Then the baby arrived, and John Tyler began to understand that the full thing had happened.

Watch looked across at Brockway and wagged a courteous greeting, then showed how long and his muscles and his nerves had been kept taut and on the strain.

He tried to realize that those dead full months must have been during the time when Brockway had been so ill, and he could not remember any of the things that had happened.

But when the family trouble came and he gave such pleasure up and turned all his attentions to his people.

Next Saturday is a red letter day in Great Britain and throughout the empire.

The grand coronation in which the people of a monarchy participate, the throwing of a sovereignty, is the event that gives to this day its unusual impressiveness.

In republics and in colonial dependencies the strength of a chief magistrate is a matter of common occurrence, but to the British people the presence of a new monarch in the throne room comes not with the regularity of a constitutional limited service, but when the life tenure of an inheritance has ceased.

Westminster has not witnessed a coronation for over seventy years and the event of Saturday, following the longest reign in English history, will owe much of its hearty spontaneity, its manifestation of reverential allegiance to the memory of the illustrious queen whose son has lifted the mantle of a nation's trust to wear it for an indefinite time and pass it unaltered to the next in succession.

One cannot read the history of the British of today a reason for the disestablishment of a limited monarchy, but in it is exemplified the best example of a contented and prosperous people. Strange as it may seem there is no example of national government today representing a clearer case of government by the people and for the people than is developed by a study of the adaptation and administration of British laws. The King is the ideal British man, the personality of the government, burdened perhaps with rights and dignities, but limited in his capacity to direct the national affairs. He is the mouthpiece of an executive of the people and under the British constitution monarchical rule and rule by the people are synonymous terms. And when in a few days, King Edward VII is crowned, there will be no murmuring of discontent among his people, no thought that, in these days when one man's right and one man's might is as good as another's, it saves of childishness to invest in a man such supreme importance as is associated in the theory of kingship. England has been governed by a king since the time when Roman rule ceased except for the days of the commonwealth of Cromwell, but wonderful changes have been wrought in the discretionary powers and prerogatives of her rulers. The British constitution is a growth that, illogical, inconsistent and vicious as it may have been in the centuries of the past, has now been shaped to a purpose that is eminently practical, securing dignity to the sovereign and liberty to the people. What more can be desired? The trappings of monarchy may be but a farce, but there are many farces in national government more ridiculous than these. The British people are intelligent and their acceptance of a law under the sign manual of their king is an exercise of judgment as commendable as the submission of the people of a republic to an enactment hatched and distorted by the play of political parties. The fact that the coming coronation will be conducted with such unanimous sanction from the people of the United Kingdom is evidence indisputable that there is no thought that the rule of kings is undesirable. The masses are resting content in the belief that their interests are well served and their expression of admiration and reverence at this time are less the new expression of homage to a sovereign than the satisfaction they feel in the greatness of the empire to which they belong, and in the knowledge that under British laws the dominions of track, liberty and justice have been established more widespread and with greater stability than under any other human agency. Edward Rex, as the inheritor of the throne, is a personality as popular as ever an elective chief secured and the weak point of hereditary rule in this instance cannot be urged to its disadvantage. Of a broad mind and statesmanlike grasp of his duties and the services of which is in the hand, and the wise experience the new king will have the respect of all nations and not from the British empire alone will go the hearty well meant hail.

"Long live the King!"

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT AND THE TRUSTS.

(New York Outlook.)

It is stated, on what appears to be good authority, that various members of the Administration are devoting a great deal of time and thought to the master of the proposed legislation dealing with trusts, and that when Congress reassembles in the fall the measure will be presented which will embody the views of President Roosevelt and some of his most influential advisers.

Attorney-General Knox is reported to be at work upon such a measure, and the newspapers declare that Representative Littlefield of Maine has been taken into the councils of the President, and is likely to be prominent in urging the proposed measure upon Congress. It is known that the President is deeply interested in the regulation of trusts, and there is every reason to believe that his interest will take the form of practical suggestion to Congress. It is doubtful, however, whether Mr. Littlefield's relation to the proposed legislation is as intimate as some journals have stated. The probabilities seem to be that a bill will be prepared during the summer, the provisions of which will be divulged to the country in one or two speeches by some member of the Cabinet during the autumn campaign. There is every reason to suppose that wherever practical suggestions the President makes will be thoroughly constructive in character, and that the legislation which he has in mind will disclose no features not already outlined in his message of last December and in his speech at Pittsburgh. It is not expected that he will take up the matter of trust reform in connection with the trusts; but it is quite certain that he will seek in law and in the use of public policy in the management of trusts and in all their relations with the public. His course is probably best outlined in a few words from his message of last December, "The public is the only sure remedy which we can now invoke. What further remedies are needed in the way of governmental regulation or taxation can only be determined after publicity has been obtained by means of law and in the course of administration. The first requisite is knowledge, full and correct, of the trusts, and the second is the public knowledge which may be made public to the world."

—Mr. L. L. Gullivan of Sydney, a real estate agent and stock broker, was arrested last week in Halifax on a warrant charging him with absconding and embezzlement. His preliminary trial was held on Friday at the house of which he was served with another warrant of the same nature. Mr. Sullivan was a Middleton man, having lived in Sydney about a year and has always been held in high esteem by his acquaintances. Much interest is manifested in the case and its development is anxiously awaited.

—The Yarmouth Light of last week gave an account of the heroic rescue of two young men from drowning by Capt. C. W. Rose of Port Maitland. A boat containing six young men capsized and two of them were going down for the last time when Mr. Rose heard the outcry and put off in a rowing boat. There being no oars he used his hands for paddling. Arrived at the scene he managed to seize one of the young men and pull him up. The other had gone down and was rescued by Mr. Rose diving for him. This young man was unconscious for two hours and was resuscitated with much difficulty. The feeling is that Mr. Rose's heroic act should receive more than passing recognition.

Another's Corner.

"A lawyer's life is not all law and order," confessed Abraham Levy the other day. "It was in the criminal court building a few weeks ago when the man from my district asked me to defend him in special sessions, and wait for me. Just before the case was to be called for trial he came round to borrow a ten and got it.

"When I came out of general sessions at noon my wife the client was waiting for me."

"I was discharged," he exclaimed. "I thought I was to defend you," I said.

"You see he replied, 'I couldn't afford to pay a first-class lawyer's fees, so I got one of those cheap fellows with the 'X' you looked me. I thought that would be cheaper."

"I BILLY RICE AND A PIN.

Billy Rice, negro industrial, used to tell the story of the pin he picked up in a pin as he was leaving the office of a great merchant, after an unsuccessful quest for work.

"The merchant, seeing the man's lack from the window, called him back and asked him to come in."

"I was looking for work, and you were looking for a pin," said the proprietor, who not only had the pin, but also the man's name.

"I thought that fellow's so small as to steal a pin off the floor, how much do you think he'll have in the tin?"

DISTANCE WAS DIMINISHED.

A. K. McClure, during the civil war, knew a planter who was given to pulling a long bow in narratives of the past, and usually had the backing of his negro servant, a long-going but a little slow-witted fellow, who always adored his master.

One day a dinner party was given at the planter's table, and the guests were introduced, and plainly showed it, but the negro servant, who stood behind his master, was not so easily fooled.

"That man there," says the planter, "is a fellow who will do all his tail just to get a piece of meat."

"That man there," says the planter, "is a fellow who will do all his tail just to get a piece of meat."
