The medical health officer thinks the above facts account for the cases on St. Lawrence street and Steiner avenue. The husband of the married sister was in the habit of going regularly to and from his work on Front street, and passed on each trip the houses on the two streets where the cases were discovered. Dr. Canniff is therefore of the opinion that all these cases are due entirely to the infection spread by the young woman. She herself probably contracted the disease from some clothes she was handling. A supposed case in the central part of the city is being watched.

"To Jerusalem!" exclaimed Mendele, aghast at the boldness of his wife's suggestion. "I should go to Jeeusalem?"

"Yes, to Jerusalem," said Rebecce, relieved that the decisive word which had so long been hovering on her lips had been spoken at last. "Why should you not go to Jerusalem? Scores of holy men have gene thither to end their days, and have found there consolation and peace. You will find the same."

frame of mind lasted for some twenty minutes, during which Mendele Bluhdorn walked on alone slowly but steadily. The road led slightly up hill, and, unacoustomed as he was to walking, the progress he made was but slow. When he had reached the tep of the incline, he was obliged to pause to recover breath, and, leaning on his eaken staff, Mendele turned and looked back a last time toward his native town.

"But you can not keep it alone," said the husband, helplessly. "How should I leave you alone, Rebecca, my soul?" But his "seul" answered dryly that Jehovah cared for the widows and orphans, and that her faith was strong, and she was willing to put her trust in providence.

"Besides," she added as an afterthought, "I know of a young man whe would be willing to take the place of shopman." The entrance of fresh customers put an end to the discussion for the moment; but while serving out lumpsugar or measuring yards of calico the old Jew felt as though he were in a dream. It seemed as if a large bell had got into his head and was ringing incessantly: "Alable treatise sent free. His name was Golde Safran, and he had a fresh color and flaming red curis. From the very outset he displayed an extraordinary genius for shopkeeping. He rearranged the little window in a totally new fashion, with a most effective pattern of raisins and almonds in the center, framed in by alternate bars of white and brown scop; and he bullied the peasants and flattered the town damsels with equal success.

No peasant was ever allowed to leave the shop without having purchased at least twice as much Wodki as he had originally intended to; and when the ladies did not find what they came to seek Golde Safran was sure to make them take something else in its stead. His system was was about as follows: If, for instance, a customer inquired for red pepper, he would answer briskly: "Red pepper, madam?
