Mr. JACOBS: No, I am referring to the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill). I venture to say that his amendment would not be acceptable to the British government, and if passed it would probably result in the denial to us of Imperial naturalization, which we value so highly. It will be remembered that in 1911 Sir Wilfrid Laurier brought this matter up at the Imperial Conference at London. There had been an agitation for Imperial naturalization. It was the subject of discussion on many occasions, but in 1911 we were told that such naturalization would be granted on our conforming to certain rules. Previous to that time three years was the time prescribed by us for naturalization. The Imperial government insisted upon five years' domicile. We conformed to that requirement. We conformed also in the matter of having the certificate issued by the Secretary of State. Now, as I understand it, under the English system we do not require the intervention of courts of justice at all, and inasmuch as there is practically no danger so long as a good Liberal administration is in power that the act will be in any way abused by the Secretary of State, I would be in favour of seeing that the Secretary of State obtained the powers asked for, with the proviso of course of voting to amend the bill as soon as the opposition comes into power.

Mr. McMURRAY: Mr. Chairman, I am frank to say that I do not find myself in full accord with the minister with regard to section 4 of his bill. I think the question can be considered from two points of view: first, that of protection of the country; second, that of the applicant for naturalization. As the Naturalization Act stands at present the country has twofold protection: the person desiring naturalization is required to apply personally to a judge, and the minister acting as an appellate court must review the decision of the judge. In that way the country is amply protected.

Now, naturalization is a very valuable right. It has long been settled in civilized countries that the judicial function should be kept entirely separate from the executive. And in dealing with the rights of citizenship the judicial function should exercise a very large and paramount jurisdiction. In this case we have now a court of appeal. We have many judges deciding upon applications for naturalization, and in this way we have a general view of the many judicial minds. There is a marked danger of turning this wide judicial operation into a perfunctory act by a mere department of the state. What does the proposed change involve? It is to be an inquiry by the police forces into the character of the applicant, and a report by them direct to the minister. The minister, sitting in appeal, does not see the applicant and has no opportunity of personally examining the policeman. He does not know the mental calibre of the man who is reporting; he knows nothing, except by letter or affidavit, of the man who is making the application. He proposes to extend that very unsatisfactory condition to first hand ab initio examination of all those who report. We can take the case of the average policeman, untrained in investigation, perhaps more or less prejudiced, reporting adversely in respect to the application of an individual possessed of splendid qualifications for citizenship. Like the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Millar) I think the judge who is familiar with the local situation, familiar with the calibre and character of the applicants in that locality, is by all means best qualified to decide in the matter. I do not like to see a matter of such vital importance to the individual dealt with merely by a department of the state, it is a question that should come within the scope of judicial inquiry, and I think it ought so to remain.

Mr. JACOBS: Surely an administration that nominates the judges of the Supreme Court of Canada ought to be trusted to grant a certificate of naturalization of an applicant?

Mr. MEIGHEN: But the judges after that cannot vote, while the man after he is naturalized, can.

Mr. JACOBS: Therefore the man who can vote has more power than a judge who is on the bench.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not more power, no.

Mr. McMURRAY: The difference is this: In the one case there is no interest in the matter at all but that of doing what is right. In my opinion it is better, rather than to put it under the control of one person, to have the benefit of a variety of views, those of the judges all over the land. I say that the matter is too vital and of too much importance to become a mere matter of departmental administration.

Mr. PUTNAM: It is evident from this discussion itself, and it should be reassuring, that the Secretary of State will, if this proposal is adopted, exercise merely the same powers and the same functions he is exercising now. We have the evidence that the work of the judges has been, not universally but in a substantial number of cases, so unsatisfactory that the department has ignored the report of the judges. I am not at all certain, with due respect to what I would call the eminent authority on the other side—and I say "eminent authority" in all sincerity—that the Secretary of State has not power affirmatively to naturalize a man against whom a judge has reported on regular application. I see some reason why he should have that power. I will suppose, if he had that power, that it was to cover what I might call emergent cases or special circumstances. For instance, a judge might in all honesty make a report against an applicant, and it might turn out within a short time that only those appeared against him who were malicious and spiteful and who had fabricated evidence to do him harm. That judge might die; there might be no circuit there for months. Would it not be feasible to get the facts before the Secretary of State, to show that there had been that miscarriage of justice, and let him exercise his own discretion in the matter? One could cite cases indefinitely where it might well be the prerogative of the Secretary of State to step in and grant naturalization to a man against whom the judge had technically shut the door. He might be a man who had been here five years, who was known to be an outstanding friend of Canada, yet the court might not meet in time to grant his naturalization before the occurrence of some event in connection with which he could be of some great national service. For instance, we might want to make him a delegate to some international convention. These are conceivable cases, and they are not to be sneered at merely because the man of my illustration has not up to that time been a naturalized Canadian citizen.

I could multiply illustrations well within the realm of reason to show that it is only just and sensible that the Secretary of State should have that supreme power. The right hon. leader of the Opposition rather thought that the Secretary of State should have come here armed with an opinion from the Justice department one way or the other. I would rather say that the burden was the other way. There is a clause in the act which on its face does seem to give the Secretary of State that power, and I should say that the man who disputes it should himself come here armed with an authoritative deliverance to convince us that the clause does not mean what it seems to say.

Hon. gentlemen opposite practically admit that a substantial proportion of the judges have been doing their work in a slipshod way, and the moment they admit that they admit that the present system falls down. Simply because some judges do their work in a painstaking and a thorough manner does not enable us to say that the system is a success; I would say that if three per cent of the judges go wrong the system is a failure, particularly if naturalization is as sacred a thing as hon. members opposite in both groups have insisted this afternoon and this evening. If we give the Secretary of State these powers we give him work to do to which his department greatly to its credit, is already enured. The evidence is that the judges were not doing the work; the department has had the power to grant a certificate when the judge reported adversely to the application—and they have been using an emergent power as a general power, due to the lack of thoroughness and the lack of painstaking care on the part of the judges. My own experience in this matter is limited, but it is sufficient to give you an illustration of how slipshod the method is in my experience. The application is filed and the notice is posted. Nobody reads it. I consider that a former speaker to-night was happy in the expression: "What is everybody's business is nobody's business." The judge perfunctorily says, "I will leave this until the last day of the term." and if no objection is registered it then goes through as a matter of course. I do not for a moment impugn the integrity of the judge, but I do say he was not properly vigilant, and it is evident that a large proportion of the judges have not exercised the vigilance that they should. And when a considerable number of the judges were slack in their work, the minister very naturally took it for granted that he could not depend upon the reports of any of these judges in so critical a matter as that of naturalization.

Mr. EULER: I do not propose to delay the committee at any length but I would like very briefly to refer at the outset to the amendment of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill), which has not been discussed. The amendment, as I understand it, calls for the prohibition of the granting of naturalization to any alien whose nationality in the country of origin is not revoked by that country itself. If the hon. member had included in his amendment a provision that such an applicant should be granted naturalization if he were himself willing to forswear his former allegiance I think I could support it, but I do not think that this House should accept any suggestion to keep fastened the shackles of a foreign country upon any man who has lived in this land for five years, has proved himself a worthy citizen and desires to obtain naturalization. That is all I have to say on that. I do not think the committee should have very much difficulty in rejecting the amendment of the hon. member in the way in which it is framed.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Would the hon. gentleman object to my correcting him as to what the amendment is?

Mr. EULER: I would prefer to get the correction from the hon. gentleman who moved it.

Mr. McQUARRIE: As I understand it, the amendment does not apply to the case of application for naturalization at all, but applies later on, giving the Secretary of State power to denaturalize a person who has obtained naturalization under certain circumstances.

Mr. EULER: As I understand it, the amendment calls for the denial of naturalization to men who have naturalization in other countries. Is that correct?

Mr. NEILL: No, that is not the purpose of the amendment at all. The amendment is to deal with the case where a man has been naturalized in Canada, and as the hon. member says probably put in three years perhaps five or ten years ago and it is found to-day that he is still a subject of Japan obeying its laws, carrying out its customs, and giving adherence to Japan, when all he has to do to purge himself of that obligation is to apply to Japan to obtain a certificate of expatriation. If he cannot get that certificate of expatriation he is still a Japanese subject. He may want to get it; perhaps he is unfortunate, I do not know about that; but if he fails to get it or fails to apply for it he is certainly still a Japanese subject as well as being a Canadian subject, and if the hon. gentleman wants a test of the sincerity and the genuineness of these denaturalized Japanese in seeking to affiliate themselves to Japan he has only to look to the United States where out of 90,000 eligible only 74 applied for the certificate of expatriation from their native country, and only 64 applications were granted. But of 90,000 only 74 or 75 ever sought for it.

As the hon. member for New Westminster has said, this has nothing to do whatever with the merit or demerit of granting or refusing naturalization to a Jap or anybody else. It deals with the case where a man has been pretending to be a subject of Canada and it is found years and years afterwards that he has been giving the most definite form of adherence to a foreign state.

Mr. EULER: If he is still giving definite adherence to his former state I am quite in sympathy with what the hon. member says. I think the result of the amendment if adopted would be exactly as I have indicated. It would rob a man who has obtained naturalization of his British citizenship. If the man himself cannot obtain release from the country of his former allegiance, even though he may be entirely willing and desirous of being a British subject only, he is deprived of his British citizenship. I object to that.

Mr. NEILL: I have given an instance of their willingness to debar themselves by citing the United States where out of 90,000 eligible to do so only 74 applied for expatriation.

Mr. EULER: Would the hon. gentleman answer this? If the man in question who has already been naturalized in Canada asks from the country of his former allegiance a release from his former obligation and is refused, and if he is willing to disavow himself of allegiance to his former country, would the hon. member deprive him of Canadian citizenship?

Mr. NEILL: No.

Mr. EULER: No, I would object to that. I wish to speak for a few moments on a matter that has been the subject of more serious debate, the matter of the mode of procedure for the obtaining of naturalization in this country. We have the two views. We have the present method whereby the application for naturalization goes to the judge and if approved by him, to the Secretary of State, who again may reject or approve as he sees fit. We have on the other hand, the suggestion made in the present bill that the application instead of going to the judge should go direct to the Secretary of State and be decided there without any intervention by the judge. I am free to say that when the suggestion was first made that the method of procedure should be changed I felt that it was not a step in the right direction. I thought that the judge should perhaps be the best judge as to the qualifications of the applicant for naturalization, he being on the spot, perhaps being personally acquainted with the applicant and having a more intimate knowledge than would be possible to the officials at Ottawa or even to anyone they might send out to make the investigation. But I have discussed the matter fairly well with some of the officials, with those who know, and I am led to believe that it is pretty much a matter of theory which does not work out in practice, just as some of us believe very strongly in certain theories, say free trade, which we know in actual practice cannot exactly work out in any country.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Order.

Mr. EULER: I do not wish to be misunderstood by my Progressive friends. Perhaps I gave a very unfortunate example, and I do not want them to read into it anything that I did not intend. But the principle is still true. You can carry a theory to the extreme and find that it does not work out in practice.

I for one am not one of those who would like to place an autocratic power in the hands of any official or of any member of the government and a power which he might abuse at certain times especially during an election. The only fair way and the only reasonable way, it seems to me, for the committee to arrive at a conclusion on the matter is to carefully compare in a practical way the exact results of the application of the two methods. I have outlined the first practice, the practice now in vogue, and the statement is made by those who know that the judges in their investigations of the applications of those who desire to become Canadian citizens are in so many words inefficient in the carrying out of their duties.

Now I do not care to make the charge that the judges in general throughout Canada do not properly investigate the qualifications of the various applicants for naturalization. I would not like to think they were all derelict in their duty, but I do know this, that there are cases where the judges who ought to know the law do not know the law with regard to naturalization, and when an applicant is rejected because of a lack of knowledge of the law I say that an injustice is done to him which ought not to be continued if we have any way of avoiding it. I know, for example, that a judge granted applications for naturalization although the law distinctly stated that the applicant did not have certan qualifications. He approved of the applications. They were forwarded to Ottawa to the Secretary of State and there they were rejected. All that expense and delay could not have occurred if the application had gone in the first place to the Secretary of State. He at least knows the law and the various amendments that are made from time to time. I have known other judges who have accepted illiterates and who have rejected men on account of their racial origin, which under the law they were not entitled to do.

[Mr. Euler.]

I take pretty well the opinion of the men who have been in charge of this work; I do not think there is any member here who is well qualified to judge as to the merits of the question. I am not so very much concerned as to the probability that the Secretary of State—as the member of a partisan government if you like—is going to abuse his power. I would not even like to say that I would be very suspicious of the Secretary of State of any other government which might have come into power —if it were a government led by the present leader of the Opposition, or a government led by the leader of the Progressive party. I am free to say that I have a little more confidence in the integrity and good faith of the public men of Canada. And even if they were inclined to be derelict in their duty it would mean that they would have to have the collusion of the men who are, if I may say so, the paid servants of the people of Canada—the deputy minister, the under secretary of state, and all the other officials; and any secretary of state who would dare, just prior to an election, to issue wholesale certificates of naturalization to aliens who he thought would vote for the party which he represented would find, I think, it would not be a very paying thing to do. He would find that his government and his party were responsible and I believe it would do him a great deal more harm than good.

We should not shrink very much from placing the power which is proposed to be given in the hands of the Secretary of State, because after all he is the responsible minister of a government, and if the people of this country have placed upon him responsibility and power it is right that he should exercise it, and if he does not live up to his duty punish him when next he appears before the electors. There are certain safeguards provided even now. In the first place when the application goes in it must be supported by the opinions of two reputable men in the community from which the applicant comes. In the second place if it is found that naturalization is granted to a man who is not worthy of it the Secretary of State and the government have the power to revoke that naturalization.

Now, we will say that a general election is upon us because it seems to be the fear of those who are in opposition that when a general election is impending the government in power will naturalize those whom they believe are favourable to themselves, and perhaps withhold naturalization from those who are opposed ot them. As I say I do not believe there is very much likelihood of their doing that but they can do it at the present time. We will say there are two candidates. One is Conservative and the other is Liberal, and they come along with perhaps one or two hundred names of men whom they desire to see naturalized. We will say that a Liberal government is in power as is the case just now. The Liberal gets his men naturalized. The Conservative cannot get his men naturalized at all if the Secretary of State—

Mr. MILLAR: Can they be naturalized without the three months elapsing? Must not the notices be posted up for three months?

Mr. EULER: Yes, but surely it is pretty well known longer than three months in advance that a general election is pending, although not always. But this is true: Even throughout the whole term of parliament with a certain government in power the Secretary of State, if he were so inclined, could reject every application for naturalization from persons he thought were politically opposed to him I think it is entirely unlikely that such would be the case.

I am not very strong in my opinion with regard to this matter. I believe that the officials of the department of the Secretary of State are entirely honest in the attitude they have taken, that their desire is to serve the public interest. I believe that the safeguards which would surround the whole situation in case the bill is adopted are ample and are quite sufficient in the interest of the country. It is for that reason that I feel, while supporting the bill as it stands at present, that if some other suggestion could be made that would satisfy the objections of those who are opposed, I would be very glad. I would like to see useful suggestions advanced rather than mere criticisms. To say that we must adhere to the old method is really not intelligent argument. If there are suggestions calculated to effect improvement I think hon. gentlemen opposite should make them, because the Secretary of State has intimated that he is willing to consider suggestions. As to the amendment of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni I feel that the committee ought to reject it.

The CHAIRMAN: Is it the pleasure of hon. members that the committee should rise?

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): One moment. Before the committee rises I wish to make a statement to correct a possible misunderstanding. I gathered from the remarks of the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Stork) that he, at least, understood me to impute some lack of bona fides to the Secretary of State in this matter and that I inferred, or attempted to infer, that the Secretary of State desired to assume autocratic power,—unnecessary autocratic power,—and to obtain the opportunity to naturalize orientals. Nothing was further from my thoughts, and I regret it if any member has understood me to draw such an inference. What I did intend to make clear was, that in my opinion the necessity for the judge's favourable report on an application, and that it was a wise provision to retain in the law, not that the Secretary of State—in this instance at any rate—would not give fair consideration to any application that came before him. What I say is, that the Secretary of State should have the advantage of the judge's report as well. As regards the refusal by the British Columbia judge to naturalize Japanese. I merely cited that as a case to show that the judicial investigation is a real one, that the judge exercises discretion and has power, and that unless he gives a favourable report, the Secretary of State cannot grant a certificate of naturalization. This I say is a wise and proper precaution but I do not, and did not, intend in the slightest degree to impute lack of bona fides to the Secretary of State in this instance.

RADIOTELEGRAPH ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Marine and Fisheries) moved the second reading of Bill No. 144, to amend the Radiotelegraph Act.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think the minister should explain what the law is and how this bill changes it.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Explanations were given when the resolution which preceded this bill was considered in committee, but I have no objection to repeat what was then said. Section 10 of the Radiotelegraph Act gives the Governor in Council the right to prescribe a tariff of fees to be paid for licenses and for examination for certificates of proficiency held and issued under the provision of this act. The aim of the bill is to add a certain paragraph for the purpose of authorizing the payment of a portion of that license fee to a provincial government or a private company for services given in connection with the operation of broadcasting stations and for services performed for the minister in connection with the licensing and inspection of stations.

Within the last two years radiotelegraphy has made considerable progress. Last year there were 10,000 licenses in Canada, and this year it is estimated that 50,000 licenses will be issued. Those licenses are mainly, almost exclusively, for receiving apparatus. Last year sixty-three licenses were issued for broadcast transmitting stations, but only forty were operated. This year only twenty-five licenses had been renewed. Those stations divide themselves into stations operated by big firms selling receiving apparatus, stations operated by newspapers for their advertisement, and then there are also broadcasting stations operated by provinical governments or private companies. The cost of establishing and maintaining a broadcasting station is rather high. The establishment may cost from $7,000 to $20,000, and the cost of upkeep is from $2,000 to several thousand dollars a year. Therefore, it is rather expensive, and many of the present broadcasting stations are going to discontinue.

This bill is to meet specially the situation in Manitoba, where there were two broadcasting stations, one operated by the Free Press and the other by the Tribune. Both have been abandoned on account of the cost. The provincial government operates the telephone system in that province, and it is quite prepared to operate a broadcasting station, but it wants to have something in return. We think it is only fair that the thousands of persons who are getting enjoyment out of their receiving apparatus should pay something to the broadcasting station that supplies the enjoyment, and the idea is to give part of the license fee to the provincial government or to any company that will operate a broadcasting station. The licenses might be collected by the province itself, part of the license to be kept by the province for the cost of operating the broadcasting station and for the cost of collecting the licenses, and the other share to come to the federal government. This is the system in force in England. In England the cost of a receiving license is $2.50, $1.25 of which goes to the government and $1.25 to the broadcasting company. So far the license fee in Canada for receiving stations has been only $1. It is estimated that about 50,000 licenses will be issued this year, so that would give an amount of $50,000. The cost of a license for a broadcasting station is $50.

When this legislation was in committee on the resolution, the former Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) wanted to know the expenditure and the revenue last year. The revenue received on account of license fees last year up to the 31st March amounted to $16,200. The cost of inspection service, including administration expenses at Ottawa, amounted to $19,250.18, and the cost of issuing licenses was $5,522.80, making a total of $24,772.98. It must be noted that part of that cost of inspection goes for the inspection of the 160 commercial and eight navigation stations, the 255 Canadian ship stations and all foreign ships visiting Canadian ports carrying Canadian passengers, and this inspection would have to be made in any event. The estimated expenditure for the present year is:

Inspection service..	$24,920
Issue of licenses..	6,100
Total..	$31,020

The estimated revenue from license fees is approximately $50,000. This bill is for the purpose of giving to the Governor in Council power to make arrangements with a provincial government or any responsible government to broadcast and to keep part of the license fees for doing that service.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Gordon in the Chair.

On section 1—Governor in Council may authorize payment of portion of license fees to provincial government, private company or other party for services rendered.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Why should the whole cost of issuing licenses run into something like $5,000 or $6,000? What is the special expense in connection with issuing licenses?

Mr. LAPOINTE: In the large cities, Montreal, Toronto, even Quebec, there are officers specially employed for that purpose. In Montreal, last month, the first month of the present fiscal year, over 3,000 licenses have been issued. A special service is required for that work.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How does the licensing of these machines come under federal jurisdiction?

Mr LAPOINTE: It has always been under federal jurisdiction.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not deny that. I see the bill was passed in 1913.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is similar to the telegraph. It is interprovincial; it is national; it is even international. We have conventions with other countries.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It may be based on some treaty, some convention; but really I cannot see any other ground. The bill, however, seems to be all right.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

CANADA HIGHWAYS ACT

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved the second reading of Bill No. 151 to extend the period of the Canada Highways Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King, the House adjourned at 11.15 p.m.

Friday, May 4, 1923

The House met at three o'clock.

THE BUDGET

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Can the Minister of Finance now definitely fix the date for the presentation of the budget?

Mr. FIELDING: I had contemplated presenting it on Thursday next, but as that day, I find, will be a holiday I will now fix it for Friday If anything happens to necessitate a change there will be ample notice in advance.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (North Toronto): As a private member may I ask a question? We have now entered the fourth month of the session, and I should be glad if the Prime Minister could tell us whether it would be possible to expedite the business of the House by holding more frequent sittings. On Wednesday we sit for three hours, and most other days only six hours. Last session the Railway committee sat for three months and brought down an important report practically a day or so before parliament prorogued. Important committees are now sitting, one of which is the committee on Banking and Commerce, and these committees have not yet reported. Can the Prime Minister tell us what the rest of the sessional programme will be? As I say, we are now in the fourth month of the session and something should be done to speed up the business.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I do not know that the government can do anything in particular towards expediting the work of the committees. So far as the work of this House is concerned, I think, it is proceeding pretty well. It rests, I think, largely with my hon. friend and other members opposite as to how quickly we shall get through.

CAPE BRETON NORTH AND VICTORIA

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. MEIGHEN: Has the writ been issued yet for the election to be held in Cape Breton North and Victoria?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not yet.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Has the government not changed its policy in regard to that constituency? There was great expedition in the case of North Essex.

Mr. GRAHAM: The result will be the same.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If it is, the hon. gentleman will be defeated.

U.S. LABOUR DELEGATES DETAINED

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It is said that importunity will move even an unjust judge. I wonder whether the Acting Minister of Immigration (Mr. Stewart) can tell us yet what has been done in the Howat case.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The officer in charge at McAdam Junction has rejected Howat, but has passed Myerscough into the country temporarily. So far I have not had notice of appeal from Howat.

CATTLE SHIPPED TO GREAT BRITAIN

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. MILLAR: Has the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) received any notification from the British authorities that the first shipment of store cattle to Great Britain was not entirely free from tuberculosis? According to a report in a Regina paper it would appear that they were not.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No report of that nature has been brought to my attention. As a matter of fact animals shipped for slaughter do not require to be tested for tuberculosis before entry into the United Kingdom. The conditions regarding tuberculosis apply only to breeding animals.

SINGAPORE NAVAL BASE

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. WOODSWORTH: In view of the vote of $50,000,000 by the House of Commons at Westminster for the naval base at Singapore, and the comments in the British parliament and in the press that this signifies strained or possibly strained relations between Great Britain and Japan, I would ask whether the government of my right hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie King) has acquiesced in this policy which is being pursued by the British government at the present time?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think it is for the British government to determine their own policy and for us to express no opinions concerning it.

CANADA HIGHWAYS ACT

On motion of Hon. Mr. Graham, Bill No. 151 to extend the period of the Canada Highways Act was considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved the second reading of Bill No. 152 respecting the Canadian National Railways.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the object of this bill is to allow the Canadian National Railway Company to do its own express business. Formerly there was the Canadian Northern Express Company, which afterwards became the Canadian National Express Company; there was the Canadian Express Company, which operated over the Grand Trunk and whose stock was vested in the Grand Trunk Company; and there was the Intercolonial Express Company, which had no connection with the Intercolonial Railway so far as ownership was concerned, being a distinct company organized by other parties for the purpose of doing express business over the Intercolonial Railway. Eventually the Canadian Express Company took over the Intercolonial Express Company. This combined company was afterwards amalgamated with the Canadian National Express Company in one organization. The stock of these various express companies of course is now vested in the Canadian National Railway Company, and for the purpose of economy the board has recommended that the Canadian National Railway Company itself be given power to do its own express business.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

On section 1—Canadian National Railway Company authorized to carry on express company business:

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why does the minister think that this is going to be the right method for the Canadian National Railway Company when it appears to be the wrong method for successful privately managed companies? The Canadian Pacific, as everyone knows, operates its express work through a subsidiary company—the Dominion Express Company. Other railway companies do likewise. I am not sure that the practice is universal, but it is almost so. Here, apparently, the practice is being changed. What is really to be gained by change? Of course, I am quite aware that just as the railways were amalgamated so the express business should be too, but why is it not amalgamated into one company operated as a separate company, thus getting whatever advantage the private railway companies get by that method?

Mr. GRAHAM: We get away from one more of the many companies that we have in connection with the Canadian National Railways. I could see some object in a private railway company having a separate express company in which there are sometimes other relationships that those interested in would not wish the railway company to be directly associated with, but I could not see any advantage of such a situation to a railway in which all the stock is owned by the government. There is no stock of the Canadian National Express Company distributed among the public; there is stock of the other express companies outstanding.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Dominion Express Company?

Mr. GRAHAM: I think so. Maybe the Canadian Pacific Railway Company practically owns all of the stock, but I think you will find some of it in the names of other people. As the stock of the Canadian National Express Company is absolutely in the hands of the government, the board thought it would be more convenient and economical if the railway company itself performed all the duties and functions of the express company.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not see why it would not be true of the Canadian Pacific Railway if it is true of the Canadian National Railway, because I have always been informed very definitely that the Canadian Pacific Railway owns all the stock of the Dominion Express Company, and this company does no business save with the Canadian Pacific, just as our express company, as I understood it would do no business except with the Canadian National. Besides, the merging of the express company in the parent company, extinguishing the separate corporation, if it is justified in the case of the express business, would surely, be equally justified in the case of the telegraph business. The telegraph business is still carried on by the Great Northwest Telegraph Company. Does the minister know any reason why he is dealing wth one and not with the other?

Mr. GRAHAM: I do not know of any reason. I know we have one telegraph company called the Canadian National Telegraph Company.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, but the stock, as I understood, is owned by the other company.

Mr. GRAHAM: That may be. The question of the telegraph service has never been discussed. This matter has been discussed by the board pretty thoroughly, and they have arrived at the conclusion that there are economic reasons for taking this authority to perform the express business as a branch of the railway management rather than as a separate branch.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister will remember that after he presented his railway budget I expressed the opinion that in the re-organization of the amalgamated railway systems upon the taking in of the Grand Trunk and upon the accession of Sir Henry Thornton there had been no very sincere attempt at getting the advantages of amalgamation. The struggle seemed to be more to find some place for everybody with a sufficiently dignified title. Now I come to the point as regards the merging of the express company in the Canadian National Railway. It is a fact, is it not, that Mr. Robb, all his life in charge of the mechanical department of the Grand Trunk, brought up in that department and the head of it for a long time until very very lately, has now been made vice-president in charge of express business? And does not the minister see that the purpose of this merger is just to enable the company to put Mr. Robb in with the title of vice-president?

Mr. GRAHAM: No.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well, it looks very much like it to me.

Mr. GRAHAM: Not at all.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is it not a fact that Mr. Robb has never had any express experience? He is vice-president now of express and colonization, in respect to neither of which has he had a day's experience; and I understand his assistant is in just the same position—each brought through and living their lives in the mechanical service. I have not a word to say against Mr. Robb in that service. I believe he was a success, one of the few—

Mr. GRAHAM: He was connected with motive power in the first place.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, that is in the mechanical department. In that service he was brought up; there he served all his life. He is now a man of about seventy and he is made vice-president in charge of express business and colonization. It is a very poor encouragement to the men who have served their lives in the express business, who have pushed themselves forward by efficient work from post to post, to find that the big post, toward which, of course, all strive, is simply taken over by a man who knows nothing at all of it.

Mr. GRAHAM: My right hon. friend's preliminary remarks respecting Mr. Robb may have been all right, but his conclusions are not so accurate. Mr. Robb was given charge of transportation long before this board came into existence.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Just for a few months.

Mr. GRAHAM: No, for several years. I have had business to do with Mr. Robb in that connection. He was there long before the amalgamation took place. My right hon. friend shakes his head, but I know; I happen to live on the line of the Grand Trunk and I have had dealings with it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Was it two years?

Mr. GRAHAM: A good deal more than that. I had dealings with him at Brockville on questions of transportation long before there was any amalgamation. But, as to his connection with this company, what my hon. friend says is all new to me. The reasons given by the board I believe to be sound. They say they can more economically manage the express company and give, perhaps, better service, by having it as a branch of the railway company rather than as a subsidiary.

Mr. HANSON: What is the position now occupied by Mr. Hayes, late traffic manager of the Canadian National Railways?

Mr. GRAHAM: I think Mr. Hayes will be connected with the express business, rather than Mr. Robb.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If Mr. Robb is not being put in charge of the express business, as the newspapers tell us, what is he doing?

Mr. GRAHAM: I do not know that I can give that information. He is in charge of work in Montreal, as vice-president.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: In charge of what?

Mr. GRAHAM: Several things—railway insurance, for one. I cannot at the moment recall his exact duties.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The papers say —and I do not know that they are not correct—I would naturally think that the responsible minister would know better than they did—that Mr. Robb, who was in the motive power branch during at least seventy-five per cent of his railroad life, has been made vice-president in charge of express and colonization, and that Mr. Hayes is the successor of Mr. Pullen, formerly manager of the Canadian Express Company, the Grand Trunk express company. My hon. friend talks about economies. We want them; now let us know what they will be. What economies will result? How many dismissals are going to be made, and where is the work going to be done?

Mr. GRAHAM: I do not know anything about the details of how these things are to be managed. The board make a representation to me that they can save money and serve the public just as well by doing away with one company and making it a branch of the railway company. The board will have to be left to carry on the management as they think best.

Mr. FORKE: Does the board make all these appointments?

Mr. GRAHAM: Surely.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend need not think we want the details of the business.

Mr. GRAHAM: The hon. gentleman asked me how many men were going to be dismissed.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The question is, what economies can be effected? Did the board say that in the name of economy they wanted to wipe these things out? Did they go even that far?

Mr. GRAHAM: No.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then it comes down to this: The string is pulled; the board says, "Get rid of these things, because economy will result," and my hon. friend does not know a single detail as to what economy will be brought about. Not even an approximation is given. Did my hon. friend discuss it at all? Has he any information except that bald statement?

Mr. GRAHAM: I have some information as to the returns from the operation of the express company and the number of employees. I think I am following out the policy announced by my hon. friend himself that when it comes to the details, that is a matter for the board. When the board makes a recommendation that looks reasonable to me, I accept it. Sometimes I do not have to decide upon it, but in this case parliament has either to accept or to reject it. If, of course, parliament does not want to accept it, I cannot help it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think anyone would suggest that the details of management should not be left to the board. I never heard anyone suggest that, save hon. gentlemen opposite when they were in opposition. That principle, of course, must be adhered to. But when the Canadian National Board presents legislation to the House through the Minister of Railways, the House is entitled to know something of what is to be done under it, to have something on which to base an opinion whether this new system of operation is in the interests of economy. The minister asks us to go at it blindly. He says we are told it will be economical, therefore it is all right. Now, as to Mr. Robb, he is for the first time in his life placed in charge of a vast express system. He never in his career had anything to do with the express business. He had to do with motive power, which is part of the mechanical department. Naturally transportation would be connected with motive power, though during the last two or three years he had, I thought, less than that to do with transportation. But he never had anything to do which was connected with the least degree with the express or colonization business, and he is now made vice-president in charge of both, at a salary, I understand, of $25,000 a year. How many more of these vice-presidents are there?—for they all receive $25,000 a year—and are there others who never had any experience whatever in the work that is committed to them at this large salary?

Mr. GRAHAM: Well, I have to go back to what I said before: If parliament wants me to interfere with the work of the Canadian National Board to the extent of knowing the qualifications of every man they select, knowing what he is to do and how much he is to be paid, then we need not have the Canadian National Board; we had better put it where it was in the case of the old Intercolonial, when the minister was the last word in the matter of management. I want to give everything to parliament that parliament should have, because parliament has to supply the money. But this is a case of internal management. The men whom we have entrusted with the task of managing the system come to me as minister, the medium through whom they have to approach parliament, and say that they can effect economies in this way. I do not think I ought to be asked for details of what this man does or what that man does; that is a matter in connection with which I take the advice of the Canadian National Board.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Nothing could be a greater contrast than the position of the minister to that of his friends when they were on this side of the House. I wish to take exactly the same position that I took then: I do not believe in details of management being revealable every day or discussable in the House of Commons, and never did. At the same time I realize, as I realized when in power, that there are some matters in connection with which the details might be brought before the House at the proper time —when that might be done without interfering with the actual day to day management, and when all the doings of the company could be scrutinized by hon. members. If the minister himself was not in the House at the time, there are others here on all sides who were, and those who were will remember that in the session of 1921 I moved the appointment of a committee of this House to review the following subjects—I speak now from memory: The first was the system of management by a directorate of the national system with a view to recommending improvements in the method of appointment, the constitution of the directorate, or otherwise. The second object was to determine what should be contained, and to what extent details should appear, in the report of the company. The third object was to determine at what time and under what circumstances the matters of management might be made known to the House of Commons and to the Senate. While management is on and while they are hiring this man and firing that man, buying coal here and refusing to buy it there, we admitted and argued strenuously that it was impossible to have these things subjected to daily scrutiny, but we always said that the time came when the House had a right to inquire into everything in management, and we asked that committee to ascertain when that time came and how these matters could be brought before the House. The fourth object was to recommend to the House whether and for what purpose the committee so established should become, and become known as, a Standing Committee of the House. The matter of steamship management was included in the National Railways I believe I have now given virtually completely the purposes of that committee. It was presided over by the present member for East Hamilton (Mr. Mewburn). The committee was appointed, however, only about three weeks before it was necessary for the House to close owing to the conference. The committee really never finished its work. Its report, however, is of value. This House has never followed the report of that committee. This government, made up of those who, while in opposition, screamed for details from day to day, demanding that everything be known right off, has never proceeded along the line even that the late government took toward the appointment of a committee to complete the work of the committee that was then appointed to find out the right system under which the scrutiny that, undoubtedly, we as representatives of the people ought to make of National Railway affairs and National Railway operation at the proper time, could be made. That scrutiny, I say, can be exercised, but this government has never moved a step to establish such a system, and the consequence is that now, a year and a half after they came into office, this House is practically blindfolded to the National Railways, and there is no method whatever by which the scrutiny we ought to exersise at the proper time can be made.

Mr. HANSON: I would like to ask the minister if he has any information as to the termination of the contract of the Dominion Express Company with the Canadian Government Railways? If so, why is it being terminated? It might appear to be a duplication of the same service, but in so far as there was competition between the Canadian Express Company and the Dominion Express Company the communities which were served jointly by these two companies got very much better service than they will get if the contract with the Dominion Express Company is terminated.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend is correct; I am not disputing it. The same thing would apply to the Canadian Pacific Railway. But our express company is not allowed to do business on the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. HANSON: Why should they not be?

Mr. GRAHAM: They are not. If the company are going to run this as a business proposition we have to let them run it that way. The public must be served, that is true, but there is no reason why the Canadian National Railway Company doing an express business should ask somebody else to go into its own line and take its business away providing it is serving the public. The Canadian Pacific Railway does not do business that way. The first thing is service to the public. If that is neglected we ought to have something to say. Upon the recommendation of the board I did give the Dominion Express Company notice that on all our lines we would do our own express business, as they have never allowed us to do business on their lines, as I understand it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I just recall to memory that the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) was one of the most enthusiastic supporters of the resolution to which I referred for the appointment of a committee and the devising of a plan for the examination into Canadian National affairs. Indeed, if I remember rightly, he wanted to go further even than we went. He has been remarkably silent this session. I think he might favour the House now with a statement of his view and just how far he suffers with patience the present policy.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): I remember that last year I asked for the appointment of a committee—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, no, the hon. member is wrong. He was very quiet last year. It was two years ago he asked for it.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Two sessions ago, and I think I very plainly stated then the purpose I had in mind in asking for the constitution of such a committee. I had in mind particularly an inquiry into the matter of the operations of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine. I was fairly well satisfied with the information I got. I do not remember that I declared myself particularly one way or the other in respect to the appointment of a committee to deal with Canadian National Railway matters. I think I espoused the idea some time ago, I do not know how far back, that it might be advisable to have a standing parliamentary committee before whom and by whom all matters relative to railway administration might be discussed so that we would avoid all discussion in the House.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Indeed that was the very purpose of the hon. member's motion, but he has not yet explained how he is satisfied to let matters go along without any committee.

Mr. GRAHAM: Confidence is increasing.

Mr. FORKE: I am at a little loss to understand this situation exactly. I understand that the board of railway management has control of employment and the operation of the railways. Just how is the minister going to get this information as to what is being paid to the employees, how they are employed and generally the method of securing them? Is it the idea to have some committee to which the railway board will report, and to have its report come before parliament for discussion?

Mr. MEIGHEN: At the right time.

Mr. FORKE: Then what steps would parliament take supposing it is not satisfied with the operations of the railway board? Would parliament over-ride the decisions of the railway board in that case? For instance, in connection with this express company, if parliament thought that a wrong appointment had been made would it interfere with what the railway board had done? What is the meaning of the whole thing?

Mr. LAPOINTE: We would get into a fine mess then.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Minister of Marine (Mr. Lapointe) says it would be a fine mess. I would just suggest to the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) that he read the speech of the minister two years ago demanding that very thing. I might also say, and I say it without any sense of malice whatever, that if the hon. member will at the same time read the speech of the hon. member now sitting to his right (Mr. Crerar) he will find the greatest possible cause for the establishment of such a committee. We did contend, we always contended, that we could not directly as a parliament or as a government control the operation of the railway, and we thought it was only consistent with that that the management should not be harassed from day to day by having the matter of operation wrangled over in this House, disclosed to it and made the subject of discussion and debate. But we had to fight heroically to maintain our ground against the assaults of hon. gentlemen here, who claimed that the dismissal of every man, or the purchase of every ton of coal, should, if demanded be made a matter of discussion right on the floor of parliament. But we went this far ourselves: That this was the place where railway expenditures should be made known, but made known at a time when they would not harass the management of the system. Consequently the committee was appointed to look into the whole situation and see when, and by what means, those things should be known. Now the hon. member asks for what purpose should they be made known? Just in order that the people of Canada would know about it and realize how their railway system had been managed. If such things, for example, were revealed as disclosed a lack of care on the part of the directorate, then the very fact that they were revealed would bring home to the government the need of altering that directorate. Undoubtedly no one could argue, no one did argue, that it was not necessary that these matters at the proper time be made known, and made known in whatever detail hon. members might desire. The only thing we wanted to guard was that we did not so pry into matters of operation while operation was on as to harass the management of the system. Now, I think I have made the matter clear, and I know that two years ago there was no difference of opinion that we should go that far. There were others who argued we should go far further, a great deal further—that we should go into these matters at any time. But all I ask now is that we do go as far as the House, as every hon. member of the House, was ready to go two years ago and that a committee should be appointed to work the matter out, and complete the work of the committee of two years ago.

Mr. FORKE: I can only say I was not expressing an opinion, I simply wanted information.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Agreements with other companies or municipalities:

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the effect of this clause?

Mr. CHURCH: The effect of this clause 2 is to enable the directors of the National Railways to enter into an agreement, which they cannot do now, for the sale of part of a national railway to a municipality. At present they can only sell to another railway company. The object of the bill is to enable the directors of the National Railway to sell part of the Toronto Suburban railway to the city of Toronto. There has been a change of policy on the part of the new board of directors. The old board had a friendly working arrangement with the Hydro-power municipalities of central Ontario, including the Niagara, Hamilton, and Toronto districts. The Hydro-power municipalities are 346 in number. These have a cheap light and power system of their own which is operating successfully and paying a large surplus. They wished to go into the railway business and to take in certain railways operated by the National system and establish a radial system of their own, including the Toronto Eastern, the Niagara and St. Catharines, and the Toronto Suburban. The by-laws for this purpose were adopted by the interested municipalities. No politics intervened in connection with this scheme. Liberals and Conservatives alike worked together from the start of the Hydro in the interests of improved transportation by radials and the people's own light and power scheme which operates at cost.

The plan proposed would have the effect of relieving the National railways of these three radials and heavy deficits. The people of Toronto have recently taken over the street railway system there. They have spent $17,000,000 in betterments, have rebuilt 140 miles of track, and are to pay nearly $12,000,000 as a result of an arbitration for the acquirement of the Toronto street railway. They have eliminated private ownership of the street railway franchise within the borders of the city and all other electric franchises except the small section referred to, the Toronto Suburban railway within the city limits. It is to consummate the purchase of this line within the city that the present proposed legislation is necessary. The acquisition by the city of the Mackenzie and Mann radial lines running in various directions in the county of York left the railway in question the only line not under the control of the municipality. Arrangements have been made for taking this line over, and arbitrators have been appointed for that purpose. The policy of the old board of directors of the National system was to work harmoniously with the Hydro in rural and urban municipalities. An arrangement had been entered into to sell these three roads to the Hydro municipalities interested: first, the radial system in the Niagara district known as the Niagara, St. Catharines and Toronto railway; second, the Toronto and Eastern railway, to be built from Toronto to Bowmanville, partly constructed; third, the Toronto Suburban railway running partly through the city and over 62 miles of track to Guelph partly on the highway and partly on a private right of way. The by-laws, based on the options obtained with the old board of directors of the National railways were submitted to the people and carried and options for the purchase of the three roads were given to the municipalities affected in the districts in which the three roads were. The ratepayers thoroughly discussed the project, the Hydro Commission engaged experts in the United States to study the question from the standpoints of engineering, commerce, traffic and policy, and decided to carry out the plans. Some of these municipalities are represented in this House by Liberals, others by Conservatives. The by-laws were carried by large majorities. What happened after the vote had been taken and the bonds for the purchase of these roads had been deposited in the proper quarter. An election was held, a new government came in, a new railway board was appointed and they went back on these solemn agreements and options with the Hydro.

I may say that in the operation of this radial railway scheme Liberals and Conservatives are united. There has been no politics in the administration of the Hydro Electric Power Commission of Ontario, the object is to carry out a cheap light, heat, power and transportation scheme at cost and give proper service. In Toronto private ownership has disappeared in a light, power and transportation sense. The municipality has bought out the private companies and they were glad to get out. In the past under private ownership the operation of these radials created large deficits; but the municipalities by rebuilding the line and carrying out certain betterments and economies will soon place the lines upon a paying basis, and they are now giving most efficient service. What has happened in consequence of the change in the directors of the Canadian National Railways? The President, Sir Henry Thornton, had scarcely been installed in office when he sent a telegram to the Board of Trade of the city of Toronto going back on the radial options given and virtually declaring war. At that time an election was pending, the people were voting on the various hydro radial by-laws to which I have referred, they wanted to be left alone, they desired to help the National railways through the medium of hydro radials of the new plans as Ontario has always done. As I say there are 346 municipalities directly interested in the Hydro Electric and radial schemes. They have no quarrel with private ownership. They respect the men who went into the privately-owned light and power companies and who bore the heat and burden of the day and then sold out to the Hydro. But the owners of these private systems wanted to sell out and the municipalities bought them out. Sir Henry Thornton, as I say, sent a telegram to the Board of Trade of Hamilton which upset the proposed hydro radial schemes by which so many municipalities had planned to go ahead with the extension and operation of their own hydro radial system. In connection with the acquisition of the Toronto Suburban railway a letter was written the Board of Control of Toronto by Mr. Walter Gow of Blake, Lash and Cassels. It was referred to in a report to the city council in this question before the board of control. I will not read his letter but he says that the bondholders have bonded the entire road from Toronto to Guelph and they were not going to be allowed to sell part of the road or the bonds on the whole would come due. The bondholders would set up the "doctrine of severance" in law, and if part were sold the bonds on all would become due. So I contend that the government cannot sell part of this road legally to the city, or the doctrine I have referred to would apply and the debentures on all the road would become due.

If this section is passed to-day what will be the result? The National Railways can sell this road to a municipality. I have no objection to the second part of the section, to enable the Canadian National to sell the entire road, but I object to the Canadian National Railways coming around after the hydro municipalities have a radial scheme of their own validated by the people at the polls and for which the municipalities are willing to pay, after private ownership has proven a failure in its operation of the three Mackenzie and Mann roads in the district, and after the government agreed to let them go to the Hydro—I say I do object to having Sir Henry Thornton upset all this.

The Toronto suburban roads have gone behind $70,000 since September 1, as the board of control's report which I have here shows. The acceptance of the offer means that the city of Toronto will have to pay the deficit incurred by these lines, which will amount to about $70,000, and about $190,000 for the city sections of the Toronto Suburban. I cannot understand why Sir Henry Thornton comes along and wants to spend a lot more of the money of the taxpayers of Canada on three radial railways which railways should be taken over by the municipalities and without a dollar's cost to Canada. The municipalities are willing and eager to take them over and to release the government of this country from any further liability and all the large capital expenditures and deficits, and will rebuild them without cost to the country and incorporate them in a hydro system. If the proposition is accepted it will save the country millions of dollars. The people's own Hydro Electric radial will act as feeders for the National Railways and millions of dollars of business for the National in the future would have been obtained by Sir Henry Thornton and his directors if he had sold these radial roads to the municipalities and let them operate them. He came along and upset it all after the people of Toronto had carried by-laws to take over the two roads—the Toronto and Eastern and the Toronto Suburban. The people of the district from Toronto down to Bowmanville had carried by-laws to take over as a hydro radial the Toronto and Eastern partly built which would have been a great financial success. The people in the suburban districts around Toronto through the constituency of the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) had carried by-laws. So had the people in the municipalities from up to Halton and they were to thus have a radial system of their own which would have solved their difficulties, and would have brought the farm produce into the city at all hours of the day, thus solving under-production and unemployment and conferring a great boon on the people of many counties in central Ontario.

Now Sir Henry Thornton comes along and proposes a radial system of his own, known as the National radial scheme for the Toronto district. I venture to say no practical man who knows anything about radials will approve of the scheme and that it will never pay the fixed charges on the proposed road. In the first place he proposes to electrify the Toronto and Eastern and link it up with the old belt line on the Don and then connect with the Guelph section of the Toronto Suburban. As I say, it will go along the old belt line and across the northern part of the city north of St. Clair avenue and through the city of Toronto and York county and link up with the Guelph system of the Toronto Suburban. That proposal is absurd and will be a huge failure for this reason: The city of Toronto is spending $26,000,000 in rebuilding the Toronto harbour and one of the main reasons why they are spending that money themselves has been to eliminate level crossings on the water front and in the city proper where many people have been killed in past years, where traffic is blocked and where the conditions have become intolerable. After we signed a viaduct agreement with the government of Can-4 p.m. ada, the Grand Trunk Railway, and the Canadian Pacific Railway to build a viaduct and eliminate all level crossings on the water front, it seems to me a pity that we cannot have this viaduct built. Now Sir Henry Thornton comes along to the north and will establish sixteen level crossings in the northern part of the city of Toronto, and the township of York at the following streets: Bowie avenue, Bromley, Rowland, Fourth and Fifth streets, Sydney avenue, Dufferin street, Rosebury avenue, Sixth street, Second street, Cheyne avenue, Hilltop avenue Mayfair avenue and city line In other words, it is going to take $32,000,000 presently and in the future to eliminate the sixteen level crossings which with one sweep, without consulting the municipalities, Sir Henry Thornton proposes to establish for his radial in and to the north and west of the city of Toronto.

This radial scheme will never pay the interest on the bonds. The people's own system of radials is what the people of the city and the farmers want. They carried the by-laws for their own system by a large majority, in many cases by three to one in the Toronto district, and the people's own hydro radial system was to run along the water front on elevated tracks with no level crossings. The railways come in on elevated tracks. It is a fast express service that the people want. Sir Henry Thornton's scheme will use the Toronto and Eastern and the old belt line will electrify them and run over them, and will involve sixteen level crossings. Not only that, but he comes along after the city of Toronto has spent $30,000,000 to acquire the Toronto railway and provide betterments, parallels part of the city line, and does a local business.

I am very much surprised if this is what we are to expect from the Canadian National Railways and I think we might as well close up altogether if they are going to spend millions in the foolish and unnecessary manner proposed here, and establish sixteen level crossings over the township of York and Scarborough and the city of Toronto after we had in good faith made an agreement with the government to have our own system without cost to Canada, spent millions on the water front to improve the harbour and eliminate level crossings, acquired our own light and power scheme, and taken over our street railway system. I am surprised that Sir Henry Thornton should come along and propose such an absurd scheme involving the creation of sixteen more level crossings. The privately-owned Mackenzie and Mann roads were glad to sell out to the city of Toronto as they had deficits on their radials and I think there was just as good business ability in the Mackenzie and Mann Company as there is in the management of the Canadian National road.

This Sir Henry Thornton radial scheme has not the confidence of the people of the county of York. I will leave that to the hon. member for West York, and other members from that district. The people of this district, Liberals and Conservatives alike, wanted their own radial programme and the people of the York district will not back up this new radial proposition. It is not their own scheme but a scheme which the people do not want, which will add to the deficit of the National Railways by millions of dollars, and will establish a system of level crossings, the like of which is not to be found in the city of Toronto to-day. There are 320 hydro municipalities that want to be the friends of the National Railways and to spend their money on a radial scheme of their own to do this work which the Dominion government should never be asked to do. The hydro radials would act as feeders to the Canadian National. Why should Sir Henry Thornton put forward the proposition now before us, and why should we be told that this money is going to be spent for the benefit of the farmers of York when they do not want it? It could not be called a work for the general advantage of Canada by the widest stretch of imagination, yet we are going to spend millions of the taxpayers' money to put this radial proposition through. The people want their own hydro radial system and they want an elevated fast traction entrance into the city of Toronto. Under the scheme proposed by Sir Henry Thornton we will have a slow system over level crossings and we will have great deficits.

It seems to me that the present board of directors of the National Railways have altogether too much power. They are going up and down the country spending millions of dollars in building skyscrapers and promising Ottawa and other parts of the country new terminals. They have promised the city of Ottawa new terminals. They have made a trip to Hamilton and other cities and promised to spend millions of dollars on terminals there, which will never be built, and if the board of directors of the National Railways would only carry out the capital commitments and agreements which they have now conditions should be better.

There are many other agreements with priority which the Canadian National Railways cannot carry out, involving millions of dollars, from coast to coast, and here we have a board of directors going up and down the country promising the people something which they know they can never give them because parliament will never vote the money. I want to discover, if I can, just what powers this National Railway Board has. Under the British North America Act parliament is defined as comprising two houses, the House of Commons and the Senate; but it seems to me that under the new order of affairs, since Sir Henry has come, we have three houses of parliament, the House of Commons, the Senate, and the House of Thornton. It is pretty nearly time, I think, that we had responsible government in Canada, so far at any rate as railway matters are concerned. Parliament is responsible to the taxpayers; yet we have no control over the spending bee of this board.

Now, public ownership is not responsible for the present railway situation in this country; the condition of affairs that exists to-day in connection with our railways is attributable to the operations of private ownership. I think Sir Henry Thornton should carry out the agreements made by the late government with these hydro municipalities in the Niagara, Hamilton and Toronto districts, where both Liberals and Conservatives and all the people are interested in the hydro-electric radial scheme. We desire to co-operate with the Canadian National Railways, with whom we are friendly; and it seems to me that it would be better for Sir Henry to endeavour to work hand in hand with the municipalities instead of sending such a telegram as he did to the Hamilton Board of Trade on the eve of a municipal election, proposing a system of radials which would never pay the interest on the investment. It is a level-crossing system and is perfectly absurd, for you cannot get directly from one point to another. If you wish to travel from point A to point B you are bound to go over a circuitous route; you must touch at C and D in three other sections before you can finally reach B in a straight line. It is the most absurd sort of radial system one could imagine, and if you are going to run the Canadian National Railways in that manner at all you are bound to have deficits. I do not regard the minister as being responsible for this condition of affairs in connection with this particular line. I believe that if he had his way he would carry out the agreements made with the late government and give the municipalities a chance to have their own system. I certainly am of the opinion that if the agreement were carried out it would relieve the country of a very heavy financial burden which is unavoidable under the York Radial plan proposed. I repeat again that it would be by far the best thing for the minister to carry out the honourable bargain entered into with these municipalities.

Mr. GRAHAM: The question raised by my hon. friend in regard to the rights of the bondholders being protected calls for a remark, I think. The bondholders of the Toronto Suburban are subject to the terms of the franchise of the old Toronto Junction, now Ward 7 of Toronto, just as are the shareholders. Outside of the franchise their rights would have to be secured in any sale made. These are my instructions from the solicitor of the Canadian National Railways. This bill is to allow the Canadian National Railways to sell to the city of Toronto certain portions of the suburban railway lying within the municipality. The reason for this bill is the fact that, while under the statute of 1919 the Canadian National Railway Company was empowered to make agreements with other railway companies, it was not empowered to sell to the municipality. The franchise expired in 1921, and Toronto desires to take over the portions of this line within the city, so that it is necessary to have the Canadian National Railway Company empowered to treat with the municipality as they are empowered to treat with other railway companies.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Can my hon. friend tell me why the decision to sell lines which to quite a large extent depend on municipal franchise was reversed? It was thought good Dominion policy that the Dominion railways should in fact be steam railways. True, they might be electrified afterwards, but it was thought best that the railways of the larger lines should be operated by steam. It was regarded as good policy to sell these electric lines, many of which depend on the municipal franchise, to the people that gave the franchises, getting out every cent of money we had in the lines and securing an agreement that we should get the benefit of all freight produced. Why is the partial sale being made instead of a total sale, so far as Dominion governmental interest is concerned? I want to tell my hon. friend that there are more people interested in this question than are to be found within the confines of the city of Toronto. If there is one disgraceful railway on the face of the earth it is that very Toronto suburban line. My hon. friend is operating cars on that line that can be duplicated only by the Toonerville trolley which we see in the papers in the morning, and the only reason that things are in their present lamentable shape is that for years it was understood that the municipalities were to get these properties, so that we have been putting up with this condition in the meanwhile. Why is the original proposition being departed from?

Mr. GRAHAM: The new board of management believe that these are very valuable properties that should be secured for the Canadian National system rather than be disposed of to any interest. If they are not properly managed they are now subject to the board of commissioners the same as any other part of the National Railway system. The people should have a good service.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: But they are not getting it.

Mr. GRAHAM: They should. The municipalities east of Toronto rather expressed the view in the last election that they did not wish to have the radial system, and I think that the city of Toronto itself expressed that view. That being the case I believe the board is acting wisely. But, apart altogether from that, here is a property consisting of some electric railways which are feeders to a large extent to the Canadian National system and which are owned by that system. Why should they be sold to anyone else? I admit that service to the people is the prime consideration, but if that service be given—and it can be given by that company as well as by any other—then why should we all over Canada who have an interest in this property sell it to someone else? These, I think, can become in a more extensive manner feeders to our Canadian National Railway system, and I agree with the board that it would be unwise to hand these feeders over to some other company that might operate them against our interest; but when we own the feeders, when we own the electric lines some of which run parallel, or nearly so, to our own steam lines, then it makes no difference which way the traffic goes, it belongs to the Canadian National Railway system. It has been a difficult proposition to work out, and in the main I agree with my hon. friend that electric railways are in a different category from steam railways. But here we have electric railways that came into our possession through the purchase of the Canadian Northern system and all its ramifications. I agree with the board that if these electric railways are a good paying system, or can be made so, the Canadian National Railway Company, serving all the people of the Dominion, should retain them rather than sell them to any person else. But, of course, the people should be served by the National as well as by any other company.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend is working in the larger issue with one which is a good deal smaller. There is no doubt that the general radial policy did suffer defeat at the hands of the ratepayers at the last municipal election, and there is also no doubt what the reason was. I will come to that reason in a minute. But apart from the general scheme there was also the idea that these lines could be easily owned by the municipalities. They were willing to undertake the burden and to agree that the Dominion should get quit of everything. And my hon. friend well knows that these lines were not paying. The St. Catharines branch has always paid, and there is no reason why it should not continue to pay; but the Toronto Suburban has never paid a cent, nor has the Toronto and Eastern. However, it was thought that with the local business which could be worked up these lines could be made to pay and to become valuable feeders to the national railway. And I do not know that it hurts a steam road at all to have this local traffic collected for it. However that may be, my hon. friend takes the position which he has just declared to us. We have not yet had any particulars, and I should like to know whether my hon. friend is implementing in his vote what he says ought to be done for the people of these counties? We have not cars, we have not tracks, we have not service, and it costs money to give us these.

Mr. GRAHAM: Which one are you referring to?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The Toronto Suburban.

Mr. GRAHAM: Running to Guelph?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It runs up to Woodbridge, and through part of the riding of my right hon. friend, the Prime Minister. Is my hon. friend taking that up in his estimates this year? These people might be getting service to-morrow if the sale be put through. My hon. friend says the people are entitled to that service. Will he see that it is given to them?

Mr. GRAHAM: The whole question of suburban service is now being considered by a committee of the Canadian National Railway Board if I remember correctly. The line to which my hon. friend refers is in a little different position to the one I had in mind when I was discussing the larger question of radials. That line might well be discussed at closer range. It is really a smaller line subsidiary to Toronto.

[Sir Henry Drayton.]

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: So is the Toronto and Eastern.

Mr. GRAHAM: I had the larger radial scheme in mind. I shall be glad to discuss that with the board.

Mr. CHAPLIN: The minister has referred to the Niagara Central This is one of the roads that have been allowed to deteriorate, and to-day it lacks equipment, and the people in the counties served by it are not satisfied with the way it is operated. Besides lack of service the municipalities concerned, not only the city that I come from but the adjoining municipalities, complain that they are not able to get their streets paved because the management of the road will not in any way conform to the wishes of the people in this respect. It seems to me that something should be done in such cases. This road should not be allowed to remain in its present shape, and the municipalities should be met by the management in a reasonable spirit and be allowed to make public improvements.

Mr. GRAHAM: I agree altogether with my hon. friend that the fact that the Canadian National Railway Company retains owners ip of any of these lines should not militate against proper co-operation with the municipalities affected. I shall be glad to call the attention of the president of the road to what my hon. friend has said. He is referring to St. Catharines, I presume?

Mr. CHAPLIN: And to the villages of Merritton and Port Dalhousie, all of which very recently have made representations regarding the condition of the road, which has continued for a considerable time. In my judgment the road has not been operated either in the interests of the road itself or of the municipalities through which it runs. It seems to me that some movement should be made by the management to get in touch with these municipalities. As I understand it, the franchises under which the road is operating have been allowed to lapse. Someone should get in touch with the municipalities and assure them that the franchises will be taken up and that the wishes of the local people will be treated in a reasonable spirit. When a municipality goes to the management to-day and asks to be allowed to fix up its streets it is met with the reply, "Oh, we have not got any money to fix the street." The result is nothing is done, and of course the people are getting sore with the management. It is not in the public interest that the present condition of things should be allowed to continue.

Mr. BAXTER: The discussion has taken a fairly wide range and I trust that I may be in order in what I am going to ask, but if the minister is not prepared with an answer now I should like him to give it to me later on. When he visits the New York Central station he sees a wonderful ceiling representing some of the heavenly bodies. If he were to visit the humble city of St. John—very humble, though hoping some day to rival New York—he would see not merely a few of the constellations but all the stars that are visible in the northern hemisphere. Some years ago in an attempt to repair the roof the whole structure collapsed. Since that time the site has been surveyed and re-surveyed, it has been measured and re-measured, it has been taken apart and put together theoretically, and yet so far, except for the few holes that have been drilled, we cannot find anything that evidences the commencement of a new railway station. I know the deficit is formidable, but still the rigours of a New Brunswick winter are not at all relished by those who have to use the open air train shed at St. John. Down there it is becoming a case of "How long, O Lord, how long." If the minister can get information from the railway board and transmit it through this House to the long-suffering public in St. John, I know they will be glad to receive even the shadow of a promise of the commencement of this much-needed work. The new chairman of the railway board was in St. John and made a speech—a remarkable thing—not exactly in the open-air train shed but very close to it. He must have observed the celestial roof, and I should have thought, with the rapidity with which things are now moving in the Canadian National Railway world, we would have seen before this a brick or stone or concrete commencement of a new station. But as yet there is nothing. We have great expectations, but nothing more.

Mr. GRAHAM: Of course, man cannot live by bread alone. The new railway board and the Department of Public Works have been in consultation respecting the terminals at St. John and the harbour developments there. I do not know just how far the discussion has proceeded, but there has been some difference of opinion as to how far the Canadian National terminals and the harbour developments of the Department of Public Works are being co-ordinated.

Mr. BAXTER: That would hardly affect the railway station.

Mr. GRAHAM: I do not know. However, if I can get a ray of hope from the board for my hon. friend I will try to extract it.

Mr. BAXTER: If the minister will simply get us the truth, whatever it is, we shall be interested to hear it. If they are not going to do it, let us know.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: With reference to that telegram from the president of the Canadian National Railways to the effect that the Dominion would electrify the railways in the district referred to, my hon. friend knows that the people are very anxious to get that electrification if they can, and I would ask him whether the suggestion contained in the telegram was merely a pious aspiration, or was it really meant? Do the minister's estimates this year provide for the electrification of that line?

Mr. GRAHAM: Not so far as I know.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then what was the idea of the telegram?

Mr. GRAHAM: I did not send it.

Mr. CHAPLIN: We see in the papers a statement to the effect that a million dollar site has been purchased for a new ticket office building in Toronto. It will cost another million to put up a suitable building, and the people in our district, who find that there is no money available to put the road in shape to do business in their part of the country, are very much interested in knowing whether it is true that a million dollars will be spent in that way.

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN: All this discussion with regard to a station at St. John and the erection of buildings in Toronto is out of order. Shall clause 2 carry?

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

CHINESE IMMIGRATION

The House again in committee on Bill No. 45, respecting Chinese immigration, Mr. Gordon in the Chair.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): When this bill was previously considered in committee section 3 was allowed to stand because there was some doubt whether or not the Civil Service Commission had control in respect to certain matters dealt with therein. I wish to submit a new clause 3, which I would ask the committee to accept. It is as follows:

3. The Governor in Council may,—

(a) appoint any official of the Department of Immigration and Colonization or of the Department of Customs and Excise to be chief controller or a controller.

That confines the appointment to persons who have previously been selected by the Civil Service Commission. We bring the Customs Department in because at many ports there are no immigration officials and we may name the customs official to act in our behalf for the purposes of watching the situation at such ports. The amended clause continues:

(b) appoint and fix the salary or remuneration of officers in countries other than Canada for the purpose of endorsing passports or performing other duties under this act.

That is the only official whose appointment we are asking to have control of. He will be stationed in China.

(c) assign any duty in connection with the carrying out of the provisions of this act to any officer or person in the employ of the government of Canada;

(d) define and prescribe the duties of such officer or person;

(e) make regulations for the carrying out of this act;

(f) designate certain ports as ports of entry for the admission to Canada of persons of Chinese origin or descent;

(g) make regulations providing for the payment of fees for the furnishing of substitutional certificates, endorsing passports and other administrative work in connection with the carrying out of this act.

That makes it very clear what we intend to do under section 3.

Mr. LADNER: On Monday last when other features of this bill were under consideration I was under the disadvantage of being out of the city at the time and was not able to make the few observations I desire to bring before the minister. Apparently in the changed clause which the minister proposes one of the chief remedies for bringing about exclusion of the Chinese from entering British Columbia is to be by regulation through the Governor in Council. I would point out to the minister that so far as the province of British Columbia is concerned and the people there, there is one straight issue and that is whether there is to be absolute exclusion or admission of Chinese into the province.

The CHAIRMAN: The question of admission of Chinese is not before the committee at the moment. The question before the Chair is the appointment of officers.

Mr. LADNER: The minister referred to certain regulations and the clause deals with the question of regulating immigration into Canada. As I understand it, the powers are wide enough to cover that, I shall only be a minute or two with respect to the question I have under consideration. Last year a resolution was introduced by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. McQuarrie) asking for exclusion. We are told by the Prime Minister that effective restriction would be provided by the amendment which was proposed at that time, and that the effective restriction thus proposed was the diplomatic way of bringing about exclusion to the satisfaction of the people. Now this bill is the fulfilment of the Prime Minister's promise at that time. It is to carry out the pledge of effective restriction, and my submission is that the clauses which propose to bring about the restriction by order in council will not be effective because of the ingenuity of the applicants in their efforts to enter this country. I also submit, Mr. Chairman, that the feature of the bill dealing with merchants will permit of an immigration which is not consistent with the wishes of the people of British Columbia, who are in fact insisting—

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member's remarks would more properly come under section 5 which confines immigration to certain classes.

Mr. LADNER: I merely wish to make the general observation that so far as this matter is concerned the provisions are not strong enough to keep out the Chinese, and the minister will have to be very careful when he comes to make his orders in council because otherwise the same ingenious devices will be resorted to by the wily Chinese that have been resorted to during the past number of years. I think that upon reflection the minister might consider the wisdom and expediency of making whatever restrictive measures he proposes part of the act itself rather than leaving it to order in council.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 5—Immigration confined to certain classes:

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): We had a good deal of discussion on Monday when the bill was up for consideration and an amendment was suggested by my hon. friend for New Westminster attempting to define what we call merchant, but it was not defined in that way, and it was suggested by the Prime Minister that a merchant should be defined as one —engaged in import and export trade, including sales agents and purchasing agents while representing bona fide Chinese exporters and importers carrying on international trade between Canada and China, buying from or selling to persons, firms or corporations in Canada.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that if we adopted that definition and put it in the act it would increase the duties of our immigration officers a thousandfold, because it would be statutory and no regulation would affect it. It is needless for me to point out to the members from British Columbia the difficulty of enforcing any regulation or statute even against immigration of the character we are trying to regulate and control, and if it would meet the wishes of the committee I would move to add after the word "merchant" the words "to be defined by regulation". My hon. friend for Vancouver South (Mr. Ladner) has just raised some objections in connection with the definition of that word. Our difficulty is this. Every advantage is taken not only by the Chinese, but by orientals generally of any implication by which they can enter the country. For instance, I am told by the officers of the department that in China they are in much the same position as we were in the days when the small shoemaker was the only manufacturer of boots in Canada and made boots in a room in his own house. Now he would come under such a definition as has been suggested. I merely mention that as one case. The officers of the department inform me that the amendment suggested by my hon. friend would really be wider than the old act, and if we put such a definition into the statute we would have a much more difficult task controlling the entry of Chinese into British Columbia than we have under the existing law. What I read to the committee the other night was the regulation I proposed to apply. It provided that before a merchant left China he would have to establish the fact that he had been engaged in business in China as a merchant, that he had a certain sum of money invested there in his business, and that when he came to Canada he would engage in the business of merchandising stuff grown or manufactured in China. But the proposal suggested by my hon. friend was that we should exclude by statute —any merchant's clerk, or other employee, tailor, mechanic, huckster, pedlar, or person engaged in taking, drying or otherwise preserving fish for home consumption or exportation, or having any connection whatever with a laundry or restaurant.

To put that definition in the act would tie our hands if there are legal methods by which they can get around that provision, but when it is left to regulation all we would have to do in case of an evasion would be to cover the case by an amended regulation at the next meeting of the cabinet. In any case we must take the responsibility for the enforcement of this act, and I am asking for this act in order to strengthen my hands in the enforcement of the law. We have confined immigration to merchants and students, and we think it best to leave the definition to regulation which can be amended within a day by the cabinet rather than having to wait for the next session of parliament as we would have to do if there was a statutory definition.

Mr. CARROLL: I may say that I am in perfect accord with the minister in not defining words in the statute unless it comes in as part of the interpretation of the act. I think that our governments are going altogether too far in that direction. These words have a well-defined meaning, their meaning has been defined by the courts of the country, and I think that the words should be left in the act bearing the interpretation that the courts of our country have placed upon them. In the present instance I am not objecting to the minister making regulations defining these words, but I do strenuously object to having the statutes of this country laden down and overborne with definitions of mere words that have been interpreted by the courts on various occasions as meaning such and such a thing. However, if the minister says he is going to make regulations governing the matter it may be a different thing.

Mr. LADNER: I was going to suggest to the minister the wisdom of putting in the specific class of Chinese which will be excluded, and which are set out in the amendment, and then adding provisions enabling the minister to supplement that by order in council.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I may point out to my hon. friend that we have done that. If he will read further he will see the words: "Who shall substantiate their status to the satisfaction of the controller at the port of entry subject to the approval of the minister."

Mr. NEILL: May I point out to the minister that what he proposed the other day is a different regulation from what he is now giving us; apparently his definition has blossomed into quite a different statement and now includes fish dealers, hucksters, tailors, etc. As I understood it the other day the regulation, which the minister said was a regulation adopted by his department, was along the lines that a merchant had to have $2,500 invested in a bona fide business in China and must show evidence of his intention to invest the same sum of money here. That is quite a different regulation from what he has suggested to-day. I would like an explanation of that?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): They are identical with the exception that I have added clauses at the end. The other day it was in positive form but to-day it is in negative form—that is all the difference. I have discovered that the provision is much more effective worded in this way.

Mr. NEILL: Is the regulation which the minister alluded to the other day set forth in the amendment which he has now moved?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No, I do not propose to make it a statutory amendment. I simply give it to the committee as a regulation under which we could work acceptably.

Mr. NEILL: In that regard then I agree with the hon. members who have spoken and who have suggested that it should be embodied in the act, with all due deference to the hon. member (Mr. Carroll) who spoke from an opposite point of view. If necessary, take also power to add to the definition by regulation. If the minister is in Ottawa and the controller is in Vancouver or Victoria, the decision on which will be based the rejection or acceptance of a Chinese merchant must be conveyed by that minister to that controller by some means of communication and I suggest it would be done by writing or by wire. Therefore that communication must contain what, in the opinion of the minister, is the definition of a merchant and on that decision the controller in Vancouver or Victoria, who has no jurisdiction of his own, will act. Now if the minister can define to his satisfaction, as he must eventually, what is a merchant, in his office and by regulation, why can he not place the definition in the act? Suggestion has been made that the Chinese are very alert in getting round any regulation that is adopted and therefore it is necessary to have a loose definition; but in the final analysis language must be used to express the minister's conception of a merchant, and if that language can be used in a regulation, it can be equally used in an act which will be much more effective than merely leaving the term merchant in a blank form.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I gave the committee my conception of what I would embody, as defining "merchant," in a regulation; but I also take care to point out that we have this advantage over placing a definition in the statute. My hon. friend desires to have that regulation a statutory one. If we make it statutory I cannot say to him, nor can he perhaps say, that it will be with full assurance that we have sufficiently covered the situation. Take for example the amendment suggested in the discussion the other day. I find, after investigation, that had we adopted it we would have widened the provisions of the statute in a way that I could not possibly control. I am willing to take the full responsibility of giving the best administration possible under this act, but I say to the committee: Leave me free to make any amendment by regulation to cover any contingency that may arise that we have overlooked. That can be done by way of regulation but if it is provided that it must be by statutory enactment it will not be possible to meet a possible contingency, if such arises, until parliament meets at the next session.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: There are two points on which I would like to get information. It is not specifically stated whether the wives of these various classes are to be permitted to enter. Further, with regard to Chinese already in Canada, or to the merchants or students who may come in later, it is not clear whether they are to be separated from their children who have been born prior to their coming to this country.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): So far as the student is concerned he does not acquire domicile or residence in Canada on the mere fact that he comes as a student; he is only permitted to be here during the period of his attendance at the institution of learning which he enters. So far as the merchant is concerned one of the greatest difficulties we have to contend with to-day is that the Chinaman, particularly if he is a man of even very moderate means and has property in China, does not care to become naturalized and become a Canadian citizen. The moment he does that he sacrifices the property he holds in China. The result is that his home—although he might be here for ten, or fifteen years and in some cases twenty years—is still in China and very likely intends to go back there some time or other. He has the privilege of having two or three wives, he has two or three families, and quite frequently in late years he has asked for the privilege of bringing in his children, and we have the utmost difficulty in arriving at a conclusion as to whether the child who is seeking to obtain entry is the child of the alleged parent or not. It is a most difficult thing to do. We hope by the establishment of an official in China that we will get over a great deal of that difficulty. Wives of merchants are not admissible under the provisions of the act, largely because of the difficulty we experience in this respect. I think I would be safe in saying that not ten per cent of the Chinese residents of Canada are desirous of bringing their wives. Someone has suggested that we might allow them to bring in one wife. It is a very difficult matter to deal with.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Dealing with these two points it seems to me we are nothing less than hypocritical if we talk about the immoralities of the Chinese and yet permit them to come under conditions that would breed immorality. We object to their coming because they make poor citizens, and then take from them the very things that are necessary to make them good citizens—that is the presence of their wives and children with them. I am not pleading that several wives should be admitted. That is not in accordance with our law in this country, but it would seem to me that if a man is to live in this country the least that can be done is to see that his wife, if she so desires, is permitted to come. I am not urging that she should be asked to come if the immigrant does not want to bring her. The minister suggests that a good many do not wish to establish homes in this country. We have heard it said again and again on the floor of this House that one of the dangers is that too many will come and establish residence in this country, and will bring their families, and that thus we shall have an oriental population. Those of us who have lived on the coast recognize that there is already a very considerable number of Chinese in this country who have their wives. There is a very considerable number of children who are growing up in the schools. We have to deal with them, and I cannot think that we are travelling along the right lines when we make arbitrary restrictions of this kind. A good deal has been said on the side of the exclusion of the Chinese from this country. I should like to make a few general observations, because I think we must recognize that this is by no means a small problem. No one who has lived where there is the conflict of two civilizations, of two different types of people, can be oblivious to the seriousness of the problems which arise. I am not making light of them. I confess that I am not at all sure that we are prepared at the present time to receive more orientals than we have. I know that at the present time at the coast conditions are far from satisfactory, and it may be necessary to have total exclusion for some time, until we are prepared to deal properly with the matter. At the same time I fancy any one who has listened dispassionately to the discussions on the floor of this House from time to time will recognize that there is an immense amount of prejudice towards the orientals. For example, not only on the floor of the House but in the West we have complaints about the low sanitary standards of the Chinese, and yet a year or two ago the oriental nurses or girls who wished to train as nurses were excluded from the Vancouver general hospital.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: An hon. member says "hear, hear". It may be well from one standpoint, that the white nurses shall not be contaminated by the presence of yellow nurses—Chinese or Japanese—but I submit, since we have large numbers of orientals already in the country, that in some way or another we ought to permit them to live up to our standards. We fail to do so with danger to ourselves and to our civilization. I said last year—and I do not intend to go into the matter at length—that it does not seem to me that mere exclusion definitely solves the problem of the competition of the white with the oriental races. We may exclude them from competing with us on this side of the Pacific, but they will inevitably compete with us on the other side of the Pacific, and as long as the water remains a very easy channel of communication between the countries, the products of Asia will come to us in this country, and our workers in this country will feel the full competition of the people over there. We simply transfer the place of competition. We make it a little less obvious, but it is there none the less, and the cargoes of goods that are coming in from time to time clearly show that this transfer has already been effected. However, if in order to maintain our standards—and I think we should do that—it is thought desirable to exclude certain classes, I would feel that at least we should give very generous treatment to the student classes to which reference is made in this act. It seems to me that we must very definitely and consciously attempt to overcome the prejudices which we have against men of other races and other colours than our own. All students of ethnology will recognize that after all there are a great many more things in common between the different races than things which separate us, and the apparent divergences are not so great as sometimes we imagine. The stranger has always been regarded as more or less of an enemy, and we are naturally content to look down upon those who are not of our own kind. We have been too apt to form our estimates of the Chinese very largely from the individuals with whom we may come in contact in this country. It is generally known that these as a rule belong to the lower classes, and that they do not fairly represent the whole of the people over there. We have to deal in these days, not merely with the individuals who come to us in this country, our laundrymen, our vegetable men, or our keepers of restaurants, or our tailors; but we have sooner or later to deal with the whole of the great people of China. We must remember that China represents a very ancient and a very high type of civilization. It is quite true that for a good many centuries Chinese civilization remained almost stationary, but one reason for that was that the Chinese shut themselves off from contact with the larger world outside, a policy which some in this country would like us to adopt with regard at least to the oriental races. We in the west have been superior very laregly because of the industrial revolution with all that it has brought to us in the advancement of science, and in the possibility of large-scale production, and may I add also in the possibility of our securing arms which from the military standpoint have made us dominant throughout the world. But now, as thoughtful students have observed, we are losing that advantage which we have had for the last hundred years or more, and the Orient is beginning to open its doors to western science, to western civilization, to western industry, and to western militarism. When the hundreds of millions of people across the ocean have gained possession of the tools of production and destruction, we have no advantage, or comparatively little advantage over them. There is not much wonder that some writers are afraid of this "rising tide of colour". It is a real danger; yet there are other ways of meeting it than by attempting to turn back the rising tide. It is a dangerous proceeding for a comparatively small portion of the human race to attempt by physical force to beat back the great masses of the coloured and darker people of the world. Very great changes have come within recent years in the Orient. With regard to China, Professor A. E. Ross, Professor John Dewey, Hon. Bertrand Russell, and a host of other writers, have been telling us of the changes that are taking place in their eastern civilization. They impress upon us there is a great intellectual awakening—an awakening that may be faintly understood. if we could realize the changes that took place in Europe at the time of the renaissance. The people are being given the literature of China in their own spoken language, and there is being translated into Chinese the literature of western Europe. A wonderful intellectual activity is consequently taking place among the masses all over China. Many of us, of course, are compelled to get at second hand these accounts of what the Chinese are doing. A gentleman returning a short time ago from China made the astounding statement that in his judgment Peking was destined to be the intellectual centre of the world. I can hardly accept that, but I cannot reject the testimony of men who are recognized authorities throughout Europe, and who declare that wonderful changes are taking place. It is a well-known fact that when an ancient civilization is touched and fertilized by a newer and different type of civilization the results are sometimes remarkable.

In view of the fact that the world has become so unified industrially and commercially, and in its political relationships, it would seem as if we had arrived at that juncture where we should very definitely attempt to establish a better understanding among the great peoples of the earth. I was very much interested in a resolution, to which reference was made on the floor of the House some few weeks ago, which was forwarded by the Federation of Canadian Students, urging that scholarships be established by the government of Canada which would bring considerable numbers of the representatives of various nations to this country, and on the other hand would send out Canadian students to those countries for the purpose of studying conditions there. If this suggestion could be carried out it would be a very definite contribution on our part towards establishing better world relationships. In opposition to the view expressed the other day, that as far as possible we should try to keep out students I would urge on the contrary, that we should heartily welcome them. If we have anything superior in our civilization to give them, by all means let them come over and discover it, so that they may learn what has made our nation great and may take that knowledge back to their country with them. We must get away from the old idea that we would lose by their gain, that we are superior so long as we can keep knowledge and information and science to ourselves and keep these other people more or less in ignorance. I would say rather that we should welcome their students. Let us take them in and give them the very best we have to offer intellectually and morally. On the other hand, I should like to think that China has something worth while to offer to us. For years she was in advance of us intellectually, and led the way in some of the industrial discoveries by which the world has been blessed. She may still have something to contribute to the progress of the world intellectually and spiritually. I am looking, however, to the practical side of the matter. If we are to avoid frictions in the future there must be a better mutual understanding among the various peoples of the world. Personally, I believe that the chief cause of modern wars is economic, but I do not believe it is the exclusive cause. One of the dangers to-day lies in the fact that we do not understand one another's position, that as nations we are prejudiced one against the other. In this discussion we have heard a good deal about exclusion. While I am not opposed to a certain measure of precaution in this direction, feeling as I do that we have a right to protect the standards of this young country, at the same time I cannot let this opportunity pass without pleading with the government and the House that they treat this question in a broad way. Do not let our prejudice blind us to the greatness of the question or to the possibilities that are open to us, as a people, of making our contribution to the solution of the great world problems which are pressing upon us in these days as never before.

Mr. NEILL: Has section 5 been adopted?

The CHAIRMAN: The section has been carried.

Mr. NEILL: If I may be permitted, I should like to point out a mistake in this section. Unless I am utterly unable to interpret it, the section as it is printed is most emphatically wrong. In subsection 1 of paragraph (c) there appears the word "merchants," with whatever amendments may now have been passed. The next paragraph refers to students, and it goes on to say, "who shall substantiate their status." The substantiation called for refers only to the students and not to the merchants, as the section is at present worded; whereas I have no doubt it is the intention of the government to require this substantiation of status on the part of both merchants and students. Paragraph (2) reads:

> Students coming to Canada for the purpose of attendance, and while in actual attendance, at any Canadian university or college authorized by statute or charter to confer degrees, who shall substantiate their status to the satisfaction of the controller, etc.

Clearly the merchant does not come under that provision; the relative "who" obviously refers to the students. Is there no legal gentleman on the opposite side who can take up this point? If there is not I shall have to solicit the assistance of the leader of the Opposition.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The definition of the word "merchant," it is provided, shall be left to regulation. That gives the minister an opportunity to put in anything he thinks advisable, to oblige this class of people to establish their status as my hon. friend suggests. I think that provision is broad enough to give the minister power to impose such conditions as may be necessary in order to meet what my hon. friend has in mind.

Mr. NEILL: Perhaps I have not made my point clear. I am not referring at all to the definition of the word "merchant"; you cannot incorporate in that definition anything about the controller as we have it in paragraph (2) of subsection (c). The words "who shall," as they appear in this paragraph, clearly refer only to students, whereas it is unquestionably the intention of the bill that they shall apply to both these classes, merchants and students.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): "Merchant" is defined by regulation and "student" by statute.

Mr. NEILL: I am not asking the minister to define anything. My point has reference to the requirement which appears in the paragraph I have quoted calling for a substantiation of status, and I say that this requirement undoubtedly applies to both students and merchants; that, I believe, is the intention of the bill. I am simply pointing out that as the paragraph is at present worded this intention is not carried out.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If that comma were changed to a semicolon would it not meet what my hon. friend has in mind?

Mr. NEILL: And the next words begin on a fresh line?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes. I think if the semicolon were put in after the word "degrees" it would cover what my hon. friend has in mind?

Mr. NEILL: And the next words to begin a new line.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It would help to elucidate it.

Mr. NEILL: Yes, that is what I mean.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 24—Re-entry; registered persons, etc.:

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil):: My hon. friend for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) raised the question as to the permission for the return of Chinese who had registered out under the provisions of the Chinese Immigration Act and the War Measures Act. They were to be permitted to return one year after the gazetting of peace. Such Chinese have in their possession a certificate which permits them to return one year after the gazetting of peace in the Canada Gazette. The solicitor has pointed out to me that even with this section there may be doubt, but we are giving them one year in which to return to Canada.

Section agreed to.

On section 26—Offences and penalties; arrest and deportation of any Chinese who has illegally entered or remained in Canada.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Objection was taken by my hon. friend to the clause as drafted, and he suggested that we add the words "peace officer," so that any officer might take into custody a Chinaman who was illegally in the country. That has been done by the amendment to 26. I beg to move this amendment, which is as follows:

26. Whenever any officer or peace officer has reason to believe that any person of Chinese origin or descent has entered or remains in Canada contrary to the provisions of this act or of the Chinese Immigration Act, chapter ninety-five of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, or any amendment thereof, he may, without a warrant apprehend such person, and if such person is unable to prove to the satisfaction of the officer that he has been properly admitted into and is legally entitled to remain in Canada, the officer may detain such person in custody and bring him before the nearest controller for examination, and if the controller finds that he has entered or remains in Canada contrary to the provisions of this act or of the Chinese Immigration Act or any amendment thereof, such person shall be deported to the country of his birth or citizenship, subject to the same right of appeal as is provided in the case of a person applying for original entry to Canada. Where any person is examined under this section the burden of proof of such person's right to be or remain in Canada shall rest upon him. Where an order for deportation is made under this section and in the circumstances of the case the expenses of deportation cannot be charged to the transportation company, such expenses shall be paid by the person being deported if able to pay, and, if not, by His Majesty.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 27—Arrest and deportation of Chinese who ceases to belong to exempt or admissible classes.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): This is an addition of the same words. I move the amendment of the clause as follows:

27. Any person admitted as exempt from the tax under the provisions of the Chinese Immigration Act or any amendment thereof, or under this act, and who at any time after admission ceases to belong to any of the exempt classes as defined by the Chinese Immigration Act or any amendment thereof, or by this act, shall, unless he is a Canadian citizen, ipso facto forfeit his right to remain in Canada and may be arrested without a warrant by any officer or peace officer and brought before a controller for examination, whereupon the case shall be dealt with to all intents and purposes in the same manner and subject to the same provisions as in the case of a person apprehended under the provisions of the next preceding section hereof.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 32—Chinese landing in violation of act, or using forged or fraudulent certificate:

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): My hon. friend for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) took exception to this section inasmuch as it did not definitely enough set out the deportation which was to take place in addition to fine and imprisonment. I have amended the clause accordingly. I beg to move the clause as re-drafted, namely:

32. (1) Every person of Chinese origin or descent who—

(a) lands or attempts to land in Canada contrary to the provisions of this act;

(b) Wilfully makes use of or attempts to make use of any forged or fraudulent certificate, or of a certificate issued to any other person for any purpose connected with this act; is guilty of an offence and liable to imprisonment for any term not exceeding twelve months and not less than six months, or to a fine not exceeding one thousand dollars and not less than three hundred dollars, or to both imprisonment and fine, and shall be deported.

(2) Every person who wilfully aids and abets any person of Chinese origin or descent in any evasion or attempt at evasion of any of the provisions of this act, is guilty of an offence and liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding twelve months and not less than six months, or to a fine not exceeding one thousand dollars and not less than three hundred dollars, or to both imprisonment and fine, and shall be deported unless of Canadian citizenship.

Mr. NEILL: Are these offences to be tried by summary process or by indictment? There does not seem to be any provision here.

The CHAIRMAN: They are all subject to summary process.

Nr. NEILL: But anyone reading this section would imagine the guilty persons are to be tried by the controller. It says here, "and shall also be liable to deportation when so ordered by the controller."

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Those words are struck out in the amended section.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 41—Chinese en route to Canada may be admitted within one month if head tax paid:

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I merely want to amend section 41 to avoid conflict with Chinese who may be en route to Canada, extending the time from one month to three months. As amended the section will read:

41. Notwithstanding any provision of this act or any order or regulation made thereunder, any person of Chinese origin or descent who is at the date of the coming into force of this act en route to Canada and presents himself for admission within three months from said date, shall if admissible under the provisions of the Chinese Immigration Act or any amendment thereof, be permitted to enter Canada upon payment of the head tax therein provided:

Provided that if he belongs to any of the exempt classes he may be admitted exempt from the head tax.

If they do come and are not within the classes defined in the act, they shall pay the head tax as formerly.

Amendment agreed to, and section as amended agreed to.

Bill reported, as amended, read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY

RAILWAYS AND CANALS

The House again in Committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Railways and Canals—miscellaneous—Canada Highways Commission: To provide for the organization and payment of staff of the Canada Highways Commission, including A. W. Campbell, C.E., Chief Commissioner of Highways, at $5,000 per annum, and W. R. Smythe, Commissioner of Highways, at $4,000 per annum; $70,000.

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals): This is merely the annual vote for the Highways Commission and staff. I have already given some information in this connection, but if there is any further information hon. gentlemen desire I will try to give it.

Mr. BOYS: Can the minister inform me, with respect to the provincial highway from Bradford to Barrie, what is the cost to date, what is the estimated cost per mile in finished state, with some reference to the specifications?

Mr. GRAHAM: Section B, Gwillimbury West township, mileage, 6·60; total estimated cost, $144,380; average estimated cost per mile, $21,875.75; 40 per cent of estimated cost, $170,292; kind of construction, gravel; amount paid to date, $107,719.86. Section E, Barrie and Oro township, mileage 1·20—

Mr. BOYS: The mileage in the township of Oro would be, I should think, about 14 or 15. Where is this 1·20 miles that the minister refers to?

Mr. GRAHAM: It would be just outside the town, not in the town.

Mr. BOYS: As a matter of fact I think some of the highway is within the corporate limits, though I am not positive as to that.

Mr. GRAHAM: We do not know anything about the provincial end of it.

Mr. BOYS: Can the minister tell me just where that mileage of 1·20 is?

Mr. GRAHAM: It is east of Barrie. Barrie and Oro township, 1·20 miles; estimated cost, $14,850; average estimated cost per mile, $12,375, kind of construction, macadam: Section F, Oro and Vespera townships, 1·60 miles; total estimated cost, $18,500; average cost per mile, $11,562; construction, macadam. Subsection G-1, Oro township, 3·60 miles; total estimated cost, $45,400; average estimated cost per mile, $12,611; macadam. Subsection G-2, Oro township, mileage 6·40; total estimated cost, $71,400, average cost per mile, $11,156.25; macadam. Subsection 11, Orillia township, mileage 4·20, total estimated cost, $48,110; average estimated cost per mile, $11,454.76; macadam. Subsection 12, Orillia totwnship, mileage 4·80; total estimated cost, $83,090; average cost per mile, $17,310.41; gravel.

Mr. BOYS: In connection with the portion of road just outside Barrie, approaching the township of Oro but not within the corporate limits of Barrie, there is a corner which was purchased from a Mr. Hughes. Will the minister tell me what was paid for that little corner and for a couple of scrub apple trees upon it?

Mr. GRAHAM: This government does not know anything about that. We had nothing to do with the approaches. That is a matter for the provincial government.

Mr. BOYS: I presume that when the Department of Railways and Canals is called upon to pay forty per cent it must know exactly what the total is, and the total is made up of the road construction with the bit of property I referred to and similar corners included.

Mr. GRAHAM: The province provides the right of way and we only contribute forty per cent towards the real road. We do not have anything to do with the right of way. They have to furnish that, and our auditors see that no right of way is put in the accounts as against the forty per cent contributed by the federal authorities.

Mr. BOYS: Then the estimates the minister has given me now do not include anything whatever for the cost of the right of way?

Mr. GRAHAM: No.

Mr. BOYS: Do they include anything for the cost of ornamental trees, for instance?

Mr. GRAHAM: No.

Mr. BOYS: Or the cost of construction of new ditches?

Mr. GRAHAM: I would imagine that would be part of the construction of the highway. That is for the drainage.

Mr. BOYS: I would also have thought offhand that the purchasing of a corner and building a highway on it all added to the cost of construction of the highway.

Mr. GRAHAM: In our regulations and the agreement the cost of any right of way is excluded so far as the federal authority is concerned.

Mr. BOYS: It is very hard to follow these figures given rapidly across the floor, but if I understood the minister rightly he was giving the estimated cost and then the average cost, and I cannot understand it. There seems to be a considerable difference in the figures.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend misunderstood me. Perhaps I did not read distinctly. The first figure was the total estimated cost, the next was the average cost per mile.

Mr. BOYS: Those figures were given with regard to a mile and a fraction, and one would think that the estimated cost and the average cost—well, there would hardly be an average cost for a mile and a fraction. It would be the cost of a mile and a fraction.

Mr. GRAHAM: I do not quite get my hon. friend.

Mr. BOYS: Perhaps the minister would refer to what he was kind enough to read a moment ago and see just what he read. Perhaps I misunderstood the reference entirely.

Mr. GRAHAM: Take section B Gwillimbury township. The mileage is 6.60; total estimated cost $144,380. The cost per mile would be $144,380 divided by 6.60 which gives $21,875.75.

Mr. BOYS: There seems to be a considerable difference between the estimated cost of the highway in the Gwillimbury section and the cost in the Oro section. That, I presume, is due to different specifications. Would the minister indicate what the difference is?

Mr. GRAHAM: Take that section in Gwillimbury township for instance; that is gravel construction. In Oro township the construction was macadam.

Mr. CHARTERS: What proportion of the roads approved by this government have already been completed?

Mr. GRAHAM: I will have to give that in the larger figures for each province. I might say that so far as Ontario is concerned, with so many different kinds of construction, the costs are very varied. In some cases there is extravagant construction. We are not paying forty per cent of the very extravagant construction.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does that statement give the cost also?

Mr. GRAHAM: The figures by provinces are as follows:

Mr. BOYS: I suppose if we take the total expenditure the minister gave for Ontario and divide that by the mileage completed, which is 379.87, we would have the average cost per mile, or is there some expenditure included in the total expenditure which has reference to the 638.69 miles referred to by the minister?

Mr. GRAHAM: The average estimated cost per mile under agreement for each province is as follows: Prince Edward Island, $2,579.95; Nova Scotia, $8,337.80; New Brunswick, $2,384.90; Quebec, $11,326.35; Ontario, $21,018.50; Manitoba, $4,523.49; Saskatchewan, $2,022.21; British Columbia, $8,820.52.

Mr. BOYS: The minister says that in some cases the actual cost exceeded the figures quoted. I understand that these are the figures of the cost that you submit to. In the case of some other portions you have not been able to agree to the cost as returned because, I suppose, you considered it excessive. This is the approved cost, I imagine?

Mr. GRAHAM: These figures do not give possibly the whole cost of the road. These figures are based on the cost of construction towards which we contribute 40 per cent. When the cost exceeds a certain amount we do not contribute. The cost of the roads in Ontario is possibly higher than the figures which I have given.

Mr. BOYS: I suppose, as a matter of fact, that the minister would have on file the actual cost, and then what we might term the approved cost so far as the 40 per cent contribution is concerned.

Mr. GRAHAM: We could dig that out.

Mr. BOYS: I would like very much to get that.

Mr. GRAHAM: I will get that information for my hon. friend.

Mr. BOYS: Now another question. There is a very considerable discrepancy between the average cost per mile of these roads in the various provinces of Canada to the extent, sometimes, of thousands of dollars per mile. Having in view the supervision which the department exercises, could the minister explain how it is there is such an enormous difference between the cost of constructing roads in the province of Ontario, and, for example, the cost of constructing roads in Price Edward Island, or in almost any other province of the Dominion?

Mr. GRAHAM: In the first place each province, to a large extent, selects the standard of its own roads. If the standard involves a lower cost we are quite willing to pay 40 per cent of that cost. Then there enters the question of broken stone and gravel. In some localities these are very plentiful, and in other places—if it is decided to construct a road of that kind—they may have to haul these materials a great many miles. I think the discrepancy may be due very often to the difference in the standards of the roads.

Mr. WILSON: Will the minister give us the estimated cost of the Hamilton and Brantford highway and the actual cost up to date.

Mr. GRAHAM: I think that will be a little high. The mileage is 19.18. The total estimated cost was $658,907.05 and the average estimated cost per mile $34,353.86.

Mr. WILSON: That does not include the surfacing of the road? What does it cost to surface the road?

Mr. GRAHAM: That work was done under a provincial agreement. When the cost exceeds a certain figure we do not put up our 40 per cent.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The figures given merely represent the cost on which the minister puts up his 40 per cent.

Mr. GRAHAM: The cost to which we agree.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Over and above that there are other costs and those are on file in the office.

Mr. GRAHAM: We can get that information for my hon. friend.

Mr. BOYS: Will the minister be good enough to bring at the same time the information he promised a moment ago—in other words the actual cost and what I might refer to as the approved cost?

Mr. GRAHAM: We will find that in the correspondence probably, because application would be made for contribution for a road at a certain cost to which we would only agree up to a certain proportion.

Mr. BOYS: Would the minister tell us what is the most expensive portion of highway construction in the province of Ontario and what is the cost of it?

Mr. GRAHAM: According to our figures the one referred to is the most expensive piece of road and, so far as our approval is concerned, it cost $34,000 per mile. The actual cost must have been more than that.

Mr. BOYS: Is that the highest cost per mile to which the department contributes?

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes. The highest expenditure to which we would contribute is $34,353.86.

Mr. BOYS: I rather gather from what the minister has said that apparently there had been some maximum cost per mile fixed by the department. If that is so I would like to know what it is?

Mr. GRAHAM: There has been no maximum fixed. Each case is dealt with as it comes up having regard to the conditions and the circumstances surrounding it. I am informed that no maximum has been arbitrarily fixed but that this is probably the maximum on which a contribution has been allowed.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I wonder if the minister could do this for us. We are interested, of course, in connection with road building and the cost of the different classes of roads. I suppose there are roads which are standard all over the country. For example there is the gravel road of the cheaper class.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is standard.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then I suppose that the gravel roads are of fairly standard width usually. I wonder if the engineer could not furnish the minister with information which would give the cost of gravel roads in all the different provinces. Then you could take concrete roads and see what the cost of those are per mile in each of the provinces. Then there are roads which are bound with different binders, apart from concrete itself. We could have those also.

Mr. GRAHAM: I have got the mileage of those roads, but not the cost. However, I could get that information quite easily enough.

Mr. BOYS: With regard to the Hamilton and Brantford highway which has been mentioned I understood from the minister's statement that so far as he knows the highest cost to which the department has contributed, up to the present, is about $34,000 per mile?

Mr. GRAHAM: The actual figures are $34,353.86.

Mr. BOYS: If I remember correctly you are to contribute 40 per cent having regard to the reasonable and actual cost of the highway. I think that is the language of the act. As a matter of fact a return brought down to this House shows that, apart entirely from the purchase price of land for highway purposes, apart from ornamental trees and other extras of that description, this particular highway cost $72,085 per mile. Now if, as a matter of fact, we are to contribute 40 per cent of the actual and reasonable cost there must be something wildly extravagant in connection with expenditure when the cost, without the extras I have mentioned, comes to $72,000 and the minister could only see his way clear to recommend $34,300 of that. I would like to know how it is that following the language of the statute requiring a contribution of 40 per cent of the actual and reasonable cost—and the minister I am sure desires to be fair to Ontario—he could only contribute $34,300?

Mr. GRAHAM: Forty per cent of $34,300

Mr BOYS: How the minister could only contribute on a basis of cost of $34,300 when the cost returned, without the extras I have mentioned, is $72,000?

Mr. GRAHAM: I would not like to criticize the Ontario government. I see that my hon. friend is getting some good material.

Mr. BOYS: Even if they deserve it?

Mr. GRAHAM: I see the pyramid my hon. friend is piling up here.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Just tell the facts.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am not sure they will be appreciated.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The facts are all we want.

Mr. GRAHAM: Take that road as a sample; an agreement was made with this department for a certain standard of road early in the construction, the cost of which was allowed by the federal department to be $34,300 a mile. The provincial authorities changed the system and made the road much more expensive than that to which we agreed. They made a better standard of road, but they had to pay the extra cost. I am not a real authority on good roads. I would not like to say the Ontario government was extravagant in building the road they did. That is their consideration, not mine. What we were providing was that we would only pay for the standard of road to which this department agreed.

Mr. BOYS: Can the minister tell us what the change was? It must have been tremendously expensive to jump from $34,000 to $72,000.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am not sure that I am not getting beyond my depth in discussing this matter. They changed the standard and put on a great deal better surface than the standard to which we had agreed. I would not like to say offhand what they did. That is outside of our purview. The province did that in addition to anything we expended.

Mr. BOYS: Was the department asked to contribute on the basis of $72,000?

Mr. GRAHAM: I would imagine the federal department would be asked to contribute anything any province would hope to be able to get. There is no doubt in my mind that they asked for it but did not get it.

Mr. BOYS: If the minister feels sure about that, I do not want to press it unduly, but I want to know for certain whether they did ask for the contribution from this government on the basis of $72,000 a mile.

Mr. GRAHAM: No doubt about that at all.

Mr. BOYS: The minister said there was an agreement between the Dominion and the province.

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes, all these roads were built under agreement.

Mr. BOYS: In writing and signed?

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes, I will give the hon. member a copy of it any time.

Mr. BOYS: I would like to have that. Is there a fair wage clause in it?

Mr. GRAHAM: We do not construct. The province would construct. I imagine they would pay the rate of wages demanded in that locality. These details are for the province. It is one of the cases where the Dominion hands over its money under certain restrictions as to expense, but the province expends the money. I do not know anything about the details. It is a public road. A copy of any agreement as to roadmaking is at the disposal of the House or any member of it.

Mr. BOYS: I can assure the minister that we require considerably more information, and it will take more than a few minutes. But we are quite willing to go on.

Mr. GRAHAM: I cannot be here after six o'clock. I was hopeful of putting it through.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: With reference to the continuation of the Brantford-Hamilton highway across the county I represent, I certainly would like to get some information.

Mr. GRAHAM: If my hon. friend would let me know what he wants, I would be glad to get it for him. It would take a cart to bring over all the documents in the department in regard to this matter.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the Chair and the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

SUPPLY

SECRETARY OF STATE

The House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Civil government—Secretary of State—salaries, $127,837.50; contingencies, $29,620.

Mr. COOTE: Has Mr. William Pugsley been appointed to some office in the minister's department, and, if so, does it come under this item?

Hon. A. B. COPP (Secretary of State): It comes under a later item.

Item agreed to.

Miscellaneous—expenses under the Canada Temperance Act, $12,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will the minister explain this item?

Mr. COPP: This is provided in case any plebiscites are asked for during the year.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is it not entirely insufficient for that purpose?

Mr. COPP: There are only three or four places in which the act is in force—Manitoulin island, Ontario; Thetford Mines, Brome and Stanstead, Quebec, Guysborough, Nova Scotia, and Lisgar and Marquette, Manitoba. The vote is provided in case any of these should ask for repeal.

Item agreed to.

Miscellaneous—expenses under the Naturalization Acts 1914 and 1920, $18,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How much was spent last year?

Mr. COPP: $19,360.12.

Item agreed to.

Adjustment of war claims—Secretary of State, $75,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What work is now going on in this connection?

Mr. COPP: We are asking for the same amount as last year. The work is proceeding as it has been during the last two or three years, comprising the activities of the clearing office the collecting of debts, and so on.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I understood that as a result of the deputy minister's trip to Germany last year or the year before the matter had become clarified so that we were beginning to see where we were. I would not think that we should be continuing this expenditure year after year. There must be some end to this thing.

Mr. COPP: We all hope it may come to an end. We have not got all the property in that we hope to get. The clearing office in London is getting all the information it can; the same staff is employed as was engaged in the work when I took office. We have had a representative in the Old Country during the last five or six months gathering in stock and things of that kind. We hope to get the matter cleared up as soon as possible.

Mr. JOHNSTON: How much of last year's vote was expended?

Mr. COPP: $64,338.23.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How is that made up?

Mr. COPP: Salaries, $46,635. the balance consisting of printing, travelling and legal services, and sundries.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How much money has now been got in?

Mr. COPP: The cash on hand at the present is $2,760,159.23.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How much of that was got in last year?

Mr. COPP: I cannot give the exact amount of money.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Approximately then.

Mr. COPP: I have a record of the transactions during the war.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What are they?

Mr. COPP: The amount and number of claims submitted against Germany in connection with pre-war transactions is $82,829.22 representing 109 claims, for the present year and $8,691,705.77, representing 885 claims, for previous years, or a total of $8,774,534.99.

Mr. JOHNSTON: It would appear to me that the further we get away from the war the more this work should diminish. Why the minister should ask for the same amount this year as last is hard for me to understand. If the claims are diminishing, the cost of administration should surely be less. I would have thought there could have been a reduction this year.

Mr. COPP: I regret we are not in a position to reduce the expenditure very much this year. We are employing the same staff, and there is a large amount of work to do carrying on the correspondence between the clearing offices. I quite realize that this is a large amount of money, but from the information I received from my officials I cannot see how we can reduce the expenditure this year. It will please me very much when we reach the point where we can do so.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The minister was giving a list of the activities. What else is being done this year?

Mr. COPP: I have a statement here as follows:

German claims for debts owing by Canadians

(b)	To March 31, 1922	Period April 1, 1922, to March 31, 1923	Total as on March 31, 1923

	$409,639 00	$409,639 00
Property not yet sold, estimated at.. ..		90,000 00
		$499,639 00

[Sir Henry Drayton.]

(ii) Securities in possession of the Custodian.

Under the provisions of paragraph 10 of the Annex to section 4, part X, of the Treaty of Versailles, Germany was obligated to transfer to Canada all certificates for shares, bonds, debentures, securities, etc. To date there has been received from Germany in this connection 38,858 shares of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and $148,580.00 Note Certificates of the same company. Other securities amounting to about $1,000,000 have also been handed over. It is estimated that all the securities would amount to about $12,-000.000.

(iii) Securities in the possession of the Public Trustee, England.

The Public Trustee in England holds approximately $6,000,000 in securities which are subject to certain liens, the amount of which is at present unascertainable, but it is hoped that at least $4,000,000 will be realized.

That is a matter of book-keeping between the local clearing office and the central clearing office. We cannot tell exactly what balance will be due us, but we estimate it to be between three and four million dollars.

We also find upon investigation that there are a number of securities held by the Alien Custodian of the United States which we claim belong to Canada. He holds approximately $1,250,000 of Canadian securities. That is now under investigation, and we hope to get it settled during the year. I inquired recently and I think the amount is somewhat larger than I have just given. The three last mentioned items total $17,250,000 and after allowing certain deductions for shrinkage the approximate results should reach about $14,-000,000.

A great many applications have been made to the department for the releasing of certain shares of stock that we have taken. In some cases we find upon investigation that stock has been taken illegally and we have to release it.

Applications for the release of enemy property vested in the custodian are continually being received on the grounds that the applicant is now an allied subject by virtue of the terms of the Treaty of Peace, or that the property was bona fide purchased by a neutral prior to the passing of the trading with the enemy regulations, May 2nd, 1916. In this connection property to the value of more than $10,000,000 (including accrued dividends) has been released, a very large proportion of this amount being Canadian Pacific Railway shares.

Nine applications have been received from Canadian women, married to German nationals, asking for the release of their property, and in two cases the opinion of the Supreme Court was obtained and upon its ruling all applications were approved and property to the value of $225,000 was relinquished.

I do not know that I could give very much more information to the committee by reading further details but perhaps hon. members may have some special questions to ask.

Mr. FORKE: I understood the minister to make a statement about property sequestrated in Germany, was that correct?

Mr. COPP: That was Canadian property in Germany taken over by the German government.

Mr. FORKE: What sort of property would it be?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: They were claims by Canadian merchants. For example there was a claim by one of our large manufacturing companies which was adjusted a long time ago. Most of what the minister has been telling us is history. Take for example his account of what transpired in Germany. That happened long ago.

Mr. COPP: Certainly.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: He has been settling these claims and getting back the money. For example there was the claim of the Massey Harris Company. A lot of this settling was done a long time ago. The adjusting of these matters was supposed to have been settled long since. Mr. Mulvey was sent over in order to wind it up.

Mr. COPP: Not wind it up.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Well, to arrange a system of settlement that would properly function; to get rid of all this expenditure and try and secure some final action on these matters. In spite of that I observe the vote is continuing just the same. What we are trying to find out is, what was done last year and not what has been done since the war. All these Canadian Pacific Railway shares were in long ago.

Mr. COPP: No, not all, we are getting them almost daily.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How many did you get in this year?

Mr. COPP: I could not tell my hon. friend exactly how many shares. I know we have not got them all in; they are coming in weekly and monthly; I could not say daily; and we are dealing with them just as they have been dealt with in the past.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The principal thing done this year was to issue claims for some $62,918.76 on behalf of Canadian debtors.

Mr. COPP: My hon. friend should not say that.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Well, what else was there?

Mr. COPP: What I have read to my hon. friend related to the work of the clearing office. It has been going on just the same during the past year as in the year before. We have the same officials and the same work is going on. We have to carry on a correspondence between the clearing offices and attend to other business. I have asked my officials if there is any possibility of getting along with a fewer number of employees and a smaller expenditure and from the statements made to me I do not see how we can.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the attitude of the minister in regard to it? This work is going on apparently the same as it has in the past although there is not the same necessity for it. What is the idea? Is this to be a perpetual department?

Mr. COPP: Claims are still coming in from Germany and they have to be considered now just the same as they have been in the past. Possibly there are not as large amounts of money involved, the claims now, possibly, are smaller but we are trying to get them cleared up and we need the staff to do the work.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My recollection was that a time limit was fixed for all this sort of business and it should be up by now; I do not know whether it has been extended. What I want to know is whether this is to be a perpetual office or not. I simply want to get the facts?

Mr. COPP: I cannot tell my hon. friend just how long the work will be going on. He knows very well that you cannot settle up such matters as these in a week, or a month, or even a year. I am sure the staff have been working as faithfully as they could and with all possible speed to try and get this matter settled up. We hope to get it settled some time but I cannot say just when.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: From what the minister says it is a pretty hopeless looking situation. He says the staff are working hard. Perhaps they are, as to that I cannot say. What I am trying to find out from the minister is when this work will be over. The German claims against Canada numbered 8,643. They have been looked after and all that is left on hand out of all the mess is 475 claims. There is not such an awful lot left to be done as far as that is concerned.

Mr. COPP: Claims are coming in all the time; they are coming in yet.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How many claims were received last month? Let us get some idea.

Mr. COPP: I do not think I can tell my hon. friend that.

Mr. FORKE: Is there no time limit for the filing of claims, or will they be received for all time?

Mr. COPP: The time has been extended.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How much longer are you going to go on extending the time?

Mr. COPP: That is a matter which would be decided by conference between the different clearing offices, but they have not been able to get together recently on account of the difficulty between Germany and France. The whole matter is being worked out by the clearing offices of the different countries interested. This is only a local clearing office here and we have to work through the central clearing office in London. The time limit has been extended from time to time, and I suppose will continue to be extended until such time as the Powers can get together and come to some conclusion as to the final disposition of the matter.

Mr. COOTE: Who is in charge of this work for the minister's department?

Mr. COPP: My deputy is the deputy custodian in charge of this work.

Mr. COOTE: What official title has Mr. Pugsley in connection with it?

Mr. COPP: He is a commissioner under the Inquiries Act to carry on an investigation in connection with the reparations question. He is not identified with my office at all.

Mr. COOTE: Is he steadily employed?

Mr. COPP: Just as a commissioner to make inquiries on the reparations question under the Inquiries Act.

Mr. HANSON: Is he paid out of this vote?

Mr. COPP: Paid out of this vote.

Mr. HANSON: How much is it proposed to pay him?

Mr. COPP: At the rate of $9,000 per year.

Mr. COOTE: Who was his predecessor in this work?

Mr. COPP: Sir Douglas Hazen, of St. John, was first appointed but later on he expressed a desire to be relieved of this work and Dr. Pugsley was appointed.

Mr. HANSON: How much was paid to Sir Douglas Hazen during the time he acted?

Mr. COPP: He did not occupy the office. He came up and looked into the matter and decided he would not take it.

Mr. HANSON: Did he not go to Washington? Did he not make some investigation?

Mr. COPP: I think not.

Mr. HANSON: It is rather strange that the amount supposed to be paid to the Hon. William Pugsley, synchronizes with the salary of the position which he has just given up as lieutenant governor of New Brunswick? It looks to me as if this place had been made for him. I should like to point out to the minister that as long as I can remember that gentleman has never been off the payroll of the government, and I question very much the advisability of appointing him at the salary to which the minister has referred. I doubt very much if it is worth that much to the country. Has it been decided that the claims of private individuals shall have priority over the claims of the Crown in connection with the German moneys in the hands of the custodian?

Mr. COPP: I cannot quite understand what you mean?

Mr. HANSON: We are entitled to some reparation from Germany under the terms of the Peace treaty. I understand there are certain German properties in the hands of the custodian. So far none of these reparations have been received by Canada to re-imburse her for expenses in connection with the war, and it is not probable, so far as we can see from the turn of events, that we will ever get anything out of Germany. Is it not supposed that the country should be re-imbursed with some of these moneys for part of the expense Canada was put to in connection with the war, and will the claims of the country have priority over the claims of private individuals?

Mr. COPP: I do not think they will. The investigation is being carried on at the present time because, under the treaty of Peace, the question of reparations and the filing of claims for reparation from Germany was advertised, and a very large number of claims have been filed, I think, amounting to twenty-five or thirty million dollars. Those have been on file in the office for the last two or three years. Some were filed as far back as 1918. Those are being inquired into now, to ascertain whether they are valid claims to be considered and whether the claims are too large. Every one who wishes to file a claim will have an opportunity of appearing before the commissioner himself, or by solicitor or counsel, and placing the facts before the commissioner, and on those facts the commissioner will make a report to the government. When that is done the question of payment of those claims will have to be decided later on, as a question of policy. I am not in position to tell my hon. friend or the House or the country, what the final result will be when these claims have been adjudicated upon. We will have a certain amount of money obtained from property we have sold, and shares, stocks, and bonds that we are holding at the present time as custodian or trustee. After the payment 9 p.m. of the debts between the two countries is arranged there will be a large amount. It is only an estimate but we hope there will be ten, twelve or fourteen million dollars in the hands of the custodian. The question of what will be done with that money, whether it will be applied in satisfaction, or in partial satisfaction, of claims for reparation, is a question of policy to be decided later on. I am not prepared to say how it will be settled. The same is true of the Old Country and the United States. They are carrying on investigations in the United States into the same question, to get information and obtain evidence upon which they can make a report and take action when the time comes to bring the matter to a finality.

Mr. HANSON: Is that question of policy one that will be decided by the federal government or the Imperial government?

Mr. COPP: I would not like to say what will be done. I think it will be decided by a conference between the governments.

Mr. COOTE: When was the commissioner appointed?

Mr. COPP: On the 13th March last.

Mr. COOTE: Who previously did this work?

Mr. COPP: No work was being done in regard to it. This commissioner is holding an investigation as to the validity of the claims that have been filed. The claims have been all filed, and he is acting in the position of a judge to hear the claims, take evidence, and make a report as to what claims are valid and what claims are not.

Mr. COOTE: Is there any good reason why this should not be done by a judge of the Exchequer Court? Would he not be the proper person?

Mr. COPP: Just now they are rather short of judges in the Exchequer Court.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: You might make an appointment.

Mr. BAXTER: The Montreal Star says the government is going to appoint an hon. member to the Exchequer Court judgeship.

Mr. COPP: I am sure any hon. member will agree that the gentleman who has been selected to carry on that work is very well qualified for the position and is a man of splendid legal attainments. He occupied a seat in this parliament for many years, and I have always regarded him as one of the greatest legal minds in the Dominion. I think the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) and the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Baxter) will agree with me.

Mr. HANSON: Do not slobber over him too much.

Mr. BAXTER: I entirely concur in the remarks of the Secretary of State with reference to Mr. Pugsley's ability. I would ask at the same time why this mad rush to appoint this gentleman with the ability? As far as I can find out from anything he tells us tonight it will be at least years, and it may be decades before a single dollar will be available for Canada. I do know that the governorship of New Brunswick became vacant some time ago.

An hon. MEMBER: He is out of a job now.

Mr. BAXTER: That is a very good reason.

Mr. COOTE: Is there any reason why the vacancy in the Exchequer Court should not be filled, and a judge of that court perform this work?

Mr. COPP: I have nothing whatever to do —more than assuming my share of responsibility—with the appointment of a judge to the Exchequer Court. I am sure if a judge were appointed he might do the work, but this is not an exchequer court matter at all. It is a matter outside of our courts, a matter of inquiry, being held very frequently outside of this country, to get information upon which this government can reasonably act in reference to a public question such as this.

Mr. COOTE: Are all the hearings held in Ottawa?

Mr. MARTELL: Does the hon. member know the legal ability and the great qualifications of the gentleman whom the government have appointed to this position? Evidently the hon. member does not know. I venture to say that if he went to Cape Breton, and from there to Vancouver and British Columbia, traversing the whole of the Dominion, he would not be able to find a man of greater legal acumen and ability or better qualified to deal with these questions than the Hon. William Pugsley.

Mr. STEVENS: I would suggest that they should get the hon. member for Hants (Mr. Martell) to nominate a man for the Exchequer Court, and help them out of their dilemma.

Mr. MARTELL: In spite of all my hon. friend's sarcasm, I would suggest that the hon. member for Hants knows many lawyers in Canada quite well qualified to fill the position but the hon. member for Hants undoubtedly, as a supporter of the present administration, having complete faith in them, knows that they will on the right occasion and at the right opportunity, appoint a man with eminent qualifications.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend has aspirations himself.

Mr. COOTE: I am sure we are much indebted to the member for Hants for enlightening the House as to the ability of the present commissioner. I really think that the present commissioner has been before the public of Canada long enough for them to judge for themselves of his ability and his particular fitness for the position. I might ask the minister again whether these investigations are all held in Ottawa or whether the commissioner has to travel about the country to hear claims.

Mr. COPP: He will hold an inquiry wherever it is most convenient to hear any number of claims.

Mr. HANSON: How long is it anticipated that this gentleman will be employed at the rate of $9,000 a year and expenses?

Mr. COPP: I cannot tell my hon. friend.

Mr. HANSON: Is his engagement subject to no definite term?

Mr. COPP: His services will be dispensed with when he has completed the work he will undertake.

Mr. HANSON: Well, I want to warn the minister that he will be on the job until another one is in sight.

Mr. STEVENS: The special pleading of the member for Hants (Mr. Martell) for our old friend Mr. Pugsley, suggests a question to my mind. Upon what basis is this eminent legal light to adjudicate these claims? The minister says that the work is not one for which the Exchequer Court is adapted. I gather from that suggestion that the basis on which the claims will be examined is not judicial. Well, is it to be a political basis? If not, I ask again, upon precisely what basis will the claims be adjudicated? The interpolation of my hon. friend for Hants rather arouses in my mind a suspicion that perhaps there is something more than the necessity for eminent legal ability involved in the matter.

Mr. MARTELL: To the pure all things are pure.

Mr. STEVENS: I will grant that the Hon. Mr. Pugsley possesses great legal ability, but my acquaintance with him in the House also convinces me that few gentlemen in Canada have more political astuteness or adroitness than has that same gentleman. It is natural therefore that we should be very anxious to know exactly the basis upon which these claims are to be adjusted.

Mr. MARTELL: Who appointed him governor of New Brunswick?

Mr. HANSON: If the hon. gentleman wants some inside history in regard to that question I can give it to him.

Mr. MARTELL: I might agree with you, too.

Mr. STEVENS: I have asked the minister a question; I wish he would answer me. Upon what basis are those claims to be adjudicated? The minister declares that it is not to be political. Well, then, what is it?

Mr. COPP: The various claims that are filed will fall into certain categories, and among other things the investigations will be directed towards ascertaining to which of these categories any particular claim belongs. Compensation may be claimed from Germany under article 232 in respect of damage suffered under any one of these categories, of which there are ten. They include:

(1) Damage to injured persons and to surviving dependants by personal injury to or death of civilians caused by acts of war, including bombardments or other attacks on land, on sea, or from the air, and all the direct consequences thereof, and of all operations of war by the two groups of belligerents whatever arising.

(2) Damage caused by Germany or her allies to civilian victims of acts of cruelty, violence or maltreatment (including injuries to life or health as a consequence of imprisonment, deportation, internment or evacuation, of exposure at sea or of being forced to labour, wherever arising, and to the surviving dependants of such victims.)

(3) Damage caused by Germany or her allies in their own territory or in occupied or invaded territory to civilian victims of all acts injurious to health or capacity to work, or to honour, as well as to the surviving dependants of such victims.

(4) Damage caused by any kind of maltreatment of prisoners of war.

(8) Damage caused to civilians by being forced by Germany or her allies to labour without just remuneration.

(9) Damage in respect of all property wherever situated belonging to any of the allied or associated states or their nations, with the exception of naval and military works or materials, which has been carried off, seized, injured or destroyed by the acts of Germany or her allies on land, on sea or from the air, or damage directly in consequence of hostilities or of any operations of war.

(10) Damage in the form of levies, fines and other similar exactions imposed by Germany or her allies upon the civilian population.

These are the various matters in respect of which damages can be claimed and into which investigation will be made.

Mr. STEVENS: Does the claimant have to establish legal right?

Mr. COPP: He has no legal right under the act; it is a mere matter of establishing his claim, and the inquiry is to ascertain whether or not any claim comes within any of the categories I have read.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Surely my hon. friend has not the slightest idea of the treaty. It is obvious that whatever rights are given by that solemn covenant are legal rights; the question is entirely a legal one. It is nonsense to say anything else. If therefore this is a matter of legal right why not leave it where it was before? And it is absolutely legal, because the category to which any claim belongs is a matter of legal construction. You might as well say that the rights under a deed or an agreement are not legal. They are legal, just as the rights under a treaty are. My hon. friend says that this is not a proper matter for reference to the Exchequer Court. Why should not the Exchequer Court have jurisdiction in this matter? There are two possible reasons, and it would be only fair to the minister to let him state his own first if he has any. I would ask him again why cannot this matter be properly looked after by the Exchequer Court?

Mr. COPP: We no doubt could have a judge of the Exchequer Court act as a commissioner, but I do not think the Exchequer Court would be the proper tribunal.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My recollection is that the Exchequer Court has jurisdiction in any matter of this kind; it is a sort of administrative court, and the government has absolute power to refer to it any such question. I should not have thought that there was any doubt about that. But there are, as I say, just two reasons for the action that is intended here. The first is, that there is a vacancy on the Bench and it is not convenient to the government to appoint the person properly selected for that position during the term of this parliament. That is one reason.

Mr. MARTELL: Who is selected?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think my hon. friend knows very well; if he does not he is not as close to the counsels of his party as I thought he was. But perhaps they are wiser than some people give them credit for being. However that may be, there is another reason. An appointment outside gives the government an excuse for paying so much per annum to a political friend. That is the second reason. There are no other reasons except those two. Now, my hon. friend says that a commissioner was appointed before—the Chief Justice of New Brunswick. That is true. But my hon. friend will find that that commissioner was to get no $9,000 a year; in fact he was to get nothing at all. Under our act he could get nothing except his mere expenses.

Mr. CAHILL: Did he do any work?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: He did not do any work. He came up to Ottawa and after the change of administration he gave up the appointment. But for the change of administration the work would have been gone on with just as soon as there was any real necessity for it to be undertaken. Now, the hon. minister knows perfectly well that there are any number of judges quite capable of doing this work whose services could have been availed of by the administration, but of course in such event there would be no payment of $9,000 a year. Will my hon. friend give me any reasons for this appointment except the two I have advanced?

Mr. COPP: I can only repeat, Mr. Chairman, what I have already said. We found it necessary to have a commissioner to investigate this matter, and as Sir Douglas Hazen, who was appointed a commissioner for this purpose just prior to the going out of office of my hon. friends, afterwards expressed a desire to be relieved of the appointment, we asked Mr. Pugsley to undertake the work. I am sure he will conduct the investigation satisfactorily to the government as well as to parliament.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman's answer reminds me of the deaf man who, when called upon to pay a longstanding debt, answered, that it was a very fine day. The question is, why appoint someone who is to be paid a salary when there are any number of members of the Bench whose regular duties are just of this character, determining claims, who could have been appointed. The hon. member knows quite well that Sir Douglas Hazen upon the accession of this government offered, if it was the will of the government, to place the position at their disposal. Well, of course they eagerly grasped it, and the Honourable William Pugsley now has a large salary at the expense of the state. It is a position demanding legal ability; our judges have legal ability. I do not deny at all that the Hon. William Pugsley has legal ability, but if it is only legal ability that is necessary, it is no news to my hon. friend to be assured that 99 per cent of the talents of the Hon. William Pugsley would be wasted. What I should like to ask is this: after the long list of appointments, east, west, north, south and central, that have gone, with really rather wearisome monotony, to party friends of the government of the deepest dye, ending with the appointment of Mr. Congdon to investigate why the Grand Trunk directors voted gratuities, are many more such appointments still to be made? Is the waiting list long yet? Let us know about when we may expect to get to the end of it.

Mr. COPP: I am sorry I cannot give my hon. friend any information.

Mr. COOTE: Have any claims been filed with the minister's department in regard to what is generally referred to as the Hoppe and Isenberg coal lease?

Mr. COPP: Nothing has been filed with us.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I hope the suggestion of the hon. member (Mr. Coote) does not lead the government to appoint another commissioner.

Mr. COOTE: Was this position filled through the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. COPP: I am afraid not.

Mr. HANSON: Why was not this matter referred to Mr. Justice Audette, the Assistant Judge of the Exchequer Court, and a gentleman very well qualified to deal with claims of this character? He has done a great deal of this class of work or work analogous to it, for the government. Was his name considered in connection with the appointment?

Mr. COPP: There is only one member of the Exchequer Court Bench at the present time. Various names were considered, and it was thought that Mr. Pugsley's name would be the most acceptable to the country generally on account of his ability and experience in that line of work.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. HANSON: Then it simply amounts to this—Mr. Pugsley needed the job. Is that the idea?

Mr. COPP: I did not say so.

Mr. HANSON: That is what you mean.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Oh.

Mr. STEVENS: The hon. Minister of Marine groans.

Mr. LAPOINTE: No, I was exclaiming at Mr. Hanson's remark.

Mr. STEVENS: The answer to the Secretary of State reveals a rather misty state of mind. He advises the House that one judge is carrying on the business of the Exchequer Court satisfactorily, and that there is no need to appoint another judge.

Mr. COPP: My hon. friend misunderstood me. I did not say anything like that.

Mr. STEVENS: Not in A, B, C, language, but that is the inference which we must take from his observation. But the government finds it necessary to appoint a special commissioner in a judicial capacity to pass upon legal claims, and he says he does not know whether it will be a decade, two decades or three decades before this appointment will terminate; he has not the remotest idea. I would suggest to the minister, if he and his colleagues cannot find a suitable appointee for the Exchequer Court vacancy, that the Hon. Mr. Pugsley should be appointed to that court as a judge to carry on this work at the salary of an Exchequer Court judge. He would then have all the machinery of the Exchequer Court at his disposal. My hon. friend and the government are setting up a separate court to do undoubtedly the very thing which the Exchequer Court is supposed to do, and at the same time refraining for a month to appoint a judge to the vacancy in the Exchequer Court. Either the country does not require another judge in the Exchequer Court —in which case why appoint an additional judge?—or else the work of that court does require that another appointment should be made.

I am going to move, Mr. Chairman:

That item No. 382, $75,000 for the Department of the Secretary of State, be reduced by the sum of $9,000.

The CHAIRMAN: The amendment should be put in writing.

Mr. STEVENS: I will put it in writing, Mr. Chairman, in a moment.

Mr. COPP: I hardly think my hon. friend can be serious in the amendment that he proposes. We have not increased the expenditure this year; we are not providing for any special outlay. The matter was given very careful consideration, as it was, I am sure prior to the defeat of the government of my hon. friend, when a commissioner was appointed by them to carry out this work. Whether it was because of the change of government I do not know, but Sir Douglas Hazen expressed his desire to be relieved from any duties in that connection. We had hoped that we could get along without appointing another commissioner, but those who had filed claims were pressing very strongly for consideration of those claims by some tribunal, and it was therefore thought advisable that a commissioner should be appointed for the purpose. As to referring the matter to a judge of the Exchequer Court, we have only one judge there at present and we thought it would not be well to ask him to take on this extra work. But aside from that, I doubt whether it would be a proper course to pursue to ask any judge to withdraw his time from his judicial duties in order to attend to an inquiry of this kind. We had a number of names before us for the position. The government of my hon. friend had appointed the Chief Justice of our province, a man of high standing, and we thought it only right and proper that we should select in his stead a man of ability, of wide legal attainment and experience, a man who for a number of years had occupied the position of Minister of Public Works in the federal government. I am charged with appointing Dr. Pugsley on political grounds, but that same gentleman was so highly thought of, so highly respected by my hon. friends, that he was selected by them to fill the high and honourable position of Lieutenant Governor of the province of New Brunswick.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister should do full justice to the subject while he is at it. The late government appointed very many strong Liberals to high positions throughout the entire Dominion. The late government was in no way narrow in that regard.

Mr. COPP: Nor, were we in any way narrow in appointing the very man whom my hon. friends had appointed as Lieutenant Governor of that province.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We did not make jobs for them, though.

Mr. COPP: We followed the example of our hon. friends; we selected a man who is admirably qualified to fill the position. My hon. friend's amendment would only embarrass the department in carrying out its work. If we were asking for a very large increase I could understand my hon. friend taking that position, but under the circumstances I am sure the committee will agree that the amendment should not be accepted.

Mr. GOULD: It is very interesting for the newer members of the House to watch the little battles that take place between the old time parties. It recalls to my mind a certain incident that occurred in the year 1920. A party of twenty-two members of this House went down to St. John, where they were given a dinner, and at the end of the table sat the Hon. Mr. Pugsley, whose name has been mentioned here to-night, and the then Minister of the Interior. As one listened to the complimentary speeches made on that occasion one could not anticipate any such criticism of Mr. Pugsley as we have heard here to-night. On that occasion each handed the other what might be termed bouquets—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the hon. gentleman be good enough to substantiate what he says by something in the nature of quotation? I assure him that anything I said I would stand by to-day and am ready to repeat before this House.

Mr. GAUVREAU: The right hon. gentleman sometimes forgets pretty quickly.

Mr. GOULD: Everything was harmonious; if any criticism at all was offered it was directed to one poor timid little Progressive who had only shortly before that reached the House. I know the Minister of the Interior at that time suggested that a new political force—my right hon. friend wants quotation—had arisen in the land, and he predicted that it would be of short duration. The timid little Progressive, responding for Saskatchewan suggested that while everything seemed to run harmoniously between the hon. gentlemen who sat at the head table, representing the two "old political parties," as they both termed them—"historic political parties"—the day might not be far distant when the new force in the land would relegate the "historic parties" to the prehistoric stage. I say again that as my mind harks back to that occasion—and a very pleasant one it was, I must say—it could not possibly have been anticipated that certain of the gentlemen sitting at that table would subsequently offer any sort of criticism. The gentleman in question stands as high in the esteem of the people at the present time as he did then. No crime can be charged against him simply because he happens to be a Liberal, nor could there be if he happened to be a Conservative, and I cannot see why criticism should be levelled against him as it has been. That is the type of politician I am; I will fight as hard and as honestly for an individual who has politically opposed me at all times as I will for anyone else, provided that he is honest and sincere and capable of filling the position to which he is assigned. That, I think, is a fair expression of the politics that we in this corner of the chamber believe in.

Mr. HANSON: Nobody questions the ability of the Hon. William Pugsley to fill this or any other judicial position, but what hon. gentlemen on this side question is the necessity of the appointment. And we are naturally suspicious when the appointment synchronizes with the completion of his tenure of office as Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick. It does look to us like a job—

Mr. CAHILL: He could not hold both, could he?

Mr. HANSON: No, he could not hold both. He has been known to hold more than one job, but he could not do so in this case—and it is not his fault that he could not. I do submit that the point raised by the hon. member for Centre Vancouver (Mr. Stevens) is well taken and that this commissionership should have been given to one of the judges. Had that been done, there would have been no cost to the country except his necessary expenses.

Amendment (Mr. Stevens) negatived; Yeas, 34; Nays, 48.

Item agreed to.

MINES DEPARTMENT

Geological survey—for explorations, surveys and investigations, wages of explorers, topographers and others..	$202,000
For publication of English and French editions of reports, maps, illustrations, etc..	60,000
For maintenance of offices and museum, instruments, chemicals, books of reference, miscellaneous assistance, and contingencies.	50,000
For museum equipment..	15,000
For purchase of specimens..	5,000
	332,000

Mr. MEIGHEN: I observe that the minister's efforts for economy have resulted in another increase. Perhaps he will explain that in the usual way.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Argenteuil, Minister of Mines): There is a decrease.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is an increase of $10,000.

[Mr. Gould.]

Mr. STEVENS: Is that the usual explanation?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The usual error too.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): If my hon. friend refers to the increase of $10,000 for publication of English and French editions of reports, that is the result of a reduction last year. My hon. friend will see that this is the same vote as in 1921-1922. My hon. friend the ex-Minister of Finance asked for a statement last year of what we had unexpended and we gave him the expenditure for ten months. Unfortunately it does not cover the amount of the publications, and we are asking for the amount this year that we formerly had. That has happened in two cases. There was a reduction of $8,000 on another item of the same character.

Mr. HANSON: Would the minister give us some information as to the exploration work that is being carried on? I notice that one of these parties was down in my constituency last summer. I should like to know how much work is being done in eastern Canada, for instance, this year, how many parties are out and where they are located.

Mr. STEWART (Argenetuil): We plan two exploration parties in New Brunswick, one under Mr. C. H. Freeman and the other under Mr. D. B. Dowling. One is doing topographical surveying work and the other geological mapping and investigation of the Minto coal basin.

Mr. HANSON: Do they come under this vote?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: Can the minister give us any information regarding the work being done in the coast province?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Mr. Hanson is to be in northwestern British Columbia, Mr. W. L. Uglow, in Cumberland, Mr. W H. Miller at Aldermere, Mr. W. A. Johnston at Barkerville, Mr. C. E. Cairnes at Similkameen, Mr. Dolmage at Copper mountain, Mr. G. A. Young, who is making an inventory of iron ore resources, Mr. M. E. Bancroft, and Mr. J. E. Walker at Windermere.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister mentioned one party at Copper mountain. What is that party doing?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): They are mapping and making a detailed study of the copper ore deposits of Copper mountain.

Mr. STEVENS: That mountain was diamond drilled by the company that is located there. Are they taking advantage of that work?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I believe so.

Mr. STEVENS: Another question in regard to oil well inspection. There are several oil wells being drilled in southern British Columbia, and the question arose some short time ago as to whether the companies drilling these wells were dealing with the matter in a fair manner as regards the shareholders and the public. That is, a driller might give out information that there was water in a well and that it was a non-successful operation, and the stock would be sacrificed and gathered in. I understand that the department have inspectors and experts who look into this work and advise companies of the actual condition of these wells, or at least they check up the operatives so that they cannot give out false returns for manipulation purposes. Can the minister give us any information on that subject?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): That would more properly come up under the Interior department estimates. However, I can give the information. We had up till recently an engineer in charge, a Mr. Slipper, who is located in Alberta but is available for inspection work in any province where oil boring is going on. It is a most difficult thing even for the expert to ascertain the facts if the driller is not prepared to give him information. We try to keep logs of all the wells in order that we may have a history of formations in the various districts where drilling operations are going on, but they are not always reliable, I am free to say. However, we have that engineer, and he is employed in the Interior department, not in the Mines department.

Mr. STEVENS: Would the minister also mention whether a survey of the iron ore deposits is being made in conjunction with the provincial authorities? If so under what agreement and what portion of the cost, etc, is being borne by this government, and to what extent has the survey been carried out?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): My deputy tells me that the arrangement is that the geological work is done by the Department of Mines of the federal government, and the drilling and testing by the provincial government.

Mr. STEVENS: Does this vote cover, or apply, in every way to the ore testing plant that is under consideration?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): It is a separate vote.

Mr. STEVENS: Is it provided for in this year's estimates?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The new ore testing plant spoken of in British Columbia?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): We have no vote.

Mr. STEVENS: It has been dropped? There was one carried for a number of years.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I am going to ask for a small sum in the Supplementary Estimates to pay for the shipment of ore to our testing plant here during this year so that the British Columbia miners may be in the same position as those who live very much closer to the Ottawa plant. There have been some negotiations—perhaps I should not say negotiations but there have been representations—for the acquiring of a plant at Nelson but we have not gone very far in that connection. I am of the opinion that a small sum of money—that is small in comparison with the interest charges on capitalization account for the construction of an ore-testing plant in British Columbia—would bring ore here and enable it to be tested. That would give a service although not as rapid as if the work were done out there and at much less cost than would be required were we to undertake a new plant in British Columbia at the moment.

Mr. HUMPHREY: Is it possible to get the true commercial value of the ores by bringing them here and treating them at the Ottawa plant?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Identically the same service will be given here that we propose to give in British Columbia. I may say for the information of the committee that this is only a temporary arrangement. I am not intimating that this is the end of the plan for an ore-testing plant in British Columbia. This is only intended to be a temporary service in the meantime I am going to ask for $10,000, I think that is the amount, to cover the freight charges.

Mr. HUMPHREY: Will that amount cover the freight and express charges from British Columbia to Ottawa on the complex ores that are required to be assayed or tested?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): It would be pretty hard to answer that question; we have no knowledge of how much ore will be offered. But I think it will. I think that we will be able to pay the freight for that amount of money and possibly give tests to ores furnished by all the people in British Columbia who are interested.

Mr. HUMPHREY: Is the minister aware that there are unlimited quantities of ore in British Columbia awaiting the installation of some ore-testing plant? Does he think that $5,000 or $10,000 would provide that convenience and develop those ore resources?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Of course, my hon. friend knows a great deal more about the subject than I do but the testing of a 200-pound lot will give a fair indication of almost any sample that is forwarded, and $10,000 will bring a great number of lots forward. I am merely suggesting it in order to give some service to the people of British Columbia who have been waiting for some considerable time to have this testing plant established in their province.

Mr. STEVENS: I think, perhaps, the minister has not clearly appreciated the point at issue which was referred to by my hon. friend for Kootenay and myself. As a matter of fact there are in British Columbia—and I presume in other sections of the country as well—very large deposits of refractory ores, for instance silver lead and silver zinc ores, with mixtures of other metals that up to the present no commercial plant has been able to profitably separate, although they have been experimenting for years. I was at one, the Trail smelter, one of the finest institutions of the kind in Canada, where they have spent hundreds of thousands of dollars trying to solve this problem. If it were solved it would mean a tremendous saving to the country and an impetus to the mining business generally, not only in British Columbia but wherever such ores are found Now, the expenditure contemplated in the location of an ore testing plant—at least the amount set a few years ago—was in the neighbourhood of $100,000. It was recognized then that the establishment of such a plant would cost probably from $100,000 to $200,000. There was a difficulty in the minds of the officials of the department as to the best place to locate that plant, whether in the interior or on the coast. Personally I have never expressed any opinion—I do not think I am competent to do so—as to where it should be located. The officials of the department should determine that in the interest of the investigatory work; it is very important. I want to say to the minister that I appreciate this contemplated vote of $10,000 to test these small samples of ores, but that will not do very much good in solving the problem I mention. It must be treated on a commercial basis, and it will perhaps take some years to find a process that will successfully treat these ores. I am certain that the return would amply repay the department for the investigation. I am very sorry if the former vote has been dropped from the estimates, because what the minister now suggests to replace it will not meet the case at all.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I have given the matter some consideration and I do not think $50,000 would construct the plant that would be required in British Columbia.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What amount?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I should say $100,000, I do not know whether double the amount, which would involve an annual expenditure of some $50,000, would do. In the meantime I thought it wise to offer facilities to the British Columbia miner who is desirous of having tests made of the product of his particular mine or claim. If he agrees to forward samples here from his nearest railway station we will give him all the tests that he would probably get at the inception of a plant in his own province. Of course I quite follow my hon. friend's suggestion that this plant would require developments as various ores came to it for the purpose of determining a proper course of treating, but we do identically the same testing work here. I am quite of the opinion that a plant of this character will have to be established in British Columbia but I may say, generally speaking, that unless there is an absolute dire necessity for the building of this plant out there and the purchase of the necessary machinery I think it well to delay matters, at least for a year, in the hope that both machinery and building costs will be reduced. However, I have no desire to penalize the very important industry in British Columbia, and in the meantime this required service will be given for the benefit of the province.

Mr. HUMPHREY: In view of the fact that a vote was passed some time ago and has been allowed to lapse, representing a district that depends entirely upon its mineral resources. I give it as my opinion, and the opinion of those better able to speak with authority than I am, that such action is penalizing the people of British Columbia and especially the mining industry. At the present time that industry in British Columbia is on the eve of improvement. There never was a time in the last eight years when the outlook was as good as it now is. We have this smelter situated at Trail, the property of the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company, a very large institution doing a great deal of work for the province. Nevertheless, there are many kinds of complex ores throughout the province, and in the districts where they have these ores they require a testing plant. The minister has mentioned this small plant located at Nelson. As I am particularly conversant with this plant, and as I know how it happened that it is situated there I can tell the minister that, with a small expenditure, it would be in a position to handle the process of testing these different complex ores in the initial stages. This plant can be made available with a very small expenditure. By holding up this vote which was put through in the last few years, I think the government is holding back the mining industry and the assistance that it should have in developing what is considered our greatest asset.

Mr. McBRIDE: I am fully in sympathy with this move to get a plant out in British Columbia to test ore, but I think the government should investigate the situation in order to ascertain the most feasible place to locate the plant. Personally, I think Kamloops is about the most central location, and I would ask the government to go fully into the question, in order to ascertain the most feasible place to put the plant so as to give accommodation to everybody. We have both the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific railways at Kamloops. It is well supplied with railways.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): In reply to both hon. members, I may say that I am entirely in sympathy with the idea of establishing a plant. I believe the mining industry warrants the placing of a plant in British Columbia. There is the practical difficulty raised by the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. McBride). We have made some investigation of the plant the hon. member for Kootenay (Mr. Humphrey) speaks of. We have not approached the owners for the purpose of finding out what it could be purchased for. It occurred to me that probably that plant was not favourably located to serve the needs of British Columbia, and that would need some investigation as well. It would serve the needs of southern British Columbia entirely, but as mining is carried on, and probably will be carried on, throughout the whole British Columbia region when the plant is built, I think it should be placed as near a central point as possible, in order that freight costs may be reduced to a minimum. What we will do this year I think will give the service to every man very reasonably. If a man brings his samples to the station, puts them on the train
10 p.m. and sends them forward we will agree to give them a test and return him the results of the test. I do not want it to be inferred that, because we have not put an amount in the estimates for the construction of the plant this year, the idea has been dropped, because it has not.

Mr. HUMPHREY: Is it the intention of the department to carry on further investigations in regard to establishing this plant in British Columbia this year, or is this the final move, providing an appropriation for bringing the ore to Ottawa?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No. I thought I made it clear to my hon. friend that this was only a temporary measure to cover the year. We will certainly try to place the plant where it will be most convenient. The question of whether it is wise to establish a plant has been settled so far as I can ascertain from the officials of the department. There are no two opinions about that, but there is some question as to whether it should go right down to the coast where the railways all concentrate, or whether it should be put in a central portion of the province, as suggested by my hon. friend for Kamloops, or some place where cross-country railways would serve the interests of all parties concerned.

Mr. HUMPHREY: The department could very well decide the location of the plant, if they would admit the principle of establishing one in British Columbia. This question has been considered and certainly negotiations have been carried on for a number of years back. The mining people of British Columbia feel that they are being penalized by the government not being able to reach a decision. Representations are being made to the department in respect to particular points, and the desire is to co-operate, and to render any assistance that may be possible to the department to assist them to come to a decision. It is not for the particular benefit of one point or one locality so much as to render some assistance and co-operation to enable the government to come to a decision. Representing a district that is entirely a mining district, I could not do otherwise than bring out the qualifications of that particular district, especially in regard to the plant now located at Nelson. That plant could be acquired practically without any outlay of money. A very small sum would purchase it, and it is equipped with something like $40,000 or $50,000 worth of machinery which is lying idle. I simply offer these suggestions with a view to assisting the government. This particular point is located in the interior, where there is practically the greatest amount of complex ore, and it is easily accessible from any other point in the province.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Is it the intention of the government to give any assistance to the Coast Range Steel Company? I believe that company has asked for a guarantee of bonds, or something of that kind.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Representations have been made to the government but, so far as I know, no commitments of any kind have been made.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No results.

Mr. MILLAR: What success has the department had in drilling for oil in southern Alberta? When I was there last fall, at what is known as the Maclean well, they had reached a depth of about 1,900 feet. They were expecting oil in a very short time. South of that is what is known as the Sunburst well in Montana and from the wells nearby I saw oil floating in great quantities. I understand that the oil prospectors believe that the intervening country, to the extent of some seven miles, is rich in oil, and it seemed to me a wise thing for the department to spend money in drilling for oil where they were. With what success have they met in connection with the Maclean well on the international boundary?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I understood my hon. friend to say that the department was drilling. The department does not do any drilling, but I can give my hon. friend some information about the Coutts Sweet Grass Company. They have reached a depth now of 2,800 feet, and we know that in all cases of drilling for oil you may be 50 feet off the basin in which the oil is located and miss it. They, like other drillers, are very confident that they will get oil, but whether they will or not I cannot say. They make the statement that at 2,200 feet they struck a small vein but did not think it of sufficient volume to warrant the stopping of drilling operations, and so they went to a greater depth.

Mr. MILLAR: I understand that they are going further.

[Mr. Humphrey.]

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes.

Mr. PUTNAM: Whereabouts did the hon. member see oil flowing?

Mr. COOTE: How much, approximately, of the vote of $202,000 is spent in each province?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): For geological survey, the item under discussion, we estimate for exploration in British Columbia and Yukon, which are combined in the item, $38,300; in the Northwest territories, $5,000; in Alberta, $17,000; in Manitoba, $4,500; in Saskatchewan, $4,500; in Ontario, $24,200; in Quebec, $11,000; in New Brunswick, $3,000; in Nova Scotia, $6,500; and "in general," $2,300. In connection with the topographical surveys we will spend in British Columbia, $12,000; in Manitoba, $4,500; in Ontario, $8,500; in Quebec $8,600; in New Brunswick, $6,000, and in Nova Scotia $8,000. A question was raised last year by the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton), and I think by the member for Wellington (Mr. Guthrie), in regard to an apparent over-lapping, and the matter was looked into. At first I had an idea that it would perhaps be well to combine all topographical surveys under the Surveys branch, but I find that some years ago the Geological branch were desirous of controlling the work for the purpose of mapping areas upon which geological work was to be carried on; and they did that work under their direction. I find also that in the Department of National Defence some work was being carried on. Under the chairmanship of Doctor Deville we have taken care to see that there is no overlapping in the work, and hence you will find a variation in the expenditures in the Geological branch and the Topographical branch in the various provinces. I can assure the committee—and this is the point I wish to make—that there is absolutely no overlapping; the operations carried on by the various organizations, are co-ordinated and made use of. For example, if in any section the geological parties have already done the topographical work, then there is no party from the Topographical branch doing work there.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think that the minister had any task in stopping overlapping. I had a survey committee at work for some time while I was in the department some years ago, and under the chairmanship of Doctor Deville I provided successfully against overlapping. What I called attention to a year ago was something in regard to which apparently I was not able to influence the government—that is, the survey work being done in the Militia department. If any human being can tell me of what value that is to this country, then the information would be in addition to my knowledge.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): They have joined us on the board; we do not know what they are doing.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Did my hon. friend say that they are joined under the minister?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No; they work with us; we know what they are doing.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I know what they are doing too, and it is because I know what they are doing that I think the work is worthless; and it is very expensive.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The topographical work?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes. They are doing such thorough topographical survey work that in the area they have covered you can tell where every schoolhouse is, where every church is, where every house is, almost where every telegraph pole is, if not the height of it. It is really a sort of literal photograph of the entire country; and they have done now so much after about twenty-five years of work that if they can keep on through next millennium and half of the following one, they will have done. Such is the nature of their work; and by the time they are about one-hundredth part through, the beginning of the work will be of no use, because all these things change. I do hope that the minister will exert his influence to see that worthless survey work is done away with. I do not find fault with the officers; I think they are doing their work well. But of what value the work is to the country for the amount of money expended I never was able to understand. I sincerely trust that now that the attention of the government is called to the matter this work will be done away with. I did not know about it until close to the termination of my office. May I suggest another thing to the minister for the exercise of his dormant talents, if he has any left after the Interior department is taken care of. He should try to avoid unnecessary expenditure and save some money for serving the country. There is a necessity in connection with that ore-dressing plant in British Columbia. I remember being entirely convinced of an urgent necessity there. I cannot say that I can bring the reasons to bear just now why it is not possible, effectively and with practical results, to bring ore here. What the minister has in mind may possibly alleviate the situation for a while, but he will find that in the end it will likely have been better for him to have saved the money and got sooner to work constructing a proper ore-dressing plant. So convinced was I of this that in the last year I was in office an estimate was put in for the purpose of starting work in this direction. But of course the contest came on that year and we could not go on. Let the minister exert his energy to prevent the appointment of grotesque commissions, and the prolific creation of fancy sinecures for party friends, and then there will be some money left for work of this kind that goes to develop wealth in the country. The minister has an ore-dressing plant in one part of the city of Ottawa; I forget the street. The plant is a good one and it is not expensive and it is to that plant that this ore will come. Some two or three years ago we were testing there new methods of ore flotation. It is well known that the mineral flotation people have a patent method of flotation by oil which they control and out of which they exact very large profits, making the company immensely wealthy. A new flotation system was being tried and, before I left, had met with very encouraging success. I should like to know whether that success has been continued, and what the opinion of the department is as to its value.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): One of the difficulties in connection with research work of this character is to convince parliament and the people that the money is well expended. We have made a very heavy expenditure at Bienfait on experimental work with fuel which has not yet resulted successfully The experiments mentioned by my hon. friend are still going on, and I watched them with a good deal of interest last year in the plant there. We are asking for some money to buy improved machinery. I had the deputy minister visit England, Germany, and Belgium as well as keep very closely in touch with the Bureau of Mines of the American government in order that we may know what other people are accomplishing in research work respecting new methods of treating ores as well as fuels and so get value for the money we expend and perhaps discover better methods of handling these problems. No very great success however, has yet attended the experimental work that my hon. friend has referred to.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The liquid flotation?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Nothing that we can say is a definite success.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Has it been tried upon the refractory lead ores of British Columbia?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I cannot give that information at the moment. I saw them experimenting there, but not on lead.

Mr. MEIGHEN: On gold?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It was considered rather successful on gold in my time. Has that opinion been reversed?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I am told on copper and gold they have got definite success.

Mr. COOTE: Has this department any revenue from some of the provinces?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No.

Mr. COOTE: Does not the government control the mineral rights in the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes.

Mr. COOTE: Have you not revenue from mining and oil leases?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes, but that is in the Interior department; this is the Mines department, which is entirely separate.

Mr. COOTE: You have no revenue from British Columbia or the other provinces in this connection?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Not in this department.

Mr. COOTE: We could get particulars of the revenue when the estimates of the Interior are brought down?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Revenue from what?

Mr. COOTE: Revenue from leases of mineral and oil rights. It seems to me it is a question that should be looked into as to just how much money we should spend on provinces that have their own mineral resources when there are other provinces that have been deprived of such resources, and I do not know whether any money has been spent to help the latter develop these resources.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I can tell my hon. friend that money has been spent, and the fact that those provinces were deprived of their resources has been a consideration in spending more money there. There is a very, very large expenditure in geological survey work in Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Alberta, particularly in the northern parts of those provinces where our chief finds were. Of course, in British Columbia there has been the greatest expenditure because British Columbia is really by nature where the best results could be expected.

Mr. COOTE: It may be true that British Columbia has the greatest mineral resources, and those resources will enure to the benefit of British Columbia alone in that sense. So that the prairie provinces are not being justly dealt with in this regard. I would point out the injustice that Alberta is suffering from at the present time. We have on our statute books an act governing the payment of bounty on crude oil according to its specific gravity, and the standard is set in such a peculiar way that I think none of the wells in Alberta have been able to secure any bounty, although the Dominion owns those resources and has received large amounts in rentals from oil leases; but the government is paying considerable sums every year for crude oil produced in Ontario, and there the provincial authorities own the mineral rights. I think it is time the government amended the act so that crude oil produced in Alberta may be given the same bounty as the Ontario crude oil. For the last eleven years the Alberta oil men have been trying to get successive governments to change the act, but so far without success. Before this session closes I hope the government will see that this injustice to Alberta is removed. It is certainly aggravating when one considers that the Dominion owns the oil resources in Alberta and yet refuses to give a bounty to the crude oil that is being produced there, although the oil producers in Ontario are given this advantage notwithstanding the fact that the oil rights there, as I said before, are owned by the provincial government.

Mr. ROBB: As the payment of these bounties is under my department. I may say that the act in question was passed long before oil was discovered in Alberta, and that its provisions do not discriminate in any way against Alberta or any of the other western provinces. The same specific gravity applies to Alberta as to Ontario oil, but apparently only the latter oil comes within the act. However, the observations made by my hon. friend have the consideration of the government, and it is quite possible that we may amend the act, if not this session then next session.

Mr. COOTE: I am quite pleased to hear that this matter has the consideration of the government but I believe it has had the consideration of successive governments for quite a number of years. The trouble is that the government of the day never does anything but consider this matter. I want to serve warning on this government right here and now that if more than one session elapses after this session, and the act is not amended, there is going to be war right in this House on this particular matter.

Mr. ROBB: Who is going to make it?

Mr. COOTE: If nobody else will I will make it myself.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I suppose I am included in the indictment. The matter was brought to my attention and not only received consideration but decision. I will give the ground of the decision to my hon. friend. I do not know whether it got very long attention at the hands of the present Minister of Trade and Commerce; I am inclined to think this is about the first he has heard of it. The act was passed in order to make oil production in Ontario a business possibility. The Ontario lands were granted in fee simple, the oil exploiter there had to buy his land or his right and parliament considered that unless this bounty were granted the capital investment necessary was such, and the production possibilities so low, that there would not be any oil production. It has been continued for that reason. Very careful examination has disclosed that it has been necessary—whether it is just now I could not say, but I fancy so—or there would not be oil production. So much for the Ontario situation. In the West we own the lands and we make leases. The exploiter pays a certain rental per acre the first year and a smaller rental thereafter, and such moneys as he puts into actual development are credited against the rental for two years—I am disposed to think I extended that to three. All these things do not apply in Ontario. In western Canada the capital expenditures that the oil exploiter puts in are credited against this rental; when he gets oil he then proceeds to pay rental based on his oil production. What would be the common sense of charging the oil well owner a rental on his oil production and then paying him a bounty on that same production? If the rent is too high, make it less, but I cannot see any object in taking a rental from him and putting it into the treasury and then taking it out again and paying it back to him in the form of bonus. The point is that the system of production in the two places is wholly different. The system in the West credits the oil man with part of his capital investment; when he gets oil we then charge him rental, because there we are the owners of the property not the private individual. In Ontario the private individual is the owner. The man who goes in to produce oil, makes his capital investment and then he may have to pay rental—royalty, we call it—to the owner of the property. He does not pay anything here; if he did it would be senseless for us in Ontario to pay him back something by way of bonus.

Mr COOTE: It seems to me this is the same old story; the state will bonus private individuals, but when it comes to bonusing its own industry it refuses to do so.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is not our own.

Mr. COOTE: In Ontario it is not a much more difficult task to drill an oil well than it is to drill a water well, but in going after oil in Alberta they drill on an average from 3,000 to 5,000 feet, and that is an expensive operation. It is very hard to get oil prospectors to risk enough money to put down an oil well, some of which cost in the neighbourhood of $100,000. So far as this bounty is concerned, if the government will cease paying it to Ontario I will be quite satisfied. I want these oil men put on an equal basis; I think we have good ground for demanding that. I do not want to discuss the question further at present, because I am not armed with the statistics I would like to have.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Would my hon. friend be really willing to have that done?

Mr. COOTE: I am quite willing to have it done.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then the government would simply have to act as the private individual does in Ontario—make the oil man pay rent right from the start, give him no credit at all on his capital investment, then when he gets the product charge him a royalty on it. I assure my hon. friend it would be no hardship on the country to allow the exploiter, under those conditions, a bonus under the Bounty Act.

Mr. COOTE: I do not see why the government would be compelled to do any such thing. If they simply cease to pay the oil bounty in Ontario that need not entail the dire results that the right hon. gentleman suggests.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is exactly equal treatment.

Mr. HUMPHREY: I do not want to get away from the item that is being considered.

but I would like some more information with regard to the ore testing plants. How much ore can be treated in this plant at Ottawa. What is its capacity?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I can hardly tell my hon. friend what its capacity is, but we have had no difficulty so far in testing all that has been offered, and I think we can take care of a considerable increase and still give service without undue delay.

Mr. HUMPHREY: Any ores sent from British Columbia can be taken care of?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes, unless some complex problem arose that would necessitate new machinery or entail an unusual amount of experimentation. That frequently happens.

Mr. HUMPHREY: There are so many different kinds of ores that a plant should be constructed in such a way as to be able to deal with them. Is the plant in Ottawa of such a character that under certain conditions new machinery may be necessary, while the mining districts of British Columbia are being held back for the want of these facilities?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): At present we are testing ores from all over Canada. There might be complex ores that we could not test properly, but in a general way we can take care of any of the ore-testing problems that may come from British Columbia.

Mr. HUMPHREY: What are the regulations governing the forwarding of ore from British Columbia?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): All that is necessary is to take it to the nearest railway station and forward it here for testing.

Mr. STEVENS: In what quantities?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Two hundred pounds is quite sufficient for testing in most cases.

Mr. GOULD: The Topographical branch is carrying on work throughout the prairie provinces along the international boundary, including the erection of towers which have caused some of the residents to suggest that the government was going into radio work. Does the United States government share the cost of survey operations along the international boundary?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes. This matter comes under the vote for boundary surveys, in which both governments have joined.

[Mr. Humphrey.]

Mr. GOULD: These towers are about 100 feet high. They are permanent institutions?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes.

Mr. COOTE: Have there been any recent discoveries of iron ore in Alberta and if so where?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No, not of a quality that would warrant development I suppose my hon. friend refers to the reported discovery at lake Athabasca.

Mr. COOTE: Yes, and there was some report in the press of a discovery northwest of Calgary.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The Butterfields were the parties who made the discovery at lake Athabasca. That was investigated by one of our officials and by Professor Allan of the University of Alberta. Their report is available if my hon. friend would care to peruse it. It is to the effect that so far as the investigation could determine, it is not possible to utilize the ore commercially.

Mr. LOGAN: Can the minister tell me what amount of money has been spent up to date at Bienfait in Manitoba in connection with the briquetting plant?

Mr. STEVENS: Is that included in this vote?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No, it is under another vote. The expenditure by the board up to March 1, 1923, was $1,031,625.37

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What has become of the reported finds of coal in Ontario? Has the department been following that up? Have we had any results, and what are the prospects?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): We have not been investigating that. The Ontario Department of Mines have been making that investigation, but we have their report.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: To what effect?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The report is that the coal is of no commercial importance.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is it coal that won't burn or what is it?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I cannot tell my hon. friend.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There was another matter that was being looked into of which I have not heard anything for some time, and that was the utilization of the shale deposits of the Maritime provinces, the winning of fuel oil, I think it was, from the deposits. Is any work going on in connection with that now?

Mr. BROWN: Is the minister thoroughly satisfied with the reports that have been made in connection with the ore deposits at lake Athabasca, that they are really as vauleless as has been indicated in Professor Allan's report?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I have no opinion in the matter. I have to be guided by the report.

Mr. BROWN: I have reason to know that the Butterfields have themselves expressed great doubt. As to relying on Professor Allan's report, it is questionable if he was ever near enough to the property to make a satisfactory report.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I think that is most unfair. Not only was that property investigated twice before the Butterfields ever saw it, but it has been investigated on one occasion since. There may be a very good reason for a difference of opinion, and at some future date it is possible that this may prove to be a valuable deposit, but I think it is very doubtful from the nature of the reports made. But to say that the geologist was not there is most unfair.

Mr. BROWN: Has the government any intention of making further investigations to satisfy themselves as to the nature of these deposits?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The only way in which they could really be proved would be by using a drill. I had a long discussion with this gentleman about this deposit, and after he had made representations we had Professor Allan report to us, and his report coincides exactly with the report of Geologist Alcock of the Geological Survey. I scarcely think that these two men would be mistaken. They are both trained men. I might say to my hon. friend that Butterfields' statement is that deeper down the ore would improve, but the only way to test that would be by taking in a drill at considerable expense and drilling down, and keeping a log, to discover whether or not his supposition is correct. From the reports we have received from the geologist that would appear to be a very doubtful expenditure.

Mr. BROWN: Is the report as to quantity or quality?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Quality, but as to quantity as well.

Mr. BROWN: The samples that were shown me, if they were true samples, do not seem to indicate a deposit of very high grade.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I would not advise my hon. friend to put any money in it.

Mr. BROWN: I have none to put in.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Replying to my hon. friend for West York who asked about the shale deposits, representations have been made to us not by the New Brunswick government but by parties interested in the development of those shales there. We do not appear to have very authentic information, but we contemplate making some further investigations to prove the value of those shales in conjunction with the New Brunswick government.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Has the department's attention not been called to these deposits in connection with the fuel question? I thought Mr. Louis Simpson had quite an extensive paper on these shales, and I understood that he had taken it up with the department.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The only matter that was brought to my attention was the oil extraction from the shale.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The whole matter came to the front in connection with the fuel situation. It was represented that we could get fuel oil at a comparatively low cost from the shales down there, that there was an unlimited supply, and that the oil was of high character. I thought the committee would be interested to know just what was going on in that regard, whether we were looking after that possible source of fuel supply.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): It is more or less a question of solving the extraction problem. There is no doubt about the oil shale being there. I think that is proven; the reports would indicate so. It is a question of how to extract the oil from the shale. It is very similar to the tar sands problem in Alberta, and we have innumerable people doing experimental work on that problem. But not very much has been done in connection with our oil shales.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: You have no one working on the problem of extracting oil from these shales?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Not at the moment, but it is on our programme.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Has that question been referred to the Scientific Research Council?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Are they dealing with it now?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): They probably will.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The minister has told us pretty well of the activities in British Columbia and in some parts of Alberta. What work is being carried on under this vote in the other provinces? Are we doing anything at all in the Maritime provinces?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes, I gave a report of the work that was being done in the different provinces and gave the names of the heads of the different parties that are out.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Where was that? What is being done?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): These are geological parties doing investigational work, also topographical parties. They come under this vote we are now discussing. Of course, we have gone very far afield in this discussion, but as I said, I have given the names of the men at the head of these parties doing investigational work in the different provinces.

Mr. TOLMIE: Has any investigation been made in the last three years of the iron deposits on Vancouver Island?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes. We have Doctor Young working on that steadily.

Mr. TOLMIE: Any results of interest lately?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The work is still going on. I cannot say that there have been any definite results such as my hon. friend is asking for. Borings will have to be undertaken before definite results will be obtained.

Mr. TOLMIE: What is the nature of the work being done now?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I made that statement before, however I will be very glad to give it to my hon. friend again. There is geological work, which Doctor Young is doing, and any boring required is undertaken by the British Columbia government.

Mr. GARDINER: When the minister brings down the information that has been asked for with respect to the inspection of oil wells, I would also like him to submit the inspection reports for the Monitor district.

Item agreed to.

For organization and equipment of the Explosives division under the Explosives Act, chap. 31, 4-5 George V, $12,000.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): This is a very small amount and there is a reduction, as will be noted, in the item. We asked for this vote last year for testing purposes. However, what Colonel Ogilvie has discovered has proved valueless to us, therefore we are dropping the vote and not going on with the experiment.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Do I understand the minister to say that the work for which he asked this money is going to be of no use?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): We asked for a vote for investigational work in the Explosives division. It really had relation to a new method of testing explosives. Since then Colonel Ogilvie has discovered that new methods are being developed. Therefore we are not going on and we shall not need a vote for the purpose this year.

Mr. STEVENS: What is the object of the vote of $12,000 this year?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): That is for the general work of the Explosives branch.

Mr. STEVENS: What work is being carried on in that branch now?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Control of the composition and method of manufacture of explosives disclosed by manufacturers confidentially, and examined for authorization for manufacture and storage in Canada or for importation. Importation is permitted only on the authority of the minister when regulations are complied with. There are only 17 factories in operation. Plans of factories and magazines have to be submitted and licenses or continuing certificates are issued by the minister only after the chief inspector has decided on the purposes for which buildings may be used, the quantities of explosives which may be stored, and the safety measures necessary for the protection of the workers, the public and property. Factories are subject to inspection to ensure that the conditions in the license and the general regulations are being observed. The general work for the protection of life and property is carried out under Colonel Ogilvie.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I observe a notation that the appropriation not required during 1923-24 is $250,000.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): That vote was for the Lignite Utilization Board. The vote last year was $250,000 for further investigational work and I have already given to my hon. friend the total amount expended for that purpose. But we have ceased investigational work except in so far as regards the trial of a process for carbonization which only involves a very slight expenditure.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What was spent under this vote last year?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I think, if my memory serves me right, it was $178,000.

Item agreed to.

CROWN LANDS, ALBERTA

Mr. SPENCER:

1. What has been the revenue, and cost of collecting same, during each of the past five years, from: (a) Coal; (b) Petroleum; (c) Grazing Lands; (d) Sale of Crown Lands in Alberta?

Hon. Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Answers as far as the Department of the Interior is concerned.

STATEMENT OF NET REVENUE RECEIVED DURING THE PAST FIVE YEARS FROM COAL, PETROLEUM AND GRAZING LEASES, AND SALES OF DOMINION LANDS, WITHIN THE PROVINCE OF ALBERTA

Fiscal Year	Coal	Petroleum and Natural Gas	Grazing Leases	Sales of Land	Total Revenue

NOTE:—The revenue derived from Coal, Petroleum and Natural Gas, Grazing Leases and Sales of land during the past five years in the Province of Alberta is 80% of the total revenue credited to that Province by the Department of the Interior. The same percentage was therefore used as the basis upon which to reckon charges of collection in respect of the total expenditure incurred in the Land and Sub-Land Agencies within that Province.

Memorandum of Explanation—The total revenue derived by the Department of the Interior from the province of Alberta in connection with coal, petroleum and natural gas, grazing leases and sales of land for a period of five years is shown as $5,893,054.96 and the direct cost of collecting same as $697,118.89 This cost of collection, however, does not take into account a number of indirect charges which ultimately should enter into the cost of administering the Dominion lands and other resources in Alberta and the collection of revenue.

In connection with the above mentioned administration and collection of revenue, a proportional amount of the expenditure incurred by Land Patents, Mining Lands and Yukon, Timber and Grazing, Dominion Lands and Accounts branches should be charged against the Province of Alberta. This also applies to a proportion of the expenditure of officials of the department in Ottawa responsible for the administration of other branches and whose duties and jurisdiction have a bearing on the Department of the Interior activities in the province of Alberta. It is, however, impossible to estimate with any degree of accuracy the actual amount involved in these proportional charges and any figures which might be compiled could not in any way be looked upon as a true and correct statement of the case.

EGG INSPECTOR—YUKON TERRITORY

Mr. BLACK (Yukon):

1. Is any official of any department of the government to be stationed at Whitehorse, Yukon territory, for the purpose of inspecting eggs or other foods imported into Yukon?
2. If so, what is his name and position?
3. What are his official duties?
4. At what cost will he be so stationed and acting?
5. At whose request or suggestion is such official to be so stationed?
6. What information has the government of the necessity of incurring the expense of such action?

Hon. Mr. MOTHERWELL:

1. There is no present intention of stationing an officer of the Department of Agriculture at Whitehorse, Yukon territory.

2, 3, 4, 5. Answered by No. 1.

6. It was expected at one time that it would be necessary, under the regulations, to appoint an egg inspector for the Yukon territory, to inspect eggs imported from the United States. Owing to the fact, however, that the Yukon is now purchasing eggs from British Columbia rather than from the United States, largely due to activities by the Department of Agriculture, there is no immediate necessity for such an appointment.

[Mr. C. A. Stewart.]

RALSTON COMMISSION—FINAL REPORT

Mr. CHURCH:

When will the final report of the Colonel Ralston commission on soldiers' civil re-establsihment be received?

Hon. Mr. BELAND: It is expected that ar interim report in respect to certain questions of soldiers' civil re-establishment will be available for presentation within the next two weeks; it is unlikely that the final report of the commission will be available before the close of the session.

MONTREAL POST OFFICE—INQUIRY BRANCH

Mr. DENIS (St. Denis):

1. What is the name of the person lately appointed to the position of senior clerk in the Inquiry Branch at the Montreal post office?
2. What length of time has the above person been in the service?
3. Did said person pass examination for this promotion?
4. If so, how many competitors were there?
5. What are their names and years of service?
6. Were arrears of salary, from 1919, to the amount of $1,100 paid to said person after promotion as senior clerk?
7. If so, why?

Hon. Mr. COPP:

1. There has been no recent appointment to the position of senior clerk in the inquiry section of the Montreal post office. Recently Miss Boisseau who was performing the duties of postal information clerk as from 1918 was confirmed in her classification of postal information clerk retroactive to the 1st of April, 1919.

2. Since 1st January, 1916 –7 years and 5 months.

3. Miss Boisseau qualified by examination for the promotion referred to in No. 1.

4. There were three candidates in that promotional examination.

5. Miss Blanche B. Boisseau, appointed 1st January, 1916; Miss B. Duckett, appointed 8th June, 1917; Mr. Lucien Gervais, appointed 22nd May, 1914.

6. Yes.

7. The salary of the position of postal information clerk was revised to the same as that of a senior postal clerk as from 1st April, 1919, on the understanding that the employees holding such positions demonstrated by a practical examination that they were capable of properly fulfilling the duties of the position. Miss Boisseau passed the practical examination, and as she assumed the duties of the position in 1918 she was given the classification retroactive to 1st April, 1919, the date the classification became effective.

HOUSING AND OLD AGE PENSIONS

Mr. CHURCH:

Does the government intend this session to introduce any legislation to aid and assist the following important economic problems, for the general advantage of Canada, namely:—(a) The Housing Problem; (b) Old Age Pensions?

Right Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, it is not possible for the government to give a final answer at the present time.

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT BOARD, EDMONTON—INSURANCE

Mr. BLACK (Yukon):

1. Has it been the policy of the government with respect to insurance arising out of the business of the Soldier Settlement Board at Edmonton, Alberta, to divide such insurance amongst ex-service men in the city of Edmonton engaged in the business of insurance?
2. Is it the intention of the government to discontinue that policy? If so, what is the new policy of the government in this respect?
3. Is it a fact that the business of insurance arising out of the transactions of the Soldier Settlement Board at Edmonton, Alberta, is to be given to three selected persons, some of whom have no service overseas in the late war?
4. If so, have any selections been made? If so, whom?

Hon. Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil):

1. Yes.
2. No.
3. No.
4. Answered by No. 3.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

IMMIGRATION—STAFF TRANSFER

Mr. LAVIGUEUR:

1. Were a certain number of officials of the Immigration department of New Brunswick or elsewhere, transferred, last spring, to the Immigration department at the Port of Quebec? If so, did they understand and speak the French language?
2. Is it the intention of the Immigration department to transfer said staff this year?
3. Were complaints made by French-speaking immigrants and citizens, that a great number of said staff could not speak or understand the French language?
4. What salary is paid to each of the said officials and employees for the immigration season?
5. How much is allowed to each for their expenses?
6. What salary is paid to citizens of Quebec, who occupy similar positions to the ones occupied by these strangers transferred to Quebec?
7. Can Mr. Joseph H. Byrne, caterer for the Immigration department at Quebec, by virtue of a certain clause in his contract recently agreed upon with the Immigration department, employ French Canadians who do not speak English fluently?
8. Can said Mr. Joseph H. Byrne, under his contract recently agreed upon with the Immigration department, offer for sale without special authorization, all the products made by manufacturers of the city of Quebec?

PUBLIC WORKS—CHIEF ARCHITECTS BRANCH

Mr. DESLAURIERS:

1. What are the names, official titles, and salaries of officers-in-charge of Dominion Buildings, Chief Architect's Branch, Department of Public Works, on January 1st, 1912, 1922 and 1923?
2. In what cities or towns are located the offices of each?
3. What is the date of their appointment and how have they been classified?
4. What was the number of employees under each officer-in-charge on January 1st, 1912, 1922 and 1923?
5. What is the number of buildings each officer-in-charge had under his charge on January 1st 1912, 1922 and 1923?
6. Have all the positions of these officers-in-charge been classified by the Civil Service Commission or Arthur Young & Company?
7. Are there any positions of these officers in charge vacant?
8. If so, what are they and since what date are they vacant?
9. What are the causes of these vacancies?
10. In what locality have they occurred?

SHIPPING RATES—GRAIN

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod) moved:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams or other communications passing during the summer or fall of 1922 between the Dominion government or any of its ministers or representatives and the Dominion Marine Association or any of its agents or representatives, or of any other person or persons whatsoever, in any way relating to the abrogation or suspension of the Dominion Coastal Shipping Regulations, or in any way relating to the grain congestion at lake ports or Montreal, or to the alleged combine, or the imposition of exorbitant rates by shipping interests engaged in the grain trade.

Hon. J. B. M. BAXTER (St. John and Albert): May I ask why the government proposes to allow this resolution to be adopted, in view of its refusal to give me the same information regarding a portion of the question, in response to an inquiry I placed on the order paper? This distinctly calls for, among other things, the correspondence with Mr. W. T. R. Preston and his correspondence with the government. I do not object to the motion; it calls for information that I desired to get, and something in addition. But why is one policy followed in respect to some members and a different policy in respect to others?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Perhaps this motion had better stand until the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Robb) is here. Speaking offhand, I am inclined to think that the answer to my hon. friend is this: At the time he asked for this information it would not have been expedient to make public some of the particulars that were desired, but the time has now arrived when it is really immaterial whether they are given to the public or not.

Mr. BAXTER: I may say that, in respect to the information I asked for, everything had been made public, as Mr. Preston's report, in the columns of the Toronto Globe. The information, however, was refused this House.

Motion stands.

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

SARDINE HERRING FISHERY

Mr. DUFF:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, petitions, memorandums, correspondence, reports of investigations, and other documents which have been received by the Department of Marine and Fisheries since 1920 concerning the sardine herring fishery in New Brunswick, particularly any matter with reference to the sale and price of said fish.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—REAL ESTATE

Right Hon. Mr. MEIGHEN:

For return showing all real estate properties, with the approximate location and area and brief description of each, sold or agreed to be sold by the Canadian National Railway Company or its subsidiaries since October 4th, 1922, and showing, secondly, all real estate properties purchased or agreed to be purchased or in respect of which an offer to purchase has been made by the Canadian National Railway Company or any of its subsidiaries since said date, and in each case showing the sale price or the purchase price, as the case may be, and the names of the purchasers and vendors.

Mr. CHURCH:

For a copy of all correspondence, contracts, agreements, letters, telegrams and other documents, relating to the purchase of property on the north west corner of King and Yonge Streets, Toronto, by the government of Canada or the Canadian National Railways, for railway purposes.

SALE OF MERCHANT SHIPS

Mr. CHURCH:

For a copy of all papers, documents, sale specifications, terms and conditions of sale, agreements, official reports recommending sale, and all other correspondence relating to the sale of about 27 of the smaller ships of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine (Limited).

DAIRY INDUSTRY ACT

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture) moved that the House go into committee to-morrow to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to bring in a measure to amend The Dairy Industry Act, 1914, and to provide regulations regarding butter substitute and the remanufacture of butter, the character and weight of butter, the keeping of records by manufacturers or dealers in butter and cheese, and the examination of such records by inspectors, methods of establishing the guilt of persons charged with the violation of the Act, and the procedure to be followed in all such cases.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General has been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution and has commended it to the consideration of the House.

Motion agreed to.

[Mr. Baxter.]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

ASCENSION DAY—WEDNESDAY SITTINGS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That when this House adjourns on Wednesday, the 9th instant, it stand adjourned until Friday, the 11th instant.

Mr. GAUVREAU: I suggest that this motion be amended to provide that we sit on Wednesday evenings. The Prime Minister stated the other day that in this respect he was in the hands of the House, and I think I voice the sentiment of the whole House when I ask that we sit on Wednesday evenings, if not from this Wednesday, at least from Wednesday week until the end of the session.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I did say that the government was prepared to be guided by the wish of the House in the matter. So far as I have been able to ascertain from the whips, it would appear that the members favour retaining Wednesday evening, and judging from the amount of applause that has greeted the suggestion of my hon. friend, I do not think the majority of the House are with him just at present. In any case, I imagine that a number of hon. members have made engagements for this Wednesday evening, therefore we had better let the motion stand as it is.

Motion agreed to.

PROPOSED LEGISLATION

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Is the Prime Minister able to tell us what further government legislation is to be introduced this session? I noticed that in answer to a question put by an hon. member asking whether the government had legislation for this session on, (a) the housing problem, and (b) old age pensions, the Prime Minister stated that no final answer could be given. I venture to suggest that the government has no legislation on either one; the accuracy of my prediction can be better judged later. But it would seem to me that if the government has legislation on such subjects as these, or on any subject, the House might now be informed.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I think my right hon. friend is correct in what he surmises about the legislation referred to, but I would not like to tie the hands of the government on any matter of legislation until the reports of all the committees have been brought into the House. The government has brought down its important legislation. There may be further legislation arising out of the reports of committees that are at present sitting, also some railway legislation and possibly other legislation on minor matters. I think my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals has some legislation. I will endeavour to let my right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) have a list at an early date.

PENSION REGULATIONS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. JOS. T. SHAW (Calgary West): Before the Orders of the Day are proceeded with, I would like to ask the government, in view of the controversy which seems to be in progress between the Board of Pension Commissioners and the Great War Veterans' Association, whether the government proposes any action in the matter, and if so what action?

Hon. H. S. BELAND (Minister of Soldiers Civil Re-establishment): A similar question was asked a few days ago, and I informed the House that it was the intention of the government to introduce a bill during this session to carry out the recommendations of the royal commission contained in the interim report which has been laid on the Table of the House.

CANNED SALMON VIA PANAMA CANAL

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): I desire to ask the government for an explanation respecting certain regulations of the Customs department. It appears that the Minister of Customs sent a telegram to the Gosse-Millerd Canning Company, of Vancouver, informing them that on shipments of canned salmon consigned via the Panama canal and New York to Halifax and other Canadian ports, a tariff would be imposed on the goods entering Canada. Other instances can be brought to the attention of the government, but this one is sufficient for my purpose. I wish to ask when and by whose authority such a regulation was established?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I happen to know that the Minister of Customs (Mr. Bureau) has this matter under consideration. He is not in the House at the moment, but as soon as he comes in I will direct his attention to my hon. friend's question and try to get a reply for him.

PRIVILEGE—MR. COOTE

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod): I rise to a question of privilege. It is reported in the Ottawa Citizen of last Saturday that I voted against an amendment by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens). I wish to point out that that report is quite in error as I voted for the amendment.

OLEOMARGARINE

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. ROBERT FORKE (Brandon): I wish to ask the government what is their intention with regard to bringing down an oleomargarine bill. Do they wish to renew the legislation?

Mr. MARTELL: Let it die.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I shall try to give my hon. friend an answer at an early date.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I might remind the Prime Minister that he told me not so long ago that the government would await the verdict on the resolution of the hon. member for Cape Breton South and Richmond (Mr. Carroll). Could he give us an idea of when he is going to have the House discuss that resolution?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I shall try to do so at an early date.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No policy.

Mr. LAPOINTE: At an early date.

COMBINES, MONOPOLIES, TRUSTS AND MERGERS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved the second reading of Bill No. 54, to provide for the investigation of combines, monopolies, trusts and mergers.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion? Carried.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): I was waiting for the Prime Minister to expound his bill.

Mr. SPEAKER: I paused for a moment.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I paused for a moment too, but both of us were disappointed.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have only to withdraw the word "Carried".

Mr. MEIGHEN: I merely want to say that I understand the Prime Minister had several amendments to propose. If so, it would appear to me that these amendments should be laid before the House and some time be given for their consideration, but if it is the desire of the government that the second reading be given now I wish to state that we want to reserve all rights of discussion in committee both as to principle and detail.

Mr. ROBERT FORKE (Brandon): I would like to make the same statement on behalf of several members who have made the request that they have an opportunity of discussing this bill at a future date.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I may say in reply to my right hon. friend that I did not attempt any remarks on the second reading because I went rather fully into an explanation of the bill and its merits at the time of introducing the resolution. I also thought that possibly the time of the House would be saved if I waited before going on with the second reading to hear and reply to any criticisms which hon. members might have. I have purposely left the second reading over for a considerable period of time in order that all hon. members of the House might have an opportunity of studying the provisions of the bill carefully. I think it is almost two months since the bill was presented to the House, and in that period of time I have had the privilege of receiving a large number of communications and a large number of deputations in reference to the measure, and I think that both inside and outside of the House there is a pretty general understanding of its main provisions.

I would like to say, however, speaking broadly in reference to the criticisms that have been directed against the bill, that many of them are due to an entire misapprehension of what the government has in mind in the legislation which it has introduced. For example, I notice that many of the newspapers of the country have reported that the government is endeavouring by this legislation to legislate against combines as such, to legislate against the right of manufacturers or merchants to fix a resale price. There is nothing of the kind in the legislation. As a matter of fact, it proceeds from a diametrically opposite point of view. I explained that, I think, pretty fully at the time of introducing the bill. It proceeds broadly on the theory that in this age of commercial and industrial competition, not merely between industry and industry and locality and locality, between the industries of one province and those of another, but between the industries of one country and those of another, the industries one might almost say, of one continent and those of another, large combinations of capital, organizations of business in a large way, are an absolute essential if the business of our country is to hold its own in competition with the business of other countries. But just because it is recognized that it is necessary to have these large organizations of business, so the government recognizes that some restraint must be placed on the possible abuse of great power which may come into their hands. The legislation does not seek in any way to restrict just combinations or agreements between business and industrial houses and firms, but it does seek to protect the public against the possible ill effects of these combinations.

The definition of the word "combine" as related to the provisions of the Act has perhaps occasioned a number of persons that measure of alarm which some of them seem to have had who have not read the definition carefully, and who have thought that the definition goes much further than it does. If the House will look at the definition, and I will draw particular attention to the wording when we are in committee, hon. members will see that the kind of combination referred to is limited to a combination that operates or tends to operate, that has operated or is likely to operate to the detriment of or against the interest of the public, whether consumers, producers or others. No other class of combinations comes within the provisions of this act. If that point is quite clear, I think it will help to remove a good deal of the misconception that has arisen in reference to the legislation. For example, I notice in one press report it was stated that the act did not distinguish between good combines and bad combines. Well, that is the very distinction that is carefully made in the definition itself. Any combination, whether it is in the nature of a trust or merger or the result of some agreement, which is carrying on its business in a reasonable way, not operating to the detriment of the public or against the interest of the public, would not come under the important provisions of this legislation; once, however, it is shown that a combination is so operating as to prejudice the public interest, then that class of combination comes within the provisions of the act, first for purposes of investigation, and secondly, if need be, for purposes of prosecution under the criminal section which has been suggested.

My right hon. friend mentioned that he understood I had a number of amendments to move. I do not know where he got his information; I have one or two very slight amendments which I will mention to the House at the moment. One is to strike out in the defining clause the words "in the opinion of the registrar or any commissioner" which appear before the words "have operated or are likely to operate to the detriment of or against the interest of the public." Those words were inserted with reference more particularly to the part of the act which deals with investigation, but when they are read in conjunction with the clause dealing with the new criminal offence which is created by the act, they acquire a significance they were not intended to have, and it is therefore my intention to move when we get into committee that those words be stricken out.

I might mention that some of the deputations that have waited on the government have pointed out that perhaps the act was too broad in permitting any individual to lay a complaint before the registrar, and it was suggested that possibly the language of the old Combines Investigation Act which required six persons to unite in presenting a request for an investigation would be a proper safeguard, and that those persons should be restricted, as they were in the old act, to British subjects. I think that is a perfectly proper amendment to have made in the act, and I shall move that also as an amendment when the House goes into committee.

There is one other slight amendment which is to strike out the words "or documents" that appear in section 18, line 42, of the act. The section as drafted makes it obligatory upon any person to give evidence before a registrar or commissioner and to produce documents. It goes on to state, however, that whoever gives testimony cannot be bound in a court of law by the oral testimony so given. The clause as it now reads goes beyond granting protection as respects oral testimony and includes documents. The effect of the bill as drafted would be that where any incriminatory documents might be disclosed in the case of an investigation, subsequently, when court proceedings were held, a combine might find its means of escape from the just penalty of its illegal actions, by having these documents protected. It is, therefore my purpose to meet such a possible situation by providing that the words "or documents" shall be deleted.

I think, Mr. Speaker, I explained, when introducing the measure in the House, the need for this particular legislation at this time. There is no legislation on the statutes of Canada to-day protecting the great body of consumers or producers against the possible ill-effects of combinations carrying their powers to too great an extreme in the way of monopolizing control of commodities, of unduly enhancing the prices of commodities or restricting their sale in a manner detrimental to the public. The legislation of 1910, the old Combines Investigation Act, was repealed by the legislation of 1919, the Combines and Fair Prices Act and the Board of Commerce Act. The Board of Commerce, as the House knows, did not function as it was expected to function. That legislation has ceased to be of any value, and it is proposed by this enactment to repeal what has become valueless. However, one of the effects of the legislation of 1919 was to make it impossible for section 498 of the Criminal Code to be operative except at the instance of the Board of Commerce. No prosecution could be commenced, under section 498 of the Criminal Code, against a combination in restraint of trade, except at the instance of the Board of Commerce, but as the Board of Commerce is no longer in existence at the present time, even such protection as the law afforded under the Criminal Code is not granted to consumers against the possible ill-effects of these combinations.

Recently there has been a decision given in Ontario, in the case of the Attorney General of the province vs the Wholesale Grocers, which, in the minds of some, would seem to raise a question as to the intra vires of the legislation which I have referred to as constituting a part of the Criminal Code. Anticipating that the matter might be referred to in discussion to-day, I asked the Department of Justice for an opinion and I may as well read at this moment the opinion I have received which will answer any questions on that particular point. Mr. Newcombe, Deputy Minister of Justice, states:

> I have considered the judgments of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court of Ontario in the case of Attorney Genaral vs Canadian Wholesale Grocers, herewith, with relation to its effect as to section 498 of the Criminal Code, and I find that it does not conclude any question as to the authority of parliament to enact that section.
> The court was composed of the Chief Justice, Hodgins, Ferguson and Magee, JJ. The Chief Justice reluctantly considered that he was bound by the observations of Lord Haldane in the Board of Commerce case to hold that section 498 was ultra vires, as not relating to criminal law within the meaning of that section of the British North America Act, 1867. Hodgins and Ferguson, JJ. however, expressly refrained from expressing any opinion against the validity of section 498, although they agreed with the Chief Justice for other reasons that the appeal should be dismissed. Magee, J. concurred in the result without any observations or reasons, and so it stands that the invalidity of section 498 rests only upon the opinion of the Chief Justice.
> I do not think that it is at present necessary or advisable that our course of action should be in any wise modified by reason of the view which the Chief Justice expressed. I do not think that the question is governed by Lord Haldane's observations, and when it arises for decision we will have an opportunity to make good our claim for legislative authority. Meantime I would proceed upon the assumption that the enactment is intra vires.

Mr. CARROLL: Has the question of the authority of parliament to pass this particular bill been placed before the Justice department?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes. I may say to my hon. friend that this particular measure has been carefully reviewed by the Department of Justice and I am informed that in the opinion of the department it is intra vires.

In regard to this legislation—just by way of helping to make clear the main divisions of it—I may say that the measure falls broadly into two parts. The first part has to do with investigations and the necessary machinery for purposes of investigation. It is intended to provide that where there are grounds for believing that a combine is operating to the detriment of the public, or likely so to operate, any six persons who are British subjects—as it stands now, any individual—may apply to the registrar for an investigation. The registrar will be an officer appointed by the government whose duty it will be to see, in the first instance, whether the evidence that is submitted appears on the face of it to be sufficient to give reasonable grounds for believing that the combination that is alleged is of a character which in the public interest should be investigated. If the registrar comes to the conclusion that the combination is of that character, then he may continue an investigation or may recommend —or the government of its own initiative may appoint—a commissioner, with the powers which are given to commissioners under the Inquiries Act, to make a full investigation, to satisfy himself, or the commissioners to satisfy themselves, as to whether or not the operation of the alleged combine is against the interest of the public. Judging from past experience it would appear that it is on the whole better that these preliminary investigations should be held in private rather than in public. The purpose of the legislation is not to subject industry and commerce to all kinds of inquisitorial proceedings which may have a baneful or harmful effect, but rather to do as little in the way of interfering with legitimate business and business methods as possible. The bill accordingly provides that so far as this investigation by the commissioners is concerned it shall be held in private, leaving it, however, to the discretion of the minister—having regard to certain contingencies that might arise that theretofore are unforeseen—to say whether any part of the investigation should be public, or whether the report of the investigation should be made public. Up to that point there is nothing in the nature of any criminal proceedings against the combination. However, upon report of a commissioner authority is given to the government to remit or to reduce duties so as to permit of a wider measure of competition, should it appear that the effect of the combination is to take undue advantage of some clause in the tariff. If it be an unfair advantage of some patent right that is taken, the government, through the Minister of Justice, may proceed for a revocation of the patent right.

Possibly I can best explain what is fundamental in the measure by saying, that in regard to combinations operating to the detriment of the public the belief of the government is that there are certain classes of evils which publicity will do more to remedy than even penalty. In regard to combinations that are actually operating to the detriment of the public, the great difficulty has always been to ascertain just the nature and full extent of their operations. Once that is ascertained, if they are operating to the detriment of the public, and the fact is known, it is natural to expect that the public will speedily find some means to protect itself. Another principle that I think will help to illustrate what is fundamental in this legislation is summed up in the words that private rights cease when they become public wrongs. In other words, the bill does not in any way seek to restrain private individuals in the making of any contracts or agreements, tacit or implied or open, which they may wish to make, so long as in the exercise of their private rights they do not carry matters to a point where their joint action becomes a public wrong in the form of a combination operating to the detriment of the public.

I think these few preliminary remarks will serve sufficiently for an introduction of a consideration in committee of the provisions of the bill.

Mr. H. C. HOCKEN (West Toronto): Before going into committee I would like to present a case to the minister and ask him if it would come under the combine's bill which we have now before us. The newspapers have recently informed us that there is a daily newspaper combine in Canada. We have been told that an effort was made to establish a new daily paper in the city of Ottawa. If our information is correct, it was a newspaper that was proposed to disseminate the doctrines of the Liberal party. But the executive of the daily newspapers association voted almost unanimously that the necessary service to carry on such a paper should be denied the man who wanted to establish a newspaper in Ottawa. To help the Prime Minister to a conclusion, if it is an improper thing for a man taking any manufactured article and fix the price, or to enter into a combine with others in the same line of manufacture in disposing of his goods to the public, is it not a much more serious matter when public opinion is stifled, and the opportunity to present to the public of this country, or this city or any city, a particular aspect of the affairs of the country, is refused, and that the men who have the money and are willing to put it up for this purpose shall be denied the privilege of doing it. I cannot conceive, Mr. Speaker, of any more dangerous form of combine than a newspaper combine. If you carry this out, the same organization of a dozen men, forming the executive of the daily newspaper association, can determine just where a newspaper shall be printed, and where one shall not be printed. If a company should be organized to establish a new evening paper, say in the city of Toronto, that company would have to go to the men who form the executive of the daily newspaper associations of Canada and ask their permission.

An Hon. MEMBER: Why?

Mr. HOCKEN: Not to ask their permission to put in a plant and print some kind of newspaper, but to ask their permission to get the service absolutely essential to the production of a newspaper that will sell. And at the same time, Mr. Speaker, this government subsidizes, to the extent of $50,000 a year a telegraphic service for the use of the daily newspapers; and the group of men who happen for the time to form this association have it in their hands to prevent a man here or there or anywhere from enlightening the public as he thinks the public ought to be enlightened. Will the Prime Minister tell us in view of what he has said, whether this bill will apply to such a case? Because he has said that this bill is designed to control these men and prevent an abuse of the great power that might come into their hands. A very great power rests in the hands of daily newspaper editors and proprietors; practically everybody in Canada reads the newspapers nowadays, and there is no class or group of men in Canada who exercise more power than the men who are conducting the daily newspapers of the country.

Mr. PARENT: And also the weekly papers?

Mr. HOCKEN: Also the weekly papers, but the weekly comes out once a week, the daily six times a week. The one will have a circulation of 20,000 or 30,000 and the other 150,000. I do not renege on my statement that the men who exercise the greatest power in the public interest in Canada are the men who control the great newspapers. And unless there is opportunity given to those who think they have a message—it may be a political or it may be a social message—to publish that message for the benefit of the public, and if they are not allowed to give that message to the public on account of restrictions imposed by their competitors, I think it may be safely said that these competitors are prejudicing the public interest, to use the words of the Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister further said that there were many classes of offences, combines, perhaps, where publicity would do more to effect a remedy than would a penalty. I entirely agree with that statement. I think publicity is one of the greatest penalties that some men can suffer for their misdeeds. If you have all the newspapers in the hands of a few, so that all kinds of abuses might exist and not have any publicity, then the public interest is surely most seriously prejudiced. If the Prime Minister feels so disposed, will he answer the question as to whether he would not consider a daily newspaper combine as one that would come within this act.

Mr. SPEAKER: Before the right hon. Prime Minister answers the question, I would remind the House that we are not yet at the committee stage, and therefore if the right hon. member speaks now it closes the debate, according to rule 21, unless by leave of the House the minister replies to the pertinent question put by the hon. member.

Mr. STEVENS: I desire to speak on the second reading, but the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Hocken) desires to ask the Prime Minister this question before he takes his seat, if it may be put in that way.

Mr. SPEAKER: Perhaps the right hon. premier would prefer to answer all these questions when he exercises his right of reply, under rule 21 of the rules of debate.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am quite prepared to answer the question now, if it is the wish of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER: If it is the wish of the House the Prime Minister may answer the question, but it is against rule 21.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think the question asked by the hon. member illustrates perhaps as well as anything could, the merits of the proceedings we are proposing to establish by this legislation in dealing with the kind of case he has cited. My hon. friend says that if you have all the newspapers in the hands of a few, you have one of the worst combines conceivable. I agree absolutely with that. I think there could be no more fatal combination, so far as the public is concerned, than that all the news of the country should be controlled by a few men, in such a way as to make it impossible for any others to enter the field of news competition. However, in regard to the case just cited,—the application which has been made by the Liberal party for a paper in this city,—the contention on the part of those who refused to give the right to permit a new paper to acquire certain news is that they think the public interest is being best served by the papers that are here at the present time. They contend that there is not a monopoly. They contend that another newspaper can come in and start to-morrow on its own account, if the parties wish. However, they have among themselves, as I understand it, an agreement as respects the sale of a certain class of news that is acquired, by cable or telegram. It is that particular class of news which they refuse to give to any other paper. Whether that refusal amounts to a monopoly of a character which is injurious to the public, is something that, I think, can be determined only as a result of an investigation. This legislation provides that where there is prima facie ground for believing that a combine exists which is operating in a manner detrimental to the public, then any six persons may apply to a registrar for an investigation. Taking the case in point, I would assume that any registrar appointed under this legislation would feel, it if were possible to cite evidence of the character to which my hon. friend has made reference, that he should immediately investigate and see how far that monopoly, or alleged monopoly, extended in its operation, whether it went the length of shutting out other papers from this city, or whether its effort was merely to deny to a paper coming into a field a certain class of news which it either could or could not acquire in some other way. If there were reasonable grounds for believing that the public was being injured as a consequence of this monopoly, an investigation would then be made by a commissioner. The commissioner would take all the evidence under oath; he would then give a statement to the public, and the public would be in a position to judge whether or not the combination was of that serious character which some might be inclined to believe it to be. I doubt if anyone could pronounce upon the merits of the particular case without having all the facts of the case before him. That is why this legislation proceeds in two stages: The first setting forth the means of getting the fullest information and giving publicity to that information; the second stage providing a remedy whereby, if need be by way of criminal prosecution, any action of the combination which is against the public interest may be effectively put a stop to.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, I quite realise that appearing as an apologist in any sense for anything that might be called a combine lays one open to attack and possible misinterpretation of one's position. During the past twenty years there has been a steady growth in the intense organization of business, in the formation of what is commonly known as combines, in the bringing of businesses of a similar character under the control of a smaller executive head, thus lowering costs of operation, increasing efficiency and, in many cases, stabilizing both production and prices. This tendency has been met on the part of the public in different ways; but there has been, with certain sections of the public, a growing resentment—shall I say?—against what is commonly known as a combine, without, perhaps, any careful defining of what a combine is. I notice that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), in introducing this legislation, both on a former occasion and to-day, stressed particularly that the object of the legislation and the objective, I might say, that he had in mind was to interfere, not with what might be termed legitimate combines, but only with such as were likely to operate detrimentally to the public interest. Further I noticed that he said that at the present time there was no legislation by which the government could properly deal with circumstances arising out of, perhaps, an abuse of privilege or power on the part of large combinations of business. It is from that angle that I desire to examine this legislation. I may say that I took advantage of the advice the Prime Minister gave, when he introduced this legislation, to give it careful study, and as a layman I rather hesitate to enter into what might appear to be somewhat of a legal argument, because I claim no right or no particular ability to do so. I have examined it as a layman, I might say as an accountant, because that is my profession. I have examined it with care and with, perhaps, some right to pass an opinion after careful study. I want to examine it before the House as it appeals to me, with reasonable brevity and at the same time with a desire to impress upon the House in particular one or two points which, in my estimation, characterise this legislation, and warrant me at least in opposing it.

The crux of the whole bill is to be found in the interpretation clause, clause 2—in the description or interpretation there set forth of what a combine is in the eyes of this legislation. I intend, by the way, to divide this into three or four heads and to deal with them very briefly as I proceed. I want first to make as clear a presentation of the facts as I can, and later on I purpose arguing the points. In the first place, clause 2 defines a combine as being one of such business organizations as —have operated or are likely to operate to the detriment of or against the interest of the public, whether consumers, producers or others.

I ask the House to bear that word "others" in mind, and let us examine it briefly. Who are "others"? Let us assume that a group of businesses find it desirable to combine, think it is in their interest and in the interest of their business that they should combine. They do so. Some of them may not enter the combine. It easily may, and very often does, result that the combined businesses operate at a lower cost, give better service, are more efficient and stabilized, and because of that they undersell the so-called independent firms or firms that stand out. These are "others" who are injured by the combination, although the public may be distinctly benefited. In this I am not drawing a bow at venture, but I am describing what has happened time and again during the past twenty-five years. Under this legislation as it now stands, such a combine, such a combination, is declared to be an offensive institution.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not wish to interrupt my hon. friend, but he has used words which indicate that the class of combination referred to would not come under the legislation at all. If what he says is true, namely, that a certain combination would really operate to the benefit of the public, that would put it out of the class referred to in the definition.

Mr. STEVENS: I do not wish to be impertinent to the Prime Minister; but if he will wait a moment, I purpose showing that that is precisely what the legislation does not say. As regards this particular portion of the definition, I submit that two words in it prevent the very object to which the Prime Minister refers. For instance, the registrar must interpret this. If a combination operates to the detriment of consumers, producers or others—and "others" is not defined in any limited sense—then under this bill it is a combination that is detrimental to the public. And furthermore, the word "likely" introduced there gives a very wide scope for interpretation solely by the registrar; that is, the registrar is the sole judge whether or not this combination is likely at some future time to be detrimental to the public interest.

But that is not all upon which I rest my argument. I take the next portion of the interpretation clause. It further describes "combine" to include:

—the relation resulting from purchase, lease or acquisition by any person of any control over or interest in the whole or part of the business of any other person.

How is that clause likely to operate? Supposing we have a group of, say, A. B. C and D. If A acquires a portion or the whole of the business of B and as a result of that combination C and D suffer, then under this bill the registrar must find that this is a combination to the detriment of consumers, producers "or others," as is set forth earlier in this clause.

Then it also deals with any agreement, etc., "designed to fix a common price of re-sale." This is a very vital point. This covers any agreement or undertaking between a manufacturer and a sales agency whereby the price of resale is fixed. Under this proposed legislation such an institution would be declared by the registrar to be detrimental to the public interest. Let us look at this for a moment. We know, at least I am pretty fully persuaded of it myself, that many manufacturers of this and other countries, enjoying the highest possible standing with the public, fix the price of their goods. The price is printed on the label or stamped upon the article itself, and the article is sold from one end of the country to the other by all dealers at that fixed price. The result is to stabilize its distribution and to maintain a price at a reasonable figure to prevent the avaricious retailer or agency taking advantage of a shortage at any particular time and exacting a higher price for it. I was shown the other day a statement by the Ford Motor Company which very carefully and fully illustrates this. They point out that they have all along fixed the price of their cars and parts to all their sales agencies, and these agencies not only sell the article at this fixed price but give certain services in addition. I think everybody here who drives a Ford car knows what splendid service the Ford agencies render. I do not drive a Ford car so I have not had the advantage of this thorough service. These agencies sell on a commission of 20 per cent. This may seem high, but it is pointed out that it includes service. The net result of it all has been that during the last few years the Ford car has actually dropped in price until to-day it is selling for about $100 less than in 1914. That is merely one illustration; there are scores one might give of how the fixing of the resale price by a manufacturer usually, and I might say generally, is in the interest of the public; and yet under this proposed legislation this practice would be demed a combine detrimental to the interests of the public.

Then—and this is of particular interest not only to manufacturers but to others—this clause describes a combine as one which enters into an agreement for > —lessening competition in, or substantially controlling manufacture, purchase, barter, sale, storage, transportation, insurance or supply.

I can bring forward several illustrations of what may happen under such a provision. I shall give these briefly because the moment I mention them the facts will be present in the minds of my hon. friends. Take, for instance, dairies. In Ottawa there is the Ottawa Dairy. I think they have some competition now, but for many years they were without any competition, and yet I recall that at the time the cost of living investigation was held by a parliamentary committee in 1919 it was shown beyond all peradventure that the Ottawa Dairy, while a distinct monopoly under this clause, did operate in the interest of the public. My right hon. friend will answer all this I know by saying, "Then it does not come under this measure." But the registrar is forced to so interpret under this clause. The clause to which I am now referring is an undertaking or an agreement or a contract substantially controlling competition and the purchase, sale, etc., of an article. In the city of Vancouver there is another illustration of what might happen under this measure, for if it were in force the Producers' Dairy would be challenged. This company, organized and owned by the producers of milk in the Fraser valley, in other words, by the dairy farmers, supplies milk to the public at a moderate price; yet they were challenged by the independent dealers. Under this bill that dairy company could be effectively challenged, and in my estimation the registrar would be bound to declare it to be a combination detrimental to the interests of the public, or to the "producers, consumers or others." Then we have the formation of a wheat pool, which would be for the purpose of eliminating competition—in the wording here, for the purpose of "controlling the purchase, barter, sale, storage, transportation." After listening, as we have, for several years to the disclosures of the difficulties and extra costs now imposed by the present system, no one will question that if another system could be worked out it would be in the interests of the public; and yet if it were done it would, as I have said, come under this clause, and the registrar, if he were appealed to, would have to declare it to be detrimental to the public interest. Then again take the Fruit Union of the Okanagan. There, perhaps, you have a more striking illustration than anywhere else of an organization deliberately formed for the purpose of controlling the price and distribution of their products; and yet, under this clause, it would be a combine. I merely give these illustrations to bring home to the House the significance of this interpretation clause.

Now I turn to what is my chief criticism of the bill, that in effect it declares to be a crime that which is, without question, ordinary, sound business sense. I have already intimated that, during the past twenty-five years in particular, there has been a growing tendency for business to get together to eliminate useless competition. By that I mean vicious competition—not competition in service, but competition which simply seeks to slay a competitor. There has been an endeavour to eliminate useless competition and to build up associations of kindred businesses, thus reducing overhead and executive charges, improving the efficiency of distribution and stabilizing both prices and production. Without such combinations there is a tendency to over-production during periods of prosperity, with recurring periods of depression and under-production. This is one of the greatest problems facing economists to-day. It is cropping up everywhere. It has cropped up in the Agricultural Conditions committee in the Banking and Commerce committee. In the consideration of any of the great problems of the day this question is the most perplexing one that arises. Yet through the medium of many of the large combinations of business in this country that evil has been, I will not say elminated, but reduced, and the stabilization of both production and distribution has been secured. Now, why should we seek to erect that into a crime?—for that is what parliament, in effect, does, and it is the feature of the bill above all others that I object to. I believe, Sir, that this bill is raised upon false premises. Any given action is not a crime simply because parliament may choose so to describe it; it must in itself be a criminal act. The judgment to which the right hon. Prime Minister has referred is filled with extracts from decisions of the Privy Council and of eminent jurists throughout the Empire, not only in the case of the Board of Commerce, not only in the case of the Wholesale Grocers of Ontario, bnt in the case of Austrialia vs. the Adelaide Steamship Company and many others. It is set forth most clearly that merely to declare, through the Criminal Code, a thing to be a crime does not necessarily make it a crime—and that is what I particularly wish to emphasize to-day. The act of combination is not an offence. The act of combination and the most rigid advantage taken of it is not an offence. But if a group of business men or others—and this applies or ought to apply to all classes alike—deliberately conspire to injure competitors; if the object of the getting together is to effect injury to others, then you have an offence, then you have a crime. On the other hand, where the combination or the getting together is purely to promote the interests, if you like, of those combining, there is no crime and there should not be said to be a crime; because, as I have stated, and as I intend to insist, the country at large usually benefits from such combinations.

Reference has been made to section 498 of the Criminal Code, and I want to deal with that aspect of the question for a moment, because I regard it as very interesting and very important. It is true that Chief Justice Meredith does in his decision question section 498 of the Criminal Code is intra vires of parliament. I am not as able to discuss or elucidate the point as others here who have legal training, but I hope that what I say will lead them to a closer examination of the whole question. In that decision and in the decisions of the Privy Council it is emphasized that section 498 of the Criminal Code was inserted to give this parliament jurisdiction. Let me put it a little differently. Parliament has jurisdiction over criminal matters, but not over property and civil rights, the latter belonging to the provinces. Parliament declares, through the criminal code and in words very similar to the interpretation that I have read, that "it is an indictable offence" and so on, against those who "conspire, combine, agree or arrange with other persons," and so on, "to unduly limit transportation facilities" and so forth—similar language to that contained in this bill. It is the erecting of the combination into a crime that the Privy Council and Chief Justice Meredith object to. They do not say that the conspiracy should not be legislated against in the criminal code. Let parliament make such provision in the criminal code that it can deal with deliberate conspiracies for the restraint of trade, and so forth; let them make it perfectly clear that it is the conspiracy they are after—then I think parliament will have rendered good service to the public. I submit to the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), as I would to the Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin) if he were in his seat, that careful examination of this bill will show that its adoption would place the government in virtually the same position that the Board of Commerce Act, that section 498 of the Criminal Code, is in to-day—without relieving, without changing or improving the condition throughout the country.

Then, the bill is inquisitorial in its character. It gives very wide powers to registrars. The Prime Minister has pointed out that under the provisions of the bill certain investigations will be held by one nominated as a registrar. This is a preliminary investigation to enable the registrar to declare whether or not the combination complained of is a combine under the terms of this act. He carries on his inquisition or his inquiry secretly; in other words, it is a star chamber proceeding. I appeal again to the good sense of this House; if there is one thing more than another that is necessary to subdue unreasonable combinations, it is publicity, not secrecy. In the second place, I submit that any bona fide business that has not been carried on with any intent to injure others should not be subjected to a secret or any other kind of inquiry. The only business that should be interfered with, harassed, inquired into, is a business that has committed some offence, a combination that is wrong. My right hon. friend pointed out, laying some emphasis upon it—and he made the same statement before a very large body of citizens who waited upon him a few weeks ago—that unless a combination had done wrong they need fear nothing under this act. But he is asking parliament to give to the registrar powers beyond those of the courts of this land; he is enabling the registrar to inquire secretly into any business or any concern complained of. Why, there would be no difficulty at any time, anywhere, day or night, summer or winter, to get six citizens of Canada to complain against some institution. I do not say ignorant people, but uninformed people, are very prone to complain of businesses or institutions wherever they may be. Six uninformed, irresponsible individuals may ask for an investigation. The registrar proceeds to investigate. He calls for all documents, contracts, books and so forth of the company. He can step into the office, examine into prices, obtain any information he demands. All that he asks for must be produced; the concern which is the subject of inquiry has no recourse but to give up everything that is demanded pertaining to the secrets of its business. I submit that one rival desiring to get information regarding another rival's business, perhaps more successful than his own, perhaps underselling him on the market, would find it the simplest thing in the world to get that information through such an institution as this.

Mr. CARROLL: That is where private investigation comes in.

Mr. STEVENS: Not only is the registrar or prosecutor not sworn to secrecy, but the minister or the registrar or the commissioner —it is so set forth in the bill—may disclose any part or all of the findings. I want my hon. friend to note that. I object to this private investigation, I am absolutely opposed to it. The registrar or a commissioner has the absolute right to determine the portion or the whole of the investigation to be disclosed, and to whom it can be disclosed. If one person desires to obtain the secrets of his competitor and stands in well with the commissioner, if he has pull—shall we say?—with the registrar or the minister, he can get a copy of the results of the investigation and no one need be the wiser. I submit that no such power, no such privilege, should be given to any one, two or three persons.

Let me turn to another phase of the bill. My right hon. friend the Prime Minister has said, and I expected him to say it, that under this bill he is taking certain powers; in clause 23 and clause 24, I think it is. Those powers are as follows: If a combination or a concern seems to be taking advantage of the tariff to unduly enhance prices, under this bill the Prime Minister says, the Governor in Council may for the time being place such an article on the free list. He has all that power now, and I wish the House would follow me in this particular. Not only in regard to this, but as I have already pointed out in the Criminal Code we have almost the identical power set forth in this bill, with but slight amendments to make them conform to the judgment of the Privy Council and the Supreme Court of Ontario. Under the Inquiries Act we can make the inquiries where it is considered to be in the interests of Canada and of law and order to do so. But in the Customs Tariff, section 12, I find a clause that is almost identical with the one inserted in this bill. Let me read it so that parliament may be seized of the powers already invested in the government. Section 12 of the Customs Tariff reads as follows, beginning at subsection 2:

> 2. Whenever the Governor in Council deems it to be in the public interest to inquire into any conspiracy, combination, agreement or arrangement alleged to exist among manufacturers or dealers in any article of commerce to unduly promote the advantage of the manufacturers or dealers in such article at the expense of the consumers, the Governor in Council may commission or empower any judge of the Supreme Court, or of the Exchequer Court of Canada, or of any superior court or county court in Canada, to hold an inquiry in a summary way and report to the Governor in Council whether such conspiracy, combination, agreement or arrangement exists.
> 3. The judge may compel the attendance of witnesses and examine them under oath and require the production of books and papers, and shall have such other necessary powers as are conferred upon him by the Governor in Council for the purpose of such inquiry.
> 4. If the judge reports that such conspiracy, combination, agreement or arrangement exists in repect of such article, the Governor in Council may admit the article free of duty, or so reduce the duty thereon as to give to the public the benefit of reasonable competition in the article, if it appears to the Governor in Council that such disadvantage to the consumer is facilitated by the duties of customs imposed on a like article.

There is absolute power to deal with this matter—no need whatever of this legislation. Furthermore, I will say this to the Prime Minister: If this legislation were to pass and it were found desirable to admit some article free, unquestionably his Minister of Justice would invoke section 12 of the Customs Tariff and not the clause in this bill.

I would point out another difference. In this bill before us it is proposed to entrust all this very, very wide power to whom? To a registrar or a commissioner. In the customs tariff it provides that the government may empower a judge of the various courts—an infinitely fairer, an infinitely better method of deciding an important point of that kind—and at the same time it preserves the rights of the person so inquired into.

The next point referred to by the Prime Minister was the revocation of a patent if it was found that by the use of that patent an abuse existed. I would again bring to his attention that during this session we have passed a Patent Act, and in that act at great length and in detail we provided against all of that. It is there. So parliament ought to be seized of this: In the Criminal Code, in the Inquiries Act, in the Customs Tariff Act, and in the Patent Act all of the powers asked for in this bill are now fixed, and fixed in the proper place, fixed in a manner that protects and will protect the interests of the public.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to sum up very briefly what I have said, not to weary the House with further detail. I oppose the bill: First, because a combine is usually prompted by efforts for efficiency and economy, and generally results in better service, the stabilizing of prices and the uniformity of supply. Second, because for persons or corporations to combine for mutual benefit is not in itself a crime nor should it be so declared either by inference or specifically. Third, the crime of conspiring, to injure other persons or to interfere with trade should be dealt with under the criminal code, and if the code as it is now drafted is not exactly fitting to the case sections 496 and 498 should be amended so as to fit.

My further objection is that the bill is inquisitorial. It will, if enforced, harass business without serving any useful purpose, and if ever there was a time when business should be free from interference and from that type of inquiry that simply disturbs and harasses it, that time is now. I venture to say that business of all kinds throughout the length and breadth of this country is struggling under the burden of taxation, under the burden of laws that really are going back, as it were, to the Middle Ages, and this would only be an added burden to the carrying on of business.

All that is sought for in this bill is much better provided for in the Criminal Code, the Inquiries Act, the Patent Act and the Customs Act. These acts with slight amendments constitute the proper medium of treatment and provide all the needed machinery, so that this bill merely duplicates powers, confuses jurisdiction, and multiplies public cost without adding one whit to the public protection.

Lastly, assuming the object of the bill to be the exposure of criminal interference with trade, profiteering and the conservation of the public rights, I submit, Sir, that no such end will be attained under this bill. On the contrary it impedes and harasses legitimate business development, it will victimize the innocent, and at the same time it opens innumerable avenues of escape for the guilty. In that regard I again remind the House that similar legislation to this has been repeatedly declared ultra vires of this parliament by the Privy Council and is called in question by this important judgment of Chief Justice Meredith. Therefore, why should we invite further litigation to determine this point when we can escape all that by, as I have already mentioned, insisting upon the real offence, namely, the conspiracy feature, and dealing with it under the Criminal Code.

Mr. W. F. CARROLL (Cape Breton South and Richmond): I believe this legislation is intra vires of this parliament and that no better legislation has been introduced here for half a century. The present bill is primarily and mainly, I think, for the protection of the consumers of Canada and it is from that aspect that I am going to discuss the subject. Various efforts have been made in the past to bring within reach of the law, persons who combine to enhance the prices of the necessities of life, but I do not think any of that legislation has been effective. In the past, in enacting laws against combines and monopolies, parliament did not take power to see that the law was enforced, and that persons who violated its provisions were penalized. The buck was passed to the legislatures and to the attorney generals of the provinces, and the Dominion statute contained no provision for making the law effective. In 1919 there was an attempt to legislate on this matter, but it was not of a nature at all akin to the present measure, and I believe our courts have declared that certain parts of that statute are ultra vires of this parliament. The Prime Minister this afternoon, in answer to my question, gave us the assurance that in the opinion of the Department of Justice the present bill was intra vires of this parliament; I am going to take it for granted that such is the case until the highest tribunal in the land has declared to the contrary.

I am in perfect accord with the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) when he states that all combines are not bad, and that combinations of business interests in this country have done a great deal to benefit not only the producers and the consumers but the nation as a whole. Combinations of capital have done much to lessen the cost of certain articles which are among the necessaries of life in Canada, and to that extent the combination of capital is a splendid thing. But when capital combines to enhance the price of the necessaries of life, when it combines to take the last cent out of the consumers of Canada, then I say that such a combination should be declared a crime by this parliament, and I want to congratulate the government on bringing down legislation with that object in view. My hon. friend (Mr. Stevens) I think, is somewhat astray in concluding that all combines would be declared criminal under this bill. It has no such intention. The interpretation clause says—

Mr. STEVENS: I did not say that they would all be declared criminal. I said that in view of the interpretation clause the registrars would be forced to declare them combines, which is all that the bill does. The bill does not deal with the criminal feature of it at all.

Mr. CARROLL: But the registrar would not be forced to declare these associations as combines.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Mr. CARROLL: At any rate, he would not be forced to investigate a concern which is not a combine within the meaning of the bill. As a preliminary the registrar will take means to assure himself that the concern is not such a combine as the bill has in view. For example, if six persons go to the registrar with a complaint, he may demand of the business firm or company concerned the right to look over its books in private. That is a proviso with which I am strictly in accord. The manager of the firm shows his books to the registrar, and I am presuming that neither this government, nor any other government which may be in power in Canada, will appoint registrars who are not honest and honourable. Now, the registrar will go to the managers of this business firm and ask them, in a quiet manner, to produce their books. Then I feel assured that if it is not a combine, such as this bill intends chasing and hounding to death—and I hope that course will be pursued—the managers will be very glad to produce their books when the registrar in the course of a few hours can inform himself whether the concern is such a combine as comes within the four corners of the proposed statute. This procedure ought to cover the objection taken by my hon. friend. But the hon. member can refer to the interpretation clause and what will he find? He will find this:

> (a) The expression "combine" in this act shall be deemed to have reference to such combines immediately hereinafter defined as in the opinion of the registrar or any commissioner have operated or are likely to operate to the detriment of or against the interest of the public—

And so on. The whole of these provisions must be read together. It is not necessary to show, for example, that there is a merger or a monopoly in order to bring that concern within the provisions of the act; that merger or combine or monopoly must be operating to the detriment of the public. My hon. friend has fallen down in his argument by ignoring that provision of the legislation.

Mr. BAXTER: What public?

Mr. CARROLL: I need not tell my hon. friend for St. John and Albert that "public" is a very well-defined expression. Further down in the clause there is included in the definition the limiting of facilities for transporting, producing, manufacturing, supplying, storing or dealing in any commodity. But they must be doing this and operating against the public weal in doing it. In all these cases you must go back to section (a) of the act before coming to a conclusion that a trust, a monopoly, or a combine, or a transportation business, is a combine within the act, which this bill declares a combine.

Mr. STEVENS: The hon. member should in his argument, in all fairness, read the words "whether consumer, producer or others" which qualifies this provision.

Mr. CARROLL: The hon. member is getting away from the argument I am presenting. However I will come to the question the hon. member has asked. I do not know exactly what significance that word "others" has. I will be quite frank with the hon. member, because I think in this country we are either consumers or producers, and as a matter of fact we are all consumers.

Mr. BAXTER: Is an insurance company a consumer or producer?

Mr. CARROLL: The people making up the company are consumers.

Mr. BAXTER: But the company?

Mr. CARROLL: The company may be a consumer.

Mr. BAXTER: Take a transportation company.

Mr. CARROLL: The members of a corporation may be both consumers and producers. The general manager of a company who could be prosecuted under this act is a consumer or producer. However, that may be exactly the class of institution which the word "others" covers.

Mr. BAXTER: Is a banker a producer or a consumer?

Mr. CARROLL: If the hon. member has any questions to ask, I will sit down. I do not like to see him in his seat mumbling questions which I cannot understand. Usually when an hon. member has anything to say he rises.

Mr. BAXTER: I will apologize to my hon. friend for asking questions which he cannot understand.

Mr. CARROLL: That is very clever, no doubt. That is one of the cleverest things I have heard from the hon. member in his whole career in this parliament, and I have heard him say a good many things. Now the word "others" may have reference to the class of trade to which my hon. friend for St. John referred. But suppose it means, what the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) says, other concerns in the same business. My hon. friend for Vancouver Centre has seriously argued that, if there were a small concern in Hamiltion, engaged, say, in the manufacture of ploughs, it was right, just and equitable that another large concern in that city should combine, or should try by any underhand means or method, to put that small concern out of business? Does my hon. friend think that would be a fair measure of justice to give to the small manufacturer in this country?

Mr. STEVENS: The hon. member is stating my own argument. I argued that if, by conspiracy or underhand means, such a thing as that were done it should be punished under the Criminal Code, but if it were done by competition, as it might be done under this act, there would be no crime.

Mr. CARROLL: No crime?

Mr. STEVENS: No offence.

Mr. CARROLL: The hon. member must know that this parliament is absolutely supreme in making crime. They can make almost any action of man a crime if they so desire.

Now my hon. friend talks about the privacies of the investigation by the registrar, and says those privacies are wrong. In another instance he calls them star chamber methods of doing business. I want to say to my hon. friend that I believe after the registrar has gone to the institution and made a personal investigation of the documents and so on, any further investigation should be of a public character. That far I agree with the hon. member. I am in hopes that the registrars will be men of such calibre that, having made a personal investigation on the premises, as they are allowed to do by this bill, and finding no evidence which will make the concern investigated a criminal under the act, there will be no further inquiry. I believe that all further investigations should be of an absolutely public nature and that the public should have access to them. My hon. friend for Vancouver Centre says that he has read the bill. He is a serious student when he takes up any question and his studies are serious, as everyone in the House knows, but I think he is mistaken or misled when he attempts to show the House that the registrar is all-powerful in so far as the whole situation is concerned. What are the facts? The registrar investigates. There may be counsel for the government and counsel for the combine which is being investigated. The evidence is taken, and the court has all the functions and powers of a court excepting that it does not pass sentence. My hon. friend and the House must not forget the fact that the registrar has no authority to come to a conclusion. He passes the matter on to the minister, and the minister decides if there is sufficient evidence to have the person, firm or corporation indicted under the Criminal Code. If the minister thinks there is sufficient evidence, he so advises the attorney general of the province, and the attorney general, while there can be no pressure brought to bear upon him to draw an indictment or lay information, may bring an indictment before the court, and the person, if person it be, or corporation, if corporation it be, accused of the crime, has the same rights before that criminal court as any other citizen of Canada. The accused may go before a jury or may elect to have a speedy trial befor the county or district court judge. If the attorney general does not see fit to proceed with the investigation, charge or trial, the solicitor general, within six months, may, off his own bat, proceed to bring home to those people their crime.

I do not think my hon. friend for Vancouver Centre wished to mislead the House, but I want to show that this registrar has nothing in the world to do, except to make a fair investigation, to pass the papers, so to speak, to the minister who has charge of the matter, and if the minister is of opinion there is something to investigate he passes the case on to the attorney general. If the attorney general does not act, the solicitor general may proceed with the case and lay a charge. My hon. friend says that all the cures for the present situation in Canada are to be found within two or three statutes and he mentions them. He mentions section 12 of the Tariff Act, he mentioned the Patent Act and the Criminal Code. If my hon. friend will read section 497—

Mr. STEVENS: 496 and 498.

Mr. CARROLL: —he will find an altogether different state of affairs from that which appears in this particular section. For example, take first the procedure. There is nothing in the Criminal Code which makes it incumbent upon this parliament or this government or any future government to prosecute offences under that act. The whole thing is left in the hands of the attorney general of the province. Under this bill we have the machinery which will surely ensure at some time, even though it be late, an investigation into a combine or conspiracy in restraint of trade. When we talk about conspiracy in restraint of trade, do hon. members in this House believe it is restraint of trade for example, if several wholesale dealers get together with the retailers in the various places where they are selling their goods, and say "Here we have a corner on something. We have a corner. in this particular vicinity, in potatoes, any kind of vegetables, any necessity of life. We are, it is true, getting a big profit now, but we are going to extract 10 per cent more from the pockets of the consumers." Is that a restraint of trade? I say, it is not a restraint of trade, and those sections of the code do not touch dealers who may act in that way. That is one of the things that the consumers of this country are concerned with, namely, that there is a conspiracy, if you will, but not a conspiracy in restraint of trade—you cannot call it that—between the wholesalers and retailers of this country to maintain prices.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the hon. membeer think such an act would be permitted under paragraph (c) of section 498 of the code?

Mr. CARROLL: I doubt if it could be reached by that section.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If it could not, it certainly could not under this legislation.

Mr. CARROLL: That is an opinion.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is no doubt about it.

Mr. CARROLL: I doubt very much if it could. It is, however, to the procedure that I am referring in the present instance. There is no doubt in the world to-day that there must be conspiracies to keep up prices of certain commodities in this country. There is no doubt that such conspiracies have existed in the past, and if this legislation is properly enforced, it will be a very great blessing to the great mass of the consumers of this country—and we are all consumers.

My hon. friend speaks about the remedies that are supplied in this legislation, having an existence already, for example, under the Patent Act. I do not know that we can have in this country too many remedies against a man who, having secured a patent, misuses it to the detriment of the public. While I have not had time to go into the clause of the Patent Act dealing with this, I would say, notwithstanding that fact, that it is necessary to have this particular item incorporated also in this legislation, enforced as it will be by the government of Canada.

My hon. friend (Mr. Stevens) speaks of the powers of the Tariff Act. I did not even have time to read section 12, I think it is, of the Tariff Act but if my hon. friend will look over it again, he will find that there is a good deal of distinction. While in the Tariff Act the bodies and persons who make an inquiry are mentioned, this is adding another body to inquire under that act it is adding a body which, I think, can make the inquiry much more readily than can a judge of the Exchequer Court or the Supreme Court. My hon. friend is not a lawyer, but I am sure he knows something of the delays which surround courts of law in various actions which may be brought before them. In this case we have a simple method of investigating; and if there are trusts and combines, which are doing things which are to the detriment of the people of this country, another method of bringing them to justice is not going to hurt any person, but it is certainly going to help the consuming masses, if the law reaches out to persons who are taking the last cent unduly, and, as the bill says, to the detriment of the public.

My hon. friend had also something to say regarding property and civil rights. It is true that the legislatures of our provinces have what we may call absolute jurisdiction over property and civil rights. That, however, has its limitations. If this parliament undertakes to deal with something within its authority and, by chance, encroaches upon property and civil rights in a province, then this parliament has the right to pass that legislation. That is the consensus of opinion which one may gather from reading opinions of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in connection with this matter. But we are not so much concerned in this case with property and civil rights as we are with trade and commerce, and the matter of trade and commerce comes four-square within the authority of this parliament. It is trade and commerce specifically at which this legislation is aimed, and if it encroaches, to some extent, upon the matter of property and civil rights in a province, yet this parliament has absolute power to pass such a measure. While I do not put myself as a lawyer on the same plane as the Deputy Minister of Justice, I think he is absolutely right in his opinion expressed to the government, that this government has power to pass the legislation in question.

I did not intend taking up so much of the time of the House in connection with this matter. I have some criticisms to make of this bill, and as I said, one of them is the criticism which the hon. member for Vancouver Centre made. That criticism is as to the public nature of the inquiry, the court inquiry held by the court registrar or commissioner, not the private inquiry which he may make into a man's business by going to his house, or shop, or store. Again, the minister should not have the last say on this question. The minister has the last say whether or not, in his opinion, sufficient information has come out of the registrar's investigation to entitle him to ask the attorney-general of a province to prosecute. From the minister's decision in that matter there is no appeal as the act is at present constituted. I would suggest that there might be an appeal to the Governor in Council, because two heads are better than one. For instance, the minister having control of this measure may or may not be a lawyer. He may not know what weight should be given to certain evidence. In his particular position in life, he may not be trained to know exactly what certain evidence means. If the Minister of Justice is not the minister referred to in the context of this bill, there should be an appeal to or a consideration, if one is asked, by either the Minister of Justice or members of the government as a whole. I have received various communications from people, not only from my part of the country, but as far west as the home of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre, and they are all of one opinion, that if this legislation is properly administered, it will be a great blessing to the people of Canada who do not have large bank accounts, in other words, the masses of the consuming public. Two or three investigations, and two or three indictments brought in against people who are active in a propaganda to extract every cent possible out of the consumers, will waken the big business people of this country to a sense of duty and responsibility, and they will not, in future, do things which will cost them in the vicinity of $20,000 or $25,000.

Mr. JOHN EVANS (Saskatoon): This bill proposes to deal with one of the most important matters that has come before parliament this session, particularly in its relation to the everyday commodities that the people have to buy, and it is from this viewpoint that I wish to discuss the bill.

The history of combines in Canada, is the history of the tariff—one evil has been produced by the other. Oil refining was protected by the tariff and was controlled by a ring as early as 1879. Mr. John Charlton, then a member of this House, said that "tariffs were bound to breed combines," and no prophecy concerning the National Policy has ever proved more true. He cautioned the House then that the tariff would speedily bring monopolies, trusts and mergers into existence, and that they would not be easily broken up. He said it would take more than one verdict of the people, more than one general election, to loosen the deathlike grip which these monopolies, trusts and mergers would fasten on the people of this country.

Well, combines, trusts and mergers did develop. Since Mr. Charlton's warning, legislation has been repeatedly enacted by parliament, ostensibly to check the rapacity of these organizations. There was a measure of this kind passed in 1889, another in 1897, still another in 1907, and the last in 1910—all to no purpose. At the election of 1896 our free trade party got into power; the original National Policy party—or as I like to term it, the trade restriction party—of that time was overthrown and in its place came a professedly free trade party. For fifteen years this free trade party held power, but the trusts, combines and mergers gained daily in monopolistic control of every commodity, and to-day these predatory organizations are more securely in control in every particular than they ever were before. I say in every particular because there never was a time when the manufacturing and distributing of all the commodities the people use were so completely dominated by classes of men, many of whom should never be in possession of the power which they exercise to-day, keeping, according to their way of putting it, the trade of the country in the proper channels. The trusts to-day have more complete control in this country than in any other in the world, including the United States, where these combinations first originated. I assert there can be no dislodgement of these monopolistic organizations, nor any effective control over them, so long as our present protective tariff with all its amendments stands on our statute books, or while there continues to be the same community of interest between the politicians of business and the politicians who sit in this House.

Now, this evil has gone on unchecked ever since Sir John A. Macdonald in 1878 in a speech at Hamilton told the manufacturers he would try to meet their wishes if they would tell him what they needed. He was leader of the opposition at that time and of course was not able to invite the manufacturers to council at Ottawa. But this he did on his return to office, and since that time the manufacturers and others who form combinations for their own benefit have had plain sailing at the expense of the consumers, notwithstanding all the anti-combine legislation that has been enacted and the successive changes of government,

In 1881 the cotton manufacturers, who for two years previously had received increased privileges from the government, met together and organized a complete union and at once agreed to advance their prices. Prior to this combination the industry had been paying "only" about 30 per cent in dividends; since then some of these cotton concerns have paid very much higher dividends. All kinds of industries, large and small, were soon organized with the same end in view—enhancement of prices. By 1889 they were so numerous and aggressive that there were complaints in parliament about the way consumers were being victimized. Indeed, one Liberal member who drew attention to this new development declared that the interests of these combines and the government supporters were so closely linked together that the government would be hampered in dealing with the evil. At that time one combine in Toronto actually put up for sale among its members the privilege of tendering, without competition, for the supply of coal to the Dominion and Ontario governments.

It was plain to both parties that these combines were brought into being by the protective tariff, so to offset the agitation against trade restriction an act was passed by the Macdonald government for the suppression of combinations in restraint of trade. Obviously the politicians responsible for that act in 1889 never intended it to be anything more than a mere make-believe for there could be no conceivable reason for the manufacturers dickering with the politicians for a high protective tariff when an effective measure on the statute books would have prevented them taking full advantage of such a tariff. Now I predict the government will have hard work to persuade the people that this bill is ever intended to do anything more than were the bills of their predecessors. No combines were broken up by the act of 1889. In 1897 too the Liberal government, then newly elected, anxious to appear before the country as desiring to carry out some of its pre-election pledges according to the 1893 platform, enacted sitll another anti-combine law. There was performed in this House at that time perhaps the greatest farce that was ever staged in the Dominion. The Conservative party, then in opposition, feigned to be frightened by the bill, and well did they play their part. Sir Charles Tupper declared it to be legislation of the most vicious kind and that it was undemocratic in that it gave the minister or the council too much power. But both the government and the opposition knew that the bill was the greatest political joke ever played on the people. The Liberal government had no intention of seriously assailing any trust or combine, indeed they never had after the conference with the delegation of manufacturers on June 18th, 1896, shortly before the general election.

Now, they added this anti-combine legislation to the Tariff Act, but they made no provision for its enforcement by any officer of the Dominion government. After it had been in force for some thirteen years, there was, be it said to its credit, one case—just one solitary instance—of a reduction in the tariff because of proceedings against a combination in restraint of trade. But it cost the concern that laid the information $1,800 to prove its charge; and I never knew of a subsequent case. As evidence, too, of the hold that the protected combines were exercising over the Dominion legislators, I have only to point out that the screws were tightened on the consumers of this land at different tariff revisions, 1884 and 1894, when heavier import penalities were imposed on the consumers while the free list began to swell for the manufacturers. This destroyed, I think, all argument in favour of the tariff as a means of creating employment or of creating a home market. After all, it is in the years from 1900 to 1914 that we must look for the greatest development of the trusts and combines as well as the ineffective attempts to obviate the evils that this development brought with it. The act assented to in 1910, known as the Combines Investigation Act, proved useless, as did its predecessors; the process was too unwieldy.

The legislation now proposed would seem to be effective in that it makes it a criminal offence for any person to assist knowingly or be privy to combines operating to the public harm. I see there is also a registrar to be appointed who shall be the chief officer through whom proceedings may be instituted. But even this will not avail, as I will show. Whether combines or agreements in restraint of trade flourish in this country to the detriment of the public may admit of some argument. But I am wondering where the Prime Minister means to begin in connection with this bill, since all the business of the country, whether financial or industrial, or, particularly, relating to the distribution of all goods, is operated or controlled by combines, mergers and trusts. These control the manufacture, distribution and prices of everything the public need to use, and there is no getting away from under their lash as long as the tariff, with its anti-dumping provisions and its latest amendments, stands on the statute book as it does to-day.

The Prime Minister would be well advised to withdraw this bill and at the same time abolish some of the existing legislation that hands power to the combines, trusts and mergers. For instance, the dumping clause as it stands to-day delivers the consumers over to the combines to do as they please with them. It is impossible now for an importer to know what duty he will have to pay. I know of one case where a retailer who last year bought goods in the United States and paid the duty on their entering this country was assessed under the anti-dumping clause for an additional amount because he was not a jobber or a wholesaler. A considerable quantity of his goods was retailed out before the anti-dumping law was applied to him—it makes a difference who the importer is. As if this were not enough, an amendment was made to the Customs Tariff Act in the closing days of the last session giving the minister complete power to place any price he likes on any natural products that enter too keenly into competition with any Canadian concern. That amendment completely delivered the consumers of this land into the hands of the jobbers, the wholesalers, and the retailers; the provision was made entirely in their interests. The anti-dumping act has closed up the trading activities, so far as agricultural implements are concerned, of one of the greatest co-operative companies that was ever formed in the Dominion. The anti-dumping act as it stands to-day with its amendments is a piece of galley slave legislation. It is impossible under it for a co-operative company to import anything for distribution in a co-operative way, because no co-operative company is recognized as a jobber and it is required to pay duty, not on the invoice price of the manufacturer, but on the retailer's price. In fact, the minister can do as he likes, and I say as long as these provisions are on our statute books, any anti-combine legislation we can bring in of the nature of this bill will be futile.

The anti-dumping law is legislation that with one stroke forms into one great combine every distributing concern in the country—and the government asks us to believe that it can introduce legislation that will tend to lower the cost of living and to control combines. I, for one, cannot believe it. I do not think there is any sincerity in this matter, when the present tariff system is left entirely untouched—the very legislation that gives the combines all the power they need. If there is one thing more than another that this country needs to-day it is that people shall have freedom to purchase their commodities where they please. But there has sprung up between the producers and the consumers a combine whose rules are absolute, a combine which is recognized under the law of this land, which is recognized by the tariff system of this country, because in the Tariff Act the words "value for home consumption" are interpreted according to whom the importer happens to be. That is, only a jobber is allowed to import on the invoice price of the manufacturer. If a consumer or a co-operative company, distributing in a co-operative way, imports, the words "value for home consumption" are interpreted to mean the retail price in the country of origin, which is an injustice. Under such conditions, Sir, this proposed bill can give no relief; any investigation is bound to prove fruitless. The Customs Act is interpreted in favour of those who still hold the lives of the people in bondage through high prices.

Now, clause 7 of the bill enacts that the minister himself shall decide whether or not an investigation shall be proceeded with. The decision of the minister is final. There can be no appeal or review. So the same minister who is now interpreting the anti-dumping clause in the interest, as I have shown, of the trusts and combines is to decide whether or not an investigation shall be made at all, and his decision is not subject to appeal or review. If this government with the help of the opposition put through, as it did on June 22 last, an amendment to the Tariff Act that closed up the very last gap of liberty to the consumers of this land, I ask what credence will the electors give to the government in the enactment of this proposed bill? I say that this proposed bill can give no relief under such conditions. The Customs Act is interpreted in favour of those who still have the power. Take that amendment of June 22 last. The hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) declared in his original budget speech that this anti-dumping amendment was to be left out as it was an unnecessary interference with trade. Just what pressure from the politicians of business was brought to bear on the present cabinet between that time and June 22 last when the Minister of Customs moved his amendment, I do not know; but there is a chance now for the whole Liberal party to free itself from all suspicion by doing something tangible, something that will give the people themselves the power to deal with these trusts and mergers in a way that will be effective.

Mr. HERBERT MARLER (St. Lawrence-St. George): Mr. Speaker, I rise not for the purpose of urging violent opposition to the spirit of the bill as now brought down, because I am quite satisfied in my own mind, in fact I am certain, that the people of Canada are quite satisfied that the Prime Minister would bring down no legislation that was not imbued with a spirit of equity and right.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MARLER: I hear some hon. gentlemen jeer. However, that is my opinion, and it is the opinion of the rest of Canada.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is the evidence?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Everything.

Mr. MARLER: It has increased very largely since the time my right hon. friend is alluding to. However, I did rise for the purpose of stating that I do not think that the manner in which this bill is worded does carry out the spirit in which it is brought down. The bill is intended to aim at trusts, combines and mergers which are unfair or injurious to trade. I read the bill in quite the contrary light as aimed at practically all combines, trusts and mergers, whether they be fair or whether they be unfair. That, I am perfectly sure, is not the spirit in which the bill has been brought down to the House at the present time.

The history of this bill has been explained briefly not only on its first reading but also again to-day, and what that history really comes down to is this: that the Combines and Fair Prices Act, which is more or less dependent on the Board of Commerce Act, not having functioned properly, and repealing, as it does, the Combines Investigation Act of 1910, the only actual legislation in force at the present time on the subject is Article 498 of the Criminal Code. In the explanation on the first reading of this bill it was stated that some effective machinery was necessary so that Article 498 of the Criminal Code could be put into effect for the purpose of the investigation of combines, mergers, and such like, and the punishment of those who may have been involved therein. That, I take it, is the necessity for the bill at the present time.

I am quite aware that on a motion for the second reading of the bill now before the House is not the proper time or place to urge amendments, but I do wish to urge on the government and on the Prime Minister in particular this fact, that the business world in parts of Canada is very much concerned over the bill as brought down, and I think that it will stand very careful scrutiny and very careful study, not with the object of not having it put on the statute book in the spirit in which it is intended to be placed there, but rather with the object of eliminating certain objectionable features which at the present time business interests think are very deleterious to their interests. I want to make it perfectly clear to every hon. gentleman in the House that in speaking to this bill I do not defend for a single moment any combine, any trust, any merger or any agreement of any kind or description which is injurious to trade, which is unfair or burdensome to the public. Let me make that perfectly clear in the most emphatic language that I can use with politeness in this assembly; let there be no mistake about it. But I also desire to state in equally emphatic language, in the most emphatic language I can use, that I do not think legislation should be placed on the statute book at the present time which will brand combines, business agreements, mergers, trusts and business arrangements of that description as combines in the unfair sense in which that word is used; in other words, I do not think that business agreements as they exist at the present time should be called unfair combines unless first of all they are proved to be unfair. If we immediately start out and state that every combine is unfair, every business interest, every trust unfair—I know that the bill does not intend to say that—but if we start out presupposing that, the business community will never know for a moment where they are.

Probably if there is any further debate on the bill at the present time the cost of living will be urged as being attributable to combines, trusts and mergers. I think I am right in saying that the public mind has for many years associated the high cost of living with the existence of combines, trusts and mergers so-called. I do not think that that is quite right. Perhaps in a few isolated cases a trust or combine may increase the cost of an article of commerce, but on the whole I do not think that is the case.

Mr. HANSON: You do not agree then with the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock)?

Mr. MARLER: I have not heard the Minister of Labour speak this afternoon.

Mr. HANSON: Have you read any of his speeches in the last campaign?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is a free party.

Mr. MARLER: I do not remember reading any of them but I am perfectly certain that what he intended to imply was right and proper, and if my hon. friend draws an improper conclusion that is his own fault.

Mr. MEIGHEN: "I have not seen so great faith, no, not in Israel."

Mr. MARLER: My right hon. friend would be exceedingly fortunate if such great faith existed on his side as exists on this.

I was going on to state when I was interrupted that I do not think that combines, mergers and trusts so-called have increased materially the cost of living, because when one comes to think of it a combine, trust or merger of various interests more or less spells efficiency, more or less brings about the cheapening of production, and bringing about the cheapening of production brings about the fact that more labour can be employed. I read with a great deal of pleasure the speech which the Prime Minister made when Minister of Labour in 1910 when that act was brought into effect. I see my hon. friend the member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) smiling; my statement apparently gives him a great deal of pleasure. I think, perhaps, it would do my hon. friend much good if he read the speech over again and became imbued with its spirit.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am afraid the hon. gentleman cannot give me the credit for the smile, it came from my left.

Mr. MARLER: I apologize to my hon. friend. I see that he is not prejudiced against what I am advising him to read. However, at that time the Prime Minister spoke as follows:

> Similarly while combines and trusts may have had the effect in some cases of increasing prices, they have not always had that effect but sometimes an effect entirely different, and I would like the House to understand that in introducing this legislation no attempt is being made to legislate against combines, mergers, and trusts as such.

Later on in the same address he stated:

> Another point I would like to make clear is that trusts and combines may not be injurious, that in some respects they may be profitable. That is a point that has been raised. This legislation is in no way aimed against trusts, combines and mergers as such, but rather only at the possible wrongful use or abuse of their power, of which certain of these combinations may be guilty.

I have not the slightest doubt, Mr. Speaker, that the present bill, as brought down, fully intends to carry out and fully intends to emphasize what the Prime Minister said twelve years ago as regards combines and mergers. But the point I desire to bring before the House is this: I do not think that the bill as drafted and brought down does carry out that spirit in effect. Part of the legislation which has been spoken about to-day is section 498 of the Criminal Code. Anyone reading that section can come to but one conclusion and that conclusion will be this, namely, there must be wrong intent in the making and the prosecution of any combine. In other words the wrong animus must be pre-existent before a combine is inquired into and called an unfair combine. Now, I claim that section 2 of the present bill does not clearly show that a combine has to be unfair, that its animus has to be incorrect before it is investigated. The words of this section are certainly very broad, and I do think that qualification of the section should be made before a business, or a merger, or a trust can be called a combine. In other words it should be made clear beyond peradventure that the animus of the combine itself is wrongful before an investigation takes place. I do not think the wording of that section, as I have said, is very clear.

Now, we must all freely admit in this House that in business life there are combines, there are mergers, there are trusts, there is fixing of prices, there are trade agreements. All these things must exist in commerce. Commerce could not go ahead unless there were such agreements. The manufacturer would never know where he was, the producer would never know where he was, the consumer would never know where he was either. These trusts, mergers and combines—providing the animus behind them is correct—should be allowed to go on unheeded and not be inquired into. Because, as a matter of fact as business affairs now stand business is only on the up grade. Every investigation that is made impedes business, every return that a business house has to make simply increases the cost of production. Business is already overtaxed and I claim, Mr. Speaker, that business at the present time—in so far as it is possible to do so, in so far as it is possible in fairness and equity to the public—should not be disturbed by further investigations unless those investigations are essential, unless those investigations are necessary, unless the animus is first of all determined to be wrong. In other words, I believe that before any investigation is made wrong doing or wrong intention should be proved on the part of that business.

Approaching nearer to the words of the bill it does appear to me that it has been framed in such a way as to call for action on the part of someone who was absolutely fair-minded in every way, who understood industrial disputes, and who was imbued with a spirit of honesty and right. Under the provisions of the bill six people can come forward and demand an investigation. I will come to that question again later on but what I want to make clear at the present time is this: Six people can come and demand an investigation. Now, if everybody in this country of ours was imbued with a spirit of fairness there would be no question to be raised at all. But unfortunately, and I think I must say this, I do not think that the mentality generally—I am speaking of the mentality not in the way of a sense of mind but an attitude generally—of people towards business affairs, towards large business, is the same as it was many years ago. There is without doubt a spirit abroad of more or less jealousy of success, a desire more or less to pull down when it is seen that a business has been successful by reason of operating it for many years in a fair and equitable manner. I fear, Mr. Speaker, that that spirit is abroad. That spirit did not exist before the war in exactly the same manner as it exists to-day—I must say that. I find the attitude of many people in business affairs appears to be very much different. Although it is true, I might say in passing, that the war was supposed to purify us, that the war was fought for democracy and to make the world safe, I have not yet been able to find where that purification or that desire for democracy in order to make the world safe comes in, although it should have come in on account of the suffering that took place and the service that was rendered during the struggle. What I say is that there is an unnecessary carping criticism of successful business methods in Canada at the present time. Bear in mind, Mr. Speaker, that I admit where a trust is injurious and is shown to be injurious a business merger is wrong. The point I desire to convey is that where a business has been successful by hard and honest work there is a distinct carping criticism of it. I will say this further: Almost from time immemorial in the ways of commercial and business life there have been agreements. These agreements have been recognized and have continued to be recognized. Nevertheless the spirit is abroad at the present time, I take it, that would think nothing whatever of tearing down a business that had been properly built up, of tearing down an agreement that had been in force for very many years.

No doubt this act was carefully prepared, and I believe that in bringing down this act the government has no intention whatsoever of trying to destroy any business of that description. It has one intention and one desire, a perfectly proper desire—to cause investigations of trusts, mergers and agreements which are injurious, unfair and burdensome to the public. It is the desire of the government that those agreements should be investigated and put a stop to and that those responsible for such conditions should be punished. That I say is perfectly right, but at the same time I do not think that a business which has gone ahead in a fair, honest, equitable way in the face of the whole community should be touched or investigated or subjected to more inconvenience than business is subjected to at the present time—because the more business is disturbed, the greater is the cost of carrying it on and the slower will be the process of reconstruction which our country so much needs at the present time. The more business is disturbed the more does the lack of stability get abroad in this country, and if there is anything we want it is stability, in order that we may progress in our ordinary business lives.

Now, Mr. Speaker I would like to take up in a very brief form the bill itself, and to discuss, as I understand them, certain provisions as they appear in it, and the procedure which is involved. The first step is the complaint, and the second is the preliminary investigation to find out if an actual investigation should or should not take place. The third step is the actual investigation and the fourth step is the subsequent action by the Attorney General or the Solicitor General as the case may be. I wil take up each of those steps very briefly.

The first is the complaint as provided for under section 5 of the bill, subject to the amendments which the Prime Minister has suggested to-day. That is to say, instead of "any one person resident in Canada," the act will be amended more or less along the lines of the 1910 act; so as to provide for investigation on the complaint of six or more persons, British subjects, resident in Canada, of full age, and so on. That I admit is a distinct improvement to the section in the bill as it stands now. But can we, in fairness, Mr. Speaker, place any business in the hands of any six people in this country? Can we not at any time get together six people who would make a complaint about any business, and who would cause an investigation to be then and there made? If the section, which is the crux of the whole bill in defining a combine distinctly stated that the only combines and the only trusts or mergers which were affected were trusts, combines or mergers which, either prima facie or by some reasonable means were shown to be injurious to trade or burdensome to the public, then the present objection that I am urging might be quite unfounded, but as the bill now stands it means—and it can only mean one thing—that six people taken from any part of Canada can demand an investigation at any time of any business at all which they think is a combine or a restriction of trade. It does not make any difference what the business is, it does not make any difference what the registrar thinks, it does not make any difference what a commissioner under the act thinks, or what the government or anybody else may think—those six people, can bring about an investigation by doing what, Mr. Speaker? All they have to do is to file an application under section 5 of the act, and the application states in general terms simply the name and address of the applicants, the nature of the alleged combine, and the manner in which and the possible extent to which the alleged combine is believed to operate against the public. Now it does not take anyone with a very high degree of skill to conjecture up in his own mind any difficulties at all, in order to have any six of these people lay a complaint of that description.

I say again, Sir, that I do think there should be sufficient qualification in this act, in some manner or of some description, and I repeat particularly to the government and Prime Minister that I do not criticize the spirit of the act at all, but I do criticize the machinery and the wording. I say that that clause should be amended in such a way as to provide that those six people whoever they may be, should show more reasonable or just cause of facts before they can, by a mere writing, by a mere declaration placed in the hands of the registrar, say that this business or that is a combine, and that this business or that should be investigated. It is all very well for six people, under a solemn act of parliament, to stand up and say that my business or anyone else's business is a combine. That is a stigma, it is not a name that any respectable business expects to be called, because the word "combine" is not used in the ordinary sense of the term, but as something which is unfair and unjust. Here we have likely to be placed on the statute book— I hope it will not be placed there—a section which will give six people the right to state that any business is a combine.

There is another point Mr. Speaker, which comes up under this section of the act, and no doubt the government has considered it to some extent. Does the government realize how many demands, or how may allegations, or how many so called applications they will have under an act of this description? I venture to say, Sir, in the conditions which are in existence at the present time in this country, and which I have alluded to, that there will be thousands of applications under this act. I believe that six people who are discontented and jealous of some other man's business will say "That man is making too much money, let us tear his business up, let us have it investigated and see if a combine exists or not." It is not an unnatural thing for six people who are not endowed with all the pleasures or the money that they would like in this world, perhaps finding themselves very pinched, to be more or less jealous of success, because they are are not as fortunate as others. I do not think I would blame them, and I do not think anyone would blame them. But here is the provision of the act and here is what it means, that six people can get together, and at any time ask for an investigation of this alleged combine. I believe the government will find, under this act which is being brought down in its present terms today, that they will have, not hundreds but thousands of investigations on their hands which they never expected for a moment.

Mr. MICHAUD: Has the registrar not to declare that he is satisfied with the application?

Mr. MARLER: I was coming to that point. It was my next point. Perhaps if it is not discourteous to my hon. friend I will answer that after recess.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MARLER: Mr. Speaker, when the House rose at six o'clock, I was defining the procedure to be effected under the bill relating to the investigation of combines. I had previously stated that in accordance with the procedure laid down in the bill, there were apparently four steps. The first was the complaint. The second was the preliminary inquiry in order to ascertain if a more detailed investigation was required. The third was the detailed investigation under which a finding or no finding was made as the case might be. The fourth step was the prosecution under the offence as so committed, at the instance or with the assistance of the Attorney General or Solicitor General, as the case might be. I had taken up the first of these steps, namely the complaint, as set out in clause 5 of the bill, and I had defined at some length the reasons why I thought clause 5 of the bill did not actually convey the intention the government had in bringing this bill down. It is not necessary at the present time to repeat or to recapitulate the remarks which I made before the House rose.

I will, therefore, pass on to the second step, namely, preliminary inquiry which the registrar is required to make after the laying of the information, or more properly speaking, the laying of the complaint under clause 5 of the bill itself. Clause 6 of the bill is imperative, it is not permissive. In other words, when a complaint is laid by the six persons as they are designated in the amendment suggested by the Prime Minister to the bill in question, the registrar shall then and there cause an inquiry to be made into the alleged combine or alleged restraint of trade, or any of the other causes set out in the definition of a combine under clause 2 of the bill. As I say, that action of the registrar is imperative on the complaint being laid. It is optional for the registrar to make a preliminary investigation, if he thinks fit, even without a complaint being laid. If he believes a combination exists, he may then and there go ahead and make the investigation himself. It is quite true under the succeeding clause—clause 7 of the bill—if the registrar finds that the complaint is frivolous or vexatious, no actual, definite inquiry takes place. In other words, possibly no offence would be found under this legislation. The point I desire to make now is this, that an investigation or a preliminary investigation must, in any event, take place in order that the registrar may ascertain whether the allegations made by the applicants in their complaint are or are not well founded, because, without making that investigation into the business, merger, trust, call it what you will, it will be utterly impossible for the registrar to say whether the complaint is frivolous or vexatious or not.

Mr. CARROLL: Would an investigation into the books of a company or combine at its office be sufficient?

Mr. MARLER: I think very likely it would be quite sufficient. I was coming to that just in a moment. As I say, the registrar would be required to make that investigation. The point I made in my remarks this afternoon, was that I thought if there was no title, or no evidence, or, in fact, nothing to show whether an actual combine existed in a particular business or trust, that business or trust, as the case might be, should be left severely alone. In other words, because six people complain and file documentary evidence—and this is only documentary evidence —under clause 5 of this particular bill, I do not think that business should be immediately stigmatized as a combine, in secret, it is quite true, perhaps not in public, nor that it should, as it would, be put to the expense and annoyance of an examination. it will therefore mean that any business is subjected to an inquiry of a more or less searching character on the complaint being made.

Now, why should not something like the following procedure be adopted? Why should not these six selfsame camplainants be called before the registrar and asked to state their case as to the existence of the alleged combine? Then if the proofs which they propose to adduce are considered sufficient by the registrar to justify an investigation it could be proceeded with. I do not claim that no investigation should be made, but I do think that the condition precedent to making even a preliminary investigation should be the production of evidence in proper form by the complainants to show that wrong has been done, and thereupon such wrong can be righted in due course. As the bill stands at present the mere production of documentary evidence alone, without any questioning of the complainants at all, leaves no option to the registrar but to conduct an examination of the business complained of. I humbly suggest to the government that the acceptance of my suggestion would cure a good deal of what at present appears defective in this particular section.

As I have said, the registrar must make an investigation to determine even if the complaint is frivolous or vexatious. That provision, I think, so far as is practicable, should be absolutely removed from the bill. In other words, even at the risk of repetition, I do think just cause should be shown against any known combine, merger or business, call it what you will, before the preliminary investigation takes place at all. Of course, if upon investigation the complaint is found to be frivolous or vexatious it is dismissed; there is nothing more to be said about it. But if the complaint is found not to be frivolous or vexatious, subject to the qualifications I have already referred to, there is no reason why a thorough inquiry should not be made. That brings me to the next step—the actual inquiry.

This brings me back to section 14 of the bill. There are various other sections relating to the same subject but it is not necessary for me to take them in detail at present because we are only speaking in general terms and I am sure that any suggestions made to the government in the interim will receive careful consideration. But the bill clearly stresses what I think is a consistent element of publicity. It is true that the registrar may or may not conduct the preliminary investigation in private; but he may make it in public, and I do think that publicity should be avoided until it is found there is just cause for investigation. If after the complaint is laid an examination of the six complainants discloses that there is reasonable grounds for a preliminary inquiry, then by all means proceed with that preliminary inquiry; but do not let any part of such inquiry be conducted in public until the registrar finds there is just cause of complaint against the alleged merger or combine in restraint of trade. I would respectfully suggest to the government that the bill be made imperative in that regard—that there be no publicity during the preliminary inquiry. I cannot state this point in too emphatic terms. What would happen if this was not made definite in the bill? A complaint might be made against a business, and whether such complaint was good or bad the preliminary investigation would mean a tremendous amount of publicity which many a business could ill afford to be the subject of. Therefore I repeat, Sir, that this section should be amended so as to make it imperative that the preliminary inquiry be conducted in private until it is found that a searching investigation is justified.

Another section of the bill to which I wish to draw attention is No. 34, which reads as follows:

> Nothing in this act shall be construed to apply to combinations of workmen or employees for their own reasonable protection as such workmen or employees.

In any remarks I have to make with respect to this section I wish it to be abundantly clear to every hon. member that I see no possible objections to combinations of workmen and employees for their reasonable protection. I for one believe that labour should be given its just rights precisely in the same way as capital is given its just rights. After all, there are practically three elements, I take it, in the relations between capital and labour: capital, labour and the community itself. All are interdependent one on the other, each must be given its reasonable and just rights. But why is it necessary in this bill to exclude the operation of its provisions against combinations of workmen or employees. I do not believe that any combination of workmen or employees would ask to be excluded from the operation of this bill. I cannot for a moment conceive that any labour body would be afraid of having its organization investigated. Therefore I do not see why labour organizations should not be included in this bill the same as any business organization, and I would ask the government to take this point under consideration also.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have spoken at some length as regards this bill, and I have stressed several points, the principal being these, and I will not detain the House very long in recapitulating what I have said. I do think that section 2 is not sufficiently distinct; in other words, I think the section should be made so abundantly clear that no combine or merger which is not actually operating in restraint of trade or in any other way doing wrong should be subject to inquiry at all.

My second point is that the bill as a whole should recognize that there must be combines, trusts and mergers and agreements, and that it is not these combinations or these agreements that are wrong. it is the animus which is behind them. In other words, if there is wrong behind any of these agreements, let the wrong be investigated; but the animus should be proved to be wrong before the investigation is ordered. I stressed that, Mr. Speaker, to some considerable extent.

My third point was in regard to the way in which a complaint may be laid. I suggested there that six persons could possibly lay many complaints and that the government might have a great deal of difficulty in looking into all the complaints which might be made under this bill, and I do believe that many more complaints would be made than the government has any idea of.

The fourth point I raised was that the complaint should first be examined into, that the complainants should be called before the registrar and their evidence examined before any inquiry was instituted.

My fifth was that the preliminary inquiry should be invariably conducted in private, and that no publicity should be allowed until a finding adverse to the combine was made by the registrar.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that is all I have to say in reference to this matter, but if the Prime Minister will not think me impertinent for making another suggestion, it is this—and it has been in part covered by the remarks I have already made: Business is only now on the up-grade in this country, and I hope the government will not do anything which will not allow it to proceed or which will not allow it to become stable in every way. I do not like to make any remarks which would probably draw a discussion or even a criticism from some of my hon. friends opposite, but I have frequently heard it stated in this House, not out of it: "What has the government done? It has done nothing."

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MARLER: I am glad to hear the "hear, hear" from the other side; I expected it. Let me tell my hon. friends this—

Mr. MEIGHEN: This is doing nothing twice.

Mr. MARLER: Well, my right hon. friend has also endorsed what the hon. gentleman sitting behind him says. The opinion of my hon. friends, in that respect, is very much in the minority—I am waiting for them to laugh. I am urging that the government to go on the even tenor of its way is the most admirable policy that could possibly be followed at this time, because the country of all things wants stability, tranquillity; they do not want any sky-rocketing, any spectacular policies.

Mr. HANSON: Will my hon. friend permit a question?

Mr. MARLER: Certainly; I expected it.

Mr. HANSON: Does he think the country wants this bill?

Mr. MARLER: I have been arguing that to my hon. friend all the afternoon. I premised—

Mr. HANSON: Damning it with faint praise.

Mr. MARLER: I premised my remarks by saying that the spirit of the bill was admirable in every way. The bill as brought down is a basis for discussion, nothing more or less.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman means that the bill is all right, only for the sections.

Mr. MARLER: My right hon. friend knows perfectly well that I made no such remark. The remarks which I made earlier in the day my right hon. friend probably regarded as not worth following, but if he had followed them closely—and I had hoped he would have; I had hoped that hon. gentlemen opposite would possibly have derived a slight amount of knowledge from my remarks on this bill—he would have heard me say definitely that the spirit of the bill was admirable but that the operation of the proposed measure and the procedure under it could bear amending, and that the bill as it stands is brought down as a basis for discussion.

When interrupted I was going on to say that the people were satisfied to have the government continue along the even tenor of its way and to have it avoid spectacular policies. I would therefore urge that some of the clauses of the bill be redrafted in such a manner as to carry out the spirit and intention of the bill itself.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Fort William and Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I have listened this afternoon and this evening with a good deal of attention to the speech of the hon. member (Mr. Marler) who has just taken his seat. I always listen to his speeches with a good deal of attention, because he studies a case before he speaks on it and he usually delivers a very thoughtful address. However, as I listened to him to-day, damning with faint praise, as somebody to my left said a few moments ago, this bill, I found myself wondering which he was endeavouring to do, to praise it or to damn it. He removed from it so far as I could see, its heart and lungs and body, and left the rest for the government, with his approval. So far as I could find, there was only one part of it with which he agreed, and that was the title.

I take very much the same attitude, Mr. Speaker, as my hon. friend takes. I have listened to the other speeches; I have given some study to the bill, and I think I voice his opinion as well as my own when I say that it is unnecessary, useless and interfering legislation. In saying this, Sir, I do not wish to be misunderstood. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) in his able speech, pointed out that he did not wish to be taken as supporting trusts, combines and mergers, and I presume it is a good attitude for me to take at the beginning of the remarks that I propose to address to the House. I may say frankly that I have not been the subject of any lobbying on this question, nor have I received even a communication of any kind in regard to it, with the exception of the ordinary circulars that I think every hon. member has received, some for and some against the bill. I am opposing the bill in a general way, not from the legal point of view but from the general point of view that we have in this country to-day too many laws. We have laws made by this Dominion parliament, laws made by the provincial legislatures and municipal by-laws of various kinds. In fact, our statute books are cluttered up with laws of all descriptions, with most of which the people are not familiar. We are practically being legislated to death, and it is time we called a halt. Too much paternalism is being exercised, not only by this parliament, but by other legislative bodies throughout the country, and I submit that it is time to let the people do a little thinking on their own behalf. When you get on the statute books a great many laws of various kinds with which the people do not agree and of which they make, to a certain extent, a joke, you bring about a disrespect and a disregard for law which is not in the best interests of the country as a whole. I noticed some time ago in a United States paper the statement of an American senator that it was time that his country proceeded not to make more laws but to unmake many of the laws which they had already enacted. I believe the same sentiment might well be expressed in Canada. The other day I was travelling on a train from the West, and I sat in the smoking room with a number of travellers, all strangers. An hour or two was spent by most of them—there were seven or eight—telling of the different methods by which they got around the liquor laws. It was a standing joke, and laws that are made a joke by the people are not in the best interests of any country. I repeat that such a law as that which is now proposed cannot be any more useful than other laws of past parliaments have been which had the same purpose in view, and that in adopting measures of this kind we are cluttering up our statute books with unnecessary and useless legislation.

An unfortunate feature of much legislation that is brought in is that the human element, the personal equation, is forgotten by the legislators; they have the impression that any law may be put on the statute books irrespective of how the people feel toward it. Moderation and sanity are just as necessary in lawmaking as they are in personal and public life. It is true that demagogic appeals, irrational and irresponsible in their character, are continually being made to the masses of the people, and that laws are very often enacted as the result of those appeals. But if we accede to all requests for laws of all kinds we will establish in Canada the same type of bureaucracy which has been established in Russia and which is not doing that country any good.

I submit that this law will lead to inquisitorial investigation into private businesses, which in a great many cases would be unnecessary. It is time to leave business and industry alone, because, as has been stated by the hon. member who last spoke, we are in a time of depressed business conditions, a time which is not opportune for the bringing in of legislation which will interfere with industry generally and which can have no other effect than that of interference.

In regard to the question itself. In the first place, is this law needed? Anyone who reads section 498 of the Criminal Code will see that practically every branch of business covered by this proposed legislation is covered by that provision. It is true that some amendments might have to be made to that clause to make it more operative than it has been in the past, but at the same time I believe it has been just as operative in the past as this legislation will be in the future if it is put upon the statute books. At any rate it should not be necessary at the present time, and in the present financial condition of this country, to establish practically a new department of government with a whole staff of civil servants to look after the carrying out of such legislation as this. I believe we have in Canada to-day all the civil servants we need for the carrying on of the business of the people. I well remember the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) in a speech made in this House last year giving figures showing how year after year as the business of the country went on the cost of civil government had increased over the year previous. This legislation if it is carried out, will create a whole staff of commissioners and registrars from one end of this country to the other, and will simply be another addition to the expense of civil government without, to my mind, accomplishing the intention of the act.

In addition to that, large corporations are needed in the business world of to-day. They are needed because of the competition which is present among the different countries of the world. After all, the wheat board proposed by my friends to my left is nothing but a large combination of the same sort. It is a proposed organization for the purpose of the handling by one body of the wheat produced in the West so that we shall be able to compete in the markets of the world in that commodity. It is really a proposition along exactly the same lines as any of these organizations which are proposed to be investigated by this legislation. The same is true of the fruit co-operative societies of British Columbia, and of some of the co-operative selling organizations of other sections of the country. Therefore, if that type of organization is necessary for the handling of the grains, for the handling of the fruit and other farm produce of this country—and I do not dispute that perhaps it is—that type of organization is all the more necessary in connection with large manufacturing plants and large industries of various kinds. Not only that, but organizations of that kind exist in all nations, and therefore have to be combatted by organizations of the same kind in countries which are in competition with them. All large organizations, even the largest trusts, do not take advantage of the opportunities they might take advantage of. I remember reading a short time ago The Life and Letters of Walter Hines Page, and if I remember correctly he made this statement; that during the war the time came when the necessities for oil were so great that he took it upon himself to deal with the Standard Oil Company, the greatest oil corporation in the world, on behalf of the British government and also the American government to a certain extent, and he points out that he got the finest type of co-operation from that company. Not only that, but although that trust had the opportunity of taking a large amount of money out of the coffers of the different Allies through control of the oil and gasoline that was needed by them, they did just the reverse, they cut down the price saving millions of dollars to the Allies in that regard.

We have in free trade England, and I mention this because the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Evans), who is not in the House at the moment so far as I can see, this afternoon blamed the whole injury to the life of this country to trusts, which he said were caused by the protective tariff—in free trade England we find trusts, mergers and combines of all kinds. I have here under my hand a report of a committee on trusts which was appointed by the British parliament in February, 1918, and reported in April, 1919. It was appointed for the purpose of looking into the advisability of bringing in just such legislation as this and in its report there is a list a page and a half long of different trusts and organizations in one line of business alone with which the Ministry of Munitions had to deal in Great Britain during the war. I will deal with that a little more fully in a moment.

Large organizations, large combines of that kind are necessary, not only because of competition with other countries, as I mentioned a moment ago, but because, and it is mentioned in this report, they are able to prevent absolute bankruptcy of the smaller corporations when competition, not only internal but external, is becoming so severe that unless the smaller organizations unite and work together they will be forced into bankruptcy. Instances are given in this report of just such a condition of affairs.

Then there is the argument of the lower cost of production, cost of buying, and overhead costs. There is another important point, and in this line we have not progressed very far in Canada, and that is scientific industrial research. We have made but very little progress in this country so far as that very important branch of industry is concerned, because it is in a sense a branch of industry at the present time. It is pointed out in an appendix to this same report that it is a factor of the utmost importance that these large organizations can carry on a type of industrial research which cannot be carried on by the smaller organizations.

Then there is the question of export trade, which I mentioned a few moments ago, greater general efficiency, and finally the point made by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) as to the standardization of parts. He mentioned the Ford Motor Company. Would anybody in this House contend for a moment, that if it were not for the size and strength and specialization which takes place in that organization it would be possible for it to turn out an automobile of the same quality and price as the Ford motor car at the present time? Certainly it would not be possible. So standardization of quality, standardization of parts, and specialization all add to that general efficiency and all cause a lowering in cost providing always, of course, that the organization is not permitted to take too much advantage of possibilities which may offer because of the power of the organization. But I submit, Sir, that we have now on the statute books legislation to prevent them taking advantage of that power. I am going to quote just three or four passages from this report which I believe should be of interest to the House. The first paragraph which I quote from this report of the committee on trusts is from a statement made to them, and which the committee quote apparently approvingly, by some of the organizations with which they deal. This is the only quotation of that kind. The rest are quotations of the committee's own statements:

Where price associations exist, all members having to quote the same price, the competition among the manufacturers, parties to the association, becomes one of quality, and one direct and important result of these price associations is undoubtedly a tendency to rise to a general higher level in production in this respect.

Then comes a page and a half of different trusts with which the Ministry of Munitions had to deal, and regarding them the Ministry of Munitions make a statement synopsized as follows:

We were furnished with detailed reports through the various departments of the ministry with regard to their experiences in dealing with these and other associations. To a very general extent these experiences appear to have been of a character satisfactory to the government. Considerable advantages were recognized in dealing with combinations and associations for war purposes. It was found that the influence of larger-minded and more moderate men had a beneficial effect upon the attitude of the trade as a whole, that the best technical advice was more easily available, and that on the whole the trade associations, and especially trade committees created for war purposes, were of the greatest assistance to the ministry.

A little further on there is another statement made by this committee,—and by the way on this committee was one of the men in England who looks upon the capitalistic system, as it is called, as a failure; I refer to Sidney Webb. I shall quote from him in a moment because he made a separate report although he signed the committee's report. This is from the full report.

It was alleged of one association that it had endeavoured to fix very exorbitant prices, and that arrangements for the control of prices had been discovered which had in fact led to a rise of prices to an excessive extent. These were, however, individual cases, and generally the officials of the ministry appeared to be of opinion that the associations had made for more economical production and for an improved quality and variety of output, and for a very beneficial interchange of technical knowledge, and that, although most associations regulated prices, the consumer in general had not suffered through such regulations.

No more favourable report upon trusts and mergers could be made, to my mind, than is contained in that statement. A little lower down there are two more statements which I wish to quote. This is one of them:

There was a general agreement among representatives of associations before us that one of the beneficial results of the formation of associations sufficiently powerful to control and maintain prices in the home market was that it enabled British manufacturers to extend their output by selling their products at a lower price, or even at a loss, in foreign markets.

I quote that because of its interest to my hon. friend for Saskatoon (Mr. Evans) I am sure, and probably to others in the House, who blame the protective system for the fact that occasionally home producers sell more cheaply in the foreign market than in the home market. And yet they state here that this extensive production under free trade enables them to sell their goods more cheaply in the foreign market than in the home market. Then they say a little lower down:

By securing remunerative prices in the home market they could make a successful bid against foreign competition in the export trade. They had a fund, a fighting fund, for the special purpose of subsidizing members who found it necessary to sell at less than an economic price in order to cut out foreign competitors. That might be called meeting dumping by dumping, but he would not agree that British firms dumped in the aggregate much more than foreign firms. They had dumped in Belgium as reprisal against Belgium dumping here.

These quotations show that the Ministry of Munitions in England, and the English government generally found large organizations, large combinations of industry, of advantage to them during the war.

Now, Sir, I have practically finished and I wish to point out in closing that in handling this matter in England this committee recommended that the whole question be handled by the Board of Trade, which is a department of the government in England just as the Department of Trade and Commerce is a department of the government in this country. They suggested bringing forward some form of legislation akin to what was in force in this country, or in New Zealand, or most of the other countries which form the British dominions, and they quoted the act of 1910 which was in force in Canada; but they leave the matter to the Board of Trade with the suggestion that a tribunal might have to be formed to handle it if the Board of Trade upon investigation found it necessary to do something to that effect; I am synopsizing the matter very briefly.

Now I wish to make one more quotation The supplementary report was made by Sidney Webb, whom I mentioned a moment ago, and three others. Mr. Sidney Webb is a gentleman who spoke of "decay of the capitalistic system" in a recent book which he wrote. While he agreed with the foregoing report and signed it—his name is attached to it—he considered that an addendum was necessary and I am going to quote one passage from it, signed by him and three others.

We do not suggest that any action should be taken to prevent or obstruct combination or association in capitalist enterprise. Apart from the experience that no such interference can be made effective,—

I should like to repeat this:

Apart from the experience that no such interference can be made effective, we have to recognize that association and combination in production and distribution are steps in the greater efficiency, the increased economy, and the better organization of industry. We regard this evolution as both inevitable and desirable. It is, however, plain that the change from competitive rivalry to combination calls for corresponding developments to secure for the community, both safeguards against the evils of monopoly, and at least a large share of the economic benefits of the better organization of industry which it promotes.

That is praise of the whole system of large organizations. Therefore, I think it is well worth while reading because of the fact that Sidney Webb, and the other three members who agreed to the first report make the statement.

That, Mr. Speaker, is all I have to say on the question except to repeat that I consider this legislation at the present time is unnecessary and that if it is carried out, if it is put into force. I do not think it will be of any more use than the legislation which is now in force in the criminal code. I believe that industry and business in Canada is in such a shape at the present time that there should rather be a desire to leave it alone than to interfere with it unnecessarily.

Mr. JOHN MILLAR (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, if there has been any doubt in the mind of any hon. member as to the effectiveness of the proposed legislation it is successfully answered by the quantity of literature which has been sent to the members of this House by those who have been profiting in the past and have now something to fear. I have been struck with the amount of eloquence poured out in order to whitewash these combines. I have no hesitation in saying that great combinations are necessary and that they can manufacture more efficiently and more cheaply. But that is not the trouble complained of. The point is that these combinations, or some of them, have been abusing their powers. I believe that this is an epoch-making day in the history of the present session. Now for the first time we have an opportunity, and the House is being put to the test, of passing legislation which will really have a kick in it. For many years past combinations of such a character have been growing up that at the present time we can buy no article the price of which has not been fixed arbitrarily. That is the reason we are suffering at the present time.

One hon. member opposite spoke in favour of standing pat and allowing things to remain as they are. I can assure you that I am not going to make an address of a "blue ruin" or "dry rot" character; but I have a great deal of sympathy with those who have tried to put the actual conditions of agriculture before the House. There is nothing gained by minimizing or exaggerating, when describing the conditions that prevail. To me the greatest optimist is the one who grasps and grapples with the actual problems before him and tries to solve them. There are such problems to be solved and that is why something effective in the way of legislation ought to be enacted at this time. Combinations have been making progress in methods of getting around legislation, of devising ways and means of extracting a greater share of profit than they are entitled to, and legislation by this parliament has not kept pace with such devices. Notwithstanding all that has been said to the contrary I believe the proposed legislation to be a sincere effort to apply effective measures to prevent these combinations continuing to operate in the future as they have done in the past. Some years ago I read, in connection with American history, where an effort was made in congress to bring about more sanitary conditions in factories, to prevent child labour, and other reforms. The same arguments that we have heard to-day were then offered. When the vote took place it stood 30 for the reforms to 190 against. Four years later that vote was reversed, and the 30 had become 190. The reforms which were sought at that time were then placed on the statute book. After they were placed there everybody realized their value, and to-day nobody in the States would think of doing away with those reforms. The reform contemplated here will meet with similar opposition.

In regard to the matter of competition, we looked to competition to regulate prices in the past. When competition prevails, such legislation as this, as the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) has said is not necessary. But when competition has been strangled, as has been the case for many years in the past, something to regulate price is necessary, and I assure hon. members that if something is not done to regulate price, even those who fear this legislation, even the manufacturers, and even those who have been forming these combinations and reaping the profits, will find that the hard times will be reflected on themselves, and that they will become the sufferers. In fact they have already begun to feel the pinch and if they turn a deaf ear, and talk about standing pat when those conditions of unrest surround us, when there is need of some effective action, they will find that conditions will get worse. However, I hope I am wrong. Some people prophesy that we are now on the eve of better times. I am afraid not.

In regard to resale prices, the member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) seems to uphold these organizations that have been selling at resale prices. I think the special committee on Agriculture had a little to say about that. Some witnesses gave evidence before the committee and one witness stated that he was selling an article at $1.75 and making a very good profit, but his competitor in the same town objected because he was selling it 25 cents less than his own sale price, and the result was that the manufacturer absolutely refused to provide him with any more of those goods. That is the way the resale price works out. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre stated that they have been able to stabilize prices. They certainly have. Look at the Imperial Oil Company; they have stabilized the price of gasoline at about 55 cents a gallon in Canada when the same commodity is selling on the other side of the international boundary line at 25 cents. True there is a very slight difference in the size of their gallon.

Mr. STEVENS: There is no duty on gasoline. Why would a man pay 55 cents a gallon in Canada, if he could buy it on the other side for 25 cents?

Mr. MILLAR: He would not make much if he had to drive 125 miles to save the 25 cents.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does not the hon. member think the combination of the Imperial Oil Company is stronger than that of the Standard?

Mr. MILLAR: Perhaps when the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) is speaking, as I hope he will a little later on, he may be able to explain why gasoline is selling for 25 cents on the American side and 55 cents on the Canadian side.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I never encountered that myself.

Mr. MILLAR: Well I have. I have known it to be selling for 25 cents in the United States and 52 cents and 55 cents in Canada at one and the same time.

There is one section in the bill which puzzles me. It would appear to me to be difficult to find out whether a combination is guilty or not until investigation is held, and from the wording of the bill, as far as I can understand it, those combinations that are not operating against the interests of the people of Canada do not come within the jurisdiction of the registrar or inspector. I may be wrong in that, but it would seem to me there might be some difficulty there. The hon member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) has stated that we have at present too much legislation. I can understand that statement coming from those who fear legislation. Even if we have too much legislation on the statute books, that is no reason why a bill that is really going to be effective should not be passed. I fancy that is an objection that is put forward among others in the circulars and newspaper clippings that have been circulated. I received some of them myself. It is a part of the howl of those who fear they are going to be injured by the legislation.

Referring to the statement that we have too much legislation, and that we should proceed along the even tenor of our way, let me point out that some time ago the United States went a good deal further in curbing combines and mergers than it is proposed to do by this bill, and certainly very much further than Canada has ever gone. During the time Roosevelt was President of the United States the legislation that was placed on the statute books and enforced very vigorously was most effective and far-reaching. He took some of those large combines by the throat. He did not treat them as though those organizations were working for the welfare of the people and that they were all good. I remember reading a conversation between President Roosevelt and a representative of one of these combines who argued with him and said "Well now, you should not be hard on us; did we not provide $60,000 for your campaign fund?" "Yes," replied Roosevelt "but I understand you also provided $70,000 for the campaign fund of my opponent". "Well" said the former "that may be the case". During Roosevelt's regime he enforced a law such as is proposed at this time with such vigour that these organizations were curbed, and the good effect of that legislation has been felt, I believe, up to the present time.

Mr. MEIGHEN: For the sake of the hon. member's seatmate (Mr. Evans), perhaps he will admit that Roosevelt was a very strong protectionist.

Mr. MILLAR: The mind of the right hon. leader of the Oposition usually runs true to form, but in this particular case I think he is running off at a tangent. I do not think that has any effect whatever. Perhaps when the right hon. gentleman speaks he might explain, if the combines operating at the present time are not to the detriment of the country, why it is that gasoline is selling at 30 cents a gallon in Ottawa and selling at about 50 cents out in the West. Having been away from home some little time, I am not just prepared to say to a cent what the price of gasoline in the West is, but I think about 50 cents. Why is that so? There is a great deal the right hon. leader of the Opposition will have to explain.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why does the hon. member ask me to explain it? I am not in office.

Mr. GRAHAM: Everybody knows that.

Mr. MILLAR: I think the right hon. leader of the Opposition among others was asking questions and seemed to disagree with me; that is the reason I asked him to make the explanation.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not on that point.

Mr. MILLAR: Reference has been made to the wheat board as being something that might be classed as a combination that would come under this act. Well, I cannot conceive, from the spirit of the act as explained in the address of the Prime Minister, and from the wording of the act, that any harm would come to the wheat board. An investigation would show that it was not intended to operate to the detriment of anybody. It was intended merely to prevent combinations from extracting from the producer a great deal of what he has a right to. But I assure the House that whether the wheat board becomes operative or not, the investigation into the lake shippers' combine and the investigation into the ocean shippers' combine will give plenty of opportunity for the operation of this bill if it is placed upon the statute books. Reports have not been issued; but the evidence has been brought out before the commission, and without the slightest doubt there is a combine that could be dealt with by this bill if it becomes law.

Let me say just a word or two in regard to unrest. It would be well at this time if hon. members would make an effort to find out the real cause of the unrest. We have been approaching this matter too much in an argumentative spirit, one trying to show that a certain industry was not getting a square deal, was getting the raw end of the deal, and others showing very little sympathy for it, saying: "Do not whine about it; we do not whine; why do you whine?" That is rather a dangerous course for those who are well-fed, who have been profiting from the producer and who have no reason to complain, because they have been getting the best of the deal. It is dangerous for them to take that cold-blooded, and I think I might even say, insolent attitude of "quit your whining and go to work." Much that has been said in this House might well have been left unsaid, because, as has been pointed out, this might injure the country in the matter of immigration; but unfortunately, it has been necessary to say what has been said, because it seemed to be impossible to enlist the sympathy of this House and have hon. members realize the gravity of the situation, so that they might come to the point where they would get together and endeavour to find a solution. That is the reason why some of our members have assumed that pessimistic attitude.

An hon. MEMBER: It is not all true.

Mr. MILLAR: An hon. member says: "it is not all true." I assure the House that what has been said is only too true, I am sorry to say, and I regret that we have been forced into this position where we have had to speak very plainly about those adverse conditions.

In the measure that is now before the House, an opportunity is afforded of giving effective redress; it is a measure that, if put into operation, will cause confidence to spread over the country. I am quite convinced that if those who have been suffering realize that the government mean business, that they are going to enforce this measure, and that combines that have been charging too much, that have been taking a greater share of the profits or, to put this in another way, a greater return for the services they are rendering than they should, are going to be dealt with effectively, the consuming public will be filled with confidence. This will give them, as it were, new life. Let me point to one measure that has already, I might say, given new life to the stock industry, just to show the House how effective this measure can be made. The removal of the embargo on cattle going to the Old Country, as the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) said a few days ago—and I agree with him—has given new life to the stock industry of the West. I assure hon. members that if this measure passes, if it is properly enforced, it will find a great deal to do; in fact, there seems to be work for it everywhere. But the moral effect will be very great. Hon. members may not believe this; some hon. members are inclined to laugh and say: "Oh, the agriculturists are always whining," but if hon. members keep on saying that, I assure them that they are taking a dangerous course. We may not always whine. We have in this country a strong foreign element, and sometimes it is necessary to keep them in curb. If the House and the country continue to take that attitude, an attitude of, as I said before, cold-blooded insolence, we may come to a time when there will be more unrest and more real trouble than we have had in the past. I would just give hon. members fair warning. Hon. members may laugh at this if they like; but that will be the effect. I am very glad to see that the government has brought forward a measure that gives promise of redressing many of these evils. I know it will not be easy of enforcement; as a matter of fact, I foresee this difficulty. When the commissioner or registrar undertakes to decide whether a combination is selling for a greater price than it should, the matter of price is relative. If he takes the income of many of our people, amongst them the agriculturists, he may well decide that the combine is getting too much; but if he will take comparison with others who are drawing good salaries, he may well decide that the combine is getting enough. I do not know how that will be decided; but, because there are difficulties in the way, I do not think is any reason why the effort should not be made. People and parliaments stand at their best, they are in their greatest glory when they are accomplishing that which seems almost impossible. This seems a difficult task; but I do not think it is impossible, and I certainly will give it my hearty support.

Mr. PIERRE F. CASGRAIN (Charlevoix-Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend (Mr. Millar) in connection with this bill, used the impression, "if it was an effective measure." We seem to have had before a few effective measures like the one that has been presented to the House. In 1919, under the Union government, there were introduced the bill for the establishment of the famous Board of Commerce and the Combines and Fair Prices bill to prevent abuses and to reduce the cost of living. We know what the result of that legislation was. The act was in existence for just a few months when one after another of the gentlemen who were on the board resigned, contending that, under the bill as it was drafted and even with the powers that were given to them, they were not able to enforce the legislation. Under the old Laurier regime, there was introduced the act of 1907, and the bill which is at present before the House seems to be very much like a repetition of that act which fell into disuse and apparently was enforced against only one big organization of the United States which was doing business in this country, with the result at that time that there was a slight modification introduced into their way of doing business. Apparently, however, there were in this country other combines or other similar institutions; but the act was not directed at them, and the people did not resort to the means put into their hands to have an investigation into those organizations. The motive underlying the bill is undoubtedly a good one. The Prime Minister and the government want to do what is fair and right by the people, and undoubtedly this measure is introduced in redemption of the pledge contained in the Speech from the Throne, to wit:

> A bill will be submitted to you to safeguard the interests of consumers and producers from undue enhancement of prices or unfair restriction of trade by combines, monopolies, trusts or mergers.

I would draw the particular attention of the House to the phrase, "undue enhancement of prices." But although this bill is drafted with the intention of safeguarding the interests of consumers and producers from undue enhancement of prices or unfair restriction of trade, I am afraid that it will fail of its purpose unless it is amended in several particulars. Far be it from me to criticize the bill in a spirit out of sympathy with the policy of the government. I endorse the action taken by the government and congratulate the Prime Minister on the introduction of this bill, which is but another evidence of his desire to better the condition of the working classes and those engaged in a small way of business and to protect them against the big interests. However, it is apparent from the constructive criticism which we have heard from the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler) that the bill if allowed to remain in its present form will not accomplish what is intended.

I find several objections to the bill as drafted. In the first place, I am afraid that the provision against the fixing of a common or a resale price by merchants, traders, or manufacturers would unduly hamper our domestic trade without curing the abuses which the bill is directed against. To carry out this provision would mean intermeddling and interference with the conduct of business and would bring about exactly the opposite result to that which the government has in view. I believe our industries should be given every encouragement and should not be dealt with unjustly —in fact they should be treated just as fairly as the public whom we wish to protect.

Another defect in the bill is that any person of the age of 21 is empowered to lay a complaint, but nothing is said as to whether he must be a British subject. No doubt this is an oversight on the part of the draftsmen, and will be corrected when the bill is in committee.

The definition of the word "combine" in the second section in my opinion is objectionable. The definition is neither precise nor scientific in its terms and it is impossible to ascertain from it what really is a combine within the meaning of the section. This definition should be recast in order that we may have no trouble when the bill becomes law.

It will be remembered that in the case of the Board of Commerce the law was tested in the Supreme Court and found to be unconstitutional. I am afraid we may have similar trouble here unless we go through this bill very carefully and all our time and trouble will have been wasted.

Another defect to my mind is that the bill does not appear to contain any provision that the person laying a complaint shall give a guarantee of his good faith. All he has to do is to simply write a letter to the registrar and the machinery of the law is set in motion. In all proceedings in our criminal courts when a complaint is laid regarding a matter of minor importance the complainant must appear before the magistrate and give his reasons for believing that he is entitled to the redress that he is seeking, and, moreover, he must deposit five dollars. Under this bill any person who may have a grudge against his employer can either personally or by letter set the law in motion. I think there should be an amendment requiring the complainant to make a sworn statement before the registrar, rendering the procedure similar to that required in ordinary criminal matters. Furthermore, I think where the word "opinion" occurs in this bill it is objectionable. As I said before, there ought to be some reasons given by the complainant as in ordinary criminal proceedings. When a person lays a complaint in our criminal courts we always take the trouble of asking him if he has good reason to believe that his complaint is justified. In this particular instance I think the bill should be amended accordingly in order to protect the public at large, and I do not think it would be going too far to require a security from the person who invokes the law, such security to depend on the nature and gravity of the complaint that is laid. As was suggested by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, I think it would be well to follow the wording in the old law, which provided, if I recollect correctly, that only upon at least five persons alleging a series of breaches of the law could the machinery be set in motion. One single case of too high a price should not be ground to justify an investigation. Where there is a series of repeated infractions of the law they become injurious to the whole community, and thereupon the law should be put into force.

Sections 5, 6 and 9 do not appear to me to be very plain; indeed, reading them in conjunction with section 10 I see no reason why a third investigation may not be ordered. I think it should be made very clear that a preliminary investigation before a registrar or commissioner must be made of every complaint, unless this discloses reasonable and proper grounds for believing that the complaint is well founded, no further steps should be taken; if reasonable and proper grounds are disclosed, then a commissioner should be appointed to thoroughly investigate the complaint. But as the bill now stands there appears to be nothing to prevent the registrar or commissioner from holding two or three investigations on the very same matter.

The question of secrecy has been touched upon by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George. I do not think the bill is sufficiently clear on this point. It is all very well to investigate the affairs of any industrial or business concern. But I do not believe that the law sufficiently protects these people; I am not sure that persons or firms appearing before the commissioner would not suffer considerably through the exposure to the public of their business affairs, their business methods, and so on.

I notice also that although this law follows in certain respects our criminal procedure it does not give to the accused or to the person who appears before the registrar or commissioner the rights given to one who appears before our courts. I do not see anything in the bill which gives to the person brought before the commissioner or registrar the right to be represented by counsel. It would, in my opinion, be a denial of justice to have the law passed in that form; I submit that there should be provision under which any person who is charged with having violated the law should have the right from the outset to bring in his own lawyer and have his interests properly protected. There is also a clause in the bill which states that evidence may be brought in in the form of affidavits. That is altogether against the practice in the province of Quebec—I do not know how it is in the other provinces—because one who is a party to an action in our province has always the right to hear the witnesses on either side, to cross-examine them and test their veracity. As the bill is drafted, anyone charged with violating the provisions of this law would not have that right if an affidavit only was produced.

I do not see in the law any provision for appeal. I regard it as very necessary that the accused or the person brought before the commissioner should have the right of appeal if the decision is adverse to him. In section 498 of the Criminal Code, which at present protects the public in regard to these matters, there is provision for appeal, and I think that in this law we ought to have a similar provision to what is contained in Article 1012 of the Criminal Code of Quebec, which enables appeal to be taken from conviction.

To sum up, Mr. Speaker, I may say that I have not so much objection to the bill as it is drawn as I have to what is not contained in the bill. The principle of the proposed law is a good one, but it would seem as if it had been conceived and put before us with, perhaps, too great haste, and if we discuss it a little longer we shall probably be able to bring out its defects and devise the necessary amendments for its improvement. The first thing that ought to be done is, in my opinion, to remodel the definition and to provide that only persons who are British subjects shall have the right to avail themselves of the provisions of the proposed law. It should be provided also that the complainant shall state under oath that he has just reason for believing that the law has been violated. There should also be a provision to ensure that the evidence adduced shall not be made public and thus injure or prejudice the interests of the person who is charged with violation. And, as I said a moment ago, the right of appeal should be provided, thus conforming to the provision contained in Article 1012 of the Criminal Code of the province of Quebec.

Lastly, I find no mention made in the bill as to who the commissioner is going to be—whether it is to be an official of some department, or otherwise. The law does not state whether or not the commissioner shall be a lawyer. I do not want to speak on behalf of my own profession, but it is the experience that when a person other than a lawyer is appointed to such a position the law has not always been carried out as it should be. I believe that the registrar or the commissioner ought to be a competent lawyer of at least ten years' standing and experience at the provincial bar, in order that justice may be done to all and that the interests of none may be prejudiced.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Centre Winnipeg): Mr. Speaker, in introducing this bill the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said that it would be specially interesting to those who were engaged in the process of production, and to the consumers. Yet I fancy that a great many of the labour people, who constitute the great bulk of producers of the country and who are decidedly consumers, will not consider that in this bill we have anything that really is vital or that will adequately meet present needs. I was delighted a little while ago to hear the hon. member for Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion) quoting Sidney Webb in favour of combinations. Undoubtedly we must recognize that the greater number of the labour people and the socialists, both in this country and Great Britain, are in favour of combinations. They do not fail to realize the evils existing in connection with combinations as they are at present, but they do recognize the inevitability of combines. In tracing the development of our present industrial system, we believe that this is one step forward and that we are now in a position where we shall have to take, in the near future, another step forward. The hon. member for Fort William and Rainy River did not elaborate the position taken by Mr. Webb and the other Fabian socialists. He did not quote from Mr. Webb's latest book, "The Decay of Capitalist Civilization," in which Mr. Webb points out that we have been travelling for a considerable time along the line of the concentration of capital in the hands of a comparatively small group; that this system is failing to fulfil the primary function of meeting the needs of the people, and hence is on its trial. Mr. Webb is far from taking the attitude of the hon. member for Fort William and Rainy River that we should let well enough alone; with other Fabian socialists, and I think with the workers generally, he says it is inevitable that we should take another step and that in the immediate future.

We recognize that the combinations we have in industry and commerce to-day, as well as in finance—the latter a later development—are largely the outgrowth of the industrial revolution that took place in Great Britain one hundred and fifty years ago. When the factory system came into existence and the individual workman gave up his little home workshop and went into the factory, we entered upon a new period in the development of industry, the period of combinations—and we cannot avoid the consequences. In those early days of the new age when the machine threatened to take the very bread out of the mouths of their children the workers in desperation threatened to break the machine. They thought that this was the only way of attaining their end. They learned in later days that what they should have done was to have gained possession of the machine. Now there are those who fearful of the combinations, of the elaborate organization which has been set up on the basis of the physical machine, would try to break up the combinations, break up the elaborate organization. We take the ground that such a policy would be as fatal as the machine-smashing policy of one hundred and fifty years ago. It is impossible for us effectively to break up these combines. The only possible thing for us to do if we want really effective action is to take hold of them and carry them one step further until we have such a complete combine that the public through its various organizations co-operative, municipal, provincial and federal, will be able to use it for its own purposes.

The Prime Minister said that in this age of competition combinations are necessary. I submit that if this can be called the age of competition it must be pointed out that it is competition of different groups and that constantly these competing groups tend to combine into larger units, so that after all the earlier age of individual competition has passed by. This is essentially the age of combination, and in so far as we still have competition it is indicative of incomplete development. It may be true that to-day we need combinations of the different warring groups; it is only because we are in the process of development, and we must inevitably face the formation of larger and yet larger combinations.

The Prime Minister says that he does not seek to prevent just combinations, but what does he mean by just combinations? Who is to decide what is just? I am not using the term just; that is the Prime Minister's term; I am not using the term unjust. The fact is that we have to deal with an existing institution, a combination, and we do not get very far by saying that it is just or that it is unjust. It is in its very nature a form of industrial organization which gives power to a limited group, and as the process goes on, the power becomes so great that the public welfare is threatened.

The hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) said that he was desirous of eliminating useless competition. Again the whole question is raised as to what is useless competition or when competition may be useful. Are we not here again face to face with the fact that competition represents a transitory stage, and that we look forward more and more to combination, co-operation taking the place of competition. I take it that our stand on this question must be that competition is inevitable, and the Prime Minister and the government, however sincere in introducing a bill of this character, are attempting to do what is in reality impossible. I do not think there is any state in any part of the world that has attempted to curb the natural development of combinations that has found it was able to do so effectively. Probably the hon. member for Vancouver Centre showed sufficiently how difficult it is to administer legislation of this character. Inevitably as you try to curb combination you come into contact with others who are perhaps less advanced in their combination, and so conflict is sure to result. Our position is that combination is not only inevitable, but that the thoroughgoing regulation of it is futile. I should like to quote what is probably as good a statement of a popular criticism of the principle of the bill as could be found. The writer of this editorial, which was circulated throughout the West, is trying to show that arbitrary power would be given into the hands of the government through the registrar. He says:

> If the registrar is to have power to decide what is an unfair price it follows that he must have the authority to say what is fair price. This is the logical working out of the proposed act. Are the men and women who produce or sell potatoes, milk, bread, magazines and the thousand commodities that are in daily use prepared to have a government official set their prices for them?
> Is there a man to whom the public would be willing to hand over this power? Is it fair to any man to ask him to make decisions of this nature? What kind of a job would the registrar have? Are there such supermen in the country? If there are, might they not be employed in other and more consequential departments of the government service?

That sounds reasonable, but when we come to consider the situation as it is about us at the present time we shall have to confess that very small groups and, in some cases, single individuals do as a matter of fact decide what these prices shall be. I have known a good many towns where the price of milk is decided by one company. I have known a great many towns throughout the West where the price of meat is decided by one corporation. I think that nearly all of us can point to article after article where the price is decided by one individual, and the trouble is that to-day that individual is responsible to no one but himself or his company. He is not in any sense responsible to the public at large. If we are to have combinations, let us have combinations that we can control. Let us have combinations and let us appoint officials to administer them who will decide their policies with a view to the public interest.

The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler) was very much afraid of having six people placed in a position where they could bring any charge or set in motion the machinery for having an investigation. Now it does seem to me that we need not worry about that. I take it that in other matters one individual can bring against another man a charge of the most serious nature. He can say that a man is suspected of being guilty of murder. If he has information that leads him to believe that, it becomes his duty to give that information to the state. I do not know that most of us are in danger of being accused of murder because that course is open to any citizen. The fact is that if there are no abuses these charges are not likely to be laid. I do not object to the suggestion that was thrown out recently that we have these matters brought seriously before the public by way of an affidavit or something of that kind. But in any case the humblest individual in the state ought to be able to invoke the protection of the state against any of these big interests. I think I am voicing the opinion of a great many people when I say that to-day we are more afraid of the big combinations with all the prestige which they possess and all the money that is behind them than we are of the irresponsibility of a few individuals who perhaps for some private grudge might bring forward some charge that was baseless. After all, if the charge is baseless, provision is made in the bill whereby it can be investigated in a preliminary way by the registrar, before it goes on to a more thorough investigation. If the charge is baseless why should any firm or corporation fear the fullest and freest investigation? The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler) would like also I believe, to take away the safeguards to labour which are contained in section 34. This section reads as follows:

> Nothing in this act shall be construed to apply to combinations of workmen or employees for their own reasonable protection as such workmen or employees.

That section is much along the line of existing legislation and simply seeks to protect the workmen from action which unfortunately has been taken sometimes in the past to prevent them from organizing. In the old days professional workers had a right to combine. No one ever questioned that right, and we have combinations of lawyers, doctors, newspaper men, authors, and so on. But when the workers some one hundred years ago, began to combine it was a different story. It was said they had no right to combine, no right whatever, and so later on certain special legislation had to be introduced to safeguard their interests. I should like to ask why the workers should not be allowed the fullest right to organize? That right is in fact guaranteed under the Peace treaty of Versailles. Why should they not have that right as much as business and professional men? We have the Canadian Manufacturers' Association—a great combination which is exercising a tremendous influence and very largely, I maintain, influencing the fiscal policy of this country. We have railway associations which, according to the reports of the recent commission, appear to have exercised their combination in such a way that there has been a very real restraint of trade. We have shipping combinations at the present time. We have a banking association which is distinctly a close corporation. We had even mentioned here on the floor of the House a newspaper combination. I cannot see why there should be any objection whatever to allow the fullest right to labour employees, of any class whatever, to combine and, in my opinion, if it is necessary to do so their interests ought to be effectively safeguarded.

There are one or two points in the bill which I should like to criticize, points which some have criticized from the opposite angle. The Prime Minister says that information, in connection with proceedings under the bill, will not be made public. I should like to ask why not? Why should there be any secrecy connected with these investigations? It seems to me that in such a provision we are, perhaps, going back to the ideals of an earlier state of industry when industry was essentially private and almost personal in its character. None of us want men to come into our homes and pry into our private affairs; but a great modern business is by no means a private enterprise. When there are a large number of people associated with it, it thereby becomes public, and the public have definite rights in regard to what is going on in connection with it. The Prime Minister said that publicity would do more than penalties to remove evils. I believe that is true. Why then should we not have the very fullest publicity in connection with this matter? In connection with this feature I was reminded of a treatment of this question which was given nearly ten years ago by ex-President Woodrow Wilson. May I be permitted to quote several paragraphs from his work "The New Freedom" which seem very pertinent to the point under discussion.

> We used to say that the ideal of government was for every man to be left alone and not interfered with, except when he interfered with somebody else; and that the best government was the government that did as little governing as possible. That was the idea that obtained in Jefferson's time. But we are coming now to realize that life is so complicated that we are not dealing with the old conditions, and that the law has to step in and create new conditions under which we may live, the conditions which will make it tolerable for us to live.
> Let me illustrate what I mean: It used to be true in our cities that every family occupied a separate house of its own, that every family had its own little premises, that every family was separated in its life from every other family. That is no longer the case in our great cities. Families live in tenements, they live in flats, they live on floors; they are piled layer upon layer in the great tenement houses of our crowded districts, and not only are they piled layer upon layer, but they are associated room by room, so that there is in every room, sometimes, in our congested districts, a separate family. In some foreign countries they have made much more progress than we in handling these things. In the city of Glasgow, for example (Glasgow is one of the model cities of the world), they have made up their minds that the entries and the hallways of great tenements are public streets. Therefore, the policeman goes up the stairway, and patrols the corridors; the lighting department of the city sees to it that the halls are abundantly lighted. The city does not deceive itself into supposing that that great building is a unit from which the police are to keep out and the civic authority to be excluded, but it says: "These are public highways, and light is needed in them, and control by the authority of the city."

I liken that to our great modern industrial enterprises. A corporation is very like a large tenement house; it isn't the premises of a single commercial family; it is just as much a public affair as a tenement house is a network of public highways.

When you offer the securities of a great corporation to anybody who wishes to purchase them, you must open that corporation to the inspection of everybody who wants to purchase. There must, to follow out the figure of the tenement house, be lights along the corridors, there must be police patrolling the openings, there must be inspection wherever it is known that men may be deceived with regard to the contents of the premises. If we believe that fraud lies in wait for us, we must have the means of determining whether our suspicions are well founded or not.

I do not think there is anywhere a better statement of the character of modern industry and the necessity of having these big corporations wide open to public inspection. I do not see why we should talk any longer about business secrets; developments have carried us beyond that stage. The member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) in criticizing the bill said that combination ought to be considered a crime only when there is a combination to deliberately injure competitors. It strikes me, although I am not a lawyer, that that is rather a novel position. It would seem that in many departments of law injury does not have to be deliberate in order that it should be made a crime. Why, we have even such a phrase as "criminal neglect" to condemn people who under certain circumstances do not do anything at all; but it is recognized that they should do something. Now, if we have a combination that has the effect of injuring the community surely that is a good reason why that particular combination should be made a criminal one. I do not know a better statement of the case than was given by the Prime Minister himself when he said that private rights cease when they involve public wrongs. So then in each case we come back to the question as to whether any particular form or association is in the interests of the public or is contrary to their interests. We find that through the course of years, with no particular guilt on the part of any one, we have arrived at these great industrial, commercial, financial institutions which we call combines, mergers and trusts. I take it that we are not here to-night blaming the individuals who, perhaps, have had a larger share of initiative and have organized these big combinations. We are not saying that the combines should not have been organized. They probably represent a distinct step in advance of the old unorganized stage of society, the old free competition that used to exist fifty or a hundred years ago, but on the other hand no one can consider their social effects without realizing that they have placed in the hands of a very small group of individuals an immense power, not only in this country, but in all countries. There is to-day a life and death struggle as to whether the industrial, commercial and financial organizations that have grown up in the last hundred years will be supreme and control even our political organizations, or whether the political organizations which grew up under an earlier system of production, are going to adapt themselves with sufficient rapidity, and are capable of asserting their control over the newer industrial organizations which now rival them in power. I take it that to-night we are helping to decide that struggle. If this House is true to the people that it represents, it will definitely set itself to attack our great problems. I welcome this bill because it gives a certain measure of publicity, because it calls public attention to the evils which exist and to the necessity for further action. I cannot become tremendously enthusiastic about it, because it is negative in its character, it simply seeks to stem the inevitable incoming tide of greater combinations. I could hope that in some way we could recognize the good that lies in combinations, in the formation of larger industrial and social units, and that as a House we could begin in a democratic way, to operate these larger units.

Mr. ALBERT FREDERICK HEALY (North Essex): The constituency I represent, containing as it does somewhere in the neighbourhood of a hundred thousand people, has within its borders special manufacturers who, through the course of building up their business have fixed prices and claim that, in order to carry on their business in the way they have built it up, they must continue to fix prices. This bill, as I read it, does not say that the manufacturers must not fix a retail price, but it does say, in the words of the Prime Minister, that when they do fix that retail price, it must not be to the detriment of the general public. Now what is the present law on the subject? In reference to the Board of Commerce Act of 1919 and the Combines and Fair Prices Act of 1922 the judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council held that both these acts were ultra vires. In reference to the bill before the House to-night, I hope the Prime Minister will ask the Deputy Minister of Justice to be sure that the proposed bill is not ultra vires of this parliament. It would be in my opinion a very grave injustice to the people of this country if after this bill was passed, and after many attempts to enforce it, the discovery should finally be made that this parliament had no right to pass such an act.

I agree absolutely with the general principles of this bill, but I do not agree altogether with the way that it may be enforced. In the district I represent we have large manufacturers who have built up their plants. I refer, for instance, to the Ford Company which has been mentioned by the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) and the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens). I wish to thank them for advertising the constituency from which I come. Both of these hon. members paid a visit to that constituency during the last campaign. I am glad to say we will welcome them at any time. I hope that they will come and definitely settle in my constituency, but of course, I will not guarantee that they can come back here, representing that constituency. I wish to thank them for advertising the great Ford Company of Canada. This company, after twenty years' experience in business building up, that wonderful organization, and building up on a fixed policy of a resale price from the dealer to the public, have produced a manufacturing concern that to-day, using the highest-priced labour in the world, is turning out the lowest priced motor car in the British dominions, and they are further attempting to increase their production to such an extent that these two factors shall be brought closer together, and surely, Mr. Speaker, that is something worth working for, when the money made can be turned to the benefit both of the consumer and of the man who produces the article and supplies the labour.

So I think that concerns such as this,—and I have taken it as an example—are rather worried over the proposed legislation, which contemplates the appointment of so many registrars. The bill does not say that these registrars shall be experienced in law. As this bill stands at present, a registrar may be any amateur who is appointed by the minister. If we were to have the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the present Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin) in power forever, I do not think this country would have much to fear from this provision. If the registrars are to do any work under this bill, if this bill is to be of any benefit to the country, they will have a large quantity of work to do, and we shall have to have registrars in all sections of Canada. There may be one in the Yukon, there may be one in Prince Edward Island; there may be one in British Columbia, and any six individuals in any one of these provinces, or, for that matter, in any city, can ask that, for instance, the company about which I am talking shall be investigated. I see in this bill nothing to prevent six individuals in each of a number of towns throughout the country, asking for an investigation of the same company at the same time. From the way in wihch this measure is drawn, I cannot see that a registrar would be justified in preventing such an investigation from going on in different parts of the country at the same time and of the same corporation. I can see that such registrars might arrive at different conclusions, and I can see that when the question came before the minister for final decision, he might be in a very serious frame of mind how he should decide. Therefore, if at all possible, these registrars and also the commissioners should be men trained in the law. I believe the people of this country and, in particular, of the province of Ontario are sick and tired of having regulatory laws put into force by amateurs. We in our constituency suffered terribly from amateurs attempting to put into force a certain law. The thing was a nightmare. This country is, perhaps, tired of anything that smacks of uplift legislation, anything that has a tendency to appear as muck-raking legislation.

The hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Hocken) mentioned this afternoon a certain combination in this country, and I hope when this bill is put into force, one of the first combinations to be investigated will be the newspaper combination. I say that not with the idea at all of criticising newspaper men. I noticed that a partcular combination was spoken of, and I know it is a combination of about twenty-nine men who absolutely control the telegraphic news of this country. This combination was known as the Canadian Press, but I believe the name was changed. Not all the members of this newspaper association agree with its practice, because in a case that I was interested in a member of the association from Quebec, Mr. Gagnon—I have not the pleasure of knowing this gentleman —another member from Toronto, Mr. Irving Robertson, and another member from London, Mr. Ford, stood out and said that they did not believe this association should take the stand they had taken in certain cases. This association, as I say, is a combination of about twenty-nine of the daily newspapers; the weekly newspapers are not in the combination, and they do not get the telegraphic news. This combination is and has been subsidized from year to year by the people of Canada to the extent of $50,000 per year, and this has been done under several governments. I am not quite satisfied that if we are going to pass legislation in restraint of combinations, the people of Canada should continue to subsidize any organisation which absolutely takes it upon itself to keep a newspaper out of any particular city or town. I take this occasion to bring to the attention of the House this combination, because I think it is an outstanding combination in this country that needs investigation. I am quite aware, of course, when I make these remarks about this association, that there is no doubt at all of what they will think of me; but when a man is appointed by the people to represent them in parliament, when he sees something that he thinks should be remedied, he should have no hesitation whatever in getting upon his feet and saying what he thinks about the matter.

I agree with the general principles of this bill. I believe manufacturers and business men are just as honest as any other class of citizens in this country. I suppose there are amongst manufacturers and business men the same proportion of crooks—perhaps no more and no less—as there are amongst professional men, newspaper men and farmers. Therefore, I believe it is necessary to have legislation to catch crooks wherever they are, and to punish crooks when they are caught.

If in the opinion of this government, it is necessary to have legislation in this form, I am willing to subscribe to it and to vote in favour of it. But I hope the Prime Minister may see his way clear, so that business concerns such as the one I have described, comprising those who are trying to specialize on certain articles, to increase production and to lower prices to the consumers, may, if possible, be left out of the investigations that may be necessary under this legislation. Unless investigation is absolutely necessary for the general welfare of this country, these concerns should not be bothered by any such inquiries as are provided for in this measure.

As regards the penalty clause, a corporation is only fined, and there is no opportunity of imprisoning the master mind of such an organization. If they are powerful and wealthy enough, a fine of $25,000 is not sufficient punishment, and in each of these organizations some officer should be made responsible who will take the gaol sentence, in case they are found guilty, just the same as any other porch-climber or burglar would go to gaol in case of an ordinary theft. This bill does not provide for any such punishment; it provides simply for a fine in the case of a corporation, and we all know how simple it is for a person to change into a corporation. That change can be effected under both provincial and federal law in a very simple manner, and then of course there is no one left to take the gaol sentence, and a little fine will settle all the trouble. I say "a little fine," because it is considered little to the interests concerned.

The point I want to make is this: If the law is necessary it should be made drastic enough to really punish the guilty; if it is not necessary it should not be placed upon the statute books. I agree that some such law is necessary, but I do not think it should be just in the form of this bill. I believe that the form of the bill can be changed in such a manner that legitimate business will not be worried, while combinations detrimental to the public interest will be punished. Another danger that may arise under this bill, as I said before, is the multiplication of officials. If it were possible to confine the administration of this proposed law to our courts, many of the objections as I see them would disappear.

In conclusion of these brief remarks, Sir, I wish to say that I do not think it is wrong for a man to attempt to criticize the form of proposed legislation the principle of which he is willing to support. When I entered public life one of the determining factors for my action was my absolute confidence in the Prime Minister and his cabinet and since I have been a member of this House I have seen and heard nothing to lead me to abate my confidence in the slightest degree. I still have the most absolute confidence that the Prime Minister is trying to do the very best he can for the people of this country, I also fully believe that the members of his cabinet are actuated by the same motives, and while I object to the form of this measure, if after due consideration by the Prime Minister and his cabinet they cannot see their way clear to amend its form, then, although I shall regret their inability to do so, I shall still subscribe to the general principle embodied in the bill and give it my support.

a few remarks on this measure. I do not intend to administer anything in the way of criticism of its provisions one by one. At the same time, Mr. Speaker, if I find myself unable to agree with the printed bill I will not be able to glorify its authors with the same meek humility and partisan credulity of some hon. members. I was indeed amused at the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler). He reviewed the measure, took one feature and then another, showed to his own satisfaction that they were wholly wrong, told us that the bill aimed at repressing evil and unjust combinations, but that its actual provisions had the effect instead, of repressing good combinations; but notwithstanding all that was wrong about the bill, he was quite certain that it proceeded out of a pure and holy source.

When the resolution was before the House I reviewed very briefly the history of our anti-combine legislation so called. I am going to ask the House to bear with me while I do so again, because although we may take this section and that section and say it does not read as if it would be effective, or that it does, yet we cannot get a comprehensive view of the real question we are discussing except in the light of the history of this legislation from the earliest times.

Hon. gentlemen talk of agreeing with the principle of this bill, and then end their speeches without the slightest indication of what they conceive the principle of the bill to be. I was indeed anxious to learn from the hon. member who has just sat down (Mr. Healy) what is this principle as to which he expresses such profound approval, in the presence of which he is going to vote for the bill, no matter what its form—in other words what its provisions may be. What is this sacred, sanctimonious principle?

Mr. HEALY: A square deal to everyone in this country.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well, if such is the principle of the bill how is it that it does not do this for the hon. gentleman's constituents, the Ford Company?

Mr. HEALY: I believe it does in principle and in final result, but it is the form of putting it in operation that I criticize.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is the difference about the form if the result is all right? Where does this kind of talk get us? I think it was Mr. Balfour who stated that the most foul smelling of platitudes was this continual talk about "a square deal and justice" with no reference to specific enactments.

This bill, to my mind, instead of being a measure seeking to get concrete results is a measure distinctly seeking to avoid them. I believe a recital of our legislation will show that wherever in the past we have had provisions that really stretched forth and caught somebody they are left out of this bill, but everything is here which is going to pile harassments, vexation and expense on legitimate business; that is all in the measure—investigation after investigation, circle after circle, but never any goal.

In 1888 parliament sought first to enact anti-combine legislation and a committee sat to work out some effective measure. It was passed in 1889, with amendments in 1892 and, I am inclined to think, a further amendment later, all of them as to the wording varying the original act in very slight form. The act of 1889 constitutes what is now clause 498 of our Criminal Code. In 1910 parliament enacted the Combines Investigations Act supplementary to that provision of the Criminal Code, which provision has been in our law ever since it was enacted in 1889.

The Combines Investigations Act had for its object the investigating of such institutions as six persons alleged to constitute a combine. "Combine" was defined, but not in the terms of this bill. The definition of the word in this bill I will deal with later. It is taken almost verbatim from the definition in a subsequent act. The Combines Investigations Act, however, proved to be aimless legislation, it proved to reach out to no real result.

Hon. gentlemen have spoken—the hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. Carroll), I remember particularly—about the law's delay, the procrastination of our courts, and he pleaded for a measure like this that gets at investigation in a simple way and, according to his idea, more expeditiously. Well, under the Combines Investigation Act, the provisions for investigation under which were much the same as this, there was only one investigation. Instead of being expeditious the investigation lived out the whole length of the dying days of one government and well through the young virility of the next and ended in nothing but mist. I refer to the investigation into the United Shoe Machinery Company. It provided for investigation, provided for the summoning of witnesses—all sorts of inquisition—and finally provided for a verdict. Then, if there was to be any punishment, if there was to be any injunction, if there was to be any variation of practice on the part of the "combinester," the whole process had to be gone over again before the criminal courts. I have briefly defined the Combines Investigation Act. This act is not in every respect the Combines Investigation Act. I have at least given the whole result of that act; there was no other prosecution under it.

Before I proceed to the next piece of legislation let me remark this: There have been numerous prosecutions under our Criminal Code. Under what is now section 498 there have been numerous prosecutions in our criminal courts, successful prosecutions too; and what is more, there have been civil proceedings which have been determined upon the provisions of that section of the Criminal Code. I believe that section has been a comparatively effective and useful section, though I do not contend for a moment that it could not now be amended with advantage. I will refer to this sentence again later.

Now I have dealt with the initial legislation—section 498 as it is to-day; then the Combines Investigation Act in 1910. The next legislation was in the form of two bills passed in 1919, assented to on the 7th of July of that year, one of them the Combines and Fair Prices Act and the other the Board of Commerce Act. The Combines and Fair Prices Act defined a combine I think in every particular the same as it is defined here; if there is any change it is a very trifling change. The Combines and Fair Prices Act then proceeded on the assumption that combines were not necessarily against the public interest, were not necessarily wrong, might even be beneficial; and it proceeded to define the powers of a board in the way of curtailing the activities of wrong combines, altering their methods, preventing malpractice, and so forth. It proceeded to establish it as a crime for any company or any person to do what it was, after investigation, forbidden to do by that board. It stated as well that the being privy or party to a combine as defined by the act, was in itself a crime. The Board of Commerce Act covered another sphere, namely, the fixing of profits. What I want to emphasize as the outstanding provision of the Combines and Fair Prices Act is that it established a board with power to prevent and power to compel. It vested in that board the right to prevent any company or combination of companies, which had been established before it as carrying on practice detrimental to the public interest, from continuing those practices. Within that board rested the power to order them to do this, the power to order them not to do that. I do not think legislation in any country ever went further. Whether it went too far or not there is a difference of opinion. Those times, however, were different from these: then profits were being made; then business was extremely active—we are living in different times to-day. I am emphasizing this: that the Board of Commerce under the Combines and Fair Prices Act had effective and final power to deny certain practices existing or to compel certain things to be done necessary to compliance with the law and make the combination no longer against the interests of the public. Of course the Board of Commerce as well had power to exhibit its findings, its evidence, its returns, and its documents before the attorney general of any province, thereby inviting the attorney general, if he thought fit, to conduct prosecution within that province before the criminal courts.

We now come to this legislation. This legislation establishes a board, but the name is changed; there has been a rechristening. A man is to be appointed called a registrar, and then around him at different times and different places there may be appointed commissioners. For all practical purposes I think it is fair to say that the registrar corresponds with the chairman of the old Board of Commerce and that the commissioners correspond with the puisne commissioners of the Board of Commerce. They have certain powers; and what are those powers? Now, I want to address myself to those who, without, I think, very thorough inquiry into the measure, have assumed that there are some teeth in its provisions. What are the powers of these men? They have power to investigate, yes; they can investigate, in private, or in public if ordered by the minister. They can lay the result before the minister, and if the minister is not satisfied he can order them to make further inquiry, and presumably they go on and inquire again. If he is not satisfied with the next report he can order another inquiry and they can proceed around the circle once more. But after they have done all their inquiry, in public or in private; after all are completed, they cannot order anybody to do anything or to stop doing anything; they have no executive power. Those attributes which the Board of Commerce possessed, the functionaries erected by this legislation are stripped of altogether. Well, what can they do? They report to the minister and the minister can lay the facts before the attorney general of the province. The old Board of Commerce could do that, but the old Board of Commerce could as well say what in the future should be right as respects a certain practice, what should be done and what should not be done. The functionaries erected here have no such power at all.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask my right hon. friend, when he is speaking of the Board of Commerce, if he would tell the House what particular functions of the board were declared to be ultra vires of the federal parliament?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am coming to that—and I will guarantee to come to it, too; I will not avoid it. They can expose the facts before the Attorney General as the old board could. There is this in addition—from memory I do not think it was in the Board of Commerce Act—that if the Attorney General of any province declines within three months to act, the Solicitor General himself may lay an indictment, on the relation, it says, of anybody over twenty-one years of age. I pause only to remark that the addition of that clause is pure surplusage, if indeed, I should not describe it as pure sham, for the reason that without any clause at all the federal Attorney General can lay an indictment, the Solicitor General can lay an indictment, can enter a prosecution. He does not need any clause of a new act to do that. May I remark once more before going further that all this power of inquiry that is supposed to be such a tremendous step in advance leads nowhere, that after it is through it does not end in anything, your registrar having no power to order anything done or to stop anything being done. But the whole of it could be done without any new statute whatever. It could be done under our Inquiries Act to-day. I repeat, there is not a single thing that may be done under this legislation that the government is not already competent to do under legislation that this House passed years ago.

Now, my hon. friend says—and perhaps this is as good a time as any to refer to the interjection—has it not been shown that in certain respects the Board of Commerce had power beyond the jurisdiction of this House to give? I admit that, and ask hon. gentlemen to reflect that the late government accused, for campaign purposes, of course, of being the ally of the interests and big business, in its legislation did not content itself with mere power of repetitive inquiry; it gave the board power to act, and gave it power even beyond the power of this parliament to give. That was our offence, if offence there was. But let us see just what was the effect of the Privy Council judgment. The Privy Council judgment, and I do not know that I am particularly competent to define its limits before this House—I will give it in my own words as I understand it—the Privy Council judgment really does not assail or impugn Part One of the Combines and Fair Prices Act. The Privy Council judgment in so far as it impugned the legislation aside from its criminal provisions stated that this parliament had not power to erect a board which would make regulations affecting trade and commerce merely locally, thereby invading the sphere of civil rights. In a word, when we are making regulations as to trade and commerce they must be general regulations, and any board we erect can only enact general regulations affecting the trade and commerce of the whole federal country. We cannot go into the milk business of a town. We cannot go into this special trade and apply regulations there which are really an invasion of civil rights. The Privy Council said more. It said: While you are doing that, getting into civil rights under the guise of trade and commerce law, while you are doing that you cannot validate your legislation by merely declaring that to violate your legislation is a crime. When you are in a sphere in which you should not be, you cannot make yourself right by declaring an offence against your legislation to be a crime. You canot use your criminal jurisdiction as a mere ancillary of what otherwise would be ultra vires legislation. So far the Privy Council went and no further.

Now I venture to suggest this: Within the limits of the Privy Council decision there is nothing at all to prevent the enactment of general regulations by this House or by any board created by this House affecting trade and commerce, and there is nothing to prevent the declaring anything to be a crime under our Criminal Code so long as we do not do it merely to establish the validity of some other legislation which really affects civil rights or invades some other sphere which we have no right to enter. Very well. I only observe this in conclusion on the constitutional phase. In so far as this legislation makes something a crime which is defined here—I refer now to section 26—it is at least very doubtful to my mind, and I say it with all deference to the Deputy Minister of Justice, whose opinion I would like to have read, it is very doubtful to my mind if that clause is within our constitutional powers; but I do not purpose to argue the point.

I want to argue this for the moment. We must have criminal legislation. We must protect our rights to enact effective criminal legislation. I am glad to know that that right has not been in any way overthrown by the judgment of the court of appeal in Ontario in the Wholesale Grocers' case. I find on reading the judgment that it has not been. We must preserve our right to enact effective criminal legislation. Our section 498 is good legislation. Perhaps it can be improved. I venture to give this as my opinion: There is no use going any further unless after you have got your board you are going to give that board power to enforce its findings. If you attempt to go further than criminal legislation, by erecting boards to inquire into this, that and the other thing, you are only placing a sham before the people of this country unless you are prepared to go on and give that board power to enforce by general regulation of trade and commerce its own findings as a result of its investigations. This is exactly what this bill does not do. It pretends to go farther, but it only gets into investigation and inquiry, and when it is through with that it is nowhere. The board has no power to make good its findings, no power to enforce its rulings, to deny practices or to compel practices. In a word, it has no executive power at all. When the investigation is through the whole thing is through, and all that it can do is to expose the facts to the attorney general. All this might have been done under the Inquiries Act if such were worth while. But I venture to say again the Criminal Code provisions will be more practically useful left alone. Improve them if you will; make them wider if you will, but leave them there as Criminal Code provisions. Do not provide for an array of official and for mere investigation. The code will be more useful as it is than supplemented by an investigation. Why do I say that? Because I believe an investigation that has no punishment attached to it, no orders that can be enforced, instead of being a deterrent is really a buffer between the offender and punishment. It really gives a man a second chance. It gives him all the case of the prosecution, and thereby enables him to prepare his defence against the time when he gets into a court before which he may be punished. If I were the worst criminal in the country I would not want anything better than to have an investigation first, with all the cards of the prosecution on the table, and then to be given my chance before an effective tribunal after. I would think the criminal far more likely to be punished if the prosecution had the same rights as he and all went to the criminal courts together. That would be more likely to lead to effective punishment. It is more likely at least that there would be a verdict of guilty.

In the United Shoe Machinery case I venture to say that if an indictment had been laid under the code in the first place there would have been infinitely greater chance of success than there was after all this circuitous investigation followed by an indictment later on. The United Shoe Machinery Company were made aware of all that was complained about, of all the arguments of the prosecution. They were made aware of everything they had not to do if they wanted to avoid prosecution, and all they had to do was to make this little change or that and all would be right. It will be the same under this bill. We will have investigations; we will have all sorts of vexatious inquiries. We will have burdens and expense put on business, but we will not have any real restraint. We will not have any effective curtailment of what are declared to be practices to the detriment of the public interest.

I want to try to make a little clear something that I was arguing a moment ago. I put it this way: I do not believe that this definition of a combine, as contained in section 2, is of any value whatever to the purposes of a real prosecution afterwards. It is of value if you have a board which has power to declare what is right and what is wrong and to prevent what is wrong being done. If you have that it is all right. Now let us see. This definition of a combine admits that combines may be good and they may be bad. A bad combine, it says, is one which operates against the public interest. Very well. A board investigates and finds that such and such a practice is against the public interest and therefore it is a bad combine. All well and good. If that board then has power to say "You cannot do that any longer" well and good. The old act said that; the Combines and Fair Prices Act said that; and the board said to the company "You cannot do it any longer" and if the company did it again then it was a crime per se; it was a crime to disobey the orders of the board.

Now, I come to apply this definition to this legislation. The definition, let me repeat, says: "A combine is a combine by business interests that works to the detriment of the public" and it adds "to consumers, to producers and others." It is a combine that works to the detriment of the public and it is undertaken to find out whether such is the case or not. Wherever a registrar finds out that it is he so reports to the minister. The minister agrees and then what happens? The matter then goes, or may go, to the criminal court; it canot go anywhere else, the registrar not having the power to stop it or make an issue of the case at all. If it is his opinion that this is a combine which works to the detriment of the public the case goes before the court. The court does not follow the opinion of the minister or the registrar, not at all. You must then convince the court that this is a combine which works to the detriment of the public. The fact that the minister and the registrar have been convinced does not get you anywhere at all. It may be their opinion; it may not be the opinion of the judge, and if it is not, not only has the prior investigation resulted in nothing but even if all the facts disclosed were correct the whole thing is a futility.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does my right hon. friend say that if the commissioner has reported that the combination, for example, has been taking advantage of the tariff that the Governor in Council may not then proceed either to reduce the tariff or eliminate it altogether?

Mr MEIGHEN: I am very glad the Prime Minister mentions that. I intend to refer to it but I do not want to get away from the point I am at until it is clear. The bill as brought down said that a combination was something that was detrimental to the public in the opinion of the registrar. Those words are now omitted. I do not see that it makes much difference because what is left in the bill really amounts to the same effect anyway. The registrar if convinced that there is a combine which is detrimental to the public will report to the minister. Presumably the minister will be convinced of the fact as well, and they expose the facts, we will say, to the attorney general. The very same facts come before the court and the judge does not need to be affected in the least by the opinion of the minister or the opinion of the registrar. He may feel that that combination is not detrimental to the public, and consequently, even though all the facts are correct and even though the company goes there and admits the whole thing, there will not necessarily be any conviction at all. There is just as likely to be a conviction if there had been no investigation whatever. I think there was a greater likelihood of a conviction because the accused person would not have the advantage of knowing the whole case of the prosecution in advance. Consequently an analysis of the proposed legislation convinces me that it is futile and a sham, as such legislation necessarily is, unless it empowers the registrar, the board, or whatever authority you may provide, to determine what is right and what is wrong, and to prevent what is wrong and to order what is right.

Now the Prime Minister says "Yes, but here is a clause that gives the Governor in Council power to wipe away the protective tariff, to wipe away the duty that protects the industry." He might have added "Here is another clause that gives it power to cancel a patent." But these are all in the statutes now, perhaps not worded exactly the same but the wording can be changed. One is in the Tariff Act. The other is in the Patent Act or in the Tariff Act. The government could have acted upon those. For that matter it is in the Combines and Fair Prices Act which is the law of the land to-day; we do not need a new statute to put that clause through. Competent legislation already exists in the Combines and Fair Prices Act which is the law of the land to-day.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is declared ultra vires.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not that section—and in the Tariff Act. You do not need all this preliminary investigation travelling over territory again and again. Let me repeat: All this legislation is simply running in a circle. It is another circle you have to go round; it is just another stump round which you can chase the flat-footed fiend of monopoly. It is nothing more and nothing less.

The Prime Minister argued, both in introducing the resolution and in his speech on the second reading to-day, that now the criminal code provisions cannot be put into effect because the Board of Commerce Act—I think it was the Combines and Fair Prices Act though—says there shall be no prosecution under the code save with the consent of the Board of Commerce. He says there is no Board of Commerce, consequently there can be no prosecution. In that he is right. But you do not need all this machinery to get over that difficulty. If he does not like the Board of Commerce Act let him repeal it. Repeal the Board of Commerce Act, then the code is there clear and in full effect. Also the Prime Minister has his tariff clause, his patent clause; he has everything except this cumbersome machinery expensive to business, provocative to business, burdensome to business, harassing and vexatious. He has everything except some worthless machinery and the power to appoint a whole army of officers the exercise of which can only have one result, namely, to reward the faithful of his party.

Now, I suggest that the Prime Minister may strengthen his criminal code provisions if he desires. It is quite possible—indeed I think it is likely—that the experience of the years would enable us now to make wider and better the provisions in the criminal code. I think in the criminal code we ought to say what is wrong and what is right. Let us make a clear definition so that men will know what is wrong and what is right, because unless we do we really do not get the effective results. Having done that take ample power to throw off the duties, take ample power to cancel patents; and when the Prime Minister has that, he has everything that is required. If he feels that he ought to go further there is only one way of doing so, there is only one way that is of any value, and that is to give to the board that makes inquiry power to give effect to the findings. If the Prime Minister does that he will really be giving teeth to his legislation. I am not urging him to do it. I do not want to be misunderstood at all—I am disposed to believe that in the present state of business in this country there is no immediate need of a drastic provision of that kind—but unless he does that his legislation is a sham, it is simply circuitous circumlocution, and is a positive burden and expense to business. Consequently, I do not feel that I need bow before the principle of this legislation. Its principle is simply to erect offices and to appoint officers to fill them, but to end up with the supposed culprit given a second chance, a better chance than he would have had if there had not been this legislation.

Hon. JAMES MURDOCK (Minister of Labour): I am under some obligation to the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) who appeared anxious this afternoon to ascertain where the Minister of Labour stood in regard to this particular legislation. I think therefore it would be entirely improper if I did not allow my position to be known. I think also that my position in regard to this particular legislation should be known, from the fact that my hon. friend for Saskatoon (Mr. Evans) seemed to refer somewhat disparagingly to the intent underlying this particular bill which is now before the House, and he seemed, as I understood, to imply that if the House could not, in accordance with his views, deal directly and entirely with the cause that they should not undertake in any way to deal with or regulate the effect. That was the understanding which I gathered from my hon. friend's remarks. For the information of my hon. friend for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) may I say that some three years ago I intimated where I stood in regard to combines, monopolies, trusts and mergers detrimental to the interest of the public in Canada. I said:

> Business men living under the protection of the tariff have got to know each other so well that price fixing agreements, and all sorts of agreements and arrangements, are the rule rather than the exception. * * * Not all of these are reasonable or proper * * * The public, unorganized as the sands by the sea, requires a protector against the super-organization of modern business.

I stand here to-night to gladly re-affirm my continued belief in that declaration, and to indicate to my hon. friend for York-Sunbury and others who are inquiring that I stand exactly in the same position to-day as to what should be done in regard to unfair combines, monopolies, trusts or mergers. I would not, however, Mr. Speaker, have one hon. member in this House draw the conclusion from anything I might say that all combines, all so-called monopolies, all price fixing arrangements, and all re-sale price arrangements are detrimental to the interests of the public. I do not believe any such thing. I have not believed that was the case, and, believing as I do, I regard this legislation as drafted generally, with some slight amendments that were suggested by the Prime Minister to-day, as legislation that will not and should not in any way embarrass any business, any combination or any resale price arrangement that is in the interest of the public. But I think, on the other hand, that any combinations, or price fixing arrangements or monopolies that are not working in the public interests know it full well to start with. My experience, if it has been worth anything to me in matters of this kind, is that they know full well that they are exacting the pound of flesh and that they are going beyond reasonable limits in certain cases in exacting unfair prices, or in imposing unfair arrangements on the people of this country. My hon. friend for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens), in his opening remarks, referred to the fact that he was not a lawyer, and that therefore he could not deal with this legislation or with combines legislation as a lawyer. He indicated to the House that he was an accountant, and as such would deal with this legislation. Well, I will crave the same privilege by dealing with this legislation as a brakeman, with some knowledge of what the people of Canada desire and demand in respect to a discontinuance of some of the combines that have throttled the prosperity and advancement of Canada generally in the years gone by, and that may be in evidence at this present moment.

Mr. BAXTER: What are they?

Mr. MURDOCK: That would appear to be a consistent thing for some one properly authorized under the law to investigate and determine, without either my hon .friend who inquires "what are they," or myself passing a snap judgment.

Mr. BAXTER: May I ask the minister if it is the case that he does not know a single instance of a combine in Canada today that ought to be repressed by law? Will he take that position?

Mr. MURDOCK: My firm and positive conviction is that there are several combines in Canada to-day that should be regulated.

Mr. BAXTER: Will he name them?

Mr. MACLEAN (York): The sugar combine.

Mr. MURDOCK: I am not at present sufficiently familiar with the sugar question to advise.

Mr. HANSON: What about Dominion Textile?

Mr. MURDOCK: My hon. friend for Vancouver Centre started in on section 2, of the proposed bill No. 54, and expressed great surprise and interest as to what the words "or others" meant. He appeared to argue—and I think other hon. members have also argued since—that surely the words "consumers and producers" were sufficient, and that the words "or others" were not necessary. It may be of interest to the hon. member for Vancouver Centre to know that those words are copied identically from the act of 1919 which was passed and placed upon the statute book of Canada by him and his associates when they were in power, and it appeared at that time to be necessary that this language should be used—

> The expression "combine" is used in this act with intended relation to articles of commerce, and it shall be deemed to have reference only to such combines immediately hereinafter defined, as, with relation as aforesaid, have in the opinion of the Board of Commerce of Canada * * * operated, or are likely to operate, to the detriment of or against the interest of the public, consumers, producers or others.

Now, the Combines Act of 1910 did not contain that provision, but in 1919 the government in power, when they were placing on the statute book a law that was heralded broadcast from the Atlantic to the Pacific coast as the last word in protection for the consuming public of Canada, proceeded to place in that section the words "or others," and let me, as one lay gentleman to another, give my hon. friend for Vancouver Centre my version of why those words "or others" are there. It came to my attention some two or three years ago that these words "or others" were very necessary on account of the business in which such "combinesters" were engaged, that if those words "or others" were not there, they would be able, with legal advice, to prove conclusively that they were neither a producer of the thing they were combined to deal in, nor a consumer of that particular thing, and that therefore, the words "or others" were necessary there to include them and every citizen of this Dominion. That is the view of one layman to another in answer to the question of my hon. friend.

Mr. STEVENS: I never asked any such question, and I never argued along the line my hon. friend is arguing. He apparently did not listen to my argument at all.

Mr. MURDOCK: I listened very carefully and patiently to my hon. friend, and I distinctly recall his insistent inquiry why it was necessary to include the words "or others" after the words "consumers, producers." The hon. member for Vancouver Centre undertook to show that this bill was somewhat absurd, because it might be regarded as tending to make a crime out of incorporation and combination for the benefit of the public. I differ entirely with that view, because if we read carefully clause 2 of the proposed bill, it is conclusively shown that only such combinations as are working or conducting their business detrimentally to the interest of the public, need have any fear from the operation of this particular bill. Intimations have come in considerable number from certain, I think, reputable business individuals and representatives of various associations, indicating the belief that something of this sort is needed that will stabilize and clearly define the status of a combination, of a price-fixing arrangement, or of a so-called monopoly that is first, last and all the time working in the interest of the public and giving to the public service at a minimum of cost, and that something is also needed to protect the public from the other sort that is not working in the interest of the public.

Mr. MEIGHEN: In order to make a firm punishable, or the members of a combine punishable, who is to decide that their conduct is detrimental to the interest of the public?

Mr. MURDOCK: The court, and I am coming to that if my right hon. friend can possess his soul in patience for only a few minutes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What does this bill do to hasten the prosecution?

Mr. MURDOCK: I am coming to that if—

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister is right at it.

Mr. MURDOCK: If my right hon. friend can give me only a little time, I will try to get to that in fair order.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister is at it now.

Mr. MURDOCK: I am not in great disagreement with the underlying cause, as defined or suggested by the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Evans), of the things to deal with which we are now here to determine ways and means. I am not in any particular disagreement with him as to what is causing, or what has in a large measure caused some of the things that we are endeavouring, if we can, to provide ways and means to remedy but I must entirely disagree with the thought that it is not proper, because we cannot go right to the root and at the moment do away with the underlying cause, that we should take any steps whatsoever to minimize the effect that is ever present with us to some extent throughout the length and breadth of Canada. There are in effect in Canada to-day conditions that we must for the time being deal with and make provision to deal with, and I now come to what some of my hon. friends have referred to as the "wooden gun" legislation that has been on the statute books of Canada in this respect for some time past. Hon. gentlemen opposite, not only one, but I think, several especially commencing with the hon. member for Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion) laid stress upon the fact that the Criminal Code was amply sufficient to protect consumers and producers from all the ills that might come from the formation of an improper combine. My hon. friend must surely know that the Criminal Code is not ready for use to the hand of any consumer or producer in Canada, and it has not been so during the past two or three years.

Mr. MANION: Will my hon. friend permit me to correct him? I did say that; but I added with the addition of necessary amendments. I pointed that out very distinctly and I think my hon. friend will admit that.

Mr. MURDOCK: I accept my hon. friend's statement, although I took down right, as I thought, from his lips, the words "legislation unnecessary as Criminal Code sufficient". I now understand that he meant that the Criminal Code would be sufficient when it was fixed up and put into shape, and when the Board of Commerce Act and the Combines and Fair Prices Act of 1919 were, to all intents and purposes, repealed. My right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) shakes his head. The word "repeal" from a layman is wrong. They did not repeal section 498 of the Criminal Code, but they made it impossible for any citizen of Canada to utilize section 498 of the Criminal Code against any combine, monopoly, trust or merger in Canada. My right hon. friend will, of course, say that there is still the Inquiries Act.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I say that all the government has to do, if it does not like the Combines and Fair Prices Act, is to repeal it, and then the Criminal Code is restored in all its original force.

Mr. MURDOCK: I realize, if we can only clear away the driftwood that has been obstructing the vision of the consuming public for the last two or three years, we shall be able to get something that will put fear into the minds of these combines and monopolies.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member has said many a time that the Board of Commerce Act and the Combines and Fair Prices Act constituted a "wooden gun" against monopolies. Will he cite a single new power that the registrars or commissioners are to have under this bill that the old Board of Commerce did not have? He knows that the old board had powers that the registrars and commissioners do not have. Will he mention one power that the Board of Commerce did not have, that the registrars are going to have.

Mr. MURDOCK: The laughable farce or misfortune of the old Board of Commerce Act was the fact that the Board of Commerce had ostensibly entirely too much power. That was the trouble, a power that citizens of Canada high and low could not see the consistency of giving to any board. What power? Power to make an inquiry, power to order an investigation, power to determine guilt, and power up until the time that the criminal was sent along branded to the judge to be sentenced. Entirely improper. The people of Canada very naturally, I think, rebelled at it. Surely it would have been amply sufficient, as contemplated by the measure now under discussion, if that Board of Commerce or another board had had authority to investigate, to look into the allegations that were made against some combine or price-fixing or resale agreement and to determine whether in its opinion such alleged monopoly or agreement was of substantial and material benefit to the consuming and the producing public; or if it was against their interests; and if found to be the latter to refer the case to a court of competent jurisdiction, such as we have throughout the length and breadth of Canada, to adjudicate and assess the guilt and penalty. That as I see it, and, speaking only as a layman, was the great mistake of the Board of Commerce legislation.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does that not mean that instead of the Board of Commerce being a wooden gun it was a machine gun that shot too often.

Mr. GRAHAM: It kicked oftener than it shot.

Mr. MURDOCK: Yes, Mr. Speaker, my right hon. friend is correct in that statement —that is just what would have happened had it not been arranged otherwise.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the hon. gentleman tell me what the arrangement was and who it was with? I am asking him to establish it.

Mr. LAPOINTE: You are asking too many questions altogether.

Mr. MURDOCK: I have been intimating to my right hon. friend for the last three years that I would be only too happy to get into the business of establishing some of that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Now is your chance. Start right at it.

Mr. MURDOCK: Bravado at this late date, though, does not change the circumstances of what happened in 1920.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What I understand by bravado is the saying of something of which the hon. gentleman has no proof. I ask him now to establish his proof. I ask him especially to appoint a Board of Inquiry under the Inquiries Act. He is a member of the government now.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Another commission.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Appoint a commissioner to go into the facts.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They laugh. Their colleague alleged—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He alleged that the members of the then government were holding his hand.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He is in office to-day—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MEIGHEN: You do not like it. He is in office to-day and I ask him to establish his allegation.

Mr. MURDOCK: I did not allege; I stated.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Now make it good.

Mr. MURDOCK: I intimated then that I would be glad indeed to undertake to show what was and what was not done.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Now is the time.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MURDOCK: Now, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MEIGHEN: You are not getting on very fast.

Mr. MURDOCK: Now, Mr. Speaker, while my right hon. friend dealt with the Combines and Fair Prices Act of 1919 to some extent, I think it should be dealt with more specifically in order to show just—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Just what?

Mr. MURDOCK: —in order to show that we have not had in Canada, as alleged repeatedly in the late campaign and at various other times, any legislation on the statute books since the Board of Commerce was annulled to deal with a combine, a monopoly or anything of the kind, nothing that a common man could take advantage of, that the plain people—shall I say to use a term favoured by some of my hon. friends?— that the plain people could take advantage of, and now at this particular time when we ask for the enactment of bill No. 54, which provides for the appointment of a registrar whose duty it will be to receive any complaints that are made by the plain people or by the other people of Canada against so-called combines, monopolies, trusts or mergers, we are told by my right hon. friend and his colleagues to go ahead and put some shims under the Criminal Code and fix it up so as to make it fill all necessary purposes. In effect, to you, Mr. Little Retail Grocer, or you Mr. Section Man, or you Mr. Brakeman, or you Mr. Logger in some part of Canada, what does that mean? It means making an expensive and cumbersome arrangement hidden in the criminal code that will prevent you in a hundred years, unless you are more financially successful than you have been, from getting into court to prosecute a combine, monopoly, trust or merger, from getting anywhere or receiving any consideration in regard to the things that you allege against some concern that is working detriment to you and the other people of Canada. That is what my hon. friend and some of his associates want to perpetuate, an arrangement in the criminal code that cannot be taken advantage of by the ordinary man, that is available for the big interests, for the wealthy at least as they desire, but that will mean nothing, because too expensive, to the ordinary citizens of Canada, whether producers or consumers.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What does the hon. gentleman really mean by that anyway? The criminal code is invocable—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will hon. gentlemen not permit a correction? The criminal code is invocable by merely laying information, and it is the duty of the attorney general to prosecute. That does not cost the informant anything. This is very expensive to him; the other costs him nothing if the attorney general does his duty.

Mr. MURDOCK: Mr. Speaker, I quite realize that what my right hon. friend states is what should be; but unfortunately I declare that it is not what is in effect, and I think my right hon. friend knows, and outside of this House would agree, how impossible it would be for some individual—yes, or for six individuals, to get consideration of any suit that they might undertake to institute against some alleged combine, monopoly, trust or merger.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the hon. gentleman know an instance—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the hon. gentleman know an instance of anyone laying a charge under the section of the code where the Attorney General refused to prosecute at the public expense?

Mr. MURDOCK: To-night I am not criticizing any Attorney General in regard to any particular case. I have not in mind, I may say frankly, any particular case where that developed. I do know, though, as I am sure my right hon. friend knows, that under all too many conditions, the provisions of the Criminal Code are not available for the purposes of the representations of the poor man, especially where, banked against the aims and endeavours thus contemplated, are, possibly, great sums of money protecting the concern that it is proposed to prosecute.

Another point that was very much stressed by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre, the hon. member for Fort William and others was with regard to the one-man representation, which was referred to as unfair and inconsistent. On the opening of this debate to-day the Prime Minister indicated that the one-man arrangement was going to be changed and that an amendment was to be proposed to make it necessary, as in the 1910 act, for six persons to indicate their belief that a combine exists. The act of 1910, which was repealed by the government of my right hon. friend, provided that where six or more persons, British subjects resident in Canada and of full age, were of the opinion that a combine existed, that prices had been enhanced or competition restricted, they might make the necessary representation, But when it came to 1919 and the present leader of the Opposition and his colleagues were fixing up legislation that was to be heralded and broadcasted as the real thing in combine hunting, it was provided in section 6 that any British subject resident in Canada and of full age who was of the opinion that a combine existed or was being formed might apply in writing to any member of the board except the Chief Commissioner for an order, and so on. I want to remind my hon. friends opposite that the safeguard contained in the 1910 statute against the possibility of some individual, for spite or any other reason, making a charge against some concern, was regarded by them as unnecessary; one man was thought sufficient. And now, because in the first text of the bill as brought down one man is specified, my hon. friends lay emphasis on the fact that is in their opinion, improper. I agree that six would be very much better.

One hon. gentleman suggested that the act contemplated the appointment of registrars here and there and everywhere throughout the length and breadth of Canada. Surely the bill must have been hurriedly read if that opinion was gained from it; nothing of the kind is contemplated. The act provides for the appointment of a registrar—one registrar—whose duty will be to receive representations that may be made from time to time indicating the belief of certain individuals that a combine, a monopoly, a resale price fixing arrangement is in effect or about to be put into effect. And when the registrar receives a complaint of that kind, it is his duty so to proceed as to demoralize and disorganize business? Not by any means. He will read what is conveyed to him as the view of those making the representations, and then, in a quiet and orderly way, he will make inquiries to ascertain what are the actual facts. We have had in Canada since 1906 a registrar of boards of conciliation and investigation under the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act. That registrar does not authorize the formation of a board in the case of every application made therefor. It has been found in something more than one hundred cases since the passing of the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act that the application for a board was based on an improper understanding or ill-founded claim on the part of the applicants, and they have been so advised. The public very seldom know anything about these decisions of the registrar; the correspondence is usually conducted between the parties making the application and the registrar. The registrar, at least at times, consults with the minister to ascertain his view or the view of the government in the matter. In Bill No. 54 exactly the same function is proposed in the appointment of one registrar located in or close to the office of the minister, where he will receive complaints that are made, analyze them and determine whether there is anything in them. He can go to the extent of asking for documents, requesting information, quietly investigating without any thought or intention or desire to disrupt or disorganize business, but only with the view of ascertaining the actual conditions in connection with the business in question, to secure such information for the purpose of conveying it to those who have complained that an improper condition exists. What is fairer than that? What can be more regular or orderly in the matter of stabilizing any legitimate business that is liable to have the charge hurled against it that it is a combine or monopoly and that its operations in that respect are detrimental to the public? Then, if the registrar believes after quiet inquiry that some things in the complaint are not satisfactorily answered, the act provides that a commissioner can be appointed—presumably someone amply qualified to analyze and investigate thoroughly, in fact, to understand, the particular business or concern that is to be investigated—a commissioner presumably amply qualified to deal with the subject that is to be brought under investigation. The commissioner proceeds to that investigation. He takes such means as the act provides to bring out all the facts which the producers and consumers of Canada are entitled to ascertain if there is as alleged a combine or any other business arrangement that is detrimental to the consumer and the producer. He brings out all that information and then makes his report.

My right hon. friend objects right at that point. After the commissioner has ascertained all that it is possible for the lay mind to ascertain—because the act does not provide that a lawyer must have the job every time a commissioner is to be appointed, or say that there are not business men throughout the length and breadth of Canada experienced in all lines of industry who may be just as capable of determining business conditions in effect as a lawyer—after the commissioner has analysed from every standpoint the conditions alleged and has decided that there is in his judgment some arrangement in effect that is not in the interest of producers and consumers and has made his report, what more logical arrangement, what more consistent with British justice could be suggested than that the culprit believed to have instituted a combine, monopoly, trust or merger should be brought before a court of competent jurisdiction anywhere throughout the length and breadth of Canada to plead his case, as he would have a right to do, before a jury of his peers? They decide on the facts presented, and then the judge on the bench determines in accordance with the provisions of this act the penalty to be applied if the verdict is guilty. That is where the Board of Commerce Act and the Combines and Fair Prices Act fell down. In the first place it undertook, the way it worked out, to make a judge out of a brakeman without any legal experience, to assess penalties, to define crime and say what should be done. This act proceeds in a more orderly way. It recognizes the courts of competent jurisdiction in Canada to-day, and as quietly and as unobtrusively as possible—I repeat that—as quietly and as unobtrusively as possible provides for a preliminary inquiry by the registrar and the commissioner. Why not? Why does some hon. gentleman talk of secret diplomacy and suggest that a secret inquiry should not be made? Is it not reasonable to act on the assumption that the registrar, yea, and the commissioner, when appointed may find that there was nothing sufficiently tangible upon which to base a claim of improper conduct against some particular combine? Why should that particular concern, if things are being done on the level and in the interest of consumer and producer, if fixing resale prices, for instance, in the interest of the consumer, if we want to deal fairly, why should it be necessary to herald this preliminary investigation from the housetops until the case finally comes to a court of competent jurisdiction for determination? I do not mean, Mr. Speaker, to imply that there will be no notoriety whatsoever before the case gets into court, but I do mean to suggest that to be fair to all concerned there should be as little notoriety as possible given to the preliminary investigation by either registrar or commissioner, for the simple reason that their investigation as contemplated is only preliminary and the concern itself is to have its day in court in the final analysis to show whether it is guilty or innocent of the charge alleged, and which either the registrar or the commissioner may believe. There is no question at all about the final investigation before a court of competent jurisdiction being given sufficient notoriety.

I have, Mr. Speaker, three more pages of references to the remarks of my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, and as I do not wish to take up any more time tonight I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and the debate adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the House adjourned at 11.35 p.m.

Tuesday, May 8, 1923

The House met at three o'clock.

COMBINES, MONOPOLIES, TRUSTS AND MERGERS

The House resumed from Monday, May 7, the debate on the motion of the Right Hon. Mr. Mackenzie King for the second reading of Bill No. 54, to provide for the investigation of combines, monopolies, trusts and mergers.

Hon. JAMES MURDOCK (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, in proceeding further with the discussion of Bill No. 54, I would like to refer briefly to what would appear to be a studied campaign which has been carried on in various parts of Canada during the past few weeks to discredit the provisions of the bill. Almost invariably hon. members who have discussed this measure from the opposition benches have, in respect to claims and contentions made, found refuge in that campaign of, I think, entire, but I hope not deliberate, misrepresentation. I want to refer to some of the statements that have been made in that connection. Here is one coming from the jurisdiction of the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. McQuarrie) which says:

> The Criminal Code of Canada, in one of its sections, has penalties which fit the crimes, known as trusts, mergers and combines, whenever these are in restraint of trade, and does it in a much simpler way than the Premier's bill, as well as providing heavy penalties. It should be sufficient for the purposes without the enactment of legislation that will handicap trade and make burdensome interference with the conduct of private business. The great objection to his bill is that it is wholly inquisitorial, and that "any person resident in Canada of the full age of twenty-one who is of opinion that a combine exists, or is being formed," may start an investigation which, on mere suspicion will subject business men to no end of trouble and expense.

There is a wholesome truth in the old saying that a half truth is worse than a falsehood. Then, we come to another one from the jurisdiction of my hon. friend for London (Mr. White), which says:

> One curious clause makes it illegal to fix a resale price.

It is not true, but it gets over in an editorial just the same.

> In other words, a manufacturing firm which does a national business and advertises from end to end of Canada its products at one price could not fix this price.

Nothing in the bill suggests the accuracy of that statement, unless it could be conclusively shown that the fixing of that price was a detriment to the public, to the consumer, to the producer. Then, this same article pays me a compliment by saying:

> That bold trust-buster, Hon. James Murdock, the Minister of Labour, has machinery he needs now if he will only make use of it.

An absolutely unqualified misstatement of fact, as every hon. member familiar with the legislation which has for some time been on our statute books, knows. Yet that kind of bunk gets over from the Opposition press, and, may I say without disrespect, is parroted by hon. gentlemen from the Opposition benches.

Then, we have another one. Listen to this: It comes from not very far distant:

> The process, too, is simple, the laying of an information before a competent magistrate puts the accused on their defence, creates the opportunity for bringing out the facts, and if there has been guilt, provides adequate punishment. The government bill is of a type that appeals to those who confound fuss with efficiency and noise with progress.

That listens very nicely, to the uninitiated, but it does not fool any hon. member or any other citizen of Canada? Who ever dreamed for a moment of the feasibility of his approaching some magistrate and suggesting that there was a combine detrimental to him or to other consumers or producers, and then getting proper redress at the hands of the court? All hon. gentlemen know how far he would get. One thing these editorials and various others that might be quoted overlook is the fact that the provisions of the criminal code dealing with combines have been useless since the days when my right hon. friend and his colleagues took good care to make the Combines Investigation Act moribund and of no effect. It has been impossible, therefore, to use the provisions of the criminal code, section 498, in dealing with the most dreaded or contemptible combine that might exist in Canada.

Mr. IRVINE: Would the minister care to state from which papers those editorials were taken?

Mr. MURDOCK: British Columbian, New Westminster, B.C., London Free Fress and the Montreal Gazette.

Mr. CARROLL: What are their politics?

Mr. MURDOCK: If my hon. friend for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) will pardon two or three additional references to the statements which he made in his speech on this subject I should like to deal first with this. The hon. gentleman said:

> Now I turn to what is my chief criticism of the bill, that in effect it declares to be a crime that which is, without question ordinary, sound business sense.

With my hon. friend I agree and am ready to assume that condition prevails so far as the great majority of combinations existent in Canada to-day are concerned, and I am ready to charitably assume that many of those combinations are not combines carrying on their operations to the detriment of the public whether consumers or producers, but I would call the attention of my hon. friend to the fact that Professor Alfred Marshall, the leading economist in the world, stated in Principles of Economics at page 447:

> But perhaps the public show too much indulgence to those who argue that a trade combination or a trust is the only means available for securing reasonable steadiness of prices.

Then my hon. friend for Vancouver Centre went on to argue at considerable length as to what might happen to certain dairy industries, and I want to remind him of some of his previous views in that regard. The exact statement of the hon. gentleman was:

> It was shown beyond all peradventure that the Ottawa Dairy, while a distinct monopoly under this clause, did operate in the interest of the public.

Let us read the record to see what was the trend of the hon. gentleman's mind when that particular inquiry was being made. At page 304 of the examination of Alderman W. Guertin, before the Special Committee on the High Cost of Living, I find this:

> By Mr. Devlin.
> Q. Do you know anything about the Producers' Milk Company?—A. Yes, they endeavoured to lower the price of milk in Ottawa.
> Q. When did they go into business?—A. About 7 or 8 months ago.
> Q. This spring?—A. Not this spring, 7 or 8 months ago. That would be last year.
> Q. Had the fact of their going into business and putting teams in the streets delivering milk the effect of reducing the price?—A. We found that the fact of their going into competition was reducing the cost of milk. The manager was telling me that they were going—
> Q. We will not mind hearsay evidence, but from your own personal examination by how many cents was there a drop in milk?—A. There was a drop, through competition of two cents—three cents I should say because the Ottawa Dairy started by lowering to 11 cents, then the Producers retaliated by lowering to 10 cents, then it was lowered to 10 cents.
> Q. What is it now?—A. 10 cents.
> Mr. Stevens: You are a mighty lucky city. It is fifteen or sixteen cents elsewhere.

Which would almost convey to the uninitiated or casual reader that there was an expression of regret in the hon. gentleman's language that the traffic was not being made to carry all that it would bear.

I desire now to make some further references to the speech of my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition. One of his statements was:

> Everything is here which is going to pile harassments, vexation and expense on legitimate business; that is all in the measure,—investigation after investigation, circle after circle, but never any goal.

That was the summing up of the right hon. gentleman in regard to this particular measure. Then he goes further and reviews anti-combine legislation, and states that in 1888 parliament first sought to enact anti-combine legislation and apppointed a committee to work out some effective measure. I assume that that is justification for believing that the right hon. gentleman conceives that there has been as far back as 1888 the necessity for dealing with combines detrimental to the public interest. I happen to have in my hand a copy of the budget speech of 1878, and I find printed as an appendix to that budget speech some illuminating evidence as to conditions in those years gone by, indicating that there was even at that time marked necessity on this North American continent to deal with combines detrimental to the public interest. This appendix refers to an extract from the message delivered by the Governor of the state of New York to the legislature of that state at Albany in 1878. I read a portion of it to show just what it is the public has been complaining of, and what it is believed this particular Bill No. 54, will to a very substantial extent protect the public from. After noting one of the causes of the currency inflation in the States the governor went on to say:

> At the same time, another great evil was strongly developed; individuals and corporations engaged in various branches of manufacture, taking advantage of the necessities of the government, rushed to congress, and by every means in their power procured for their own benefit the levy of what we call protective duties under the false pretence of raising revenue for the government, but really to compel consumers to pay exorbitant prices for the favoured article thus protected.

So that was regarded in 1878 as being the underlying cause of certain combinations detrimental to the public interest. Then my right hon. friend inquires, in a manner such as no other member of the House could inquire "What is this sacred sanctimonious principle?" and he was very properly advised by the hon. member for North Essex (Mr. Healy) that what is proposed is a square deal to everyone in this country. I am willing, however, to let my hon. friend (Mr. Healy) take the responsibility of answering that question of the leader of the Opposition, but I shall quote the right hon. gentleman's own words before he became a right honourable. We find that on July 4, 1919, the Combines and Fair Prices Act was before this parliament. Let me quote from Hansard what happened on that occasion:

> On the motion of Hon. Mr. Meighen, Bill No. 167, concerning the Investigation and Restraint of Combines, Monopolies, Trusts and Mergers, and the Withholding and Enhancement of the Price of Commodities, was read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Boivin in the chair.
> On clause 2—definitions. "Combine":
> Mr. McKenzie: Perhaps the work of the committee might be abbreviated by the minister stating wherein this bill differs from the old Combines Act or is it practically the same?

I ask my hon. friends to follow me closely in this quotation to ascertain where some things came from.

> Mr. Meighen: No, it is very different. I think, however, the committee already has a pretty full idea of the intent and scope of this measure from the discussion in a previous act. I direct the attention of the committee to the clause:
> The expression "combine" is used in this act with intended relation to articles of commerce, and it shall be deemed to have reference only to such combines, immediately hereinafter defined, as, with relation as aforesaid, have, in the opinion of the Board of Commerce of Canada (or of a single member thereof acting under authority of and for the purposes of section eight of this act) operated, or are likely to operate, to the detriment of or against the interest of the public, consumers, producers or others and, limited as aforesaid, the said expression as used in this act shall be deemed to include,—
> (a) mergers trusts and monopolies, so called.

[Mr. Murdock.]

> That is to say, the scope of the operations of this board as affecting combines shall be directed against such combines as are detrimental to the public interest. In other words, this act recognizes the fact that there may be combines, and there may be purposes of combines, that are in full accord with the public interest, in the interest of the country. For example, combinations of capital, and combinations for the purpose of working together towards increasing export trade. The greater our export trade the better to the country. That is a good, laudable practice and a good reason for amalgamation, because there are times when it can be better secured, indeed almost always, by that means. But if that same combination operates for the purpose of keeping down the wages of its employees, combines for that purpose, or for the purpose of putting up the cost to its consumers, above what is reasonable to those purchasers that is detrimental to the interests of the public, and for so doing a combine comes within the operations of the act and is answerable to this board.

Mr. Speaker, I submit that is fairly good Liberal doctrine and is sufficient to justify the proposal to incorporate practically the same definitions of a combine detrimental to the public interest as are found in the proposed bill No. 54, now before the House. My right hon. friend also states as his opinion, that the Privy Council's judgment really does not assail or impugn part one of the Combines and Fair Prices Act which is now on the statutes books of Canada. In that statement I, as a layman, concur and I think my friend for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) would also concur. But I want to make some inquiries. If that is so why has it been possible for the people of Canada to be denied the protection accorded by part one of the Combines and Fair Prices Act during all of the later months of the late government's regime? Why was not something done to continue the protection or to appoint some tribunal that would take care of the combines detrimental to the public interest that might exist? We find my right hon. friend on June 29, 1920, twelve days before he had reached the goal of his very commendable ambition to become the Prime Minister of Canada, making this statement in regard to the Board of Commerce:

> Why in the first place, there is a law conferring certain powers and imposing certain duties on a board, a law written and planted on the statute books, known to the board when they took office, a law with the operation of which nobody can interefere, a law which they have the courts of the land at their disposal to enforce.

My right hon. friend, of course, did not intend to make a statement that was incorrect but the statement contained in the quotation which I have given is absolutely incorrect, as I propose and undertake to prove. This was the 29th of June, 1920, and no one knows better than my right hon. friend that the Board of Commerce had been a wooden gun, so far as protecting the interest of the consumers, the public, and others against unfair combines, for more than four months prior to that particular day. No one could know that fact any better than my right hon. friend, and yet we find him getting up in parliament and making the statement referred to. The reason for that fact is, that four months prior to that date the chairman of the Board of Commerce had resigned—to be exact on the 23rd day of February, 1920—had resigned hurriedly, and from that very moment the Board of Commerce, to the extent of protecting the public against combines detrimental to it, ceased to function under the language of the law. In other words, prosecutions could not be instituted without a chief commissioner. The law has been so framed, whether unintentionally or purposely I do not know. The latter part of subsection 2 of section 9 of the Combines Investigation Act says:

> In the case of an investigation ordered the chief commissioner shall fix the time and place for such investigation, of which the secretary shall notify in writing the applicant or his authorized counsel.

And so as the weary weeks and months had gone by—four long months—without the board being permitted to do anything or get anywhere in relation to the things for which presumably it was paid, we find the right hon. gentleman on the 29th June rising in the House—as he also did last night—expressing surprise and inquiring wherein the board had been interfered with by absolute prevention on the part of certain honourable gentlemen, or by failing to place the board in a position to do things which the Combines and Fair Prices Act, in part one, provided should be done in the interests of the public. My right hon. friend, capable legal gentleman he is, should be very familiar with that fact.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am sorry I am not. Will the minister tell us what we failed to do that the act called on us to do?

Mr. MURDOCK: The right hon. gentleman failed to do anything that the act called on him to do. That is only another very delightful way which my right hon. friend has of dodging the real point.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know what the issue is. The minister says they could not do anything because they were prevented, and to show that they were prevented he says that the minister would not do what he should have done in order to enable the board to act. I want him to tell me what it was. I do not know. I want him to establish what he says and show that it was our duty to do it.

Mr. MURDOCK: The act, of course, as the right hon. member would try to convey, does not provide that immediately on the chief commissionership becoming vacant, if the board is to proceed to function in the interests of the public as by law intended, a chief commissioner shall be appointed, but the language of the act was so fearfully and wonderfully prepared, either inadvertently or intentionally, that that was the net result, and that fact was called to the attention of hon. members at that time sitting on the treasury benches of paliament, not once but repeatedly.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The failure then was to appoint a chief commissioner to succeed Judge Robson. That is what I understand. Does the minister say that, in the absence of Judge Robson, or upon his resignation, the commission as it existed then had not power to act?

Mr. MURDOCK: Exactly, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He says what is wrong.

Mr. MURDOCK: The claim that is made—and I am sure my right hon. friend is aware of this, and if not he can get unlimited legal advice to that effect—is that in a more important aspect of the intended functioning of the board, that board was powerless to proceed without a chief commissioner.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not at all. That is not the fact. Although the minister, with all his talents, was on the board, the board was just as powerless before as after the resignation.

Mr. JACOBS: It was a board of the right hon. member's creation.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister was not.

Mr. MURDOCK: There is considerable in what the right hon. member says, that the board was practically as useless before the resignation as aftewards. Again, I am not informed as to whether this was inadvertently or intentionally done.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the hon. member not admit that it was an act of the board committed or performed after the resignation of Judge Robson, that was called in question before the courts, and that the courts in their judgment in no way even referred to the absence of the chief commissioner as affecting the validity of the act? It was just as vaild after as before. It was the hon. member that was wrong—not the act.

Mr. MURDOCK: My right hon. friend is a little off in his dates and in his facts. He overlooked the fact, that the cause of the resignation was the writing of a letter which, in some way, came to be sent by other members of the staff in connection with a case that was being prepared for the courts.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not mention anything about that.

Some Hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MURDOCK: In other words, it is not correct to state that it was after the resignation of the chairman that facts in connection with the appeal case were prepared and sent forward. It is true there was a completed case, and the courts were ready to go ahead and deal with the case that had been prepared for submission to them.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister missed my point. Was it not an act or an order of the board issued after the resignation of Judge Robson that was brought before the courts on appeal, and did the courts not decide it without even referring to the absence or non-existence of a chief commissioner?—showing that the board had perfect power to act after as well as before.

Mr. MURDOCK: My right hon. friend is aware that there were two cases submitted, the latter case being by consent of the parties for the purpose of testing the validity of the act, for the purpose of clearing up and trying to get somewhere, and to give the government what they appeared to want, and that was the assurance that the Board of Commerce had no right to function in the interests of the public in protecting the public against combines, monopolies and mergers. That is, by every act, what appeared to be the desire of the government.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What act?

Mr. MURDOCK: Every act and omission to act.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Name one of them. The hon member is deceiving nobody by this evasion, except perhaps himself.

Mr. MURDOCK: I will call my right hon. friend's attention to certain actions of his government, indicating their particular intent in regard to certain of these matters. In addition to the presumed and intended duties of members of the Board of Commerce, in the latter part of January, or, to be exact, on the 19th day of January, 1920, the members of the board were hurriedly called to the office of the Minister of the Interior, who desired to convey to them the understanding that they were to be appointed to some additional and new duties. They were to be Paper Controllers for the Dominion of Canada, as the result of the resignation, or pending resignation, I forget which, of the then Paper Controller. What were the facts in connection with this paper control? A price of $80 a ton on newsprint paper had been fixed and continued in effect as applicable to various newspaper concerns all over Canada, when at that particular time, or during a part of that time, the spot market price for newsprint was from $90 to as high as $165 a ton, determined by how hard up some newspaper was to secure the product to get out its issue. As a result of this condition, the switches of the Fort Frances Pulp and Paper Mill had been spiked down, and an ultimatum had been served on the Backus company that no more would they be permitted to ship paper across the international boundary until they complied with the language and intent of the Paper Controller's orders. So that was the situation on the nineteenth day of January when we were hurriedly called to the office of the Minister of the Interior to be invested with our new functions and authority.

An hon. MEMBER: Who was he?

Mr. MURDOCK: The Minister of the Interior at that time was the right hon. gentleman who now leads the Opposition (Mr. Meighen). On two occasions on that 19th day of January we were called to interview the right hon. gentleman and also the Assistant Deputy Minister of Justice, and then in the evening the intimation was given "Nothing doing just now". That very night, or early the next morning, a trusted and capable civil servant was despatched to Fort Frances, with the result that within a few short days, the spikes were taken out of the switches, and the Fort Frances Pulp and Paper Company were permitted to send their paper unhindered across the international boundary. The civil servant returned to Ottawa, and gentlemen connected with the then government indicated, by their talk and scowling looks and suggested actions, that they were very seriously concerned about the unfortunate act and disobedience of the civil servant who had gone to Fort Frances to do exactly what he was told to do. Then on the 30th day of January we were again called in and were made full-fleged paper controllers. At the suggestion of and under a Privy Council order prepared by the then Minister of the Interior, we started to carry on that additional farce of fixing a price for newsprint paper to the newspaper companies of Canada at about one-half the price that the market called for. Yet on that particular day would there not have been great clamour and dissent throughout Canada, as there was in certain cases, when it was proposed to fix the price of milk to babies or bread to hungry people? No, that must not be done; that would be carried by this government across the seas; carried to the Supreme Court of Canada first, where three eminent judges sitting on the Supreme Court benches decided that the contested rights were satisfactory, and by law contemplated and as the Board of Commerce had contended. All a part of the beautiful farce of fooling the public.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the hon. gentleman permit me? I have tried to get out—

Mr. MURDOCK: I still have the floor.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am aware of that. That is about all the hon. member has. I have tried to extract out of this mass of verbiage something attributable to the government. All I have got is this: He states that the commissioner who went west prior to the appointment of the Board of Commerce as paper controller, was instructed to do what he did by the then government. That commissioner was Mr. Breadner. I tell my hon. friend that Mr. Breadner had no such instructions, and my hon. friend cannot produce a statement of Mr. Breadner that he had.

Mr. MURDOCK: My right hon. friend can, of course, put what construction he likes on what I say. I stated and I repeat that, self-evidently and without any question, what was done at Fort Frances was what was intended to be done. I say that even in disregard of the attempt of certain hon. gentlemen to fool the Board of Commerce later into the belief that nothing of the kind was intended.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I tell the hon. gentleman that I had to do with the matter—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I deny the right, Mr. Speaker—I want to know—Has this hon. gentleman or any hon. gentleman the right to speak of the intentions of men with whom he did not come into contact, whose word he cannot bring in support of his statement, and against the statement of one who actually had to do with the matter? Such conduct is not only infamous; it is of a character I cannot describe in this House.

Mr. SPEAKER: I understand the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Meighen) rises to a question of privilege. No hon. member in the debates can impute motives, and I would ask that the debate be continued, but without motives being imputed to any hon. member.

Mr. MURDOCK: I gladly withdraw if the right hon. member considers that I was in any way imputing improper motives to him.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would much rather that he would make what he says good.

Mr. MURDOCK: The right hon. member last night and again to-day was particularly anxious about making good. He seems to have overlooked entirely what so many thousands of the people of Canada have known for many months, or since the sixth of December, 1921, that the case has been tried and the verdict rendered in regard to the alleged and camouflaged pretence by the late government of providing a Combines and Fair Prices Act for the protection of the consumers, producers and others. The verdict of the people of Canada has been rendered on that subject, and my right hon. friend is very safe in showing bravado now, three years late, in having something investigated, and judgment passed upon it, that all the people of Canada passed judgment on about sixteen months ago.

I want to refer now as fast as possible to two or three other matters in connection with Bill 54, as proposed. The right hon. member last evening stated:

> In so far as this legislation makes something a crime which is defined here—I refer to clause 26—it is at least very doubtful to my mind if that clause is within our constitutional powers.

My right hon. friend and the other hon. members who are behind him, seem to take great objection to this particular new "crime" to be incorporated in the statutes of Canada:

> Everyone is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to a penalty not exceeding $10,000 or to two yars' imprisonment, or if a corporation to a penalty not exceeding $25,000, who is a party or privy to or knowingly assists in the formation or operation of a combine as defined in this act.

My right hon. friend and those associated with him, as well as certain newspapers in Canada, appear to be much concerned as to whether that particular crime and the penalty therefor can be made effective. If the right hon. gentleman would only look at the legislation which he proposed and upheld some three years ago he would find that it was very much more drastic in its intent than what is now proposed. As you will recall, Mr. Speaker, he stated last night that the first part of the Combines and Fair Prices Act of 1919 had not in his judgment been changed by the Privy Council decision. Further, he said:

> But I venture to say again the Criminal Code provisions will be more practically useful left alone. Improve them if you will; make them wider if you will; but leave them as Criminal Code provisions. Do not provide for any investigation.

That is exactly what my right hon. friend and his associates appear to be afraid of—an investigation in regard to some particular concern.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not say that. If the hon. gentleman will read the rest of it he will find that, either in that sentence or in one further on, I state that it is worthless to provide for an investigation unless the investigators are given power to give effect to their findings.

Mr. MURDOCK: Very well. It can at least be noted that the right hon. gentleman rallies promptly to the support of some combine, monopoly or price fixing arrangement that is detrimental to consumers, producers and others. That is the first thought. And he argues, as only he can argue, to show why the re-affirming of section 498 of the Criminal Code would be satisfactory and would give all the relief that is possible or necessary. Now, I just want to refer to a statement made by my hon. friend for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) last evening. That hon. gentleman, it seems to me, was very discourteous to, and inconsiderate of, the rights of citizens of Canada, particularly those who might happen to be section men, firemen, brakemen—men employed in logging operations and others engaged in similar occupations. Listen to the position taken by the hon. gentleman; just see how he classes these people. He refers to "six uninformed, irresponsible individuals" asking for an investigation.

Mr. STEVENS: Just a moment. Will the hon. gentleman read the preceding explanatory sentence in which I distinctly stated that I was not saying ignorant persons, but persons uninformed as to facts.

Mr. MURDOCK: My hon. friend in the preceding sentence does say:

> I do not say ignorant people, but uninformed people, are very prone to complain of businesses or institutions wherever they may be. Six uninformed, irresponsible individuals may ask for an investigation.

Well, I would call the attention of my hon. friend to the fact that the right to ask for such an investigation was conceded to these "uninformed," "irresponsible" and "ignorant" persons by his government in 1919 when passing thrcugh this House the Combines and Fair Prices Act. I do not see therefore why "six individuals" can now be classed as irresponsible and ignorant just because it is proposed to give under Bill 54 the same rights that were contemplated in that act. Now, Mr. Speaker, in conclusion—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

[Mr. Murdock.]

Mr. MURDOCK: Do not do that now, because I may not stop.

Mr. STEVENS: I think they want you to go on.

Mr. MURDOCK: My right hon. friend and others have made a reference to the alleged numerous investigations that are to be conducted before arriving at a starting point in Bill 54. Let me briefly analyze this proposition so that we may ascertain whether or not that is just the case. The leader of the opposition, as I recall, indicated that any individual could, under section 498 of the Criminal Code, reaffirmed, go to a magistrate and lay an affirmation against some combine, trust monopoly or merger, secure the necessary investigation, and drag that combine, trust, monopoly or merger into court. He actually says a thing of that kind

4 p.m. and expects, I presume, that the hon. members of this House will believe it. My right hon. friend knows, as does every other hon. gentleman sitting behind him, that almost assuredly, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, if an individual undertook to lay information as to the existence of any combine or trust or monopoly or merger, he would not have had the necessary access to the facts that would permit him to make that affirmation in detail sufficiently to ensure the issuance of a warrant or the bringing into court of the alleged combine or whatever it might be. My right hon. friend knows that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: My hon. friend knows—it does not take a lawyer to know it—that you do not need to allege any fact whatever save this, that you have reason to believe and do believe that the illegal combine, or whatever it might be, exists. If that is done, then, unless there is sufficient reason to the contrary, the attorney general will take the matter over and conduct the prosecution.

Mr. MURDOCK: And my right hon. friend would know, of a surety, that there would possibly be, as he suggested by his qualifying remark, a sufficient reason to the contrary.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That would be the fault of the attorney general.

Mr. MURDOCK: Wherever the fault would be, it would be a wooden gun; it would be a thing unavailable to the section man, to the logger, to the small merchant; they could not grapple with anything so large. But entitle these same individuals to some reasonable inquiry to ascertain if the suspicions they hold are well founded, and the result is different. So this Bill No. 54 permits six individuals to send in a statement of their belief, giving all the facts as they know them. The registrar of the boards of investigation, without any publicity—at least without the publicity that would result should action be taken under the Criminal Code—inquires, presumably by correspondence, or otherwise as he sees proper, into the facts, with a view to ascertaining whether the claims made by the six individuals are well founded.

Mr. STEVENS: Will my hon. friend permit a question? If it is true that it is impossible to get action under the Criminal Code, how was it that under section 498 there were at least six prosecutions, while under the Combines Investigation Act of 1910 there was only one inquiry, the case of the United Shoe Company, and no prosecution?

Mr. MURDOCK: I would be in a better position to answer my hon. friend if he would tell me when these six prosecutions under the Criminal Code took place.

Mr. STEVENS: I will do so. Rex vs Elliott, 1904; Rex vs Master Plumbers, 1905; Rex vs Gage, 1907; Rex vs Clark, 1907; Rex vs Beckett et al, 1907; Rex vs McMichael, 1907; Rex vs Day, 1905. Then there were several later civil actions in connection with which the provisions of the Criminal Code regarding combines were the deciding factor. Included in the cases were Hatley vs Elliott, 1903; Wampole and Company vs Karn Company, Limited, 1906; Weidmann vs Schragg, 1912; and there were several others. The first seven cases I mentioned were under the Criminal Code, section 498, whereas, as I have pointed out, under the Combines Act there was only the case of the United Shoe Company—an investigation, but no prosecution.

Mr. MURDOCK: My hon. friend is entirely correct about the number of prosecutions proceeded with under the Combines Act of 1910; that has not been questioned. As to the prosecutions under the Criminal Code, it would be interesting, if my hon friend and I had time to do so, to indicate to the House just what were the proceedings. For instance, in the case of Rex vs Beckett, 1907, my recollection is that a decision was handed down some eight or nine years later. In any case, if I am not mistaken, it took a great length of time to deal with it, and then the results were practically nil. But is it not reasonable to assume that the plan now proposed is a better one—that of having an inquiry made on the basis presumably, of the good judgment of the registrar? And my assumption is that a peculiarly qualified person should be chosen to fill that position. The registrar would make the necessary preliminary investigation, and if there appeared to be something requiring further attention he would so report to the minister. The minister would no doubt communicate with the Governor in Council, and if it was so decided they would appoint a commissioner for the particular purpose of investigating the alleged combine, monopoly, trust or merger. The commissioner would not, as has been suggested, simply ramble round at his sweet will here and there and everywhere, inquiring into this, that, or the other thing; he would be a man particularly fitted to make that specific inquiry. If after the commissioner had made his investigation it was found that a trust, combine, monopoly or merger existed detrimental to the interests of the public, then the matter would be taken up in a court of competent jurisdiction and if guilt was established the penalty would be imposed.

I want to say just this in conclusion. My right hon. friend has stated:

> Let me repeat: All this legislation is simply running in a circle. It is another circle you have to go round; it is just another stump round which you can chase the flat-footed fiend of monopoly.

How different from the language used by the right hon. gentleman in 1919 when the Combines and Fair Prices Act was being proposed. Then he talked as if he were desirous of protecting the public against unfair combinations, but now he and certain of his associates who have spoken would wish to make it appear that there is the same camouflage in this bill as was characteristic of the Combines and Fair Prices Act. I assure hon. members of this House that if I thought there was any such camouflage in the provisions of this bill as were developed and worked out under the Combines and Fair Prices Act, the creature of my right hon. friend's government, I would oppose the measure with every means at my command. If that were the case I should not be here to claim that by this bill it is proposed to give the plain people of Canada an opportunity to secure redress where there may be in effect combines, monopolies, trusts or mergers detrimental to the public interest.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York): I do not intend to follow the hon. gentleman (Mr. Murdock) who has just sat down except to disagree somewhat with the position he has taken, because he is here to-day as the defender of a proposal dealing with combines which has been introduced by the Prime Minister of Canada, which has been endorsed by his government and endorsed by his party, notwithstanding a number of dissentients from his own followers, for last night there was a kind of backfire from his own side of the House. But he is attempting to deal with the question of the regulation of combines and trusts in this country, and he is approaching it in the conventional way—going by the old formula, and the old formula is no good at this time. It is true that the measure before the House now has all the marks of being pontificial. It is a law passed by parliament, and you must obey it; if you do not, look our for yourself. Perhaps!

We have had legislation of that kind in this House for a great many years; the different acts have all been enumerated. Now as an old member of the House and one who has read something in the past, who has studied this question as best he could from his own point of view, I want to give my experience and to suggest a new formula for approaching a situation of this kind. We have a formula now on the statute books, and we have a formula in the past in the records of previous statesmen in this country. They have a very fine phrase in French, which is very significant. They speak of L'Action Catholique or catholic action, L'Action Agricole or farmers' action or the farmers' kick, something that has punch to it. And the punch must come not so much from the act of parliament as from action by the government of the country, who are responsible for the conduct of public affairs and for the relief of grievances that may happen to come before parliament and are in the mouths of the people every day. I mean by direct action on the part of the government.

I am speaking for six hundred thousand women who are to vote in the next election in this country, and a good many of them are to vote in my own province in a few weeks. I am going to say that the greatest combine in Canada to-day is the sugar trust in Montreal, and it is not to be approached and the grievance is not to be remedied by legislation exactly of this kind, although I am going to vote for this measure because all my life I have advocated the regulation of combines and trusts. I am going to do so mainly for this reason, that an opportunity is being given in parliament to-day by the introduction of this bill to direct the attention of the people to these combines and to the necessity of their removal.

Now what is the thing to do in connection with the sugar trust? I do not exactly say, do what Sir John A. Macdonald did in the past but it has been done in parliament, and to-day there is this big sugar combine in Canada and the women of this country are beginning to organize against it, and they will be heard from within a few weeks. The duty of the government to-day in connection with that sugar combine is to exercise the powers conferred on them as a government. The Minister of Finance is coming down to this House on Friday with his budget proposals and his revision of the tariff. Now what I would suggest—and I make this suggestion to the Prime Minister and his party and to the government—is that their immediate duty in dealing with this sugar combine is to send a straight and short message to the sugar combine in Montreal: If you do not by Friday afford relief to the housekeepers and every citizen of this country who uses sugar, by a reduction of the price, there will be a reduction in the duty on sugar.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): That is practical politics. That is dealing with combines in the way they ought to be dealt with, and that is the only way to deal with them. I have seen these matters brought up in the courts for forty years. I have seen it as a young man, as a member of this House, as a newspaper man. I have seen it and I know where action of that kind always ends. But what you want is a strong man in office. A strong Prime Minister and a strong government in office, with a strong party behind them, who will regulate these trusts and send these short telegrams to these men saying: If you do not have the price changed by Friday, look out! The way to put the fear of God into these men is by direct action of that kind.

Just to give the House an illustration of what a combine is, we have what is thought to be by a great many people a banking combine in Canada. I met an old friend of mine the other day, and he made a reference to the Merchants' Bank and what occurred in connection with it. He said, "Mr. Maclean, if my old friend Mr. Courtney—at one time Deputy Minister of Finance—had been there when the disclosures were made about the Merchants' Bank he would have had the bank directors and president here in Ottawa in ten hours and said to them: If you do not correct this abuse and stop this waste of the funds of the bank, as it should have been stopped, immediate action will be taken." There would then have been a different story in regard to the Merchants' Bank. Action is not in courts: action is in the government and is the thing necessary. The action is in the Prime Minister. The action is in his party, and the action in regard to combines to-day is to intimate to these men: If there is no relief in the price of sugar by Friday, look out!

I will go a step further. If the sugar combine does not pay attention to the women housekeepers of Canada, and half a million of them are going to vote in the next election, if it does not pay attention to this condition of affairs I would have the Minister of Finance wire to two great banks, the Royal Bank with headquarters at Montreal, one whose president is Sir Herbert Holt, and to the Bank of Nova Scotia with headquarters in Toronto, and I would tell these banks who are behind the sugar combine that if relief is not afforded to the housekeepers and the people of this country, men, women and children, for everyone uses sugar, and a high price is being put on it, then we as the government of Canada will not give you the facilities we are giving you now for rediscount. Provide the money yourselves for the sugar trust. If that did not have the desired effect I would send another telegram to the Canadian Manufacturers' Association. I know a good deal about them. I have been more or less a friend of theirs in the past. I believe in protection in this country, but I do not believe in the extortion of trusts. I would send a wire to the Manufacturers' Association and I would say: If this thing is not regulated by the sugar trust, and is not to be regulated by the banks that are behind the sugar trust, we are going to revise the tariff on some other things. The next organizations to be dealt with should be the combines that control textiles, enamelled ware, and other commodities of domestic use. It is no good to say, "We will send you to the courts. We are going to appoint a registrar to hold hearings in private"—as some gentlemen want; and the same thing applies if held in public—"to inquire into the grievances of the public." The government should say, "We are going to find out what are the grievances of the public. We are Liberals and we consider it to be our duty to afford relief to the people. We are to get the public that relief and we are about to get it in a quick way."

Now, as to the sugar combine I want to say something else. That sugar combine wrecked more Canadian capitalists who put their money into the securities of the sugar trust than almost any other organization I know of; and I think if the leader of the government were to ask some of his old colleagues who had experience of the sugar trust they would tell him some surprising things. The situation, however, resolves itself into this—that relief lies more in action on the part of the government than in making laws and appointing judges, sending for the constable and hauling men into court. The great thing is for the government to send out an order that within so many hours this thing, which is very unfair to the public, must end. They are coming to that in other countries. In the United States Mr. Hoover is trying to deal with these questions, and in some respects he is getting relief. Previous presidents of the United States, including Mr. Taft, and their attorney generals, have dealt with this matter and have found that the only effective way to deal with these people is to summon them to Washington or to Ottawa and say "You must do so and so. You may show me if I am wrong and if you do so the government will listen to you. If you cannot, the public are entitled to get relief and we will see that they get it through action on our part in regard to the tariff." Mr. Harding is probably going to take some action along this line when he starts his campaign for the next presidential election in the course of two or three weeks.

Now let me take up another point. It is all very well to say that we will apply the law. The government are making some progress under previous legislation that we had but it was not effective. That is the great thing, it was not effective, and it did not deal with the situation but had the matter referred to the courts. Why, in the great court case of Jarndyce vs. Jarndyce, of which Dickens tells us, how many years did it take to get a verdict? There is a quick method of settling public grievances to-day and it does not lie so much in legislation as in action on the part of the government in power. In short, my contention is that this legislation will not be as efficacious as action on the part of the government if they choose to exercise the power. It is up to them to take action and it is up to the public to make its wishes known when there is an election if the government do not take that action. We must remember that there has been a great addition to the voting power of the country now that women are entitled to vote. The woman has arrived in politics, she is in this House, and she is out in public life to exercise her vote. It is all very well for newspapers to show their regard for women by instructing them in matters of fashion and dress; and giving details of the wedding of the Duke and Duchess of York and the presents received by the royal pair. The real question to the women of this country is housekeeping, and sugar is one of the great items that enters into the question. A sugar trust exists in this country. We are about to revise the tariff, on Friday next, and I ask what action will the government take on the protest of the 600,000 women throughout Canada who now have votes?

There is a combine—so the farmers tell us—indeed evidence has been given before a parliamentary committee to that effect—in shipping in this country. That combine has treated the farmers infamously in regard to freight rates. Well, it does not need any legislation to regulate the actions of that combine. They now enjoy rights in connection with the canals. Those waterways are owned by the people and they should refuse the shipping trust the use of our canals. Or the government could order the directors of the National railways, which now belong to the people, to reduce rates and thus serve the interest of the public as against the shipping trust. It is not necessary to do that by legislation; it could be done by the government. Action on the part of the government is the effective way to do it. As to the shipping trust I am going to tell the Prime Minister and the Minister of Railways something; there is a suspicion in the minds of a great many people that the National Railways are a party to this shipping trust. That ought to be investigated. If that be the case, Sir Henry Thornton has probably come into it by inheritance. If it is the case that there is an understanding between the National Railways and the shipping trust by which shipping rates are maintained, it ought to be made possible for the farmers to ship their grain by railway. Now, the regulation of all this does not lie in legislation. As I have already said it lies in action on the part of the government in controlling and regulating the use of the canals and, at some points, the harbour dues. In a hundred different ways a combine can be reached by the power that is vested in the government when the public are treated unfairly.

Now, as to the alleged combination of the banks: They are up now for legislation, and we also have the question of securing credit for the farmers of Canada which apparently they need. It may be true that that relief is not to come by way of money advanced by the banks, but by way of the creation of new organizations—loan banks as they are called in the United States—or in other ways. It is up to the government to see that practical legislation is enacted along this line and not leave this matter so much to the banks.

I want to give the Prime Minister credit for what he is doing here to-day; he is approaching the question in the legislation that he has brought down. But there is something that follows from that action on his part. Does he know that if he does not make good in these matters he is simply preparing a rod for his own back? That is the point the Prime Minister should bear in mind; he will be judged by what he does, and most of all by what he does in connection with the sugar combine. I am sorry the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) is not here. I would like to impress my views upon him, but he will hear of them sooner or later. And the sugar combine will read to-morrow what I have said and they may be shaking in their shoes. I would like to know what that great newspaper the Montreal Star will have to say when it reads that a proposal was made in parliament to give relief to the housewives of Canada from these enormous sugar charges.

I have tried to present the real issue and to show what is to be done. There are many combines. I confess that I am a protectionist and I am glad that Canada has built up her industries by a system of protection. But these industries must be square with the people who give them privileges, and with parliament which passes the legislation that concerns the welfare of the country. There has been great profiteering. There never was such an era of profiteering, some of it under government regulations, as we have witnessed during and since the war. The war is not altogether responsible for present conditions. The profiteering which has taken place since the war has had a most far-reaching effect, and is going to stay with us, not only through our lives, but through the lives of our children, and we are not going to recover until we get down to hard facts and wherever we find a wrong, to right it, and to compel reparations, which is the phrase used now in connection with the war. That will be accomplished by the efficiency, the power, the study and the determination of the government of the day. So far as the present act is an attempt to follow previous legislation, I will give the government credit for it, but let them remember that they are on trial now. It is not the sugar trust that is on trial at the present time so much as it is the government which has introduced this legislation. If it affords some relief the government will get credit for it in the country. The people want relief to-day from the shipping combine, and in the regulation of our national railways, if these are a party in any sense to the shipping combine, and in the regulation of the other trusts and combines which exist in the country. In common with other hon. members of the House, I have been flooded with appeals from the druggists and other combinations. They have presented a special appeal containing very scientific terms. They are saying "Do not deal with our combine." But parliament has to deal with these combines, and is to-day trying to deal with them. The government has introduced something which is not the real remedy, and I am urging to-day that the real formula for dealing with the trust is by direct action by the government, and that action lies through the tariff. We are going to have the tariff resolutions on Friday and will have a debate next week. We will then hear from the women, and I hope the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) will listen in on the wires and see whether he is with the women of this country and is going to fight their battles against the sugar and other trusts, because there are many trusts in this country. These trusts are growing and becoming more insolent and defiant every day. I will tell the House what they are doing, as I see it every day in the committees. The danger in this country is in creating a bloc made of members of the two parties against the national ownership of the railways and against any legislation for the regulation of combines in this country. People ask why should we have three parties in this country when previously we only had two? But you see three parties coming, and they are going to be here for some time. Some people think we are to get rid of them, but parliamentary government is progressing and not going backward. New things turn up. I never was so surprised as when I read in an English newspaper what was going on over there, and read the arguments presented by the best papers in England about the regulation of combines and the building combines that exist. I do not refer to the daily press but to the weekly press.

I am going to close with a reference to a matter which is rather apropos of the present situation. There never was a more sensational week in the history of the New York exchange than last week. Many small investors were closed out; tens of millions of money embarked in stock speculations were lost and will never come back. Queer actions occurred on the stock exchange yesterday, and other things have happened concurrently with the doings on the New York stock exchange. Wheat fell 5 cents a bushel and cotton fell to a much greater extent. The Standard Oil Company has seen fit to reduce the price of gasoline; but sugar goes up, because there is combine in sugar, and there is not a combine in wheat or in cotton. Wherever there has been a combine, or wherever a parliamentary group can be organized irrespective of parties in parliament to protect these combines, it is being done. I do not know what the outcome of those incidents in the New York stock exchange of last week will be. I am afraid there is a great financial crisis ahead of us. It may be arriving now, and we have an opportunity to-day, in dealing with the tariff, to compel the combines which have used that tariff to deal unfairly with the people of Canada, to right these wrongs. On behalf of the people of Canada I draw the attention of the government to the new formula, and the only practical formula for dealing with combines at this time; that is by direct action on the part of the government, and by telling these combines that if they do not give relief they will be forced to do it by tariff withdrawals. They must not depend on the tariff of this country; the steamship companies must not depend on the use of the canals in the country, and the banking group must not depend on the discounting power of the government in connection with re-discounting. They must be told that only those who treat the people fairly in the matter of combinations will have the favour of the government and of the party in power. As I have always been a protectionist and a friend of the manufacturers, I think the statement may well come from me that the only way to bring these men to time in Canada and in the United States is by the exercise of the power vested in the government and in parliament by way of legislation. But there is a still more efficacious way, and that is by the formula which I have laid before the House, namely that of direct action.

Mr. ROBERT FORKE (Brandon): I was a little astonished last evening in listening to the very mild arguments that were presented in favour of this bill by hon. members from the other side of the House. In fact, I can almost say that some of them condemned it by the same phrase.

I wish to refer to remarks made by the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean). I am very pleased indeed to listen to some of the advice and the recommendations that he has made to the right hon. Prime Minister. I hope the Prime Minister will listen to the advice given him, more especially when the hon. member called attention to the fact that a deputation of the women of this country was going to call upon him. If hon. members will notice, the subject under discussion by the hon. member for South York was a very sweet one, and consequently worthy of very great attention. I listened with a great deal of pleasure to the speech made by the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr.

Evans) last evening. I notice a considerable resemblance between the speech of the free trader and that of the protectionist, when they begin to deal with the subject of combines. The only difference I noticed between the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Evans) and the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean), is the fact that one would cut off the dog's tail by inches, and the other would take it right off at the root. I have hopes that as days go by, my hon. friend from South York will find a warm reception over in this corner of the House. I do not think we are very far apart. He consoles himself every now and then by repeating that he is a friend of the manufacturers and he is in favour of protection.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): I am in favour of industries prospering in this country.

Mr. FORKE: We in this part of the House can repeat the formula with a little change. We are in favour of just as much free trade as is possible in Canada, and we are also in favour of the manufacturers so after all I do not think there is a great deal of difference between us.

Last night I heard some discussion as to who the people of Canada were and during that discussion there came into my mind an old phrase which, perhaps, most hon. members have heard. The people generally mean the class of people in whom we are particularly interested. We are all fond of talking about "the people," and perhaps some of us have heard of the tailors of Toole street, who put at the top of their paper "We, the people of England." So I imagine some of us view things along pretty much the same lines. We are all in favour of doing what we believe to be in the interest of the people, only we have different points of view, and it makes a great deal of difference from what angle we view any subject which is under our consideration. I do not think any of us have anything to say against combinations as such. We believe we are living in a day when people are getting together to work for their mutual advantage. At the same time I have no sympathy with the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth), when he says that he believes these combinations are only moving toward a time when we shall have what might be called socialism, when it will be one great combine and that will be the state. There is in the Anglo-Saxon nature something that will always prevent such a combination, because deeply embedded in our nature is the feeling that we always want to have something which we can call our own. I do not care how much a person may prove, in theory, the beneficial effects of socialism, it will never find a resting place among the Anglo-Saxon people.

A few words were said last night as regards newspaper monopoly. Perhaps this is one of the most dangerous monopolies that we can possibly have in a civilized country. We are sometimes inclined to criticize, to find fault with the press; but we cannot possibly do without it; it is the only means of information which we have. I can think of circumstances away back on the prairies, where the people living on their farms have only one source of information and that is the daily paper coming to their homes each evening. They do not know aything about what is occurring anywhere in our Dominion, or in the world, excepting through that paper. How important therefore, it is that we should have news of the best description, news that is accurate, reliable and trustworthy. It is so long since I have looked over the Progressive platform, that I have almost forgotten some of the planks contained in it; but I am quite safe because I know they were founded on good and sound principles, and I am pretty nearly sure to come along the beaten path with regard to that. I know there was a plank at the time—and I think it is there yet—that in every newspaper there should be some sort of statement as to who controls its policy and who owns the stock. If we had that information, we could sometimes read between lines and form an accurate judgment as to the reliability of the information contained in a newspaper.

I notice many speakers, whenever they have anything to say about monopolies or combinations, always refer to the wheat board and the attempt that the farmers in the West made to get a monopoly in the selling of wheat. I have given up all hope of ever enlightening some hon. friends as to exactly what that meant, because I do not think we shall ever be able to do so after the months that have passed and the many speeches and explanations that have been made. I will only repeat again that any attempt that was made was simply a matter of stabilizing the price during the season, so that all should reap an equal advantage. I do not think anyone ever thought for a moment that the wheat board would add one cent to the price of wheat in England; the idea was that it would stabilize the price over the different months of the year.

In connection with the bill at present under discussion, I believe it is a move in the right direction. I do not think it will altogether accomplish the ends intended just as long as we have a protective tariff. I know it is usually the custom, when speaking of hon. members from this part of the House, to make out that we are out-and-out free traders. I want to make this explanation at this particular time. While I believe free trade is the right principle, we must remember that we are up against, not a treaty, not a theory but a circumstance in this country at the present time, and consequently it is necessary that we should have some revenue. Therefore, so long as the tariff is a means of getting revenue, perhaps we have not so much criticism to offer in these days as we might have under other conditions.

I want to say a few words in connection with some combinations that have been working in restraint of the agricultural communities. Not very long ago I asked the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) a question in connection with the shipment of cattle. We know there has already been an investigation as regards ocean rates, and we are perfectly satisfied and convinced that a combination exists there to take the last cent possible out of shipments of cattle. One of the difficulties we have to meet in agriculture at the present time is the loss of morale amongst the agricultural people. I know they are carrying a heavy load of indebtedness upon their shoulders; but at the same time farmers, as a class, are optimists and, as a rule, they look hopefully toward the future, believing that "man never is, but always to be blest." But at present there is a certain lack of morale from the very fact that no matter what may be their exertions, no matter what crops they may raise, the practical outcome will be the same. I speak from experience. I have raised big crops and small crops; but I have always found at the end of the year's transactions, that matters have been so manipulated that only a bare living has been left to the man who has produced the wealth. That is why we want to get to the bottom of combinations in restraint of trade or for the purpose of taking undue advantage of the privileges they have acquired. I have no doubt that all members of this House are anxious for the prosperity and welfare of this Dominion; but at this particular time I would make a plea for the common people, the working people, who after all are just as essential for the welfare of Canada as are our business classes. Every now and then when any attempt is made to adjust any difficulties, we hear this cry: "It will disturb business." Business, apparently, is regarded as something sacred and holy that you must not interfere with. When I think of the hundreds and thousands of men and women scattered throughout this country who are making their living by daily toil, I am not so tremendously afraid of business; business can take care of itself.

I do not intend to take up any more of the time of the House at present. I will support the bill because I believe it is a move in the right direction. I do not for a moment believe it is going to cure all the evils that exist at the present time. I believe those can be cured only when trade shall flow freely backward and forward in all directions. One of the evils to-day is not the tariff alone. Some people think we look upon the tariff as the cause of all the evils that have overtaken agriculture in these days. The tariff is infinitesimal in comparison with the evils that result from it. In itself it would not be so obnoxious, but it makes possible the very things we are trying to get at and to cure with the present bill. I believe therefore that this is an attempt in the right direction. While it will not cure the whole evil it will at least help to do so, and I am inclined to give it my support. I listened with interest to the very able criticism of the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen). I am always pleased to follow the criticisms of that right hon. gentleman and I admire his ability, his industry and his energy. In this case, however, I think his criticism was peculiarly weak and lacking in power or conviction. Possibly I have said enough.

Mr. ANDREW McMASTER (Brome): A sad but imperative duty compelled me to miss the very interesting debate that took place yesterday, but I have listened attentively to what has been said to-day and have endeavoured to acquaint myself somewhat with the progress of the debate which occupied the attention of the House yesterday. This bill seems to me to be a step in the right direction. I do not propose to discuss it in detail; I think that a great deal of the discussion which took place yesterday might very properly have been reserved until the bill is in committee, when hon. members on both sides of the House will have an opportunity of offering those suggestions which they think fit for the perfecting of the machinery of this legislation. It seems to me that on the second reading of the bill we should discuss its spirit and essence. Is there a need for such legislation as we have before us this afternoon?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Mr. McMASTER: That there is such a need all parties in the House are agreed. The leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) while he was one of the foremost members of the administration which preceded the present government, placed on the statute books legislation not dissimilar in character. I do not intend here to enter into any acrimonious discussion as to whether that legislation was right or wrong, whether it was well-conceived or ill-conceived, or whether it functioned to the benefit or to the prejudice of the people. The point I wish to make is this, that in the opinion of the Conservative party of that day, called at that time the Unionist party, it was necessary to have such legislation. Any of us who have examined the industrial and economic structure of our country as it exists at this time are all, I am sure, absolutely convinced that the economic and industrial life of Canada is honeycombed with combines and rings of all sorts. I do not think there is any possibility of dispute so far as that is concerned. It has been said that all combines are not bad. That may be true. There may be that rara avis in our economic life, the beneficent combine, the gathering together of manufacturers or middlemen for the purpose of reducing costs of production or of distribution and of giving the benefit of that reduction to the consumer. I would gladly welcome the acquaintanceship of such a combine, and in the words of the president of the Privy Council of years gone by I would desire to give my tribute of praise to any such institution. When I see such a combination as that I shall not be chary in the expression of my appreciation. But I am afraid that a calm and cool survey of the situation will bring most of us to the unbiassed conclusion that as a rule combines are not made for the purpose of reducing prices but of maintaining or raising them. There is therefore obviously some necessity for somebody to control combines. There is only one objection which in theory is perhaps a sound objection to legislation of this kind, and that is that it interferes with the freedom which should characterize human endeavour; and if we lived in this country under a system by means of which trade could flow freely into and beyond our boundaries, then I would hesitate before giving approval to legislation of this sort. But we cannot get immediately that "consummation devoutly to be wished," and while we maintain to any substantial degree the protective principle we have to protect the consumers of the country against the exactions of those people who take advantage of the tariff wall in order, in a circumscribed and comparatively narrow market, to charge all that traffic will bear, to the deriment of the consumer. I think that is the sound answer to the otherwise perhaps sound objection against such legislation as this, that it interferes with people conducting their own business in their own way. That being the case, I think we are pretty well all agreed as to the necessity for the legislation.

[Mr. McMaster.]

I have little to reply to in the remarks made by the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean) and the leader of the third party in the House (Mr. Forke). With a great deal of what they said I am in entire accord. It is interesting, however, to note that one of the fathers of protection in this country, one of the admirers of Sir John A. Macdonald, who imposed protection on the country in 1878, has had to speak with such utter frankness of what has grown up under the system. The system, he says, is not at fault; the system is a good one. But unfortunately there have been a large number of "growths" around the system. The question, to my mind, is whether a system can be characterized as good which brings about such unhappy results. However, I am not here to seek occasions for difference but to endeavour to find common ground of accord. It seems to me that we should pass this bill into committee of the whole House, or, if the government think it well, refer it to a special committee for further investigation and study. I indicate two courses of procedure, but I do not give my preference to either. But all the representatives of the people in this House should, I think, join in giving the principle of the bill their hearty support. Let no false impression go abroad from this House to any special interests in the country that there is any particular feeling of sympathy in any corner of the House, with those who, placed in strategic positions in the structure either of production or of distribution, propose to take advantage of such positions. Let that be clearly understood. We may differ as to methods; some may incline to one method of procedure and some to another. But let it be understood that the representatives of the Canadian people, no matter what place in this House they may occupy will not stand for extortion or exactions of more than a fair profit in business or in manufacture. Let us get the bill into committee, and, without any attempt to gain party advantage the one at the expense of the other, endeavour to develop the necessary machinery to make the legislation effective. The hon. member for South York anticipated some of the remarks I desired to make in this regard. The resources of civilization are not exhausted when we come to deal with combines and monopolies. Monopoly cannot raise an arrogant head in this country and lead the representatives of the people to understand that they, the monopolists, are masters of the situation and that nothing can be done. We control our ports and harbours, and if we find combinations of shippers who endeavour to charge all that the traffic will bear, and to stifle and suffocate the commerce of the country, we can say to them: If you pursue such methods as these, not one ship of yours shall be allowed to tie up at any public wharf. We can say to those who on the Great Lakes pursue such a policy that not a lock on the canal shall open until fair and just rates for the carriage of our natural and our industrial products shall be agreed upon. That is one weapon, and by no means a small one, which is in the hands of the government.

5 p.m.

Mr. CALDWELL: What about freight rates?

Mr. McMASTER: I was just coming to freight rates; my hon. friend has anticipated me. The people of Canada own the greatest transportation system, in point of mileage, on this continent. Let it be known that those persons, whether middlemen or otherwise, who refuse to deal justly with their fellow men so far as distribution, the cost of distribution or the cost of manufacture are concerned, shall find it mighty difficult to move their goods on the railways of the people. And, last but not least, there is the tariff. As long as a tariff is maintained as an engine for raising revenue—and in my opinion a very expensive engine it is—let it be known that the tariff shall be used as a weapon to defend the rights of the people against the monopolists and that those who charge unjust and unfair prices for what they are able to produce under the shadow of the tariff wall may find that wall reduced or even cut down altogether, in order that it shall be impossible for them to charge their fellow Canadian citizens more than a fair price for a decent article.

These are some of the methods which I think might be incorporated in this bill. I invite to the support of this bill all those in this House who feel that the economic life of Canada is not what it should be. I do not propose that the government should abandon any rights to control freight rates, to control their ports or the tariff, which they now possess. If the government were omniscient the investigatory portions of this bill might be unnecessary, but as long as governments are composed of human beings they will not be either omnipotent or omniscient. Therefore, is there any more reasonable method to pursue than that indicated under the bill—that there should be investigation, and after investigation, action? Whether the investigation should be carried on just as indicated in the bill; whether the action should not be rather larger, rather broader than as narrow as indicated in the bill, are matters which we can discuss, I respectfully suggest, Mr. Speaker, better in committee than when we are sitting as the House. But I do think that this bill deserves the support of all the representatives of the people. I would be glad to see notice given to all monopolists and combinesters in this country, by the unanimous vote of this House, that the heart and the mind of the representatives of the Canadian people are behind this legislation in order that it may have a fair chance and a fair field to bring about the desired end, namely, not the reduction of prices irrespective of what the goods cost, but a fair deal for the consumer as well as for the producer.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (North Toronto): Mr. Speaker, there will be ample opportunity to discuss the details of this bill when we go into committee, this the second reading is the occasion for discussion of the general principles of the bill. For that reason I am going to say only a few words this afternoon. But, coming from a city that has had a great deal to do with the Board of Commerce—perhaps more to do with it than all the rest of the municipalities of Canada put together because we have had more applications before it—I would like to make a few remarks regarding the proposed legislation.

I would like to help the government in the work they have before them, but I am sorry that they have seen fit to bring down such a bill as that now before us. If you read the bill from cover to cover; if you carefully examine the definition of "combines," "registrar," and so on; if you look into the machinery provided for the enforcement of the act, it will be seen that the general principle of the bill is based on the old Board of Commerce and the Combines and Fair Prices Act. The denouncing of capital is very popular with some, particularly at election time. Personally I would not want to be an employer to-day, having regard to the high taxes and the high prices which are general throughout the country. The lot of the employer or of the capitalist is not an easy one, by any means. I know a great many capitalists interested in private enterprises who work as hard as, if not harder than, any labouring man in Canada, who spend large sums to improve their business, and who in many cases give a lot of their money away to the public. In some respects they are more sinned against than sinning. I say it is a popular act with some hon. members of this House to denounce from the housetops, trusts and combines and restraints of trade. We had a speech this afternoon from the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock). No gentleman in the late election went further than he did concerning what would be done to the combines and trusts if he was returned as the member for South Toronto. This subject is a predominant one in Toronto, particularly among the working classes. I may say that the working classes in Canada have themselves done more to regulate the trusts and combines by not buying when prices are increased than all the legislation I have seen. We hear a great deal about the big interests, particularly at election time; it has been said that we on this side are the allies of the big interests, that was said, indeed, by the hon. Minister of Labour himself in the election campaign in South Toronto.

Now, what are these "big interests" that are referred to? They are, first, the transportation and shipping interests; second, the manufacturers and the Manufacturers' Association; third, the banking interests and trusts and combines along these lines. What has the minister done to regulate these trusts during the two years that he has been in office? There is no country in the world to-day in which the big interests flourish like a green bay tree, without let or hindrance, as they do in the Dominion of Canada. Canada is the happy hunting ground for all these American trusts and combines. Take the restaurant trust to-day—Child's, Bowles' and all these places. They are well established in the big cities of the United States, and they have crossed to Canada. They are subject to public regulation in the United States; inquiries have been made respecting them and prosecutions taken against them to bring down the prices, but nothing of that kind has been done in Canada.

It has been said that the party system in Canada has fallen down in its regulation of trusts. I am sorry that this question has been made the political football of this party or that party. In fact, both political parties are in the same boat in this respect; they have done what they could to try to regulate these trusts and combines on behalf of the public but have failed. I wish to give the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) a certain amount of credit, in connection with this particular matter, for bringing down this bill for debate for he has long been a student of labour. Hon. members criticize the party system for not having done something to regulate the trusts and combines; I wish to criticize the United Farmers of Ontario and the group system for having fallen down in this matter. The hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean) has said that there is a shipping trust on the Great Lakes. So there is. And there is a sugar trust. Anyone who will take Houston's Financial Annual will see the large number of mergers that have been formed in recent years. The city of Toronto spent about $10,000 at the request of this Board of Commerce, of which the present Minister of Labour was one of the members, to secure data for them. There was a general complaint among the working classes and those receiving small salaries that they could not get a good lunch in a restaurant under anywhere from 60 or 75 cents to $1. A bit of a sandwich would cost 25 or 30 cents; corn, which could be bought at about 15 to 18 cents a dozen, would be sold at 35 or 40 cents each; tomatoes retailing at 35 cents a basket would sell at 35 cents a plate in some restaurants and hotels. The women's organizations sent a deputation to the Toronto City Council and Board of Control; they filled the council chamber—several hundred of them—and asked that we should do something regarding the prices of certain food products. It was pointed out to them what the law was, that section 498 of the Criminal Code had been suspended because of the Board of Commerce Act of 1919 and the Combines and Fair Prices Act. So the medical health officer, Dr. Hastings, was requested to make a survey of the situation in Toronto, at the request of the Board of Commerce which he did at great expense to the taxpayer. He made a survey and collected enough evidence to fill a trunk. It was sent down to the Board of Commerce at Ottawa, who filed and pigeon holed this elaborate report, but nothing further was done. They simply passed the buck to somebody else, as the military authorities say—all that could be done under that particular act.

I give the men who proposed that act credit for being sincere, but with all due respect that act failed, and for many reasons. The Board of Commerce legislation was founded very largely on the successful carrying on of the United States Federal Trade Commission, but the Board of Commerce never got going, and I believe the same will be true of this new board that is to be appointed—I do not believe it will ever get going. Before it gets going the skilled lawyers of the trusts will raise some technicalities and have the legislation before the Privy Council. Some clever lawyer will find a flaw in the drafting, notwithstanding that it has been drafted by the Justice department, and we shall find it declared to be ultra vires of this parliament. The Board of Commerce was founded largely on popular clamour to regulate prices after the war. Popular clamour demanded action by parliament in 1918 and 1919, and in 1919 two acts were passed, but the main features of the Board of Commerce legislation, and the main functions of the board of 1919 never came into operation, owing to members of the board resigning, and owing to the fact that no action was taken on their reports. So the real working functions of the board of 1919 were never performed, and I predict that this new board will never perform its functions either, but will simply become a cypher. In other words the Board of Commerce Act was, and this act will be, "still-born" so far as practical results go.

I may say that profit control was one of the very last functions the Board of Commerce considered—but profit control, should be the main function in the regulation of prices and trusts and combines. The Board of Commerce no doubt did some good work. Mr. O'Connor did very good work in connection with profiteering, and the bacon extortion, and I venture to say that if some war profiteers had been prosecuted, better results would have been obtained. But the war profiteers were in a preferred class in this country. They got away not only with profits but with titles as well.

If I may be permitted a suggestion to the government I would advise them to repeal altogether the legislation of 1919 and adopt some practical legislation such as they have in the United States—the grand jury scheme of inquiry—under which some four hundred and eighty combines, trusts and mergers were prosecuted in one year by federal and state authorities. Take Judge Landis of the city of Chicago; he prosecuted the Standard Oil combine and imposed a fine on that corporation of $50,000,000 under federal legislation. That was practical legislation, not legislation under which you ran round in a circle and when you had got round it handed it over to the provincial Attorney General or passed the buck to another.

The provincial Attorney General in Ontario is in politics and does nothing but talk.

This matter was put up to him but he said: No, let the Dominion government look after it. We laid a bill of indictment before Mr. Justice Kelly and a jury, and we were told that the Crown prosecutor would not take the case, first, because the Attorney General would not approve, secondly, because he had no power inasmuch as the Criminal Code had been superseded by the Board of Commerce Act, and thirdly, because the applicant, the city of Toronto, would have to put up a bond as security for costs and bringing the witnesses there. But in the United States they did get results by the grand jury system of inquiry into trusts and combines and got results quickly.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that some of these mergers are good things. I could name several of them that have been good for the country; when they cut down the overhead and reduce the price of the article. Many of them have done good, but the majority of them have done wrong, and several of them are all wrong and should be regulated. The producer has the law on his side. It is always there in many ways to protect him. The law always favours the producer. But the five-and-ten-dollar consumer, the poor man, finds the legislation all against him. Take the Lord's Day Act, for instance, if a man is rich he can buy ice cream and a box of cigars for Sunday, but the poor man cannot have these luxuries on Sunday because he can only buy a cone or one cigar at a time. It is the same with trusts and combines. A poor man cannot get anywhere in his attack on them. If he wants to lay a charge he is told by the Crown: You will please put up security for costs, and so forth. I would suggest that the government adopt the grand jury system of inquiry as set out in the report of Judge Landis of Chicago. He did a great deal of good work, advised the federal authorities and got results a thousandfold.

I should like to propose this amendment if the government would be good enough to consider it. Of course, I know it cannot be moved to-day, but I should like to bring it to the attention of the government. It has been asked for by many grand juries. I know that a couple of grand juries made a recommendation something like the amendment I have drafted. I propose that the following be added to the bill as section 37, and I shall move this amendment in Committee of the Whole House:

(37) Any grand jury at any sittings of the General Sessions of the Peace, or any grand jury at any sitting of the High Court of Justice, or any grand jury duly and lawfully convened in any province of Canada, may exercise as respects any person or any property within such province any power which by this act may be exercised by the registrar or any commission appointed under this act, without obligation, however, to report to any minister of the Crown, and with power to make a presentment in accordance with the facts found by it.

What I would suggest is that the government repeal the Board of Commerce Act of 1919 and the Combines and Fair Prices Act of 1919, and go back to the old law, section 498 of the Criminal Code. Let us broaden out that section by such an amendment as I have suggested, giving the grand juries power to go into these questions. After all is said and done, the government of the day can do very little in a matter of this kind. There are many problems which governments cannot handle in days of stress and strain like these. There are many problems that the government cannot solve legally or otherwise except with the aid of Providence—and while the government may try to do the best they can and are sometimes criticized unfairly, and sometimes insincerely, the best action to take in this matter is to decentralize the problem. There is nothing like the old law of supply and demand. The people of New York state have been teaching a lesson to the sugar combine and women organizations have been established in New York state to fight that combine by not buying sugar in order to force the price down. The same thing happened over here many years ago among the working classes as they refused to buy certain necessities of life because of the high prices. So while the government may endeavour to do its part, it cannot do all, and it is better for it to decentralize and leave this matter to those who have the necessary time, ability and knowledge—the judges, Crown officers, grand juries and municipal officers. Give them a chance of looking into these questions; and also give the grand juries the opportunity I have suggested, because there is nothing like a little publicity in these matters, and the grand jury will get results that this bill will never get.

I spoke of the city of Toronto's experience with the Board of Commerce and pointed out that we got no action at all. Bearing that in mind it was a funny thing to me to hear the speech of the Minister of Labour this afternoon. He was a member of that Board of Commerce. I do not wish to be unfair to him, but I understand that after all the members of the board had resigned he still remained a member for four months and drew his salary. If he did not believe the board was fulfilling its functions, he should have resigned and not drawn the salary which he did.

Mr. MURDOCK: Apparently the hon. gentleman is not aware that I was not the last member of the Board of Commerce to go. Mr. O'Connor left the Board of Commerce after I did.

Mr. CHURCH: I gladly accept the hon. minister's statement, but he was a judge on the board and acted although he now says his powers were curtailed. I do not know about this particular problem but I do know that when a trunk load of evidence was sent to the Board of Commerce in regard to the operations of certain combines, including American restaurants in the city of Toronto, it was without result. The health officer of that city at the request of the Board of Commerce spent thousands of dollars in collecting evidence with respect to combines of many kinds —restaurant services, boots and shoes, clothing and others. When that evidence was sent down to the Board of Commerce why did they not act? Instead of acting they moved in a circle and wound up by asking the attorney general of the province to institute proceedings. Well, the people of Toronto got disgusted, and what did they do? They laid a complaint before the Board of Police Commissioners stating that exorbitant prices in restaurants were being charged, and excessive prices for milk and the other commodities I have named, which are really necessities of life. That board took prompt action. In the city of Toronto restaurants, for example, cannot operate except under license from the police commissioners. So Colonel Denison and his colleagues, including Judge Winchester and myself, summoned the managers of these American restaurants before the police board and threatened to cancel their licenses unless the rates they were charging were cut in two within one week. Action in the desired direction promptly followed. Before the expiration of the allotted time the prices charged for coffee, toast, vegetables, eggs, and other articles had been reduced by 33 1-3 per cent. This shows that you can get action if you only go the right way about it. I really believe that if we could have periodic inquiries by the grand jury as in the United States into excessive prices we would really make more headway. Personally, I do not think it is fair for the government to introduce a bill of this character so late in the session. The principle involved here is exactly the same as in the legislation of 1919, but the difficulty seems to be for the lawyers to draft a statute in such a way that it will not be declared ultra vires of this parliament.

The tariff is blamed for the condition of affairs that is complained of. In my opinion the tariff is not responsible. The Mother Country is a free trade country and yet mergers, trusts and combines flourish over there. The United States has a protective tariff but over there they enforce the law against trusts and combines. As I have already said the United States federal attorney general, with the assistance of the state attorney general, has prosecuted some 485 combines in one year over there resulting in the imposition upon them of penalties amounting to millions of dollars in the aggregate and the control of prices and mergers. Therefore, you cannot blame the tariff for the existence of these combines. The tariff is blamed for almost everything but in my opinion it is not responsible for this particular problem. The difference between the proposed legislation and that enacted in 1919 is that in the present bill you can by order in council amend the tariff. If a combine is taking advantage of it, or you can revoke a patent found to be operating injuriously to the public you can do that already now in another way. It is also provided that if the Attorney General of a province does not enforce the report of a registrar, the Solicitor General may act in certain cases.

The act of 1919 and the present bill will fail in effect for the same reason that the Board of Commerce failed. Undoubtedly there is a demand for action of some kind. A great many trusts and combines are flourishing in this country. The shipping combine, for example, seems to be most active both in the matter of freight and passenger rates. Formerly one could travel from Toronto to Niagara Falls for $1.25 return but that rate has been increased to $3 and over. Freight rates on fruit, vegetables and farm products carried to cities and towns on the shores of lake Erie and lake Ontario have also been enhanced. The small freight and passenger boats which in former days used to operate with great advantage and convenience to the public have been frozen out by this combine. The matter should be looked into by Mr. Raney the Attorney General of Ontario. This combine, which is a restraint on shipping, could be investigated and remedial action taken if the provincial Attorney General were so inclined under section 498 of the Criminal Code. The same is true of many other combines that are flourishing like a green bay tree.

There is a question involved here as to the power of parliament to enact such legislation in view of the decision given by the Privy Council in 1921 in the case of the Attorney General of Canada vs. the Attorney General of Alberta. It would appear from that judgment that it is very doubtful whether this parliament can enforce such legislation as this proposed bill inasumch as property and civil rights within a province is exclusively a matter for the provincial legislature, and that the federal authority cannot erect a board competent to make regulations affecting trade and commerce which will be of merely local application. This parliament can, however, regulate trade and commerce if its regulations are of general application and for the general advantage of Canada. If parliament goes to the extent proposed in this new legislation before us to-day into the matter of property and civil rights it is very doubtful if it can enforce the act by merely declaring that to violate it is a crime. I would suggest that the proper course to take would be to broaden out section 498 of the Criminal Code so as to enable a grand jury to investigate these and declare the maintenance of mergers, trusts and combines of a wrongful nature a crime. One of the ablest county court judges we had in Toronto was the late Judge Winchester, who was also a police commissioner. Some fifteen or sixteen years ago, he, together with Colonel Denison, police magistrate, took action under this section 498 against certain trusts. They sent down and seized the books of a particular trust complained of and within twenty-four hours those identified with that trust amended their regulations and reduced their prices. As it is now, section 498 of the Criminal Code is practically inoperative. Some time ago a prosecution was started against the milk combine in Toronto under section 498. A bill was preferred against a milk combine, but Mr. Justice Kelly and the crown prosecutor, Mr. White, refused to consider a bill of indictment, because, they said, the powers given under the Criminal Code, section 498, had been superseded by those conferred on the Board of Commerce. I would suggest to the government that they carefully confer with the Justice department and see whether, by broadening section 498 and bringing into operation the functions of grand juries, properly convened, action cannot be taken in the desired direction rather than pass legislation of this character. In that way no harm would be done to capital, to labour, or to any public interest and combines, trusts and restraints of trade would be subject to some practical, useful and effective public control.

Mr. FERNAND RINFRET (St. James): Before the second reading of this bill passes I would like to dispel an impression which may have been created in the minds of hon. gentlemen by certain references of an hon. member to the Canadian Press. The remarks in question were offered by the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Hocken), and were very ably replied to by the Prime Minister whose statement I am glad to substantiate. Unfortunately those remarks have been accepted and commented on by subsequent speakers in this debate. In the first place, I would like to correct the idea that the Canadian Press can prevent the publication of a newspaper in any city in this country, also that this organization is in any sense a "combine of opinion". It is not by any means in the power of the Canadian Press to prevent the publication of any paper in Canada. The only thing they can do, and which they have done in certain cases, is to deny to certain papers applying for it the privilege of the interchange of news which is enjoyed by those papers composing the Canadian Press. That matter I will deal with at some length later on. But the Canadian Press, contrary to the view expressed by some hon. members opposite, is in no sense a "combine of opinion" because the opinion expressed by any paper has no place whatever in the exchange of news among the different papers concerned. What the Canadian Press does is to furnish to its members news of the events transpiring in different localities in Canada. This is merely carrying out on a larger scale the arrangement which formerly existed between the newspapers of Montreal and the newspapers of Quebec for the exchange of local news. In accordance with this arrangement a newspaper in Quebec would wire to its Montreal confrère local happenings of interest, and the Montreal newspaper would reciprocate by sending to Quebec news of interest from its own neighbourhood. It was thought that the papers in different cities of Canada might agree to an exchange of news and that great advantage might accrue, not only to the papers but also to the reading public, because it would enable the different papers to carry the news at a cheaper rate. But again I say, never has the opinion of a paper been called in question. Take for instance the report of the Canadian House of Commons. These reports are published by Tory papers and by Liberal papers and by Progressive organs, because they are merely a compendium of what takes place in the House. If a paper wishes to comment on speeches made in the House, or measures that are being presented by the government, it is for them to engage a special Ottawa correspondent or to take it up in the editorial columns. There is no question of opinion in the alleged combine of the Canadian press. A Tory paper that is a party to that association may later be bought by the Liberal party or by an independent party, yet it would retain the privileges it enjoys in the Canadian Press. I repeat it is not in the power of the Canadian Press to prevent any paper from starting publication in a city where papers belonging to the Canadian Press Association already exist. The only situation that is created is that a paper starting in without the services of the Canadian Press would naturally be placed under a certain handicap, and possibly in that regard the Canadian Press may come more or less within the scope of the bill now before the House. There is not the slightest understanding between any of the papers concerned in the Canadian Press with regard to the rates of advertisement, or the price the paper will charge for copies. I would submit that this news service cannot be handled by a private company. It might be said that it would be better if a private company would undertake to organize a service of that kind and to place it on the market at a certain price so that every paper in the country could buy it. But a private company, not having the machinery and not having the benefit of the organization of the newspapers in different parts of the country could not hope to undertake a service of that kind at a price moderate enough to allow any of the papers to use it. It will also be understood that a service of that kind cannot be unlimited in number of members forming the association. The principle of it is an interchange of news. If you have in that association a paper whose service is limited, and it enjoys the news service of a larger paper for which it does not give a corresponding news service, there certainly would be a lack in the organization that would not be for the good of the newspapers concerned generally or for the good of the public that it is intended to serve.

On the other hand, we cannot forget that this association gets a subsidy from the government, and it looks very much as if it came to a point where the government was subsidizing a certain number of papers and leaving it in the hands of those papers to refuse admission of other papers in their association. I may say, quoting from memory, that article 7 of the charter of the Canadian Press of 1914 grants to the association the privilege of establishing regulations for the admission and expulsion of members. Possibly there is there too great a liberty given to the association. I would think that if the charter were amended in such a way that the Canadian Press could not refuse admission of papers applying for admission under certain conditions, we might remedy that part of it. But as I am connected with a paper which is now in the association of the Canadian Press, I thought it would be well, before the bill is read the second time, to give this explanation to the House. Personally I do not think, outside of that point, that these papers are enjoying a subsidy of public money, I do not think there is anything wrong with the arrangement at all. I would say that if this bill is given effect to it might form the subject of an investigation, but I am quite sure the Canadian Press could withstand an investigation, and could show that its alleged combine is merely an arrangement whereby the Canadian public are getting news from all over the Dominion, not of a political or contentious character, but merely facts, and they are getting it at a cheaper price than they could if that association did not exist.

I fully agree with the principle of this bill. Some hon. member asked last night, what is the principle of the bill? I think the principle is clear. It is giving the taxpayer an efficient weapon against combines. It has been argued against the bill that it is useless because section 498 of the Criminal Code deals with combines. It has also been argued against the bill that the proceedings provided are too long and of a circuitous character. It has also been argued that the registrar should have wider powers and also a penalizing power. Other arguments have been presented to the effect that this bill could be abused, and that we must protect trade against any demand for inquiry that would not be warranted, and also that we must have secrecy in the proceedings in order to prevent blackmailing or anything of that character. I think all these arguments presented against the bill answer themselves. The reason why the proceedings are of the character the bill provides for, and the reason why the registrar is not given too extended power, is precisely to prevent what other members are afraid the bill might do; that is that it might serve, in the hands of an unscrupulous man or group of unscrupulous men, a wrong purpose. I think it is perfectly right that the registrar should not have absolute power, and that his power should be merely, as the bill provides, to establish an inquiry. It is also perfectly right that whatever company is inquired into should have the right to present its defence. I believe that the argument presented by the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) that it was a wrong principle to give a chance to the accused party to know of an accusation and give that party time to answer the accusation, is a very wrong argument and altogether un-British. I think the bill is along the right lines. This bill gives the public an opportunity to apply to a registrar for an inquiry, something which it could not do under the criminal code on account of the expenses that would be involved. It gives to the registrar power to restrict that inquiry, but it gives to the accused parties an opportunity to present their defence. I have sympathy for the proposal that has been made by some hon. members, including the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler), that a certain secrecy should be kept over these proceedings as long as the accused party has not been found guilty, because this would be the best means to prevent any group of men from using this bill, not to fine a combine but merely to serve some other purpose.

In conclusion, I hope this bill will attain its end, not only by providing means to suppress existing combines, but, if it proves an efficient weapon in the hands of the people, by preventing the formation of combines in future. I believe that this should be the aim of all legislation, not only to remedy what evil already exists, but to prevent that evil from spreading in the future.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Hon. J. B. M. BAXTER (St. John City and Counties of St. John and Albert): After the number of speeches that we have heard upon this subject, which is an important one, I do not know whether I am acting wisely in continuing to occupy the time of the House, as very much of the discussion will properly proceed upon the details of the measure when we are considering it in committee section by section. Yet there are some general observations which have occurred to me and which I feel are fundamental with respect to the measure, and that is my excuse for troubling the House after the debate has already proceeded so extensively.

In the first place, even at the risk of uttering some generalities, I think I may say that the speakers have been generally, if not entirely, in accord in recognizing as perhaps fundamental that combines, trusts and mergers are not necessarily injurious to the public interest. On the other hand, it is common experience that under certain circumstances, and carried on in a certain way, combines, trusts and mergers may produce a very great injury to the public. I think we can all see that, in the very formation of great aggregations of capital or industry, the world is slowly working out the problem of co-operation which, in some form or other, perhaps one or perhaps many generations after the present time, will find a different method of adjusting human relationships from that which we now possess. It is not unnatural perhaps from this side of the House for me to take the traditionally Conservative view of desiring to be assured of what the next step is going to be before I take it. It is not to be wondered at that a certain portion of the community, which I might describe as radical, desires to take some extraordinary step regardless of consequences and rather for the sake of experimentation. Between the two seems to lie the traditionally Liberal view—I do not know whether I interpret it aright—of not saying whether they are going to take any step or not, but of waiting for things to turn up.

I do not wish to be understood as being opposed to legislation of the character which has been introduced in the House. Some remarks have fallen from the lips of hon. members rather intimating that there was no sincerity on the part of the previous government in dealing with this question. Some have said that the previous methods have not been effective. Really, Mr. Speaker, I would rather attribute that feature of the discussion, which we have heard in this Chamber, more to a desire to exploit the subject for political capital than to any real wish to bring something to bear upon the present measure and to discuss it on its merits, offering, if they can be made, helpful suggestions for the working out of the act. The past must always be the past, and I trust we are living in the present and looking toward the future; and it is for us, if we do not think that a suggested remedial measure reaches what is really perhaps a danger point in our civilization, to contribute something to the perfecting of that measure. I intend that what I say to-night shall be directed to that end, because before I conclude I trust I shall be able to make some suggestions which I believe would enable the present government and this parliament more effectively to deal with a question of this character than we are able to do under present circumstances.

Among the criticisms that we have heard of the past legislation was the remark of one hon. member that we had now got legislation with a kick in it, as he expressed it. I think I may fairly claim for past administrations, whether they have been Liberal or Conservative, that they have each and all recognized the difficulties which may be presented by some form of commercial combination and have each put forward some means of remedying this state of affairs, which means was thought to be adequate at the time it was promoted. I think the House could fairly agree to that; and it will be conceded, I have no doubt, that the measure introduced in the time of Sir John A. Macdonald was quite sufficient to meet the evils that appeared in his time; that later legislation which was introduced by my right hon. friend, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) was believed by him and his party to be adequate for such evils as existed at that time; and that when we come down to the Board of Commerce and the combines legislation my right hon. friend who leads this side of the House (Mr. Meighen) was presenting what was believed to be the most adequate and the latest development in legislation for dealing with difficulties of the character that was being experienced in that day. Surely we must give some credit for a little honour and sincerity of purpose in public life; and I think that the House would do much better to trace the legislation step by step to see where improvements have been made and to find out what gaps, if any, have been left unfilled, and view the present proposition in the light of that history and present experience, with the object of getting some measure, if the present one is not the best, that will be adequate to meet the situation. It is entirely in that spirit, as I say, that I wish to approach the question.

Now, we have to start practically from the Board of Commerce Act and the Combines and Fair Prices Act. There was legislation that I do not think can fairly be described as a wooden gun; it did not in any way lack a kick. The power was there for investigation, for prosecution, for punishment. If the old code provisions, about which I hope to say something before I get through, were not sufficient, at all events the government in 1919 took steps, by two reciprocal measures, to rid the country so far as possible of all unfair dealing in the necessaries of life and in articles of trade and commerce. I do not understand, I cannot find from the records, that a single criticism was offered at that time as to the possible ineffectiveness of the legislation. There was some criticism that the legislation was going too far, but we never heard, I think, on the floor of this House the suggestion that the legislation was in any way outside the competence of this parliament. Now, what happened? The legislation was called into question. We must expect that; every interest that is struck by legislation will naturally turn to the courts and look for relief. Certain interested parties did that; the case was ultimately submitted to the Privy Council, and whether we like it or not, whether or not we think it ought to be the law, we are bound to accept their decision as the law in this respect, and there is no appeal for us except to the supreme law-making assembly, the parliament of Great Britain.

What did the Privy Council decide? I will not trouble the House by reading lengthy extracts from the judgment, but I think I can put it on this ground: The Privy Council recognized, as it must recognize, the division of powers as between the Dominion and the provinces as laid down by the British North America Act; that in the enumeration of powers vested solely in the province we have property and civil rights within the provinces, and that there is no power in this parliament to trench upon property and civil rights except in some mode ancillary to carrying out some one or more of the powers which are expressly and exclusively confided to this parliament by the British North America Act. I think that any layman, and a great many lawyers, in looking at the British North America Act and studying the allocation of subjects which are within the exclusive jurisdiction of parliament, would have said that the words "trade and commerce" were ample to confer all possible and requisite jurisdiction upon this parliament. But a decision of the Privy Council has laid it down that the vast business of insurance, which has grown so mightily in the last few decades, is not a subject falling within trade and commerce. The Privy Council went much further when the Combines and Fair Prices Act was submitted to it. The Privy Council said that unless the subjects dealt with fell within trade and commerce, this parliament had no power over them at all. It went even a step farther and declared that you could not decide that a thing that fell within the class of "property and civil rights" within a province was noxious and, having decided that, take it out of the class of property and civil rights by calling it an infraction of the criminal law. Whether we like this as a decision or whether we do not, it is the law that binds us today and it is the principle by which the act submitted by the right hon. Prime Minister must be judged. So that one of the objects of my address this evening is to clear away, if I can, what I humbly think are some misconceptions that prevail in this Chamber with regard to the power and the ability of the measure which has been presented.

I have heard hon. members discussing a subject into the details of which I do not propose to enter, namely, the regulation by an association of newspapers of a certain franchise. I know that some hon. members honestly feel that all that it is necessary to do is to get this bill enacted into law and that they will then be able to use the investigator and resort to the courts in order to obtain a franchise for a newspaper which is now being denied a franchise. Well, all I can say is that in the light of the decisions to which I have referred, that is a complete misconception of the law. I am not afraid of being treated as a prophet; in fact, there is no prophecy involved in it. You can adopt every syllable of this bill and there will be no relief for that newspaper situation. Let us pass to something else entirely different. This law professes to strike at, possibly, combinations in insurance, but it will be futile in any attempt to deal with that question because insurance has been declared not to be a part of trade and commerce by the highest legal authority in the Empire, and merely putting insurance in this bill will not make it a part of trade and commerce. Unless you legislate with respect to trade and commerce in its widest and amplest sense, you are not legislating at all; there is no power here to deal with the matter. Where then, is the power? The Privy Council has said that it resides in the local legislatures. Unfortunately for the objects of this bill, it does; and before I get through I shall possibly suggest a remedy with regard to that.

Let us now come to something that gets much nearer home so far as a good many members of this House and a good many of their constituents are concerned. Mention was made in the course of the debate of the question of milk supply. I have not the slightest doubt that hon. members within the sound of my voice think that if this bill goes through it will be possible to stop any unfair or oppressive combination with regard to the distribution of milk or the fixing of prices for milk. But you cannot do it. If this parliament had the power, the bill would be effective, but the bill fails because parliament constitutionally has not the power. The sale of milk, the sale of butter, of eggs, of ordinary dairy products, of most of the things that we eat or drink or wear, form incidents in the law of property and civil rights which has by the wisdom of our forefathers been allocated to the provinces. Hon. members will recall last year the difficulty that was experienced with regard to a wheat board. That was another attempt of Union government to do a thing that was strongly desired by a part of this country; it failed in precisely the same way. Hon. members know the difficulties that have been experienced since in trying to get corresponding legislation from the provinces in order that a wheat board might be galvanized into partial life. The very same thing that creates that difficulty creates this one: you are simply up against the powers of the provincial legislatures and the want of power of this parliament.

Banks and banking. You have there a subject that belongs to the Dominion. You may pass legislation of this character dealing with banks and banking because you have control of the subject and you can pass any law that you want to with regard to the subject. With respect to insurance, as I have said, you cannot. Retail business within a province this parliament cannot touch because it does not fall under any of the heads of the powers that belong to this parliament. Wholesale business if limited to a single province would be equally out of the scope of the legislation, and I have already made a remark about the newspaper situation.

Now what is the remedy for this? In my judgment, and I am giving it for what it is worth, the proper way to reach this subject is to get the power in this parliament to deal with what is a very important phase of national life. I do not regard the compact of confederation as a thing that came into force on the 1st day of July, 1867, and that has never to be altered. I realize the immense difficulties there would be in getting the consent of the provinces to approach the Imperial parliament and have a resettling of those distributions of power, but I think we have got to come to it some day. I am not going to discuss by itself in any way the question of the wheat board that we had last winter, but I say that if wheat control is a necessary thing for Canada, if that be demonstrated then the obvious, the logical, the necessary thing to do is to go where the power can be given and get the power given to this parliament to deal with a question of that kind by Canada, instead of having it split up among the several provinces and become utterly ineffective. Just in the same way, if I am right in my interpretation of the judgment of the Privy Council, and I think I am, the remedy that ought to be applied today is not the enacting of legislation which is going to fall far, far short of the expectations of this House, is going to fall far, far short of the provisions that are contained in it, so far as effectiveness is concerned; the remedy is to get the provinces to co-operate and to ask the Imperial parliament to change the distribution of powers between the federal and the local legislatures and give the power to this body so that efficient legislation may be enacted. We are going to have, and have in increasing measure as time goes on, trusts and combines, mergers and monopolies, and it seems to me almost farcical to suggest that they ever can or will be adequately dealt with by provincial legislation. Then if the power is not here, and the Privy Council has said that it is not here except in rare instances, again I repeat the obvious thing is to take the proper steps to get the power so that this parliament may function in accord with the will of the people.

But entirely apart from that I would like to take perhaps a few minutes to discuss what might be done at the present time, without seeking any delay, that would afford some relief, would give some power and would in my opinion be more effective than the measure that is proposed; in other words would do very much the same thing but in a different sort of way. Reference has been made to section 498 of the Criminal Code. Reference has also been made to a judgment recently in an Ontario court, and to the observations of the Deputy Minister of Justice upon that decision. In my judgment—it may not be worth much but it is the best I have got—the opinion of the Deputy Minister of Justice is absolutely right and the obiter of the Chief Justice of Ontario—perhaps it was more than that—that the code provision was ultra vires is, I humbly submit, not a correct view of the law. I prefer and believe to be correct the judgment of the majority of the court and the opinion of the Deputy Minister of Justice. But this code provision which has been in force now for a great many years has never been a wooden gun. It has never been an ineffective weapon. It has been simply, readily applied, easily operated, and it may surprise hon. members of the House to realize that it has been invoked at least with fair frequency and on the whole with a very great deal of success. If my hon. friends will take the trouble to take any modern book on Canadian criminal jurisprudence, turn to section 498 and look at the list of cases that are cited as having been decided under it, they will find that in the great majority of these cases the prosecutions were successful. I have not pretended—I did not think it worth while—to make an exhaustive digest of the cases because I realize that while parliament is a court in one sense, yet about the last thing that parliament desires is to hear a lawyer talking shop, and therefore I do not want to make a long bead-roll of cases. But I might point out that there was a wheat case in Manitoba. It is known as the Gage case. There the prosecution failed. But why did it fail? Because the court held, or the single judge before whom it was tried held, and the appellate court felt they could not interfere with him, that an agreement to exact a profit of one cent and to limit the profit to one cent per bushel was under the circumstances not an unfair agreement, not an undue combination, not in any sense an oppressive thing, but that it really worked out to the benefit of the business. Well, I do not suppose, assuming that the judge came to a correct conclusion on the facts, that anyone would want any different kind of a decision under the measure now proposed, under the criminal code, or under any other legislation.

But then we have other cases. An agreement in an Ontario case to sell cheaper to the Master Plumbers' and Steam Fitters' Association than the manufacturers were selling to other dealers who were outside of that association by a difference of twenty-five per cent was held to be a violation of the code provision, and a penalty was imposed. Hon. members who want to investigate that will find that it was decided in the case of the Central Supply Association. Now the code was not without a kick there. There was no wooden gun in evidence, and what machinery had to be gone through in order to obtain that provision? Nothing but for one man, not six, but one man to go into the office of a police court and tell the clerk of that court what his complaint was, wait till the clerk wrote it out, and then swear to it. After that the whole machinery of justice moved on without the necessity of that individual spending his own money or in fact doing anything else than giving the names of witnesses and a statement of the facts they could prove. No preliminary inquiry by a registrar, or a commissioner, or any other functionary—nothing but the plain, everyday, ordinary administration of British criminal justice as we have always known it. That does not require very much addition or simplification, does it? We had in another case a declaration by a court that it did not matter whether a price was to be raised or lowered by the combination; so long as it was an improper interference with trade it was a reprehensible thing and it was punishable. A lumber association was formed. That lumber association fixed prices and assumed to prevent persons from engaging in the lumber trade in certain localities without the consent and approval of the association, through its officers, and subject to its control both as to the minimum prices to be charged the public and as to the places in which lumber yards should be started. Now, in the Clarke case in Alberta, the association had arranged the prices at which tenders should be put in and who should put them in, and I think a fine of several thousands of dollars was imposed. Once again the ordinary administration of the criminal law of the country was found to be quite sufficient. There are many other cases. I have not extracted any more but I think hon. members will take my word that they exist, and that this act has been found to have a very great deal of kick in it, a great deal of vigour, and absolute effectiveness.

One of my suggestions to my right hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie King) is this: There is no question as to the power of this parliament to establish a criminal law to alter that criminal law from time to time, and to make new criminal laws, provided it deals with subjects that can be said to be properly subjects for criminal law. In the Board of Commerce case the Privy Council said that you could not take hold of a transaction which under the law of the province was only referable to the province for decision or transaction which, whether you liked it or not, was perfectly lawful under the law of the province, and attach criminal consequences to the doing of an act permitted by that law. In other words you could not have recourse to the criminal law for the purpose of interfering with the powers of the provinces. On the other hand under British law, from practically the earliest times, things that have been perfectly innocent when performed by one man have been held to be guilty because they were performed as the result of a combination by two or more men. That is the law of conspiracy. It is fundamental, and if you add to the code a provision imposing a penalty upon any persons who combine to do certain classes of acts you will have effective criminal legislation because you are not professing to do anything else than deal with crimes. You are not allowing a man to form a combination of something and then attaching to that the penalty of a crime, which was simply what had been done in the Board of Commerce and Combines and Fair Prices Acts. That was what was done there and what is sought to be repeated in the present legislation. Now I may be told that in a certain sense I may be wrong. I expect to hear this advanced in reply because it was intimated that the Deputy Minister of Justice, for whose opinion I have a very profound respect, or rather the Justice department, had gone over this bill and had expressed the view that it was within the constitutional limits of the power of this parliament. Well, I would be better satisfied if I could hear the opinion read not of someone in the Justice department but the Deputy Minister of Justice himself. And yet if I heard his opinion I doubt if I would feel justified in abandoning my own opinion because he had formulated a different one. I would be driven to this position: I would have to say that it must be a matter of considerable doubt, and that the question could not be resolved until the opinion of the highest appellate tribunal in the Empire had been taken on the subject. Because, after all, there is no very great difference in the reasoning power among the members of my profession. It is just as possible for one man to read the judgment of the Privy Council and draw his deductions as it is for another; and I would not lightly let go of my opinion which I may say I have not formed except after a very great deal of study of the question. I believe that I am absolutely right, though I would be sorry to assert that in such a broad way if I were confronted with an opinion of the Deputy Minister of Justice just as stoutly asserting the opposite.

Now, in the course of the Board of Commerce case the Privy Council pointed out pretty well what this parliament might do. In summing up the legislation of the Combines and Fair Prices Act they pointed out that it authorized the board, under that act, to restrict in cases of food, clothing and fuel, accumulations of these necessaries of life beyond the amount reasonably required in the case of a private person for his household not less than in the case of a trader for his business. They pointed out further that this was an interference in normal times with property and civil rights; that the authority of parliament to legislate for the regulation of trade and commerce does not, by itself, enable interference with particular trades in which Canadians would, apart from any right of interference conferred by these words, be free to engage in the provinces. They further said that legislation implies a claim of title in the cases of non-traders as well as of traders to make orders prohibiting the accumulation of certain articles required for everyday life, and the withholding of such articles from sale at prices to be defined by the board, whenever they exceed the amount of material which appears to the board to be required for domestic purposes or ordinary purposes of business. The board was authorized, they say, to deal with individual cases, and not merely as the result of applying principles to be laid down as of general application.

Now, what is the present legislation? It is simply authorizing not a board but a registrar to deal with individual cases and is not merely the result of applying the principles to be laid down as of general application. The Prime Minister has, I think, considerably improved the structure of his bill by striking words out of the combination section leaving so much to the opinion of the registrar. But still the expression "combine," as defined by the bill, is to be what? It is:

> —to have reference to such combines immediately hereinafter defined as have operated or are likely to operate to the detriment of or against the interest of the public, whether consumers, producers or otherwise.

Limited as aforesaid the expression that is used in the bill is to be deemed to include certain things which are enumerated. I want to point out that while I, in common with every other member of this House, would be glad to see effective legislation which would prevent combinesters from attaining an object which they intended to reach in the future, yet when I read this language "have operated or are likely to operate," I realize that it is beyond the power of parliament to make a criminal act out of something that has not been committed. If this bill goes through in this form to the Privy Council, the moment they see that language they will say, "You cannot invoke the criminal law to punish a man for what he has not yet done. You cannot with one foot step into the domain of provincial right, and place the other foot upon the bed rock of the Criminal Code, and try to straddle the question in that way. You tried it once with the Combines and Fair Prices Act, and we upset that; you cannot come back and try it under this slightly changed form of words, for the change is very slight."

What I am appealing to the House to consider is not at all the interests of any one who seeks to oppress the people, or the interests of any one who seeks to interfere with the trade and commerce or business of the country, and not the interests of any one who strives to make a purely partisan question out of this measure. I believe that the measure will go through, but I am trying to drive home to hon. members the fact—and they might as well know it before they vote for the bill—that when they have set the seal of legislation upon this measure they will have accomplished practically nothing, so far as effectiveness is concerned. They will have done one thing. They will have voted an indirect subsidy that will not be paid wholly out of the exchequer of this country, but that will be paid by scores of contributors throughout Canada to gentleman of my cloth, who will have an opportunity of discussing the defects of this measure before court after court, until it reaches the Privy Council, and in the meantime, once you get a case launched towards the Privy Council, you will have absolutely no attempt to enforce the law until that case is decided. You will have a veritable fit of paralysis.

My hon. friend the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) was not able in his speech to accurately define the measure. He got a little bit off the track and was trying to put the blame on my right hon. leader. He has not described to us yet any nefarious device that my right hon. friend invented or made use of to prevent the Board of Commerce Act, or the Combines and Fair Prices Act, from working, but he says it did not work. The reason it did not work was that when the question was raised, and when the question was on its way to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, it would have been blind folly to have started prosecutions all over the country which might, and, as the result shows, would have been upset in their conclusions by that decision. I would ask if there is anything more specific in what the minister charged than what he has already said. I think the reason I have given is a complete answer to the remarks that he made, as I thought rather unfairly, trying to throw upon an individual blame for something which, if there is blame at all in connection with it, is due to the Fathers of Confederation, who, perhaps somewhat unwisely, divided the legislative power between the Dominion and the provinces. My right hon. friend can scarcely be accused of that, and I do not know that any one political party can be accused of it. We are learning and we are developing, and I am suggesting that there is a way out of the difficulty by a reallocation of those powers. Going back to section 2, I would suggest to the Prime Minister that the word "such" in the third line be struck out so that the section would read:

> The expression "combine" in this act shall be deemed to have reference to combines hereinafter defined, or to combines immediately affecting trade and commerce and defined as having operated or likely to operate.

I have even great doubt of the wisdom of employing the words "likely to operate." It seems to me the only way this measure can be made effective is to couple it up with something that directly affects trade or commerce. Unless we have the power of getting rid of the Privy Council, we cannot legislate for anything outside of trade and commerce. As the section is drafted, it appears in a mere incidental form in the last clause—> —or otherwise restraining or injuring trade or commerce.

But it can hardly be necessary to set up a board for the purpose of doing the one thing, or to appoint a registrar for the purpose of doing one thing, that the Privy Council has said we may validly do. I read from the judgment that the Dominion can call for statistical and other information which may be valuable for guidance in affecting Canada as a whole. Such information may be required before any power to regulate trade and commerce can be properly exercised. They cannot confer capacity to regulate particular trades and businesses.

Now against that vital portion of the judgment this legislation is bound to come, and when the two come in conflict, the legislation is going to fall, and not the decision of the Privy Council. I know that if I were dealing with this matter from a purely political and partisan standpoint, if we were indulging in repartee on both sides of the House, and if we were having a good election field night the discussion would be intensely more interesting, but I cannot help it. Law is a dry subject, and I cannot handle it in any other than a dry manner. Still I want the House to have the patience to follow me a little bit through the provisions of the code. Section 498 of the code says

> Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to a penalty not exceeding $4,000 and not less than $200.

And those can be increased by simple amendments.

> Or to two years' imprisonment, or if a corporation, is liable to a penalty not exceeding $10,000 and not less than $1,000, who—

Does what?

> —conspires—

Now we have all power to legislate criminally against conspiracy. We are on solid ground. The section continues—> —agrees or arranges with any other person or with any railway, steamship, steamboat or transportation company to unduly limit the facilities for transporting, producing, manufacturing, supplying, storing, or dealing in any article or commodity which may be a subject of trade or commerce—

Whoever drafted that section scouted and rather condemned absolute safeguards, and yet whoever drafted that section had pre-vision of the decision of the Privy Council, was so good a constitutional lawyer that the Privy Council, nearly two decades afterwards, has fallen into line with him, because he confined this thing to trade and commerce, the effective subjects upon which we can legislate. The section continues:

> —or to restrain or injure trade or commerce in relation to any such article or commodity, or
> —to unduly prevent, limit or lessen the manufacture or production of any such article or commodity or to unreasonably enhance the price thereof, or,
> —to unduly prevent or lessen competition in the production, manufacture, purchase, barter, sale, transportation or supply of any such article or commodity, or in the price of insurance upon persons or property.

It is impossible, by talking about the matter, to make comparisons that will be visible. If hon. members could lay those provisions with the words separated, in the rough analysis that I have given, side by side with the proposed measure, they would find that really there is in the proposed measure not very much that is not in the code. There are, however, some things that are covered by the code, and I do not think will be reached by the measure. I am not going to take them all in detail. There is the subject of transportation, which is now under inquiry, not under the proposed legislation, but under a special commission appointed for the purpose. We know in a general way the complaint about the taking, practically the absorption, by the transportation companies, of the profits gained from the soil. Yet if those transportation companies operate wholly within the limits of a single province, the new legislation will not be effective as regards them. If the transportation is between two provinces, or between Canada and a foreign country, there will then be ground upon which this legislation can be based.

I do not think it will be worth while to continue a technical discussion of this character at greater length. I simply say that the way for this House to deal with this subject at present is by adding to the Criminal Code such provisions as are deemed to be vitally necessary. Then you have a straight, clear, direct way of enforcing punishment upon the people who violate those provisions. The other thing that can be done is with the concurrence of the provinces, to apply to the Imperial parliament, to change the British North America Act so that we may do what we ought to be able to do here, validly to legislate on a subject of this character as comprehensively as possible. That I believe can be accomplished; but in the meantime there is no use; in fact, it is unfair—I withdraw the remark "it is unfair"—it is of no use to represent to the people of this country that a wonderful panacea for social ills has been discovered and is now being presented to the country. I withdraw the remark that it is unfair, because I believe in the sincerity of the right hon. gentleman who introduced it and a number of hon. gentlemen who have spoken in support. No, I must withdraw that, because I have not heard, outside of two members, any who have spoken absolutely in its support. Most hon. members on the government side have found fault with it, and I have not heard very great faith expressed, except by one hon. gentleman in the other portion of this side of the House; but I think those who are putting it forward are sincere. I also think, and I have the right to think, they are absolutely mistaken, and that when this measure becomes law, when the official is appointed for whom the place is being made ready, when he has his cohorts around him, when he begins trying to persuade the Attorney General of a province to take action—and that has not been easily accomplished in the past—when he falls back on the Attorney General of Canada or the Solicitor General of Canada and gets some prosecution going, I am not absolutely sure that the people of Canada are not in for another great disillusion. For a few days it will go through the country that a wonderful remedy that nobody ever thought of before has been provided; but after the lapse of a year or so, it will go into the discard along with other legislation that has been passed and that has been found to be ineffective.

I will not make any remarks of a partisan character. I simply appeal to the right hon. gentleman in charge of the bill to give it some more consideration, and if he will, to adopt the suggestion of strengthening the criminal code and letting the Attorney General of Canada or the Solicitor General of Canada, armed with a real gun that will shoot, go into the courts and bring down some of those "combinesters" that we heard so much about during the last election, and that up to this hour no hon. gentleman opposite has either named or even indicated by a vibrant finger pointing in many directions at almost the same time. The province of Ontario was flooded with speeches from an hon. gentleman who, I see, is taking hypocrisy out of public life by retiring himself. I refer to Attorney General Raney, who went throughout the length and breadth of Ontario preaching against the combine in connection with the Ford Motor Company and telling the farmers of Ontario how they were being robbed by the iniquitous government which was putting thousands and millions of dollars into the Ford Company. Last night I was in earnest, I was not joking, when I asked the Minister of Labour to name some of those combines that the government wants to get after. I thought he would name the Ford Company, but he did not. He was invited from this side of the House to name a number; but, oh, with that smile that this House enjoys so much, and with that oratorical utterance that is so pleasant to us all, he just waved aside all interruptions, looking as if he was perfectly happy about what he was saying, managed to side-step everything and, in the end, took his seat without having expressed his faith in the existence of anything but some vague, nebulous combine that he did not propose to name and that he would not even assure us that he could name if he would.

While last session this question which I must ask, would not, perhaps, have been quite pertinent, this session it is surely reasonably fair. We were accused of being the party standing in with combines, mergers and monopolies. We were the oppressors of the poor. Every rise in the cost of living was charged to us and our wicked associates. But our hon. friends have now had a fairly reasonable time to put into effect the somewhat vigorous existing provisions of the criminal code; they have had a fairly decent time in which to prepare special legislation, naming the villains if they want to get at them directly. Have they done so? Under those circumstances, is this bill after all marked with all the sincerity that I have been giving its authors credit for, or is it just one more scene in the vast camouflage of politics?

Mr. HAROLD PUTNAM (Colchester): Mr. Speaker, I had not the privilege of hearing the whole of this discussion, and I may set the House at rest by saying that my observations shall be very few. I want to tell the hon. member for St. John City (Mr. Baxter) that I have very much enjoyed his speech, and I have no mental reservations in telling him that I particularly enjoyed that major portion of it which was devoted to a legal discussion of this question. The hon. gentleman, I am sure, would receive a respectful hearing on a legal question wherever he chose to present himself. There was one observation of his with which I might have the temerity to take issue, or at least to discuss with himself and the House. He seemed to imply that if the person laying the information in the early stages could arrive at no further point than to show that there was a state of facts, or that there were doings or circumstances which produced nothing more than the imminence of an objectionable combine there would be no offence under the act. I cannot follow the hon. gentleman there. The bill does presume a state of affairs wherein a combine is imminent; it does presuppose a state of affairs wherein a combine may or might result from certain indicated circumstances; and it says in effect that you may nip the mischief in the bud and go on with the investigation. The very clauses read by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Baxter) from the Criminal Code went no further than that; and yet that was by his own admission a distinct crime, because those clauses read by him from the Criminal Code, I take it, relate merely to a conspiracy to do certain things. I think therefore that a state of affairs which reveals the imminence of an objectionable combine is an offence just as truly as are the cases which were cited by my hon. friend when he read from the Criminal Code itself. In the other and more elaborate phase of the hon. gentleman's very interesting and lucid legal argument, I do not presume to follow him to-night further than to say that to me it was very interesting and I thought substantially fair. I am in hopes that this is entirely intra vires legislation. However, if it is not it will but prove another of those little knocks by which from experience we have come to understand the Act of Confederation better and better as the years roll on.

The bill has been considerably criticized on the ground that it is too easy and informal a proceeding to allow, as it does, six persons to put their heads together and submit a complaint seeking thereby an investigation. Looking at the surrounding circumstances, we must presume that the registrar will be a man of intelligence, of reasonable shrewdness and of judicial temperament. We must presume that, as a juror, he will know or can ascertain, to some substantial extent, the character of the six persons who make the complaint. It is suggested that a man might have a spite against an employer who may have dismissed him from his factory, and that for that reason he would start a merely vexatious prosecution. Well, the remedy for that lies in the common sense of the registrar. I know that in my home town we have a stipendiary magistrate, who, if someone comes and lays a charge against an alleged rum-seller, and if he detects any element of spite in the conduct of the complainant, generally gives such a man pretty short shrift in his court. So that I would take it that one who held so important an office as registrar for the Dominion under this legislation would have an opportunity of becoming fairly well acquainted with the bona fides of a complaint that was submitted to him. Further, six men are a fairly substantial number to lodge a complaint, and it is not at all probable that they would be just so many ne'er-do-wells trying to start trouble. But if they were, as I say, the registrar by a little local inquiry could easily ascertain their character and the bona fides or the mala fides of the complaint, which would largely influence him in coming to a conclusion in the matter and would make for thoroughness and care before the undertaking of an investigation. But the registrar need not be content with a mere verbal or written statement; he can at once invoke section 17 and require the complainants to go upon oath; and every layman knows that if he is reckless in a solemn affirmation or affidavit he is immediately open to the charge of perjury. Section 17a provides:

> The registrar and every commissioner may accept or require evidence upon affidavit or written affirmation, in every case in which it seems to him proper to do so.

That means that, at any stage, he may declare himself dissatisfied with the statement submitted to him and require an affidavit upon which to base the investigation. So that the mode of instituting the investigation is not quite so plain and easy and informal as many a critic in this House may imagine. The origin of an investigation is something more substantial than that; it is not nearly so intangible as many hon. members evidently suppose.

There is some misconception abroad already with regard to this bill. I find that the Ottawa Journal in an editorial has the ridiculous supposition that if the registrar produces a certificate that in his view the matter should go to the criminal court, that is all the evidence that the Attorney General will require to obtain conviction. Let me read one paragraph from the editorial. It is interesting merely as showing how wide of the mark the writer has been:

> The registrar may, if he sees fit, conduct his proceedings in camera. If he signs a certificate that a combine is in existence which is detrimental to the public interest, such certificate by him is all that the prosecuting attorney need present to the court in asking for a conviction and the accused, although before the court, may be denied the right to establish or attempt to establish his innocence; the courts under this bill may become merely sentencing bodies.

This is interesting only by reason of the fact that interested parties are deluging members of parliament with propaganda; and I would suggest that if they undertake to give it the dignity of print they should be much more careful with reference to their facts. The right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) himself expressed an opinion entirely contrary to this only last night. His fear was that you would reveal the evidence upon which the prosecution would be based and that you would not get a conviction. He was decidedly of the view that up to the time the matter reached the criminal court nothing would have been done in the way of having a legal pronouncement made as to the guilt or innocence of the man against whom an objectionable combine was charged. He properly explained that a complete trial would have to take place in the criminal court. I am sorry the right hon. gentleman is not at this moment in his place, but he appeared to think that it would be a calamity if the accused were not convicted I do not look upon the matter in that light at all. It might well be that while the accused did not go over the edge of the precipice and did not actually form an objectionable combine he might have come very near the mark and that his conduct was properly a matter for investigation. We are not after blood; if it is shown that he did not go that full length, no possible harm is done. But I should say that if a responsible registrar sent the case that far it is highly probable that a man whose conduct in connection with the class of trade in which he was engaged was the subject of such suspicion, he would be pretty well warned at that stage, and the publicity would do no harm but good. Moreover, the bill safeguards him by providing that the inquiry shall be conducted in camera if there is nothing to send up to the criminal court.

Almost every hon. member concedes that we should have laws and regulations against the miserable device of combines, trusts and mergers that are really inimical to the public interest. But hon. gentlemen opposite say: We have a criminal code that is an almost perfect remedy in itself; with a little amendment it would be a perfect remedy. Well, Mr. Speaker, we have been used to a federal statute dealing with alleged combines and mergers, apart from the criminal code, and we should continue to have such a law specially dealing with cases of that kind. Even if this is not a perfect act the deterrent effect will be of value. I say that another warning hand should be held out, in addition to what is involved in section 498, which is practically hidden away in the criminal code. Let the public know that we have made this effort; it will not interfere with legitimate or honest business. Imperfect though the bill may be, it can be improved with practice and experience at subsequent sessions of parliament. Let us make a start, because at present we practically have to fall back entirely on the criminal code.

The right hon. leader of the Opposition said, I think it was last night, that we could get so far with the procedure under this bill but no farther. I confess I could not follow him in that. He said: "You say what a combine is; you bring your evidence, but you do not tell the man complained against what he shall not do or what he shall do henceforth." Well, it seems to me that you might as well say that if at a given level crossing there were no accidents in the course of a year, you might reasonably take down the conspicuously painted sign which directed the attention of the public to the fact that that was a railway crossing and warned them to be careful. Or you might as well say that if in a given community nobody was prosecuted for theft during the period of a year, the provision against theft might well be struck out of the criminal code. It is only a quibble to say that the publicity of the evidence and the pronouncement of the judge for conviction or acquittal will not indicate to a reasonable merchant whose conduct has been called in question that he should adopt a certain course. It is only a quibble to say that that experience will not give him the cue as to what he shall do or what he shall not do, or as to how he shall or shall not henceforth carry on his business.

Mr. A. J. LEWIS (Swift Current): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to take up very much time to-night; a great deal of what I had intended to say has already been said. I have listened to the various arguments for and against the proposed legislation, and I was particularly interested in the new line of argument presented by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Baxter) namely, the constitutional aspect of the question. I do not know very much about the constitutional law of Canada, but it does seem to me that colour is lent to his argument when comparison is made with the neighbouring republic to the south. There we find that there is a federal law in regard to trusts and combines, and the great majority of the states as well have legislation dealing with the same subject. Whether or not this applies to Canada I am not in a position to say, but it does seem to me that some such legislation is needed in Canada at the present time. I do not think anyone can read the evidence that has been given before the various committees in this House without feeling that there is need for legislation such as is now proposed by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). I wish to speak not so much in regard to the spirit of the bill as to the need of it. I was particularly struck with a certain sentence uttered by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler). He said that somehow or other the common people of Canada had got the idea that the high prices, the high cost of living, were due to trusts and combines.

Mr. MARLER: I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. Is he reading from Hansard?

Mr. LEWIS: I quote:

> I think I am right in saying that the public mind has for many years associated the high cost of living with the existence of combines, trusts and mergers so-called.

Mr. MARLER: The hon. member used the words "common people;" I never used that expression. I do not believe the people are common people.

Mr. LEWIS: The public mind, then.

Mr. MARLER: Quite so.

Mr. LEWIS: I think the public mind judges pretty fairly the conditions as they exist. Now, I read the bill carefully and I was heartily in support of it, but I was just a little bit disappointed when the right hon. Prime Minister, in his remarks yesterday, explained its application. It seems to me that by his explanation the bill was largely robbed of its virtue. His words were—I think I can quote them also exactly—that in the industrial world as we find it at the present time, combines and mergers are essential, and that there are such things as just combines and agreements. What I want to ask the House is this: What is the general reason why we have a trust? There must be some reason why business men get together to form trusts, combines and mergers. In the United States some years ago, when mergers and combines had become prevalent, an investigation was made during the course of which organizers of combines, trusts, and so on were interviewed. In almost every case it was stated by those people that the purpose of the combination was to suppress competition and to gain control. One particular sentence is significant in that connection, and I will read it. It says:

> It throws off the restraint of competition by absorbing overawing or crushing out competition.

That was the reason, the investigators said, why they had combines and mergers in the United States. Now in looking over this bill and over the history of Canada it seems to me that this sentence is particularly applicable to the banking history of this country, when you consider the number of banks that have passed out of existence and the financial control that has been centered in the hands of a few men simply by absorbing and crushing out and beating out competition. In this bill I am sorry to say I see nothing in regard to financial combinations. It seems to me that the financial end should also be included in the bill. I can readily understand that from the standpoint of the business man competition is an evil. The chief thing that a manufacturer desires is high prices for his products. I think it is a well known economic fact and law that where combination is possible competition becomes impossible. I was speaking to one of the wholesalers in Saskatchewan only a few weeks ago, and he said that he comes down east to Montreal or Toronto to buy his goods for the whole year about the 1st of May, but he said that he cannot buy them on that date. He must wait a certain time, possibly till the 15th, and then on the 15th of May he is told the price of his goods. He said that it would not make any difference to him whether he went to one man or another. There may be six firms manufacturing the same thing, but they would all have the same price. The price had already been set by the combination of these firms. So it does seem to me that where this exists, and we seem to know instinctively that such mergers and combinations do exist and set prices in Canada, such legislation as this is really needed.

The hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Evans) mentioned a fact last night in regard to the tariff. I notice in the bill that one of the remedies that is proposed in section 23 is the lowering of the tariff if the price charged the consumer is too great. Now in the United States some years ago a certain man named Havemeyer uttered this sentence, "The protective tariff is the mother of trusts." I do not think that statement can be swept away without some consideration. It has been said repeatedly in this House that the tariff has nothing to do with combines, mergers and such like. I believe that the tariff has something to do with them. I believe that another factor enters into it also. One is the industrial situation as we have it at the present time. We have a competitive system, and the logical outcome of any competitive system is this, that the manufacturers will endeavour to save themselves from any competition that would destroy them, and so for that reason the logical sequence of a competitive system is naturally combines and mergers for the salvation of those in the business, and until we can change our system and have some other form of co-operation it will be necessary to have combines and mergers as we have them at the present time. In the United States, with all the drastic legislation they have enacted, means have been found of outwitting the legislation and beating the anti-trust laws as they have them there.

In regard to the sentence I quoted a moment ago as to the tariff you can readily understand, Mr. Speaker, that high tariff duties charged on many articles permitted a large measure of profit to the manufacturers with the result that there was a duplication of plants, and as a result of that duplication ruinous competition and production, and in order to escape the latter trusts were organized. Now if the tariff had not granted immunity from foreign competition, people would not have ventured to place their capital in those industries. So in the first place it is a result of the high tariff. This artificial barrier has led to goods being manufactured in this country that never should have been produced here, and that has made it necessary for us to have combines. Where it can be materially proved that combines exist as a result of the tariff I think that section 23, if applied drastically, will have the effect of remedying the situation.

There is another thing that I feel is a great evil in regard to combines. Certain hon. members of this House have said that combines are not necessary evils. As I look over the history of combines in this country, what do I find? I find that possibly some ten, fifteen or twenty companies have been merged into one great company, and when you compare the total capitalization of all the companies that entered into the merger with the capitalization of the merger you will find that in the new merger the capitalization is overwhelmingly above that of the sum total of the smaller companies. The result is that in a merger we get an over-capitalization. What effect has that on the consuming public? The man who is put in charge of this new merger demands that his company shall pay dividends on the over-capitalization, with the result that these mergers instead of producing a commodity at a lower price through the smaller economies that can be effected by means of a large organization, are swallowing up such benefits by paying large dividends on over-capitalized stock, with the result that the combination is of no benefit to the consumer.

Professor Jenks on behalf of the Industrial Commission in the United States refutes the thought that combines through the small economies effected bring about cheaper prices. He cites two instances, the instance of the Standard Oil Company and also the Sugar Trust. It is true that as a result of the Standard Oil Company coming into being, although that one great organization passed out of existence some years ago as far as legislation was concerned, they did lower the price, but when an investigation was made it was found that the crude oil had also been lowered in price and that the difference to the consumer was even smaller than the difference in the price which the Standard Oil had to pay for its crude oil. The same relation was also proven in regard to the sugar industry.

I view with a great deal of alarm the centralization of capital in large-scale industries

It is said that it is necessary for us to have large industries in order that we may compete successfully with other countries in other parts of the world, and yet when we look at the prices that our products sell for in foreign countries we find them very much lower than the prices in our own country. So the argument does not work out very well. It is a well known fact that in Great Britain, the United States and Canada the home consumer usually has to pay for the export trade. Large scale industries may not be an evil in themselves. They may save a great many small economies, but so far as I am concerned I believe in legislation that will be drastic enough to have complete power to investigate any merger or combine, and if it is found that it is working against the interests of the public it should be amenable to law and that the law of Canada.

I should have liked to speak in regard to the history of some of these combines and mergers in the United States. During what we might term the year of combines there we find that 149 combinations were formed in which the subscribed capital amounted to over three billions of dollars, a menace practically to the public. It was the fear of destructive elements of competition that forced these people to combine. I ask the government, could this have taken place in the United States or in Canada if free trade had prevailed? As a result of combination in the United States the Standard Oil Company paid 12 per cent in dividends in 1891 and in 1902 no less than 45 per cent. Yet to all appearances, they give some semblance of competition to the people of the United States. As far as possible the authorities have endeavoured in the United States to overcome these combinations. I understand that in 1892 the Supreme Court of New York state declared that the organization of the Standard Trust Company was illegal. What did the company do? Immediately following the declaration they adopted a new plan. They divided up the shares, but continued to hold the great majority of them just as completely as in the case of the old Trust Company. That is the danger in regard to any legislation that we put upon the statute books.

The spirit of the measure that we are now called upon to pass is all right. It is a step, and a good step, in the right direction; but I would like to see the responsibility for taking action placed not upon any six individuals, but upon the government. The rights of the people are in question here. They are bearing a heavy burden at the present time, as we find out from the evidence given before investigating parliamentary committees; and it seems to me that the government should not only enact this legislation but follow it up by such action as will free the people from the operations of these unjust mergers and combines. Combinations may be necessary in the industrial life of the country but when they operate unjustly the people should be given a chance to escape from the extortionate charges which these combines often exact instead of remaining satisfied with legitimate profits.

Mr. A. E. MacLEAN (Prince, P.E.I.): I do not intend to offer any very extended remarks at this late hour, but believing this to be the most important legislation that has come before the House this session I wish to put myself on record as being strongly in its favour. During the past few years the subject with which this bill deals has been a very live one throughout the Dominion, and has been discussed pro and con from every platform. Now we believe the time has arrived when some relief should be given the public along the line indicated.

The criticisms which have been directed against the measure to-night are not very well founded in my opinion. We must make a start somewhere. Legal questions will always be raised in connection with any proposed legislation; gentlemen of the legal profession will always discover points for discussion no matter what the provisions of a bill may be. I believe this is a start in the right direction. We do not want any better evidence of that than the sensation which it has created throughout the country. Hon. members have been receiving letters and circulars from combines and trusts showing they have awakened to the situation which confronts them and realize there is going to be something doing in the future. I cannot altogether follow the argument of some hon. members who maintain that in a free trade country there will be no combines. Personally, I am strongly in favour of a policy of free trade and I would like the time to come when we, in the lower provinces at least, might enjoy that great boon. But the existence of free trade is no deterrent against the formation of combines and trusts. We read in the public journals that in the case of articles upon which there is a low rate of duty combinations have been formed on both sides of the international boundary for the purpose of getting together and holding up prices. So that I am not able to follow the reasoning of hon. gentlemen who argue that combines will not exist where free trade obtains.

I was pleased to hear the remarks of the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean) this afternoon. He sounded a splendid note in his address and I believe his remarks will have their due effect on some of the combines to which he referred, notably the sugar trust. We know, also, that the manufacturers on a large scale of hats, caps, boots and shoes are seemingly making exorbitant profits. If this bill is brought into operation and one or two of the offenders taught a severe lesson I believe it will tend to put an end to this unjust system and that in future those who conduct industrial enterprises will be satisfied with a more reasonable margin of profit. I do not think anyone in this House wishes to crowd any manufacturer out of business. What we do desire is that he shall be satisfied with a fair profit and not exact exorbitant rates from the consuming public.

I am strongly in favour of this legislation and am proud to belong to the party responsible for introducing it. I am only too glad to follow a Prime Minister who has brought such a bill as this before parliament; it is one that should receive the support of every hon. member. Let us adopt this measure and show the country that we are behind the Prime Minister and intend to see that it is put into force. I do not take much stock in the argument that this bill is not workable. As I say, this legislation is a start in the right direction and if experience discloses any imperfections the law can be amended from time to time. Let us all unite in passing this bill and show the country that we mean business.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: If any hon. member desires to speak he should take advantage of the present opportunity before the mover of the resolution closes the debate.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The discussion which has continued now for the greater part of two days has disclosed, as has already been alluded to by one hon. member opposite, that the House is practically unanimously agreed that in this age of competition it is unavoidable that there should be large combinations of capital and business interests. It was pretty generally admitted, with the exception of possibly one speaker, that industrial combinations in one form or another were inevitable having regard to world competition as it exists to-day. This legislation starts out from the point of view that such is the case. The hon. member to whom I have referred, also mentioned that new times bring new developments and new methods of dealing with new situations. I think it is worthy of note in that connection that from the point of view of legislation on matters of this kind a real advance has been made. The Canadian parliament in 1909 was virtually the first parliament to take the attitude that it was not proper to legislate against combinations as such, but rather that it was from the point of view of guarding against the ill effects of large combination that legislation of this kind should proceed. It has now become pretty generally accepted that that is the correct point of view to adopt.

Let me refer by way of example to the Sherman Anti-Trust legislation of the United States, regarded at the time as the best possible method of proceeding. It started from the point of view that combinations as such were wrong, and that combinations of large business interests were an evil. It was found, as endeavours were made to enforce that law, that its enforcement was an impossibility; that it was really proceeding from a wrong point of view. To-day we find that members on both sides of the House are in general agreement as to the right of combination where it is legitimately carried on. This would have been impossible fifteen years ago. We may feel in the circumstance that the world has moved a step forward in an understanding of the problems of modern business.

Another point on which the House has been in agreement is that combinations which operate against the public interest or are detrimental to the public interest should not be supported or permitted. Well if we are in agreement on both these points, I fail to see wherein any reasonable objection can be urged to the legislation which is being presented to parliament to-night. It is based on the supposition that combinations will continue to exist; and if properly conducted have a right to exist. The only kind of combination which it pretends in any way adversely to affect is a combination carried to the point where the public interest suffers in order that private interests may make gains to which they are rightly entitled. If the country will appreciate, and the House will appreciate that such is the sole purpose of the legislation, the bringing to time, so to speak, combinations that in their secret business methods go beyond what is reasonable and fair, to prevent what amounts to extortion as regards the public, and that this is all that is being aimed at in this legislation, there should, I think, be unanimity of expression in favour of some legislation of the kind.

Let me say a word about the relations of the public to big business. I have heard a great deal in this debate about the business interests and the rights of business, and the non-interference with private rights and the like. I think it is sometimes forgotten that perhaps, after all, the public is one of the parties to industry just as much as any of the other parties. It was assumed at one time that all the problems of industry were problems that related solely to labour and capital. Then there came forward another class that claimed the right to be considered in the discussion of these problems. That was the class that describes itself as management, those possessing managerial ability. It was pointed out that while capital could do a great deal, and labour could do a great deal, unless the two were in some way brought together and directed intelligently under the skill, the business ability of a guiding genius very little could be accomplished in the way of large business. It is now admitted that these three groups are entitled to consideration in matters pertaining to industry but a fourth group of late has come more and more to the fore, and is beginning to receive more and more its due consideration,. I mean the public; the public which, for a long time, was ignored altogether. Labour, capital and managerial ability each claimed its share of consideration in the distribution of the fruits of industry, but the public was left to shift for itself. So far as this legislation is concerned, it is brought forward in the name of that fourth party, in the name of the public without whom neither labour nor capital nor managerial ability could accomplish or achieve anything.

It may be asked, Mr. Speaker, how it is that large businesses are able to expand and to carry on to the extent they do? It is in virtue of what the public does, or permits to be done, through its organization in one form or another. Were it not for law and order as preserved by the public through governments what could large businesses achieve? Were it not for what the public permits in the way of organization of transportation, organized banking and credit facilities, agencies of communication and the like, what could large business achieve one way or the other? Were it not for what the public does in furthering education, encouraging invention, stimulating trade through its consular representatives, through its trade agencies and the like, were it not for what is achieved by diplomatic representatives, where would large business be in its successful ventures throughout the world? I might go on and mention the very direct aids that are given to big business in such matters as have been referred to frequently in this debate, as for example the tariff, bounties and other forms of special protection given to large business. By whom? By the public, through the agency of its representatives in parliament. Well, if it is true that the public is rendering this service to industry, surely the public has a right to demand of industry and business that, so far as it is concerned, it will be protected from any extreme and extortionate act on the part of large business through the facilities it affords. That is all the government is asking for in this bill.

We come in the name of the fourth party to industry, we come in the name of the public, the people at large, and say to large business interests, whether it be manufacturing, wholesale or retail businesses, agencies of communication, commercial enterprises or the like, but for what the people do, not merely in creating demands for commodities of these industries and arranging for their distribution, but in the other ways to which I have referred, large business would not have any place in the community at all. We say, in consequence of that, the public is entitled to know where it stands in reference to its part and relation to industry as a whole.

A great discussion over this measure has had special reference to the criminal offence which is created in this enactment. Hon. members opposite, and particularly my hon. friend for St. John (Mr. Baxter) have spoken more especially in reference to the criminal section of this bill. I would like for the moment to have hon. members forget that there is a criminal section in the bill, or a criminal offence intended to be created by the legislation. As I explained briefly, both at the time of introducing the measure and on moving the second reading, the law falls broadly into two phases. The first has to do with investigations, and the second has to do with criminal prosecutions. Let us for the moment leave to one side altogether the possible intra vires of the legislation, so far as the criminal prosecution is concerned, and consider the other aspect of the legislation, that namely which has to do with investigation. So far as I am concerned, in my own view of it, I would say that the powers of investigation given under the act are likely to be more effective in achieving the end aimed at than the new criminal offence which the bill creates. I think powers of investigation, rightly, legitimately and carefully exercised will go far towards curing ills, with respect to which penalties would be found wholly ineffective. In other words, as I expressed it the other day, there are certain classes of offences, those particularly which relate to social and economic conditions, which publicity is infinitely more effective to prevent and to redress than penalty. Once the public has the facts before it, once it has the necessary information, has got at the truth, once the situation is known from within, and that it affects the public adversely, the public may be expected to find some means, through its parliament and in other ways, to provide the necessary remedy or cure for any particular situation. That is the point of view from which this legislation proceeds. It seeks to frame machinery through the agency of which the light of day can be let into transactions with a view of disclosing whether these transactions are in the public interest or against it. In other words, it seeks to do for the social system in the matter of its moral health what the light of day or the sun does for the physical body in the matter of its health. Exclude the sun and its power from the physical universe, and very soon you find disease setting in where there should be health and vigour. Prevent the light of day from penetrating the secret recesses of various business devices, and very soon industry, instead of being the great servant of humanity which it should be, comes to be an instrument to be used against the well-being of the people themselves.

This legislation, in providing for investigation, does so, as I have said, for the purpose of bringing out the facts, bringing out information. My right hon. friend said that the measure was of no value, because it meant simply one investigation after another. At this point, may I draw attention to the character of the criticism which has proceeded from hon. gentlemen opposite? The hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) was the first to speak at great length on this legislation, his whole attack was that it went too far; that it was vexatious; that it was altogether harassing and extreme, and that it would be an injury to private business. The leader of the Opposition went to the other extreme—

Mr. MEIGHEN: I said the same thing.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, the right hon. member said the same thing, and he also said something directly the opposite.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes. He generally takes both sides at the same time. He said that the legislation had no teeth in it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think he remembers that. On the one hand it was extreme in one direction, and on the other it was extreme in the other direction.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Legislation can be very vexatious without having teeth in it. That can be done by the effect of its claws.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If we have succeeded in bringing into this House legislation which to one section of our opponents opposite appears to be altogether short of the mark, and to another section appears to go much too far in the other direction, that is pretty good evidence that we have struck the happy medium by avoiding extremes. That is exactly what we have sought to do. As to the investigation having no advantages, might I ask my right hon. friend, when he says investigation is powerless to be of any service, how is it that we have royal commissions appointed to inquire into problems with respect to which light is needed? Why is it, might I ask, that we have committees of parliament at the present time trying to get at the truth in regard to many important matters? Is it not a fact that both royal commissions and committees of parliament sitting at this very time are recognized by all hon. members as rendering the kind of service that is essential for legislation along right and proper lines, and for adequately informing public opinion? Is that not the best answer to anything that can be said against investigations into combines, monopolies, trusts or mergers which may tend to operate against the public interest? If the facts can be ascertained, a remedy will very soon be found.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The right hon. member puts that as a question to me. I do not say that investigation is useless; but I say that a permanent body for purely investigational purposes without power to enforce its finding, is a surplusage. The power of investigation, in any individual instance or contingency the government has without this legislation.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is not a permanent body that this particular legislation undertakes to create.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The registrar?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The registrar is one individual; he is not a permanent body in the sense in which that term is generally used. The effective investigations will be by the different commissioners who will be appointed to deal with cases which the registrar thinks are deserving of more careful investigation. My right hon. friend says that because there is no power to enforce the finding of the particular commissioner, the investigation is, therefore, of no value. To argue in that way is to deny any value to public opinion, to deny all value to the power of parliament, and those are the two greatest powers which the people have in the matter of self-protection. The power of a well-informed public opinion and the power of parliament to deal with any situation of which it may have accurate and concrete knowledge—that is the power which this legislation brings into being. It provides the machinery whereby, in regard to matters which directly affect the people, which affect them vitally as regards their food, clothing, housing and all the things which go to make up the necessities of their existence, they may get accurate information; this it does in order that the framers of public opinion throughout the country, whether they be in parliament, on the platform, of the press or in whatever form public opinion cares to express itself, may have an opportunity to help to redress a public wrong. I ask hon. members if that is not the greatest power which it is possible to give. What is the power 10 p.m. of the criminal code to prosecute some particular person or group of persons in comparison with the power of spreading broadcast throughout the land accurate and true information with regard to a situation which is inimical to the public interest, and which the people themselves are certain to be concerned in remedying. Take it as respects legislation. How is parliament to know what is the best course to take in the matter of legislation unless it gets true and accurate information? If you wait until the criminal code is put into operation against some particular concern, you may never hear of the evil. An important inquiry has been going on respecting freight rates on the Great Lakes. I imagine the country has become pretty well aware at the present moment of how necessary that inquiry has been. I wonder if that inquiry would ever have taken place under the criminal code if there had been no investigation. Investigation where properly conducted is the one thing which will bring to the attention of parliament what is necessary in the way of legislation to protect the public interest. Therefore, if this legislation went no further than simply to provide what it does in the way of machinery for investigation, it would be rendering a great and much needed public service.

But there are other immediate methods of action which follow upon investigation, apart altogether from the criminal procedure. Under this legislation the Governor in Council with respect to an article of commerce which is shewn to be unduly enhanced in price as a consequence of the tariff, has power immediately to reduce the duty or to wipe out the duty altogether. That is apart from any criminal offence created in the measure. That is a power given to the government itself to be exercised at any and at all times.

May I draw this further fact to the attention of the House? The value of a measure of this kind is not to be estimated by the number of prosecutions that take place, nor by the number of investigations. Rather is it to be estimated by the power of prevention which lies in the fact that it is known that a certain course of procedure will inevitably lead to an investigation and disclosure of conduct that is contrary to the public interest. Is it not desirable to have upon the statute books of this country a power of that kind which stands at all times as a safeguard of the interest of the public?

As regards big business itself, I think it is rendering big business the greatest possible service that such a power should at any and at all times be found on our statutes. There are members of this House who view with alarm at times the advance of what they refer to as socialism, the tendency for the state itself to take over control in a variety of directions. What is it that more than anything else has been responsible for the advance which socialism has made? It has been the feeling in the minds of the masses of the people that, in some way or another, their interests are not being protected or looked after; that in some way a power other than themselves is greater than the power of the state itself. You help to remove a feeling of that kind when you put it into the hands of any six persons, who have reason to think there is some social injustice under which they are suffering, to have that matter investigated and to have their minds set right as to whether or not the facts which they believe, are true.

A reference has been made to the old Combines Investigation Act of 1910, under which it has been stated, there were only one or two prosecutions. I had a little to do with the administration of that act, and I know that as respects a number of industries in connection with which people believed or were asserting that some injustice was being worked, once these people had it within their power to bring about an investigation, they refrained altogether from taking action because they were unable to submit even a prima facie case sufficient to establish ground for an investigation of the charges they had so freely made. I believe it will be so in the case of this legislation. I believe that men who get up and, without any justification for their words, begin to attack large business simply because it is large, once they are given an opportunity to make good the charges which they are ready to bring against such business will be more careful about the use of their words and directing accusations against big concerns. From that point of view I think the legislation is calculated to be of service to large business as well as to the public itself.

Now I may touch upon one or two other points that have been referred to. But first of all let me say that if at the time of introducing the legislation, I had had any doubts about the wisdom of it, those doubts have been completely removed through the endeavours that have been made, in the name of so-called private business interests to prevent any investigation whatever. What has legitimate business to fear from the light of day? Why should men be afraid that the power of investigation is going to lead to all kinds of serious trouble, if there is nothing to conceal? I think that there must be plenty of work to be done under legislation of this kind if some of the fears which appear to be entertained by some gentlemen are real. So far as anything is reasonable or fair or just in business relations it will not be affected by this legislation; but if there are existent, in connection with business, practices which will not stand the light of day, then probably there is justification for some of the alarm and some of the fear that has been expressed as a possible consequence of investigation. That however is only a reason why this parliament, which is here to protect the interests of the people as a whole, should see to it that legislation such as that being considered, is placed upon the statutes.

Now, it has been asserted that many of the methods which large industry adopts in price fixing and in other forms of combination and agreement are wholly in the public interest. I admit that; I have so stated; and I am willing to agree with anyone who points out that by large combination and price fixing you may help to bring about in industry a stability which otherwise it might not possess, as well as economies and increased efficiency. That is all perfectly true. But it is also true that by these very same methods men who are not actuated by a public spirit, but who think primarily of all that it is possible for them to exact from the public, may carry their price fixing and their agreements to the point of monopoly in a manner which will be detrimental to the public interest; and as soon as private rights reach the point where they become public wrongs, at that moment it seems to me there has been a departure from what is just and fair and the commission of a wrong that to all intents and purposes is a crime. When you get a public wrong that affects the people as a whole then surely the government of the country is entitled to make a criminal offence out of that which is against the interests of the public. That is all that this legislation seeks to do. It makes no criminal offence until it has been established by the most careful and conservative processes conceivable that there is reason to believe that the public in some way has suffered an injustice from certain conditions complained of. Take the steps leading up to the creation of a criminal offence. I think it was the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) who said that this legislation tended to erect a crime out of what was common sense. That was his way of stating the criminal aspect of the bill. Well, at what point does the legislation erect a crime out of common sense, as the hon. gentleman says? In the first place, at least six persons who are British subjects must present to the registrar, who will be appointed by the government, which will be responsible to parliament for the kind of appointment it makes, sufficient ground for him to believe that there exists a combination which is operating to the detriment of the public and against its interest. The registrar is given power to call before him the parties concerned, to go to their place of business if he so desires and thinks it necessary, and to gather information from various sources, with a view to ascertaining whether there is really sufficient ground to believe that the business is not being conducted in accordance with legitimate and accepted methods but is going beyond that to the injury of the people at large. Unless the registrar is satisfied that such is the case, there is no further investigation of the particular combination of which complaint has been made. If the registrar, after having examined the case carefully, comes to the conclusion that the men who have presented their complaint are not cranks nor disgruntled, dismissed employees, nor any of like classes to which reference has been made, but that they are sober, sensible citizens who have a regard for the well-being of the public at large,—if in short he comes to the conclusion that there are just reasons for believing that a combination is operating to the detriment of the people, then he reports to the minister, who thereupon asks the Governor-in-Council to appoint a commissioner to make a larger and more careful inquiry. Now, the government is responsible for the commissioner that will be appointed; no government is likely to appoint at random any kind of an individual to that position. The government will be responsible to parliament for the class of men it appoints to discharge this responsible duty. The worth of any finding that will be made by a commissioner will depend on the class of man chosen for the particular position; and unless the commissioner, after having made a full inquiry, after having given all the parties concerned the fullest opportunity of making out their case, is convinced that the action of the combine is against the public interest, nothing further comes of the matter; nothing at all by way of prosecution. But that is not all. Even after the commissioner has presented his report, which parliament will be in a position to call for at any time, it then remains for the attorney general of a province or the Solicitor General of the Dominion to enter prosecution against the combine concerned. The question is, will an attorney general of a province or the Solicitor General of the Dominion enter a prosecution against some concern with respect to which the evidence is not strong enough in his opinion to effect a conviction? Up to that point there is possible nothing in the nature of a criminal prosecution against any concern which is alleged to be injuring the public interest. Yet my hon. friend says that the legislation seeks to erect a crime out of what is common sense. I think that if we have regard to the different stages that have to be passed before we reach the criminal stage we shall agree that by the time we get to that point it is high time that some legislation should "erect" a crime out of a course of behaviour that would lead that number of different persons, looking at all sides of the case, to the belief that the public is suffering a wrong by reason of a certain course of conduct. So much, then, for the criminal offence which the act creates.

But my right hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition and those associated with him have said to us over and over again, "Why not rely on the Criminal Code? You have everything in the Criminal Code which you want. Why add any other legislation?" Well, may I ask my hon. friend, why did he not, when in office, rely upon the Criminal Code, if it was sufficient? Why did he introduce the Combines and Fair Prices Act or the Board of Commerce Act if the Criminal Code was sufficient for all purposes?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I told my hon. friend that when I spoke.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What was the answer?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I stated that in those days there was very great business activity and that very large profits were being made. It is all right to erect a Board of Commerce; there is some result in it if you give that board power to give effect to its findings. I stated to the Prime Minister that if he thought similar conditions existed now he might go ahead, but that he should give his board power to give effect to its findings, and that until he did that his legislation was a sham.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This afternoon, my right hon. friend's associate, the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean), said, I think, that he believed that to-day very large profits were being made, that to-day business was being conducted very much as it had been when my right hon. friend was in office. If that is the case, there was just as much need for the Criminal Code when he was in office as there is to-day, and the Criminal Code ought to have been just as effective then as it is now.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It was.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But my right hon. friend did not rely on the Criminal Code; he introduced the Combines and Fair Prices Act and he introduced the Board of Commerce Act. I am not complaining of his action; I think he did what was right, except in restricting actions under the code. I think he was right in believing that the Criminal Code of itself was really of very little use.

It is a fact, and no one knows it better than my right hon. friend, that in regard to the class of subjects which we have been discussing to-day, the criminal law is in a very different position from that which obtains when we are dealing with the class of criminal cases to which we are most accustomed. In cases of theft, murder, perjury, any of these crimes, there is little or no difficulty in ascertaining that a certain wrong has been done; the difficulty is to apprehend the wrong-doer and bring him to justice. As regards the average subject with which the criminal law deals the offence itself is apparent on the surface, but it is not so in respect to most of the evils that arise out of the methods resorted to by combinations in restraint of trade. As a rule these are framed with the assistance of the best legal advice that can be obtained; they are worked out in the most careful manner. The men who have to do with the administering of questionable methods of proceeding in business usually take all possible precautions to see that there is as little publicity as possible with respect to what is being done. In such cases the difficulty is to discover and bring to light the evil of which complaint is made, but when it is discovered, when the facts are brought to light, then the Criminal Code may well become effective. That is the basis on which this legislation proceeds. It seeks by the agency of investigation to bring to light methods which will not stand the light of day, if there be any such. And when they are brought to light, then, with the evidence assembled, the bill provides a means whereby that evidence may, at the instance of the Attorney General or of the Solicitor General, be used for the purpose of bringing the combine into court and obtaining such redress as may be possible by means of a criminal prosecution.

Mention has been made of an alleged inquisitorial phase of the legislation. I think the member from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) said that because this investigation was to be carried on in private before the registrar or before the commissioners, it was in the nature of a star chamber proceeding. Well, so far as I am concerned I am perfectly willing to have that investigation as open as the day, both before the registrar and before the commissioners, and if my hon. friend will move an amendment to that effect, I shall be willing to abide by what the House says in regard to it. The reason that the investigation has been made private is because the so-called interests, those that have made their representations, have expressed it as their opinion that it should be in private.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Perhaps the public think otherwise.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The public may think otherwise, but I think the interests are right in the point of view which they present, for this reason; the investigation may be made at the instance of any six persons, and I do not think it is desirable, if it can be avoided, to have the affairs of any business brought out before the public to any greater extent than may be necessary, until it is shown that the course of procedure complained of is really contrary to the public interest. That is the nature of the protection which this legislation gives to legitimate business. It seeks to prevent any undue publicity; but if and when it is shown before the registrar or before the commissioners that the method of procedure of the combine in question is contrary to the public interest, then the veil of privacy which for the time being has been thrown about what has been assumed to be a legitimate business is withdrawn; the evidence may then be made public. The particular combine, if it has been operating against the public interest, no longer gets any protection in the way of privacy; on the contrary, the public at large are given all the information that has been secured. I think that is perhaps the best way of proceeding.

My right hon. friend says that what we have in this legislation exists in large part in other legislation. He referred to the provisions of the Customs Act which give to the Governor in Council power to reduce the tariff after an inquiry by a judge, and he referred also to certain powers given under the Patent Act for the revocation of patent rights. Well, that legislation was in existence when the Combines Act of 1909 came into effect. It was thought advisable to make it clear in that act just what the different classes of remedies were to which the public might look when there was evidence adduced that the public interest was suffering through combines in restraint of trade. That legislation existed exactly in the form in which it exists to-day, when my right hon. friend introduced his Combines and Fair Prices Act and his Board of Commerce Act; and he embodied both the clauses—the very clauses that we have here—in that legislation.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly—if the right hon. gentleman will permit me. I do not find fault with putting them in. But we have these clauses in other statutes and there is no need of a new bill merely to enact them twice. What I say is that my right hon. friend, while he is having his legislation, may just as well have all the remedies in one bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Now my right hon. friend is coming to my point of view. That is precisely what the government seeks to do; it is seeking to assemble in one piece of legislation all that is relevant to the particular subject under consideration. By bringing together the different parts of existing legislation that have a direct relation to the investigation and prosecution of combines, monopolies, trusts and mergers, in whatever form these pieces of legislation may appear, we have perhaps taken the most effective means of preventing combines of one kind or another from proceeding contrary to the public interest.

As to the constitutional aspect of the question, to which the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Baxter) has referred, I think the House may well accept, for the time being at all events, the opinion of the Department of Justice that what we are doing in this legislation is entirely intra vires of this parliament. However, if it is not, I would still think it was advisable to introduce this legislation at the present session rather than to wait a little longer. The sooner we find out how far we can legislate in this matter the better, and I would say to my right hon. friend that if at any time it should appear that this legislation in any particular is not intra vires of this parliament, and that by expanding the Criminal Code or adding to it in any way we can still deal effectively with the evil we are seeking to remedy, if the present government should remain in office and be there in office, very little time would be lost in making the Criminal Code all that he or any other member of the House may desire in that regard.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Mackenzie King) which was agreed to on the following division.

SUPPLY

MARINE AND FISHERIES

The House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Ocean and river service—examination of masters and mates, $20 000.

Mr. STEVENS: Will the minister give us an explanation of that item?

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Marine and Fisheries): This item is to provide for the examination and certification of masters and mates of ships. The law requires them to have certificates. There are three districts in which examinations are held, the eastern divison, the Great Lakes division and the western division. The expenditure last year was $19,958.29. It will be about the same this year.

Mr. TOLMIE: Who conducts the examination?

Mr. LAPOINTE: The department has a certain number of officers in every district. In my hon. friend's district we have Captain Charles Eddy, who is the supervising examiner at Vancouver, Captain Davis at Victoria, and Captain Lindsay at Nelson.

Mr. TOLMIE: Are these examinations held once a year?

Mr. LAPOINTE: No, only when candidates offer themselves for examination. In Vancouver there were twenty-three masters examined last year and given certificates, thirteen mates and five second mates; and in the same proportion in other places in the western division.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What are the masters and mates for? The mercantile marine or the Canadian navy?

Mr. LAPOINTE: For all Canadian ships.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Including the navy?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Well, the Canadian merchant marine or any ship operating in Canada.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Any ship operating in Canada?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Only on Canadian waters?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: The examiner of masters and mates can examine for deep-sea certificates?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend said just for Canadian waters.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I meant also deep-sea certificates.

Mr. STEVENS: Does this appropriation include payment for lecturers? I remember the question arose last year.

Mr. LAPOINTE: No, that is for navigation schools. There is a special item for that.

Mr. BANCROFT: Where is the examiner for Manitoba located?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Manitoba is in the Great Lakes division, because it is nearer to the Great Lakes than it is to the Pacific ocean. There are only three divisions: the eastern division, the Great Lakes division and the western division. The Great Lakes division comprises Toronto, Collingwood, Port Arthur in Ontario, and Selkirk in Manitoba Selkirk being at the moment vacant.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does this provide for certificates for masters and mates on our trawlers?

Mr. BUREAU: They are not trawlers; they are chasers.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I have nothing to do with the chasers to which my right hon. friend refers. They are outside of my jurisdiction altogether.

Item agreed to.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again. I just wanted to get into the estimates, so that I could go on with them any day.

Progress reported.

SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS

JOINT COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER MATTERS OF COMMON INTEREST

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that I have received a message from the Senate requesting the House of Commons to unite with the Senate in the appointment of a joint committee to be composed of an equal number of members, not exceeding five, of each House to consider the following matters:

1. The forms of bills and the best means of affording information and assistance in the consideration thereof at all stages of legislation in both Houses of parliament.
2. The better distribution of the work of legislation between the two Houses.
3. The practical operation of the provisions of the Senate and House of Commons Act, R.S.C., 1906, chapter 10, respecting the attendance of Senators and members of the House of Commons and the expediency of making any alterations in these provisions;

And that the hon. Messieurs Béique, Belcourt, Calder, Green and Pardee have been appointed to act on behalf of the Senate as members of said joint committee.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the House adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

Wednesday, May 9, 1923

The House met at three o'clock.

REPORTS

Agreement between the Imperial government and the government of Canada with respect to the prepaid passage scheme.—Hon. Mr. Stewart (Argenteuil).

Report on the discovery of placer gold in Labrador.—Hon. Mr. Stewart (Argenteuil).

Bill No. 158 (from the Senate), for the relief of Louisa Wemp.—Mr. Simpson.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

CANADIAN CUSTOMS OFFICER AT NEW YORK

Mr. LADNER:

1. Has the government any information, and if so, what, with regard to the extent of business in lumber, canned salmon, pulp and paper, iron and steel and other products, as between Eastern Canada and the Pacific Coast, that is lost in favour of the United States owing to the fact that there is not a Canadian Customs Officer at New York and duty is imposed by the United States on goods passing through the Panama Canal from Eastern Canada to British Columbia?
2. Has the government any information, and if so, what, in regard to grinding balls to an Owen Sound firm from the Premier mine of British Columbia which was cancelled and placed in the United States because of the absence of a Canadian Customs Officer at New York?
3. Has the government any information, and if so, what, with regard to the advantages of a Canadian Customs Officer at New York, in facilitating trade between Eastern Canada and the province of British Columbia?
4. Has the government any information, and if so, what, with regard to the iron and steel used in British Columbia which might be purchased from Nova Scotia if a Canadian Customs Officer were established at New York?
5. Has the government any information, and if so, what with regard to the effect of the absence of a Canadian Customs Officer at New York on the amount of freight which might otherwise be sent over Canadian railways by the Canadian manufacturers and traders but which actually goes to the United States?
6. What would be the annual cost of maintaining a Canadian Customs Officer at the port of New York?
7. Does the government refuse to place a Canadian Customs Officer at the port of New York?
8. If so, what are the grounds of such refusal?
9. What are the advantages, if any, which accrue to the government of Canada or the people of Canada by refusing to put the said Customs Officer at New York?

Hon. Mr. BUREAU:

1, 2, 3, 4 and 5. The government has no information.

6. This information is being ascertained.

7. No, the government does not refuse.

8 and 9. Answered by previous questions.

GREAT LAKES AND ST. LAWRENCE SHIPPING TOLLS

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Will legislation be introduced this session to place shipping and marine rates and tolls on the Great Lakes and St. Lawrence under some public control such as the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada?
2. If not, what will be done to afford the public some relief from excessive rates, both for freight and passenger rates?

Right Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The matter of marine rates and tolls is the subject of investigation by Royal Commission at the present time and it would not be possible to answer this question in any positive way until the report of that commission has been received.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. CHURCH:

1. When will the report of the Royal Commission re Great Lake rates be received, and will an opportunity be granted parliament of considering their report?

2. When will the Banking, Agriculture, and Redistribution Select Committees reports be received by the House?

3. Owing to the lateness of the Session, will these reports be received in proper time to have them dealt with at this session of parliament, or will they be left over for next session?

4. What legislation, if any, is yet to be brought down this session by the government, not referred to in the Address at the opening of parliament?

Right Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This question, I think, the hon. member is in about as good a position to answer as the government.

1. The government is unable to say when the report will be received, and it is impossible to say what opportunity will be given for consideration until it is received.

2. I suppose they will be received when they are ready, I cannot think of any other answer.

3. Obviously it is impossible to say what will be done with the reports until they are received, or what time may be available.

4. I answered this question yesterday in reply to my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen).

DAYLIGHT SAVING IN OTTAWA

Mr. GARLAND (Carleton):

1. Has the government been officially advised by the Mayor of Ottawa that daylight saving becomes effective in the city on Sunday, May 13th?

2. If so, is it the intention of the government to recommend to parliament to conform to daylight saving time, and to make the same applicable to the public departments?

Right Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. Yes.

2. The government has assumed that parliament would wish to do this year as in previous years, adapt its proceedings to the local time. So far as the public departments are concerned, where daylight saving is being observed the public departments will be expected to conform to the usage of the locality.

PORT ARTHUR ELEVATOR

Mr. SHEARD:

Does the Canadian government elevator buy or purchase screening shutouts, or, in other words, the dockage of 3 per cent or over on grain that is unloaded, in their Port Arthur plant, or does the Canadian government elevator only handle for its own account the dockage on grain that is allowed the terminal elevator, according to its tariff?

Hon. Mr. LAPOINTE (For the Minister of Trade and Commerce): The procedure followed is that when cars of grain are unloaded into the Canadian Government elevator at Port Arthur, warehouse receipts, both for grain and screenings, outturns showing charges, and official weight certificates are sent to the Winnipeg office of the Canadian Government elevator system, where they are delivered to the party surrendering the bills of lading, usually the commission merchant acting as agent for the shipper. If these parties desire to dispose of the warehouse receipts for screenings to the Canadian Government elevator, the manager of the Winnipeg office is always prepared to purchase same at the current market price, and is provided with a fund, designated "Special Account," from which to make payment for such purchases. The holder of warehouse receipts for screenings is under absolutely no obligation to dispose of same to the Canadian Government elevator, but is always at liberty to take delivery of the documents and dispose of same to the best possible advantage or in any manner he may see fit.

TORONTO AND SUBURBAN RAILWAY

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Has the portion within the city of Toronto of the Toronto and Suburban Railway been offered for sale to the city, and on what terms, either by the government or National Railways?

2. Have the bondholders objected to the sale of a part instead of the whole road, and can the sale of a part be legally consummated?

3. Have the bondholders notified the government to this effect, and how does the sale now stand?

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM:

1. The Toronto Suburban Company's lines within the city of Toronto are governed by a franchise granted by the former town of Toronto Junction (now Ward 7 of the city of Toronto), which expired in 1921. Under their franchise, the former town of Toronto Junction, or its successors, had the right, upon notice, to take over the whole of the lines within the limits of the town at a valuation to be agreed upon, and fixed by arbitration. The city of Toronto duly gave notice in 1921 of its intention to take over the franchise lines, and a tentative valuation was made between the two parties, which has not yet been acted upon.

2. An objection was made on behalf of the bondholders that the whole of the lines of the Suburban Company, both inside and outside of the franchise limits, had to be taken by the city on the expiry of the franchise, but this objection was not concurred in by the Toronto Suburban Railway Company, and is not maintainable. The bondholders are subject to the franchise terms to the same extent as the railway company, and while objection may be made, at discretion, by the bondholders to the sale of lines, or parts of lines outside the franchise limits, within the franchise limits the consummation of the sale or taking over by the city depends only upon the fixing of the consideration to be paid.

3. The representatives of the bondholders claim that they must be consulted and must agree to any value fixed or to any disposal of lines outside the franchise limits. In the correctness of this position the railway company concurs. The terms and the extent of the taking over are now under active consideration by the parties concerned, subject to the rights of the bondholders as stated.

MR. EDWARD E. BOUDROT

Mr. HANSON:

1. Has Edward E. Boudrot been dismissed from the position of light keeper at Green Island near Arichat, Cape Breton?

2. If so, when was he dismissed and what were the reasons for his dismissal?

3. Were any charges made against Mr. Boudrot and if so were said charges investigated, and by whom?

4. What report was made as a result of such investigation, if any were held?

Hon. Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. Order in Council of the 15th January, 1923, has issued dispensing with his services and he will be relieved when arrangements are made by the Civil Service Commission for his successor.

2. See answer to No. 1. He assaulted a fisherman and his son when they landed on the island for shelter.

3. Yes. The charges were investigated by Daniel D. Boyd, a Commissioner under Part II of the Inquiries Act.

4. The lightkeeper's conduct on the occasion in question cannot be justified.

CANADIAN GOVERNMENT MERCHANT MARINE

Mr. CHURCH:

1. How many ships of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine are now being sold, what are the terms and conditions of sale, and will tenders be called?

2. Why are they being sold at all, and are these ships suitable in draught for service on the St. Lawrence and Great Lakes?

3. While in operation were the Merchant Marine (Limited) a part of an Atlantic combine in any way for an increase in freight rates?

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM:

1. As proposed by the late board and recommended by the present management authority has been taken to sell twenty-seven of the smaller vessels by public tender, if satisfactory offers can be obtained, but otherwise by private sale.

2. These vessels are too deep in draught and of wrong type for service through the St. Lawrence canals, but would be serviceable for, and some are already being made use of on the upper lakes.

3. The management of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, Limited, maintain that they were never parties to any combine though their representative has sat in at the weekly sessions of what is known as the "North Atlantic Conference" for the stabilizing of freight rates and the ensuring of equality to all shippers.

UNOPPOSED MOTION FOR PAPERS

SHIPPING RATES—GRAIN

Mr. COOTE:

For copy of all correspondence, telegrams or other communications passing during the summer or fall of 1922 between the Dominion government or any of its ministers or representatives and the Dominion Marine Association or any of its agents or representatives, or of any other person or persons whatsoever, in any way relating to the abrogation or suspension of the Dominion Coastal Shipping Regulations, or in any way relating to the grain congestion at lake ports or Montreal, or to the alleged combine, or the imposition of exorbitant rates by shipping interests engaged in the grain trade.

SANITARY CONDITIONS ON CATTLE BOATS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. ROBERT FORKE (Brandon): I wish to ask the Minister of Agriculture if he noticed the statement in to-day's newspaper press that the unsanitary conditions on boats carrying Canadian cattle to Great Britain had been the subject of discussion in the British parliament. The despatch in question said that an inspection had been made necessary by the Canadian Department of Agriculture owing to these conditions. Has the minister any knowledge of the matter? It is very necessary that this service should be carried out under the very best auspices and, if unsanitary conditions prevail on these boats, that steps should be taken to remedy them

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture): I saw the despatch in this morning's paper to which my hon. friend refers. I do not know that we should attach too much importance to all these despatches because of the confusion that exists between the authorities over there and ourselves with respect to the proper conception of the arrangement that was made last fall as to the class of animals that were eligible to be shipped. As I understand the situation, nothing but stockers, that is non-breeding cattle and fat cattle, are eligible to go over; breeders are not eligible. With respect to the sanitary conditions on the boats engaged in carrying cattle, I understand that when the embargo first came off some vessels were put into commission rather hastily and were not up to the requirements. I expect, however, that will be remedied when these vessels take on board their second load. I did not hear exactly all that my hon. friend said. If there is any part of the question I have not answered I should like my hon. friend to repeat it.

GOVERNMENT PRINTING—INQUIRY FOR RETURN

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon): I should like to draw the attention of the Minister of Labour to the fact that so long ago as April 18, a return was ordered showing the names of newspaper companies and printing companies who have received federal moneys for printing, since January 1, 1922. This return is not yet forthcoming although its preparation would not take very long. On the occasion of a former inquiry I was told that some other members had asked for some other information, but that should not in any way affect this return for which I have asked. The return is a long time overdue and it should be brought down without further delay.

Hon. JAMES MURDOCK (Minister of Labour): I am very sorry for this delay. The information was prepared and was all ready to present to the House last week when it was found to be somewhat inaccurate in that it did not give exactly what the hon. gentleman and others had requested. It was therefore necessary to have the return re-checked in order that the information might be accurate. I had hoped the return would be here to-day, but I feel sure that it will be forthcoming at the next sitting of the House.

ICE IN CABOT STRAIT

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. HERBERT MARLER (St. Lawrence-St. George): I should like to ask if the government is aware of the serious ice conditions which prevail in Cabot strait at the present time, greatly impeding shipping bound for the port of Montreal. I am informed on reliable authority that yesterday there were forty ships held up in that vicinity owing to ice conditions. I would like to ask the government what action, if any, it intends to take in the direction of sending the new government ice breaker to that vicinity to help shipping.

[Mr. Motherwell.]

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Marine and Fisheries): The ice breaker Montcalm has been doing ice patrol duty in Cabot strait and the lower part of the gulf of St. Lawrence for the last two weeks, and the reports are that the conditions there are much more serious this year than ever before. It is true that yesterday there were approximately forty ships trying to get through the ice into the gulf of St. Lawrence, their progress being attended with great difficulty. In addition to the Montcalm the ice breaker Stanley is also in service there. The Mikula is undergoing temporary repairs in the Champlain drydock but is expected to leave for Cabot strait next Saturday. The department has been communicating with all the principal shipping companies and they agree that everything possible is being done and that the delay is due to the unusually difficult conditions of the ice this season.

CATTLE EMBARGO—MR. DUNCAN MARSHALL

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. S. W. JACOBS (George Etienne Cartier): I should like to direct the attention of the Minister of Agriculture to a cable despatch which appeared in the daily press yesterday to the effect that Mr. Duncan Marshall our Commissioner of Agriculture, in a public speech at Dundee, Scotland, said that it is the intention of the British government to put an end to the bargain made with the Dominion of Canada with respect to the entry of cattle into Great Britain.

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture): That was not my understanding of the despatch which my hon. friend refers to. May I read it Mr. Speaker?

Duncan Marshall, in a speech at Dundee, is credited with the statement that the British government is preparing to break its bargain with Canada regarding the admission of cattle. Marshall is reported as saying: "The embargo is only partly removed. The Royal Commission reports recognized cows and heifers as stores, but the government differs. The Canadian representatives came to a definite arrangement allowing and speeding the entry of cattle. My information is that the British government does not purpose to carry out the bargain. The matter will be threshed out on May 15."

I may say that I have a cable from Mr. Marshall quite to the contrary. His position is this: He is taking the ground that the arrangement entered into by my colleagues the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries is the one which should be carried out. That is all that Mr. Marshall is contending for.

Mr. HANSON: Would the minister say whether Mr. Marshall has been appointed to the position of Commissioner of Agriculture?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: He continues to hold the appointment which he has had from the beginning.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Has the minister ever considered the wisdom of suggesting to Mr. Marshall that he might ease up a little on his speeches in other countries affecting questions between us and those countries?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Whatever may be said with regard to Mr. Marshall's speeches, at all events they are absolutely accurate.

CANNED SALMON VIA PANAMA CANAL

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): Perhaps we can now get an answer from the Minister of Customs in regard to a question I put last Monday dealing with a telegram sent by him on 16th April to the Gosse-Millerd Canning Company, of Vancouver, informing them that on shipments of canned salmon consigned via the Panama canal and New York to Halifax and other Canadian ports, a tariff would be imposed on the goods entering Canada.

Mr. BUREAU: No that is not right.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Calling at New York.

Mr. BUREAU: That makes all the difference in the world.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I asked for an explanation of the telegram. I wish to know by whom and on what authority that regulation was brought down.

Mr. BUREAU: The regulation has existed for years. I could not say who passed it, or under what authority it was passed. I took it as it stood and enforced it.

ICE BREAKER ON THE BAY OF FUNDY

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. L. H. MARTELL (Hants): I wish to call the attention of the government and particularly the attention of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, (Mr. Lapointe), to the question of having an ice breaker to clear the ice from the Bay of Fundy, especially for the vessels endeavouring to come through Minas channel and basin and proceeding to the port of Windsor. For some time there have been vessels loaded with nitrate of silver at New York and other places, consigned to Windsor, Nova Scotia. This nitrate of silver is sometimes called by the railway company a dangerous explosive; consequently it takes a higher rate of freight, and therefore, we have to ship it by water. The vessels so loaded are not accustomed to enter fields of ice.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. MARTELL: I brought the matter to the attention of the department and asked to have the question dealt with—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. MARTELL: My hon. friends may call "order," but they cannot put me off in that way.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Marine and Fisheries): I would be pleased to get the information for my hon. friend and give him an answer to-morrow.

Mr. MARTELL: Will you have an ice breaker sent there?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Possibly. We are short of ice breakers just now.

COMBINES, MONOPOLIES, TRUSTS AND MERGERS

The House again in committee on Bill No. 54, to provide for an investigation of combines, monopolies, trusts and mergers, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

On section 2—Definition "combine:"

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I mentioned my intention to strike out the words "in the opinion of the registrar or any commissioner" after the word "as" in line 9. I offer that amendment before we discuss the clause.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. MARLER: Before the amendment is carried—

The CHAIRMAN: The amendment is carried.

Mr. MARLER: The amendment is all right, but I suggest to the Prime Minister to alter the words "or are likely to operate," and insert in place thereof the words "or are about to operate." A combine likely to operate is something intangible, whereas a combine about to operate means one that has been formed, in which case there might be something tangible for the registrar to get at as being improper.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The words "or are likely to operate" are taken from section 2, subsection 1, of the Combines and Fair Prices Act of 1919, and I imagine that they were chosen with care at the time. I fail to see very much distinction between the words "likely to" and "about to." I think the words "likely to" indicate the probability, and that is what should be aimed at for the purpose of investigation.

Mr. MARLER: Suppose that two concerns were about to get together and make their financial arrangements, and six persons, under the following section of the act, came along and said, "Oh, this concern is likely to operate as a combine, we will put a stop to it and put an end to the financial arrangement," whereas, if those two concerns had got together in such a way that there was a tangible evidence that a combine would occur, it would mean that the registrar would have some facts to go on, so that he could actually prosecute under the act. I am quite aware that these words are taken from the Combines and Fair Prices Act, but under that act I think the complaint had to be made in such a case to a judge. I am speaking from memory in that regard. I suggest to the minister that the words "are about to operate" indicate something tangible, something fixed, and the words "likely to operate" indicate something intangible or something not fixed, but something which might likely take place in the future.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not see very much force in what my hon. friend has said. I cannot see that the use of the word "about" will alter materially what is aimed at. If it will help to reconcile my hon. friend to the section as a whole, I have no objection, if he likes to move the amendment, to have it adopted.

Mr. MURDOCK: I think it would be a misfortune to change the word "likely" to the word "about." An ounce of prevention is surely worth a pound of cure, and if, as the hon. member indicates, two concerns are likely to be brought into a combination or a merger to the extent that they might, as a result, by being brought into combination, be likely to operate to the detriment of the public, the ounce of prevention is what should be used if anything is to be used, and prevention of that particular combine, if that were brought about, could be made effective. We should not wait until they have been brought together and consolidated and had a free field to see if they could evade the intention of the law. Personally, I do not think my hon. friend has anything whatever to fear. It would certainly suggest discredit on the entire intent of the act to make any such change as that, for the reason which has been given.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. MARLER: I can hardly follow the reasoning of the Minister of Labour. I quite realize the intent of the act. I said that I realized the intent of the act, and I voted for it. But I certainly think, as the bill now stands, to have something tangible is a great deal better than to have something intangible, and I cannot see how the amendment which I suggested to the Prime Minister does any harm to the bill itself. I do not think the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) caught the drift of my remarks.

Mr. McBRIDE: I should like to say a word in connection with a statement made in this House by two hon. members on this side regarding an alleged fruit combine in British Columbia. I want to state definitely that no such thing as a fruit combine exists in British Columbia. There is in British Columbia an organization that is trying to get what it produces to the consumer with the least possible expense. In days gone by, certain profiteers were making as high as a dollar or a dollar and a quarter a box on fruit, whereas the people producing this fruit in British Columbia were getting only from 7 cents to $1.25 per box for raising, packing and shipping, and they did not think that was right. They have formed an organization so that they will be able to give the consumer on the prairies and in other places the best possible prices on fruit.

In connection with the bill before the committee, I should like to make one or two suggestions, and the first one is in regard to the six persons who will lay a complaint against any combine. The registrar should see that those six persons are not from any one company or concern. It would be very easy for a concern that was running in opposition to another to have six of its members lay a complaint; in fact, this would be a sort of blackmail. The law should be such that those six persons should be from six separate concerns, and when they lay a complaint, the first thing the registrar should do would be to call upon them to prove the allegation laid before him, and if need be, he should put them under oath and make them prove it. This is only reasonable. In the next place, those who do the investigating should be sworn to secrecy. They should not be at liberty to make public in any way what they may find until such time as the matter comes before the court.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Under this clause, would there be a possibility of prejudicing or embarrassing the operation of a wheat board?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If any parliament or legislature undertakes to enact a piece of legislation, I should imagine that would be a sufficient answer to any inquiry that might be made respecting its propriety.

Sestion 2 as amended agreed to.

On section 4—Registrar:

Mr. CASGRAIN: As regards subclause (1), which relates to the appointment of a registrar, when speaking on the merits of the bill, I said that I thought a lawyer of a certain number of years' experience at the bar should be the registrar. I would, therefore, ask the Prime Minister if he would have any objection to considering my proposition now, that such registrar shall be a lawyer of at least ten years' standing at the bar.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think the government will have to take the responsibility for the appointment it makes, and I imagine that it will be wise to leave with the government the discretion that may be necessary in the matter of the appointment itself.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—Application for investigation of alleged combine.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I intimated also another amendment that I would ask to have inserted with respect to this clause. The amendment is to the effect of requiring the application for an investigation to be made by six persons, British subjects, resident in Canada. I beg to move:

That clause 5 be amended by striking out lines 8 and 9 and substituting the following therefor:

"Any six persons, British subjects, resident in Canada of the full age of twenty-one years who are of the opinion that a combine exists, or is being" and also by striking out lines 14, 15 and 16 and substituting the following therefor:

"showing: (a) the names and addresses of the applicants, and at their election the name and address of any of their number or any attorney, solicitor or counsel whom he may, for the purpose of"

Then in line 18, by striking out the word "him", and substituting for the word "him", the word "them".

Mr. McMASTER: I should be glad to have an explanation why the benefits of this law should be restricted to British subjects. I think it is the sentiment and tradition amongst our people that any person domiciled in Canada should be protected in the exercise of his legal rights and should have free recourse to the courts. There are some jurisdictions, for instance, where aliens are not allowed to hold real estate. I think that is the case in the state of New York; but that has not been the case, so far as I am aware, in any province of Canada, and I do not see that the bill is in any way improved by restricting the class of persons who may make a complaint. Take, for instance, the case of a citizen of the United States, whose business has brought him to Canada, who has lived here for many years, whose interests are here, but who, through sentimental or other reasons, has hopes in his old age to return to the United States and who has never ceased to be a citizen of that country. Why should such a man as that be precluded from laying a complaint under this law? I see no reason for the change, though, perhaps, the Prime Minister, who is in charge of the bill, may have some weighty reasons which may show me that I am wrong in my view. The principle I would lay down is this, that this is in the nature of a judicial inquiry, and the courts are and should be open to all dwellers in this land who are behaving themselves in a seemly fashion.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The clause as originally drafted stated that any person resident in Canada might make an application for an investigation. That was thought to be too broad, and for that reason the words "six persons" were substituted. The addition of the words "British subjects" was simply to ensure a little more care as to putting this legislation into operation. As my hon. friend knows, there are large numbers of foreigners who are domiciled in Canada, who are not wholly familiar with our laws, institutions, and methods of proceeding, and it is conceivable that, for reasons more of agitation than otherwise, some of them might be persuaded to endeavour to set this particular law in motion simply because it is so easy for the individual to do so. I should think, if any six persons in the country who are not British subjects, really had ground for believing that a combine existed which was operating in restraint of trade or to the detriment of the public, they would find very little difficulty in securing six other citizens who were British subjects to make the application on their behalf. I do not believe it will really affect the freedom, the liberty or the right of anyone in any material significance, and if it tends to give a sense of greater security to some of those who fear that there is too much latitude in the law as it stands, I think it is advisable to retain the words "British subject."

Mr. MARLER: If the Prime Minister has no objection, I would suggest that in line 11 the word "shall" be substituted for the word "may" and that in line 13 there be inserted before the word "statement" the word "sworn."

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have no objection to the first suggested amendment, of substituting the word "shall" in line 11 of section 5 for the word "may."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. MARLER: I suggest further that the section be amended to read:

The application shall be accompanied by a sworn statement showing, etc.

As the section stands, a mere statement, without any qualification, is required.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am prepared to be governed by the wishes of the committee in this particular, but I do not think we should make it difficult for an application to be submitted. The purpose of the legislation is to give to the citizens of the country a feeling of assurance that there is an avenue of approach against any possible injustice, and to make that approach as easy as possible. The registrar would have to be satisfied himself that the application put before him was one deserving of that careful consideration which the law would expect, and one that merited an investigation, before anything further could be done. The fact that the application must be sworn to might make it more difficult for some persons to apply. If however the committee thinks that the suggested change is advisable I shall be prepared to consider it, but I rather hesitate to compel people who are not accustomed to taking oaths to submit to such an obligation in a matter of this kind. I should be glad to have an expression of opinion from the committee.

Mr. FORKE: A statement over the signature of six persons is definite enough without being sworn to.

Mr. PUTNAM: The amendment my hon. friend proposes might, I think, be out of joint with subsection (a) of section 17 which gives the registrar or any commissioner power to exact an affidavit or a written affirmation at any stage of the proceedings.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 6—Registrar shall cause inquiry to be made:

Mr. CASGRAIN: It might be well, if the Prime Minister sees no objection to the proposal, to have this section amended in accordance with a provision in the Immigration Act which I shall read to the committee.

[Mr. Marler.]

The hearing of all cases brought before such board of inquiry shall be separate and apart from the public, but in the presence of the immigrant, passenger or other person concerned whenever practicable, and such immigrant, passenger or other person shall have the right to be represented by counsel whenever any evidence or testimony touching the case is received by the board.

I think that the accused should have the right to be represented by counsel whenever any evidence or testimony touching the case is received by the registrar, and that he should have the right to adduce evidence on his own behalf. A similar privilege is accorded immigrants who come into the country and in regard to whom the question of deportation is under consideration. If we do this much for persons who are not citizens, surely we can give a citizen accused under this legislation the right to be present and to be represented by counsel. If the accused were represented by counsel and gave certain explanations to the registrar, or if certain officials of his company were given an opportunity to explain matters fully, it might well be that the registrar would consider such explanation satisfactory and that further investigation might be avoided. This happens frequently in connection with inquiries under the Immigration Act.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The point of view which my hon. friend presents suggests that the persons complained against as belonging to a combine that is operating to the dertiment of the public are in the position of defendants or accused. I think that is a wholly erroneous assumption. The fact that a representation is made by six persons that some particular concern is a combine operating to the detriment of the public does not place the persons involved in that alleged combine in the position of defendants or accused until, after an investigation by the registrar and after an investigation by the commissioner, and at the instance of the attorney general of the province or the Solicitor General of the Dominion, they are brought into court as having violated a section of the act which we shall discuss later. At that stage it would be quite proper that the persons about to be placed on trial should have the right to be represented by counsel and have all the protection that the law can give them. But for the purpose of a preliminary inquiry to ascertain whether there are prima facie reasons for believing that a combine exists and is operating to the detriment of the public, I think that the more freedom that is left to the registrar to make that preliminary investigation, the better. It goes without saying that the first act of the registrar would be to bring before him the persons against whom the particular complaint is directed. It is conceivable that some of the applications might on the face of them be of such a character that he would dismiss them without going thus far, that is to say, if they were frivolous or vexatious. On the other hand, I cannot conceive of an investigation proceeding a single stage without the registrar getting immediately into touch with the persons against whom the complaint is made. I do not think it would be wise to introduce the lawyers at that early stage of the proceedings.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I was not speaking on behalf of the lawyers.

Mr. MARLER: Is the Prime Minister of opinion that the registrar has to be satisfied with the prima facie proof adduced, or does he think that it is imperative that he make an inquiry whether or not he is satisfied with that preliminary proof? It does seem to me, from a reading of the action, that the registrar is bound to make an inquiry into the matter, or have the commissioner make the inquiry, whether he is satisfied or not with the preliminary proof adduced. That is the point I raised a day or so ago. I said that if the registrar had any shadow of proof before him—I did not care what the proof of the six persons was—then there was no objection to his proceeding to investigate any business. But I did think it was a mistake to make it incumbent on the registrar to examine into a business before he was satisfied in the initial stages that there was something wrong. If the Prime Minister would consider that point I should be glad to have his opinion.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think the registrar must proceed up to the point where he is satisfied that either the complaint is frivolous or vexatious and without sufficient foundation or that there is substantial ground for believing that the representations are accurate. It should be left to the discretion of the registrar to proceed in the matter so far as satisfying himself one way or the other. That is all that the section requires. It does not propose that the registrar shall start a full-fledged investigation involving wide and extensive examinations if on the face of things there appears no ground for anything of the kind. On the other hand, if the application does contain representations which make it advisable for the registrar to go pretty carefully into the case before reporting to the minister, he will doubtless proceed as far as the circumstances seem to warrant.

Mr. MARLER: Is it not the case in the opinion of the right hon. gentleman that the registrar under this section would have to investigate the books of the concern or make such reasonable inquiry to establish whether or not the complaint was vexatious or not? How could he determine otherwise? The point I am drawing to the attention of the right hon. gentleman is this, that after the word "registrar" in the second line a few words should be inserted to show that after sufficient proof had been adduced to the satisfaction of the registrar he would proceed to make an investigation. As the section now stands I think the registrar has no option but to make an investigation to determine whether the complaint is frivolous or not.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my hon. friend will look at the words in line 31:

—as he shall consider necessary to inquire into with the view of determining whether a combine exists—

Those words ought to meet what my hon. friend has in mind. If the registrar thinks it necessary to carry the investigation to a certain point to satisfy his own mind, he is at liberty to do so. If by a brief examination he feels quite satisfied that the combine does not exist, then he need not pursue the inquiry any further. But the responsibility is his to say that he has looked into the matter and found that there are not reasonable grounds for believing that the combine is operating to the detriment of the public. Having that responsibility, he ought to be permitted to judge how far he should carry his investigation.

Mr. MARLER: In that case the registrar would be bound to make an investigation, which might be of considerable extent, to determine whether the allegations made were frivolous or not. I do not think there is any doubt about that. In other words, the registrar would have to go into the company's books and make an examination of its affairs no matter whether the allegations were wholly frivolous or not. Under this section the registrar would be bound to take that course in order first of all to satisfy himself whether the complaint was well grounded. That is the objection I urged a couple of days ago, and I think it is still in the bill as it stands now. I am not asking that the discretion of the registrar shall be circumscribed by any rules, but that he should have produced what in his opinion is reasonable proof before he makes any investigation and puts a business to all the disturbance that this would involve.

4 p.m.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Of course, my hon. friend must assume that the person who is appointed as registrar will be a man of character and judgment and will act accordingly. By way of illustration, I might be allowed to assume for a moment that my hon. friend was appointed a registrar under this section, and a complaint was brought before him. The responsibility would be his to decide whether there were grounds for believing that a certain combination was acting to the detriment of the public. In that regard he would use his judgment as to the class of people who appeared before him and as to the representations they made in deciding how far it was necessary to go in verifying their representations. He would not necessarily at once institute an inquiry into all the ramifications of the business before satisfying his mind that such inquiry was essential. I think a great deal is unnecessarily made of the effects of inquiries of this kind. It does not follow that concerns are going to be prosecuted because they are given an opportunity of explaining a certain situation, and that is practically what all the preliminary investigations of this character amount to. I should think a combination that is conducting its business in a fair and honest way would welcome a chance of coming before the registrar.

Mr. MARLER: Providing the registrar is myself.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Providing the registrar is my hon. friend. Perhaps while the government may not be able to secure any one for the position so much to its liking as my hon. friend, it will endeavour to get a registrar who will commend himself to the hon. member.

Mr. MARLER: The hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) might be made registrar.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): You might do worse—probably will.

Mr. MARLER: The Prime Minister suggested if I was appointed registrar under this act what I would do. There is only one thing I could do—I would have to make an investigation of the company's books to determine in my opinion whether the complaint was frivolous or not. Under the section as it now reads I would have no alternative.

Mr. MURDOCK: Mr. Chairman I certainly never understood the section in the sense stated by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler). The words in line 26, "shall have reason to believe" seem to me simply to place in the hands of the registrar the responsibility of determining what he shall do.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. MARLER: May I interrupt the hon. minister? Will he please read a few lines further down?

Mr. MURDOCK: (Reading):

—that a combine exists or is being formed, or whenever so directed by the minister,—

Mr. MARLER: Will the minister please read the next few words?

Mr. MURDOCK: (Reading):

—the registrar shall cause an inquiry to be made—

Mr. MARLER: Precisely.

Mr. MURDOCK: Precisely. He shall cause an inquiry to be made—if in accordance with line 26, he——shall have reason to believe that a combine exists—

And do not let us dodge the real facts now or try to misquote something that is not in the section.

Mr. MARLER: I am not misquoting.

Mr. MURDOCK: He shall cause an inquiry to be made—if he—shall have reason to believe that a combine exists detrimental to the public.

Mr. MARLER: The hon. minister is reading the section backwards. If he reads it forward he can come to no other conclusion than that which I have stated.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. MURDOCK: I think, Mr. Chairman, this is an important clause and should be cleared up, because I have been entirely in error so far if this section contains anything such as is suggested by the hon. member. My understanding all along has been that it was contemplated that an honest-to-goodness-business-square-dealing man would be appointed as registrar with some authority under this bill to utilize ordinary business common sense in deciding that there was real substantial ground to institute an inquiry, and that in no other case would he start in to make an investigation that might be inconvenient or embarrassing to some business concern. If the registrar is going to do even one tithe of what the hon. gentleman suggests, he certainly will be a busy man.

Mr. MARLER: He will be.

Mr. MURDOCK: He would be if he attempted to investigate all business concerns in Canada. I do not think anything such as is suggested can be injected into the bill.

Mr. HEALY: I read this section in exactly the same way as the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George:

Whenever such application shall be made to the registrar—

then you can skip the next three lines and continue the registrar shall cause an inquiry to be made.

It seems to me that it is compulsory there for the registrar to make an inquiry.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think, Mr. Chairman, if my hon. friends will look at the next section they will see pretty clearly by the very first words what is intended:

If after such inquiry as he deems the circumstances warrant, the registrar is of the opinion that the application is frivolous or vexatious,—

That is the extent to which the registrar is expected to go. He must satisfy his own mind having regard to the circumstances, and the inquiry that he is to make is clearly such inquiry as he deems the circumstances warrant. That is the whole purpose of the section.

Mr. MARLER: I think the Prime Minister is thinking of the second inquiry. I am speaking of the preliminary inquiry. That is the only one I have ever taken exception to. I have not taken exception to the second inquiry at all. If the registrar is satisfied by the preliminary inquiry that there is a combine, an injury being done, I have never said that he should not go on. I think he should. I am entirely in accord with the Prime Minister's viewpoint there. But the one point I have made, as has been stressed a few moments ago is, notwithstanding what my hon. friend the Minister of Labour says, that section 6 makes it absolutely imperative for the registrar to make an inquiry. The Prime Minister, a few moments ago asked, if you were a registrar what would you do? I would have absolutely no alternative but to go into the combines themselves and make an investigation of these facts to find out whether the allegations and the complaints made were frivolous or not. However, I have spoken long enough on this subject.

Mr. BOYS: I agree entirely with my hon friend (Mr. Marler). I think reference to section 6 will show that there are three things contemplated by that section. The first is the inquiry to be made by the registrar upon receipt of application. Secondly, the registrar himself if he has reason to believe a combine exists can start an inquiry of his own accord, and thirdly, the minister if he sees fit, can set the machinery in motion. I do not think the lines referred to by the Minister of Labour "or whenever the registrar shall have reason to believe" are coupled at all with the first line. He seems to think that when the application is received the registrar pauses to consider, and after doing some considering, if he thinks there is reason to believe a combine exists, he proceeds. I think the minister is reading it entirely wrong. It is perfectly obvious that there are three distinct provisions. If I am wrong in that I would suggest to the Prime Minister that he should consider an amendment to the section, for certainly it is open to that construction without any doubt. Let us read it again:

Whenever such application shall be made to the registrar—

That is one thing. Then he must proceed to make the inquiry referred to, and furthermore he may require returns to be made under oath and so on. That is one thing. Next comes this:

—whenever the registrar shall have reason to believe that a combine exists or is being formed—

He may set the law in motion. Or third, the minister may set the law in motion. If that is not the intention I would respectfully suggest that the Prime Minister had better reframe the section for I feel certain that the language is not capable of any other interpretation.

Mr. MARLER: It has been suggested to me—it is not my own suggestion—that after the word "registrar" instead of the word "or" the word "and" be used. The section would then read:

Whenever such application shall be made to the registrar, and whenever the registrar shall have reason to believe that a combine exists or is being formed, etc.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does not that go further than the hon. member intends? That would shut off any initiative on the part of the registrar, and I do not think that he means to go as far as that. Of course, the real trouble about this bill is that those who are chiefly in favour of it have not taken the time to find out what it does mean. The hon. Minister of Labour is just as right in his contentions on this clause as he has been in the whole of his main argument. He is keeping up his batting average. He is one hundred per cent wrong exactly, no more and no less. I do not know that it makes very much difference. After all, this is only a start. The government are satisfied with the bill; let them have it. They think it is all right; let them have it. We have tried to point out how absurd these things are, but they do not want any assistance, none at all, so why should we delay the proceedings one way or the other. Of course, if English means what English is supposed to mean, if these written words are to be taken not as a joke from the Department of Labour but as meaning just exactly what they are supposed to mean, the hon. gentleman who has raised this point is absolutely right.

I want to ask a further question. Can my right hon. friend give us any light as to what the words "or others" mean in this same section? I admit we have had one explanation from the Minister of Labour, and I must congratulate him upon that. In that explanation he again kept up his batting average. I think his explanation was again one hundred per cent error, because he tells us that the reason that the words "or others" are put in there is this, that these combinesters sometimes are so clever that they can take the position that they are neither producers nor consumers, and they therefore are "others," so that the word "others" according to the minister means them.

Mr. MURDOCK: The hon. gentleman is misquoting me, as he will find if he refers to the record.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We will see just what he says. Here it is:

> It came to my attention some two or three years ago that these words "or others" were very necessary on account of the business in which such "combinesters" were engaged, that if these words "or others" were not there, they would be able, with legal advice, to prove conclusively that they were neither a producer of the thing they were combined to deal in, nor a consumer of that particular thing, and that therefore, the words "or others" were necessary there to include them and every citizen of this Dominion.

Now my hon. friend will say that the word "others," is put in because these people that are combinesters can say: We are neither producers nor consumers. Perhaps I had better pause here to ask the minister if I did not read his statement right.

Mr. MURDOCK: That part of it which you read I think was read right.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is the only thing I am referring to, that and nothing else. My hon. friend will say that the word "others" there is put in for the purpose of protecting these wicked people from themselves. They may say they are not producers, or they may say that they are not consumers. They are in a combine and that combine may be hurting themselves, and that is the reason the word "others" is in there. That is the explanation given. I am quite sure that my right hon. friend will say that that is not his reason, but that is the only reason we have been given up to date. I think we should be given some sane, logical reason as to why the word "others" is there.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think I can give my hon. friend a reason that he will accept. He himself is partly responsible for the insertion of those words, and I think that reason was given and given by the Minister of Labour yesterday. My hon. friend (Sir Henry Drayton) has only to ask his own leader and to consider what he did when he was a member of the government to discover where those words came from. I have in front of me the Combines and Fair Prices Act of 1919, which was passed when my hon. friend was a member of the government, and the language of that act is as follows:

> The expression "combine" is used in this act with intended relation to articles of commerce, and it shall be deemed to have reference only to such combines, immediately hereinafter defined, as, with relation as aforesaid, have, in the opinion of the Board of Commerce of Canada (or of a single member thereof acting under authority of and for the purposes of section eight of this act) operated, or are likely to operate, to the detriment of or against the interest of the public, consumers, producers or others—

That is the language that my hon. friend was responsible for putting in the statute which was passed relating to combines. The present administration is seeking to take from previous legislation what was best and most effective in it and omit what seemed to be superfluous and unnecessary, and therefore retains those words. I confess I did not see that they had any great significance until I heard the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Baxter) yesterday draw the attention of the House to the fact—or rather ask the question—was an insurance company a consumer or producer, was a transportation company a consumer or producer. He said he could not tell. Well, the purpose of this bill is to protect any section of the public, whether transportation companies, insurance companies, or anyone else. That is the reason why the words "or others" are inserted there and should be kept there. I hope my hon. friend will feel that, inasmuch as he has been partly responsible for the insertion of these words in a similar enactment perhaps there is great wisdom in their being included there.

As to the other point which has just been mentioned, let me say to my hon. friend that when he intimates the government is not anxious to receive any assistance that can be given he is quite in error, the government will welcome any assistance. What the government hopes will be avoided is unnecessary criticism, obstruction simply for the purpose of obstruction. Nothing of the kind has been shown. But I would certainly like my hon friend and every member of the House to feel, that the government will welcome any suggestion, any assistance in making this bill as perfect as it can be made. It is a very difficult question and will require all the expert advice it is possible to offer.

Just before I leave the section we are referring to let me read the provisions one by one. First of all there is this provision:

Whenever such application shall be made to the registrar—

That is the first condition if one wishes to put it so. Then:

—or whenever the registrar shall have reason to believe that a combine exists or is being formed—

That is the second.

—or whenever so directed by the minister—

That is the third. Now continuing—

—the registrar shall cause an inquiry to be made—

I think that is, perhaps, where the fear of hon. members arises. They have a fear of the word "inquiry," they attach to it a significance which the rest of the language of the section does not justify. "Cause an inquiry to be made" does not mean that the registrar shall institute a large and extensive inquiry, going into all the business transactions of a company in a formal manner. If one reads the rest of the section one will see what is meant. Let me continue:

—cause an inquiry to be made into all such matters whether of fact or of law with respect to the said alleged combine as he shall consider necessary—

The whole of it is limited by what the registrar himself shall consider necessary to inquire into with a view of determining whether a combine exists. He is not expected to go and find out how far the combine could operate; and by the word "combine" there, reference, of course, is to a combine as defined by the act which is a combine operating to the detriment of the public. He proceeds to inquire with a view to determining whether a combine operating to the detriment of the public exists or not. Now the very next section, which still refers to the registrar says:

If, after such inquiry as he deems the circumstances warrant, the registrar is of the opinion that the application is frivolous or vexatious, or does not justify further inquiry he shall make a report in writing to the minister setting out the application, the statement or statements, the inquiry made and the information obtained, and his conclusions.

It is perfectly clear that the whole purpose of the section is simply to appoint some person who will receive applications and whose duty it will be to act in much the same manner as a grand jury acts in regard to matters that are drawn to its attention to discover whether there are grounds sufficient to merit an inquiry of a more elaborate character being gone into. I think if my hon. friend will read the two sections just as they are in plain English he will find it difficult to come to any other conclusion.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is quite true that the words in question can be found somewhere else, but I apprehend the draftsman had some reason for what he was doing, There is a good deal of difference between two acts. Words and definitions, and the like, change as acts or as objects change. That I think the right hon. gentleman must know. It is perfectly idle to say to me that I should know all about it, for frankly I do not. I thought this was really the hobby of my right hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie King). I thought he would know the use of every single word in this bill. I am very much surprised to learn that instead of knowing anything about it he simply says "We have gone through your legislation and we have taken all the good we can find in it, dropping the unnecessary clauses." That is discarding the most ingenious although highly fallacious explanation given by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock). The Prime Minister is driven to this point, that knowing nothing about it and having no other reason to offer, he is forced to accept a suggestion made by this side of the House. Well, I think, perhaps, we shall have to let it go at that.

Mr. MURDOCK: I would draw my hon. friend's attention to the fact that the Minister of Labour on 27th January, 1920, knew entirely too much to suit my hon. friend about these things.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We have had so many funny things—and they generally come from the same funny source—they are coming along from time to time. I do not know what my hon. friend is referring to. He is a creator of jokes as well as a great investigator.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not of jokes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Sometimes the investigation was a joke. There was one supreme joker investigated.

Mr. MURDOCK: You are a splendid judge of jokers, you are the king of them.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I might tell my hon. friend what splendid investigations are sometimes made. He has given us a certain date. That date reminds me of one of his startling discoveries made during the last election when he found that a whole carload of 45,000 pounds of campaign literature had ben sent from Ottawa to help me in the West York campaign.

The CHAIRMAN: I am afraid the hon. gentleman is getting out of order; he is wandering from the immediate consideration of clause 6.

Mr. MURDOCK: Who started that, a Tory?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Oh, no; the hon. gentleman knows where it started.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend knows very well. I thought this came up as the result of a question that the hon. gentleman put to me.

The CHAIRMAN: The fact that the hon. member is asked a question does not justify wandering from the subject.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is the investigation to be secret or public?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Secret, or rather I should say private.

Mr. MEIGHEN: So the sun does not commence to shine just yet?

Mr. GOOD: Will the Prime Minister allow a suggestion as to wording which I think will make the meaning of the section a little clearer? I would suggest putting in the word "such" before the word "and" in line 29, and delete the words "to inquire into" in line 31, so that the section will then read:

> The registrar shall cause such an inquiry to be made into all such matters whether of fact or of law with respect to the said alleged combine as he shall consider necessary with the view of determining—and so on.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not think that would alter the meaning. However, I have no objection to using it if the committee think that is better phrasing.

Mr. BOYS: I gather from the remarks of the Prime Minister that he does not agree with the construction placed upon the first two lines of this section by the Minister of Labour, but it would be well to make sure of that. If I understood the Minister of Labour rightly, he really read the section as if the word "or" were "and"; but if I interpret the remarks of the Prime Minister correctly he does not intend that the word "or" should have the effect of the word "and" at all, and there are three distinct propositions.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is right.

Mr. BOYS: If the Minister of Labour is right in his view, there is no question that when you receive the application you then must go a step further and the registrar must have reason to believe a combine exists. I do not think that was the intention, and I see that the Prime Minister does not think that is the intention of it either.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Minister of Labour said he never could agree to that meaning. Is he going to resign?

Mr. MURDOCK: Not at the present moment. That would be too entirely satisfying to my right hon. friend.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It might be a good thing for the country.

Mr. MURDOCK: I respectfully decline to resign. It seems as though it is really necessary for me to explain my position a little further. I do not take any exception whatever to the statement made by the hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Boys); but I hold that, under any reasonable and consistent application of the first words of that section, where six gentlemen had made an application to the registrar, if he had, as it is presumed he might have, absolute knowledge of the conditions in effect with regard to the particular matters as to which representations were made, and if he, therefore, had reason substantially to know that there was nothing in it, he would certainly indicate that fact to those who were making the appeal. So that surely, if the registrar is to be a responsible officer acting under the direction of a responsible minister, the general question would be to determine what would be "reasonable knowledge" before proceeding, or to determine that there was no necessity to proceed. That is the reason why I said that it should be surely determined by the words "shall have reasonable knowledge," because in the final analysis, in any case, so far as the registrar is concerned, that would be the determining factor for the registrar in judging how far he might proceed.

Mr. BOYS: The point was that if the application is once made the registrar is obliged to act whether he wants to or not, and in making that observation I would like to call the attention of the Prime Minister to what he next proposes under section 8. The registrar requires a return under oath, with the production of all agreements, contracts, and so on, and he does this on his own initiative.

I would not object if that were done on the direction of the minister, but it seems to me it is an extensive power to give a registrar who is in one sense responsible to no one. All he has to do when he gets the application is to call for a return upon oath from the party against whom the allegation is made, and then they have to supply the vast amount of information provided for by this section, and return all contracts and agreements, and so on. My own idea would be that this is too much power to give any registrar. If the minister thought it necessary to call for that, I would not object.

Mr. MURDOCK: Does section 7 not provide that the minister shall determine this question?

Mr. BOYS: No. It provides only one thing, and that is that, if the registrar comes to the conclusion that there is not sufficient ground, he then reports the matter to the minister; who then considers it, and if he agrees with the registrar, he in turn gives his reasons for his conclusions to the applicant. On the other hand, as part of that inquiry—I may be reading the act wrongly, but I do not think I am—whether it is the minister or the registrar, or the six individuals, the registrar calls for an extensive return on oath. I say that is a tremendous power to give a registrar.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We can discuss section 8 when we come to it.

Mr. BOYS: It has to be discussed in connection with this section, because so long as you leave the words "or whenever the registrar shall have reason to believe a combine exists," you give him that power, and having that power, he proceeds as outlined in the following section. I am quite prepared to discuss that section when we reach it, but it is quite proper at this stage to refer to it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think if the act is to have any virtue, you must give to the registrar all the powers he might find necessary to satisfy his mind as to the applications made. The charge that the right hon. leader of the Opposition has made against this measure is that it has no teeth in it of any character. I think he added that it had no claws. My hon. friend wants to take away apparently all the little power that is given to the registrar. I think unless you give the registrar some opportunity of getting any information you render his position one of absolute futility.

Mr. BOYS: I think you should sink your teeth in the result, and not in the preliminary investigation. In the preliminary steps teeth are not so essential.

Mr. BIRD: Did I understand the Prime Minister to say this section gives the registrar the power to begin an inquiry on his own initiative?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. BIRD: That is apart from any previous proceeding?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, if he believes there is a combine in restraint of trade.

Mr. BIRD: From information he has acquired himself?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. BIRD: Would he be expected to exercise surveillance over the conduct of business in general on behalf of the public?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think he would probably find his time would be very well taken up simply discharging the duties the act places upon him without attempting any general supervision of business.

Mr. BIRD: I asked that question because it seemed to me almost vital that he should be expected to exercise some degree of surveillance over the business that he is concerned with. I understand from the tenor of the right hon. member's speech on this matter, that the registrar would be appointed as a guardian of the rights of the public. The history of the guardians of the public is instructive. The guardian of the rights of the public unfortunately occupies a delicate position. That is, he takes up his position on lines that divide the public from their would-be exploiters, and I recall to mind the history of the guardians of the poor in the history of the British Poor law. Originally guardians were instituted with human motives in regard to the rights of the poor, but eventually they degenerated into guardians of the taxpayers, and were always on their guard against the encroachments of the poor. It seems to me to be vital, and in fact I do not see that any other part of this act is at all vital as compared with that part which delimits the functions of the would-be guardian. If this registrar is simply placed there to take the buffet and absorb the shock of public complaint ere it reaches the foot of the throne, I do not think there is very much in this legislation after all, and I would very much prefer that this registrar were given certain police powers, powers of surveillance, so that his spare time might be employed on behalf of the people as against their would-be exploiters. My prophecy is that unless that is done his position will degenerate into that of a guardian of the exploiters of the people, and will not maintain its original intention of being a guardian of the people themselves.

I offer that as a criticism of this bill. It is all right to be precise and exact about the incidentals, but when you come to define the functions of the man or the person who is to carry out the law you are touching its nerve. Therein lies the whole work. The registrar, whoever he may be, will be exposed to much influence from the public. Any motion that comes from the public will be now and then and here and there, scattered and pretty much ineffective. It will not be concerted. The powers that will move upon him from above will not be of that kind. They will be concerted, concentrated; and woe to the man if his duties are not defined and if those duties are not so defined as to make it beyond any peradventure that he is placed there on behalf of the public. I wish the committee to note that that was the sole motive for introducing this legislation—that the public should be safeguarded from this menace that exists from growing combines. The whole intention of the legislation is defeated to begin with if you do not so state—put it in the bond—that this registrar is placed there purely for public reasons, for the public benefit, and not in any way to absorb the effect of public complaint before it reaches the point where it can be effectively heard.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If the fact that any liberty is given to any six individuals to bring to the attention of an officer of the government a matter which, they believe, affects the public in a detrimental manner, is not sufficient in the way of supervision in the public interest, I doubt very much if more effective supervision could be found in giving to one government officer the general business of going around and hunting for grievances and difficulties. What my hon. friend suggests would lead only to an expectation on the part of the people, of interference with business in a manner which would hardly be in the public interest itself.

Mr. PUTNAM: To revert to a minor matter, I must support the suggestion of the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Good) that the word "such" be inserted in line 29 before the word "and." This will not alter the meaning in any degree, and it will make good language. The word "such" is rather obviously omitted.

[Mr. Bird.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We have the word "such" appearing six or seven times in the one sentence. That does not affect the meaning.

Section agreed to.

On section 7—Registrar to report to minister on inquiry; minister to decide whether further inquiry shall be made.

Mr. CARROLL: Has the Prime Minister taken into consideration the suggestion I made the other evening regarding the finality of the minister's decision in matters of this kind, whether or not, after he has read the evidence sent up by the registrar, he will place the matter before the attorney general of the province? I would think, unless the minister who will have charge of this matter is the Minister of Justice, there might possibly be an appeal to the Minister of Justice or to the members of the government. The reasons I gave for that were that if the minister who would function under this measure were a layman, he might, perhaps, not be just in a position to understand the nature and weight of evidence as well as the Minister of Justice or members of the government.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Any action of the minister would be action on the part of the members of the government. I think that will cover the matter.

Section agreed to.

On section 9—Power of registrar to investigate and to enter and examine premises, books, etc.:

Mr. LEWIS: Is this power of investigation limited to the registrar himself, or can he appoint anyone to conduct the investigation? The clause does not say anything about anyone whom the registrar may appoint for the purpose.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I presume the registrar would have in that regard just the same powers that a judge would have in making an investigation. Some things which it might be impossible for him to investigate personally, he might detail an officer to work out for him; but the responsibility for the investigation must be with the registrar himself.

Section agreed to.

On section 10—Governor in Council may appoint commissioners to hold investigations:

Mr. MEIGHEN: I presume, under clause 7, if the minister orders another investigation, the registrar has to go on and make another investigation. The bill does not say so, but that is clearly presumable.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Clause 7 reads:

Whether further inquiry shall or shall not be made.

I think the further inquiry there rather refers to an inquiry by the commissioner than by the registrar.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the minister orders a further inquiry, he further inquires. Will this further inquiry be private or public?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think it will still remain private unless hon. gentlemen wish to change the drafting of the law.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am waiting to see when the sun comes out, that the minister referred to yesterday.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Just as soon as the bill passes.

Mr. CASGRAIN: This clause refers to the commissioner. I think this would be the proper moment to suggest the amendment which I tried to introduce before, that the man appointed should be a lawyer of ten years' standing at the bar, or a judge of the Superior Court in the province in which the inquiry is to be held. I understand there might be some objection in the case of a registrar, because a registrar would more likey be an officer such as we call a prothonotary, or an officer of the court. When the question is one of appointing a commissioner who is going to go outside, in a larger territory and wider field, to investigate matters, he ought to be a lawyer of a certain number of years' standing at the bar, say, with the number of years' standing necessary to be a judge, or a judge of the Superior Court. Under the old act of 1910, it was always a judge who was president of the board. A board comprising Mr. Justice Laurendeau, of Montreal, Mr. Walsh and, a lawyer, I think, a Mr. White, conducted the only investigation that took place at that time. In this case, the amendment that I suggest might have its raison d'être, and it ought to be adopted by the committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my hon. friend stops to consider the class of persons who have been appointed on royal commissions, he will see the wisdom, possibly, of not limiting the individuals just to members of the legal profession. No doubt members of the legal profession have some special qualifications; but there might be cases pertaining to industry in its various branches in which an individual who was more or less familiar with the particular industry or allied business, might be a more suitable man to conduct the investigation than a member of the legal profession. The government will have to take the responsibility for its appointments in that regard. Appointments will be made by the Governor in Council, and I think my hon. friend may feel that care will be exercised in the selections made.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Another knock at the lawyers.

Mr. GOULD: I suggest to the hon. gentleman who so frequently offers amendments in favour of the lawyers that it is quite unfair that he should advance arguments so often in support of class legislation.

Mr. CASGRAIN: It is not class legislation.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What are my right hon. friend's ideas as to the remuneration that will be paid the commissioners to be appointed, and also the registrar? The bill may be useful although we think it is too much emasculated to be of use. However, we hope it will be useful to some extent at least. It may also be turned into a beautiful mess of patronage and prove a waste of money, and I think the House has a right to know now what the views of the cabinet are in regard to the remuneration of these gentlemen, whether you call them commissioners or anything else. The usual practice in the past has been to select the prosecuting attorney of the district, who is accustomed to elucidate facts and is familiar with search warrants, the seizure of papers and so forth, for such duties as are here contemplated. If that plan were adopted, although the government might rob itself of the opportunity to reward a few more Liberal politicians who are not yet satisfied, the country would be very greatly benefited by a very much reduced scale of costs in the appointment of persons who have been accustomed to look after this sort of thing.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend may have noticed that the bill gives power to the government to name some individual who already holds a position in the public service to act as registrar or, if the circumstances seem to necessitate it, to make a separate appointment; and I should think that for the class of work expected of the registrar, and having regard to the character of the man who would fill the position he would correspond very nearly to a deputy minister and the salary would be proportionate. As to the amount to be allowed the commissioners, I should think that what has been the average in the case of royal commissions would possibly be the amount that the government would think proper for these officers. I have no final judgment on that point, but I am sure that in fixing the amount the government will bear in mind its responsibility to parliament for such expenditures as it may find necessary.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the average allowed royal commissioners? I confess I do not know.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: About $30 a day—it varies between $20 and $40—with necessary expenses. Some commissions have gone much higher than that.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What my hon. friend has in mind is an amount between $20 and $40?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. FORKE: What the hon. member for West York wants to know, I suppose, is how much it will take to satisfy disgruntled politicians.

Mr. JACOBS: It depends on how disgruntled they are.

Mr. BOYS: Would the appointment of the registrar be for life or for ten years as in the case of the Railway Commission? On what basis will he be appointed?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: On a basis similar to other members of the Civil Service.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the Prime Minister really think that the registrar in this position, with the powers he has under the act, if it does not become a dead letter, should be a creature of the government, subject to dismissal at any time by the government? Should he not be in the position of members of the Civil Service Commission, or of the Railway Commission, or of the late Board of Commerce?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think it is very desirable that whoever is appointed should feel that there is some certainty of permanency about the position so long as his duties are being performed in a satisfactory manner, and I should hope that if the government ever changed, the government succeeding would retain in office whomsoever might be appointed provided he filled the office satisfactorily. I do not know that the expression "creature of the government" is wholly a proper one to use in reference to an appointment of this kind. I think the government would be fully aware of its responsibility to the public and to parliament in the matter of such an appointment and would seek to appoint someone whose standing in the community commended itself to the people. The government would be the first to recognize that the effect of a measure of this kind would depend on the character of the men who had to do with its administration.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That does not answer my point. If what the Prime Minister says is right and applies generally, then judges should be appointed on the same basis. If the government can always be relied on never to dismiss anyone for selfish reasons, if the government is always of the nature depicted by some hon. gentlemen yesterday—virtuous and right no matter what issues from it—then, of course, the Prime Minister's position is defensible. But, judging from some appointments that this government has made if one may not judge from anything else, I must say that my faith in that regard has been rudely shattered.

Mr. CAHILL: Did you ever have faith in this government?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I can say that I have had more than I have now.

Mr. MURDOCK: Your government made mistakes, too.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We appointed strong Liberals, and I do not know that we ever made a greater mistake than that relating to the hon. gentleman who interrupted me. If I am ever forgiven for that I shall be safe for all time. Now, I do not myself anticipate—I give my opinion for what it is worth, of course—that this registrar will have very much to do. He will have one job a month; about the end of each month he will have a small task. He may possibly have a little work in between if the act is put into operation and does not become a dead letter; but practically speaking he will have one job a month. If these great inquiries that are supposed to take place are to be of the nature of the sun that dispels thieves and robbers and unworthy things, according to King Richard II in Shakespeare, if these inquiries are to act as a sun to clear away the germs that the Prime Minister mentioned yesterday, there will have, of course, to be an operation of the act. But the registrar sitting in his office will not be any such sun. Anyone who suggests, for example, that the Combines Investigation Act operated as a preventive must have a great imagination.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There was a registrar under the Combines Investigation Act.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He had a fine sinecure.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He was a deputy minister.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He did no work at all. The power of investigation was in the old act, but so far as that act proved a preventive of combines, it might as well have never been passed, and the whole country knows it. There were never as many combines formed in the history of Canada in the same period as during the existence of that act. My anticipation is that this will be just the same and that the registrar will have the duty of drawing his salary once a month. To the extent that it operates the act may prove vexatious, but it will get nowhere. But in the exercise of his duties, in order that at least the minimum of harm may be done and that effective action may be possible, the registrar should not be subject to dismissal at the will of the government. If such is the case he is disrobed of all judicial clothing whatsoever; there is nothing judicial about his office; he is simply there to carry out the will of the minister and of the government, subject to dismissal if he does not. The moment you place a man in a judicial position you must place him beyond the power of dismissal at the hands of the government. Is there anything of the nature of a judicial office in the post of registrar? If there is, then he should not be subject to dismissal.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I agree with my right hon. friend, I think whoever holds this position should feel that he is to all intents and purposes precisely in the same position in relation to the government as is a judge. But the duties are somewhat new and it may be that it would be difficult to find a man of experience to fill the position. Therefore I think it would not be wise to provide in the statute that the registrar shall not be removable from office until it is seen just how far it may be possible to secure a person who will fill this position in the most satisfactory manner. Personally I would not have any objection whatever to having the statute include a clause to the effect that the registrar shall be in the same position as a judge and be appointed for life; but when we are introducing legislation of a new character I think it is wise not to finally close the door to a possible change in the event of an appointment being made which would not be all that the government hoped it would be. I certainly agree that if the office were made in any sense political it would be a great abuse of the whole purpose of the statute.

Mr. FORKE: I do not know whether what I am about to offer is a practical suggestion, but would it not be possible to make the appointee responsible to parliament?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: All members of the service in one sense are responsible to parliament.

Mr. FORKE: I know.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Every minister is responsible to parliament.

Mr. FORKE: But could not the appointee be removed by action of the whole House?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That practically comes to just what my right hon. friend is suggesting, that the position be similar to that of a judge. If the committee think it wise I would have no objection to this being done, but I submit that perhaps it would be better to have the registrar appointed on the understanding that his office would be a life appointment, unless after he had exercised the functions of the 5 p.m. office for some months it was found he was not the person adapted to such a position. I think it would be better to leave the door open in this way so that if the man appointed in the first instance did not measure up to what was expected of him he could be removed from office.

Mr. BOYS: I suppose the appointment of a registrar would involve also the appointment of a secretary and a stenographer and provision for special office accommodation, all of which would cost not less than ten or fifteen thousand dollars. Does not the Prime Minister think that before the country is saddled with any such permanent expenditure there should be some certainty of the registrar having something to do? As my right hon. leader said, I do not think the appointee will be very busy. If he has four or five investigations to make in a year I venture to say that is the utmost he will be called upon to undertake, in fact there may not be as many. Supposing we are right, if the office is once established we are committed to this expenditure. I would suggest that an officer of one of the courts in Ottawa should receive this appointment, at the outset at all events, until we see where this legislation is going to land us. Of course, he should get fair remuneration for any work he does. After a year, or at the outside two years, we will have an idea as to whether there is any real need for such an officer or not. There is power in the bill now to appoint some person who already holds office. That is what I would suggest at the outset, say the registrar of one of our courts in Ottawa, or possibly the deputy minister could for the time being fill the office. There is certainly no good reason to make a life appointment and incur this heavy expenditure until we know just what the duties of registrar will involve. For my part if we find there is necessity for a registrar and important work for him to do, I certainly agree that he should not be subject to removal by any government, but should be in the same position as a judge and be removable from office only for proper cause.

Mr. RYCKMAN: In any event I would suggest to the Prime Minister that such a life appointment be not made until it is determined that this measure is within the competency of parliament to enact. One of the most learned counsel in Toronto has already expressed the opinion that such legislation is beyond the competence of this parliament, and I for one would think that it was not in the interests of the country to appoint a registrar and staff, involving superannuation allowance and other burdens, until it is beyond doubt that this legislation is not ultra vires.

Mr. HEALY: Mr. Chairman, I think the question asked by the hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Boys) as to whether there is any need of a registrar being appointed is easily answered. In my opinion there is sufficient evidence before the committee now to warrant the speedy appointment of a registrar.

The other day the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Hocken) inquired as to whether the refusal by the Canadian Press Limited—as it then was—of a franchise to the proposed Ottawa paper would come within the provisions of this measure. In attempting to give some information the other evening I recited part of the history of a case that had come before the Canadian Press Limited. My remarks called forth from the Ottawa Journal two full columns of personal abuse and a double column editorial this morning. In the latter the Journal calls me almost everything that it is possible to call a man, but I suppose hon. members are not interested in such personal abuse heaped upon themselves. However, as I am termed a company promoter by the writer of the editorial, I may at once state that I never owned a share of promotion stock in my life or drew a fee for promoting a company. I am also charged with the crime of writing a letter to the Canadian Press, Limited, in stationery that happened to be owned by a company in the city of Detroit of which I am president. Of course, this may be a crime in the eyes of the Ottawa Journal.

But perhaps the real reason for these abusive articles is that the managing director of the Ottawa Journal is the president of the Canadian Press which I suggested might be a combine. Now, I think some provision might be made in this bill that where a registrar discovers that a combine exists, and that this combine is subsidized by the government in order that it may exist, the government should cancel the subsidy or any unpaid portion of it during the year in which the discovery was made. That is only a suggestion, but as to the fact whether this is a combine or not the Ottawa Journal goes along for two columns and gives the history of two cases. It connects me very thoroughly with one and ends up by saying that I should be the last person, or words to that effect, to complain because the Canadian Press did eventually grant a franchise to a paper that I promoted and own. The facts are I was a director of the Windsor Telegram, that the Windsor Telegram invested in buildings, plant, machinery and paper $167,000, put a paper on the street, and then asked the Canadian Press for a franchise. The only connection I ever had with that, except writing a few letters, was to appear for five minutes before the Canadian Press at the city of Toronto. They said: "It is all very fine. There is one paper in your border cities of sixty thousand. If you stand the gaff long enough we will probably give you a franchise next September." We carried along our paper without any telegraphic news whatever because the Canadian Press absolutely controls the telegraphic news of this country. It also has an agreement with the Associated Press, and it is impossible for any newspaper in this country to get any telegraphic news without the Canadian Press service. They say in this article, and have said before, that they do not prevent anyone from starting a daily newspaper. Quite right. Mr. Herman could come into the city of Ottawa and invest a million dollars in plant, land, buildings and machinery, and put a daily newspaper on the streets of Ottawa, but he would have no telegraphic news in it. He would have no news of the proceedings of the legislatures. It is true that he could put a special reporter here, but he would have no news from any other part of Canada unless he owned a franchise now controlled absolutely by the Canadian Press, which is controlled in this city by three men, not five, as is stated in this article, because the Citizen owns two franchises, the Journal owns two, and the French paper one.

Now that is the situation. If that is a combine, if the people of this country are willing to pay that combine $58,000 a year so that it will exist, we should know whether a newspaper owner or any number of men who wish to start another daily paper in any part of this country cannot have the telegraphic news. I suggest humbly that it is possible somewhere in this act to take care of a situation such as that. I believe personally that the combine does exist. I believe that it is not for the benefit of the public that it exists. I do not for one moment criticise the service rendered by the Canadian Press. The statement in this article is absolutely correct, that every report sent out by the Canadian Press is accurate. There has been no politics of any description in the reports sent out. I am not attempting to criticise the newspaper men, but I do criticise the men who control these franchises and I say it is to the detriment of the general public of this country that such a situation exists, and that we should cease subsidizing them and perhaps cease allowing them to gather their news over the telegraphic lines owned by the people of this country.

Section agreed to.

On section 15—Employment of experts:

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the intention as to the employment of these other people? Are they to be just temporary employees for each particular case or what?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Just temporary, certainly, to meet a special situation.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: They will not be regular employees; no additions to staff there at all? It is still private down to that point too, is it not?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Unless my hon. friend would like to move to make it public.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am just asking. You have not got the sun yet.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not yet.

Section agreed to.

On section 16—Powers of registrar and commissioner as to witnessses, evidence on oath and production of papers:

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: As to non-attendance of any person who has been duly served with an order, does that cover any ordinary individual who may happen to make default under subpoena.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend is referring to paragraph (d)? This is simply to require the attendance of witnesses that are essential for the investigation. It would be impossible for the registrar or a commissioner to make any headway with the inquiry if no attention was to be paid by witnesses they might subpoena.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What provision of previous legislation do you rely upon for this precedent?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Section 36 of the Combines Investigation Act, 1910.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Has my hon friend—I ask merely for information—ever considered the application of penalties of this character, six months in prison and a fine of one thousand dollars in the case of non-attendance of a witness? Now if he was charging against the people that were interested in the combines that they had destroyed their books or withheld evidence or anything of that kind, well and good, but what does my hon. friend think of imposing a penalty of six months' imprisonment and a thousand dollar fine for a witness forgetting his subpoena papers?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Unless the witness was a material witness and there was some evidence of deliberate intent on his part not to comply with the requirements of the law, I do not think that there would be any likelihood whatever of the penalty being imposed.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am afraid my hon. friend is relying very very much upon somebody else going through this and putting the proper amendments in for him. It is a most extraordinary situation.

Section agreed to.

On section 18—No person excused from attending or giving evidence on ground that evidence may incriminate him:

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have an amendment to this section, Mr. Chairman, that I mentioned it was my intention to introduce. I move to amend the section by inserting the word "oral" before the word "evidence" in line 40 and by striking out the words "or documents" in line 42 and substituting therefor the words "so given." The section as it stands protects in the event of a criminal prosecution any person as respects the oral evidence which he may have given and also as respects documents he may have introduced. It is quite clear that unless the words "or documents" are stricken out, the clause would only serve to protect the combine in the matter of the evidence that was needed at the criminal prosecution.

Mr. MURDOCK: I would point out in that connection that it will be necessary to insert the word "oral" in line 4.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is what I have done.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 19—Proceedings in private:

Mr. MARLER: I suggested a few days ago that the proceedings up to the end of the preliminary investigation should be in private, and that secrecy should be maintained with respect to the documents produced. I do not think the bill carries that out.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The complaint made with respect to this bill, as I understand it, is rather that there is too much privacy about the legislation as drawn. I think the intention is perfectly clear that the proceedings shall be private. The documents certainly would be kept private.

Section agreed to.

On section 20—Counsel may be instructed to conduct investigation:

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is the Prime Minister of the view that when he is going to appoint investigators the investigators have to have counsel to tell them what to do?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There may be cases where it would be in the public interest to have a commissioner assisted by counsel. I think it should be left to the Minister of Justice to appoint counsel if, in the opinion of the government, that step would be wise in the public interest.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is evident that this bill is thorough in one respect—it is about the only thing I can congratulate my hon. friend on having done thoroughly—and that is getting opportunities to employ people. The bill is very thorough there. Now, my right hon. friend, in the first instance, has his registrars and his commissioners. Then he has a right to appoint experts for the purpose of assisting the commissioners when assistance is necessary. Now on top of that he wants to get the right to appoint counsel. If the commissioner is not an expert he might need an expert to advise him. If the commissioner is neither an expert on the one hand nor intelligent on the other, and requires counsel to tell him what ought to be done he should not be appointed. If my right hon. friend accepts my suggestion and appoints the local county crown attorneys as his commissioners he will have no such trouble, and if no additional expenditure is to be incurred the Minister of Finance will be correspondingly relieved.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would point out to my hon. friend that the government is not seeking, in connection with this bill, the right to make any more appointments than have been thought advisable, for example, in the case of royal commissions empowered to investigate different subjects. I think the act has to be broad enough to permit the meeting of any kind of case that may arise. The government will naturally wish to be economical in the administration of this measure and will feel its responsibility for expenditures that are incurred.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes, very much, as in the case of the German claims.

Section agreed to.

On section 22—Distribution of report:

Mr. BOYS: Is it the intention that the report shall be available to anybody who wishes to get it? If so why should it be left to the minister to furnish copies? Under section 19 the proceedings of the registrar and commissioner are to be conducted in private, but the minister may order any portion of those proceedings to be conducted in public. When it comes to the report it is provided that a newspaper or any person can get it only if the minister so directs. I do not see any necessity at all for that precaution. Surely if the country has to pay for all these proceedings, anyone should be able to get a copy of the report, possibly, if thought proper, upon payment of the usual fee of ten cents a folio or a reasonable charge. It should not be for the minister to say that the report shall or shall not be made public.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There again, Mr. Chairman, I would feel that there is a responsibility with the minister which he may be expected to exercise in accordance with what was in the public interest. I can conceive of some cases where, perhaps, it would be the part of wisdom for a minister to withhold a report. But he would be responsible to parliament for his action in so doing; he would have to give the reason for having refused to make a report public. In fact I can conceive of cases where the commissioners might, after having gone into a matter very fully, give it as their opinion that it was inadvisable that the report should be made public. Therefore I think, discretion should be left with the minister in that regard. Personally I am rather sympathetic with the point of view of my hon. friends opposite that everything should be made public; but let me point out again that the government, in this legislation, has sought to avoid what some hon. gentlemen have pointed out as a possible danger—too much interference with business and subjecting private businesses to an amount of publicity that might bring about a possible injury. The government is sincere it its desire to not prejudice a private interest if that can possibly be avoided in the carrying out of this legislation. I think, probably, it is wise to leave with the minister discretion as to the amount of publicity that is to be given to a report.

Mr. BOYS: I do not know that I can agree with my right hon. friend there. I quite appreciate that the earlier stages of the inquiry should be private; but when you have once found that there was something to inquire into, and when a commissioner goes into the matter and hears the evidence and a report is made, surely what I suggest is not going to hurt the firm or person investigated. If the report is unfavourable why should not the public have a right to know the result of the proceedings for which they are paying? As the bill stands at present the whole thing is absolutely private from beginning to end and even the report can be withheld unless the minister chooses to say it can be made public. Not one single step to be taken under the provisions of this bill can be made public except with the minister's authority. Even when the country has paid for the investigation and the report arising out of it is ready that report cannot be obtained except with the minister's permission. The newspapers of the country cannot get the report, the newspapers cannot even be represented at the investigation unless, forsooth a minister of the Crown says so. I am absolutely in accord with the views of the Prime Minister as to the earlier stages of the investigation; I do not think it would be fair to a company, when the matter is being first investigated, that the press and public should know all about it. But when the registrar is of the opinion that there is something to be investigated, and when a commissioner is appointed to take that investigation in hand, why in the world should not the proceedings of that court be open to the public and the press just as readily as the proceedings of any court of justice. Whether the Prime Minister will agree with me in that I do not know; but to maintain, that after a report has been made, the press and the public are not entitled to a copy of it unless some minister says they may have it, seems to me extraordinary. I have heard nothing from the Prime Minister which justifies that. Let me repeat: If the report whitewashes a suggested combine surely to goodness they would want it made public and they, or anybody else, ought to be able to get a copy of the report. On the other hand, if the report finds there has been a combine why put it in the hands of any minister to hush the whole thing up if he wants to? Surely it is in the public interest that the matter should then be made public? What is the good of this bill if the whole thing can be kept from the public? I am not saying the minister will do this, I hardly believe he wants to do it, but why give him this power? The proceedings having reached the stage where the alleged combine is being investigated, the parties concerned being represented by counsel if necessary, I cannot see why they should not then be just as public as in any court of justice. However, if the Prime Minister does not think that procedure is correct I do trust he will accede to the suggestion that at least those interested, including the public and the press, may get a copy of the report when that report is made.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think the word "may" is, to all intents and purposes, equivalent to the word "shall" with this one possible difference; that if you insert the word "shall" you leave no discretion whatever for the holding back of an individual report. You compel every report to be published, regardless altogether of what the circumstances may be. In the event of any report being withheld, the minister is responsible. I have not the slightest objection, if my hon. friend wishes, to move to insert the word "shall" in place of the word "may". The only reason the government has used the language which appears in this bill is the one I have given, an endeavour to have caution exercised in respect of any matters which are likely to be of concern to private business, so as to interfere as little as possible with private business. I feel certain that the minister administering the act would take advantage of the word "may" to give publicity to reports which had been received. If he is given that permission I think that is almost sufficient guarantee that he will exercise it, unless there is exceptional reason for not doing so.

Mr. BOYS: If the Prime Minister intended his remarks as an answer to my suggestion, he misapprehended my meaning. I do not care whether the word "may" or the word "shall" is inserted. If you leave the word "may" in the section I admit you, perhaps, leave it open for a judicial decision. I know that in the county of Simcoe we had a case which lasted one solid week, and finally reached the Court of Appeal, which involved the meaning of the word "may." It was a very costly affair. But my point is as to the words "if the minister so directs". The section reads:

A copy of any report may, if the minister so directs, be sent free of charge to any person.

And so on. My suggestion is that it should be amended so as to read:

A copy of any report shall be available and free to any person and to any newspaper in Canada.

Mr. MURDOCK: As to a case in which the report is against the concern being investigated, as referred to a few moments ago, I would like to ask a question. Considering that the minister has no authority to assess the penalties, or to finally determine, in a real court of justice, the actual guilt for penalty assessing purposes, does the hon. member think it would be in accordance with British justice that the report should be heralded through the country at all times broadcast to the world that one single individual, acting as a commissioner, had expressed to the minister his best judgment that a serious situation existed, that should be sent on—

Mr. BOYS: This is a speech, not a question.

Mr. MURDOCK: No, it is a question.

Mr. BOYS: I will answer it, if the minister will give me a chance.

Mr. MURDOCK: Does the hon. member think it would be in accordance with British justice to send a man to trial with that cloud hanging over him? Would that not rather be a proper thing for the attorney general of the province or the Solicitor General to deal with in sending the case on for determination.

Mr. BOYS: I do not think the question is at all troublesome. Have you not exactly the same state of affairs in a preliminary investigation in any criminal court? Many people are prosecuted in the police court. An investigation takes place there. If the magistrate thinks there is sufficient evidence to place the party on trial, the proceedings in the police court are public, and the party is sent up for trial. At the same time these parties are sometimes found to be innocent. After you have had your preliminary investigation, and this registrar, who has the status of a deputy minister, a fairly responsible man, comes to the conclusion that there is something to investigate, you then go further and your commissioner, another high-priced and capable man, investigates the matter. Both sides are heard. He thinks there is a combine. Do you not think it is time the public knew something about it?

Mr. MURDOCK: I am entirely willing to accept the hon. member's view.

Mr. BOYS: I am delighted I have made some impression on the minister. I was trying to answer his question. I cannot see anything terrible about what the minister has suggested. I did not hear all the discussion yesterday. I was more pleasantly engaged.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Where?

Mr. BOYS: Read the papers and you will find out. I understood the suggestion was there was to be so much light thrown upon this, and it was to be exposed to the sun. Now, I find the whole thing is to be in camera, unless the minister otherwise directs. Coming back to my suggestion—and I make it for the last time—I say that this clause should be amended so that when we reach the last stage of a double investigation no matter what the report is, any newspaper or any individual should be permitted to get a copy of the report if they want it.

Then the bill goes on and provides that the proceedings should be sent to the attorney general, and he should institute proceedings and if he does not do so in three months, the department at Ottawa takes it in hand, and we have a further investigation. It seems to me the provisions of the bill are useless if, when you go through the entire process, the public can not even get a copy of the report unless the minister says so.

Mr. CHURCH: I think it would be better if the House did not pass this bill at all. The committee has carried twenty one clauses, and we are never going to get anywhere in regulating the trusts and combines with this bill. The result of this bill, if it passes, will simply mean a lot of party politics. The registrar and the commissioner, when appointed, will be under the control of a minister of the Crown, While he may be a good minister, he is still a politician, and he will have to deal with the matter of regulation of trusts and combines. This bill provides for a private or star chamber inquiry, and we are not going to get anywhere against the powerful influence of the shipping combine and other trusts, the banking institutions, the great manufacturers' association, and all the rest of these trusts and combines. We have had on and off the statute books for thirty years various legislation dealing with this problem, and we have never got anywhere in solving it. We have not been able to accomplish anything for the working classes in the way of bringing down the cost of living. I listened to the Minister of Labour yesterday and to-day, and I may say that the more I look into this bill the more I am convinced that it is simply fashioned after the style of the Board of Commerce Act of 1919. The registrar will be a politician, and the commissioner will be a politician; one reports to the other, and the other reports to the minister, and then you have got to the end of the first circle. They have to go to the minister and get permission to go further. The proceeding is not conducted as a court would be conducted at all. They had the same legislation in the United States twenty years ago, but they went further, and as I said yesterday the grand jury system was then adopted. Our Board of Commerce Act was based on the same principle as the United States Federal Trade Commission. They did not get anywhere. What has been the result in Chicago under the grand jury system? They had the great motor combines and the oil combines indicted. These gigantic combines are located at the foot of lake Michigan, in the city of Chicago. The grand jury sat and Judge Landis fined the Standard Oil fifty million dollars.

I urge that we take this question out of party politics, and leave it to the grand juries in the different centres of population throughout Canada. In that way we would relieve the government of a great burden. I do not think it is fair to ask the government of Canada, whether this government or their successors, to deal with this matter. The Ministers of the Crown are too busy to attend to it. It is not fair to ask them to take hold of a matter like this, and the country does not expect the government to do the impossible. I think it would be far better if the minister would consider whether he would not, at the end of this bill insert a provision vesting in the grand juries throughout the country the power to deal with this question. There are judicial and national questions and they deal with economic matters. We must be fair to capital on the one side, and to everybody concerned in trade and commerce. You cannot deal with the matter properly if you are going to handle it as a political question instead of as an economic one. You must be fair to the mergers and trusts in that respect, because some of them have been doing good work; some of them have been effecting economies in many spheres of activity.

The majority, however, have not, and they should be under some form of public control. Railway transportation interests are under the control of the Board of Railway Commissioners; they are not under the control of a registrar or of a commission, and there is a suggestion to give that commission increased powers and to put transportation on the ocean and the Great Lakes under its control. If that board can deal with matters like that which are of a national character, surely grand juries can handle the trusts and combines better. They know local conditions and the judges and juries have the time, which a busy minister of the Crown has not, to study the problems. I do not think it is fair to a minister of the Crown on the opposite side, because ministers are loaded up with work, that he should have to assume this additional burden. I would not ask the Prime Minister to do so. The grand jury is a judicial body which can handle this question, it has the time and machinery to handle it, and it is the only body in the Dominion of Canada that can properly handle this question. Under the old Combines Act, 1910, there was only one inquiry, that into the United Shoe Machinery Company; the minister said that from 1908 to 1923 there was only this one inquiry.

Conditions are continually changing in Canada. I hope the government will succeed under this legislation, but I doubt very much if they are going to succeed. I do not doubt their sincerity; I do not doubt the sincerity of the Prime Minister in introducing this legislation; I give him credit for bringing this legislation before parliament. I will be glad to see him bring about some results; but on the one hand, in these days of stress and strain, we must not forget that the capitalists have some rights and, on the other hand, the consumers must come in somewhere. Therefore, I think the courts are better fitted for this work than ministers of the Crown, and registrars and commissioners appointed as they no doubt will be under party politics. We should take this whole question out of party politics to get results.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If it were possible to foresee all the circumstances and how they were likely to operate, I would, I think, agree with my hon. friend that it were well to change the wording and make the publication of the report compulsory as soon as it is handed in. On the other hand, I think a moment's reflection will show that circumstances might arise where an investigation has brought to light many facts which are included in the report. The minister may feel that the case is one which should go on immediately to the courts as the combine is of a character that should be prosecuted. He might wish to reserve for the time being, to place in the hands of the attorney general of the province or the Solicitor General who might be prosecuting the combine, the evidence and the report made on the evidence. It might be to the public interest that all those facts should not be disclosed before the case comes to trial. That discretion should be left with the minister. At all events, I would say to my hon. friend that I think that is a clause which might be permitted to stand as it is, at least, until the legislation is given a trial, and if experience shows that it is wise to make it mandatory rather than permissive, we can have it amended at a subsequent session.

Mr. FORKE: I am rather in sympathy with the remarks of the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Boys). I think it is clause 25 which says that unless the minister thinks there is sufficient evidence to go on with, the whole thing is put aside. That seems to throw a tremendous responsibility on the minister. The whole proceedings have been in secret; nobody knows anything about them. The evidence is taken; then the matter comes before the minister, and he can shelve it if he likes. If the public had some information as to what evidence had been gathered in the inquiry that had been made, they would be in a position to know whether the minister had acted fairly or otherwise in dismissing the case. A tremendous responsibility is thrown upon the minister; in fact, this is a temptation that, perhaps, he should not be subjected to without some public investigation of some kind. I admit the argument which the Prime Minister has advanced.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I might point out to my hon. friend that his remarks would have great force and weight and I would agree with him wholly, were it the circumstance that the minister is not responsible to parliament for everything that he does. But when members of the committee recall that with respect to every action of a minister, either in giving out a report, or in withholding it, he is accountable to parliament, and that any hon. member may call for any report that has been made, may demand from the minister in the presence of his fellow members, an explanation of why that report was not made public at a particular time, with that thought in mind, having regard to the unforeseen nature of the circumstances of different cases and what the public interest at the moment may render most desirable, I think it is better not to take away the discretionary power of the minister. I think a minister will seek at all times to further what he believes to be the public interest. I cannot conceive of any minister, unless he is heading straight to destruction, both for himself and for his government, trying to take a course that will be other than in the public interest and one that he can defend on the floor of parliament. That is my reason for thinking that, on the whole, it is wiser to leave with the minister the discretion as to the time, at any rate, of giving out a report that may be made.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Just let us see how far we are really going in this legislation —towards enabling the whole of the matter to be turned into a matter of party political exigency, that and nothing else.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask my hon. friend this question when he speaks about turning the whole matter into a matter of party political exigency? Is that the point of view from which he would administer the legislation? If not, why should he impute a different motive to anyone else?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I cannot see any other reason from the manner in which the bill is drawn. In the first instance, my hon. friend is perfectly right. He is going into this question of a combine, and he does not know whether there is anything in it or not. He puts a man, in whom he is supposed to have trust and confidence—or else he would not appoint him—in a position for the purpose of finding out whether the prima facie case is such that it is clear that a combine exists. It is quite right that that should be all private. Nobody is arguing that that should be made public. That is the first proceeding. The second proceeding is this, that my hon. friend turns around and this particular concern over here is turned inside out, and that particular concern over there is turned inside out for the purpose of finding out whether the commissioner or the registrar was correct or not in his views. Those people are, in effect, on trial and they ought to be. I am not quarrelling with that at all. They are undergoing a preliminary investigation, and they are undergoing a preliminary investigation at the hands of the person that my hon. friend again has to have confidence in or he ought not to appoint him, for the purpose of finding out whether or not they are guilty of an offence. On top of all that, money is being spent. The investigation here and the investigation there are costing the country money, for experts, commissioners, time, evidence and the like. The result is a result from which further criminal proceedings are to start or not to start, just exactly the same as in the case of a preliminary investigation. The crime is certainly no graver than are crimes that are covered by preliminary investigations. These preliminary investigations are held under the laws passed by this House. They are public; they relate to far more serious offences, such as the improper publication of the opinion of a magistrate that the committal should be made, and they do far more harm than any mere trade offence can do. And there are further investigations that are not surrounded with as many safeguards as we have here. I ask my hon. friend why there should be the difference, unless there is to be political favouritism or favouritism of some other kind. A concern over here, let us say, is being investigated. The minister may not like the colour of the man's hair or the kind of business he carried on, and he makes the report public. Another concern is being investigated at the same time; the minister likes the man and thinks his business is all right; and there is no publicity in that case. The one is taken and the other is left. If my hon. friend wants to have something like unifrom treatment of companies and wishes to see justice in the administration of the act, there should be no room for such favouritism. The minister should take his stand openly in regard to either course. He may be right or wrong in both, but the public surely have a right to know what the facts are. We have criticized this bill on the ground that it is going to take us nowhere. Surely my hon. friend must see the force of these criticisms, if the whole thing is to be left to the possibility of being tied up in secrecy. My hon. friend suggests that the matter should be kept quiet until the attorney general knows about it. Why? Why should it be kept quiet before the attorney general knows about it any more than any other crime under the statute? What possible harm can come of publicity? I think my hon. friend on further consideration should have that clause so amended as to provide that the public shall have the second report when it is made.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The hon. member starts on the assumption that the minister who is to administer the act will not make the reports public; I think I am equally entitled to assume that he will make all reports public. It is from that point of view that the government is proceeding, namely, that the reports will all be made public unless there is some very special reason why publicity should not be given to a particular report at a particular time. I think that any minister who would refuse to make a report would incur a great responsibility. The minister in charge would be very careful in exercising that right in view of that responsibility. I have in mind a matter that is the subject of inquiry at the present moment,—the question of freight rates on the Great Lakes. The government had a preliminary investigation made of that matter and a report was presented by the investigator. I believe the whole report has been substantiated under a royal commission which had power to put parties under oath. An effort was made on the part of interests concerned to secure a copy of the report before they were brought to the position where they would have to appear before the commission for investigation. The government refused to make the report public, believing that it was in the public interest that the information gathered in that way should be handed over to the commission that was to make inquiry into the matter and be used by the commission in such a manner as would best serve the public interest. The government, I think, was wise in withholding the report from publication at the time; and I can conceive of cases under this act where, a group of interests having associated themselves, are acting in a manner detrimental to the interest of the public, information is obtained and a report submitted which is so strong that the government intends then to proceed to prosecution of the combine concerned. It might in such cases be very much in the interest of the public to withhold the report of the evidence on which the decision to prosecute is based, until such time as the combine itself has been investigated in a court of law in the regular way. This is a matter that can be determined only in the light of each case as it arises. I am entirely with my hon. friends opposite in this regard,—I think that wherever it is possible, and there is reasonable ground for believing that no just interest will suffer, the fullest publicity should be given to all proceedings under the act.

Mr. BOYS: My right hon. friend is with us, but he will not accede to our request.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let the hon. member move an amendment.

Mr. BOYS: I was more or less impressed by what the Prime Minister said with regard to the finding on the part of the commissioner. In special cases it might not be desirable to publish the report. Personally I should be satisfied if the Prime Minister would go this length, that if the commissioner himself, who should be the best judge because he has to hear all the evidence, recommends against the publication of the report, then by all means the minister should withhold it and let the matter go on to trial. If the report is a favourable one I can see no reason why it should not be published; any question of withholding the report could arise only in the case of its being unfavourable. If the commissioner after hearing the evidence is of opinion that the report should not be published, and he so recommends, the minister should be in a position to exercise his discretion and withhold its publication. But if the commissioner does not so recommend, I do not believe any minister should have the power that is here provided. I think you are putting more on the shoulders of the minister than you should; and if perchance there ever were a minister who wanted to use legislation to personal advantage or profit, you are certainly giving him a wonderful opportunity. You might have a report recommending a prosecution or stating that a combine existed, and if the minister were a man susceptible to influence, and if he were so influenced, the work of the whole investigation could be frustrated merely by a word from him.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I shall be pleased to hold the section and confer with my hon. friend to see if we can draft a clause to meet what he has in mind. I share the views of hon. gentlemen who want to give as much publicity as possible to inquiries, and shall be only too happy to go as far as I can if I can get the committee to go with me.

Section stands.

On section 27—Contempt of registrar or commissioner:

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the precedent for this?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This is similar to section 31 of the Combines Investigation Act of 1910.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It seems a rather absurd section; it goes further than anything I have yet run across.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is very similar to a clause in the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act which has been on the statutes for twelve or fourteen years.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The section refers to any person who "wilfully insults" the registrar or any commissioner. Who is to determine when such an insult takes place?

[Mr. Boys.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: You never know how anyone will behave.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: But what does the Prime Minister think?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is a section of the bill which cites the manner in which persons offending under its provisions are to be tried, and I presume it will be in accordance with that section that action will be taken.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I can understand the reference to "interruption" much more readily than I can the reference to the "insult." I do not know what exactly is sought to be got at. Suppose anyone said the registrar was stupid. Would that be an insult?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would not think so.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Well, possibly my hon. friend is correct. But what does he think would be an insult under that clause?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The following section provides:

> For the purpose of the trial of any indictment for any offence against this act, section five hundred and eighty-one of the Criminal Code authorizing speedy trials without juries, shall apply.

And the next section:

> Any person who contravenes or fails to observe the provisions—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend is missing the point. His reference to section 27 has nothing to do with my question. I was asking him what is a "wilful insult." He says it would not be a wilful insult to say that the commissioner is stupid? What is the intent?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I suppose if he hit him over the head it would be an insult.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would call that an assault.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Possibly—an insult too.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is covered by the Criminal Code.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend was Crown prosecutor for a long time and is, I think, pretty familiar with a wilful insult

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I was never called upon to deal with anything so silly as a wilful insult.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question being put, pursuant to rule.

Friday, May 11, 1923

The House met at three o'clock.

BANKING AND COMMERCE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I move that the name of Hon. T. A. Crerar be taken from the list of members composing the Select Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce and the name of Mr. Robert Forke be inserted in lieu thereof.

Mr. SPEAKER: By unanimous consent.

Motion agreed to.

DOMINION LANDS ACT—COAL

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 159 (from the Senate), to amend the Dominion Lands Act respecting the sale or other disposal of coal lands and coal mining rights.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Sir LOMER GOUIN (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 165 (from the Senate) to amend the Petition of Right Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

PRIVATE BILLS

FIRST READINGS

Bill No. 160 (from the Senate), for the relief of Edgar Lindsay.—Mr. Stewart (Leeds).

Bill No. 161 (from the Senate), for the relief of Charles Marigoli Hare.—Mr. Duff.

Bill No. 162 (from the Senate), for the relief of Esther Levin.—Mr. Gordon.

Bill No. 163 (from the Senate), for the relief of Hilda Marguerite Watt Black.—Mr. Stewart (Leeds).

Bill No. 164 (from the Senate), for the relief of Abigal Aileen Beryl McCrea Tull.—Mr. Duff.

DELAY IN BRITISH MAILS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. HOCKEN: I should like to ask the Prime Minister if he can give any explanation for the extraordinary delay in British mail reaching this country. For example, the latest issue of the London Times received here was dated April 6th, but it did not arrive until May 7th. There must surely be some reason for this delay of apparently a month in the transmission of mail to Canada.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING: I cannot offhand give my hon. friend a reply. There has been some considerable delay in the crossing of some of the ships, as the hon. member will have observed. I have no doubt there are other reasons to account for the matter to which he refers. I will direct the attention of the Acting Postmaster General (Mr. Graham) to the question and will endeavour to get a reply.

THE ROYAL COMMISSION ON PENSIONS

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. R. J. MANION (Fort William and Rainy River): I should like to direct the attention of the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment to a telegram which I have received. I know that the hon. member for Victoria City (Mr. Tolmie) received a similar telegram, and I am sure other hon. members have received telegrams of the same tenor:

> The Fort William branch of the Great War Veterans Association joins with the Dominion command in demanding from Pension Board immediate statement as to whether it intends to review claims now pending in accordance with Royal Commission findings. Board's refusal to act causing unwarranted distress and hardship among many widows, dependents, and disabled ex-service men throughout the Dominion. Urgently request immediate acceptance.

In view of the report of the royal commission, which has pointed out many defects in the carrying out of this act, I should like to ask: Does the hon. minister feel it within his power to instruct the Board of Pension Commissioners to carry out the intent of the law, as brought before the House of Commons last year by the parliamentary committee, and as explained to the House? If he cannot do that, I should like to find out, if possible, when he intends to bring in legislation which he stated some time ago he was going to bring in, to carry out the recommendation of the royal commission, and settle the discontent which exists very seriously throughout the country among ex-service men.

Hon. H. S. BELAND (Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment): It has come to my knowledge that a very large number of telegrams have been received by members of the House, and also by members of the government. As to the interpretation of the Pension Act by the Board of Pension Commissioners, my hon. friend and hon. members of this House are aware that it is entirely within the discretion of that board. The question of the advisability of amending the Pension Act is for this House and parliament generally to consider. It is the intention of the government to bring down legislation during the present session with a view to remedying the grievances which have been uttered more or less all over Canada by the ex-service men. It is hoped that these amendments will meet the situation. Again repeating myself, I say that, as far as an interpretation of the act is concerned, it is entirely within the power and authority of the Board of Pension Commissioners.

Mr. MANION: The Board of Pension Commissioners, according to the ruling of the commission—I do not wish to discuss it, and I shall not do so except to say one word—having put up certain information to the minister for interpretation, and having finally taken their own interpretation, perhaps not according to what the minister had said, point out that these clauses should be interpreted to a certain extent with different points in view. Under the circumstances, does the minister not think that he might direct the Board of Pension Commissioners to interpret the act in the most broad-minded way possible, and will not he promise the House to bring down the alterations which he suggests at a very early date?

Mr. BELAND: The minister has on repeated occasions, in memoranda addressed to the Board of Pension Commissioners, asked for the most generous interpretation of the act. The contention of the Board of Pension Commissioners is that they have always remained within strict interpretation of the statute. The remedy, therefore, would appear to be in an amendment to the statute, and this amendment, or these amendments. I propose to introduce in the House as soon as possible—as soon as the budget debate is over. Whatever legislation may be adopted by this House or by parliament would not take effect before it is assented to by His Excellency which would happen only at the time of prorogation. But I repeat that I expect that it will be possible to amend the Pension Act so that the complaints which have been uttered during the last year or year and a half will be remedied. That assurance has been given by myself to all those who have done me the honour of corresponding with me either by letter or telegram.

SOUTH SHORE BRIDGE

On the Orders of the Day.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: I wish to direct the attention of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Lapointe) to the fact that an order was agreed to on the 23rd April last, regarding the construction of the South Shore bridge. When may we expect that return?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I have been advised that this report will be handed to me in a few days, and I shall be pleased to lay it on the Table.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT BY HON. W. S. FIELDING, MINISTER OF FINANCE

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think the rules of the House permit that you should leave the chair without a motion, but as that will not carry out the object in view, I will move that the House do resolve itself into Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. SPEAKER: Rule 17 C provides that on Thursdays and Fridays, when the Order of the Day is called for the House to go into Committee of Supply or Ways and Means, Mr. Speaker shall leave the chair without putting any question. Though that is the letter, it is not the spirit, of the rule, The budget speech must be delivered before the House and not before the committee. Therefore, living up to precedent, I shall put the question: Mr. Fielding moves, seconded by Mr. Lapointe that I do now leave the chair for the House to resolve itself into a Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. FIELDING: The financial affairs for the fiscal year, 1921-1922, which was the last year of which we have the public accounts, call now for only a passing notice. With regard to that year, the year ended 31st March, 1922, it is worth while remembering that while the present government were in power at the time the accounts were made up at the close of the year, they had only been in power three months, and, therefore, it will not be unfair to treat that year as a Conservative year, inasmuch as the Conservative government of the day, in the discharge of their duties, prepared the estimates and voted the money, made the contracts, and practically controlled the expenditure of the year. So that I think we may count that year, practically speaking, as a Conservative year. I am going to ask at this stage, and at one of the other stages during my remarks, that the courtesy of the House be extended to me, which is usual, to enable me to put into Hansard, in the form of a summary some figures which I may present.

Income and Expenditure

The revenue for the year was $381,952,386.99 against ordinary expenditure of $347,560,690.63.

If the surplus is to be ascertained by comparing the ordinary revenue with the ordinary expenditure—and that was the time-honoured way of determining surpluses—then on that year there was a surplus of $34,391,696.36. But there was a capital expenditure of $16,295,332.55. If we take that into account, both ordinary expenditure and capital expenditure, there was still a surplus of $18,096,363.81. Then there were certain special expenditures, including demobilization charges, of $1,526,583.22. So, if we take into account ordinary expenditure, capital expenditure and what is called special expenditure, there still was a surplus of $16,569,780.59. So far this is a story of surpluses; but there is a further statement to be made which quite destroys that happy picture. There were charges for advances to railways of $97,950,645.36. If we take, then, the whole expenditure for the year, ordinary, capital, special and railways, there was a deficit in that year of $81,380,864.77. After allowances for some deductions are made, the net result was that in that year we added to the public debt $81,256,818.04.

We turn now to the year 1922-1923 which closed not many days ago. We have not the complete accounts before us, but there is sufficient information to enable us practically to announce the result. Ordinary revenue amounted to $393,619,000. These are estimates, as the figures are not absolutely final. Ordinary expenditure amounted to about $331,780,000. As between those two items, there was then a surplus of $61,839,000. Capital expenditure, however, represents $14,500,000; adjustment of war claims, $6,700,000; cost of loan flotations, $3,050,000; these representing in all $24,250,000. There was thus a surplus over ordinary, capital and special expenditures, of $37,589,000. But again the railways have to be taken into account. We had to advance during that year $92,190,000 for railways, and $6,060,720 for the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, making in all for that charge, $98,250,720. This, of course, takes up all the surplus I have mentioned and leaves a large balance on the other side of the account. If we take everything into consideration for the year, the net result was that we added to the public debt in the year just closed $49,293,086. The receipt of something over $8,000,000 from the British government on exchange account helped us to keep down what otherwise would have been a larger addition to the public debt.

The Public Debt

The addition of nearly $50,000,000 to our public debt in the past year is not a situation that should cause very much satisfaction in any quarter. During the war it was inevitable that there should be large additions to the public debt, and after the war was over there also had to be large additions to the public debt; but the war has been over for several years; we are now getting to a period of peace, so-called, and many will think it is about time that we endeavoured to balance our budget; that is to say, that we no longer have the excuse of the war for spending more money than we receive. I suppose stern economists will say that that is what should be done. I confess, as Minister of Finance, that it would be very agreeable to me if I could present such a statement, and the temptation is strong to pile on the taxes and meet the difficulty. Many people who have the critical spirit, without responsibility, will probably say that that is what a Minister of Finance should do. There is, however, another side to the account. The people of Canada are pretty heavily taxed to-day; between Dominion, provincial and municipal taxation, the burdens of the people are very great, and I am reluctant to add to those burdens now by introducing new forms of taxation. Readjustments there will be, reductions here, changes in various ways; but I do not want at present to yield to the temptation of opening up new fields of taxation. I am going to ask the House and the country to bear patiently for a year or two, perhaps, the condition of affairs, in the hope that the betterment which, we believe, is near at hand, will enable us to bear the burdens without opening up these new fields of taxation to which I refer. I am, therefore, going to ask the House to take the result that we may have to add some little amount to the public debt even yet, rather than introduce new forms of taxation.

It is true that we are adding to the public debt each year, but I note with satisfaction that the amount of the addition is each year diminishing. The figures of our additions to the debt immediately before the war, during the war years and in the years since the armistice, are encouraging. I will now give the round millions. From 1914, the increases in the public debt are as follows:

1915	$113,000,000
1916	165,000,000
1917	264,000,000
1918	312,000,000
1919	382,000,000
1920	674,000,000

1920 seems to have been the banner year in the way of additions to the debt:

1921	$92,000,000
1922	81,000,000
1923	49,000,000

So, while these additions to the debt are deeply to be regretted, there is a little encouragement in the thought that, year by year, we are making the additions less than they have been. I would cherish the hope that with the betterment that, I believe, is coming to Canada in various ways, we shall not have to add very much to our debt in the years to come. I think, probably, our railway situation is going to be improved; I think, probably, with the consolidation of the roads, with the vigorous management we now have, we may reasonably expect that there will be an improvement in that situation, and I have a strong hope that in another year we shall have a better statement as respects the railways, a better statement as regards our finances generally. I believe I express the wish of the House when I say that it is better that we should pursue that course than that we should add to the burdens of the country by opening up new forms of taxation.

Coming now to the present year, 1923-1924, I will put in a statement which will show the figures in comparison with the two previous years. We are expecting an increase in Customs to the amount of $5,600,000, an increase in the Post Office of $250,000, an increase in Dominion Lands of $200,000, an increase in war tax revenue, inland revenue, $7,180,000, other war tax revenues, $85,000. On the other hand, we have to look forward to a decrease in Excise of $5,600,000, a decrease in interest on investments of $9,718,000, a decrease in inspection of staples of $50,000, a decrease in income and business profits of $17,797,000 and a decrease in all other revenues of $1,251,000. The net result is that we expect on this year that our revenues will hardly come up to the figures of last year. I am assuming that the decrease on the whole will be about $21,000,000.

The Main Estimates already submitted to parliament for all services other than railways amount to $353,011,235.73. Advances to railways amount to $73,000,000, advances to merchant marine, $1,500,000, or a total for these two items of $74,500,000. To this must be added something for Supplementary Estimates. I am putting down the figure, approximately, of last year, of $15,900,000, but I fondly hope that it will not be so large and I shall do my best to keep it lower.

Under the present system of taxation the revenue I estimate to be $372,517,000. As between the consolidated fund expenditure of $339,000,000 and the revenue of $372,517,000 we might expect a surplus this year of $37,517,000. Capital expenditure will reduce this by $23,415,000 so that we may hope to provide for a surplus over ordinary and capital expenditure of about $14,100,000. But the railways have to be taken into consideration and we estimate that they will require $74,500,000. This, of course, will consume all of the surplus that I have mentioned and leave a balance on the other side of the account. From these figures it is evident that we must look forward to some addition to the public debt at the end of the year. There will be something saved, however, through the full amount of the estimates not being expended, and I am hopeful that if, as seems likely, at the end of the year we have some addition to the public debt it will be a very small one.

Loan Operations

The loan operations of the last year are partly known already to the House. I mentioned last session the New York loan of $100,000,000. The five-year bonds at 5½ per cent, 1917 Victory Loan, amounting to $182,834,500, matured on December 1, 1922. The holders of these bonds were given the privilege of exchanging maturing bonds for new bonds bearing 5½ per cent interest and taxable as follows: Five-year bonds due November 1, 1927; Ten-year bonds due November 1, 1932. The holders of the maturing bonds took advantage of the offer to the extent of $114,449,250, leaving a balance of $68,385,250 to be redeemed in cash. Of course, with that large amount to provide, in addition, a very considerable sum in temporary loans was involved.

Treasury bills matured during the fiscal year as follows: $24,605,000 due October 1, 1922; $49,215,000 due October 15, 1922; $35,000,000 due November 2, 1922; $35,000,000 due November 15, 1922. Of these bills, $49,100,000 was paid and the balance was extended for six months from the respective due dates at 5½ per cent. Renewals for a further period of one year have been arranged, with interest at 5¼ per cent. The due dates and the amounts outstanding will therefore be as follows:

April 2, 1924	$ 4,680,000
April 16, 1924	41,060,000
May 2, 1924	19,325,000
May 15, 1924	29,655,000

It will be seen, by the extension, that we have been carrying our treasury bills over at what I think will be admitted, under the circumstances, to be a very fair rate, namely, of 5¼ per cent.

Tax Reductions

The estimated revenue that I have referred to here has been based upon the existing system of taxation. We are proposing a considerable reduction in our customs tariff and in the excise duties. If we had no expectation of an enlargement of business this loss of revenue would of course add materially to the deficit of the year. I am hopeful, however, that the reduction of taxation which we are now proposing will not seriously affect the revenue. We are looking forward to an increased volume of business to a sufficient extent to give us results equal to those of our present system of taxation. An increased business should give us the revenue and offset the loss from the reduction in the duties. A large proportion of the revenue comes from what is called the sales tax. Last year we were obliged to increase the amount of the tax considerably. We must admit that the tax is a burden; and apart from the amount of it, the form in which it has been imposed has given rise to very much discontent. There are varying rates of taxes at the different stages of business enterprises, —6 per cent, 4½ per cent, 3¾ per cent, and 2¼ per cent. Many a good citizen who recognizes that the government needs money and who is willing to pay his fair share of the taxes, objects to the complexity of the sales tax. We are proposing to change it in the hope that we shall improve the situation. Our aim is now to impose this tax at its source, at the first stage of business operations, at which the tax is properly applicable. We propose that the tax shall be 6 per cent and that it shall apply on the duty-paid value both of home-made and of imported goods. Stated in this way the proposal seems a very simple one, and its purpose I believe will have widespread public approval. The working of the system, however, has its difficulties and I hope we have been able to overcome them in the resolutions which I shall lay on the Table.

We are adding to the list of exemptions in the sales tax, five items, raw furs, wool, drain tiles for farm purposes, manuscripts and newsprint. Some new taxes were imposed last year experimental in their character; some of them proved satisfactory while others have not; and I suppose the best thing we can do is to admit that we were mistaken in our judgment and correct the error.

Very much complaint has been made about the receipt tax. Now, I am persuaded that this is a thoroughly sound tax. It has been imposed in Great Britain for many years and no Chancellor of the Exchequer dreams of dropping it. All new taxes are annoying at first; they are irritating. But I think that the worst is over now and I am firmly convinced that the receipt tax is a sound one. I am therefore going to ask the country to adhere to it, for I believe it will be a large means of obtaining revenue, and in the end the people will be quite satisfied.

With regard to the cheque tax, we introduced last year graduated taxes on cheques with a maximum of $2. There has been some complaint with reference to this. It is represented that there are transactions in which several cheques have to be given but which really relate practically to the one business deal, so that in that way the tax operates as a burden. It is also represented to us, and I think with some force, that on the boundary line this tax induces men who have an opportunity to do so to keep their accounts across the border on the other side. There is probably some force in all these criticisms. We do not feel, however, that we are free to give up the tax; it is a valuable source of revenue and we intend to retain it. We propose however that the maximum instead of being $2 shall be $1 only. This reduction will apply also to notes and bills of exchange.

In the course of the discussion of the French Treaty I suggested that the reductions therein made might necessitate some readjustment of other duties. One of the questions raised in that debate had reference to the excise tax on light Canadian wines. The tax has been for some years 30 cents per gallon; we propose now to reduce the duty to 7½ cents per gallon. Canadian wine manufacturers are beginning to make a sparkling wine. The excise tax on this is $3 per gallon. The wine manufacturers represent that this is almost prohibitive and that only a reduction of the duties will permit the industry to expand. We propose to meet this point by reducing the excise tax on Canadian-made sparkling wine from $3 to $1.50 a gallon. Any disadvantage that might otherwise accrue to the wine industry through the French Treaty will be fully met, I am sure, by this readjustment.

Another item concerning which there was a discussion was French brandy. There is a provision in the treaty that there shall be a discount of 10 per cent. It was represented that probably that would operate to the disadvantage of Canadian spirits. I think perhaps that we had better wait a little while before forming a conclusion on that question. In the first place, the reduction does not apply to all brandies; it applies only to certain specified articles described in the treaty as Cognac and Armagnac brandies. These are specialties of France; they are high-class liqueurs and are expensive. I do not think it is reasonable to suppose that any one will give up drinking Canadian spirits of any kind and turn to French brandies costing very much more than is paid now for the Canadian liquor. I believe that in all probability we shall do well to await the development of events and see how the matter operates. In the meantime it is worth noting that the French Treaty will not be in operation for some weeks. The formalities in closing a treaty generally take time, and we need not be alarmed at any immediate danger in that respect. With regard to the excise duty on wines, as this reduction is intended to offset the provisions of the French Treaty, it will only be brought into operation by proclamation at the same time as the treaty comes into force.

In the observations I have made to-day it will be noticed that I am not touching the Income tax. If there be necessary changes in this respect they will be dealt with later in a separate bill.

Among the taxes imposed last year was an increase in the duty on cigarettes. Ministers of Finance always look upon tobacco and cigarettes as easy marks—if you ever want a few million dollars just clap an extra duty on tobacco and cigarettes. There was a time when whiskey bore this burden, but additional revenue is no longer possible from this source. I confess I thought last year we might get more money by increasing the duty on cigarettes by $1.50 per thousand. However, the figures seem to show there is a falling off in the consumption of cigarettes. My own judgment is that there is no falling off in the consumption, the only falling off is in that portion of the commodity which pays duty. Along the boundary line, I am informed, it is a very easy matter to smuggle cigarettes. There are articles which cannot well be smuggled, and there are articles which may be smuggled very easily. Unfortunately, cigarettes come within the latter class. However, our expectations in regard to this tax have not been realized, and we propose now to strike off the extra $1.50 duty and revert to the old rate.

There were other disappointments. We thought we might get some money from an excise tax on beetroot sugar, but nothing has come of that. The trade interested has complained very much; no revenue has come to us; and, as I am proposing some readjustment of the sugar duties in other directions, we have concluded to abolish the tax on beetroot sugar.

There were several taxes which caused a good deal of irritation, among others the soft-drink taxes. We propose to change the form of these, and instead of 5c. per gallon and 5 per cent, we propose to strike that business at its source by imposing a tax of one cent per pound on carbonic acid gas. We think we will get our money to the same extent and with less trouble.

Customs Tariff Changes

We are not making many changes in the details of the Customs tariff. I will mention some, others will be found in the resolutions by those who study them carefully Nearly every item I shall mention is in the direction of reduction. It is a rare thing in this budget to have any proposal to increase taxation, but there is an exception in the item I am about to mention. We are proposing to increase the duty on raisins and dried currants so they will be free from Great Britain and pay 3 cents a pound under both the other tariffs. My hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Robb) recently made a trip to Australia in the hope of coming to a commercial arrangement with the Australian Commonwealth. As we know, while he made some progress which gave him some encouragement, he was not able to conclude an agreement. We are advised that in addition to our British preference which we offer to the Australians they are particularly interested in raisins and dried currants, and if we change our tariff so as to offer some inducement to them on these items it will go far to make them content with our scheme and bring about an agreement. In the hope that that may be the case, we are going to provide that the duty on raisins and dried currants shall be increased to 3 cents a pound under the intermediate and under the general tariff, but that they shall be free under the British preference. If Australia makes an agreement, and thus comes under the benefit of the British preference, this will be the rate which will be imposed upon the things that she is most anxious to send us. There is a small duty on raisins and dried currants now.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Two-thirds of a cent.

Mr. FIELDING: Yes. The Customs department has had some trouble during the past year with regard to the kind of petroleum which was imported at the Pacific coast, the importers claiming that it was crude petroleum and should be admitted as such. The Customs department ruled that it was a commodity in which some advancement had been made in manufacture and that it could not be admitted as crude. We are proposing now to fix a small duty upon it of 3/10, 4/10, and 6/10 of a cent per gallon. This we think will enable this petroleum still to be brought in; but as it is a half-manufactured product it is not in a position to claim freedom from duty.

Iron or steel scrap per ton is now dutiable at 50 cents, 90 cents, and $1. We propose to reduce it to 25 cents, 45 cents, and 50 cents.

Boots or other appliances for deformities of the feet are placed on the free list.

Casual donations are allowed to come in free now to the amount of fifty cents duty. We propose to make the item one dollar.

We propose to insert a special item for machinery of a class or kind not made in Canada, designed to manufacture goods not made in Canada; in other words, new industries which will come in. We are not making the machinery free, but we are proposing to give it a drawback which will make it practically 40 per cent of the ordinary duty.

Another article in the way of machinery is also dealt with. It is represented to us that vast quantities of fish waste are destroyed in Canada which could be converted into useful material, such as fertilizers, poultry feed, and so forth, and we propose that machinery of a class or kind not made in Canada, designed for that purpose, shall be admitted free.

We are proposing that hemp seed be put on the free list.

There is an item in the tariff now by which well-drilling machinery for the prosecution of the oil industry is free within certain limitations. It has been represented, however, that the item is rather narrow. We are broadening it out so that it will include practically the whole equipment for well-drilling except motive power.

The duty on stumping machines is reduced and provision is made for a drawback.

Malt flour which is used by bakers is reduced one cent per pound.

The item of printing machinery is broadened out to include some articles which are not mentioned in the present tariff.

A new industry is promised us for the manufacture of artificial silk. It is represented to us that this industry will employ a large amount of labour and we have every reason to believe that if we can make encouraging terms a great industry will be established. We propose to make a classification in which it will be treated largely as silk, and we have every reason to hope this will lead to a very important industry being established.

We propose to adhere to and extend the British preferential tariff. Our proposal is that on whatever duty may be payable according to the varying rates of the British preferential tariff a discount of 10 per cent shall be allowed. This, of course, does not mean a 10 per cent reduction of the tariff rate. Where the tariff rate is 30 per cent the discount of 10 per cent will reduce it to 27 cents; where the tariff rate is 25 per cent, the discount rate will reduce it to 22½ per cent, and so forth. To these reductions we attach two qualifications, the first of which is that they shall not apply in the case of any article where the duty is not above 15 per cent. A duty of 15 per cent will not be regarded as a high one, and it will hardly be expected that we ought to apply these reductions to items which stand at 15 per cent or less. That is one important qualification. There is another one, however, which I am sure the House will receive with satisfaction; we say that this 10 per cent discount shall only apply when the goods are brought direct to the ports of Canada. With Montreal and Quebec in summer, Halifax, St. John, Victoria, Vancouver, and Prince Rupert all the year round, Canada has abundant opportunity to bring her goods into her own ports. We think this is an important step in the direction of the encouragement that many people in our ports have long desired. In this part of our programme we believe we are doing three things which are worthy of commendation. In the first place, there is a comprehensive reduction of duties—and that will be agreeable to those who regard the tariff as a tax. Then, there is an emphasis given to the British preference, which has always found favour among the people of Canada, and then at the end we have this effort to do something for the encouragement of our own ports. We hope the proposal made in this respect will meet with the satisfaction of the House; I am sure it will.

I mentioned that we were having some revision or readjustment of sugar duties. Increases of taxes on commodities are quick to reach the consumer; reductions of taxation on like articles are slower in their operation. The reductions which I have already mentioned will in due time represent a substantial diminution of the burden of taxation.

Sugar Duties

There is another item on another article of commerce to which I now wish to invite the attention of the House. If there is one article of almost universal use among our people, it is sugar. Taxation on sugar is a burden on the whole people, and a reduction of the duty on sugar is one of the most direct methods of granting relief. During the war sugar advanced to very high prices. After the war there was for some time a reduction until prices became somewhat normal. Quite recently, however, we seem to be returning to war-time conditions with respect to the cost of sugar. Just what may be the cause of this advance is perhaps a matter of controversy. In some quarters it is alleged that speculators in the United States have obtained control of the market and that this is the cause of the rapid increase of prices. But one thing that the consumers distinctly know is that they are again called upon to pay very high prices for this very necessary article of household use. In the United States the feeling is so strong that householders in many places are organizing boycott campaigns against the use of sugar. Nothing of the kind has yet occurred with us, but the consumer is everywhere feeling keenly the burden of the high cost. If, then, we would make some very substantial reduction of taxation, something having a direct bearing on the cost of living, what article is so suitable for the purpose, under present conditions, as the article of sugar? We propose a reduction of 50 cents per 100 pounds on refined sugar and a proportionate reduction on the raw sugar from which the refined article is made. I estimate that in this item we relieve the consumers of sugar of taxation to the extent of $2,500,000.

There is another point I should mention in connection with sugar duties. You know that we have in our tariff what is called the dumping duty, which is designed to apply where illegitimate competition is taking place. There are some lines of trades in which it has not been deemed necessary to apply it; the dumping duty does not apply to refined sugar imported from the United Kingdom. So long as sugar is at a moderate price, that may be all right; the dumping duty would be applied in the case of importations from other countries. But if sugar is going to be at a very high price, as it is now, with the prospect of going higher, then we think a restriction of the dumping duty should apply, and we propose that wherever sugar costs at the point of shipment more than 8 cents per pound, the dumping duty shall hereafter not apply—that is, there will be freedom of purchase irrespective of dumping duty.

Copper Bounty

We have been asked from time to time to do something to encourage industries of various kinds. Where these applications take the form of a request for higher duties, the problem is not an easy one. One of the difficulties of such a situation is that there are many items in the tariff which cannot stand alone for consideration; they are closely related to one another. The article which is the finished product of one man is practically the raw material of another, perhaps of several others. If you increase duties to assist the first man, you disturb the whole scale and all the others will expect compensatory increases. Industrial aid of this kind naturally meets with widespread objection. There is another form in which it may be possible to assist industry without the disturbing results I have mentioned. The granting of a bounty simplifies the case. Many people, willing to see industry aided, would prefer the bounty rather than protective duties, especially if the bounty be of a temporary character and placed on a sliding scale. One merit of the bounty system is that you know precisely what you are paying and can compare the cost with the results. We have given careful consideration to requests made to us on behalf of the copper interests of Canada. Canada is a copper-producing country. Our far western province, British Columbia, is rich in this respect. Yet the copper industry has made but moderate progress. There is a duty of 1½ cents per pound on copper in the form of ingots. A very large enterprise has been established in British Columbia which is encouraged by this duty. The next stage of the copper business is the production of bars and rods, which become the raw material of other manufactures, such as the making of wire. Copper bars and rods are the raw material of wire manufacturers. To assist them, these bars and rods were some years ago placed on the free list for the use of manufacturers in their own factories. All these bars and rods are thus imported free. Neither of these copper products is produced in Canada for the reason that our producers are unable to compete with large manufacturing enterprises in the United States. We sympathize very warmly with the desire to have a larger development of the copper industry in the Dominion. Since a duty on bars and rods would probably necessitate increased duties on the manufactures of a number of articles made from copper, we are unwilling to grant aid in that form. We have concluded that if the copper industry is to be encouraged as we would desire, it will be better to deal with it directly in the way of a bounty than by higher duties on that which is the raw material for other factories. I said that a bounty will be regarded by many as a better form of aid than any increase of protective duties. But even a bounty would be objected to with much reason if it were not of a temporary character. Much has been heard in times past of the importance of assisting infant industries. Most folk will be kindly disposed towards the industries while they are in their infancy. But experience has shown that the infant grows up, and when he has attained to all the strength of manhood he is still found clinging to protective duties and claiming that he cannot live without them. A new industry which is to have that kind of experience is not a very desirable one for the country. An industry based upon the natural resources of the Dominion which wants a helping hand at the beginning and is prepared later to rely on its own strength and character is worthy of consideration. We propose to afford a measure of help to the copper industry of Canada on the condition that that help shall take the form of a bounty, that the amount of the bounty shall be held within proper limits and that it shall be reduced from year to year until it is extinguished. We propose to allow a bounty for a period of five years, beginning at 1½ cents per pound and diminishing from year to year until the end of the five-year term. The bounty will apply to copper bars and copper rods manufactured in Canada, from copper produced in Canada, and sold for consumption in Canada, and not to include exports. The privilege now granted to manufacturers to import copper rods and bars for their purposes free of duty will continue. What we desire is that the aid we are giving will enable the Canadian producers to compete as they have not been able to compete before with their American rivals and that they will get a reasonable command of the market. We are placing a limitation of $200,000 per anum upon this bounty. At the beginning the industry will not earn anything like that. As the time rolls on it will probably earn that much, but when it gets to its highest point it cannot get more than $200,000 in any one year.

4 p.m.

Bounty on Hemp

There is another industry to which we are going to extend similar aid. We have been working together to encourage the cultivation of hemp, for which article we are assured the soil of parts of our country is particularly adapted. It is believed that with some encouragement a large manufacturing plant can be established in Manitoba, drawing its raw material from the crop to be raised in the immediate vicinity. Here again is a case where the helping hand may only have to be extended at the beginning. There is a large market in Canada for products manufactured from hemp, and other articles of similar character. If we can economically produce the hemp ourselves and turn it into manufactured products in factories within easy reach of the fields in which it grows, surely that is an industry which may be well worthy of the helping hand. We therefore propose to apply in this case substantially the same rule as in the case of the copper industry. Under the aid we are affording, copper rods and bars should be turned out in Canada at an early date. The development of the hemp business will be slower. To complete the plans of the authorities who are giving attention to the promotion of the movement, to raise the crop and to prepare and manufacture the hemp, will take a considerable time. We therefore propose that in this case the five year period shall begin on the first day of July, 1925. By that time binder twine and other products made from Canadian hemp should be ready for the market and the producers will be in a position to claim the bounty. In this case also we propose a bounty beginning at one and one-half cents per pound on the hemp and diminishing from year to year, until at the end of the five years the bounty is extinguished.

In this case, too, we limit our payment to $200,000 per annum. A much less sum would be sufficient at the beginning, but as the enterprise develops its business may be large enough to absorb the full $200,000.

Bounties Granted and Bounties Withdrawn

We are proposing the granting of certain bounties to develop new industries. Let me now draw attention to our desire to put an end to some bounties—

Mr. McMASTER: Hear, hear.

Mr. FIELDING:—which we think have served their purpose.

One of the measures adopted under authority of the War Measures Act was the granting of a bounty to encourage the production of linen thread. The bounty was not to exceed $25,000 per annum and was limited to a term of three years. The law allowed an expenditure of $25,000 per annum, but in no year did the actual expenditure reach as high as $6,000. However the three years are over and that bounty will cease. We are not proposing to renew it.

Many years ago provision was made for a bounty of three-eighths of a cent per pound on manila hemp used in the manufacture of binder twine. There was at the time an export duty in the Philippines against hemp coming into Canada, which did not apply to hemp going to the United States. This placed the Canadian manufacturer at a disadvantage to meet which the bounty was granted. The export duty was repealed some years later and no money has been paid under this authority for some years. We have deemed it well, however, to repeal the act, so that there may be no misunderstanding concerning it.

Some years ago, in the readjustment of petroleum duties, a bounty was provided for in the case of petroleum produced in Canada. The operations carried on under it were never very large. They were chiefly in Ontario and later in some degree in New Brunswick. The operations have dwindled considerably. The total amount paid in the form of bounty in 1922 was $93,636. The amount is not large, and if we had to consider only the conditions which existed when the bounty was applied it might not be worth our while to make any change. But oil has been found in our western country. There is a widespread conviction that we are on the eve of great oil discoveries in the far west and north. The development of great oil wells in that country would of course be in one way a blessing, as adding so much to the natural resources of the Dominion. But from the Dominion Treasury's point of view that which might seem to be a blessing would be little less than a disaster. If there should be, as may very likely occur, great strikes of oil in the western country, the bounties we are called upon to pay would be a very serious charge upon the treasury. We are proposing, therefore, to confine the bounty of one and one-half cents per gallon to those who have already been receiving it, to continue it for one year, until July, 1924, that next year it shall be cut one-half, and that thereafter the bounty shall cease to be paid.

Forest Conservation

The question of forest conservation has of late commanded ever-increasing interest. Where a country has a lavish supply of anything, we are apt to be careless in the conservation of it. Too often it has been assumed that there is no limit to the forest wealth of Canada. Those who have given the matter closest attention realize that with the extensive operations of the lumbermen, the immense damage by fire and by insects, a timber famine in Canada is by no means impossible. Every effort that can be made in the way of conservation should be and is being encouraged. From some enthusiasts there is a call for more drastic methods. It is proposed that we prohibit the exportation of pulpwood. In several of the provinces this prohibition is already in effect through provincial regulations. Only the federal parliament can prohibit any exportation, but where provincial governments are owners of timber lands they can in their leases stipulate the conditions under which operations shall be carried on. In this way several of the provinces have practically prohibited the export of pulpwood. But there are in all the provinces private lands which are not subject to provincial restriction. The object of the movement to which I refer is to prohibit the export of wood by these private owners. Such a policy, while it would find favour in some quarters, would certainly be objected to by the private land owners, who will argue that they should be as free to dispose of the products of their land as other land owners are. Before reaching a conclusion in this matter, we think there should be a more thorough investigation than there has been before and we shall therefore, during the recess, endeavour to find suitable persons, one or more, to inquire into the matter and get all the information which it is possible to obtain before coming to a conclusion.

Tariff Stability

There is a thought which does not receive as much consideration as I think sometimes it should be given in public discussions, and that is the desirability of something like tariff stability. Business men do not like to be always threatened with changes in the tariff. There is no finality in legislation either as respects that tariff or as respects anything else. That which parliament can do to-day it can undo to-morrow. Everybody knows that. Everybody must conduct his business in the light of that fact. Nevertheless it is desirable that something like an assurance of tariff stability should be given to business men. Exceptions will occur. There will be cases where, in the interest of the consumer, reductions in the tariff ought to be made. There will be inequalities discovered in the tariff which should be corrected; there will be errors which should be remedied. Any minister, any government, any parliament must be free to deal with these cases as they arise. But the conditions to which I refer are exceptional. Speaking broadly, it is possible to give the country a reasonable assurance of stability of tariff. Such assurances are very desirable, for no business man would care to enter upon enterprises which may be brought into peril by frequent tariff changes. The tariff as it will be when the changes proposed to-day come into effect will be a moderate tariff and probably as low as the country can afford to have under present condition. Of course we cannot expect that it will be satisfactory to everybody. It will not meet the desires of those who would rigidly apply the principles of free trade. It will not meet the wish of the advocates of high protection. After all life is largely made up of compromises. In the realm of political affairs orderly government can be possible only where a spirit of compromise exists. Subject to the exceptional conditions such as I have mentioned, I think the country should be content to accept the tariff as it will now stand as one as fair and reasonable as can be prepared under all the circumstances, and business men should be able to carry on the various enterprises without the fear of being soon disturbed by further changes.

Stability of tariff cannot be expected while tariff rates are high. But where the rates are for the most part, as in our tariff, moderate, a reasonable measure of tariff stability should be assured.

Relations With the United States

I want to say before I conclude a word or two with regard to our relations with the United States. With a few exceptional cases, we do not propose any reduction in our general tariff which applies to goods coming from the United States. While we naturally desire to develop trade within the Empire, as we have been doing and wish to continue to do through the British preferential tariff, we do not conceal from ourselves the fact that our trade relations with the neighbouring republic are matters of very grave importance to many of our Canadian people. The congress of the United States in the exercise of its undoubted right, has established what is commonly called the Fordney-McCumber tariff, which is largely a high tariff, and which we realize operates to the disadvantage of Canada. Any desire that we may have towards modification of our own tariff is naturally held in check by the high tariff of the United States. Whatever may have been thought and said and done at other times, there is hardly anybody in Canada to-day who does not feel that better trade relations between the Dominion and the United States are very desirable. I believe I am warranted in saying that to-day there is no class of the Canadian people who do not recognize that it is of the highest desirability that we should have proper trade relations with the United States. The desire of Canada to make a friendly treaty with the United States ought to be well known, and I think it is well known. As to the willingness of Canada to have a measure of reciprocity between the two countries there ought to be no question. A minister of this government went to Washington and informed the government and the congressional leaders of Canada's willingness to enter into negotiations for another reciprocity treaty. They know our willingness in this regard, and I think it is well we should say it again. The position of our government in the matter, therefore, is well known. In 1879 when the national policy, so-called, was framed, there was what was called a standing offer to the United States, and the United States had notice of how Canada would like to deal with them. I want to adopt the principle of that, though not the details of it. I am proposing that we shall put into our tariff laws to-day a declaration of our readiness and our willingness to make an arrangement with the United States whenever they are ready to meet us on fair terms. I propose to put in this clause:

> The Governor in Council may authorize any minister of the crown to enter into negotiations with any authorized representative of the government of the United States with a view to the making of a commercial agreement between the two countries on terms that may be deemed mutually beneficial. Any agreement so made shall be subject to the approval of the Parliament of Canada.

This is a general indication of our willingness to make a commercial treaty with our neighbours. We realize, however, that if this suggestion on our part should meet with favourable consideration, considerable time would have to elapse before an agreement could be made and brought into effect. It would require action by congress. Congress only could deal with the matter in that broad way. Is there not some other way in which the desired end, in part at least, could be reached? Can we do nothing in the meantime? Possibly we can. Under the present law of the United States there is a privilege granted to the President of the United States to make certain reductions if he likes to do so. He may do that without waiting for congress, and, therefore, we propose to insert this clause, having relation to that particular matter:

> If the President of the United States, under authority of the United States' Tariff Act of 1922, determines to reduce by fifty per cent the duties imposed by such act on the following articles, that is to say: Cattle, wheat, wheat flour, oats, barley, potatoes, onions, turnips, hay, fish as enumerated in paragraphs 717, 718, 719 and 720 of the said Tariff Act of 1920, the Governor in Council may by order in council make such reductions of duties on similar articles imported into Canada from the United States as may be deemed reasonable by way of compensation for such reductions of duties similar articles imported into Canada from the United States as may be deemed reasonable by way of compensation for such reductions on Canadian products imported into the United States.

The previous paragraph makes a standing offer of reciprocity which we know can only be adopted by congress. This paragraph appeals to the President, or intimates to the President, that if he is prepared to exercise the power which the congress has given to him by way of reduction, we are prepared to meet him on similar terms. I do not know that any good will come from it. I think we are doing right to place on record our desire and determination to meet our American friends on fair terms, if they will meet us.

The Outlook

Canada, in common with other countries, has been passing through a period of severe depression. Some of our farmer friends have come to us from the West with gloomy stories of the condition of affairs in their part of the Dominion. Unfortunately, there has been depression, not in the West only, but in the East as well. Not many months ago, the conditions in the neighbouring republic were in every respect as bad as, and in some respects worse than, in our Dominion. Suddenly, so suddenly as to leave room for doubt as to a continuance of it, a great revival of business has arisen in the United States. Whether there is economic ground for it is doubted by many thoughtful students. The buying power of the western farmer in the United States is still at a low point. Foreign markets are still so much disturbed that the prospects of large sales in that quarter are not bright. Nevertheless, there is a boom on in the United States. I asked a friend who is a careful observer of these things on what he thought the American people found ground for their present activity. His answer was, "By faith in themselves." It really seems that this is the case. It is a sort of "Coué́ism." They resolve that things are going to get better, and they believe that they are better. However that may be, we need not analyze the conditions. We know there is great activity in the United States. Stern economists will wonder what our American friends are going to do with the products they are having turned out so rapidly from the American factories. Meanwhile there is no question that the boom is on. Instead of the unemployment which prevailed so widely but a few months ago, there is now a great demand for labour. Wages which had begun to fall are again on the rising scale. This activity across the border, this great demand for labour at high wages, has naturally affected us in Canada. We are so near to the United States, and it is so easy for our people to cross the border, that when things are somewhat dull over here, and high wages are offered in the United States, there would naturally be such an exodus as there has been during the recent months. But this I believe is only a temporary condition, I believe they will come back. Experience has shown that the United States are usually ahead of us by a few months, perhaps a year, in the change of conditions. The prosperity which comes to them reaches us a few months later. The adversity which sometimes comes to them comes to us a few months later. This experience justifies us in believing that history will repeat itself in this respect. Already we see signs of reviving activity in our country. That we may check the exodus and bring back many of those who have already gone is a reasonable expectation. If we have faith in ourselves, faith in the intelligence, industry and courage of the Canadion people, faith in the vast and splendid resources of our Dominion, we may justly look forward to an early revival of the prosperity of former days.

Resolutions

I beg to give notice that upon the House resolving itself into committee I shall move the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, That the Customs Tariff, 1907, be amended by repealing section five, and substituting therefor the following:—

5. That the importer of goods entitled to the benefits of the British Preferential Tariff shall be entitled to a discount of ten per centum on the amount of duty computed under such Tariff, when such goods are conveyed without transhipment from a port of a country enjoying the benefits of the British Preferential Tariff into a sea or river port of Canada.

Provided, however, that this discount shall not apply to duties on any of the following articles, viz., wines, malt liquors, spirits, spirituous liquors, liquid medicines and articles containing alcohol, sugar, tobacco, cigars and cigarettes.

Provided further that this discount shall not apply in the case in which the duty does not exceed fifteen per centum ad valorem, or, in the case of a specific duty or a specific and ad valorem duty combined in which the computed rate does not exceed fifteen per centum ad valorem, or to goods admitted into Canada which have the benefit of reductions provided for in the Canada-West Indies Trade Agreement, 1920.

2. Resolved, that The Customs Tariff, 1907, be further amended by adding after section 8A the following as sections 8B and 8C:

8B. The Governor in Council may authorize any Minister of the Crown to enter into negotiations with any authorized representative of the government of the United States with a view to the making of a commercial agreement between the two countries on terms that may be deemed mutually beneficial. Any agreement so made shall be subject to the approval of the Parliament of Canada.

8C. If the President of the United States, under authority of the United States Tariff Act of 1922, determines to reduce by fifty per cent the duties imposed by such act on the following articles, that is to say:

Cattle, wheat, wheat flour, oats, barley, potatoes, onions, turnips, hay, fish as enumerated in paragraphs 717, 718, 719 and 720 of the said Tariff Act of 1922. the Governor in Council may by Order in Council make such reductions of duties on similar articles imported into Canada from the United States as may be deemed reasonable by way of compensation for such reductions on Canadian products imported into the United States.

3. Resolved, that schedule A to The Customs Tariff, 1907, as amended by chapter sixteen of the Statutes of 1910, by chapter twenty-six of the Statutes of 1914, by chapter five of the Statutes of 1914 (second session), by chapter forty-seven of the Statutes of 1919, by chapter twenty-seven of the Statutes of 1921, by chapter nineteen of the Statutes of 1922, and by Order in Council, be further amended by striking thereout tariff items: 83a, 99, 134, 135, 143a, 168, 235, 242, 281, 328, 348b, 365, 374, 386, 441a, 442, 469, 586, 638a, 670, 690a, 710b, the several enumerations of goods respectively, and the several rates of duties of Customs, if any, set opposite each of said items, and to repeal section 1 (i) of Order in Council, P.C. 16/1556, dated fifth day of June, 1912, designated as item 760 of The Customs Tariff, and to provide that the following items, enumerations and rates of duty be inserted in schedule A

5. Resolved, that any enactment founded on the foregoing resolutions shall be deemed to have come into force on the twelfth day of May, one thousand nine hundred and twenty-three, and to have applied to all goods mentioned in the foregoing resolutions imported or taken out of warehouse for consumption on and after that day, and to have applied to goods previously imported for which no entry for consumption was made before that day.

1. Resolved, that it is expedient to amend The Inland Revenue Act, chapter fifty-one of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, as amended by chapter six of the Statutes of 1914, chapter twenty-eight of the Statutes of 1918 and chapter twenty-seven of the Statutes of 1922 by repealing paragraphs (g) and (h) of section two hundred and seventy-nine thereof and substituting therefor the following:

(g) On cigarettes made from raw leaf tobacco or any substitute therefor, weighing not more than three pounds per thousand, six dollars per thousand;

(h) On cigarettes made from raw leaf tobacco or any substitute therefor, weighing more than three pounds per thousand, eleven dollars per thousand.

2. Resolved, that any enactment founded on the preceding resolution shall be deemed to have come into force on the twelfth day of May, one thousand nine hundred and twenty-three.

3. Resolved, that it is expedient to amend The Inland Revenue Act, chapter fifty-one of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, as amended by chapter twenty-seven of the Statutes of 1922, by repealing section 378 thereof.

4. Resolved, that any enactment founded on the preceding resolution shall be deemed to have come into force on the first day of January, one thousand nine hundred and twenty-three.

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend The Special War Revenue Act, 1915, and amending acts and to provide:

1. That the maximum amount of stamp tax payable on a cheque, bill of exchange, promissory note, advance on securities, overdraft, receipt by a person for money paid to him by a bank chargeable against a deposit of money in the bank to his credit, express company's money order or traveller's cheque, or post office money order be reduced to one dollar.

2. That after a date to be fixed by proclamation of the Governor in Council the excise tax on wines of all kinds, except sparkling wines, containing not more than forty per centum of proof spirit be reduced to seven and one-half cents per gallon, and the excise tax on champagne and all other sparkling wines be reduced to one dollar and fifty cents per gallon.

3. That the existing provisions respecting tax on sales be amended by providing for the imposition of a consumption or sales tax of six per centum on the sale price of all goods produced or manufactured in Canada, including the amount of excise duties when the goods are sold in bond, the tax to be payable by the producer or manufacturer at the time of the sale thereof by him, and of a like tax upon the duty paid value of imported goods, the tax to be payable by the importer, or transferee who takes the goods out of bond, at the time when the goods are imported or taken out of warehouse for consumption, subject to the following conditions, that is to say:

(1) A manufacturer or producer who produces goods to the value of ten thousand dollars or more during any fiscal year shall take out an annual license, the fee therefor not to exceed two dollars; the minister may direct that a manufacturer or producer, who does not manufacture or produce goods to the value of ten thousand dollars a year, and who uses a substantial portion of goods which are exempt from the tax in the manufacture of goods which are liable to the tax, shall take out a license and shall be subject to the same conditions as the licensed manufacturer or producer.

(2) A wholesaler or jobber who sells not less than thirty per cent of his total sales of goods to a licensed manufacturer or producer to be used in articles to be produced for sale, may be granted an annual license, the fee therefor not to exceed two dollars. Such licensed wholesaler or jobber shall give security that he will keep proper accounts and render true statements of sales to licensed manufacturers or producers and pay any tax imposed by the said act.

(3) The said tax shall be payable by a licensed wholesaler or jobber at the time of the sale by him to other than a licensed manufacturer or producer of goods the price of which shall include the amount of excise duties, if sold in bond, or the price of which shall be the duty paid value thereof, if imported.

(4) The taxes imposed by sections 16A, 19B, 19BB and 19BBB of The Special War Revenue Act shall apply to goods sold or imported by:

(i) His Majesty in the right of His Majesty's Government of Canada;

(ii) His Majesty in the right of His Majesty's government of any province of Canada, for the purpose of resale;

(iii) Any railway operated by or under the authority of the Legislature or the Lieutenant Governor in Council of any province;

(iv) Any commission, board or public utility which is operated by or under the authority of the Legislature or Lieutenant Governor in Council of any province.

(5) The said consumption or sales tax shall not be payable in the following cases, that is to say:

(a) on goods exported; or

[Mr. Fielding.]

(b) on sales by a licensed manufacturer or producer to another licensed manufacturer or producer of goods to be used in the production of articles for sale; or

(c) on goods imported by a licensed manufacturer or producer to be used in the production of articles for sale; or

(d) on goods sold by a licensed manufacturer or producer to or on goods imported by a licensed wholesaler or jobber whose sales are to be accounted for in accordance with the provisions of paragraph two of section three of this Resolution.

(6) A manufacturer or producer who does not produce goods of a value over ten thousand dollars a year, unless he comes under the provisions of paragraph one of section three of this Resolution shall not pay the said consumption or sales tax on goods produced by him, but he shall pay the tax on importations.

(7) A refund of the amount of the said consumption or sales tax may be granted in the following cases, that is to say:

(a) to a wholesaler, jobber or other dealer on goods sold to a licensed manufacturer or producer to be used in articles produced for sale; or with the consent of the wholesaler, jobber or dealer a refund or deduction may in the like case be granted to a licensed manufacturer or producer; or

(b) to a licensed manufacturer or producer or a licensed wholesaler or jobber in respect of goods on hand on the 1st of August, 1923, and which are to be used in the production of articles for sale, no refund to be allowed in respect of goods on hand after the 31st of December, 1923; or

(c) on goods manufactured or produced in Canada when satisfactory evidence is produced that such Canadian goods are at a disadvantage by reason of the fact that like goods may be imported into Canada free of duty, such refund or reduction not to exceed twenty-five per cent of the said tax otherwise payable; or

(d) on imported goods on which customs duties have been refunded on exportation; or

(e) to a manufacturer, producer, wholesaler, jobber or other dealer, of taxes paid under sections 16A, 19B, 19BB, 19BBB of the said act on goods sold to His Majesty in the right of any province when His Majesty in such right is exempt from taxes in respect of such goods.

(8) That the "duty paid value" of any article be defined as meaning the value of the article as it would be determined for the purpose of calculating an ad valorem duty upon the importation of same into Canada under the laws relating to the customs and the customs tariff whether such article be in fact subject to an ad valorem or other duty or not, and in addition the amount of the customs duties, if any, payable thereon.

Provided that in computing the "duty paid value" of tea purchased in bond in the United Kingdom the amount of the customs duty payable on tea for consumption in the United Kingdom shall not be included in the value of such tea for purposes of this act, 12-13 Geo. V., c. 47, s. 12 Am.

4. That schedule I to the said act be amended by striking thereout the items respecting confectionery and beverages.

5. That schedule II to the said act be amended by striking thereout the item respecting beverages and by adding to the said schedule the following item:

"Carbonic acid gas in cylinders, per pound, one cent."

6. That the provisions of the said act respecting stamp tax on receipts be amended by providing:

(i) That paragraph (b) of subsection four of section fourteen of the said act as enacted by said chapter forty-seven be amended to read as follows:

"(b) a receipt or document in the nature of a receipt which is taxable under section twelve of this act."

(ii) By adding provisions for the better enforcement of said section fourteen.

7. That the provisions of this resolution, except the provision proposed by section two, shall come into force on the first day of August, 1923.

1. Resolved, that it is expedient to amend The Petroleum Bounty Act, 1909, being chapter forty-six of the Statutes of 1910, by providing that the bounty shall be payable on crude petroleum having a specific gravity not less than .8235 at 60 degrees Fahrenheit's thermometer, produced from wells or from shales or other substances mined in Canada which have actually produced crude petroleum before the date of the coming into force of the act to be founded on this resolution.

The said bounty shall be paid at the following rates, that is to say:

On such crude petroleum produced on or before the thirtieth day of June, one thousand nine hundred and twenty-four, the bounty of one and one-half cents per imperial gallon provided in the existing law shall be paid;

On such crude petroleum produced on or after the first day of July, one thousand nine hundred and twenty-four, and not later than the thirtieth day of June, one thousand nine hundred and twenty-five, a bounty of three-quarters of one cent per imperial gallon shall be paid.

On and after the first day of July, one thousand nine hundred and twenty-five, no bounty shall be paid.

1. Resolved, that it is expedient to repeal The Act respecting Bounties on manufactures from Manila Fibre in Canada, being Chapter five of the Statutes of 1903, the act to amend the act respecting the manufacture of Binder Twine in Canada, being chapter five of the Statutes of 1907, and regulations made thereunder.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (West York): Mr. Speaker, before you leave the Chair, I desire to make a few remarks which I am able to do more easily because my friend was kind enough to let me have information as to some of his figures this morning. Before dealing with the budget, I would like to present my compliments and congratulations to my hon. friend. It is a very nice thing to be able to do that which you like to do and have pleasure in doing. I have great pleasure in congratulating my hon. friend on the presentation of his seventeenth budget. It is hard to realize that this is his seventeenth budget, because he is showing such an evidence of youth all the time. You know, Mr. Speaker, that the supreme evidence of youth is the ability to learn, and I want to congratulate him upon the manner in which he is still learning and taking his lessons to heart. Last year we told him in connection with the cigarette tax what was going to happen, that we had there a tax so high that if anything higher was tried it would kill business and destroy the revenue. My hon. friend said "No, we are going to get an increase of half a million." But there is a drop in the revenue of $1,200,000. But the hon. minister is not the Bourbon that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Lapointe) is so fond of speaking of. He sees the figures, he learns and he repents. Further than that we told him what would happen in the case of the beet sugar tax. That was a tax that was directly against the farmer and against a primary producing industry, we told him what would happen. Again he has learned, and he has taken the duty off. Besides that, my hon. friend is showing what an apt pupil he is of to-day's conditions. We know he had a great deal of trouble with the French Treaty, and we explained, and explained and explained in this House just exactly my hon. friend's errors in connection with that treaty; —how if he had first had a duty on luxuries which he was dealing with, that would have enabled him to get a proper treaty with France. We are again delighted to get this further evidence of my hon. friend's youthfulness of mind and adaptability, because to-day he turns around, applies what we have been saying, and tells us that the one real excuse for the imposition of a three-cent per pound tax on raisins and dried currants as against a three-quarter-cent per pound tax at the present time is simply because, if that is done, there is some opportunity of making a proper trade treaty with Australia. Again I congratulate my hon. friend; but most of all I desire to congratulate him upon his newfound faith. When I say "new," I say "new" simply because I have reference to what my hon. friend has said time and again from this very seat on the tariff issue. Why, he finds to-day that there is necessity for stability in business. It has taken him a long time to find that out.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Some hon. members laugh, but the other day we had a discussion as to what is going on in the United States and the reasons therefor. There is progress there; they have no idea that this manufacturer or that manufacturer, or this kind of business or that, is to be put out of business overnight. They are not drifting; they have some idea where they are going. Yes, they have prosperity in the United States, and my hon. friend says that times have been bad in Canada. But my hon. friend now thinks there is a real necessity for business stability in Canada, and that you cannot have business stability unless you have tariff stability.

My hon. friend has made another wonderful discovery, which I think is the most hopeful discovery of them all, namely that the tariff is a low tariff. My hon. friend is absolutely and perfectly right. But I do not like to leave the situation as my hon. friend leaves it. I do not think Canada is in such an awful position as he seems to think. It is true that we are not doing as well as other countries. I do not know that it is incumbent upon the opposition to give apologies and reasons for that. It is true that only last session we were found, by the government that came into power, to be in a better position that any other country was in. But, notwithstanding the fact that we are suffering from a delayed and repressed recovery in this country, it is also true that you cannot keep Canada down, and we are going ahead now. Our trade figures are not bad figures now, although they ought to be better. While our trade figures are not what other countries have had, while we cannot point to the tremendous changes that they can point to in the Mother parliament, while we are piling up deficits as against surpluses reported in the Mother parliament, yet the country itself, the real fundamental business of the country itself, is, at the bottom, sound. We are increasing our exports; we are increasing our activities to some extent, although not as much as I would like to see them increased; but Canada is sound, and Canada will come through, no matter what government is in power.

I want to make just one or two remarks as to the figures submitted by my hon. friend. In the first instance, he very fairly pointed out that the kind of surplus we have to-day is an old story. We had the same thing before. In 1921, we had a surplus of $150,000,000, and still we had a very large increase in our debt. In 1922, we had a surplus of $115,000,000. It is also true, as my hon. friend says, that our whole financial trouble at the present time really has reference to the railway situation. I am going to ask my hon. friend hereafter just to pay a little more attention to that railway situation. I cannot understand how it is that the railways this year cost this country $92,000,000, unless it be that the new management wanted so to swell the vote and the expenses this year that, perforce, an excellent showing must be made next year. Look at the report brought down by the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham). That hon. gentleman made, as we all thought, a good showing this year. In the year 1920, I think we had a deficit of $36,000,000. In the year 1921, we had a deficit of $16,000,000, a reduction of practically $20,000,000. For the year 1922, we had this year a report read on the floor of the House that there was an operating surplus of $4,000,000 as against a deficit the year before of $16,000,000. Yet, in some way or another, the full appropriation asked for, an appropriation which was asked for on the figures of the year before—and though an appropriation is asked for, it is never intended that the money shall be spent unless it is absolutely necessary to spend it—amounts to $92,190,000 which has been drawn on account of railways. I do not know, of course, why it is drawn or anything about it; but without knowing much about it, I suggest to my hon. friend that he should do just this simple little thing—look into the details of the appropriation as made by him last year, check those details and see just how much money has had to be switched from one detail to another in order to make up that amount. I am sure that is something to which my hon. friend may very well give his strictest attention.

Just another word as regards the accounts. My hon. friend points out that we are going behind. So we are. As he told us, the deficit, the addition to the debt before other matters are taken into consideration, will be $61,000,000. Then we have refunds of exchanges, and the net result of it all is, as he tells us, to bring the net addition to the debt down to $49,000,000. The refunds of exchanges amounting to $8,000,000, cannot, of course, be taken into consideration in this year's operations, because they have nothing to do with that at all. That exchange was earned years ago, and the amount was simply fixed this year. If that were not taken into consideration, we have an addition of $57,492,339 to our debt.

That is the addition to the debt which flows out of the operations of the government this particular year; and my hon. friend I am afraid is sending us off, not with a benediction on this year's work, but practically with an admonition to look to a deficit of $58,000,000 next year, because he tells us that his estimated surplus next year will be $14,100,000 apart from railway obligations. Well, Mr. Speaker, I think that the situation is really a little better than that; I think that probably my hon. friend is taking too gloomy a view of matters, just as I thought he did last year. Last year his estimate for customs was $103,000,000; he has collected over $15,000,000 more, so that he is out in that respect about fifteen per cent. In other words, his spectacles were fifteen per cent too black in that case. Then again, in the case of the income tax, his estimate was $60,000,000; in this direction he was out $12,797,000 or over twenty-one per cent. The thing that is extraordinary to me is this, that my hon. friend to-day—that is, assuming that I took down his statement correctly—discounts the collections on income and excess business taxes some $17,797,000. I think that was the figure he gave; he will correct me if I am wrong. Surely my hon. friend is not taking the view that the country is in as bad a position as that estimate indicates. Last year we were told in the address that we were in an excellent position; but we were told in the budget of that year that the year previous had been a very bad one. The exact words of my hon. friend were:

> This tax is levied on income of the past year, which was not a good business year. Indeed, I think it was a year of exceptional depression.

And in connection with a year of exceptional depression, the year 1921, he wrote down the collections in respect to income and business profits taxes from $101,500,000 to $60,000,000, yet, as I say, he collected $72,797,000. This year he is going to make his collections on the income tax and the business profits tax materially lower than he made his estimate for a very bad year. What is the trouble? I admit, of course, that my hon. friends have been in power fourteen or fifteen months; I admit that business has been harassed and bothered by a hundred and one kinds of pin pricking taxation; I admit that we have experienced uncertainty, and all that sort of thing. But I do not think that the effect of my hon. friend's government is as bad as he thinks it is. The year 1921 he told us was a year of exceptional depression. What does my hon. friend call this year? What kind of language would he apply to it if he is to discount our income and excess business taxes still further? Why, Mr. Speaker, he is making the figures in regard to direct taxation and consumptive taxes much worse even than they were last year. The year before that, when we were responsible, we raised, if I remember rightly, 32 per cent of all the revenue from direct taxation, income and business profits taxes. This year so far—and again I am speaking from recollection, although, I think, correctly—the government has raised only 24 per cent. And we used to be chided and scolded all the time because we were not doing a great deal more in that direction. What does my hon. friend think he has done to business?

I want again to congratulate my hon. friend on becoming an advocate of industry. That is another discovery we have made to-day. He wants to help the artificial silk industry; he wants to help the growing of hemp in Canada and the manufacture. We have not had an opportunity yet of going through the resolutions, and I am not going to say anything about that phase of the budget until I have had a chance to study these resolutions. The hon. member I have no doubt is sincere in his conversion in this respect. And all this is to be done in the interest of trade and to ensure that stability which he finds so sadly lacking in Canadian industry to-day. I shall not go any further now, Mr. Speaker, and therefore beg to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

COMBINES, MONOPOLIES, TRUSTS AND MERGERS

The House again in committee on Bill No. 54, to provide for an investigation of combines, monopolies, trusts and mergers, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

On section 22—Distribution of report.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): When this section was last under discussion the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Boys) emphasized the wisdom of making public any report by a commissioner under the provisions of the act. I intimated to the committee at the time that I would subsequently discuss the matter with the hon. member to see if we could arrive at a clause which would be satisfactory to both of us. I beg therefore to propose the following amendment which is agreeable to my hon. friend, and if it meets with the approval of the House, I hope it will be adopted. The amendment is:

> To strike out the first sentence contained in lines 24, 25, 26 and 27, which are as follows:
> "A copy of any report may, if the minister so directs, be sent free of charge to any person and to the representative of any newspaper in Canada who applies therefor, and the report may also be published in the Canada Gazette."
> And substitute therefor the following:
> "Within fifteen days after its receipt by the minister, a report (other than an interim report) of any commissioner shall be made public, unless the commissioner is of opinion that the public interest will be best served by withholding publication, and so states in the report itself, in which case the minister may exercise his discretion as to the publicity to be given to the report in whole or in part."

The committee will observe that the limitation of fifteen days is placed in this clause in order that whatever the particular circumstances of the case may demand may be taken into account. I would also suggest that the word "distribute" in line 27 be struck out and the word "publish" be substituted therefore. The clause would then read:

> The minister may publish and supply copies of any report in such manner and on such terms as to him seems most desirable.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 27—Contempt of registrar or commissioner.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I thought this section was standing over for a definition of the word "insult" by my hon. friend.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This will have to be left to whomever the remark is addressed to, to decide. The clause is similar to one which is contained in the Combines and Investigations Act, 1910; it is also similar to a clause in the Industrial Disputes Act. This simply protects a registrar or commissioner in the same manner as a judge from being insulted by persons who may appear before him.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The judge of a court determines what is contempt of court and what is not; he has the authority and the qualification to do so. The registrar is not given any authority here, even if he had the qualification to decide what is an insult. I do not know who drafted this bill, nor do I know who drafted many bills that have been brought down this session, but I can tell the Prime Minister who did not draft it. It was never drafted by the Deputy Minister of Justice.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As I say, that language is taken from the Combines and Investigations Act of 1910. Section 31 of that act reads as follows:

If, in any proceedings before the board, any person wilfully insults any member of the board, or wilfully interrupts the proceedings, or without good cause refuses to give evidence, or is guilty in any other manner of any wilful contempt in the face of the board, any officer of the board or any constable may take the person offending into custody and remove him from the precincts of the board, to be detained in custody until the conclusion of that day's sitting of the board, and the person so offending shall be liable, upon summary conviction to a penalty not exceeding one hundred dollars.

The registrar or the commissioner stands in the place of the board in this bill. I do not think the section is a very important one, but if it seemed wise to give that protection to the members of the board in a former act, I think it would be equally wise to give it under this.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I doubt if anybody will ever insult the registrar, indeed, I do not know that many will ever see him unless at a social gathering so I would not worry about the substance of the clause. But it just shows bad draftsmanship; nobody is given power to decide what is an insult.

Mr. McMASTER: Where does the bad draftsmanship come in in that clause?

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: Because the registrar is not given any power to decide whether there is any wilful insult or not.

Mr. McMASTER: If a man is given power to hold an investigation, it is not unreasonable that he should have the powers of a judge—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. McMASTER: —in preserving decorum in his courtroom.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then why not give it to him?

Mr. McMASTER: Is not that what the clause gives him?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, that is just what I am complaining of, he is not given this power at all. He is not to be a judge, so he is not competent to exercise the powers of a judge. I call the hon. gentleman's attention to this too: the word "combine" is defined in clause 2, but it is used all through the bill just as if it had never been defined at all.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, no.

Mr. MEIGHEN: A combine is defined as something that works to the detriment of the public, and so on, and subsequently the registrar is commissioned to decide whether some combine works to the detriment of the public. I am curious to know who drafted this bill. Will the Prime Minister tell us?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I might satisfy my hon. friend when I mention to him that the bill as drafted was submitted to the Justice department and gone over by its officers and approved.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That was only as to the competency of this House to pass the measure.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not at all, it was as to the drafting. Particular reference was made to each section.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the Prime Minister not tell us who drafted this bill? The English and general structure of the bill is not reviewed by the Justice department except on special occasions. All I can say about the draftsmanship of this clause is that it is no better than the plan and the whole structure of the bill.

Section agreed to.

On Section 31—Appointment of registrar and commissioner and employment of requisite technical and special temporary assistance, etc.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I forget whether the Prime Minister or his Minister of Labour told us in committee that there was to be only one registrar.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is all.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then why other offices in the various cities?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It does not mean other permanent offices; it applies only to temporary offices which the commissioner might require when holding an inquiry outside of Ottawa.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The cheapest way would be to use the court houses.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is probably what would be done.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Our exchequer court judges have that right. I do not know why we should hire offices merely to conduct investigations. I think it is absurd.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I agree with my hon. friend that we should use the court-house building wherever we can get it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that this clause in effect repeals the Civil Service Act so far as this institution that is going to be erected is concerned. This clause says that the permanent employees shall be under the Civil Service Act, then it goes on to say, all except the registrar, the commissioners, the technical experts. Who in the world is going to be there who would not come under one of these various classifications? The government decides who is technical and who is not. I venture to say that you can invoke the word "technical" as an excuse in connection with every single one in the service so far as the purposes of this bill are concerned. Why is the Civil Service Commission not competent to appoint in this case, as they appoint to-day, officers of the Geodetic Survey, officers of many technical departments of the government? Either wipe the whole thing out, or make the ordinary provisions apply here. Of course the main purpose of the bill is to get a chance to appoint some officers, and this is the clause which, if it passes, enables the government to put their friends in any of the offices that are going to be set up. I would like a photograph now of all who are going to be appointed by the Civil Service Commission if this clause passes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend deliberately misconstrues the purpose of this clause. Nothing could be more emphatic than that by this provision any such appointments as can reasonably be regarded as permanent appointments under this act will be made by the Civil Service Commission. The clause reads:

> All persons permanently employed under this act shall be subject to the provisions of the Civil Service Act, 1918, and amendments thereto, and other similar acts bearing on the Civil Service of Canada.

That is a clear statement of the intention of the government with respect to all the permanent appointments under this measure. In connection with individual inquiries, where commissioners have to be appointed, and the like, no one would contemplate to-day, in connection with a royal commission, asking the Civil Service Commission to name the clerks necessary to carrying out its work. If we had to go to the Civil Service Commission each time an individual inquiry was to be made and ask them to designate such persons, I do not think we would get very far in facilitating the procedure The bill as drafted simply allows the necessary lati-

5 p.m. tude to permit investigations to proceed in the most efficient and most economical manner. The section also provides:

> The Governor in Council may appoint any British subject to be, ... a commissioner thereunder.

It is clear that the government should have the right, in the case of an important appointment like the registrar, to proceed as it does in connection with the appointments of deputy ministers. Similarly, the provision respecting commissioners should be the same as the provisions respecting commissioners under the Inquiries Act. The responsibility rests with the ministry as to the class of person to be appointed. But these are clearly not appointments which the Civil Service Commission is in a position to make with the same guarantee of qualifications as when the appointment is made by a minister of the Crown. The section also says:

> The minister may employ such technical and special temporary assistance as may be required to meet the special conditions that may arise in carrying out the provisions of this act.

That clause has been drawn to meet special conditions. In other words, it is assumed that the Civil Service Commission will make the necessary appointments in the case of all ordinary classes of work, but if a commissioner is making an inquiry, say, at Vancouver one day and at Winnipeg another, and an inquiry into one industry here and another industry there, he should be free to engage the class of temporary assistance that may from time to time be needed in the particular locality in which he is working.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is the minister quite sure that he is right on that question of the deputy minister? I put it to him in all sincerity; would he not be saved a great deal of trouble if, say, in connection with the appointment of a deputy minister to the Post Office Department the responsibility had been on the Civil Service Commission? Perhaps, if that had been the case, the Postmaster General (Mr. Murphy) would never have been ill and would still be here. Nor would my hon. friend himself be in the midst of so much turmoil in that connection; there would not have been the charges that have been made against the responsible minister and against a reputable member of a department that he is wire-pulling and doing all sorts of things to get a job. Does my right hon. friend not think that in the interests of good government and ordinary decency it would be well to avoid that kind of thing by having these matters placed in the hands of the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I only wish I were in a position to assure my hon. friend that the unfortunate and, I regret to say, somewhat serious illness from which the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Murphy) has suffered was due to anything relatively so insignificant as what my hon. friend has thought it well to mention. I again assure him that the illness of the Postmaster General has had nothing whatever to do with any happenings in any department of the government.

Mr. McMASTER: Mr. Chairman, the leaders of the Opposition are bringing to bear upon the discussion of this clause what I might call the acidulated method and the humorous method. The former Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) is responsible for the humorous method and the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) for the acidulated method. I do not think that either of the hon. gentlemen is right. The people of Canada want a bill of this sort. The vote the other night was a very striking testimony of the desire of the Canadian people that such legislation should be enacted, because with all the eloquence of the right hon. leader of the Opposition, eloquence which was exercised in no unmeasured terms, only twenty-one of his followers, including himself—if that is not an Hibernianism—responded to the division bell to vote against the bill. Now, the objections raised by the hon. leaders of the Opposition are not well founded. Both of them are, or were at one time, distinguished members of the bar; but evidently they are not familiar with admiralty practice. In admiralty practice the judge calls in nautical assessors to help him, just as in this case the registrar will call in expert technical assistance to help him in his investigations. Is the right hon. leader of the Opposition serious in his pretension that the Civil Service Commission should be had recourse to in order to find out what technical or expert assistance should be obtained to enable the work of the registrar to be carried out with wisdom and despatch? I hardly think he can be.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the hon. member say that that applies only to the temporary technical men?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. McMASTER: I think that is the meaning of the bill. I have carefully read this clause—and I trust my vision is not obscured by a disdain of, and a contempt for, the whole legislation which, I am sorry to say, I think obscures the vision of the right hon. leader of the Opposition. But as I understand clause 31, its meaning is that the ordinary permanent officials who will be attached to the office of the registrar will be chosen in the ordinary manner by the Civil Service Commission, but that the registrar himself and the registrar's temporary assistants from time to time of a technical or expert nature will be chosen by the minister under whose department this investigation will be carried on. It seems to be a reasonable and perfectly proper suggestion. I can hardly think, therefore, that the two methods of criticism are well founded.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am sorry I cannot imitate the delightful, the mellifluous turn of phrase of the hon. gentleman, much less his charm of manner, but I will try to approach within reasonable distance, his admirable logic in arguing the meaning of this clause. I do not pretend ever to have beeen an adornment to the bar—

Mr. McMASTER: You would if you had remained there.

Mr. MEIGHEN: —but I think I arrived at the stage, long years before I came to the bar when I could reasonably understand English. The hon. member says, and the Prime Minister reiterates, that under this clause only temporary appointments can be made by the government and by the minister whether commissioners or whether technical. That is what the hon. member said, and the Prime Minister reiterated it. He was also good enough in his speech to say that I had deliberately misconstrued the section. Now,

I am going to put myself in the hands of the committee:

All persons permanently employed under this act shall be subject to the provisions of the Civil Service Act, 1918, and amendments thereto—

And so forth. And then:

—notwithstanding anything in the said acts or amendments thereto.

If there was no exception to the application of the Civil Service Act to permanent employees why is the proviso there at all? Certainly the registrar is a permanent employee and he is to be appointed by the government without regard to the act. I ask my hon. friend does he now say that technical employees must be temporary?

Mr. McMASTER: I think that is the reading.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, my hon. friend does not think so. I can measure the intelligence of the hon. member better than he can himself in this regard. The section says that permanent employees shall be appointed subject to the Civil Service Act but paragraph (a) provides that the Governor in Council may appoint any British subject to be registrar, or any British subject to be a commissioner.

Mr. McMASTER: "And".

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is the proviso:

—and (b) the minister may employ such technical and special temporary assistance as may be required—

And so on.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does my hon. friend contend that his argument applies to technical assistance?

Mr. MEIGHEN: If it does not, why is the word "notwithstanding" used in the first part of the section? That word would not be used if that were not to be the case.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am quite agreeable to transposing the word "temporary" and having it read "such temporary technical and special assistance as may be required".

Mr. MEIGHEN: That will have a different meaning.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That was what was intended.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is not the way it is now.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We are changing it to get over my right hon. friend's objection.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Appointments can be made to positions that are permanent, otherwise the word "notwithstanding" would not apply in that case at all. I want to say to my right hon. friend that in the practical working out of this bill the phrasing will not make very much difference. The government will employ practically all the persons they can; they will make the appointments and work the appointees in in some way even though they are supposed to be only temporary.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend must not judge this government by his own.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am judging my right hon. friend's government by its own actions and I will give a few instances to bear out my contention. I want to point out that a well-known Liberal organizer in Alberta, Mr. May, was appointed Immigration agent in the United States.

Mr. McMASTER: I rise to a point of order.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I thought the hon. gentleman would. He never cares for particulars. I am giving instances—

Mr. McMASTER: I rise to a point of order.

Mr. MEIGHEN: —of what I expect is going to be done.

Mr. McMASTER: I rise to a point of order. I submit that the right hon. leader of the Opposition has no right, in the discussion on this bill, to indulge in the criticism of the administration of the Immigration department.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh no, the Civil Service Act.

Mr. McMASTER: Oh, the Civil Service Act?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is what I want to draw your attention to, Mr. Chairman. I am pointing out what the government has already done. I was illustrating my contention of what the government are likely to do under this clause by what they have already done. They have appointed the Liberal organizer in western Canada to be Immigration agent in the United States.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Since when was Mr. May a Liberal organizer? I never heard of it before.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He has been most of his life.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I beg the right hon. gentleman's pardon. He never was a Liberal organizer for one moment or for one day, he was a Liberal candidate and was defeated.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The right hon. gentleman is very much at sea.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think he is.

Mr. McMASTER: I again rise to a point of order.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Perhaps the Minister of the Interior could speak of Mr. Ingram of Manitoba. Was he not a Liberal organizer?

The CHAIRMAN: I must draw the attention of the right hon. leader of the Opposition to the fact that a point of order has been raised.

Mr. McMASTER: I was going to show that this discussion has been caused by the right hon. leader of the Opposition's reference to the Acting Minister of Immigration and Colonization. It demonstrates that the point of order was well taken. Now, if I might reply to my right hon. friend while I am on my feet—

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman has no right to the floor except to state his point of order.

Mr. McMASTER: That is true.

The CHAIRMAN: Does the right hon. leader of the Opposition wish to discuss the point of order?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think there was any; it was an abortive point of order which the hon. gentleman raised.

The CHAIRMAN: No, the hon. member for Brome asked for the chairman's ruling.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will shift my ground and the point of order will not then apply. I realize how sedulously anxious the hon. gentleman is to prevent this information coming out with respect to these Liberal organizers. I know he is very ingenious in getting the sunlight stopped but he should remember the injunction of his leader.

Mr. McMASTER: The sunlight?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, the sunlight. His right hon. leader says the sunlight should be thrown on certain secret transactions. According to the Prime Minister this bill is going to do for the social system what the sun does for the physical universe. Did not the hon. member get that lesson from his chief during the second reading of this bill? If the sunlight is to be diffused why not let it be directed upon the acts of this government who are appointing immigration agents despite the provisions of the Civil Service Act? However, if I am stopped from proceeding any further in that direction—

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): May I interrupt the right hon. gentleman to say that the appointments to which he refers were not made despite the Civil Service Act, nor was any attempt made to evade that act.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Who appointed those men?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I appointed them and I did not evade the Civil Service Act in one single instance.

Mr. MEIGHEN: You just paid no attention to it.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No; I beg my right hon. friend's pardon.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What right had the minister under the Civil Service Act to appoint them?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The Civil Service Act gives authority to appoint a person for a period of ninety days.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Under conditions of emergency.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Where was the emergency in appointing those Immigration agents in the United States? The emergency was in the Liberal camp.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The emergency arose the other day. Let me say this to my right hon. friend: The gentleman who occupies the position of Deputy Minister of Immigration was undoubtedly an organizer—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil):—and was appointed by my right hon. friend.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, and we had the right to appoint him too under the act.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I am not disputing that but I do say that my right hon. friend has no right to question my power to make an appointment under the act.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If you make the appointment under the act. You have no right to appoint Immigration agents that is different.

The CHAIRMAN: This discussion is getting out of order if it has not already reached that stage.

Mr. McMASTER: It was out of order long ago.

Mr. SHAW: I would suggest to the Prime Minister that he should transpose the word "temporary" in the manner indicated.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have an amendment here to do so. In order to make clear the intention of the section I would move that the word "temporary" in line eleven of section 31 be transposed and inserted before the word "technical" in line twelve.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I wish to say with regard to the second and third subsections of section 31—

The CHAIRMAN: We have not reached that yet, we are on subsection 1 of section 31, and the Prime Minister has moved an amendment.

Mr. RYCKMAN: The same words occur in two other clauses following, which would make it abundantly clear that the word "technical" was in a class distinctly by itself, and distinct from the word "temporary."

The CHAIRMAN: It is moved that in subsections 1, 2 and 3 of section 31, the word "temporary" be transposed to appear before the word "technical" wherever the word appears before the word "assistance."

Mr. MEIGHEN: In view of the fact that there is no definition of the word "temporary" in this bill, may I ask what is the Prime Minister's idea of the maximum length of time a temporary employee should serve and be paid?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It would depend on the length of the inquiry. There might be some inquiries lasting a couple of days, some a couple of weeks and some a couple of months. The reference here is to the commissioners, to get the necessary clerical or expert assistance in carrying out the inquiry.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The United Shoe inquiry lasted for some years.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: They were not going all the time.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think they were, and the government has degenerated since, so that I fancy the expression "temporary employee" will be interpreted with much elasticity.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The hon. member said the other day that the officers had nothing to do under the old act.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This only applies to the extent that they had anything to do. They had nothing to do under the old act, save in the one case. There was one case and it was very lengthy, almost as lengthy as it was worthless.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 32—Technicality not to invalidate proceedings:

Mr. RYCKMAN: Does the Prime Minister mean by section 32 that steps can be taken irregularly or not in accordance with the procedure laid down in the act, and that then the final determination will be the action of the registrar, and that would be as binding as if it were regularly taken and without any departure from the procedure? It seems to me that it is an unusual clause, and I would like to know its history. It may be in the Combines Investigation Act of 1910, which I have not had the pleasure of reading recently.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is where it came from—section 42 of the Combines Investigation Act and also the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, which has been on the statutes a great many years. It has been found useful in the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, just to meet the possible quibblings of persons who wish to obstruct the proceedings before the commissioner and it may serve a similar purpose in connection with investigations before the registrar. The intention of the government is to make it a workable machine, and it is well known that in most of these inquiries parties who are interested in blocking the inquiry are going, wherever opportunity presents itself, to raise some technical objection or some quibble. The idea is to get rid of that kind of ambuscading, as far as possible.

Section agreed to.

On section 33—Governor in Council may take necessary regulations:

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would like to find out from the Prime Minister what regulations are contemplated and what is supposed to be done? What is there that we have not already covered by the act?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am afraid I cannot answer off-hand. As an act of this kind is put to the test and cases arise under it, there will develop or be disclosed undoubtedly reasons for laying down certain general regulations that should be complied with by parties, for example, making the application, as to the form of the application, and also the time and matters of that kind. The same power is given under similar legislation to which I have referred, the Industrial Disputes Act, and regulations there have been found useful. They were not put in the statutes because they were not important enough to find a place there, but they are of assistance in trying to preserve a certain uniformity of procedure.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): I would like to ascertain whether this legislation would in any way interfere with the rights of parliament as they are being exercised now by the Committee on Agriculture in making inquries of a similar character and giving great publicity to certain wrongs, and perhaps to certain cures. Under this act it may develop that it is not quite within the purview of parliament through a committee to investigate even the things that are assigned to this special structure which we are creating to-day. I would like to ask the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) what his idea is in regard to the question I have raised.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Parliament must be supreme in everything.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): This cannot be treated as in any way interfering with the rights of parliament?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Oh, no.

Section agreed to.

On section 34—Trade unions not affected:

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the Prime Minister tell us what he understands by reasonable protection? Would the word "reasonable" there have the same meaning as it would have with reference to other combinations?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It would have exactly the same meaning as it has where this clause appears in the criminal code. My hon. friend knows that this section is taken from section 2, subsection 2, 9-10 George V, chapter 45, Combines and Fair Prices Act of 1919. There is a similar clause in section 498 (2) of the Criminal Code, the original of which was enacted by 63-64 Victoria, chapter 46, section 3. Perhaps, I can answer my hon. friend's question as to the meaning by saying it has just the meaning he had when he passed the Combines Act.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I asked the minister's conception of its meaning, and I accept the compliment he pays me when he says he cannot define it better than referring to the language I used myself.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend knows that any construction he or I put on it would not affect the interpretation the courts would put on it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I know, but I wanted the Prime Minister's opinion on it.

Section agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the title carry?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend asked me, on the seconding of the bill, what was the difference in the interpretation clause between the phraseology and the effect of the phraseology and the definition relating to combines from that which appears in the code. I think possibly for the purpose of record I had better place the distinction on Hansard. It is a little technical, but I have it in detail. This memorandum reads:

The difference between sec. 498 of the Criminal Code and the crime created by secs. 26 (a) and 2 (a) of Bill 54.

Sec. 498 of the Criminal Code reads as follows:—

498. Everyone is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to a penalty not exceeding four thousand dollars and not less than two hundred dollars, or to two years' imprisonment, or, if a corporation is liable to a penalty not exceeding ten thousand dollars, and not less than one thousand dollars, who conspires, combines, agrees or arranges with any other person, or with any railway, steamship, steamboat or transportation company:

(a) to unduly limit the facilities for transporting, producing, manufacturing, supplying, storing or dealing in any article or commodity which may be a subject of trade or commerce; or,

(b) to restrain or injure trade or commerce in relation to any such article or commodity; or

(c) to unduly prevent, limit or lessen the manufacture or production of any such article or commodity, or to unreasonably enhance the price thereof; or,

(d) to unduly prevent or lessen competition in the production, manufacture, purchase, barter, sale, transportation or supply of any such article or commodity, or in the price of insurance upon person or property.

2. Nothing in this section shall be construed to apply to combinations of workmen or employees for their own reasonable protection as such workmen or employees. 63-64-V, c. 46, s. 3.

Subsections (a), (b), (c) (d) of section 498 should be compared with the following subsections of section 2.

Section 498 (a) of the code reads:

To unduly limit the facilities for transporting, producing, manufacturing, supplying, storing or dealing in any article or commodity which may be a subject of trade or commerce.

Clause 2. (a) (3) (i) of the present bill reads:

Limiting facilities for transporting, producing, manufacturing, supplying, storing or dealing.

The word "limiting" is substituted for the words "to unduly limit." Section 498 (b) of the code reads:

—to restrain or injure trade or commerce in relation to any such article or commodity.

Clause 2. (a) (3) (vi) of the present bill reads:

Otherwise restraining or injuring trade or commerce.

Section 498 (c) of the code reads:

To unduly prevent, limit or lessen the manufacture or production of any such article or commodity, or to unreasonably enhance the price thereof.

Clause 2. (a) (3) (ii) of the present bill reads:

Preventing, limiting or lessening manufacture or production.

That is, eliminating from it the words "unduly" and "unreasonably." Section 498 (d) of the code reads:

To unduly prevent or lessen competition in the production, manufacture, purchase, barter, sale, transportation or supply of any such article or commodity, or in the price of insurance upon person or property.

If that is to be compared the present bill, clause 2. (a) (3) (v) reads:

Preventing or lessening competition in, or substantially controlling within any particular area or district or generally, production manufacture, purchase, barter, sale, storage, transportation, insurance or supply.

In the above section it will be seen that section 498 contains the word "unduly" in subsections (a), (c), and (d), whereas such word does not appear in the corresponding provision of section 2. The test in section 2 of whether a crime has been committed is whether what has been done has operated, or is likely to operate to the detriment of, or against the interest of the public whether consumers, producers or others. This is the test which is substituted for the word "unduly."

Section 498 applies only to persons who conspire, combine, agree or arrange with any other person, or with any railway, steamship, steamboat or transportation company to do any of the acts set out in subsections (a), (b), (c) and (d). Section 2 (a) is wider in that the limitation with respect to conspiracy, etc., is not mentioned, and it extends to "any actual or tacit contract, agreement, arrangement or combination which has, or is designed to have" any of the results mentioned in the rest of the paragraph.

Section 2 (a) extends not only to the matters which have already been enumerated and contrasted with the corresponding sections of 498, but also to:

(1) Mergers, trusts and monopolies so called;

(2) The relation resulting from the purchase, lease or other acquisition by any person of any control over or interest in the whole or part of the business of any other person.

(3) Any actual or tacit contract, agreement, arrangement or confirmation which has or is designed to have the effect of,

(iii) fixing a common price or a resale price, or a common rental, or a common cost of storage or transportation; or

(iv) enhancing the price, rental or cost of article, rental, storage or transportation.

It will thus be seen that section 2 (a) is substantially broader than section 498, and more applicable to modern conditions.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): I would like to ask the Prime Minister a question in connection with a report sent to me to-day of a debate in the Manitoba legislature dealing with the combination of steamship companies, in which report the legislature has declared that it will ask this government to provide other penalties or remedies for the discrimination by those transportation companies which is complained of; that the coastal laws be suspended so that the companies which have made combinations shall meet with the competition of American ships, and that the use of the canals and waterways be denied to transportation companies that continue to conspire against the public interest and especially against the transportation interests of the West.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What is the question?

Mr. MACLEAN (York): I want to know if the Prime Minister would say whether those penalties are still available together with other penalties that are provided for the correction of parties conspiring against the public interest.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Certainly it is open to parliament to enact by way of legislation any remedy that it thinks best to meet the situation.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Or the Governor in Council can exercise his powers?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes. That, I think, will be the great advantage of legislation of this kind. It will enable the government and the public to know the facts with respect to any particular situation, and in that manner it will likely suggest the most effective remedy, whether it is to be found within the confines of the legislation or not.

Title agreed to.

Bill as amended, reported.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. MEIGHEN: A bill like this should not be read the third time the same day.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I thought my right hon. friend was anxious for the sun to come out soon.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If I had the same faith in the sun coming out as my right hon. friend has I would be glad that the bill should be read the third time to-day but it has as close a relation to the sun as it has to the nether elements.

Mr. McMASTER: That is somewhat cryptic.

Motion stands.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Marine and Fisheries) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to amend section 487 of the Canada Shipping Act, chapter 113 of the Revised Statutes, 1906, by providing that a master or mate upon application as therein provided may, if his application be approved by the pilotage authority, be thereupon examined, and if found competent, a pilotage certificate may be granted to him.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Explain.

Mr. LAPOINTE: By section 487 of the Canada Shipping Act apart from the pilotage districts of Montreal, Quebec, St. John and Halifax, the master or mate of any vessel can apply to the pilotage authority to pass an examination as pilot, and the pilotage authority, after the ordinary examinations and upon the payment of the dues, is compelled to deliver a certificate to that master or mate. The object of the resolution and of the bill is, that instead of making this compulsory on the pilotage authority, to make it discretionary. The pilotage authority, instead of "shall deliver the certificate", "may deliver the certificate" after it has approved the request. The necessity for this has been shown to the department in a special case this season in the pilotage district of Miramichi. At this place the channel is narrow, and any accident that takes place there would block the traffic altogether. It is not a very important district, and the pilot could not make a living if the most important ships that go there were relieved from the obligation of taking those pilots on those ships. It is very important to the port that pilots should be retained there to bring foreign ships in. The only purpose of the resolution and of the bill which will be introduced based upon it is, in special cases, to empower the pilotage authority to refuse the examination of a master and mate and to place the small pilotage districts on the same level as Quebec, Montreal, St. John and Halifax in this regard.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. RYCKMAN: Who is the pilotage authority?

Mr. LAPOINTE: The Governor in Council under a section of the Shipping Act can at any time nominate the Minister of Marine and Fisheries as pilotage authority for any port. For the port of Miramichi, for instance, the minister is the authority.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Lapointe thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 166 to amend the Canada Shipping Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

IMMIGRATION ACT AMENDMENT

The House again in committee on Bill No. 136 to amend the Immigration Act, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

On section 3—Certain persons to be deemed to belong to the prohibited or undesirable classes:

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Argenteuil, Acting Minister of Immigration): When the bill was last under consideration exception was taken to the amendment to the Immigration Act which is proposed in section 3 of this bill. This section proposes to repeal section 41 of the act and replace it by the old section which was embodied in the act up to the time that the present section was adopted. That old section, which it is now proposed to re-enact, provides:

Whenever any person other than a Canadian citizen advocates in Canada the overthrow by force or violence of the government of Great Britain or Canada, or other British dominion, etc.

Objection was taken to the words "any person other than a Canadian citizen" on the ground that they implied a reflection on British subjects who were not Canadians. I propose therefore to strike out the words after the word "any" and substitute in their stead the word "alien," so that the section will now read:

Whenever any alien advocates, etc.

Mr. MORRISON: Why not say "any person" instead of "any alien"? There is no reason why a Canadian citizen should not be amenable to the law in this respect.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): This section relates to immigrants who are subject to deportation for the offences described. A Canadian citizen could not come under the section.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister has failed to protect himself. An alien is forbidden to advocate the assassination of any official of the government, but apparently he may advocate the assassination of any member of the government.

Mr. JACOBS: Which is sometimes justifiable.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why not simply leave it at assassination, without any qualification? If anyone advocates the assassination of anybody, that surely is a sufficient offence.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I am simply adopting the old wording; I have not changed the language of the old section at all. Exception was taken to the fact that, by implication, permission was given the department to deport a British subject, and the amendment I now propose is intended to meet that difficulty.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am not objecting to the amendment, but I would strike out the words "any official of the government of Great Britain or Canada or other British dominion," etc., and simply say "assassination." I do not know why officials of the government should be particularly sacrosanct.

Mr. JACOBS: Particularly if appointed by the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Perhaps it is the immigration agent the minister wants to protect.

Mr. BAXTER: Listening to the budget this afternoon, Mr. Chairman, I thought this provision was going to be dropped, that the withdrawal of the duty on hemp was for the purpose of getting the proper kind of rope for hanging these people instead of sending them out of the country. What is the purpose of the government?

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the section can be improved why not improve it?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): For ten years we have got along all right with this wording, and it is well to be careful not to change the wording of any particular clause without considering its effect upon other parts of the bill. However, I have no particular objection to striking out the words my hon. friend complains about. He is complaining that the section applies only to officials of the government and not to citizens?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes. Why should it be any more a deportable offence to advocate the assissination of an official of the government than the assassination of anybody else?

Mr. JACOBS: We are also providing against the assassination of Lenine and Trotsky, because this section applies to all foreign governments.

Mr. McMASTER: I submit with a good deal of confidence that assassination is undesirable under all circumstances, and in regard to all persons, and if it is advisable to retain this clause, I do not see why the words "of any official of the government of Great Britain or Canada, or other British dominion, colony, possession, or dependency, or of any foreign government" should not all be stricken out.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is what I mean.

Mr. McMASTER: Any person who advocates assassination is ipso facto undesirable and should be deported.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Strike out the word "the" before assassination. If a person advocates assassination he at once becomes an undesirable.

Mr. McMASTER: Yes.

Mr. JACOBS: Assassination applies only to the murdering of those high in authority, not to ordinary individuals.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Make it apply to ordinary individuals. I want the protection to apply to ourselves.

Mr. CARROLL: Should not the word "assassination" be supplemented by another word?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: "Assassination" is a good word. Do you like "murder" better?

Mr. CARROLL: I would suggest "assassination or murder."

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the difference?

Mr. CARROLL: There is a legal difference.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Perhaps the section would be clear in this form:

> Whenever any person other than a Canadian citizen advocates in Canada the overthrow by force or violence of the goverment of Great Britain or Canada, or other British dominion, colony, possession, or dependency, or the overthrow by force or violence of constituted law and authority, or by assassination, or shall, by word or act, and so on.

The whole idea is to look after assassination which tends to overthrow government.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Better leave the section as it is, I think.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Strike out the word "the" before assassination.

Mr. McMASTER: It seems to me that assassination with a political complexion is no more heinous than assassination of an ordinary sort.

Mr. CARROLL: Does the term "assassination" apply to the ordinary individual?

Mr. McMASTER: I think so. An assassin is a person who kills another. I do not think the person assassinated has to be in a higher position in the scale of society than the murderer.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I move:

That the word "the" before "assassination" in line 21 be struck out and that the following words after "assassination" be struqk out, "of any official of the government of Great Britain or Canada, or other British dominion, colony, possession or dependency, or of any foreign government."

Mr. BAXTER: Would that enable us to get at anyone who is attempting to interfere with a foreign government?

Mr. McMASTER: Are these remarks merely for the ear of the right hon. leader of the Opposition?

Mr. BAXTER: Yes, it is just a private conversation. I think we should retain the words "of any official of the government," and so throw protection around the hon. Minister of the Interior.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Exception was taken by the shipping interests to the amendment to section 52. In order to meet their objections I beg to move that section 6 of the bill be amended to read as follows:

Subsection one of section fifty-two of the said act, as enacted by chapter twenty-two of the statutes of 1919, is amended by striking out all that portion of the said section preceding the word "such" in the ninth line and substituting therefor the following:

"52. (1) Upon arrival of any vessel in Canada from any port or place outside of Canada, it shall be the duty of the transportation company, owner, agent, consignee or master of a vessel to deliver to the agent or inspector in charge of the port of entry such lists as may be required by the minister containing the names of all officers, seamen or other persons employed on such vessel which lists shall contain whatever information the minister shall prescribe, and before the departure of any such vessel the minister may also require—"

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What does that mean?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): It is an amendment to section 52. We are striking out the increase of fine and also meeting the objection taken by the shipping interests that they have to prepare manifests simply for the use of the Department of Immigration, but that actually are never used except to trace someone who becomes a public charge and whom it becomes our duty to deport. Under the amendment we will use the manifest deposited in ordinary course with the secretary of the Shipping Association, rather than compel the purser on every trip to make out a separate manifest for the department. This, however, will not apply to foreign bottoms.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Am I correct in understanding that under the present law a manifest is made out specially for the Department of Immigration?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Both on arrival and on departure.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: And the whole effect of the amendment is to render that unnecessary in the case of British bottoms?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No. They have been using a separate manifest for the department; we now propose not to ask them for that but to accept the manifest filed with the secretary of the Shipping Association at the port. That applies only to British bottoms; we still reserve the right to ask the owners or masters of foreign bottoms who have not deposited such a manifest to make one for our use.

Mr. CARROLL: Has the department a complete record of the entry into Canada of all immigrants who came here legally?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes.

Mr. JACOBS: Does this amendment meet with the approval of the shipping federation?

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

IMMIGRATION ACT AMENDMENT

The House again in committee on Bill No. 136, to amend the Immigration Act, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: When the committee rose at six o'clock an amendment had been moved to clause 6 of the bill.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the minister tell us what the purpose of the amendment is?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I did that before the committee rose at six o'clock. In discussing this matter with the shipping interests they were anxious not to have to provide a double manifest as they are required to do under the existing act. One manifest they file with the secretary of the British and Canadian shipping interests, and the other with the Immigration department. This second manifest we do not use for any purpose except for reference when we find a sailor who is liable to become a public charge upon the country, and who therefore is liable to deportation. We agree to accept the manifest of the secretary of the Shipping Association, rather than have the purser make out a second list. The shipping interests are objecting to the increased fines, and, therefore, I have struck out section 6 as it stands in the bill, substituting the amendment before the committee as an amendment to subsection 1.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That clause 6 is an addition to the present clause 6.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No, I am striking out clause 6 in the bill and substituting the amendment.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Section 52 is really subsection 1.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes.

Amendment agreed to.

Section, as amended, agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

SUPPLY

PUBLIC WORKS

The House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Harbours and rivers—Esquimalt, B.C., dry-dock under construction, $1,500,000.

Hon. J. H. KING (Minister of Public Works): The first item $1,500,000, is a vote to continue the construction of a dry-dock at Victoria. The amount of this contract was $4,217,400. In 1921-22 $1,164,872 was expended. Of the apropriation for 1922-23, on the 31st March, $547,700 had been expended.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How near completion is that dry-dock?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The contract expires in January 1924. There have been certain delays and probably an extension will be required. Although the contract should be completed in 1924, I would not think the dry-dock would be ready for operation before 1925.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The government is responsible for the delay. Did the government not hold up the work for quite a while?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There was some delay last year by the failure to vote supply in the Main Estimates.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister sees his error, I hope, and is duly repentant. Has the minister a report that he can lay on the Table, that the government received as to the necessity of this dock, the probable utility of it?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): This is not a new project; it has been under consideration for many years. Negotiations were carried on years ago and a site purchased for the construction of this dry-dock. All that went by the board; but in 1919-20, my right hon. friend and his government entered into a contract to construct this dry-dock. There was some hesitation on the part of this government as to the advisability at the time, with conditions as they were following the war, of entering into the construction of two dry-docks on the Pacific coast within a few miles of one another. This government, on coming into office, found that an expenditure of $1,000,000 had been made at Victoria, and although there was a doubt as to the advisability of continuing the construction of these two dry-docks, one at Esquimalt and one at Vanvouver, it was considered advisable, after careful investigation had been made, to continue construction of the dry-dock at Victoria. In the Supplementary Estimates of last year, an appropriation of $1,000,000 was passed for continuation of construction, and the work has been proceeding since that time.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister stated that this matter was deferred for investigation. What was brought to the minister's attention during the investigation that contributed to the decision of the government to go on with the work?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I do not think there should be any doubt in my right hon. friend's mind as to the attitude of the government on taking office. The declaration was made by the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) when he was contending in the countryside for election and the election of his party, that contracts which had been entered into would be investigated. We found on the Pacific coast that two contracts for dry-dock purposes had been entered into, and these with other contracts were held up. As regards the work at Victoria, as I have already explained to the committee, there had been an expenditure of $1,000,000, and after a thorough investigation and going into the requirements of shipping on the Pacific coast, we concluded we would be well advised to continue construction of that dock.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister got to the point at the last minute, but he was not very explicit. The point that I asked him was not as to any historical account. I know that pretty well myself. I asked him what were the results of the investigation that prevailed with the government and decided it to go ahead. He mentions that after investigating the necessities of shipping on the Pacific coast, the government decided to continue the construction. Does he mean by that the government was convinced that the necessities of shipping really required that dry-dock?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): After the investigation which the government made, and taking into account the fact that there had been a very large expenditure on the dock and also the increased shipping and development on the Pacific coast, the government was convinced as to the advisability of continuing construction of that dock.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Supposing there had been nothing at all spent on it, would the government then have seen fit to go on with the work? Did the necessities of shipping so impress the government that it would have gone on with the work even had we not commenced it?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The government in that case would have been in an independent position to make its own investigation and to define its own policy.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The government made an investigation and the minister has the result. Will the minister say to-day that the late government went on too soon with the construction of the dry-dock?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I would say that that government went on too late. That dry-dock should have been constructed in 1912-1913. If it had been constructed then, it would have served a useful purpose.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Undoubtedly it would. Then will the minister say that we did not commence it too soon in 1919?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It would have been very useful during the war period.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the minister think we commenced too soon in 1919?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I think it would have been much better to have commenced at an earlier date, as we would then have had the use of the dock during a time when it would have been of great service, not only to British Columbia, but to the Empire generally.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is not my point, and I do not know why the minister does not answer my question. Perhaps it would have been better if we had known when the war was going to break out. We, however, did not commence the dock in 1912. If we had followed the advice of my hon. friend's friends, there would have been a number of things that we would not have commenced. As, however, we did not commence the dry-dock before the war, or during the war, does the minister say that we were too early in commencing it in 1919? I know this is a poser.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): So far as I am concerned there is no poser. My right hon. friend has no reason to worry about my position as regards the dry-dock. My party had, in 1911, a contract for the construction of a dry-dock on the Pacific coast. When we came into power in 1921, we took conditions as we found them, and we are carrying on, I believe, to the satisfaction of the people on the Pacific coast in the matter of dry-dock policy.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is not what I asked.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I am answering the question and my right hon. friend can interpret my answer. I think it is a fair answer, and so far as I am concerned there was no poser in his question. We are proceeding with the construction of this dry-dock.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister is simply dodging the question. I am going to keep on a little longer, perhaps some time longer. I am asking the minister: Keeping in mind that we did not commence during the war or before the war, did we commence, under all the circumstances, too early in 1919 at the time we did commence? He can answer that by saying yes or no.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I will give my right hon. friend the same answer that I gave before, that he commenced construction of the dry-dock too late.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How then does the minister justify his support of his leader who denounced us for commencing it too soon? Is that the poser for the hon. gentleman? I do not hear any answer to that. I presume I may assume that this is just another instance of the whole humbug that was perpetrated throughout the entire year. The minister, I presume, by his silence will acquiesce in that description.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): We do not need to acquiesce at all. My right hon. friend would like to develop a situation at this time, but the situation is not there for him to develop. If he thinks he can get any glory out of his policy in the matter of dry-docks, he is privileged to take all the glory he can get. As regards ourselves, we are carrying on. I think, in the interests of the country.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I was not seeking glory at all; I was seeking a frank statement from the minister. He declines to answer whether we commenced too soon in 1919 or not. He dodges the question by saying that we should have commenced in 1912. I asked him then: Assuming that we had not commenced in 1912, had not gone on during the war, under all the circumstances did we commence too soon in 1919? He declines to answer.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): That is a matter of opinion entirely. My right hon. friend can have his own opinion.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I know my opinion exactly and I will say it. I will say that we did not commence too soon. Will the minister have the courage to say yes or no?

Mr. GOULD: Will the dock when completed be large enough to accommodate the largest vessel plying on the Pacific, or will the department be called upon in the future to ask for more money to enlarge it?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The present dimensions of the dock are such as to afford sufficient accommodation, I understand, for the largest ships afloat.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): How much money has already been spent on the work, and how much more is it estimated the construction will require before the dock is completed?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): When the item was first introduced I gave the expenditures in 1921-22 and in 1922-23. There was an appropriation in 1919-20 of $500,000, there was only expended of that sum $4,994. In the year 1920-21 there was voted $500,000 of which $13,536 was expended; in the year 1921-22, $1,300,000 was voted and that year the expenditure was $1,164,000. In the year 1922-23 the expenditure was $547,720.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): But how much is it estimated will be required to complete the work?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Something over $2,000,000.

Mr. GOULD: What was the total estimate in the first place?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister's figures could not be right if he gave his details correctly. He did not give details aggregating that sum by nearly a million dollars.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I have given it year by year.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I added the figures.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I understood the figure last given by the minister to refer to the amount still required to be spent.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I thought the minister was giving the committee what had been already spent.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The amount estimated as being necessary to complete the work I should say, would be roughly $2,300,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: And the minister told us that the total already spent is some $1,600,000.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: And to complete the work it will require $2,300,000. Now, owing to delays we shall have to wait until 1925 to have the use of the dock.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Not necessarily. Some of the delays were due to failure in voting supply in the Main Estimates last year; there was a delay of two or three months. Further delays have also been occasioned by certain occurrences in connection with the work which have held up progress somewhat. I should think that the contractors should be through in 1924,—at the end of 1924 at any rate.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the work cost more because of the suspension of operations on the part of the contractors, and if so, how much?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): During the suspension of work there were certain operations that had to be continued of necessity and expenditures had to be made in connection with them. These expenditures were necessary for keeping the pumps going, taking care of the machinery, plant equipment, etc., for which the contractors have made a claim. The matter is under consideration.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is the amount of the claim?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It amounts to $69,600.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is pretty expensive procrastination. Is that the only item though that the government will be called upon to provide for on account of this suspension of work?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): That is all that I know of.

Mr. GOULD: What was the total estimate for the whole construction in the first place?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The amount of the contract is $4,287,000.

Mr. GOULD: The amount already expended and the amount estimated as a further requirement will total somewhat more than that, will it not?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There have been no additions except in one regard. An additional expenditure has been found necessary in the matter of certain yardage of rock which it has been found exceeds the yardage estimated originally by the engineers. This is a discrepancy that might occur in any engineering problem of this kind, and that is the only extra that I know of.

Mr. MacLAREN: What are the dimensions of the dock?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The length is 1,188 feet, the width at entrance is 126 feet on the sill and 135 feet at the coping level. The depth of the sill at spring-tide is 40 feet. The dock will have two inner walls located 400 feet and 750 feet from the entrance respectively, thus making it possible to accommodate boats from 350 to 1,150 feet in length.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Where are the ships being taken care of now pending the completion of the dock?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Some of them are being accommodated at the old dock at Esquimalt and others are going to Seattle and to other dry-docks on the coast.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But the great bulk of them are going to Seattle?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: So that because of a year's delay the country will lose all that is now going to Seattle. That will be another portion of the harvest that we shall reap from the hon. gentleman's procrastination.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes, unfortunately; but it is only one year's delay as compared with many years' delay.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But there is this difference between the delay in this case and the many years' delay my hon. friend refers to: We were not out any money all that time; this time we are out money, we are out the damages to the contractor, we are out the use of the dock, we are out the trade that results, and all that as a penalty on the country for the election propaganda of the hon. gentleman and his friends.

Mr. CAHILL: And we are out the Tory government.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Which is another penalty.

Mr. GOULD: When the contract was let in 1919, I take it that it covered the whole construction and was intended to take care of the completed job. In other words, I should think that the contract price quoted them would be the total that the contractor would receive. I cannot see therefore why, if there has been any delay in carrying out the contract, the contractor should get this $60,000 that the minister has referred to. Is that amount to be added to the contract price?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The matter is under consideration, and if the amount is allowed it will be added to the total cost of the dock.

Mr. GOULD: In 1919, prices were high and any contractor would be inclined at that time to put in a high tender. Labour costs generally, however, have gone down, as also have prices in other directions. I think therefore that the contractor who tendered in 1919 should be compelled to live up to his contract to the last cent, and I would urge upon the minister to see that this is done.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I hope that the hon. member will not forget to ask next year what was done in that regard.

Item agreed to.

Port Arthur and Fort William—harbour improvements, $135,000.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): In explanation of that item I may give the following particulars:

Port Arthur—	Dredging
To complete contract with Messrs. O'Brien & Martin, slip 2,350 ft. long by 100 ft. wide to depth of 26 ft. at mouth of McIntyre river in front of grain elevator under construction by Parrish & Heimbecker, Ltd..	$22,500 00
To dredge a slip 1,760 ft. long by 175 ft. wide at bottom to a depth of 25 ft. below low water in front of grain elevators under construction by Jas. Stewart and the N. Bawlf Grain Co., both of Winnipeg, Man..	81,500 00
To complete payments to Messrs. Chambers, McQuigge & McCaffrey on the final estimate for their contract for the construction of a rubble mound extension 1,850 ft. to the Bare Point breakwater	2,042 14
Fort William—
To complete contract with Messrs. O'Brien & Martin for construction of 1,000 ft. rubble mound extension to breakwater	23,500 00
Inspection, contingencies, office, etc.. ..	5,000 00
Total amount required 1923-24..	$134,542 14

The amount asked for is $135,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is there any other considerable expenditure contemplated for this harbour this year?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There is under consideration a further extension of the Bare Point breakwater.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What would be the probable estimate for that?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I have not the item before me. Probably $200,000 would carry on the extension that is considered necessary at this time. If my right hon. friend is familiar with the situation at Port Arthur he will know that this breakwater gives protection to a shore line where there are constructed a dry-dock and some pulp mills and elevators. The Grain Growers' Co-operative and Richardson's elevators are still exposed, and it is hoped to extend the breakwater this year to give these structures protection, but it has not been finally decided upon yet.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is that the Grain Growers' elevator or the Saskatchewan Co-operative's?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I think both the Grain Growers' and the Saskatchewan are in that locality.

Mr. MANION: I did not think there was any work contemplated of such an extensive character as that mentioned by the minister. Is the part that is to be extended simply to protect works that are now in existence?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

Mr. MANION: You are not extending the breakwater in the other direction for works contemplated in the future?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No.

Item agreed to.

Quebec harbour—Champlain dock—to complete, $96,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I suppose this is carrying out the programme laid down last year involving a total cost of a million and a half dollars?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It is a revote. I think it has been carried for a couple of years. It is required to complete the construction of the Champlain dry-dock under contract with Messrs. M. P. & J. T. Davis as follows:

To complete items of contract..	$55,748 80
Toilet building for use of crews off steamers in the dock and men engaged in repairs..	21,924 10
Installation of soot blowers, feed regulators, and 3 electric motors and gears in pump house..	12,700 00
Inspection, contingencies, etc..	5,500 00
Total..	$95,872 90

Mr. MEIGHEN: This is not part of the million and a half dollar harbour improvements there?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This is just the completion of the Champlain dock?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I suppose the government is receiving the same complaint as to no business being diverted to the harbour of Quebec which was a constant source of political fuel to the hon. gentleman a few months ago?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I have not heard of it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman cannot attend council, I am sure.

Item agreed to.

St. John Harbour—improvements, $860,000.

Mr. BAXTER: What amount has been spent in the past, how much is it anticipated it will be necessary to spend in the future, and then what will we get for the outlay? Also, does this include anything for the west side, or is it simply for the improvements at Courtenay bay?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Of this amount $809,385 is required to complete the Courtenay bay contract, which has been under way for some years.

Mr. BAXTER: That is just the dock and the dredging?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

Mr. BAXTER: No wharves?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No, these are the other particulars:

Courtenay Bay contract amount required to complete	$809,385
Maintenance of harbour works	20,000
West St. John—protection of concrete exposed to sea action	10,000
Fort Dufferin—repairs to breastwork	3,500
Staff maintenance	18,000
Total	$860,885

There is no provision in this amount for the breakwater which my hon. friend speaks of.

Mr. BAXTER: Roughly, what is the amount that has been spent in Courtenay bay, so that with the $809,000 we may have the total cost?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Practically, $8,000,000.

Mr. BAXTER: So it will be pretty nearly $9,000,000 before it is all done?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Practically.

Mr. BAXTER: Is the minister hopeful of being able to do something this year for the extension of the breakwater to the island?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I can only inform my hon. friend that the matter is receiving consideration. The government are fully alive to the importance of protection work at that point, but we feel that we should complete this large undertaking that has been under way for some years.

Mr. BAXTER: I do not find any fault with the completing of the large undertaking that has been under way for so many years. I have always had grave doubts as to the advisability of ever having undertaken the project in that particular place—Courtenay bay. However, it was a fad of the hon. minister's predecessor, and no doubt the dock will be useful, but we will never get the full benefit of that expenditure until wharves are put in the basin to connect with the Canadian National Railways, which will mean considerable further expenditure. Several million dollars of the country's money have already gone into important works on the west side of the harbour, but the most modern, the best built, and the deepest berths there are not capable of being utilized during certain weather conditions, and never will be until the breakwater is continued to the island. I am not attacking the minister. He has been down to St. John and I will give him credit for having shown all the interest that could be reasonably expected of a minister. I think he is sympathetic. But I would like to carry the project a little beyond the point of sympathy. The completion of the breakwater is only a matter of good business; indeed, it is vital, for otherwise it will simply be a matter of carrying in a useless condition these other valuable works that have cost a lot of money and on which the country is bearing the interest charge. I would urge as strongly as I can that at least a beginning be made this year. The community of St. John, as the minister knows and as a good many hon. members know, spent quite largely of its own means to make a winter port out of the harbour. They have been helped by governments regardless of the political faith of those governments, and more will have to be done. After all, St. John and Halifax are to be the great winter outlets of this country on the Atlantic coast. The community has sent delegation after delegation to government after government here, but one thing after another has turned up. This Courtenay bay project has interfered; the war has interfered; and the difficulty of finance has interfered, and still we find in the winter seasons more vessels—perhaps the condition was not so bad last winter as it had been on previous occasions—lying out in the stream, waiting for berths, than there ought to be. I say it does not make good business in the port— and all the time there are two splendid docks which these vessels cannot utilize because a gap about a quarter of a mile long is not closed between this breakwater and the island. I would like to lend to the minister some of the vehemence that I and the community in general feel like expressing on this subject, so that he might use it in council with a view to effecting these purposes the consummation of which the whole community so strongly desires.

Mr. MacLAREN: What would be the estimated cost for the completion of the breakwater?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The last tender we received on that work, I am informed, was $750,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: When was that tender?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Eight or ten years ago, I believe.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It would be more expensive now. That is the Negro Point breakwater, intended to extend to Partridge island?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What amount has been spent on that in the last four or five years?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): This is an extension of work done, I believe, a great many years ago. I have not before me the figures as to the cost of the original work.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Has no money been spent on it in the last four years?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Only for maintenance and repairs.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is the work in good shape now as far as it has gone? Is it serving as a breakwater yet, to the extent to which it has been built?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The work was constructed twenty or thirty years ago. I am advised that it is in good condition.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would join in the appeal of the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Baxter). I visited the district, and it really appears to me that the millions that we have put there are not going to be available for service until that breakwater is completed. The breakwater is the protection of the investment, and I hope it at least will be carried on concurrently with the completion of the other work.

Mr. MacLAREN: Do I understand that no estimate has been made since the estimate of ten years ago?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No new tenders have been called for since that time. The department has made frequent investigations and estimates, but I do not know that they are below that amount, which was the lowest tender received. Some tenders were as high as a million dollars and more.

Mr. MacLAREN: I thought it was customary for the department to make some estimate of its own.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There is no item bearing on that, and I have not the information here.

Mr. MacLAREN: If that is the case, one cannot hope that the matter is being very actively looked into at the present time. I would remind the minister that several years ago there was a natural breakwater there which was removed for the purpose of the extension of the harbour facilities. The Negro Point breakwater has been only partly 9 p.m. completed, so that there has been no entire replacement of the natural breakwater that formerly existed. I am sure the minister will agree as to the reasonableness of the suggestion that the harbour should be put in as good a position as it was in years ago. We are voting $860,000 for the completion of the Courtenay bay works, but we are not providing for the completion of the breakwater which is the protection not only for these works but for the wharves and piers on the other side of the harbour I would urge upon the minister, therefore, the importance of proceeding with this work, not only for the protection of the existing government works, but also to put the harbour in as good a condition as existed previous to the taking away of the natural breakwater.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I assure my hon. friend that we are not unmindful of the matter as it has been pressed by him. It is a question of finance and the ability to do work of this character at the present time. The matter is receiving serious consideration.

Mr. BAXTER: I do not want to torture the hon. minister, but earlier in the session he told me that the department was making some further investigation and that he was expecting a further report. Of course I do not know that it would be judicious to have the figures given out if a report has been made, because that might affect any future call for tenders. But if the minister has a further report, I would like to ask whether it shows any serious increase in the cost of doing the work. The condition at the port of St. John probably is of very little interest to a large part of the Dominion, and yet it ought to be of very great interest to those who do not believe that their own locality is the whole of Canada. That condition compels me to say something as to the work that has been done, and the work that is, in a sense, being wasted for want of something more being done. For a distance of about a quarter of a mile from the main channel of St. John harbour in towards the shore, and for a distance, I would think, of nearly half a mile along the length of the channel, mud and boulders which used to be visible at low tide have been dredged at thirty-two feet below water level. That work cost, if my memory is correct, about 90 cents a cubic yard of material removed. The soil that was removed was carried out beyond this breakwater that we are speaking of. Every tide, and there are two of them a day, brings some of that material back into the big ditch that it cost millions of dollars to make, which was excavated in order to establish wharves for ocean steamers. Two large piers were constructed. Three more, I think, could be constructed and if they were built we would have space for at least a dozen large vessels. We probably do not need all that space at the present moment; but following a course that has been pursued for many years—I am not laying this at the door of the minister alone—the country will be faced some time with the necessity of redredging this large area. If we had that breakwater completed it would save the cost, to some extent, of redredging that area in the future; and I am trying to get the attention of the committee so that the minister may have reasonable support if he comes here at a later stage and says that it is good business to close that gap now, even though we cannot afford to build any more extensive wharves within the area which it protects. I am only appealing in the name of common sense and plain, decent, business economy. I believe the minister is sympathetic. I believe he is convinced of the utility of this work, but I think he fears, because of financial conditions, to put a project—even of the magnitude of perhaps a quarter of a million dollars for a beginning—before the House. I want to encourage him to do so, but I would like to evoke enough real attention and study to this problem, so that members should feel that it was no mere waste of money for the sake of pleasing a locality, but that it was a vital step in enabling Canada as a whole to handle her traffic within her own ports and borders instead of letting it pass through the ports of a foreign country.

Mr. KELLNER: Before the item passes I would like to ask the minister if he expects any extra ports will be needed in eastern Canada in view of the clause contained in the budget speech this afternoon.

Mr. BAXTER: Pardon me a moment. I do not know whether the hon. member's remark was intended to be facetious, or whether it was intended for a sneer but I am going to say that what was announced this afternoon in the budget speech was in my opinion a bigger thing than ordinary politics. It was a realization of the policy of Canada for Canadians, a thing that people with whom I have been associated have been talking of, dreaming of, and hoping for. I am glad to see that at last it is made part of the national policy of Canada, and I am prepared to back up a proposition of that kind no matter by whom, or how, or when it is introduced.

[Mr. Baxter.]

Mr. KELLNER: It was the minister's opinion I asked for, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BAXTER: Well, you got mine.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): We on this side entertain great hopes that the tonnage and shipments coming in and going out of Canada will in the course of a few years, under the rule and regime of the Liberal party, be greatly increased not only in the ports on the Atlantic but in those on the Pacific as well.

Item agreed to.

Toronto Harbour—improvements, $250,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We certainly should have information on this large item. We should be told what was spent last year, how far the work has progressed, if the present vote is intended to complete it, and the nature of the work still remaining to be done.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): This amount of $250,000 is required for the following improvements in Toronto harbour undertaken some years ago:

To complete the present contract for the construction of western breakwater	$204,228
To complete contract for dredging at eastern entrance..	17,415
Redecking west pier of eastern entrance.. ..	4,600
Office maintenance, salaries, etc..	18,000
Inspection, contingencies, etc..	5,757
Total amount required..	$250,000

The estimated total cost of the work authorized to be done under the present contract is $3,803,244.64. The amount which is now being voted will complete the contract.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I should like to ask the minister if he has taken into his favourable consideration the question of completing the agreement which the government has entered into with the city of Toronto. This is not a matter of favour, except as to the time when the government will implement its contract with the city. I know the minister is well aware how much depends on the carrying out of this agreement and I should like to know, because the time is opportune—in fact the date has long been overdue—when we can expect that agreement to be brought to a happy completion.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The government realizes the importance of this work, for the carrying out of which a contract was entered into with the city council and harbour board of Toronto. We are now trying to complete the scheme which has been undertaken. It is true that the work has not moved as rapidly as we could have wished but I am hoping that ultimately it will be carried through to completion.

Mr. HOCKEN: Would the minister tell us how much the government has agreed to contribute and what amount has already been contributed?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The government has spent approximately $6,500,000 and it will take $1,500,000 to complete the undertaking entered into some years ago.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Before we leave this item, would the minister tell us what progress he has made in relation to the emergency which has arisen in Portage la Prairie? I want to draw attention to one error that the minister made in the previous discussion. He sought to chide me for having neglected to provide, while I was in office and in response, to appeals, for the correction of the error of 1908, in order that water might flow around the bend and thus take care of the sewage. I had no recollection of any appeal whatever, or of the question ever arising. Since then I have obtained from the Department of Public Works a copy of all the correspondence, and I find that my recollection is quite correct. That matter never arose at all. What was appealed for at that time was the dyking of the banks, in order that floods might be prevented. That was under consideration, and reports of engineers were made looking to the curing of the situation arising therefrom, but the matter in issue between my hon. friend and me was a wholly different matter. No appeal was made by the municipality and no appeal was made individually. I draw that fact to the attention of the minister, so that he will not fall into that error in the future, and that he will be more careful in a controversy to adhere to the issue and not to obscure it by something which has nothing to do with it. What progress has been made? He will recall that he stated to the House that it was the intention of the government to provide for an extension of the sewerage system down to the present flow of the river, providing only that such was constructed at reasonable cost. That was the definite undertaking of the minister? His estimate then of what that would cost was $45,000 which he intended to contribute, but he made the statement very clearly twice, in answer to me, that the government's intention was to provide the extension at whatever cost it might entail; that is the money that would be required to complete it, if it were reasonably conducted. I understand that since he has made an offer wholly different from that. I do not know just what has taken place of recent date, but I hope to get a favourable report from the minister of this subject, and the time is now very close at hand when it will become a matter of increasing seriousness.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): In reply to my right hon. friend, I wish to state that there is no misunderstanding. It is probably not worth while reviewing it, but in 1917 and 1918 the engineering department did request of the government that certain works should be done on the channel that had been dug in order to prevent what has occurred. My hon. friend suggests that this is not in the correspondence. Well he probably has had more time than I have had. I understand he has had the correspondence, but the reports I had from the engineering department indicated that that was the condition at that time. In regard to the advance that was made since then, I do not think we have much to report to the House. In the previous discussion I suggested to the House that we had an estimate of $45,000. Since that time it has been revised by the engineering department, and we are advised that it can be done for $35,000, and the city of Portage la Prairie has been so advised. Within the last few days there have been tremendous floods in that area, and we are awaiting reports from them. I think the matter will be up for discussion later, when the Supplementary Estimates are before the House.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have read the correspondence very closely. The minister was complaining that there was no response on the part of the late government. There was no appeal to the late government and no request by anybody. What was requested was a different matter. I know the minister will recall it, if he will wait until I have made my assertion. I am aware that the minister of the time obtained a report from the engineers, in response to an appeal for dyking the river, not to any appeal with respect to the sewerage at all. The matter never came up, and would not come up till there was some need of it. In response to that appeal the engineer recommended that certain things be done with a view to meeting the situation, and, incidentally, in the course of that report stated that it would have the other effect as well. The weir would provide for the water flowing round the bend. That was a wholly different matter. How could he suggest that the failure to provide the weir was at the door of the late government, when the matter was never called to their attention? Nobody drew it to their attention. The correspondence clearly disposes of that. So much for that subject. The minister had no warrant to inject into the controversy anything in the way of a remonstrance against the administration in relation to the bend in the river and the sewerage. Now the minister revises his estimates, but does he not see that that does not affect the issue at all, because the minister's undertaking in the House was, provided of course the city were satisfied to accept it, that the government was prepared to provide as much money as was reasonably necessary to continue that sewerage system down to where the water actually flows? Is the minister still ready to abide by that?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I have had the opportunity of reading a letter addressed by my right hon. friend to the mayor of Portage la Prairie following the discussion recently on this item, and I have no doubt a similar letter will be written to-morrow to the mayor of Portage la Prairie, advising the mayor as to how he held the minister up, and how he made the minister say this and that. There is no doubt in regard to the position of the government. My hon. friend says there is no responsibility on his part, and that no representations were made. Who are the agents of the government? The Public Works engineer in that district, who did make reports, advised that a weir be put in in order that the water might go round the bend and prevent what has happened. Now I can quite understand that my right hon. friend, although a member of the government, might never have heard of that before. It is quite easy to understand that, but I claim that the agents of the government did foresee the danger at that point and recommended to the government that certain works should be undertaken.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There was no mention of the danger whatever—not the least. The report simply stated that this would meet the request for dyking the river, and at the same time would provide a weir for turning the water round. No government in the world would propose to provide against a contingency that was never called to its attention. The minister tries to intimate to the House that I wrote an unfair letter to the mayor at Portage la Prairie. I would ask him to read that letter.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I do not have it here.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think the minister should have so intimated. I merely stated the facts to the mayor, and I transmitted Hansard in order that the city would know where it stood. That was my plain duty to the council of Portage la Prairie. I recited what had taken place in no boastful tone at all. I think it is the duty of one who interests himself in this matter—and I take some interest in it, and I have some interest in it from many standpoints—to report what does result. That alone was done. I think it is the duty of the minister to state the position of the department fairly. I ask him, is he still ready to do that? I do not know that it will be of any value, but it may be. I know the city council feels that it should not be saddled with the cost of maintenance of that extra sewerage outlet, which I think is about a mile and a half, some considerable distance at all events. They feel that the government is fully responsible and should bear that cost. Is the minister prepared to abide by what I understood to be his undertaking before, which I never thought he would have varied, save by reason of the intimation that since has been given to the city council. Has the minister's undertaking been in any way varied?

Mr. LEADER: I am sorry I was not in at the opening of this discussion, but evidently the hon. member for Grenville (Mr. Meighen) is discussing matters pertaining to Portage la Prairie. About two weeks ago, while I was out of the House temporarily, word was sent to me that he was also discussing Portage la Prairie. He was finished when I got in; but on reading Hansard I noticed that he said he should apologize. I would like to accept the apology, but I am afraid he is unrepentant. As hon. members no doubt are aware, I am fully conversant with matters pertaining to Portage la Prairie. I have worked in connection with this matter; I have done all I possibly could, and I may say that the government have met our request in a favourable mood. I think they have offered to do what I believe is the square thing. They have offered to take care of the sewage system in Portage la Prairie and replace it, put it back where they found it. I do not think you could ask the government to do anything further than that, and I do not believe the people of Canada, much as I respect my constituents and all that, could be expected to take care of the sewage system of Portage la Prairie forever. If the government will assume responsibility for the situation which has developed there, if they will go so far as to put the situation back as they found it, they cannot be expected to go further than that, and the citizens of Portage la Prairie would consider that they were only doing their duty in that regard. The Minister of Public Works speaks of a letter that the hon. member for Grenville sent to the Portage la Prairie Graphic. I am responsible for handing that paper to the minister, and to show that the hon. member for Grenville is a third-rate politician. I would be glad if the minister would read that letter to the committee to-night.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I wish to pursue the subject just a little further. If the minister will state that the undertaking is as stated by the hon. member for Portage la Prairie, I am quite content. That will suit me exactly. If the government is really in the position that it is prepared to put the city as it was, from which place it was dislodged by the action of the former government, of course a Liberal government, that is quite satisfactory to me, and I am prepared to accept that wholly.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): This matter seems to be of very considerable interest to my right hon. friend, and it has been pursued to some extent. I am going to take occasion just now to make a reference to the hon. member who represents Portage la Prairie. He has given us valuable assistance. Last summer, during the harvest season, when he was busily engaged in his home work, he left the fields, took the train hurriedly, made a trip to Ottawa and laid this whole matter before the government or the Department of Public Works. He also brought up the question of certain river bank protection. We have had investigations made since then, and we have carefully followed the matter. Why my right hon. friend should want to pursue this matter to-night when the item is not under discussion, when a little later on, as he knows, Supplementary Estimates will be up, and this subject will be up for discussion, and to have me reaffirm the statement I made some two or three weeks ago, I cannot understand, except that I am advised that the mayor representing the city council of Portage la Prairie is now on his way to Ottawa, in order that he may further pursue this subject. The department's mind is made up; it was freely expressed to my right hon. friend and to members of the committee not long ago. We have not changed our minds, and my right hon. friend, who has recently perused the files, knows from his perusal that there is a letter setting forth to the mayor of Portage la Prairie the undertaking which the government are prepared to make in that matter. Why we should be pressed to reiterate a statement to-night, I cannot for the life of me see. It may be the desire of the right hon. gentleman to make representations at this time, before the mayor who is now on his way here at the expense of the citizens of Portage la Prairie has an opportunity of making his representations.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I knew the matter was discussed as to the mayor coming down. I did not know that it had been decided that he should come. I was anxious for the reaffirmation, for only one reason as I explained, because the letter of the minister was not strictly in accord with the undertaking as I understood it. He now says that the government has not changed its mind. That is satisfactory to me, and I am glad to have an intimation that the subject is to be taken care of in the Supplementary Estimates.

Mr. LEADER: If I am in order I should like to say another word.

The CHAIRMAN: The discussion has been all out of order for the last hour.

Mr. LEADER: I should like to ask the minister if he has anything more to offer the mayor and the solicitor who are coming down to Ottawa than he has already offered to the representative for Portage la Prairie?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): We will be very glad to hear the representations of the mayor and the solicitor of Portage la Prairie. The department are prepared to deal fairly in this matter. If the government of Canada or if the department have made a mistake, we realize that we should try to remedy it, and there should be no great worry if that is done. The disposition of the department was explained early in our dealings, and we are prepared to carry through on that basis.

Item agreed to.

Public Works—chargeable to collection of revenue—graving docks, locks and dams, etc., working expenses, etc.
Graving docks..	$145,800
Harbour and river works, etc..	61,000
Collection of public works revenues.. ..	5,000
	$211,800

Mr. MEIGHEN: Where are these works?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The first item deals with the Champlain graving dock and the Lorne graving dock in Quebec. The Esquimalt dock is the old dock at Esquimalt, Vancouver Island.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is, two docks at Quebec and one at Vancouver Island.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: In what way is the money being spent—for repairs, emergencies or extensions of the docks?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): This is for salaries, repairs, maintenance and operation.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why is there an increase this year?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There are three items in connection with the Champlain docks:

Scraping and painting of two casings of gate,..	$7,200
Fire hose and reels..	5,475
Incidentals and contingencies, repairs..	1,000

In connection with the Lorne graving dock this amount of $51,800 is required to provide for the staff, maintenance and repairs:

Requirement for 1923-24 compared with previous year

	1922-23	1923-24
Staff..	$13,975 25	$13,285 25
Materials, supplies, tools, sundries, etc., for operation and maintenance of dockyard, shops, buildings and dry-dock proper	4,892 94	4,500 00
Materials, supplies, tools sundries, etc., for the operation and maintenance of steam-hydraulic mechanical equipment	1,870 50	1,500 00
Purchase of electric energy.. ..	600 00	780 00
Water service..	600 00	600 00
Diver's service..	100 00	100 00
Coal..	6,158 00	6,255 00
Repair works..	4,897 00	9,959 33
Fire pump..	3,200 00
Fire hose..		1,500 00
Incidentals, unforeseen and contingencies..	900 00	1,000 00
Rebuilding coal shed..		4,168 00
Repairs to rolling caisson, entrance gates, etc..		8,200 00
Total..	$37,193 69	$51,847 58
Say..	37,200 00	51,800 00

The expenditure on the Esquimalt dock is the same.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not understand why these items should be separated from the votes for harbours and rivers of the different provinces. Doubtless they have been done before, but why is it done?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Many of these works are revenue producers and they are kept separate on that account. This has always been done.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would suggest that it would be much better for every purpose, while they may be kept separate by reason of their producing revenue, for them to be put under the votes for the different provinces so that we may see just how much is being devoted to these specific purposes in each part of the country.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): This is the usual practice, and I can see the wisdom of it. For instance, there is a vote of $7,500 for the Burlington channel bridge; that is an operating cost. In connection with French river dam the cost of operation is $3,500, but there is also a revenue account in this case. There is no revenue from the Kingston bridge which was built some years ago, but the cost of operation and maintenance is $12,000. The expenditure on St. Andrew's rapids, lock and dam, is $27,000; and there is a revenue from the Selkirk repair slip.

Mr. MANION: The costs are for caretakers, etc.?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes, and for the operating staff.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Has the minister had any communication from the Hydro Electric Commission of Ontario in regard to the question of damming some of the waters of the St. Lawrence with the idea of developing waterpower on the St. Lawrence and in that way affording the commission an opportunity of developing a large amount of power which could be used for industry in eastern Ontario and in a portion of Quebec? I believe the question has been under consideration, but I do not know whether the government has been in touch with the Hydro Electric Commission or not.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No proposals have been made to the Public Works department, but I understand that the matter has been before the Department of Railways.

Item agreed to.

Telegraph and telephone lines—Prince Edward Island and Mainland, $7,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Presuming that this vote is for the maintenance of the lines, can the minister give the committee information as to what revenue has been derived from them, say for last year? Evidently we spent $7,000 last year.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I am sorry I have not the revenue in my notes. These are operating costs. The cost of staff and maintenance will follow closely the figures of last year.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What was spent last year?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The total vote was expended.

Mr. MacLAREN: What is the difference between the government telegraph lines and the telegraph lines operated in connection with the railways?

Mr. KING (Kootnay): The telegraph and telephone service of the government has been largely a pioneer service. These lines have been built to remote places that have not been attractive enough for private capital. The lines have served a very useful purpose. There is a marked difference between our telegraph lines and those of the railways. As I have said, we reach remote places whereas the railway telegraph lines serve those territories tributary to the railways. We are now trying to unload certain of this work in territories served by the railways which have recently been acquired, and there has been co-operation between the railways and the Dominion telegraph service.

Mr. MANION: What department undertakes the collection of the revenue from these lines?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The work is done by our department.

Mr. MANION: I see that the expenditure on the whole of this item No. 360 is somewhat less than it was last year. Would he tell the committee how much revenue came from the whole of these different lines of telephone?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I am sorry I have not that information. In this detailed statement of expenditures the revenue collected apparently is not taken into account. I shall be pleased to give my hon. friend that information at an early date.

Mr. MANION: Could the minister give a rough estimate?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I would hesitate to do so, but I can inform my hon. friend that the service is being run at a loss.

Mr. MANION: I took it for granted. Of course, I know a great deal of this work is being done for the benefit of sections of the country which are non-revenue producing to a great extent, but it would be interesting to know in a general way if we are losing 50 per cent, 25 per cent, or what percentage on such an item.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): In the printed annual report of the Public Works department the required particulars will be found.

Mr. EVANS: Between what points are these lines run in Saskatchewan that entail this expenditure?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): In Saskatchewan, Qu'Appelle—Onion Lake section, 63 miles; Battleford—Isle La Grosse section, 298 miles; Moose Jaw—Willow Bunch section, 212 miles, making a total of 573 miles. The department is arranging to abandon certain lines in that area. There will be a considerable expenditure incurred in taking down the pole lines and salvaging the material, but eventually a saving of $10,000 or $12,000 a year will be effected.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Are these lines built entirely at the expense of the Dominion, or is there any contribution towards their cost by the provinces and the municipalities?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I do not think there are any contributions from the provinces or the municipalities. Occasionally an individual or groups of individuals will undertake to furnish the poles or do a certain amount of labour for the convenience given by these lines. The department takes advantage of such offers, but generally speaking the expenditure is made directly by the Dominion government.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Are any extensions proposed this year?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There will be some minor extensions. These will appear in the supplementary votes probably. They usually come up from year to year.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): This item is entirely for maintenance?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

Item agreed to.

Land and cable telegraph lines, lower St. Lawrence and Maritime provinces, including working expenses of vessels required for cable service	$233,500 00
Saskatchewan	61,900 00
Alberta	113,700 00
British Columbia—Mainland	111,200 00
British Columbia—Vancouver Island district.	136,900 00
Yukon System (Ashcroft-Dawson)	277,000 00
Telegraph and telephone service—generally.	10,000 00

Mr. MANION: Do these items embrace all the different telegraph and telephone lines of the government outside those used by the railways?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I think so.

Mr. MANION: Do any of the other departments—the Department of Marine and Fisheries, for instance—control lines of this kind, or are they all handled by the Public Works department?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The Interior department maintain certain telephone lines in connection with their Forestry branch.

Mr. MANION: Just short local lines?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes. The Marine department carry on radio-telegraphic work on the coast; that is distinct from the lines controlled by the Public Works department.

Mr. MANION: But there are no lines of any extent outside those handled by the Public Works department?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I think not. In regard to revenue, I find in the annual report of March 31st, 1922, the total revenue was $290,131.34.

Mr. MANION: Is that for these lines we are discussing?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes, but for the year 1922.

Item agreed to.

Civil Government—Public Works—salaries, $639,300; contingencies, $75,000.

Mr. MANION: What is the increase in this item?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The increase is caused by the making permanent of 38 employees, the consequent transfer from other appropriations to civil government, and the re-establishment of a vacancy in the Telegraph branch, less 8 positions dropped, due to retirement or resignation. The statutory increases account for $13,100. There are 38 transfers from other appropriations, seven from Works salaries, sixteen from Engineering salaries, fourteen contingencies and one Ottawa building repair appropriation, making a total of $63,300. There has been a decrease due to six resignations, eight retirements, two deaths, and four transfers, three from civil government and one to civil government. The total decrease amounts to $20,115. There is a net increase of $61,265. As a matter of fact the pay-roll of the department is less this year than last.

Mr. MANION: That is including temporary and permanent employees?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

Mr. MANION: I do not know what the policy in the past was, but I notice this session the same reply has been given in regard to various other departments—that the increase in salaries is because a number of temporary employees have been made permanent. Is that a new policy, or has the government decided upon this procedure for all the departments?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It had been the practice in the government service for a man who got a position to be appointed temporarily, on probation, and as time passed he either got a position in the permanent service or did not. In the blanketing-in lists recently adopted in my department there were men who had held important positions in the service for quite long periods of time. One was an engineer who had been in the service some twenty years. In the case of persons holding positions of a permanent character, doing work which is of value in the service, there has been a disposition to make them permanent. This is carrying out a policy adopted by the late government following the reclassification and rearrangement of the service It makes the estimate before us look larger, but where this item has been increased others have been reduced. The employees concerned are merely transferred from one pay roll to another.

Mr. MANION: I entirely agree that when a man has been for some years in a temporary position he might well be put on the permanent list. But has there been any systematic policy under which a man is transferred to the permanent staff after having been on the temporary list a certain length of time?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No definite policy.

Mr. MANION: Was there no method by which a man would be automatically transferred to the permanent staff after having been on the temporary list, say, two or three or four years?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I understand that those who were brought in by order in council were considered permanent employees; others remained on the temporary list. But since 1919, after the reclassification, there has been a disposition to place on a permanent basis persons who have been in the service many years and are performing important duties.

Mr. MANION: I think that is a proper policy. The minister mentions the case of an engineer who had been twenty years on the temporary staff. It seems a ridiculous thing that a man like that, apparently a capable employee, should work so long and only at the end of the twentieth year be placed on the permanent list. I suggest that it would be worth the minister's consideration and the time of some of his colleagues to endeavour to work out some scheme whereby a person listed as temporary who had given efficient service and performed necessary duties for a given length of time should be transferred to the permanent staff.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): As appointments are made now, they are given by the Commission either permanent or temporary standing; they enter the service on that definite basis. At present, therefore, there is not so much difficulty on that score.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Can the minister say how many temporary employees there still are—in other words, how many have not been transferred to the permanent staff?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I have not that list here, but it has been worked out in the department. There is a very large number of employees who are not on the permanent list—caretakers, elevator attendants, firemen, engineers, and so on. Many of them work at prevailing rates. Under this vote we show thirty-eight employees as having been brought in and classed as permanent.

Mr. CARROLL: Thirty-eight temporary employees?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Clerical and technical temporary employees who 10 p.m. have been in the department for some years and whose services are necessary.

Mr. CARROLL: What are the occasions which necessitate appointments to temporary positions in the department?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Pressure of work. Years ago appointments were made to important positions and permanent standing might not be given for a considerable length of time. When extra work makes temporary appointments necessary, the commission now issues a certificate designating the appointment as temporary.

Mr. CARROLL: These employees, I assume, would know that their appointment was temporary and that their services might be dispensed with at any time?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

Mr. MACLAREN: How does the personnel compare in number with that of the previous year?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There is a decrease of twenty from last year.

Item agreed to.

National Monument on Connaught place, $10,000.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): When we were in committee before, this item was held up at the request of one or two members, who had some hesitancy about voting an expenditure of $10,000 in connection with the building of a national monument on Connaught place. I am rather sorry the Prime Minister is not in his seat because he would express more felicitously the desire of the government in this matter than I can. It has been felt by the government that we should erect something in the nature of a national monument in the capital city of Canada to commemorate the deeds of our men overseas, a monument of a national character such as would express the sentiment of the nation in that regard. As I say some objection was taken when the vote was brought forward but I do not think it is at all unreasonable—in view of the fact that we have undertaken the expenditure of a very large sum of money in France to erect fitting memorials to the heroism and endurance of our soldiers in the Great War—that we should ask for a small expenditure at this time in order that plans and designs might be prepared for the erection of a permanent memorial in Ottawa to indicate to the world Canada's opinion of the gallant part Canadians played in that struggle. The opinion of competent authorities will be sought in choosing a suitable design, and we are asking for the present amount in order that the work may be started and carried to a successful completion.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Does the present amount cover the cost of preparing plans?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It is just a preliminary amount.

Mr. MacLAREN: I notice on the central pillar at the entrance to these buildings an inscription denoting that it has been erected in recognition, among other things, of the valour of our men who went overseas?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

Mr. MacLAREN: It is now proposed to have a second memorial? In what respect does the present memorial fall short of its purpose?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Perhaps I might say a word as to what the government had in mind in making this proposal. In every country in the world the spirit of the nation has found some expression in regard to great events in the form of permanent monuments if the occasions have been sufficiently worthy of such recognition from the national point of view. The government felt that a monument should be erected in the capital of Canada expressive of the feelings of the Canadian people as a whole to the memory of those who had participated in the Great War and had lost their lives in the service of humanity. The thought was that the most appropriate centre in the capital should be chosen for such a monument. I may say, without suggesting any finality in the matter, the idea was that something in the nature of a great column erected in the triangle just opposite the post office, which is the very centre of the city of Ottawa, would be the most suitable form of monument and locality. My hon. friend (Mr. MacLaren) has referred to the column in the parliament buildings; I think he has reference to the central pillar in the main entrance. That column has an inscription on it commemorative of the services of our men in the Great War. I do not think it is intended as a national monument in any sense of the word. The same column contains a commemorative reference to confederation. Indeed, I think the pillar is more or less symbolical of our relations with the British Empire as a whole; the column arising out of a symbolical sea being representative of the British Isles and the dominions whereas the columns on each side are symbolical of the various provinces of the Dominion. I believe the architect's whole plan is more or less symbolical of these ideas. But the monument to be erected to commemorate the deeds and services of those who participated in the Great War is intended to be a national monument in the national capital. There are in many Canadian cities monuments which those cities themselves have erected; but there is, as yet, no monument of a national character in the capital of the Dominion. The government has received representations from different quarters that such a monument was rather expected on the part of the Canadian people. Even if such representations had not been received the government would have felt that having regard to the events of the past, the part which Canada took in the war, and the valour of her sons, something of the kind commemorative of their heroism, sacrifice and service, should be erected in the capital of our country.

Mr. KNOX: What is the estimate of the total cost?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): That will largely depend on the design that is accepted.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think the custom, in most cases of this kind, is to advertise the purposes in view and call for designs from architects and sculptors, leaving to a committee the choice of a suitable design and to fix the maximum of expenditure.

Mr. KNOX: I should think the government would have in mind some maximum of expenditure for a monument of this kind.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I would say offhand $50,000 or $75,000 but I am speaking without any knowledge of the nature of the design and what may be recommended. We must, if we decide to erect a monument, make a start. Designs having been received, it will be the duty of those who have to make the choice to make a suitable selection. Then we can come to parliament and ask for a sufficient vote to carry the proposition out.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It seems to me that at this time a protest ought to be made against the government going on with a work of this character and that on several grounds. First of all we should not be asked to make a preliminary grant without having some very definite idea as to the actual expenditure involved. If this $10,000 is spent on plans we shall probably have the government coming next year with a very elaborate scheme and one of the pleas for a larger expenditure will be that this vote has been spent and it ought not to be spent in vain. At this time when we are trying to save money, and restricting departmental expenditures which could render necessary services and desirable to the people, I think we might very well economize on such a project as this. There are people all over this country who are struggling to meet the enormous burdens of debt that we are now carrying. We are adding, this year, we were told only this afternoon, $50,000,000 more of debt. I speak for at least one section of the people when I say that, however desirable it may be to add works of art to the capital, we ought not at this particular time, with the people burdened with debt as they are, to incur any more expense than is absolutely essential. Further than that, there are a great many of those who went overseas who are not fully provided for at the present time. This government cannot see its way to provide anything for the unemployed, and there are thousands of men who spent several years overseas who are to-day suffering and whose families are suffering. In connection with the proposed monument, I had a rather bitter letter sent me from a woman in the West, whom I know very well. I think I shall read it, because it reveals the feeling, not of the few, but of hundreds of returned men and of their wives. I have hundreds of them in my own constituency, and in this regard I speak for the returned men themselves This woman, whose husband was out of work, had to put her children away for a time in order that she might work and try to keep things going. The letter reads:

> May I suggest that instead of spending money on the fallen, they spend the money for the clothing, feeding and sheltering of the men who had the great misfortune to return to Canada with their lives. It is no fault of theirs if they are not among the so-called "glorious dead". Had these men returned they would be in the same category as their living comrades—in the bread line and the recipients of old clothes (by appeals in the press), doles, poverty, Hastings Park, etc. Canada has already forgotten those men who served Canada for the profiteer, and saved poverty and misery for themselves. Yes, our children will remember when they see their fathers and brothers who did come back, sick, miserable and in want. We are told there is no money to provide decent constructive work. No, but they could find money for war and for the destruction of life, but nothing to conserve life.
> Thinking people are tired of this hypocritical cant about the dead, let us attend to the living. We dress up the dead with cenotaphs, etc., and we refuse the living bread.

I am not accusing the government, in attempting to erect a monument, of forgetting the living, but I do say that until there can be fuller provision made for the living, we ought to hesitate about erecting a monument in marble. One other thing which I think ought to be said is this: that in commemorating the war there ought to be the utmost care exercised as to the character of that commemoration. No man of this generation is likely to forget the Great War. It has touched too many of our homes. We are struggling beneath an enormous national debt because of this great war. The whole world to-day is upside down to a large extent because of the war, and I for one want to protest once more that, however we may accord the utmost sympathy to the men who risked their lives and the many who gave their lives at the front, we must be very careful lest in any sense whatever we glorify war or militarism. If there is any monument erected at all, whilst it might contain some tribute to the men who gave their lives, it also ought to point out that, after all, war is, from the beginning to the end, a miserable failure. The monument ought to commemorate the failure of the war to obtain one of the slightest things for which we went to war. In saying this I speak not merely from the standpoint of a few individuals, but for a very large section of the working class, and, in addition to that, for a large section of the people of Canada, who as a rule do not get their opinions before the public. I feel that I could not let this opportunity pass without protesting against the erection of a monument of this kind.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am surprised at the remarks of my hon. friend from Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth). If he assumes the government has any desire to glorify war he is entirely mistaken. There is a great difference between glorifying war and glorifying patriotism or glorifying sacrifice, the greatest patriotism and the greatest sacrifice which the country has ever known. That is what the government seeks to glorify in the monument, and what I believe the nation hopes to see glorified. When my hon. friend speaks about caring for the poor and the hungry, I think it is not unfair to remind him of a reference or two that might appropriately be made at this time. There is a saying which my hon. friend will recall, to the effect that man does not live by bread alone.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Man cannot live very well without bread.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, and he cannot live without the other. If it is a choice between living without bread and living without a spirit that is ready for sacrifice, I think the majority of men would prefer the spirit of sacrifice to bread. It is the spirit of heroism, the spirit of self-sacrifice, the spirit of all that is noble and great, that was exemplified in the lives of those sacrificed in the Great War, and the services rendered by the men and women who went overseas; and the nation will be dead the minute it loses that vision. It is that vision which the government wishes to keep alive in erecting a monument of this kind. Every point my hon. friend has urged might have been put forward by the Pharisee and his associates who rebuked the woman who broke the alabaster box of ointment over her Saviour. Why, they said, it was a waste. It was all thrown away. Its contents might have been sold and given to the poor. They were unable to appreciate the spirit of sacrifice and understanding that really accounts for all that is noblest and best by way of inspiration in the world. Everything in life is not to be measured by its mere utility value. There is a side of life loftier than that of the mere material satisfaction of daily physical needs. I do not think I need emphasize that point with my hon. friend. I think he appreciates it as well as any one, but what I am protesting against is his venturing to assert, in the name of labour or any group in the community, that the government should not seek to perpetuate in the minds of our own and future generations in this country the greatest service, the greatest sacrifice ever rendered by the nation in a cause which was the greatest the world has known in the history of human freedom.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I wish to dissociate myself, in any apparent criticism of this item, from the remarks of my hon. friend from Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth). He has spoken of the debt which we in Canada owe. It is a large sum we all know, but we are able to pay it. We owe a debt to the soldiers who have gone overseas and made the supreme sacrifice, and this is one way in which we are able to pay part of it, and one way which I hope, we will not overlook or neglect. My only object in asking the minister for information—and I sincerely hope the item will be carried—is to ensure that the most careful and thorough investigation will be made by the government, that suitable plans will be prepared and procured that this item will not be lost sight of in the pressure of the many other items and important business of this country. I quite agree with the remarks of the Prime Minister, and I sincerely hope that we will soon have erected a monument somewhat in keeping with the sacifice and the service which our soldiers have given overseas.

Mr. MILLAR: I am very anxious to see economy practised, but I could not oppose this motion. I believe, with the member for Centre Winnipeg, that it is wise that we should educate our people against war. Nevertheless, after they have made the sacrifices that were absolutely necessary during the recent Great War, I think it is well we should commemorate those sacrifices. With the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Knox), I too would like very much if we could know at the present time more nearly what this monument is going to cost, and if it would be possible to get plans without the expenditure of even the sum of $10,000. I do not know whether that is possible or not; but as has been said after $10,000 has been expended one feels, well, that we do not like to waste the $10,000, and even though the monument may cost a sum that we do not feel like expending just yet, that expenditure may be used as a leverage to go on. The necessity for money and for relief from the burden of taxation at the present time is at present very great, but I hope that, at least in a few years a monument will be erected to commemorate the great sacrifices of our soldiers at the front. As I said before, I am anxious for economy. In fact, while I have not criticized the expenditures that we have just passed at the instance of the Minister of Public Works, if I had the opportunity of using the knife on them, I would cut out quite a goodly number where expenditures are made on harbours for merely local traffic. When the case is one of through traffic, I can see the reasonableness of spending money from the Dominion treasury; but where it is only for local traffic, merely a local affiair, I cannot see any reason why it should not be left to the provinces or even to the towns and cities to construct their own harbours. As regards this appropriation if the plans cannot be secured for a less amount than that, I am willing to support it.

Mr. MANION: As regards another section of this item, the National Gallery of Canada, I notice that the expenditure has increased by 100 per cent, from $50,000 to $100,000. Can the minister explain what that increase means?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): That appropriation was discussed and passed some time ago.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Marcil): These items under "Miscellaneous" are all carried except the last one.

Mr. MANION: I thought the whole item No. 168 went together.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): They are all passed except the last, the National monument.

Mr. MANION: I understand, however, that even when one item is left, we can discuss the others.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): This matter was discussed at the time, and my hon. friend will find in Hansard of that date a full explanation why the additional amount was granted.

Mr. MacLAREN: I quite undertsand, regarding the estimate for the National monument, that the amount should be indefinite: but I think any such sum as is mentioned, $50,000 or $75,000, will not in any way provide the memorial that the Canadian people would wish to have. I would suggest to the government that if delay is not material, when a monument is erected, it should be put up in accord with the ideals of our people, and that would involve a much larger sum than the one suggested. If a monument is to be erected, as I think one should be, it should be done on somewhat of a grand style.

Mr. IRVINE: I was very much interested in the remarks of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) as regards this question. I was also interested in what was said by the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth). Perhaps there is a little confusion of mind between the Prime Minister and the hon. member for Winnipeg. I do not suppose that the latter meant to convey any idea that he was opposed to memorializing the heroism of our Canadian soldiers. I do not think anybody is opposed to that. But this is a matter worthy of much more thought than this House is giving to it, and, perhaps, worthy of more thought than the government has given to it so far. I am just wondering if to build a heap of stone is, after all, the best way of memorializing greatness. I think we shall all be willing to concede the great courage which the Canadian soldiers manifested, and we shall be willing to erect a monument, whether in stone or in some other form, that will express in the best possible way our appreciation of that courage. But if we are seeking to express our appreciation of heroism, would it not be well if it took a little heroism to do that? Can we not find a way of expressing our appreciation of the greatness and heroism of our soldiers that will take a little heroism on the part of legislatures and of Canada? For instance, could we not memorialize them with a statute or, if necessary, more than one statute that would give a shred of reflection of the liberty for which they died, that would be an embodiment of a shadow of the ideal for which they poured out their blood? I do not object to your building a monument that will reach to the stars, if you will, and then it would not express their greatness. But surely there is something deeper, more beautiful, of greater utility than that, and that could be found, perhaps, in legislation, in such an alteration of the economic system under which their brothers are spared to live, under which their children will grow up, that will be a nobler monument than a heap of marble or of rock. So I would suggest that before we hastily decide to follow precedent, to follow the ancient countries that have built their memorials to war, we would seek if haply, we might not find a better way of expressing our appreciation of the greatness of the Canadian soldiers who died in a way that was supposed to end all wars, and who died thinking to bring liberty and peace—and all such words that we have been so fond of mouthing.

One more thought. It looks a little incongruous that we should convert into marble or rock, actual material that seems to be needed by those who happen to have been spared from the great conflict. If we are going to beautify Canada, or Ottawa, or any other city, or any part of the world for that matter, as a means of expressing our respect for our dead, it might be well to wait until we can do that without suffering, if indeed we are so pinched as a nation. That, of course, I do not believe; I do not believe in this miserable prating about economy, and I am prepared to vote against economy of the kind that we have been talking about. But seeing that the government and the people and the House think so, then let us wait until we can do this without a man standing aside and wondering at a dead soldier getting more than a living one. I should like to see a memorial built when the living soldiers can say: "We are not suffering because of that." That is all I think my hon. friend from Centre Winnipeg meant to convey, and I would submit that as a thought to the government. There is no hurry. Perhaps this is not the best way of commemorating the dead; but when we do this, let us do it in the best possible way, and I do not know that this would be best expressed in a monument of rock.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend that I doubt very much whether he or the hon. member to whom he has alluded would have the privilege of speaking in this House to-night the words of liberty which they are professing to utter, but for the sacrifices of the men whose heroism the government is seeking to commemorate in this simple way? The least the nation can do is to erect in its capital some memorial that will be worthy, in its appearance, in its symbolism, in the greatness of its noble position, structure, proportion and beauty, of the spirit that was exemplified in that great sacrifice. My hon. friend has referred to labour. Where do all the great works of art come from? They have been for the most part contributed by those who, born amid humble surroundings through years of struggle and toil, assisted here and there by such bits of inspiration and aid as the nation could give them, have come through their art to be numbered among the country's greatest. When a nation loses what is signified by its art it loses its own spirit, and when it loses the remembrance of the sacrifices and heroism by which it has gained the liberty it enjoys, it loses all the vision that makes a people great.

Mr. IRVINE: I do not want to take up too much of the time of the committee, but I do not wish the implication of the Prime Minister to go unchallenged. There was nothing in what I said that would not express just as much gratitude to the soldiers of Canada as the Prime Minister has expressed; neither have I suggested that we should not build a monument. That is not the point.

The question I raised was whether the proposed monument was the best form in which we could express our gratitude to the soldiers; and in the second place I wondered whether we could not undertake this work at a time when we were economically in a better position to do so. I still think that this perhaps is not the best way, and also that there are other things more necessary to be done at this time. So that in my view it would be well for us to wait a little longer in order that we might carry out in a much better way what is now intended. That is all I said and it is not necessary to throw out the suggestion that anyone is failing to appreciate the sacrifices of the Canadian soldiers.

Item agreed to.

Public buildings—Quebec—Terrebonne—New public building (Governor General's warrant, December 19, 1922), $26,000.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): During the recent unfortunate fire in this community the Dominion public building was destroyed. A desire was expressed by the citizens that the building should be immediately restored, and owing to the fact that a great many of the people in the community belong to the labouring class it was suggested that it would be of greater advantage to them if the restoration could be undertaken almost at once in order to provide labour for those who had suffered so severely from the fire. The government asked for the Governor General's warrant to undertake the work, and this vote is to confirm the warrant.

Mr. JELLIFF: What is the character of the building?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It is a post office and customs building.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): What is the total cost of the building?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): About $35,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I understood the minister's reason for the warrant to be that there were certain persons out of work because of the fire. I do not object to the building being restored, but what was the reason for the warrant?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): A public building was suddenly destroyed by fire and there was no way of providing money for its restoration except either to wait until parliament met or to ask for the Governor General's warrant The latter course was followed. My explanation I think is a fair one. The town of Terrebonne is composed largely of labouring people and after the fire many of them who had lost their properties were in distress.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The fire, then, extended beyond the public building?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes, practically the whole town was burnt.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, that is different.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It was felt that some measure of relief could be given by undertaking the immediate restoration of the public building.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That explains the matter, and it seems to be the proper thing to do.

Item agreed to.

Harbours and rivers, Ontario—Owen Sound, wharf construction—further amount required, $1,320.05.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is the five cents for?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): This item is to complete the payment on the final estimate of a contract amounting to $97,470. There has been paid $96,150, and the vote is to meet the balance.

Item agreed to.

Port Elgin—alterations to breakwater—further amount required, $960.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does this complete the work?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is meant by "alterations to breakwater?"

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It was necessary to open up a portion of the breakwater to make a vent.

Mr. MEIGHEN: For vessels?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

Item agreed to.

Sheguiandah—wharf reconstruction—further amount required, $1,300.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How much has been spent on this reconstruction so far, and does this complete the work?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): This amount of $1,300 is required to complete payments on a contract for the reconstruction in cribwork of the superstructure of the wharf of Sheguiandah, which is 225 feet long, 125 feet being 20 feet wide and 100 feet being 40 feet wide, and to repaint the warehouse. The amount of the contract was $5,496.44. I find that the appropriation is so far reduced that it will only be possible to pay at present to the extent of $4,240, leaving still to pay a balance of $1,256.44.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does this finish the work?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

LEGISLATION—HOUSE OF COMMONS

Legislation—House of Commons—salaries (including H. P. Arsenault as Chief Translator—Bluebooks—at an initial salary of $3,480, from 1 April, 1923, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Civil Service Act or amendments thereto), $236,545.

Mr. SPEAKER: In explanation of this item, Mr. Chairman, I may say that the staff of translators was short of two or three men last year, and as Mr. Desaulniers, was chief of the Blue Books branch, was superannuated, the question came up of replacing him. There were several men competent for the position, but I had to make a choice which would justify itself not only on the point of professional ability, but also on the point of discipline and administration, and out of the several candidates who were mentioned the name of Mr. Arsenault seemed to me to be the one which would be best favoured by the staff because of his administrative ability and official authority. He is not a newcomer, he has been ten years on the staff. I may say that those who were competitors for the position were agreeable to his election.

Mr. MANION: Have we not divided the staff into two parts really, and put Mr. Arsenault in charge of one part and someone else in charge of the other?

Mr. SPEAKER: We have abolished the position of assistant chief. We have appointed Mr. Arsenault as chief of the Blue Books and Mr. Paradis as chief of the Law Branch translation. They are two very important positions because the reports are read in Europe not only in France but in other countries where the French language is most familiar, and consequently we must have excellent translations.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why is it necessary to name the official? Does it not come under the Civil Service Act ordinarily, and is not this an appointment outside of the provisions of the act?

Mr. SPEAKER: Yes, and no. The Civil Service Commission have an examination, of course, but all these appointments would have to come before the committee anyway, because the organization of its staff is under the purview of the House of Commons. But when the competition took place before the Civil Service Commission there were, I think, three or four candidates, of whom two were most prominent, Mr. Arsenault and Mr. Keliher? Mr. Keliher himelf came to see me at the time and said he preferred to be in the Hansard branch where we had a vacancy. So we appointed Mr. Arsenault. But as the commission declared that Mr. Keliher should be in Mr. Arsenault's place, we had to come before the committee and word the item as it appears in the estimates.

Mr. MEIGHEN: In view of Mr. Keliher's attitude towards the question, could not the commission have changed their nomination?

Mr. SPEAKER: That is what I intended, but it was done during my absence in Europe, and I found the estimates as they are. At all events, I would have to come before the committee with the name of Mr. Arsenault in the estimates.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I understand Mr. Keliher is quite agreeable?

Mr. SPEAKER: Yes, he came to see me and said he was quite willing to go to the Hansard branch.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does anyone feel that he has been passed over?

Mr. SPEAKER: No.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The reason I ask is that I heard from some source, I cannot remember which at the moment, that there was some disappointment in relation to the appointment.

Mr. SPEAKER: Oh, no.

Mr. SPEAKER: The committee will notice quite a substantial decrease. We intend to make a further decrease this year.

Item agreed to.

Library of parliament—salaries, $43,660.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: We have no details whatever given us with regard to the Department of the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr. SPEAKER: I may say to the hon. gentleman that this year there is a total decrease in the expenditure of this branch of nearly $2,000, although we had to increase the number of cleaners because of the much larger area to be looked after. The committee will realize that it is quite a job to superintend this immense building, but notwithstanding the amount of work involved I am sure the committee will notice with pleasure that there has been the decrease in expenditure that I mentioned and a decrease in the staff of five.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I notice in connection with this vote one or two items that should hardly go unchallenged, especially as under them members would seem to be more or less the beneficiaries. I notice the salary of the manager of the joint restaurant is $2,520, and the maintenance of the restaurant $20,000. I cannot understand why such a large sum should be set apart for this purpose.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Marcil): The details will be found on page 20.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: As the restaurant is supplied with space, light, heat, furnishing and equipment of all kinds free, it should not cost the country such a large sum as this. I believe that someone has figured it out at about $100 for each person who is entitled to use the restaurant. If the charge for meals is too low, it should be increased. I cannot think we are justified before the country in putting on it a heavy account like this for what is after all simply a convenience for members.

Mr. SPEAKER: The restaurant is under the direction of a joint committee of the House of Commons and Senate. It so happens that we had a meeting at the beginning of the week. This salary of the manager of the restaurant was fixed at the meeting which was held during last session. It is a committee which has been in existence since confederation, and I may say as an old member—in fact, looking around me, as the oldest member of the House—that in all my parliamentary life we have never had a restaurant which gave more satisfaction than the present one. It must be borne in mind that not only the members but their wives share in the benefits afforded by the restaurant, and that we must have a man there who is familiar with restaurant management. We are very fortunate in having Mr. George. I am sure if he were manager of the Chateau Laurier, here, or the Ritz Carlton in Montreal, or any other large hotel, he would receive a much larger salary than that which is paid to him as manager of our restaurant. I have this to say for Mr. George: he came here, I think, as a page; he has been here thirty-five or forty years, and as we say in common parlance, he "knows the ropes." He is diligent; he is sober—naturally; he is very intelligent, and gives excellent service. As I have said, this increased salary has been fixed by the joint committee on the restaurant, comprising members of both Houses. If my hon. friend will think of what is paid to managers of large hotels and even to restaurants in cities and towns, he will realize that this amount is not excessive.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am not objecting to the manager's salary in any sense whatever; I have been quite misunderstood. I see in the estimate one item for the manager's salary, $2,520; maintenance, $20,000; and, in the supplementary estimates, a further sum of $7,500. That is a total of $30,000 for the maintenance of this institution. I do not criticize the salary of the manager; I presume it is none too high. I am not criticising in any sense the service rendered by the restaurant. But it does seem to me that from the standpoint of the public at large, $30,000 is a very large sum to pay over and above the granting of a room with free light, heat and equipment. I doubt whether we are justified in asking the public to put up that $30,000, which after all, we know must be paid from the taxes of the people.

Mr. SPEAKER: It must be remembered that in the carrying on of the restaurant we must have a personnel which is not employed the whole year round, and my hon. friend knows that you cannot get servants, domestics, as cheaply to-day as you could some years ago. The food is excellent; there has been no complaint in that respect. Of course it costs a little money, but it is a matter that is in the hands of the legislators. If it is the desire to abolish the restaurant, hon. members have only to say so, but as long as we maintain it for the members, the senators and the principal employees, we must expect to have to pay something. But I made an examination of the accounts the other day, and I am pleased to be able to say that for the first time we shall be able out of the profits—because the restaurant is now a profit-making institution—to apply something in abatement of the expenditure involved in maintenance. So that if under Mr. George the restaurant continues to be well managed, I am sure my hon. friend will next year find that figure for maintenance much decreased.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have no objection to the resolution carrying, but I have been impressed, as one who has now got to be a pretty old member of the House, by the fact that there is a great deal of money wasted in the library. Although I use it about as much as the average member, if not more—I am sorry to say, not as much in recent years as formerly—I am sure there is a great deal of stuff bought for the library that I do not think anyone sees from one year's end to the other. I think it would be well to bring home to the librarians the wisdom of revising the whole purchase programme to see if economies could not be effected by curtailing some of the things for which we now vote very considerable sums. The library also is getting cluttered up, and there is scarcely room to get around. I know it has been rearranged lately and very much improved in that respect, but I would think that something should be done to bring the reading matter that is in the library more in conformity with the actual needs of members of parliament. It seems to me it now spreads into too large a field and that much that is there is not worth the room it occupies.

Mr. SPEAKER: The right hon. gentleman is quite right. Last year there was a meeting of the joint committee on the Library of Parliament, which is composed, as in the case of the restaurant committee, of members of both houses, and on that occasion we decided to remove to the Archives building many of the files of old papers that were accumulating in the library. I agree that a better choice of books might be made. The trouble with the library is that it is at present in a transient stage. As the right hon. gentleman knows, when the construction of this building was decided upon, plans were made to extend the library, but in view of the extra cost involved it was decided to postpone these suggested changes. The result is that many valuable books were never seen on the shelves but are stored away below the Senate lobby and in an area extending nearly up to our portion of the building. The purchase of books, reviews, encyclopædias, etc., might be a little more judicious than it has been. The librarian of to-day, or to express myself more correctly the up-to-date librarian, differs totally from the librarian of yesterday. To-day the conduct of the library amounts to a science. The library of congress at Washington is a magnificient library. They have there probably the most elaborate organization I have seen in that regard. Over there the management of libraries has developed into a science and in the universities lectures have been given on the art of becoming an efficient librarian. So far we have not enjoyed that advantage in Canada but our institutions of this character are developing. We now possess libraries, thanks to the munificence of Carnegie and other benefactors of humanity. For the future I believe we certainly ought to adopt the views of the right hon. gentleman and see to it that our parliamentary library is especially adapted to the needs of parliament.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am glad that the Speaker has called attention to the modern scientific libraries. It would appear that with the immense amount that is being spent on our library, and with the large number of books we already possess, there ought to be some better arrangement for caring for them than exists at present. I think anyone who knows anything about libraries will recognize there is a handicap our librarians suffer from that cannot very well be overcome. I refer to the lack of stock room. Undoubtedly that is a very great inconvenience. The books are packed into a space that is really not sufficient for more than a quarter of their number. Not only is the arrangement bad, but the structure is far from being modern. I wonder sometimes whether, until such times as we have a suitable library building, the library could not be departmentalized and certain sections of it placed in other parts of the building, making it more available than it is to-day. Further, I should like to suggest that although the librarians are kindness itself we ought to have some more modern system of indexing and cataloguing than prevails at the present time.

The hon. the Speaker has referred to the congressional library. At Washington, they have worked out a system of cataloguing and indexing that might be very well applied to our library here. The system is being adopted in many small libraries throughout the country and is proving a very great convenience to anyone wanting to consult the institution. Further than that, it would be a very great advantage to all the members if some system were adopted for filing clippings, magazine articles and legislative material dealing particularly with topics that concern us in parliament. I remember a few years ago visiting the state library in Wisconsin where Mr. Charles McCarthy, who was rather a genius and tremendously interested in this work, had evolved a very valuable scheme for making available to all the members of the state legislature the information that existed with regard to any subject that was likely to come before the members of the House. Although I happen to be a comparatively new member, I would respectfully suggest that the system that was worked out with regard to the legislative department of the Wisconsin state library might very well be investigated by some of our departmental heads with a view to adopting it or adapting it, with possibly some modifications, for our use in Canada.

Item agreed to.

Senate—salaries and contingent expenses, $162,040.

Mr. MANION: I was going to suggest that as we have passed a great many items and it is now after eleven o'clock it would be a good idea to call it a day.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If there is any objection to this item I will agree to its consideration being delayed. However, I have looked over the items pretty carefully and I think that on the whole there is a considerable reduction in the amount. What there is in the way of increases appears to be simply increases that would be permitted by statute. I doubt whether there is any particular point in regard to the estimates that hon. members would wish to discuss before they are passed. They are adopted, I believe, pretty much as a matter of form in this House.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then they would not take much time to pass when they are next considered. I do not know whether any particular objection is entertained in regard to them or not, but if we get as much done every day as we have done to-day, we will not be here long.

Item stands.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the House adjourned at 11.08 p.m.

Monday, May 14, 1923

The House met at three o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEDNESDAY EVENING SITTINGS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): With the consent of the House, I move, seconded by Mr. Fielding, that on Wednesday, the 16th instant, and on subsequent Wednesdays to the end of the session, the sittings of the House shall in every respect be under the same rules as provided for other days.

Motion agreed to.

]Mr. Woodsworth.]

THE BUDGET DEBATE

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance): With the consent of the House, I beg to move that the order for consideration of the motion for Mr. Speaker to leave the Chair for the House to go again into Committee of Ways and Means have precedence over all other business, except the introduction of bills, until disposed of.

Motion agreed to.

SATURDAY SITTINGS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. L. H. MARTELL (Hants): Will the Prime Minister tell us when the government proposes to commence Saturday sittings? It is very hard for the ordinary country legal practitioner to remain in attendance in Ottawa while the courts are being held throughout the country. I know that other members of parliament will find it difficult to remain here, and if the session is going to be stretched out to a very great length it will cause great inconvenience to many members. Therefore, I should like the Prime Minister to let us know when Saturday sittings will be commenced, and when we may hope for a termination of the session.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I am not in a position to give my hon. friend a definite reply. He is, perhaps, as capable of judging of the length of the session as I am. I should certainly say that during the present month the government would not consider the holding of Saturday sittings. Whether such sittings may be advisable or not a little later on will depend on the work which comes to the House from the committees. My hon. friend may be assured the government will keep in mind the point he has mentioned.

DELAY IN BRITISH MAILS

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. G. P. GRAHAM (Acting Postmaster General): On Friday last the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Hocken) asked a question concerning delay in the transmission of newspapers from the Old Land to Canada and gave an example of one paper that was in transit from 6th April till 7th May. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in replying pointed out the extraordinary conditions that had prevailed during the past season—great storms in the ocean and almost calamities for the railways. Besides, sometimes there are delays at the beginning. A weekly paper is published, say, on the 6th, but the first sailing to carry the mail may not take place until a week from that date—a week lost to start with. Take the case the hon. member has referred to. He referred to the date, April 6th. The paper was probably despatched by the British post office by the Marloch, sailing from Glasgow on 13th April and due to arrive at St. John on the 21st. This is one of the slower Canadian Pacific Railway steamers, and on this particular trip she had one of the worst passages she ever experienced, and did not arrive at St. John until the 29th of April—eight days over-due. The mails were forwarded from St. John on the same day, but owing to a washout on the line the train did not get farther than McAdam junction, and had to return to St. John. Permission then had to be obtained to run the train east of Moncton and via the Canadian National Lines to Montreal. This was done, but the train did not reach Montreal until the 3rd of May. As a result, the mails reached Toronto Friday evening the 4th. Owing to these delays, these mails reached Toronto at the same time as British mails from the Montcalm and the Canada, thus throwing an immense volume of mail at one time upon the Toronto post office and causing more or less congestion. In this way the particular paper in question was not delivered until Monday morning the 7th of May. The delay in its transmission as set forth above will be seen however, to be wholly exceptional. I might add that on 11th May, the day the hon. member asked the question, the London Times of 1st May was in the reading room —just ten days.

Mr. HOCKEN: Was the Marloch the first ship that sailed after the date of publication?

Mr. GRAHAM: I would not be sure, but it was the first ship which the British government used for the transmission of mails.

Mr. HOCKEN: Does the British government not use the Canadian Pacific railway steamships, and did not the Empress of Britain sail before the Marloch?

Mr. GRAHAM: I think not.

Mr. HOCKEN: That is my information.

Dr. A. M. LOWE

CANADIAN CITIZEN IN NORTHERN CHINA CAPTURED AND MALTREATED

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): I should like to bring to the attention of the Prime Minister a matter which has been referred to me, and with your permission, Mr. Speaker, I will read this telegram which is from the firm of Lowe, Buswell Company, Limited, of Vancouver, and addressed to Brigadier General Clark and myself:

> You will have read in newspapers that Canadian citizen A. M. Lowe was beaten bound and made captive in northern China afterwards released on representations British consul. Urge you take up matter in session demanding explanation from Chinese government and substantial damages for outrage. Doctor Lowe member this firm and born in Victoria, B.C., resident in China two years. Your attention this matter will be very much appreciated.

Has the government taken cognizance of this incident and made any representations in protection and in behalf of Canadian citizens to the government of China, asking for the usual explanations and damages, if such, according to custom, are deemed warranted.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): A communication very similar to the one which my hon. friend has just read was received from the same firm by the Secretary of State (Mr. Copp) towards the latter part of last week and was referred to the Department of External Affairs. I ascertained at the time that the Under Secretary of State for External Affairs had already instituted an inquiry into the incident to which my hon. friend has made reference. My hon. friend will appreciate that conditions are very much disturbed in China at the present time. Mr. Lowe was one of fourteen or fifteen, I think, who were similarly treated. He was released immediately after his capture, and the government of China made some apology; our government notwithstanding is making representations as to the incident with a view of seeing what reply the Chinese government may wish to make.

MANITOBA GRAND JURIES

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): The Manitoba legislature has passed a resolution, I believe unanimously, asking that it be relieved of the expense of grand juries—indeed, that the grand jury system be abolished. It has petitioned the government to introduce this year legislation amending the code so as to make the desired change. Does the government purpose doing so?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I would like the Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin) to reply to this question. As soon as he takes his seat, I will direct his attention to the question.

*WHEAT BOARD LEGISLATION

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. MEIGHEN: Has the government yet passed its order in council bringing into effect the extension of the wheat board legislation of last year?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not yet.

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is there a difference of opinion?

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

LABRADOR GOLDFIELDS, LIMITED

Mr. GAUVREAU:

1. Has the Labrador Goldfields, Limited, been incorporated under a federal charter?
2. What is the capital of the company and the number and face value of the shares?
3. What are the names, place of residence and occupation of the applicants for the charter?
4. Is it a fact that part of the ground on which the company has announced to have obtained leases from the Newfoundland government is in disputed territory between the latter and the Dominion government?
5. Is it true that the Federal government has waived or intends to waive its possible rights of sovereignty on above mentioned position of the ground supposed to be covered by leases by the Newfoundland government to the said Labrador Goldfields, Limited?
6. Has the government received or any member thereof, representations to the effect that the details of the very peculiar way of disposing by parcels of the leases has been hatched in the city of New York and the possibilities of gold findings on the Labrador coast heralded in the papers of that city?
7. Is it the intention of the government either directly or through the Quebec government to place before the public, before it is too late to protect them, whatever information they may have with whatever possibilities there are of gold finding?
8. Is the government aware that the Labrador Goldfields, Limited, have on the market for sale and selling as fast as possible, lease of ¼ of one acre of their 25,000 leased acres, at the initial cost of $200 in cash for each quarter of an acre which would net them $20,000,000 with very problematic return for the investors?

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

*See correction, pages 2740 and 2741.

Hon. Mr. COPP:

1. Yes.

2. Capital, $50,000 divided into 5,000 shares of $10 each.

3. Honora Charlotte Bellew and Beatrice Frances Ann Bellew, stenographers, Mary Lawlor, spinster, John Brown, contractor, and Arthur Thomas Forbes, bond broker, all of the city of Montreal, in the province of Quebec.

4. No official information of the precise area of the claims held by the Labrador Goldfields Limited under mining leases granted by the Newfoundland government, but if it may be assumed from the published advertisements of this company that their claims are situated on rivers flowing into Stag bay, then the whole of the area covered by their leases is within the disputed territory.

5. No; the Dominion government neither has waived nor intends to waive any rights of sovereignty which belong to the Dominion in its own right or in that of the province of Quebec over or within the territory covered by the leases referred to; and it is not probable that the Newfoundland government can acquire any advantage by acts of administration while the boundary case is pendente lite.

6. No information.

7. The provisions of the company's act requires a prospectus to be filed and contracts to be referred to, liability for mis-statements is provided for. The government has no information regarding finding of gold on the property of the company.

8. No information.

RHINELAND OCCUPATION

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT:

1. What was the cost to Canada for the Canadian army of occupation that was sent into Rhineland?
2. Did Germany or Canada pay for that cost?
3. At what date did this occupation cease?
4. Is the government aware that the American forces on the Rhine did not cost the United States a penny, that the Germans were paying the whole bill?
5. If Germany did not foot this bill for Canada, why did Canada receive a different treatment than the United States in that matter?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD:

1 and 2. It was estimated by the Overseas Ministry that the cost to Canada for the Canadian army of occupation amounted to $7,350,956.70.

At a conference of prime ministers, and representatives of the United Kingdom the Dominions and India, the allocation of the sums received from Germany was decided upon, Canada's share being $6,314,500. This amount has been paid.

3. March, 1919.

4. No information.

5. Answered by 1 and 2.

MR. GEORGE WEDGE

Mr. CHAPLIN:

1. Is George Wedge employed in the transformer house of the Railways and Canals department at Thorold?
2. If so, how long has he been employed by the Department of Railways and Canals?
3. Has he always performed his duties satisfactorily?
4. Is he now being discharged? If so, why?

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM:

1. Yes.
2. About ten years.
3. As regards the department, there have been no complaints.
4. No.

PORT ARTHUR ELEVATOR

Hon. Mr. STEVENS:

1. What was the total amount of No. 1 standard screenings at the government elevator at Port Arthur for the years ending August 30th, 1920-21-22?
2. What was the total amount of revenue received in each of the above years from all screenings?
3. Were the said No. 1 standard screenings recleaned in the said elevator?
4. If so, what was the total revenue for each year:—(a) from the recleaned screenings, (b) from the refuse screenings?
5. During the said years, to whom, at what price and what amount did the government sell, (a) No. 1 standard screenings, (b) recleaned screenings, (c) refuse screenings?
6. Were the said screenings at any time offered to public tender?
7. Did the government officials mix the grain extracted from the said screenings with other grain in the elevator?
8. In accounting to the shipper for screenings, as provided by law, was said accounting and payment for the No. 1 standard screenings before being recleaned or only at the rate allowed for refuse screenings?

Hon. Mr. ROBB: This question requires information from Fort William, and, I notice, covers a period of three years. Unless we have the report, we may allow it to stand for this week; but if the report does not come along next week, we may have the question stand as an order for return.

Question stands.

COLONEL J. A. SPONAGLE

Hon. Mr. STEVENS:

1. Was Colonel J. A. Sponagle of Middleton, Nova Scotia, appointed Port Physician at Margaretville, Annapolis county? If so, when?
2. Did the said Colonel Sponagle serve overseas as medical officer of the 25th Battalion?
3. Were the said Colonel Sponagle's services dispensed with after the year 1921?
4. Was the customs officer at Margaretville notified by the department in future Dr. F. S. Messenger of Middleton would be employed instead of said Colonel Sponagle?
5. Did the said Dr. Messenger have military service overseas?
6. What was the reason for dispensing with the services of said Colonel J. A. Sponagle?

Hon. Mr. COPP:

1. No.
2. Yes.
3. This officer was struck off strength, the Canadian Expeditionary Force, 16th February, 1920.
4. No.
5. There is no record of Dr. F. S. Messenger having served overseas with the Canadian Forces as an officer or other rank.
6. Lieut. Colonel Sponagle was struck off the strength the Canadian Expeditionary Force on general demobilization.

FUNGUS AND INSECT CONTROL

Mr. LADNER:

1. What is the organization of the two services dealing with fungi and insects respectively of the forests of Canada?
2. What are the relative duties and the relative compensations provided for the technical staffs of the two services referred to?
3. Does the government consider these two services, namely:—That which deals with fungi and that which deals with insects, of equal economic importance?
4. Has the department during the last ten years carried out any investigation with respect to damages in the forests of British Columbia, under Dominion control, caused by fungi and by insects?
5. If so, in what years were such investigations carried out and of what did the investigation consist?
6. Is it the intention of the government during the summer months of 1924 or 1925 to carry out investigations relative to the causes and control of damage caused to forest trees in British Columbia by fungi and by insects?

Hon. Mr. MOTHERWELL:

1. As far as diseases of forest trees caused by fungi are concerned, this work is done in a subdivision of the division of botany of the Central Experimental farm, Ottawa. In the Entomological branch of the Department of Agriculture, there is a definite organization known as the Division of Forest Insects. Officers of this division investigate insect outbreaks of forests and their control in the various provinces.

2. The duties of a forest pathologist, include the study of the damage due to fungi, the ecological conditions predisposing forest trees towards disease, the taxonomy and morphology of fungi, together with a study of economic control measures possible under prevailing lumbering conditions. The staff of the section dealing with fungi of forests—apart from the general direction of this work by the divisional chief, as far as his other duties will permit, consists of one permanent plant pathologist, with a salary of $2,400—$2,760, and a number of seasonal men of minor qualifications whoes salaries and expenses amount to approximately $8,000. The duties of the entomologists attached to the division of forest insects, are to study the life histories of important forest and shade tree insects, the natural control of the same, as well as all phases relating to artificial control. The amount, including salaries, devoted to forest insect investigations in 1922 amounted to approximately $22,100.

3. It is difficult to make comparisons between these two services, but just at present insects are working more injury to forests than fungi. But the injury effected by fungi is frequently less obtrusive, although it may be quite as great as that caused by insects, hence it is not possible to say definitely whether one is of more economic importance than the other.

4. Only occasional observations as to damage caused by fungi have so far been possible in British Columbia. Certain definite studies of conditions relating to the outbreak of white pine blister rust were made during the past year and a half. Investigations have been carried out, during the last ten years, with respect to damages caused by insects in the forests of British Columbia.

5. With respect to fungi: The investigations have been carried on since September, 1921, and consist principally in determining the areas in British Columbia affected by blister rust and investigations of the susceptible secondary host plants, including a study of distances fungus spores are carried. With respect to insects: Every year practically, particularly since the establishment of a division of forest insects in 1914. Since this latter year investigations have related particularly to the spruce budworm, the forest tent caterpillar, the fall webworm, various species of bark-beetles, borers, etc. From biological investigations conducted, information of great value was obtained based upon which control operations were directed.

6. Yes.

MR. GEORGE FRENETTE

Mr. HANSON:

1. On what date was Mr. George Frenette dismissed from the civil service as postmaster at St. Jean l'Evangeliste?

2. Why was he dismissed?

3. How long was the post office located where it stood prior to the dismissal of Mr. Frenette?

4. Were any petitions received by the Post Office Department pleading for the reinstatement of Mr. Frenette as postmaster?

5. Did the department receive any official report as to the convenience of the locality of the post office at St. Jean l'Evangeliste under the postmastership of Mr. Frenette? If so, what was the substance of that report and by whom was it signed, and on what date?

6. Did the Post Office Department advise the Civil Service Commission that the locality of the post office under the postmastership of Mr. Frenette was inconveniently situated and if so on what date was such advice sent to the Civil Service Commission by the Post Office Department?

[Mr. Motherwell.]

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM (for Postmaster General):

1. Office moved from the residence of Mr. George Frenette to residence of Mr. Charles Alfred Green on 26th December, 1922, on a report from the member for the constituency, Hon. Charles Marcil, to the effect that the site of the office did not serve the convenience of the great majority of the patrons.

2. Office moved to a site more convenient to the majority of the patrons.

3. Since 1st April, 1896.

4. Yes.

5. On 16th February, 1923, a report signed by S. Tanner Green, District Superintendent, Quebec, was received, to the effect that 51 families receive their mail at St. Jean l'Evangeliste post office; 12 families are located on high ground on a stretch of three miles north-west from the parish church; 24 families live on the lower level on a stretch of one mile. The remainder of the families who receive their mail are located on the south side of the Nouvelle river, and have their exit by a road close to the residence of Mr. Green. Mr. Frenette's residence would be more suitable for the twelve people on the hill, but Mr. Green's residence would be more suitable for the people who live on the lower level, and also those who are located on the south side of the Nouvelle river. The parish of St. Jean l'Evangeliste, which has a population of 1706 is served by six minor post offices besides the St. Jean l'Evangeliste post office, the latter being the only money order office. Looking at this question from that aspect it may be stated that 606 people occupy territory situated west of the parish church and the residence of Mr. Frenette, or an area which extends eight miles; 549 people live east of the parish church, on a tract which extends three miles to the vicinity of the Robitaille post office. The remainder of the population, 497 people, are located on the peninsula to the southward. Out of a population of 1706, 1046 must pass by Green's door to go to the church, and among the 51 nearer patrons of the office, 39 have to pass Green's door to reach the residence of Mr. Frenette.

6. The Post Office Department advised the Civil Service Commission on March 27, 1923, to the effect that as the department had decided to remove the office to the vicinity of Mr. Green's residence in the middle of the village and near the railway station, where it would afford better public service to the majority of the patrons of the office, it was considered that Mr. Frenette's application to keep the post office at the old location could not be taken into consideration.

PURCHASING COMMISSION

Mr. SHAW:

1. Under what authority does the Purchasing Commission operate?
2. Is such authority, if any, legally sufficient and adequate?
3. If such authority is legally insufficient and inadequate what does the government propose to do?

Right Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. Under authority of order in council P. C. 1077 of April 4, 1921.

2 and 3. The points raised in these questions are under consideration.

MOOSE JAW INCOME TAX OFFICE

Mr. HOPKINS:

1. Does the government intend to close the Moose Jaw Income Tax office?
2. If so, why and when?
3. If not, how much further is the present systematic reduction of the staff to be carried?
4. What status is it proposed to give the office, and what are the reasons for making the office junior to Regina and Prince Albert?

Hon. Mr. FIELDING:

1. No.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. Staff will be increased or decreased as required to maintain an efficient service.

4. No change in the status as a sub-district office is anticipated. Economy and efficiency in administration.

CONDEMNATION INSURANCE

Mr. SPENCER:

1. Have any steps been taken or orders issued in the past by the Department of Agriculture looking towards the discontinuance of the system of condemnation insurance in Canada?
2. If so, upon whose request was this done?
3. Was it carried into effect?
4. If such an order was issued and not carried into effect, what was the reason for the failure to do so?
5. Upon whose request or demand was this failure brought about?

Hon. Mr. MOTHERWELL:

1. Yes.

2. Many requests had been received from different sources but action was taken specifically upon resolution from the Western Canada Live Stock Union.

3. No.

4. The order was first issued early in 1920 based upon a ruling by the Justice department pointing out that the charges referred to would appear to require legislative sanction unless justified by well-established usage. Subsequently, however, in the same year, it was agreed with the various live stock interests, producers and packers both being included, that it would be inadvisable to put the order of discontinuance into effect unless and until a constructive policy could be developed, providing comprehensively for the elimination of tuberculosis in commercial cattle. This agreement led to the organization of the Animal Contagious Diseases Eradication Board, for the purpose of working out such a policy. This board met on several occasions and agreed upon a progressive programme which was submitted to the government. This programme the government felt could not be financed by itself alone and that the producers would be expected to assist by taxing themselves in connection with the sale of commercial cattle. This question was referred to the Western Canada Live Stock Union in December, 1920, but in view of the fact that it was found impossible to reach an agreement as between the government and producers' interests respecting the financing of the policy, the programme which had been drafted was, by force of circumstances, allowed to drop. This being the case the order was not put into effect and the matter has not been since presented to the government.

5. Answered by No. 4.

RAISINS IMPORTED

Mr. PARENT:

1. What quantity of raisins were imported into Canada each year during the last five years?
2. What quantity of said raisins were imported into each province during each of the said years?
3. From what countries were the said raisins imported?

Hon. Mr. BUREAU:

1. Total imports or raisins entered for consumption in Canada during the fiscal years ended March 31, 1919 to 1923:

RUSH—BAGOT AGREEMENT

Hon. Mr. BAXTER:

1. What progress, if any, has been made toward the negotiations of the new treaty which the government has proposed to effect with the United States to take the place of the present Rush-Bagot Treaty?

2. Does the government intend to continue these negotiations?

3. If so, what does the government expect to achieve thereby which will be of real advantage to Canada?

4. Is it the intention of the government that the present British Ambassador to the United States shall be permitted to sign such treaty along with the representative of Canada when same is complete?

Right Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. Negotiations looking to the conclusion of a treaty to take the place of the Rush-Bagot agreement of the 29th April, 1817, are still in progress.

2. Yes.

3. The removal of possibility of friction in matters connected with naval armament on the Great Lakes between this country and the United States.

4. This matter will be determined at such time as final action is taken.

[Mr. Bureau.]

LAKE OF THE WOODS LEVELS

Right Hon. Mr. MEIGHEN:

1. What is the present condition of the negotiations with the United States regarding the Lake of the Woods levels and the problems incident thereto?

2. Has any progress been made within the last year? If so, what?

Right Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. Negotiations are proceeding between the governments concerned, and satisfactory progress is being made.

2. Answered by No. 1.

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

MARGAREE RIVER

Mr. HANSON:

For a copy of all papers, letters, telegrams and other documents, relating to the Margaree river Salmon Fisheries Association during the year 1922 and the present year, including in particular, all papers, letters, telegrams and other documents relating to the membership or ownership of such association, and the distribution of moneys payable by the Department of Marine and Fisheries to the association or the members thereof.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—EQUIPMENT ORDERS

Right Hon. Mr. MEIGHEN:

For a return showing all orders for equipment placed by the Canadian National Railways since October 4th, 1922, including orders for cars of different kinds, separately stated; for engines of different kinds, separately stated, with prices in each case or basis of prices, and comparison of such prices with last prices at which similar goods were ordered. The said return to contain also names of firms and location of factories, with whom such orders have been placed, and where same are to be filled. Also showing all correspondence and requisitions between officers of the companies and any member of the government referring to the necessity for such orders.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—NEW POSITIONS

Mr. RYCKMAN:

For return showing all new positions created and filled as offices of the Canadian National Railways since October 4th, 1922, together with salaries attaching to such positions and the name of the appointee to each. Showing also all salaries raised and all salaries, if any, diminished, of the officers of the Canadian National Railways or Canadian Mercantile Marine, since October 4th, 1922, with particulars as to previous and present salary in each case.

Mr. GRAHAM: I have no objection to the motion on the understanding that it shall also include information in regard to positions abolished.

ITALIAN TREATY

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Would my right hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition, have any objection to the third reading of the bill respecting the Italian Convention to-day?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING moved the third reading of Bill No. 153, respecting a certain Trade Convention between his Majesty and the King of Italy.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time.

COMBINES, MONOPOLIES, TRUSTS AND MERGERS

On motion of Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King (Prime Minister) Bill No. 54 to provide for the investigation of Combines, Monopolies, Trusts and Mergers, was read the third time and passed.

THE BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from Friday May 11th, the debate on the motion of Hon. W. S. Fielding (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (West York): Mr. Speaker, when I rose on Friday it was for the pleasant purpose, in the first instance, of congratulating my hon. friend, the Minister of Finance. I rise now to discharge a duty that is not quite so pleasant; I have now to condone with the hon. gentleman. I must tell him how much I sympathize with him not only in regard to the extent of the work that he has had in hand but because of his inability, after four months of the session of parliament, to make any appreciable change in the situation, as well as his utter inability to disclose any message or policy for the Canadian people and the utter absence of any programme of any kind from his budget. I am quite sure my hon. friend has done his best with the material he has on hand, with the burdens which he is subject to, and limited and bound as he is by his mixed surroundings. The budget has a very notable omission this year. Usually budgets are begun with a review of world conditions and Canadian trade; and a review this year would have been very gratifying if it had taken into account the evidences of Canadian industry and production. The minister could have shown very good figures—figures due to the enormous harvest of last year having regard to our agricultural exports; he could have shown very good figures in connection with sales of our forest products—pulp, paper, newsprint, and the like—sales which have very materially advanced owing in large part to the tremendous expansion which our neighbours to the south are at present enjoying; he could also have shown that the late government were not very much wrong when they looked upon Canada as the legitimate manufacturing and export field for American industry owing to the preference which we are able to obtain in the British and other markets of the Empire. He could have shown, for example, that the factories which under our administration were built at Oshawa are now doing a very large share of the export business of the American automobile makers. He could have shown all that, but at the same time he could have claimed credit for nothing.

There was, however, one real reason why it was not done. My hon. friends have claimed credit for all kinds of prosperity in the past; they have claimed credit for our golden days, for our weather, and for our crops, with which of course they had nothing to do. But, I repeat, there was one reason why nothing of the kind was done this year. To have said anything of that sort would immediately have invited a comparison between what we are doing here in Canada and what other people are doing. On the one hand, it would have invited comparison of how this country—which the government last year described as being left in a better position than any other country in the world—stood after eighteen months of their administration in relation to other countries which they thought, and justly so, it was so much ahead of. For example, we would immediately have had a comparison drawn between the deficit of former years of other countries and our deficit on this year's operations. This year's deficit is $57,000,000. It is not $49,000,000, because the deficit ought to be considered having regard to the results of the year's operations without taking into account the exchanges earned in previous years, and if we take away the $8,000,000 which is applied for the purpose of reducing the year's deficit, we find that we have a deficit growing out of this year's operations of $57,000,000. That would have been thrown into very glaring contrast with the redemption of debt that is going on to the south, it would have been thrown into very glaring contrast with the credit balance that the Mother Country reports this year, representing, if I remember rightly, in the neighbourhood of £100,000,000. But more than that it would have been thrown into very direct contrast with what countries are doing which have suffered tremendously from depreciated currency. The daily press tells us that the finance committee of the French Senate has adopted the report of Senator Bérenger on the budget for the current year, which balances the budget with an estimated surplus of nearly 400,000,000 francs. This is in contrast with a deficit of nearly 4,000,000,000 francs estimated by the French Chamber. So there was a very good reason why the usual thing was not done in this instance.

Well, Mr. Speaker. I wonder how we can describe this budget. What kind of a budget is it? What is its object? In what is it instructive? How does it help us in so far as governmental policy is concerned? How does it help us in so far as our own finances are concerned? How does it help us in connection with the tariff? I do not suppose that anyone will call it a low tariff budget when it contains increases in some instances and a general tariff of 37½ per cent on the new item of artificial silk. Neither can it be described as a tariff for revenue. We certainly need revenue this year, if we ever did. But this is a tariff that loses revenue, it is a tariff which is budgeting for a decrease in excise taxes, for example, of $5,600,000. It is a tariff which provides for a reduction in our sugar revenues of $2,500,000, that reduction, of course, being justified on the ground that there will be a decrease to the extent of half a cent a pound in favour of the consumer. Why, Mr. Speaker, the hon. Minister himself pointed out that we had cheap sugar with these very duties; sugar was high during the war, it was cheap afterwards. He pointed out, as the fact is, that the price of sugar is not at all related to the rate of duty at the present time, but that it is supposed to be a matter of speculation, something entirely removed from the question of duty; but nevertheless, at a time when we ought not to throw away one cent of revenue we are sacrificing $2,500,000 by reducing a tax under which in the past we had cheap sugar. No, Mr. Speaker, it is not a tariff for revenue.

I do not suppose anyone would call it a tariff for free trade. Hardly. We have heard a belated plea for business stability—a plea which had it only been made eighteen months ago, when hon. gentlemen opposite first came into power, and been acted upon, would have resulted relatively in just as much improvement and progress here in Canada as we see to-day in the United States. But we have that belated plea. No longer do my hon. friends opposite think it is a good thing to get rid of the dog's tail by cutting off an inch at a time and expect the dog to thrive. That idea is exploded. We cannot get free trade by slow degrees and continue to function. We have had the threat hanging over us, with the result that we have had a dead year when we ought to have had a good year.

But the tariff will not be described as a free trade tariff—not only in view of that plea but also in connection with the direct aid to new industries. Why, Mr. Speaker, I do not know how this budget ought to be labelled. It has not as many spots as a leopard, but it has infinitely more colours. It is a beautiful bit of camouflage. It is something which goes a small way in every direction, something which is going to throw a sop here and a sop there and a general kick all round when the final result is obtained. You cannot go north, south, east and west at the same time, but that is what this budget is trying to do. It is a political budget, a budget of expediency. I can sympathize with my hon. friend, because I am sure he has done the best he could with the material available, with the divergent views prevailing among those who surround him, and with a policy which is such a vanishing, a lost thing, as that Liberal platform.

Well, Mr. Speaker, we have a few more changes in the tariff. —2½ per cent off here and there. I do not know whether 2½ per cent is popular down in Nova Scotia, but if the hon. minister went through Ontario he would hear a lot about two-and-a-half per cent there. In fact, two-and-a-half per cent Ontario beer may become famous. I wonder whether the minister thinks there is something in these particular figures, or whether 2½ per cent in tariff tinkering is the standard by which he thinks we ought to be governed? We had quite a lot of these little reductions last year, we have not so many of them in the present budget—perhaps just enough to carry into this year something of the paralysis that was to be found last year in so many quarters.

What evidence of principle can we find anywhere in the tariff. What evidence of principle is there in connection with any of the reductions made? Why are the reductions made that are made? As to the increases, there is an increase which is to help us negotiate a treaty with Australia; that is a perfectly proper, a perfectly logical and business-like procedure. The lesson has been learned only too late, had my hon. friends learned it before, the Minister of Finance would have been relieved of many of his difficulties in connection with the preparation of this budget. But apart from that item, what reason is there for any of these increases? I find none—looking back to past treatment. It is idle of course, to look to the Liberal platform as affording any reasons why anything should be done now. It is discarded; it is disgraced. The thing ought never to have been born; it never breathed; it represented a principle that the chief financial authority of the party says he was never bound by. Last year, while we were to discard the Liberal platform, he invited us to see what he said in the House in discussing these different tariff matters and suggested that we would then find out what the Liberal platform was, or, rather, what it ought to be.

Now, I will turn to something my friend said. I am going to refer, Mr. Speaker, to the hon. gentleman's statement reported in Hansard of 1921, page 3153, as follows:

> If there are any people in Canada who are contemplating the establishing of new lines of business in which they feel that tariff protection is necessary, I do them a friendly service when I say: "Don't do it." because anybody who counts upon the continuance of a protective policy is bound to find that he is pursuing a delusion. If any outside capitalist purposes coming to Canada to start some industry which he believes can only be kept alive by protection, again, I advise him not to come. . . . Protection, like conscience, "makes cowards of us all." We lose faith in our country. Let us get away from that, let us find the things that we can produce, that God and nature intended us to produce.

That was the last deliverance made by my hon. friend upon the subject in opposition. I have tried to get his considered views down to the latest possible point, and this was his statement during the last session of the House before the present government came into power. Bearing that in mind, I wonder on what principle my hon. friend acts this year? On what principle does he deal with artificial silk? Now, the manufacture of artificial silk is an entirely new industry here. Let us see what he says about it, bearing in mind his remarks, to which I have referred, on the last occasion that he could very well deal with the subject in this House while in Opposition. I quote from his budget speech of this year:

> A new industry is promised us for the manufacture of artificial silk. It is represented to us that this industry will employ a large amount of labour and we have every reason to believe that if we can make encouraging terms a great industry will be established. We propose to make a classification in which it will be treated largely as silk and we have every reason to hope this will lead to a very important industry being established.

I may point out to my hon. friend that the classification hardly does that. As I read it, the classification is one which he has to draw for the purpose of avoiding the procedure by which silk duties and other duties on luxuries were reduced in connection with the French treaty. His items read that way all through—items referring to artificial silk, winding up with item 583d, "manufactures of artificial silk or artificial fibre silk," and so on, carrying a duty of 30 per cent preferential tariff, 35 per cent intermediate tariff and 37½ per cent general tariff. Now, what principle does my hon. friend go on? He is certainly not going on the principle that he himself laid down that nothing should be started in Canada that requires protection, whether from the inside or from the outside. We have here a direct protection. My hon. friend is in the position of saying the wrong thing and doing the right, but the trouble is we do not know how often he is going to do the right; in the absence of all principle we cannot tell. Then, there is the case of copper bars. Bearing in mind what he said in 1921, here is what my hon. friend says this year about copper bars:

> All these bars and rods are thus imported free. Neither of these copper products is produced in Canada for the reason that our producers are unable to compete with large manufacturing enterprises in the United States.

I wonder if that is a phrase which the government consider they have the right to use only when sitting on the benches over there. I wonder if they have only caught it since they moved over there? It is a very familiar phrase that I have heard denounced and held up to ridicule. The minister continues:

> We sympathize very warmly with the desire to have a larger development of the copper industry in the Dominion.

Then there is the matter of hemp. My hon. friend says:

> There is another industry to which we are going to extend similar aid. We have been working together to encourage the cultivation of hemp, for which article we are assured the soil of parts of our country is particularly adapted. It is believed that with some encouragement a large manufacturing plant can be established in Manitoba, drawing its raw material from the crop to be raised in the immediate vicinity. Here again is a case where the helping hand may only have to be extended at the beginning.

And so on. No start without the helping hand, and the aid now given. But, Mr. Speaker, if artificial silk is to be helped, why should not natural silk be helped? It is a proper thing to help industries which can be made and ought to be made indigenous to Canada. We believe that, and my hon. friend is perfectly right when he takes that stand in connection with this article of artificial silk—perfectly right. It is a comparatively new thing, and I think it is going to be a very good thing. But although it is a pretty good thing it is a very small thing as compared with natural silk. Yet, if artificial silk is to be helped, why not natural silk? Why, Mr. Speaker, the other day I had occasion in connection with the Italian treaty to bring to my hon. friend's attention this fact, that while in the United States no silk whatever was grown—we all know where it comes from, and the same thing can be said of European countries, of France itself—nevertheless by a protective duty on natural silk they worked up an industry in the United States that during the year 1919 distributed in wages the tremendous sum of $108,000,000. Why not natural silk if artificial silk? Or is this altogether a sham idea and you want to get artificial things instead of real things? Or is it because the artificial is cheap and the natural expensive? Artificial silk to-day to a very large extent is the only kind of silk that the poorer people can buy. Real silk costs money, and a good deal of it. Is it to be understood that the reason we have artificial silk and not natural silk here is because the one is really a luxury and the other a comparatively cheap thing, and that in consonance with what was done in the French treaty and other treaties we are to have cheap taxes on the more expensive things and heavy taxes on the cheap things? Because that is what this government has been doing. Perhaps that is the reason; I cannot think of any other.

Then again, if copper bars, why not brass works? Why, if we are doing this for labour—and the real justification for protection always is the employment of labour at work which is properly indigenous to a country, and to the greater extent and greater amount that labour enters into the cost of a business the greater the claims it ought to have for protection—well, there is much more labour in turning out brass works than in turning out copper bars. So why not brass works?

Again, if we are to have copper bars, why not glass? First-rate factories now in Canada are practically doing nothing. Why not glass? If copper bars why not steel plates? And if hemp why not flax? The farmer in Canada is interested in the growth of flax. Why is flax to be dropped and hemp helped? Why?—unless it be that there is a total absence of principle in connection with the consideration of any rate, and the consideration that is given rests upon the insistency of the demand upon the one hand or political advantage on the other. So much for these tariff provisions.

My hon. friend makes a change in the sales tax. I am inclined to think, Mr. Speaker, that here again he has yielded to importunity.

4 p.m.

I can remember very well when one of the great complaints made by hon. gentlemen opposite against the customs revenue was that the customs revenue being collected at the source formed part of the costs of the jobber, formed part of the costs of the retailer, and as it formed part of the costs of both, their profits in both cases were calculated upon it. There is an easy way and there is a hard way of handling the sales tax; I quite admit it. We chose the difficult way because we wanted to keep down the cost of living. We wanted to see to the fullest extent possible that every single cent that the consumer had to pay in sales tax went in taxes and was not made the basis of further and increased profits. I admit it was hard, but we were getting along very well with it.

There is another consideration in connection with that very self-same tax. If you make the tax small and spread it out wide enough you can get it so that it merely becomes a part of the overhead and is not passed on. That is what we did in our sales tax of one-and-a-half and one-and-a-half. The other day I ran across the owner of a large departmental store and he said we had been a great nuisance to them. I said "What is the trouble?" "Well," he said "you had that infernal sales tax on, and it was so small that we did not feel like changing catalogues and the like and passing the tax on. We absorbed it. But we are all right now," he went on "with the increase of fifty per cent the sales tax became so large that we are passing it on." The increase he spoke of was made in the sales tax of last year, and I think in a good many cases the sales tax was being passed on I think there is no doubt of this, Mr. Speaker, that the real reason why prices stopped falling down with my hon. friend's last budget, and took an upward curve, just simply lay in the fact that these sales taxes were being passed on. I am afraid that my hon. friend while he is considering himself, his department—and I admit it will be easier for them— while he is considering the retailer, and the retailers all want it, while he is considering the wholesaler, and the wholesalers all want it, is forgetting entirely the position of the rate payer And I venture this prophecy, that the result of this tax will be to increase further the cost of living. It is an absolutely inescapable conclusion as I see it.

I would just like to show how these taxes work out. I am going to take $100 worth of goods. Under our tax of 1½ per cent $100 worth of goods goes out from the manufacturer He has to pay a sales tax of $1.50. That amount of $101.50 goes to the jobber. I am going to assume for the purposes of this statement that the whole tax was passed on, even when it was small. I am going to assume that what that departmental store man told me was wrong and that everything was passed on; that is, put the case against our sales tax in the worst possible light, and do violence to the facts, for the sake of illustration. The jobber's cost then is $101.50. Now I will put the jobber's profit at—it does not matter what you put his profit at. His profit varies. It may be down as low as 5 per cent or up as high as 25 per cent. Suppose we say 15 per cent; the figure does not matter so long as you stick to the same percentage in all your illustrations. The jobber's profit of 15 per cent would amount to $15.22. That is what he sells at, assuming he passes everything on, and on that he has to pay his sales tax—again 1½ per cent. That is now increased to $1.75. That makes a total for which he sells of $118.47. Now, it does not make any difference what percentage we take for the retailer, as long as we stick to it. These gross profits vary tremendously. Take 35 per cent. Thirty-five per cent profit would be $41.46. That would make the cost to the consumer, assuming everything had been passed on under our tax, pressing it to the last possible extent, $159.93.

Let us take it under the proposed tax, which certainly has the great merit of simplicity, and direct action on the rate-payer, which has no merit. Take goods $100; sales tax $6, jobber's profit at 15 per cent, $15.90. Jobber's price, therefore, $121.90, retailers profit at 35 per cent $42.66, a total of $164.66, as against $159.93, a resultant increase in taxation to the ratepayer of 4·63 per cent. As I say, Mr. Speaker, the trade gets its way and makes more money. The ratepayers pay 4·63 per cent more. I notice that this is no secret, and I am going to read one of the many quotations which you can get as to who wanted this change. There is no secret about it. In this morning's paper I find the following:

Good budget for jobbers

Hamilton, Ont., May 12.—Jobbers are particularly pleased with the budget especially in its treatment of the sales tax.

"It's a good budget for the jobbers," stated St. Clair Balfour, of Balfour Smye Limited, wholesale grocer.

"It gives us just what we have been after for a long time. Hitherto with a one per cent tax we had to absorb the sales tax."

They did that under our tax. The quotation proceeds:

"We could not avoid it. Now, however, this tax will be placed on at the point of manufacture and we will be relieved of this trouble."

Asked if this would not result in pyramiding Mr. Balfour readily admitted that this would be the case.

"Oh, yes, certainly," he said, "if the article costs $100 and the manufacturer puts on the $6 sales tax we will collect our profit on the $106."

Why, Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend says that he is not bringing in new forms of taxation. Well, I assume he is not bringing in many new forms of taxation, but he is multiplying the results of taxation on the ratepayers by the method in which he deals with that sales tax. I hope that the government are going to get good returns and that the revenues will be largely increased. My hon. friend needs these returns. But I would be very much more hopeful if I saw some way in which the increased profits in the case of this taxation, which is going to the jobber and retailer, could be diverted into the treasury. I am afraid it will never get there.

The receipt tax, he says, is to stand. Well, Mr. Speaker, we have receipt taxes, we have cheque taxes and other things. We have got the niggling taxes that bother us and bring in the main but comparatively small results, while we have been entirely overlooking taxation on those that can best afford it—the taxation on the consumers of luxuries. This receipt tax, my hon. friend says they have it in England. He is right. He says that no chancellor of the exchequer in England would think of dropping it. Again he is right. But no chancellor of the exchequer in England would ever have thought of permitting taxes on cheques as has been done here—never in the world. Even in the worst days of the war the very highest they went was tuppence on a cheque. There was no ascending scale. There was a recognition that there was no service given, a recognition that it was a nuisance to business, and a difficult tax to administer; and I am going to have something to say about that when we go into committee, but at present I will not detain the House. Now, the position in England and the position here are entirely different. The receipt tax here, on top of those drastic cheque taxes, ought not to be thought of. We are getting far more out of our cheque taxes than we ever get from receipt taxes. There would not be nearly the objection to giving receipts to-day, if the hon. minister would accept the English method, and have a flat rate on cheques and a flat rate on receipts, but while we have not got it, the minister says it has to stand. It is just another of those small things that I do not believe my hon. friend is going to get revenue from. He has not enlightened us as to what revenue he is going to get to-day. What I do know now is that the chief effect of this receipt tax is that you do not get receipts. You sign your cheque to-day and send it, if you are fortunate enough to be able to send it, and the man who receives it says "Oh well, that cheque will be a receipt for that fellow, I will save two cents;" and the government is out two cents on the receipt and three cents on the return postage. That is how it has worked out. I know that to-day you have to ask for receipts if you want to get them. Then again we have the cheque tax still to stay with us. I suppose that my hon. friend feels that he is absolutely consistent in what he does with the cheque tax. This government will not tax luxuries. It is a very luxurious thing to be able to write cheques exceeding $2,500. You need not pay anything more for it. That is getting up into the class of luxury. You need not worry about that. Just as long as you keep the tax down to the cheques of the denominations that most of us are able to write, you pay your little percentage every time and there is no help. This assistance is put at the wrong end altogether. There ought to have been something done with this cheque tax, I admit, but the relief is given at the wrong end. The tax on cheques works in absolutely inverse ratio to the rate of taxation we pay in on incomes. The bigger income you have the more money you have to pay. It went up on an increasing scale, and went up heavily. You have super-charges going on all the time. But it works absolutely in the reverse way, so far as cheques are concerned. The remedy is at the wrong end. If the minister had said, "we are going to help small businesses, we are going to help people to-day that require help, and we will exempt all cheques under $500 from the operation of the tax, just leave it to the old rate of two cents, he would have done something. He would have given relief there where relief is far more required.

I think I have already dealt with the cigarette tax, but I wish to mention just one thing that was wrong in connection with it. My recollection was that my hon. friend counted upon an increased revenue of $5,000,000 in connection with his tobacco duties, and on looking the matter up in Hansard, I find that is correct. But instead of getting an increased revenue of $5,000,000, he has lost $1,200,000. He is not going to get that back to-day. You cannot bring down provisions and laws which directly affect business, which hurt business very materially, and say: "Oh, it does not matter; I will take the tax off this year and you will be just as well off as you were before." You cannot do that. Businesses that are disturbed and disrupted do not come back in that way, and it will be some time, I am afraid, before my hon. friend is able to make good the cost of his error and to get back anything like the old return which this country got from the sale of cigarettes. My hon. friend again is quite right when he said that cigarette consumption did not stop. It did not. He is again quite right when he said that smuggling took place, and that any quantity of American cigarettes, which paid us absolutely nothing, was being consumed in place of our own.

My hon. friend said that there was no revenue from the tax on beetroot sugar. That is quite right. Of course there was no revenue, but I do not think that statement leaves on the House the impression that he would desire to be left. The rate was first brought down at 48 cents. After protests from the opposition, the rate was reduced to 24 cents, and then a further protest was made by the manufacturing company, the sugar refinery. They said: "We have our contracts made for the whole year; we never counted upon this cost; it is unfair to impose this tax." Well, the tax for the whole year was suspended, as my hon. friend explained, last year, and there has been no opportunity to collect the tax this year. Yet my hon. friend says there is no revenue from this tax. Of course there is no revenue because the tax was suspended. The real evil of that tax was not the reason that prompted its suspension last year. What prompted its suspension last year was the fact that manufacturers of beets into sugar would be out just that much money. That is not the real evil. The real evil, the real reason why the tax ought never to have been imposed, was that it was a tax upon a first product of the country, of which product we were not getting enough. My hon. friend is perfectly justified in discarding the tax altogether.

I am pleased to see that my hon. friend has taken that niggling tax off soft drinks. He could not have got much money under it, I am sure he did not; and if the cost of trying to collect it were taken into consideration, he would find his receipts were a vanishing quantity. There is just one suggestion I would make to my hon. friend in connection with that tax. He is taking it off now because he thinks it is wrong. If he thought it was right, he would not take it off. If it is wrong, it is just as wrong to-day as it will be on the 1st of next August. Nothing is going to occur between now and August to make that tax wrong on the 1st of August and perfectly right now. But he does not take it off until the 1st of August. If the tax is wrong—and it is wrong—it ought to be cancelled now. Further than that, in fairness to a trade that has been harassed a good deal by this tax, as they have to-day to prepare for their summer's trade and they cannot properly do that when they have this tax over their heads, if it be wrong, let us get the wrong righted at the earliest possible moment. I agree with my hon. friend that it is wrong and I see no reason why the repeal should not come into effect immediately just the same as our tariff resolutions have come into effect.

The next point that I want to say a few words upon is the resolution as to the United States. I do not know just what was operating in my hon. friend's mind. I am entirely disposed to believe, knowing him as I do, knowing his great ability, that he has absolutely no faith in his proposition; that he knows it is an idle gesture, and that it is meant merely for the purpose of pleasing my hon. friends to my left. No one believes at the present time that anything can be done with that resolution. Why, the Americans are men of business; they are much more concerned in trade and in furthering trade than they are in reading over piously indicated and beautifully worded resolutions in our statutes. They know where they are just as well as they will know after the present resolutions are made law. We learned something about their acumen when we heard about the French treaty. We found that everything we could get only at such great cost, they got for nothing, and it was suggested that we should employ an American to make the next treaty with France for us. They are business people, and there is only one way of trading with business people, that is, by having something to trade with; and this resolution constitutes absolutely nothing to trade with. In the last few days hon. gentlemen have learned the soundness of that doctrine: If you want to trade have something to trade with. In carrying out that doctrine, they imposed a duty on currants and raisins. The hon. member for Victoria and Carleton (Mr. Caldwell), I think, has been helping them a little along the line of instructions. I do not know how he managed this; he certainly managed to get them to pick out the one item that would constitute the smallest reason in the world to move an American business man in the right direction. But, perhaps, the process of education will go on. He has got them to put a protective duty on potatoes when other countries maintain a duty against potatoes grown in Canada. I do not know why we should not eat Canadian potatoes. I always thought we should. I think Canadian potatoes are very good.

Mr. CALDWELL: Since the hon. member has coupled my name with this, I should like to dissociate myself with it entirely. We want free entry of our potatoes into other markets.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Wonderful! Is the attitude of this hon. gentleman not extraordinary? I am not going to debate the matter; but I am going to tell him one thing, that his attitude is just as helpful to the potato producers of New Brunswick as was his vote on the Crowsnest pass case. If he wants to make it impossible to do business, all right; but hon. gentlemen across the aisle were learning something, and they put this duty on potatoes. Let us suppose that this duty on potatoes was imposed for some good cause. If there be any good cause, the reason why potatoes should be picked out as a specific instance, must have regard to the American tariff. The one potato scale I know of that is worrying Canada to-day is the American potato scale. We get some potatoes from the United States, and hon gentlemen think that reciprocity in tariff, which they regard as something good, should begin with this article. They evidently wanted to find something to trade with, but it seems to me that they are very bad traders when they begin with such a small item as potatoes. I have not the trade returns for 1923, but I find according to the returns for 1922 that in that year the Americans sold us potatoes to the value of $423,113. That is one of the very smallest items, one of the most unimportant, that my hon. friends could begin with. Certainly it is a fine point to start with if they are serious in the desire to tackle the question like men of business. Undoubtedly it is a fine trading point as compared with the millions, the hundreds of millions, of values that come from the United States into Canada; it is small, for example, as compared with the millions which we get from them in silks, textiles, iron and steel products, etc. It is simply small and contemptible. Surely the amount of agricultural products which the United States sends into this agricultural country is of infinitely more value and importance than potatoes. I do not know how it is in the rest of the provinces, but I do know that in Ontario the commodity that is of immediate concern to every thrifty farmer's wife is eggs; and in the year that we import $423,000 worth of potatoes we buy $3,162,143 worth of eggs from the United States.

Mr. FORKE: The Canadian hens went on strike that time.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not know anything about that; I cannot speak for Manitoba; but I certainly know that in Ontario this particular preserve of the farmer's wife is being very largely encroached upon, and I know that there is a real difference, in the Ontario farm at any rate, brought about by the conditions which these figures disclose. It may be that my hon. friend is interested only in wheat, but in Ontario, I would have him know, we are greatly interested in all of the activities of agriculture and certainly do not exclude that very important item, the domestic hen and her eggs. Now, there is one way of handling this question, and that is, not by indulging in any pious and empty gestures, but by being somewhat manly about the situation. Just let us have a little faith in our own country and in ourselves; let us have a little bit of courage; let us realize that this country is the second largest buyer of American goods. Let us realize also that the Americans are interested in this market; bearing in mind, of course, that they will do what is best for themselves and their people without any regard to us just so long as we have not enough pluck or courage or determination to do anything for ourselves. In that very year to which I have referred we made, of all our national purchases, 69 per cent from America, selling them only 39 per cent of our exports. If ever a country had arguments ready to hand to be moulded in a cause, we undoubtedly have them. Yet, with our trade blocked, American trade is allowed to come into the country untrammelled and absolutely unchecked. Do we suppose that we shall get anywhere by merely uttering pious phrases? Is there any reason why, in regard to the things that we do not get from the British Empire or produce ourselves, we should not at least show our good friends to the south that we are determined to take a leaf from their book and be good Americans in this Scotland of the north, and adopt the American tariff in connection with these goods, at least to the extent of agricultural products? There is a way of meeting the situation; but; as I have said, it is not by means of pious and empty gestures. Now, I have dealt with artificial silk, and I think that something can be done in this direction if proper steps are taken.

Mr. McMASTER: The hon. member calls Canada the Scotland of the North American continent. Is he aware that about two hundred years ago the Scotch people talked in the same way about trade coming from England after the union?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: A whole lot of things have happened in that two hundred years.

Mr. McMASTER: Apparently not.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: One thing that happened only two years ago was the Fordney tariff. I wonder whether there is another thought behind my hon. friend's interruption. Scotland is a part of England.

Mr. McMASTER: No.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Shame.

Mr. FORKE: I object to that statement; Scotland is not a part of England.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Well then, I should have said a part of Great Britain. Scotland is a part of Great Britain; but does my hon. friend think that there is any parallel between Scotland, as a part of Great Britain, and Canada, not a part of the United States?

Mr. McMASTER: The parallelism is between the thought of the hon. gentleman now and the thought of the Scotch protectionists of that day, who of course soon saw the error of their ways.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We have dealt with the silk industry, and I want to congratulate my hon. friend on what he is doing for copper, because we ought to be able to make some use of our mines and keep some of our money in the country that is got out of their exploitation. I only regret that the hon. gentleman has not gone further and seen to it that the languishing trades that use copper were looked after. Let me congratulate the minister also on bringing up the matter of hemp. Every now and then countries get national opportunities, generally, unfortunately, at the expense of other nations. To-day we have a great opportunity to go into the hemp industry by reason of the unfortunate position of Russia. We can grow hemp to advantage in the Northwest. Experiments have been carried on over a very wide field and I have no doubt whatever that hemp can be made a very highly productive crop to the western farmers. If there is anything that we ought to do to-day, I think we should above everything else help agriculture where we can, and this is one real practical way of helping it. We at any rate are of that opinion. My right hon. leader (Mr. Meighen) had on the order paper a resolution dealing with this very matter. If there be any way of enlarging the profits of agriculture in Canada to-day it certainly ought to be taken. Not only will it help agriculture, but my hon. friend is right in saying that it will also help us materially. It will help the country as a whole materially, because I think it was last year that we imported some sixteen million dollars' worth of materials, and their place could be entirely taken by hemp grown in the prairie provinces. Therefore I congratulate my hon. friend.

But I do not congratulate him on the result, because I am convinced that this bounty will never be sufficient to get the hemp industry going. It is a five-year bounty, and then it stops. Just contrast the position as between copper bars on the one hand and hemp on the other. In the former case you have an industry already organized and functioning, with great works at the smelter. But in order to make the hemp industry a success the farmers in the districts where hemp can be grown must be instructed in the best methods of cultivation, which takes time—a long time. Copper is sure, it is not dependent upon drought, frost, vermin or anything else; it is there ready to be manufactured. On the other hand, the hemp industry must overcome the various troubles I have enumerated and an entirely new plant must be constructed. Therefore I hope my hon. friend will take into his serious consideration the advisability of greatly extending the length of time for payment of the bonus and the maximum amount. I think the farmers of the West absolutely require the utmost help we can give them, and if we can get hold of a crop which is really going to be a good paying crop—and it is said that this crop is worth from twenty-five to thirty dollars an acre net at the prices of hemp to-day—if we can render any help in this direction it is something which as many farmers as possible in the West ought to participate in. And there are great opportunities for such an industry. Not only our own domestic trade—which, as I have already pointed out, is large—but the possibilities in export trade are tremendous, and I sincerely hope my hon. friend will reconsider the terms of this bounty and make them more generous so that we may make sure of getting this primary industry well established for the benefit of Canada.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to turn for a few minutes to the position of the country and to my hon. friend's plight in connection with his budget. I want to be as fair to him as I possibly can. I do not know exactly which figure he really adopts. He showed increases in customs, post office, Dominion lands, and inland revenue, aggregating $13,315,000, with decreases in excise, investments and other taxes to a total $34,598,000, with a net decrease of $21,283,000. At one point he mentioned that his surplus over ordinary and capital expenditure would be $14,100,000, and that the railways would require $74,500,000. These figures would result in a deficit of $60,400,000. Of course, my hon. friend stated that he hopes something will occur in the meantime, that economies may be effected and that trade will revive, but on the figures given that would be the deficit. On the next page, however, there is another set of figures in which he gives the main estimates, exclusive of railways, at $353,011,255, advances to railways $73,000,000, advances to merchant marine $1,500,000, supplementary estimates $15,900,000, making a total of $443,411,255; with an estimated revenue of $372,517,000; leaving an estimated deficit therefore of $70,889,255. There is a third calculation which may be made and which would increase this deficit, but I do not desire to make it; either set of figures is sufficiently grave—extremely so.

It seems to me that if my hon. friend had delayed bringing down the French treaty until after his budget was out of the way, and he perforce had found how he stood, he never would have brought that treaty down. Why, Mr. Speaker, are the reductions being made which my hon. friend has enumerated? The French treaty. Why are luxuries to be more lightly taxed than the necessaries of life? The French treaty. Why is the tax on Canadian still wine reduced from thirty cents to seven-and-a-half cents at a time when we want every single nickel that we can get? The French treaty. Why is this tax on Canadian sparkling wine of three dollars reduced to one-and-a-half dollars? Again, the French treaty. Why is the reduction in the excise estimated at $5,600,000, unless it be the French treaty? I am confident that if my hon. friend had got out his figures first and had seen where he stood he would not have asked the House to proceed with the French treaty. In a year when we have a deficit of $57,000,000, five-and-a-half years after the war is over, when the government is deliberately budgeting for a deficit next year of $60,000,000 or $70,000,000, depending on how it is figured, but an enormous sum anyway, is it not indeed tragic to think that this is the time chosen to take off taxes on luxuries? But that is what is done. And why? Well, there was the treaty, there were many political considerations to be taken into account appealing to sentiment here and the like—in a word, party politics. And perhaps party politics after all may be expected to figure largely in a budget which has been dictated mainly by political necessity. Of course, it is unpopular to tax or economize but, if there is a tax that can be justified it is the tax on the luxuries brought into this country to the extent of millions and millions of dollars. But our friends had not learned their lesson; they went over with their tariffs as they were. I wish we could get this government imbued with the idea that the business of Canada and the necessities of Canada are greater than the necessity of staying in office or of getting jobs; if we could do that we would have a business budget, something not quite so political in its character. We used to hear statements about the independence of parliament, emanating from gentlemen opposite; how well do they themselves observe it? Let us see what has been taking place. Mr. McCoig goes to the Senate. Mr. Boyer goes to the Senate. Mr. Turgeon goes to the Senate. Mr. Demers becomes a judge. Mr. Stein becomes a judge. Mr. Trahan becomes a judge. Mr. McKenzie becomes a judge. And at this very minute there is an important judicial office held open, for the purpose, as it is generally supposed, of giving another hon. gentleman across the aisle a job. Besides that, Mr. Pacaud gets rewarded with a job in England—and all this in the short time since my hon. friends attained office. Then, we have had an Acting Minister for the Post Office. The government cannot make up its mind even as to a deputy for that department, so that there is no one really in charge. We have an Acting Minister of National Defence. We have no Auditor General; postmasters are holding office and being paid against the provisions of the law. We have no Solicitor General, no Chief Justice of the Exchequer Court. There has been activity in the appointment of commissions. We have Mr. Congdon's commission, which will enable him to have a very nice trip and to amuse himself —another ex-politician. We have the genial Mr. Pugsley, another very eminent Liberal ex-politician. We have that great and good man, Mr. Duncan Marshall, another commissioner. I will not go through all the rest of them—we have the grain inquiry started and we have also the Great Lakes shipping inquiry, the purpose of which is to do something which other governments did without wasting time and before the loss actually occurred.

[Sir Henry Drayton.]

Mr. McMASTER: What?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Did my hon. friend say, "what?"

Mr. McMASTER: I did not catch my hon. friend's last remark.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I will tell him what. In the year 1912 there was an advance in lake freight rates which the then government thought worked an injustice to the farmers, and they promptly repealed the coastal laws. That increase, though, was as nothing compared to what we had last year. The crop moved under those high rates; the coastal laws stood—but a commission is appointed; somebody will get some fees.

Then, we are to have another commission on exports of wood. My hon. friend admitted that there was a timber famine in Canada and that every possible effort should be made in the way of conservation. He pointed out in his speech the right of the private owner to dispose of the product of his lands. Here is a threatened famine of timber; the necessity of conservation and the like is admitted, and the difficulty is stated, namely, the right of the private owner to which I have referred. Well, that difficulty will remain exactly the same no matter how many commissions pass on it or how much money is spent on it. You will have the question whether a man can denude his land to such an extent as to injure his neighbourhood, the question whether or not he stands in the same position as the farmer with his casual crop which is produced and harvested from year to year. If ever there was a case in which a private right, as was stated by the Prime Minister the other day, became a public wrong, it is in connection with the waste of timber, and if ever there was a right of interference, here it is. My hon. friend does not offer one word of argument in answer to the statements made by Mr. Barnjum—and what a fine thing it is, Mr. Speaker, to run across a patriotic individual who does not mind spending his own money and devoting his time and energies to the attainment of some great public object. That is what Mr. Barnjum has done. He demonstrates the famine to my hon. friend, and what is the answer? Oh, another commission. And we shall be just where we were before. I regret that there is no action in this connection which would be in the great interests of our country as a whole.

It is the usual custom, Mr. Speaker, for the official opposition to present an amendment to the budget. We have a good deal of sympathy with our friends to our left. They wanted to get in an amendment last year, but they did not have the opportunity, because under the rule—and we think it is a proper one—only one amendment can in such circumstances be moved. This year we want to give our friends an opportunity of moving any amendment they see fit to present. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, although this budget is so full of holes that the task of drawing an amendment would indeed be easy, we are going to leave that opportunity and that task to my hon. friends to my left.

Mr. ROBERT FORKE (Brandon): Mr. Speaker, before addressing myself to the motion that is now before the House I wish to follow in the steps of the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) and congratulate the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) on the bringing down of his seventeenth budget. Irrespective of the varying shades of political thought prevailing in the different parts of the House, hon. members look with respect upon a man who has occupied so honourable a position for such a considerable length of time in the life of our country. We all rejoice in the fact that the hon. Finance Minister came before us once again, and of him it may well be said that "his eye was not dim, nor his natural force abated."

I wish I were able to turn now to the budget which the hon. Finance Minister has brought down and refer to it in the same words of commendation and praise, but I am afraid I cannot do so. There are some things in the budget that we can accept gratefully; other things we are not so proud of. On the whole I feel satisfied that we have not very much to be thankful for in this budget.

We have listened with a good deal of interest to the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Sir Henry Drayton). I do not think that we can draw very much comfort from the remarks he has made in connection with this budget. So it seems to me that we must fall back upon the members in this quarter of the House and rally to our own support, bringing forward the principles that we believe to be in the best interests of the whole people of Canada.

Mr. STEVENS: You still have the member for Brome (Mr. McMaster), you know.

Mr. FORKE: Possibly some time we may get the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens). While there is life there is hope. I am afraid there will be disappointment in many parts of this country upon the reading of this budget. It has been looked forward to a good deal and much has been expected. It was expected that some relief would be brought to the people of Canada in the different items that were brought down by the Minister of Finance. I noticed a criticism in one of our papers in which it was stated that this was neither a very good nor a very bad budget. I do not know if that is a fairly accurate statement of the case. It is simply a matter of standing pat,—"as you were." There is not very much difference that I can see from the position we occupied last year.

I want to say a few words, in commencing, in regard to the financial position of the country, and in doing so I would repeat some of the figures that were given to the House the other day by the Minister of Finance. We were told that at the end of the fiscal year 1921-22 there was a surplus of $34,391,696.36 over ordinary expenditure, and that after taking care of capital account and a charge of $97,950,645 for the Canadian National Railways we had a deficit that year of $81,256,818. Coming to the year 1922-23 we again had a surplus over ordinary expenditure of $61,839,000, but capital account and a charge of $92, 190,000 against the railways and a deficit of $6,060,720 due to the Canadian government merchant marine left us with a deficit that year of $49,293,086. I think the Minister of Finance made the statement that in these figures we could find some ray of hope because the deficits year by year were getting a little smaller. Well, let us take all the comfort we can out of that situation.

Let us remember, however, the great increase that has been taking place in the public debt during the last fourteen years. Since 1914 there has been an increase in the public debt of over two billion dollars, and we are still adding to it. The time is not yet in sight when we are likely to have our expenditure balance with our receipts. Now that cannot continue. It must come to a stop. In the ordinary business of life if year by year our expenditure is larger than our receipts some day bankruptcy will be the condition that will meet us. And the same is true of a country. I realize that the larger part of this debt was incurred during the war time, and although we think that some steps might have been taken at that time to pay some of the debt as it was incurred by some means that might have been adopted, it is no use going back and criticizing what was done at that time. The debt is here and we have to meet it, and the consideration before us is how are we going to pay this indebtedness.

We hear a good deal about economy, although I think perhaps we are beginning to forget it because I have not heard the word mentioned so much recently. It was very much on the lips of hon. mmebers when we came down here first, and I think
5 p.m. we ought still to keep in our minds the fact that it is necessary to practise economy if we are going to get out of the woods. I saw it stated not very long ago that in Dominion, provincial and municipal taxes the people of Canada pay year by year something like one billion dollars. Just think of it—a population of nine million people carrying a load of taxation of one billion dollars per year. Surely something ought to be done, something must be done, or taxation is going to reach the point where production will cease to some extent at least. With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I want to read a short extract headed "Britain's Example to Canada:"

> In four years of peace the British government has reduced its income from taxation by one-third and has cut its ordinary expenditure by one-half.
> In four years of peace, Canada has increased its revenues from taxation by about one-tenth and has effected a minor increase in its expenditures.
>
> Great Britain has reduced its taxes. Canada has raised its taxes. Great Britain has reduced its expenditures. Canada has increased its expenditures. Great Britain has reduced its debt and thus its annual interest charges. Canada has increased its debt and also its annual interest charges. What Great Britain has done the United States has been able to do as well.

[Mr. Forke.]

Great Britain has adopted a policy of economy in every branch of manufacture. I know the railways can be blamed for the poor showing that we have been making during the last few years, but at the same time I do not think there has been much evidence of economy in the public business of our country during the last few years. The Minister of Finance may find a method of extracting money from the people, and I am willing to admit, Mr. Speaker, that he is most ingenious in his methods of extracting money from the pockets of the taxpayers. That is perhaps his business, but there ought to be some means of practising economy in order that so vast a sum will not be needed to be raised year by year. If the money is found, I think the government will find means of spending it. I do not know just how this economy is going to be brought into play. I have often thought that perhaps the only thing would be to have a stated sum of money apportioned to each minister and he would have to pare his estimates down to come within that sum. I think that is the only possible way, because when a minister sits down to draw up his estimates he will think he absolutely cannot do with anything less than he has asked for. I know that the provincial governments have been practising this sort of economy. They have simply had to make up their minds that there was only so much money to spend and they had to bring down their estimates to suit that amount. That is one method of practising economy in this young and, I hope, growing country. The limit of tax-paying power would be reached, and as I said before that will in time limit production.

I have a few figures here on the growing cost of government in this country which with your permission, Mr. Speaker, I will read. Take civil government—I shall mention only a few departments, and I do not do it in a spirit of criticism but simply to bring the facts before the House at this time. The Department of Agriculture in 1912 had 1,326 employees, and in 1922, 731 employees, but the salaries rose from $943,368 in 1912 to $2,392,309 in 1922. In the Department of the Interior in 1912 there were 720 employees, and in 1922, 1,342 employees. The salaries in 1912 were $862,023 and in 1922, $2,402,680. In the Post Office Department in 1912 the number of employees was 596, and in 1922, 788. The salaries in 1912 were $543,188 and in 1922, $1,348,218. I will not take up time reading reports from the other departments, but I will give the totals:

	Employees	Total salaries
1912	8,371	$ 7,805,373
1922	11,878	19,271,985

I know that the expenses of government have gone up enormously during those ten years, but the population of the country has not increased greatly in that time. We know that the expense of civil government has grown out of all proportion to the increase in our population. I do not know how we are going to remedy it. Speaking from this side of the House, I have realized how unable one who not on the inside is to criticize the different departments, the different estimates and the different expenditures as they come before the House. I believe that that could be done and done more economically if it were done from the government side of the House. But I want to make this prognostication: I believe the government that does it might as well make up its mind that it is going to be out of it for a few years at least. Nevertheless I would like to see governments that had the courage to undertake that house-cleaning that I think is very necessary at the present time.

Another question that I think is largely associated with the government and the expense of running the country is the question of distribution. I believe that our machinery of distribution is much too complicated and is not at all suited to our modern civilization. I think the cost of distribution is altogether out of proportion to the services rendered. We have a good many parasites between the producer and the consumer and when I say this I include manufacturers and all those who are doing good, useful and productive work, no matter what line of business they are in. I am very well aware that distribution is a very important part of the business of the country, but I think it could be shown conclusively, without fear of contradiction, that the increase in the cost between the producer and the consumer is altogether too large on any given article of commerce at the present time. It would not have been difficult for me to bring figures to show that the cost to the consumer is sometimes one hundred per cent and even two hundred per cent higher than the price paid to the producer. That same argument will apply to manufactures, just as it applies to agriculture and other industries of the country. A great deal of wastefulness characterizes the whole system and I believe our economic system lends itself to abuses of this kind, and that under different conditions a great many of the wrongs and injustices could be righted.

In regard to the budget itself, need I say that I am pleased with the few changes that have been made in it? I am not going to particularize the different items mentioned by the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding). Perhaps before the debate is closed all these matters will be discussed at very great length. Therefore, I will content myself with dealing with matters in a general way and leave others to particularize in regard to the different items. There is a maxim I would like to bring to the attention of the House at the present time, and that is if you do not buy you cannot sell. I think that is something that some of us ought to get into our heads, keep there and think over for a good while, because there seems to be an idea that you can sell yourself rich. That is not possible in the field of economics, and the only way you can be successful in business is by carrying on what you might call a successful trade. There is sometimes an idea that in an interchange of commodities one should get the better of, or have an advantage over the other. That is not the true spirit upon which commercial business should be carried on. The true idea would be an interchange of commodities that would benefit both parties concerned, so that we must make up our mind that if we are going to carry on business it will be to a certain extent by carrying on a certain trade.

I am very glad there has been a slight reduction in the British preference in the budget presented to us. Needless to say, anything connected with British trade with Canada interests me a great deal. While a good Canadian, I always look across the Atlantic ocean in my mind's eye, and still have a warm feeling for the Old Land with her many troubles, and any little connection we can have with the Mother Country is something that always brings pleasure to me indeed. I have an item in my hand which I wish to quote to the House. It reads:

> An increase in the flow of trade east and west between Great Britain and Canada would be reflected in an increased prosperity from Halifax to Vancouver. It would mean increased shipments through the ports, increased traffic for the railways, increased demand for Canadian produce abroad and increased purchasing power for the Canadian people as consumers at home.
> This stimulus to trade would help to meet the objections raised by protectionist members that a reduction of the tariff would mean a decline in the national revenue. Canada cannot prevent the United States from erecting tariff obstacles to the flow of trade north and south; but this Dominion can take a step towards stimulating trade east and west by substantially reducing the tariff on British imports.

I will read another short extract in connection with the British situation. I think we ought to have sympathy with Great Britain in her troubles and trials at the present time. This quotation reads:—

> Look at the British situation as it is. Forty-three millions of people can live in the narrow area of the United Kingdom only as long as they can sell abroad their manufactures and their minerals and in return buy food, of which they can produce at home only a few weeks' supply annually. Their resources are increased by the accumulations of capital of other times and by the earnings of their shipping and foreign investments.

But if the foreign markets, go, if they cannot sell goods and buy food, reduction of population is inevitable and as it is postponed misery is inescapable.

That is one of the reasons why I am anxious to see every British preference that is possible for this country to give. Another feature in this connection is the fact that we produce in large quantities. Britain is our best market for agricultural products. We are shipping large quantities of goods, and we hope in the future to ship a great number of cattle. One of the difficulties has been the high freight rates which have been charged on the Atlantic ocean. If we could get a certain amount of return charge for those ships which are carrying our produce abroad, it would be possible for the shipping companies to give us reduced freight rates. Whatever is done, I do hope the government will take steps to see that proper and reasonable ocean freight rates are quoted for shippers who are trying to work up a business in the cattle trade. It will not do for the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) to make a reply to this request that he does not carry transportation in his pocket. We expect the government to pay attention to these things and to see that proper transportaton is afforded for carrying the produce of our country.

I have a few words to say regarding the protective tariff and combines. Protection is an evil in itself. I know my hon. friend (Sir Henry Drayton) would not agree with that statement; but I repeat that I for one am unalterably opposed to the principles of protection. Not only is protection an evil in itself, but there are evils that follow in its train. Protection makes combines, trusts and mergers possible. Although we have a large country, we have a very small population, and it is not very difficult for people within the confines of Canada to form a trust, or merger, or combine for their advantage if they are assisted by a protective tariff. I do not want it to be thought that I am against combinations as such. I believe a combination can be formed for the interest of all concerned, for economy, efficiency in business, and that it can be to the advantage of both producer and consumer. But I maintain that human nature is human nature always, no matter whether it be amongst manufacturers or consumers, and if you place a combination in a position where it can take advantage of the public, it is only human nature that it is very likely to do so. A protective tariff lends itself to that system of things. The public to-day have plenty of evidence of combinations not to the advantage of the consuming public. Any one who has read the newspapers can testify to that fact, and those who have been following the work of the different committees of this House can, I am sure, bear ample evidence to the truth of that statement.

Canada is a land rich in natural resources. If you take into account our natural resources, Canada is, per capita, the richest country in the world. Then why should we as a people have trouble to make a living? I wonder why there should be so many poor people in Canada. Why should we not be the happiest and most prosperous people on the face of the earth at the present time? There must be some reason why this condition of affairs exists. We want a policy that will encourage our basic industries and make available the latent riches of the country. We have the riches; we do not need to create them; all we have to do is to make them available for the use and benefit of the people who dwell in our land.

I should like to recall a promise of last year's budget and to say just a few words in connection with the promises of 1919. I know that is becoming almost a hackneyed phrase in this House, and it should not be repeated too often; but it seems to me the time is opportune to call the attention of the government to some promises that have been made in past times. One of the most disappointing things in connection with the speech delivered by the Minister of Finance was when he began to use the words "finality and stability of tariff." Not very long ago there was a by-election in the constituency of Moose Jaw, and at the Liberal convention to nominate a candidate to support the present government, there was passed a resolution of which I will quote just these few words:

That this meeting re-affirms its endorsation of the tariff policy as laid down by the Liberal Association in Ottawa in August, 1919.

The election took place and, of course, hon. members know what the result was. Let me read this short extract from the Manitoba Free Press:

It now appears that the Progressive candidate in the Moose Jaw by-election will have a majority of well over 1,500 and careful observers both in the East and West interpret the result as containing an important lesson for the government, namely, that more attention must be paid to the needs of the West. The tariff was one of the main issues in the election and the result represents the insistent voice of this part of the country for substantial relief from the burden which the tariff imposes on the Western farmer.

I will read these few words from the Lethbridge Herald, an independent Liberal journal:

Had the Liberals done something substantial to carry out their Ottawa platform, they might have made inroads upon the Progressive strength in the rural sections, but the Progressives were able to convince the electors that practically no attempt had been made to carry out the tariff planks of the Liberal platform, particularly. This was a handicap to the Liberal candidate, and accounts largely for his defeat. If Ottawa will only now interpret western sentiment, as represented by the Progressives, to be genuine, it may be able to do something substantial to meet it and recover some of the ground lost in the West by the Liberals in recent years. If the standpat sentiment, however, is permitted to prevail, there is little possibility of a change in sentiment on the prairies.

I might read a little more, but I think that is sufficient. I should like to say to the government that, as regards the West and, perhaps, over a large part of Canada, that is the handwriting on the wall.

Mr. CALDWELL: Make that East as well as West.

Mr. FORKE: It has just been suggested to me that I might say East as well as West. It is the handwriting on the wall. We have had promises and promises, and some other method must be taken to implement those promises than waiting upon the government to do so. I said there were changes for which we were thankful, and other speakers may deal with them as the debate proceeds. I will say once again that there is a feeling of disappointment, I know, particularly in the prairie provinces at this time. I have had ample evidences of that fact since the budget has been brought down. We hear of people leaving Canada to-day; we hear that our manufacturers are not able to compete. As one who wishes well for Canada, as a lover of Canada, I do not like to repeat those statements. There must be a reason why our people are leaving us to-day, and there must also be a reason why our manufacturers are not able to compete and to hold their own in the business world. Living as I do in my home very near the international line, I am going to state what I know to be facts. Perhaps they are not always pleasant to hear, but we might just as well know the truth. Everyone who is living by agricultural work on the northern side of the international boundary, knows very well that the farmers on the south side of the line are receiving higher prices for their produce than Canadian farmers are getting. That is a fact there is no disputing. I do not know whether I would grumble much about it, because I cannot help it. But there is another side of the matter when you consider that everything the Canadian farmer purchases, he has to pay just a little more for than the man living on the south side of the line. Perhaps our situation may explain that fact to some extent; but the fact that confronts us is that our agriculturists get less for their produce, pay more for what they have to buy and their overhead is larger than is the case on the other side of the line. It costs something to be a Canadian sometimes, in money, in dollars and cents. I do not want to be misunderstood, so I should like to make this statement. I said in commencing that I am British in sentiment. I am thoroughly Canadian from first to last and I will sink or swim with my country to the bitter end. But I do not think it is any part of patriotism to hide facts that are, perhaps, working to the detriment of the prosperity of our country as a whole. I have no pleasure in repeating these things; still I think they ought to be said, and the people of this country ought to know the facts of the case.

Why is Canada a dear country to live in? As I said before, it is a country of great natural resources, one that produces in great abundance all the common necessities of life; yet it is one of the most expensive countries on the face of the globe to-day in which anyone can live. Why is that? It is simply because we are living under artificial conditions and are not pursuing the true and the natural lines of business and economics. The mechanic, the labourer, the professional man, the business man, must have a high remuneration in their respective spheres if they are to make a living in this country; and I declare that we are going to have hard times and experience great difficulty in competing with other countries just so long as that high cost of living is maintained and just so long as Canada in consequence remains, as she undoubtedly is, one of the most expensive countries in the civilized world to-day. The manufacturers complain. Well, I have great sympathy for the manufacturers, notwithstanding that a good many people sometimes entertain the idea that because we talk low tariff we are opposed to manufacturing industries. I only wish that those industries were able to carry on successfully. But I believe, Sir, that some of their troubles are attributable to the very fact that I have been labouring, namely, the high cost of living, which we have to contend with. If a mechanic, an artisan, or a factory worker wants to build a house for himself he is met at the very outset with a tremendous estimate of expenses; if he wants to buy a suit of clothes he is called upon to pay an exorbitant price. So that the worker must have high wages; and this process continuing, the vicious circle is completed and in the end the manufacturer finds himself confronted with a high wage list.

In the past it has been a very common thing whenever any industry has got into difficulties for those engaged in it to journey to Ottawa and secure a little more protection for that particular enterprise. No doubt this protection was well intended; the idea was to help the business along for the time being in the hope that in the not very distant future it would become successful and prosperous, when the assistance given in its time of trouble could be withdrawn. Looking back however, over fifty or sixty years we are perfectly convinced that this argument will no longer hold water; we know quite well that once assistance is given it is retained.

Now, Sir, that cannot continue; we have reached the limit. I repeat that the cost of living must come down and production must be made cheaper, although I know very well that the statement is often made that this cannot be done. But some people believe that with efficient methods of conducting business, with up-to-date machinery, with conditions all as they should be, and given the skill, the energy, and the business abilities of the Canadian people, the cost of production can unquestionably be reduced and the cost of living consequently lowered to the benefit of the consumer and of the whole population as well. There are many people who hold this view and I am one of them. I do not like to make the statement, Mr. Speaker, but I fear that if the cost of production cannot be decreased, then some of the industrial plants in this country will have to go out of business. I should be sorry to see this done; I want to see them rather increased. But we must face the facts; if they cannot carry on under existing conditions they will have to cease operations.

The taxing of commodities increases prices and lessens consumption, so that you have fewer contracts, less work done, and consequently unemployment. If you can buy two suits of clothes at $50 each instead of one suit for $100 the manufacturer employs twice the number of persons who can make clothes; and that argument is easily demonstrable. The higher the price of material and the greater the inability of people to purchase, the greater the unemployment. I believe that the cause of unemployment in a great many instances in this country is due to the fact that people are not able to purchase goods that are already manufactured. The business man complains, and surely he realizes that when business is slow he must necessarily suffer. Surely by this time the business man of Canada must begin to realize that he is in the same boat and sinks or swims with the great industries throughout the Dominion. I have here a small clipping from the Montreal Witness, which with the permission of the House I will read.

Is it not a little cold-blooded, is it not a little insolent—

This is the Witness's language——for comfortable people in other walks of life to snarl at the producers upon whom they are living and tell them to stop croaking? If this supercilious and, let us frankly add, dangerous, attitude means anything, it means that the farmers have no ground for their demand to be released from the burdens which make their life that of slaves to the ruling part of the community. These people find themselves bound to the soil—to hard unpaid-for work for the men and harder work for the women—while every one who is free moves away, either to skim the cream off a fresh acreage or to some other employment, often some other country, where to be a Canadian is a commendation to employment.

Whatever may be said about question of employment or unemployment, the manufacturer and the farmer are in the same boat; if times are dull they cannot make business pay. It is not easy for them to pull up stakes and leave the country, or enter into some other occupation at home. I should like very much indeed, Mr. Speaker, to see a closer bond of sympathy between the agricultural community and the manufacturers of the country, and no spirit of hostility ever induces me to speak in the strain in which I sometimes do speak. Last year a great stream of wealth poured down from the western prairies through eastern Canada to the Old Country. I want to tell the House that this is what kept the wheels of industry moving at that time. It was not protection; it was no system of economics; it was because a certain amount of wealth had been created from the soil and went to grease the wheels of industry in Canada. But we are met face to face with this condition: If it should be found that the remuneration of those who produce that wealth is not sufficient to procure them a decent livelihood, is it not probable that the stream may cease to flow at no distant date? I want to point out to the House, therefore, that it is in the interests not only of the West but of all Canada as well that the agricultural industry should be placed upon a footing where it will be advantageous to the people engaged in it. I say this with no sectional feeling. No hon. member in this House who hears statements made by gentlemen representing every part of the Dominion can fail to realize that there are difficulties in all walks of life, and that every part of the Dominion has its own peculiar troubles. I do believe, however, that there is not a proper estimate of the great wealth that is yet to come from the western prairies if the right conditions are brought to bear upon that great land.

I am very proud of this Canada of ours; but all the same I cannot but believe that a great many eastern Canadians do not understand the potentialities that lie in the development of that vast land, an empire in itself. No one can fully estimate these potentialities, which may be realized in actual wealth in the not distant future, if the proper conditions are brought about in the interests of those who are trying to develop that part of our Dominion.

I do not know whether all my hon. friends agree with me on the question of immigration. However, whatever may be said on the subject, I think it will be agreed that if we can so get conditions in Canada that people will believe that this is a good country to live in, and will come in great numbers, our great difficulties in taxation and our railway troubles will to a very large extent disappear. I realize the perplexing problems which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) has to cope with to-day; I realize the tremendous amount of money that must be raised, year by year; and it is in no spirit of opposition. in no spirit of criticism that I offer the remarks I make to-day. I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, I would much rather have stood up in my place and endorsed the budget. Nothing but a sense of duty and a sincere belief that the welfare of our country makes it absolutely essential that a different course should be taken has induced me to take this stand.

The hon. member for West York referred to ideals and sentiments. Well, there is undoubtedly a good deal of sentiment in human life, and, after all, hard as business may be and matter of fact, we cannot ignore sentiment in everyday life. It is perhaps a bold assertion for me to make, but it does seem to me that the civilized nations of the world have an altogether wrong ideal. I do not know what we are heading for but commercial rivalry and industrial war. This does seem a hard thing to say, but such must be the inevitable result of present-day conditions. I believe that the building up of high tariff walls engenders hatred, jealousy, and distrust among the nations of the world. In all solemnity I express my belief that the last great catastrophe that overtook the world had its source in commercial rivalry, in the idea that Germany wanted a place in the sun, a full share of all privileges from the commercial standpoint. This has not anything particularly to do with my argument; I merely interject it by the way.

We have heard from time to time in this House considerable criticism of the speeches delivered from this quarter of the chamber descriptive of western conditions. I do not think that these conditions were in any way overstated in relation to certain parts of western Canada. While some isolated statements might be taken exception to as perhaps not giving an exact impression of prevailing conditions, yet upon the whole what was said was well within the facts. We talk a good deal of what our immigration policy is to be, and thousands of dollars are to be spent on advertising to attract immigrants. But, Mr. Speaker, I wonder if we realize sufficiently the great volume of correspondence that flows between Canada and Great Britain day by day and year by year, those who have come out here telling their friends at home just how things are going with them in Canada? I can assure you, sir, that if the letters sent to the Mother Land were full of news of prosperity and good times we would have a tremendous volume of immigration, and no advertisements would be needed to induce people to make their homes in the Dominion.

I hope that I have not said anything that will in any way hurt the feelings of those who I have no doubt have the interests of Canada just as much at heart as I have. What I have said has been uttered in all sincerity and in the full belief that it is in the best interests of Canada that I should be frank in expressing my opinions. Let me repeat that I have the greatest love for this my adopted country, and that I have no thought at any time but what is for the advancement of my fellow citizens.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker I beg to move, seconded by the hon. member for Last Mountain (Mr. Johnston):

That all the words after the word "that" be struck out, and the following be substituted therefor:

Whereas the tariff policy of the government, as indicated by the Minister of Finance in his budget speech, and particularly his pronouncement in favor of tariff stability at existing rates, and the consequent intimation that the government contemplates no further appreciable tariff reduction, constitutes a repudiation of the tariff planks in the Liberal platform of 1919 and is inconsistent with the Finance Minister's statement last session that the changes then made were a step in the right direction;

And whereas the fiscal policy of the government as now brought down is based on the principle of protection, and in this respect is indistinguishable from that of their predecessors in office;

And whereas the condition of the primary industries and the position of consumers in general is such as to demand immediate relief;

Therefore, be it resolved: That while recognizing that changes in the fiscal policy should be made in such a way as to give industries affected a reasonable opportunity for readjustment, this House is of the opinion that the principle of protection as a basis for fiscal policy in Canada is unsound, and that every claim for protection should be heard publicly before a special committee of parliament.

And, further, that the best interests of Canada will be served by:—

(a) An immediate and substantial reduction in the tariff, particularly on the necessaries of life and the implements of production.

(b) An immediate increase in the British preference to 50 per cent of the general tariff.

(c) Reciprocity in trade with the United States as outlined in the proposed Reciprocity Agreement of 1911.

And, further that the loss of revenue, if any, which might result from a reduction in customs duties should be made good by:

(a) The readjustment and extension of the income tax to bear more heavily on unearned incomes.

(b) The increase and extension of excise and other taxes on luxuries.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Centre Winnipeg): Mr. Speaker, I should like to express my agreement with a great deal of what has been said by the leader of the Progressives (Mr. Forke) and also to concur in the general lines of the amendment which has been presented. I would, however, like to point out that in the opinion of the group which I represent, the mere bringing about of a larger measure of free trade does not really touch the root of the trouble to-day. The leader of the Progressives has stressed the need for greater economy. We believe that we should have economy in our different government departments; we believe that there should be elimination of all duplication, elimination of all effort that is not really productive in character. At the same time we do not believe that, essentially, economy will solve our problems to-day. Rather we would point out that the necessity is to touch the real sources of wealth; not merely to cut down our expenses, but to recognize that if we adequately administer our natural resources, with the equipment we now have there will be sufficient to carry on all the administrative machinery of this country and at the same time provide for the needs of individuals and their families. We believe we ought to get down deeper than the question of free trade or the question of economy and ask ourselves whether the time has not come in our industrial and political history when there ought to be some radical social adjustments in our whole economic system.

The budget has been said to be a disappointment. I do not know that some of us had expected it would be very different from what it is. I am not so sure but that it is a good thing that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) has come out frankly and stated that he would like to see the policies incorporated in the budget made more or less a permanent policy for Canada. We understand now more clearly, and I think the country understands more clearly, that the present Liberal government is committed to very much the same kind of policy as that of the government that it superseded. In fact, it is very interesting to some of us to find the members of the Conservative group congratulating the Minister of Finance on having learned the principles which they have advocated so long. Essentially the budget reveals an intention to perpetuate the old policies. There is nothing to indicate any radical changes in the policy of this country; we are still going on what has been known for a great many years in Canada as the National Policy. There is not even any indication of a gradual alteration; rather, as I have said, the Minister of Finance has thrown out the suggestion that the manufacturers and others ought to be assured that there will be no great changes. The people generally are looking for light at this time, they are wondering in what direction the light will break. I think we may say it is clear that the light is not breaking from the quarter occupied by the Liberal party. In the Liberal manifesto issued in October, 1921, publication number 11, we read that the tariff policy——advocated placing implements of production and food on the free list, thus benefiting labour both as producers and consumers.

That promise seems to have been entirely forgotten; indeed, in some instances at least the duty on the necessities of life has been greatly increased.

An hon. MEMBER: What about raisins?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes—raisins. I have the following telegram from the Women's Labour League:

Sugar resolution protest forwarded yesterday. Latest advice on budget housewives note proposed increased duty on raisins will increase final cost at least four cents per pound. Raisins and currants are household necessity and we feel present duty of two-thirds cents per pound high enough and government should find ways and means of raising necessary taxes without penalizing the housewife.

I should like to quote an oft quoted passage from an address by one who stands very high in the opinion of a great many men across the floor of the House, and, I think, in the opinion of the country at large—Wilfrid Laurier. In a convention speech before he came into power he said:

> If every cent collected through the operation of the protective policy went into the treasury it could be borne, but for every dollar that goes into the public coffers two or three dollars go into the pockets of the protected manufacturers. . . . We will relieve the people of protection, which is a fraud, a delusion and a robbery. For it is a robbery to take money from one man and give it to another.

It seems very strange that the Progressives after all these years have to advance this plank of free trade and urge that protection is essentially evil in itself.

With regard to the general attitude of the government toward our larger public questions, I should like to read also a note that was sent to the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) a few weeks ago. This comes from the Montreal Unemployed Workers' Association:

> We note that almost half of the budget will be applied in payment for past wars and in preparations for future wars and it would appear to us that something could have been expected from the government for the preservation of life and the building up of a higher grade of citizens. While the government, evidently, has no regard for the welfare of the workers of this country, we note their great interest in cattle and farm stock. To such an extent are they interested in the latter, that nearly three millions of dollars is voted to wipe out disease and in improving the type of stock. We cannot be blamed if we come to the conclusion that we as human beings in the working class are considered of less value than cows, horses and pigs. We do not say that the grant should not have been given; on the contrary we believe that it is a good investment, but at the same time we feel that the unemployed workers are entitled to some consideration.

The Minister of Finance seems to be very much concerned—chiefly concerned, shall I say?—over the question, how shall we raise the necessary money, and how can we so raise it as to give occasion for the least protest? It would appear as if there were some larger and more primary questions that should be asked at this time. We are running a vast machine and it seems as if it takes all the steam that we can generate to keep it going—there is no power left to pull the load. We must admit that with our small population we have altogether too extensive governmental machinery. I think of this large House here, with the Senate across the way; I think of all the departments that we have at Ottawa, of our provincial governments, in some cases with two Houses in a province, of the many departments connected with them; of the county machinery in some of the provinces, the municipal machinery, all on an elaborate scale. The fact is that our comparatively small population cannot begin to carry such a load as this, and the people are beginning to get out from under it. It has been said by one of the members on the government side that you cannot blame ambitious young men for going over to the United States, that you cannot blame people for seeking the higher wages over there. I am not sure just what their position ought to be from the patriotic standpoint, but I take it that we who are here charged with public responsibility are attempting to do the most patriotic duty possible when we try to get at the real evils underlying the present condition of affairs.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker, when the House rose I was trying to point out that the time had come in the history of this country when we should be concerned not merely with the questions of how to raise a certain amount of money, and how to raise it with the least protest, but that rather we must face some of the more fundamental questions which are before us. A great many of the citizens to-day are looking for the government to take stock, as it were, of the actual situation, in which we find our country, and to introduce those measures, however radical, that are really necessary to meet the present situation. I ventured to point out in passing that we could hardly look at the legislative and administrative machinery of government of this country without recognizing that we are organized on altogther too elaborate a scale, involving an expense heavier than our population really warrants. Our federal, provincial and municipal organization is very elaborate and very costly, and in some way we must cut this down. Just where reforms are to begin is a question. In this House, the highest legislative body in the land, we might well set ourselves to the task of reorganizing our governmental machinery. But further than that, much deeper than that, is the question of the organization of the whole economic resources of the country and their proper administration. I have tried to secure from the Dominion Bureau of Statistics some estimate as to the wealth of Canada. The officials gave me a rough approximation of the value of our developed resources. It is almost impossible to form any estimate as to the value of the undeveloped resources, the value of the water powers and so on, but the statement furnished by the bureau was as follows—

Farm values in 1921	$3,196,876,000
Buildings	1,035,712,000
Implements	391,660,000
Live stock	766,720,000
Poultry	38,007,000
Animals on fur farms	5,824,000
Mines and forests	1,200,000,000
Fisheries	50,405,000
Steam and electric railways	2,687,000,000
Canals	137,000,000
Shipping	200,000,000
Telegraph and telephones	191,000,000
Urban real property	4,115,050,000
Manufacturing machinery	666,835,335
Stocks of raw material to manufacture goods	789,513,000
Stored products of farms, fisheries and mines	500,000,000
Household furnishings, clothing, carriages, motors, etc.	800,000,000
Specie	193,603,304
Imported merchandise in store	250,000,000
Total for Canada	$17,215,205,639

Surely, when we talk about the poverty of Canada, we cannot be thinking of our vast natural resources and the equipment to work those resources. I would call your attention in this statement to the one item, specie, which amounts to only about 1 per cent. We are making a great deal of fuss these days about whether or not we have gold. According to the statement of the Bureau of Statistics, the gold that we have in this country amounts to only about 1 per cent of the entire national wealth. It is really a negligible quantity, and when bankers are trying to impress upon us the necessity of a return to the gold standard, whatever that means, we may very well bear in mind that the actual amount of specie we have in Canada does not matter very much one way or another.

Next, having given a statement of our physical assets, as it were, I should like to turn and ask: What about our annual production? Again these figures are supplied by the Bureau of Statistics:

Estimated gross annual agricultural revenue, 1921	$1,396,233,000
Fur industry, 1920-21	10,152,000
Forestry, 1920	306,661,000
Fisheries, 1920	49,241,000
Minerals, 1921	172,431,000
Manufactures, 1920	1,830,145,000

That is the net value added in manufactures.

Transportation and communication, 1920	$ 603,134,000
Professional (very rough estimate)	200,000,000
Wholesale and retail trade (very rough estimate)	600,000,000
Total production	$5,167,997,000

Let me note that with a capital of $17,000,000,000 as given by the Bureau of Statistics, we produced, according to the estimate of the bureau, about $5,000,000,000, or about 30 per cent. The value of production per capita is $585, or, taking a family of five, $2,925. That is, keeping in mind the immense amount of unemployment and under-employment, the very small percentage of efficiency in our productive and distributional processes, the over-lapping, the lack of proper organization on the one hand and over-organization on the other, the general anarchy that prevails in our industrial, commercial and financial world—taking all this into consideration, the fact is that we yet produce for an average family something like $3,000 a year.

I want to come a little closer in our study of one particular industry where the figures are more readily available than in some others. That is the manufacturing industry. The figures in connection with the manufacturing industry of Canada in 1920 are as follows:

Value of products	$4,019,371,869
Cost of materials	2,189,227,028
Net value of products	$1,830,144,841
Total wages and salaries	814,412,677
Leaving a balance of	$1,015,732,164

I should just like to ask the question: For what and for whom is that immense balance? I note that, according to these figures, the average salary is $1,773, and the average wage is $1,102.

Let me give another note supplied by the Bureau of Statistics. The fixed capital invested amounted to, say, $3,500,000,000, and the value of the products to, say, $4,000,000,000, representing a net production of $1,800,000,000. The par value of securities of joint stock companies engaged in manufactures amounts to $2,743,520,823, of which $1,591,076,596, were held in Canada and the rest outside of Canada, so that dividends, bond interest, etc., were paid in these proportions. Altogether Canada's indebtedness outside of Canada has been estimated at about $400,000,000,000. According to those figures, in the manufactures of Canada in 1920, salaries and wages accounted for 44·5 per cent of the value added by the process of manufacture; fuel and miscellaneous expenses, 26·9 per cent; interest on capital investment at 6 per cent, 11·3 per cent; leaving a balance of 17.3 per cent for profits, discount charges, depreciation and other unprovided-for expenditures.

I should like to turn for a moment to the other side of the ledger and ask concerning our national debt. These figures also are furnished by the Bureau of Statistics for the year ended March 31, 1922. The net public debt amounted to $2,422,135,801, or, per capita, $275.60. I turn to the provincial governments. There we have both direct liabilities and indirect liabilities. Of the direct liabilities, the per capita figures are as follows:

Prince Edward Island	$ 17 10
Nova Scotia	42 96
New Brunswick	77 69
Quebec	24 71
Ontario	69 86
Manitoba	119 74
Saskatchewan	60 63
Alberta	108 12
British Columbia	115 52

Further than that, our municipal debenture or bond interest by provinces is as follows—I again give merely the per capita figures:

Prince Edward Island	$12 28
Nova Scotia	36 64
New Brunswick	27 95
Quebec	80 55
Ontario	91 94
Manitoba	94 77
Saskatchewan	52 26
Alberta	97 21
British Columbia	183 21

I am going to take Manitoba, my own province, as an example of particular interest to myself. The national net public debt per capita is $275.60; provincial direct liabilities $119.74; municipal debentures and bonded debts $94.77; a total of $490.11, or roughly speaking $500. A newspaper editorial, commenting upon a similar set of figures, says:

> It is common knowledge that the net national debt has been increased approximately eight times during the last decade with very little increase in the population. President Gooderham, of the Bank of Toronto, in his statement at the annual meeting of that institution, said that the total debts of the federal and provincial governments and municipalities amounted to $4,000,000,000, or about $500 per head. This is a staggering statement when it is borne in mind that the greater part of this indebtedness is now bearing more than five per cent interest, which means that the average family is bearing an annual interest charge of at least $100 a year for public expenditure alone.

Then we find this situation: Illimitable natural resources in Canada. No one doubts it. It is not necessary to go into an enumeration of what they are. Further, we are well equipped with an elaborate system of production and distribution; we are, on the whole, an industrious and resourceful people. And yet for some mysterious reason we have unemployment on the part of a considerable section, anxiety on the part of a still larger group, and general dissatisfaction. What do we find the government offering us in view of all these circumstances? Well, they are taking a tax off candies and putting a little higher duty on raisins. Is that a proper solution for the immense problems that we face at the present time?

I should like to-night, as well as I may, to present this question from the viewpoint of labour. We have had the problem outlined this afternoon from the viewpoint of the farmer. Labour, as yet, in this country is poorly organized politically. We are very few in number in this House, and yet it is clearly manifest to all that labour is by no means negligible numerically across the country, and one day its voice will be heard more effectively than it is to-day. The viewpoint presented to us by the leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Forke) this afternoon was very largely that of free trade. Now, I would suggest that free trade came into existence as an economic gospel at a time when there was real competition among the trading classes of Great Britain. At that time undoubtedly it was in the interests of the manufacturers, the traders, and perhaps the public at large in England that there should be a very large measure of free trade. But there have taken place most remarkable developments in the economic field since that time. All our large industries have been built up, our great combinations and trusts have been organized, and our governments themselves have been induced to take a larger part in the economic affairs of the country. So that it is very doubtful indeed whether, except in a very limited degree, free trade will solve our problems. I, for one, am heartily in agreement with it, the underlying principle, but I doubt whether it can be carried out under existing conditions. Even if it were, as it has been in free trade England, there are still unemployment and social difficulties. I doubt, therefore, whether it is a real solution of our problems. So far as labour is concerned, socialism is the economic gospel of the labour movement, as free trade is, or was, the economic gospel of the trading classes of Great Britain at the time when political Liberalism came to its best development. In Great Britain, however, we have had in recent years new political ideals and alignments. A good many in this House like to stress the part that Great Britain has played, and to point out to us the example that Great Britain affords us. Well, I am content to follow their lead, and to-night I should like to indicate the policies that are being advocated these days by the opposition party in the British House of Commons.

The great British National Labour party starts out on this programme:

> To secure for the producers by hand or by brain the full fruits of their industry, and the most equitable distribution thereof that may be possible, upon the basis of the common ownership of the means of production and the best obtainable system of popular administration and control of each industry or service.

It has been said in the past that socialism, whether of a co-operative variety, or the Fabian type, or state socialism, was altogether an academic question. Someone stated on the floor of the House the other day that it would never find any place in any Anglo-Saxon country. We cannot be quite so sure of that when it has become a matter of practical politics in Great Britain. A few weeks ago the following resolution was introduced into the British House of Commons as an amendment, I believe, to the budget:

That in view of the failure of the capitalist system to adequately utilize and organize natural resources and productive power, or to provide the necessary standard of life for vast numbers of the populations, and believing that the cause of this failure lies in the private ownership and control of the means of production and distribution, this House declares that legislative effort should be directed to the gradual supersession of the capitalist system by an industrial and social order based on the public ownership and democratic control of the instruments of production and distribution.

This resolution was introduced by Mr. Philip Snowden. Now, whether or not the members of this House can agree with such a resolution as that, it does seem to me highly desirable that we in the various dominions should know what is taking place in the Motherland, and that we in the opposition in some of the Houses in the dominions should try to bring before the public of this country what some of the leading people in Great Britain believe will be the solution of our social problems. You will notice that this is a very moderate resolution indeed. In some countries the labouring classes in desperation have rushed in, have overturned the present system, and are attempting to set up another. The British Labour party does not propose to do that. It offers at least an alternative solution. Whether or not the country is in a position to adopt the alternative remains to be seen, but at least it is put forward as a possible solution. The far reaching character of this resolution was clearly set forth by Mr. Lloyd George in an article which was published in our papers of April 21. I should like to quote a paragraph or two from that article because Mr. Lloyd George is a critic of these labour proposals, and so, perhaps, his estimate of the seriousness of this resolution may be regarded as being moderate. Speaking of the socialist vote, Mr. Lloyd George said:

At the last election the aggregate socialist poll reached the imposing figure of 4,251,011 votes. The party that secured a majority of members in the House of Commons polled only 5,467,871 votes. Mr. Ramsay Macdonald states categorically that he knows that independent Liberal members—exclusive of their leaders—favour nationalization and a capital levy. If that be an accurate statement of the views of the majority of these gentlemen and of those who elect them, nearly one half of the British electorate are already prepared to assent to Socialism in easy stages—which is the purport of Mr. Philip Snowden's motion.

On that assumption we are on the eve of greater and more fundamental changes affecting the lives of every class and condition of men and women than has yet been seen in this country. Hence the new sense of struggle with which the political atmosphere is palpitating. Capitalism is to be arraigned before the supreme court of the nation, condemned, sentenced and executed by instalments—Chinese fashion. The composition of that court is not to-day favourable to the prosecution. But who will be the judges after the next general election?

Again:

The men and women who have no property for the state to seize constitute an overwhelming majority of the electors of the country.

And again in suggesting how to avoid trouble:

The second and more important is the rooting out of social evils which furnish the revolutionary with striking and indisputable object lessons of the failure of the capitalistic system as an agent of human happiness.

I take it that we are in this position—either we have to advance to some radical programme of this kind, or we have to say there must take place such fundamental changes as will do away with the gross injustices which now exist.

Mr. H. G. Wells says:

The great war has struck a blow at the very foundation of our civilization. It has shattered the monetary system which is the medium of all our economic life. A rotting down of civilization is spreading now very rapidly and nothing is being done to arrest it.

And this fate is not threatening civilization; it is happening to civilization before our eyes. The ship of civilization is not going to sink in five years' time or in fifty years' time. It is sinking now.

I am well aware, Mr. Speaker, that certain hon. members are prejudiced against some of those who hold what they regard as radical views. Perhaps few of us realize how radical are many of the critics of the social system, how clearly they recognize that if Socialism, as they have pictured it, is not to come into existence, then almost equally radical changes must take place in society. I believe a great many members of this House are loyal adherents of the great Catholic church. Might I then quote a statement written for the Halifax Evening Mail by Dr. J. J. Tompkins, Vice-President of the St. Francis Xavier University? He says:

The average Conservative citizen who does not feel the pinch of want, as so many of the exploited poor do, or who is not actively engaged in "industry" has not begun to realize the grave import of these facts—indeed, the facts themselves have scarcely dawned upon his consciousness. Such a man would probably be startled to read in a recent cable despatch the proceedings of a meeting of Catholic bishops and priests presided over by Cardinal Logue. Describing the conditions that menaced society, one of the speakers said that by degrees workingmen had been delivered helpless and isolated to the hardheartedness of employees and the greed of unchecked competition; that the mischief had been increased by the rapacious usury of financiers; and that to these evils was added the custom of doing work by large contracts which concentrated many branches of business in the hands of a few individuals.

It followed as a dreadful consequence, therefore, that "a small number of very rich men had been able to lay upon the teeming masses of the labouring poor a yoke little better than slavery itself". The remedies are proposed in language equally frank and outspoken: "We should not shrink from the application of Catholic social principles however startling or revolutionary they may appear to persons long adjusted to prevailing circumstances. We must make up our minds that the wage system has to go. The wage system is degenerating into industrial anarchy before our very eyes. It is doing more than Socialism to restrict ownership. The worker must be made a partner so that he may get a proper share of the income earned by his work."

Many ecclesiastical authorities as well as those representing various types of social work and economic thought, have united in bringing before our attention the indisputable fact that to-day we are face to face with a serious crisis. I have spoken of this world situation because I believe that we in Canada are simply part of a larger world, and that our troubles are simply systematic of the troubles that exist in the whole body politic. For that reason I crave the indulgence of the House while I explain how we of the labour movement believe that we have arrived at the present stage of development in our economic and political life.

Going back to the England of one hundred and fifty years ago we come to a great change, which is known to historians as the industrial revolution. Before that time the great majority of workers produced by means of a few simple tools all that was necessary for themselves and their immediate neighbours. Then came the introduction of machinery and the application of mechanical power. That changed entirely the course of the history of Great Britain and of the world at large. It ushered in a completely new era, so different from the past that students of economic history have called it a revolution. The use of machinery meant greatly increased production. Commodities were turned out sufficient not merely for the local markets, not merely for the immediate county, not merely for England herself, but for the whole world. England became the workshop of the world. Not only that, but processes of standardization were introduced, which meant that the people generally began to consume much more nearly the same class of things, and therefore the market could be supplied much more readily. Things went well so long as England was the only workshop in the world; but gradually other nations began to introduce the modern type of production—France, Italy, later Germany, later the United States, and last of all the Orient, so that to-day we have the same kind of system prevailing throughout the greater part of the world.

Now, I submit that while this system may have been fairly tolerable and, indeed, beneficial in Great Britain while she was the only country that manufactured in this way, this same system may prove anything but desirable when a large number of countries have adopted it. However, I want to give the system its full due. Undoubtedly it has led to the development of what we regard as our modern industrial civilization. Here in Canada until a few years ago the large majority of us lived in the country or in small rural towns where we had very much the same type of production that prevailed in England one hundred and fifty years ago. It is within the memory of most of us that these changes have taken place in Canada. The trouble is that a good many of us are still thinking in terms of individualistic production. Our ideals are still those of the individual producer, as our institutions are largely those that prevailed before this great world change took place. The industrial revolution has affected most profoundly farm life as well as city life. it is only making itself manifest to-day. To a considerable extent the farmer is still an individual producer, and yet the farmer would be helpless to-day without his machinery. Our western farmers would be in a sad plight without the railways that bring his supplies and take away his goods. In fact, as soon as the farmer steps off his own farm he becomes a cog in this vast machinery of production and distribution However, he is still to a limited extent the owner of the tools of production and so perhaps he has not quite so clearly realized the character of the machine as has his industrial neighbour in the city.

The machine was applied to transportation, and we have our transcontinental railroads and our transoceanic steamship lines. These have really brought all the different parts of the earth into one great community. Still, we sometimes talk as if we lived a narrow national life. The fact is that industry and commerce and finance have spread away beyond the confines of narrow national boundaries. Whether we like it or not we are to-day living in an international community. That is the point we must remember. One of the difficulties is that we are still thinking in terms of the parish, in terms of the little country, in terms of one continent, instead of in world terms.

Not only was production fundamentally altered in its character, but the industrial revolution wrought a very decided change in the economic status of the worker. As long as a man, with his own hands and a few tools, could provide for his own needs, he might have been said to be a free man. If he did not produce, it was his own fault; if he did not make his living, it was his own fault. But when the big factory was set up and in order to carry on his work of weaving he had to leave his hand loom and to go to the factory then he ceased to have that freedom which once he possessed; he became simply a wage worker. He had no control over his tools of production; he had no voice in the management; he had nothing to say with regard to the disposal of his product. The owner of the factory claimed to own the product because he owned the machinery, and thus the hitherto free workman of Great Britain was reduced to being simply a hired man, a wage earner, or as he himself sometimes bitterly puts it, a wage slave. There is a good deal of truth in that expression; for whoever controls a man's livelihood really controls his life. I could make this position of the industrial worker understandable by our farmer friends if I could picture a great syndicate coming into the West and buying up several thousand square miles of territory and proceeding to organize it under scientific management. The individual farmer would become simply a tenant, a hired man. Possibly he would be compelled to give up the little home in which he had been brought up and to go and live at some central point from which the farm operations would be carried on. He would have nothing to say as to the disposal of his product; from then on, he would be reduced to the position of being forever a hired man and his children forever hired men. That is the position of the industrial worker. In this connection I should like to submit that perhaps the farmer is not so very far from reaching that position. Statistics from the southwestern states so long ago as Roosevelt's commission, on agricultural conditions showed that in increasing numbers the farmers were becoming merely tenants. Out in the West a year or two ago a farmer, who had the impression that we wanted to nationalize the private farms—which was not our idea at all—said, "After all, I would be quite willing that the state should own the farms; I would rather have government ownership than bank ownership."

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

Undoubtedly this new form of production, with its concentration of capital, has led to some very important and valuable results. It has been largely responsible for what we term modern civilization. Whether this is capable of being perpetuated remains to be seen. Mr. John Maynard Keynes, in that epoch-making book of his, "The Economic Consequences of the Peace", points out some of the advantages of the concentration of capital in a few hands. He says:

> The immense accumulations of fixed capital which, to the great benefit of mankind, were built up during the half century before the war, could never have come about in a society where wealth was divided equitably. The railways of the world, which that age built as a monument to posterity, were, not less than the pyramids of Egypt, the work of labour which was not free to consume in immediate enjoyment the full equivalent of its efforts. Thus this remarkable system depended for its growth on a double bluff or deception. On the one hand the labouring classes accepted from ignorance or powerlessness, or were compelled, persuaded or cajoled by custom, convention, authority, and the well-established order of society into accepting, a situation in which they could call their own very little of the cake that they and nature and the capitalists were co-operating to produce. And on the other hand the capitalist classes were allowed to call the best part of the cake theirs and were theoretically free to consume it, on the tacit underlying condition that they consumed very little of it in practice. The duty of "saving" became nine-tenths of virtue and the growth of the cake the object of true religion. There grew round the non-consumption of the cake all those instincts of puritanism which in other ages has withdrawn itself from the world and has neglected the arts of production as well as those of enjoyment. And so the cake increased; but to what end was not clearly contemplated.

Mr. Keynes says there is coming a fundamental change—and that is what I should like this House to recognize; we cannot reckon on the old system going on as before the war. He says:

> The war has disclosed the possibility of consumption to all and the vanity of abstinence to many. Thus the bluff is discovered; the labouring classes may be no longer willing to forego so largely, and the capitalist classes, no longer confident of the future, may seek to enjoy more fully their liberties of consumption so long as they last, and thus precipitate the hour of their confiscation.

I have said that so long as England very largely held a monopoly of this new method of production, so long as she was able to invest and reinvest her capital abroad, the situation was not so bad; but after a while when the colonies began to set up this self-same system, and when even the Orient did the same, the conditions became fundamentally altered. They needed larger markets in England and hence said: If we can only get free trade, that is all that is required. But to-day where are we to find new markets? The United States is after larger markets. All the countries of Europe are after larger markets. Japan and China are after larger markets. Where then are these larger markets to come from? Before, as Mr. Keynes points out, the man who owned the tools was able to control a large part of the product. He gave in wages to his workmen a very small part of what they produced, and as long as he could keep the balance for himself and invest it in some other country he was all right, but when he had nowhere else to invest it then came the difficulty. His factories became idle and his men unemployed.

Why? Fundamentally, because the workers had not the buying power. That is the real trouble to-day. Men who are not socialists, leading economists like Mr. J. A. Hobson, have told us for the past twenty years that what the world requires is to distribute a larger measure of buying power. That is what some of the economists have been trying to tell us in the Banking committee in the last few weeks. We need buying power. Unfortunately the whole financial system has been built up so long on the older basis that we have become hypnotized by the older ideas and do not seem to be able to perceive the newer ideas clearly. Ever since the war the Canadian Manufacturers' Association has been telling us we ought to produce more; then when our warehouses are full they are at a loss to know where to find the markets. A good many of my farmer friends are beginning to realize that when they produce more as they are advised they too will be faced with the same problem. When the Argentine produces more largely, when Russia and the other countries of Europe begin again to produce wheat more freely, where are our markets coming from? Thus we come to the strange anomaly as we have it to-day in all parts of the world, a plethora of produced articles and yet at the same time a vast mass of impoverished, unemployed workers. Surely something is fundamentally wrong, and unless we can seriously tackle this problem here in our own country as they are attempting to do in some other countries, I do not know that we can hope to make very permanent progress.

This vast capitalistic system set up rival groups of manufacturers, traders and capitalists—that increased in power until the successful competitors became organized on a national and even an international scale. I am not going into the perplexed question of the causes of the late war. Undoubtedly as a great many thinkers have recognized, it was fundamentally a struggle for world markets.

If we had any doubt about that 9 p.m. question before or during the war, surely the Peace Treaty and the events since the signing of that treaty must have revealed to us that the great nations are dominated by great competing industrial and financial concerns striving to get possession of world markets, concessions and mandates and all this kind of thing, in order that they may control the situation for themselves.

We have had in the building up of these competing groups, of course, the great problem of combination. As I have said if we could have free trade it would be a good thing, but as I tried to show on the floor of this House the other day, the fact is that in our great combinations we recognize a development which is bound to go ever forward. Someone has said in Great Britain, either the trusts will control the nation or the nation must control the trusts. If we can control the trusts and let them go on with their work, I suppose it is all very well, but the trusts have become too firmly established, too monopolistic in character, to permit them to remain under private control.

Perhaps more serious than the monopoly which has taken place in the industrial field and the vast extension of large scale commercial operations throughout the world has been the more recent control of finance. There is to-day a monopoly of credit. I do not intend to anticipate the debate on the control of credit which must come in connection with our banking system, but I would say that the evidence which has come before the Banking committee has revealed to us that in this country as in other countries a comparatively small group of people control the whole of our financial machinery. In Canada some seventeen financial groups can say practically where and what shall be produced. Further than that, they can say at what price things shall be produced. I am not going to elaborate those statements. I think they can be proved when there is opportunity so to do.

This great system which has grown up, industrial, commercial and financial, which, for want of a better term, we commonly call the capitalist system, has had not only its great economic results, but also its social consequences. One of these is that those who own so largely the resources of the world exercise a predominating influence over all our educational agencies—our schools, our universities, our churches, our press and so on. I repeat that those who own come inevitably to exercise a very great influence in all these various educational agencies. I hope every member of this House has been reading the books of Upton Sinclair on conditions on the other side of the line. With regard to the control of the press even in Great Britain, I should like to read this statement from Viscount Northcliffe:

> Behind every single London daily newspaper, with the possible exception of some sporting journals and a labour publication, of which I know nothing, there is a multi-millionaire or a very wealthy colleague, a shipping king, a cotton-waste king, coal kings, an oil king and the rest of them.

That is the situation that we find all over the world to-day and which makes it so difficult for us to carry on an effective propaganda. Not only that, but these vast industries and financial concerns have secured a tremendous hold on the governments of our country. I am not going to speak of conditions here in Canada for a moment but I will go to Great Britain, the Mother of Parliaments. There is a vast organization over there known as the Federation of British Industries with which I believe the Canadian Manufacturers' Association is in affiliation. In its bulletin of February 3, 1920, the F. B. I. states:

> The federation is now a very powerful body representing through its direct and indirect members some 18,000 manufacturing firms with a united capital estimated at £4,000,000,000 . . . . . When the general voice of industry on any particular question of national importance is expressed by the Federation of British Industries it is received with due weight by the government and the press. . . . During and after the war it has secured representation on most of the government committees appointed to inquire into matters concerning industrial, economic and financial policy. The value of its watchful activities regarding legislation affecting industry can hardly be overrated.

The pamphlet from which I am reading, the publication of the Labour Research Department, goes on to say:

> After the election of 1918, when about seventy directors of firms belonging to the F. B. I. were returned to the House of Commons, a parliamentary committee was set up, and a special "Liaison department" was established for the purpose of keeping in direct touch with government departments. From this time on the "watchful activities" of the federation ranged from influencing the form of the peace treaties to the determining of the post-war programme of the government.

Let me add one more paragraph of this same pamphlet which gives the viewpoint of labour in the Old Country,—a viewpoint which is to a large extent shared by labour in this country.

> But although the representatives of big business have captured both the Commons and the Lords, their power does not reside there or depend upon this capture. This generation, which has seen a newspaper make and unmake a government, has no illusions on that score. Just as the king, a sacramental man of the Middle Ages, lost all his personal power and became the mere facade of the structure of government, so the whole of parliament has become a facade behind which go on the operations of finance capital and the real government of the country. Were the workers' representatives to gain a majority in the House of Commons and abolish the House of Lords, they would only have captured the outworks. The real struggle would still lie before them.

Now in this indictment of capitalism, which has been made by British labour on the floor of the House of Commons at Westminster and which is being made all over this country to-day in every labour union hall, as well as in every workers mass meeting, we have had splendid reinforcements from those known in Great Britain as the intellectuals. On the floor of this House the other day, the Conservative member for Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion), referred to the last book of Sidney and Beatrice Webb, "The Decay of Capital and Civilization". I venture to quote a paragraph from that book in which the authors sum up the arguments which may be used against the existing system. They say:

> The socialist indictment of the capitalist system of industry and the society based upon it has four main counts. History proves that, whilst national poverty may have other causes, wherever and whenever the greatest part of the population are divorced from the ownership of the instruments of production, even where the aggregate production is relatively enormous, the bulk of the people live in penury and large numbers of them are perpetually threatened by starvation.

We have our millions upon millions of unemployed in Great Britain. We have our millions upon the very verge of starvation in Great Britain, but I submit that in all countries more or less the same condition exists. Even in Canada, with any abundant natural resources, we have had a very large share of unemployment, and those who have worked in our large cities among the industrial population know that large numbers are on the ragged edge of poverty. Let me read further:

> In the second place this penury and its accompanying insecurity are rendered more hideous and humiliating by the relative comfort and luxury of the proprietary class and by the shameless idleness of some of its members.

Let me pause for a moment to suggest that whilst we in Canada have not had, in the past, the vast differences between the very wealthy and the very poor, there has undoubtedly been created, especially since the war, an ever widening gap, between those who live by owning and those who work for their living. I know that we are still in the first generation of those who have earned large fortunes. I know perfectly well that a good many of those who are wealthy to-day have worked as hard as anyone, perhaps harder, and yet the fact remains that their wealth has come to them, not merely by hard work, but because they have been enabled, with some start they have had, to secure exceptional privileges or to secure monopolies of various kinds which have more or less placed other people within their control, In our largest cities to-day we are beginning to develop the social diseases associated with wealth. Reading on:

> The worst circumstance of capitalism is, however, neither the poverty of the wage-earner nor the luxury of the property owner, but, thirdly, the glaring inequality in personal freedom between the propertyless man and the member of the class that "lives by owning." Hour by hour, day by day, year in and year out, the two-thirds of the nation who depend for their daily or weekly house-keeping on gaining access to the instruments of production find themselves working under the orders of the relatively restricted class of those who own these instruments. The sanction for the orders is not legal punishment, but, ultimately, a starvation which is supposed to be optional.

That is what is meant by the wage earners when they complain of wage slavery? It was not until I went into the industrial ranks myself, that I began to realize what the Webbs mean here when they speak of those who have so little freedom, freedom of self expression, or control over their daily lives. It is all very well for men who use the old Liberal phrases, to talk about us having political liberty, but if a man has not liberty to go out and earn his daily bread, if a man has not any real liberty in finding a job, political liberty becomes an absolutely vain thing. I would say again to my farmer friends to whom I appeal, because I believe their condition is fundamentally the same as that of the industrial workers of the cities, that they should realize that this political liberty would be absolutely useless if they had not that liberty which comes through the power to earn a decent livelihood for themselves and their families. One other point which is made is this:

> Fourthly, the socialist believes that the very basis of the capitalist system is scientifically unsound, as a means of organizing the production and distribution of commodities and services, and fundamentally inconsistent with the spiritual advancement of the race.

We come now to the practical difficulty. If this system is functioning, I have comparatively little to say with regard to it, but when we see, in almost every nation that has adopted it, that it is failing to supply large numbers of men and women and children with the actual necessities of life, when we find that it is setting one group against another, and one nation against other nations, we may well ask ourselves, whether there is not something in it that is fundamentally unsound. We have in Canada such a bad situation that by tens of thousands the labouring people are leaving to go to the South. We have farming conditions of the worst kind portrayed to us in season and out of season in the House. We have high prices that are felt by the consumers from one end of the country to the other. We have a large number of business men in nearly all our cities to-day who are feeling the pinch very severely. They are more or less whistling to keep up their courage. They are saying that they must not give a black eye to the country, but if we inquire in any of our cities we find that there are back rentals and large accounts owing to the bank, and all other indications of a most serious economic condition.

What do we propose? I am not going to spend any great length of time to-night on our proposals, simply because I realize perfectly well that we are not in a position effectively to propose anything. We are in this house too few in numbers. I would suggest merely the lines along which we hope to advance. I would put forward the principles that, in our opinion, ought to underlie sound legislation and administration. We say that there ought to be democracy, not only in politics but in industry. I am not pleading for any particular form of economic or political life. Many people think we cannot speak of socialism without referring to state socialism. It may very well be that some of our concerns may come under federal control, for instance the railways. And in passing let me say that I cannot see that we are going to effectively operate a Canadian National railway in opposition to a privately-owned Canadian Pacific railway. Sooner or later we must bring our great railways under one control. Some things may be owned by the federal government; others may be owned by our provincial governments. I can see very well how great natural resources like our coal mines might be brought under provincial control. I think my farmer friends have already gone as far as recognizing that it might be well that we should have some sort of definite government control over our mines. We can hardly think of these great coal measures in Nova Scotia and Alberta, and the way in which they are being maladministered at the present time and the fact that the people are not being able to get the fuel that they should, without recognizing that it is a responsibility of the government effectively to operate or control an industry which is so vital to the life of the nation.

Sometimes we socialists use another phrase to indicate what we should like to see brought about, and that is "production for use instead of for profit." I am giving a phrase; it may be no more than a phrase; but after all we must try to formulate in some way our ideals. Our thought is that we have gone on producing for profit, competing firms producing for profit, until we have lost the real meaning of production. Why do farmers produce wheat? Fundamentally not to sell; they produce wheat to be made into flour to feed hungry men, women and children. Why do we produce coal? Fundamentally, not for profit, not to sell, but in order that we may use it to warm our homes and to run our factories. Why do we produce furniture, clothing and all the other manufactured articles? Fundamentally, not to sell, but in order that we may use them in our every day life. Our contention is that we have gone on and on and on in this system, each man producing simply to sell, producing as much as he can, producing irrespective of the real needs of the people, until we have forgotten the primary reason of production. We say that we have to get back to fundamentals so to organize our productive and distributional processes that we shall produce in order that the people may use.

We have come very near to a place when either we must face a collapse in our financial system or we must bring about radical readjustments which will in themselves amount to a practical reconstruction of the system—one thing or the other. Take for example our financial system to-day. If we go on and on piling up debts as we are doing, it is absolutely impossible that we shall ever pay them. One cannot observe the way the debts have been pyramided—to use a word that has been common in the Banking committee—during the past few years, and hope that this can be a stable system. There must be either a collapse or such radical change in the system itself as will be really revolutionary in its character. The old parties have their policies. Labour offers an alternative policy. I should like to suggest the practical lines along which labour in Canada proposes to proceed even at the present time in order to keep things going. The party which I have the honour to represent suggest the following fiscal planks in their platform:

6. Regaining for the use of the people of the natural resources of this country which have been so recklessly alienated by incompetent or venal administrations.

7. Public ownership and democratic operation of public utilities, and, as soon as possible, of essential large-scale industries.

8. The nationalization of the banking system.

9. Abolition of fiscal legislation that leads to class privilege: (b) Removal of taxes on the necessaries of life; (c) Taxation of land values; (d) After exemption of small incomes, a steeply graded income and inheritance tax.

10. A capital levy for the abolition of the war debt.

I am not going to argue these points to-night. That can be done at some later time when our numbers will enable us to do so more effectively. But I should like to call attention to the fact that our taxation, as it has been in the past and as it is proposed by the budget before us, rests most heavily upon the ordinary people of the country. As far as I can read that budget, if there are modifications, the modifications are made in the interest of the moneyed people, in the interest of luxury, and not in the interest of the necessities of life which are most used by the large majority of the people of Canada. Taxation is the taking of wealth for the purposes of carrying on the government; it is taken from one or the other group. We claim that the government is taking a very large amount from one particular class to-day. Why should we not have some such arrangement as a capital levy for the abolition of our war debt, a levy on the actual property that is owned to-day by a limited group. At the beginning of my speech, I cited the large natural resources that we have in this country. Some people say that these lands and natural resources ought to be held inviolable; that they belong to one particular group, and that the rights of this group can never be challenged. Any one who has read such a book as the History of Canadian Wealth, any one who knows anything of the way in which the large resources of this country have been alienated, must recognize that the present owners have by no means given an equivalent for what they claim at the present time. From the standpoint of law itself, private property has never been recognized as being inviolable. I wonder if I may quote just a sentence or two on this point from legal authorities of Great Britain. Blackstone says:

It being received and now undeniable principle in law that all lands in England are holden mediately or immediately of the King.

Again Williams on Real Property, says:

The first thing the student has to do is to get rid of the idea of absolute ownership. Such an idea is quite unknown in English law. No man is in law absolute owner of his land. He only owns an estate in them.

Again Cope says:

All lands or tenements in England in the hands of subjects are holden mediately, or immediately, of the King. For in the law of England we have not any subjects' land which is not so holden.

David Lloyd-George says:

I remember as a law student that the first thing I had to learn was that there was no such thing as private property in land.

With reference to the great estates that exist in England, the proposal of the British Labour party is to boldly recognize that these are fundamentally public property and should be administered as such. In this country our land is, to a considerable extent, held and worked by small owners, and we need not worry over that. But we have other resources that are held by big syndicates, the great mining properties, the great water powers, all the machinery by which nearly all the goods of this country are produced. These resources are held by certain groups who claim an absolute private ownership in them. We assert there is no reason why the government should not tax these—tax them as heavily as it pleases, tax them even to the extent of partial or full expropriation. May I point out that during the war thousands of our men went overseas. Some of them went under a measure of conscription; they were told that their lives were owned by the state. I would say here, as I said a year ago, that if it is right to conscript men it is right to conscript wealth. There is no difference between the principles involved. I should not say that—there is an immense difference between the two. Surely men are worth infinitely more than natural resources, than mere wealth. Undoubtedly they are, and yet we have reversed the valuation. We have claimed that it is right to require men's lives but we hesitate to say it is right to require a portion of men's wealth. Our whole policy is built upon the idea that we must leave the dividends to the big companies, that we must leave the interest and dividends to the banks, that we must leave the big profits to the great trusts. These things are inviolable according to our present way of looking at matters. But we tax the ordinary necessities of life and make it so that many families in this country hardly know how to make both ends meet. We labour men claim that the whole policy must be reversed, we assert that when it comes to a conflict between the welfare of a majority of a people and what are called property rights, that the welfare of the people must have first place.

I am not going to prolong this argument. Perhaps there are some in the House who think that I should not have presented this case to-night, or at any such length as I have done. I have done so, because I believe that there is a growing body of public opinion throughout the country that is seeking a way out of our difficulties, and that that body of public opinion has not hitherto been able to give voice to its ideals in the house of parliament. I can recognize how easy it is for these men, who perhaps, come from the better classes of the business and professional men to see almost everything from one particular angle. They are themselves fairly well fed, fairly well housed, fairly well-to-do, and so they look at the situation from the standpoint of their particular class. But there are other groups in this country who because they have had altogether different experiences are thinking along altogether different lines. It is not because I want to "knock" our institutions that I make this serious indictment of the existing situation. It is because that it is well that parliament should know what all sections of the community are thinking about these matters. I have ventured to go into the subject more thoroughly because if a good many of the leading economists in this and other countries are right we are facing, not a situation which can be rapidly passed over, and from which we can hope there will be a return to normalcy, but rather a new epoch in our history. We are producing in a collective way and yet our institutions, economic and political, are lagging behind our method of production. The result is not satisfactory. We cannot claim that justice prevails between man and man. We cannot claim that we have evolved a civilization in which under the existing system there is any prospect of a permanent peace.

Before I close I should like to quote one or two sentences from one of the great writers of the Far East, Rabindranath Tagore. He says:

> We have seen that in spite of its (civilization's) boasted love of freedom, it has produced worse forms of slavery than ever were current in earlier societies—slavery whose chains are unbreakable, either because they are unseen, or because they assume the names and appearance of freedom.

And again:

> And this nation may grow on to an unimaginable corpulence, not of a living body, but of steel and steam and office buildings, till its deformity can contain no longer its ugly voluminousness—till it begins to crack and gape, breathe gas and fire in gasps, and its death-rattle sound in cannon roars.
> I ask you to have the strength of faith and clarity of mind to know for certain that the lumbering structure of modern progress, rivetted by the iron bolts of efficiency, which runs upon the wheels of ambition, cannot hold together for long.

Mr. Speaker, I submit that we are facing to-day the necessity for radical changes. Members of this House again and again have pleaded that on the ground of patriotism we should do this, that and the other thing. I think we may claim that the vast majority of the people of this and other countries are earnestly desirous of doing the right thing. I am not seeking to impugn the motives of anyone, I am not seeking to suggest that anyone is particularly responsible for the condition of affairs that prevails to-day, but I would urge that every thoughtful man who realizes these conditions must set himself definitely to their solution. Although some of us may be beneficiaries of the system, the thing for us to do is to recognise that either we must make changes or within a very short time we, as other nations have done, may pass through a period of great suffering if not of chaos. I would therefore plead that even at this session of parliament we frankly face the situation, and attempt the necessary changes however radical they may appear.

Mr. JOHN PRITCHARD (North Wellington): Mr. Speaker, I remember one hon. gentleman charging the Progressives, a few weeks ago, with being academic in their speeches. I assure you that it is my purpose to-night to be exceedingly practical. I have been sitting here for some months listening with a good deal of patience to the speeches made from day to day. I heard one remark during the debate on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne offered by a member of the government. It was intended, I think, as a compliment to the seconder of the Address, and I noted it. It was that this is a good school. On that occasion he also expressed the opinion that members of parliament were up to and even above the average in morals. I believe he was stating the facts. Notwithstanding all that may have been said, disparaging and otherwise about the speeches that had been delivered in this House, I have come to the conclusion after carefully listening to our debates that no man even of average intelligence can be long a member and not receive a good deal of information.

I do not feel inclined to upbraid any particular group, for I feel that as members we are all here with one common object in view, no matter where we sit. But I believe there is a wide difference of opinion in regard to the policy that is best suited to promote our national interests, and before I sit down I hope to state some of the facts that I think have a bearing on this point.

One of the difficulties that we in this corner of the chamber have had in debate has been to establish the fact of the actual condition of agriculture in the Dominion, and I have noticed that some hon. members who are not farmers have not been inclined to accept the statements made by a number of my colleagues. Perhaps we may show a similar disinclination in regard to matters which may be brought forward by hon. members in other quarters of the House. I was convinced before I became a member of parliament of the wonderful ability possessed by many of our public men, of their remarkable grasp of the actual conditions of our country, and that when I came here and listened to them I would find I did not know very much. I will admit that this has been borne out by my experience here. But since I have sat in this chamber I have been struck by the fact that some of our most prominent members have made statements on the floor that I have good reason to believe were not altogether correct. While many of us may not have had the advantages of a university training, we have had the inestimable advantage of a good training in the school of practical experience. Theory is all very well, but I have noticed that when a man speaks on a subject on which he has practical knowledge it is pretty hard to beat him in debate.

Now, the question of policy bulks largely in this debate on the budget. For forty years we have been following a certain fiscal policy, and if we look at the result we can come to but one conclusion—that there is something radically wrong with its policy. As I stated last session, we have a vast country with only a sparse population. And yet in the estimates for the current year there is a million and three quarters set aside for unemployment—a condition of affairs which naturally was emphasized during the debate on immigration, when many hon. members in this quarter of the House objected to the initiation of any policy which would bring in more immigrants to swell the ranks of the unemployed. I have considerable patience with those who took that stand, and I agree with them that conditions here should be improved before we ask more people to come in. On the other hand, we admit that we want more population, we want immigration. The question then arises: How are we to make conditions better so that we will be justified in adopting a vigorous immigration policy? We are all anxious to improve economic conditions. the only trouble is how to go about it in the right way.

We find to-day, as the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) has just shown us, that our labouring men with their well-organized unions have advanced the price of the labour, but conditions continue unsatisfactory, for we find unemployment, want, and actual poverty among our working people And we do not find our manufacturers altogether satisfied although they are able to control the price of their output. Labour has demanded of the manufacturer higher wages. In turn, the manufacturer has demanded the higher price for his products, until we hear in this House—in fact it was stated only this afternoon—that this is the dearest country in the civilized world to live in. I believe this is true. Now, you may put wages and commodity prices up twice as high if you like, but will you be any better off?

Then what about the agricultural class? We as farmers claim that the fiscal policy of this country for the last forty years has not been in the best interests of agriculture. That has been proven on this side of the House beyond the shadow of a doubt. It is being shown from day to day in the special committee on Agriculture what the farmer is making to-day. If the working man in the city is not getting wages enough, what about the working man—the farmer—on the land? I find that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have paid on an average to every man, woman and boy in their employ five dollars a day for the past year. Suppose we take half a section of wheat land in western Canada, yielding 23 bushels to the acre. It takes five people—his wife, a boy, and three men—to harvest and handle that crop. Supposing he pays the same wages as the men receive from the Canadian Pacific Railway, he finds that it takes every bushel of wheat to pay his wage bill alone. How are we going to employ men to work on our farms in competition with the railway companies under such circumstances? How are we going to compete with the manufacturer who being able to control the price of his output can pay his men five and six dollars a day? How can we go on the labour market and expect to hire men to go on our farms and stay there in the face of such competition?

I had a striking illustration of this last session. One of the finest types of immigrants one could wish to bring to this country struck this city a few weeks before I returned home. I do not care if you bring out ten thousand immigrants, you could not bring a finer specimen—a young man twenty-one years of age, of good character and fine physique. He came and worked on my farm, which was situated on the edge of a town with railway employees across the street. That young man was satisfied with his condition, he appreciated everything we did for him, but he was studying conditions and he saw it was quite impossible for a farmer to keep a man on the land when these protected industries were able to pay twice as much in wages as the farmer could afford. These are the conditions. Now, the farmer has no control over the price of his output. He has to sell his output in the markets of the world. Some hon. gentlemen try to tell us that we should build up a home market and that in that way we could get a better price for our products. But those of us who have been growing farm produce know that after all we depend largely on the markets of Europe; we would very soon glut the market if we attempted to sell all our produce in a country of 8,000,000 people. So that the home market really does not cut any figure at all.

I have heard a good many arguments to the effect that the man living near the city could get better prices for his products, but that statement is hardly correct. Those of us who have been farming know that a man who is some distance from the city can produce stuff and put it on the city market just as cheap or a little cheaper than the fellow who lives close to the city. Take the case of milk; right in our own locality, one hundred miles from Toronto, considering the cheapness of our land, the low freight rate to the city and the amount of stuff we can produce compared with what the man near the city can turn out, we can undersell the man on the more expensive land adjoining the city of Toronto, which is our chief market.

We have reason to believe that conditions can be improved. It is asserted that we should have better tariff arrangements. If there were not so many burdens on the men on the farms, and if they had some of the advantages that men in other callings are getting, we in Canada could hold our own with any country in the world. We have a country of wonderful resources; we have a people who are resourceful and energetic. It is true that we have a national debt, but after all it amounts to only 30 per cent of our total assets. It has to be admitted that our debt is large, but there is a cause for that debt which we do not care to enlarge upon at this time. The war was very far-reaching in its effects; we are still suffering from the reaction, and it behooves us as Canadian people to take a lesson from our men who went to the front. Surely we are possessed of some of the courage that those men possessed. If we get busy and endeavour by every means in our power to produce, to create wealth, we can pay off our debt. We often speak about our resources, and undoubtedly they are very great indeed; but we have no greater source of income than our farming lands. Our forests, which have been a great source of wealth, are becoming depleted; our fisheries may fail; our mines may fail. But after we have used our farms for hundreds of years, they will still be there, a national asset. I believe that we have to-day no other source of revenue equal to the farm lands of this Dominion. If we would develop our agricultural industries we would have no trouble about our cities, but the policy of this country has been to build up the cities first and thereby build up our country. My policy would be this: Look after the agricultural industries of an agricultural country, and then we will develop the towns and cities. We have been demanding too much off the agriculturists. Time would hardly permit me to enumerate all the different burdens that are placed upon them, but if I mention one or two it may make some hon. members realize that I am on safe ground. I was thinking of our educational institutions. We boast of having the best educational institutions in the world, and we are proud of them. I do not wish to suggest anything that would impair the usefulness of those institutions, but I wish to point out—and I am thinking now of the burden that is placed on the farmers—that if a man wants to enter a profession and undertakes to get a university training, we, the people of Canada, pay practically half the cost of that man's training in the university. Now, we are producing a lot of splendid men in our universities every year. But to me the sad part of it is not so much the expense these men are to us on account of their training as the fact that hundreds of them, after they have finished their courses, go across to the other side of the line to be an asset to the United States. To my mind that is a tremendous national loss. We are expected to carry untold burdens for all classes of our people that we have no right to bear. If something was done to eliminate some of these the farmer would have more encouragement and there would be more men going to the land. With our immigration policy the trouble is to get men to go to the land; if we would make conditions more favourable on the land we would have no trouble getting our immigrants to go there. I submit that it should be our policy to do that. If we can get six or eight million people on the land we shall solve all our national problems. If we can make conditions right so that people will be induced to go on the land, we shall have that many more people, as has been said time and again in this House, to shoulder the national debt, that many more people to produce on areas that are now practically lying idle.

We talk about helping our immigrants, and there is great lament about those who come here with nothing. I sometimes think of the men who came into this Ontario when it was all bush, without a dollar, without experience, without anything. Who helped them to make this country what it is? Our Ontario boys growing up during the last thirty years, who in many cases started without anything, have complained that when the immigrant comes here, the alien, we begin to pay him money out of the public treasury, so that the man who has had to make good for himself has not only to hoe his own row but is asked to help the other fellow. We do not think that is fair to the man who is struggling on and trying to make his way in this country. The returned men are much in the same position—these men of whom we speak in admiration and on whom we shower praise for their wonderful sacrifices. These men are asked to assume their share of the responsibility of the debt of this country; they have to help to pay it. I mentioned this before, but I will mention it again lest the minister might forget it: I refer to the case of a returned man, one of our own Ontario boys, who went West and settled on the land there, and he was positively refused the same chance that was offered to the alien coming to this country. I am pleading at this time, in this city, for help for that man out in Alberta, and I am going to continue the fight; if I do not get anything I will keep at it just the same. When a returned man has the courage to go on land in the western provinces surely he ought to get treatment equal to that handed out to the aliens who come to our country. I could deal with this question at some length but it is not my intention to take up the time of the House.

I am not a pessimist. I do not feel for one moment that we are up against the inevitable or the impossible. We are here in this House to do a man's job. I think I heard one hon. member of this House say some time ago that the farmer should have stayed at home and looked after his organizations and after his market conditions, and leave parliamentary affairs alone. We would have been satisfied to stay at home and do that work. We did stay at home and worked hard and we talked and pleaded, but the members of this parliament would not listen. We kept on pleading until we got tired, and that is why we are here now representing the farmers of Canada in this parliament, and if the different parties in this House will not listen to the words of warning that have come from the rural sections of this country there will be a still larger deputation sent here, for the voice of the people must be heard. We have a problem before us, and we feel that the farmers are fit to deal with that problem. We have done hard things. We would not be worthy of the name Canadian, we would not be worthy to be called brothers of the men who went to the front, if we were not able now to grapple with the financial situation of this country after what our boys have done in the Great War in France. We are able to do it gentlemen, and we are not going to stop the fight in this parliament until we have brought about a better economic condition in this country that will help pay off our national debt and put the country's finances on a better basis. It is up to us to do it. As I said before, it is a man's job, and I have confidence that the members of this parliament will be equal to the occasion. We are not going to stop the fight until the body economic of this country is in a very much healthier condition.

As we have sat here listening to speeches for some time, we have been impressed very much with one idea which I must mention. There seem to be two forces at work in this parliament. There is a strong financial force somewhere at work, and another force at work in this parliament in the interest of the common people of Canada. I am satisfied that the former force has had too much influence in this parliament in the years that are past, and that influence I am satisfied is just as active to-day as it ever was. This is not a new condition in the British Empire. I have a book here that was written not long ago and if you will pardon me, Mr. Speaker, I will make a short excerpt from a speech made at the Brotherhood Congress in London, England, by the Right Hon. Arthur Henderson:

> Class rule in politics, notwithstanding the existence of a broadly democratic franchise, is still a reality. What are called the possessing classes, through their social influence, the power of money, their practical monopoly of all the higher branches of education, and their control of the press, contrive repeatedly to defeat the popular will on every first-class political issue in which the rights and liberties of the common people are involved.

If that is true of conditions in England, I believe it is also a factor which has actuated too much many of our public men. I imagine that the fight is on, and the fight is between the men of that class and the men who represent the common people of this country, I was going to say; but I do not like that term, so I will say the great masses of our people at home.

I have faith that by the exercise of thrift and economy we will overcome these difficulties. I believe that in our public life as in our private life there is room for the exercise of economy. I believe that we are all guilty of extravagance, extravagance in our public business and in our private business, and I am satisfied just as much as I am standing here that if we would cut out the unessentials our national debt could be reduced to a minimum. If we will attend to that with the earnestness and the zeal with which the men who first came to this country made this Ontario of ours the country it is, we shall soon solve the fiscal and financial problems of this country.

10 p.m.

Mr. ALFRED STORK (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, in rising to offer a few observations on the budget I wish at the very commencement to compliment the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) upon this his seventeenth budget. I believe, Sir, that Canada is fortunate in the possession of the experience of the Minister of Finance. He has served Canada long and well and his integrity is a national asset. We hope that he may long be spared to grace his position in the councils of the parliament of Canada.

Coming to the budget, I notice with satisfaction that it reaffirms the principle of reciprocity. It was last Friday when this announcement was made in the House, and we are now beginning to receive evidences of how these proposals have been received throughout the Dominion of Canada and also the republic to the south of us. So far as Canada is concerned I believe the Canadian people will welcome this attempt at a fiscal arrangement with the people to the south of us. The American papers are now coming to hand and many of them are expressing satisfaction that ways and means are being opened up to have this problem negotiated. I wish very briefly to quote from one of the prominent American newspapers, the Chicago Tribune which commenting on the reciprocity proposals says:

> Now, after 12 years, a new start is made. This time probably we shall face bitter opposition by some American farmers who fear Canadian competition, but the wiser of those opponents will see that their products compete with Canada's not in the United States but in world markets. It is the surplus production of any country which meets competition with other countries.
> So long as the United States is a producer of surplus agricultural products it cannot avoid such competition, no matter how high our tariff barriers. That has been proved to thinking persons by the utter failure of the emergency or the permanent tariff on farm products to raise the price of such products in the United States.
> On the other hand, reciprocity in trade would work to the mutual advantage of both countries. We hope the friendly advances made by Mr. Fielding will find a cordial welcome in Washington.

I notice also that the budget in its reciprocity proposals specially mentions cattle, wheat, oats, barley, potatoes, turnips, onions, hay and fish. It was also gratifying to note that timely attention is being given to the sugar situation.

The high price of sugar in the United States has caused the people in many parts of that country to embark upon a boycott of sugar. I am not in accord with the principle of the boycott, because in a country like Canada, if that principle were adopted by the users of sugar in order to force down the price, it would of necessity inflict a tremendous hardship on those who find the use of sugar a very great necessity. We should be able to find other ways of dealing with the soaring price of sugar rather than to force our people to boycott the use of it, and the timely attention which the minister has given to the rising price of this commodity will commend itself to the people of Canada. I would commend the Minister of Finance for the alteration which he has made in the manner of collecting the sales tax. I think the improvement he has made will commend itself very generally to the people of the country.

I shall deal with some matters of particular concern to the province of British Columbia from which I come. The first matter is the bounty on copper and the manufacture of bars and copper wires. British Columbia, Mr. Speaker, as you are no doubt aware, is a great copper producing province. This bounty on the manufacture of copper will give an added impetus to the mining industry and will call into operation a very large concern which has been established in West Kootenay for this particular purpose. It will bring into operation many copper mines in British Columbia which heretofore have had to remain idle.

Another matter which I am very pleased with is the admission into Canada free of duty of machinery used in the manufacture of fish offal for fertilizing purposes. We have several propositions on the coast for the manufacture of fertilizers. The machinery to be used in connection with those plants is of very vital importance. This concession will also encourage the destruction of pests such as dog fish. We have a great variety of fish which play upon the commercial fish, and this will assist in a very great degree in the extermination of the dog fish and other pests.

I notice also that the principle of the British preference is being extended with the object of developing Canadian ports. The minister, in naming the principal ports of Canada, was good enough to include such ports on the Pacific coast as Vancouver, Victoria and Prince Rupert. This government has a very large holding in Prince Rupert. It has the terminus of the Canadian National Railways there. It is a port which has not been used up to the present time, but I notice in the papers to hand to-day that the first shipment of lumber to Japan is starting from the port of Prince Rupert the middle of next month. There is no reason why the freight to the Orient should not go through that northern port, because we are 500 miles nearer the Orient than any other port on the continent. I find that from the 1st September, 1921 to April 23rd, 1923, there were 3,842,177 bushels of wheat shipped to Japan through the port of Vancouver. This undoubtedly should have gone via Prince Rupert. This would all be Canadian National business. I find from September 1st, 1921, to April 1st, 1923, 14,679 cars of wheat arrived at Vancouver. The Canadian National Railway hauled 5,693 of those cars, and the Canadian Pacific Railway 8,986. By developing the port of Prince Rupert, any traffic that comes into that port will naturally come in over our own railway. I am advised by competent authority that a grain elevator located there would effect a saving of 25 cents a ton in loading and port charges. With a 7,500-ton ship, with a full cargo, a saving of 25 cents a ton in loading and port charges would equal $1,875. That is equal to three days' operation and profit for a ship of that type. This saving offsets any handicap that the northern port might suffer in competing with the Panama canal route on traffic destined for ports in Europe.

So far as facilities are concerned, this government has already in the port of Prince Rupert a splendid new freight warehouse capable of taking care of ocean going business. That is available at the present moment for the shipping and handling of sacked wheat with a very small additional expense in connection with loading facilities.

I am glad to see also that reciprocity is reaffirmed in this budget. It is true this question was before the country in 1911, but I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that the contest as carried on in 1911, was not fought out on the merits of the case. The people of Canada have had twelve years in which to reflect, and at that time the slogan was "No truck or trade with the Yankees." To-day I think the boot is entirely on the other foot. The Fordney tariff says "No truck or trade with the Canadians." The United States for years admitted fish free into their country. Canada insisted upon maintaining a duty of 1 cent a pound on fish coming into Canada from the United States. The Fordney tariff apparently says. "Well if you like it, and if you believe in the principle of 1 cent a pound on fish, we will meet you on that issue, and we will impose a duty of 2 cents a pound on your fish coming into American territory." The Americans are apparently trying to demonstrate to their own satisfaction that they can get along very well without Canadian fish. I do not know how long it will take them to find out to their own satisfaction whether they can do so. It may require a long or short period. However, I am persuaded of one thing, and that is that while they are trying this experiment in the United States they are certainly demonstrating to the Canadian fisherman that they cannot get along without the American market. We need the American market. The 2 cents a pound duty on halibut going into that country is slowly exterminating the Canadian fisherman. The situation in British Columbia is most acute, more especially in regard to the matter of fish. We have in that northern part which has handled all the fish trade, the spectacle of American fisherman marketing their fish in British Columbia, and as a rule receiving 16 cents a pound. The Canadian fisherman is immediately docked the amount of the American duty, and he receives 14 cents a pound. An American selling fish in a Canadian port receives 16 cents a pound and a Canadian selling fish in the same port receives only 14 cents a pound. Moreover, when we remember that the port is absolutely free and open to the Americans, we can see the immediate effect unless we are able in some way to bring about a better situation as regards the marketing of fish. Last year there were sent east over the Canadian National Railways 1,500 refrigerator cars loaded with fish for the American market. Each one of those cars paid to the railway on an average of $1,000 for traffic charges. The trade is growing by leaps and bounds, and this year the record will be even greater than that of last year.

I am persuaded that this acute situation, as developed there, is due largely to American misunderstanding. The American fishermen who are using Canadian ports do not want this duty. It does them no particular good. The American people themselves do not want this duty, and the Canadian fishermen certainly do not want it. This situation is due very largely to the action and attitude of townsite boomers in the neighbouring territory of Alaska. They have made representations to Washington, and the authorities at Washington have had no evidence to the contrary. The Grand Trunk Pacific railway runs to the fishing grounds. At the present time the advantage of that railroad is largely with the Americans, and Canada has to keep up and foot the bills incidental to carrying it on. The American fisherman uses our ports free; but if he should buy in a Canadian port for his boat any supplies such as ice, or bait, or gear, or even if he should paint his boat in a Canadian port, the moment he lands back in American territory, he pays 50 per cent duty on everything he has bought on the Canadian side, even though he had free access to the Canadian port.

The present situation is a most unequal one. At the present moment the Commissioner of Customs is on the Pacific coast, and the Minister of Customs (Mr. Bureau) has requested him to proceed to the north and to investigate thoroughly the whole situation. I trust when his report is received by the government, they will be advised of all the facts and details in connection with this matter, and that they will give this their immediate attention and endeavour to expedite action.

Everything possible that can be done should be done to negotiate a settlement of this question. Canada has been generous in her treatment of her American cousins. During the progress of the war Canadian ports were free to American vessels, and American ports were free to Canadian vessels. Not long ago the Americans rescinded that agreement as regards themselves and withdrew the use of their ports from the Canadian fleet, but we in Canada have still continued the courtesy and our ports remain open. Very often Canadian generosity is misunderstood.

We are not small or quibbling in our dealings with our neighbours. In fact, in the northern part of my constituency up at the end of the Inlet, where are located the Canadian town of Stewart and the neighbouring town of Hyder, the Salmon river flows into the Inlet and brings down gravel, sand and silt in such large quantities that it has more or less filled up the American end of the Inlet. In their search for deep water and harbourage, they have, according to the best advice I have received on the question, come over into Canadian territory, and we have now an American wharf built on Canadian soil. We do not object to that particularly; we have plenty of foreshore and deep water, and if our American cousins want to use a little of it, we have no special objection, provided of course, that they will accept our generosity in this respect without misinterpreting it. In view of all the courtesies Americans receive in Canadian ports, when these matters are laid before the American authorities, there should be little difficulty in arriving at an amicable settlement.

I would suggest that we should have at Washington a trade representative. If we had stationed there a man who was thoroughly conversant with trade conditions in Canada, many of these misunderstandings would not occur. A man stationed at Washington would be able to lend his assistance and to furnish information from time to time that would keep us out of many of these misunderstandings. Our prosperity depends entirely upon our export trade. I see no danger whatever in trading with the Americans; in our trading with them, our nationality is not in danger. I believe it is preferable to keep our young men here at home, to build up Canada, to develop the natural resources of Canada, and by trading and dealing with the United States, we shall be able to keep our young men at home rather than see them proceed across the border to seek a livelihood, and there to take on the duties of citizenship, by doing which they are lost to us and to Canada forever.

Mr. L. P. BANCROFT (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I will base my remarks to-night on the assumption that the policy of the government and particularly the policy as outlined in the annual budget, should have a direct and vital relationship to the platform on which the party went to the country. Indeed, it might be said, without fear of contradiction, that no government has a mandate other than the mandate secured from a free and untrammelled electorate. To argue otherwise is to repudiate the first principles of democratic citizenship. Under our system of government it is at once the duty and privilege of the opposition, to slowly, deliberately and intentionally evolve a policy the aim of which is to influence and ultimately to capture a majority vote of the people, and thus enable them to pass from the opposition to the government benches. If we review the history of the Liberal party in opposition from the time of their defeat in 1911 until the date of their victory on December 6, 1921, we are justified in drawing no other inference, or in arriving at no other conclusion than that the party by every legitimate and conceivable means, not only created a low tariff sentiment in this country, but became known as a party that stood for a revenue rather than a protective tariff. I want in this connection to quote two amendments submitted by the Liberal party while in opposition, amendments that speak more eloquently of the attitude of that party towards tariff reform than anything I could possibly say. During the budget debate in 1919, the following amendment was moved, which is to be found in the 1919 Debates at page 326:

> The proposals of the Finance Minister are unsatisfactory. They offer no curb against extravagance. They utterly fail to take any adequate steps to relieve the present high cost of living. They give no definite promise of tariff revision downwards.
> That to relieve the present situation, the tariff should be so framed as to free the food of the people and the machinery used in the development of the natural resources of Canada, together with the raw material entering into the manufacture thereof.
>
> To take off or substantially reduce, as speedily as may be expedient and just to all interested, the duties upon all other necessaries of life;
>
> Also, the reciprocal offer of trade with the United States should be accepted, and a general downward revision of the tariff undertaken forthwith in conformity with the principle herein enunciated.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Whose words were those?

Mr. BANCROFT: I could not tell the hon. member who framed them but this is an amendment which was moved in the House by the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster). Then in the following year, 1920, another amendment was moved which is to be found on page 2510 of Hansard and which reads in part as follows:

> That in view of the continued increase in the high cost of living, of the greatly increased burden of taxation, of the hardships which many of the people suffer from these causes, and the unrest naturally arising therefrom; and in view of the desirability of adopting measures to increase production and effect such relief to consumers and producers as may be within the power of parliament, the House is of opinion that, pending a wider revision of the tariff, substantial reductions of the burdens of customs taxation should be made with a view to the accomplishing of two purposes of the highest importance—first, diminishing the very high cost of living which presses so severely on the masses of the people; second, reducing the cost of the instruments of production in the industries based on the natural resources of the Dominion, the vigorous development of which is essential to the progress and prosperity of our country.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Who moved that resolution?

Mr. BANCROFT: The present Finance Minister. Now, Mr. Speaker, it might be well to pause here and ask what were the motives which actuated the Liberal party in supporting these proposals? Were they actuated by sincerity, or were these mere attempts to deceive the electors and thus obtain power under false pretences? It is not my intention to answer this question, I simply leave it to the members of the House and to the disillusioned electorate. The tariff plank of the Liberal platform in 1919, which formed the basis of that party's appeal to the country, was simply a concrete and condensed statement of the attitude of the whole party, without a single exception, towards tariff taxation during the years when they occupied the opposition benches. That this plank was a chief issue in the last campaign few will dispute. The then Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) nailed the protectionist flag to the mast, and the low tariff forces of this country quickly and eagerly accepted the challenge. In western Canada tariff reform had been, although somewhat unwillingly, left in abeyance during the war period. Actuated by a sense of patriotism the agriculturists were willing to labour under almost any handicap in order that the nation as a whole might not be retarded in its efforts to win the war. Coupled with this there was a tacit understanding that tariff revision would immediately follow the signing of the armistice, and the fact that this revision was not undertaken, in spite of the report of the Tariff Commission appointed by the late government accounts in no small measure for the failure of the Conservative party to elect a single member in the three prairie provinces. An anaylsis of the vote cast in the last general election is both interesting and illuminating. It is doubtful if there has even been in the history of Canada since confederation a parliament representing such a considerable body of low tariff sentiment as the present one. It is well to remember that the tariff planks of the Liberal and Progressive platforms are almost identical. I have them here, Mr. Speaker. The Progressive platform recommends:

(a) By immediate and substantial all-round reduction of the customs tariff.

(b) By reducing the customs duty on goods imported from Great Britain to one-half the rates charged under the general tariff, and that further gradual uniform reductions be made in the remaining tariff on British imports that will ensure complete free trade between Great Britain and Canada in five years.

(c) That the Reciprocity Agreement of 1911, which still remains on the United States statute books, be accepted by the parliament of Canada.

This platform was drawn up in the year 1916 but we have not forgotten it yet.

(d) That all foodstuff not included in the Reciprocity Agreement be placed on the free list.

(e) That agricultural implements, farm machinery, vehicles, fertilizers, coal, lumber, cement, illuminating fuel and lubricating oils be placed on the free list, and that all raw materials and machinery used in their manufacture also be placed on the free list.

(f) That all tariff concessions granted to other countries be immediately extended to Great Britain.

(g) That all corporations engaged in the manufacture of products protected by the customs tariff be obliged to publish annually comprehensive and accurate statements of their earnings.

(h) That every claim for tariff protection by any industry should be heard publicly before a special committee of parliament.

Now, the Liberal platform reads in part as follows:

That, to these ends, wheat, wheat flour and all products of wheat the principal articles of food; farm implements and machinery; farm tractors, mining, flour and saw-mill machinery and repair parts thereof; rough and partly dressed lumber; gasoline, illuminating, lubricating and fuel oils; nets, net-twines and fishermen's equipments; cements and fertilizers, should be free from customs duties, as well as the raw material entering into the same.

That a revision downwards of the tariff should be made whereby substantial reductions should be effected in the duties on wearing apparel and footwear, and on other articles of general consumption (other than luxuries), as well as on the raw material entering into the manufacture of the same.

That the British preference be increased to 50 per cent of the general tariff.

And the Liberal party hereby pledges itself to implement by legislation the provision of this resolution when returned to power.

These two platforms are almost identical and when we remember that the united votes cast in favour of Liberal and Progressive candidates at the general election totalled 2,150,342 as against 971,502 registered for the Conservative party, the truth of my contention is readily realized and the mandate of the elected representatives appears clear and unmistakable. Never did the people express themselves more completely on this matter, never did they seek more earnestly to escape the injustices for which, in their opinion, the protective system is responsible. It is my opinion that the policy of the Liberal party in opposition, culminating in the platform of 1919, was a policy evolved at a time when the needs of the Canadian people were the primary interests of the Liberal leaders and when retention of office and mere political opportunism had not, as yet exercised a baneful and paralyzing influence on the minds of those leaders. In a word, we appeared to have in Canada at that time a Liberal party with a Liberal programme, a party since transformed into a party of Tory reactionaries clothed in the mere garb of official Liberalism.

It might be pertinent to ask, Mr. Speaker: Has public opinion undergone any appreciable change on the tariff question, and if so, is such a change at all in evidence? Is it sufficiently widespread to justify the present administration in following the tariff policy of their predecessors in office? If not, what is their justification? I submit without fear of contradiction that low tariff sentiment has in no sense diminished rather it has increased since the present government took office. There is a feeling, indeed one might call it a deep-seated conviction, that the protective system is directly responsible, first of all, for the alarming emigration from this country; for the high cost of living in so far as the high cost of manufactured goods is concerned; for the restricted purchasing power of the Canadian dollar, which must of necessity militate against industrial development and expansion; for the unrest and dissatisfaction so acute in rural Canada at this time; and for rural depopulation, the seriousness of which becomes evident when we realize that we can only meet our crushing financial obligations by the export of our surplus farm products, sold in open competition in the markets of the world.

It might be stated in reply that it is illogical to contend that the protective system is responsible for the high cost of living and for the outflow of settlers owing to the fact that these settlers migrate to a country which has a tariff higher than ours. But we must remember that they have in the United States, speaking commercially, the largest free trade area in the world—110,000,000 people, the wealthiest in the world, trading freely with one another. And while their tariff is high, the amount of customs duty collected is comparatively negligible when compared with ours.

I have the figures of customs duties for the two countries for the calendar year 1922. I took the calendar year because the fiscal years of the two governments do not correspond, ours closing on March 31st, and theirs on June 30th. In the United States for the calendar year 1922 they collected in customs duties $458,359,415, or $4.17 per head of population. In Canada in the same period we collected $132,167,544, or $14.68 per head of population. Taking the family unit as five, this puts an annual burden on the supporter of each family in the United States of $20.85, while the head of a Canadian family of the same size has to shoulder a burden of $73.40.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the acid test to which our tariff legislation must be submitted is the results that accrue from it and as these results affect the great masses of the people in their efforts to secure the necessities of life and the tools of production. Therefore in this connection I want to submit a few figures, briefly comparing the prevailing prices in the United States to-day with those in Canada. The figures are the most up-to-date that can be procured, and the commodities chosen are those in which the people as a whole have a direct interest. In February of this year I got a copy of their mail order catalogue from the T. Eaton Company at Toronto and from Winnipeg. These catalogues I think are always admitted to be a fair criterion of prices of general commodities in Canada. In the same month I sent across to the States and got a copy of the mail order catalogue of the Sears-Roebuck Company of Chicago. Some hon. members might think that this perhaps is not a fair comparison, that the Sears-Roebuck Company may be a cheap concern handling an inferior line of goods. I want to assure them that such is not the case. I have lived among American farmers in western Canada for some years and I know positively that the Sears-Roebuck Company occupy the same position among the rural communities in the western United States that the T. Eaton Company do in Canada; they have practically a monopoly of the mail order business so far as rural sections of the western states are concerned, and they hold that monopoly by giving good value. In fact, many farmers in western Canada living near the border send to Sears-Roebuck Company for their goods. The company does not ship to Canada but to the nearest point on the American side, and our farmers go across for the goods and pay duty as they bring them into Canada. Of course, if the customs officer did not happen to be there when any of these farmers came across with their goods they would always wait until he came!

In going through these catalogues, while there is a great difference in the prices, there are a great many lines of goods which I could not use for purposes of comparison; that is, I could not take two suits of clothes and say they were exactly the same. However, I have picked out certain items which I could be sure of from the description in both catalogues. The first I have here is overalls and smocks. This is the description in each catalogue:

Blue and white stripe, heavy weight denim.

I think a great many members are familiar with these articles. Before I go into this comparison any further I want to say that wherever possible I used Eaton's Toronto catalogue for comparison with the Chicago catalogue of the Sears-Roebuck Company because I thought it was fairer to do so; but a great many articles used in western Canada do not appear in the Toronto catalogue, and in such cases I have had to use the Winnipeg catalogue of the T. Eaton Co. These overalls and smocks are quoted in Eaton's Toronto catalogue at $1.80 per garment; in Sears-Roebuck at $1.48 per garment. That is, they are 22 per cent higher in Toronto. The tariff on denims is 32½ per cent. Another item is men's work shirts, heavy weight drill, black and white stripes. I chose this shirt because it is very popular among working men in this country—I wear one myself when I am at home. Eaton's price is $1.45; Sears-Roebuck's 95 cents, or 53 per cent higher in Toronto. The tariff is 35 per cent. The next article is women's gingham house dresses. In this line I could not pick out two dresses and say they were the same, so I took the highest and lowest in price—there is a page of them in each catalogue. In Eaton's Toronto catalogue they run from $2.65 to $3.75; in Sears-Roebuck's from $1.69 to $2.98. The difference between the two best ones was 26 per cent higher in Toronto, and in the case of the two cheapest ones 56 per cent higher in Toronto. The tariff is 32½ per cent.

Another item is sewing machines. These are also taken from the Toronto catalogue of the Eaton Company. I could not pick out two of these and say they were just the same, so I took the highest and the lowest as with the preceding article. In Eaton's they ran from $29 to $52.50; in Sears-Roebuck's from $24.85 to $39.75. The difference between the best machines shows 32½ per cent higher in Toronto, and the cheapest machines were 17 per cent higher in Toronto. The tariff on sewing machines is 30 per cent. Warm air furnaces, complete except for pipes and registers. These are both described as having a 20-inch firepot and 12,000 cubic feet heating capacity, the only difference being that the Sears-Roebuck furnace was something like 80 pounds heavier in shipping weight; Eaton's, Winnipeg, $84.50; Sears-Roebuck, $57.45, or 47 per cent higher in Winnipeg; tariff, 25 per cent.

I find in both these catalogues specials in paints. Those to which I shall refer are paints for inside and outside use, the kind we usually buy for ordinary work in this country. Eaton's, Toronto, $3.15 per gallon; Sears-Roebuck, $2.35 per gallon; 34 per cent higher in Toronto; the tariff is 30 per cent. Twelve-inch gang-plow, stubble bottom, high lift; Eaton's, Winnipeg, $88; Sears-Roebuck—and this, Mr. Speaker, is at Fargo, North Dakota; they have a warehouse there for some of their heavy implements, and while the price is higher there than at any other point where they stock it, I took that price because I thought it was fairer when compared with Winnipeg, Fargo being only a few hundred miles straight south of Winnipeg; Sears-Roebuck, Fargo, $75.45; that is 17 per cent higher in Winnipeg. The tariff is 15 per cent. 16-16 disc harrow—and most hon. gentlemen in this corner will know that that means 16 discs 16 inches in diameter—complete with tongue truck and weight pans; Sears-Roebuck, Fargo, $45.24; Eaton's, Winnipeg, $54.50; 20 per cent higher in Winnipeg; tariff 12½ per cent. Three-quarter wagon or general purpose truck—a very popular wagon in this country, the wheels being three-quarters the height of the standard wagon. Skeins 3½ inches by 10 inches; front wheels, 36 inches high; rear wheels, 40 inches; 3-inch tires; Eaton's, Winnipeg, $59.50; Chicago, $49.95; 24 per cent higher in Winnipeg; tariff, 17½ per cent. Standard two-deck wagon-box. Now, there are different styles of wagon-boxes, involving different costs of construction, but there was a cut in both these cases and the styles were the same. Both boxes are described as being 26 inches high, 10 feet 6 inches long and 36 inches wide. Sears-Roebuck, $22.50; Eaton's, Winnipeg, $33.75; 50 per cent higher in Winnipeg; tariff, 30 per cent. Self-dumping hay rake, 10-foot size. This is from the Toronto catalogue; Eaton's, $42.50; Sears-Roebuck, $33.66; 26 per cent higher in Toronto; tariff, 15 per cent.

The next item I have here is that of hay forks. Both catalogues indicated that only one hay fork was stocked, so that there can be no difference in quality. Three-tined, bent handle hay fork, 5-foot hardwood handle, Eaton's, Winnipeg, $1.25; Sears-Roebuck, $1; 25 per cent higher in Winnipeg; tariff 22½ per cent. Four-tined barley fork with guard—this is the kind of fork we use for pitching straw. Eaton's, Winnipeg, $2.25; Sears-Roebuck, $1.65; 36 per cent higher in Winnipeg; tariff, 22½ per cent. Five-foot mower, vertical lift, complete; Eaton's, Winnipeg, $79.50; Sears-Roebuck, Fargo, $59.90; 32 per cent in Winnipeg; tariff, 10 per cent.

Thresherman's tank pumps, 5-inch cylinder, 5-inch stroke: Eaton's, Winnipeg, $15.75; Sears-Roebuck, $10.65. Open top lift pump, —this is the type of pump used for shallow wells— with 3-inch by 10-inch iron cylinder: Eaton's, Winnipeg, complete with 8 feet of 1¼ inch pipe, $8.45; Sears-Roebuck, complete with 4 feet of 1¼ inch pipe, $5.60. Then, there are wooden pumps, also very popular for shallow wells. I figured this out for a well with a depth of 24 feet: Eaton's, Winnipeg, $20.25; Sears-Roebuck, $13.88; tariff on pumps, 30 per cent.

I found a great difference in harness, but it was impossible to pick out two sets of harness and say they were exactly the same. However, on some parts of harness we could get a good comparison. For instance, on heavy team lines complete, 1¼-inch by 22 feet, the prices were: Eaton's, Winnipeg, $7.85; Sears-Roebuck, $6.37; 23 per cent higher in Winnipeg. Also team traces, 6 feet 4 inches long, with heel chain 2 inches wide, 2-ply: Eaton's, Winnipeg, set of 4, $14.75; Sears-Roebuck, $12.65; 17 per cent higher in Winnipeg; tariff 30 per cent.

We have heard something in the House this session about a building boom in the United States; perhaps the figures I am about to give are an indication of one of the reasons. Standard wire nails, 2½ inches—that is the length—per 100 pound keg: Eaton's, Winnipeg, $4.90; Sears-Roebuck, $3.50; 40 per cent higher in Winnipeg; tariff 60 cents per 100 pounds.

I looked up woven wire fencing but I was unable to find two that were of the same pattern—that is, no two that had the same number of line wires and the same number of stays per rod, therefore I could not get a fair comparison. But in poultry netting I was able to make a comparison. Diamond poultry netting, 2-inch mesh, constructed of No. 19 wire throughout, galvanized, 36 inches wide, 50 yard roll: Eaton's, Toronto, $4.65; Sears-Roebuck, $2.95; 57 per cent higher in Toronto; tariff, 30 per cent. Standard barbed wire, 4 points, 80 rod spools: Eaton's, Winnipeg, $4.25; Sears-Roebuck, Chicago, $4; 6¼ per cent higher in Winnipeg; tariff, free.

Rotary washing machines operating on the Dolly principle, Eaton's, Winnipeg, $16.60; Sears-Roebuck, $12.25; 35 per cent higher in Winnipeg, tariff, 27½ per cent. Gasoline engines—I took the small type, 1½ horsepower, a very popular engine throughout the country, used for driving washing machines and churns, pumping water, operating fanning mills and doing many little chores like that about the farm. These are both described as 1½ horsepower, both equipped with Webster magneto: Eaton's, Winnipeg, weight 250 pounds, $67.50; Sears-Roebuck, weight 278 pounds, $52; 37 per cent higher in Winnipeg; tariff, 27½ per cent.

Cream separators, similar style and quality, both described as having 600 pounds skimming capacity: Eaton's, Winnipeg, $57.50; Sears-Roebuck, $62.50; $5 higher in Chicago; tariff free.

Cream cans, five-gallon size, heavily constructed, railway shipping cans, weight twelve pounds—Eaton's (Winnipeg) $5.10, Sears-Roebuck, $3.40; fifty per cent higher in Winnipeg; tariff, 25 per cent.

Agricultural monkey wrenches, 10-inch size: Eaton's (Toronto), 70 cents; Sears-Roebuck, 45 cents; fifty-five per cent higher in Toronto; tariff, 30 per cent.

Crescent wrench, with adjustable jaws, 6-inch size. This is a very popular wrench nowadays where there is any mechanical work to do. The price at Eaton's Toronto, is 65 cents, Sears-Roebuck, 45 cents; 44 per cent higher in Toronto; tariff, 30 per cent.

Men's gum rubber boots, knee length: Eaton's, $5.25, Sears-Roebuck, $3.98; 31 per cent higher at Eaton's; tariff, 25 per cent.

*See page 2696.

[Mr. Bancroft.]

Next comes an item that will not interest the hon. member for Saltcoats (Mr. Sales). Gillette safety razor, new model, silver plated: Eaton's (Winnipeg) $5, Sears-Roebuck, $3.75; 25 per cent higher in Winnipeg.

Auto Strop safety razor, silver plated, twelve blades and strop; Eaton's Winnipeg, $5, Sears-Roebuck, $3.75; 25 per cent higher in Winnipeg; tariff 30 per cent. There was about the same difference in the hollow ground razors but I could not pick out two of them and say they were the same quality.

I could go on almost indefinitely making comparisons between these two catalogues, but I think that is enough to give the House some idea of the range of prices on ordinary purchases and of the excess that we have to pay as compared with the farmers in the United States. It is my opinion, Mr. Speaker, that there can be no permanent prosperity in this country while our production costs are greater than those of the countries with which we have to compete. I believe it is our duty to remove all artificial barriers in order that we may develop our natural industries to the greatest possible extent, and not until we do this can Canada take her place among the great producing nations of the world.

On motion of Mr. Raymond the debate was adjourned.

Mr. TOLMIE: Will this debate be continued to-morrow?

Mr. ROBB: We shall continue this interesting and illuminating debate.

On motion of Mr. Robb the House adjourned at 10.45 p.m.

Tuesday, May 15, 1923

The House met at three o'clock.

*WHEAT BOARD LEGISLATION

On the Orders of the Day.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I think I owe my right

hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) and the House an apology for having given an incorrect answer to a question that was asked me yesterday. My right hon. friend asked me if the government had extended by order in council the operation of the Wheat Board Act, and I replied, "not yet." I had in mind another matter. The answer should have been, that the extension was granted by order in council on the 7th day of April.

CROWSNEST PASS AGREEMENT

On the Orders of the Day.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Has the government yet taken action with respect to the Crowsnest pass or so-called Crowsnest pass agreement extension? It will be remembered that there was power to order an extension of the temporary arrangement, or so-called temporary arrangement, for one year. Has action been taken to do so?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): That is the matter I had in mind when I replied, "Not yet," to my right hon. friend.

Mr. MEIGHEN: When is it the intention of the government to take that step, or does the government intend to do so? It is clear that it had better be done now if it is going to be done.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The matter is under consideration. I will give my right hon. friend a reply later.

THE BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from Monday, May 14, the debate on the motion of Hon. W. S. Fielding (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means, and the proposed amendment thereto, of Mr. Robert Forke.

Mr. W. G. RAYMOND (Brantford): Mr. Speaker, so far as the debate on the budget has proceeded, I should like to associate myself with the cheerful sentiments expressed by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Stork). It came quite refreshingly after what we had been treated to for some hours before; it came like a refreshing western breeze, full of hope and inspiration. It was as though one had been reading in the Lamentations of Jeremiah, and had turned from that to the glad songs of Isaiah, the prince-poet of Israel. I should also like to associate myself in the complimentary remarks that he made to the Minister of Finance. I am sure that not only hon. members on this side of the House, but every hon. member of this House, and, in fact, the country at large must thoroughly appreciate the great service that the Minister of Finance has rendered to Canada. A record of forty-one years of life devoted unselfishly, honestly, faithfully and patriotically to the service of his country is a record that is very seldom equalled in any civilized country in the world. Not only has his native province every reason to be proud of him, but the great Dominion from ocean to ocean has reason to be proud of and grateful for his services.

I am one of those who believe that in this particular budget that he has brought down now, he has rendered his country a great and signal service. I was pleased with it. Although it has been criticized by some hon. members opposite, it possesses many features that must commend themselves to the country generally. In the first place, there is no great disturbance of business; there is no attempt to do something spectacular. His position has been termed "standing pat", and some hon. gentlemen opposite find fault with the expression that the hon. gentleman used of "tariff stability". In my opinion, the very thing that we wanted in this country was tariff stability, and I am bold to believe hon. gentlemen misunderstood the way in which the word "stability" is applied. Stability as applied to a ship does not mean that it will not progress; that it will not change its position; but it means that it is not easily upset. Every time before a Dominion general election, there has been a feeling of anxiety throughout the business world of Canada, and to a somewhat less extent there has been a feeling of anxiety every time a budget has been brought down in this House by the Minister of Finance. But on this occasion a general feeling of confidence was established throughout the country. The people found in the budget speech many things for their general advantage, some things that were to the particular advantage of the farmers and people generally engaged in agriculture, and others particularly advantageous, perhaps, to the commercial and manufacturing industries of our country.

I do not intend to take up the items of this budget in detail, but speaking in general of it, I think we may say that it is one that has given satisfaction in many regards, partly in the increase in the British preference which I thought was what was wanted by our hon. friends opposite, and the removal of certain taxes whose removal must be beneficial to those engaged in that industry, such as the sales tax on wool, the sales tax on drain tiles, the sales tax on furs, besides the removal of the excise tax on beet-sugar and the reduction of the excise tax on wines. While these items may not appeal to hon. gentlemen who live on the prairies, surely those who have to sell wool, those who have to purchase drain tiles, those farmers who have furs to sell, those persons who raise grapes for the purpose of making wine, or, as in the case of western Ontario where the industry is carried on to quite an extent, those who grow a great deal of beet-root for sugar making, should all certainly feel that something has been done in the way of helping along their respective industries. I regret therefore that there was no word of appreciation, not so much as a syllable, from hon. gentlemen opposite. I had hoped that they would feel some appreciation and would at least recognize that this much had been done, and if there was anything else that they wanted they might have mentioned it. Alas, however, not one word of appreciation comes from them for what has been done for them in these instances.

Had I not been so well pleased with the budget on hearing its presentation by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), I think that the criticism of it that was made by the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) would have given me some confidence in it. We all know that hon. gentleman's power and his knowledge of budget questions; we know that he has had an intimate association with the labours of a finance minister, having filled that important position himself. We know him also to be a man of great acumen and penetration. So, when we consider these qualities and reflect on the little objection which the hon. gentleman could find to the budget, we must come to the conclusion, I think, that the minister's statement was a pretty perfect production. The hon. gentleman's criticism rather tended towards the French treaty; in the latter part of his address he seemed to make a very strong point of the treaty and to repeat the arguments that were made at the time the treaty was before the House, to the effect that it reduced the taxes on luxuries and goods used by the wealthier class. That I took to be his argument when the treaty was under discussion, and it was repeated. But as I stated before in this Chamber when the treaty was being considered, the satin, the silks, the cords, the braids, the twists, and all these articles that come in cheaper under the French treaty are the raw material of the dressmaker, the milliner, the tailor and the costume-maker, of all who make garments in our country for our people, whether they are rich or poor. Consequently, I pointed out, it was a relief to lighten the tax on the raw material of the garment makers, because the reduction helped those industries and helped to cheapen the clothes of everyone. Again, the hon. gentleman stated that brandy and champagne were luxuries. In the part of the country I come from, I beg to say that brandy and champagne are not luxuries; nor, Sir, is sparkling Burgundy a luxury. On the contrary, these things are classed with blue pills, calomel, salts, and various kinds of similar matters that must be prescribed as medicine by doctors. So that they are not only necessaries, but necessaries for the sick, and if these goods are lightened in any way by the French treaty the reduction is beneficial to those who suffer the afflictions of sickness under the hand of Providence. Now, I should not like it to be thought, when I say that these things are not luxuries, that they are articles of common, daily consumption, in Ontario at least. But certainly Mr. Speaker, when one who can analyze this budget as thoroughly as did the member for West York finds so little in it to criticize, the effect must be to inspire greater confidence in all the friends of the Minister of Finance. The hon. gentleman's criticisms seemed like some heavy 12-inch howitzer, but the emplacement did not seem to be exactly accurate, the elevation was not precise, nor was the training direct. So that the little soixante-quinze seemed to get away.

In the remarks of the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bancroft) I was much interested, particularly in the lengthy price list that was produced of Eaton's goods, as well as the comparison that was made—which was very instructive—with the goods of Sears-Roebuck, of Chicago. But, Sir, would it not be considered by Wanamaker, by Montgomery-Ward, by Seigel, Cooper, and by other large stores on the other side, a matter of partiality that only Sears-Roebuck should have the advantage of the great advertisement which was given that firm in the placing upon Hansard and the dissemination all over the country, of their price list? I feel sure there was a great deal in the hon. gentleman's argument; but without having the actual goods before me, and just taking the statement in one catalogue that a shirt is worth so much and another statement in another catalogue that a shirt is worth something else, I would want to be quite assured that it was identically the same kind of shirt before I began to compare prices. This is another exemplification of the old adage that the proof of the pudding is in the eating.

We have heard recently of a number of young men who went over to the United States, induced to go there by the high wages on account of the boom. Those young men are now coming back because of the high cost of living on the other side. The member for Selkirk endeavoured to show that the cost of living was lower in the United States than it is here and that it was cheaper to live across the line than in Canada. Well, the Mayor of Brantford recently made the statement that many of the young men who had left that city and gone to Detroit and other American cities were coming back because the cost of living was so much greater in the United States than in Canada. There was another part of the hon. gentleman's speech that I could not help noting.

He stated that because the right hon. member for Grenville (Mr. Meighen) had nailed his protection colours to the mast, the two parties that were opposed to him at the last election received 2,120,000 votes whereas the right hon. gentleman got only some 900,000. I believe that was his statement. I could not help wondering, Mr. Speaker, when the hon. member made the remark, what the hon. member for Grenville was thinking; and it seemed to me, by a kind of telepathy, I suppose, that I could hear with my mind's eye, if I may use that Hibernianism, the reflections that were going on in the right hon. gentleman's mind. He was saying: Did I not try to cultivate you with 5 per cent of a reduction off the duty on cultivators? Did I not try to reap the harvest of your affection by throwing 5 per cent off binders? Did I not try to draw you to my way of thinking by making tractors absolutely free? Did I not try to bind you to my affection by leaving binder twine free on the list? And what was the answer? I am sure that the right hon. gentleman's reply to his own soliloquy must have been that ingratitude was "more strong than traitors' arms." There was no response from these gentlemen—no response whatever. And now when the question is brought up again we are reminded that duties were thrown off at that time to please the Progressive party. Duties have been relaxed now to please them. But nothing seems to please them, they do not appear to be delighted with anything. But is it a matter really to be sorry for? Because, knowing them personally and individually, I can say they are mostly cheerful, healthy, happy men; but as a party, I should like to see them appreciate those things that are done for them.

Last night we had a very long address that, as far as I could make out, was on the subject of capital and—I won't say labour, but on the subject of capital and no capital. Now, capital is one of the most important considerations of this country and is something that needs to be understood by those that talk about it. When a man rises in this House and tells us what the wealth of this country consists of, and goes over our farms, farm buildings and live stock, our mines and forests, he must not lose sight of this fact, that so far as these represent the wealth of the country, they also represent the hard work and the savings of our people. If you follow that out you will find that the capital in our banks and our insurance companies represents the thrift and the savings and the self-denial of somebody or it would not be there. Therefore I say that when a gentleman rises in this House and suggests that we should make a levy upon capital to pay the national debt, I think he either does not understand what capital means or he does not understand the genius of the Canadian people; because it is contrary to our institutions, it is contrary to the whole spirit of our people to make a levy upon capital to pay the national debt. Why, think of it! These seventeen banks that seem to irk him so much and to grieve him because of their existence—indeed, he looks upon them as some big monopoly apparently—actually represent in many cases the property of widows and orphans.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. RAYMOND: I do not understand whether the objection is to the banks or to the widows and orphans. What I mean to say is this, that if they will examine the stocks of these banks and the stocks and bonds of our insurance companies they will find that they represent, as I say, the savings and the thrift of somebody. For instance, if a man dies and leaves an amount of money, what is done with it? It is put into some sound investment for his family, and that investment constitutes the capital upon which the member (Mr. Woodsworth) who was speaking last night said he would like to make a levy to pay our national debt.

I do not understand a great deal that is said and written nowadays about capital and labour, how can we get money for nothing, and how the purchasing power of people can be increased without the people working and saving. It may be my stupidity, Mr. Speaker, it may be the old-fashioned way in which I was brought up, but I think what a man does not earn by his hands and save, that he cannot have by enactment of parliament. There is no sense in spending money and calling it purchasing power and then throwing it back on to the general aggregation of the wealth of the country. Why, what are the mines and the forests that he spoke of?—and I doubt his figures in regard to these when he said they were only worth $1,200,000,000, because the forests of Quebec alone, according to a report of the government of that province, are worth $600,000,000; I believe our forests and mines are worth many times what he said they are worth. But what good are they? How can you coin them, how can you issue paper against them? They are worth nothing until they are developed—they are worth nothing until the gold, silver, copper and iron are brought to the surface, until the trees are cut down and sawn up into lumber or converted into pulp and paper. And what does develop these natural resources? The capital of the country. And this capital, I repeat, represents the thrift and savings of the people. If you can point to so many billion dollars' worth of farms and farm buildings, to several hundred million dollars' worth of live stock, it is because the farmers have worked and earned and saved money; it represents their capital; and if you have mining corporations or milling corporations functioning, it is because somebody has saved the money for their purposes, and that money constitutes capital.

The idea of having any hard feeling against capital or against capitalists, or making laws against capital or capitalists! Such legislation would be the wreck and ruin of any country. We have seen it done in Russia. We have seen war made upon capital in that country by gentlemen who hold something of the same kind of views that the Socialists profess. I must here admit that I cannot distinguish very clearly between a Communist, a Socialist, an Anarchist, and an out-and-out Bolshevist; there may be a difference, but I fail to see it. I think that anyone who understands this country realizes that it is necessary to have capital if we want to develop our resources, that while those natural resources are there under the ground they are of no value, and that it is only by capital that we can hope to develop them.

Now, the logical consequence of that is that we must have laws that make property safe, we must have laws that respect the rights of the people. We must not countenance anyone who should change the basic principle of our jurisprudence, because if we do we shall have trouble. While we have, as I say, the gross example in front of us of Russia at the present time, we should proceed with due caution. We know what they did in Russia. They first destroyed their ruler, then they destroyed their parliament, then they destroyed their banks and merchant citizens and murdered them for their money, and finally they destroyed the farmers and took their wheat away from them.

Some Hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. RAYMOND: These are facts. They may be uncomfortable to certain hon. gentlemen, but the farmers of this country should be mighty glad that we have—I won't say no Bolshevists, but so few.

Passing for a moment to the speech of the hon. Minister of Finance, I think we should realize that one of the greatest difficulties he has is to produce the money necessary to run the country. There are many things doubtless that we all would like to see done that he has not been able to do. But I do not think we should for a moment suppose that he has not seen them, I do not think we should imagine they have not come under his consideration and received the due exercise of his careful judgment. However, when such a general benefit to the country is offered as a reduction of the duty on sugar I should have thought it would have helped to sweeten the public generally—I won't say particularly hon. gentlemen opposite, but I should hope they would appreciate it because it is something that affects us all. For myself, I would have thought that had it been possible the Finance Minister would have abolished another tax that I feel sure has been brought to his attention, and being one of an important nature he will, I am sure, exercise his due judgment upon it. I refer to the removal of the war tax stamp from letters. It is something, I think, we should all be very glad to see removed. It is something, I feel sure, the hon. minister will remove as soon as it is possible to do so. It is something that, no doubt, can be removed by order in council, and I hope that later in the year it will be possible to remove this tax, because at the present time we are sending letters to Great Britain and to our sister nations within the commonwealth on which we are obliged to pay twice the postage that the citizens of the the United States have to pay on their letters. Where their postage has been two cents on letters forwarded to those places ours has been four. I hope the time will come when ours will be reduced to a figure at least as low as that which prevails in the United States; and I feel sure that this would have been done had it not been for the unfortunate and regrettable illness of the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Murphy). But we ought to remember that if the United States at the present time is leading us in the matter of low postage rates there was a time, in 1897, when Canada led the world by establishing penny Imperial postage. I say I hope the time will come, Mr. Speaker, when it will be possible again to send letters all over the British dominions at the rate of two cents.

There is a suggestion I would make to my friends the Progressives—and I would emphasize the word "friends," for nobody thinks more of them than I do; and I know they will take my suggestion as I mean it. They seem to concentrate their whole attention on that poor item of our national programme, the tariff. On every question that comes up in the House, whether the French treaty or immigration or anything else, my hon. friends always manage to work around to the tariff, obsessed as they are with the idea of free trade. I would say this to them: that there are other questions well worth their consideration; other questions ten times more important to them than the tariff question. If they will consider the question of transportation and what it means to them coming and going, taking supplies to them and bringing their products away, why, the tariff, as a matter of supreme importance, will disappear; it will become a relatively small thing in their minds. The farmers of the West produced last year something like 400 million bushels of wheat and something like 1,000 million bushels of other grains. If they could only save 10 per cent on that by improving the transportation system, the whole amount involved in the tariff system would be equalized by the amount thus saved on the transportation of their goods. I say the matter is well worth their consideration. The tariff is not the only thing. But it is true that in developing these railways, in developing a transportation system and making it a success, it is necessary to have a tariff system; tariff system and transportation system and immigration policy must go hand in hand in the development of this country. It is not necessary to reiterate this; it has been referred to several times in the House. But I would respectfully urge my hon. friends to look at some other questions besides merely the matter of tariff.

Now, what do my hon. friends propose instead of the tariff? What do they suggest as a means of raising the revenue that would be lost? They propose an additional revenue by way of income tax, a tax upon unearned income. But if they will examine the figures in the Income Tax department they will see how heavily the income tax already presses upon that part of our population which is included within our towns and cities—it does not press so heavily upon those in the country. I think my hon. friends would see that it would be impossible by any system of increasing the income tax—a tax which is imposed by the Dominion government, in Ontario by the municipalities, and in Manitoba, I believe, by the province—to attain their object. Then, they suggest an increase of certain duties on luxuries. Why, the people who would be buying the luxuries are the very people whose incomes they would reduce by increasing the income tax. The plan they propose, therefore, to make up the money that the tariff now provides would not be at all adequate; a fair consideration of it shows that.

But I would ask my hon. friends, how do they like the other substitute, the one proposed by the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth). Among the suggestions he made, one, I think, was a levy upon real estate, upon the land. The whole tariff could very easily be made up by a levy upon real estate, a tax upon the land, but the reason it is not done is that such a tax is thought to be not quite fair to the farmers. Yet that is proposed by a gentleman who associates himself with my hon. friends and who finds that he is able generally to vote with them on their tariff policies and their resolutions. The tariff question is not, I think, rightly understood by some of those who undertake to discuss it.

Some Hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. RAYMOND: Let me give hon. members my point of view, and they will see whether that applies to my discussion of it. The tariff is very often discussed merely as a question of political economy, discussed by people who take a theoretical view of things. Most of us are aware that on the basis of mere theory free trade can be argued very successfully, especially upon the presumption that every other country is a free trade country. But as a theory, simply as a theory, it is a dead, cold thing; it is the stillborn child of parents who suffered from academic anaemia. As a theory, free trade is something that never could take its place in the comity of nations to do its part for Canada. When we speak of the free interchange of natural products between Canada and the United States, then we are dealing with something which, if consummated, would somewhat change the aspect of affairs. But we are situated beside a great country, a country of many times our population, with large well organized and well established factories; a country with a high protective tariff against us. What, then, can we hope to do with free trade? We have heard hon. gentlemen opposite tell us that the United States is a free trade country, but when they say that it is evident they have not tried to sell any wheat there; if they had, they would have found a duty of 35 cents a bushel staring them in the face; they have evidently not tried to sell any cattle there. They have not tried to sell woollen garments there, because they would find on woollen goods an absolutely prohibitory duty. And the same applies to cutlery and many other articles. Situated as we are, therefore, we cannot hope to succeed if we have free trade while the United States maintains its present tariff policy.

I do not look upon the tariff purely as a question of political economy that can be argued on a theoretical basis. I regard it from another point of view entirely. It may be a wrong point of view, but I can look back over the history of Canada and I can see that my contention of what the tariff question really involves is amply borne out. As long ago as 1805, 118 years ago, there was a similar discussion going on in Montreal and throughout Canada, which was a small country then. It was considered that the town interests were separated in some way from the country interests, and the question of duties came up. One of the sentiments expressed on the occasion of a great banquet in that time was: "Here is to our agricultural and commercial interests; may they work harmoniously together and both realize their advantages and responsibilities." I think the same sentiment is necessary to-day. But from that time down to the present the tariff question has always been raised in Canada. Some people think it is a new thing, but there have been tariffs practically ever since Canada has been a country. If to cease to have this tariff means—as it does mean—to surrender our market, to give up our commercial weapon of negotiation; if it means to lay our country commercially helpless at the foot of a rival, I say it is contrary, Mr. Speaker, to the spirit and nature of the Canadian people. That is my argument; the tariff is not a question of theory, and it never can be made a question of theory. It is a study in natural psychology. And I would ask you to look at these Canadian people and see what they are, see where they came from and the spirit of independence that they brought with them. You can go from one end of the country to the other. You can begin with those sturdy men who came from Scotland because they stood by the cause of the Jacobites and would never surrender, and who came over to Nova Scotia and that part of eastern Canada. You can take those people to whom I am, I suppose, by race more nearly related, so I will not say anything about them except that it is said that the totem of their tribe is the bull dog on the flag and their motto "What we have we'll hold." No surrender has always been their motto. Or you can take those people who inhabit the western part of the country, and you have there a people of a strong, free, independent disposition, whose motto never could be surrender. If you take the people of the old historic province of Quebec why, Sir, the first military governor described them as the best and bravest people in the world—a man of an alien race, a man who belonged to the army that had been successful at the seige, Murray. That was his description of them, and there is nothing in their history from that day to this but carries out his words of that people—the best and bravest people in the world. Now, do you tell me that a people who have that blood of freedom flowing in their veins are going to surrender their market, throw down their boundaries and barriers and lay themselves helpless at the feet of a wealthy rival to the south of us? It is not to be thought of. It puts me in mind of the battle of St. Julien. If you want to see the concentrated essence of the Canadian people I would remind you of the post that was held by a Brantford boy. He got word during the hear and struggle of that battle when men were falling thickly around him, "Hold the position at any cost"; and he sent back this answer, "We will hold the position till Hell freezes over." I quote that now because it is typical of the spirit of the Canadian people, and come before them in any way you like, bring down your tariff propositions in any way you please, with the duty off this or the duty off that, but when it is a proposition to throw our markets at the feet of any commercial rival, I tell you what, gentlemen, you will never find it meet the approval of the Canadian people.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Fort William and Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I join with very great pleasure in the good wishes and congratulations which have been showered upon the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding). It is certainly the viewpoint of every man in this House that we wish him long life, prosperity and happiness, with many years of good health and all the good things that can be wished for a man who has so many years of public life to his credit.

I have some general remarks to make, Mr. Speaker, and I shall not deal with the budget except in dealing with these general remarks a little later on in my address. In regard to the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Raymond) who has just taken his seat, I do not intend to touch his speech, because with a great deal of it I think all of us can agree, and his speech was so humourous and entertaining and showed such culture and good feeling that many of us could profit by emulating many of his qualities. My own remarks for a few moments will be of a general character.

In the first place I should like to point out that, if we look back over the different addresses given in this House since the opening of this session, we are forced to the conclusion that this country of ours is in a very serious condition. That is mainly due to the fact that we have had very little immigration into this country while at the same time we have had tens of thousands migrating from this country, not only from the prairie provinces which are mentioned by my hon. friends to my left, but from the different industrial cities of this country and from the eastern provinces of Canada as well.

What are the causes in brief for that exodus? Well, in the first place, there is the fact mentioned by the hon. member for Brantford, that we have an area which for over three thousand miles is contiguous to the greatest industrially developed country in the world, and one of the richest nations in the world which will always be an attraction for the young men of our country who look for wider fields to capture than they can obtain at home. In the second place, there is the fact that the climate of this country is more severe than the climate of the United States, and because of our cold climate the people have to spend more for their food, more for their clothing, more for their houses and the heating of those houses, than they have in the nation to the south of us. Then there is the fact of high taxation. We have been suffering in this country recently from very high taxation. I regret to say there is very little sign in the budget that has just been brought down of cutting down any of that taxation. It is true that much of it is due to war expenditure, but in addition to the ordinary taxation we have the railway taxation in Canada, because after all railway charges are a direct tax upon the people of a nation. We have unfortunately built three transcontinental railways where two would have been amply sufficient, and until we can build up the population of Canada to a point equal to supplying both passenger and freight traffic sufficient for these railways we are going to have very heavy railway taxation.

Finally, there is the fact that we have a very small population spread over a very large area. We have about three people to the square mile, whereas in the United States they have about twelve and in Europe thirty or forty people to the square mile. In addition to that the population is congregated into sections which makes the country a very difficult one to govern and a very expensive one to live in. We have the Maritime provinces in the east, where there is a large congregation of people with interests different and industries and problems different from those in other sections of the country. Then come the industrial sections of Ontario and Quebec, which are the manufacturing sections of the nation. Then comes my section, a thousand miles of more or less undeveloped hinterland in northern Ontario with a very sparse population indeed. Then we have the wheat-growing provinces with different interests again, and finally across the Rocky Mountains the province of British Columbia, with its own interests of fruit growing, lumbering and fishing, which are different from the interests of other sections of this country.

Unfortunately each section has a tendency to blame its own problems for the condition of the nation as a whole. For example, my hon. friends to my left in many speeches this year have blamed different causes for the conditions in the western provinces. They have blamed the tariff on some occasions, the unfair exactions of the grain trade, the banks, the fact that the Hudson Bay railway has not been completed, and the high transportation costs. Any or all of these are contributory causes to the conditions in the West, just as over-speculation is a contributory cause, or a desire to live too luxuriously probably is a cause. The absence of mixed farming, as mentioned by the hon. member for Brandon, the leader of the Agrarian party himself (Mr. Forke), is another contributory cause. But none of these are the whole cause, except in individual, isolated cases.

There are two main causes for the depression in Canada to-day in addition to the high taxation and some of the other things I have mentioned. The two main reasons for our depressed condition that appeal to me are these: One is the high prices of manufactured goods in comparison with the prices of agricultural products from the farming sections of the country. The other, the chaotic conditions in Europe because of which world markets have vanished to a great extent. In regard to the high price of manufactured goods there has been too high a cost not only for labour but for raw material. There has been a tendency on the part not only perhaps of the manufacturers themselves, though I do not know that is a fact, but it would appear so, but on the part of their employees as well to charge all that the traffic will bear. I submit that the high cost of manufacturing and distributing goods in this country is standing in the way of a return to prosperity to a very real extent.

In regard to world conditions, France occupies the Ruhr and the Saar basin, the coal and iron mines of Germany. She has the heart of Germany in her hands. I am not criticizing France for that; in fact, I entirely sympathize with France in her attitude, but the fact remains that Germany is out of business and France herself is in a very serious condition. Austria and Italy are also in a very serious condition. Russia is in the hands of the Communists, and we all know what the conditions in Russia are. So far as Great Britain is concerned, she, unfortunately, has lost many of her continental customers. Her trade is disorganized; there are a million and a half unemployed in that country; she has a debt of forty billions of dollars; and her political condition is very unsettled. So that the European and world conditions are all upset. With respect to the United States, that country has placed an increased tariff against imports from Canada. Therefore the world conditions have had a very grave effect on conditions in this country. A recent authority on the world's grain production has stated that the last world crop was short one and a half billion bushels of the world's need, and yet, notwithstanding that fact, there remain in Canada to-day something like one hundred or one hundred and fifty million bushels of grain unsold. That is due to the fact that these world conditions have destroyed the purchasing power of other nations.

Now, let me give just a few figures to illustrate the loss of the market to the farmers of the Canadian West. In 1922 we sold more grain to Great Britain it is true, than we sold in 1921; but, Sir, to other countries we sold less. Here are the figures:

[Mr. Manion.]

Canada's Sales of Grain in 1922 as compared with 1921 were

	Bushels less
To the United States	26,000,000
To France	4,000,000
To Italy	11,000,000
To Germany	500,000
To Belgium	10,000,000
To Holland	4,500,000

These are figures given by the Bureau of Statistics of Canada, and no doubt are absolutely correct. So that the loss of the world's trade, due to the chaotic conditions that exist, has cost Canada a great deal.

What are the remedies for these conditions? It is true that some of them are uncontrollable by us. So far as we are concerned we cannot control world conditions or the decrease in the purchasing power in Europe, nor can we control the United States tariff despite the gesture towards reciprocity made by the Minister of Finance in his budget. But, Sir, there are five main things I believe we can do to help to build up our country. One of these is to hold, so far as we can, the home market. The Fordney tariff in the United States is an attempt on the part of that country to hold the United States market for her producers; and all the other countries of the world have put up tariffs with the same object in view. It is true that there should be an effort made by the manufacturers and by the workers in the factories of this country to lower the price of manufactured goods so that the farmers of the west and the other sections of Canada can have a better opportunity of buying to a greater extent than they have had in the past. I am not even sure, Sir, that an educational campaign along this line might not have some effect in pointing out the seriousness of that condition, not only to the manufacturers themselves but to the employees in the factories.

Second, Sir, we should increase, so far as we can, interprovincial trade because that not only helps our country generally but does away to a great extent with misunderstandings and brings about a unity which cannot be effected in any other way.

Third, we should, so far as we can, increase the population of this country. There, Sir, is where I believe the government has failed in not having a proper immigration policy, a policy which will build up the population of this country. Because if we can do that we will solve practically all the problems we have, particularly that of high taxation and the railway problem. I will step aside for a moment to deal with immigration upon which question I wish to say a few words. There are to-day tens of millions of European people who are anxious to come to this country, anxious to get away from the serfdom under which they have lived not only for generations but for centuries, anxious to come to a country where they can establish themselves and their families in a free land. I well remember, Sir, a story which illustrates my point, the story of one of Napoleon's marshals who had gone to Vienna, where he was taunted by one of the nobility of Vienna with being a parvenu, an upstart. He replied "Yes, that may be so, but I am an ancestor, and you are only a descendant." That is the spirit, the desire to be ancestors, which animates the breasts of tens of millions of central Europeans, of tens of millions of agriculturists, who have lived as serfs in those countries and who are only too anxious to come to Canada if they are given the proper encouragement to do so. But in order to aid them to carry out this ambition we must also strive to make our country a good one to live in, and—

Mr. PUTNAM: Would the hon. gentleman indicate what his conception is of the "proper encouragement" to be given?

Mr. MANION: That, Mr. Speaker, is not my business. I am not the Minister of the Interior or the Minister of Immigration in the government. I would think that one way at least would be to have a plan of some kind, but such a plan does not exist at the present time so far as I have been able to see.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I was going on to say that this is a moment which would appear to afford a supreme opportunity for Canada. I have a very great respect, and I say this in all sincerity for those foreigners whom we have in this country and those foreigners whom I am speaking of bringing to this country. I live in a city which is very cosmopolitan. There are people of all nationalities in that city. I have worked among them in my earlier days to a great extent in the course of professional practice, and I say that this is a fact: According to my observation the Canadian-born children of these people become good Canadian citizens. I well remember meeting little Slovaks, little Polanders, little Italians, little Greeks, in my city and of observing how quickly these Canadian-born children became good Canadian citizens. I have seen them in their school rooms and I remember on one occasion hearing 200 little Slovak
4 p.m children sing "God Save the King" with as much gusto and heartiness as any of our Canadian children could do it. So I believe, Sir, this is the time when we have these millions of acres of ours to develop when we may look into the immigration problem before us and do everything we can to get these people.

The fourth method by which we can improve conditions in this country is by cutting down taxation. We have Dominion taxation, provincial taxation, and municipal taxation in this country and these taxes bear very heavily on the people of Canada. Sir, in that respect I consider that our budget was very disappointing. In England when the budget was brought down about a month ago they cut off from their national debt forty million pounds, about $200,000,000, and since the war they have reduced the national debt by about £600,000,000, about $3,000,000,000, a sum greater than the whole national debt of this country. In addition to that they have lowered taxes. Despite the great difficulties under which they are suffering they have lowered taxes. In this last budget they lowered taxation to the extent of £34,000,000, or $170,000,000, which works out at $4 per head for every man, woman and child in the British Isles. In our budget which has just been brought before the House we have cut taxation to the extent of about $2,500,000 on sugar, which works out at the rate of about 30 cents per capita, less than one-tenth of the cut in the British Isles. In addition to that, Sir, we have not only added to the debt in the past year, and in all past years since the war, but we are going to add to that debt in the future. I believe, Sir, that the people of Canada are looking forward to a cutting down of the national debt in the very near future, and not an addition to it. Our budget should, so far as we are able to do it, be balanced. I do not know that it is altogether possible but a greater attempt should be made to balance the budget than has so far been made by this government. I fear that the promises of economy on their part, like the Liberal platform of 1919, have gone into the limbo of forgotten things.

There are two items in the budget upon which I wish to congratulate the Minister of Finance. They are details but, I believe very important details in their consequences to the people concerned. One is the lowering of duties on stumping machines. In northern Ontario, northern Quebec, British Columbia, and in some parts of the Maritime provinces, stumping machines are very important to the pioneers who are cutting their way out of the forest. They certainly are of great importance in my section of New Ontario, and I advocated this step to the minister.

Then, Sir, in regard to boots for cripples. It is a small duty it is true, but it is something that will be greatly appreciated by those who are affected. In this connection I have never been able to see why we should not take off the duties on all appliances for cripples in this country. I do not know why those cripples, who are handicapped before the world to begin with, should not have, at least, the benefit of any remission of taxation which may possibly be given to them. I say this very feelingly, because in the past summer a carpenter in my city, who has a little boy paralyzed from the waist down, found it necessary to buy a wheel chair to send that little lad to school. He told me that he had to pay a duty of $30 on the chair. I took the matter up with the Deputy Minister of Customs and asked if there was not some way by which this could be remedied, but he told me that according to the law, it could not be remedied. It is time, at least as regards cripples, that we should do everything we can to lessen their difficulties in life. That is one of the ways in which it can be done, and the Minister of Finance should extend this legislation as regards cripples' appliances and should carry it out completely.

There is another matter which I wish to lay before the Minister of Finance; unfortunately he is not in the House at present, but I hope the matter will be drawn to his attention. According to my understanding of the budget —and I hope I am wrong—after August 1, the sales tax will not be permitted to be passed on by large dealers. I say I hope I am wrong, in certain connections at least, and the following is one of them. The other day I had a letter from a large lumber dealer in Ontario, in which letter he pointed out that he had made large contracts amounting to millions of dollars, under the law as it was before the present budget was brought in. He claims that under this new legislation, if he is not permitted to pass on the six per cent sales tax, he will not be able to continue, that this will put him out of business. It would be at least fair to have the Minister of Finance bring in a resolution to protect men of that kind who have made contracts in good faith under the law as it was.

The fifth point to which I wish to refer and which is, I believe, necessary to build up this country, is that we should have a little less pessimism in Canada than we have had in the past. It is true that conditions in Canada have not been good. It is true that all of us, not only the farmers on the land, but citizens in the cities, have been up against a very difficult proposition. But I do not think it is necessary for a man in trouble to stand on the housetops and tell his troubles to the whole world. It is true that a foolish optimism is sometimes worse than pessimism, but we have reason for being fairly optimistic in this Canada of ours, and I am going to take the liberty of dealing for five minutes, not with the dreams but with the actual accomplishments of this country.

1. As a wheat growing country, Canada stands third amongst the nations of the world. In wheat export, she stands first. Our total field crops amount to $1,000,000,000.

2. As regards our gold output, Canada stood second amongst the nations last year, with one-fifth of the world's production, Ontario surpassing even California.

3. Canada has the second-largest coal deposits in the world, and it is only a matter of time until our transportation difficulties are removed so that, at least, we may supply all our own fuel.

4. Canada stands third in production of silver in the world. Last year we produced 21,000,000 ounces, being surpassed by only the United States and Mexico.

5. Canada produces over 90 per cent of the cobalt produced in the world, 80 per cent of the nickel, and 80 per cent of the asbestos.

6. Canada possesses 18,000,000 horse-power of potential riches in waterfalls, and only one-sixth of that has been developed.

7. In pulp, paper and forest products, our exports last year amounted to $200,000,000 worth, or nearly as much as our exports of wheat.

8. Finally, we have millions of acres of fertile land, fisheries on all sides, iron ore to the extent of hundreds of millions of tons, because of which there is no doubt the day will come, in the not very distant future, when Canada will be one of the largest iron-producing countries of the world; and we have a vigorous, virile people.

These are only a few brief facts showing why this country may feel optimistic, and it might be well for us to forget, to a certain extent, some of the pessimism that we have been displaying too freely in Canada.

In addition to that, the other day I read a statement by Doctor O. E. Baker, an agricultural economist of the United States Department of Agriculture, in which he said that there is practically no more potentially agricultural land left unutilized in the United States, that does not involve unprofitable expense for reclamation and clearing. He pointed out that in the United States there is a movement to limit production. According to a foreign agricultural economist, in the great grain belt of southeastern Europe, the peasant proprietor is lessening production. Therefore grain growers of Canada and Canadians generally may look to the future with a little more optimism. It is true that conditions in the West are not good, but the rest of the country has also been hard hit. There has been a great deal of hardship, not only on the prairie farms of the West, but in the cities and towns. A short time ago we had a discussion in this House as regards mortgages on the farms of Canada. To have a mortgage, one must at least possess something to mortgage, and a large proportion of the people in the cities and towns have nothing that they can mortgage. Even as regards those of them who have homes, seventy-five per cent have mortgages on them. It is true that we must do all we can to aid the West, and it is the desire of every one in this country to do so. Some arrangements must be made for longer credit. Apparently, from the evidence given before the Banking and Commerce committee, longer credits than the banks can give and at interest rates better than the farmers can get at the present time, are necessary on the western prairies. Transportation must be looked into, and as far as we can we must lessen transportation costs. Any unfairness in the grain trade must be removed.

But there are some lessons of history which the people of Canada cannot forget in dealing with questions of this kind, and one of those lessons is this, that the United States, under a protective tariff, has become an immense, powerful, highly developed nation, probably the most highly developed industrial nation in the world to-day. Canada and the United States resemble each other more closely than any other two countries in the world. We are like the United States in people, in area, in resources, in thought, in nearly every way in which it is possible to resemble the United States. Therefore, it would be worth while remembering that Canada can profit by the lessons which she can learn from the United States.

The absurd claim has been made that the United States has been built up under a free trade policy. I use the word "absurd" advisedly, because if the United States is a free trade country, so is Germany, with her sixty-five or seventy million people and her different kingdoms with no tariffs in between. So is France; so is Austria; so is Canada; so are all those other countries. Russia with a larger area, would be a free trade country also. Free trade and protection refer to international trade, not to internal or home trade. A country which collects twenty to thirty per cent, or even more, upon the vast proportion of her imports, is certainly anything but a free trade country, and that is what the United States does. The following are some of the duties collected by the United States on some of its imports. I will name only ten lines of goods:

Cotton clothing, 30 per cent ad valorem.
Wollen goods, 25 to 40 per cent ad valorem.
Carpets, 20 to 50 per cent ad valorem.
Automobiles below, $2,000, 30 per cent ad valorem.

And those are the automobiles that the farmer and small dealers require.

Cutlery, 25 to 55 per cent ad valorem.
Oil cloth, 20 to 30 per cent ad valorem.
Kitchen utensils, 25 per cent ad valorem.
Wool blankets, 25 per cent ad valorem.
Agricultural products—the Fordney tariff.

In 1920, practically fifty per cent of all imports into the United States were dutiable. Under such conditions, the United States is certainly a protectionist country.

How has protection affected the United States? If hon. members will investigate any of the industries of that country, they will find that they have gone ahead by leaps and bounds. I am going to place on Hansard five of the United States industries.

In 1890, the tinplate industry in the United States was practically non existent; yet by 1920, thirty years later, they produced 3,000,000,000 pounds, and the imports which they had previously obtained from Wales were practically wiped out.

In 1890, the United States produced 4,000,000 long tons of steel. In 1920 they produced 42,000,000 long tons.

In 1890, the United States produced $480,000,000 worth in the manufacture of iron and steel. In 1920, they produced $3,600,000,000 worth, or nearly eight times as much.

The total manufactured products of the United States in 1890 amounted to $10,000,000,000 worth, and in 1920 to $60,000,000,000 worth.

The value of the products of their farms in 1890 amounted to $3,000,000,000 worth, and in 1920 to $22,000,000,000 worth. This is probably of more interest to the farmers. These figures which I have given cover a short period of thirty years. Probably there is not a man sitting in this House who was not in existence when the first facts which I have given were occurring, and to-day the figures that I have quoted reveal that all these lines have gone up six, seven or eight times. In the case of dozens of other industries, anyone who cares to look up the Statistical Abstract of the United States will find that the same thing is true in regard to every one of them. It is true that the United States is practically self-supporting because of the high production of all lines of goods in that country. But that is to my mind just another argument favourable to a moderate protective tariff. It is also true that free trade might temporarily assist the farmers of the West; but in my opinion, and as was pointed out by the hon. member who took his seat a few minutes ago, it would ruin to a great extent the industrial cities of the East. And those cities would not suffer alone; the farmers who live in the vicinity of every such industrial centre would be affected as well. Would it be wise for the West to be benefited through the ruin of the East? I would ask another question also, and I would have it clearly understood that I do so out of no disrespect whatever; I ask the question with the greatest deference to hon. gentlemen from the West. All the countries of the world with the exception of Great Britain have been and are protectionist, and England has adopted the protective principle in certain directions recently. But even though England did adopt free trade in 1846, the fact that no other country has adopted it, the fact that all the nations of the world have considered it a poor policy, compels this question: Are we to draw the inference that those people in the West of Canada who advocate free trade have inherited all the wisdom of the ages, notwithstanding that they are alone in this matter?

Mr. FORKE: Does my hon. friend imagine that the world has been governed by the maximum of wisdom during the last fifty years, when he considers the condition in which it is at the present time?

Mr. MANION: Perhaps it has not been as well governed as it might have been, but I was referring to the tariff.

Mr. FORKE: If the hon. gentleman followed my remarks yesterday he must have seen that I was contending that the tariff is the great bone of contention and the cause of ill-feeling, hatred, envy and jealousy, and in short is responsible for the condition of the world to-day. I contend that the condition of the world at the present time has to a certain extent at least been caused by high tariff walls.

Mr. MANION: That is a matter of opinion. I think, personally, that the condition of the world to-day is due mainly to the fact that the German Kaiser undertook to conquer it. That is my own idea.

Mr. FORKE: Yes, under high tariff walls.

Mr. MANION: If my hon. friend wishes to debate that question I can take it up with him. As a matter of fact the German Kaiser, under a high tariff wall, was conquering the world, and if he had exercised any sense he would have sat tight and conquered it commercially. Indeed, he was gradually encroaching upon England's commerce before the war. I have already on several occasions cited figures to prove that before the war Germany was outdistancing England in very many lines of commerce. She had gained upon England in many directions. For example, the basic industry of all countries is the production of iron and steel, and Germany had surpassed England in thirty years to a considerable extent in this industry. Germany, with her protective tariff, was surpassing England under a free trade policy; and there are very many serious-thinking Britishers who thought that England had been suffering to such an extent that it would be necessary for her to fall back upon the protective principle. I believe, too, that the time will come when she will adopt protection in many lines. There is this to be remembered about Great Britain. Great Britain is a small piece of land, 120,000 square miles in extent, which could be placed in about half the area of northern Ontario. England cannot produce raw materials on a large scale as can the United States or Canada. She must have free trade in raw materials and also to a certain degree in foodstuffs. Therefore what is good for England is not necessarily good for a country thirty or forty times its size, as Canada is.

Mr. FORKE: But you told us that England would quit free trade.

Mr. MANION: And she has done so in some respects. My hon. friend is a farmer. Would he tell me what he thinks of the protection given to industries in the United Kingdom now under the Key Industry Act.

Mr. FORKE: The protection which is enjoyed by the industries in Great Britain at the present time is protection that is given to key industries. That is a little different from straight protection.

Mr. MANION: It is protection to the extent of thirty or forty per cent, and is intended to keep out the products of Germany and all other European countries.

Mr. FORKE: Some protection has been given in England to a few key industries.

Mr. MANION: Will the hon. gentleman tell me what the cattle embargo was? Was it a precaution against disease or was it not rather direct protection for the cattle raisers of Great Britain?

Mr. FORKE: I think it was protection, all right.

Mr. MANION: Then the hon. member admits that protection is given at least to many industries in the United Kingdom. I could recount many of the industries in Great Britain and show that the protective policy is being rapidly adopted in regard to a number of them. I do not think that Great Britain will ever go back to an absolute protective policy for the reasons that I have already given. The country is so small in area that she cannot produce on a large scale the raw materials that she needs for her manufacturers and the food that is required for her people. She must therefore of necessity resort to free trade to some extent. But the argument in regard to Great Britain, in view of these considerations, does not by any means apply to a country that is thirty or forty times her size, with immense natural resources awaiting development. Such a vast country could not adopt a free trade policy for reasons that would hold good in a country like Great Britain.

Mr. MORRISON: The hon. member stated a moment ago that the wisdom of this nation did not all lie in the West, and he added that the West had no right to ruin the East. I would ask him this question: Has the East any right to ruin the West by exorbitant taxation through the customs tariff?

Mr. MANION: I absolutely agree with my hon. friend that the East has no right to ruin the West; nor do I think that our tariff has been so high as to do anything of the kind. But I do not think, on the other hand, that the East should suffer in order that the West might be advantaged.

Mr. MORRISON: The West is suffering by reason of the oppression and short-sightedness of eastern capitalists who refuse to consider or to listen to statements made by western people, who, they declare, are mis-representing the facts. But the hon. gentleman, I think, himself indicated a little while ago that he recognized the fact that the West was in a bad condition. Does he propose any remedy?

Mr. MANION: I am proposing a number of remedies. I admit that the West is suffering to a great extent, but I submit at the same time that if we consider all the facts we must realize that there is not only one cause; there are some ten or twelve causes, two or three of which I have pointed out in regard to world conditions. I do not suggest for a moment that the East has any right to benefit at the expense of the West, but I repeat, I do not believe that the East has any more right to suffer in order that the West may be benefited. I take this attitude, however, that we should have a tariff sufficient to protect the industries of the country, and when I say so I am quite prepared to concede that the tariff has to be revised from time to time. And I was going on to deal with that a little later. I want hon. gentlemen to be assured that when I made the remark I did a few moments ago about wisdom, what I said was said in perfect deference to my hon. friends from the West. I certainly did not mean to stir up a hornets' nest around me, and I sincerely hope that my good friends have not taken offence.

Mr. FORKE: You are very good-natured, Doctor.

Mr. MANION: It must be obvious, however, to anyone who looks at the question dispassionately, as I have done, for I am neither a farmer nor a manufacturer, that the vast balance of opinion of the world today is favourable to protection; and that is proven by the number of countries who have a protective policy, as well as by the further fact that Great Britain, the sole free trader, is adopting the protective principle in regard to many industries.

Mr. EVANS: If we have such vast resources, why do the manufacturers require that everything they need in the way of raw material shall be on the free list?

Mr. MANION: I do not know that the manufacturers want that, but I think that these materials should be on the free list so far as we can place them there. The manufacturer has to compete with other manufacturers in the world, and if he has to pay a very high duty on the raw materials he uses he cannot carry on that competition successfully.

Mr. EVANS: Does my hon. friend not concede the same argument in favour of the farmer?

Mr. MANION: Yes, and as a matter of fact we have put most of the farmers' raw materials on the free list. Many agricultural implements are on the free list, and others enjoy a very much lower rate than many of the machines used by manufacturers. Now, I was going on to point out the necessity for periodical revisions of the tariff. I am not one of those who think that the tariff is going to stand as the laws of the Medes and Persians; I admit that it must be changed from time to time. I believe that the tariff needs revision periodically; and I have expressed the opinion on two or three occasions, which I still hold, that we should have an advisory tariff commission who will devote all their time to the study of just such questions as have been brought up by my hon. friends to my left. I certainly think that we need a proper tariff protection for our industries; but it is my own private opinion that if an industry can get along under competition with industries of the United States with 20 per cent protection, there is no reason why it should have 35 or 40 per cent. I believe therefore that a proper advisory tariff commission who would devote their whole time and attention to the questions that relate to the tariff would do a great deal to bring about that condition which would probably be satisfactory to the West and at the same time meet the undoubted necessities of the East.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have spoken, I think, a little longer than I intended. But there are a few more observations which I feel I ought to submit for the consideration of the House before I conclude. I wish to point out one thing to my hon. friends to the left—the United Kingdom produces a vast amount of revenue under a free trade tariff. I remember during the last general election it was said there was no such thing as a free trade tariff. England has a very heavy free trade tariff and in 1919-20 she produced something like $750,000,000 of customs revenue, more than the United States, by the way, produced under its protectionist tariff. But the difference is this that under a free trade system the tariff is put upon the necessaries of life altogether.

Mr. WARNER: In connection with an advisory committee, would the hon. gentleman be willing that whoever wanted tariff protection of his business should come before the committee and give reasons therefor?

Mr. MANION: Certainly. That would be the duty of an advisory tariff committee, to study the question at all times and to advise not only the government but this House through its parliamentary committees.

[Mr. Manion.]

Mr. WARNER: We agree with that; that is all we ask.

Mr. MANION: I am glad to hear it. Usually my hon. friends to the left ask for free trade. That is the difference. However, I wanted to point out that the taxes under a free trade system are to a great extent placed upon the necessaries of life. Out of this $750,000,000, $200,000,000 was upon sugar and $600,000,000 was upon sugar, tea and tobacco, and as not only a very large percentage of the men but also a large number of the women of the British Isles smoke, tobacco might be looked upon as one of the necessaries of life,

An hon. MEMBER: A luxury.

Mr. MANION: And sugar and tea are necessaries. To get away from that for the moment. I should like to know what it is that free trade is supposed to do that would justify its adoption by Canada. Under free trade what has happened in the United Kingdom? To-day they have a million and half unemployed. While conditions have been bad in Canada, they have been infinitely worse under free trade in Great Britain. And not only are there these unemployed, but they have been asked to emigrate. The reason that conditions are so bad there is because the United Kingdom is dependent for its prosperity upon the buying power of its neighbours altogether, and has thrown away its bargaining or negotiating power which it had under the protective tariff system, and which the United States and Canada respectively retain under their protective tariff systems to-day.

Frank H. Simons, one of the cleverest writers in the United States, has made this statement:

> It is certain that unless England does get back her trade which she had before the war she will have to cut her population by ten million.

Very recently I was reading the memoirs of the late Earl of Dunraven, an Irishman who lived in Ireland during the great famine of 1846 and subsequently, in which he states that the population of Ireland was reduced from eight million to four million, due entirely to the loss of the agricultural interests because of free trade having been introduced in Great Britain.

I have made the following statement before in this House, it has never yet been successfully contradicted and I make it again now, that there are now in England and were before the war more extremes of poverty and riches, more pauperism, more unemployment, and greater emigration in search of better conditions than will be found in Canada, the United States, France, Germany, and these are all protective countries. Not only that, Sir, but agriculture has been practically ruined in the United Kingdom under free trade. Great Britain grows less grain than France, Spain, Germany, Italy, Austria—I could name half a dozen other countries—so much less that there is no comparison. France with an area not much greater than the United Kingdom grew in the year before the war 300,000,000 bushels of wheat as against Great Britain's fifty or sixty million bushels. France, because she is protectionist, and Germany for the same reason, were growing most of their own foodstuffs. There is a lower percentage of agriculturists on the land in Great Britain, than in France, Germany, Austria, Spain, Italy, the United States or Canada.

Schooling, one of the best statisticians in the United Kingdom, says:

> In 1851 in England and Wales the agricultural labourers per 1,000 of population numbered 106, while in 1901, fifty years after the introduction of free trade, that number had dwindled down to 30; in other words, a reduction of 70 per cent.

Mr. WARNER: Is not that because the English people feel they can make better use of their land for stock raising purposes?

Mr. MANION: France imports practically none of her food; England imports from 75 to 80 per cent of hers. France, Germany, and the other European countries succeed in producing not only their grain but practically all their other foodstuffs, while England is absolutely dependent on outside countries for her food supplies. I shall quote a statement by Lloyd George from an article of his which appeared in the Montreal Star of April 21, less than a month ago. He says:

> America, in spite of its gigantic manufacturing and distributing industries, still retains 60 per cent of its population on the land. The same proportion of French and Italian population is agricultural. Barely 10 per cent of British workers are engaged in cultivating the soil.

Now, I wish to get back for a few moments to the present budget and the attitude of the Minister of Finance at different times during the last two or three years. In the first place in 1919 he adopted the attitude of the Liberal platform, which was virtually free trade in many different commodities. Last year in his budget speech he stated what my hon. friend from Brandon has already referred to, that this budget was only a beginning, that it was going in the right direction and we could hope for more. This year he brings down his budget and states: "This is a moderate tariff and you cannot expect it to go any lower than it is at the present time." In passing I may say that it is practically, though not entirely, the same tariff which has been in force since John A. Macdonald introduced the National Policy in 1878, and I doubt if anyone in this country wants a higher tariff —anyway I do not know anyone who does. As I thought of the variations of attitude of the Minister of Finance I was struck with the fact that though he has passed more than the allotted span of "three score years and ten" he still retains all his youthful agility as a tariff acrobat. This permits him to chant loudly his favourite hymn "Onward, Free-trade Soldiers." while at the same time performing that very difficult acrobatic act of beating the low-tariff drum with his hands, marching forward to the music with his feet, yet consistently rolling his head in the opposite direction. There is no doubt, sir, that this has been very entertaining to the House, and in a sense also to the minister himself, but it has not been inspiring of confidence to those wishing to invest capital in this country, and there is no question that investments of various kinds have been delayed and in some cases prevented by the fact that those who wish to build up our industries were hesitant because of the uncertainty of the tariff. It is true that the Minister of Finance in introducing his latest budget gave us an assurance of tariff stability, and I congratulate him upon that. We need tariff stability. In addition to that I think we also need in a general way the same type of policy so far as our tariff is concerned which has obtained in the United States for the last sixty years—the policy of a moderate tariff, scientifically revised from time to time, a tariff high enough to equalize competition, but not so high as to give unfair advantages to the industries concerned.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I would refer to the amendment moved by my hon. friends to the left. Last year we moved an amendment condemning the Liberal party for repudiating its platform of 1919, and my hon. friends to the left, to a great extent, did not find it wise to support that amendment, though I notice in theirs now they incorporate practically the same condemnation. But I have noticed another strange thing about the amendment—I do not know that it is very strange either—and that is that it is carefully worded so there is no chance of our supporting it. It is in direct support of a free trade policy, so there is no possibility of members in this corner of the House voting for it.

Mr. BANCROFT: It did not require much care in drafting.

Mr. MANION: Perhaps not. But last year, when we were not very careful how we voted against the government, I noticed there was great care displayed by my hon. friends in voting the other way. And I may say, by the way, that in regard to very many votes it has been the same. I am not accusing my hon. friend himself of that, but many of his friends have shown a very strong attitude of guardianship over the acts of the government.

In closing, I may say that as this amendment contains a very strong avowal of the principle of free trade, naturally the members in this corner of the House cannot—much to their regret—support it.

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, it is the usual thing for hon. members to discuss any subject they may feel constrained to deal with on the occasion of the debate on the budget. I am going to take advantage of that opportunity, and then, before I sit down, dwell for a short time upon the budget itself. But before taking up any of the themes I have in mind, just for fear I should forget it, I wish to refer to a few of the remarks made by the hon. leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Forke) and my hon. friend who has just taken his seat (Mr. Manion).

I have not before me the figures of the old tariff of Sir John Macdonald, but it is my recollection that that tariff was very high on farm implements. It ran as high on many articles, particularly on threshing machines, as 35 per cent. I think Sir George Foster was credited with giving the greatest reduction of any finance minister, in 1894, because there had been a tremendous agitation throughout the country against the high duties of that day.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member will not forget to give us credit for making a further reduction of 5 per cent, against the protest of the hon. member for Brantford.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I am coming to that; but I am sure my hon. friends opposite will not expect me to take up too much of my time extolling reductions made by them. But I wanted to correct the statement made by my hon. friend—inadvertently, I am sure—that the tariff of to-day on agricultural implements is almost as high as that of the tariff of Sir John A. Macdonald.

Mr. MANION: May I correct the hon. minister? I am sure he will allow me. I did not discuss the tariff on agricultural implements at all in that connection. I stated that the tariff was practically—and I emphasized the word "practically"—the same as the tariff of the past. I did not have in mind any particular details such as the duty on agricultural implements.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Thank you. I am very glad to be corrected, but I am afraid that even with the correction my hon. friend's statement is a long way from the facts. However, we will let that go.

There are only one or two of the statements of the hon. member for Brandon that I should like to refer to, because they have already been taken up by the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Raymond). I always like to have my department criticized; I think it is good for any public man to be subject to constructive criticism. I have often complained in the smaller provincial sphere in the West that I got very little criticism, so that I am glad to get it here. My hon. friend referred to the increase in the number of officials in the various departments, including my own. Well, that is so; I hope never to be identified with a department of agriculture, in a young country like Canada, the staff of which remains stationary or goes back. I do not know of any provincial department of agriculture, or, indeed, any federal department dealing with similar matters, that has not continued to go forward and give a larger service to the country each year. The same applies to many other departments.

My hon. friend has suggested that economies might be effected by various branches within the departments themselves by paring down the estimates before they come here. If my hon. friend ever has the duty devolving upon him, which he may, of bringing down estimates, he will find that they are pared several times before they come into this House.

Mr. FORKE: With my hon. friend's permission, I would like just to state that I made estimates for twenty years for muncipal purposes.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That may be so, but what I want to point out is that the paring down is carried out in spite of ourselves. The items go before the heads of the various branches and before the deputy, and they are frequently cut before they get to council, and after they get to council they have to run the most terrific gauntlet of all—every minister knows that, so that when the item gets here it is pretty well shaved down. That method of practising economy is actually indulged in, I can assure my hon. friend, to the limit.

My hon. friend very properly described the stream of wealth flowing down here from the West. Last fall I took advantage of an opportunity to run down to Montreal and get for the first time a bird's-eye view of that great harbour. Ninety vessels were either loading or unloading there, in some cases two spouting at the same berth; in one case a vessel was spouting across another vessel which lay between it and the berth. I could not help feeling a sense of pride in the fact that the prairies, notwithstanding the disabilities they have had to labour under, are able practically to choke the avenues of commerce with their products right from Montreal back to Fort William. But my hon. friend's suggestion is that this stream of wealth may be dried up unless certain reforms are instituted in this House. Well now, I have heard statements like that made thirty years ago, at a time when I was more disposed to indulge in bluffs of that nature than I am now. I do not know whether my hon. friend meant that seriously or not. It reminds me of the statement made last year before the Agricultural committee by both Mr. Maharg and Mr. Wood in which they graphically described what was going to happen to the country if they did not immediately get a wheat board. Well, they got the necessary legislation for a wheat board, but it did not come--and the next harvest was the largest we ever reaped. That shows that it is not safe to prophesy until after the event. I am sure my hon. friend does not mean that as a threat or even as a warning. But if it means anything it must mean that the people out there will cease to cultivate their farms, or will strike out into some other branch of agriculture, as indeed, they are actually doing in some cases. But the development of the country never stops. It may slow up during one year, but in no case has it ever ceased. The people are surely not going to abandon their farms; they will not, out of vexation of spirit, cease to produce crops; that would be positive madness. What are they going to do with their product if they do not send it out to the market? I think that is an idle statement; it is unworthy of my hon. friend, and I as a western man wish to dissociate myself from any such thought. The fact is that this stream of wealth is bound to become larger as the years go by, because not one-half the acreage of the West has yet been brought under subjection by the hand of man. So much for that matter. Perhaps it was hardly worth referring to, but there has been so much of that kind of talk indulged in that I could not let the statement go by without some reference to it. I have had correspondence from various parts of the United States asking if the western prairies are likely to go back to the Indian and the roving Buffalo, if there are any. I have had to correct that impression on more than one occasion, and I want to voice the correction through this parliament. So far as we can make an estimate, there is no going back; there is to be a constant going forward, in spite of the difficulties that have beset us in recent years—and to these I shall refer later.

I was the subject of another remark, apparently, with respect to an incidental reference I made to not carrying around cattle space in my vest pocket. When my hon. friend gets better acquainted with my eccentricities of speech he will not feel so much offended when I make a remark of that nature. Here were the circumstances, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. FORKE: I would like to ask the hon. member if he saw the description of his vest pocket in the Manitoba Free Press?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I certainly did, and it was very cleverly gotten up. I am going to refer to that—not to the description, but to certain other articles in the Free Press. The circumstances were these: Here was a business which after suspension for a period of thirty years had been suddenly restored. A good many of the applicants for space did not apply as soon as they might have. Anyway, after the space was all gone the tail-enders began to send in their applications. They evidently thought that space would be awaiting their pleasure, not at Portland, because we did not ship from there, but, say, at St. John, and they would be calling me up from here and there wanting to know where that space was. That is what provoked the remark that no matter where I went I would be found by long distance telephone or telegram or some other means of communication by some applicant for space who was too late in making known his requirements for shipping stockers overseas. I take this opportunity of suggesting that all who want space in the next rush in August and September put in their applications early and avoid the rush that is bound to occur when the ship owners themselves do not know what the requirements will be. They must know within a reasonable time in advance if we are going to have space to take care of the requirements of the shipping public.

I want to say just a word in connection with the Free Press, a journal which is very capably conducted, though not particularly accurately conducted. If it were as accurate in its statements as it is clever in some of its news editorials that are displayed on its front page we would have nothing but nice things to say about it, but some of its statements, as I notice from my correspondence have caused some anxiety in the West regarding an alleged dereliction of duty, not so much on the part of myself—I let that go; I look upon references to myself as first-class advertising—but on the part of my department. If we are negligent we certainly deserve the reprimands that the Free Press has been giving to us in its front page news editorials for the last two or three weeks. But what are the facts? In this connection I wish to give due credit to my predecessor, the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Tolmie). Before this government came into power at all steps were taken by the Department of Agriculture in anticipation of the embargo being removed. As a matter of fact everybody knew since the pledge was given by the British government in 1917, that there were nine chances out of ten that sooner or later the embargo was bound to come off, and come off in our time. Consequently in the year 1921, the last year of the life of the old government, steps were taken by the Dominion Department of Agriculture to get in touch with the National Railway Board with a view to seeing if any of the Canadian Merchant Marine boats, which were then under the administration of that board, could be converted into cattle boats, and here is a summary of the reply. The letter itself is too long for me to read, but it can be made available to any member of the House on request. This is a summary of the reply given by the Canadian National Railway Board to the Department of Agriculture in 1921:

Not practical to use vessels at present in service for carrying cattle. Two vessels under construction at Halifax that could be equipped for carrying cattle. This would be a start.

These two vessels were converted into cattle boats, and I shall refer to them later. The reason I take this matter up now is because on several occasions there have been intimations of a more or less insinuating character made with respect to this matter. As a matter of fact, the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader) came out frankly and intimated gross negligence on the part of the Department of Agriculture with respect to this matter. I bring it up now to correct the mis-statements that are constantly being made by the Winnipeg Free Press, and I take this opportunity to put all and sundry right in this matter. I cannot guarantee that they will stay right, but I have nothing to do with that.

Here is another letter from the Canadian National Railway management, addressed to the Deputy Minister of Agriculture by Mr. R. B. Teakle under date of April 7, 1921:

[Mr. Motherwell.]

Smaller ships not at all suitable for carrying cattle. Could carry about 138 head on main deck of big ships, but it is not worth while when the expense connected therewith are considered.

The full contents of this letter can be made available on request. Later on I wrote to Sir Henry Thornton and I have here his reply under date of March 15, 1923. That was before any shipments of cattle were available from Canada to the Old Country. I will give the sum and substance of Sir Henry Thornton's letter: .

Steamers not suitable cattle carriers. Necessary to conform to British regulations. Extensive repairs would be necessary. Approximate cost $32,000 per ship. From October to May deck of ship liable to be flooded, during storms.

These were the boats of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, which then and prior to our coming into power were under the administration of the railway board. The decks of these mercantile boats of ours are very close to the water's edge, probably six feet above it, and during the storms that are bound to come in the months mentioned the decks would be so swept by the billows that frequently animals and the fixtures on the deck would be swept overboard.

Here is a memorandum prepared by my deputy in connection with this same matter:

It has been contended that smaller boats were not suitable for the cattle trade. This is demonstrated by the serious loss of cattle from the Canadian Commander in October, 1921, when she lost 57 head from a load of 288 cattle.

There is no encouragement to shipping cattle under those circumstances. Imagine the insurance you would have to pay when it became known that these boats were liable to lose that proportion of cattle, 57 out of 288 head. I have not figured out the percentage, but it is a very serious loss.

We were not satisfied with that and efforts were made later on to see if some sheltered deck system could not be devised to prevent this untoward loss of cattle being swept overboard during a storm, but the result has been as I have intimated. When you consider the loss and the risk, it was not a practical proposition to convert these boats into cattle boats.

That is the result of the correspondence that was had by the department before I was minister. Efforts were made subsequently with the results that I have intimated. Not only that, but we have sought other sources of relief in this respect. I have got in touch with a New York firm who had under their control a fleet of three tramp steamers that could carry two thousand cattle each. We also got in touch with other firms, with seven other steamers, all of which laid down this condition, that if they were to come and take part in the cattle trade of Canada at the fixed freight rate they were prepared to adopt, it would have to be on the condition that the Canadian government in return would guarantee them a full load every time they went across the Atlantic during the entire year. You know, Mr. Speaker, what that would result in. During the slack seasons of the year half the space would be empty, and consequently such a guarantee was impossible. What I wish to emphasize, however, is that these avenues of relief were canvassed and found to be impracticable. Well now, in view of the fact that there was never at any time over two or three hundred cattle for which space was demanded and could not be supplied, were we justified in going any further in anticipating a shortage than taking the measures I have referred to?

It is true that a number of gentlemen who are buying cattle in the West, when they got out in that broad and breezy western land and came in touch with enterprising newspaper men—well it is amazing what stories they were able to spread abroad on the western breezes. The result was that there grew up a fictitious demand for space, which had two effects. One was to run up the rates, because the moment ship owners or anybody else find a demand for their commodity the natural result is for them to raise the price of that commodity, and that is what happened in this case. Our good friends of the Winnipeg Free Press made the most of these circumstances. They made the case twice as bad as it was, but of course, that is not very bad from that source; but to read stories of that kind without hearing a proper explanation of the facts is certainly discouraging to the man who raises cattle. When the embargo was taken off we are told that the rate per head was $15. That is not correct. It was $25, but that is neither here nor there. There was a time when it was $15. That was in last December or January, but shipments had to be made from Portland and the law does not permit us to ship through that port so that it was of no effect as far as we are concerned—as a matter of benefit to us it might as well not have existed at all. It was intimated in the case of a number of steamers that had not very much to do that they were going to try and operate from Portland, for instance, at $15. They might have been prepared to do that rather than remain idle, but they knew perfectly well that they could not get Canadian cattle for stockers because the British law distinctly stipulated that they must go from Canadian ports. Consequently we can count that offer out. It never was available for Canadian cattle during last year or since shortly after the outbreak of the war. In the second or third year of the war what was the first price that was advertised for Canadian stockers? It was $20. Afterwards there was a rate of $22.50 largely as a result of the optimistic talk that was indulged in by some of the buyers back on the prairies with respect to the likely requirements of space. Unfortunately those requirements did not develop to the extent that a great many people thought. I have in mind one gentleman whose name I will not mention. I had an interview with him and from his conversation I should judge he would make a first class westerner. He was feeling optimistic and said he thought he should want 2,000 spaces. We were naturally very desirous that these buyers from the Old Country should have their requirements filled in toto if possible at this end. So we got in touch with some of the brokers in Montreal and we managed to rustle, by various means, over 1,400 spaces. That fact was communicated to the gentleman in question and then we found that he only wanted 400, so that the balance of the spaces available was going begging. These are the facts in connection with this matter. I do not want to read too many documents for it is not very interesting. All I want to do is to lay facts before the House showing that we were not derelict in our duty in this respect. I am proud to know that there were a sufficient number of high quality export cattle in Canada at that time to fill two or three hundred spaces. I would rather have conditions that way than that accommodation should go begging. It will mean a lot for the development of this trade when the requirements of the country are known and appreciated by the shipping fraternity, and when the farmers of the West, in fact the farmers throughout Canada, know what the removal of the British embargo is going to mean to them with respect to their stockers.

Now, what further did we do? We do not want to be boastful at all but since this matter has been referred to so frequently it is well that the facts should be known. You know in politics you have to be sufficiently suspicious to keep your eye on the ball and be on your guard against those who are trying to put their hooks into you. A great many people in this country resented the delay which took place in the removal of the embargo and clamoured for the application of the shillelah, or a black thorn in the absence of a shillelah, because the British authorities did not make haste and have this embargo removed. That is not the way to get the British or anybody else to come across. This was essentially a matter for the British themselves to take action. Now, I would like to give credit, in connection with this matter, to all to whom credit is due. I remember saying, when we were discussing this matter last year that if we had the good fortune to get the embargo removed I was prepared to divide the credit for it. I have done that elsewhere in any public statements I have made and I do it here now. Every public man, every public body—whether on this side of the Atlantic or on the other—that co-operated in getting this embargo removed is entitled to a full share of credit. But when I say that I do not want anybody to swipe the credit that is properly coming to this government. One of my experiences on coming down here to take office in the government was to find that if you adopt any good measure somebody steals the credit for it before you get up next morning. The Crowsnest pass matter is an example of that.

An hon. MEMBER: And the Moose Jaw election.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, the Moose Jaw election if you like. If my hon. friend is satisfied with the result in Moose Jaw I am equally satisfied. If my hon. friend is satisfied with the circumstances which created the vacancy resulting in that election I am not going to express any dissent. I would like to take advantage of this opportunity to congratulate the new member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Hopkins). I was a colleague of his for many years in the early days of the Grain Growers' Association before the evil spirit of politics came upon that noble band of heroes and workers.

Now, I have a newspaper editorial which I desire to quote. I do not accept it as being necessarily authoritative, but the Gazette is a very responsible and a very well edited paper. The editorial refers to the report of the proceedings of a certain number of shipping authorities who convened in Great Britain some two or three years ago on the question of the Atlantic freight rates. This question of the freight rates on the Atlantic is not a new question, it is a very old and very typical one, and I am sure the House will agree it is not a very easy matter to deal with. This year I had the opportunity of discussing the difference between railway rates and water rates, and my attention was drawn to the fact that while it was comparatively easy to control railway rates it was quite another question to control rates on the Atlantic ocean. The moment you begin to put restrictions on water rates the vessels concerned can fly away to the seven seas and leave you without any cargo carriers. That remark also applies to rates on inland waters, although not to the same extent. Well, there was a body of men in the Old Country representing the various interests concerned. The British representatives were appointed by the Lloyd George government and the conference was fairly well participated in by many countries including Canada. The representative of Canada was Sir George Perley who at that time was our High Commissioner. I am not going to O.K. this document because I do not know enough about the conditions of Atlantic shipping to give my approval to it but it set me thinking a great deal and I will submit to the House the findings arrived at. I was not able to obtain a complete copy of this report in any of the departments and therefore I must give credit to the Montreal Gazette for securing a copy of it somewhere and giving its readers the benefit. This is the part I desire to quote:

5 p.m.

> It appears now to be a universal condition of the larger industries in all progressive countries that there should be a high degree of organization among the chief companies, firms, or other units, and this condition is especially marked in industries which have to deal with transport. The necessity for such organization obtains clearly in the case of liner services. They have to provide for the distribution all over the world of heterogeneous classes of goods, the circulation of which to an ever-increasing extent constitutes an essential part of the world's economy. The requirements for this part of commerce are in marked contrast to those of bulk cargo in general, where large quantities of the same kind of goods have to be carried at irregular intervals. The ships which cater for this trade are in the main separate units, but the liner service requires fleets of ships operating in unison and consequently large capital resources and a carefully perfected central organization.
> It is clear that competition between individual liners or lines in the same trade would be quite incompatible with stability of rates—

Speaking for myself I do not like that expression very well. However, I did not use it; that is the expression contained in the report. Let me continue:

> —and that the trade would in fact tend to return to the disturbed conditions which prevailed before the introduction of the conference system, or to those characteristic of the tramp market. The shippers might for a time secure the benefit of low-cut rates, but there would inevitably be a strong tendency to abandon regularity in sailings, and there would be no guarantee, such as obtains at present, of any general progress in the type of vessel plying and the nature of the facilities afforded. We consider, therefore, that the conference system must be accepted as a necessary concomitant of modern commerce.

What is the conference system? It is a conference amongst all those who have fleets upon the Atlantic as respects, not only time of sailing, but the charges in connection with their service. I wonder, would the First Minister consider that a combination inimical to the interests of the people that they are endeavouring to serve, or would it be one of those combinations to which the leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Forke) referred the other day, that might be one of benefit to all? I do not know enough about the matter to say which is the case. I only say that that is the condition of affairs that exists. These are the bodies that made this report. The Canadian government that preceded us and, I presume, this government also, as long as we make no protest, are parties to this arrangement. I do not know of any better arrangement that I could formulate offhand. What other plan would the Canadian National Railways adopt in the administration of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine? Either they have to work with this conference, or those vessels have to become tramp steamers. What kind of service would they give to their system of railways as tramp steamers? Tramp steamers do not run regularly like a regular line of ships; they are here to-day and somewhere else to-morrow, wherever they can get a cargo. The Merchant Marine have to join the North Atlantic Conference, to work in unison with it or to establish a line of steamers of their own. I do not know which they should do. I know I was not in Ottawa for two months until I began to dig into this question.

Mr. FORKE: Might I inquire of the minister if it gives him any particular pleasure to see Canadian boats carrying American flour four cents a pound cheaper than Canadian flour?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That does not give me any pleasure at all.

Mr. FORKE: Must that continue?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That has been partially corrected lately. I think it was the second month after I came to Ottawa that the Millers' Association drew my attention to the very question to which my hon. friend refers, that is, not so much the difference between the rates for hauling flour, but rather the difference in the cost of exporting Canadian flour via our National Railways, and Merchant Marine and, not necessarily a particular line of boats, but any line belonging to the Atlantic Conference. I took the matter up with Mr. Graham Bell, Deputy Minister of Railways, with the idea of inquiring why this Merchant Marine of ours could not run its own show. The impression that the public has is that it could do so, and my information was that it would be very nice, first, if we had boats that were capable of running our own show. These boats were constructed primarily for war purposes. I have no criticism to make as regards that; I do not want anybody to think I am blaming the government under which those boats were built. They were, I think, properly constructed primarily for war purposes, and secondly for commercial purposes. When they were put in service for commercial purposes, we found that they were, in the first place, not fit at all for cattle boats and, in the second place, not fitted very well for what is called parcel cargo. Moreover, they have not the speed to compete successfully with the average liner on the Atlantic. That is my information. We on the prairies are brought up far from the sea, and I do not claim to be an authority on these matters. I wanted, however, to know why the Canadian Government Merchant Marine could not run their own show. That was the explanation I received, and it seems rational. What are we going to do about the matter? Could we not take a crack at running our own show and see how it would work out? I was told that the way this had worked out in the past, was that they were eight or nine or ten million dollars in the hole, a deficit which the people of Canada had to contribute to. I was also informed that if they had gone on to the ocean, run their own show and accepted rates that some people in Canada thought should be in force, the deficits would have been only that much greater. I do not know how much this was being put over on me, an innocent man from the interior of this country; but it was pointed out to me that a line of boats of that description could not successfully compete on the Atlantic with properly constructed boats. You were sure to get cargoes going east, because the Canadian National Railways would supply them; but the moment you began to hunt in Great Britain for a cargo to come back with, you would have the entire North Atlantic Conference to compete with, and you would have no cargo. I do not know whether that sort of thing is done down by the sea in this country. I hope it is not, but I feel that is exactly what would happen. I made further inquiries to find out if there would be any danger to the actual safety of the boats themselves. I was told, no; but there would be such competition and combinations put up against that independent line of steamers, that they would come back empty, and that the deficits would be greater than ever. What are you going to do against competition of that kind? Those boats are very important as regards carrying freight for our Canadian National Railways, and if you put them on an independent basis where they would be carrying cargo only one way, they would invariably come back empty. That is my information and I can see why it should be so. We think we have competition in this country; we think we have cutthroat methods, but this is not all confined to Canada. If you go abroad, you will get it in all its purity, in all its genuineness, and that is what you have to do with these liners. There is no speed to them. You might as well put an old plug of a plough horse on a race track as regards speed. But these boats are essential factors in connection with the administration of the Canadian National railway system, notwithstanding these disabilities, notwithstanding the fact that they cannot be converted into proper cargo boats.

Mr. DUFF: No, they are not.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I am giving the House my authority. I do not want to be reflecting on the official opposition which is up against it badly enough these days without my poking any more at it.

Mr. FORKE: The opposition seems to be from the other side.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The opposition was pretty well taken care of this afternoon by the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Raymond).

Mr. EVANS: Will the hon. gentleman say what our Merchant Marine is good for?

Mr. MARTELL: Good for nothing.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I am giving the House my authority. What I am primarily doing is showing the reasons why we could not by this medium provide space for the new trade in cattle this spring. These other references are only incidental. I want to make a complete statement and I hope this will prove to be the last one that I require to make.

[Mr. Motherwell.]

When my colleagues were on the sea in connection with negotiations with the British government, and two members of my staff were joining them, we at home started another course of action, anticipating the removal of the embargo. What was that? I think everyone down East knows the question of union stockyards has been a very important one in eastern Canada for ten or twelve years, particularly in the city of Montreal. In the city of Winnipeg we have a splendid stockyard, and my farmer friends know the advantage that it has been. I went down to Montreal in order to look into the matter. It is pretty hard to get a line on a large city like Montreal, with all its ramifications, just in one or two short visits. I went down there and saw the conditions for myself. I came to no conclusion, but I got into touch in September last with representatives of the Canadian National Railways, the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Quebec Department of Agriculture and requested them each to appoint a representative to meet in my office with a view to ascertaining if anything could be done to carry out successfully the idea of a union stockyard in Montreal. The gentleman who was chosen as chairman of the committee was a Mr. Johnson, who is very well and favourably known in western Canada, having been for many years stationed at the union stockyards at Winnipeg. These gentlemen met on various occasions, held regular sittings in Montreal and were in a small way what one might term an unofficial commission. The organization was not announced nor established by order in council; it was just a matter of mutual arrangement between the different parties interested, to see if some amicable working arrangement could not be evolved for the purpose of consummating the old problem of a union stockyard in that great city. I have under my hand the report they submitted and in which they made certain recommendations which are in the hands of the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway and the president of the Canadian National Railways. I do not anticipate that any further action will be taken until after the prorogation of parliament. However we have got thus far. I mention this matter to show that we have not been at all idle, and I think that those gentlemen in this House and persons elsewhere, especially those connected with a great journal like the Winnipeg Free Press, should be more careful of the statements which they send out broadcast throughout Canada. If they had taken the trouble to consult the agricultural editor of that journal, she would have saved them from the blunders and the mistakes which they have made in this matter.

I come now to a consideration of the conditions of agriculture generally in this country. Now, Sir, we have heard some wonderful stories of agriculture in Canada; and if a man had not a backbone of steel he would have got jaundice long ago listening to the tale of woe which has been told and re-told about these conditions. All over the globe, across the seven seas, it has been iterated and reiterated; we have been told what a horrible time we have experienced especially in western Canada. But what are the facts? I will deal with that question at a later stage. However, let me hurriedly review conditions generally, for that is what more particularly concerns the people as a whole than the conditions of one particular province. Let us start with the provinces down by the sea; let us take first the little island—it is not necessary to say what island. I have never been in that land myself and therefore I have to speak at second hand so far as it is concerned, as indeed I have to speak in regard to the Maritime provinces. I had an itinerary all made out for an intended visit to these three provinces last fall, when the rumpus occurred in the Dardanelles which compelled me to cancel that visit. But I have been fairly familiar with the people that belong to those provinces. I have had labourers from that part of the Dominion for years, especially from the island. I have had men for the last fifteen years who have come from that island, and I have never got a poor man from that source. They have always been willing to do chores, which is exceptional among labourers to-day. I have found them to be reliable men, willing to accept responsibility, and I could pretty nearly always tell what religion they belonged to; I mean the denomination.

Mr. DUFF: Presbyterian.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes; they fear God and keep out of debt as much as they can, and there may be some connection between the two. There is a lesson to be learned in western Canada from the attitude of the farmers of the East towards debt. I can recall my own youthful days, which is some time ago, when we looked upon debt as something to be utterly abhorred and avoided to the last. We thought that only in dire extremity, when one was in the last ditch, was it at at all excusable to get into debt, and then only as moderately as possible. Instead of amortizing debt from now to eternity we always tried to keep out of it. And that is the reason why debt is not crucifying the people in the Maritime provinces. It is true that they are having tight times in some respects, but at least half of the people there are free from debt, and very few of the other half are overwhelmed with obligations, the simple reason being that they have never got into debt; they have played safe. Instead of running to the bank every now and then or hunting up the mortgage company and quarrelling with them because they would not give more, these people went to mother earth, dug the soil, improved the quality of their live stock and dairy products and thus obtained greater revenue from that source. And, withal, they kept their heads. Sometimes we in the West look down on the people of the East and call them stick-in-the-muds, slow and effete. I think, however, that we might to advantage acquire some degree of their caution, at least so far as the matter of debt is concerned. I have often wondered, if we struck the balance between the advantages and the disadvantages of mortgages as a means of developing agriculture, where the the difference would lie. I do not know. However, let us proceed with a consideration of agricultural conditions throughout the country, first in the Maritime provinces.

There is specialized farming in Prince Edward Island, at least to some extent; there is the raising of foxes in addition to specialization in certified seed potatoes, both of them very profitable industries. In New Brunswick there is a considerable area represented I understand by my hon. friend from Carleton (Mr. Caldwell), that specializes in commercial potatoes. They have special equipment; their land is in shape; and their efforts during the war years were well rewarded. Now, however, the war is over and they are faced with a tremendous tariff in the United States, so that the potato growers in that part of the Dominion are in hard circumstances. Well, Mr. Speaker, that is always the way; the man who engages in specialized farming of any kind, even dairying, will sooner or later find the same thing befalls his industry. Possibly dairying and hog-growing which go together, constitute the safest line; there is the least amount of disease associated with them and the least liability to collapse. But specialized farming, whether it be potato growing in New Brunswick, fruit growing in the beautiful Niagara peninsula, or in the Annapolis valley, or specialized fruit growing in British Columbia, all run infinitely more risks than are encountered in diversified farming. That doctrine is as old as the hills, and yet a great many of us are so slow to appreciate it. I suppose we can be excused for reluctantly admitting it. Anyone who ever got the imperial feeling that comes to a man on a threshing machine, who sees the stream of golden grain running into the waggon box, and afterwards takes it to the elevator and gets his cheque, will agree that it is no wonder that people specialize. There is a sufficient modicum of the gambling instinct in most of us to succumb to such a temptation. I have never been a gold miner myself but I can imagine a man digging and prospecting for twenty years in the hope of turning up something, until he is finally bankrupt. But we must play a safe game in agriculture. If we do, we shall be able to obtain a living and build ourselves comfortable homes and provide something for old age. Let every man do this, so that he may be his own household king, beholden to no man. And that is what is really worth while. So much for the Maritime provinces. I regret that I cannot spend more time dealing with their conditions. They form an interesting part of the country and this summer I hope to make another itinerary and have it carried out. Then I shall be able to speak at first hand.

I had an opportunity of visiting the experimental farms in Quebec last year, and some of my friends described my references thereto as a travelogue. I suppose I know in a vague way what that is, but I had an interesting time, whether you call it a travelogue or any kind of "logue". Agriculture in Quebec presents an interesting study. I do not think any province has made the same development in agriculture during the last twenty years. It may be said that Quebec has had further to go, that its agriculture was primitive twenty years ago, and therefore those responsible for the affairs of state had the opportunity of their lives. I am not going to discuss that feature. All I know is that in co-operative dairying I am safe in saying that no other province has made the same progress during the last ten years, in fact in co-operative marketing generally. Our estimates were scarcely through the House where some doubting Thomases were wondering whether anyone would take advantage of the cold storage subsidies, when we had two applications from co-operative societies in the neighbourhood of Montreal and Quebec cities—not the Harbour Cold Storage concern that I referred to the other day, but real co-operative societies run by farmers. They have been asked if they will be able to comply with our conditions and so earn these subsidies. Co-operation is the spirit of the age. I am not one of those who think that middlemen are a bunch of grafters or parasites; not at all. I think a certain class of middlemen are necessary, otherwise we must give the same service ourselves. During the present hard times we have been compelled in many places to adopt co-operation and dispense with some of the services of the middlemen in order that business may be conducted at a profit. But, remember, we are merely doing the service that in former years had been relegated by custom to middlemen.

A good part of eastern Quebec has a climate not exactly like that of the Canadian West, but sufficiently similar to make it difficult to grow fodder corn. The result is that few silos have been constructed. A considerable portion of that interesting province has been denuded of its trees, and farmers are endeavouring to till a reluctant soil that will scarcely grow a crop. It is in such sections of Quebec that you find hard times. We had a man before the Agricultural committee from Ste. Anne's. There are some beautiful spots around there, and also some very hard-looking sections which should never have been brought under cultivation. That witness told us a rueful story, as if the conditions in his locality were representative of those obtaining throughout his province. The substance of his lamentations was this: I am on poor land and I cannot borrow any money. He wanted what are known as additional credit facilities. I asked him if he had not sufficient credit facilities from mortgage companies and the like. He replied that these companies would not lend him any money or only very little. Upon further inquiry I found he was actually trying to eke out an existence on land that should have been left as forest. But there is a certain amount of intermediate quality land between these splendid valleys and the absolutely poor land where the farmers get along pretty well. But if they knew they could grow first-class ensilage by cultivating sunflowers—something which will flourish in a much colder climate than Quebec—their profits would be increased to a very great extent. Such ensilage can be kept over from year to year for provision against drouth. It is not necessary to build an upright silo. If a farmer is too poor to undertake such an outlay he can build a silo in the ground. A hundred years ago or more we find that in the north of Ireland and other parts of Europe the farmers put ensilage in a hole in the ground—sometimes brewers' grain, anything in fact that they wanted to keep in a semi-acid condition. So a man does not need to have much capital to construct a silo for his dairy stock. The use of a silo will encourage him to go into a much more profitable form of dairying. In other words, to be profitable to the maximum dairying should be all the year around, not merely during the summer. I can recall my own boyhood days, when we stopped milking the cows and the milk factories closed we used to think it a day of rejoicing, for to lads of fourteen years of age the work was laborious and the hours very long. Well, the moment that the cows went on winter rations so many farmers put them through on such low maintenance rations that in the spring they were skin poor. That is not right. Those are the conditions under which dairying largely failed in Ontario years ago. Naturally there is a tendency if you are not getting anything from the cow to feed her very sparingly. Of course, this is a great mistake.

I hardly know what to say about agriculture in Ontario. You will travel over many seas and in many lands, Mr. Speaker, before you will find a better country than old Ontario. I do not think it necessary to spend very much time in describing farming conditions in Ontario. As to suggesting improved methods, I would hesitate long before venturing to do so. Possibly one reason why they have not very many experimental farms in Ontario is that they do not need them. But even in Ontario I venture to say the farmers are only waking up to two or three things that we should have been alive to twenty or thirty years ago. Of course, we all think of living when we should be thinking of dying. In the western Ontario peninsula there has been a tremendous hazard in the growing of fruit. The government that preceded us, in one of its moments of enterprise and progress, built a pre-cooling plant at Grimsby. That has proved to be a wonderful transforming institution in the fruit district of the Niagara peninsula. If they could get one or two more such institutions it would simply revolutionize fruit-growing by enabling them to pick their fruit from the tree and rush it into cold storage. Last year that institution was kept open day and night for weeks to the great advantage of the local fruit growers.

We are falling behind in our dairy exports. Reports from the Motherland indicate that our competitors in the Antipodes are getting away ahead of us. They have adopted modern methods in the manufacture of their butter and cheese; we have not; that is all there is to it. It does not follow that we are inferior or incompetent in these matters, because it was a Canadian in the person of Mr. Ruddick, our present dairy commissioner, who organized the New Zealand dairy industry. There is a Canadian to-day in charge down there. Well, if a Canadian can do it in New Zealand, why cannot a Canadian do it here? They have many disadvantages, on the other hand they have many advantages too. Two of our representatives have just returned from a visit to New Zealand and Australia. I have not yet received their reports, but I have had a preliminary report from Mr. Ruddick. He has also given certain statements to the press and certain evidence before the Agricultural committee with respect to our dairying requirements. In effect he says that if we are to keep pace with our brothers in the Antipodes we must modernize our methods. We have antiquated cheese factories in this country. They are too small to give a proper turnover, to give a profit either to the farmer or to the maker of cheese; too small to enable the turning out of a large volume of uniform quality. The cheese is graded too soon, taken out of the factory too soon, not cooled properly, not ripened properly; and the result is that it cannot compete with the first-class article that is put on the market of Great Britain by our competitors. We shall have to speed up if we are to avoid falling further back. For twenty-five years we were the topnotchers on the British market in the matter of cheese. We are second now, and unless we watch out we shall soon be third. We never were first in butter that I know of; we were, I think, third for a time. I do not know where we are now; I do not know where we shall be three years from now if we do not take warning and get our dairying on a better basis. That is all I will venture to say at this time until I get the report of the commissioners who journeyed to New Zealand and saw what was the last word in this connection. Well, I do not know that it is, in fact, the last word; it is like the tariff—there is no finality; even death is not final. And there is no finality about dairying. But the investigations being made have to do with the last word in dairying so far as its application to Canada is concerned. I hope, therefore, that I shall have the sympathy and support of the dairymen of eastern Canada, who have been exceedingly tolerant of a western man who is not supposed to know anything about dairying. I hope we shall have their co-operation in putting the dairying of Ontario and Quebec on a better basis so that we may be where we ought to be so far as the British market is concerned, at the top of the list—where we were before, where we should be again and may be again if we only will. But I want to warn you that you will have to submit to even more restrictions than you do submit to now. There was a great howdy-do when Hon. Manning Doherty introduced last spring for the first time the policy of buying milk on the basis of quality and butter fat content. Just think of it: after fifty years only now waking up to the necessity of paying according to the quality of the goods you get. Why, you might as well make a flat rate for horses as have a flat rate for milk. The same may be said in regard to the cream, because in all these things we have fallen behind. Mr. Doherty is to be congratulated for taking the initiative in this matter, because as a rule the man who breaks the ice in this direction in an old province is going to get rapped over the knuckles for it. Mr. Doherty was sufficiently near this election to make it a little dangerous for him; I was sufficiently far from the election to make it comparatively safe for me to introduce this principle of grading. People would come into my office and tell me what was going to happen to me if they were not permitted to carry on their dairy boards as they had been carried on for the last forty years and to make cheese and grade it just as they pleased. Well, nothing happened; there has been no upheaval. The new grading system came into effect on the first of April and on succeeding days we woke up and found things just about as they were, except that our butter and cheese were going over with the government grade stamped on each package.

Mr.. WARNER: May I ask the hon. gentleman which province took the most prizes in last year's butter market?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think it was the province of Alberta. I am just coming to the breezy West now; I cannot afford to spend any more time on Ontario. Now we have to go through that great area of rocks and mountains and plains west of the lakes—and I will deal with the three prairies as one country. They are to a large extent the same so far as this subject is concerned, though it is true that in some other respects they are quite different. In the matter of dairying Alberta takes the lead both as to quantity and as to quality and prizes. Of course it is an easy matter for a man who is an adept at it, and who specializes in assembling cream from the best patrons, to make a high quality of butter. The western provinces have come to the front, but not because the dairymen there are better than those in the East; they are not; they are far more primitive dairymen than the eastern dairymen are. They have more primitive surroundings; they have poorer live stock; they have not as good barns; they have not had as much experience as the eastern man, having been at it a shorter time. Yet, because they have adopted proper methods, their butter commands five shillings a hundred more than any eastern butter that goes on the British market. I am sure my eastern friends will not object to our saying that; we have not much to boast of there, you know, outside of our wheat. I tell you that our country out there, notwithstanding the long winter, can be profitably turned to dairying. The adoption of new and improved methods, the paying for milk and cream on the basis of quality, enables the butter makers to turn out a first-class article. The chain of cold storages that has been established in that country enables us to take care of the butter until such time as we wish to ship it to the Old Land. Some hon. gentlemen have spoken disparagingly of co-operative activities, but it was the co-operative creameries of Regina that sold and shipped overseas more than sixty carloads of high-class butter last year—the record shipment from Canada to the markets of Great Britain.

There is not so much disparagement of diversified farming by our Progressive friends this year, and I will give them credit for it. There was last year; they are learning, like the rest of us. There was a good deal of tee-heeing and poking of fun at dairying and diversified farming. Some of our friends across the way are good at telling humourous stories. There was one very funny one that we all laughed at; it was the experience of the hon. member for South Battleford (Mr. McConica), whom we are glad to see in his seat again, in connection with sheep growing; I am sure you will all recall it. Our western country has up to quite recently been a purely grain growing country except in some parts of Manitoba, where they have been diversifying for many years; we have been specializing in the growing of grain. There have been men who have grown wealthy in that business. The fact is that you either grow wealthy fairly quickly or you go broke even more quickly—one of the two. If you are a good manager; if you are young and healthy and vigorous and can get up betimes in the morning and will go to bed while you can; if you have the capacity of getting work out of men; if either you or some of your boys know how to run a gasoline engine or some other kind of power machine to supplement your farm labour at times, and if you are a regular nigger driver, why, you can hold the pace for ten or fifteen years and you may become independently wealthy. Some have done it in less than that. But that is a pretty hard life, Mr. Speaker; it is no wonder some of those who follow it have to go to California or British Columbia. I know of one gentleman whose case just comes to my mind now. I know his experience from the year one so far as the West is concerned. He was in my employ at a dollar a day for a week, and at the end of the week I got to my last dollar and had to dismiss him. But that is how he started out; and to-day he is worth I do not know how much. I know he has $30,000 worth of Canadian bonds; I know he has a good many Canadian Pacific Railway stocks; in fact, he is in the plutocratic class now. He also has shares in one of the local banks. And he did not make it all by working his family day and night, either, because he has not got any family. His name is Elmer Shaw, if anyone wants to look the gentleman up.

We have had a series of varying experiences in agriculture in western Canada; it has been a case of make or break. When that country was settled first there was a great rush of immigrants. That was the case in the early days of the construction of the Canadian Pacific, at the time I went there myself, and it occurred also later on, in the early days of the present century, when people were coming from all quarters of the globe to take up land in this El Dorado. Naturally a great many people came in who proved to be misfits; the attraction of a homestead for $10 was very great indeed. The thirst for land is strong in the breast of the average individual, and we still have land to gratify that thirst, but in the coming of people from all quarters of the globe, from all climes and all directions, including the republic to the south and eastern Canada, you are bound to have men who have failed in other countries and are desirous of trying their luck once more on this new land and having a farm for ten dollars. Unfortunately the same methods they pursued which caused their failure elsewhere would be very apt to occasion their failure in the West also. I am not one of those who disparage inexperienced settlers. I know men who went out there who did not know anything about agriculture except that they knew that they did not know anything about it—and believe me that is the start; when you know that you do not know anything about agriculture, then you are ready to learn at the feet of anybody whom you think does know, but if you go there thinking you know it all the chances are that you will meet with disaster before you learn the peculiar requirements of prairie agriculture. A number of these people have hung on. I know a number of them who through all these years have been just one lap ahead of the sheriff. In times like these when money is tight, and these facilities we are talking about for borrowing money are not multiplied by two, these people are squeezed pretty hard. They borrowed all the money they could get and went into one hole to get out of the previous one. Instead of improving their methods they wanted to improve their opportunities for borrowing, and then they quarrelled with the mortgage company because they could not get still more.

We will have to assume a different attitude towards debt, Mr. Speaker, before we get our stride properly on the prairies again. I can recall the time especially during and before the war, when some of us took a certain amount of pride in actually boasting about borrowing every dollar we could get on our land, and then going abroad and spending it like a lord, investing it in this and that possibly not connected with the farm and then expecting the farm to carry that obligation and help wipe it out. That is not fair. Very few debts contracted in the West have been spent on agriculture, and I say that advisedly. I think I am safe in saying that three out of four first mortgages are for the purpose of consolidating store bills and dead horses and such like, with not one dollar invested in any productive enterprise that will help pay back the loan. That was the condition. We rushed in there pell-mell, enthused with the possibilities of the development of that country We thought the thing would never end. We sowed to the wind and are to-day reaping the whirlwind. This condition of affairs, aggravated by the war, has occasioned many, many tragedies on the prairies. There is no question about it. It is something that would make your heart bleed, Mr. Speaker. But what are you going to do about it? Men who lend money must have security.

I have in mind another instance, and there is nothing that could be more tragic than what I am going to describe. Both of these parties were labourers of my own at the time they were married. They started out for themselves with nothing but the prospect of getting a home for themselves and $45, and that was not in cash. They had a three-year old filly, and they got a chattel mortgage on the filly for $45, more than what they paid for it, and made the first payment on a quarter section of Canadian Pacific Railway land. They added to that by one means and another till they had five quarter sections, all on time except the initial payment. They bought machinery on time, and horses on time.

I will not tell you how they got them or stood off their creditors, I do not know; I could not do it and succeed. After twenty-four years of that kind of experience, growing magnificent crops, if you like, and raising a family of twelve, they are finally crowded out on to the street by the mortgage company. If you did not know the history of that, Mr. Speaker, you would think it was something terrible. It is something terrible if you do not know the circumstances. But under the circumstances nothing else could befall them. The only wonder is that it did not happen long ago. There is no country in the world except the Canadian West which would have stood such abuse of farm and credit, and where this couple could have lasted for twenty-four years. I might say that the neighbours helped that couple for years and are helping them yet. Some friends in Alberta wrote to the First Minister, and the First Minister passed the letter over to me. It is a great place down here to pass the buck, you know, Mr. Speaker. I got a letter describing the case, and I told the First Minister that there was nothing else for it. I knew the couple exceedingly well. Some of the boys and girls were capable of working out, and I advised them to work for their neighbours. Hundreds of men who would make first-class labourers, are only fourth, or fifth-class managers for themselves. It takes a long time to find it out. My advice to such would be to let the shoemaker stick to his last, let the man perform that service he is best fitted for. If he cannot make a living managing his own affairs, if he is a faithful labourer and gives proper service, he may soon find himself in better circumstances than his employer.

Mr. KNOX: Does the minister mention that type as representative of the farmers of the West?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Which one? I have tried to describe two, the two extremes—the man who was a bounder and was turned on the street after twenty-four years, and the man who was a good manager, a mechanic, who knew how to get labour out of his men, got up betimes in the morning, took care of his business and became wealthy. It just shows, Mr. Speaker, how much depends on the individual. It has been said, though this is extreme, of course, that some men would make a living in the Sahara desert while others would starve in the Garden of Eden.

[Mr. Motherwell.]

Mr. KNOX: Does the minister mean to represent the man who did not go into debt as being prosperous to-day?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Debt is a good thing sometimes. It is like fire. Fire is good as long as you are the boss, but when fire becomes your boss, then look out. Debt is a good thing, I suppose, as long as you are master. It is a good servant but a mighty bad master. If we have to go into debt let us go into it just as little as possible, and just to the extent that we think we can get out of it in reasonable time.

Mr. KNOX: I am afraid the minister did not catch my point. Does he mean to say that agriculture in the West to-day, in the case of the men who keep clear of debt, is prospering?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I say that the men who kept out of debt or went into debt only very moderately are in safe circumstances to-day, and there are less failures among these than among any other class of people. I say that advisedly.

Mr. KNOX: Are they prosperous to-day?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, they are prosperous to-day. The fact that they are out of debt is a good indication of that. I say further, I would like to sound a note of warning right now. I do not think the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Raymond) exactly voiced my sentiments.

Mr. GOULD: I would like to ask the minister how he reconciles his statement about farmers keeping out of debt with the statement that was made in the Agricultural committee that for all the municipalities of Saskatchewan this year the records show an average unpaid tax of $37 per quarter section.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: If my hon. friend will wait for a minute or two until I get to that point I will be very glad to deal with it; it is the very next item on my notes. I would like to sound a note of warning with respect to this amortization of debt, this funding of debt. One of the reasons why the man with little debt, or only sufficient debt to be controllable, is better off than the man with a big burden and heavy interest charges is this: All the time he has the consciousness of being a landed proprietor; he is sitting under his own fig tree, the dwelling he occupies is his own, and even if he has a little debt that home is not endangered. Therefore I say that the man in that condition is better off than the man who is so burdened down with debt he does not know whether his home belongs to him or whether the mortgage company owns it—there is no question about that. And the idea of asking a man to undertake an amortization of debt which is to run for thirty years! Why, if he is thirty years old he will be a man of my age before he knows the sweet joy of being the sole proprietor of that land. I say that is paralyzing to his efforts to make a success of that farm, yet it is exactly one of the mistakes we are making. Instead of pleading before our committees for more facilities to borrow money we should turn our attention to digging wealth out of the soil and buying better live stock.

Now I will deal with the question asked by my hon. friend the member for Assiniboia (Mr. Gould).

Mr. SPEAKER: Seeing that the hon. member is about to take up a new branch of the subject we had better call it six o'clock.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Mr. Speaker, when the House rose at six o'clock, I had just finished depicting, to some extent at least, the condition of agriculture on the prairies. I had shown both extremes, the well-to-do man who was on easy street, and the ne'er-do-well, who was pretty nearly on the rocks, if not there already. Between those two extremes we have all classes and orders of people, from the man in comfortable circumstances down to the one I have described.

I will deal with another phase of this question later on in my remarks. I cannot spend too much time on it, because I presume other speakers desire to address the House on many questions during this budget debate. I cannot, however, dispose of agriculture without passing on to the Pacific. During the last ten years or so, we never looked on British Columbia, indeed, she did not look upon herself, with any great seriousness as an agricultural country. We all knew of her mines, fisheries, timber and other wonderful resources, but it has taken these last ten or fifteen years to demonstrate that she has great agricultural possibilities as well. I had the pleasure of a trip out into that beautiful country with its many diversifications, its many sources of occupation. British Columbia has two ports, and no man can tell the future possibilities of either of them. British Columbia has shown to the world her possibilities by the performance of a Holstein cow at the Agassiz experimental farm which made a record by producing over 1,600 pounds of butter, the largest output of butter in the world. In poultry also she is making wonderful records. In the northern part of British Columbia, along the Canadian National highway, there are possibilities of development that are almost indescribable for the man who is prepared to go on the land and to do some hard work in clearing it. I do not mean the heavily timbered, but the partially timbered land. I have not time at this stage to dwell on this subject any longer.

I will pass on now to the question asked by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Gould). I do not recall the question exactly, but it was something about debts of municipalities. Some evidence was taken before the Agricultural committee with respect to municipal debts. It is beyond that, in some municipalities, there is a very substantial and very serious bonded indebtedness. I remember Mr. Hamilton's evidence; I was present during part of the time, and I recollect he had not complete figures for all the municipalities. We were discussing this phase of the question, that before one could size up intelligently that debt, one would have to know what it was composed of. There would be first the bonded debt; there would be the current debts to the banks possibly; in addition to that, there might be and there is, in fact, a very considerable number of municipalities, I think 125 odd, that handle hail insurance. A very considerable proportion of debt might be due to hail insurance, not a municipal debt at all. In any case, whatever this debt may be due to, is it getting worse or better? If we have turned the corner, then there is hope for the future, and according to the evidence I have under my hand, we are turning the corner in respect of municipal indebtedness.

Mr. GOULD: The minister has not quite got the question as I had put it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I had forgotten exactly what it was.

Mr. GOULD: I made reference to evidence given before the Agricultural committee, that there was an average tax debt this year of $37 per quarter section on every quarter section in Saskatchewan, a debt that was recorded on municipal lands.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Does that mean bonded indebtedness?

Mr. GOULD: No, average tax.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I have a bigger tax than that on my land.

Mr. GOULD: This is an unpaid tax on each quarter section.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not doubt that either. If my hon. friend is familiar—and I am sure he is—with collecting municipal taxes, he knows that if things are bad, it is not the municipality or the government that is paid first. I do not think my hon. friend wants to make a case against any party. He wants to get at the facts as I do, and I want to get between these two extremes that we have heard of during the session.

Mr. GOULD: I was trying to establish the point that people who own land will not permit arrears of $37 per quarter section of land on an average throughout the whole province, if agricultural conditions warrant their paying it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not know if that is correct. Possibly evidence of that nature was given before the Agricultural committee; but I am going to read to the House a statement made in the budget debate in the Saskatchewan assembly by the premier of that province. I think we can take the premier of that province as a reliable authority. I must confess that since leaving provincial politics, I have not kept close tab on municipal debts. There are some municipalities that have no bonded debt at all; I happen to be fortunate enough to live in one myself. That municipality has never had any bonded debt unless perhaps it has incurred one within the last two years, for during that time I have not been there to know. If, however, the same reeve is in office who has been there for many years, then I venture to say there is no such debt yet. But with regard to the rest of the bonded debt, $40 or $37, on current taxes overdue, the situation is getting better every day in every way. I have a communication here from the Minister of Agriculture of Saskatchewan, Hon. Mr. Hamilton, to this effect:

> Replying to your wire of the 14th instant, I am enclosing herewith typed copy of Premier Dunning's budget speech. The printed copies have not yet come to hand.

This is the letter accompanying the budget speech which he forwarded to me, but he gives certain information personally in addition.

> In October last a campaign was inaugurated for the selling of Saskatchewan bonds for the Farm Loans Board, and to date an amount of $902,300 has been received. Of this amount $300,000 was subscribed by the Hail Commission, and the rest practically all by farmers.

I have no records for the other provinces, but I think that Manitoba's situation is somewhat better than the condition in Saskatchewan municipally, while the situation in Alberta may possibly be somewhat worse. As I say however, I have not the facts before me, and that is merely my assumption. It will be noted that over $900,000 worth of Saskatchewan bonds were sold last year so that the Farm Loans Board might have these funds from the farmers and be able to re-loan the money to less fortunate farmers. That is their scheme. Out of that $900,000, $300,000 worth was purchased by the Hail Insurance Commission. Where did that commission get the money? They got it through the premiums from the farmers; they had that much to the good this year and invested it in Saskatchewan farm loan bonds. This is the information that comes to me from the Hon. Mr. Hamilton. He then refers me to page 27 of the budget speech of Premier Dunning wherein he says will be found reference to the sale of Saskatchewan debentures. I will not go into that phase of the situation. I do not know whether the information given me is correct, but I do know Mr. Hamilton to be a responsible man. Of course, it will be a difficult matter to get at the real facts in regard to the average overdue taxes in the municipalities of Saskatchewan, for the reason that the returns are not all in. However, I will accept my hon. friend's statement as to the amount on the average that is overdue. Again, I do not know that this statement is correct, but I will accept it any way for the purposes of this debate. Now let me turn to Premier Dunning's statement, which is rather voluminous. He said in part:

> It is not possible to say truthfully on this occasion that our economic problems are solved, that we are a very prosperous people or a very prosperous province. But I think the conclusion the House will reach, after hearing the information which I have to present on this occasion, will be that at least we have passed the low point; and, to use the phrase that is often used, we have scraped bottom and are now on the improvement so far as economic conditions of our people are concerned and the financial position of the province and its municipalities.

I am sure that this must be regarded as pleasant information. Mr. Dunning states, "We have touched bottom, we have turned the corner, we are going to be able we hope, with the experience of the past before us, to make the grade."

Some hon. MEMBERS: Glad to hear it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not know whether my hon. friends are rejoicing at the possibility of their being able to put a different construction on the phrase I have used, "touching bottom," from the meaning that Premier Dunning intends it to convey. I do not know whether it is the bottomless pit that hon. gentlemen have in mind, but apparently the worse construction is the one they entertain. Would it not be better to take that better meaning, "Whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report," and so on? I think it would be better for hon. gentlemen to take that more favourable construction when referring to their own country; I do not see what pleasure they can take in fouling their own nests.

Mr. SALES: What we want is the truth.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: If hon. gentlemen can take any fun out of this I am loath to deny them the pleasure. All I desire to do is to give the information to the House. Let me continue the quotation:

This probably is largely due to the way in which Nature or Providence treated us in 1922 as compared with the previous year.

Surely Providence plays a part in our harvests and in our lives.

It is also due to the fact that our people during 1921 learned the stern hard lesson of the necessity for economy and thrift in all their dealings and work.

Premier Dunning attributes the good result to economy and thrift plus a good crop, which enabled them to turn the corner. The people learnt the lesson that was taught by the perfect orgy of extravagance in connection with borrowing which had been indulged in. Most of us have been guilty of such extravagance, Mr. Speaker. I confess that I too have been bitten by the bug of extravagance. Some of us, however, kept our businesses very reasonably in hand and when the fatal day of deflation came we were able to recover our balance without disaster, while others went with such impetus that they toppled over the precipice, with the result that everything is gone except the howl.

Our wheat acreage in 1922 decreased as compared with 1921 by over one million acres, but in spite of that the yield of wheat increased from 14.8 per acre to 20.25, or giving total figures from 201,000,000 bushels to 251,000,000 bushels in 1922, an increased production of over 50,000,000 bushels of wheat.

The province that can produce 250,000,000 bushels of the best wheat in the world surely should not feel too hard up. Surely some of it must accrue to the people after it has passed through the various avenues to the markets of the world.

Mr. COOTE: Would the minister give it as his opinion that the men who grew this wheat were able to sell it for more than cost of production?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The last time I operated my farm was in the year 1921, and if I had attended to it myself instead of gallivanting around the country preparing for the election of that year I would have made it pay. As it was I did not make it pay, because I was not there to superintend and manage the farm myself; and I do not think that any man can make a farm pay unless he stays on the job. Now, to come to the matter of price.

The average net price to the farmer for the 1922 crop will be 85 cents per bushel, or 10 cents per bushel more than 1921.

That was the estimate made more than three months ago, in the month of March. The price has gone up 10 or 15 cents a bushel; at least that 85 cents will have increased to 90 cents by the time the figures are all in. So much for the statement of Premier Dunning. Now, there is not much money in exclusive wheat growing; there is no question about that; neither would there be much money in any business in which the by-products were not utilized. How much money would there be in any industry in Canada if the by-products were dissipated in the way they are on many wheat farms on which there is no live stock?

Mr. COOTE: Before the minister leaves Premier Dunning's statement would he mind reading the premier's expression of opinion in regard to that late budget just brought down?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, I think I can give it to my hon. friend. I have not got it here.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, I will give it to my hon. friend. I wired Premier Dunning this morning and I will give my hon. friend to-morrow a copy of my telegram. The concluding paragraph of Mr. Dunning's speech is something like this— by the way, would my hon. friend read Henry Wise Wood's expression of opinion on the budget?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I have to apologize to my hon. friend the Premier of Saskatchewan. I do not want to make such invidious comparisons of that nature. The last paragraph of Premier Dunning's speech was something like this:

We might take this budget and that of last year as moderate indications of a desire on the part of the government to carry out their tariff pledges of 1919. But no western Liberal will take the ground that these should be the final word in the redemption of the tariff pledges given at the national convention of 1919.

An hon. MEMBER: No stability.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That was the substance of his speech, and I can say yes to that. And who said it was the last word?

Mr. FORKE: The Minister of Finance.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Nobody said it was the last word. I was very sorry to hear the terms mentioned by the hon. leader of the Progressives (Mr. Forke). I am sure he did not mean that "finality" and "stability" were synonymous terms; and yet one might infer as much from the way in which he used them in his address yesterday. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) said distinctly there was no finality, that what parliament did to-day it might undo to-morrow. I think the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Raymond) gave a very apt illustration of it. We have had stability during the last two years, but not necessarily finality. I do not think we can have finality in anything.

Mr. HOCKEN: What is the hon. gentleman's definition of stability?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I cannot improve on the definition given by the hon. member for Brantford.

Mr. MORRISON: That was political agility.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: My hon. friend can supply his own interpretation.

Mr. COOTE: Does the hon. minister mean by stability that we have been on the bottom for the last two years that he referred to a little while ago?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No, I decline to constitute myself the interpretation clause of the act. I want to produce some further evidence, Mr. Speaker, of the condition of agriculture—not from myself at all for I have not been an active farmer during the last two years except very casually. Learning something from the press of what we might expect this session, we sent out last January a questionnaire, prepared by my deputy and myself, to some hundred correspondents throughout the three prairie provinces. It is too voluminous to deal with in detail; I am only going to take the two last questions which are really the essential ones. The first is:

Is mixed farming, that is, raising beef cattle, dairying, pork production and poultry keeping, making any progress in your district?

[Mr. Motherwell.]

The other question is:

Have you any suggestions to offer as to the best line for farmers to follow in your district in order to make a greater success of their operations?

A great many of these correspondents are practical farmers; some of them are operators at illustration stations and have a little advantage in that way because they are probably in advance of the average farmer in experimentation and keeping their eyes on the results therefrom. I have summarized the answers under three colums, headed Yes, Some and No.

The first question, as to whether they are going into mixed farming or not, is I believe the most important, because after all that is the solution of many of the difficulties of our western farmers. From the province of Manitoba every answer to that question is yes. So they are on the right track to improve their condition. Answers were received from the city of Winnipeg, Brandon, central Manitoba, Treesbank, Morden, Fort Garry, Dauphin, Lake Winnipeg to Manitoba, Manitoba (Live Stock Branch) and Arthur.

From the province of Saskatchewan sixty-five per cent of the answers were to the effect that the writers were going gradually into mixed farming. These answers were received from Meota, Scott, Saskatoon and Prince Albert, Ogema, Lloydminster, S. E. Saskatchewan, Tugaska, Avonlea, Indian Head—I have often said that when Indian Head started to go into mixed farming nearly every other place would be thinking of following its example, because that is one of the earliest successful wheat areas of Saskatchewan—Regina, Moose Jaw, Prince Albert and Radville. Six say they are going some into it, namely, North Portal, Riverhurst, Saskatoon, Davidson and Pambrun. Forty-one per cent say no, they are not going into mixed farming. I hope they are mistaken in their answers. These negative replies came from Wood Mountain, Kindersley and Qu'Appelle. I do not quite understand what part of Qu'Appelle unless it is the village in the valley, for it cannot be Qu'Appelle Station, this having always been a diversified district.

From Alberta we received replies that the tendency is to go into mixed farming. These answers came from the following districts: North Alberta, Edmonton, Lacombe, Lacombe (Reed), Calgary District, Alberta, Alberta and Peace River, Grassy Lake, Pincher Creek, Okatoks, Calgary (Bain), Red Deer, and Alberta (Cormie).

Nine districts say they are going into mixed farming some, and four districts answer in the negative. These latter are Wainwright—by the way, from what I saw when I was there last year it would appear that they were not going into mixed farming. The fact that the great buffalo herd, of which my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior has charge, is stationed at Wainwright would go to show that it is an excellent live stock country.

Mr. SPENCER: Does the minister imply that Wainwright is not a mixed farming country?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I should think it was to some extent.

Mr. SPENCER: It certainly is.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: But the report here says that they are not going much into mixed farming.

Mr. SPENCER: The report is wrong.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: In answer to the other question. Have you any suggestions as to the best line for farmers to follow in your district in order to make a greater success of their operations? We heard from Manitoba pretty much to the same effect as in reply to the first question; 95 per cent advocate mixed and diversified farming. Here are some of the individual answers. One says:

> Cattle—better sires and better market conditions—dairying—increase live stock, more alfalfa, sunflowers, fodder corn etc., hogs, poultry, smaller farms and winter feeding of beef cattle, cut down expenses and work more.

I do not suppose any one in this House is in need of that advice—each works hard when on the farm. In the case of Saskatchewan 95 per cent of the correspondents give the same advice:

> Dairying and hog raising—better business methods—smaller farms—more corn—smaller farms, worked better.

These are all good suggestions. They also write:

> Cut down costs—too far from the railway to farm—more summer fallow—improved market conditions—farm better—keep better cows, etc.—

Now here is one answer, Mr. Speaker, that is rather unusual. This correspondent says: "Pray for rain." Now, this may be more effective and less expensive than introducing a second Hatfield the rainmaker. I commend it to the attention of my hon. friends. Then, in Alberta, "mixed farming," "better live stock"—you would think it was the same man who wrote all of this. These questions come from all over the country, and surely what everybody says in this respect must have some element of truth in it. "Dual purpose cattle; better quality of poultry." A number of them stress the necessity for improved live stock. It seems to me that no one is doing his best on a farm who insists on keeping scrub beef cattle, low-grade cows, razorback hogs, and dunghill hens. There is no virtue in live stock unless it will more than pay for the cost of keeping it. I do not think, however, that it is necessary to develop this phase of the question. Here is a practically unanimous verdict as to how we may better ourselves as a result of the effort of the individual. Later in my remarks I will come to some of the larger public questions and refer to the manner in which the individual can be helped in some measure by the state. But now I am dealing with those phases of agriculture in which the man himself is largely the dominant factor. There is no doubt that in 30 or 85 per cent of the cases the success of the man on the land depends upon his own individuality.

A gentleman whose name I have forgotten was passing through Ottawa in January, and we were discussing these things. He estimated that the farmers had 100,000,000 bushels of grain in their possession or in transit or at the terminals at that time, subject to no obligation. I thought the estimate was pretty high and I wired Mr. Snow of the Grain Commission, who replied that on the last of January there were 75,000,000 bushels of unsold wheat, with obligations attached to some of it that was at Fort William. However, over half of it was in the farmers' granary with no obligations against it. I do not think many of the men who held wheat in their granaries until the first of February mortgaged it, although I believe they can do so if they desire. My point is this: A country that can carry over from harvest time until the first of February 75,000,000 bushels of wheat, worth slightly over $1 a bushel, or $75,000,000, cannot be in a very bad condition. I have no doubt that this estimate of the Grain Commission is correct; as a matter of fact I think it is low. As I say, the obligations against this wheat were comparatively small. There would be, of course, whatever payment they would get in advance, whatever drafts might be attached to the bills of lading. And I may say that since the rapid deflation of wheat in 1920, considerably more care has been exercised in attaching drafts to bills of lading.

Mr. GOULD: Would the minister not suggest that out of that 75,000,000 bushels, provision must be made for seed as well as for advances made on the grain?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No; allowance was made for that. It was the estimate made of what had to go forward.

Now, we have some figures with regard to other matters besides grain. We cannot live by grain alone or by growing it. There are too many plant diseases, too many insect pests. The way to develop insect pests is to grow the one kind of plant food for them all the time; if you do that you will soon be visited by some kind of fungus or destructive insect. That is the condition we are in now. The fungus pest is continuing its depredations; the wheat stem sawfly has become more prevalent. Then, there are the grasshoppers. We never heard of grasshoppers in Saskatchewan until a few years ago and they have been a terrible scourge.

I am going to deal now with cattle. We are developing rapidly as a stock growing country. I am sure the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Knox) did not go headlong into wheat growing alone; he stood fast as a farmer; he carried on diversified agriculture and grew good live stock. During the calendar year 1922, 18,000 head of live stock were shipped to Great Britain, valued at over $2,000,000. To the United States we shipped 217,000 head, valued at over $5,000,000 and to other countries 4,000 head valued at $391,000. Our total exports were 240,000, valued at $8,000,000.

I have here an estimate by the Dairy branch with respect to the total production of dairy products. Last year the total production of creamery butter in all Canada was 128,000,000 pounds, of a total value of $48,000,000. Of cheese the total production was 162,000,000 of a total value of $28,000,000. The total dairy production in Canada in 1921 —milk, casein, milk powder, skim milk, sterilized milk, and so on—totalled $212,000,000. We know that in the eastern provinces dairying is largely carried on, and we are just beginning to realize the necessity of regarding dairying in the West as something more than a mere side line. In 1921, 8,000,000 pounds of creamery butter were produced in Manitoba; last year the production was 10,000,000 pounds, an increase of 2,000,000 pounds. In Saskatchewan in 1921, the production was 7,000,000 pounds; in 1922, nearly 9,000,000 pounds. In Alberta in 1921 the production was 13,000,000 pounds and in 1922, 15,000,000 pounds. There is the hope of Alberta. I am sure the hon. member for Strathcona (Mr. Warner) would, if he had the liberty that we all like to enjoy, tell us how he kept his head above water, how dairying kept him afloat as it has kept many another man, especially in the pioneer days when there was nothing else to live on but the cows.

[Mr. Motherwell.]

I was going to give the total exports of wheat from Canada, but I do not think I need give the figures; they are familiar to all hon. members.

Mr. CHURCH: I understood that the minister when he was out West in a recent by-election promised that the Hudson Bay railway would be ready by Christmas. I am afraid it will be like getting the boys out of the trenches, and take a much longer time than that.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. The hon. gentleman may ask a question but he cannot give an address.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: My hon. friend is referring to the time when I was out West on that interesting Easter holiday. I may say that I did not hear anything about that report until I got back nearly to Ottawa. I saw it on the train in some of the morning papers—of course, we read everything on the train—and that was the first time I ever heard of it. I took particular care not to discuss the Hudson Bay railway very much in that by-election. I certainly never even suggested such a thing as the railway being ready by Christmas. What is more, if I had, the people in the Moose Jaw riding, especially, in that district interested in branch lines, certainly would not have been in favour of it because they would have figured out that the more mileage built on the Hudson Bay railway the less money there would be for branch lines in the southern part of that riding. Whoever started that fake yarn did not know the situation in Moose Jaw. The people down there want branch lines, and they want them very badly. I may add that in spite of the result of that election I had occasion to make a recommendation regarding some of the earlier lines to be taken care of and one of them was in the southern part of Moose Jaw riding. I recommended that because the people need it, no matter whether they were foolish or not about whom they selected. There is nothing like casting bread upon the waters, Mr. Speaker.

I am going now to deal with an interesting subject.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I hope I am not too tiresome to my hon. friends. I try to be as little wearisome as possible but it is a big story, the story of agriculture in Canada.

We dealt with the subject of immigration in this House for five consecutive days, and I did not feel like rising and further obstructing the estimates of my colleague to my right (Mr. Stewart, Argenteuil) I want to congratulate the leader of the Progressive party, the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) for the sane and wise attitude that he has taken on the question of immigration, not only in this House but in Winnipeg and elsewhere in Manitoba where his voice was heard after he received the position he now occupies. He spoke on the subject at Brandon too, I believe, at the convention. He takes the ground that a great many of our difficulties would be solved if we had more people. He does not think it is wise to induce any more people to come to this country until those who are here are on Easy street. Well, if we wait till that time comes we will wait till the crack of doom, for a lot of people will never get on Easy street; they are not built that way. He takes the ground that the railway situation would also be solved by immigration. We have too much country and too few people. Twice as many people would not cost twice as much to administer; that is obvious.

Then hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Hoey) is to be congratulated too, also the hon. member for Strathcona (Mr. Warner) in his few remarks, and the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote). I think after all is said and done, it was the few over in that corner that offended on the question of immigration. Some people have the capacity for making considerable noise and getting in the limelight. I feel like exonerating the great bulk of the Progressive party of the charge of disparaging their own country. Why are they doing this, those that are doing it, and how much of it is genuine and how much for political purposes? I am going to make a confession. I can recall when I was in opposition. It was apparently my fate to be born in the county of Lanark where a fellow that was a Liberal was always in opposition, and in the early 90's in the West and the late 80's I can recall when we were all nearly bankrupt and would have been absolutely if it had not been for the Rebellion of '85: The government of that day, which was Conservative, would send down some of their members like the present Senator Foster to tell us how to farm. Of course, we got mad and turned around and said, "Here, we have been working at this farming business for years and are getting poorer all the time." In my younger days I used to say just the same kind of foolish things, but surely with the years should come some wisdom, and that is the reason why the leader of the Progressive party has wisdom.

What I want to point out is this. During those days of hardship there was some justification for it, because we had no tradition, we had no history; it was all a question of what the future of the country was going to be. But we have had forty years' experience now which we can look back upon as an earnest of what can be done in the future. During those bygone years I did take the ground on more than one occasion, especially when a Tory politician from Ottawa came around, that there were enough people already in the West to experiment, and that we should wait before bringing more people in—just exactly what my hon. friend was saying the other day. But there was justification for my saying that then. It was a gamble, an experiment in those days. There were only a few Hudson Bay posts and a few church missions throughout the country to tell what could be done in agriculture. I want to put myself in the same category with the hon. gentleman who was wanting me to define "stability," because I took the same ground, but I think I had some justification. The object was partly political. I am free to make that confession now that thirty years have gone by. It was partly that, and I think it is partly that on their part now. How are they going to get any political advantage out of this? I do not know myself, but the idea as far as I can understand it, and we have seen the same disposition in several of the committees as well as in this House, seems to be to blacken things blacker than your hand. Well, if that is good politics, we cannot throw a lariat around any hon. gentleman and choke him off if he wants to talk that way. This is a free country and we have free speech; there is no closure even, so I suppose we will just have to submit to it. But I understand the feelings of hon. gentlemen. I know the tragedies that have occurred on the prairie. I know homes there that are destitute of the ordinary necessities, let alone the conveniences of life. I know of the hardships because I went through them. I do not wish to refer to myself too much, but I started on the Portage plains as a harvest labourer and I know the business of agriculture, I know its hardships. If a man goes there with youth, courage, determination and health and stays with the job I know he will win out. Where would I go to for a better place to farm?

Mr. MARTELL; Nova Scotia.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Premier Dunning had an experience that I am going to relate. I do not know whether he told it at the Grain Growers' convention at Saskatoon or not, but he said some straight things there. Some person was croaking about the West. There are lots of things that are not very pleasant if you are looking for that black side, and this man was chewing about the black things of life, when Mr. Dunning said, "I am not a wealthy man, but if you will pick out the place you want to go to I will buy your ticket." Then the gentleman thought he would stay a little while longer. He did not take advantage of the offer. It may have been a bluff, but he did not call it.

Now I wish to refer briefly to the amendment to the budget. That amendment is so remarkably like some features of the budget that it would need the X-ray to distinguish the difference between them. The amendment declares:

> And, further, that the best interests of Canada will be served by:—
> (a) An immediate and substantial reduction in the tariff, particularly on the necessaries of life and the implements of production.

How many Progressives from the prairies voted for the reductions last year? What encouragement is there for anybody to fight for a thing and have not a single Progressive from the West support it? I think the proper policy when there is a lowering of the tariff is to support what you are getting. The Progressives last year showed the same attitude towards the lowering of the tariff as the Conservatives did. The latter opposed the government's policy because there was too much tariff reduction; the Progressives opposed it because it was too little. Had either proposition been adopted the government would have been defeated. It shows the folly of group parliament. Then this amendment proposes an immediate increase in the British preference to 50 per cent of the general tariff. That is the policy of both the Liberals and the Progressives. The leader of the Progressives, I want to point out, is far too modest in asking for an increase of 50 per cent in the British preference, far too modest. He is asking for something that is already in existence, something which now obtains on many articles although not on every article. I expect that when I read the list of tariff duties which I am about to do my hon. friend will head a deputation to the Finance Minister to-morrow telling him that he will have to reduce the British preference in these cases, that it is altogether too high. Let me enumerate some of the tariff items which I got to-day. I asked the commissioner of Customs to supply me with a list of imports from Great Britain that came in under this new tariff at 40 per cent or more. Here is the statement furnished me.

MEMORANDUM

The following items of fabrics, furniture, boots and hardware, are extracts from an extensive list, showing where the present preferential rates, with the 10 p.c. discount therefrom is equal to 40 p.c. or over of the present general tariff rates:—

Item	——	Present Pref. rates	Pref. rates less 10 p.c. dis.	General Tariff rates	British rate is now the percentage indicated below of the General Tariff p.c.	p.c.	p.c.	p.c.
521	Gray cotton fabrics and fabrics of flax, n.o.p.	12½	.....	25
525	Stair linen, sheets, tablecloths, etc., of cotton or linen	20	18	30	60
557	Woollen yarns	20	18	30	60
562	Coalid cloth, etc	20	18	30	60

435	Lamps	20	18	30	60
440	Sewing machines	20	18	30	60
450	Shovels and spades	20	18	32½	55 5/13
626	Hats and caps	22½	20¼	35	57 6/7
627	Gloves and mitts	22½	20¼	35	57 6/7

Let me deal in detail with a few of these. For example take: Gray cotton fabrics, and fabrics of flax. Under the British preference the duty is 12½ per cent. Under the general tariff it is 25 per cent. The British percentage rate is not given. Take the next item: Stair linen, sheets, tablecloths, etc., of cotton or linen. Twenty per cent is the present rate and the rate under the general tariff is 30 per cent. The British preferential rate now is 60 per cent. Now let us take woollen yarns. This is something very essential in a cold country like western Canada and sometimes it is very cold in the East too. Now in the case of woollen yarns it is 20 per cent and the British preferential rate is 60 per cent, 10 per cent higher than is asked for in the amendment. What are we going to do about it? We have overdone it, we have slipped a cog somewhere. Then we have coalid cloth. I do not know what kind of material that is but there is 60 per cent preferential rate on it. These figures were obtained from the Customs department not three hours ago and no change could have been made in that time. Then we have the article of blankets. As to that I felt guilty myself when I heard my hon. friends pleading for cheaper blankets. I tell you you need lots of them and cut wide in a cold country. I see that on blankets we have a preference of 57 6/7 per cent, which is less than one-half of the general tariff. There is no question about it the Tories will have to submit an amendment in regard to these reductions. Then we have flannels 51 3/7 per cent. I have not looked over this list very carefully and if I make a blunder it will be kind of awkward. I am therefore going to try and keep one line ahead if I can. The next item is linen and cotton clothing 57 6/7 per cent. Here at least is a case where we have even exceeded the pledges contained in the National Liberal convention of 1919. We have more than carried out our promise here, so we will put that to the credit of some other pledge and call it two. Next there is the item of velvet and silk fabrics 52½ per cent; ribbons 57 6/7 per cent; furniture 60 per cent; boots 52½ per cent. We are two to the good there. Then nails and brads 51 3/7 per cent; screws 57 6/7 per cent; cutlery 60 per cent; enamelled ware 51 3/7 per cent; iron and aluminum hollow-ware 60 per cent; lamps 60 per cent; sewing machines 60 per cent. And so on. There are twenty-four articles and on none of them is the British preference 50 per cent. We will have to have an investigation into that.

Mr. LAPOINTE: A commission.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The hon. member for Brandon and the hon. member for Last Mountain will have to ask for some sort of an inquiry.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I am quite satisfied for the minister to get what comfort he can out of the present budget. I would submit to him, however, that the list he has read constitutes a very small part—

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No doubt.

Mr. JOHNSTON: —of the total list of commodities which this country imports from Great Britain.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I know that. There may be one hundred or two hundred but we have not got round to those yet.

Mr. JOHNSTON: You are a long time getting there.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Will the minister give us the preferential rate on butter?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: If we had the same advantage as our friends the Progressives in the matter of adjusting platforms I do not know in what position we should find ourselves. An interval of twenty-three years elapsed between the conventions held by the Liberals. After such an interval I think it is only right that the platform should be brushed up. A number of members of the Liberal opposition in parliament took the ground that the Liberal platform of 1919 should be brushed up; in fact was brushed up by a subsequent resolution. I was not there so sometimes it is convenient not to have a past. I know that very strong opinion has been expressed that the platform of the parliamentary members of the party was not the same as the 1919 platform. But two wrongs do not make a right. Surely a platform should not have finality any more than a tariff. I have here the platform of the Progressive party. It is quite interesting and I want to comment upon some of the clauses. Here is one extract from it:

9 p.m.

> By reducing the customs duty on goods imported from Great Britain to one-half the rates charged under the general tariff, and that further gradual uniform reductions be made in the remaining tariff on British imports that will ensure complete free trade between Great Britain and Canada in five years.

That expression "in five years" was dropped off in 1920 and it now might mean five centuries. That was a very convenient expression to knock off from the old Progressive platform. The free trade plank has also been eliminated from the platform. I think the Conservatives at least, will consider that as all right. Another plank in the Progressive platform reads thus:

That the Reciprocity Agreement of 1911 which still remains on the United States statute books be accepted by the parliament of Canada.

Did my hon. friend hear the Minister of Finance make his speech? Why repeat part of the budget asking for what they have? They were sorely tried to pad out an amendment when they had asked for a British preference to 50 per cent of the general tariff, when it was already 60 per cent, and to ask for reciprocity which they already had in the budget. An oversight must have occurred. Several hon. members probably drafted the amendment; they merged it together, and they had not time to see whether they conflicted with each other or not. This is one of their proposals:

As these tariff reductions may very considerably reduce the national revenue—

They propose this method of raising revenue:

By a direct tax on unimproved land values including all natural resources.

That is their old platform. They have dropped that, and I do not blame them, because it was fallacy. There is nothing about that in the amendment.

Mr. FORKE: What makes the hon. member think we are moving a platform? We are moving an amendment to the budget.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Of course I recognize that. My hon. friend was not present when I pointed out that he had more already than he was asking for.

Mr. FORKE: Just on a few articles. This is not, however, the place to enter into a debate, but we shall probably have an opportunity at some other time.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That pleases me all right. I was trying to point out, when I was assisted by my hon. friend, that they had the advantage and the wise advantage of being able to change their platform. They are doing that now, and they are omitting a number of things that they previously asked for. Things which they are asking for now, in some important instances they already have. I think it was stated by the Regina Leader that, in the West, they had one pleasant surprise in the budget, namely the standing offer of reciprocity. It surely was not necessary for any of the oppositions to bring down another budget with the same proposition precisely. That is not an amendment. Moreover, the amendment asks for a British preference to 50 per cent of the general tariff, disregarding the fact that on some twenty-four articles, the preference is from 50 to 60 per cent already. That is quite delightful to me. Whether it is consoling to my hon. friends or not, I do not know. It is the carrying out of both of our platforms, and then some more.

Mr. KNOX: I was wondering, when the minister was quoting from the Regina Leader, if he also noticed what the premier of Saskatchewan thought about the budget.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: My hon. friend is three or four laps behind. I have already dealt with that.

Mr. KNOX: I am sorry I had not the pleasure of listening to that part of the minister's remarks.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: They all have the same joke. We cannot expect another one. This "blue ruin" talk has developed that kind of thing.

I come now to a very interesting part of the budget with respect to bounties. We are told that it is a protectionist budget. Strange to say, so far as I have been able to determine, the change in every single item in the budget, in which there has been a change, is downwards. How in the world then, do you make out that it is protectionist? Can you make it free trade by putting it up? Can you make it lower by making it higher? If you can, there must be something wrong with this kind of figuring.

Personally I do not see any justification for the amendment on the ground that the budget is protectionist, unless it is as regards the two items upon which bounties have been placed. I wonder upon which of those two items the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) thought he discerned the vicious hydra-head of protection. I do not like protection one bit better than my hon. friend. I was not brought up on that at all.

Mr. FORKE: The hon. member has changed his views.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I should like to know on which of those two articles he thinks he can detect the vicious principle of protection, that interminable protection that you cannot get rid of. A bounty is, admittedly, a species of protection; but it is the least objectionable, and it is terminable rather than interminable. I do not hear vociferous voices telling me which of these two items constitutes the protectionist feature of the budget. Perhaps hon. members straight opposite will be the authority on protection and can tell me that. I am up against it. I am not an authority myself on protection. That reminds me that there is protection and protection. When I was advocating the establishment of a new industry in Manitoba, the development of the flax industry there, some of the arguments seemed ominously like those which the Tories used to make. I can remember them, but this had the saving virtue that it was going to last only so many years. There is no termination that I can see to the other kind of protection. In my election address at my nomination in Regina, before both urban and rural representatives, I made this statement. I have under my hand what I said. I wrote it down so that I would know:

> In a young country like Canada, with so many and varied natural resources, new industries are bound to be springing up from time to time. Any of these that are likely, and indigenous to the country, could, if deemed wise, be directly assisted in a start, by means of loans, guarantees or otherwise, and then gradually withdrawn as the particular enterprise becomes established. Right in this city—

That was in the city of Regina.

> —we have two illustrations of such state assistance by the provincial government to the Saskatchewan Co-operative Creameries and the Saskatchewan Co-operative Elevators.
> State nursing to exotic industries or industries already long and well established under a protective tariff is not good ultimately for labour, consumer or anybody else, except the beneficiaries thereof, and is frequently the source from which corruption emanates in our public life.

I am pledged, as a matter of fact my whole provincial experience was along the lines of starting up industries connected with agriculture by some form of state assistance.

Mr. MORRISON: Does the minister say that the Saskatchewan Co-operative Elevator Company got a bounty?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I did not say that at all. If my hon. friend will sit down, I will tell him what I said. There are other illustrations. I could not be expected to say everything, even in this House. I will refer my hon. friend to an activity that was a straight subsidy, and that was the stockyard at Moose Jaw and the other one at Prince Albert. They were each given a straight subsidy of $25,000. I would not be surprised if my hon. friend has stock in that stockyard. I know I was canvassed for it, and if I had not been hard up, the chances are that I would have had some.

Mr. MORRISON: I have a $100 share in it, which I will count as a subsidy to the Moose Jaw stockyard, instead of an investment.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It was after I left that they gave that.

I am glad to find myself entirely on the side of the amendment in one important respect and that is with regard to the question of the excise. I do not know whether in this weary political world we shall ever get around to that but it is absolutely sound, and it is the only way to take protection out of any tariff. There is no such thing as an exclusively revenue tariff; the question is merely one of degree as between one kind of tariff and another. The tariff may be high enough to be prohibitive, to be protectionist, or it may primarily be just a revenue tariff; but if it is a revenue tariff it is to some extent protectionist. The more general adoption of the excise, we are told, would be most equitable all round and would relieve the poor man accordingly. "I am," the hon. gentleman says, "in theory, if you like, and in practice if I can be, in favour of an excise tariff." If that is so, let him come over and help me get it through. What is one among so many? Let the hon. gentleman come and help me. But that, Mr. Speaker, shows the folly of being divided. If I had not had the experience thirty years ago of having made just exactly the same blunder that my hon. friends are making, I would be on the other side now. But when you make a mistake once what is the sense of making it a second time?

Mr. JOHNSTON: May I ask a question?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, two if you like.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Just one. Does the minister mean to imply that he is the lone wolf howling in the wilderness, and that there is no one on the other side besides himself who holds these views?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I did not say that.

Mr. JOHNSTON: You want us to come and help you.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I did not say anything about wolves or coyotes or anything else.

Mr. JOHNSTON: You cried for help.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I did; and there is no reason why my hon. friend and I should not be on the budget together instead of his submitting the flim-flam proposition that we have here. What is the use of asking for reciprocity? How much more can you get than is offered in the budget?

Mr. KNOX: Speaking seriously, does the minister really want to leave the impression that as a westerner he is satisfied with the present budget?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I am never satisfied with anything in this progressive world; I am always on the lookout for better things. Did the hon. gentleman ever see a Liberal who was satisfied to stay in one place? Now, I was getting around to the subject of twine, and I could not get a reply from my hon. friends from Manitoba as to whether they thought that the budget in this respect was protective. I can recall the time when Manitoba voted eight to two against reciprocity, and I am disposed to think that if they were so vigorous as protectionists at that time they will not object very much to this least objectionable form of protection, particularly when it is likely to establish an industry which we stand in very much need of and for the product of which we should be independent of the outside world. There are two or three primary requisites for which we should not have to depend on foreign countries One of these is coal and another binder twine. I remember that during the war we were at one stage almost with the last ball of twine; and if the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Campbell) is in his seat he will no doubt recall that I interceded on his behalf once and got a carload of twine hooked on to an express train that was going to Yorkton, for the purpose of meeting the exigencies of the situation there. We have become, almost overnight, the greatest exporter of wheat in the world. The estimate of the International Institute of Rome shows that we have exceeded the United States by some six or eight million bushels this year in exports of wheat. Yet here we are, the greatest exporter of wheat in the world, bound to depend on foreign nations for 90 per cent of the twine that is used in binding it. We do not want to anticipate any difficulties that may arise in the future, and probably our relations with our cousins to the south will continue to be cordial. But what about Mexico? A lot of our sisal comes from Mexico and our manilla from the Philippines. Suppose another war should occur, where would we get our binder twine? Why should we depend for our raw materials on places at the ends of the earth, especially for the manufacture of such a commodity as binder twine, or rope, or the various cordage and articles that are made from hemp? It seems to me that both this commodity and coal we should be able to produce ourselves; we should be self-sustaining so far as they are concerned. Should we allow any theory, shot into us when we were young regarding trade and economic practices, and which may be all right in theory, to prevent us from carrying out such a policy? Such a policy is not contrary to the tenets of the Liberal party. We have had subsidies before and I presume we shall have them again. A high tariff on articles not made in the country is not incompatible with free trade. There are certain things that are not inconsistent with the policies of the Liberal party, and one of those things is the permission of aid to such an industry as this. What would be the situation if we were to take the position that every new industry must either start on its own merits or not start at all? This idea seems to me to be absolutely nonsensical. How can you get capital invested in an industry that is in its experimental stages if it has to face such an old-established industry as, for example, the International Harvester Company? If you have to wait until capital will come in under conditions of that kind you will wait until the crack of doom, because that will never be. So that unless we do something to help this industry we shall have to keep on buying 90 per cent of our binder twine outside the shores of Canada. I am not an authority on the copper trade, but I have had an opportunity of visiting some of the hemp factories of Europe, and I know that hemp can be grown and has been grown in Manitoba around Portage la Prairie and the Swan river country. I do not believe there is a man in that province who has not seen it growing; and there are many parts of Saskatchewan in which it can be grown. Under irrigation in Alberta also, particularly around Edmonton, there would be no difficulty in raising this crop. There is therefore an immense industry capable of unlimited development later on which would be able to supply not only our own needs but the oriental trade and the Antipodes as well. Is there any reason why this should not be? I do not know of any country that can produce this raw material in greater bulk than can the Canadian West. Now, if this is not a protectionist feature of the budget, what is? And if it is a protectionist feature of the minister's proposals, do I understand that hon. gentlemen are opposed to it? Judging from the remarks of the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton), that hon. gentleman is heartily in favour of it, as we might have expected. It was not necessary for the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) to put any resolution on the order paper dealing with this matter to indicate where he was. I knew where he would be. I might have suspected, from our experience with the Progressives with regard to the Crowsnest pass when they swiped our policy, that any credit that was coming to the government might be encroached upon in the same way by the leader of the Opposition, in the placing of his resolution with regard to hemp on the order paper, the hon. gentleman knowing that we intended to take action in any event. If this swiping business keeps on I think we will soon have to tie on our political clothes with a logging chain. I exonerate the right hon. leader of the Opposition from any such intention. He is a straight protectionist from the word go. He never changes, and we know where he is—if that is any virtue.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If one is a protectionist he is better to be a straight one.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Sure. I am with my right hon. friend. There are certain points of similarity so far as bounties are concerned that I think all three parties could agree to. Then why worry about them? This is one.

Mr. FORKE: Why worry?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Now, Mr. Speaker, I am going to deal with what I think are some discriminations against the West. My hon. friends over there, while they have not done all they might have done to help themselves, know the shoe pinches in some other respects too. We have known that for many years. But while they are endeavouring to get a certain remedy from the state, that is no reason why they should not come to their own relief through the dozen and one avenues that are available to them, as I have already described. What is the use of sitting back and not adopting modern methods of agriculture? Those are the only methods that can lead to success. Simply waiting for the state to come to your relief in the matter of tariffs or anything else will not get you very far. There is no system of taxation through the customs tariff that will not bear unjustly on the West. That is a statement which I think on reflection you will all agree is correct. At least, such a system of taxation can not be levied so as to bear justly on the West until we have manufactories out there equal to those in the East, and I never expect to see them. Protection, even the most modest protection you like, cannot be of any essential value to the people of the prairies in the sale of their staple products such as wheat and cattle. Our wheat goes to the markets of the world and sells on its own merits regardless of what the tariff is here. Our steers are going there now, landing at the various ports and standing on their four feet in competition with every steer from the four quarters of the globe and selling on their merits. How can you protect them? Our butter is coming to that position, too, because we now have an export surplus. I say that any tariff, whether for revenue, protection or otherwise is only a matter of degree, will bear unjustly—will bear unduly perhaps is a better word, because I do not think that any of us want to be unjust—on the West. My eastern friends demonstrated that last year when they said: If you can show any of us how the West can be assisted, even by the establishment of what we disprove of—a compulsory wheat board, for instance—we will give it to you so far as is possible to do so through this House. And they did go as far as they could in that direction. I do not think there is any desire on the part of the eastern provinces to be unjust or unfair in continuing a system of tariff taxation that inevitably must be unfair to the West simply because it cannot be otherwise. The alternative is to assume that the millennium is here, that the hundred and ninety-five representatives from the eastern provinces are ready to set their interests aside in favour of the interests of the three prairie provinces. I never expect them to do that. Then how are we going to equalize matters? There are certain causes for the discontent of the West, apart from their mighty bad farming in some instances and equally bad management. They are going into it to-day right to the eyes.

Mr. SPENCER: Does the hon. minister claim that in the West there are more bad farmers than good farmers?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I have not been up in my hon. friend's constituency of Battle River so I do not know. But I do know there is a lot of bad farming in the West. When those farmers arrive at that conclusion themselves, it will be the first ray of hope for their betterment. Yes, my hon. friend surely knows there is a lot of bad farming in the West. How could it be otherwise when much of the country was settled by people without farming experience? And yet some of those very people, much to their credit, have made a pronounced success of their farming operations. I know many of them.

Where did I leave off when my hon. friend interrupted me?

Mr. SPEAKMAN: It does not make any difference. Start again.

Mr. FORKE: The cattle were on their feet.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: No, the butter.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: If my hon. friends will just keep quiet for a little while I shall be able to satisfy them. I have been very patient with them and have enjoyed myself as much as, possibly more than, they have. I want to make an appeal to the entire House with regard to the question of natural resources. It is a time-honoured question in the West. There is never an assembly out there but what that stereotyped resolution is on the order paper All three of the western provinces got a splendid bargain from both the Liberal government and later on from the Conservative government in the form of subsidies in lieu of their natural resources. Those resources now, Mr. Speaker, are actually becoming a liability on the Dominion to administer. Out in the West we are beginning to feel that while we did get a good bargain in that respect, we are sufficiently ambitious and optimistic to think the time has come when we can administer those resources much better ourselves than they can be possibly administered from Ottawa. All the interest that Ottawa has is to administer these resources efficiently so as to get enough revenue to meet the expenditures involved; and that is barely what they are doing. As a matter of fact the revenues are not meeting the expenditures.

Now, why should we not administer our own natural resources? If we are going to be a happy family of nine in the confederation surely we should as nearly as possible be all on an equality. I have pointed out that we cannot be on a footing of equality so long as we have a protective tariff; I do not care how modest it may be it will bear unduly on the West. Then why aggravate that inequality by continuing a condition of affairs which puts three of the nine provinces in an unfair position with regard to their natural resources, particularly when these resources are administered by the Dominion at a loss? How do I know that? I have gone into the Department of the Interior and examined the accounts. I knew the natural resources of the prairie provinces were barely carrying themselves. I am not going to give these figures in detail, I am merely going to show the results of the last 18 years. The total includes immigration and also the Dominion parks, but their inclusion will not affect the total to an appreciable extent. British Columbia is also included in these figures, but the small amount of natural resources there and the difference between the expenditures and the revenue is so little that it will not affect the result either. However, we will knock off several millions on this account if you like. We find the total expenditure for the four western provinces since 1905—that is when the three prairie provinces were erected—has exceeded the total revenue by approximately $27,500,000. That is to say, it cost the Dominion that huge total to administer the natural resources of the western country over and above the revenues received. If we knock off $7,500,000 for Dominion parks we find the Dominion is still out to the extent of $20,000,000. That is the liability on the Dominion in respect of the administration of these natural resources.

Now why wait until this liability becomes so much heavier that the provinces will want even greater subsidies in lieu of their administration of these natural resources? That is what is going to happen. Look at the province of Manitoba. It costs in that province $5,000,000 annually to administer the natural resources, and you will not get a million and a half out of it. That is the condition that will soon prevail in Saskatchewan when the instalments for lands that were sold during the boom are all paid in. In Alberta their natural resources are gradually going to bring in more revenue. They are more fortunate than the other two provinces in regard to the permanency of their revenue-producing natural resources, due to their wonderful coal deposits and, possibly, oil deposits. I have discussed this matter not only with my colleagues but with private members, and they are imbued with the idea, that if we get the balance of the natural resources we should give up the subsidy. On the face of it that looks logical, but the fact is that any balance that is left is so small that there is no revenue in it for anybody at this time. Why, not, seeing that this is a liability to the Dominion, pass it over to these three western provinces and make that equality to exist that should prevail among all the members of confederation? Give them the opportunity of converting this liability into an asset to the various provinces. Make the subsidy terminable at some particular time, if you like; the right of that subsidy will then have been purchased by this Dominion forever.

Mr. MEIGHEN: To whom is the hon. member appealing to do this justice?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The whole House.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Would it not be a good idea to bring in a bill?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It takes two to make a bargain—the provinces and the Dominion. There has never been anything done between the provinces and the Dominion on the question of the resources except by consultation or by conference. Suppose we could get a bill through this House, the provinces might not accept it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Could the hon. gentleman not succeed in making terms with the government of Saskatchewan that he just came out of?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The government of Saskatchewan knows when it has a good thing in this bargain and it is not likely to give it up. A year ago last autumn there were suggestions that the natural resources should be given plus three years' subsidy; I believe that offer was made to the three provinces. A flat rate basis of that kind will sooner or later have to be arrived at, but the provinces would not accept the three years' subsidy. They might accept ten; I do not know. It was tentatively talked about. I know that my right hon. friend, as former Minister of the Interior, is familiar with this question and interested in it. It must have some finality—unlike the tariff. I am satisfied that a settlement of it would remove a lot of the grievance on the ground of inequality of treatment through the western provinces not having control of their natural resources. You may say, why should we take over a liability? Well, we believe we can convert them into an asset at some time or other; and they are getting to be more and more of a liability administered where they are. I appeal to every hon. member of this House, those—the oppositions included, to get this involved, knotty, long-standing question solved and put off the order paper.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the hon. minister will allow me, he knows the terms that he asked for when he was a member of the government of Saskatchewan, and he knows the terms that the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) asked for when he was Premier of the province of Alberta. May I ask why this government does not grant these terms? Has he now come to the conclusion that they were unreasonable?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not know that any government has ever got as far as to offer the terms that we did at the last conference.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I mean the terms the provinces asked for, that the minister himself asked for when he was in the government of Saskatchewan. Why does he not now grant the terms that he himself asked for?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It was never my fortune to be in the conference. I always had the impression—

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman asked the terms.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I know, and I take the responsibility for doing so. But nobody knows better than my right hon. friend the ramifications involved in settling that question by an accounting. I cannot conceive of a body getting at that in less than ten years.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I tried to convince the hon. minister of that when I was in power, but I could not convince him.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Better late in getting wise than not at all. I was under the impression that this government was the first government—speaking from recollection—that had made a straight flat rate offer.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, no.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: And trimmed it off with all these conditions. I am only speaking from memory, of course.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, no. The hon. minister is about ten years late in that.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I am glad my right hon. friend did think up something that was right during his regime. I am appealing to my right hon. friend's good nature. I see that he is in good humour, and I do not want to put him otherwise.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does my hon. friend not think that we were pretty nearly right on the tariff too?

Mr. MOTHERWELL. No. Some of it you cannot get away from, I admit, but you were not right, just the same.

Now, as to these natural resources, we are going to get further in wrong, we are going to get a greater liability. The instalments on the Saskatchewan land will all be due next year; the same applies to Alberta. After that the receipts will gradually grow less and the deficit will grow greater. We will have one more deficit added to that of the Merchant Marine, one more added to that of the National Railways—which, by the way, I hope will soon disappear altogether. There is no sense in letting one deficit disappear and having another bob up on the horizon like this one, but that is what will happen. I appeal to hon. members of this House, all of them, to consider the advisability of handing these resources over on some conditions associated with a terminable period of years after which the payment of subsidies would stop. Naturally the number of years would be smaller in the case of Alberta than in the case of the other two provinces. I am not going to suggest how many years should be stipulated, but in my opinion that is the proper basis on which to arrive at an agreement.

I apologize for taking up so much time, but I think the responsibility is equally divided over the House.

Mr. E. J. SEXSMITH (Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, I am persuaded that my contribution to this verbal deluge will not, perhaps, be of very great value. Still, on account of the importance of the subject before the House I feel it incumbent upon me to express some of my opinions in connection with this budget.

I admit that the task of discharging the duties of a finance minister is a tremendous one, involving perhaps more labour and care and ability than many of us have a true conception of. Therefore I find mingled in my suggestions this evening feelings of sympathy and respect for our worthy Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding). Perhaps in my remarks tonight I may deviate somewhat from the general line of discussion that has been followed. I desire not to be specific but to talk along lines of general principles.

Canada has a debt of approximately two and a half billion dollars. If we consider this debt in comparison with her undeveloped abilities or her resourceful wealth we have grounds for optimism; but if we consider this debt in comparison with her volume of business and her population this problem is a bit more serious. Yet I take it, Mr. Speaker, that every statesman, every representative should have a determination and express that determination that this debt can and must be paid. Indeed every citizen should feel that Canada is his country and that the defeat or success of Canada means his personal defeat or success, that the distinguishment of the country means his distinguishment. A national debt means a depreciation in the value of individual possession. Therefore, every one should feel that it is his imperative duty to endeavour to pay this debt of the country. In order to make this privilege proportionately possible governments have as far back as we can remember resorted to taxation.

In raising the revenue there are certain fundamental principles to be observed. Governments try if possible to bring down a balance budget, or to go one better and bring in a surplus, but when large war debts accrue and post-war conditions obtain I apprehend, Mr. Speaker, that to bring down taxation proposals that would produce a surplus in any one fiscal year might not be the wisest policy to follow. It might create demands that would encourage and lower the morale of the people and retard national progress. We, however, both governments and citizens, should try to decrease the deficit. In the report brought down by the Finance Minister for the fiscal year 1922-1923 we were told that the revenue estimated on the then existing method of taxation amounted to something like $332,000,000 and that the expenditure was $460,000,000 odd. This convinced, or should have convinced, the people of Canada of the necessity of accepting the burden of additional taxation, but I am free to state that no hon. gentleman here decided within his own mind that we would have a balanced budget, that there would not be an increase in the deficit. In talking to many people in my riding I estimated that there would be a deficit of perhaps twenty or thirty million dollars. I regret, however, to learn that that deficit amounts to about forty-five million dollars. Now we are facing a condition. The business of Canada will not permit an increase in taxation. Neither would it be wisdom to decrease our revenue from taxation. Then whence is relief to come?

I wish by way of constructive suggestion to refer to two well-tried principles that are fundamental in this connection; First, an increase in national business, and secondly economic retrenchment in financial expenditure. It is necessary for Canada to have more people. You cannot have a greater business unless you have more people. Our population is about nine million; the population of the United States is about one hundred and twenty million. I would therefore suggest that the federal parliament and the provincial legislatures should co-operate in a vigorous policy of an effective kind to induce immigrants to come into our country. No matter what their vocation in life, so long as they are not abnormalities, speaking in the broad sense of the word, let them come. We are not importing machines; we are importing men and women, men who are eager and willing to start at the bottom of the ladder. Men who start at the bottom of the ladder generally look up, but the man who starts at the top generally looks down. If we get enough people who will appreciate the great privileges that the Dominion of Canada has for them, and will take hold of these privileges, that will be a great help in increasing our business. Along with that I would suggest that the government of Canada try in every possible way to develop our natural resources. Canada is rich in minerals, and I was pleased to hear the Finance Minister speak of the efforts put forward for the mining of copper. I hope that there will be efforts put forward for the mining of coal, for I believe that we have coal mines in Canada capable of supplying our people with all their fuel requirements. It is true that in its early development any mine or any works might not pay, but if we persist the time will come when the output will be prolific enough that it will pay. The development of the natural resources and more people in this country mean more business.

Let me now take up my second thought, economic retrenchment. It is true that in the development of a country the spirit of miserliness must be forgotten. We must carry on necessary public works, but it does seem to me sometimes and to others who have spoken to me that parliaments that handle money by the millions of dollars seem to forget the value of the hundred dollars. Of course, we know that all departments try in every possible way, or at least they ought to, to curtail unnecessary expenditure, but I sometimes think that the members do not try very hard to do this. They come here with requests from the different provinces and from the people of their riding for all manner of new public works, post offices, dry docks and so forth.

Mr. LOGAN: What about the Hudson Bay railway?

Mr SEXSMITH: I think it is only right that members should consider the financial condition of the country and not encourage those who ask them to try and further such works. It would be a help to the men who have the responsibility of carrying on these works.

Let me mention a few things that, perhaps, may not be very popular. Aside from the expenditures on public works, economies might be effected in other directions which would save, I think, millions of dollars to the treasury. With all due respect to the late government, as well as to the present government, the administration of the country's affairs is far too expensive and has been for some years. I am well aware that my suggestions for retrenchment may be unacceptable. They certainly will not be very popular in the city of Ottawa. However, I want to make a few remarks as to the cost of government here and if I am wrong in any respect I am quite ready to be corrected. First of all, there must be a retrenchment in expenditures in connection with the Civil Service. I voted for an investigation into the salaries, classification and numbers of the staff of the Civil Service. It seems to me that the investigation which is being conducted into these matters ought to result in a very substantial saving. Salaries are disproportionately high. They have been increased from time to time because it was the custom so to do. In that respect we have been following a practice which obtains in other countries, with the result that the stipends are in very many cases too high.

Then I would restrict, in great measure, the expenditure on superannuation and retiring allowances. Why should men who have been receiving large salaries for the greater part of their lives receive a retiring allowance when quitting the service when hundreds of thousands of people who are following vocations that are essential from the standpoint of the national well-being and who are in every way good and commendable citizens get no such allowance when the time comes for them to quit work. This question has been impressed upon the public mind by the very large amounts granted to officials of the government railways on retirement. The electors are asking why, for example, a railway president who has been receiving a salary of from $35,000 to $50,000 should be retired on an allowance of $35,000. If the expenditures of the public departments are carefully studied it will be found that there are many directions in which retrenchment is possible thus, possibly, causing a saving which could be devoted to the reduction of our national debt.

I want to speak now for a moment or two on the question of taxation. As fair minded citizens we cannot rebel against just and equitable taxation, but we can protest against extravagance and we, as a parliament, can show the lead to the rest of the country by practising economy ourselves. To my mind when budget proposals are brought down the effort should be to relieve the burden of taxation where it bears heaviest upon the great mass of what I might term unprivileged people, and to impose such taxation as is necessary in the interests of the revenue upon those best able to bear it. At the same time I do not believe in the doctrine of equality which we often hear preached: I think that is something which ought to be discouraged as undemocratic. On the other hand, men who are in responsible positions should do their utmost to discourage that spirit of selfishness and graft, too often present in the human character, and which in the past has resulted in oppression, the oppression of the financially weak by the financially strong. I know, Mr. Speaker, that it is exceedingly difficult to arrange equitable methods of taxation. There are some methods that commend themselves to all of us; there are other methods that we do not approve of. It seems to me, for example, that there could be no fairer tax than the income tax. Nevertheless we find people who have never paid a cent of income tax in their lives raising the greatest outcry in regard to it. I also believe that a business tax is fair. If a man is conducting a good business he certainly can afford to pay a tax of some kind. Then there is a consumer's tax. If it is absolutely such as represented and can be made workable I cannot see that there is anything so particularly wrong about it, provided due regard be paid to the principle of which I have spoken. I had intended saying something about the sales tax because in calling upon different business concerns in my own riding complaint was made that it was unworkable. I understand, however, that the Minister of Finance, having had various deputations wait upon him has made the necessary changes so that the same ground for criticism no longer exists. There are some methods of taxation of which I certainly do not approve. The tax, whether direct or indirect in its nature, which builds up one industry at the expense of another is unfair. It is based on special privilege which is unjust and will result in bringing about an unbalanced economic condition.

10 p.m.

In 1878 or 1879, Sir John A. Macdonald introduced his National Policy, a policy to build up cities. I remember hearing a speech delivered by him in our county town, to the effect that if you build up your towns, your cities, you build up home markets, and thereby you build up your country. All this, however, had to be done at the expense of the rural districts. Nobody ever built up a city from above, nor from below. This, to my mind, has obtained too long in the interest of the cities' wealth and the cities' privileges, and it has resulted in the neglect of rural interests. People are expecting a revision of this policy. Not only have I heard men who believe in the Liberal platform or in the Progressive platform, but I have talked during the last year to men who professed to be Conservatives, and they say emphatically that there must be a downward revision of this protective feature.

[Mr. Sexsmith.]

Leaving for a moment this campaign football, the tariff, let me say that there are other questions of momentous concern for men who are in responsible positions as ministers of the Crown or even as representatives of the people. There are forceful organizations which are national octopuses, and they are chaining the hands of governments and parliaments. In North America, governments are strangled; they are helpless. The forceful feature, for instance, in the labour unions—and I say this with all respect to labour—has become reactionary. There was a time when labour was not recognized as it should be. I know that because for several years when I was younger I worked as a mechanic; I have associated with such men and I know whereof I speak. But silently and subtly, this union has been working until the plumb line has gone the other way. Strikes are unprofitable from the fact that they throw men into idleness for a certain length of time during the season, and they keep up the high cost of living the whole season around. Vigorous efforts should be made to try, by commission work and in every other way, to see if there cannot be some conciliation between labourers and their employers. During the height of the coal strike in the United States, President Harding is reported as saying that the United States government would take over the mines and they would see that the people were supplied with the necessary fuel. Immediately after that he received word that he had better go slowly and be considerate, or transportation would be stopped. This is a serious condition. It is a more important matter to occupy the minds of men in responsible positions than for them to play party politics.

There are other unions which are fixing, maintaining and controlling prices, and it is a problem to know how to manage them. Retailers report that in many lines of merchandise their price is fixed from above, and that price is maintained by controlling the outlet. Would it be justifiable, if it were possible, for those engaged in agricultural pursuits to form unions, combines, and monopolies, and to fix the price of the foodstuffs of the world? Certainly that would not be right. That is the very feature of protection or monopolies in any respect that we as Progressives stand against. I am sure that organizations or industries that are financially strong enough to form combines of that nature do not need protection. It will be to the eternal honour of some government to at some time make this decision and, in spite of any influences whatever, act upon it.

Let me speak for a moment on agriculture. After hearing the Minister of Agriculture (Mr.

Motherwell) talk for two hours and a half, I do not know but that I might almost feel optimistic. I will, however, make this statement, that farmers have not come to parliament to have glass beads hung about their necks, nor to receive bouquets for the farming interests and nothing else, and then to run home like children. Those who are engaged in agricultural pursuits are broad enough to know that there is a diversity of industries in Canada, and that every industry, no matter whether it be great or small, must have its status. Since I have been in Ottawa, I have arrived at some conclusions in connection with the duties of parliament. One is this—and I say this conscientiously and with due respect—that the man who has been brought up in a city has a very slim conception of what it means to farm. Another conclusion to which I have come is that partisan politics is costing this country too much, and people are beginning to find this out. The trouble with the agricultural industry to-day is, plainly speaking, that the prices of all the supplies that the man who is engaged in agricultural pursuits requires, are so governed by combines that he has nothing to say. If he cannot afford to buy those supplies, there is no use in saying so; the prices are fixed, and it will be observed that when prices can be controlled, they are not fixed, maintained and controlled without a commensurate profit being given. On the other hand, if an agriculturist has anything to sell, there appears an army of respectable people, of course, whom you could not coax or persuade in any way to go out on a farm. They stand between the consumer and the product of the farmer. They have to be kept, and this creates a spread. They cannot ask too much because the consumer cannot buy the article, so they have to go the other way and force the price down on the agriculturist until it is almost impossible to coax or persuade young men to continue in agricultural pursuits. We hope that the very effective work of the different parliamentary committees, together with the Combines Act, will tend to relieve conditions. At any rate they will reveal those conditions, which will be realized by the public, and will create a sentiment which may perhaps have the effect of ameliorating matters.

As regards the budget, I must confess that I am very much disappointed. We were told some things last year that we thought justified us in supporting the minister's budget at that time. We realized that it was the government's first year in office and that there were post-war conditions and difficulties in the way, and we had a promise that there would be a reduction in the tariff. I do not know that I object to the tariff so much as to that feature of it which is called protection, and which continually exploits one class of the community to build up another. That is the part I object to. The amendment is more elaborate than I should like, but there are principles in it which I feel will compel me to give it my support.

Mr. HATFIELD: Did I understand the hon. member to say that he supported the budget last year?

Mr. SEXSMITH: Yes.

Mr. HATFIELD: Did the hon. member's party support it?

Mr. SEXSMITH: No, not all.

Mr. T. W. BIRD (Nelson): My fellow members will agree with me that we have had a very interesting day. I listened with a very great deal of interest to the address of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) and was very much pleased with the good humour that he exhibited practically all the way through. I did detect, however, signs that the hon. gentleman was just a little bit sore, a little tender around the place where he got kicked at the Moose Jaw election. The minister does not take very kindly any reference to that matter. With regard to the other interesting speech with which the day opened, I may say that on this side of the House we always listen with kindly interest to anything contributed by the member for Brantford (Mr. Raymond), and I will not make any lengthy reference to his speech except to observe that his definition of stability apparently is going to be historical. His definition of stability is the stability of a ship, which can be stable at the same time as it is making progress. When he mentioned the word "ship" in connection with Liberal policy my mind went back a good many years. Association of ideas is a wonderful thing, and when the hon. member mentioned that word "ship" in that connection I thought immediately of the Jolly Roger which used to float so bravely over the good ship Hispaniola. I do not know which member of the Liberal ministry is responsible for the policy of this budget, but he might be likened to the good old John Silver, that man of attractive yet questionable genius. I think that if we could put a wooden leg on the Minister of Agriculture himself he would fill the character very well. Whoever else on this side of the House has failed to appreciate the present budget, its policy, its delicate concessions to the people of Canada, I shall try in the few minutes at my disposal to do it what justice I can.

During the war, and under the stress of the conditions that prevailed then, very many experiments were tried in federal taxation. These included the sales tax, the customs war tax, the income tax, the business tax and the luxury tax, the two latter of blessed memory. Some of these were rough and ready means of raising money in a time of stress and were justifiable solely from that standpoint. But we are no longer at war and it might reasonably have been expected that before this some sincere effort would have been made to place our taxation on a more equitable basis. Instead of that, last year the Minister of Finance chose to perpetuate these crude methods and not only to perpetuate them but to make them bear more onerously upon those elements of the community that always find it difficult to bear any extra burdens of any kind. I think we may be grateful that the income tax is still with us. It is probably the tax that is most easily adapted to the requirements of equity and the economists tell us that it is the only tax that will stay where it is placed. It is a tax that exacts money where it is expected that money can be got. I do not say that our present income tax law comes anywhere near to that ideal. I am sure it does not; it is clumsily and inequitably graduated. The well-to-do people of Canada are not taking a fair share of the burden of Canada's taxation.

We have heard many expressions of appreciation of England during this session. In that wonderful little island the principle of noblesse oblige is practical politics, and the well-to-do person is expected to pay a fair share of the country's expenses. For instance, a man in receipt of an income of $10,000 over there pays in income tax an amount equal to about 18 per cent of his income. In Canada a man in receipt of a similar income would pay about 9 per cent. The well-to-do person, the person who has the good things of life, is getting off very easy in this country at the present time.

There is another defect in our income tax law that might very well be remedied, namely, the failure to discriminate against unearned income—income which comes without any effort or enterprise on the part of the recipient. At the present time there is about a billion and a half dollars in the hands of well-to-do Canadians that did not exist until the war had been in progress for two or three years. That is to say, an income of over $50,000,000 a year was diverted by war into the pockets of certain people. According to all the rules of equity such income ought to bear an extra share of the expenses of government, especially when more than half of our national expenditure is for purposes arising out of the war. In a word, this is the income of people who do not sow, neither do they spin.

There is another form of tax neglected by our federal government, no matter which party is in power and no matter whether we are at war or at peace; I refer to an inheritance tax. This is a form of property upon which the state has had an unchallenged claim from time immemorial. There never was a time in the memory of man when the state did not have a claim upon both real and personal estate at the moment it passed from one generation to another. A short while ago I was reading that even the contemporaries of the late lamented King Tutankhamen of Egypt paid inheritance duties, and I rather think that is the best explanation yet of that monarch trying to carry so much property with him—he was evidently dodging the inheritance tax. We know that the Roman statesman of old, who laid the foundations of much of our present system of statecraft, thought the most appropriate end that could come to an affluent career was some form of compulsory bequest to the state, and they saw to it that such careers were so fittingly closed. Let us look at little England again—a never-failing source of sound precedent, I notice, to certain hon. members. Those lovers of the constitution who are so well sprinkled over the benches of this Chamber when any uncomfortable constitutional question arises always look to England for their precedents. Well now, as soon as England emerged from its political tutelage, at the time of the Revolution her statesmen imposed a tax of this kind, and it has been kept in force in more or less the same form ever since.

Now, it seems to me that such an inheritance tax approaches as nearly as a tax possibly can to the principle of painless extraction. It hurts nobody. That it is a perfectly just claim established by time, reason and sound democracy, cannot be denied. Therefore it seems rather odd that our federal government should so long have overlooked this source of revenue. I would go as far as to say that all our sister dominions have adopted such a tax, for the reason that in most of their legislatures there is a greater carefulness for the interests of the common people than has been displayed in this House for a good many years. Indeed, when it comes to the principle of equity in taxation Canada is the laggard of the British Empire.

The principle of discrimination to which I have already referred was recognized during the war to some extent in the business profits tax. The history of the imposition of that tax is very significant as illustrating the spirit that has prevailed in this House, irrespective of party, towards equity in taxation. There was a tax that, while it contributed very justly to the cost of the war yet was inaugurated very timidly, very tentatively, very apologetically, and it was provided with a kind of automatic stop lest, I suppose, some future finance minister—possibly a Progressive—might forget to stop it. That is one of the pieces of legislation that is not altogether rare in our history whereby a law comes to a silent unseen termination and nobody is the wiser. And so the business profits tax was allowed to go out of existence. It was a just tax, an equitable tax, a tax which if in existence to-day would to a great extent relieve the consuming people, the common people of Canada.

That leads me to a brief discussion of the sales tax and its failure to discriminate against luxuries. The luxury tax was inaugurated on May 19, 1920, and after a short, unwelcome existence it went out of this world of fiscal sorrows on the 20th of December of the same year. The circumstances surrounding its death were very significant—just as significant as the circumstances surrounding the death of the business profits tax. The former Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) said some very touching things at the graveside. He said in effect: "It has fulfilled its purpose; it has checked extravagance and lowered the cost of living in this country." Above everything else—he did not actually say this, but it must have been in his mind—it made it easier for the people to swallow the sales tax. There is no doubt that that was the hidden motive behind the luxury tax. It was imposed at the same time as the sales tax. When this tax was dropped the opposition of that day, constituting the present party in power, were silent; they were suspiciously acquiescent; they consented to its death. I think I am right in imputing that attitude to them, because the present Minister of Finance has not, so far as I know, as much as mentioned luxury taxes during the last two years. It is true that one lone voice was raised against the elimination of this tax, that of a gentleman who until recently sat in the ministerial seat but is now translated to a better position, without the responsibility of office. The protest made by that gentleman was remarkable because of its picturesqueness, its biblical imagery. He said: "The Minister of Finance is pandering to the millionaire. He has stood by and allowed the Queen of Sheba to mince past in her furs and diamonds and all her gay apparel, while he has stood by, with a cudgel for the poor workingman." That came from the Opposition benches when the luxury tax was dropped. I have wondered how that fervent advocate of the poor man felt last year when the hon. minister allowed not only the Queen of Sheba to go by, but also King Solomon in all his glory, while the minister lay in ambush, with a club twice as big this time, for the poor workingman. These are the kind of discussions we get in this House; things are allowed to pass quietly; they are never known to the public at large. Taxes are born and taxes die, both parties consenting thereto. We have this silent, invisible pact whereby the masses of the people always get the heavy end of the burden, and the well-to-do people get things easy.

I want to say a word further in regard to the principle of indirectness as it predominates in the taxation of this country. Canadian governments, it does not matter whether Liberal or Conservative, believe in taxing the consumer—and "the consumer" means that entity which we sometimes refer to as the common people, the great mass of the people who are not very well able to bear taxes upon the necessities of life. This House, irrespective of party, believes in taxing the consumer, making the consumer pay for the war, making the consumer pay for the cost of government. The figures for 1922 show that the consumers of this country paid in that year 67 per cent of the money raised in taxes to carry on the affairs of the country. I think I am safe in saying that in no other country in the English-speaking world do any such figures apply. When we come to apportioning taxation, irrespective of what government is in power, the poor man gets it every time. The hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) this afternoon suggested that Great Britain laid very heavy taxation upon the necessities of life; that in spite of the fact that it was a free trade country, Great Britain was making things very burdensome for the poor people. Now, I want to say that in Great Britain the principle of laying the burden where it can most easily be borne is carried out to the fullest extent. There not more than 30 per cent of the cost of running the country is laid at the door of the consumer. I could go a great deal further than that, because I am just referring to what is collected under customs and excise. I think the hon. member for Fort William referred to these as necessities of life, but I would point out that customs and excise taxation in England correspond to our excise taxes here. I want to know how many necessities of life are included in our excise taxes? Nobody but a Scotchman would call spirits a necessity of life, and that is about all that is contained in the British customs and excise—except sugar, of course, and sugar is taxed fairly heavily. The same applies to tea, matches, and, to some extent dried fruit. Outside of these things there is nothing that can at all be called a necessity of life. I do not think that more than 5 per cent of the total British revenue is raised upon the necessities of life. I would not be so unfair as to say that 67 per cent of our income is raised from the necessities of life, but the great bulk of our revenue comes from the consumer, is laid upon what he purchases and what he uses. That is a serious thing for Canada, a country that is finding great difficulty in maintaining its population. The people are just slipping through our fingers all the time. Some time ago there were a good many allusions to this subject and I do not want to cover the ground again, but since the Minister of Agriculture has been handing out congratulations I think I will follow his example and hand out a few more. The gratitude of this House—I do not suppose it will be expressed in a formal manner—is coming to those upon this side who attempt to bring the House face to face with the facts. It takes a courageous man to tell the truth sometimes, and that is exemplified from what has followed in this House from action along those lines. I have been pleased to note that since some Progressives made it the fashion to tell the truth, others have followed suit; it is not so hard to tell the truth once somebody has broken the ice. Not long ago the attention of the House was drawn to a front page article in a responsible and influential western journal which stated that last winter 6,000 families had gone from its own city to the United States. I notice that the Minister of Agriculture, when he referred to that journal, did not make the reference with perfect equanimity; he is not on very good terms with it just at this time. The reason is that the minister feels that public opinion in the West is going one way and he is left alone to go the other way. I am reminded of the story of the little boy who went with his mother to see his big brother's regiment off to the war. They saw the regiment march down the street, and the little fellow said "Mother, look! They are all out of step but our John." Now it seems that the Minister of Agriculture does not like it because that great organ of public opinion in the West is going in the opposite direction to him. But we are very glad that it is. We are very glad to think that one of the most powerful organs of western opinion is coming around to the opinion as expressed in this House a few weeks ago. This is not only a western matter. The other day on the front page of a very important American daily I saw an article in which the present leader of the Opposition was represented as saying that thousands of people were leaving Canada every day because of the high cost of living. Now when I read that statement and saw that it was not associated with the name of the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) I had a grand and glorious feeling. After all it is not the Progressives alone that are telling the truth. The Progressives having made it easy to tell the truth the others are beginning. It is going around this way to my right and it may be that it will get across to the other side.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think I can let that go quite unchallenged. I did not make a statement so strong as that. I do not know where the hon. member read it. I went to the limit of the truth but no further.

Mr. BIRD: The hon. member will have to settle his accounts with the New York Tribune. He did say incidentally of course, that the high cost of living was due to the management of our friends across the way, but I thought it not advisable to say that. In that article there was another thing with which the right hon. leader of the Opposition had nothing whatever to do. This article on its own account, I believe, said that on a certain day in Montreal there were four hundred skilled Canadian workmen who applied to the United States consul for entry into the United States. That was in Montreal, not Winnipeg. I may add to these a little news item that I collected from a local paper in my own district at home which read like this: We are sorry to see so many of our Swedish neighbours leaving us; four families left last week for the United States. Mr. Speaker, that is the kind of immigrant that is held up to us as being most capable of adapting himself to conditions as they are in Canada. So from city, town and hamlet they go in thousands and tens of thousands. Then there comes along a certain type of patriot and says: Do not mention it; hush it up; breathes there a man with soul so dead that he will draw the world's attention to a thing like that? An open vein spouting out the rich, red life of Canada, and these lachrymose patriots say: Cover it up; bring a funnel and pour in more; bring a force pump and pump it in; bring Mr. Coué and let us cure it by auto-suggestion; let us woo the immigrant in, and check immigrants from going out; let us cure these things by simply denying them. Now some people call that patriotism, but we on this side of the House call it stark foolishness.

Now there is another side to this inequitable taxation story besides the national one. I do not see how you are going to attract people from countries where they leave the poor alone, into a country where they make a practice of giving them the heavy end. Apart from that, this is a social question. This iniquitous system of taxation that has prevailed in this country before and during the war and is carried on now succeeds in accentuating unjust conditions that already existed apart from it. I am referring more particularly to the farming community in this country, because I am more particularly associated with them. Some hon. members in dealing with this question of farming conditions have pointed to other countries and said: Look at the farmers in other countries, you Canadians. See how they are getting on. If you only take stock of farming in England and the United States and other places you will be satisfied to stay in Canada. Mr. Speaker, that is poor comfort. It is the kind of comfort that Job got. It means this: You are trying to comfort the Canadian farmer by showing him how widespread his trouble is. I think he could endure it if he thought it was only local, but when he is told it is a world-wide condition, that farmers are getting it in the neck throughout the universe, that is pretty hard on the spirit of the farmer.

The fact is, Mr. Speaker, the agricultural industry throughout the world for the past few generations has been gradually pushed into the background by growing industrialism. The farmers throughout the world have wakened up at last to find they are living in a world that has been moulded to suit the ideals and aims of urban life. Educational, social, fiscal, financial, in transportation, in almost every important economic item that you can mention, our modern life has been switched away from the farmer, and it does not matter what country you lay your finger on you will find the same thing. This trying to compare British farmers with Canadian farmers does not amount to—that! The Canadian farmer and the British farmer are suffering from the same thing—the neglect of governments that did not understand them and did not want to understand them, that bid for their votes at election time but when it came down to their economic difficulties they did not know and did not want to know. I say this is true whether of the British farmer or of the Canadian farmer, and the fact that the British farmer wants protection and the Canadian farmer free trade makes my point all the more clear if you will only think about it. Free trade and protection does not matter that much! It is the negligence, the callousness of governments that have not tried to understand the principles that govern rural life and the industry of the farmer. Yes, the world has been aroused, "a green international" has come into being and the farmers throughout the world feel that they are standing on common ground. This has resulted in what? It has resulted in the birth of certain political forces that have shaken the old political parties to their foundations—in England the National Farmers' Union, a non-political body but exercising tremendous political influence, in the United States the Farmers' Bloc, an inter-party body that absolutely dominates the parties in the United States, in Canada a direct political movement that may not dominate the old parties but it has them pretty well worried, and it will have them more worried yet, mark my words! In Canada this movement has taken its most logical course because the Canadian farmer stands in this world as being the man who relatively is the worst off. I say relatively advisedly, because the Canadian farmer has no business to be as badly off in a rich country like ours as farmers in other parts of the world. Relatively speaking conditions have pressed most hardly upon the Canadian farmer, and it has resulted in a party so sane in its demands, so democratic and broad in its constitution—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BIRD: Wait till I am through—so broad in its constitution and that so appeals to the man who loves a square deal that I prophesy for it that it is going to transform the public life of Canada and divert it into channels that will be more conducive, not only to that national prosperity that we hear so much about, that is registered in bank clearings and factories and exports, but the prosperity that is registered in the homes, the lives and happiness of the people.

Some gentlemen in this House try to persuade themselves that this is a temporary movement, that it is an ebullition of class consciousness that will die a speedy death. But those gentlemen are ignorant of two things. They are ignorant of the depth of the wrong from which the Canadian farmer is suffering in the first place, and they are ignorant moreover of the economic and political enlightenment that the farmer of Canada enjoys to-day. Now, the consciousness of a wrong is no assurance of permanence I admit; history is too sad a testimony of that. There are plenty of wrongs that have been keenly felt but that have never been redressed. But a wrong that is backed up by enlightenment and the ability to organize, is the thing that is going to win out; and I want you older politicians to think of the organizations that exist throughout Canada: The little local, the little spot of light in a local community where there is just as much intelligent discussion of economic and political matters as there is on the floor of this House—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Far more.

Mr. BIRD: —I want you to remember that before you try to make any prognostication, because if you do not remember that you will be all out. You will remember it sooner or later. This is not an ephemeral thing you are dealing with. Oh, you may exercise your eloquence pointing out the defects of our political ability. We have not been very long in the game, we have not learned its tricks and all its deep and dark ways, but we are getting on. We are learning quickly. If we are here a year or two more we will know most of the things that make the politician notorious in modern life. Now, the shaft of ridicule that hits us does not hit the movement that is behind us. You may wipe out everyone of us twice over but you will not touch it. This movement could get on without any of us. It will not only break the man that opposes it but it will break the friend that is false to it. You may point over here and say "Scratch them deep enough and you will find the old Tory and the old Liberal." You may hit the nail on the head sometimes, but in saying that you are unconsciously paying a compliment to this party. The party that has been able to take hold of the old Tory and the old Liberal and make them, for the first time in their lives, step forward on the path of progress, has something in it that you have got to reckon with. Even the man that goes back "to the flesh pots of Egypt" will never forget the exhilaration he experienced while he was here.

Now, just a word more specifically in regard to the principle of protection that underlies our whole taxation system. I have criticized the taxation system but all my criticism comes to a focus upon the principle of protection. While other English-speaking countries have been forging ahead and achieving a degree of equity Canada has been lagging behind because its system of taxation has been vitiated by this principle of protection and so long as you have protection as the basis of your taxation system you will never get equity. The protectionist does not want equity because if you get equity you will not get protection. The protectionist who goes out to seek for equitable modes of taxation would rather he did not find them because if he did find them it would spoil the scheme of protection. That is why we have not got an inheritance tax in this federal parliament, that is why we have not got other taxes that would be successful. We do not want an equitable and successful form of taxation in this federal parliament because it would endanger the very existence of protection as a revenue producing instrument. No, protection is the thing that vitiates the whole system from top to bottom. Now, the proof of this, the proof of the influence of protection upon this parliament is to be found in that annual work of art we call the budget. What is the difference between a Conservative and a Liberal budget? It is like the difference between finality and stability. That is not a conundrum, it is a serious question. What is the difference between a Tory budget and a Liberal budget?

11 p.m.

Mr. HOEY: They are both Tory budgets.

Mr. BIRD: The only difference that I have ever discerned between the Liberal budget of last year and the Tory budget of the year before was in the literary style. There is a great deal of difference between the respective styles of the present Minister of Finance and his predecessor. But I do not think that constitutes a sufficiently important difference to perpetuate two parties where one might well do. The difference betwen last year's budget and that of the year before might be expressed in a very small decimal fraction, and I believe that fraction, strange to say, is in favour of our friends to the right. For over fifty years what have we had? We have had a tariff in this country which has not varied more than 2½ per cent any way. Somebody said the other day there was a fatality in that figure. I think there is a fatality in it. For over fifty years this country has been embroiled in a 2 per cent controversy. The people of this country have been agitated, stirred up all these years for that, with all the train of corruption and waste that has gone with it. There is not very much difference I can vouch, between a Liberal and a Tory budget. I am reminded of the feud that existed between the Big-endians and the Little-endians in a mythical country. It began at table one day. One faction said: "Now the big end is the proper end at which to crack an egg." Another faction rose up and said: "No, it is the little end," and from that moment there began a feud that lasted for centuries and that involved millions of innocent people who had no interest in the question whatsoever.

The state of politics in this country for two generations has been like this: When it came to the annual business of opening the purse of the taxpayer, the Conservatives said: "It is the big end." The Liberals said: "No, it is the little end." But when the taxpayer counted up what was left, there was not very much difference; there was not any It was all the same, and it is still the same. There is not any difference, just a difference of words, just a cloud of argument that is meant to go out through the daily newspapers and blind the people of this country to what is going on. There is no difference whatsoever. Two parties, but one policy—that is all there is to it. Do not let us try to see what difference there is between Conservatives and Liberals, because that is not worth the trouble. Assume at once that there is not any difference, and let us get down to business. I had the curiosity to go back a few years in order to see what this purse opening had led to, and I found that, as an actual fact, it is just as easy rifling it from one end as from the other; it does not make any difference. Going back fifty years, I find this astounding fact that the Canadian consumer has paid $2,500,000,000, to help the manufacturers of this country to establish themselves. Those grey-haired boys that refused to grow up have received $2,500,000,000 of the hard-earned money of the people of Canada. That is equal to our present national debt. It is an amount that would lift every mortgage off every farm in Canada, and I believe it would pretty nearly buy every farm in Canada. It would build enough houses to house those people in Canada who find it hard to keep out the frost and the cold, and to be as patrotic as some of the people who represent them in this House. That amount would not only build those houses, but furnish them; It would make them comfortable. The interest on it, in a very short time, in about the length of time that we are discussing this budget, would handsomely complete the Hudson Bay railway. I had to work around to that because of my interest in it.

My criticisms to-night are of this character. I have made some strictures upon the policy of the present Minister of Finance; but those strictures are no indication of my personal feelings towards him, because as one of the younger members of this House, I have a very real admiration for his character, ability and public spirit. But I think the Minister of Finance has put himself in a somewhat ambiguous light before the young and rising generation of this country. I do not think his explanation of the divergence between his policy and the Liberal platform of 1919, will be clearly understood by the young people who are rising up to take their part in the public life of Canada. We have heard much about scraps of paper. I do not think responsible public men and responsible parties ought so easily to go back upon their word as that. After all, moral questions enter into public questions, and it is a serious matter that a traditional party in this country should so lightly, so light-heartedly go back upon a written statement of what its policy should be if it were returned to power in this House.

The Progressive party has no ambitions for power, and a statement of its policy does not look forward to any assumption of power. But the Progressive party believes in itself and its policy, and I think the people can easily see that in the Progressive policy there is nothing inconsistent with running the country economically and efficiently. I do not see that there is any just criticism of the proposals that we have laid down whereby the country can be run without imposing upon the consumers a burden that is hard to bear. The Progressive party does not stand for a financial policy only. That is only the skeleton beneath the flesh so far as we are concerned. It stands for the broad prosperity of Canada; but as I said before, it wants to see that prosperity registered in the actual life of the people. The Progressive party stands for economical adjustment. It does not envy city life and urban life, but it does not want to see the urban dweller getting all the good things of life. We are out for economic readjustment, because we believe after all, that is what touches our life most closely, and we are out for political reform, not as an end in itself, but as a means to an end. We believe that politics are not necessarily evil, but that they are evil only when they are made an end in themselves. We believe if politics are subjugated to the work of readjustment and to keeping adjusted the social and economic relationships of this country, they will purify themselves; they will become serious; they will lose their corruption automatically, just as in our personal life, if you have a consuming purpose, your life is kept stronger and straighter.

And so it will be in political life, if we can only forget the idea that politics is an end in itself. We are out for political reform because we want to see things done, we want to see Canada a happier place; and we are out, let me say, although one hesitates to say it, as men who love their country. We are out as patriots, we hope, but we are out for that kind of patriotism which seeks to inculcate the love of country by making the country a place that one can love. I could take you to place after place in rural Canada which it would require a man of strong imagination to work up any affection for. You cannot build up patriotic Canadians upon that basis. Patriotism is not a vague feeling; it is not altogether founded in the affections. It is a matter of sentiment in regard to real things, things that a child can be trained to love and to have a real affection for. We are out to transform the countryside of Canada and make it a place in which people can live and be contented to live, and which they can grow up to love. I want to say moreover that the Progressives are out for the unity of Canada, and I make bold to say that we have the only basis upon which there can be such unity, that is, the basis of justice as between classes in Canada and as between sections in the community. That is the only real basis upon which there can be any unity. We have no traditional spites and no petty feelings of strife behind us. Our sole stock in trade is what we carry with us, just a straightforward economic policy, that is all. It does not matter what you are religiously, socially or provincially, you are equally welcome into this fellowship, because we do not specialize in any of those things that divide one Canadian from another. The basis on which we work is the basis on which all the people can co-operate.

Just one parting shot at the policy of the Liberal government. I was reading some of the earlier budget speeches of the Minister of Finance, and I discovered that he made his first budget speech on St. George's day and another subsequently on St. Patrick's day. Now I want to make the humble suggestion that he deliver his next budget speech on Holy Innocents' day, because no budget he has yet made has killed any dragons or driven out any serpents, while I am afraid they have taken in quite a lot of innocents.

[Mr. Bird.]

On Motion of Mr. Stewart (Argenteuil) the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Graham the House adjourned at 11.15 p.m.

Wednesday, May 16, 1923

The House met at three o clock.

JOINT COMMITTEE ON LEGISLATION

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That this House do agree to concur in the appointment of a joint committee to consider the following matters;

1. The forms of bills and the best means of affording information and assistance in the consideration thereof at all stages of legislation in both Houses of parliament;

2. The better distribution of the work of legislation between the two Houses;

3. The practical operation of the provisions of the Senate and House of Commons Act, Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, chapter 10, respecting the attendance of senators and members of the House of Commons, and the expediency of making any alterations in those provisions;

And that Messieurs Boivin, Charters, Euler, Hudson and Millar be members of such committee on the part of the House;

That a message be sent to the Senate informing their Honours of the above resolution;

That the Clerk do carry the said message to the Senate.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the unanimous pleasure of the House that the motion be adopted.

Motion agreed to.

RUMOURED RAILWAY APPOINTMENTS —IMMIGRATION

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (West York): There is a newspaper despatch to the effect that Colonel Balfour, formerly an assistant to Sir Henry Thornton in the management of the Great Eastern Railway of England, has arrived in Montreal to assume the duties here of assistant to Sir Henry in the management of the Canadian National Railways. It is also stated that a Mr. A. J. Thomas, who as well was a former assistant to Sir Henry Thornton in England, has come to Montreal to take office here. Will the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) inform the House whether these statements are correct, and, if they are, what Canadians are being displaced?

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways): I have no information in reference to the matter except what I have seen in the press.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will my hon. friend get that information? There is another matter which I desire to bring to the attention of the government. I see, according to the press, that Sir Henry Thornton has made a certain speech on the subject of immigration, in the course of which he declares that four things are absolutely necessary in connection with immigration. The first he gives is a capable Minister of Immigration who will co-ordinate the efforts of the people.

Mr. FIELDING: That is all right.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would ask the Minister of Railways whether Sir Henry Thornton is speaking for the administration and whether any changes are in contemplation.

Mr. GRAHAM: So far as the government is concerned, I can assure my hon friend that there is in office at the head of the Immigration department just the kind of minister that is referred to.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Well, you do not agree with Sir Henry Thornton.

DR. A. M. LOWE

CANADIAN CITIZEN IN NORTHERN CHINA CAPTURED AND MALTREATED

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. LADNER: Have the government received any information regarding a Canadian citizen, Dr. A. M. Lowe, a prominent merchant of Vancouver, and a native of Victoria, British Columbia, who was beaten, bound and made captive in northern China? If they have, do they intend to require an explanation of the Chinese government?

Mr. SPEAKER: This question has already been asked and answered at a previous sitting.

ADULTERATION OF MILL FEEDS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. SUTHERLAND: With reference to the numerous complaints that have been received by the Department of Agriculture regarding the adulteration of mill feeds, will the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) introduce at the present session the contemplated bill which he referred to on 23rd February? Possibly we are nearing the end of the session, and I have not yet seen or heard any intimation that the bill will be brought down.

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture): Speaking for myself, I have not so far decided whether it would be advisable to introduce the bill at the present session. We have had a good many bills of a similar character, multiplying restrictions manifold; and while I am personally willing to put further restrictions upon the people, I am not at all certain that it is advisable to impose them too heavily and too frequently at such short intervals. I am, however, quite willing to be advised by my colleagues and by my hon. friend (Mr. Sutherland) as well with respect to the advisability of introducing the bill at this session. I may observe that I have it all ready.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

EMPIRE DAY ADJOURNMENT

Mr. BOYS: What is the intention of the government with regard to the 24th of May? Is there any thought of adjourning next Wednesday night over the week end?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The government proposes to follow the custom of previous years and observe the 24th of May as a holiday, but I think it would be advisable for the House to sit on Friday.

THE BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from Tuesday, May 15, the debate on the motion of Hon. W. S. Fielding (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Robert Forke.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Argenteuil, Minister of the Interior): Budget pronouncements, Mr. Speaker, are always important in the life of every parliament, and this budget has been no exception. Before proceeding to deal with the budget direct and the matters that I shall refer to briefly this afternoon in connection with it, I desire to say a word or two with respect to the minister (Mr. Fielding) whose duty it has been to prepare the budget and who has just brought down his seventeenth financial statement in the parliament of Canada. It has been my great pleasure, and indeed my good fortune, to have been associated with this hon. gentleman for a period of over one year. It is scarcely necessary for me to say that the relationship has been most pleasant, that I have acquired a great deal of information that I did not formerly possess as to the management of the affairs of government, and that I have learned to respect the opinions of the hon. gentleman whose duty it is to prepare annually a financial statement for the people of Canada. I hope he will continue to bring down our budgets for a very considerable number of years, and I am sure he will always retain the love and respect of all parties in this parliament.

The science of government, Mr. Speaker, is rather a difficult one. To the uninitiated it always appears to be easy. I have no desire to criticize my hon. friends opposite, indeed I have watched with a great deal of interest their efforts to solve our social and financial problems in both the federal and provincial fields. Undoubtedly in those provinces in which they have the responsibilities of government they are finding much more difficulty in their administration than they anticipated. Let me say that I for one would have no objection in the world to seeing my hon. friends of the Progressive party occupying the treasury benches for a term of four or five years in order that they might have an opportunity to put into practice some of the principles which they advocate so zealously in opposition.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman should know what that is like.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): My right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) has had a similar experience, and, frankly, I may say that it does not seem to affect me in the same way as it does him. I wish my hon. friends who may displace me all the success in the world.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the hon. gentleman know anything I promised in opposition that I did not redeem in office? If he does I should like him to give it to the House.

Mr. GRAHAM: Farm implements, I should say.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did that.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): My right hon. friend has had the advantage of having been a member of this House a great deal longer than I. I have never attempted to criticize his administration because I did not come directly in contact with it. But I am speaking of the things whereof I know, and I may say frankly to my right hon. friend that although perhaps on other matters we were never very far apart, on one fundamental issue, I always disagreed with him. He may say that now I have seen the light I am not prepared to go as far as I advocated in former years; but I may inform him that I am still prepared to go all the distance I was always prepared to go when the occasion offers and the time is opportune. But my right hon. friend and his government have made it exceedingly difficult for any administration succeeding them to offer the measure of tariff reduction that I think this country is entitled to and some day must have. What I started to say was that when we have to tackle the job of government, when we are responsible for the budgets to run the country, we have to view everything not from a sectional standpoint but as it may affect our people throughout the length and breadth of the Dominion. That is no new observation, nor do I offer it as such, but I want to deal with our national affairs from that standpoint.

My hon. friend (Mr. Bird) who preceded me last evening intimated that both parties in dealing with public affairs were not just exactly honest with themselves or with the people. Well, if the time ever comes when my hon. friend is entrusted with the responsibilities of office he will find that perhaps he will not be able to be so drastic and so radical in his administration as he expresses himself to be when in opposition. I have no serious criticism to offer my hon. friends except in one or two instances. I know somewhat of the responsibilities of carrying on the war, and therefore I am not finding fault with the tremendous financial burden that has followed from the war. But we have to deal with that burden, it is an everyday problem, and for a population of scarcely nine million people the preparation of a budget to meet the ordinary expenses of administration to the extent of $372,000,000 is rather a serious obligation on any government. Not only that, but if the government is fair to the provinces and to the municipalities it must make that burden as light as possible upon all parties concerned, because we cannot forget that our war obligations entail huge expenditures. I have heard those expenditures criticized on the ground that they were not in every case judicious, that great savings might have been effected. And in reply to my hon. friend (Mr. Forke), the leader of the Progressive party, who cited to us the other day the conditions in England, let me say that during the war there was a vast difference between taxation in Canada and in England, in this way, that in England much heavier taxation was levied to meet war expenditure than was attempted here.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the hon. gentleman give figures to show that? I dispute his statement. I say we paid a larger proportion of our debt than England did.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): My right hon. friend will not deny that taxation so far as incomes and profits were concerned was levied to a much greater extent in England than here.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It was on the moderate incomes, not on the higher, and on profits not so high.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): But my right hon. friend levied little or nothing on profits.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, far more than they did in England.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Not in comparison with the profits that were made. Of course, that is a matter of opinion, but on the whole I think that in England, irrespective of whether it be applied on a per capita basis or generally, a greater proportion of taxation for direct war purposes was levied during the period of the war than ever was attempted in Canada. That, in part, answers some of the criticisms of my hon. friend who leads the Progressive party.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But it is not correct.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I leave my right hon. friend to deal with that if he speaks in this debate. Not only in agriculture, in business and in commercial life, but in every line of activity we had inflation in Canada during the war period. I am not blaming our predecessors in office for that; inflation was prevalent in every country. But some of our problems to-day are resultant from that inflation. My right hon. friends of the Progressive party have laid great stress on the fact that agriculture in this country is in a critical state. I am vitally interested in agriculture, indeed, outside the business of looking after some of the departments of government I have no other interest, and therefore I know something about our agricultural conditions. I do not deny that they are critical, but I do deny that this is the most strenuous period through which our agriculture has passed. In my own experience of less than forty years I have known worse conditions agriculturally than we are going through to-day. The economic condition in Canada is not altogether responsible for all our difficulties; if it were, similar difficulties would not prevail in other countries. I challenge my hon. friends in any part of the House to name any country to-day in which agriculture is in a prosperous condition. It is true that in the United States we have the reverse side of the picture; we cannot say of the United States, as we have to say of Canada, that as a result of the agricultural depression there is depression in industry as well. While the present conditions are bad, we have had other periods just as bad, and I will name one: the period between 1890 and 1896 was characterized by just as much depression in agriculture as exists to-day and that depression was just as severely felt. We recovered from that, however, and made splendid progress in later days.

Now, what is the main difficulty that we have to face to-day as a government? As a result of the war we have to provide a huge annual budget. We have been extravagant in many directions in Canada, and we have not been alone in that respect. The conditions through which we passed induced it and encouraged it. One of the most difficult things to prevent in any country is a condition of inflation, something we fondly call prosperity, a condition that leads to extravagance, large expenditure, and unfortunate speculations that afterwards we must pay for. The war placed a tremendous burden of taxation upon the people. In addition, our provincial governments through force of circumstances, have been extravagant in their expenditures, have in many cases expended beyond the legitimate bounds in many cases. Perhaps the province of Quebec, from which my good friend the Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin) comes, is an exception; they have not gone as far in that direction as the other provinces. Our municipalities, too, have expended beyond legitimate bounds. So that to-day we have the problem of paying the accumulated debts and the borrowings that we made against future prosperity. I do not wish to paint a picture that will indicate lack of hope, or the impossibility of improvement, or the impracticability of our emerging from these difficulties with credit to ourselves. I do not think that states the case at all. Nor do I wish to be classed as an optimist who has no good reason for his optimism.

We have, then a public debt, as the member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) pointed out the other day, amounting to $450 per capita. My hon. friend was more than generous in his estimate of the earning power of the Canadian family of five, which he placed somewhere in the neighbourhood of $3,000 per annum. He stated that each family must make provision for $100 to meet its share of the public debt. That is a very heavy drain. But we have in Canada vast resources which are yet untouched, great areas of cultivable land, valuable mineral districts, large timber properties, pulpwood areas, and so on, all awaiting development. We have a splendid heritage; let us hope that we shall be able, notwithstanding the tremendous burdens that we have undertaken, to emerge successfully from our difficulties.

The situation becomes a serious one from the point of view of taxation. My hon. friends of the Progressive party say that we have not gone far enough in the way of reductions. While the depression began, perhaps, with agriculture, it has spread to other lines of business and has made itself felt there. If my hon. friends had to raise money to meet Canada's obligations and to carry on the public service, they would have to exercise due care with respect to the position in which we find ourselves. And what is that position? As the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) enunciated yesterday, for at least thirty years business and industry have been built up in Canada under a system of protection. The statistics show that the number of businesses operating in Canada have increased in the last ten years from 14,000 to almost 35,000; that the investment has doubled and the number of people employed has more than doubled. Rightly or wrongly, representatives of these various businesses have repeatedly stated that they cannot compete with industries across the line and elsewhere unless they are given reasonable protection.

Mr. MEIGHEN: May I ask a question?

Mr. MARTELL: Will my hon. friend permit a question?

Mr. COOTE: I would ask the minister—

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Who is first?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would ask the minister whether he thinks it was right or wrong that these industries have been built up under a system of protection?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I can answer in one word: I think it was wrong.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why then is my hon. friend starting to build up another by the same system, namely, artificial silks?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I say it was wrong; I believe that industry would have prospered without the extreme protection offered in many cases.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That was not the question.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): My hon. friend says it is out of the question.

[Mr. C. A. Stewart.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, I said that was not the question. But I will leave the first one and take his answer. Will he answer the second now?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): My hon. friend asks me if silks are to be protected—

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, I do not.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): —to the extent of 30 per cent.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, I did not say that. I said if it was wrong—

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I have got my hon. friend's question; will he permit me to answer it? There has opened up in Canada an industry for the manufacture of silk. Let me say to my hon. friend that I have grave doubts whether we need so much protection for the silk industry. But at the same time, unless we are prepared to reduce with one stroke the protection that exists upon silks, then in fairness I think we should let the industry start on the same basis as those already existing.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is the duty my hon. friend is putting on that I am asking about. If it is wrong to encourage industry by protection, why is he starting in now to encourage another?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): My hon. friend, of course, will say that the logical answer for me to make is to reduce both, and then see whether this industry would start or not. He will agree that if it is necessary—and those who are engaged in the industry say that it is necessary—that that industry should have protection at the moment, then in fairness to the man who wishes to start a new industry of a similar or almost identical character some protection should be afforded so long as the government are prepared to leave that protection on. So far as I am concerned, I want to know definitely the reason why it is necessary that so heavy a protection is required for any industry in Canada. But let me go back to my original statement. I do not believe and I have had nothing to convince me, that so heavy a rate of protection is required as is given to many of the industries existent in this country to-day. But it is also true that many industries that have enjoyed protection have built up their business under that system. We find ourselves in peculiar conditions in Canada to-day, depressing conditions not only with regard to agriculture but business as well, and much as I would desire reductions in many lines, particularly on the commodities that enter so much into the lives of our people, reductions that would mean something considerable in the cost of living to the people of Canada, it is not my desire nor is it the desire of this government at this moment to jeopardize any of these industries while they are passing through such a trying period as they are to-day. That I think is a fair answer to my hon. friend.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I see it has some bearing on the first, but what bearing it has on the second beats me. If it is a wrong system, why recommence it with respect to any industry?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I think I have answered my hon. friend's question fairly. I have said on the other hand that I consider the conditions serious, and I think he and any hon. gentlemen who know anything about business conditions in Canada will agree with me that this is a serious time in the business life of Canada. My hon. friend may say that that is the result of a change of government. I have sometimes heard him say that the Liberal party are responsible for a great many misstatements made throughout Canada. Let me say this to him: I do not believe the Liberal party, or the Progressive party, or any other party, was responsibile for his difficulties on 6th December over a year ago. Perhaps he may apply the same remark to me. I have no complaint to offer for the treatment that I received. The people of my province desired that someone else should take the reins of government, and I was quite willing that that should be done. I am watching with a great deal of interest the results of the new order of things in my province. I am also watching with a great deal of interest the effect of the new order of things in the province of Manitoba. I do not say that in any critical spirit, but with the hope that perhaps they may be able to give a better brand of government than we were able to give in the past.

With regard to the condition of industry in Canada, I do not think the government would have been warranted in going a great deal further in the way of reductions than they have gone in the budget brought down to parliament on this occasion. I have no doubt that we shall be criticized, in fact, we have been criticized already, because we did not go a great deal further in making reductions. While I believe that the tariff plays a very important part in the lives of the people of Canada and in the economic condition of our country, I do not believe that it is entirely responsible for all our difficulties. Sometimes we turn our eyes away deliberately from the real facts. In many cases we are forgetful that inflation is responsible for a large part of our difficulties. We are forgetful that the drought in western Canada is also responsible for a fairly large amount of our difficulties, forgetful, too, of many other things that have contributed to the present condition. We are forgetful of extravagance, for instance. We must get away from that because I see in the future the strongest kind of competition coming from every part of the world. Our transportation systems have made competitors of all our neighbours, whether they be near or far. Furthermore, and here I think my right hon. friend will agree with me because I have heard him make the statement repeatedly almost every country in the world has been increasing its protective duties. That makes it incumbent on those who are charged with the responsibility of government to go somewhat slowly in the direction of reductions, but as a member of this government I want to say this: We are going in that direction, slow though my Progressive friends may think our progress. They may say that it does not amount to anything. Well, if that is the case, it should be a grain of comfort for the protectionists. Our Progressive friends may attack us on the ground that we are not going far enough, but I say to them that if they had upon their shoulders the responsibility of office at a time like this they would consider very seriously before making further reductions. I hope that in the very near future, however, it will be possible without injury to business to make reasonable reductions in the customs tariff of Canada. While perhaps I am not thoroughly convinced that more reductions could not have been made, I for one believe that we have gone as far as we reasonably could have been expected to go at this particular time, bearing in mind the conditions prevalent in Canada.

I want to associate myself with the statement of the hon. Minister of Agriculture yesterday that he did not understand that the statement made by the Minister of Finance on the tariff was a finality. I did not so understand it, nor do I think the Minister of Finance meant to convey that idea. If my hon. friend were sitting where the Finance Minister sits and were being daily interviewed by business as well as agricultural interests throughout Canada, and listened to the varied cases presented, I think that they would say with all the information before them that the Finance Minister had gone as far as he thought it was safe for him to go at this particular time.

I want to deal for a moment or two with the question of immigration. My hon. friend the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) was anxious to know when there would be a change in this particular department. Well, I have made some statement with respect to that. I have the responsibility of quite a number of departments, and I would not worry a very great deal should my leader decide at any moment to make changes. Just let me cover the situation as it exists so far as immigration to this country is concerned. Hon. gentlemen opposite say that it is unwise to place people upon the land in Canada. I argued some weeks ago in this parliament that there was a vast difference between the man who came here with a respectable amount of money and settled on the land, a man without any encumbrances hanging around his neck, and the individual who had accumulated a great deal of debt had taken upon himself large obligations for its repayment. If the man of that first class I mentioned is properly located, I said then and I still think, he will have a fair chance for success. I do not anticipate that there will be a very great difference between the price of the commodities that he must purchase for use in his business and the selling price of the products of his farm. Of course, as the Minister of Agriculture pointed out, the price of most of his products is regulated by conditions in the markets of the world, while the prices of the commodities that he uses are usually regulated by conditions at home. That situation will continue, but I still think that in the reorganization and readjustment of business, in the readjustment of labour that must take place, freight rates will play a very important part in the matter of cost and they are bound to play a much more important part in the future. A reduction of freight rates will count fully as much, in my opinion, as even a drastic reduction in the customs tariff to-day in the lives of the people of Canada. What my hon. friend pointed out yesterday certainly could be done and if followed up by a reasonable reduction in the customs tariff the things hoped for will come about. They undoubtedly will come about if the statements of my hon. friends opposite are to be taken at par as to what they propose to do in the future, and also what may be expected in a reasonable way from this government if we remain in office.

Mr. HANSON: I agree with what the minister has said as to the effect of a drastic reduction in the freight rates. May I ask him what efforts this government are making at this time to bring about that desirable condition of affairs?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): If it is true, and I am accepting the statement as true, that the increased cost of labour to the railways represents more than 60 per cent of the advance in the cost of operation, and that there has only been so far a reduction of less than 20 per cent in that cost—I am speaking now of a government owned institution where there are no profits going to the investment but rather a loss incurred—it will come about in a reduction of labour costs. Let me ask my hon. friend, does he think that the government of Canada, or any other government, can regulate the cost of labour upon railways or upon anything else? I do not think they can, nor do I think they would be warranted in trying to do it. These things will adjust themselves, they will be bound to do so. I have been accused in Canada of preaching deflation, but I have no thought that living conditions will be worse for labour even if a further reduction is made in the cost of labour on our railways and in other lines of activity. But that reduction will undoubedly come. One of the reasons why it has not come earlier is, perhaps, that in the country to the south of us there is an inflation which is probably unprecedented in the history of the United States. That will undoubtedly go on for a time. But it is causing considerable uneasiness in Canada because it is attracting many of our best citizens from the Dominion. However, I hope and predict that they will come back to us when the period of inflation in the United States comes to an end.

Dealing with immigration let me say this. Take the statement, if it were made, and I do not believe in newspaper statements on all occasions, that we need co-ordination in immigration work, well, with respect to that let me enumerate some of the things that I have been endeavouring to do, very imperfectly perhaps, possibly it may be said that I have made a very serious failure; but I do not believe that the government of Canada would be warranted in borrowing large sums of money to attract people to Canada and through the medium of loans placing them on the land; I believe they should be attracted in a legitimate way. I believe somewhat with my Progressive friends that the best immigration agent you can have is a happy and contented settler; and with that thought in mind and keeping it constantly before me, I have endeavoured to so arrange conditions that the settler will write back to the country from which he came advising other people to come and settle in Canada. I do not think anyone will quarrel with me about that. But certainly you could not invite labour to come to Canada when, as last winter, you had unemployment in every city in the Dominion, when various Canadian cities were telegraphing us to know what we were prepared to do in conjunction with the municipalities for the relief of unemployment. I think you will agree with me that it would not have been wise, in view of the conditions which then prevailed to invite immigration of that character. Therefore we set about co-ordinating the activities of the transportation companies and our own activities in Great Britain and on the Continent for the purpose of bringing to Canada people whom we thought we could assimilate, and they are coming forward to a much larger degree than they were one year ago. Our port reports for the past three months indicate a one hundred per cent increase over last year. We have not as large an influx from the United States as we had a year ago, but probably it will come later. Let me say to my hon. friends opposite, and especially to those who are agriculturists, that while conditions are bad in Canada all they have to do is to cross the line and they will find out that agricultural conditions are even worse in the United States where they are having, as I pointed out, perhaps the greatest expansion in a business way in their history. Now, that does not tend to make it easy to attract settlers from that country.

Mr. KELLNER: Does the minister claim that agricultural prices are lower in the United States than in Canada?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No, not in every case but freight rates are higher. The price of wheat and commodities of that character are somewhat higher. These prices always have been higher although they vary very considerably in a period of years.

There are other conditions, conditions of taxation, that my hon. friends opposite complain very much about. There is, for example, inflated land values that agriculturists in the United States have to contend with but which are not found in Canada, and for that reason the higher prices there are more than offset. Let me say to my hon. friends—for I am getting authentic reports from the United States as to the conditions over there—that I can give statement after statement of individuals who, if they were able to liquidate the properties they hold in the United States at a reasonable sum, would be willing to emigrate to Canada at once and who will do so as soon as they conveniently can. So that the prospect for immigration seems to be reasonably reassuring. No matter what may be done in the future in respect to immigration I do not for one moment believe that it is necessary for this country to embark upon a scheme that will involve the borrowing of huge sums of money for the placing of people on the land. I agree very much with my hon. friends opposite that it is better to make the settlers we have happy and contented if that is possible. However, it will not be possible for a few years until they have recovered from the serious depression through which they have passed and the obligations which they undertook during that time.

I have tried to point out in a very brief way some of the difficulties that we must encounter in raising the revenue in an equitable manner. The one complaint made by hon. gentlemen opposite is that the budget is not equitable in its character. It is complained that the duties do not bear heavily enough upon luxuries and that commodities in general use in Canada are too heavily taxed. But the point must be borne in mind that we have in this country no large class of rich people in comparison to the population; that most of the business of the country is carried on very largely by the savings of the people; that most of the deposits in our banks do not represent the money of the wealthy but are rather the accumulation of the saving of the middle-class people. An hon. gentleman who spoke yesterday referred to the taxes as bearing too heavily upon the consumer. Well, I presume we are all consumers in that respect. I made the statement once in the province of Alberta, in dealing with this question, that if we are to succeed in paying the public debt of Canada every individual in the country will be required to contribute to the public revenue according to his ability. There can be no question about that, and if it is inequitable, then I would like to sit down with hon. members and consider wherein changes can be made, because I think that in a country like Canada you cannot go to the extreme in taxing capital, as has been advocated by some hon. members. I am very much interested in the experiment of public ownership, but our hope for the future depends upon the development of our natural resources, and the individual who has not capital cannot develop these resources. While we are bringing people to Canada for the purpose of labour in Canada, and offering them an opportunity in that line, we must bear in mind that it is desirable to attract to Canada capital in a very large way, for the development of these resources. You cannot start a new industry upon labour alone, you must have capital to develop it. If there is need for assistance it is in the earlier stages of development, and if an industry cannot exist after being assisted in the early stages, it should go out of business.

But, hand in hand with the development of Canada we must have the importation into Canada of people and capital as well. The mineral resources of Canada alone will pay the debt of Canada a thousand fold, if properly developed and preserved for the people. Some complaint has been made that we are not conserving as we should the mineral wealth of the country. I have given considerable thought to this matter, and I ask, what have we done in the development of oil alone?—that, perhaps, is a concrete case which might apply to all developments. We have not taken the public funds for the purpose of developing oil, but my hon. friend who preceded me will agree with me that we have made it as easy as possible for capital to come in and start the development work in the search for oil; and if it is discovered, I think the public, after all, are entitled to a fair share of the profit. So far as coal production in Canada is concerned, the provinces that lease their natural resources are taking a toll on coal production—perhaps we should take more. In the case of the timber we are doing the very same thing. The day has long since passed when governments were in the habit of handing out to private individuals the natural resources belonging to the people —where I think they properly belong—and permitting them to be exploited in the interests of private individuals. The hon. member also said that the inheritance tax should be increased.

Mr. BIRD: Does the minister think it is a good thing for the people of Canada that we should fail to balance our budget year by year?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I agree with the hon. member that it would be good business to balance our budget year by year, but would it be good business to undertake to pay off in one or two or three years the railway debt of Canada? I think the hon. member will agree with me that it would not. I do not think we should transfer to posterity any more than is absolutely necessary, but I think my hon. friend should bear in mind the fact that we have a unique condition in Canada, and that we should make taxation as light as possible, having in mind, of course, the fact that we should not delay too long the repayment of the public debt. I think it is advisable not to tax too heavily at the moment. If the proposition I submitted a moment ago had been followed in the earlier stages, there would have been no difficulty about being able to tax sufficiently to pay all the running expenses of Canada, but under the railway conditions that exist to-day—because we are collecting more than enough for ordinary expenses—I doubt the advisability of attempting to clear off by taxation the rising deficits that have occurred the past year or two. We hope conditions will improve and that it will be possible in a year or two to make revenue and expenditure balance each year, and that we shall not carry to posterity an increased public debt.

4 p.m.

Mr. KELLNER: Will the minister tell me how he anticipates that the people are going to be benefited by having coal and oil mergers developed in Alberta?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The people will undoubtedly profit by the royalties collected. The Alberta government are collecting a tax of ten cents a ton on coal. Perhaps the people are entitled to more from that commodity; however, that is the tax they have decided to impose, that is what they think fair and reasonable when they allow private individuals to do the development work and carry on the industry. I think that is as it should be. I do not believe we should go entirely into the business of public ownership in connection with all our public utilities and public resources, but we should preserve for the people what they are entitled to from the vast wealth in these resources. I think on the whole the provinces are attending to that feature pretty well.

I have tried to show, Mr. Speaker, that under the circumstances we have made an honest effort to cut down wherever possible in the customs tariff. Looking to the future when business conditions are different, perhaps greater reductions can be made. But whoever happens to be Minister of Finance, charged with the responsibility of levying taxation, will always have to bear in mind the conditions of the moment, and not the conditions of the future. Because, unless we increase very rapidly in population—and I hope we shall—and unless our railways begin to produce balances on the right side of the ledger, then the present conditions are bound to recur. I think that the spirit of recklessness that was abroad, has passed away, and that the people realize that due caution must be exercised in the preparation of our budget.

My hon. friends opposite have seen fit to move an amendment, and I have no particular quarrel with their doing so. But in that connection I wish to say something which I intended to say a moment ago with respect to the income tax. I am not altogether satisfied with the income tax as it is constituted. The one man who pays to the utmost limit, who has no escape from the income tax, is the salaried man and, perhaps, he contributes more in that regard than any other individual. On the other hand, I think my hon. friends will find, if they examine the matter carefully, that the income tax hits fairly heavily the man who has a respectable income from all sources, no matter how large it may be, and that he contributes, according to the money he has a pretty respectable proportion, as things go, in the way of taxation. I may say that one hope for the future in Canada is that we have not yet adopted a direct land tax. In the provinces this has been done in a very moderate way. But it leaves an opportunity for the lands of Canada to be developed, and for a livelihood to be obtained from them; and for the next decade or two agricultural conditions will be the barometer by which business and other conditions will be judged in Canada; that is bound to be the fact. That being the case, I think we should leave that field of taxation entirely in the hands of the provinces and the municipalities themselves, for they will need all that the land can stand in the way of taxation for the carrying on of their own affairs.

With regard to the inheritance tax I want to say just a word or two. For years I have had not only a desire but a hope that a very great increase in the inheritance tax might be placed upon estates by the provinces themselves. I know that the statement is made that you cannot collect this tax. Let me assure the House that there is no desire on the part of the federal government at this time to invade this field. I do think, however, there should be as little restriction as possible on the opportunity of a man to make wealth But if he has enjoyed prosperity and has accumulated vast wealth, then there is no reason whatever why the province in which he has acquired it should not in a much larger way than has been the case in the past take for its own benefit, particularly for educational purposes, a greater inheritance tax. But that is outside the field of federal taxation, and I make this statement merely in answer to my hon. friend, with whom I agree entirely.

Mr. HOEY: Would it not be far more equitable for the Dominion to impose the tax and split it fifty-fifty with the province? If the province imposed a heavy tax a man might leave shortly before he died, settle in some other province, and so avoid paying his share of taxation to the province in which he had made his wealth.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I must leave that to the Minister of Finance. I brought up the matter simply because it was mentioned in the discussion yesterday and because I agree most heartily in the principle, no matter how the tax may be imposed. I have heard the statement made that it would be impossible to collect the tax if you went beyond a certain point, and the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) pointed that out in connection with the cigarette tax the other day. It is possible, in connection with many of the taxes, that if we went too far we might fail of our object; and in this particular case, if we exceeded a certain limit it is not improbable that the distribution of the estate might be made before the tax could be collected. At best, taxes are bound to be heavy on the Canadian people, although I am hopeful for the future, judging by the experience of the past: and looking back over a period of twenty years, I think that Canada, irrespective of what particular government has been in office at any time, can congratulate herself on her progress. In all lines of endeavour huge strides have been made. It has been said that in Ontario particularly, agriculture is lagging and indeed is dying out. The statistics do not show that. They do show, it is true that there are fewer people on the land; but they reveal as well the fact that one individual on the land to-day, with modern and improved machinery and equipment, can produce very much more than five or six persons could twenty-five years ago. And that is being demonstrated. Manufacturing industry and agriculture in Canada are running about equal. I do not think that is necessary. I believe that agriculture should lead in a very large way, and I am prepared as one member of this government, so long as I have responsibility as a minister, to assist in every way possible, and to encourage legislation that will in every respect assist, this industry and promote its interests. After all, agriculture is the basic industry upon which the wealth and the prosperity of Canada is built. While I say that, however, let me make it clear that I have no desire to interfere with business or industry, believing that it should be encouraged in every way and that industry should be enabled to establish itself, and believing that in every legitimate way it should be fostered. Our aim should be to have industry and agriculture progress in Canada in order that we may have a well balanced condition of affairs. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have tried to cover as briefly as I could a few of the criticisms that have been offered in this debate, and I commend to the good judgment of the House the budget which has been brought down this year by the Minister of Finance.

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (East York): In rising to contribute a few remarks to the debate on this budget, to which we have been giving so much consideration, I want to request the Minister of Finance to listen, if he will, to two or three words. First of all, let me congratulate the hon. gentleman on the vigour and energy he has shown in presenting to parliament his seventeenth budget. At this session, particularly when he has to consider a review of the Bank Act, I am sure that the Minister of Finance will receive the greatest sympathy of hon. members in all corners of the House. But I do not think that his colleagues on this account can be relieved of responsibility for the consequences of the budget which the minister has brought down. It is my earnest wish that the minister may be spared a good many years to serve this fair Dominion, not in his present capacity, but on this side of the House. I say that advisedly, because in looking through the budget debates of previous years I find that that hon. gentleman on former occasions has been a very able critic. In fact, Mr. Speaker, I believe that if we were to take some of the criticisms of the present Minister of Finance, of budgets brought down in years that have passed, and if we were to submit those criticisms in toto from this corner of the House, we might feel that we had done justice to the present debate. In confirmation of this assertion I am going to ask hon. members to listen while I read a few words that fell from the lips of the minister as member for Shelburne and Queens. In 1920, the minister is reported at page 2,509 of Hansard as follows:

> The Minister of Finance to-day gave us some tariff changes which we shall be better able to understand when we read them in detail in Hansard. Let me say, however, that I am sure there must be deep disappointment on the part of a great many members of the House who were, or are, supporters of the government, to find that the tariff reform which they are getting—if you call it tariff reform—is of such a moderate character. We must not forget that the government have for the last two years been, shall I say, coquetting with this tariff question, jollying their friends along and promising that something was going to be done. If I might use a quotation:
> "They promise, prepare, propose, postpone
> And end by letting things alone."

Mr. FIELDING: Hear, hear.

Mr. HARRIS: Well, Mr. Speaker, I think that that little quotation, even if I went no further, would exactly describe the position to-day. But I should be remiss in my duty if I did not indicate a few things which I feel are worrying, to a great degree, the people of the Dominion at this time. Before generalising in regard to conditions I want to refer first of all to some of the irritating forms of taxation which it has been deemed necessary to put on the statute books, not only of the Dominion House, but also of the provinces and of the municipalities during the past decade. The one I have particularly in mind is the sales tax. I remember that in 1915 or 1916, when it was first proposed, the people in the part of the country from which I come were told that it was necessary not only for agriculturists and manufacturers but even for individuals to re-arrange their budgets and cut down overhead expenses, to pay the cost of carrying on the government of the country. I submit that in a large measure the sales tax of one and two per cent as first instituted was absorbed by the manufacturer or wholesaler, so that in the final analysis the ordinary people were not paying more for their goods. But we were not content to rest there, we continued to increase the tax until now it is as high as 6 per cent. Even when it was placed at 4½ per cent we found the higher it was raised the more it was passed on from one person to the other, until to-day, the consumer is paying the sales tax in its entirety. That is what I find fault with in part.

There is another point in the same connection in contrasting the sales tax as imposed under the old regime with that which is now proposed by the Minister of Finance. Formerly goods imported from other countries were subject to a sales tax of 6 per cent, made up of 2¼ and 3¾ per cent; whereas goods manufactured in this country were only carrying a sales tax of 4½ or 2½ per cent as the case might be. Right away I suppose some hon. gentlemen will be inclined to say: There is another form of protection given to the Canadian manufacturer. But that was not the case. Briefly, it worked out in this way. For instance, take as a concrete example a purchasing agent setting out to buy goods in this country. He went to the various manufacturers and wholesalers for quotations, and perhaps obtained other quotations from abroad. But he always bore in mind that he would have to pay a sales tax of 6 per cent on any goods he imported. What was the result in the majority of cases? It was simply this—it tended to encourage our people to buy goods direct from our own manufacturers rather than from some wholesaler, who had in turn bought from a jobber, who had in turn bought from the manufacturer's agent and who in turn had bought from the manufacturer himself. The proposed amendment will leave room for a large number of such middlemen to again find a vocation. This was discouraged under the provisions of the old Special War Revenue Act, for the reason that immediately the manufacturer sold to the manufacturer's agent, and he in turn to the jobber, and he in turn to the wholesaler, each found it necessary to pyramid —if I may use that expression—the cost of the goods. But the purchasing agent realized that and he was wise enough to buy direct from the source of production. In that way since the inception of the tax under the government which is now represented by this quarter of the House the purchasing agent stepped over all these intermediate men and dealt direct with the manufacturer. This proposed amendment discourages these direct transactions with the manufacturer and will give rise to an increase in a class of people who are not necessary—the middlemen. They should be kept down to a minimum. Large numbers of people live on others' mistakes, and this classe of middlemen in particular will live on the mistakes of this government. I submit that we have quite sufficient middlemen in the community already. Of course, there is room for a few ministers of the Gospel, there is room perhaps for a few lawyers, there is room also for a few undertakers, but there is not room for more of the class of people who want to live on other people's mistakes.

Perhaps I would be remiss in my duty if I did not notice some of the remarks which fell from the lips of the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart). It was interesting to see him on the horns of a dilemma, to hear his declaration of whether we are free trade or protectionist. But he has been on the horns of that dilemma before, and perhaps he has already endured sufficient criticism for this session. When he rose to defend the government he took refuge in like manner as the Minister of Finance did when introducing his budget, he said: It is easy enough for those who have no responsibility to rise in their place and say that we should balance our budget. He added: Of course, we can do that by taxing the people. But, Sir, in my humble opinion he missed one particular feature which should be voiced more and more on the floor of this House, and that is the cutting down of the cost of civil government. The hon. Minister of the Interior said that he had one vocation outside of filling the Treasury bench—that he was a farmer. I ask him: In his private operations did he not find it necessary during the last four or five years to retrench until it hurt in order to balance his own budget? I say to him: Now you have come into power—you are over there and we are over here—and we propose to criticize you in good spirit. We feel that you are not doing right by the people when you do not bring down the cost of civil government to the point where you can eventually balance the budget. It can be done. You, or at least your supporters, told us on your election platforms from Halifax to Vancouver that this balancing can be done by rigid economy. I am not going to suggest that it should be done by slashing the salaries of our civil servants, for no doubt there are lots of branches in which our employees are not now sufficiently paid. But we see every day around many of the buildings in this fair city of Ottawa one department overlapping another; we see—to take the lowest stage—doorkeepers and other unnecessary people waiting on us hand and foot; we see statistical and other information from one department conveyed to us by another department. In a word, throughout all our government institutions there is too much overlapping. It should be cut out. The people who stumped this country from Halifax to Vancouver in the last general election in support of the party now in office all pointed out how economies could be effected and promised drastic retrenchment if the Liberal party was returned to power. Now I want to see some results.

The ship of state, under the direction of our friends opposite, is drifting. It is manned —I hesitate to use the expression which runs in my mind, but I am going to let it go: the ship of state is manned by a bunch—I hope the Speaker will call me to order if I go too far—of men who are really like a lot of sailors. You know the kind I mean; I do not need to tell you. The Liberal party are drifting, drifting, on to the rocks of destruction. I sincerely trust that they will wake up to their responsibility and see to it that they balance their budget. The Minister of the Interior spoke in the House this afternoon; what relation has his immigration policy to the budget? In other words, what has the budget done to help him out of the predicament in which he now finds himself? Is there anything in the budget that can be held up to prospective settlers? Is there anything in the record of this government during the last fifteen months which will make the people of other countries say: "That will be a good place for me to settle, a good place for me to bring up my boys and girls?" Is there anything in the budget, anything in the record of the present government, to encourage people to come to our shores? It is time we rose to our responsibilities; it is time we had a little bit of statesmanship here. Let us bring governmental institutions to the same business-like basis as that upon which ordinary business institutions are run, and in the end we will solve many of the problems which at present face the people.

There is one other paragraph in the budget to which I should refer if I am not to be remiss in my duty to the good old Conservative party—tariff stability. I congratulate not only the Minister of Finance but the Liberal party as a whole in coming to an acknowledgement of the absolute necessity of tariff stability. I expected to see with one accord the whole party to my left rise to their feet, but perhaps they will do it with a vengeance when they once get started. It is quite easy to criticize the protective principle; those who have not reviewed the conditions prevailing in Canada from Halifax to Vancouver are wont to agree with many of the policies enunciated by people who are desirous of having in this country a certain amount of free trade. When I think of free trade I am reminded of an industry that I have observed for quite a number of years. It happens to be located in the heart of the riding represented by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). We have there an industry which is indigenous to this country, its raw material being drawn from our own natural resources. It comes under paragraph 9 of the tariff schedule, wood and woodenware products. I am going to give a reason why I feel that it is necessary to have a reasonable tariff as applied to many industries of that nature. These people manufacture such things as clothes-pins, wash-tubs, patent pails and rolling-pins. We have in Canada at present but nine millions of people. The raw material for the things these people manufacture—and I have mentioned only about four of them—is capable of being manufactured into a great number of other lines of goods. If we had a population close to this industry which would absorb the whole output of any one of these articles being the sole product of industry, the whole attention of that manufacturing plant could be concentrated on that one article, and it would not be necessary, perhaps, to have a tariff against similar goods entering Canada. Take any one article you wish—the rolling-pin, for instance. There are more Mrs. Jiggs' in England and the United States than there are in Canada. But take rolling-pins; if that factory were able to do nothing else but work three eight-hour shifts a day in the manufacture of rolling-pins alone, and if there was a market for the product close to the factory which would absorb all the rolling-pins turned out, then it would not be necessary to have protection against that article. I am not going to dwell on that, because twenty or thirty per cent of the material in the Library of parliament deals pro and con, not with tariff stability, perhaps but with tariffs in general.

I am sorry to note in the budget speech the paragraph that has to do with reciprocity. The people of Canada gave notice to the governments of Canada that they did not want to put themselves in the position—oh, I was going to use the expression, of beggars waiting for crumbs in the way of reciprocity to drop from the industrial table of Uncle Sam. It is well known to the powers that be in the United States that we have a Liberal party here which is pledged to reciprocity. Why make the people of Canada feel badly in the thought that they have on record in black and white, embodied in this budget, a request—to my mind, and I am speaking for myself, a begging request—that Uncle Sam should drop a few crumbs of reciprocity from his industrial table? If he should do so, he would only give us something from which he would receive the majority of the benefit; otherwise he would not give it. I submit in all sincerity that it is bad business. It will not be good for the young people of Canada to feel that we lower ourselves—I hesitate to use that expression; but to feel that we put ourselves in a begging position so far as Uncle Sam is concerned.

I must hurry on, Mr. Speaker, because I do not want to take up too much time. I have some sympathy for the view expressed by the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. McBride) who has suggested on a number of occasions that twenty minutes is sufficient for the average speech. At that rate I have about one minute to go.

A great many committees of the House are sitting at the present and are doing a lot of good work. They are accumulating a great deal of useful information, and I am going to refer to one item of information I gathered from one of these committees on Thursday last. It has to do with a subject which I am sure is of vital interest to every citizen of Canada, of particular interest to my hon. friends to my left who come from the prairie provinces, as well as to the hon. members for Quebec city. It has to do with cattle shipped from Winnipeg to the port of Quebec for export to Glasgow and Liverpool. Anyone who has sat in the Railway Committee room and looked at the map hanging there, instead of perhaps listening to the orations that have been delivered from day to day, must have been impressed with the shortness of the route from Winnipeg to the port of Quebec and with the possibility of our taking a great deal of the products of our western provinces over the Canadian National down to Quebec, and from Quebec to the markets of the world. It impressed me that way as I sat in the Railway Committee room some two or three weeks ago. I recognize, and we all know, that the transcontinental railway now known as the Canadian National Railway is a white elephant on the hands of the people of Canada. But we are Canadians, and we can rise to the occasion and take hold of that expensive organization that is on our hands now and use it to the best advantage, and here is one opportunity in my humble opinion for us to make use of it. The rail haul via the Canadian Pacific from Winnipeg to Montreal is 62 miles longer than the Canadian National route from Winnipeg to Quebec city. The grade over the Canadian Pacific to Montreal is much harder—I use that word for want of a better term—than the Canadian National grade from Winnipeg to Quebec. Why not, then, ship the 60,000 cattle, which we expect to ship to the Old Country in the next open season, over the Canadian National to Quebec city, and from there to the markets of the world? I merely bring this point up on the floor of the House, not because I hold any brief for the city of Quebec or for our western friends; and I hold absolutely no brief for the cattle industry of this country. I suppose you would expect me to be a little narrow and sectional and think only of Ontario or perhaps one of the Yorks where I come from, but I feel that in short-circuiting Toronto and Montreal in this way we would be doing something of benefit to the country as a whole.

I want to enlarge on that for a moment if I may. There is also some 18 hours shorter travel for cattle going over the Canadian National route to the port of Quebec. There is also that 24 hours' delay avoided going down the river from Montreal to Quebec. What is needed now is a recommendation perhaps from the Agricultural Conditions committee or from some department of this government that the shipping interests shall give the same privileges to the port of Quebec, so far as shipping space and facilities are concerned, as are given to Montreal, and to see to it that perhaps some of the boats of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine—I know some of them were used in 1921—be diverted to take care of this particular traffic, and more particularly to see that no influence emanating from the city of Montreal shall in any way interfere with this flow of trade on that railway—that great white elephant which we still have on our hands. Any remarks I might make in regard to the cattle industry will in my humble opinion apply in the same degree to other products from the western provinces, such as flour, which may flow to the markets of the world.

In view of the fact that I have said this much for the province of Quebec and for our friends from the West, I want to ask their indulgence for a moment while I say something which more particularly concerns the people of Ontario and our western friends, but which in my humble opinion concerns also the whole Dominion of Canada, and that is the canalization of the St. Lawrence river.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. HARRIS: Someone says, "hear, hear." I do not bring this matter up with the idea of saying that to-day or to-morrow we should immediately go on with the canalization of the St. Lawrence river; but what I do say is that when the Prime Minister of this country receives a message from the United States of America asking his consideration of this great project, the people of Canada should have the benefit of a good and fair debate on the pros and cons of the issue as it was submitted to the First Minister. They should have that debate, so that public opinion could be roused throughout the whole Dominion of Canada, and when that public opinion was sufficiently roused and sufficiently instructed as to the pros and cons and the wisdom of going on with this great piece of engineering work we would be in a position to act on that public opinion. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that it would be in the interests of Canada if some of the academic questions which have been discussed on the floor of this House, such as the single transferable vote, proportional representation, and things of that kind, which do not matter to the same degree as such projects as the canalization of the St. Lawrence, should be put to one side in favour of bigger issues.

An hon. MEMBER: Louder.

Mr. HARRIS: Somebody says "louder." Mr. Speaker, the hon. Minister of Agriculture in his oration last night, in his monthly instalment of amusement given to this House, mentioned something about the crack of doom. Now I have always been taught to believe that when the crack of doom is heard an angel shall descend from heaven, and placing one foot on the sea and one foot on dry land, shall proclaim to the people of the earth that earth shall be no more. Mr. Speaker, when that day cometh, I imagine that the hon. member who said "louder"—I do not know who it was, but I think it was the hon. member for Colchester (Mr. Putnam)—will probably rise in his place and say, "Louder! louder!"

Mr. PUTNAM: I want to assure the hon. gentleman that I was able to hear him distinctly, and made no such request.

Mr. HARRIS: I most humbly beg the hon. gentleman's pardon, but I heard the word drift across from some quarter of the House and naturally thought it came from over there. Was it the hon. gentleman who wears the hat (Mr. Leger)? Perhaps he comes from some part of the country where the sea joins the dry land and will therefore be quite close at hand to receive the message of the angel on descending.

When I was interrupted, Mr. Speaker, I was dwelling on a subject which is close to my heart, and that is the canalization of the St. Lawrence river. At the present time we have, as all know, the Welland canal nearing completion, and there is an absolute necessity of reducing the cost of bringing the products of the western farmer to the ocean and to the markets of the world. The cost of getting the grain out of that western country absolutely must be cut down, and if it can be shown to the people of this country that the potential wealth of electrical energy to be developed from the St. Lawrence waterway will be quite sufficient to pay the cost of that whole development and not saddle the people of this country with any extra cost, then I submit that all arguments pro and con should be submitted and public opinion and enthusiasm be roused. It is questions of this sort that should be given consideration by the people of this country. I do not need to dwell further on the subject. All hon. members know the magnitude of that fall and flow of water down the St. Lawrence, and can imagine the millions of horse-power that could be developed and the vast possibilities to follow. I do not want to appear as a dreamer, but I ask the earnest consideration of this House for projects of this kind rather than academic questions.

Before resuming my seat I would like to say something with regard to two or three expressions of opinion I heard in this chamber. One of those expressions emanated from the Progressive side of the House. I did not discover who uttered it but hon. gentlemen will remember the remark was something like this: "The breezes are blowing in the mulberry trees". The speaker seemed to have in mind the idea that part of this country should belong to the United States. He said: "The breezes are blowing in the mulberry trees. How long will it be before these breezes shall turn into a hurricane and sweep these western provinces from us"? Mr. Speaker, that is a wrong attitude, in my humble opinion, to take with respect to the issues in this country. The greatest feat of statesmanship to be accomplished, I think, during the next decade, will be to keep Ontario and Quebec united with the western prairies separated as the eastern provinces are from the West by a thousand mile gap. We in Ontario, and I can speak for the hundred thousand people that I represent, are ready to stand to a man with the rest of the country in repelling onslaughts upon the Dominion such as were hinted at in the remarks referred to. There was also a sort of doubt cast by an hon. member from Quebec, the other day, in speaking about Great Britain, as to whether or not this country really belongs to the British Empire. I do not want to indulge in any flag waving because I did no soldiering myself during the Great War, but let me say to the hon. gentleman in question, one of the gallant men who fought in the period from 1914 to 1918, that the British Empire, in my opinion, has been the greatest agency for good in the whole wide world.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. HARRIS: I do not want any applause for that, it may seem too much like a recognition of flag waving, but I wish to say that it is absolutely imperative that we stand shoulder to shoulder in defending this great country of ours from all assaults, let them be from within or from without, and to preserve it intact in the interests of the civilization of mankind

As far as the budget is concerned I shall say nothing more than to apply to the action of the government the words quoted in this House by the Minister of Finance on a previous occasion:

> They promise, prepare, propose, postpone
> And end by letting things alone.

Mr. D. F. KELLNER (East Edmonton): Not being possessed of a voice like that of the hon. member for East York (Mr. Harris) I have moved from my customary seat to a position near the centre of the chamber. Like other hon. members who have spoken I would like to commend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) for the manner in which he presented the budget to the House. I understand that previous budgets have received considerable commendation because of the manner of their presentation and I think it would be entirely unfitting if we did not extend the same courtesy to the Minister of Finance on the present occasion. There is one point about the budget which seems to be causing a little confusion. That is as to what is meant by "stability." I would like to be possessed of the same powers of oratory as the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat in order to be able to tell you what, in my opinion, this term means. I think that in the West it means "low tariff"; in the East it stands for "protection"; at any rate that is what this term has usually meant in the past and no doubt the same definition will continue to be applied to it.

I discovered in a western paper a characterization of the budget which perhaps, describes it more correctly than I could do. With the permission of the House I will read that article. It says:

> Upon the receipt of Mr. Fielding's budget in lake Winnipeg there was tremendous excitement and enthusiasm among the fish. A flounder dashed in with the great news—"the duty on machines for making fish meal had been abolished." A mud fish refused to believe it and got entangled in acrimonious debate with a catfish. The whole colony of whitefish stood on their ears and wiggled their fins for joy; the suckers received the news open-mouthed, and then proposed that a message of thanks be sent to Mr. Fielding for taking such a burden off the backs of the poor fish in the West. Carried swimmingly.

The foregoing excerpt is taken from the Manitoba Free Press under date of May 14. Mr. Speaker, I have not had the pleasure of hearing many of the speeches so far delivered in this debate; I have been obliged to spend a great deal of my time attending one of the committees. Consequently I hope that in what I say I shall not be threshing over matters which have already been brought to the attention of the House. I have had the privilege of listening to only one or two speakers so far but I would like to make a few comments on some of the statements made by the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) last evening. I must express a little sorrow that the minister, before giving his speech to the House, did not run it through a cream separator in order that we might grasp its substance more easily. Personally I have not had time to read it all and I am afraid I shall never get that opportunity. The minister endeavoured to impress upon the House that he knew all the troubles that were afflicting agriculture and the remedies for them. He sought to pose as an authority on what kinds of live stock the farmers should keep and he was in no way backward in advising us respecting the manner in which they should be kept, the kind of crops we should grow, and the sort of immigration policy the country ought to pursue. In a word it would take a good-sized encylopaedia to contain all the information and advice which the minister handed out. The hon. gentleman wound up his long address with the bald statement that bad farming is practically responsible for all the ills of the western country. The minister also endeavoured to discredit the amendment moved by the Progressives to the budget, and stated that the reductions in the British preference for which we are asking were less than the government are proposing. I wish to deny that statement most emphatically. The minister gave a table professing to bear out his statement. I have a table which contradicts in some respects the rates given by the minister. Let me quote from it:

	Present rate Per cent	Rate under Government proposal Per cent	Rate under Progressive amendment Per cent	General tariff Per cent
Gray cotten fabrics and fabrics of flax	12½	..	12½	25
Stair linen sheets, table cloths, etc., of cotton or linen..	20	18	15	30
Woollen yarns.	20	18	15	30

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is my hon. friend quoting the relative reductions under the amendment and the budget as respects the British preferential tariff?

Mr. KELLNER: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Of course the hon. gentleman is aware that cotton fabrics now come from the United States. It is from there that we experience competition in cotton fabrics. It does not matter in that case what reductions are made in the British preferential tariff.

Mr. KELLNER: I admit that, but the Minister of Agriculture stated last night that the government's reduction in the British preferential tariff would be more than under our proposed amendment. It would be a greater reduction, of course. I have a long list of items here, twenty-four in all, and they are all in the same category. The following is the list of these items, with the present rate of duty, the rate proposed by the goverment, the rate under the Progressive amendment, and the general tariff.

	Present rate	Government proposal	Progressive amendment	General tariff
	Per cent	Per cent	Per cent	Per cent
Ribbons..	22½	20¼	17½	35
Furniture.	20	18	15	30
Boots	17½	15¾	15	30
Screws	22½	20¼	17½	35
Cutlery	20	18	15	30

Then we get into a line of importations. The first one is iron and aluminum hollow-ware. Hon. members may have noticed that the minister stumbled a bit when he came to that item last night, and I could not help wondering if he quite realized what hollow-ware was. I think I should tell him that it is material for making up caskets and they make it in two different forms, iron and aluminum. They bury their old political pledges, the ones which they never expect to resurrect in the iron casket; it is heavier, and they stay firmly in place. But matters like the tariff, which they expect to bring back and use from time to time, it is much more convenient to place in the aluminum casket. This list continues:

	Present rate	Government proposal	Progressive amendment	General tariff
	Per cent	Per cent	Per cent	Per cent
Lamps..	20	18	15	30
Sewing machines.. ..	20	18	15	30
Hats and caps	22½	20¼	17½	35
Gloves and mitts.	22½	20¼	17½	35

I took a great deal of pleasure this afternoon in listening to the Acting Minister of Immigration (Mr. Stewart) in his address when he told us that he had no very great objection to the Progressives assuming power in Canada, and he also made the statement that in the provinces where they are now in power they are not making a very great amount of headway. Let me tell him that in mostly every province it was the relics of a poor Liberal administration that put them into power, and it is going to be pretty hard for them, or any other government, to make very much of a showing for a little while at least. He made a very strong plea for capital, and I do not blame him, because hon. members will remember that in the last federal election capital showed itself to be just a little frivolous. In the beginning of the campaign it got in behind the Conservative party and tried to elect them, but before the campaign was very far advanced it switched and got in behind the Liberals and did elect them. Now I think members of the government to-day ought to feel as though they owed a great deal to the capitalistic interests of Canada. The minister also talked about an inheritance tax, and said he thought it should be a part of the provincial taxes. I do not know whether I agree with that policy or not, but it seems to me that at the present time all the millionaires that we have in Canada seem to die either in Montreal or Toronto. I think probably we make them out West, but when it comes to crossing the Great Divide which the member for East York (Mr. Harris) so very touchingly described a few minutes ago, they always end up in Montreal or Toronto, and the inheritance tax is collected in those cities. I am very sorry, Mr. Speaker, that in discussing the minister's statement of last night I omitted to read an extract from the Toronto Globe of April 17th, which I ask permission to read at the present time. It says:

5 p.m.

> In Wednesday's Globe, April 11, is a message from Hon. Mr. Motherwell, Minister of Agriculture, in which he blames the raisers of the scrub steer the off-type hog and the dunghill hen—

A class of animal that is very well known to hon. members of this House; we have often heard of it. The article continues:

> —for the complaints in regard to the condition of agriculture at the present time. If the Minister of Agriculture will travel through any part of Lambton county, Ontario, and I have no doubt any other county as well, he will see for himself the kind of stock kept on the farm and he will hear from men who know their business that the farmers are facing difficult problems.
> There is not one man in one hundred who can start on the farm under present conditions and pay for his farm if he lives in the way any civilized man ought to live. The lifting of the British embargo may help stock raisers. It is to be hoped it will, but the best market by far for the Canadian farmer is just across the border.

And I have yet to learn that our Liberal government has taken any step to secure that market for the Canadian farmer. If our government realized the seriousness of the situation, they would remove the duty on all the necessities of life and on all farm implements. If Canada had free trade with the United States, this country would prosper as never before, not only the farmers, but every class in the country, and, to my mind, that is the only way to make Canada the country it ought to be. At present we have apparent prosperity in our large centres of population, but if present conditions continue the prosperity of our cities will vanish. The Globe in the same issue makes the statement that the prosperity of the whole country depends on the success of agriculture—scrubs, steers and dunghill hens included, I presume. The Globe says—

> The Globe in the same issue makes the statement that the prosperity of the whole country depends on the success of agriculture: this being so, and there is no denying the fact, it is up to the Globe to use its whole influence for the removal of the obstacles that are throttling agriculture.
>
> The Liberal party should put into practice the platform adopted in 1919 or hand the reins of government over to our Conservative friends who are the fathers of protection in Canada.

Mr. GRAHAM: That would be bad.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We would rather get them another way.

Mr. GRAHAM: Hope springs eternal.

Mr. KELLNER: I think it would be well not to read the rest of the article. I am sure I could not expect any applause for it; so that I will desist.

I desire to offer a few remarks on the budget from a personal point of view; I want to criticize it as I see it myself. I do not know that I shall have the entire support of all Progressives in this section of the House in my stand on this budget and therefore, Mr. Speaker, I want to have it known that I am speaking only for myself and that part of the West which I represent. When this government took office I think the people of Canada had more hope and greater expectations of its members than had ever been entertained on the accession to power of any former government in Canada. Just previous to the return of the present government we had experienced a period of very great inflation followed by a time of depression. We were still suffering from that depression when hon. gentlemen opposite took over the reins of power. When the armistice was signed there was a lull in the activities of the country. I believe that the people were of opinion that the devastation of war having ceased they could afford to rest on their oars. But very soon we were told that it was necessary for Europe to be rehabilitated, and the people were requested to get to work immediately and produce even more than they had done during the war. It is our opinion now that this request was made probably because certain persons who controlled the destinies of Canada wanted time in which to set their house in order so that they might be prepared to meet the shock which they no doubt knew would come. It has been a great pleasure to me in listening to the discussion of this budget to learn that at last we have reached bottom and have got as far down the abyss of financial depression as it is possible for us to reach. That at any rate is the good news which we have been given.

In my opinion our financial troubles started at the frontiers of our country long before they began in the more urban sections. In the far East and the far West we felt the pinch many months before the people suffered in this section of the country. And that is ever the case. The people living in those outlying communities are never as prosperous as the people in sections like this, and a smaller loss brings them down to the bread line sooner. They are further from the centres of wealth, so that any reduction in the value of their goods is more keenly felt and takes a greater percentage from their profits. Probably that is the reason that we in the West have been more insistent in bringing to the attention of the House the deplorable conditions in which the country finds itself to-day. I hesitate to mention this matter to-day, for I was among those who a few weeks ago were classed as calamity howlers for having referred to the matter at all. We were told that this was one of the things we should not have go out to the world; in fact we were given to understand that it was just about the lowest depth of degeneration even to mention it.

It seems to me, though, that it is a rather poor policy for us to shut our eyes to the unrest that is becoming more pronounced day by day. There is no doubt that people are sinking in financial morasses from time to time through no fault of their own, and they are getting into a frame of mind which this government or any other would do well not to disregard. They seem to feel that human sympathy is dead and that depressing calculations are their only outlook. If that is the state of mind of the Canadian people to-day I think it is high time that these matters were brought to the attention of the House in no uncertain way. This present depression is even influencing social and religious life. A few Sundays ago I sat in Chalmers Presbyterian Church in this city when their budget was brought down, and I gathered from the statement submitted that day that this year there had been paid into the church more money than ever before in one year and that the revenues were greater than in any past year. On the other hand, however, from every remote section of the country it appeared that missionaries had to be called in. Retrenchment is the order on the frontiers of western Canada and in foreign lands, and I believe this is due largely to the fact that a great volume of the money that is collected is taken up in paying interest charges and meeting similar obligations. And this is the same in everyday life in all occupations.

Now, these were largely the conditions that prevailed when the Liberals took office. But the people seemed to have an unusual amount of faith in that party at that time. No doubt the promises of hon. gentlemen when they were in opposition were still ringing in the public ear; the people were still listening to speeches of the kind made in this House in regard to war graft that had gone on, besides graft in connection with the merchant marine and things of that sort. The people hoped that when this government took office it would be the champion of the working classes. I believe that the people had a special confidence in the Prime Minister who seems to have had a reputation as a man of democratic tendencies and one who had especial sympathy for the weak and those who needed help. If I doubt not the people of the country trusted him to a very large extent. But I am afraid that to-day that trust and the hope they entertained then have gone.

The hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Bird), speaking last night, said that there was no difference so far as he could see between the Liberal and the Conservative parties. I do not think he carried the argument quite to its logical conclusion; I would enlarge on his statement to this extent, that in my opinion, it does not matter which one of these parties is in power, it does not govern the country anyway. I believe that this country is governed largely by unseen hands, by different financial institutions; and it matters not who for the time being occupy government benches, they get their orders. And so far they have been carrying out those orders. At all events, the faith which the people had that a better state of affairs would ensue on the accession of this government to office no longer exists; and if Liberalism means anything to-day I believe it means something shady.

There is just a little too much selfishness at work in this country of ours. There seems to be a supreme desire on the part of some of those who are controlling our destinies to get just a little more than it is possible for the country to let them have. The manufacturers say that it is essential that the prices of goods be kept up; they tell us that it is not wise to monkey with the tariff. They say that if we bring in goods from other countries in competition with them they will have to close their factories with the result that employees will be thrown out of work.

[Mr. Kellner.]

The financiers tell us that we should keep interest rates up and get back to the gold basis as quickly as we can; while the merchants claim that their sales are small and that prices must be maintained because they are not doing a large business. Then the railway companies come along and declare that freight rates must not be brought down, that they must be kept up in order that dividends may be paid. And I do not think that anyone will doubt that the professional men of the country have gentlemen's agreements to keep up their charges, and that they are doing so.

On the other side are a large number of people paying these excessive charges—people who live neither in Montreal nor in Toronto—and their purchasing power has been so greatly reduced that commercially they are of little benefit to the country. They are asking for cheaper money, for lower tariffs, for the lessening of taxes on the necessities of life; to all of which this governmenet turns a deaf ear. I think the government's real policy is probably brought out a little clearer in some of the speeches we hear in this chamber from their supporters rather than in the budget proposals, and as far as I am able to size up their policy from such speeches it amounts to about this: Work harder—cut down expenses—raise a lot more goods and send them to some foreign country to be sold at about two-thirds the price they will bring in Canada.

The charge is made that poor farming is largely responsible for conditions as they exist in the West to-day. I think the charge is very unfair. Going back to the days of the war, when we were asked for greater production, I would put this question to hon. members: What country anywhere in the world produced in anything like the same proportion as western Canada? And is there a farmer in any other country to-day who produces anywhere near as much as the western farmer does? One hon. gentleman in speaking during the debate on immigration, I think it was the member for North Winnipeg (Mr. McMurray), stated that it was the farmer's own fault that he found himself in the position he occupies to-day. "Why," exclaimed the hon. gentleman, "he does not live in a sod shack like he did in the days when I was a boy; he lives in a real house now. He is spending far too much money. He even climbs into a Henry, steps on the gas and runs around like other people do. The farmers of the West to-day are overstocked in land in machinery and in other things." I should like to compare the advancement of the farmer with the advancement of people engaged in other occupations to-day. Would hon. members who feel that way about it care to go back a few years and view the life that professional men then lived? I think they will find that then there were very few of our professional men living in modern houses such as they are able to afford to-day; most of them would be found above a store or in similar quarters. May I also call the attention of the House to the fact that from the standpoint of intelligence the professional man is not by any means outclassing the farmer? We have quite a number of lawyers and doctors in this chamber, and I want to ask you: If you had a very difficult case to argue which one of these distinguished gentlemen would you engage? Would you rather do as the Dominion government did, go down to Toronto and hire a lawyer at $400 a day, and perhaps go across the line and hire two or three more at a similar rate? I remember in the days when I was a boy on the farm back in Ontario we had a doctor who used to visit our farm, a distance of eight miles from his home, and he did not drive a McLaughlin Six or any car of that kind but a horse and buggy. He made those eight miles for $2.50 a trip—just about what a doctor to-day will charge for writing a prescription.

The difference between what those engaged in the various professions are earning and what our farmers earn was plainly brought out before the Banking and Commerce committee the other day, when the manager of the Weyburn Security Bank told us that they had received reports from two hundred and forty of the best farmers in Saskatchewan which disclosed that their annual revenue above operating expenses had been $600. Now, in nearly every instance that would represent the wages of two people, in many instances the wages of several people—the farmer, his wife and family. For a whole year's work they got the magnificent sum of $600. No doubt that meant getting up about four o'clock in the morning, milking the cows, feeding the calves and working until probably six or seven o'clock at night, and then doing the same chores again before going to bed.

Mr. PUTNAM: I suppose the hon. gentleman does not overlook the fact that those two hundred and forty farmers each made $600 over and above living expenses?

Mr. KELLNER: No, I had not overlooked that. I am quite willing to concede that in these cases they did make their living and $600 in addition according to the evidence of the manager of the Weyburn Security Bank. I was very much surprised to hear this for I did not think it was possible. However, would the hon. member wish to compare that income with, say the income of Mr. Tilley when he was acting for the government in the Grand Trunk arbitration—$400 a day and expenses? That is just a little bit too much of a spread. While the farmer had his living during the twelve months he was making his $600, so also had Mr Tilley when he was making his $400 a day.

Mr. PUTNAM: If I might answer the hon. gentleman, I do not think the comparison at all relevant. But I have heard that the ambition of the Noble Foundation Farm did not differ from Mr. Tilley's.

Mr. KELLNER: I might advise my hon. friend that that farm is in the hands of a receiver at the present time.

Mr. GOULD: Absolutely

Mr. PUTNAM: I said the ambition of that concern did not differ from the Tilley ambition. The only difference is that one had luck, the other had not.

Mr. KELLNER: I do not think "luck" is the right word there. One had an organization behind him to see that legal fees did not go too low; the other had no such organization to see that his grain prices did not go too low. I think that is probably the crux of the situation.

In discussing this budget a good many hon. members try to ridicule representatives of the West because we come here and ask for lower tariffs. They try to make out that we do not altogether know what we are talking about and that it would not be a good thing for us to have lower tariffs. I may tell this House that these hon. gentlemen can never make protectionists of the people of western Canada. Neither can they convince western Canada that the people in that part of the country should submit to the excessive interest rates that they are paying to-day. They cannot convince them, either, that it is their duty to pay the high freight rates they are paying to-day. When we ask for lower interest rates it is not going to do us any good to tell us we have the best Bank Act in the world, and say, "You farmers keep your horny hands off it." And when we tell you that we want lower tariffs, it is not going to do any good to get into a discussion of tariff stability or anything of that kind. When we ask for lower freight rates, it will not get you anywhere to tell us that the present rates are just as low as they can be and permit the payment of dividends. I think there is a spirit abroad in the West to-day that will not be much longer denied. When we see the transportation companies and the elevator companies exploiting us from coast to coast in weights, in grades, in transportation rates, it is only natural that we should feel just a little bit strong on some of these questions. We cannot be intimidated, either, by being told that we do not know what we are talking about; the dissatisfaction which prevails in the West will, I am sure, never die out until times are made better. If this House cannot conceive of anything that will enable us to get on our feet, then I say to you in all sincerity, do not do anything to increase that flame. If conditions are such in this country that we cannot live together as one family, by all means do not interject anything into this House that will keep us from being good neighbours.

I have often thought while sitting here in this House that those who have control of the government frequently lose sympathy with the people. It has often been given as the reason why Rome fell that she had disregarded the soul of her people, and I am just a little bit afraid there is a tendency in this House and in this country at the present time to disregard the soul of the Canadian people. There is nothing that will inspire men to the same degree of feeling as a fight for their existence, and that is what the West is fighting for to-day. We are rapidly losing our homes in that district, and it has been well demonstrated that if there is anything that will inspire a man to action it is to see his home going.

Before I close I would like to call the attention of the House to the very awkward and unsatisfactory position which the Progressives are in at the present moment in this House. We realize that we have little to expect unless we are well enough organized to go out and win enough support to carry the government of this country. At the present that is hopeless, for we have no organization in the East at all. Probably it could be accomplished in the very near future, but at present it is out of the question. Now, we are forced to this position of affairs: Should we defeat this government by some manoeuvre or another —and no doubt we could do it—what in the name of common sense have we to expect from the Tories? So we are forced to sit here; we take the ridicule of the press quite frequently, but we are helpless to better our position, for if we did switch parties the chances are we might get the worst of the switch.

An hon. MEMBER: It could not be any worse.

Mr. FORKE: Do not be so hopeless. There is a chance for us yet.

Mr. KELLNER: In conclusion, I think it would be well, if this country wishes to avoid broils and internal strife, that more attention be paid to the demands which come from the West. The representations made should not lightly be passed by; we should not merely be told it is our own fault. There are many of us who have been through the mill. We have seen the homesteader go in there and work as hard as any man possibly could, exercising all the frugality that any man could be expected to exercise, and the blame is not his; it is that of the method by which our business is carried on in this country. It is my opinion that that method must be changed; otherwise it is very doubtful whether the boundaries of our country can be maintained as we know them to-day.

Mr. J. E. FONTAINE (Hull) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate on the budget, I feel that my first duty is to congratulate the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) for having, after barely fifteen months of administration, so considerably improved the financial conditions of the country. What a change he must have noticed, after having been in office in 1911. as Minister of Finance during the fifteen years of the Liberal regime and having left the Treasury well supplied, he found the country, after ten years of Conservative administration, indebted, ruined and at the threshold of bankruptcy, without mentioning all the other evils—the race question, the strife of capital versus labour—which afflicted the country.

It is an established fact, Mr. Speaker, that in 1911, when the Canadian people, in an hour of weakness, threw over the Laurier government, the national debt amounted to only $340,000,000, and, in 1921, the debt of Canada had reached the figures of $2,340,000,000. Under Laurier, the interest we paid amounted to only $12,000,000 per year; the interest we have been paying since 1921—after the Borden-Meighen administration—amounts to $140,000,000 per year. In 1911, the debt per capita was $47, and ten years later it had increased to $266. These figures speak for themselves and I challenge our opponents to deny their truth. Some may say, this is a fact, but it is due to the war. Yes, we have experienced a war, but it is not the only factor responsible for all this increase in our debt. Have we so soon forgotten the Borden government? Who does not recall that members of this House supporting the Borden government were forced to resign because they had speculated, for instance, on drugs, on articles of first necessity to assist our soldiers who were wounded on the battlefields? Who has forgotten that another member was obliged to resign for having speculated on horses bought by the government for the war? Who has forgotten the gift of $100,000 made out of the public funds, to a lady stenographer? Who does not recollect the boot scandal, boots made from paper and paid the price of first quality goods, and all this to enrich the government's friends. Yes, Sir, we have had a war; it was a costly one, however, the country's debt would be but half as large, if we had had an honest and economic government, whose object had not been to enrich trusts and profiteers. Under Laurier's administration, that is between 1896 and 1911, we passed through the golden age; everybody was earning; agriculture had progressed, lands rose in value, farmers having become comfortably off were entirely satisfied, the labouring class was happy, salaries were ample, the cost of living was low; but, during the ten years of Conservative administration, agriculture fell, farmers were imposed upon, farm products found a market but it was the middlemen who carried off the profits, speculated and enriched themselves. I still have a vivid image of these leeches, these vipers with human faces known as trusts who acquire at low prices the products of the farm, such as beef, butter, cheese, etc., hoarding them in warehouses and only agreeing to sell them at exorbitant prices, while during that time the working class was starving, all this taking place under the watchful eye of the Borden-Meighen government.

Mr. Speaker, this is the origin of the United Farmers and Labour parties. The farmers were imposed upon, the labouring class suffered, they were discontented, they grouped together into associations, in political parties in order to protect themselves, rightly have they done so. Under the Laurier regime, the country had expanded, two new provinces, Alberta and Saskatchewan took their place on the map of Canada. All these facts cannot be mere accidents; we should infer from them that the Liberal policy established by Laurier and followed for the last fifteen months by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) is the wisest policy for this country, a policy of the people, an entirely democratic one whose object is not to enrich a small number of select people to the detriment of the consumer, but whose aim consists in everybody participating in our national wealth, developing our industries in towns, not neglecting however the first of all industries: agriculture, which is the foundation of our national wealth.

Yes, we must encourage the farmer because he is the one,—this noble artisan of the soil,—who is the most necessary to the growth of our country. This truth is so evident, Mr. Speaker, that in the face of this world-wide upheaval caused by the Great War—this after-war crisis—all thoughts have turned to the land, to the development of agriculture, our only hope to save the country. I, therefore, take this occasion to ask the government to still lower, if possible, the duties on agricultural machinery and all the implements necessary to the farmer. We want to lower the cost of living. Well, let us be consistent; let us begin by lowering the cost of production, let the Dominion government acquiesce in the provincial governments' requests and grant them the money necessary to build good roads in the country, let them establish everywhere model farms so as to improve the farming methods, give these people the means of enjoying life, procure them comfort so that their children will give up the thought of leaving the farm and emigrating to cities for the purpose of enjoying the comforts which they are deprived of in the country.

I wish to congratulate the government and especially the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Marine on their achievement, during their last trip to Europe, in concluding trade connections with France and Italy. The United States have so enhanced their tariff that we are almost unable to trade with them, we, therefore, need new markets for our farmers and industries. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Robb) has also travelled all the way to Australia so as to come to a trade agreement with that Dominion; I trust that his trip will bear good results.

I also want to thank the right hon. the Prime Minister for having had the courage to refuse the invitation of Mr. Lloyd George, then Prime Minister of England, to take part in the war which seemed impending with Turkey. It was more than time that some one put an end to this excess of imperialism. The whole Canadian nation, the entire press of Canada approved the Prime Minister's conduct in this matter; there was but one critic, one dissenting voice, that of the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen). He would have liked, I suppose, despatching our Canadians to be killed across the seas; he would have felt some satisfaction in forcing upon us a new conscription act.

Let the hon. ministers pursue their good work. The Canadian people do not expect that the present government will succeed in remedying, in a few months, the wrongs perpetrated by the Borden and Meighen governments, during their ten years in power, with their policy of wanting to sacrifice the very last man, the very last dollar to save the Empire. Nor do the people expect that they will immediately change deficits into surpluses, the wretched times into a golden age, but they do expect the government to improve the financial conditions of the country by practising a strict economy, by ceasing to meddle in European affairs and by initiating a policy essentially Canadian, and for the Canadians.

I wish to say a few words, Sir, on the immigration question. I fully realize that it is a serious and embarrassing problem; indeed, the question before us is whether we shall disburse large sums of money to bring hither immigrants from Europe, when many of our best Canadians emigrate to the United States. I know full well that the greater half of our territory is yet to be settled; that we have an abundance of natural resources, which only await willing hands to develop them; I realize that we have a territory that can feed 100,000,000 people and that we number hardly 8,000,000; I am aware that we have a railway system which is a burden to the country, and does not pay for its upkeep because we have not the traffic nor the necessary population to feed it; I concede that it was immigration which built up the wealth and developed the United States which, at the time of their proclamation of independence, in 1775, consisted only of a few thousand people, while to-day they have reached the enormous number of 112,000,000. Notwithstanding all this, I wonder whether, in the present financial conditions we are placed in, the time is propitious to disburse money to bring over immigrants who, perhaps, will swell the number of the unemployed in cities. I wish to protect the Canadian workman, he is the one who needs most protection because he is the most affected by the present crisis. For the last few years, there has been a shortage of work, salaries have dwindled down to such an extent that many of our families in Hull and elsewhere are forced to cross over to the United States to earn a living. It is sad, Mr. Speaker, to witness our young men, capable and vigorous, cross the border to enrich the United States citizens when we have here a country just as advantageous as theirs. Let the government find means to keep on this side our population rather than spend money to bring over immigrants.

I realize that the government mean well, they want to place these immigrants on the land so as to develop agriculture, but I fear that these people who, for the most part, have not been brought up on the farm, will make but a short stay on the land and eventually find their way to the cities, displacing the Canadian workman. Would it not be wiser for the government to make use of this appropriation to keep our people here instead of disbursing money to bring in strangers who have neither the characteristics nor the ways of Canadians. I would suggest that instead of spending millions to promote immigration, the government begin immediately the construction of the Georgian bay canal which will open up the country and will give work to our people for a number of years to come.

I also wish to make a few remarks in regard to the Civil Service Commission: when the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) submitted to this House his resolution to abolish this Commission, I happened to be sick and could not give my views. I am opposed to this Commission as it stands today. I maintain that it is unconstitutional and I fail to understand why the government tolerate a Commission which has more power and more prerogatives than they have. Let candidates pass the Civil Service examinations for the positions of copyists or type-writers, but let us return to the Act passed under the Laurier government—that will be satisfactory. According to this Act, the Commission only exercised its control over the inside service but I cannot conceive how the commissioners should be in a position to judge of the qualifications of candidates to positions in the outside service, for instance, a lock-keeper, a postmaster, a carpenter, a labourer, etc. This is so much the case, Mr. Speaker, that for these kinds of positions, the Commissioners are advised by a committee of citizens gathered a little everywhere in Canada. Do not imagine, however, that the members of this committee—amongst whom I see the names of defeated candidates at the last general elections—do not favour their friends; therefore we have a recurrence of patronage, though in a roundabout way and under different control. Why not leave the appointments to the government who would in turn be advised by the members who, at least, are responsible to the people. I was quite astonished to hear the Conservatives say, at the time this discussion took place, that the Commission must not be disturbed as it would lead to a return of patronage. These good Tories have become over-scrupulous; yet they are the ones, who, in 1911, when they came into power, dismissed 3000 employees because they were Liberals and replaced them by their political friends. They had appointed commissioners to make an inquiry throughout the whole country, and, Conservatives seeking positions had but to come before these Commissioners to have Liberal employees dismissed, stating that they had taken part in the political campaign. In my own place, the city of Hull and the county, many were dismissed through such means. If only the government of the day had been satisfied with replacing those employees who were dismissed! But things were much worse than that; in order to please their friends they crammed all the departments to overflow: 12,000 new employees were appointed. It was at that stage that American experts were called in, the Griffenhagens, to establish the famous classification, which was carried out with a great deal of partisanship and injustice, to such an extent that 15,000 employees appealed from the ruling of this classification. I congratulate the government for having appointed a committee of inquiry who will re-establish the facts and will, I hope, facilitate the amending of the Civil Service Act.

Before closing my remarks, I wish to remind the government that last session this House adopted unanimously a resolution which I had the honour to move, asking to adopt an old age pension act. ,I fully understand that the financial situation of the country is such that it is difficult to even comply with just demands, but this legislation is so necessary, it commends itself so strongly that it should be the first to be taken into consideration by the government. I do not wish to repeat the speech I made last year on this subject, but allow me to remind you, Sir, that the Canadian people expect that the government will move in the matter. I have received hundreds of letters, from all over the country, asking me to follow up this project, and even lately, I had the honour to join a Nova Scotia labour delegation which waited on the Prime Minister. They came here to impress upon the government the necessity for this old age pension and ask the government for immediate legislation to that effect. I was very much pleased with the encouraging reception that the Prime Minister gave this delegation and specially in hearing him say that it was one of the subjects on his programme, that he had at heart the carrying out of this project and that the legislation in question would certainly be brought down as soon as the government's finances permitted.

Before I resume my seat, I wish to state that I shall vote against the amendment of the Progressive leader (Mr. Forke). I place very little faith in their policy which only favours the western provinces. If we want the country to progress and Confederation to be maintained, we must have a policy which favours equally all provinces and all classes. It seems to me that the old eastern provinces have done their share of sacrifice to develop the West. If to-day we are overburdened with taxes, if we have a system of railways which shows a large yearly deficit, it is because we have built two transcontinentals so as to help in developing the West. If the government were to accept the Progressives' suggestions and establish free trade and abolish the duties which are the main sources of our revenues, where would they get the money to meet the $140,000,000 of interest which is due yearly? Where would they get the money to administer the affairs of the country? They would be forced to have recourse to direct taxation, and again it would still be the old eastern provinces who would have to pay the larger share, since they have reached a higher degree of development than the western provinces.

Mr. Speaker, I have full confidence in the Liberal party and its leaders. I approve of their policy; I shall therefore vote with pleasure for the budget as brought down by the hon. Minister of Finance.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (North Toronto): Mr. Speaker, the small attendance in the chamber during this debate evidently indicates that now the session has entered upon its fourth month members are about prepared to go home. In my opinion no good object can be gained by delaying the session.

First of all I want to congratulate the veteran Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) on the budget statement he presented the other day. The minister has served a great many years in public life and is admired and respected by everybody.

I must say that I admire the manner in which those who have so far spoken in this debate have presented their case. There is room for differences of opinion in a big country like Canada, but up to the present those hon. members who have spoken have displayed good feeling and a spirit of fairness which have won the respect of those who have listened to them.

Bearing in mind that this is the 105th day of the session I am sorry there should have been so much delay in bringing down the budget. I appreciate the fact that the Minister of Finance has a good many outside matters in the French and Italian treaties to attend to and that he is really overworked; but I think it would be better if this government in future would copy the example of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the Old Country, Right Hon. Stanley Baldwin, who presented his budget speech in the British parliament on the 10th day of the session. If this government emulates that example in the future I think it will be a step in the right direction.

In my opinion the tariff is not a political question, and I would urge that an authority be set up in this country that could act in an advisory capacity to the government, in relation to this particular problem. The tariff should never have been made a political football by this or the other political party in Canada. It is not a political question in any sense. It is an economic question, a business question, a question of trade and commerce; and more than that it is a great national, patriotic question that concerns every citizen of this country. Neither is the tariff an academic, or what you might call an abstract question, or an abstract theory; it is a national and economic necessity.

The hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Raymond), who yesterday made an able and very fair speech, characterized by courtliness of manner, spoke of the tariff question as being a study in national psychology. I do not agree in that statement. I believe the tariff question is a great problem which concerns everybody and for that reason should not be approached from the party spirit, or with a view to reaping party advantage. There has been a tariff in Canada ever since Canada has been a country. There are those who would like to abolish the tariff; and if I understand the purpose of the amendment it aims to practically eliminate the tariff. Even as far back as 110 years ago we had something in the nature of a tariff.

The Liberal-Conservative party has always been a consistent protectionist party. From the days of Sir John Macdonald every Conservative government we have had have been protectionist, and the party preached the same gospel of protection in every part of Canada. In the last election the leader of this party Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, preached that doctrine whether it was in the Maritime provinces, in central Canada, in the prairie provinces, or on the Pacific coast.

Wherever he went he preached the gospel of moderate protection adequate for the industries of this country. After all is said and done, Mr. Speaker, it was not any political party that made Canada a nation. The people themselves had something to do in bringing that about as well as the government. In my opinion, however, it was the National Policy that made this country the great nation which it is to-day. You may criticize the National Policy if you like, because it has some defects, but when you criticize the defects of the National Policy do not forget its virtues. It is owing to those virtues that Canada has achieved her proud position as a great industrial nation.

The present Minister of Finance has been responsible for the inauguration of seventeen budgets and if you take the seventeen tariffs introduced under them they are what economic writers would not hesitate to call protective tariffs. Eighty-five per cent of the products of Ontario have a home market in the near cities and towns, and the producers obtain the highest price that can be realized in fair competition on this continent to-day. That home market is not one that is here to-day and away to-morrow. It is a steady market, and is to be found in many cities and towns along lake Ontario, lake Erie, the upper lakes and in the district south of the National Transcontinental in Ontario. An election is pending in Ontario now, and I say that I do not believe the farmers of Ontario believe in free trade, nor do they believe in reciprocity. If it were not for the protection which the farmers of Ontario have had, in view of the hostile tariff commonly known as the Fordney-McCumber tariff, the farmers of Ontario would be 100 per cent worse off than they are to-day, and the province would be suffering from under-production, unemployment, depression, and rural depopulation to a greater extent than at the present time. That remark applies to eastern Canada as well. A very distinguished statesman, Hon. J. Israel Tarte once said that platforms were made to get in on and not to stand on.

My Progressive friends, for whom I have every respect, had a platform in the late election, not only in Ontario, but in other parts of Canada, which was commonly called a free trade platform, and they made good their promise by placing the principles of that platform in the amendment which is before the House to-day. While I do not believe in the principles which they enunciate. I give them every credit for their sincerity. My hon. friend from Brantford (Mr. Raymond) preached the gospel of adequate protection for the industries of his great city of Brantford. That city is a great industrial centre, in common with other cities in Ontario such as Toronto, Hamilton, London and others. Why? Owing to the principle of adequate protection for the industries of the country. In 1878 the city from which I came had to open soup kitchens. These soup kitchens had to be opened to meet the wants of the large number of men out of work. Many people emigrated to the United States, and the Mayor of Chicago said that that city had become at that date the third largest Canadian city in the world. There was a great deal of unemployment at that time. We had many vacant houses and stores, and evidence of distress on every hand. When the policy of protection was adopted it stimulated the growth of Toronto, Hamilton, Brantford and other places, and the trade and commerce and the population of these cities have greatly increased. Toronto has doubled in population every ten years. The post office receipts for the city of Toronto were over $5,000,000 last year, and the receipts from customs, inland revenue and other utilities, to say nothing of banking, industry, trade and commerce have increased prodigiously. Toronto is only one of the many cities which have made industrial strides as a result of protection. Geography has taught the people of Canada a lesson in more ways than one. It has taught them not to leave themselves at the mercy of a foreign country like the United States in regard to fiscal affairs, especially when the people of that foreign country are the wealthiest and most prosperous, ambitious and industrious people in the world to-day.

Every country in the world is increasing its tariff. Not only the various countries in Europe, and the United States, but Australia, New Zealand and the countries of South America are all increasing their protective tariffs. Can it be argued that all these countries are wrong and that the Progressives in Canada alone are right? I maintain that, as a result of the Great War, more protection will be required to meet the changing conditions in the years that are to come. Sir Richard Cartwright once said that if his party were returned to power he would remove every vestige of protection from the statutes of this country. If you examine the seventeen budgets of the present able Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding), as I said a few minutes ago, you will find they are all protective tariffs. The tariff resolutions before the House to-night are all of a protective character. The best part in the whole budget speech I think was that in which the Finance Minister spoke of the stability of the tariff. That is an economic principle which is accepted the world over. He said:

> There is a thought which does not receive as much consideration as I think sometimes it should be given in public discussions, and that is the desirability of something like tariff stability. Business men do not like to be always threatened with changes in the tariff. There is no finality in legislation either as respects that tariff or as respects anything else. That which parliament can do to-day it can undo to-morrow. Everybody knows that. Everybody must conduct his business in the light of that fact. Nevertheless it is desirable that something like an assurance of tariff stability should be given to business men.

I may say the very able and distinguished Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin) has on more than one occasion agreed to that doctrine, and I am glad to say that we have, such an able, patriotic and well liked member of the government in the very responsible position of Minister of Justice, because he has done a great deal to instil a sense of responsibility into the government along the line of stability of tariffs.

I may say, as one of the harbour commissioners in Toronto in 1919-1920 and 1921, that we lost a large extension of a basic industry, the Baldwin Tin-Plate Industry from Wales. The present Chancellor of the Exchequer was the president of that company. We had a contract signed and sealed by them to lease some thirty-six acres in Ashbridge's bay, in the industrial area.

It promised to be one of the largest concerns on this continent, and they were going to manufacture granite plates, and tin plates.

Some of the directors came from Swansea, Wales, the headquarters of the company. They spent a large sum of money in erecting a factory, machine shops and buildings, and they were going to in time employ 1,800 men. Just as they got under way bad times came, and there was a conflict between the political parties with regard to the great economic question of the tariff in Canada.

Statements had been made in the House and out of it to the effect that if there were any people in Canada or out of Canada who were contemplating establishing or extending new lines of business in which they felt protection was necessary, they should not do so.

A distinguished member of the present government made a speech and said: "I will do them a friendly service and say to them 'Do not do it'". Such remarks were made, not only by a distinguished member of the government, but by others, including some members of the United Farmers of Ontario. As a result, the Baldwins did not go on with the proposition because at that time the tariff was in politics in Canada with no guarantee of stability and for that reason they did not proceed. In that way we lost a large basic industry, with the result that many of the men who were engaged for that industry had to leave our city and go to the United States, and there were a lot of skilled workmen among them. For that reason, if for no other, I agree with the statement of the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Justice in this connection, and I think it will commend itself to the wisdom and judgment of the country. I am not one of those who blames the government for changing its policy completely. After all is said and done, a government is something like a progressive business man or individual. A man may conduct a business one way to-day and change it to-morrow, and he may change his policy through no fault of his own. For that reason, I have never believed in talking about what one party has done and what another party has done, because two wrongs do not make a right. Therefore, I give the government credit, when they came into office, for being business men enough not to upset the old order of affairs in the matter of protection which had been a good thing for the country, for the city man and the farmer as well.

In looking over the tariff proposition before the House to-night, one could not consider the proposed tariff a low one. When an article is marked up as high as artificial silk, which is 37½ per cent, you could not by any means represent the tariff that gives you this rate as a low tariff. Nor can you say that this is a tariff for revenue only, because the revenue is not equal to the expenditure. Although there has been deducted the sum of $2,500,000 on sugar at the rate of a half a cent per pound, there is a decrease in the budget for excise of $5,600,000 and a deficit of $57,000,000. You cannot therefore say that this is a tariff for revenue alone, because, as I have just indicated, the revenue is not equal to expenditure. Furthermore, the Minister of Finance cannot claim that it is a free trade tariff: if we look over the duties and bounties, and take into consideration direct and indirect aid to industry, we are forced to the conclusion that the budget is far from being one of free trade but is a fairly High Protectionist one.

Now, I am opposed to the amendment which has been submitted to the House and I shall vote in support of the minister's motion. I believe that the national policy of Canada should be brought up to date and that further amendments should be made in it for the purpose of conserving our own industries for our own workmen, and keeping our own markets for our own products. That is the policy that this country needs, and inasmuch as the budget goes to some extent in that direction I shall support it. Among our imports from the United States during the last year we purchased potatoes to the extent of $423,000. The hon. member for Victoria and Carleton (Mr. Caldwell) speaking in this House the other evening made this statement:

> Since the hon. member has coupled my name with this, I should like to dissociate myself with it entirely. We want free entry of our potatoes into other markets.

In other words, the hon. gentleman wants free trade in potatoes. Well, Mr. Speaker, is that practicable or advisable? If we had free trade in potatoes with the United States where would it land us? In this connection I would ask the House to bear with me while I quote an article which appeared in the May Bulletin of the National City Bank on the question of potatoes, which shows the disastrous condition of affairs that now exists in connection with this particular product in the United States. Before I read this article I want to say right here that I agree with the policy of the government in imposing a duty on potatoes. This, I think, is only proper, and I am convinced that the farmers of Ontario as well as those of the Maritime provinces will see the wisdom of the Minister of Finance in maintaining the tariff on this product. The article I am about to quote from supplies the answer to the hon. member for Carleton in regard to his proposal of free trade in potatoes. As I have stated, it appears in the monthly bulletin of the National City Bank, which is one of the largest institutions of the kind in the world. It publishes a bulletin monthly on the economic affairs of the world including the United States, Canada and other countries. With regard to the question of potatoes this article has the following to say:

> It is easy to see what has been the matter with potato prices. The acreage last year was large, and the average yield per acre also large. The big consuming sections of the country had enough potatoes grown locally to nearly supply their wants and did not require to import them long distances, hence potatoes were in over-supply in states like Minnesota, the Dakotas and Idaho. Potatoes are not a crop that stands shipment very well or that can be carried over from one year to another. Incidentally, as they are not a crop traded in on the exchanges, the low prices could not be laid at that door.

From the quotation I have just submitted to the House it must be obvious how impossible it is for us to have free trade with the United States in potatoes, for the simple reason that they have not a market over there at the present time for their own crop of last year; and the balance of that crop of theirs will just about equal the demand for this particular commodity in the United States. I stated a moment ago that we import from the United States $423,000 worth of potatoes, and I am firmly of the opinion that the minister is acting wisely in placing a duty on this article. There is another commodity on which I should like to see a duty imposed, and that is eggs. If we want to trade with the people of the United States we must have something to trade with, and I have just proved that there is no basis upon which we can trade with them in the matter of potatoes. The people of this country during the past year imported from the United States $3,162,600 worth of eggs. I would place a duty on this article coming into Canada, because I think we should preserve the home market in this commodity for the Canadian farmers, and this would be a nice little side line for them in Ontario. There are many hon. gentlemen to my left who apparently are of the opinion that Ontario is interested only in wheat, but I can assure them that the farmers of Ontario at any rate are also greatly interested in many other products, including the one I have just referred to of eggs.

Mr BRETHEN: Would the hon. member inform the House what the respective prices of potatoes are in the United States and Canada to-day?

Mr. CHURCH: I am not an authority on the price of potatoes, and in any case it fluctuates considerably.

Mr. BRETHEN: In the market reports a week ago potatoes were quoted in the United States at $3 a barrel, and I think that the hon. gentleman who is sitting at my hon. friend's right (Mr. Spence) can tell him that potatoes in Toronto have been selling at from 75 to 85 and possibly 90 cents a bag, that is, about $1.50 a barrel.

Mr. CHURCH: As I say, I am not an expert on the question of potatoes, nor am I an expert on small potatoes either. I may say, however, that in the city from which I come it is impossible at the present time to get good potatoes at the prices quoted by the hon. gentleman. All the potatoes we can get are old potatoes, and the farmers in the Toronto district have not been growing them to any great extent. They have to import their potatoes mainly from New Brunswick, and I am glad to see them come from that province and as well from Alberta and the West; I prefer to see them come from these provinces rather than from the United States. So that it is absurd to talk about free trade in potatoes; the fact of the matter is that there is no market available in the United States for the potatoes grown in that country, to say nothing of our own. I repeat, the farmers of this country will agree with the minister in his tariff in so far as it seeks to protect this particular commodity. Now, of all our national purchases during the past year we obtained 69 per cent from the United States, selling them in return only 39 per cent of our own products. In view of that great discrepancy, I think that it is only the part of wisdom that the national policy of Canada should be maintained. Why should the United States be allowed, absolutely free and unchecked, to supply 69 per cent of the purchases of Canada when we can sell them only 39 per cent of our own goods? Why do we give them our market? We should preserve our own markets for the Canadian people. The same thing relates to butter. The farmers of the West, in Alberta and other places, require a home market for their butter. Alberta butter sells at 31 cents in the East. The price of New Zealand butter is 27 cents, and there is a duty imposed upon it of 4 cents. In my opinion the government should try to hold this market for the western farmers by increasing the duty from 4 to 8 or 10 cents.

I sympathize with a great deal that has been said about the West, and no one, I assure the House, would be more pleased than myself to see that great land succeed. I do not agree with the gloomy tone of some of the speeches regarding farming conditions in the West which were delivered in the course of the debate on the immigration policy of the government. No country in the world has such a magnificent record for wheat production as western Canada—the granary of the Empire. The fertility of its soil and the industry of its people are responsible for this great record. Every year hundreds of men go out west to help in the harvesting operations, which extend over a period of about three months. The majority of these harvesters then return eastward. Many of them have suggested to me that it would be a national benefit if either the federal or provincial authorities would formulate a policy under which these harvesters could be provided by the farmers with proper housing accommodation and the farmers encouraged to engage in mixed farming so that they might find employment for these harvesters the year round. An hon. member from the Maritime provinces in this debate said quite recently that our western farmers would get much better results from mixed farming as a side line to grain growing.

Therefore it seems to me that it would be well worth while for the government to consider this suggestion and, if feasible, adopt it. Certainly no manufacturer who attempted to conduct his business by running it for only three months in every twelve could hope to be successful; and I think the same principle applies to the business of farming.

Every country in the world to-day is veering round from free trade to protection—even the Mother Country. England to-day is the dumping ground for the surplus production of the world, and as a result very large numbers of her workmen are suffering acutely from unemployment. For lack of protection British industries have been seriously crippled by German competition, and if it were not for the French invasion of the Ruhr, England to-day would be flooded with German goods. It was not the union of free trade and Cobdenism that gave England her greatest industrial expansion; it was the union of steel and coal. Happily England to-day is becoming somewhat of a protectionist country, and some of our free trade friends were very much surprised to learn a few days ago that she imposes a duty of 5 cents per pound on sugar. Quite recently a thoughtful writer expressed himself in these terms:

Victims of Free Trade

Photography saddens the hearts of British-loving Canadians with its representation of the agricultural laborers who are out on strike in Norfolk, England. The camera does not lie and the truth of photography paints these English agricultural laborers as they are. The strikers are of the old English yeoman stock. They are big of body, simple of heart. They are hard-working fathers, brothers and husbands who love England and ask no more than the right to live and die as toilers on the land of their birth. They are on strike for a guarantee that their toil will never be requited with a smaller wage than approximately $6 per week.

Ill fares the land to hastening ills a prey,
Where free trade accumulates and men decay.

There is more truth than poetry in that couplet, Mr. Speaker. To-day the agricultural labourer in England is suffering from unemployment and poverty; a disappointing condition to be reduced to after his fine record in the war.

[Mr. Church.]

I am opposed to the amendment introduced by my Progressive friends because I believe in the principle of protection. I believe we should develop our home market for the benefit of our workmen and our manufacturers. There should be reciprocal treatment between the farmer and the manufacturer. The farmer is protected in relation to his wheat, potatoes, dairy products and so forth. Why should not the basic industries of our cities and towns be given equal protection? If the government could only discover two or three basic industries every year and give them adequate protection a great boon would be conferred on the country. I am glad to see that the present administration is giving encouragement to two or three important industries, and I believe the country will be all the better pleased with the budget on this account.

At a time when thousands of our skilled labourers are suffering from lack of employment and emigrating to the United States it is of vital importance that we should encourage our industries In the place of the skilled men we are bringing in unskilled labourers, whom we shall have to support to a certain extent until they get on their feet. Would it not be better for the three parties to remedy this anomalous condition by bending their united energies to the development of our basic industries and encourage the entry of immigrants who will develop our vast farming areas? The United States started as an agricultural country. Naturally the farmer there wanted a home market, and therefore the government encouraged industrial development. The Americans traded with each other and sang, "My Country' Tis of Thee".

In Canada we sing, "O Canada" and then weep over the procession of our sons as they leave their home land to find work in the States. The trouble is this country is filled with idealists who would like to make a living without working; others of a different kind are professors in our universities and some outside.

That we are capable of untold industrial development is apparent from the skill our workmen and indeed our women displayed in the manufacture of munitions of war, although they had had very little training in this particular work. This country can be developed industrially to as great an extent as any of the European countries if we pay the same wages as are current elsewhere. But it is not the intention of the government or of the manufacturers to put our workmen in the same position as the workmen of Europe.

Take the case of wool. We have the facilities in this country for combing wool, and we can excel them all. But we have a minimum wage for the protection of our workmen, therefore we should protect the manufacturer and be able to keep our industries at home. Wool is a basic commodity, and we should do everything we can to put the wool industry on its feet, rather than burden it by heavy sales taxes. This industry is subject to what is known in the sales tax to a pyramid of five so far as the application of the sales tax is concerned. I say that some protection should be afforded to the wool industry. The same as hemp and other matters in the present tariff.

Everyone admits that we require more people in Canada, but thousands of skilled workmen are at present leaving this country to go to the United States where industries are protected. In other words, while Canada is paying immigrants and unskilled labour to come into the country by one door, people whom we shall have to aid until they get on their feet, the other door is open and large numbers of skilled workmen, persons who were developed at the expense of the country, are now going over to the United States. In the small town of Trenton on the north shore of lake Ontario it has been reported by one of the hydro inspectors that thirty householders have given him notice to cut off their direct current because they were leaving the town. If our industries were protected, such a thing as that would not happen. I believe the Minister of Finance is sympathetic along these lines, and I hope that when we go into committee on the budget resolutions he will extend the boon of protection to such a basic industry as that to which I have just been referring. We had a debate in the House some months ago in the course of which the Progressives urged that view very strongly. I concur in what was said on that occasion; I believe the Progressives have the right idea so far as that particular commodity is concerned.

Various reasons have been given for the exodus of these skilled workers to the United States. There are some hon. members in this House who blame the tariff for everything except the weather. In my opinion the tariff is not responsible for the departure of these workers from Canada, because practically the same condition of affairs prevails in England where they have free trade. Canada is a great agricultural country. Climate, after all is said and done, has something to do with this situation. We are to-day at the door of one of the greatest industrial countries in the world, the United States—a great young men's country—and entrance through that door promises success to our young men. High taxation has had something to do with these people leaving the country and unemployment, but there are many other economic reasons, and on the whole you cannot blame the tariff for it.

One of the main causes of the present depression is the chaotic condition of the world to-day. You cannot read any bank statement about finance, industry, trade or commerce without seeing how closely the economic problems of Canada are related to those of other countries, and that is one of the chief reasons for the depression—namely our economic connection with Europe and the rest of the world. Another reason for the existing depression is high taxation, the high prices of manufactured goods and of their distribution. Some hon. gentlemen on my left have said that the United States is a free trade country. It is not a free trade country; it is one of the most highly protective countries there is in the world to-day, and they are increasing this protection. There is the Fordney-McCumber bill, and if you go through the list of articles from "acid" to "zinc" you find that the rates of protection average from 20 to 35 per cent, and that on some commodities they go as high as 50 or 60 per cent. You notice that we cannot sell them any wheat, because if we try to do so we are met with a duty of 35 cents a bushel. We cannot sell them any cattle or woollen garments, on account of the prohibited duties. The same applies to cutlery. Situated as we are, then, how can we hope to succeed on a free trade policy? It is obvious that the tariff, therefore, should not be a political question.

A popular subject in this House and out of it is economy. But the government collect the revenue not merely because they want to collect it but because they need the money in order to finance the ordinary affairs of the country. The Finance Minister, who is a well known economist, has been doing his best to effect some economy, and he has succeeded in some ways. But it is one thing to preach economy and it is another thing to practise it. It is interesting in this connection to compare the conditions in Canada with those in the United States, Great Britain and France. We in Canada have a deficit for this year of $57,000,000. Great Britain has a surplus of £101,000,000, and the Finance committee of the French Senate have adopted the report of the chairman of the committee on the budget for the current year which balances the budget and shows an estimated surplus of four billion francs. The United States also has reduced expenditure, in that respect copying the admirable example of France and the Mother Country. Hon. gentlemen to the left preach economy, and in the resolution they have presented in amendment there is a clause which deals with economy. One of the speakers, the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bancroft), the other day blamed the present government for not having practised economy. Let me point out to the Progressives that we have in Ontario a farmer government, the Drury government; how have they practised economy? One of the principal planks in the platform of the United Farmers of Ontario was that if they attained office there would be economy, there would be reduction of capital and maintenance expenditures and so on. But the fact is that the Farmer government in Ontario have increased the capital debt of the province from $97,000,000 to $247,000,000 in three years. When the Drury government came into power in the fall of 1919 the ordinary expenditures were $21,464,574. In 1922, after three years of administration, the maintenance charges for ordinary expenditure had increased to $37,442,985. In other words, even the farmers' administration did not practise what it preached in this particular respect.

I want to refer for a moment to the budget of the Right Hon. Stanley Baldwin, British Chancellor of the Exchequer—whose budget and financial statement every country in the world would do well to imitate. The fact is that we have to look to the mother of parliaments for an example of how to conduct business on a business basis—in time of peace. In four years of peace the British government has reduced taxation by one-third and has cut ordinary expenditure by one-half. You remember that there was a committee presided over by Sir Eric Geddes for the purpose of cutting down estimates. In four years of peace Canada, on the other hand, has increased its revenue from taxation by one-tenth, and there has been a minor increase in expenditure. Great Britain has reduced its taxes; so has the United States; so has France. Great Britain has reduced expenditure; Canada and its provinces have increased expenditure. Great Britain has reduced her debt and annual interest charges, like the United States and France; Canada has increased the debt and the annual interest charges. The first clause in the Right Hon. Stanley Baldwin's budget was a most sanguine and optimistic diagnosis of the nation's financial and commercial health. He was able to tell the country of the steady improvement in trade and commerce and to express hope for the future. He believed that the country was still experiencing a series of transition years but had passed the peak of depression. The first thing he did was to take sixpence off the income tax, which was reduced to 4s. 6d. per pound sterling. Then he reduced the corporation tax by one-half and made a reduction of one penny a pint on beer. The British budget promised a progressive and substantial decrease in high taxation. The surplus there this year was £36,000,000. Last year's surplus of £101,000,000 went towards the reduction of the national debt. Trade at home and abroad has improved so far as Great Britain is concerned and unemployment as a result has become less. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, like our own Finance Minister, was disappointed because he was not able to make greater reductions in taxation including levies on tea, sugar and similar commodities.

The Liberal and Labour parties in England have been clamouring for "the free breakfast table," and they have been taking some steps towards that in the Mother Country. Here luxuries are more lightly taxed but the necessaries of life are heavily taxed

We have not made the progress in this country towards the free breakfast table that one would like to see, and no one would like to see it better than the Finance Minister himself, I am sure. Coal, for instance, enters into the cost of the breakfast table in this country. It is required to prepare the food on the table. Coal has increased to $15.50 per ton in Canada. Bread, milk, tea, meat, bacon, eggs, butter, vegetables, almost everything has increased. Talk about prices being reduced, it is a wonder to me how the average toiler in the city lives at all owing to the shrinkage in the purchasing power of the dollar.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer holds out hope also for a reduction in sugar. He recommends a reduction in postal charges, telephone rates and telephone calls, and the British government are considering a tax on betting. I am sorry that nothing has been done to reduce the postal rates in Canada. I believe that a large increase in business would flow from reducing the ordinary postage rate from three to two cents, and drop letters from two to one cent. I believe the increase of business that would flow from such a reduction would create a large surplus for the Post Office Department.

I am sorry too that we have not adopted the British principle recommended by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who stresses the importance of the utmost possible reduction of the national debt, because after all, there will be enough debt for posterity to pay when their time comes. Mr. Baldwin says:

> Nothing eased the finding of capital for industry more than the public policy of redeeming the public debt.

Why cannot we do this in Canada? The surplus, he says, comes from the best of all causes, namely, reduced expenditure, which I am sorry we have not been able to effect in Canada. He promises to bring about further economies next year, and then goes on to say that the huge yield from death duties, which we call succession duties in this country, for the next three years, is going to be applied solely to sinking fund purposes to reduce the national debt. For 1924 Great Britain will still be raising the huge sum of £700,000,000 in taxation. In conclusion, he deals with the reserve, and says that there is no rise in the purchasing power of the population but that the consumption of tea, tobacco and spirits is falling off and likely to go even lower. He says that it is useless to further reduce taxation at the cost of debt reduction, and I believe that what he says is financially sound and in accordance with the views of the most eminent financiers in England to-day, and Canada should adopt such a policy.

"Failure to reduce the debt means insolvency," says the Chancellor of the Exchequer. and he has the authority of eminent financiers for that. So there is little prospect of further relief for the taxpayer in the Motherland, and even in Canada, unless some new sources of revenue can be found. Here in this country we are going behind some $57,000,000, and next year it will be approximately $60,000,000 or $70,000,000, so some new sources of revenue will have to be found in this country also.

I want to refer to two other matters before I conclude. I am sorry there has not been some reduction in the income tax. In the city from which I come two income tax bills have been handed out this month. On the 30th of April everybody had to pay income tax to the federal government. Then on the 18th of May the city treasurer sent out an income tax bill which must be paid in one instalment, so the people of that city, many of whom are only of the middle class working people, will have a double-header income tax to pay this month in 18 days.

They will have to give a cheque for the full amount of the city tax bill, because it is payable in one instalment without any rebate, and then they will have to pay two and three instalments to the federal government in order to save the discount. There should be some co-ordination between the federal and municipal authorities in regard to the 9 p.m. collection of income tax. I understand that the total income tax collected this year will be about $72,000,000. I think it was stated at $60,000,000, but there was an under calculation of about $12,000,000. I think we should copy the example of England next year and do something towards reducing the income tax. I think there should be no federal income tax on incomes of less than four or five thousand dollars. I have seen school teachers in the city of Toronto struggling to make a living on a small salary, some of them getting only $2,000 after working for years, and then having to pay an income tax to the federal authorities and the city also. I am sorry to see that. I think the smaller salaries should be exempted from federal income tax anyway.

Now I come to the question of cigarettes. I was talking to some dealers in Toronto on this subject, and I recently saw a despatch from Toronto in local papers, dated the 14th of May last, to this effect:

> Prominent cigar and tobacco dealers here say the increase of one and a half per cent in the general sales tax will practically offset the reduction from 7½ to 6 per cent in excise duty.

Cigarettes are very heavily taxed, and since the war they are no longer the luxury they might be regarded before the war. They are now smoked by soldiers and all classes in this country, and in my opinion they have been taxed too much altogether. I understand that the tax is now six dollars per thousand in Canada, four dollars per thousand in Great Britain, and three and one-half per thousand in the United States.

Now I come to the question of sugar. In my opinion the whole of the reduction in sugar duties will go straight to New York. Why do I say that? I do not want to be unfair to the government, because I think the minister is endeavouring to do the best he can in the matter of sugar reductions. But Stanley Baldwin says so. Let me quote what the Right Hon. Stanley Baldwin said in his budget about sugar. He declined to take off any of the duty on sugar. He left it untouched and explained his action by saying that he thought it highly improbable that the consumer would be the gainer by any reduction for more than a short time. A reduction in the tax would lead to an increased demand, which would raise the world price and the money sacrificed by the exchequer would go straight into the pockets of producers and dealers. He goes on to say:

When it became obvious that the Cuban sugar crop was going to be far below the estimate, prices began to move up strongly week by week until on Tuesday last the price was 30s. 3d. per cwt. or three times more than in January, 1922. This rise was caused entirely because so far as could be seen there was actually going to be a shortage of sugar this year, and the slightest increase in demand might easily cause a panic and send up prices far beyond that.

That was the position, and it was well known in commercial circles. He had information that the increase of sowing in the continental countries of Europe stimulated by higher prices was as much as from 25 to 40 per cent so that as far as they could see by the turn of next year there should be cheaper world sugar and when that came it would be the time to reduce the duty. (Ministerial cheers). But if he were to reduce the duty in this budget the whole of that reduction would go straight to New York, and he was not going to do it. (Ministerial cheers). It would be a very easy thing for him to have proposed this reduction, and said in public that sugar was cheaper by the amount of the reduction of the duty. Let those members who might believe that to be true say it; but he did not believe it to be true, and therefore he was not going to say it. (Ministerial cheers).

Excise duties on tea and sugar put $200,000,000 per annum into the Old Country treasury. Every half-cent per pound taken off the Old Country sugar duties reduces the revenue by aproximately $25,000,000 per annum. The Old Country sugar duty is four and three-quarter cents per pound. The British Chancellor of the Exchequer refused to take the fraction of a cent per pound off the English sugar duties because Mr. Baldwin said: "The whole of that reduction will go straight to New York."

So when the Minister of Finance takes $2,500,000 or a half a cent a pound off the Canadian duty on sugar the whole of that reduction will go straight to New York and Stanley Baldwin says so.

The excise duties on tea and sugar in the Old Country amounted to $200,000,000 and if the Chancellor of the Exchequer had made a reduction of half a cent a pound in the duty on sugar it would have taken off twenty-five millions from the breakfast table of the sugar consumers of that country. But the British Chancellor refused to make that reduction because he said the whole of it would go straight to New York. I believe the whole of the reduction of 2½ millions on the sugar duties which has been made under our budget will go straight to New York also.

Another matter which is much discussed in the cities and towns of the country, especially among the retail merchants, is the tax on receipts. The Finance Minister said that the British Chancellor has retained this tax and that he is going to retain it also. Some labour organizations in this country have characterized this tax as an imposition on the people. Owing to the development of the banking system in this country there are branch banks in every city and town. Conditions have changed from what they were twenty-five years ago. Formerly working people received their wages in bills; to-day they are paid by cheque. Most of the workers have a bank account in the district in which they live. They pay all their bills, their rent, their groceries, their food, and so on, by cheque. To-day if you go to a retail man and ask him to send you a receipt he will not do it. He will explain to you the reason for that and then you will not ask him to do it. The result is that this tax is being evaded and the government are losing in each case two cents on the postage. There was no loss under the old way of doing things because receipts were forwarded by mail and required a postage of two cents. To-day you can forward a cheque which requires a stamp of two cents on it up to $50 and by the Bills of Exchange Act in this country a cheque is the equivalent of a receipt. The dealer will explain to you now that your cheque is a receipt and he will not give you a written receipt in payment of your account because it will cost him two cents, and as many of these men have several thousand customers it would represent a very heavy tax on them. I am sorry an amendment has not been made in this regard because I consider that the stamp tax should operate on the same principle as the income tax. In the case of the latter the bigger the income the bigger the tax, but the receipt tax is not graduated in the same way. It should be on the same basis as the income tax if you desire to have a receipt tax of an equitable character. In my opinion in the case of both the receipt tax and the cheque tax exemption from these taxes should be given until an amount of $500 is reached. This would give the man of small salary a chance. At present he is taxed to death by the federal, provincial and municipal authorities. He and his family cannot go to a moving picture show without having to pay a provincial tax, an amusement tax under the guise of a war tax. I contend that the provincial amusement tax is illegal because by section 91 of the British North America Act, Militia and Defence matters are under the jurisdiction of the Dominion. If the legality of this tax were contested I think it would be found that the tax is ultra vires of the provincial legislature. I am sorry that the Minister of Finance has not contested that particular point. As I say, the men of moderate income are taxed to death and I am sorry that some relief has not been given to them in the budget through a modification of the tax on cheques and receipts.

I am glad to see the government giving direct tariff aid to such products as copper bars, hemp, wool and artificial silk in the manner in which they are, but I think the bounty insufficient in some cases especially in the case of hemp. It will be very difficult indeed to get the hemp industry on its feet unless the period of time is extended and the amount made a little larger. The hemp industry needs to be nursed very carefully in order to make a success. The farmers of the district where it is grown will have to be instructed in the best ways of cultivation, and it is going to take a long time to develop that industry. No doubt the reason for this action on the part of Canada is the failure of Russia as a source of supply. But the hemp industry is a peculiar one. It is affected by all classes of weather, and it is a problematic investment for the farmer. The same is not true of the copper bar industry because it is already well established. It is organized and is already functioning and there is likely to be a great deal of work to be done by the smelters. The copper bar industry does not depend upon weather conditions like the hemp industry. I commend the government for the good work they are doing with respect to these industries but I am sorry they did not extend the same measure of protection to wool. If the government wish to establish aid to a good basic industry—there is a combing mill at Trenton which could use a lot of raw material. The result would be we would have another addition to our basic industries and the allied industries which would grow up in connection with it would attract capital, provide employment for labour and give a market to the farmer. I would not advocate sending milk out of Canada to be made into butter and then brought back to the Dominion for home consumption. Yet this is what the government are compelling the farmer to do in the case of wool. That commodity is shipped out of Canada to be combed and then brought back into the Dominion for consumption because our legislation has not been framed with such wisdom as to look after the development of our natural resources. I hope some relief will be given in this direction when we go into committee.

I am sorry that no provision has been made in the budget for old age pensions. Unfortunately the war debt and the railway debt have made it impossible for many years to come to extend aid towards the improvement of the public health and the advancement of humanitarian work. In addition our soldiers and their dependents also have to be provided for. I think the matter of old age pensions should be taken up by the provinces and the municipalities and an agreement arrived at between them to afford relief in the shape of old age pensions similar to the relief now given in the province of Ontario in the form of mothers' pensions. In the case of mothers' pensions one-half the cost is borne by the municipality and one-half by the province, and it is one of the finest humanitarian works that I know of.

The railway situation in this country, Mr. Speaker, has been responsible for the great deficits in our finances. Were it not for the railway situation in Canada to-day we would have a good surplus and we would be facing an era of unparalleled prosperity. After granting $900,000,000 in direct and indirect aid to railways we are now met by an overdraft of $74,000,000. How this is arrived at I am unable to say. It is pretty nearly time parliament re-asserted itself with respect to our railways. If we are to have responsible government in this country we cannot allow the National Railway system to go on spending money in a capital way in the manner they are doing. There must be some control over the National Railway Board in respect to their capital commitments. The deficit in 1920 amounted to nearly $36,000,000. In 1921 the deficits on those railways was $16,000,000. In 1922 there was an operating surplus of $4,000,000 as against a deficit of $16,000,000 the year before. For this year the deficit is set down at $74,000,000. Wait until you see the deficit for next year. I am afraid it will greatly exceed $74,000,000. I hope the House will not pass the votes for railway expenditure without, at least, asking for details in connection with them.

It is time responsible government was restored in Canada, so far as the administration of the Canadian National Railways is concerned. The board should have a free hand in the actual administration of the road, but they should not spend money in a haphazard manner and should not be permitted to run up an overdraft of $74,000,000. In my opinion it was not necessary to go outside of Canada and appoint a president. We could have had a Canadian appointed to that position. President Beatty of the Canadian Pacific Railway is a Canadian and the chief engineer of that road is also a Canadian. The greatest engineers in the world constructed the Chippawa-Niagara plant. They are Canadians, they are graduates of Canadian universities, and I think there are a great many Canadians engaged in the management of the other gigantic power works of Canada. I think we might have found a good Canadian to take hold of the Canadian National Railways. However, not satisfied with appointing an outsider as president we find that they have brought out Colonel N. H. Balfour, as shown in the following despatch:

> Montreal, May 15,—Colonel N. H. Balfour, formerly assistant to Sir Henry Thornton in the work of the Great Eastern Railway in England, arrived here to-day to join Sir Henry as one of his assistants in the management of the Canadian National Railways here. He is accompanied by A. J. Thomas, son of the well-known English parliamentarian, and also a former assistant of Sir Henry on the Great Eastern Railway.

I think it is pretty nearly time that we should find Canadinas to take such positions. If we are going to have any efficiency in the railway system of this country we have got to adopt the principle of promotion. In the management of the New York Central, in the administration of the Great Pennsylvania lines and the Baltimore and Ohio road, the presidents have announced that promotion will be the method in administering these railways. Furthermore in the United States, I may remind hon. members that brakemen have worked their way up to be railway presidents. We find that condition of affairs in the administration of the United States roads, and the system adopted in that country should be good enough for a road which went behind sixty or seventy millions last year. We should adopt the principle of promotion in the administration of our railways and should not have to go to other countries when so many of our own people are out of work and being laid off by the Nationals.

I believe in Canada for the Canadians. I believe in a national policy for coal and for food, and I believe in a national policy in the administration of our railway system as well as in the administration of our merchant marine, and I cannot understand why we should have to go to England to appoint a president of our railway. Of course, I speak with every respect for Sir Henry Thornton because he has had so far no criticism in Canada, and we hope there will be very little criticism and that he will be given a fair chance. But I am surprised at his recommending the sale of the twenty-seven smaller ships of the merchant marine. I believe that with the deepening of the Welland canal these ships will be necessary for our commerce, and in view of the inquiry which has been held into the rates on lake shipping, we should have held the smaller ships, so as to bring them into competition with the shipping combine on the Great Lakes and regulate this monopoly. I believe it is a mistake to put them up for sale at the present time. They have not had a fair trial or chance.

There was a combine in regard to lake rates, and the shipping interests fixed rates for themselves and for others. The merchant marine also sat in when the Atlantic combine was at work. I am sorry these ships are to be sold, because I believe many of them could be used to bring coal from Wales and from the Maritime provinces to the head of the lakes and also to carry grain down the St. Lawrence to the seaboard. At the present time a few of them are not of the proper draught, but with the deepening of the Welland canal, they will have the proper draught. I am sorry to see the head of the railway system of Canada make the recommendation which he did without proper inquiry or giving a fair trial to the merchant marine.

I believe in the principle enunciated by the Right Hon. Stanley Baldwin that he should seek new sources of revenue from those not already taxed to make up the deficit. What about a tax on pulpwood exported from Canada? We exported to the United States in the year 1921 newsprint to the value of $62,820,000. A duty of 10 per cent ad valorem would produce the sum of $6,282,000. Then with reference to water powers, we exported 158,000 horse-power to the United States, to the value of $8,000,000. It was pointed out by the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Lapierre) and the hon. member for St. Marys (Mr. Deslauriers) that that would be a source of revenue. Referring to the question of coal, the bituminous and anthracite coal brought into Canada amounted to $56,000,000. I believe if we had a rate for Alberta coal and Nova Scotia coal a large part of that $56,000,000 would remain in Canada, and be paid as wages to our Canadian people. The National Railways of Canada quoted a price of $9 per ton, train load, for transporting coal from Alberta. They evidently would rather charge the $9 prohibitive rate and do no business than quote a $6 rate and get the cream of the business. If the Canadian Pacific Railway had adopted such a principle in business and had never taken a chance they never would have been as successful as they are to-day. They took chances and they made experiments with the rates with the result that they captured the trade and made a success of private ownership. They also made sucessful investments in ocean, hotel, land and oil services. If the National Railways will only have the courage to bring down the products of Alberta to the central provinces and use the merchant marine for that purpose, I believe a large volume of business will come and the deficit will be wiped out. I do not agree with the gloomy view taken by some hon. members in the speeches which have been made. Agricultural depression is not a local matter; it is a problem which exists all over the world.

Thomas Bradshaw, the veteran head of the Massey-Harris Company, Toronto, and formerly the ablest and best city treasurer Toronto ever had, gave evidence before the Agricultural committee in Ottawa. I believe there is an Agricultural committee in the United States investigating conditions of the farming industry. We have an Agricultural committee in England and we have a similar committee in Canada holding inquiries with a view to improving the condition of the farmers. I agree with Mr. Bradshaw, and I will quote from his evidence. He says before the House of Commons special committee on Agriculture:

> This committee has been investigating agricultural conditions in Canada with a view to discovering what, if any, steps can be taken to improve the position of the farmer, and in concluding this evidence, it may perhaps not be out of order to express just a few thoughts along these lines.
> Now, I returned from Europe not very long ago, and was over there for quite a little time, and therefore had an opportunity of finding out what the people were saying about Canada, how they were feeling.
>
> In the first place, it appears to me that it is most unfortunate that so much emphasis has been laid upon, and publicity given to the so-called agricultural depression in Canada. It seems to me that it has had a bad effect upon our own people, in putting them in a state of mind where pity rather than self-help occupies their attention; and it has greatly weakened Canada's position abroad. She does not now appear a desirable home to emigrants, as compared with Australia and South Africa which have been painting their own charms in no uncomplimentary way; her credit has been undermined, for who cares to deal with a nation apparently thought to be approaching bankruptcy; and her future jeopardized, since the seed of doubt once sown grows vigorously.
>
> I know this from actual experience, because while I have not been in the agricultural machinery business very long, I have been connected with the business of loaning money to the farmer since 1897, and I have been up and down the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Alberta, on the actual farms, talking to the farmers and making loans to them, and I am still associated with two or three companies making loans to western farmers, and I have had an opportunity of knowing just exactly how they are situated.
>
> As a matter of fact, agriculture at the present period is no more depressed than it has been at other times in the past, and, moreover, it is far from being a local condition. It is as widespread in the East as in the West; it affects the United States as well as Canada; it is a feature of agriculture in the eastern hemisphere as in the western. An "Agricultural Tribunal of Investigation" has been sitting in England and has just brought in its report upon agricultural conditions in Great Britain. In passing, it may be noted that it is evident from its report that artificial restoratives are few.
>
> By Mr. Caldwell:
> Q. What was their report, was it rosy?—A. No, it was not rosy, it was not good, but at the same time it was believed that the only way conditions could be improved was by what I think we have all got to do, and that is, we have to work hard, have patience, and have courage.

I find that the report of the Agricultural committee is backed up in a report along similar lines brought down in the United States by the Anderson committee of the senate and congress, a joint committee that had been investigating agricultural conditions in the United States. They have gone into the question thoroughly, having made a most extensive inquiry at Washington, through a joint agricultural committee of congress and senate, under the chairmanship of the Hon. Sidney Anderson, the member for Minnesota. They investigated the problem of rural credits, the question of rural depopulation, the matter of high prices, and so forth, and submitted an exhaustive report. In that report they reached the conclusion that there is not a single factor in the complex modern price structure which can be said to be primarily responsible for the spread between producers' and consumers' prices. The report goes on to state:

> The growth of cities is another factor in higher costs to their inhabitants. The congestion of traffic and physical difficulties that attach to city delivery are increased as population grows.

They find practically along the lines of the British committee that agricultural depression is world wide and can be little helped by legislation.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I want to express my regret that in the budget which the minister has submitted to the House on this occasion he has deemed it fit to make reference to the question of reciprocity. After all is said and done, I do not believe that the people of this country believe in reciprocity. A vote was taken upon this question in the year 1911 when the public of Canada expressed its opinion in no uncertain voice, and if the Minister of Finance had left that recommendation out of his budget I think that the statement which he has given to the House and to the country on this occasion would have commended itself better to the people. The amendment moved by the Progressive party also refers to reciprocity with the United States as outlined in the Reciprocity Agreement of 1911 Reciprocity with the United States is impossible. The Harding administration are going to the country next year, and with the farmer bloc in the United States they have decided that free trade and reciprocity would be impossible. I do not believe that it would commend itself to the judgment of the American people. We know what happened to the Taft administration. Reciprocity would carry just as many American states as President Taft carried at the election of 1912. Vermont and Utah were the only two states that voted for the author of the reciprocity offer. The presidential election results that defeated Taft were associated with congressional election results that would have destroyed reciprocity. There has been no mandate from the Canadian people, Mr. Speaker, for any overtures in the direction of reciprocity, and I do not believe that this reference in the budget will meet with the approval of the Canadian people.

Mr. W. S. REED (Frontenac): I need hardly say, Mr. Speaker, that this is the first occasion on which I shall have spoken in this House, and before I say anything else I want to contribute a word of commendation to what has been said regarding the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), with whom I would couple the name of the hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham). These two hon. gentlemen, practically throughout their business careers, have been more or less all the time before the public of Canada, and in my opinion they have certainly rendered this country a great service.

I would refer first of all to the rural mail system, not particularly by way of complaint, because I think it is generally recognized that existing conditions in Canada to-day will not permit of that complete service which the people would no doubt desire. There are a few connecting links in the county that sent me here which we should like to see completed as soon as financial conditions will permit. I want it to be understood, however, that I am not pleading for the county of Frontenac alone; the same privilege which I ask for that county I should be pleased to see extended from the Atlantic to the Pacific wherever it is needed.

I do not think I need dwell further on this subject, but I might say a word or two on the question of immigration, principally for the purpose of bringing to the attention of the House the state of things as they prevail near my home. I do not know the conditions as they are in the cities, but I can say that in the rural part of my riding there is not one man to every hundred acres, and with such a condition we cannot very well carry on the business of the country. I am glad therefore to hear the Acting Minister of Immigration (Mr. Stewart) inform the House of his intention to do something to improve this condition.

So far as public works are concerned, we know, of course that a great deal of money has to be spent in this department, and I think I speak for all hon. members when I say that we have called upon that department from every corner for assistance in regard to the works that have to be carried on in connection with harbours, wharves and so forth. But I think we have a minister who is capable of discharging the duties that are before him.

I want now to refer for a moment or two to the railway situation, but I shall not deal with that subject at any great length; it is needless for me to go over the ground that has been covered by the last speaker (Mr. Church). I believe that, with the present minister, and with the board as it is constituted to-day, this department of the public service will make good, and I think it is the duty of every Canadian to do what he can towards this end.

During the course of this debate we have heard a great deal about the national debt, and I think that those of us who have been following the trend of events know what is responsible for our obligations. I may be wrong, and if I am I am ready to be corrected; but I thought I heard it stated across the floor of the House that the interest alone was $140,000,000.

Now, from east to west there are many problems with which the Canadian people must grapple. We have heard a great deal about the wonderful natural resources of British Columbia, its great timber, its fish, and so forth; but I must confess that never having been either in the East or in the West, I am really ignorant of western conditions. In the course of the debates of this session we have noticed that the members from British Columbia, irrespective of their party affiliations, are all agreed on the gravity of the oriental question and the proper way to deal with it.

Now I come to Alberta. I am sorry that we do not hear any very good reports from the members representing that province regarding conditions in the rural sections. Some day I intend to take a trip to the West, but I do not care to go where conditions are so difficult. I hope they will improve. Nor are the conditions what we would expect them to be in Saskatchewan and Manitoba. When we recall the illimitable coal measures, the vast wheat fields, the great cattle ranches and the rich, natural resources of these western provinces, it is apparent that something must be wrong when their economic condition is so unsatisfactory. We hope to hear better things of the West as a whole in the near future.

In the great provinces of Ontario and Quebec we find some of our most important urban centres and our principal industrial development. Consequently there is not the same dependence on agriculture as we find in the western provinces, and therefore the depressed condition of our basic industry has not reacted so severely on the people generally. Lastly, we have the Maritime provinces. Their distance from the central and western portions of the Dominion places them at a decided disadvantage commercially, and naturally we want to assist them in every possible way.

In all we are a family of nine provinces, each with its advantages and also corresponding disadvantages, and it should be the purpose of our administrative authorities to so legislate as to give an equal chance to all of us. Wise legislation will accomplish this purpose. But whatever may be done for our social and economic advancement, our paramount duty is to see that our rising generation are afforded such educational opportunities in our schools and colleges that they may take their place and in due time assist in the development of this great Dominion.

Mr. H. A. FORTIER (Labelle) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, those years of the Great War were the cause of a deep disturbance both in the economic and national life of our country. As we gradually emerge from the gloom of this never to be forgotten period of our history, we more vividly realize the extent of the spontaneous sacrifices made, resulting from the participation of this young country in the greatest world war of all times.

The Liberal party became heir, in December 1921, to a rather burdensome estate. Called upon to take charge of the administration of affairs in this country, the present government found itself facing an enormous public debt which the years following the war had but increased through considerable yearly loans so as to meet the ever increasing deficits. Moreover, our predecessors had further added to our obligations, the burden of state management of the National Railways which yearly showed large deficits. All the taxes that a country may be burdened with, our predecessors had imposed.

Yet, all the sources of revenue and all the heaviest levies bearing upon the Canadian subject, henceforth, taxed to the utmost limit, could not balance our budget. Briefly, this was the situation of our finances when the present government took hold of power in December, 1921.

Two things were absolutely necessary to the good administration of affairs in this country: a strict economy and moderation, that is to say a gradual return to pre-war conditions. I think the present government has practised economy and this accounts for the success of this administration which has already begun to greatly improve our financial situation by solving the problem by which we shall soon see the end of our deficits. We now fully hope, in the near future, to see the return of those prosperous years of the Laurier government.

The late government, during the years that followed armistice, up to the end of their term in office, had borrowed nearly $1,000,000,000. The interest alone of these war loans amounted to about $50,000,000. We cannot take into account the fiscal year of 1921-1922, as being the first fiscal year of the Liberal administration for the greater part of it was under the administration of our predecessors. The first fiscal term which could be attributed to the present government would therefore be that of 1922-1923. It is true that during that period the Minister of Finance admitted that he had been constrained to borrow the sum of $49,000,000, however, we have grounds to console ourselves to some extent, in the fact that this loan was not any greater, for it only makes up the amount required to pay off the interest on the loans made by our predecessors, from armistice day up to the time they were driven out of power. The present estimates attest a considerable decrease in expenditures and the management of our railways which are on the mend, allows us to hope that the patriotic efforts of those at the helm of the country will succeed in restoring our financial equilibrium. I have faith in the comforting forecasts of the Minister of Finance and I again state it is only through these principles of economy and cautiousness that the government may overcome the financial difficulties which have, up to date, seemed to us insurmountable Guided by these wise principles, the government has already made an effort to reduce the irksome burden of taxation. True to its programme, it has already brought on tariff changes in a downward revision of duties. I especially rejoice in seeing that, at this stage of the session, offers are made by the Liberal government to the United States toward a resumption of the negotiations for a trade convention such as we were intent on securing in 1911. I think that had we not rejected the offer of our powerful neighbours, in 1911; had we ratified this advantageous trade convention for the exchange of agricultural products with the United States; Canada would certainly be more prosperous and would even be more united than it is to-day. This exchange of agricultural products with our neighbours would be to the advantage of both countries. Had we carried out this trade convention of 1911, I again state that we would now be better off than we are at present, however, since the Minister of Finance, in the eloquent speech he made the other day, declared that the wish of Canada was to carry out this trade convention with the United States, we do hope that our neighbours will not lend a deaf ear to our offer. If we, to-day, read the newspapers which reach us from across the 45th parallel, if we listen to those in authority in the United States who have expressed their views, we can say that the appeal made by the Minister of Finance will not be a vain one, and that to-morrow perhaps, we may, for the exchange of certain products, carry out this trade convention which will certainly be to the advantage of both countries, but especially to that of Canada, the pre-eminently agricultural country, which feels the want, in consequence of the development of its great natural resources, of engrossing the friendship of our neighbours and bringing about a trade treaty with them.

Canada has not its equal so far as its natural resources are concerned. Its farms, mines, forests, fisheries and industrial products forever increasing, place her henceforth in a position to seek advantageously trade relations with American countries, Europe and all the dominions of Great Britain. It is to the Liberal party's credit to have granted this British preference which increases the exchange of our products with those of the Mother Country, and which has been a great help in maintaining and developing, especially in our old provinces, one of our important agricultural industries: the dairy industry, destined to bring wealth to our farms in this part of Canada. It is again to our party's credit to have further increased this British preference and thus anticipated the wishes of the Canadian people. It is with the object of furthering our trade and industries, so necessary to the work of reconstruction, that our government is negotiating a trade convention with Australia. This government, moreover, has happily negotiated a new trade convention with both France and Italy. France of late years has been looking to our country; we are continuously present in her mind, and as the ancestor, she comes to us with the tender feeling evoked by long separation. Should not we, her descendants, united to her people by the ties of kinship, respond to such overtures from the old Motherland, and proclaim that we have sought her in the course of our national existence, with the sincerity which springs from true hearts and inspired by our historical motto "Je me souviens." France came to us in those never-to-be-forgotten days of June, 1921, when the Fayolle mission, composed of the most illustrious Frenchmen, landed on our soil to officially present to the government of Canada the venerated statue of France, by Rodin. This statue now rests here, in the capital of Canada, under the roof of this parliamentary building, and one may say that the image of the old Motherland shines brightly from the promontory of Ottawa, on all the horizons of the Dominion of Canada. Has she not since made, to the Canadian nation, the highly apreciated gift of 250 acres of land on Vimy ridge? This patch of French soil, made illustrious through the heroism of the sons of Canada during the Great War, now encloses the glorious remains of those who have fallen on the battlefields. The government will erect there a monument commemorative of the great deeds of its children. In the centuries to come, this sacred spot across the seas will for ever remind the sons of New France grown old of the grateful feelings of the older Motherland. After this event the souvenir of which is very dear to us, France still remembered us and we remembered her through this trade convention which Parliament has just ratified. This treaty would give new life to business and would help us to bear up with fortitude through this period of after-war by relieving the financial situation and helping us to carry over the enormous deficits of our National Railways.

One of the most important tasks to which the present members of the government must give their entire attention, is certainly the management of our National Railways. A gigantic enterprise which, last year, showed a deficit of $67,000,000, a deficit borne by the tax-payers of this country. However, by devoting their energies to the great task of managing a railway system which is the largest in the world, the government must rely on the public's good-will, their united effort and on the sympathy of all the citizens of this country.

I congratulate the Government for having appointed very able men to fill the important posts of directors of the National Railway Board. I especially congratulate them for having placed at the head of the board, Sir Henry Thornton, a man of wide experience, an able man, one who possesses to a high degree the genius of administration, and who, I feel confident, will make a success of the important work in connection with the National Railways. With such men, backed by a public-spirited administration—which should give us the assurance of a fair trial being given to public ownership,—I am certain that our railways will become one of the most important items in the assets of the State and will constitute one of the most reliable means of contributing to the development of our country.

In a young country like Canada, with an unlimited stretch of land, natural resources of incomparable wealth, it is necessary that the railway should closely accompany and sometimes precede the important work of colonization. Take for example the prairie provinces. The immense plains of La Vérendrye remained unsettled as long as the railway had not encircled with its steel ribbon the matchless wheat fields. From the valleys of the Red river and the Assiniboine, the settler found his way to those rich lands that now grace the prosperous cities of Portage-la-Prairie, Regina, Saskatoon, Prince Albert, Calgary and Edmonton. Saskatchewan and Alberta rose in the middle West as if by enchantment, two provinces which sprang up some fifteen years ago, the happy result of agricultural settlement made possible by the railway. Further away, on the shores of the Pacific ocean, there exists a province, famous for the incomparable beauty of its scenery and the mildness of its climate, rich through its unrivalled national resources. "Splendor sine occasu" appears on its blazon. She finds this splendor in the development of agriculture through the colonization of her fertile valleys. The three transcontinental railways which cross the Rocky mountains are admirably adapted to the opening up of settlements and to the building of towns. Already wheat is begining to flow from Alberta to the port of Vancouver. In the East as in the West the transportation facilities are always the most powerful means of developing the economic resources of our country. In the eastern provinces, in our old province of Quebec, it is through the railways and the work accomplished by Laurier, namely the construction of his transcontinental that we have been able to witness the opening up of this beautiful and immense region of Abitibi. That territory would still be covered with virgin forests if we had not built this railway which was the means of spreading French civilization beyond the Laurentian mountains. It may be said in certain quarters that this is very unwise expenditure. I, however, think that it is absolutely necessary for a young country, and we, the political heirs of those who accomplished this so important task of the construction of the transcontinental, which permitted the rapid development of the Abitibi region, one of the best of the province of Quebec, we should the more appreciate the National Railways. Indeed, is it not the work of railways which has contributed the most to the extension of settlements? Is it not the railways which have contributed the most in settling and enlarging the magnificent county of Labelle? We may, perhaps, have more deficits for a few years, but we should not weaken in the task. So far as I am concerned, deficits do not frighten me, because I am convinced that later on we shall be proud of the great achievement accomplished by the railways. Thanks to them, Canada made progress and I again state, I do not fear the deficits, providing that our railways contribute to the expansion and prospertity of our country.

I therefore state that all the provinces of the Dominion must lend their most generous co-operation and most effective help to the government so that this important work of the management of our railways may become a financial success and at the same time a powerful lever to the development of the country through colonization. One cannot broach the subject of colonization without awakening in our mind the problem of the day, the recruiting of settlers, or in other words, immigration. Let me, Mr. Speaker, dwell for a few moments on two other necessary elements of colonization, namely, the lands fit for colonization and the assistance to be extended to the settler. The immigration problem comprises three distinct features. The first is to find land fit for cultivation; the second is to provide for the settler; and, the third is to find that settler who will make his home on such lands and will later become a good Canadian citizen. As regards settlers' lands, they are almost inexhaustible in this country, from ocean to ocean, and through all the nine provinces of the Dominion, one can find, for settling purposes, unlimited areas.

Speaking before the Canadian Club, at Winnipeg, on the importance of immigration in this country, Lord Shaw, last summer said: "Your incommensurable prairie provinces contain 200 million acres of arable land and up to the present time you have but one-tenth under cultivation." Could we not say as much for our eastern provinces? In the old province of Quebec we are not lacking in arable lands since at present in all the valleys, right into the heart of the Laurentide mountains, we have any extent of lands fit for cultivation. At present, in our province, the area of arable land being farmed is but 3½ per cent. There are, according to statistics supplied to me, over 400,000 farms of 100 acres each surveyed and reported upon which await the pioneer. I do not intend to show by means of statistics the acreage of land fit for cultivation in the nine provinces. These two distinct divisions of our national soil, the East and West, are sufficient to bear out my contention.

The provincial governments come generously to the rescue of the settler when it is a question of land grants in the old eastern provinces, where the settler's hardihood is put to test by the difficulties encountered at the outset. He must cut an opening in the virgin forests and build his shanty. Nothing equals the self-willed tenacity of the pioneer, toiling heroically to extend civilization in the far-off territories where everything breathes of the forest. However, in the midst of his toils he may depend upon the good services of a government which makes of colonization its main work. The surveying of districts, the building of roads and bridges, the help given to school and agricultural matters, are the many sides of protection shown by a government friendly to the settler.

The Quebec government in granting large subsidies, have shown themselves to be the true patron of the settler. The work of the Dominion government is still being performed on a large scale to facilitate the settlement of the immigrant on their lands.

The recruiting of the settler which is the third feature in question, is certainly one of the most important parts of the problem and the one which offers the most difficulties. The various opinions expressed on the subject since the beginning of the session only tend to show that there is a considerable exodus of settlers in the West and especially in Alberta, which is continuously on the increase. To what can this emigration be attributed? To the economic crisis of the country, a crisis accentuated by two poor consecutive crops? To the readiness with which the settler hailing from the United States at the first setback encountered, returns to his native land? To the too extensive immigration of the first decade of this century? Whatever be the causes, the consequences are but transient and everything seems to point to a return to normal conditions, especially after the abundant crop of last year. If we are to place faith in the words of experienced western men, conditions have much improved and the farmer, to-day, may look with confidence to the future.

In Quebec our national increase, each year, exceeds the number of deaths by 45,000. Yet men well informed have contended that for the last eighty years, emigration has carried away yearly from 15,000 to 20,000 people. The buoyant spirit of our young men and the narrow circumstances of a portion of the people both make for the desertion which has been bleeding the country for nearly a century.

How should the recruiting be carried out? Shall it be by an appeal to the European nations so that they may cast on our shores the surplus of their population, thrust in our midst at the expense of the Canadian government? Are we to erect at the entrance of the ports of St. John, Halifax and Quebec, another statue of Liberty holding out a large mantle to receive in its folds all the wandering children of the earth? I do not think so. Let us first keep those who are with us, let us make our own people happy; we shall have but to select those who come from the outside.

One of the unquestionable advantages of the government's immigration policy is the settlement of immigrants in all the provinces of Canada. We were, up to the present time, in the habit of thinking that the prairie provinces were the only ones entitled to receive immigrants and settle them on western wheat lands. Now, the immigrant arriving among us through his initiative and that of the government, shall be able to settle in any part of Canada. Each province has its own advantages and disadvantages. A settler who comes to reside in Canada may have a certain temperament, special aptitudes, certain peculiarities which fit him for one province rather than for another. For instance, one coming from Belgium, France or Scandinavia might, perhaps, prefer to settle in some eastern province rather than the West, while others coming from western United States would naturally settle in the prairies. Nevertheless, all would become Canadian citizens and, hence, they would be equally entitled to the help and protection of the Immigration department. The Immigration Act, which affords an equal measure of protection to the immigrant in whatever province he settles, is fair and equitable. However, since in Quebec, the true evil is to be found not in the small number of settlers coming in, but rather in a regrettable exodus of our citizens across the 45th parallel, I wish to say a few words in regard to the enactment relative to repatriation agencies which are helpful to the province of Quebec, and I would ask the government to make the repatriation regulations more effective, first of all for the purpose of retaining our people who have not yet become the prey of family troubles, and secondly, with a view to bringing back those who have already emigrated. I should like to see the government take all the steps necessary so that our peasant, this courageous and abstemious farmer, should feel himself sufficiently backed up by pecuniary help to hope not only to maintain himself in comfort, but become even more prosperous. Indeed, we must not lose sight of the fact that the large families which constitute a truly national wealth, demand of the head of the family greater resources. The establishment of repatriation agencies in regard to immigration is therefore another good feature of the government's new policy. Our people who at one time went across the 45th parallel never forgot their native country; many of them are awaiting a favourable opportunity to return to live and die among us. Let them know that their brothers in Canada are desirous of seeing them again and extending a warm welcome. The old province awaits them and has paved the way for their re-establishment. The government agents should be among them to let them know on our part that there is room for them in the old eastern provinces, as well as those in the West, and that everywhere their old fellow-citizens await them with open arms.

Mr. Speaker, the session is drawing to a close; I have followed the debates with attention mingled with some anxiety. My country, I had a glimpse of it, thanks to all those beautiful speeches of eminent men but of very contradictory opinions. As I saw it, it was going through a crisis wherein its future was at stake. The glorious hour has struck for us; we who form the party in power, if we know how to respond to the hopes of the people, the propitious moment to ensure the permanent welfare of this country of ours. It is in a period of such great upheavals that a nation, filled with apprehensions for the future, needs great men, wise statesmen who find the means of ensuring the safety of the nation's future. I feel confident that Providence who guides nations and has entrusted into our hands the government of the country, in this hour of national anxiety, will bestow on our leaders that wisdom which distinguishes great statesmen. I have faith, consequently, that this perilous hour for our country will, in our annals, redound to the honour of our party, and command the admiration of posterity.

Mr. JAMES STEEDSMAN (Souris): Mr. Speaker, while I desire to join heartily in the congratulations extended to the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) upon the presentation of his seventeenth budget, I regret to say that I am unable to extend my congratulations to the members of my constituency and to the residents of the province from which I come, not only because the budget affords us little or no relief from the protective tariff and fails to keep pace with the feeble efforts of last year to take a step in the right direction, but because the government have now decided that efforts in that direction shall cease and we may look for little more reduction from them. Stability, and the assurance to the protected interests that they have nothing to fear in the future with regard to the tariff, will bring rejoicing in some quarters, but, Mr. Speaker, it will bring disappointment and discontent in other sections, especially in the West, where farming conditions are such as to demand immediate relief if we are not to lose many of the valuable settlers we have at the present time. We have been told to have faith, and faith is a fine thing; but it will not pay the taxes; it will not pay the interest on the mortgage, neither will it feed or clothe the children. To be told now by a government representing a party that has always declared in favour of lower tariff that nothing further in that direction need be expected is discouraging, to say the least.

Now, Sir, in regard to the serious condition of agriculture in Canada to-day, we know that the chief cause lies in the fact that the cost of living and the cost of production have not come down in proportion to the decrease in the prices of farm products. Of course that is not the only reason, but it is the only one I shall refer to in the discussion of this budget. That being so, it will be evident to all that the farmers are producing at a loss to-day, consequently they are going behind; their debts and their difficulties are increasing every day. What is more natural, therefore, than that we should look for a remedy or for a means of balancing our budget? In reviewing the situation we realize that the main cause of low prices for what we have to sell is the lack of purchasing power on the part of the nation to whom we sell our surplus, and as the export price usually controls the local market price the only remedy in that direction is to lower the cost of transportation, the cost of handling and distributing, to the lowest possible point consistent with efficiency, and to eliminate all unfair profit-taking in the performance of those operations. In this respect I am free to admit that the government have already done something; the reinstatement of the Crowsnest pass rates and the passing of the wheat board legislation of last year at the urgent request of the people of western Canada was a step in the right direction. But much more remains to be done, and we will watch with great interest.

Mr. CARROLL: What does the hon. member think of the attitude of the legislature of Manitoba on that particular question? It is opposed to the Progressive attitude, I understand.

Mr. STEEDSMAN: I would like to point out to my hon. friend that if the farmers of Manitoba at the present time are in such a condition that they think they cannot wait for the operation of a wheat board, it is all the more reason why they should get relief in some other direction. That I understand is why the wheat board legislation did not pass the House in Manitoba. I say that we will watch with interest the outcome of the royal commission and of the special committee that has been appointed to inquire into lake transportation rates, the grain trade, and agricultural conditions generally.

We believe, too, that this government should come to the assistance of the provinces that they may be enabled to extend their rural credit and farm loan policy to the end that the farmers may be able to secure long term credit with cheaper interest rates, with which to pay off their mortgage indebtedness.

Then too, the prairie provinces should be given their natural resources. That has long been a matter of contention, and we think that now would be a very opportune time for the natural resources to be handed over to the provinces that they may get the benefit of such revenue as may be derived therefrom. That would mean that the municipalities in those provinces might be relieved to a very great extent from the tremendous burden of taxation under which they are labouring at the present time, that our school districts might be able to keep open the schools, many of which are closed at the present time, that we might be able to educate our children.

Now what about the cost of production? In looking over means of bringing down costs, what is more natural than that we should compare prices with those paid by our neighbours to the south of us? I do not intend to detain the House at the present time by making comparisons of prices. My hon. friend from Selkirk (Mr. Bancroft) the other evening quoted sufficient figures to convince this House that prices are considerably lower on the other side of the line. Living as I do within a few miles of the boundary line of North Dakota I am in a position to know that the prices he quoted are absolutely correct, and I could give many more instances as well. I know, too, that our neighbours over the line have always been able to buy the necessaries of life, the implements of production, lumber, building material and everything that goes into building up their homes much more cheaply than we could, and moreover they have always or, at all events, have usually been able to command a better price for the products that they had to sell, and their products are the same as ours. Our products have to compete with theirs in the open markets of the world. Is it any wonder that we come to parliament and ask that the duty be removed in order that we may get the benefit of lower prices and get our raw material as cheaply as our neighbours to the south?

It has been suggested by one hon. member, I think it was the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion), that an educational campaign might be carried on among the manufacturers and industrial workers of eastern Canada to induce them to bring down their prices. Well, Mr. Speaker, we think that a more effective way would be to remove the tariff on these articles altogether, and then competition would take care of the prices. It is not particularly that we want to purchase American machinery, because I am sure that the average Canadian would prefer to buy Canadian machinery provided he could get equal quality for the same or very nearly the same price. But we believe that the Canadian manufacturer should be able to compete successfully with the American manufacturer in the home market when he can do it so successfully in the foreign market, especially those companies that have been organized for a great many years and have enjoyed the protection of the tariff during all the years of their existence. When we say, Mr. Speaker, that the principle of protection as a basis for fiscal policy in Canada is unsound, when we say that the condition of the primary industries is such as to demand immediate relief, we believe that there are many members sitting upon the government side of the House who will agree with us in that contention, but we are immediately faced with the problem of how to make up the loss in revenue. In that regard I would just like to say that the people of Canada could afford to pay twice the amount collected in customs revenue under almost any system of direct taxation that the government might see fit to adopt and then be money in pocket. What with the duty, and the profits on duty pyramiding every time the goods are turned over, and the increased cost of goods of the home manufacturer, we believe that it would be quite possible for the people to bear that burden in the form of direct taxation.

Mr. CARROLL: Would the hon. member suggest what form the taxation should take?

Mr. STEEDSMAN: If my hon. friend will look at the amendment suggested by my hon. leader he will notice what form we suggest it should take. I say that almost any form of direct taxation would be better.

Mr. CARROLL: But if the hon. member wishes to be constructive in his suggestions I think he should inform the House the particular form of direct taxation he would suggest.

Mr. STEEDSMAN: An inheritance tax, for instance, a properly graduated income tax, for after all, Mr. Speaker, have not practically all taxes to be paid out of income? Where else can they come from? I hope my hon. friend is satisfied.

Mr. CARROLL: I would like the hon. member to be a little more specific. We have a graduated form of income tax now. How would he graduate it so as to fill up the void that would be left after the customs tax was taken off?

Mr. STEEDSMAN: I can only suggest to my hon. friend that he study the platform of the Progressive party—

Mr. CARROLL: That is a cure.

Mr. STEEDSMAN: —and study carefully the amendment which has been proposed by my hon. leader. In conclusion, I desire to say that I intend to vote for that amendment.

On motion of Mr. Kyte the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Graham the House adjourned at 10.23 p.m.

Thursday, May 17, 1923

The House met at three o'clock.

NEW MEMBER INTRODUCED

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House has received from the Chief Electoral officer a certificate of the election and return of Joseph Félix Descoteaux, Esquire, for the Electoral District of Nicolet.

Joseph Felix Descoteaux, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Nicolet, introduced by Hon. Jacques Bureau and Hon. Ernest Lapointe.

REPORT

Sixth report of the Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills.—Mr. McGiverin.

JAPANESE IMMIGRATION

Mr. W. G. McQUARRIE (New Westminster): May I be permitted, Mr. Speaker, to present a petition, signed by W. J. Bartlett and 1,436 other residents of the lower mainland of British Columbia and Vancouver Island, asking that no further naturalization certificates be granted to Japanese, and also that such changes be made in the immigration laws as will prevent a further influx of Japanese to Canada.

THE BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from Wednesday, May 16, the debate on the motion of Hon. W. S. Fielding (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Robert Forke.

Mr. R. K. ANDERSON (Halton): Mr. Speaker, I find the most difficult part of making a speech in this House is to get started; and I notice that some members find it equally difficult to stop. The budget speech may be described as the chief event of the session. A great deal of interest is always taken in it not only by hon. members but by the people generally, for it deals with taxation and debt. Once you touch the pockets of the people you instantly arouse a good deal of criticism and opposition, and I do not think that any man in this House or outside knows more about that feature of a budget than the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding).

The present budget appears to me to be drafted not so much for the purpose of meeting the exigencies of the national situation as for its political effect. It is a colourless and featureless budget devoid of any outstanding characteristics. The hon. Minister of Finance last week presented his seventeenth budget, a record in our parliamentary history, and I compliment him on his long and useful service to the country. The hon. gentleman, previous to the election of 1896 was an advocate of free trade or tariff for revenue, but during the following fifteen years while in power, he made no effort to implement his promises, and the people watched in vain for some signs that he remembered his promises. In 1911 he asked the approval of the country of a reciprocity pact with the United States, but the people would have none of it. That is a matter of history. But now, in 1923, after the country had spoken so emphatically on that question in 1911, he comes back with a resolution for the same purpose.

The hon. gentleman has been either a free trader or an advocate of a tariff for revenue all the time he was in opposition, but in power he has always been a protectionist. It would be interesting, Mr. Speaker, to know what are the reasons that cause this sudden change of front when he succeeds to office. What caused his change of front in 1896, and again in 1921? Are we to believe that the hon. Minister of Finance was not sincere in his demands for a tariff for revenue when he was in oppostiion? Was his change of front due to a fear on his part that such a policy would not be in the best interests of the country? Did he fear that such a policy would not be in the best interests of the party in which he occupies such a prominent position? During the Liberal regime of 1896 to 1911, a period of 15 years, the Liberal government reduced the average rate of tariff duties by the small amount of 79/100 of one per cent. That statement was made in this House a few years ago by the then member for Red Deer Dr. Clark. Dr. Clark evidently knew what he was talking about when he made that statement, because he was a member of the Liberal party. That was the full extent to which the Liberal party ventured into the charmed field of free trade. Evidently when they get into office it does not present a pleasing view to them; and it is less pleasing now, for since they came into office, instead of reducing the average tariff duties they increased them in the year 1922-23 by 74/100 of one per cent over what they were in 1921. This is a peculiar way to lower tariff duties, to get down to a tariff for revenue purposes only or to a free trade policy. I cannot say that I blame the Finance Minister for this. I believe in the principle of protection—a moderate protection, not a high protection—and believing in that I cannot blame the minister for not reducing the tariff duties. The figures upon which I base this statement are the following: In the first eleven months of 1921-22, ending February 28, 1922—I am taking the eleven months because at the time I made the calculation the figures for the whole year were not available—the amount of dutiable goods imported for home consumption was $422,309,490. The duty collected was $107,186,255, making an average rate of duty on all dutiable articles of 24·23 per cent. In the first eleven months of 1922-23, ending February 28, 1923, the amount of dutiable goods imported for home consumption was $475,583,587, on which the duty collected was $118,872,102, making an average duty of 24·97 per cent and showing an increase over 1921-22 of ·74 per cent. The total merchandise dutiable and free imported in the same period—and I am making the calculation on the basis of all articles imported, whether there was duty collected on them or not—amounted to $668,425,606 on which was collected for duty purposes $107,186,255, the amount which I have already mentioned, showing an average rate of duty on all goods of 16·34 per cent. For the eleven months period in 1922-23 there were imported $710,583,616 worth of goods dutiable and free, on which was collected $118,872,102, showing an average duty of 16·81 per cent, or ·34 per cent higher than it was in 1921. I am just bringing these facts to the attention of the House to show how far the Minister of Finance and the Liberal party have kept their promises to the people to reduce the duties on imported goods. Instead of reducing them, on the average they have raised them. I could give the figures for the whole year, having received them subsequent to making these calculations, but I think it is unnecessary to do so.

I may say that the Minister of Finance is now firmly entrenched in the National Policy of Sir John A. Macdonald. After seventeen years during which the Finance Minister was pledged to a tariff for revenue he comes down this year with the statement that he believes in the principle of protection and that the tariff of Sir John A. Macdonald of 1878 is good enough for him. In making the statement that he could not further reduce the tariff duties he practically accepted the principle of protection. The principle of protection is the real essence of the National Policy of 1878. That National Policy was introduced not with the idea of its standing always as a moderate or a high protective policy; It was introduced as a protective policy, and when the hon. Minister of Finance accepts that policy to-day he accepts in his financial affairs the principle of protection. Having posed all these years as being in favour of a tariff for revenue, in 1923 he changes by one touch of his magic hand the high protective policy of Sir John A. Macdonald into a moderate tariff policy a policy which hon. gentlemen now on the government benches designated as a high protective tariff while in opposition. A tariff "in favour of the big interests," a tariff that "imposed intolerable burdens on the people," a tariff which he pledged himself and his party to do away with when elected to office, has been changed over night by his magic touch into a tariff for revenue.

The hon. Minister of Finance is not the only convert to the principle of protection I must compliment the right hon. leader of the Opposition on the efficiency he has shown in making converts, because it is largely due to him that these conversions have been taking place. The hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) only a few days ago in his statement expressed the opinion that the protective principle was all right. I understood him to say that a tariff for revenue was impossible without a certain measure of protection, that is, that there is an incidental measure of protcetion, in any tariff for revenue purposes. The hon. Minister of Agriculture has not thoroughly studied the question or he would not have made such a statement. It is not in accordance with the facts and with experience. The British Government only a couple of years ago collected over $600,000,000 in duties without giving any incidental protection. Those duties were placed upon articles which they did not produce at home.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is understood always.

Mr. ANDERSON: The hon. minister did not make that statement in his speech the other day.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Later in my remarks I did.

Mr. ANDERSON: There was nobody to protect. Nobody was producing the article, consequently no measure of incidental protection was given to the English people. Perhaps what the minister meant when he made that statement was that he could get away from the protective principle by having an excise duty on the articles which we produce. He could offset the protective principle in the tariff by putting on an excise duty equal to the import duty on the article in question, but I cannot see where or in what way that would reduce the cost of living to any people. The Minister of Finance in his budget speech last year said that he intended to make such adjustments in the tariff itself as would so far as possible reduce the cost of living, and he did last year make an attempt at that by reducing the protective duty on farm implements by two and one-half per cent. But in lieu of that he added a two per cent excise tax. The result was that the cost of the imported article remained practically the same and the home-made article was raised by two per cent. The farmer got absolutely no advantage from it. You cannot reduce the cost of living by an excise tax.

The hon. Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Stewart) would appear to me to be a convert to the principle of protection. He said in his speech yesterday:

> I do not believe, and I have had nothing to convince me, that so heavy a rate of protection is required as is given to many of the industries existent in this country to-day.

The minister does not oppose the principle of protection; he is simply opposed to high protection, and thus protection is being kept in force apparently with the connivance of the Minister of Immigration and Colonization. The Minister of Finance in his want of confidence motion on the budget of 1921 made this statement:

> The tariff is a tax, and the aim of legislation should be to make taxation as light as circumstances will permit.

I do not dispute that statement. I think it should be the object of legislation to make the cost of living as light as possible. The Minister of Finance implemented that by stating he would make an effort to reduce the cost of living. Now, Mr. Speaker, the tariff is certainly a tax, and a tax on somebody; there may be some dispute at times as to who pays the tariff tax, but certainly there can be no dispute as to who pays an excise tax. An excise tax is a home tax. It is placed on the commodities in the country itself. There is nobody but the Canadian people to pay it. But when an article is imported into this country there may be cases in which the exporter of the article, that is the producer in a foreign country may pay all or part of the duty. Who pays the tax on articles that are dumped into this country at prices lower than the cost of production in the country of origin? It may not be the consumer in this country. Possibly it is the manufacturer or producer of the article in the foreign country. There may be some question about that, but there can be no question about who pays an excise tax.

With regard to the sales tax, no matter what can be said in regard to its being a means of increasing the revenue, it directly and immediately is reflected in an increased cost to the Canadian people of the articles on which the duty is placed. It has an immediate effect. It does increase the price of that article. A larger amount of revenue is collected from the people, and the manufacturer or the dealer passes on the tax to the consumer. If he has a narrow margin of profit he must do that or go out of business. The sales tax can have no other effect but to increase the cost of living to every Canadian. So long as the need of taxation exists, so long as a large revenue is necessary to carry on the business of this country, a sales tax judiciously applied is a very efficient tax. I consider that it is a just tax because the average individual will pay the tax in proportion to his ability to purchase. The more wealthy he is the more he will purchase and the more taxation he will pay. I can have no objection to that tax.

There is, however, one feature about the present increase in the tax to six per cent to which I would refer. I would think that a tax at the fountain source is perhaps the best way of collecting it, and I commend the Minister of Finance for making the change. Last year instead of changing the application of the tax he increased it by fifty per cent. I want to show by some figures I have that that was immediately reflected in the returns of the Excise department, and in connection with these returns I want to emphasize the fact that as the tax was collected entirely from the Canadian people it must and did result in an increased cost of living. I remind the House that this tax came into force on the 23rd of May, 1922. The revenue from the sales tax for April, 1922, was $2,072,000. The average amount collected for the previous four months—I did not think it was fair to take only April, because it may have been smaller than the other months, so I took the average collections from the domestic sales tax for the months of January, February, March and April, 1922—was $3,126,000. Hon. gentlemen will notice that in May—and remember, the tax only came into force on the 23rd of May—there was a decided increase, in sales tax collections. Here are the figures:

Sales Tax Collections, Domestic Goods, May-December, 1922

Month—	Collections	Increase over average Jan.-April
May..	$3,829,000	$ 700,000
June..	3,900,000	800,000
July..	5,072,000	1,900,000
August..	5,558,000	2,400,000
September..	6,314,000	3,200,000
October..	6,692,000	3,500,000
November..	6,213,000	3,100,000
December..	6,113,000	3,000,000
Total..		$18,700,000

During those eight months the Finance Minister by his increase in the sales tax took from the pockets of the Canadian people $18,700,000 more than would have been taken by the old rate of duties, that is, if the average rate of $3,126,000 for the first four months of the year had been maintained. That is only from the domestic tax. But the sales tax was also placed on imported articles. The average return from the sales tax on imported articles for the first four months of 1922 was $1,485,000. This tax also went into force on the 23rd of May, 1922, and the increase in the months following were:

Sales Tax Collections, Imported Goods, May-December, 1922

Month—	Collections	Increase over average Jan.-April
May..	$1,771,000	$ 300,000
June..	2,376,000	900,000
July..	2,338,000	900,000
August..	2,634,000	1,200,000
September..	2,387,000	900,000
October..	2,533,000	1,100,000
November..	2,663,000	1,200,000
December..	2,471,000	1,000,000
Total..		$7,500,000

So we have increase of sales tax on domestic goods $18,700,000; increase of sales tax on imported goods $7,500,000, or a total of $26,200,000. This amount was taken from the people in excess of what they might have paid. The revenue was necessary; I am in no way criticizing the Minister of Finance for having asked the people to contribute it. I am only saying, that by increasing the sales tax in order to add to the revenue he was not adopting the most satisfactory way of reducing the cost of living. It had not the effect which he intended; as a matter of fact, the result was the opposite. The decision to levy the sales tax of 6 per cent at the source of production of the article is wise, I believe. There may be some difficulty in deciding just where is the fountain source of the finished articles, for what is the finished article to one manufacturer may be the raw material to another. I believe the Minister of Finance will experience considerable difficulty in coming to a conclusion as to where the tax should be levied. No doubt a committee will be appointed, or possibly the department will itself undertake to settle this matter, and I presume that regulations will be made to ensure that the tax shall not be collected more than once. That was the fault in connection with the previous tax of 4½ per cent, for I believe that in many instances it was collected several times, probably three or four times over; at any rate, in certain instances it was as high as 15 or 20 per cent of the cost of the article. I hope that the minister will devise some means of preventing this repetition of payment in connection with the present 6 per cent tax.

In regard to the question of deciding upon the origin of a finished article, in the manner of clothing or of a cloth, for example, I do not know how the minister will settle the point as to who is the manufacturer. Will it be the tailor, the retail man who makes the clothes, or will it be the manufacturer who produces the cloth? These are difficulties which I have no doubt can be overcome, but I have certain criticism of the question.

Many manufacturers as well as men of business have stated that a turnover tax would be more satisfactory than the sales tax. It is possible that a turnover tax might be more advantageous, because the man who had large profits would pay a greater proportion of it. He would not be so apt to pass it on to the consumer; he could absorb it into his business. I think that this suggestion in regard to a turnover tax might well receive the consideration of the Minister of Finance in the future.

There is one particular article on which the sales tax was placed last year in regard to which some modification would be advisable. As I have previously stated, I am not a high protectionist, and I think there are some industries in this country which possibly are too highly protected. One of these, I think, is the automobile industry. This industry is making rapid strides in Canada and in the last year this country, a country of nine million people, exported half as many automobiles as did the United States, with a population of 110,000,000. This shows that the industry is flourishing in this country. There is a duty of 35 per cent on the imported car, and to that was added last year a sales tax of 10 per cent. I did not understand from the Minister of Finance whether he intended to abolish that tax or not; I think it has been reduced to 6 per cent; that at least is my understanding of the matter. When an automobile is introduced into this country a 5 per cent charge is made on it over the sales price in the United States; to that there is added 35 per cent of a duty collected in Canada; and on top of that was the 10 per cent sales tax, making something like 52 per cent of the cost price on the American side which was charged to the purchaser here. That is too great protection, and I think that the minister might have left off the 10 per cent sales tax on the imported car and brought the protection down to 25 per cent.

Now, the Minister of Finance has not only come over as a convert to the protective principle in our policy, but he has repudiated the whole Liberal platform of 1919. In his speech in the by-election at Windsor on February 27, he made this statement, speaking on the subject of the Liberal platform of 1919:

> That is not the policy on which I appealed to the country.

I only wish the Minister of Finance were in his place; I would ask him why he used the pronoun "I." I do not know whether he meant to imply that his personal policy was different from that of the Liberal party. However, he went on to say:

> And that policy was never endorsed by the Liberal party after it got into power.

Well, we know that it was not; that was undoubtedly a truism. The Liberal party never endorsed their policy after they got into power; they used it merely for the purpose of getting into power, and it was a dead letter after they assumed office. Now the Minister of Finance repudiates it altogether. He said that he never at any time promised to endorse it.

Now I come to the question of the finality of the minister's budget, regarding the tariff. There is some doubt as to whether the minister really intimated that we had reached bottom in the reductions in the tariff. Evidently the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) does not believe that we have, because in the course of his speech in this House the other day he made a very significant remark. I will quote his words:

> Who said this was the last word?—

Meaning the statement of the Minister of Finance that he had reached the final decision with regard to the reductions in the tariff.

> Who said this was the last word?. . . . Nobody said it was the last word. The Minister of Finance said distinctly there was no finality, that what parliament did to-day it might undo to-morrow.

Did the Minister of Finance leave a way for retreat from the position he has taken? Is the Minister of Agriculture right in his supposition that his colleague did not mean what he said? The words that the Minister of Finance used in his speech were these:

> Speaking broadly, it is possible to give the country a reasonable assurance of stability of tariff.

Now, I believe that the country has a right to accept that statement from the Minister of Finance and to assume that the question of tariff reductions has been settled. It has gone out to the people of the country, particularly those engaged in industry, that the matter has been decided, and the effect of this assurance is to dispose these people to extend their plants and to go further into manufacturing industries.

Coming now to other phases of the budget, let us consider the statement of the Minister of Finance with reference to the necessity for economy. I think that economy in the government is absolutely necessary. The time has arrived, I think, when revenue might very easily meet expenditure. We should balance our budget and endeavour in addition to have a small surplus with which to start a sinking fund for the purpose of paying off the national debt. If we go on adding to the debt each year the interest charges will increase so that it will become an intolerable burden to the people. Why should we pass that burden on to future generations? We should stand up to our responsibilities and make every effort to meet them as we go along. But the Minister of Finance makes no effort to do this in the present budget; in fact, he gives us a statement to the very opposite effect, that next year it is possible the revenue will not meet current expenditure and that there will consequently be a further addition to the national debt. I have looked up the national debt of Canada for some years back and I find that in 1867 it was $75,000,000; in 1914, $335,000,000; in 1918, $1,191,000,000; in 1922, $2,422,000,000; in 1923, $2,471,000,000. That is the net debt of the Dominion, and it is still increasing; last year the Minister of Finance added $49,000,000 to it. I had the curosity to look into the current expenditures of previous years; I mean the ordinary expenditures of government, not capital expenditure. I think it is reasonable to take from the expenditures of the present year the amount that is paid in interest on the national debt, increase due to the war, that is, the debt incurred by the war, and that includes the amount paid for pensions and other expenditures in connection with the war. I have compiled the figures, putting the year 1923 on the same basis as 1913, when there was no war and had not been for some time. The war is now five years behind us. It is that far back in history, and it is time we were getting down to a pre-war level. Removing, as I have said, from the expenditure of 1923 the amount spent in pensions and the interest on the war debt, we find that the expenditures were as follows:

1913..	$112,059,000
1914..	127,384,000
1916..	$130,350,000

[Mr. Anderson.]

Hon. members will observe that these were pre-war years. Then take the following years:

1918..	$178,284,000
1920..	303,843,000
1923..	331,780,000

Taken on the basis which I have suggested —deduction of interest on war debt and pensions—hon. members will find that in 1913 the expenditure was $112,-059,000. Taking from the expenditure of 1922 the $158,928,000 paid in interest on the war debt, and pensions, we have left an expenditure of $76,000,000 in excess of the expenditures for 1913, for ordinary expenses of government; and over 1914 it was $61,669,000. While we spent in 1923, $61,089,000 more than in 1913—that is, the ordinary expenditures of government, without taking into consideration expenditure on capital account or for war, the expenditure of 1923 exceeds that of the war years by many millions. As follows:

Exceeding 1916 by $51,000,000.
Exceeding 1917 by $47,000,000.
Exceeding 1918 by $29,000,000.

We are not getting back to pre-war conditions as fast as we might. During the war there were many activities which are not in existence now. There were many civil servants in the Militia department and other departments that are not needed now. Their services have been dispensed with, and if they had not been dispensed with there would have been a very much greater balance against the present day expenditure. It is all very well for the minister—and I commend him for it—to call upon the people to economize in their private affairs, to get down to practical business by producing more, but the trouble is that the Finance Minister is not setting a good example. He preaches a good doctrine but does not practice it. I think that economy is vitally necessary at the present time in the conduct of affairs by the government. We should endeavour to make ends meet, and establish a sinking fund in order to reduce our debt. We should make an effort to reduce the interest charges year by year. We do not desire large surpluses, Mr. Speaker, but we ought to make the budget balance and provide a few millions for a sinking fund. I think that leadership is needed in the matter of economy, and the present Finance Minister is not giving us that leadership.

The budget speech embodies a resolution offering reciprocity to the United States. Now, we had a reciprocity pact with the United States once before—from 1854 to 1864. Immediately at the end of that period the United States gave notice that they would abrogate that treaty. The treaty was made for a period of ten years, renewable if the contracting parties were agreeable. They abrogated the treaty immediately after the United States Civil War, giving as their reason that they needed a greater revenue, that they needed to restrict imports in order to bring their dollar up to par value, and also that they desired to cultivate industries in their own country and give employment to their own people. At that time, Mr. Speaker, we had made arrangements by which our transportation companies were running north and south in order to take care of the trade which went in those directions. Transportation will follow commerce and possibly commerce will follow transportation, but at any rate we had placed ourselves in such a position that we imported from the United States most of our manufactured commodities, and we looked to the United States for a market for the produce of our farms. The result was that after the Civil war the United States put up a tariff duty against us. We had no tariff duty against the United States, and the consequence was that after 1865 we had the greatest and most serious depression in trade this country has ever experienced. In 1876 it was so serious that parliament appointed a commission to inquire into the problem. And, looking up the history of that time, it seemed peculiar to me that the committee inquiring into those conditions went over to New York city, and sat there for a considerable time inquiring into the depression in trade conditions in the Dominion of Canada. At that time the treaty was abrogated, and a duty was placed against Canada largely at the instance of the agricultural interests of the United States. History is repeating itself. Although the United States was not interested in the Great War to the extent that we were, immediately after that war the agricultural interests of the United States demanded that they should have an increased tariff against the imports from the Dominion of Canada. That was acceded to by the United States government, and we have to-day as a result the Fordney Bill which practically prohibits many articles from this country going into the United States. The same conditions prevail now as existed then. The United States, if they were willing to listen to us in 1911 with regard to reciprocity, are not likely to listen to us at the present time, because there is that restraint upon the government, and the agriculturists of that country do not desire reciprocity with Canada. Even if we had a reciprocity agreement at the present time, what would be the result? Trade undoubtedly would begin to flow to the United States. Our transportation facilities might not be equal to the flow of that trade, and the consequence would be that we would have to change our present transportation system. For a number of years we have had no reciprocity treaty with the United States, and we have our transportation system travelling east and west. We have cultivated an interprovincial trade and also a world trade. I believe that the world market is the one to which we should look to-day, and that we should not confine ourselves entirely to the United States market. It is all right to trade with our neighbours. We are trading more with them than with any other part of the world. I wish to place on Hansard a few figures in connection with that matter. At the present time over 75 per cent of the trade of this country is done with the British Empire and the United States, and not quite 25 per cent of it done with the rest of the world. I have the figures of the imports for the years 1921, 1922, and 1923. They are as follows:

Percentage of Imports from

British Empire	United States	Other Countries
1921.. .. 21.45	1921.. .. 69.04	1921.. .. 9.51
1922.. .. 19.94	1922.. .. 68.6	1922.. .. 12
1923.. .. 22.3	1923.. .. 67.3	1923.. .. 10.4

This shows that of imports coming into Canada from these various sources, something over 60 per cent comes from the United States and only 10 per cent from foreign countries, exclusive of the British Empire, by which I mean England and her colonies. Of our total exports, our exports are as follows:

Percentage of export to

British Empire	United States	Other Countries
1921.. .. 32.77	1921.. .. 43.38	1921.. .. 24.35
1922.. .. 46.7	1922.. .. 39.1	1922.. .. 14.2
1923.. .. 47.2	1923.. .. 39.7	1923.. .. 14.1

If we take our total trade, that is imports and exports, the percentage is as follows:

Percentage of total trade

British Empire	United States	Other Countries
1921.. .. 27.3	1921.. .. 57	1921.. .. 15.7
1922.. .. 33.2	1922.. .. 54.3	1922.. .. 12.5
1923.. .. 35.7	1923.. .. 51.9	1923.. .. 12.9

This shows that we have been gradually adjusting our trade conditions in an easterly and westerly direction, trading more with the British Empire and less with the United States. I think that is the way our trade should go. I cannot see why we should particularly demand trade with the United States in the commodities produced by the western farmers. I cannot see the logic of trading with a country that is a competitor of ours in those commodities in the world's markets. They produce a surplus for export. If they want the wheat of the Canadian west —and Canadian wheat is probably the best wheat that is grown—they want it for blending purposes. They do not need it for their home market because they have plenty of their own. It does not seem to me a logical way to start to improve our trade by trading with people who produce the same articlse which we do and in a greater quantity than we do and who are our chief competitors particularly in the markets of the British Empire.

Just a word or two with regard to immigration, which is an important subject at the present time. The other day I noticed an article by Sir Henry Thornton. Sir Henry Thornton speaks on many questions, and although possibly he may speak too often, yet his statements in this article are sound indeed. With regard to immigration he said:

Four salient points were emphasized with regard to the immigration problems of Canada by Sir Henry Thornton. . . . First, a capable Minister of Immigration who would co-ordinate all the efforts of the people, is needed.

Mr. GRAHAM: Which we have.

Mr. ANDERSON: I think he is quite right in that. I am not saying that the present Acting Minister of Immigration (Mr. Stewart) is not capable. I do not know whether Sir Henry Thornton had that in mind or not, whether he was hitting at the present Minister of Immigration.

Mr. GRAHAM: He was saying that he was good.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: In a funny way.

Mr. ANDERSON: Sir Henry Thornton continued:

Coming to restrictions, Sir Henry said that no immigrants had been admitted unless they were physically and morally sound. Immigrants should be made to understand that they must respect the laws and customs of the country; in other words, neither Bolshevists nor Communists need apply. The financial position of the new immigrant must be such that he is in no danger of becoming a burden upon the community.

Again he said:

One thing is distinctly lacking, that is, some central co-ordinating official or personality who will insist on us focussing our undivided attention.

I think this is all sound, that is that there should be some means by which immigrants coming to this country can get first hand information from some head. I have no doubt the Minister of Immigration is in a position to give that, but he is not always available. The article continues:

Sir Henry advocated the community centre idea for immigrants, especially in the West.

With that statement I feel disposed to disagree. I think it has been proven in the West that the community idea is wrong, because it does not conduce to making immigrants from foreign countries into good Canadian citizens. They are inclined to live as they did in their own country. They have their own language and schools, and they are really a foreign country within the midst of ourselves. That idea is not a good one. The article continues:

He said that while no "calamity howler," the railway situation, as judged by statistics, was not any too favourable in Canada to-day.

He has got away from the immigration point. With regard to this question of immigration, I agree pretty thoroughly with what Sir Henry has said, but I noticed an article in the Ottawa Citizen of May 11 of this year. This is copied from one of the Winnipeg papers, it does not say which. This is an article quoted from Bishop Lloyd of the diocese of Saskatchewan. Bishop Lloyd had been in the Old Country on a visit, and he had been delivering lectures to people in that country, probably with regard to immigration. The article states:

British settlers want to come to Canada but they are afraid they will not be welcomed by government authorities here, according to Bishop G. Exton Lloyd, of the diocese of Saskatchewan.

Reports that new settlers are not desired in Canada are turning the current south to Australia and every ship to the Antipodes carries immigrants, Bishop Lloyd declared. The Australian government, backed by shipping companies, is straining every nerve to keep this tide turned south, he said.

That is something the government might well look into. It is certainly desirable that we should get increased population in this country. We need immigrants of the right class, and I would say that immigrants should be preferably of British stock and that they should be sound physically and sound mentally. Those are the chief desidera in an immigrant. They should also be willing to work, capable of working, and desirous of making a living for themselves. Whether they have a little capital or not when they come here, does not matter so much, if they are desirous of working and willing to go to work and make themselves self-sustaining. That is what matters most; it does not matter so much whether they are highly educated; but they should have a desire to make themselves efficient and of service to the country of their adoption.

4 p.m.

I also cut a little article from the Ottawa Citizen giving a despatch from Welland, Ontario. The article says:

That children of Russian and Polish parentage are being taught Bolshevistic doctrines, including the undermining of the churches and the worship of God, was told the Welland Ministerial Association this afternoon by Rev. Father Charles Barron, whose charges were supported by Father Searo Sinunski, priest of the local Russian church. Father Barron told of a death threat made against one of his parishioners if the latter did not cease church attendance and send his children to the alleged Bolshevist school, and stated that he had information that a picture of the devil had been shown the children as representing God. He said the schools held two-hour sessions each day, after the close of the public schools, and that forty children attended one and sixteen the other. Both priests stated that similar schools existed in Thorold and St. Catharines, and Father Barron expressed his belief that a mortgage on one of this city had been paid off with Soviet money received from Winnipeg. The association will consider the allegations further at its next meeting.

I think that also demands investigation. My advice to the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Stewart) would be to ban Russian immigrants as a class until their nation regains its reason. Russia as a nation is insane to-day, and it is not wise that immigrants from that country should be allowed here as they are bound to be a source of evil and a disturbing influence.

I come now to the amendment presented to the budget by the hon. leader of the Progressive party. I think this amendment was dealt with in a very effective and very humourous manner by the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) a couple of days ago. He said, "You would need an X-ray to see the difference between it and the budget." That may not be an altogether accurate description because the hon. gentleman certainly delivered himself with great abandon of fact and argument. He was very entertaining indeed, but not very convincing. This amendment is really dictated by the interests of the three prairie provinces. To my mind it is simply a political gesture, not intended to embarrass the government, but to impress the constituents of the Progressive members from the West that their representatives are using their best endeavours to further the principles of their party. It seems to me that the Progressive party might have taken the opportunity to move their platform as an amendment to the budget, but the hon. Minister of Agriculture explained that omission by stating that the Progressive party had toned down their platform of previous years and that it was not the same to-day as it was a few years ago. Coming from the West the hon. minister knows the mentality of the people there better than I do, although I do not see why there should be any difference between the respective mentalities of the eastern and the western man. But our Progressive friends were very careful to move an amendment which no members in this quarter of the House could vote for. In fact there was no intention on their part to secure any support from us. Because of its free trade proposals it would be impossible for any member of the Conservative party to vote for the amendment. However, hon. members to my left will be free to support the government when it comes to the budget vote itself, because we in this corner of the House will vote solidly against it. We cannot possibly support a budget that contains a standing offer of reciprocity.

With regard to the statements made by hon. members of the Progressive party regarding the depressing conditions under which the western farmers are said to be suffering, I have only a few words to add to what the Minister of Agriculture has already said. He stated that these complaints were political too. He knew this because he had done the same thing himself when a young man. He added that he was not doing it now because he had more wisdom. It was very amusing to hear him, and I admire the members of the Progressive party for the very good-natured manner in which they took his sallies. He certainly plastered them with ridicule; he did not merely lay it on with a brush but with a mop.

Mr. GARDINER: Which was the more ridiculous, the Progressive party or the Minister of Agriculture?

Mr. ANDERSON: I think the House must decide that question; I do not care at the moment to give a decision. Like the hon. Minister of Agriculture, I am not the interpretation clause of the House. I hope my hon. friends to the left will not take it as being discourteous on my part, for it certainly is not so intended, when I attempt to show that the farmers of the prairie provinces financially are as well off as the farmers of the East. We are all suffering more or less from hard times and the people of Ontario are no exception, indeed it is a condition that prevails not only in the western provinces but in the eastern. I had the curiosity to look up a return showing the number of rural income taxpayers in Canada for 1922; these numbered 18,873. In the three prairie provinces, 11,656 rural citizens paid income tax, or 61·75 per cent of the total number, while the rest of Canada accounted for 7,217, or 38·25 per cent. The rural citizens of the three prairie provinces who were able to pay income tax were almost twice as many as those in the rest of Canada. Our western farmers are either better able to pay income tax, that is, they are enjoying larger incomes, or they may be more honest than their rural brothers in the other provinces. Of course, I cannot say as to that. I believe the government is making every possible effort to collect income tax from all who are liable, but I have no doubt many escape payment. Taking the rural income taxpayers in proportion to population, I find the prairies provinces with a population of 1,252,753 show 1 in every 108 farmers; the rest of Canada with a rural population of 3,770,197 show 1 in every 523 farmers; Ontario with a rural population of 1,226,292 shows 1 in every 200 farmers. In other words in the three prairie provinces they had almost twice as many rural income taxpayers to the population as they had in the province of Ontario, and five times as many as in the rest of the Dominion. That surely is not an index of hard times; it shows that the farmers of the West have money. Taking the figures by provinces they are as follows:

In Saskatchewan, 6,560 in rural population of 538,522—1 in every 82 farmers.

In Manitoba, 3,458 in rural population of 348,651—1 in every 100 farmers.

In Alberta, 1,638 in rural population of 365,550—1 in every 223 farmers.

In Quebec, 150 in rural population of 1,038,128—1 in every 6,920 farmers.

In British Columbia 640 in rural population of 272,-020—1 in every 425 farmers.

Taking our bank shareholders I find on referring to Hansard that in the rural districts the prairie provinces contain 1,794 out of a total of 3,887 for the whole Dominion, leaving for the rest of Canada 2,093. This means that among the rural population of 1,252,753 in the three prairie provinces one farmer in every 698 is a bank shareholder, while in the rest of Canada with a rural population of 3,770,997 one farmer in every 1,802 is in this happy position, showing again that the rural people of the prairie provinces had more money than their rural friends in the other provinces for investment in bank shares.

Again, take the field crops. I will not go fully into this; it will suffice to say that Canada ranks second in production among the wheat producing countries of the world and third in area, the United States first in production and first in area; India third in production and second in area. The wheat production of the world amounted in 1922 to 3,012,293,000 bushels; the production of Canada was 391,425,000 bushels, and of the United States 310,123,000 bushels. Here is a table showing the value of field crops in the various provinces, including grain, vegetables, hay and sugar beets, and covering the years 1921 and 1922:

	1921	1922	Decrease
Quebec..	$219,000,000	$167,000,000	$52,000,000
Ontario	239,000,000	233,000,000	6,000,000
British Columbia.	20,000,000	18,000,000	2,000,000
Prince Edward Island	14,000,000	10,000,000	4,000,000
Nova Scotia.. ..	29,000,000	24,000,000	5,000,000
New Brunswick..	38,000,000	31,000,000	7,000,000
			$76,000,000

So that in those parts of Canada exclusive of the prairie provinces there was a decrease in the returns for 1922 from those of 1921, totalling $76,000,000. The following are the figures for the prairie provinces:

	1921	1922	Increase
Manitoba..	$ 72,000,000	$104,000,000	$32,000,000
Saskatchewan.. ..	215,000,000	299,000,000	84,000,000
Alberta	82,000,000	94,000,000	12,000,000
			$128,000,000

So that there was an increase in the prairie provinces for those years of $128,000,000 as against a decrease in the rest of Canada of $76,000,000, as I have shown. That does not indicate that there are any harder times in the prairie provinces than there are in the rest of Canada, and I fail to see what basis the Progressives have for the statements they have made in this House, statements which are not in the best interests of the Dominion of Canada and are certainly very detrimental to the West. The rest of Canada has always been friendly to the West. Only a few days ago some of the members of the Progressive party suggested to me that there was an unfriendly feeling between the East and the West. I cannot undertsand such a statement; there is nothing of the kind. It seems to me that the western members have thought so much on this question that they have failed to realize its significance.

There were other matters, Mr. Speaker, to which I might refer, but I shall not take occasion at this time to put any further figures on Hansard. I have only to say that I cannot vote for the amendment because it declares for free trade, neither can I vote for the budget on account of the reciprocity resolution which it contains. I am therefore under the necessity for voting against both.

Mr. R. J. WOODS (Dufferin): Mr. Speaker, in offering a few remarks in connection with the budget I do not propose to charge the government with responsibility for all the ills at present prevailing in the Dominion of Canada in connection with industrial or agricultural or labour conditions. I am confident that it would be impossible for any government to discover a panacea for all those ills, but I am convinced that the government are responsible for the fiscal policy of the country; therefore I feel quite free to offer some criticisms in connection with the present budget.

To my mind the government of the day have had—possibly still have—a dual policy. I have had more or less to do with political contests on the back concessions and in the rural sections of Ontario for thirty years or more, so that I am not entirely a stranger to political contests, to what has been advocated on the hustings, or to the legislation that has been enacted in connection with our fiscal policy. As I have viewed it during the last thirty years or more, the political parties have had a double policy, one for the time during which they sat on the opposition benches and the other while they sat on the government side. So that from that point of view in any case I am justified in offering some criticism of the minister's budget for the present year.

The Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart), in his address yesterday, told us that the government were moving in the direction of lower tariff. Well, in watching the history of the Liberal party for a considerable length of time I have been impressed by the fact that the motion has been very slow. According to the statements made, and according to what is put before the people in political campaigns, the party now in power have been moving in that direction for a great number of years. I have tried to view the situation honestly and fairly, but my observation is that the progress has been so slow that it has been almost impossible to detect a movement during the last thirty years so far as reduction of the customs tariff is concerned. So that if the government continues to move as slowly in the future as it has in the past. a lot of us boys who are sitting in the House at the present time will have passed out of existence so far as this world is concerned before there is any considerable reduction in the customs tariff.

There is one thing I want to commend the government for, and that is the proposal of a reciprocity agreement with the great nation to the south of us. That proposal has been objected to by some hon. members of this House. I think it was the member for East York (Mr. Harris) who suggested yesterday that the people of Canada were not in favour of entering into an agreement with the United States on trade matters, were not in favour of our standing at the door of the United States begging for an opportunity to carry on our trade. So far as my experience and knowledge goes of the rural people at least they are very, very anxious that such an agreement be brought about, for those of us engaged in agriculture know the benefits that we received while we had an open door into the country to the south of us for our natural products. So I want to congratulate the government upon this step and I hope that negotiations will proceed and the agreement be brought about as speedily as possible.

Mr. PUTNAM: Does not the hon. member admit that this is a step towards lower tariffs?

Mr. WOODS: I will possibly answer that question before I get through, though perhaps not just as directly as the hon. member would wish, but if he follows me closely I think he will find something that will answer his question.

To prove to this House the benefits that the agriculturists of this country at least received while we had access to that open market in the United States I am going to quote from the report of the Department of Trade and Commerce. During the first ten months under the United States Emergency Tariff Canada's exports to the United States of the principal articles affected by the new duties fell, when compared with the corresponding period of the previous fiscal year, from $157,000,000 to $36,000,000. The principal items included in those totals are wheat and cattle. The value of wheat exports fell from $91,000,000 to $13,500,000, and the quantity from 42,000,000 bushels to 11,000,000 bushels. The value of cattle shipments for the same period fell from $21,000,000 to $3,000,000, or from 280,000 head to 143,000 head. So it is apparent that the agriculturists of this country received a wonderful advantage through that open door. It was a great benefit to them to have that open market, and it is our most natural market being right at our door to which to ship our cattle and other products free.

I want now to refer to the tax on cheques in respect to which legislation was brought down in this budget. Personally I am not favourable to that tax. When the Minister of Finance brought down his budget a year ago his first intimation was that cheques should be taxed two cents for each unit of fifty dollars to the full amount of the cheque, but later the tax was changed to a maximum of $2, so that on a cheque over $5,000 only the maximum of $2 was paid and the unit principle ceased. Personally I was not favourable to a maximum being set. The Finance Minister goes a step further in this budget and reduces the maximum from $2 to $1. In that respect this appears to me to be a rich man's budget. A great deal of the business done in our small towns and cities by small merchants, cattle dealers and so forth is done by cheque, and their cheques are usually small. Now they are compelled to pay two cents on every unit of $50 or less no matter how many cheques they issue, while the man doing a large volume of business and paying out hundreds of thousands of dollars pays nothing on a cheque beyond a certain amount. His maximum tax on any cheque, no matter how large, is to be one dollar. I claim that that is very unfair, it works an injustice. I am not going to find fault with the two cent stamp on cheques, not by any means, I think that is a very nice way to raise revenue; but I say that in all fairness to the masses of the people who do business on a small scale and issue many cheques for comparatively small amounts, and who are taxed two cents on every unit of $50, the rich man who issues cheques for large sums of money should be taxed in exactly the same proportion and should pay two cents on every $50 no matter what the size of the cheque issued.

Now, I want to refer for a few moments to the tariff. We have heard occasionally about the high tariff on goods entering the United States. It is true that the United States has a very high tariff, and of course as a justification for keeping up the tariff here hon. gentlemen will sometimes point to the tariff wall on the other side of the line. But while that is true in the general, the United States government has taken cognizance of the needs of the agricultural interests of that country. They have looked well to the interests of the producer. The United States imposes no duty on farm implements of production entering that country, these implements go in there absolutely free. Wagons, threshing machines, cultivators, binders, mowers, reapers, ploughs, harrows, all farm implements enter the United States duty free. But on this side there is a duty of from 10 to 17½ per cent on wagons, 15 per cent on ploughs, cultivators and so forth, and 10 per cent on binders and mowers. It appears to me that if the United States government are so interested in the agriculturists of that country that they can give this advantage to the farmers who cultivate the soil and produce the grain and food that the masses of the people in that country require, the government of this country ought to be as deeply interested in the agriculturists of Canada and give them the same advantage in their work of production. I want to bring to my assistance in this debate, and just in this connection, a speech delivered by the present leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) in the session of 1910-11. I expressed the opinion, when I first began to speak, that there was a dual policy on the part of this government, and it seems to me that in this respect the members of the present administration are not altogether alone; there are possibly some others who are practically in the same boat. If I remember rightly, at the time the right hon. gentleman delivered that speech a large deputation of farmers from the West had waited upon the government of that day and had insisted, I believe, practically on free trade in agricultural implements; at any rate, if they did not ask for absolute free trade in this line they demanded a great reduction. I am going to quote now some brief extracts from Hansard in which the right hon. gentleman's speech on that particular occasion is reported. You will find it at page 1915 of Hansard of 1910-11, volume 1. A resolution was introduced by the right hon. gentleman, and I quote it:

> That in the opinion of this House a substantial reduction in the import duties on agricultural implements is now due the agriculturists of Canada, and is in just accord with the true ends of the protective tariff.

Of course, I must give my right hon. friend credit for this, that he upheld at that time the same idea of protection. However, let me quote another extract from the same speech; it will be found at page 1917 of the same volume.

> They have allowed—

Referring to the government then in power.

> They have allowed, in the respect which I am discussing this afternoon, protection to run rampant, and they have for reasons that are only too obvious, become the slaves of those who helped them into power and who now maintain them there behind ramparts of gold.

In the face of such a statement as that coming from the right hon. the present leader of the Opposition, I think that the group of gentlemen who surround me here and who all advocate a reduction in the customs tariff in connection with agricultural implements, will surely enlist the sympathy and support of the right hon. gentleman. But I cannot help remarking that if the government in 1910 were standing behind ramparts of gold they are to-day still standing behind the same fortress; for as we are all aware, while the duty has been reduced, I think, on binders, which at that time paid 17½ per cent whereas to-day the duty is 10 per cent, the duty on ploughs is still 15 per cent, with similar rates on harrows and other necessaries of that description. So that there is not such a wonderful difference, after all, in that direction. But we must bear in mind this important fact, that implements in 1910 were slightly over half their present price, and in dollars and cents the protection which is afforded to-day on these implements is greater than it was at that time. The price is well nigh double what it was in 1910; and notwithstanding that there has been a slight reduction in the rate of duty, the actual amount in dollars and cents paid on these implements coming from the other side is considerably more than it was in 1910.

Take boots and shoes as another example. If agricultural implements are of great importance to the farmers of Canada, it will not be denied that boots and shoes are an absolute necessity to all of the people throughout the Dominion; and if it is desirable to reduce the duty on agricultural implements, in my opinion the duty on boots and shoes should undoubtedly also be reduced. Boots and shoes to-day are going to the United States free of duty, while we are taxed in this country from 25 to 30 per cent for them.

Mr. McMASTER: Fifteen per cent British preference.

Mr. WOODS: I am referring to the general tariff; the duty is 25 to 30 per cent. But the United States admits boots and shoes absolutely free. Yet we are told that if the customs tariff were reduced the manufacturers of the country would suffer. It strikes me that, seeing that labour, according to evidence given before the Agricultural Conditions committee, is practically about the same—this being also very largely true of material—if the manufacturers of the United States can turn out agricultural implements and boots and shoes and throw them upon the world's markets in open competition with all other countries including Canada, the Canadian manufacturers of these same goods should be able to compete in the same markets with the producers to the south of us.

Mr. STANSELL: Would the hon. member say to what extent the boot and shoe manufacturers of Canada are exporting shoes to the United States at the present time?

Mr. WOODS: According to the evidence given before the Agricultural Conditions committee a few days ago, if my memory serves me,—and I think I have the facts here—a shoe manufacturer in his testimony practically stated that there were no exports of boots and shoes from Canada to the United States. But let us not forget this, that the boot and shoe manufacturers of Canada hold a monopoly of this industry in this country. When these goods from the United States are debarred by a duty of from 25 to 30 per cent the practical effect is to give the manufacturers in this country an absolute monopoly of the home market.

Mr. HOEY: While they have a larger market in the United States as well.

Mr. WOODS: Yes; they have free access to the United States market, so that if they have any surplus in Canada they can place it there. I am going to bring the House back again to another quotation from the speech by the right hon. leader of the Opposition delivered in, 1910, to be found on page 1,931 of Hansard of that year. He said:

> Now, sir, what are the manufacturers of agricultural implements enabled to do? They are able under this tariff to exact a higher price than they could exact if the tariff were lower.

And then a little further on, on page 1933, he said:

> They have not only given the manufacturers a grip on the whole home market, but practically given them a monopoly of it, and they have taxed the consumer in order to push the manufacturers and their industries successfully into the markets of the world.

Now I believe that statement of the right hon. member in 1910 is absolutely true, that the customs tariff of this country and the protection that the manufacturers have had for forty years have given the manufacturers a grip on the home markets of this country, and practically given them a monopoly of those markets and enabled them, as the right hon. gentleman has stated, to push their manufactured goods into the other markets of the world.

But what are the conditions in regard to agriculture? The farmers of this country have not a home market for the produce of the soil. True, there may be a few farmers living in close proximity to our large urban centres who will benefit by being in touch with the markets there because products can be brought to the city markets and sold to the consumers without passing through the hands of a middleman. In that regard the farmers of this country are benefited, but how many? Very few of the farmers of the Dominion of Canada are in the happy position that they can bring their products to those markets in the urban centres and sell them directly to the consumer, without passing them through the hands of the middlemen. The home markets are practically worthless to the farmers, because we have to put our surplus products on the markets of the world. According to the figures in the report of the Department of Trade and Commerce last year, we exported, in vegetable and animal products, the products of the farm, $233,692,749 worth more than we imported. In the animal and vegetable products of the farm this country has exported goods to that amount more than have been imported of the same quality of goods. The producers of these goods have no home market, speaking on broad lines for goods have to go to the open markets of the world. This boasted home market that the tariff has built up—and we have had many public addresses along that line—has been built up for the manufacturers

Then again we are referred to the revenue, and the fact is pointed out that we need a customs tariff for revenue. We know that considerable revenue is derived from the customs tariff, but it is quite possible that a lower tariff might bring equally as much revenue or possibly more. We see an example of that in the statement made by the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) in regard to cigarettes in his budget speech. The duty on cigarettes was practically a prohibitive duty and the reduction of that duty was made in the hope that it might bring in more revenue. What is true in regard to that is certainly true in regard to other commodities. To my mind a revenue tariff works in the reverse way, because of the fact that it is too high, and we might possibly receive more revenue with a lower tariff, and it would impose less burden on the consuming public.

Now again I am going to refer to the speech of the right hon. member (Mr. Meighen) delivered in 1910, to verify the statement which I have made. At page 1,933 of the same Hansard he said:

> I say that to my mind this tariff is designed to benefit the revenues of other countries rather than the revenues of our own countries. As at present constituted this is not so much a tariff for the revenue of Canada as a tariff for the revenue of Spain, as a tariff for the revenue of Austria. . . . It is, Sir, a tariff for the revenue of Roumania, a tariff for the revenue of Russia, a tariff for the revenue of France rather than a tariff for the revenue of Canada.

That quotation verifies the statement I have just made in regard to the high tariff being to some extent prohibitive, and that a marked reduction in that tariff might be the means of bringing more revenue to this country than it does at the present time.

I wish to refer now to the tariff as being a means of centralizing the industries of the Dominion of Canada. I think the hon. member for North Waterloo, (Mr. Euler) in his speech some time ago, advised our friends from the West—if my memory serves me right, and I think it does—to start manufacturing industries all over the West.

Mr. EULER: Hear, hear.

Mr. WOODS: It would be a wonderful thing to start manufacturing industries all over the West and build up a home market. It has been proven conclusively, to my mind at least, that with our present population, and until it reaches to millions and millions more than we have at the present time, we have practically no home market for the agricultural products of this country.

Mr. EULER: I was also in favour of the policy of immigration—to let the people come in.

Mr. WOODS: I also hope we will get immigration. What has this done for the small manufacturer? I refer chiefly to Ontario, because I am not so much acquainted with the other provinces of the Dominion, so far as industries are concerned, but I have known something about the conditions in the province of Ontario for the last forty or fifty years. I am sure that I am correct when I state that 30 or 40 years ago scattered throughout Ontario in almost every little village there were one or two manufacturing establishments which supplied the great bulk of the needs of the people in those commodities. They were small foundries where men got their ploughs, their cultivators, their farm implements to a great extent, outside possibly of binders. They got their mowers. Personally I might state that the first mower we ever got on our farm I bought for $40 from a home manufacturer right at my own door. I cut wood in the bush and paid for it. We never had a more substantial mowing machine on our farm from that day to this, and we have had quite a number of them. That, however, is a thing of the past, because those small industries have been either swamped or bought out, I do not know which. There is no question that they have disappeared. We are at a loss, to a large extent, even in getting our repairs which we formerly got from those little manufacturing establishments that we had in our communities. They built our threshing machines, our horse-power machines, many of our farm implements, such as ploughs and so forth. Those establishments have now disappeared. In those days we could take our grist to the mill, have our wheat ground and our flour returned to us along with the by-products, bran and shorts. Those mills have all disappeared. We could take our oats to the mill and get our oatmeal back with us. Those mills too have all disappeared. The reason is that the manufacturers of this country have been so protected that they have built up gigantic industries in the great urban centres, and from the rural communities they have drawn the labourers, the farmers, many of our people who should be on the farms to-day, operating and cultivating the soil. Those people have been drawn off to the great urban centres because of the centralization of the manufacturing industries of this country. I believe the protective tariff has a great deal to do with that condition in Ontario to-day.

But then we are told that where they have a greater volume of business, where they have larger machines, they can manufacture the implements so much more cheaply in those great factories than could be done in the small factories. I believe that is true; but who reaps the benefit of those cheap manufactured goods? Who are the beneficiaries? It is not the farmers back on the farm, but the manufacturers that receive the benefit by manufacturing more cheaply and at the same time holding up the price of their goods under the protective policy of this country. I am going to give an illustration of that. In the constituency which I have the honour to represent there is one small factory that has weathered the storm. It has not weathered the storm as regards manufacturing new implements to any extent; but it still carries on by manufacturing repairs for the implements in that community. I am going to give to the House figures that are absolutely correct. In 1921, that foundry in the constituency that I represent was selling ploughshares to the farmers at 50 cents apiece. It was sending them out over the community wherever people would send in an order for them, and while of course, there would be the freight, that would be a very small trifle for a ploughshare going a short distance by railway over the constituency. I asked that manufacturer what he was selling these ploughshares for, and he said: "I am selling them for 50 cents apiece and I am sending them out by the hundreds." At the very time that that small manufacturer was selling ploughshares at 50 cents apiece, our local dealers, who were agents for the large manufacturing companies of this country, were charging us from 90 cents to $1.20 for the same ploughshares. Who was receiving the benefit? If the small manufacturer could make ploughshares at 50 cents apiece, why could the manufacturers not make those ploughshares, send them out and sell them through their local agents for 65 or 70 cents apiece? It is the large manufacturers who have received the benefit of cheaper manufacture in the great centres, and this, I claim, is due to centralization largely brought about through the protection that is given to the manufacturers by the customs tariff.

I am going to refer to another matter that has been thrown in our face occasionally, and that is that when the Reciprocity agreement was before the people of the Dominion of Canada, the farmers turned it down. In my opinion, to a large extent we are guilty; but so far as my knowledge goes in connection with that particular campaign as it was carried on in the locality in which I live—and I think that would be a fair sample of what went on in the various localities in Ontario—I did not know of any Liberals in the past who were farmers turning against the Liberal party and going over and voting with the Conservatives. I knew of no Liberals who forsook the Liberal party because of the Reciprocity agreement.

Mr. McMASTER: Not real ones.

Mr. WOODS: So in regard to that, the farmers are not really guilty. If the farmers had turned over from the Conservative ranks and voted Liberal in strong numbers, we might have succeeded, and I am sorry that they did not. So far as I know they did not do so to any great extent in the rural sections. What was the result in the urban centres? What was the attitude of the Liberals in the great urban centres, the industrial Liberals of the Dominion of Canada, in connection with the Reciprocity agreement?

5 p.m.

Mr. McMASTER: The noble eighteen of Toronto.

Mr. WOODS: That was just what I was going to refer to. Eighteen Liberals signed a manifesto to oppose that Reciprocity agreement, and if my memory serves me aright, I think amongst that number was Sir Thomas White who was honoured with the position of Minister of Finance of the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. McMASTER: By the Tories.

Mr. WOODS: But he turned over from Liberalism.

Mr. McMASTER: Yes.

Mr. WOODS: That is to my mind conclusive evidence that the manufacturers of this country are behind the government that will protect them. They are behind the government for class legislation. Although the Progressive group has been charged with coming into existence to seek class legislation for the farmers, this group came into existence because we had to fight class legislation in the Dominion of Canada. Many of us would have been tilling our land to-day if it had not been for the very fact that the farmers of this country had been burdened through class legislation in the interest of the manufacturing industries. That is the reason why this group is here to-day. We are on the job, we are going to stay on the job, and we are going to fight for equal rights to all and special privileges to none.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will my hon. friend aid us in starting that campaign by moving the permanent suspension of the Crowsnest rates?

Mr. WOODS: We will see how things are going to work out in the future. So far as my observation goes, our tariff legislation for the last thirty or forty years is the joint product of the Liberal and Conservative parties, and both parties are in the one boat as respects fiscal policy. In a word, which ever party happened to be in power never failed to receive support of the manufacturing interests, because quite naturally these interests always stand behind the party that stands for protection in this Dominion.

Mr. W. D. EULER (North Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, before entering upon the observations which I intend to make on the budget proper, I should like to join in the congratulations which have been tendered by other members to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) on the presentation of his seventeenth budget. And I do this for two reasons; first, because he has established a record that is unique in the management of the Finance department of Canada and, secondly, because he is held to-day, after twenty-five years of office beginning in 1896, in just as great regard by the people of Canada as ever. I further congratulate him because of the budget which he has brought down at this time. I do not suppose that my hon. friends opposite will agree with me, but I think the Minister of Finance has presented a budget which ought to meet with the general approval of the people of Canada. I do not suppose that he himself would claim that his budget is entirely perfect. It may be capable of improvement. Indeed, there may be one or two features of it with which I would not agree myself. But in a country such as we have, with its diversified interests, I realize, and I think all members should realize, that it is necessary to grant something to the spirit of compromise.

True, the budget has met with some criticism, but this criticism has not been very strong. I should like to approach the consideration of the budget in a broad way and from a national viewpoint. It has sometimes been said that Canada is a very difficult country to govern. I believe that to be true. We know the Maritime provinces came into confederation unwillingly; they felt they were losing their natural market in the United States, and for it they claimed they were not compensated by the market which they hoped to get in central Canada, in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec; and to-day many of their people find it difficult to make ends meet because of that disadvantage. Farther west we have the industrial provinces of Quebec and Ontario where, rightly or wrongly, the people feel that a moderate tariff is necessary for the preservation of their industries. Going still farther west we have the prairie provinces where again, rightly or wrongly, the people feel that no tariff at all or a very, very moderate tariff indeed is in their interests. And then across the Rocky mountains we have a mixed population whose ideas vary on the subject of the tariff. All of which, Mr. Speaker, merely goes to prove that if we are to have national unity we must each of us, though our interests vary, yield something for the common good. And that is why I support the budget.

I should like to deal for a moment with some of the criticism directed against the budget. So far as the criticisms of my hon. friend, the former Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) are concerned, in my opinion they require very little reply. He had a very difficult duty to perform, and it is no reflection upon his ability to say that he found it extremely difficult to make an impression on this House favourable to his views. I believe that if he were perfectly frank he would say that the budget is a reasonably good one—not so good, of course, as a budget that he might present himself.

I presume that when the right hon. leader of the Opposition takes part in this debate he will as usual refer to breach of faith on the part of the Liberal party with respect to the tariff plank in the platform of 1919. That is usually his stock in trade, and I for one do not particularly blame him for taking any opportunity that may present itself in making out what I consider to be a poor case. Perhaps it may shock some members on this side of the House when I say that I have very little confidence in the making of platforms, anyway. I do not believe that a government or members elected to the responsibility of a seat in this House should necessarily be asked to accept what may be ill-digested planks in any platform imposed upon them by people who come from various parts of the country, and whose suggestions probably are as much dictated by political expediency as anything else; I do not believe that men who represent the public should be expected to carry out such ill-considered behests on the floor of this House. So that speaking for myself, Sir, I would say frankly that in the public interest the platform of 1919 should not be permitted to shackle the government responsible to all the people, whether it be a matter of tariff or anything else.

Mr. GOULD: Would the hon. member inform me whether that expression of opinion was voiced by him in the hall where the platform of 1919 was framed?

Mr. EULER: I may tell my hon. friend that I was not present when the platform was framed and I never gave adherence to it afterward. Now, referring again to the criticisms of the hon. gentleman (Sir Henry Drayton) who leads the official Opposition to-day, I listened to him very carefully, and the burden of his song when he particularized somewhat seemed to me to be this: The government was taking steps to promote the artificial silk industry. If you are going to help the artificial silk industry why not promote the interests of the natural silk industry, he asked. Then he claimed the government was not properly taxing luxuries, and answered his own qusetion by saying: Perhaps this government proposes to help the artificial silk industry because artificial silk is the only kind of silk that the common people can afford to buy.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does not the hon. gentleman understand that, according to everything that has been said in certain quarters, protecting artificial silk would put a price on it, and therefore would add to the cost of what was at least an article of luxury?

Mr. EULER: I understood that he was saying that luxuries were not properly taxed; yet he was objecting to the process of making available to the common people an article that was just as good, perhaps, as the real silk but would not cost them quite so much.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: And now coming in without that protective duty.

Mr. EULER: My hon. friend's solicitude for the lowly silk worm reminded me of a little rhyme I heard some years ago. Perhaps I may be permitted to paraphrase it—and I assure my hon. friend that I do so without any intention whatever of giving offence. It ran something like this:

> It wriggles in; it wriggles out,
> Leaving the hunter still in doubt
> Whether the worm that made the track
> Was going out or coming back.

I would like to discuss for a few moments the criticisms of the leader of the Progressive group. I felt when he was speaking that his objection to the budget was apologetic in its nature, and I was rather impressed by the fact—I think it is a fact—that the Progressive party itself did not really expect any very great change in the tariff at this session. They would have been very well satisfied, I believe—and I doubt whether any of them will contradict me now—if the hon. Finance Minister had not made what they considered an unfortunate statement with regard to the desirability of stability in the tariff. I am free to say, Mr. Speaker, that that statement of the Finance Minister was especially pleasing to me and should receive the favourable consideration of the House. I do not think he intended to convey the impression that the tariff was as unchangeable as the laws of the Medes and Persians. Indeed, he stated very definitely that there was room for change as circumstances demanded. But surely, in the matter of the business interests of this country, whether you call them manufacturing interests or any other, it is advisable and for the general good that business men should know that there is reasonable likelihood that they may be allowed to carry on their affairs and extend their businesses without the constant apprehension that they are going to be interfered with by radical tariff changes. In fact—and I have no doubt that my Progressive friends are aware of this—no less a gentleman than Mr. Henry Wise Wood, of Alberta, a not inconsiderable figure in the party, has expressed his appreciation of the budget and stated that he is well satisfied with it.

We must not forget that a fiscal policy that is satisfactory to all Canadians cannot be framed without, perhaps, failing to give satisfaction to some of the diversified interests that we have in this Dominion.

I have a great deal of sympathy—and I hope my hon. friends will believe this—for the farmer of Canada, more particularly for the farmer of western Canada. I have that sympathy because I think every citizen ought to feel consideration for any other citizen or any other class of citizens who find it very hard to make both ends meet in these times. And I have a certain selfish consideration in the matter also, because I am free to admit that if the western farmer or any other farmer in Canada does not prosper, then the industries of the riding which I represent cannot prosper as they should. There are in my riding something like 150 to 165 manufacturing industries. Their market, or a great portion of it, is in western Canada, and they are very much interested in the progress and prosperity of the western farmers. The farmers themselves in the district in which I live have just as great a concern in the prosperity of the industries of the city from which I come, because that city is in itself a very considerable market for their produce. But while it has been difficult for the farmer to make his way—and we all freely admit that—I think sometimes there is a disposition on the part of our friends opposite to feel that the manufacturers and the business men of Ontario and Quebec are making huge profits at their expense. Now, I know whereof I speak, and I may say to my friends opposite that many of the manufacturers in the city from which I come, as well as in many of the other industrial centres in the province of Ontario, have found it very difficult to get along during the last few years. The point of my remarks is this, that in this country of varied interests there must be something of a compromise. We must get something of the other man's point of view so that we shall not take an extreme view in any one direction. We may be partly right, but the other man is perhaps also partly right; in order to get together each of us must yield a little his own viewpoint.

In theory most men are free traders; in actual practice we all know that at the present moment free trade is not possible. Liberals and Conservatives usually draw fine distinctions on tariff matters; the Liberal sometimes speaks of tariff for revenue and the Conservative frankly advocates a tariff for protection. The attitude I have always taken with regard to that—I have taken it before in this House and I take it again to-day—is this: That as a matter of fact a tariff, whatever name you may give it, is protectionist in its effect. It makes no real difference whether the tariff is primarily a means for the purpose of raising revenue;—it will have a protective result. If you impose a duty upon the foreign manufacturer who brings his goods into this country, just to that extent do you impose a handicap on the foreign manufacturer and to that extent favour the manufacturer of your own country.

Mr. McMASTER: But you do not put the tax on the foreign manufacturer; you put it on your own consumer.

Mr. EULER: Well, it is just a question where you are going to draw the line as to what is the interest of the consumer. If you are going to make your tariff so low that your manufacturer cannot exist, or if you wipe it out altogether, I think you will soon find there is a corresponding effect upon the consumer as well—usually a workingman who is engaged in production and is also a consumer.

The leader of the Progressives complains that the government has not lived up to its 1919 platform, yet in his amendment he fails to state completely his own platform. Why does he not call for free trade with England as it was enunciated in his own platform some years ago—free trade with England within five years? I think the five years have elapsed; if he still believes in the principle as enunciated a few years ago he might just as well have called in his amendment for absolute free trade with England.

The budget calls for an increased preference to Britain, yet that does not meet with the approval of the hon. leader of the Progressives. The budget has a standing offer to the United States for reciprocity in farm products, yet he calls in his amendment for the old Reciprocity agreement of 1911, in face of the fact that many of his followers, many of the people of western Canada, especially in the province of Manitoba, failed to support the very reciprocity agreement that he asks for to-day.

Mr. HOEY: They are all converted now.

Mr. GOULD: That applied to the urban centres, not to the farmers.

Mr. EULER: I have the highest regard for the hon. leader of the Progressives—and I am sorry he is not in his seat to-day. I believe he is sincere in what he advocates, but I do not think that in his criticisms he has been quite fair to the government. He said the other day that this budget and this government have done nothing for the farmer. I wonder if he has forgotten what took place last session when this government restored the Crowsnest rates on grain and saved the farmers of western Canada $20,000,000 in freight rates.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Last Mountain): That is not in the budget.

Mr. EULER: My statement was that he had said this government had done nothing for the farmers.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Last Mountain): He was referring to the budget.

Mr. EULER: I think you will find on referring to Hansard that he said neither this government nor the budget had done anything for the farmers.

I would like to make a reference to the Crowsnest pass arrangement of last year. It is true, I believe, that the leader of the Progressive party himself as well as many of my Progressive friends, and I am not saying this with the intention of arousing any antagonism but simply to show that they have not acted fairly in the matter—there are notable exceptions, I am willing to admit—did go west and claimed, and claimed in Ottawa, that they forced the Liberal government to restore the Crowsnest rates on grain. Mr. Speaker, nothing can be further from the truth, and I leave it to the members of that special committee on railway rates to say whether it was not the Liberals on that committee that gave them support and helped to restore the Crowsnest pass agreement.

Mr. HOEY: The Liberals helped.

Mr. EULER: Yes, and if it had not been for the help of the Liberals my hon. friends would never have received that agreement. I will say this further: There were members on that committee, members from this side of the House, who in a sense worked against their own interests when they took that attitude on the Crowsnest agreement. If I may be pardoned a personal remark, I was a member of that committee. Among the commodities that were included in the old Crowsnest agreement was furniture. Now there are in the riding I represent something like twenty-five furniture manufacurers, and yet I was in favour of dropping the commodity of furniture from the agreement and restoring only the grain rates for the benefit of the western farmer. There was another member of that committee himself a manufacturer of furniture who very cheerfully sacrificed himself in that respect also.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Has the hon. gentleman and his co-member yet been able to get a statement from the government as to whether they will give the manufacturers those low rates this year?

Mr. EULER: I have not made any inquiry with regard to that, but I will say this: Notwithstanding that the rates on furniture and other commodities were not restored as they were on wheat, I have had absolutely no complaint from the furniture manufacturers of my town. In fact, I discussed the matter with some of them and they were quite willing to say, "The western farmer needs the assistance, and we will give him all the help we can. We are perfectly willing to wait until he gets in a better position."

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That will be next year, won't it?

Mr. EULER: I cannot say. I am not entirely in the confidence of the government with regard to these matters. What I do say is this, that it showed that the attitude of the Liberal party and of those manufacturers was an admirable one and contrary to what we sometimes hear of the selfishness of manufacturers and the dereliction of the government with regard to the interests of the western farmer.

Mr. McMASTER: And showed the manufacturers' confidence in their member.

Mr. EULER: It is true that it was simply the granting of a just demand. But I will add that a fair and just acknowledgment that the Progressives had received the assistance of Liberals and of the government would have been more in place than a denial or a suppression of the fact that they received the assistance of which I have spoken.

Mr. BIRD: Can the hon. member give an instance of where any Progressive member made the statement he charges us with?

Mr. EULER: I could quote him the attitude and statement of a very prominent member of the party in that committee itself, who stated that the concession was forced from the Liberals.

Mr. HALBERT: Is the hon. member sure that he is quoting a member of the Progressive party?

Mr. EULER: Yes, I am quoting the leader of the Progressive group.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Last Mountain): I am sure the hon. member wishes to be fair. My leader is not here, but I think my hon. friend will admit that the statement to which he has made reference was not made in a spirit of criticism at all, but more as a joke and was not in any sense seriously meant.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. EULER: I really regret having had to make that statement. I had no intention of making it, but I was pressed for it by my hon. friends opposite.

Selfish tactics are usually attributed only to the two old parties. Well, Mr. Speaker, the two old parties have their faults, but I believe that the average of political morality and of real patriotism and the desire to serve their fellowmen is just as high in the two old parties as it is anywhere else. I for one, and I am saying this not with any malice at all, will say frankly that, to use an expression often used, I am just about tired of that "holier than thou" attitude taken by some members of this House. The Progressive member for Edmonton (Mr. Kellner) yesterday voiced the old stereotyped shibboleth that both parties took orders from the big interests, and that is why I am making these remarks to-day. I resent that statement on the part of the hon. member. I do not believe it is true, and if I believed this government was taking orders from the big interests I would not support it.

Mr. BIRD: Does the hon. member make that statement on behalf of both parties?

Mr. EULER: I think I can make that denial on behalf of both parties.

Mr. BIRD: Does the hon. gentleman remember certain statements made to my right last year in regard to the influences that had returned the Liberal party to power?

Mr. EULER: I do not recall any particular statement.

Mr. BIRD: I could give two instances.

Mr. EULER: I should be sorry to believe that either of the old parties is susceptible to these influences as indicated in such a wholesale way by the hon. member for East Edmonton (Mr. Kellner). Speaking for myself I would say this: I believe that I represent the farmers, the workingmen, the manufacturers, the business men, men of all classes, just as fairly according to my own poor ability as any member on either side of this House. I never asked nor received from any central fund any contribution, and there are no strings, financial or otherwise, attached to me. I wonder whether the same can be said of every member of the group opposite.

Coming back now to a more pleasant subject, we from Ontario are usually charged with being high protectionists.

Mr. MEIGHEN: May I ask the hon. member a question? First of all I acknowledge the generous attitude he has taken, nor can I ever recall his taking any different attitude. But I ask him if he has any recollection of the speech of his own leader in the corresponding budget debate of 1921? I think the worst offender to receive his own castigation now is his leader of to-day.

Mr. EULER: I regret that the leader of the government is not here at the moment. I am quite sure he would be in a position to answer the hon. member's question. I am not.

I was going on to refer to the tariff. Those of us who come from the province of Ontario are very often charged with being high protectionists. I will say for myself, and I believe I can say this for almost every hon. member who comes from Ontario, most of whom come from industrial towns and cities, that we are not high protectionists. We are not elected as high protectionists. We believe, most of us, in a moderate tariff. Personally—I have said this frequently before—I believe in a tariff that is going to maintain our industries, not to maintain industries that are going to build up a monopoly and squeeze the last cent out of the consumer. But after all, I have a concern in the industries in the riding which I represent, and I for one could not vote for such a reduction of the tariff or an entire elimination of the tariff that to my knowledge might work certain injury not only to the manufacturers, but to the working men of the constituency I have the honour to represent. As a matter of fact, the farmers and the manufacturers have very much the same difficulty. They are brothers together; the difficulty of both alike is the lack of markets. The Canadian manufacturer would like a larger market, although to-day he is doing an export trade as great as that of all the products of the farm. But his difficulty is just what I have stated; he needs larger markets.

Mr. GOULD: In his statement about the manufacturers doing such a larger trade than the farmers, I think the hon. gentleman is saying something that is at least a bit strong.

Mr. EULER: I have the statement on good authority and if the hon. gentleman can give me figures to the contrary I am quite willing to accept them. But whether I am right or wrong in what I have just said, the fact remains, there is a common difficulty for the manufacturer and the farmer. They both want to extend their market; and I will say this for the manufacturers—and I can speak with some knowledge of the attitude of those in my own community, there being very many large industries in the city of Kitchener—that many of them are of this view, that if they were assured of a large market to the south, if they were assured of a reasonable permanency in demand in that market, they would be willing to compete with the United States manufacturers on a fair and even basis.

Mr. HOEY: They have such a market in boots and shoes.

Mr. EULER: That is one article on the American free list, but there is no certainty of permanency about it. And men with large business interests are not going to extend their enterprise and do business in a market of 110 or 120 million people, incurring great expenditures, unless there is reasonable assurance of permanency in that market. I for one say that there is no justification for opening our markets entirely to our neighbours to the south of us when they persist in keeping up their high tariff against us; and I have no hesitation whatever in taking this position, that I will oppose serious reduction of the tariff just so long as the United States government maintains its tariff wall as it is doing now. I should think that this ought to appeal to the patriotism of some of my Progressive friends opposite. I know that some of the Progressives would say to-day, if they gave expression to what they feel, that they are not in favour of raising the Canadian tariff or cutting it down while the United Sates retains its own tariff against Canada.

The Progressive amendment calls for lower tariff, and, I think, consequent lower revenue.

Mr. McMASTER: Not necessarily.

Mr. EULER: I think so. The tariff we have now is a moderate one, and if you made it much lower the revenues would be very much smaller.

Mr. GOULD: What is the hon. gentleman's authority for his statement?

Mr. EULER: I say that the tariff is a moderate one.

Mr. GOULD: You believe that.

Mr. EULER: Yes, and it affords a reasonable protection from other countries; it is neither an exclusive nor a monopolistic tariff, and I do not believe that there are many of my Progressive friends who would argue that. Consequently, to reduce the tariff is to reduce to a great extent the revenues which we receive at present. We have to-day a deficit of almost $50,000,000 and if you reduced the tariff very much, I for one certainly believe that that deficit would be still larger. That is a serious situation to face. It is the duty of the Minister of Finance to adjust his finances in keeping with his expectations, and personally I do not blame him at the moment for declining to reduce the tariff at the risk of adding to the national debt. I also agree with the minister in not imposing new taxation in order to make the budget balance. Taxes are now high, and there are some forms of taxation I do not believe in. I believe that taxation is reasonably high now, and if it is true that the tremendous debt we are carrying to-day, and which entails such heavy taxation from year to year, was incurred for the preservation of our liberty and the liberty of the world, then I say it is fair that posterity should carry at least a portion of it.

Mr. McMASTER: Posterity can hardly be charged with responsibility for the war.

Mr. EULER: No, but it will share in the good results that may have been secured.

Mr. GRAHAM: "The sins of the fathers," you know.

Mr. EULER: Whatever may be the general opinion about that, I believe that under present circumstances, and in view of the condition of depression that now prevails, the Minister of Finance is quite justified in not increasing taxation. I think he may look forward with reasonable hope to the restoration of better business conditions and an improvement in the railway situation, and this being the case I do not think that higher taxation will be necessary next year or in the years to follow. I think that the position taken by the Ontario man and possibly by the resident of Quebec would under similar circumstances be taken by my hon. friends the Progressives. Most of them represent farming constituencies. Now, I do not suppose there is much essential difference between the United States farmer and the Canadian farmer. The Canadian farmer believes in a very low tariff, or practically in absolute free trade, because he thinks it would benefit him. The American farmer to-day is an ardent protectionist, because he is of the opinion that protection is going to work to his advantage. In short it all depends on whose ox is gored. I believe that my hon. friends opposite are actuated by altruistic motives, if I may use that term, just as much as any of us, but not a very great deal more. Charity begins at home.

Mr. CAMPBELL: What motives actuate the manufacturers?

Mr. EULER: Let me ask the hon. gentleman this: What were the motives of the Westerners when they asked for an exclusive wheat board, which was protection?

Mr. CAMPBELL: They wanted to eliminate the speculator.

Mr. EULER: I was not going to refer to this, but the hon. gentleman suggests the question. The leader of the Progressives (Mr. Forke), in an address the other day on the Combines Act, expressed the opinion that combines ought to be curbed when they entailed higher prices for the consumer. Well, I think that this would have been exactly the result that would have been attained by the Wheat Board. The Westerner would expect higher prices for his wheat and if he got higher prices someone would have to pay—

Mr. CAMPBELL: Not at the expense of the consumer.

Mr. EULER: —unless we accept the pretext that there is some man who comes in between the producer and the consumer and takes the intermediate profit.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Last Mountain): That is not a pretext.

Mr. EULER: The Westerner believes in free trade because he thinks it is to his advantage. He may be right or he may be wrong. The Easterner believes equally in protection, if you like to call it protection, or at least in a moderate tariff. He, too, may be right or wrong. It just comes back again to my old argument; it all goes to show that all of us, no matter what we may believe is good for ourselves or for the country, should, if we have divergent views, try to compromise and to reconcile those views as far as possible.

Mr. EVANS: Is it not a fact that the Canadian manufacturer believes in free trade too when it comes to raw materials for his purposes?

Mr. EULER: I do not know what the attitude of the manufacturers may be, but I would say that so far as is possible, all along the line, the Canadian manufacturer ought to get his raw materials free.

Mr. EVANS: Would you not concede the same thing to the agriculturists?

Mr. EULER: Is the hon. member referring to raw materials?

Mr. EVANS: Yes.

Mr. HOEY: He means instruments of prodution.

Mr. EVANS: Well, that is our raw material.

Mr. EULER: That is rather a novel way of putting it; I never thought of it in that way before.

Mr. PRITCHARD: What about printing presses?

Mr. EULER: They do not come free.

Mr. CAMPBELL: What about fertilizer?

Mr. EULER: I protest; I cannot answer all these questions at once, and I must pray that I be allowed to proceed. I am convinced that the tariff question is magnified out of all proportion. As the member for Brantford (Mr. Raymond) stated the other day, there are other important matters that are worthy of the consideration of parliament and of the Progressive party.

[Mr. Euler.]

Mr. BIRD: Would the hon. gentleman enlarge upon his definition of a moderate tariff? Wherein does it differ from the tariff of my hon. friends to my right?

Mr. EULER: Again I must protest at the number of questions that are being flung at me; I really desire to conclude before six o'clock if my good friends will allow me to do so. If the hon. gentleman desires to discuss the tariff or any other question with me on any other occasion I should be glad to take it up with him. Now, the government has a duty to perform to all citizens of this Dominion, and it cannot heed the demands of any particular occupational group at the expense of all the others. For that reason, and because I believe the budget is an honest attempt to afford a fair average of justice to all classes of the community, while having regard to the financial necessities of the country, I am going to support it.

The leader of the Progressives (Mr. Forke) believes the loss of revenue should be made up from the taxing of unearned income and taxes on luxuries. I confess I have a good deal of sympathy with that suggestion, but I fear that, as a definite source of large revenue, a tax on unearned incomes would not be so successful as he imagines. I also agree with what the leader of the Progressives said with regard to economy, and I think what he said with regard to the Civil Service is worthy the consideration of the government. I believe all civil servants ought to be well paid, but I do not think we ought to have any larger number in the service than is absolutely necessary.

I was going to speak briefly on the subject of taxes, entirely apart from the tariff. I think that during the next generation governments in general throughout the civilized world, especially those who took part in the war, will meet defeat more frequently than in the past, for the simple reason that people resent taxation, all of which is a reason why the theory of taxation should be carefully studied and a logical, reasonable system of taxation worked out, in this country as well as in other countries. People never take kindly to taxes in any country, and that is another reason why, both politically and in other ways, it would be wise to make the imposition of taxation just as light and as little irritating as possible.

I take mild issue with the government in the matter of taxation. I never believed from the beginning, under the Union government, in the imposition of taxes such as the stamp tax, and, more recently, the tax on receipts, and many of the irritating excise taxes which we have had in the past. I believe we can develop something that is a good deal more simple and just as logical as the taxes that we have now. I see no real connection between the liability for a tax and the justice of placing a tax, on cheques for example. The mere fact that a man is paying out a sum of money by cheque is no reason why he should pay a tax. He may have had to borrow in order to pay the money and yet he is taxed. If there is any logic in it, I think the tax should be paid by the man who receives the money, rather than the man who pays it.

But I base my argument in that regard on the difficulties in connection with collecting the tax, and the unnecessary irritation that it causes to the public. I was going to make this suggestion—and I have made it before—that ultimately the government might very well confine the tax-raising operations to three chief sources. First, the tariff, and the amount of taxes to be gathered in that way is limited. Then we should have an income tax, and obtain as much as is fair and right from those who can afford to pay. That is also limited. There will still be a large balance which will be required, which ought to be and must be collected from the ordinary man of the country. That will be a general tax that will be averaged, and will be collected from all classes, because we already have provided for taking taxes from the man who has a large income through the income tax. As to that I believe—although I know there are a great many objections to it—that in the end governments will come to a simplified form of a turn-over or sales tax. I am quite sure some of my Progressive friends will find fault with that, but I believe that in the end it will be found the most equitable and certainly the cheapest form of taxation to collect. We should get down finally to the three basic methods of taxation, the tariff, the income tax, and the turn-over or sales tax.

I admit there is a great deal to be said against the sales or turn-over tax. But that is the case with all taxes. The tax that has just been imposed in the way of a sales tax is open to the objection that there will be pyramiding all the way down the line, and the consumer will pay more than the amount of the tax. I know that is the argument. Perhaps, with careful thought we can develop something that will meet the situation. And consideration should be given to the endeavour to prevent overlapping of the taxation that we have in this country to-day. As to the income tax, in Ontario a man must pay to the federal government and also to the municipal government. In Manitoba I note that the government has imposed a provincial income tax. It seems to me it would be the part of wisdom for the federal, the municipal and the provincial authorities to get together and map out their spheres of taxation, so that they will not overlap.

In conclusion I wish to say a few words on a subject in which I am always very much interested. That is the matter of the National Railways and the public ownership of railways. There was a time—two or three years ago, perhaps longer—when I believed in public ownership, and I was one of the very few who were in favour of national ownership of railways on principle. The railways, it has been said by the right hon. leader of the Opposition and others, and quite rightly so, were taken over because they had to be taken over. They were bankrupt. But so far as I was concerned, I favoured that action on principle. Now we have lost very heavily on our railways in the past year. We have however, I am glad to say, improved our position by something like $12,000,000, and the improvement to-day is very rapid. At present the business of the National Railways is increasing by leaps and bounds, and I believe one of the reasons is that the people of the country are realizing that the railways are their own, and they are patronizing them, knowing that every dollar they put in the coffers of the national railways goes to help to decrease the deficits which otherwise they would have to help to pay in taxes. I venture to say that in a period of less than five years the National Railways will pay not only their operating charges but their fixed charges as well. In the meantime the people of Canada are getting a great benefit as a result of national ownership of railways. They are receiving a service such as they never received before, and that remark applies to the Canadian Pacific as well as the Canadian National Railway. Courtesy and efficiency have become the essential policy of the two great systems as a matter of necessity in the struggle for business.

I would like to make one suggestion to the government in connection with the railways, and I make it with modesty, knowing also that the suggestion is not a new one. Among the charges standing against the National Railways are large sums which are the results of deficits and of advances made by the Dominion government and upon which involve heavy fixed charges, and increase the deficits from year to year. We may fairly say that the original roads comprising the National Railways were in a state of bankruptcy.

We are now re-organizing these roads. In private business when re-organization of a bankrupt business is carried out the old losses and fictitious assets do not find a place in the new capitalization, but the business is capitalized at its real value and it starts off with a clean sheet as a new enterprise, free of the incubus of the old debts and losses. I think that is sound business. That practice might well be followed by the National Railways. A fair valuation of the whole system should be made, and I know this has been advocated by the former leader of the Progressives, with whom I agree in a good many ways. A fair valuation of the whole system should be made. I think the amount now standing against the National Railways in one way or another is something in excess of one billion eight hundred million dollars. I do not know that is exact. It is difficult to dig the figures out of the report. The railways should be expected to pay fixed charges upon securities representing only the total of the real value as would be done in any private business. The interest could not be evaded on securities held by the public as individuals, but the amount held by the latter is less than the actual value of the road. The balance of the indebtedness is in the form of advances made by the government of Canada or securities taken over with the old roads.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What would be the basis of my hon. friend's re-valuation—replacement or earning power?

Mr. EULER: I was coming to that. I should say that the basis of re-valuation should not be the cost of replacement, because if the roads were to be rebuilt, they would not be rebuilt as they are now. There is too much duplication. But I would say, if it were possible, re-valuation should be arrived at on the basis of a thoroughly good system that would serve the same purpose as the system that we have now.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the hon. member mean the replacement value of a thoroughly good system?

Mr. EULER: Yes, what it might cost to build a new system that would serve the purpose of the combination of systems that we now have. I would write off the difference between the actual value so ascertained and the amount of indebtedness which is now charged against the railroads, upon a large portion of which we require to pay fixed charges, although those fixed charges are based on fictitious assets. I take that position because the money was lost, we have nothing to show for it, and we might as well write it off and not have the fictitious assets as a perpetual handicap upon the road. This action would not reduce our losses in actuality, of course; but it would reduce the enormous aggregate of fixed charges which the roads are expected to earn, and which figure so largely in the annual deficit. If this were done it would be an encouragement to the board of directors. Not only would it encourage the management who would not be continually confronted with the task of trying to make earnings on an over-capitalization, but it would put the National Railways on more of an equality with their great competitor, the Canadian Pacific Railway. I believe also if that were done, it would be only a short time until our National Railways would be on a sound financial basis. The profit and loss account would soon show a balance on the credit side, which could then be applied to a reduction of rates which is so much desired.

Some weeks ago the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) suggested that these losses and fictitious assets, as I have called them, should be carried along with the idea that, in future years as the roads became more prosperous, we would be able to draw dividends, if we want to call them such, on these amounts. I am not disposed to agree with that, because I do not believe it would be businesslike to carry on the books, assets which are not real assets. If after a time we find that the rates do show profits over and above operating costs and fixed charges, under the plan that I propose, it becomes merely a matter of policy whether these profits shall be applied to wipe out the old losses or whether they should be applied to a reduction of rates. Frankly, I think they should be applied to a reduction of rates because the real theory and purpose of public ownership is not the making of profits, but the giving of the best possible service at cost.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the government lay on the Table to-morrow a statement of how the revenue for last year was made up? I find it is not in the budget speech. I should like a statement showing the ingredients of the revenue for the antecedent year. There were other particulars omitted from the speech which are usually included also, but I will not ask for them at present. I should like them also.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Hon. S. F. TOLMIE (Victoria City): Mr. Speaker, in rising to discuss the budget I wish to extend my hearty congratulations to the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), who on this occasion is delivering his seventeenth budget. He has rendered very valuable and faithful services to this country, services extending over very many years, and I can pay him no greater compliment than to say that to-day he possesses the esteem of the people from one end of Canada to the other.

It has been pleasing to us in this quarter of the House to note that our friends who now occupy the government benches are at last coming round to the view that we must have a certain amount of protection and that under present conditions, with other countries raising high tariff walls, it would be unfair to Canada to cut down our tariff, particularly when it would be so hard to obtain revenue from other sources to make up for any loss caused by a revision downwards.

We have to take into consideration, too, the competition that our manufacturers would have to meet in the event of our lowering the tariff on certain articles that we now manufacture. We have not only competition from the United States, where they manufacture in such large volume that they are able to put their goods on the market at a cheaper rate than we can compete with, but we have another source of competition that has not had much attention paid to it in past years, although I think now we are beginning to wake up to the danger. I refer to competition from the hundreds of millions of people on the other side of the Pacific with cheap water transportation to our shores. We find Japan is branching out in many lines of manufacture, and in a very short time, in fact even to-day, with her splendid steamship service across the Pacific she is able to place her merchandise on our markets at lower prices in some cases than we can quote ourselves.

I am very pleased indeed to note that the government proposes to give a bonus for the manufacture of certain lines of copper. This will beneficially affect one of the big smelters in British Columbia. I know that smelter very well. It lies at the foot of the hills from the well-known mines at Rossland, and below the smelter again lies the little town of Trail with a population of several hundred, dependent entirely on the copper works about. This little town would go out of existence were it not for the Trail smelter. Therefore, as I say, I am very pleased to note that the government has agreed to give some assistance to this smelter to enable it to meet outside competition.

I propose now, Mr. Speaker, to touch more particularly on certain points in relation to agriculture and shall only refer incidentally to the budget as I proceed. But before leaving the budget itself I must refer to the very interesting amendment brought down by our friends to the left. It is interesting from the fact that they have taken certain planks from the Liberal platform of 1919 and incorporated them in an amendment to a Liberal budget in 1923. Undoubtedly it is rather unique in that respect. They have also included certain clauses that they knew beforehand how the Conservatives would vote on, and in that way they have brought in what might be termed a safety amendment. When we first heard that an amendment to the budget was to be brought down we thought we could look forward to a little excitement when the vote was taken, but after hearing the terms of the amendment I have come to the conclusion that there will be just as much excitement when the division comes as there would be in waving a red flag at a dead bull. However, towards the end of this debate it will be very interesting to hear from the government benches, because we expect they will then pay a public farewell to their platform of 1919.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Order.

Mr. TOLMIE: As we look over the agricultural situation in Canada and throughout the world we find that the markets on which we have been depending for a number of years and on which our agriculture was very largely built up, are very much disorganized. Some of them are entirely out of existence; others are much more limited than they were before. This condition, of course, has a serious effect upon agriculture in this country. Some of our farmers are meeting with reverses in regard to the disposal of their product; owing to climatic conditions, bad crops and so forth some of them are losing heart and, I think, leaving the country. But this is not the first depression we have had in Canada; we have had even worse depressions than this in former years and we have lived through them all. I feel quite satisfied that with the spirit of the Canadian people behind us we will survive the present one.

We must not, however, criticize the farmer too severely. In fact, no one is in a position to criticize the farmer unless he has himself experienced some of the ups and downs of agriculture. Those of us who were brought up in the country, particularly in the wooded sections, know what it is to rough it on the farm, to go out and do half a day's work on a plate of porridge—and I may say in that connection that my father came from Inverness, Scotland. At the same time I do not feel that we are going to get anywhere by blindly complaining of our condition. It appears to me that the most practical thing to do under the circumstances is to make a careful survey of the situation and then to select those lines of agriculture that will give to us the quickest and best promise of success. In doing this I think at the very beginning we can score rather severely that particular line of farming known as single crop farming. In fact, where it depends on the production of one line of grain in some sections of the country, it develops into very little more than a gamble with the weather. But the man who gambles on the single crop is rather at a disadvantage compared with the man who gambles in other lines, because he is limited to only one bet a year. If he wins that bet he probably winters in California; if he does not win it he stays at home and tells us that the country is no good. Now, it is admitted—and judging from the debate that has taken place already it is generally accepted in this country—that our most reliable line of agriculture is that of mixed farming with live stock as a basis. This is the safer plan even for the man who wishes to specialize in a particular line; if he at least keeps a certain amount of live stock for a nucleus he can radiate from this centre as far as he likes, and the chances are, if the live stock markets are in any sort of reasonable condition, that the results of his work in that direction will carry him through many of the hard places in connection with the single crop on which he has concentrated much of his attention.

There never was a time in Canada when it was so necessary to carry on a system of good farming as it is to-day. When prices are high we may practise hit and miss farming to a certain extent and meet with fair success, but under conditions like those which prevail at present, with prices low and costs high, it is necessary to apply the very best methods if we are to succeed.

There is another thing that is very important, too, and that is the plugging up of the leaks to the best of our ability. Produce all we can at home, make the farms self-sustaining, and at the same time send nothing to market but what is of the best quality possible, in the best condition, and marketed at the proper time. In that way we can make a very substantial saving. Let us glance for a moment at the situation with regard to marketing and the quality and condition of the stock sold in the markets of this country, and then form an opinion whether the farmer is at the present time making the best of his opportunities. Last year we sold 600,000 head of cattle through our inspected abattoirs, and it is estimated that owing to poor quality, poor condition and small size the farmers of this country dropped $30,000,000. A comparison of the prices will be rather interesting. We find in the first place that instead of the marketing of these cattle being extended over the greater part of the year, most of them are rushed to the market during the fall and early winter months, with the result that the market is glutted and the packer is almost beside himself to know what to do with the stock. At one time a few years ago, during the war, when there was a great demand for bone meal on the other side of the water and the Argentine competition did not exist, we could sell this cheap trash to fairly good advantage. But just now that market is gone, owing largely to the Argentine competition. I will quote a few prices just to give you an idea of the spread. The average low and high prices in the Toronto market during the years from 1918 to 1922 inclusive, were as follows:

	Low Average	High Average
1918..	$5 54	$15 12
1919..	5 02	15 35
1920..	3 93	15 80
1921..	1 63	9 83
1922..	1 22	8 67

This shows that there is a tremendous spread between the price of the animal that is desired by the packer and the butcher and the animal that is sent to market in a low condition, of a scrubby nature, and lacking in size. You will readily see that in the last three years the men who handled that kind of cattle never made any money at all.

There is another very striking feature of these figures. Even during the bad years the man who produced a steer of good quality received either a first class price or a very fair one. This clearly indicates that there is no advantage in breeding the scrub animal, so that the farmer who pursues that policy must come to the conclusion either to change his methods or to change his business. I would emphasize, then, the tremendous loss that has been occasioned to this country, first, in lack of weight in our stock, and then in lack of a good price—that is, the existence of a low price for the cattle, running, as I have indicated, into many millions of dollars—a dead loss to the farmer. Here is a situation where the farmer must absolutely help himself. While he can receive a certain amount of assistance from the government, the actual result depends very largely on whether or not the individual is going to change his methods.

Another branch of the live stock industry, and one of the most reliable, I think, is that of dairying. Dairying is one of our most stable industries; even to-day, in those cases where cheapness of production is well taken care of and good breeding has been attended to so that the herds contain animals of fairly high quality, a very reasonable profit is returned to the farmer. But again the result depends very largely on the farmer himself. I will show you that we are losing every year an amount estimated at $200,000,000 owing to the poor quality of the dairy cows in Canada. We have 3,500,000 dairy cows in this country that average about 3,500 pounds of milk each per year, while we have single cows in Canada that yield as high as 33,000 pounds in a year, or a little over eight times as much as the average yield. The farmer who maintains scrub cows has to keep a stable that will hold eight cows instead of one. He has to feed eight cows, clean out the places for eight cows, milk eight cows, and after he gets through with it all there is very little profit in it for him. The man who maintains a better herd—and some of our herds average as high as 14,000 pounds of milk per cow for the whole herd—does not talk about hard times, while the man who maintains a scrub herd is always doing so.

One of the greatest jokes in connection with the agricultural business, if there are any such—my experience is that it is always pretty hard work—is to hear a man complain about the failure to take the duty off agricultural implements while at the same time he is trying to make a living out of a 4,000 pound cow. It is an utter impossibility. If he would just take care of his herd, get the proper kind of cows and breed them up, improve their quality, I do not think the duty at present existing on agricultural implements would interfere with him very much. It has been found at some of our experiment stations that as the yield of the cow increases, the cost of production goes down up to a point of 18,076 pounds per year, and in those cases where the milk was of a fairly high quality the cost still kept lowering. But where the butter fat content is rather low we find that above that figure the cost of production is a little higher, but at the same time still quite profitable.

While the improvement of herds may be looked upon by some as something that can only be accomplished by a rich man, I may say that at the Nappan experiment station down in the Maritime provinces an experiment was conducted of taking a number of scrub cows from neighbouring farmers and placing them on the farm, and just by good feeding alone the product was increased by fifty per cent. Then by proper breeding methods the output of the offspring of these cows was increased fifty per cent again, showing that there is a proposition within easy reach of any farmer, and one where good results can be accomplished by a combination of proper breeding and feeding. The farmer who still maintains a scrub herd and has not yet tried to improve its condition should not be downhearted. I know of my own personal knowledge many cases where farmers have commenced with scrub cows and after a few years have been able to reach over 12,000, 13,000 and 14,000 pounds of milk per cow, and in addition to that 550 pounds of butter fat per cow, showing that this is within easy reach of any farmer who has the energy and perseverance to try. Of course, this was not done by making speeches. It was done by being willing to work, to learn and improve. These men I particularly speak of took every possible opportunity to improve themselves, improve their knowledge of dairying by visiting experiment stations, exhibitions and the best herds in the country, and I am quite sure that anyone who will display the same intelligence and energy as they did will have very satisfactory results.

Our dairy industry last year was worth about $240,000,000 to this country. Our export market is that of Great Britain. We send some dairy products to the United States, but Great Britain, I think, is the more important market of the two. We have been having rather bad results over there during the last year or two owing to the fact that our butter is not coming up to the demands of the British market. As you may know, in that market we have to meet very strong competition from Denmark, Holland and also New Zealand. The Britisher complains that our butter is too heavily salted. Some people say that the salt is put in to meet the taste of the people in Canada, while others explain that salt sells for two cents a pound and butter for forty or fifty cents a pound. The Britisher also complains that our butter is uneven in colour, that its flavouring is not first-class, and that it is also defective in keeping qualities. To illustrate that I may say that our butter sells in Great Britain from ten to twenty shillings per hundredweight below the butter of Denmark and New Zealand. It is estimated that the loss on this alone in 1922 amounted to no less than half a million dollars. Last year a well known western creamery sent to Great Britain a consignment of butter of very good quality, with the result that it sold for over five shillings a hundredweight higher than other Canadian butter that was over on that market at that time. This is pointed to as a result of the system of grading of dairy butter that some of the western provinces have carried on during the past few years. There is no reason why we should not get our goods on the British market in first-class condition. This will depend largely on the grading of our cream and butter, but we must also supply it in sufficient quantity to interest the people on the other side of the water. The Britisher quite naturally does not want a certain consignment this week, and then no butter of the same kind next week. There must be a continuous stream, even in quality, first-class in every way, and made with a view to meeting the demands of that particular market. Here is an opportunity for improving matters for the Canadian farmer and assisting him to a very great extent in connection with his outlet for dairy products, which must always be on the other side of the water or in some other country as we produce more than we absolutely require for our own needs. However, it must be remembered that nobody can make first-class butter out of poor cream or badly kept cream. and in that particular the farmer himself can render very valuable assistance.

Let us glance for a moment at the hog and export bacon industry. Perhaps no line of live stock has suffered so much from in-and-out farming, that is to say, the farmer has gone into the hog business when prices were high and dropped out of it when prices were low, and very often by that system he has missed the high prices and failed to get the advantages the other man has secured who has stayed steadily in the business. At the Central experimental farm at Ottawa it has been clearly demonstrated that on land valued at $125 an acre, where regular wages were paid, where they did not have the benefit of family help, hogs paid every year during the war and since that time. But during that very period there were men out in certain sections of Canada where grain was a little cheaper than here who were going out of the hog business because they said hogs did not pay.

Let us see whether the farmer has made the most of his opportunities in connection with the hog industry. Our markets to-day are suffering very severely owing to the fact that the farmer fails to send to those markets hogs of the proper type and proper weight. This not only injures the farmer himself but the packer also. It very seriously interferes with his work, and particularly in his effort to secure a fair share of the British market. There are eight packing plants doing business in Ontario, and at these plants forty-five per cent of the hogs marketed are what are known as out-weights. The ideal weight for a hog to furnish a Wiltshire side for the British market will run from 160 to 210 pounds live weight. These hogs that are not of the right type seriously interfere with the sale of our goods on the other side of the water. To illustrate, let me say that recently at a sale of Canadian Wiltshire sides held in England the desirable weights brought from 101s. to 102s. per hundredweight of 112 pounds, while out-weights that did not conform with the requirements brought only 94s. And still the farmer continues to market these out-weights even in face of the fact that there is a difference of one or two cents a pound on the live hogs as they are taken into the abattoir.

There were 2,000,000 hogs slaughtered in our plants in the year 1922. Of these, 40 per cent, or 800,000 were required for export; and in the grading of these 800,000, only 13 per cent were classed as selected bacon type. If all the selects had been exported they would have supplied only about 32·5 per cent of the packers' requirements, with the result that the packer is now compelled to buy many of the out-weights and fat types to meet the market demands. What effect has this on him? This is simply one of the reasons why Danish bacon, with the uniform supply from that country, will sell in the British market at 117 shillings per hundredweight, while the best Canadian bacon sells at between 102 and 105 shillings and on the average only 96 shillings per hundredweight. It has been clearly shown that our best hogs are equal in every way to the Danish product, and the cure given by our packers in this country is altogether on a par with that given to the product of the European packing houses. By way of illustration I might quote the following from a letter received from a gentleman a short time ago who spent some time in England. He says:

> One day last week I tested Canadian bacon against Irish and Danish, without knowing the position of the three. By long odds everyone was in favour of one kind, which turned out to be Canadian; and yet we have to take many shillings a hundred-weight less for our product.

What is the reason for this? The explanation is simply that, as I have pointed out, our supply is uneven both in quality and in weight. There appears to be no excuse for our not being able to produce a good quality in Canada. We have a great variety of grains which I think are equal for these purposes to any grown in the world. In the United States they produce their hogs largely on a corn diet, with the result as shown in the figures which I will give to the House bearing on the question, comparing the prices received for American Wiltshire sides as against Canadian Wiltshires. The American Wiltshires brought 90 shillings per hundredweight, while the best Canadian product sold at 105 shillings; and the average American product brought 80 shillings as against the average Canadian 96 shillings. The American, in addition to feeding his hogs on corn, raises what is known as the thick fat hog, which goes largely to lard. This is a type that the Englishman is not very fond of. He got a surfeit of it during the war and I am afraid it will take some time before he recovers from his experience with American pork.

A comparison of the prices at Chicago with those obtaining in Toronto during the year ending March 31, 1923, shows that the smallest difference beween the Chicago and the Toronto price was in favour of the Toronto price to the extent of $1.45. That was during the month of October. The higher price in favour of Toronto in the month of July was $3.97 while the average for the twelve months was $3.16, showing that the Canadian farmer marketing his product in Toronto and the other markets that contribute thereto, obtains a higher price than if he had his hogs in Chicago when hogs are sold there. This is largely due to the demand for his particular type of hog, as I have shown; and with the feed at the disposal of the Canadian breeder and feeder, he is able to send pork to market in a firmer condition than can the man who has to depend entirely on corn.

Let me say however that while we are competing in the British market with the Dane, while we produce our own feeds at home, the Dane has to depend to a great extent on feeds exported from other countries. In view of this fact, surely we should be able to compete with him if we pay particular attention to the article we send abroad and see to it that it is uniform and of the kind demanded. While the type of hog produced in Canada, the price of which is controlled by the export market, fetches the prices I have quoted, there is to be taken into consideration this fact that the producers of hogs in Canada enjoy a certain form of protection. According to our health of animals regulations it is illegal to import hogs from the United States for slaughtering purposes, or indeed, for that matter, for any purpose at all, unless they are quarantined for thirty days at the boundary line. With such a regulation in force, it would not pay anyone to import hogs, unless for breeding purposes and of high value, and incur the expenses connected with this quarantine. This therefore is a form of protection. It was not intended as such, but in fact it is protection and that is one reason for the price the Canadian producer enjoys in the home market.

Another interesting point I might mention. We might compare the prices of grain grown in this country and used for hog feed, such as barley, corn, bran and shorts, with the hog prices received during the war. Last year we find the ratio between the prices of feed and of hogs more favourable than in 1914 or at any time during the war, which shows that the opportunities of the producer of pork at the present time are better than they have been for ten years. However, careful feeding is absolutely necessary. Recently out of a shipment of some 2,500 head of hogs sent to one of our abattoirs, 400 carcases were classed as "softs" owing to improper feeding. There is a great scarcity of hogs of the proper type of weight and finish. To obtain these hogs more attention must be paid to breeding and feeding operations. The market will increase and our product will equal the Danish product if we send the kind of material which is called for in London and at other points in Great Britain where our products are used. We need to exercise great care in the selection of breeding stock with a view to securing the proper type. We must also market our product at the right time. One of the failings of the Canadian breeder is that he sends mixed lots of hogs to the market, some of which conform with the requirements, securing the highest prices, others being too heavy, having been kept too long, and others, again, too light, not having been fed long enough. This is another instance in which the farmer must help himself. Neither the government nor anyone else can help him in this regard if he does not take the initiative. With regard to this Canadian market, I have no doubt of the possibility of our being able to secure our full share. There is no question about that. The conditions are favourable, but if the farmers show indifference with regard to the type of hog they produce, we may easily find ourselves among the tail-enders in the British market.

There is another line of live stock which I think should be doing very much better than it has done in the past in Canada. It is one in regard to which we are very much behind other agricultural countries, not only of the British Empire but in the world at large. I refer to the production of sheep and wool. The number of sheep in Canada to-day does not exceed three or three and a quarter million head as compared with twenty seven millions in Great Britain, forty millions in the United States and eighty millions in Australia. This has been due largely to the fact that while the market in Canada has been of an unstable nature, prices varying up and down, there has been no encouragement for men to go into this business. This particular industry, I think, should receive every assistance possible. We have been allowing Great Britain to ship her wool over to Italy and Germany, where it is combed and returned and then shipped into Canada free of duty. This product is known as "tops." We find also that the Japanese are now going into the wool combing business quite extensively, and their goods are coming here free and competing with ours, which is a very unfair competition indeed. I am informed however that there has been in existence for some time a tariff of 15 per cent on combed tops coming into Canada. This 15 per cent has never been enforced and I would urge upon the minister that it be put into effect at the earliest possible date so that our wool combers in this country may secure the protection that they require to build up their industry.

I would even go further than that and give bonuses for the handling of wool in this country until we get the industry on a proper footing. There is something certainly very seriously wrong with an industry when in a huge country like Canada, with vast areas of land, suitable for the raising of sheep, our sheep population amounts to only about three and a half million, particularly in view of the fact, as I pointed out, that you cannot blame it on protection, as far as combed wool is concerned. I would like to draw this matter to the attention of the Minister of Customs (Mr. Bureau) whom I had not noticed in his seat until this moment. I said that we were bringing wool combings into this country absolutely free at the present time, in spite of the fact that we have a tariff of 15 per cent against that class of goods, which has never been enforced, and I am pressing on the House the necessity of enforcing that tariff at the earliest possible date so as to assist in placing our sheep industry on a proper and substantial footing. It is quite possible for us to produce the highest quality of wool in Canada, capable of manufacturing up to 64s. quality. From that up to 70s. and 80s. we have to import our wool, but it is possible for us to produce the higher grades necessary for the manufacture of that particular quality. We also have competition from Australia, which is sending combed wool in here without any duty, while in that country the government bonuses wool combing to the extent of 5 or 6 cents per pound. Here the Canadian producer of sheep and the Canadian wool comber have to face during part of the summer, the competition of the bonused wool trade of the greatest sheep-growing country in the world. In addition to that the Australian wool comber is able to buy wool from the hide wool stock accumulated by the Australian government during the war, at cost price and this is another disadvantage which the Canadian wool comber has to contend with. I sincerely hope the government will give this question their closest attention.

There has also been a reduction in woollen cloth from Great Britain, and in this connection I may say that we should I think be able to build up a few of these important industries the building up of which means assistance and help to our natural products, such as wool, and many other articles. Let us get our home manufacture of woollen goods at least securely on its feet, and let the wool market become a reliable one, and you will find the sheep population of Canada increasing in very great numbers. The sheep is a useful animal, useful on almost every farm, and one that will live largely on waste material in the summer months. It is a very good animal for keeping down weeds and it furnishes a supply of manure at almost any time of the year. Here is the farmer making the best of his opportunities in the production of lambs. The lamb is a side line of the sheep industry which is very important and one that is very remunerative where carried on in the proper way. We find in Canada that the farmer markets about 70 per cent of his male lamb flocks with the result that there is a great loss in the summer on that particular account. To give you an idea of the size of this market, in the first three months of the year over 28,000 ewes and lambs were marketed in the Toronto market. The lamb market has changed to a great extent. Within recent years lamb feeding has been taken up and the lambs are fed on the waste material of the wheat grower, known as screenings; and fed properly on that material. Large feeding plants have been established at Calgary, Fort William and other points. With the supply of winter lamb from the feeding plants, it has not been so necessary for the farmer to fill the cold storage plant during the fall of the year. He finds the fresh killed lamb during the winter months will not pay, and that the nursing lamb will not sell so well in the winter when there is fresh lamb to be obtained. Where lamb is produced under first class conditions, some of it is exported to the United States and first-class prices are procured, and in some cases even a premium is paid over the price which would be secured for an American lamb. Here again the farmer is suffering a severe loss by indifference. This is something which depends upon himself and which he can remedy with very little cost to himself and in that way secure a very much better market for his product. I have pointed out a few of the leaks in agriculture and I have attempted to show that a great deal of the success in the stoppage of the leaks will depend on the individual himself.

Mr. KNOX: I have been listening very attentively to the hon. member and before he leaves the live stock end of it I would like him to go into a little more detail in regard to one point. He stated that the farmers lost some $30,000,000 last year through not keeping the proper class of stock. I would like to know how he arrived at that figure?

Mr. TOLMIE: It is estimated that the number of animals that went through our packing houses was 600,000 odd. It is based on a calculation made by some of the experts in the Department of Agriculture during the time I was minister in 1919. In 1919 and 1920 there had been exported through our inspected slaughter houses 1,126,000 head of cattle, and less than 10 per cent of these cattle were either good enough in condition or good enough in quality or heavy enough in weight to be exported to Great Britain to compete with the products of other countries. At that time the loss was estimated at some $40,000,000, and this is based on the same figures. I cannot give details, but it was all worked out in proportion. I pointed out that success depends very much on individual effort, that the farmer must be more self-dependent, that while the government can assist him in a general way he must help himself and be ready to co-operate. There is one line however, among others in which the government can render very valuable services in my opinion, and that is the field of research, particularly in connection with our animal contagious diseases, those that are classed as contagious diseases under our act, and also those that are not classed or scheduled in the Animal Contagious Diseases Act. The two diseases which cause the most loss are tuberculosis and hog cholera. I pointed out some time ago a very marked increase in our inspected abattoirs in tuberculosis, both in cattle and in hogs, having reached the point of nearly 22 per cent on the inspected carcases, those carcases going through our inspected abattoirs where exact returns are kept.

Another disease causing tremendous loss in cattle is infective abortion, a disease affecting horses, sheep and swine. Then there is another disease called the "joint ill," in the foal, one of the most destructive diseases which affects animals. When they become infected with this disease, they die in a very short time.

There is another field for research and that is in regard to internal parasites, which according to the estimates in the United States, has cost that country hundreds of millions per year. In 1921-22 we paid in compensation for tuberculosis $639,530 and in 1922-23 the sum reached nearly $1,000,000. This does not include the losses on the abattoirs and also on the farms from affected carcases, which losses would run into many more millions, in my opinion. In the face of this, we are spending only $30,000 a year on research work, and much of this expenditure is required for the manufacture of tuberculin and other such agents for the diagnosing of disease. It is quite possible for an animal to be quite healthy in appearance on the outside, and there is no physical way in which to make a diagnosis so as to decide effectively whether it is affected with tuberculosis or not. We use tuberculin which is applied in three ways: To the eye, or into the pores of the skin, or under the skin. By that means and by taking temperatures, watching swellings and so on, we are able to diagnose very effectively whether an animal is affected with tuberculosis or not. We have one serious obstacle in the way, and that is that we cannot separate an animal that is badly affected and that would be a spreader of disease amongst other live stock, from an animal that is only slightly affected and that probably, under ordinary conditions, will make a recovery. This is the point. At present we are compelled, when we get that reaction in our tests, to destroy all those animals. If we could discover in our research work a reagent that would differentiate between an animal that was slightly affected and one that was badly affected, we would make a very substantial saving to the country.

Another feature that offers us great promise is in immunization from tuberculosis. Certain experiments along those lines have been carried on which have given very fair promise, and by proper research work we should be able to discover some serum or bacillus or other biological product which would give us great assistance in that direction. My claim is this, that it does not seem practical to be paying out hundreds of thousands of dollars for compensation without spending much money on research work. We should follow out this research work to the very end of the road and spend any reasonable amount. I can well understand that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) has a great deal of difficulty in securing sufficient money to carry on his work, and I speak feelingly on this subject, because I have been in that position myself. The country, however, will gradually improve and get on its feet, and as opportunity offers, this is a particular branch of our live stock work that should be carried out to the fullest possible extent so far as money will permit.

Another point in connection with research in the direction of bovine tuberculosis is the tremendous field of human tuberculosis which is closely allied to it. It is now generally accepted everywhere that the bovine bacillus is communicable to man, and the discovery of an immunizator, or a discovery in some other direction that would help to overcome this scourge in cattle, would prove of tremendous value to man. We are very fortunate in Canada in having in Doctor Watson, Chief Bacteriologist of the Health of Animals branch, a man of exceptional ability. As an illustration of that, let me point out that only a few years ago in southwestern Saskatchewan and Alberta, we had amongst horses a disease know as glanders. Dr. Watson was placed in charge of the outbreak there; a quarantine station was established at Lethbridge, Alberta, and he was able, while there carrying on his experiments, to discover a blood test by which he could diagnose the disease before any clinical symptoms were shown. When he discovered this test, the amount of compensation paid that year for horses destroyed amounted to $46,000, and I think not more than five or six years had elapsed when the compensation amounted to $75. The next year it was wiped out altogether in Canada. They have been carrying on some experimental work at the Pathological station in Hull in connection with the production of a protective or immunizing serum against glanders. While the experiments were being carried on, a farmer in Manitoba became infected with glanders from a glandered horse. Fortunately a doctor from that province was visiting Ottawa and heard about the immunizing serum discovered by Doctor Watson. He secured some of it, and by the time the serum reached Manitoba, the doctor attending the farmer was also infected with the disease. I know of no other case on record—some hon. members who are doctors will correct me if I am wrong—where glanders in the human body has ever been cured. By the use of this serum, however, I am informed, both the doctor and the farmer are now attending to their business in the usual way, and only a few weeks have elapsed. What I claim is this, that we should cultivate and encourage in every possible way a man of such exceptional ability along the line of research and an appropriation of only $50,000 to be given him would be quite sufficient and could be added to from time to time as the work developed. In that particular connection, it would be advisable under those conditions to have Doctor Watson devote the whole of his time to this special work.

Another line of the greatest importance and, perhaps, the greatest obstacle to the success of the agriculturist in this country is that of distribution, owing largely to our tremendous distances in Canada and also to the high cost of transportation. It is pretty difficult to find a solution for the problem of what we should aim to secure in that particular line; but a little investigation will bring us relief, and that is to secure cheaper transportation for the farmer, an equalization of freight rates, and then to allow trade to flow in its natural channels regardless of our big cities trying to draw trade in their direction.

I might draw the attention of the House to the development of trade on the Pacific coast where I am fortunate enough to live. The trade from the Pacific coast across to the Atlantic is now something over a billion or two billion dollars a year. The Panama canal has certainly made a great difference as regards transportation from western to eastern Canada. We should take advantage of all those things because it is most important that the primary producer, the farmer, should secure as large a proportion of the profit from his output as he possibly can. In this particular connection, agriculture is of such great importance to the Dominion of Canada that if we could place this industry squarely on its feet and make it profitable to the farmer, almost everything else would take care of itself.

In the development of our markets, a great deal can be done. According to statistics, we market about 80 per cent of our goods at home, either for consumption or for remanufacture for export. Our principal export markets are those of the United States and Great Britain. The United States, as we all know, is quite close to our border; it is easy to reach at low cost; but it has the disadvantage of having a very high tariff. Somehow or another there are 110,000,000 people on the other side of the line who believe in protection, with the result that we find our goods going into that country are very much handicapped by a heavy tariff. Great Britain then is the market that is the most desirable one, although situated at some further distance from our shores. Still it is willing to pay excellent prices and it is one which should be cultivated with the greatest possible attention. During my visit to Great Britain in 1921, I went through a number of the markets. There I found the Britisher anxious to buy our goods, provided they were of good quality, uniform and of sufficient volume to interest him. He was quite willing to pay us just as much as he had to pay to anybody else, but absolutely no more, and you cannot blame him for taking that stand. Another great field is being opened up for us across the Pacific where hundreds of millions of people desire our goods, and this market should be developed to the greatest possible extent.

Another feature that might receive encouragement is that of co-operative selling amongst farmers. Co-operation would enable the farmer to get his goods to market in much better condition, and by being able to load in carload lots, he would secure lower freight rates and be able to market to better advantage.

Long time-credits might also receive attention. In fact this means of helping the farmer is receiving considerable attention now, from what I have heard in the Banking committee and in the committee investigating agricultural conditions. The ordinary banker, while quite satisfactory for the farmer who is on his feet, cannot be expected to make long-term loans. That is not his business. Some other organization must be developed for this particular purpose of making long term loans at the lowest possible rate. However, there is one thing to be pointed out in this connection, and that is that the farmer who has been unable to make ends meet owing to being on a poor farm or following bad methods cannot look for very much help from borrowed money, whether he obtains it at a low or a high rate of interest. To succeed he must either change on to another farm or adopt proper farming methods.

There is another matter which is of the greatest importance agriculturally, and that is the education of our farmers as far as it is possible to go in the way of encouraging them to adopt better methods of farming. We are doing this now through our fairs, our agricultural press and the splendid system of experimental farms throughout the Dominion. I think we have one of the best systems of experimental farms to be found anywhere in the world. When I was across the water I visited some institutions of this character in Great Britain, but they did not have anything over there superior to our Central experimental farm.
