If the right hon. the Prime Minister is to be believed, no new principle is involved in the Bill which he is now presenting to the consideration of the House, and which it is but an amendment to the existing Militia Acts, with the addition of a few clauses and the elimination of a few others.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if such should be the case, the right hon. leader of the House, with this Bill, could certainly not compass the object he has in view, and he could certainly not provide for the compulsory enlistment of 100,000 men for overseas service; because, if the principle embodied in our existing Militia Act is to be maintained in the Bill under consideration, the Government could not put our militia on active service in Europe, without violating the policy and the letter of our Militia Act.

I submit, Sir, that the words in the Militia Act "beyond Canada for the defence thereof" merely convey the meaning that our militia may be called out beyond our frontiers to repel the invader.

From the day our first Militia Act was passed, in 1868, down to our own times, our lawgivers never contemplated or had anything in view besides the defence of Canada in North America.

Up to 1868, their were to be found in our Statute book formal enactments which never gave rise to ambiguity. In 1868, the Act of 1863 was superseded, and although the framers of the Act did not express any intention of changing the policy of the law, however as some exception was taken to the change made in the Act, the lawgiver, in 1868, formally affirmed the fundamental principle laid down in the orginal Acts, as concerns the placing of the militia on active service abroad, by the addition of the words "for the defence of Canada" and by explaining the meaning of those words.

When the construction to be placed on any clause of a statute is called in question, no better authority can be invoked than that of the framer of the Bill which has passed into law.

In looking up the Debates of 1904, I find that Sir Frederick Borden, the sponsor of the Bill, then said, as reported at page 6491 of Hansard:

> Sir Frederick Borden: There has been no change in policy. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Maclean) will take the trouble to look at former Militia Acts and the discussion on Militia Bills he will find that the intention always has been whether expressed or not—in some of the Acts it has been distinctly expressed and in far more stringent terms than in the Bill now before the Committee—that the Militia of Canada or of the old provinces before the Dominion existed, should be only called upon to serve within the territory of those provinces or of the Dominion.

And further on:

> That is the intention.

Further on:

> That is the idea in the organization of any milita force. . . .it is a home force for home service. . .

Further on:

> It seems to me that we have made clear in this section exactly what is undestood as the object of a militia force in every country.

Pages 8087-8088:

> Sir Frederick Borden: I do not think the hon. gentleman himself would seriously contemplate a proposition by which the Government would have authority to order the militia to serve a thousand miles away from Canada.
> Mr. Gourley: Why not? What are we here for?
>
> Sir Frederick Borden: It is for the hon. gentleman to explain that. I do not think that any thoughtful man looking at the condition of things in this young country would seriously propose to enact a statute which would place in the hands of any government the power of ordering out the militia to serve in distant parts of the world—
>
> Mr. Barker: That is the old Act—
>
> Sir Frederick Borden: It is not the old Act—I have taken the trouble to go to the statute of old Canada and of the various provinces in this Dominion and there I have found that not one of them contains a provision by which the Militia can be sent outside of the province iself. That being the case it seems to me that we may just as well understand where we are and I accept, fully, absolutely and entirely myself the responsibility for the proposition which is contained in this clause.

[Mr. Demers.]

Could we place a different construction upon the wording of the statute? Could we give a different interpretation to the language of our statutes, by the light of our history and of our traditions? I submit as a sound legal proposition that a different construction cannot be placed upon the Act. And is it not evident that, when the war broke out, the Government themselves gave that very same interpretation to the Act, by sending our soldiers abroad, not as a part of the Canadian militia, or under the authority of our Militia Act, but to serve as an auxiliary to and in fact to form part of the Imperial army? Is it not evident that when the war started the Canadian Government placed the same interpretation upon the Act, in their communications with the British authorities, as to the status of our soldiers in Europe?

And yet, if ever there existed danger for Canada, it was indeed at the inception of the war, when Germany, after making a most intense preparation for forty-four years, almost succeeded in rapidly winning the war, without seriously impairing her forces and energies, and came near being enabled to dictate peace conditions which would have decided and determined the future of our country. Yet, in spite of this impending danger, the Canadian Government made no enactment for placing the Active Militia of Canada on actual service beyond Canada, because they realized that they had no such power. And if they lacked such power in those times of stress and emergency, on what ground can they now claim the power of taking such action, when Canada is no longer in danger of invasion or of conquest? Is there an hon. gentleman in this House who believes that there is any cause for Canada to fear invasion or conquest by the German nation, now utterly exhausted or at least seriously weakened and almost tottering to her ruin? Let us not shift the question. It is not enough to say: We must fill up the ranks, as they become depleted. We must certainly maintain our lines, if we wish to keep our plighted faith to our soldiers, but not by placing upon the Act such wrong interpretation as placed upon it by the Prime Minister and by those who favour conscription. A question of sentiment would be no adequate ground for authorizing the Governor in Council to send Canadian forces across the sea. There should exist a real or apprehended danger of invasion of Canada, a statement which no thinking man to-day would subscribe to, and in the absence of such danger, the Governor in Council could not, even under the interpretation placed upon the statute by the Prime Minister, force the citizens of this country to enlist for overseas service.

To sum up my first argument, if the principle involved in this Bill does not change the policy or intention of the existing Act, the Governor in Council cannot call out the people for service across the ocean, first because our Militia Act does not authorize it and moreover because, even under the Act as construed by the Prime Minister, there exists no real or apprehended danger.

But, unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, the interpretation of our law, by the Prime Minister, seems to me much more of a subterfuge to excuse the enormity of his act than the expression of a conviction.

This Bill, according to him, does not contain any new principle? Are we to be persuaded that chalk is cheese? Then why pass a new law? Would it be, perchance, because it is intended to suppress the equality of the ballot in order to replace it by the supreme injustice of selective conscription? No, Mr. Speaker, the reason why a new Bill is submitted, is that here is a Bill where we find these words "Canadian Expeditionary Force," and we find also these words, "Preservation of the Empire and of human liberty." The reason why another Bill is brought down, is that this is not the case of a mere innovation, but that of a complete revolution in our legislation. Besides, that is how this Bill has been interpreted all over the country. The whole press has announced it under the heading of " the Conscription Law." Has our present Militia Act ever been designated under that appellation? Moreover, as I have just stated, there is no better authority for the interpretation of a law than the explanations given, at the time of its making, by the author of the Bill and, as the Prime Minister has told us, very plainly and without any ambiguity, that the sole object of the Bill he proposed, was to permit the sending of our soldiers to Europe for the defence of the Empire and human liberty, then this Bill is essentially different from our present Militia Act where, most naturally, there is no other question but that of the defence of Canada—Home Defence. This Bill therefore indicates a political tendency entirely different from the one we have heretofore followed, and that is why I submit, as a second proposition, the following: The proposed law, should it be adopted, will be unconstitutional. And, in support of my thesis, I will have but to repeat my previous argument as to the meaning of the words: " outside of Canada for the defence of Canada," in the case of actual or apprehended danger, merely adding to it this: According to the British North American Act, the Federal Parliament, by section 91, paragraph 13, has the power to make laws for " the militia, the naval service and the defence of the country."

If we attentively read over the debate which took place about the proposal of Confederation, we must necessarily come to the conclusion that the Fathers of Confederation had in view solely the defence of Canada in North America; that they never had the intention to try and organize in the country a militia for the protection of the Empire and of human liberty throughout the world. The only question was the defence of Canada, and that defence presupposed an attack against the Canadian territory. Besides, at the time of Confederation, we had a Militia Act which continued in existence until 1868, and that law did not provide for the sending of our militia beyond the limits of our territory, except to repel an attack, when it did authorize entering into a foreign territory, but into a territory contiguous to or adjoining our own. Not one of those who participated in the debate upon the Confederation proposal has expressed any intention other than this one. Such is, therefore, the meaning to be given to the words " for the country's defence," in the Confederation Act; that is to say, that the principle which presided over the making of the first Militia Act has never been altered by any subsequent legislation.

This is for the legal and constitutional side which is of capital importance, which is of such importance, that by itself alone, it necessitates a referendum in order to have the people's view concerning the constitutional changes that are meant to be made by the measure now submitted to us.

It is not my intention, Mr. Speaker, to consider all the viewpoints from which the conscription question might be examined, but I will not, however, take my seat without insisting upon a certain feature of the Bill.

We are told that our greatest concern for the time being should be " to win the war," and that is why conscription should be proposed.

Have you faith in the usefulness of the method adopted by the Government? For my part, I have not. I desire to express forthwith my own opinion, with all sincerity and I do say I am satisfied that had anyone wished to completely paralyze Canada's effort in this war, he could not have found worse or better than the move made by the Government.

Has the Prime Minister satisfied himself, for a single moment, that his measure would make for union among the citizens of this country? Has the Prime Minister satisfied himself for a single moment, that his measure would promote greater unity of action? I do not grant him such ingenousness. He must have known that the contrary would happen; he should have known that the first and only sure result, would be to intensify the race conflict going on in Canada, more particularly since the outbreak of the war.

A few moments of reflection should have made him foresee the national disaster toward which he is heading us, and as I cannot suppose that the Prime Minister has not foreseen that fatality I hold him responsible for having deliberately done so. And by creating that condition in the country could the Prime Minister think he would stimulate the Canadian effort in the prosecution of the war? On the contrary, he should have reflected that he would paralyze it, as he does paralyze it, he will cause us to lose abroad the benefit of all the sacrifices we have imposed ourselves until now.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, we had drawn, we had provoked rather, the wonder and the admiration of the allied nations by the generosity and the spontaneity of our participation, and now the arbitrary and despotic action of the Government shall give rise to protests and to more than protests, which will certainly have the effect to create in the Allies' minds a confusion as to the appreciation of the sentiments and of the motives which have inspired our former participation.

To desire to establish conscription in our country; to wish to establish conscription here, when we have so nobly and so generously answered every call, is not only a poor appreciation of the sacrifices made, it is a crime, and the future will say whether I am using too strong an expression to qualify the Government's action.

All these considerations, Mr. Speaker, awaken within me some suspicions as to the motives which have inspired the Government, and I am asking myself whether the " win the war " has had as much a decisive influence as did party considerations, and I would be greatly surprised if the Government, after the adoption of their measure, if it be adopted, ever attempt to apply it.

The Prime Minister knows under what conditions the Parliament is called upon to legislate upon a question of this importance. We are no longer the representatives of the people, and we would have the impudence of doing away with the liberty of the people. But is not the absurdity of such a pretension most evident, and, more especially, the danger of seeing it materialize?

But, it is said, our parliamentary existence has been continued by the Imperial Parliament. That does not make of us representatives of the people, but Imperial deputies, and since when has the Imperial Parliament the right to decide of the life of the citizens of Canada? They will laugh at us, unless the Government's action be considered as a provocation; then, they will revolt. We have no authority in the matter, and it would be daring the people, should we have the audacity and the insolence to try and dispose of its liberties. The people will have nothing but contempt for an arbitrary measure adopted by an irresponsible body and I say: Woe be to those who would provoke them. We are living in a democratic country and our people will not readily accept the return to autocracy and despotism.

While it is not yet too late, I ask the Prime Minister to reconsider his decision, to withdraw his Bill. I ask it of him on behalf of Canada's future; I ask it on behalf of the necessary union of the races in this country; for the success of the war inasmuch as Canada's participation is concerned.

The Prime Minister stated that we should fear the wrath and indignation of our soldiers on their return, if we did not provide to fill the gaps and to send reinforcements. I think the Prime Minister was very ill-inspired in making such a statement. No one will believe that the heroes who have fought freely and voluntarily for the triumph of civilization, of liberty and of equality, would demand the application to their fellow-citizens of methods different from those that were applied to them. I have a higher conception of the mentality of the heroes of Vimy, of Courcelette, of Saint Julien, of Festubert and of Ypres, and I entertain the hope that, fighting over there for universal peace against barbarity and the despotism of the military castes, they would not return here to establish the German methods and the reign of terror. Otherwise, there would be reason to bitterly regret our intervention in this war. And then, have we deserved this threat from the Prime Minister? No, assuredly not.

Let us see. Do they absolutely mean that we have done nothing in this war or do they not realize the gigantic effort we have accomplished? According to the Prime Minister, we ought to hide ourselves in shame, for our apathy and our indifference.

Well! this language shocks me and offends me, and far from being ashamed at our share in this war, as a Canadian I am proud of it, and I concede to no one the right to diminish the glory, the honour and the credit which must therefrom reflect upon our country.

We are told: what will they think of us if we do not fill up the gaps? What will be thought is this, that we have done our share and that our resources do not permit us to do any more, inasmuch as our contribution in men is concerned. What did people think of France when she abandoned a part of her front line of defence to entrust it to British soldiers? It is not absolutely necessary that the front, now occupied by the Canadians, be always held by Canadians. The important point is that it be maintained by allied troops, whether they be English, French, Australian, American or Canadian soldiers. When the French soldier could not hold his entire line, he was replaced by the British soldier and there was no cause for humiliation in that, just as there would be no reason for uneasiness and for shame if a portion of our line were maintained by the Americans who have just entered the war and who should now contribute a share at least equal to ours.

Let us suppose that we do go to the extreme limit, that we send all our men fit to carry arms, and that the war should last two or three years longer, should we then be obliged to send over our women, our children and our old men, so that we still might pride ourselves in saying that the Canadian lines are entirely held by Canadians? We have at present 420,000 men enlisted, perhaps more, out of a population of 7,000,000 souls, and although I do not desire to recriminate for, after all, such a levy has been voluntary, and although I have no objection against voluntary enlistment, I may truly say nevertheless that we have exceeded our capacity, and I find myself in excellent company when I make such a claim. The sending over of 200,000 men would have been more in conformity with our needs, with the needs of the Allies, with our resources and our interest, 200,000 men at the front would have been considered as evidence of a boundless generosity, and devotion. Never had the Allies expected or imagined such a contribution from Canada, because they knew the extent of our territory, our relative population, and because they realized that our degree of interest was not the same as that of the sovereign nations; and they would not entertain any feeling of contempt, did they know that, before imposing upon ourselves the supreme effort, we desire at least to be convinced that we are not doing it in the place of those who are primarily obliged to do so. My intimate conviction is that 100,000 more men, in this mass of 25 or 30 millions of combatants, could have no more influence upon the result of the war than a grain of sand cast in the sea would affect its level, and, therefore, I am the more convinced that it is merely a matter of saving 100,000 men from elsewhere by sacrificing our own. These 100,000 lives, we need them at home; they mean little or nothing as far as the war is concerned, but what a capital for a young and vast country as ours, which, to lay its foundations, has been obliged until quite recently to pay people to cross over and to spend fabulous amounts towards encouraging immigration.

If, after the gigantic effort made by us, the Allies are still in need of soldiers, let us not forget that the United States are at war, that they have a population of 112,000,000 inhabitants, that they have entered this war for questions purely of national interest and that, comparatively, to equal our effort, they must raise an army of six or seven million men. Let them first draw from this abundant and inexhaustible source before thinking of draining this country of its men before thinking of rooting out the very elements required for the carrying on of its activities.

After the splendid but lavish effort we have made, I am shocked at finding that it is proposed to take steps towards forcibly enlisting even the last men, by means of a conscription Bill. And under what circumstances? After the Premier and his colleagues have absolutely pledged themselves not to do so; after a minister of the Crown, just a few months ago, had himself elected upon a policy absolutely contrary to that which is born to us to-day; with an incomplete representation and when, as a matter of fact, some way or other, some thirty counties are deprived of all representation; when there is no longer in this House any representative of the people and that neither the Government nor this Parliament have the constitutional right of enacting conscription.

Resolutions have been known to spring from measures less arbitrary. What are we in our relations to the people? Plain individuals, without mandate or authority, existing as a body in consequence of an Imperial Act, but we are no longer the representatives of the people. I have no right to speak here in the name of the people, neither upon this question nor upon any other, and I am too proud of my country's autonomy to speak in the name of the Imperial Government. I am too fond of the democratic liberal ideas to play the dictator; the people of Canada are alone master of their destinies, alone have they the right to decide. They have delegated their powers to no one and, indeed, I cannot believe that, in this land of liberty, we could have the spectacle of a majority in an assembly of two hundred individuals, that would thus enforce its own views upon 7,000,000 free citizens. Let us beware!

The Allies' cause is noble and holy, we have realized that from the start, we made all manner of sacrifice; we made them generously and willingly; we are ready to make more, but to come and attempt to coerce us after the remarkable voluntary effort we have just made, that is an insult which has been spared the people in certain portions of the Empire, such as Australia where though determined to contribute their all they nevertheless resolved to affirm their freedom. Let us consult the people. A large section of the country is opposed to conscription, it may or may not form the majority; a plebiscite alone can show. Will the majority declare in favour of it? If so, the minority will submit, for we have a population deeply imbued with sound democratic ideas.

Without a plebiscite, who can tell us that the people shall respect a measure arbitrarily passed by a power without responsibility or authority? Have we the right to create in the country such a situation? Have we the right to risk the consequences of an arbitrary and despotic act when, by a referendum, the question would be settled, without friction and without danger, within a few weeks?

Would a negative verdict be feared? Who are those who fear public opinion? Shall public opinion be respected, yes or no? Are we living in a constitutional country? Well, then, what is this public opinion? There is nothing but a popular consultation that can let us know, at this hour, for there are no longer any representatives of the people.

Of course, I am aware that in certain centres the opinion is current that anti-conscriptionists are to be found in Quebec only; let us have a plebiscite and we will thus obtain two equally important results: first, we shall know the popular will as regards enlistment, and, in the second place, we may perhaps put an end to the prejudices that are fostered against Quebec in certain outlying and beclouded communities.

The hon. Solicitor General thought fit, the day before yesterday, to put a question, not to me, but to the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil). I would have been glad if someone had put me the same question, and I shall do as if that had actually happened. He asked what was our opinion upon conscription.

Should the Government withdraw its Bill and grant us a plebiscite, I would go before the electors of my county and engage them with all the energy in my power to vote against conscription. As a citizen, I would vote against conscription most decidedly; but if the majority declared in favour of conscription, then I would submit, and I would ask all my electors and all my fellow-citizens to likewise submit. I would go before my electors and I would tell them this in order to induce them to vote against conscription. I would say to them: According to me, the only way in which we can at present really assist in bringing about the final victory of the Allies is by developing agriculture, it is by doing intensive culture, it is by setting ourselves to the building of ships, it is by turning out more munitions.

I have a long time since been deeply impressed with that idea, and never was I more convinced of it than when I heard, in this House, the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster), who spoke as follows—

Sir HERBERT AMES (translation): Will the hon. member allow me to put him one question?

Mr. DEMERS (translation): Certainly.

Sir HERBERT AMES (translation): The hon. member stated, if I rightly caught his meaning, that he would do all in his power to induce his electors to vote against conscription?

Mr. DEMERS (translation): Certainly.

Sir HERBERT AMES (translation): But if the vote of the Dominion of Canada be in favour of conscription, that he would do his possible to induce his electors to accept that measure. If there is a general election, would he be disposed to do anything after?

Mr. DEMERS (translation): If there is a general election before the passing of this law or after the passing of this law? If we had a general election immediately?

Sir HERBERT AMES (translation): Yes.

Mr. DEMERS (translation): If we had a general election immediately, I would tell my electors that the question of conscription would be submitted to them by plebiscite unless the Government agreed to have a plebiscite at the time the election was being held.

Sir HERBERT AMES (translation): I do not exactly understand; if you will allow me, from your point of view, is there a difference between a referendum pure and simple and a general election?

Mr. DEMERS (translation): Certainly, if, in a general election, the question were not separately put, the voters' opinion, as to this special question, would perhaps not be known—and I believe the question should be put in a most special manner, so that the voter may give a distinct answer, and I do think the only way out of the difficulty would be to submit the question through a plebiscite, either at the time of the election or subsequently, if the Liberal party came into power and the movement in favour of conscription should be continued.

I was just about to quote the words spoken by the hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce, when I was interrupted—and, indeed, it has afforded me pleasure—by the hon. member for St. Antoine. I shall now quote from the statement made by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce:

> The great question in the war at the present time is feeding the Allies, feeding the Allies for the rest of the war, and more especially for the next six months. A submarine can sink a 6,000 ton vessel in two minutes, but it takes months to build one. The critical time is between now and the end of 1917, and whatever goods we can have in that period is our bounden duty to save.

To further confirm my views, I just read this morning, in a Montreal paper, an interview given by Lord Rhondda, food controller in England, an interview which took place on the 19th of the present month. Here is what he says:

> In this war, and especially at this stage, food-power is co-equal with man-power," said Lord Rhondda, the new food controller in an interview to-day. "The problem of Great Britain's food primarily depends upon the supply, and in the main the solution of the problem of supply lies in America. I am sure they will not let us down."

And further:

> For this we depend to a vital degree upon the United States and Canada. No one recognizes that more fully than I do.

Mr. Speaker, in concluding I will say that our duty just now in this country, considering the assistance we can give the Allies and the very future of our country, is first, to practice the strictest economy, and then to apply ourselves to promoting the interests of agriculture and production generally, and we must also think of preserving in this country at least the germ of life which shall be necessary to us in order to face and to solve the after-the-war problems of which we have been given so gloomy and dismaying representations.

On motion of Mr. Hazen the House adjourned at 11.05 p.m.

Friday, June 22, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

THE MILITARY SERVICE ACT, 1917.

MR. SPEAKER REFERS TO LANGUAGE USED BY MR. GAUTHIER.

Mr. SPEAKER: My attention has been directed to language used during the debate last evening by the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe at a time when I happened to be out of the Chamber. The hon. member (Mr. Gauthier) is reported in Hansard to have said:

> His amendment (Mr. Barrette's), being a negative one, would have been ruled out of order if it had not been introduced with the consent of the Government.

It seems to me that the implication contained in these words is unmistakable, and one which if allowed to go unchallenged would seriously impair my usefulness as Speaker of this House. I need hardly say that the use of such language by an hon. member of the House is not in conformity with the usual practice in such cases, and is not in keeping with the spirit of proper decorum in debate. When the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe is in his place I purpose to ask him to withdraw this language.

CRIMINAL COURT AMENDMENT.

NUMBER OF JURORS IN PANEL.

Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 97, to amend the criminal code.

Mr. GRAHAM: Explain.

Mr. DOHERTY: Our attention has been called to the fact that by recent legislation in the province of Manitoba, as well as by legislation which has been in force for some time in some of the other provinces, there is no fixed number of jurors to be summoned as constituting the panel, power being given to the judge to summon any number of jurors that he may deem desirable for the purposes of the business to be brought before the court. Under this legislation the panel may be of a very large number, and the Crown in any trial has the right to stand aside any number of jurors as they are called, without assigning any reason. Wherever under the law the panel is fixed at a definite number, this right of stand aside is of course limited to the number fixed for the panel, and, the panel once exhausted, these jurors may be called again and, unless there is ground for challenge, will be entitled to sit. It was considered not desirable that the Crown should have this right to stand aside extending to such an indefinite number, or rather, that it should not have that right without its being subject to the same control which is confided to the judge as to the determination of the number of the panel. This Bill therefore proposes to amend that section of the Criminal Code by limiting the right of stand aside to the number of forty-eight, which is the fixed number of the panel in many of the provinces, was such in Manitoba, until the recent legislation, unless the judge for special cause permits the right to be exercised as regards a larger number. In other words, the purpose is simply to subject the right of stand aside to the same control on the part of the judge as under the provincial legislation referred to he has over the number of the panel.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

EXCHEQUER COURT ACT AMENDMENT.

Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 98, to amend the Exchequer Court Act.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Explain.

Mr. DOHERTY: This Bill contains two clauses. The purpose of the first is to make provision for the liability for costs on the part of litigants with the Crown where the case on the part of the Crown is conducted by the department. In those cases the lawyers in the department are not entitled to collect fees or costs for themselves, they being paid by their salaries. It is thought desirable, notwithstanding that fact, that litigants who bring unfounded claims against the Crown should be liable for costs the same as any other litigant. The purpose of this first clause is therefore to provide that in such cases the costs to which the litigants may be condemned shall be payable to the Crown simply, the Crown paying its own costs through the salaries of its officers.

The other provision of the Bill is to achieve a purpose which was also the purpose of a Bill introduced earlier in the session by the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Lapointe), if my memory serves me right. The matter dealt with by that proposed Bill of his had already been brought to our attention before his Bill was introduced, and we had come to the conclusion that an amendment such as he sought to make by his Bill should be made to the Exchequer Court Act. The clause of the Exchequer Court Act sought to be amended by this Bill and by the Bill of the hon. member for Kamouraska is the clause giving jurisdiction to the court to adjudicate upon any claim of damages against the Crown resulting from death or injury to person or property caused by the negligence of any servant of the Crown upon a public work. The Supreme Court has interpreted the section as it now stands as limiting the liability to cases where the injury is actually sustained upon the public work; that is to say, where the person suffering is actually on the public work or where it is a question of damage to property which property itself is actually upon the public work. This created a situation in which, though a man might be injured by the negligence of an employee of the Crown in the course of his employment, and where the whole cause of the injury took place upon the public work, yet if the victim himself was not actually on the public work he had no recourse.

While there is no reason to criticise the interpretation put by the Supreme Court upon the section as it stands, I do not think it was intended when the legislation was originally enacted to make that distinction, namely, to make the liability depend upon the locality in which the individual or the property injured happened to be.

The purpose of this legislation is simply so to amend the section that the Crown will be liable—as I certainly believe was intended—for damage or injury resulting from the negligence of an employee of the Crown within the scope of his employment upon a public work. It simply does away with the requirement which the present section has been interpreted as containing, namely, that the individual or property injured should at the moment be actually on the public work.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

INTEREST ACT AMENDMENT.

Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice): moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 99, to amend the Interest Act.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Explain.

Mr. DOHERTY: The purpose of this Bill is to make the rate of interest payable upon judgments in the province of Manitoba similar to that payable in the province of Alberta and Saskatchewan, and I think in almost all the other provinces. The necessity for this legislation arises because of the fact that it has recently been decided that the interest upon judgments in the province of Manitoba runs at but 4 per cent, which I understand was the rate fixed by English statute at the time the English law became applicable to the province of Manitoba.

The courts appear to have held that it was not within the jurisdiction of a provincial legislature to legislate on the subject of interest, even interest running upon a judgment, and that consequently any modification of the law in that regard attempted by the provincial legislature was ineffective. From many sources in Manitoba have come requests that the interest rate there should be made the same as that provided for by statute for the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan, which is the ordinary rate of interest, five per cent provided in cases where neither by law nor by agreement is the rate of interest fixed. There have been requests from Manitoba also that the interest rate should be made higher than this. While it did not appear to us that there should be a higher rate of interest in Manitoba than in other provinces, it did appear desirable that there should be an equal rate. This Bill, therefore, simply brings the province of Manitoba under the provisions made applicable to the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan, under which interest runs upon a judgment at the rate of five per cent.

Mr. OLIVER: What is the rate of interest, under such circumstances, in Ontario?

Mr. DOHERTY: My impression is that it is five per cent. I know that it is five per cent in the province of Quebec. I think that in one or more of the Maritime Provinces it is six per cent.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

SATURDAY SITTINGS.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister) moved:

That on and after Saturday next, the twenty-third instant, and on Saturdays until the end of the present session, the House shall meet at three o'clock in the afternoon; and the Order of Precedence on Saturdays shall be the same as on Fridays.

He said: While I present this motion in the form in which it stands in my name, yet it has been represented to me by hon. members on both sides of the House that it is rather short notice to take to-morrow, and also that the following Saturday will precede a public holiday. I am willing to be guided by the feeling of the House in the matter. If it is preferred that Saturday sittings should begin two weeks from to-morrow I am willing to propose the motion in that form. On the other hand, if it is the feeling of the House that we might take to-morrow, and then make any necessary arrangements about next Saturday I am prepared to take that course. Has my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) anything to suggest?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I think the sense of the House is that it would be quite impossible to sit to-morrow—I suppose my right hon. friend (Sir Robert Borden) agrees to that. I would say the same about the following Saturday. If the Saturday sittings were to begin with the first Saturday in July I should have no objection.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Then we will let the motion pass amended accordingly—it will not include to-morrow or the following Saturday.

SPEECH OF MR. L. J. GAUTHIER.

THE PRIME MINISTER DENIES STATEMENTS MADE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my attention has been directed just now to a statement made yesterday by the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. L. J. Gauthier), to which Your Honour has alluded. I observe, also, in the speech of the hon. member another statement of somewhat the same character. The first statement to which I wish to allude is this:

> We are engaged in a very serious debate, but permit me to say that I consider this amendment to the amendment to be a farce. It has been engineered, not by the mover and seconder of the motion, but by the Government itself.

Further on he says, referring to the same amendment proposed by the hon. member for Berthier:

> His amendment, being a negative one, would have been ruled out of order if it had not been introduced with the consent of the Government.

I desire to give these statements the most unqualified denial. I neither heard, nor knew anything of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Berthier until I saw it the following morning in the newspapers. Any intention to propose such an amendment was never communicated to me; nor, in so far as I am aware, to any of my colleagues. The Government, from first to last, had absolutely nothing to do with the proposed amendment, and we will oppose it in the most unqualified manner.

PRIVILEGE.

STATEMENT BY MR. BARRETTE.

On the Orders of the day:

Mr. BARRETTE (Berthier), (translation): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. I found in Hansard, this morning that the honourable member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Gauthier) had stated yesterday before this House that the Government had inspired the amendment to the amendment which I did propose to the conscription Bill.

I emphatically deny the honourable Prime Minister or any of his colleagues or followers having had anything to do either directly or indirectly with this amendment to the amendment. I am even ready to resign my seat in this House to prove my statement.

I make this denial, not because I am in the least afraid of what may be stated by my honourable friend from St. Hyacinthe, whose speech has stirred up general indignation throughout the country, but because I wish to set the facts in their proper light. I alone stand responsible for this matter. Had the Government wished to play their last card in order to pass their Bill, they would have had a better hand than the honourable members of the Opposition who, for want of something better, did play their white card, on Thursday night, when they called upon my honourable friend from St. Hyacinthe to take part in the debate.

LABOUR STRIKE IN WESTERN COAL MINES.

DIRECTOR OF MINING OPERATIONS TO BE APPOINTED.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. W. A. BUCHANAN (Medicine Hat): Has the hon. the Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers) any further information to give the House about the coal strike situation in Western Canada?

Hon. T. W. CROTHERS (Minister of Labour): A recommendation has been made by Council for the appointment of a director of coal mining operations in Southern Alberta and the southern part of British Columbia. It has not yet received the approval of His Excellency the Governor General, and until it receives his approval it would not be proper for me to say anything further about it.

Mr. W. E. KNOWLES (Moosejaw): Has the hon. minister any statement that he can bring down? A great deal must have happened in the past of which we do not know anything. We are very much uninformed as to what has happened. If an Order in Council has been passed dealing with the matter it should be brought down. We have such fragmentary information that I think the minister without taking a day to make a debate of it might give us all the data he has or make a consecutive statement in regard to the matter.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The Order in Council can be brought down if it is desired. That is not the recommendation to His Excellency which was mentioned just now. In addition to what my colleague (Mr. Crothers) has said, I might add that a gentleman has been selected to fill the position of director of coal operations within that district, but as the recommendation for his appointment has not yet received the approval of His Excellency, nothing more can be said at the moment. If the House should sit to-morrow, I might possibly be able to make an announcement, but I certainly shall be able to do so on Monday.

Mr. KNOWLES: Has any report been made by the hon. gentleman who was commissioner in the matter?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: He made an oral report to the Minister of Labour and to me.

Mr. KNOWLES: Might we have a resumé of that report communicated to us?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I think the result is pretty well set forth in the Order in Council which will be brought down. Anything that is desired in addition can be stated. I may say that very considerable progress was made in bringing the operators and employees together and that eventually there was simply one difficulty remaining, which did not seem to be of a very important character. Nevertheless, it was a matter in respect to which neither side would give way and for that reason it became necessary to take the action which will be communicated to the House on Monday in case it should receive the approval of His Excellency the Governor General.

COST OF LIVING IN THE YUKON.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. A. THOMPSON (Yukon): For the information of the House and the Government I would like to read a telegram which I received this morining from Dawson. It is as follows:

Dawson, Y.T., June 21, 1917.
Lt.-Col. Alfred Thompson, M.P.,
Ottawa, Ont.

Business men of Dawson met this afternoon; your telegram submitted to them. They request me to send following: "No desperate situation exists here; workmen in Yukon gold thawing plants petitioned for increase of wages or company to supply them provisions at cost for next winter, and many have quit work pending adjustment, but no disorder exists." The facts are that the increased price of living in the case of single men who are in the majority, falls upon the company as men are hired upon the basis of giving wages and board. Excepting the recent advances in flour which seemed necessary to meet local conditions, there has been no advance in price of provisions from last season's prices except as new goods have arrived, prices in such cases being advanced in the ordinary ratio to landed cost. Retail prices of flour, lard, beans, hams, bacon, butter, potatoes and rice as established last year and prevailing here all winter, have been as low, and in some cases lower, than those prevailing in Vancouver this spring. Allegations of Williams' complicity with dealers, absolutely unfounded. Complete stenographic proceedings of meeting at which this propaganda originated are being forwarded by mail.

STATEMENT BY LE CANADA.

HON. T. W. CROTHERS MAKES CORRECTION.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. T. W. CROTHERS: Referring to the speech I made in this House on Wednesday of this week, Le Canada newspaper, published in Montreal, in its issue of yesterday, had this to say:

Hon. Mr. Crothers says that the French Canadians are degenerate and fallen men. It is with this insult to our race that the Minister of Labour ended his speech last night in favour of conscription.

There is no truth in that statement whatever, and nothing I said on that occasion warrants it.

MILITARY SERVICE ACT, 1917.

DEBATE CONTINUED ON MOTION FOR SECOND READING AND ON THE AMENDMENTS.

Consideration of the motion of the Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden (Prime Minister) for the second reading of Bill No. 75, Military Service Act, 1917, and the amendment of Sir Wilfrid Laurier thereto, and on the amendment to the amendment by Mr. Barrette, resumed from Thursday, June 21.

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (South Renfrew): Mr. Speaker, as a great portion of my public life has been devoted to defending the rights of minorities, even to the point of generosity, as charged by my opponents, to-day, being in the minority among my own friends, I ask from them the kind consideration which I have always endeavoured to extend to them. We are asking the men of Canada to be : Ready, aye ready. We, in this House, might add a slogan for our own benefit: Be steady, aye steady. If there ever was a time in the history of this country when men should curb their passions and prejudices simultaneously with their tongues, that time is now, and this is the place. Nothing can be gained, Mr. Speaker, by recrimination. We are citizens of a common country, having the same ideal, having the same object, and, I take it, every man in this House no matter from what province he may come, or from what stock he may have sprung, believes in his country, is attached to his country, and believes, further, that the destiny of his country is bound up in its relationship with the great British Empire. We may differ on details, but only on details. Sir, the people of Canada, the people of the Empire, and the nations of the earth, are looking at Canada at the present moment. Should we say or do aught to disturb the harmony that exists among the people of different origin in this country, we will add to the gratification of our enemies and detract from the comfort of our friends.

In attempting to speak as one of the minority on this side of the House, I do it without any trepidation. I say, frankly, if I were on the other side of the House, I would not feel such freedom. Liberalism, as I have learned it, allows the fullest freedom of thought to every member who advocates Liberalism, and I want to say that, while I differ with my revered leader, I have his absolute consent to take whatever course I think best at the present time. Every member on this side of the House is at liberty to act, speak, and vote as he chooses, and, by doing so, he is not severing the ties of affection that bind him to his grand old chieftain, neither is he slinking away, in any sense, from the great Liberal party and the causes which it has always stood for. We have had, Sir, attacks made on my revered leader. I resent those attacks just as warmly to-day as I would, or could, if he and I were agreeing. We are not disagreeing on any essential a bit more than members of different churches are disagreeing on the one essential belief, and trying to get to heaven, each picking his own path. The great Liberal chieftain stands to-day where he has always stood, as the advocate of what he thinks is best for Canada and for the Empire. He is as anxious about winning this great struggle as I am. He sees difficulties in the way, in my point of view, but he recognizes my right to have that viewpoint. I do not see those difficulties, but I want to point out that he and I, as well as every member of this House, are joined in one resolve that our best must be done for the winning of this great struggle, and it is only on the details of how that is to be accomplished that I differ from him. I may be wrong in my attitude, and he may be right. Young men might forget that, when they were boys, the Liberal chieftain was fighting for the great principles, the benefits of which they now enjoy. In 1896, facing the greatest opposition, and the greatest influence that was ever brought to bear on man in this country, he stood for the principle of provincial rights, and other men from the province of Quebec stood behind him on that principle, and, as a result, it was established. He was right. Those who sat on the other side of the House were wrong. That may be the case in this instance. On the question of the Canadian navy, the events of this moment prove that my leader was right

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. GRAHAM: I would ask hon. gentlemen who live in the interior of Canada to go to the Pacific and to the Atlantic coasts, and come back and tell us what they find that they would not have found, if there had been a Canadian navy. In 1911 my leader was again right, as the Government has acknowledged by its action. He may be right in this case, but I think he is not. We differ, having both one object in view.

Sir, just a word or two as to our fellow citizens from the province of Quebec. We cannot get anywhere in this country by recrimination. Readers of Canadian history must not forget—they cannot forget, though some gentlemen speak as if they were not conversant with Canadian history—that the fact that to-day we are still a portion of the British Empire is due in a measure to the loyalty of the Frenchmen of the province of Quebec in the years gone by. During recent years, in the province of Quebec, our fellow citizens have not been imbued with the military spirit with which we in the other provinces are imbued. They have not in Quebec, throughout the villages and small towns, the drill halls and military centres to the extent that we have them in Ontario. They have not had a centre of military education, by having officers stationed all through the province of Quebec. They have gone their way, as we have gone ours in the other provinces, believing that the time would not come, for many, many years at least, when they would be called on to perform military service. We must meet the situations as we find them, and we cannot possibly by vituperative language, accomplish the purpose we have in view.

Having said this, I want to refer to another matter. The French race is much more logical than we are. There are very few English-speaking members of this House who know the French Canadian character as intimately as I do; I have had daily business relations with the French Canadian people. They are brave, chivalrous, truthful; above all, they are logical. Having been told time and again by the leader of the Government and the leader of the Opposition that there would be no conscription in Canada, they hardly believe it possible that conscription has been proposed. They cannot understand it. They are logical, but we are not. We can change with conditions much more readily than can our French Canadian fellow-citizens. These considerations must be borne in mind in the discussion of the question now before the House. It is the duty of those who differ from the French Canadian people to look at these matters from their viewpoint and to discuss them accordingly. To my mind, the surest way of being fair is to put ourselves in the other man's position, to find out what we should do if we were subject to his environment, his history, his characteristics. If every one does that there will be an exemplification of what is best; there will be not recrimination, but a closer drawing together of the two races, with the result that after this Bill is passed it may not be necessary to put it into operation.

There are three classes of Canadians: those who have gone to the front, those who cannot go, and those who ought to go. Of those who have gone nothing too good can be said. They have gone from Quebec and from Ontario, from the East and from the West, from the families of the rich, of the middle classes, and of the poor. Mingling on the field of battle, irrespective of the position that they held in this country in the way of class or occupation, they are fighting side by side in order that your children and mine may enjoy that liberty and freedom of individual action which has always been the pride of our race. In that respect there is no distinction of class. I know men of great wealth who have sent practically all their sons, some of whom have suffered; all honour to these sons and to these parents. I know the sons of workmen who have gone. Many widows have sent their only sons, some of whom have died, leaving the mothers without support and without comfort. The people of Canada are imbued with the spirit of sacrifice, knowing full well that if we lose in this great struggle nothing is left to us who so long have prized the liberties which we enjoy. Our forefathers fought in 1812; better a thousand times that we had lost in 1812 than that we should lose in 1917. Had we lost in 1812 to-day we should be under another form of democratic government—that would be the only change. But if we lose in this conflict we lose all that democratic government stands for; we become not our own masters, but the slaves of others.

This brings me to the matter of recruiting. I do not wish to indulge in undue criticism, but having taken part in the work of recruiting, so far as I could in my own feeble way, I think I am in a position to point to some of the reasons why the voluntary system failed. When the war broke out, recruiting leagues, designated by various names, but all working for a common purpose, were formed throughout Ontario. But from the Government's standpoint there was no organization. Any man in this House from the province of Ontario who will recall the recruiting operations in his own territory will realize that the successful work along this line was done by civilian organizations. Not only did these civilians work, but they paid the expenses as well; there is, I suppose, not a man in this House who has not paid out large sums of money from his own pocket in order to assist the work of recruiting in his own vicinity. If we had had proper Government organization in Ontario—I speak of that province only—recruiting would have been 25 per cent greater than it was. To the citizens of that province, much more than to the Government, is due the credit for the success of recruiting in Ontario.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: Why should not the same course have been followed in Quebec?

Mr. GRAHAM: I shall come to Quebec in a moment; my hon. friend must not worry. If I leave anything out, and the House, having not wearied of my remarks, will direct my attention to it, I shall deal with it.

This, then, is my first criticism of the Government: there was no real organization in the matter of recruiting. It is true that recruiting officers were sent here and there. I look into the faces of men who spoke at various meetings and who had charge of various committees. They will agree with me that many of the recruiting officers were of no value whatever to them in getting recruits. I do not wish to speak disparagingly of those officers, but they were not the right men to get recruits. Some officers were sent out who hindered civilians from getting recruits. I have stood on the platform with men for whose language I had to apologize in order to bring the audience back to a frame of mind in which they would consider my request for recruits. No man can hope for success in recruiting who begins by abusing the young men or the older men and calling them slackers. That is not the way to get recruits. We had too much of that in Ontario, and our recruiting was not what it should have been.

The first real jolt that was given by the Government to recruiting in Ontario was when the ex-Minister of Militia said that he was getting more men than he needed. At the first meeting that I attended after that statement had been made, I was laughed at. Men said: we understand that the Government are having no trouble in getting men; that they are getting more men than they can equip; that the men are climbing over each other to enlist. For months that statement of the then Minister of Militia was a serious handicap, because the men naturally concluded that if the Government were getting more men than they could equip, there was no use in enlisting until the work was caught up. This emphasizes my contention that there was lack of organization, somewhere, somehow.

Then other things came up; I do not want to refer to them in a critical way. The manufacturer was not allowed to sell directly to the department; people got in between, and were receiving certain commissions. This tended to greatly injure recruiting in Ontario. The ex-Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes) told us the other day that the Prime Minister himself, after Sir Thomas, now Baron, Shaughnessy issued a certain statement, intimated that the pressure upon recruiting might be relieved for a little time. I think the ex-minister said that the Minister of Finance brought back that report after a visit to Toronto.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I made a statement in this House—I think it was on the 1st or the 2nd day of February last—which is the exact and literal truth, so far as I am concerned in this matter. I purpose, before this debate closes, making a further statement on the subject, which I hope will place the matter beyond question. On no occasion did I ever ask recruiting to be slackened or delayed. What I did do—and this I have stated many times in this House—was to endeavour to have recruiting officers so direct their efforts that skilled men, who were of greater service to the country in the occupations they were engaged in than in military service, should not be taken, when other men capable of going to the front and of much less service to the State at home could be sought and secured.

Mr. GRAHAM: I leave that to the Prime Minister and the ex-Minister of Militia. That was not my strong point in this case. I was repeating what the ex-Minister of Militia said.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I interrupted only because I understood my hon. friend was attributing to me some action which had occasioned a slackening in recruiting. I desire absolutely to deny that.

Mr. GRAHAM: Again my answer must be the same. The trouble was that the ex-Minister of Militia, being a member of the Government, was believed throughout the country when he made the intimation that the pressure on recruiting was to be lessened, and recruiting practically stopped. The head of the Canadian Pacific Railway did issue a statement regarding recruiting along certain lines, and either that or something else at that period undoubtedly interfered with the progress of recruiting in Ontario.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: What is the exact period to which the hon. gentleman refers?

Mr. GRAHAM: I forget the dates; I have not them with me.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Does the hon. gentleman mean the summer of 1916?

Mr. GRAHAM: My recollection is that the ex-Minister of Militia said that it was in March, 1916. These are just a few of the things that interfered with recruiting, but the great thing, to my mind, was the lack of organization from a military standpoint. But thanks to the work of the citizens of Ontario, who formed associations, leagues, committees in every town and county, their work being aided in a measure by the Militia Department, recruiting was fairly successful in the province, but not nearly so successful as it might have been had the conditions to which I have referred not existed.

I come now to Quebec. Hon. gentlemen have referred to the appointment as chief recruiting officer of a clergyman of the church to which I belong. That may seem a small matter, but as I said in the beginning of my remarks, if we are to accomplish our object, which I presume is the securing of recruits, we must meet the people with whom we have to deal from their own viewpoint. We might as well expect the Archbishop of Montreal to be appointed editor of the Orange Sentinel, as to have a Methodist clergyman, no matter how great a preacher he is, chief recruiting officer amongst the French Canadian people. That, however, is only a minor matter.

I come now to a more delicate point, and I raised this question in this House in the early stages of the war. I wish to speak of this without any recrimination, without even questioning for the moment the standpoint of the men to whom I refer, but merely as a matter of history and of fact. Since the war began, I said in this House that the doctrine preached previously to 1911 by certain people in Quebec, namely: that we owed nothing to Britain and should not send a man to fight her battles, had more to do with slowness of recruiting in Quebec than any other cause. Another cause was that when the war broke out the Government of Canada had as three of its members, men who had taken
4 p.m. that position at every church door in Quebec, and the young men to whom this Government was appealing to enlist had been told by those men that it was no part of their duty to enlist to fight overseas. As I have said before, the French mind is logical; you cannot turn it upside down over night, and when men were found in the Government, helping to direct the affairs of this war, who had told the young men of Quebec that such a war was no concern of theirs, those young men challenged the sincerity of the men who were asking them to enlist. Under similar circumstances any one in Ontario would have done the same thing; I certainly would have; I would not have listened, under like circumstances, to any appeal. Further than that, when this war broke out, the Government of Canada had not a French speaking member in it who cared to go on the platform in Quebec and ask for recruits.

Mr. SEVIGNY: Wrong.

Mr. GRAHAM: Wherein am I wrong? If my hon. friend can show me where French-speaking members of the Government were making speeches when this war broke out, I will tell him whom he sent to make the speeches. He sent the late Mr. Casgrain, who was not then a member of the Government, who had never bowed the knee to Nationalism, but who had been a straight line, loyal Tory all his life. Who else was sent on behalf of the Government of Canada? Mr., now Justice Marechal, of Montreal, who was also a straight line Tory and not a Nationalist. Those two men stood on the same platform with my leader, with the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) and other Liberals, at several meetings, if I remember correctly.

Mr. SEVIGNY: What meetings?

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend should know; he has been keeping pretty close track of the matter.

Mr. SEVIGNY: It was one meeting at Sohmer Park, Montreal.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: One in seven is a pretty good average for you.

Mr. GRAHAM: I did not say "seven." I said "several." My hon. friend should wake up. I am serious in this matter. I am not saying it because of any hard feelings I have for these gentlemen; that is not my object. I am pointing out, as I pointed out months ago in this House, that that has been the great stumbling block from the beginning of the war to securing recruits in the province of Quebec. After that, Mr. Casgrain was brought into the Government and he was the only one brought in. After his death the Prime Minister brought in the very man who I say should have been asked to step out when this war began. I maintain that General Lessard should have been sent to Quebec at the beginning of the war and given charge of recruiting in that province. There is no question but that he would have been welcome and would have achieved results.

Mr. MORPHY: Was any request made by any one in the province of Quebec that General Lessard should be sent there to look after recruiting? If so, what was his name?

Mr. GRAHAM: I am not in the Government, so I cannot tell. But if my hon. friend thinks the fact of the Government's not being asked to send him there excuses them for not sending him, then he cannot vote for a compulsory measure.

Mr. LALOR: What success did he meet with when he did go there?

Mr. GRAHAM: General Lessard was sent to Quebec in March last with Colonel Blondin, or Colonel Blondin was sent with him, I do not know which. And what was the very next thing that this Government or somebody else did? They put Armand Lavergne in uniform—I saw him in uniform myself in the city of Montreal—as part of the recruiting force, going up and down saying: "You must not recruit for overseas, but only for home service," and at the very same time General Lessard and Colonel Blondin were saying: "You must recruit for overseas service." How could you expect success under these circumstances? I am not going to follow this up any further, but I maintain that these are some of the reasons why Quebec did not respond to the call for troops. The call was made in the most irritating way, and by men in whose sincerity the people had no confidence.

I will go further and say that I believe that if General Lessard had been given charge of recruiting in the province of Quebec at the beginning of the war and had been given a free hand to gather around him the men he wanted, we would not now be criticising the province of Quebec, for they would have had their full quota in the ranks to-day.

I come to another class, and the House I hope will bear with me in this. I mean the class composed of those who cannot go. In this class, outside of the nurses, we find the women of the Dominion of Canada, and let me say that the good women of this country have sacrificed more than the men of this country. They have given up many of their amusements, many of the things in which they took pleasure, and have devoted themselves day and night to caring for the boys at the front, sending them comforts, and caring also for those our boys have left behind. It is all very well for us fathers and brothers to think we have made sacrifices; our sacrifices are great indeed, but they are not to be compared with the greatest sacrifice of all which a mother makes when she gives the boy she bore to risk his life for his country. To the women of Canada will be devoted perhaps one of the brightest pages in the history of this great struggle.

Then we have those men who are engaged in business, and at this point I propose to discuss for a few moments the subject of a resolution of which I gave intimation a few evenings ago, but of which I did not give notice on the Order Paper, and which consequently I am not out of order in discussing now. The resolution, though general in its terms, is intended to point in a certain direction, and reads:

> That in the opinion of this House it is desirable that steps should be taken forthwith by the Government to provide that accumulated wealth should contribute immediately and effectively to the cost of the war, and that all agricultural, industrial, transportation and natural resources of Canada should be organized forthwith so as to ensure the greatest possible assistance to the Empire in the war and to reduce the cost of living to the Canadian people.

Having flung a general motion of that kind into the arena I feel that I ought at least to say what I mean by it. I do not pretend to be a financier, and I make no pretensions to be an overly shrewd business man. I am but an ordinary everyday plodder, so that anything I may say can undoubtedly be criticised by the Minister of Finance, and I should not be at all surprised if he brings in the question of exchange before I get through. But I have some general views which I have embodied in this motion.

Some people have spoken of the conscription of wealth, but I have not used that term. It may mean that in the eyes of the public, but I would rather deal with the question from a broader point of view. The first thing I would do would be to call in the heads of labour, and not only the heads of labour but the heads of industries, the men of capital. But I would certainly not omit the representatives of labour, because these are times when our efforts must be co-ordinated, and we cannot hope for success in working out these problems if any large class is objecting to one course. I can see no difficulty at all in having the work thus carried on harmoniously and with creditable results.

The Minister of Finance will ask me right away, what next? He knows what I am going to say about wealth before I say it. I repeat what I said some weeks ago in this House, that I can see no earthly reason why men with large incomes should not be contributing, and contributing generously, to the carrying on of this war. I would not have an income tax for the man with the ordinary income because he has difficulty enough now in living, but there are in Canada a great number of men who receive a great deal more money than they earn, and a portion at least of their excess income ought to go hand in hand with the labour and the soldiery of Canada for the prosecution of this war. Two illustrations occur to me. Here is a young man engaged in business or in the practice of a profession, making perhaps $4,000 or $5,000 a year. He has a small family, and has saved enough to make a start in life. When the call comes he does not wait for conscription, but locks his office door, leaves his wife and children and goes to the front. The wife and children of this man will not accept assistance from the Patriotic Fund. They have no other resource but the pittance the husband can send from the front, and soon the little stock of money they have saved dwindles, and when the husband comes back, if he ever does, minus a leg perhaps or an arm, or maimed in some other way, he finds himself without a business and his little stock of money gone, and he has to start life over again.

This is what he may look for if he does come back. And he may never come back—he takes that great risk. Compare this with any sacrifice you can ask of the man with the large income. If he had to give all his income except just sufficient to live on he would be contributing a bare mite in comparison with the contribution of the young man to whom I have referred.

My hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) will say: Oh, we are taxing many of these men who have their money in business. That is true. But the fact remains that the expenses of managing the business are taken out before the business tax is levied, and among these expenses is the big salary of the man. So, this salary is not subject to taxation at all—it is exempt from the business tax as part of the expenses of the business. Generally speaking, wherever there is a large income this Government ought to step in, and step in now, and tax it more heavily to help in carrying on the affairs of the nation.

In what I am about to say now, perhaps I may cover ground upon which the financial amateur should not venture. Certain things, however, seem quite plain to me. At the present moment the Finance Minister, through legislation, compels certain companies to invest a portion of their money in Government bonds. They have the money to invest, and for that money they might receive seven or eight per cent, but they are compelled to invest in Canadian Government bonds, the rate of interest upon which is what the Government desires to pay. I quite agree with that policy. But why not apply the same principle to the man who has a big investment, but not in one of the companies subject to this law? Would it not be right that every man of capital in the Dominion should be compelled by law to invest a large portion of his capital in Canadian bonds for the carrying on of the war? My hon. friend will say that they are doing it voluntarily? But a great deal is not being done voluntarily that might be done under compulsion. Many of these gentlemen have invested in foreign securities. What, then, can we do? Suppose that these investments are in United States securities, this is the suggestion I make: The Government might well say to the holder of United States bonds, for instance: You give us these bonds and we will give you Canadian war bonds for them. The proceeds of these United States bonds could then be used in trade between the Dominion of Canada and the United States and the Government of Canada would thus be relieved from the necessity of borrowing large sums of money directly. I think that would work out. Perhaps it would not; but I have not been able to find any suggestion in my own mind why it should not. I would go further than all this, if necessary; but I think that would be far enough for a first step—a long way further than the Minister of Finance has gone yet. If it were necessary for the carrying on of this war I would take other steps by which capital should be called upon to contribute more than by the methods I have already suggested.

I am not sure that the Government would not be warranted, also, under present circumstances, in making every acre of vacant land in Canada, which is held for speculation, pay a certain amount of taxation during war time at least. That would have a double result. It would bring revenue, or, if the owner of such vacant land wished to escape taxation, he would have the land cultivated, and this would bring good to the country as a whole and would furnish traffic for our systems of transportation.

These are just a few ideas which, I think, could be amplified, and by the use of which the treasury of this Dominion could be greatly enriched. The Minister of Finance may say: We are getting along nicely, we get enough revenue for the present moment. But we are not getting enough revenue for the present moment, if the hon. gentleman will allow me to differ with him. And why not pay our way, or approximate that condition more than we are doing at present? With all our borrowings, so long as we can borrow freely, our expenditures are not going to be so economical as they would be if we were not trying to borrow but were raising our revenues by taxation. The people today do not feel the burden of our borrowing. But are we not, by declining to use our present resources, helping to create a burden of taxation which the soldier returning from the front will have to help to bear? These men ought not to be called upon to bear a heavy load of taxation; they will have done their share before they return. To-day, Canada, through her industries and her agriculture, is prosperous; and I believe the people will uphold the Government in imposing a greater amount of taxation and thus enable the Dominion to pay its way, or to come nearer paying its way, than it is doing at this time.

The next point to which I wish to refer is agriculture. I do not pretend to be an authority on agriculture, and I think a lot of the lectures given to the farmers about how to conduct their business are so much wasted energy. Most of the farmers I know understand how to carry on their business better than do any of us who might be inclined to give them lectures. We tell them when they are engaged in growing wheat that they ought to go in for mixed farming. Well, if they can make more out of wheat, they are likely to stick to growing wheat; but if there is money in mixed farming, then you may expect to see them go into mixed farming. The farmers at present labour under a lack of assistance; this is true of my own province, and I suppose it is true of other provinces as well. Young men are going from the colleges, from the collegiate institutes and high schools, into the country to spend their vacation. Their midsummer examinations are allowed them if they are able to show that they have spent two months with a farmer. This kind of help is not the strongest help for the farmer, but it is far better for him than being left alone. Any system of re-distribution of labour that does not in a measure provide the farmer with assistance, will not be complete. I am not sure that a man forced to work on a farm would be of much use; there would not be enough people there to keep him at work. But I believe there are thousands of people, men who are not able to go to the front, boys, and others, who would willingly go on the farm if some co-ordinated effort were made to get them there. Some arrangement should be made under this Bill or otherwise, for the distribution of labour on the farm as well as elsewhere. I believe that could be done without any compulsory effort.

But, after all, production on the farm, labour being given, depends on the profits from the farm, and the profits from the farm depend more largely on transportation than on anything else. Let me speak of that. I want to criticise the Government in that they did not co-ordinate the transportation facilities of this country months and months ago. I do not know what the situation is to-day or what the Government propose about railways. I have not time just now to go into this question. Our minds are full of something else, but I do say that, no matter what happens, we must keep the railways of Canada running or else the farmers cannot produce. If they do produce they cannot sell. We have been told time and time again that we have too many railways in Canada. I make the assertion now, and I believe I am justified in doing so, that for the productiveness of Canada we have not yet sufficient railway mileage. The productiveness of Canada is the thing that I am speaking of and not the products of Canada. Months and months ago in this House the Department of Railways and Canals was asked why more business was not done on the Transcontinental railway. No cars; no rolling stock! What an answer for a Government that is managing a railway to give! The business that should have gone to the Transcontinental railway from east to west was brought by the Intercolonial railway to Montreal and handed to another railway. It made a good showing for the Intercolonial, but it starved the Transcontinental railway, and the reason given was—no rolling stock. I am not going to say that there was any motive, but the fact remains that the Transcontinental railway has not been used as it should have been used, while the Intercolonial has been overcrowded, and the reason given is —no rolling stock. This matter was brought to the attention of the Government months and months ago, but because of the lack of such rolling stock it seems that the Government cannot deal with the supplies in the West that should be brought forward quickly, during the winter months, if necessary, and stored at Quebec or shipped from St. John and Halifax. What happens down in Halifax? The Government has no machinery of any consequence to handle the grain that they do deliver there, and when they get it there no ships are available to take it across the ocean. The Government ought to take more power even than it has given to the Board of Railway Commissioners to co-ordinate the efforts of the railways of Canada, and they ought to provide that no railway can hold back traffic when they have another railway near which could carry that traffic. They ought to compel the use of any railway that is not crowded by a railway that is crowded. The Government and the people of Canada criticised the Grand Trunk Railway because it could not move coal owing to lack of rolling stock. Why did the Government allow that condition to exist? It must have known that it would arise. I regret that the Government, through lack of organization, did not many months ago provide rolling stock for all the railways in Canada, in order that goods might be carried from the west to the east and from the east to the west, and in order that the agricultural products of the country might be moved in the quickest possible time. They should not only co-ordinate the railways, but they should take possession of them, if necessary, If they took possession of the railways they would be able to carry the transcontinental traffic this way and that way. What happens at the seaboard? We have no ships. This matter was brought to the attention of Parliament time and time again and the Government were pressed to make some provision for building ships in which our products could be carried across the seas. Nothing was done. Recently the Government, I believe, has been advancing money to the British Government and various shipbuilding industries in Canada are building ships, not for us but for the British Government. That is right so far as it goes, but our shipbuilding industry in Canada, or a portion of it, should have been building ships for Canada months and months ago. Then we would not have been in the position that we are in now. I would go on and build them myself if I were the Government. It may be too late, but better late than never. If the Government desire to help out agriculture, the suggestion I make is that they co-ordinate with transportation. One of the most important things to do in this connection is to relieve the shortage of rolling stock on the Government railways. The hon. gentleman who now leads the House (Sir George Foster) will have it in mind that a few weeks ago the general manager of the Government railways resigned and a very few days afterwards the new manager gave an order for 5,000 cars. He rose to the situation, he knew what was needed, but for some reason his predecessor did not do that. There were some 500 passenger cars ordered by the Government in the United States. I asked the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals some weeks ago how many of these 500 cars which had been ordered in the United States in June, 1916, had been delivered and the answer was: Five or six. As a result of this delinquency, this lack of organization, of co-ordinated effort in our forces of transportation, we find that our railways have no rolling stock, the Government railway is short of rolling stock, we have no ships, and yet we talk about promoting agriculture when we have neglected the prime requisite to bring that about.

Mr. LALOR: Is not the fact that the same condition of shortage of rolling stock prevails in the United States?

Mr. GRAHAM: I am not sure but that such is true, but it would not be an excuse here. They are building their own ships and working away. Although this condition was called to the attention of the Government as likely to arise, we find that the Government railway itself got so far behind with rolling stock that a few days after the new manager was appointed he ordered no less than 5,000 box cars and several engines.

Let me speak of the co-ordination of industry in natural resources. A great many of our industries have been taken charge of by the Imperial Munitions Board, and some of them have been pretty well organized, but there are still in Canada industries that are turning out goods which are not essential to the prosecution of the war. They are turning out goods that are luxuries, not essentials, not necessaries. There ought to be a sizing up of all these industries and every industry that is not producing something that can be used in the war, or which is a necessity, ought to be asked to turn its attention in some other direction in order that the war may be carried on more successfully. The industries of Canada have shown that they can produce anything that can be produced anywhere in the world, as well and as cheaply. An inventory of the various industries of this country should be taken and those that are producing non-essential goods might well have their efforts directed to the production of necessary goods. Co-ordination of that kind would prevent overlapping between industries and we would have turned out in Canada in one steady stream from our own industries the things which are required for the prosecution of the war, and we would not find ourselves short of one commodity at a time when there was a big surplus of some other commodity.

Then, take our natural resources. The first thing this Government should have done was to have taken a firm grip of the nickel supply of the Dominion of Canada.

That is one of the very essentials of modern warfare and modern shipbuilding, and by no circuitous route, but by a direct grip of the hand, this Government should have taken possession of the nickel mines, or taken control, at least, and should have seen that the nickel products of Canada went for the benefit of the Allies, and for nobody else. And also that they went at the cheapest price, and if necessary, this Government should have had a nickel refinery industry in Canada, managed and worked by itself. Thus all the nickel should go straight to the Allies, and not through any other channel. We have our fishing industry, and we have been told, in the recent report, that fish is one of the best foods that could be sent to the Old Land, but, to a large extent, that export has fallen down. Why? Because arrangement has not been made with the railways to carry this freight by refrigerator cars, in which it could have been sent in greater quantities, than by express. The fishing industry has been neglected, and that industry, which should have supplied fish in great quantities, has practically fallen down, or largely so. I understand that a prominent gentleman who was here to propagate the fish industry in Canada for the benefit of our boys at the front, has gone to the Old Land, to endeavour to form a company, and to come back here, and do what the Canadian Government should have done months ago. I will now refer to our other minerals, coal, oil, gas, and I might say shale.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Hear, hear.

Mr. GRAHAM: These are things that enter into the every day consumption of necessities of life, both industrially and domestically. We hear every day of coal mine troubles. A fuel controller has been appointed, but we have heard of trouble in the coal mines every session since the war started. Last year there was a shortage of coal here, and a shortage of coal there, and only a few weeks ago did the Government of the country wake up to appoint a man to take a grip on the situation. Whether that is the right thing to do, I will discuss in a moment, but something should be done. Sir, the coal mines, as well as the other mines of this Dominion, belong primarily to the people of Canada, and the necessities of the day, when our boys are at the front, when everybody is sacrificing something, demand that every coal mine in Canada that can be worked must be worked. Perhaps all the blame is not on one side, but the labour troubles should be dealt with in as fair a way as this Government can deal with them. I do not think the best way to deal with the labour trouble is to send a Conservative member of Parliament to settle it. It looks like some party manoeuvre, to send this member of Parliament, instead of selecting an independent man to take hold of the situation; and when the truth comes to be known, it may be that the people out there acted accordingly. Every coal mine should be operated and dealt with, and if it cannot be operated successfully under the present system, it is the duty of the Government to see that the people of the country get all the coal they need, for we possess the coal, and we ought to get it from the bowels of the earth.

With reference to the question of reducing the cost of living, the Government has appointed a fuel controller and a food controller, both good men, personal friends of mine. But does not the hon. gentleman who is leading the House think that, if he were an elector in the country, a Liberal who had sent two boys to the front, would he not look upon the appointment of a Tory member of the Dominion Parliament, to settle a strike and the appointment of an ex-Tory member of the Government of Ontario, as food controller, one right after the other, as a proof that this Government still maintains that they are the only party interested in the war? I ask you, if you are living in a country that sent two men that were Liberals, would you think that was the way to inspire voluntary enlistment? I am not objecting to these two men, but simply pointing out this fact. I will refer to another matter. Does my hon. friend think that the agent of the Standard Oil Company in Canada is the best man he could select to deal with his fellow trust men throughout the Dominion?

Having said that, I leave that question and go to the active work. I see Mr. Hanna has gone to the United States, which is a very splendid idea. What is being done in the United States? First, the women have been registered in that country as well as the men. Every woman between certain ages in the United States is compelled to register, just as every man is compelled and she carries her registration card, just as her husband does. What does that mean? That she has enlisted, prepared to work in harmony with the food controller, to do her part, so that the waste that takes place, or has hitherto taken place, may be stopped. I saw a statement the other day that if one pound of bread per week per resident of the United States were saved, it would provide the interest on the whole of the Liberty loan. I did not figure out the calculation, but that statement was made. The first thing that ought to be done in the Dominion of Canada so far as home consumption is concerned is to get the co-operation of the women in the households. If I had not been speaking at such length, I would read an appeal made by the President of the United States along that line. The controller of food in the United States has also dilated upon that question. But, Sir, something can be done. We have been years getting around as far as we have gone, and now we have to go to the United States for an example, and that country has only been in the war a few weeks. This matter should have been arranged months and months ago. There is sufficient food wasted in our hotels and restaurants to keep a large portion, if not all, of the poor of the cities in which these hotels are located. These are small things, but they are at the foundation of economy in the food consumption. The Government has appointed a Board in reference to the grain question. My only criticism is that the Board is too unwieldly, and too big, I think, to do any practical work. In that, however, I may be mistaken. In this case, in order to get the best results, you almost require to have a man with autocratic power and democratic ideas.

But, Sir, food control comes about in various ways. I have seen some reports these last few days, in which it is said that everything is all right about the cold storages of Canada. I do not know how that is, but I do know, that in Canada, millions of dozens of eggs are put in cold storage the minute the price dips a little, and the supply is thus stopped, till the price goes up, and the public, which should have had the benefit of the cheap eggs has to pay the big price. A real food controller would stop that, although it would interfere with trade. I have been looking into that question. I had a certain party look after the garbage in a certain city not long ago, to see how many eggs unfit for food were found in the garbage, and, in the collection of one day's garbage, cold storage eggs, that should have gone to the consumer fresh, and at a cheap price, were found in the garbage by the hundreds of dozens, thus proving two things, first, that the consumer did not get what he paid for, and second, that the consumer did not get fresh eggs at a reasonable price, but that he obtained comparatively stale eggs at a high price. I could take my hon. friend to one or two cold storage plants in Canada where a few weeks ago enormous quantities of provisions were piled up and being held until prices should rise. I do not wish to interfere with any business, but this is a time when people must make sacrifices. If Canada is successfully to come through the stress of the shortage of food, as we believe she will, the individual must make sacrifices for the general good of the people.

I now come to the class that ought to go to the front, and this brings me to a consideration of the Bill itself. England started with this slogan: England expects that every man this day will do his duty; but England later took measures to designate the man and to specify his duty. I believe that had proper organization been effected in Canada we should not now be face to face with the conditions that confront us. To my mind the Bill was thrown into the arena of public opinion in a most irritating way. If my memory is correct, after the Prime Minister and his colleagues returned from the old land the Minister of Public Works gave an interview, in which he said that the Government hoped to proceed without the introduction of any compulsory measure. Practically only a few hours after the people had been given to understand that the Government would proceed further with voluntary enlistment notice of the introduction of a compulsory measure was placed on the Order Paper, without previous intimation, without any education of the people in respect of its need, without any suggestion to the people that such a thing was coming. I repeat, Sir, that this Bill was placed before the public in an irritating and an awkward way.

If this Bill should take away all the men required for our farms and industries I would not support it. But I believe that after we have provided for our industries and our farms we shall still find in Canada a large number of young men, who, while consuming, are adding nothing to production. I do not know whether this Bill will take them or not, but these are the first men that ought to go. I am inclined to think, however, that they will go when the time comes. As to the references which have been made to enlistment in Quebec, I may say that I have been in various cities of Canada outside of those in Quebec during the last four or five months, and I find that in all those cities there are young men who can be spared from the life of the country in order that the boys in the trenches may be relieved. I am in favour of conscription, because I believe that it will have some effect in stimulating the filling up of our battalions. I cannot bring myself to vote against any measure that will have the effect, directly or indirectly, of assisting in the prosecution of the great struggle in which we are engaged.

Now I come to a consideration of the proposal for a referendum. I claim to be a democrat; I believe in the people being consulted. But let me say to the House and to the country that the Government are going to consult the people; they are getting ready for an election. Since the day the Minister of Public Works put his foot on the ship to go across the seas to visit the soldiers, the Government have been getting ready for an election. The Prime Minister himself, in a suggestion made some days ago, intimated that the people ought to be consulted before this Bill is put into force. I took that as an indication that there was to be a general election. But we had another indication last night. When an hon. gentleman on this side was speaking about a referendum or an appeal to the people, the member for St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames) asked him if he would be satisfied if the people were appealed to immediately through a general election. The member for St. Antoine is close to the Government; I took it for granted that he had been discussing the matter with the Government and was trying to find out what the members thought about the proposal of a general election. I think, therefore, that there will be a general election, when this question as well as others can be threshed out. Perhaps the best way to clear the atmosphere and to arrive at a solution of the difficulties which present themselves is to go to the people and have them say what we are to do and who are to do it. I take no stock in the objection to a referendum because of its taking time; if anything, a referendum could be had in shorter time than a general election. But I believe that the people of Canada will be asked to divide on this issue among us as individuals—for on this question we are not divided into parties; many gentlemen on the other side of the House accept the view of gentlemen on this side, and some on this side hold the view entertained by gentlemen opposite. We will have to go to our electors upon our personal attitude in this matter; and I am not sure, as I have said, but that an appeal to the people would clear the atmosphere as nothing else would.

For the reasons which I have given at, perhaps, too great length, and for others which I might mention, I am disposed, Sir, to vote against the proposal of a referendum and in favour of the Bill.

Hon. Sir THOMAS WHITE (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I trust that my remarks upon this momentous occasion will be, both in tone and in character, in accord with the moderation which has marked the speeches of most of those who have preceded me, and will be in keeping with the importance of the measure now before the House and with the extreme gravity of the conditions which have brought it forth.

This is one of the greatest debates that have ever taken place in this House. Great issues bring forth great speeches, and great speeches are founded upon conviction. Hon. gentlemen on both sides of this House have during this debate spoken from full hearts the words of sincerity and truth. I think I can understand the wrench that it gives a man to sever the ties of his allegiance to a party with which he has been connected for many years. But we on this side of the House realize that hon. gentlemen opposite, and those on this side who differ from their leaders, are actuated by conviction, and, so far as we are concerned, there is no ignoble satisfaction at seeing hon. gentlemen opposite detach themselves, on an issue such as this, from the ranks of that party to which for so many years they have been connected. While, as I say, I shall emulate the moderation of most of those who have spoken in this debate, I shall not follow the example of my hon. friend (Mr. Graham). He commenced by pointing out the futility of recrimination, and, possibly unconsciously to himself, because he is a politician who has for many years fought the battles of party, he indulged in not a little of that recrimination which he deprecated at the beginning of his remarks. He referred to the contest of 1911, and the action of Nationalist members upon the platform in Quebec. Is argument of that kind likely to advance the issue in this House? Should I add to the information of this House or gain any weight in the persuasiveness of my remarks if I harked back to an earlier date and quoted the leader of the Opposition upon many occasions on which he uttered sentiments to which he subscribed then, but to which he might or might not subscribe now, but which, I submit, would not be relevant to the consideration of this issue?

I purpose, therefore, confining myself to the question, namely, the Military Service Bill, which is now before the House. I shall touch lightly upon some of the matters referred to by my hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) with regard to the organization and mobilization of the resources of this country; but it seems to me that those matters, while I admit they are somewhat, though remotely, relevant to this discussion, might be better dealt with on another and different occasion when some subject other than this Bill, which has evoked so much feeling, which is of so much importance, is before the House for consideration.

We are considering the necessity and the principle of compulsory military service in Canada. Hitherto the effort of Canada has been put forward under the voluntary system of enlistment. The effort which Canada has put forth under that system has been wonderful; it has been such as to command the admiration of the world, and I believe it will for all time stand to the credit, the renown, the honour and the glory of Canada, that by voluntary effort she has been able to do what she has done. I do not regard the effort which Canada has put forth under the voluntary system as having been a failure; I say, on the contrary, that that effort was a magnificent success. Unfair and unjust it was, as enlistment under the voluntary system always is unjust and unfair, because the burden is cast upon the most patriotic in the community; but unsuccessful, it was not; it was a wonderful success. My hon. friend has criticised the Government for not organizing the country better in the carrying out of the voluntary system; he says that recruiting has been carried on principally by civilians. Does that detract in any way from the glory of the achievement? The Government takes the initiative in matters of this kind, and to the extent that it can secure the assistance and sympathy of citizens, to that extent will the effort the more succeed; and I desire to pay this tribute to the ex-Minister of Militia.

The energy which he put forth and the enthusiasm which he displayed at the outset of the war had much to do with the magnificent results accomplished by Canada under the voluntary enlistment system. It has been found in all States, no matter how patriotic they may be, that there comes a time, if they are engaged in a life and death struggle, when the voluntary system fails, and when the State must, by compulsory service, enlist the manhood of the country if the State is to be saved. That happened in England, the Mother Country of individual and constitutional freedom? The voluntary system broke down there, and in order that the nation might be saved, resort was had to the compulsory system. Great-hearted Abraham Lincoln, as my right hon. friend who is a great admirer of his character knows, had to resort to the draft in order that the Union might be saved in the War of Secession, and to-day the United States, the greatest of the republican communities of the world, after having the benefit of the experience of other nations during the past three years, has resorted to the selective draft, and no less than 10,000,000 of her sons have come forward and enrolled. That is the position.

Canada's effort under the voluntary enlistment plan was a wonderful success, but voluntary enlistment has run its course, and we are now considering a system of compulsory military service which will organize and mobilize selectively the manhood of this country in order that we may continue to play our part in the prosecution of this war. The fact is that the world and its civilization cannot be saved, in this great crisis, by the voluntary system as against Germany organized under the Prussian military system. Compulsory military service has been adopted in France, the United States, Great Britain, and New Zealand, and I believe it will in time be adopted in Australia. We have reached the stage in Canada to-day when, if we are to continue to play our part in this war, if we are to continue to take our share in the national defence, and above all, if we are to observe our obligations of honour to the men who have gone and who represent us at the front, we must resort to compulsory military service; we must adopt this Bill.

This war is not like other wars in history. In the vastness of its scale, in its issues the most vital to humanity, in its menace the most dread to civilization, this war is different from all other wars, and so far as we can judge it is not near its conclusion. We have not even reached the crisis of this war. Three years of war behind us! How many years of war before us? The situation is of the gravest kind and the question before us is: Shall Canada's efforts slacken; shall we continue to put forth our utmost strength, or shall we quit? From men of the blood of both races in this House I think there can only be one answer. Canada must continue to put forth the utmost of her effort. And for how long? Until this war is determined in our favour, until the Hohenzollerns are utterly vanquished. It is more than a war of nations, it is a war of conflicting ideals, and it will go on until one set of ideals is firmly established and the other utterly uprooted and overthrown. There can be no truce, there can be no peace, until the issue is victory for the Allies, and for Canada as one of the Allies. The war must go on; I think that is common ground for both sides of the House.

Let us not think this war is nearly won. Opposed to us is the greatest foe that ever confronted humanity, Germany, with her 70,000,000 of people; Austria with 50,000,000, Turkey with 30,000,000, occupying together a compact territory with interior lines of communication. My right hon. friend the Prime Minister said upon his return from Great Britain that the Central Empires had 1,000,000 more men in the field this spring than they had last spring. Their line still extends from the North Sea to the confines of Switzerland; there is still a line of a thousand miles between the Central Empires and Russia. We read of great battles in which tens of thousands or hundreds of thousands of men fall; we gain a mile or two miles or three miles, but the fact remains that the line on the Western front and the line on the Eastern front are substantially where they were a year ago. I say substantially, but I am the first to say that great progress has been made considering the conditions of modern warfare, for modern warfare is a warfare of attrition. It is a wearing-down process; the killing of more men on one side than on the other; the breaking down of morale and the exhausting of resources; that is modern warfare. But we have still before us the greatest enemy that ever confronted mankind, organized in every department of its national life, grim, determined that no effort shall be spared, that all power shall be put forth in order that they may impose their will upon humanity, that they may Germanize the world. There is as much need, nay, there is more need for great effort to-day than there was at the outset, or at any time since the war began. From that German menace no nation, I care not how remote it may be, is free. The smallest nation or colony separated from Europe by thousands of leagues of sea is subject to the menace of German agression.

[Sir Thomas White.]

It has been put forward in this House that Canada is in no danger of an invasion. If that is so, to what is it due? Is it not due to the British fleet and to those men of French and British blood, who, month in and month out, have withstood the hosts of Germany in France and Flanders? Is it not due to the Canadians and New Zealanders and the others of our Allies who have met the enemy in the gates? If there is no danger of invasion, if there has been no such danger to Canada, it is only because we have been protected by the British fleet and by our Allies and our own heroes who have withstood the Hun on the battlefields of Europe.

Let me ask another question, and I am discussing this phase of the matter because it has been put forward that Canada should not send her forces outside this country unless to repel apprehended invasion. Supposing the Germans had taken Paris in their first rush, as they intended; supposing the British fleet had been defeated—if one can imagine such a thing—and that the Germans had reached London. Supposing they had been in a position to compel capitulation on the part of France and Great Britain. What would have happened to this country? Without landing a man upon these shores, the enemy could have compelled the cession of Canada. I say that it is within the plans of the German autocracy, within the world plans of German militarism, if not now, at a later date, to break up the British Empire and enter into and possess it. All their actions for years past have been in accordance with that view. If, as they hoped, they had struck down Great Britain, taken London, and compelled the payment of an enormous indemnity, why should they not seek to compel the cession of the different parts of the British Empire? It is the plainest and most obvious fact that Canada, fighting in France and Flanders, is fighting absolutely for the safety of Canada herself. No danger of invasion to Canada in a world war cataclysm such as this? Shall we take the position that we should not send our troops out of Canada, but allow the British fleet and our Allies to save us? Shall we take the position that we should not send our forces to help them, because constitutionally our forces should not be sent outside the Dominion unless to repel threatened invasion?

Could this country take that position? The defence of Canada! Where should that defence be conducted? That depends upon circumstances; it might in some wars be strategically advantageous to defend Canada at the border, it might in others be strategically advantageous to defend Canada thousands of miles away, as we are doing it to-day. That is so plain, so obvious, to me that I marvel that any one should suggest that Canada's forces while fighting abroad are not fighting against the invasion of the sovereignty and autonomy of Canada.

The question has been raised whether it is constitutional for Canada to send forth her forces to defend herself in a place where she can best be defended—which, I say, is in France and Flanders. Well, Mr. Speaker, it is the first law of nations that they should protect themselves; it is the first duty of a government to its people to take any steps that may be necessary in defence of that people. But, it is said, we are widening the compulsion of the Militia Act. I agree entirely with those who have argued that we are not adopting any degree of compulsion that is not provided for in the legislation now on the statute-book. But it would not trouble me in the least degree if we were widening that compulsion. The first duty of this Government is to save the nation, to take such military steps as may be necessary to put the nation beyond danger from invasion in the war which threatens Canada and threatens the Empire. And I am confident that I speak for most of the members of this House when I say that the people of this country attach some importance to the British Empire and their connection with it—we are not only fighting for Canada, but fighting to maintain the integrity of the Empire which is threatened by German aggression. So that so far as the Militia Act is concerned, it does not concern me, and I believe it should not concern this House, whether it is narrower in its provisions than this Bill or not; the question before us is, from the standpoint of national safety, are we going to continue the war? I believe that the people of this country are determined to continue this war. For how long? Until, as I have said, it is won, and the Hohenzollern is overthrown.

It is said, or at least implied, that enough has been done, that the situation is such that further help on the part of Canada is not necessary. I wish I could say that that is true. I have pointed out that but little progress has been made upon that Western front, notwithstanding the outpouring of blood and of munitions. To-day, we are confronted with as serious a situation as at any time since the outbreak of the war, except that, I believe, the Allies have now the offensive in the sense which we have not had it before. But we must remember, as pointed out by the right hon. Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) that the effort of Russia has slackened. I hope that this condition will not continue. I believe that the welfare of Russia lies with the Allies, and that the people of Russia, if properly led, will continue the great effort which they made from the outbreak of the war. I hope and pray that that may be so. But the fact is that the Russian offensive has slackened and that the German troops which are engaged upon that Eastern front are to-day in action on the Western front. And so the cry goes up for men, and more men.

That brings me to another point which has been dwelt upon in this House and which cannot be dwelt upon too much—the duty that we owe to those noble sons of Canada who have gone forward and are at the front to-day. Mr. Speaker, could Canada, or could any of Canada's citizens, consider seriously for a moment the desertion or abandonment of those men at the front? We have four divisions there; I visited them last November. I talked with officers going into their dugouts for the night. It was at a time when there had been great wastage in the ranks. There were men of ours in England whose training was not complete, and every effort was being made to hurry them forward to repair the casualties at the front. Officer after officer said to me: I am going into the trenches to-night with seven hundred men where I ought to have a thousand men. I talked to both officers and men, and let me tell this House that if there is one thing which more than any other annoys the men at the front it is to read the headings in Canadian newspapers that are sent them that the war is going so well that it may soon be over. I tell this House that these men look back earnestly to this country for more and more reinforcements of their ranks. These men are daily walking hand in hand with death; the most earnest, the most noble band of men I have ever seen. I came away with a lump in my throat and with a great sense of my own unworthiness. I wish that every man in this House, French or English, could go to that front and see what these men are doing there. If that could be, I believe there would be no doubt as to how every man would vote upon this Bill. Canada, for her own honour and apart from the question of her own safety and the safety of the British Empire, must not desert these men at the front. We are on the eve of the greatest battles in the history of the world. Every effort will be put forth by the great nations engaged in this war to bring about a decision. Why? Because the wastage is so great. It will be the strategy of commanders to press the war. This is why I say that we are on the eve of the greatest battles in the history of the world. There will be casualties, unfortunately, among the Canadians. How are we going to fill the gaps; how are we going to reinforce the ranks? The voluntary system has broken down; we must do what other nations have done, we must resort to compulsory military service. I believe that the people of Canada will say that if we desert these men at the front, God will desert this country. What do I mean by that? I mean that our moral fibre would deteriorate, that our national character would be broken, that in the eyes of the world and in the eyes of ourselves, we should appear as not having the manhood essential to a great nation.

Mr. Speaker, in what I have to say I would not wound the feelings of any man or woman in this country. I had hoped that there might be unity respecting this Bill and I still hope that when this Bill is passed and becomes law, there will be unity on both sides of this House in urging this country and all parts of it to respect that law. We talk about the necessity for food, for munitions, for supplies, and all these things are necessary; but if the people of Great Britain, of the United States and Canada devoted themselves to the production of food, munitions and supplies, who would hold the battle line at the front? The German is there, the German infantry, the German artillery and they can only be defeated by human valour, by the men behind the lines who launch the fire of the artillery and the men in the trenches who scale the parapet, charge with bayonet and hand grenade and take the trenches of the Hun. You cannot win this war by encouraging agriculture, although that is necessary; you cannot win this war by mobilizing your railways, although that is necessary; the decision is to be got by human valour at the front and in no other way, although these other things are ancillary.

I will say just one more word about the volunteer system because the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) passed some strictures upon the Government in connection with its organization. The volunteer system was not only unjust but it was illogical and in many ways it impeded the nation in putting forth its best effort in carrying on the war. Reference was made to myself and to my right hon. friend the Prime Minister as retarding recruiting. I do not believe that the members of this House; I do not believe that the people of this country, realize the burdens which devolve upon the ministers of the Government in time of war. Day and night, Sunday and Saturday, practically every week, there is the burden and the responsibility of the war. I mention that, not because we deserve any sympathy because our sacrifices and toil are as nothing compared with the sacrifices by the men who have gone to the front, and by the fathers, mothers and wives who have sent them forth. But notwithstanding the duties which have devolved upon us, notwithstanding the responsibilities with which we have been burdened, the members of this Government have done what they could within the limits of their physical powers to promote recruiting. The Prime Minister went from the Atlantic to the Pacific upon his return last fall appealing to large audiences throughout this country in a last effort to stimulate recruiting. For myself, I have spoken upon scores of platforms in Ontario, at Montreal, and at Halifax, in the interests of recruiting. Everything was done that could have been by the Government. All aid was afforded that was asked for by the Government and no nobler work was ever done by the devoted band of men and women who gave their time, thought and energy to the promotion of recruiting. I had hoped for the sake of unity, because I knew that this question would create division, that Canada, by the voluntary system, would have been able to carry on the war to the end which we all desire—victory. But it became apparent that the voluntary system was no longer effective. That was admitted by those men and women in this country who had devoted themselves to the work. It has been referred to by hon. members on both sides of this House who have given themselves day and night in aiding recruiting in their constituencies and elsewhere. The recruiting system broke down. The Government, for the safety of Canada and the Empire, and also for the honour of Canada, and in recognition of its obligation towards those men who have gone forward, brought down this Bill providing for compulsory military service. We all learn as this war progresses. War is a terrible realist; it brings you face to face with reality. It is a great discloser, a great revealer; it reveals much even to men who have been closest to the prosecution of this war. I believe that the bringing down of this compulsory military service Bill will do more to stimulate the national activities of Canada in all departments of life towards the prosecution of the war than anything that has happened before in the history of the war. Take the debates in this House; I have never heard such debates. I do not think that any man in this House has ever heard such speeches —speeches from the heart, sincere, a debate in which every man stands up and expresses his conviction to his fellow members in the desire to reach a right solution of this question and to determine what is the duty of Canada at this great crisis in our affairs. I respect the views that any of my fellow members put forward in this House. This is no time for partisanship; it is no time for antagonism. Sincerely and seriously we must consider the most important measure that, I think, was ever laid before this House and the effort on the part of the Government to meet a great national crisis. I have no fault to find with those who differ from me

But I have spoken because I desire, as others have done, to express my thoughts and convictions upon this question. I say that this country is in honour bound—no other course is open to us—to take such measures as will insure the continued and necessary reinforcement of our men at the front, and I believe that this debate will have great weight, in all parts of this community, in persuading people to that view. This is one of the great functions of Parliament. A debate of a week on a subject of this kind will do more to educate, enlighten and clarify public opinion than all the action that could be taken by individual members of the Government for a year.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Perhaps my hon. friend's object will be obtained in that way, and he may not want to pass a Bill.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I desire to say that this Bill must be passed by this Parliament. I believe that that is the will of the people of Canada. I believe that this Government can take no other course than that which we are now taking, if, in the words of one of the greatest orators of the world, we are to have any regard for our past, or for our glory, or for the days that are to come.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Why not leave it as it is?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I will come to that in a moment. This Bill will do more, not only to give us reinforcements for the men at the front, which is its immediate object, but to stir the moral enthusiasm of this people, to mobilize, and to organize the people of this country for war, than anything that has yet happened. I say the speeches in this House are not like the speeches delivered when we were discussing worn-out political formulas a little time ago. Men are speaking words of sincerity and truth from their hearts. That is one good result this debate has had. Let us rid this discussion of old worn-out issues, which are dead and gone. The thought of this world will never be the same,—the structure of society will never be the same again. This measure will not only give needed reinforcements, it will stimulate the people of this country, it will educate them on the great issues of the war, in a way they have never been educated before. No democracy, Mr. Speaker, ever puts forth its greatest effort until the religious sentiment of democracy is enlisted. My hon. friend smiles. Take the war of the Secession in the United States. Let my hon. friend read the second inaugural of Abraham Lincoln. Let him read Julia Ward Howe's "Battle Hymn of the Republic"—

> Mine eyes have seen the glory of the coming of the Lord. He is trampling out the vintage where the grapes of wrath are stored.

The literature and poetry of that period breathes with religious fervour. You never get the strength of a democracy until, in addition to its material effort, there is put forth its spiritual effort. There must be self-sacrifice. There must be self-denial. There must be the mobilization of the spiritual energies of the nation. This Bill will do much to bring that about, because, if you are going to say to one man: You must offer up your life, men will realize, as never before, what sacrifice means, and will be prepared to support the Government in such action as may be necessary to bring the whole power of the nation to bear upon the problem of the prosecution of the war. This Bill will accomplish all these things.

Referring to the remarks of the hon. gentleman from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham), I am sorry I have to deal with matters which are only remotely relevant to the Bill, but which were put forward by him and seem to require some answer on my part. But my answer will be brief. I am glad the hon. gentleman from South Renfrew made it clear this afternoon, with regard to the expression "conscription of wealth," which has been used a good deal by the newspapers of this country, since his bringing forward of the resolution which he read that he had not in mind conscription of capital. I may say to the House, and I would like to say to the press, but not for publication, that the use of the phrase "conscription of wealth" is leading to certain disturbing conditions in some parts of the community. I think it would be well, not to make use of a phrase which is not understood in its literal sense in this House, but to which some people outside may attach a meaning it is not intended to bear.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Make it "contribution by wealth."

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) talked about equality of sacrifice, and I am glad he made it clear that there is no equality of sacrifice, and there can be no equality of sacrifice between the case of a man who gives his son and a man who writes a cheque for taxes. The two subjects should not be dealt with at the same time. They are separate and distinct. Mobilization of man-power, in order to reinforce our troops at the front, is one thing. Taxation for the purpose of finding funds for the prosecution of the war is another, and very different matter. It is perfectly proper for any member of this House to say to me on a proper occasion, say on the Budget debate, or in Supply, "you are not raising sufficient money by taxation; you are raising too much by loan." That is a fair argument, when we are dealing with the subject of finance, but it is not a pertinent argument, I submit, in this debate. It is not relevant, because you are comparing things which are essentially different, when you say that, if there is conscription of man-power, there must be also conscription of wealth. I think, however, that, when the people of the community are in the condition that they are in to-day, under strain, stress and affliction, a good effect is produced if they realize that others, who may not be sending sons or husbands to the front, at all events are contributing, or are made to contribute, of their substance to the prosecution of the war. I ask this House to bear this also in mind: besides giving due attention to the providing of money by loans and by taxation for the prosecution of the war, the Minister of Finance must not lose sight of the fact that if he attempts too much, he will defeat his own purpose. In other words, taxation must be wisely imposed. Men who are reputed to be wealthy may have no ready cash. Let us say that they are engaged in a great industry which employs thousands of men; shall the state seize any portion of the capital invested in that industry? The state cannot pay its debts in kind; it must pay in cash. The financing of a war must be carried on by drawing from the liquid funds of the nation—from that and the new wealth, so to speak, created during the war; otherwise essential industry is likely to suffer. The Minister of Finance, therefore must be sagacious in his imposition of taxation, or he may defeat the very purpose, laudable though it may be, that he has in view.

The member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) said that what he really had in mind was an income tax. There is a good deal to be said for an income tax. It is a fair form of taxation, because it does not take away from a man what he really needs. But it must be borne in mind that if you have too severe an income tax, you do impair the liquid capital of the community which is available for loans and for the purposes of banking and commerce. Canada has never lacked money since this war began. We speak of the man behind the gun, but, so far as Canada is concerned, the dollar has always been behind the man—and that is the position to-day. There has been abundance of money to send our men forward and to maintain them at the front, and to finance Great Britain in her purchase of needed munitions and supplies in Canada. All those moneys have been found by the Government. It is open to hon. gentlemen opposite to say to me: you have not raised as much as you should by taxation; you should have raised more by taxation and less by loans. That would be a fair and pertinent argument to put forward—though I would controvert it—but not in connection with this Bill. Can you weigh the imponderable? Can you put a human life on one scale and a million dollars on the other? The measure of taxation which I brought down to this House, and which was objected to by the member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) as being too severe, was one of the stiffest measures of taxation ever brought down in any country. The member for North Grey (Mr. Middlebro) the other night put on Hansard some figures as to the amount contributed by the largest taxpayers. I stated that if the war went on we should prob-bably have an income tax. I will not spare the people from taxation, if taxation is necessary in order to win the war. At the outset I taxed the financial institutions; I imposed special war taxation. By the end of this fiscal year we shall have raised nearly $200,000,000 by special war taxation. But in our direct taxation I have resorted chiefly to those who have derived advantage from the war. We said to them: if you have made abnormal profits through war conditions, you must give a large proportion of them to the State. I submit that that was an absolutely sound course. Such taxation is much fairer than an income tax, especially in Canada, for this reason: in Ontario, let us say, you may have a tax upon incomes by the municipality, a tax upon incomes by the province and a similar tax imposed by the Federal authorities. Another thing that I have always tried to keep in mind is this: the war will be over some day. This country has been inviting people to come into it from all parts of the world—from the United States and from Europe. When men are invited to come into a country they naturally ask, what are the conditions in that country? Any Minister of Finance who is considering a taxation scheme in Canada must have regard also to taxation in the United States. If your taxation is too severe, it will have the effect of driving some men out of the country and preventing others from coming in. That argument was submitted to me in connection with the excess business profits tax and there is something to be said for it. It is true that in war time it may be necessary to raise money to meet the needs of the war, even though immigration or capital may temporarily cease to flow into the country. I am not rejecting an income tax. This war has gone on much longer than any of us ever thought. We have taken, step by step, measures necessary to find money with which to back the men at the front. We will continue to take those steps, to issue loans, to impose taxation, as severe as may be necessary in order that our troops may have financial backing and support. This Government may be depended upon to bring in such measures of taxation as may be necessary to accomplish that end. An hon. gentleman suggested the other day that I was not taxing wealth sufficiently, and that there was a motive behind my action in that regard. I can tell that hon. gentleman that I have made many enemies, through no fault of my own, on account of the severe taxation which has been imposed. But that is absolutely of no consequence. We will take whatever measures are necessary, whether by income tax, succession duty tax, a tax upon real estate, or otherwise, in order that we may win this war. But I qualify that to this extent: taxation should not be imposed for the purpose of punishing anybody. Taxation should be wisely imposed, and only to the extent necessary. Good judgment is required as to the taxation which a nation should be asked to stand during war time. Having regard to the high cost of living in Canada and other places, you must be very careful in coming to a decision concerning the imposition of an income tax upon people of moderate incomes.

Let me tell the House what has brought about the agitation with regard to the so-called conscription of wealth. The record of this country since the beginning of the war has been wonderful, not only in respect of the number of men who have gone forward, offering their lives, if necessary, for their country; but in respect also of the amounts of money liberally subscribed to the Patriotic Fund, the Red Cross and other funds. One of the glories of this country will be its voluntary effort in support of those funds. The hon. member for St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames) said the other day that $40,000,000 had been raised or pledged in connection with those funds. Let us not overlook that; but unfortunately, in every community, there are one or two or three or more men who are rich and who are close and who have not contributed to those funds, and the people of this country feel that they should be made to contribute. If I can make them contribute, I will do so. I am not sure that it would not be well, in connection with an income tax, if we bring one down, to provide that a man should be exempted to the extent that he has contributed to the Patriotic and the Red Cross Funds, because, if you impose too severe taxation, you will tend to stop—I do not say you will stop—the voluntary flow of funds for those great purposes, and it is not only the money that is valuable, but the good will. The heart that is behind the offering to those funds is of priceless advantage to the people of Canada in the prosecution of this war.

I shall not speak upon the referendum —the expedient put forward by the leader of the Opposition, except to say that I agree with the arguments which have been put forth by those on his own side against the course which he has suggested. I will not say a referendum is unconstitutional, but I do not believe that the abstract question—are you or are you not in favour of conscription?—will get a fair decision on the part of the people of this country on this most momentous question. The public, as has been said by the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Pardee) requires leadership. You could not get the people of this country properly to pronounce upon that question if submitted by referendum unless you have practically the equivalent of a general election in which men would discuss the issue and speak out of their hearts to the hearts of the people. There would have to be the tumult and excitement of a general election which is greatly to be deprecated at this time. There is one rule for individuals, one rule for Governments, and the Government that adopts that rule, like the individual that adopts that rule, will always be on safe ground. What is the rule? To do the right thing, the noble thing, the patriotic thing. What is the right thing, and the noble thing and the patriotic thing at this time? To take such measures as may be necessary to prosecute this war to a victorious conclusion, and to support those gallant men of ours, our noblest and our best, who to-day are fighting for you and for me on the battlefields of Europe. They are fighting just as much in the defence of Canada as if they were fighting on the shores of Nova Scotia or along the banks of the St. Lawrence.

I realize that there is a sharp cleavage of opinion upon this question, and I have endeavoured to discuss it in such a fashion as to wound no man's feelings. I am sure the House will give me credit when I say that we members respect each other's convictions. While we differ sharply upon questions of national importance, we yet respect each other and we speak what we have to say without heat, without hostility, without enmity. Looking at this matter from the standpoint of the statesman, I ask: What of the future? It has been pointed out and emphasized here that there is a cleavage of opinion in this country. My opinion is that this debate in this House may go a long way towards assisting the carrying out of this measure, because I believe one of the functions of Parliament, in debating great questions like this, is to inform the public, to persuade them of the expediency of a certain course. This Bill will pass into law. In my administrative position, and in any debates in which I have taken part in this House, I have treated all members on both sides of the House, no matter of what nationality, only as Canadians; I do not know them as French or English; they are my fellow-Canadians. For 200 years or more ourselves and our fathers and our forefathers have lived together in this country. There have been differences of opinion; sometimes there has been discord; once there was civil war, rebellion; but on the whole we have got on fairly well together. We have been engaged in the great work of reducing half a continent to the use of civilization. We respect each other in this House, and I believe the different sections of this country respect each other, although they have their differences. I believe the right thing to do is to pass this Bill. I believe compulsory military service is necessary in this country. How can we secure practical union in support of this measure? We shall not get it by taunting each other, by political recrimination, by reviving old differences of opinion; but if hon. members on both sides of the House, the leaders, the front-benchers and all other members, after the debate is over, would join in asking the people of this country to respect the obligation of this measure and to assist the Government in putting it into effect and carrying it out, that would make for unity in this country, and I believe that could be done. This Bill must be enacted into law because it is necessary for the national safety and honour that it should be enacted into law. Let us all, French and English, in this House and in this country, accept this Bill as being a necessary measure, having regard to the grave national conditions which beset us, and in that way let us have unity; let us present the appearance of unity to the world. I do not believe insuperable difficulties would present themselves if we all address ourselves to the matter, and I leave that thought for the consideration of this House.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS.

THE TORONTO, HAMILTON & BUFFALO RAILWAY.

House in Committee—Mr. Blain in the Chair—on Bill No. 39, respecting the Toronto, Hamilton and Buffalo Railway.—Mr. T. J. Stewart.

Mr. T. J. STEWART: I beg to move that clauses 1 and 2 be struck out of the Bill, and that the Bill be then reported and given its third reading.

Mr. MURPHY: Explain.

Mr. T. J. STEWART: This Bill has reference to an agreement made between the town of Dundas and the Hamilton and Dundas Street Railway Company in regard to the handling of freight by the electric road. Dundas is situated in a valley and as the steam roads do not go in there, the Hamilton & Dundas Street Railway Company entered into an agreement with the Toronto, Hamilton and Buffalo Railway Company to handle the freight over the electric road. There was a clause in the agreement that if the town of Dundas saw fit to pass a bylaw extending the charter for 29 years, making a total of 50 years, and ratification sought from the Ontario Legislature. The town of Dundas passed the bylaw and got special legislation by the Ontario Legislature ratifying the agreement. The ratification could not apply to the Toronto, Hamilton and Buffalo Railway Company as they were under Dominion charter. The Toronto, Hamilton and Buffalo Company are now asking the Dominion Government to place them in the same position as the town of Dundas. The town of Dundas say "No, we are not going to allow that." They take the ground that the freight cars were allowed to remain in front of the people's doors on the streets of Dundas, which is most unfair; but the Toronto, Hamilton and Buffalo Company has no control whatever over the streets. Wishing to be fair, however, we agreed to spend $15,000 on a new switching, ground and freight lines. Then they took the objection that the smoke was a nuisance, and that we would have to handle the freight by electric power. That meant buying two motors at a cost of $80,000. The interest on that would be $4,800 and the total earnings of the road are only $5,400 a year. The Toronto, Hamilton and Buffalo Company therefore could not see their way to handling the freight by electric power at that enormous cost. We do not think a little town like Dundas with only 5,000 people had any right to ask for something no other place in the Dominion had got. We agreed, however, to having legislation put through placing us under the Dominion Railway Board. That apparently did not satisfy them. The Railway Committee amended the Bill to read 5 years instead of 29. To my mind the committee could do only one of two things: either grant the 29 years, or say: No, they had no right whatever to make the agreement without all parties being represented at the meeting. We have made up our minds that if the town of Dundas will not grant us what we think we are entitled to, we will withdraw these two clauses and let the town handle the freight as it sees fit.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: This Bill was thoroughly discussed before the Railway Committee, representatives being present from the town of Dundas and the surrounding district. I am sorry the hon. member for Wentworth, who is particularly interested in this Bill, is not present. I am sure he would take serious objection to the Bill being amended in this way. Many of us who were present at the meetings of the Railway Committee are strongly opposed to the wishes of the railway representatives, who are simply trying to get their charter, which has now only one year to run, extended for 29 years. Has the hon. member for Hamilton given notice of this amendment?

Mr. T. J. STEWART: I am acting on the advice of the Law Clerk of the House. I am given to understand that the committee had no right to amend the Bill for five years; they should either have made it 29 years or refused. We certainly do not intend to accept the Bill as amended. Therefore, why should there be any objection to allowing us to withdraw these two clauses? We have some rights in the matter. I think we have been treated most unfairly. We are simply asking for what the town of Dundas took for themselves, and I think we should get it. I have stated the facts exactly as they are, and I now ask the committee to allow me to withdraw clauses 1 and 2 of the Bill. That will only leave in the Bill clauses 5 and 6. Clause 5 refers to freight arrangements with the Michigan Central Railroad Company, the Canada Southern Railway Company, and the Grand Trunk Railway Company. Clause 6 empowers the company to hold stock in a steamboat company. These two clauses have already been passed by the committee.

Mr. GRAHAM: Probably we should make better progress if we allowed the Bill to stand until the hon. member for Wentworth was present.

Mr. T. J. STEWART: He knows I am proposing to withdraw these two clauses; we have talked it over.

Mr. GRAHAM: But he is not here.

Mr. T. J. STEWART: Is it not customary, Mr. Chairman, that notice be given of an amendment of this kind?

The CHAIRMAN: As the hon. member has appealed to me, notice will have to be given, as this amendment is a very important one.

Progress reported.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

Bill No. 86, respecting the Western Life Assurance Company.—Mr. Schaffner.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill No. 85, to incorporate the Canadian Council of the Girl Guides Association.—Mr. Northrup.

Bill No. 87, respecting the Empire Life Insurance Company of Canada.—Mr. Macdonell.

Bill No. 90, respecting the Security Life Insurance Company of Canada.—Mr. Macdonell.

MILITARY SERVICE ACT, 1917.

Consideration of the proposed motion of Sir Robert Borden for the second reading of Bill No. 75, Military Service Act, 1917, and of the amendments thereto, resumed.

Mr. E. W. NESBITT (North Oxford): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on the Bill before the House, I think I fully appreciate the importance of the departure we are proposing to take in reference to the enlistment of soldiers. My hon. friend (Mr. Graham), who preceded me, declared that he was not going to recriminate or criticise. For my part, I am going to take the liberty of offering some criticism, and if that is called recrimination, then I am going to recriminate.

In the first place, I do not think that the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden), in introducing this Bill gave us as ample information as he might have given. For instance, he might have told us whether Great Britain had required of this country men rather than more production. We have seen a great deal in the newspapers on the subject of production, and the other day we had the report from the recently-appointed food controller of England that it was absolutely necessary to have production from this country and from the United States to supply Great Britain. Had the Prime Minister told us how much production on our part Great Britain needed, we should have had a better idea of how many men could be spared from this country. I quite understand that it would not have been possible for Great Britain to tell us how many men they would like us to send, for the reason that, I suppose, this will depend entirely upon the progress of the war. On that point I doubt that the Prime Minister could have given us much more information than he did. But the right hon. gentleman can easily see that the quantity of food that can be produced in this country for use in Great Britain will depend very largely on how many men we send to the front. It must be borne in mind that we are a very sparse population. I do not agree with those who say that voluntary enlistment has failed. It may have fallen short of the number of men required, but in my judgment it has certainly not failed. According to the last return there have been 421,767 enlistments in this country. To enlist this number in a country with a population of about 7,500,000, spread over an area about 3,000 miles long and perhaps 1,000 miles broad, besides keeping up agriculture and other industries, as well as the professions of the country, I think is doing wonderfully well; it says a great deal for the patriotism of the people of Canada.

Now, so far as the voluntary enlistment can be said to have failed, I cannot but blame the Government very greatly for that state of affairs. My hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) pointed out some of the mistakes that had been made by the Government. He referred to the discussion reported in the press as having taken place between the ex-Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes) and the other members of the Government on the necessity or otherwise of continuing enlistment, and pointed out that this had had a bad effect. But that which had the worst effect in Ontario, at any rate in my judgment, was that the press was full of rumours of over expenditure, graft and corruption. There were the charges made here in the House and the investigations that followed. There was a feeling abroad, which was reflected in the newspapers, that the Government was spending quite unnecessarily enormous sums of money.

In some sections of the country the Government enlisted men and kept them for months in this country after which they were discharged as medically unfit. A great many others were taken over to England and there discharged as medically unfit. The ordinary man, the farmer and the working man, understands the expense that is incurred in a proceeding of that kind. The people got discouraged with the general condition of the country resulting largely from the fact that the Government was practically doing nothing. There is no doubt that my hon. friend from South Renfrew was correct when he said that the Government did not take an active part in the enlistment campaign that was going on throughout the country. In a great many instances they sent big, husky fellows, captains, majors or something of that kind, drawing anywhere from $6 to $10 a day, around telling the boys in the towns and the country that they should enlist and go to the front.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: Were not these men who were taking part in recruiting, men who had returned wounded from the front? I could give the hon. gentleman several names of recruiting officers who had been wounded at the front.

Mr. NESBITT: I was just coming to that if my hon. friend had not got impatient. There were many men who never went to the front, who never saw the front and who never intended going to the front, big, husky fellows drawing large salaries, and these very officers are trying to enlist men at the present time. Would not a wounded returned soldier be the right man to go around and address recruiting meetings? A man standing on the platform who had been at the front and had been wounded could say: Go and do as I have done. I am sure he would have a great deal more influence on the audience than the fellow who has never been at the front, who is within the age, who is perfectly capable of going to the front, who is drawing a salary as captain or major, dictating to the men down below him in the audience and telling them that they should go to the front? Naturally, they say: "Why does he not go instead of telling us to go?" In many other ways this Government discouraged voluntary enlistment. But the main discouragement was the appearance in the press of reports of the enormous and unnecessary expenditures which have been carried on in connection with the war and enlistment. The people, I confess, thoughout Ontario at any rate, were very patriotic and loyal; they subscribed an enormous amount of money for carrying on the war. Another thing that, in my judgment, influenced voluntary enlistment was that there was a campaign carried on for munition workers. A great many men said that it was just as necessary to have munition workers as it was to have men at the front. I know that the papers were filled with that sort of talk. Was there ever anything more preposterous, more absolutely absurd, than to put it abroad that it was just as necessary to have men making munitions in this country as it was to have men going to the front to fight our battles? Munition workers got from $2.50 to $8 a day, while a man for going to the front was paid $1.10, with a certain amount for field allowances, clothes and his separation allowance. You cannot possibly figure that up to be more than $2.25 a day, and he was expected to risk his life. Yet the munition worker was getting anywhere from $2.50 to $8 a day, and a great many people said that it was just as patriotic to make munitions as it was to go to the front. I leave it to any man here to say if that was not an absurd statement to be put through the length and breadth of this country and to be uttered from public platforms. There was an advertising campaign carried on in the principal newspapers in Toronto for munition workers as if the men making munitions could not advertise for their men and could not get men just as well as any Government official that the Lord ever produced.

Mr. GRAHAM: Does he produce them?

Mr. NESBITT: Were they not just as capable of getting their own men as were the Government? I understand that $60,000 was paid in connection with this munition workers' campaign. I know that in making that statement I am speaking within the mark, because I know something about it. That also hurt voluntary enlistment, because people became disgusted with the way in which the money of this country was being spent for so-called assistance in the war when it was not for assistance in the war.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: Has the hon. gentleman ever asked a question in this House, or has a minister ever made the statement that the hon. gentleman has just made, that $60,000 of the Dominion's money had been spent in advertising for workers for munition factories? That is the statement that the hon. gentleman made, and I challenge the truth or correctness of it.

Mr. NESBITT: I do not care what my hon. friend challenges. I am telling him the truth. I imagine I can get as many people to believe me as the hon. gentleman can get to believe him.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: I asked the hon. gentleman if he had ever asked the question in this House, or has it ever been asked? As a test of the bona fides and good faith of the hon. gentleman, let him ask the question now and see what truth there is in the statement.

Mr. NESBITT: My hon. friend beside me says there is a return to that effect, but I do not care a cent whether there is or not; I know. I do not care whether they bring down a return or not, and it is not necessary to ask the question in the House, because I know it myself.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: That was for your own friend, the Ross rifle.

Mr. NESBITT: I have nothing to do with the Ross rifle. My hon. friend cannot chuck the Ross rifle at me, because I had nothing to do with it. I have given some of the reasons why voluntary enlistment has stopped to a certain extent. But, last month there were over 7,200 men enlisted, and if you will take the return which was brought down in this House very recently you will notice that for the last three months more men enlisted than there was wastage at the front.

Mr. ARTHURS: Has the hon. gentleman any information as to how many of those men who enlisted last month were for the infantry, or the fighting line?

Mr. NESBITT: No, but I might tell my hon. friend that when they do enlist for one branch they are sometimes sent to another branch when they get to England, so that it will be pretty hard to tell what they are in now. I know men who enlisted in the artillery, and who, when they got to England, were put into the infantry, in spite of a very strong protest from their families at home. That brings me to the question of enlistment from Quebec. My hon. friend finds fault with that enlistment. I am sorry to say that it is a case, to a large extent, of chickens coming home to roost. It is said that if you sow with the wind, you will reap with the whirlwind. My earnest hope is that my hon. friends will not do the reaping according to that adage. The first time the so-called Nationalist movement in Quebec was brought to my attention was in the Drummond-Arthabaska by-election. It has been frequently stated on the floor of this House, and not denied by my Conservative friends, that they were at the bottom of the movement and endorsed the Nationalist candidate in that election. They were behind the extremists in Quebec, when they told the people that they owed nothing to Great Britain. In that election, my Conservative friends were accused, time and again, of endorsing the man who made these speeches. It is certainly true that they endorsed the Nationalists in the election of 1911.

Mr. LALOR: Will the hon. members kindly explain the difference to-day in the platform of Bourassa and the Nationalists, and the platform of my hon. friend's leader in this House?

Mr. NESBITT: If the hon. gentleman will read this evening's paper, which contains a statement from Bourassa, one of his friends, he will see exactly what the difference is. I cannot carry it in mind, but one of his own papers—what do you call this thing here in Ottawa—I think the Journal-Press —contains a statement of the matter. The hon. member can read Bourassa's statement of the difference. My honoured chieftain in that campaign was forced by the attitude of the Conservative party and their partners, so-called Nationalists, properly provincialists, to state to the people of the province of Quebec that he did not mean conscription, that he was opposed to conscription and would not vote for conscription. The campaign carried on in 1911 on the Laurier Naval Bill forced my leader and his supporters from Quebec to make the same statement, and I say, without fear of contradiction, that it is absolutely impossible for any man of honour and truth, after being forced to take the position he did at that time in the province of Quebec, to do otherwise than he is doing to-day. In my judgment, not only the safety of the province of Quebec, but the safety of the nation, or the unity of the Dominion at large, are safeguarded by my honoured chieftain taking the position he has announced on this Bill, because if he took another position, he would drive the province of Quebec into the hands of the extremists.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Where are they now?

Mr. NESBITT: Where they have always been. My comrades from Quebec are absolutely as honest in their views to-night as my hon. friend who has interrupted me. After all, though we differ on this occasion, it is not necessary to say a man is dishonest in his view.

Mr. WILCOX: Will the hon. gentleman deny that the Nationalists are now on the same side as himself and his honoured leader?

Mr. GRAHAM: Wait till the first vote is taken on your partner's motion.

Mr. NESBITT: My hon. friend from Renfrew has answered the hon. gentleman, but personally I absolutely deny that there is any collusion between my hon. leader and his supporters from Quebec or the supporters of my hon. friend on that side from that province. But in that election there was the usual collusion of my honourable friends in sharp practices. Both in politics and in business such collusion will come to naught. My view has always been since I was a boy, that there is only one way to do business or politics, and that is to be absolutely honest. You may succeed by chicanery for a little while, but it meets with poor success, and the chicanery of my hon. friends in the Drummond-Arthabaska election, and in the election of 1911, did more harm to this country than they can imagine, and now it is reacting on them. Perhaps it was smart practice at the time, but honesty is the best policy in politics and in business. My hon. friend from South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) gave the Bill credit for the organization of labour. I asked him the question where he found it, and he told me he thought it was there. The only language that could be construed in that way at all would be the last section of the interpretation clause, which reads:

> And whereas, by reason of the large number of men who have already left agricultural and industrial pursuits in Canada to join such Expeditionary Force as volunteers, and of the necessity of sustaining under such conditions the productivity of the Dominion, it is expedient to secure the men still required, not by ballot as provided in the Militia Act, but by selective draft.

No, there is nothing in that to show there is any intention to organize labour in this country. The Bill expresses the intention of selecting men for military purposes, but nothing to show there is any intention for the organization of labour—at least, I say so.

That brings me to the question of voluntary enlistment versus conscription. The one great benefit of voluntary enlistment, in my view, is that, after all, the man, whoever he may be, voluntarily goes to the front and voluntarily risks his life. Against that, for compulsory conscription, there is the basic theory that it is the duty of every man to defend his country. If you start on that basis, I am free to confess that the only logical conclusion you can come to is conscription, whether it be selective or otherwise, whether it be according to the Militia Act or according to the proposed Bill No. 75. But, after all, the difficulty with me is that I dislike to say that anybody else shall do something if I will not do it myself. I confess that I shrink from saying to any man or woman that his or her son shall go to the front and expose his life in war when I am not going myself. Hon. gentlemen know that under this Bill I would not be selected for military service, because I am too old, by many years. That made me hesitate; it took me a long time to make up my mind—because I do not try to be generous at the expense of my wife's relations. I rather felt that, as a representative of the people, I was putting myself in a position of dictatorship. Although I am represented in the military service by the only member of my family who could possibly volunteer, I myself am not at the front, and I hesitated to say that any other man's son should go, especially when he might never come back. I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that that is a serious position for me to take. But, as I have said, every man is required to defend his country when the time comes. There seems to be only one way of ensuring the proper defence of the country at this time, and that is by means of conscription. But any measure of compulsory service must be fairly and properly carried out. A great many people—not especially the people whom I represent—but people to whom I have talked on and off the trains, have asserted that ever since the war started the business connected with the war has been carried on by the Government in a most partisan manner. That has hurt recruiting in Ontario worse than anything else. In my constituency—or, rather, in the constituency that I am supposed to represent—a good many more Liberals than Conservatives volunteered.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Does the hon. member mean Liberal officers?

Mr. NESBITT: No, I mean men. My hon. friend knows that there would not be more Liberal officers. I have no complaints of that kind to make. To do the Government and the Department of Militia justice, I may say that the department has freely done everything in reason that I have asked it to do since the war started. I must give them that credit.

Mr. LALOR: Why, then, do you say that there was partisanship in your county?

Mr. NESBITT: I did not say that there was partisanship in my county. My hon.

friend is very clever to-night; what is the matter with him? In the first place, I do not own a county. In the next place, I did not say that partisanship was evidenced in the district that I represent. So far as I know, it certainly was not.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. NESBITT: But I did say that the feeling was abroad in the country that partisanship had been exercised by the Government ever since the war started. For instance, have any Liberals been given positions on the numerous and innumerable commissions that have been appointed?

Mr. DAVIDSON: The Pensions Commission.

Mr. NESBITT: Not that I know of.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: One of the officers now on the Pensions Commission was one of the most intolerable and intolerant Grits in my town. If every hon. gentleman will frankly admit what he himself knows, then the public will get the truth.

Mr. NESBITT: Who is this intolerable Grit to whom my hon. friend refers? I suppose he was intolerable to my hon. friend because my hon. friend was intolerable to him.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: A man named McKeaud.

Mr. NESBITT: On the Pensions Commission?

Mr. BENNETT: On the Pensions Commission—a good office.

Mr. NESBITT: There is no such man on the Pensions Commission that I know of.

Mr. BENNETT: You do not know everything.

Mr. NESBITT: I understand that the Pensions Commission consists of Mr. Ross, Mr. Todd and Mr. Labatt.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not say that he was one of the commissioners; I said that he was on the Pensions Commission.

Mr. NESBITT: Oh, he got into a clerkship, I suppose. You should never have allowed him to get that clerkship; you had better dismiss him.

Mr. LALOR: It surely was not partisanship that induced the Government to send Colonel Andrew Thompson, of Ottawa, into my county to take charge of a battalion that had already been recruited.

[Mr. Nesbitt.]

An hon. MEMBER: Why should he not go?

Mr. LALOR: I say that he was not sent there because of partisanship.

Mr. NESBITT: My hon. friend is quite willing that Colonel Andrew Thompson should go overseas and risk his life at the front. I do not know if there is anything—

Mr. SPEAKER: May I direct the attention of hon. gentlemen to the fact that there are entirely too many interjections? Hon. members ought to extend to the House the courtesy of rising if they wish to make remarks.

Mr. NESBITT: Thank you, Mr. Speaker; I was not getting into trouble. I never noticed that my hon. friends were desirous of stopping any Liberals from going to the front. They have always been perfectly willing that Liberals should go to the firing line, and I suppose they will continue to be.

Mr. WILCOX: Nonsense.

Mr. NESBITT: As my hon. friend says, why not?

Mr. WILCOX: Oh, no; I said "nonsense."

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. NESBITT: In introducing this Bill the Prime Minister said that the Militia Act, which has been on the statute book for many years, did not provide for the proper selection of men for military service. I refer hon. gentlemen to section 27 of the Militia Act, which is as follows:—

> When men are required to organize or complete a corps at any time, either for training or for an emergency, and enough men do not volunteer to complete the quota required, the men liable to serve shall be drafted by ballot; but at no time shall more than one son belonging to the same family residing in the same house, if there are more than one inscribed on the Militia roll, be drawn, unless the number of names so inscribed is insufficient to complete the required proportion of service men.

Nothing in this Bill, so far as I know, provides for such selection as is provided for in that section of the Militia Act. Nothing in this Bill allows selection, except according to the discretion of the tribunal appointed for the purpose. Without desiring to throw out any reflection, I may say that this tribunal will be appointed by hon. gentlemen opposite. There is nothing in the Bill to indicate how the selections shall be made; there is nothing in it which provides for any organization of labour.

I have pointed out that the militia workers, for whom advertisements were floated about in the newspapers, were paid from $2.50 to $8 a day, whereas the man who went to fight was paid $1.10 a day, besides being maintained and furnished with equipment. It is the duty of this country to pay the man who has actually to go to the front better than he has been paid. There is absolutely no comparison between the duties a man working in a militia factory performs and in the duties a man going to the front performs, and why men should be asked to go to the front for $1.10 a day, including equipment and maintenance, when a man working in a militia factory received from $2.50 to $8 a day, is more than I can comprehend and is absolutely unfair. The Minister of Finance said this afternoon that there was plenty of money for the support of the men at the front. The Government, therefore, should take steps now to pay our fighting men more than they are receiving at present.

Mr. EDWARDS: Can the hon. member fix any amount of pay per day which he thinks would be commensurate with the sacrifices incurred and the risks taken by the men at the front?

Mr. NESBITT: Certainly not, but does that prevent us from paying them a reasonable remuneration? It would take a great deal of money, but there are a great many people in this country to share the burden. The men at the front enlisted for patriotic purposes; they did not enlist for the sake of the pay, but that is no reason why we should not give them a reasonable remuneration. Is it?

Mr. EDWARDS: No.

Mr. NESBITT: Then we absolutely agree. That brings me to the question of taxation which the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) touched upon this afternoon. The Minister of Finance this afternoon made an admirable speech, with which I cannot possibly find any fault excepting that he emphasized the fact that we have as much need for effort now as we ever had before. Surely such a statement was unnecessary. Any one in this country over five years old who reads about the war knows that it is absolutely necessary to make as much effort now as it was before. Then the minister, discussing the objections taken by some hon. members on this side of the House to the Bill, discussed the question: Shall we not send troops outside of Canada? There is no question as to whether we should send troops outside of Canada or not; the question is as to the methods of raising troops, whether by voluntarysm or by conscription, to send to the front; at least, that is my understanding of the arguments presented on this side of the House. The Minister of Finance also stated that the voluntary system had failed in England, and he quoted the Conscription Bill there. The minister must bear in mind that the English people, before bringing conscription into force, organized labour and industry in 9 p.m. England. That is the difference between this country and England. I am not going to discuss what the minister should do in regard to taxation; but while the minister has taxed wisely in many ways, I have never agreed with his blanket increase of 7½ per cent, and he will notice that while the United States complimented him to the extent of saying they were going to do likewise, they afterwards did not do so. Every one in this country, no matter whether he is rich or ordinarily well off, or in whatever financial condition he may be, will have to pay more taxes on account of the war. We cannot continue to borrow. I think we have paid $100,000,000 towards the expenditures of the war. Am I correct in that?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: This year we paid $60,000,000 on account of principal. So far as I know, only ourselves and Great Britain are paying towards the principal of war expenditure.

Mr. NESBITT: What the other fellow does, does not help us. The capital debt in the United States is very small in comparison with its population and resources, so that that country can well afford to borrow a few billions of dollars and still not have a large capital debt. We, however, cannot do that, and moreover, we have no means of securing the money, because if we borrow too much, we check the commercial development of the country, and we cannot afford to do that. At the present time we cannot borrow from the United States; we have made several large domestic loans, and there is a limit to such borrowings. Therefore, while I do not say that we should pay all the expenses of the war as it progresses, we must pay more of the war expenditure as we go along, and we must tax every one regardless of whether he is rich or not. I have no faith in that catch-phrase—conscription of wealth—that one hears everywhere throughout the country. I have asked many people what they mean by "conscription of wealth," but nine out of ten, in fact, ten out of ten, cannot tell me what they mean. We must tax wealth, and probably what the people mean by "conscription of wealth," is that we should impose an income tax. The Minister of Finance will have to resort to an income tax, although he has told us time and again that the expense of collecting an income tax will be very great. I appreciate that fact; but we have to form a basis for the taxation of wealth, and in my judgment, we shall have to resort to the imposition of an income tax; indeed, I would not be surprised if we had to resort to a land tax, because we have to tax the people of this country in such a way that they will feel it. The minister spoke this afternoon very eloquently about what discussion in this House would do towards organizing the people. We, as a Parliament, must organize the people, and the minister must tax the people so that every one will feel that he is doing something towards this war, as every one has a right to do.

I object to the regulations, with reference to the guidance of the tribunals that select the men, being made by Order in Council. The Parliament of Canada is the place where such regulations should be made. It is all very well for the Government to ask us to trust them, and to say that they will not exhibit partyism in these tribunals; but the Government has shown partyism from the very start of the war. They must remember that they have done so, and therefore they must remember that in the ordinary Liberal mind there is a suspicion —that perhaps should not be there, but that is still there—and all that the Liberals I know of want is fair play in this selection. The suspicion in their minds is that they will not receive fair play if these regulations are made by Order in Council. I do not think I have anything more to say at the present time with reference to the backslidings of my hon. friends on the other side of the House.

I come now to the question of the war. It does not matter to me particularly whether this Government have done what they should have done since the war started. It does not matter to me particularly, except as a citizen, whether they do what is right in the future or not, but my duty is plain. I am only answerable for myself and on this question, as on every other, my conscience must be absolutely clear. I am in no way responsible for the sins of the Government; I am not responsible for anything they have done in the past or may do in the future.

[Mr. Nesbitt.]

We are at war. The leaders of the two great parties have both declared that we are in the war to the last man and the last dollar, and the press of the country have declared the same thing. Our men are fighting at the front and they have to be supported. Apparently voluntary enlistment has fallen down. No matter whose the fault, it certainly has slackened up within the last five or six months; the men required are not coming forward. In view of the slaughter that is going on at the front we do not know how many men will be required, and if we are going to act on the principle that it is the duty of every man to defend his country there is nothing else for us to do but to pass this Bill. Voting according to my conscience, being left absolutely free to do so by my right hon. leader, I shall support the Bill on its second reading. On the third reading I shall vote according to my conscience again, and I reserve the right to vote for or against the Bill according to the improvements that may be made in it in committee, and according to what concurrent legislation may be introduced in the way of taxation, the organization of labour exclusive of manpower for the front, and the organization of industry. I should not like to suggest an election, as did my hon. friend from Saskatoon (Mr. McCraney). If I might suggest anything to hon. gentlemen opposite it would be this; in place of a referendum that when this Bill passes they close up this legislature for a couple of weeks or a month, for the purpose of forming not a coalition government, but a coalition of both Houses of Parliament in one grand effort to get the necessary men for the front by voluntary enlistment. I say that because I cannot help feeling that a grave responsibility rests upon the people of this country, and unless something of this kind be done there is likely to be produced in this country a disunion that must last for a considerable number of years. While I believe that conscription is the proper basis, it being every man's duty to serve his country, at the same time I most strongly urge that both sides of this House and both Houses of Parliament get together for two weeks in one grand effort to get the necessary men by voluntary enlistment, and if I might say so, I think my hon. friends from the province of Quebec could well join in such a campaign, and I hope they will do so. I believe such an effort would bring unity throughout the length and breadth of this land. Unity perhaps is not so important as winning the war, but next to winning the war the most important thing to this country is to have the people of all the provinces of this Dominion united. I thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BURRELL: I understood my hon. friend in the earlier part of his remarks to make a statement to the effect that the Dominion Government had expended $60,000 in an advertising campaign for munitions workers. I am sure my hon. friend would not wish to have any statement of his that was inaccurate go out to the country, and I wish to say for the Government that I believe there is absolutely no basis for such a statement. I felt so at the time, but to make sure I called up the Deputy Minister of Militia, and he tells me that absolutely no such expenditure was made through that department; and I do not see how it could very well have been made through any other department.

Mr. NESBITT: My information comes from the man who got the contract. The minister will possibly say that it was English money that was being spent.

Mr. BURRELL: If the Munitions Board spent that sum of money in an advertising campaign, it had absolutely nothing to do with this Government; it was not our money.

Mr. NESBITT: That is only a subterfuge.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Not at all.

Mr. NESBITT: Who pays the money eventually?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The British Government.

Mr. NESBITT: Do not we have to pay our proportion of it?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: If we lend any money to the British Government here for the expenditures of the Imperial Munitions Board, it is a set-off to money which the Imperial Government advances to us for expenditures in Great Britain and on the Continent. It is just as much the money of the Imperial Government when our cheque passes to the Imperial Munitions Board, as my hon. friend's money is his own. This Government is not in any way responsible, and has no authority whatsoever over the expenditures of the Imperial Munitions Board.

Mr. NESBITT: I quite appreciate that, but when the grand settlement is made in the end, do not we have to pay our proportion of the expenditures that have been made for getting munitions for our men at the front?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: In virtue of an arrangement which has been made, we pay the Imperial Government a certain amount in respect of the maintenance of our men at the front and the munitions which our troops use. But the policy of the Imperial Munitions Board is not necessarily the policy of this Government. I do not think my hon. friend would say that we have responsibility where we have no authority.

Mr. NESBITT: I only mentioned that point as one of the reasons for the failure of voluntary enlistment. If the minister says that this expenditure concerns the Munitions Board alone, I have nothing more to say, but undoubtedly we shall have to pay our proportion of it when the final settlement comes. I have not the remotest intention of wishing to mislead the people of this country. I know my information is absolutely correct, because I got it from the man who took the contract.

Mr. W. F. COCKSHUTT (Brantford): Mr. Speaker, there are occasions when it is difficult for members of this House to decide what is the best course to pursue. I quite understand that the legislation now before us is causing a good many to have doubts as to what is their proper course. Speaking for myself, however, my path of duty lies perfectly clear before me in the support of the measure the Government has brought down. Never have I seen a great measure brought before the House that I could support with so good a conscience, or with a clearer belief that I am doing what is best in the interests of my country and my Empire.

I was somewhat surprised that my hon. friend from North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) spent so much time, first, in proving that the voluntary system was a comparative failure, because it had not been carried on as it should have been carried on; deciding, then, that he would vote for the conscription measure on the second reading, but advising that it should be held in abeyance for some weeks or months, after which Parliament should be brought together and put it through, so that it could be satisfactorily carried out. That seems to be his policy. I say I am surprised that a gentleman who has such a good knowledge of world affairs should, on a question of this importance, give forth any uncertain sound. I understand tha the provincial leader of the Liberals, Mr. Rowell, recently held a meeting in his constituency, which is also that of my hon. friend (Mr. Nesbitt)—both these gentlemen are elected by the same constituents. This meeting was held in Woodstock, and a resolution was moved by one of the gentlemen present to the effect that those present were heart and soul in favour of conscription. That resolution was carried, I understand, by a practically unanimous standing vote, and amongst those who voted, I believe, my hon. friend (Mr. Nesbitt) himself had the honour of appearing, as well as the gentleman who was formerly representative of South Oxford and is a candidate for the next election, Mr. Schell. Having taken that stand in his own constituency, I think it was the hon. gentleman's duty to himself and the House to state more plainly his attitude and to give more whole-souled support to this measure, which is undoubtedly required, which is in the best interests of Canada and of our army at the front, as well as of the Empire as a whole.

This departure upon which the Government has embarked is the first real out-and-out war measure proposed, according to my way of thinking. It is not designed, as my hon. friend would intimate, to be a conscription of one party or another party, but of all; and I think my hon. friend is scarcely true to his own knowledge when he stated that all the matters in connection with the war have been administered with more or less of a partisan bias. I think that is not true of the county of Oxford; it certainly is not true of the neighbouring county of Brant. In the county of Brant, Liberals and Conservatives have had a square deal throughout. The first man to go from Brantford in command of a contingent was a Liberal; and I can say as having had a great deal to do with the raising of the 125th Battalion, that the question of politics had nothing to do with its management or with the filling of its ranks. And I think the same conditions prevailed in Oxford.

Mr. NESBITT: That is what I said—I said there was no partisanship so far as sending men to the front was concerned.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I think that Hansard will show that I have correctly represented what the hon. gentleman said. He said the whole war had been conducted in a partisan way. Of course, I do not wish to misrepresent the hon. gentleman.

Mr. NESBITT: I said it was so reported.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Oh! But the hon. gentleman's own experience in Oxford does not warrant any such statement. My experience in Brant certainly does not warrant it; and I think that other hon. members can testify to the same effect with regard to their several counties. I say this is a real war measure. And I think that the Government mean business in it. If not, they certainly will not get my support for long. If they pass a Conscription Bill, declaring that they want to put it in force, and then leave it idle on the statute book and do not push it, I shall certainly be dissatisfied and shall criticise any turning back in this measure, or with regard to the control of food and fuel, or the grain commission. All these are thorough war measures, the kind of measures we have been calling for for some time. My hon. friend knows that we have been calling for them, and knows that now that we have got them we expect the Government will carry them out without fear or favour. If they do not live up to my expectations, all I can say is that I do not expect to follow a Government that makes fine professions but does not carry them into effect. I believe they are honest and that they intend to carry out this law.

Mr. NESBITT: Then my hon. friend and I will have to form a separate party, for I quite agree with him.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I suppose I should be very proud of one sincere follower. The hon. gentleman has told us that the voluntary system is exhausted.

Mr. NESBITT: No, no.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: He told us that it was not effective because it was not properly carried out.

Mr. NESBITT: No, you have a bad memory.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I think that Hansard will show that the hon. gentleman attempted to prove that voluntary enlistment had been so bungled that we did not get the men we called for.

Mr. NESBITT: No, I did not say anything of the kind.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: The hon. gentleman said that officers had been put on the platform and given large money, husky chaps that ought to be at the front.

Mr. NESBITT: Sure, I said that.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: The voluntary system was successful to the extent of procuring for our armies over 400,000 men. I do not think that any one is justified in describing that as a failure.

Mr. NESBITT: You are saying just what I said.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: If the hon. gentleman agrees with me, I hope he will allow me to proceed. The voluntary system as carried out, I think, has been a great credit to our people. I believe that as many men enlisted under the voluntary system in the Dominion of Canada as enlisted in any other part of the world. But it succeeded only in those parts of the country that gave it a fair trial and did their best under it. If it failed in any place, it failed because it was not pushed with sufficient vigour by the natural leaders of the people. And who are those leaders? The members of this House. The man who represents a constituency in this House is the first citizen in his riding, and he is the man who should have taken the responsibility for recruiting in that riding. There were no kid-glove methods pursued in the province of Ontario when getting recruits, let me tell my hon. friends from the province of Quebec. These hon. gentlemen tell us that the voluntary system has not had a fair chance, that it has not been pushed for all it was worth in Quebec as it has been in other places. Let me tell these hon. gentlemen that the same methods that were pursued in Ontario were open to them in Quebec, if they chose to employ them. How were recruits raised in the various constituencies in Ontario? The member for the constituency—and I include the Liberals as well as Conservatives and think they deserve probably as much credit as we do; I will say that for Oxford, though I have not been closely associated with recruiting in that county; and I believe the same is true of Wellington and Lambton—put himself at the head of the movement and carried the message to all the countryside. We did not get recruits in Brant to the number of 4,000 out of a population of a little over 40,000, let me tell my hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux), without putting forth exertion. The men in the county formed themselves into a recruiting organization, including the best citizens on both sides of politics—there was no politics in it.

We did not know the politics of the men upon that recruiting committee. Men of all parties, all races and all creeds were there. They got together, a band of citizens, believing that the life and unity of the Empire were at stake, that Christianity, civilization, liberty and religion were in the balance and, like men realizing that all these responsibilities were upon them, they placed themselves willingly in harness; their cars were at the disposal of speakers, their houses were opened to visitors who came to speak, their money was at the disposal of the committee, and thousands and thousands of private dollars in the city of Brantford and county of Brant were spent in getting these 4,000 men together. We did not have any rosy way of doing it; it was done by solid work and I ask the hon. member from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) as he seems to be one of the few representatives from Quebec in the Chamber now, if the same methods were fairly tried in Quebec. If they were not fairly tried in Quebec he and his fellow members should shoulder the responsibility. The responsibility rests primarily upon the members of this House from the province of Quebec if the voluntary system did not receive the support it should have received. That is gospel truth and no one can deny it. Throughout Ontario this message was carried, at every cross-roads the doctrine was preached and at every school house the flag was unfurled and the message was delivered. People who had never had much experience in speaking, who previously had been slow in speech, roused their fellowmen in a way that I had never seen equaled in a public meeting in the city of Brantford or the county of Brant. What was the response? From the good old province of Ontario about 180,000 voluntary recruits offered their lives on the altar of their country, and to-night many of them are laying down their lives in the trenches that you and I may enjoy our ease at home. This thing has been done and it has been done by disinterested citizens in all parts of this country. What took place in Ontario I am sure also took place throughout the whole of the West and if it has not applied to the East it is because the members, primarily of the Opposition, have not done as was done in Ontario—placed themselves at the head of a recruiting league and gone out and carried the message and planted the cross—the fiery cross—upon every road that leads to every town, city, and hamlet in Quebec. I feel confident if that had been done the response from Quebec would have been better than it has been.

We are told that this is a fit subject for a referendum. Governments in this country have not frequently shifted their responsibility and placed upon the people the lead that they themselves should take. That has not been the vogue in Canada. It may be wrong. In Australia they pursue a different course but in this country Governments have shouldered the responsibility with regard to all the questions they have had to deal with and they have placed them fairly and squarely before the people. But now we have the policy proposed of a referendum to the people so as to allow the slacker, the man who has not gone under the voluntary system, to say that he will not go under the compulsory system; while our 400,000 soldiers are out of the country. Is that a fair proposition? No.

This is not a fit subject for a referendum because in many cases the voter to whom it will be submitted is not a fair and impartially-minded man to give a decision on such a subject. If the liberties are worth having they are worth fighting for, and if the liberties which we in Canada enjoy are as great as we think they are, they are worthy of the best efforts of every citizen.

I do not want to reprove my fellow citizens from Quebec. I am sorry to disagree with them on a question of such great importance, but I must say that Quebec has been the greatest disappointment to me in the whole war. I say that from the bottom of my heart. When this war began I thought: Now, Canada will be a united country; never have we been entirely united but now we will be absolutely united. Look at the great, old land of France, valorous, brilliant France; there she is with every man available, every woman, every child throwing their lives into the struggle spending their last ounce of energy, their last drop of blood, in defence of the great old land that gave our friends their language and their liberties in the first place, and to whom they owe a great deal of what they possess. I said: There will be no doubt about the position of Quebec on this great question, because all her people will stand shoulder to shoulder with us. But now is there to be a referendum—to all the people of Canada?—No; to the people who stay at home, to the people who should have gone but who did not go. It has remained for the province of Quebec to furnish, in my mind, the most pathetic and outstanding figure in Canada in this whole war.

I am sorry that the right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) is not here because I wanted to make a special appeal to him. I was going to propose one referendum that he should make. Although I disapprove of the spirit of the proposal I would give in to the extent of such a referendum as that which I propose. I would be willing and delighted to pay the expenses of this particular referendum if my right hon. friend would make it. What is it? It is that he immediately send a wireless message to Dr. Beland, the ex-Postmaster General in his own Government, telling him the situation in which we are placed in Canada to-day in regard to recruiting and conscription and asking him, on behalf of his own people here, to tell them truly what in his heart he thinks should be done. If such a message were sent to Dr. Beland, I can imagine that a reply would come back, written almost with his life blood, that must appeal to every Quebec citizen: Recall your resolution, recant your opinions, repent of your mistake and come; stay not upon the order of your coming, but come. Let me appeal to the pity of my hon. friends from Quebec—Dr. Beland, visiting in the neutral country of Belgium, seized upon almost immediately after war broke out; his new bride done to death by the ruthless Hun; he, himself while we are here debating and discussing ways and means, eating the bread and drinking the water of affliction in Germany, a man who cannot move hand or foot without the permission of the Huns! Is this a time to sit here in idle debate? Is this a time to say that you cannot do any more than you have done? No, Sir, let that referendum be taken and if my friend does not answer somewhat in the line I have indicated, then I think I might almost venture to oppose the Bill myself.

Mr. LAFORTUNE: If we in Quebec do as the hon. member from Brantford suggests, will the Government repeal the School Act of Ontario?

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I am hardly ready to discuss the bilingual question on the present occasion.

Mr. LAFORTUNE: And we are not ready to go.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I have my views about it, but I do not think the people of Quebec can escape defending our common country, because we do not speak as good French in Ontario as we should.

I have spoken strongly on this question, and I feel strongly. It is a profound regret to me, personally, that I have not the support of my hon. friends on the other side of the House, especially the members from Quebec. I feel that they have misjudged the situation, and are not prizing the liberties that have been theirs under the British flag and Crown. I ask them to repent, ere it is too late, and join us, and, in one united effort, let us bring the war to a close, because if we allow the enemy to defeat us in this matter, we will only regret it once, and that will be for all time to come.

An attempt has been made, on the part of many, to confuse the one issue in this Bill, and we hear a great deal about the conscription of wealth. The hon. gentleman from South Renfrew dwelt on that at great length, and the Finance Minister has replied very ably. I look upon this and other matters which have been discussed as side issues, which have nothing to do with the question before the House. These questions have been dragged in, but are not properly matters to be discussed in this debate. The conscription of wealth is a subject by itself, which seems to be not very well defined, and the Finance Minister tells us he has been able so far and expects to be able, in the future, to furnish all the funds that are required for the war. We want the men, and the money will take care of itself, and will be provided in due course. The ministers of every denomination have preached conscription of wealth as well as of men. I attended a church meeting this week, and this question came up, and in my own church I said what I am not afraid to say here, that this proposition, with regard to the conscription of wealth, is going to hit some of the preachers, if it is carried, and I think it started them puzzling a little bit. Let it be remembered that, if you conscript a man, you take the whole of him, and do not leave a leg or arm behind, and you require a good sound man. If the conscription of wealth means the same thing it is going to take the whole pile of wealth which a man possesses, leaving nothing. Many of our clergymen brethren are lords over a great pile of money. I think Quebec can tell us something about that as well as Ontario. It must be remembered that, if conscription of wealth is coming, some of the churches are going to be hit. It reminds me of a remark a Six Nation Indian used to make, when they told him the preacher had given them a very poor sermon—"Well, it was poor pay and poor preach." It will be a good deal the same with our clerical brethren. If all the wealth be conscripted the churches will not be supported as they have been. Wealth has been accumulated by many of the religious bodies, and the clerical gentleman cannot refuse to obey the scriptural teaching, that a man should always pay taxes and obligations of that kind, especially if he is a religious man. I throw out that hint to the preachers who are propounding this doctrine from the pulpit: that the conscription of wealth will take the accumulated wealth of the churches, as well as the wealth of the individuals. We are all prepared for that to the full extent necessary to conduct this war to a finish. Canada has the right to expect from its citizens the surrender of all that they possess to be used in defence of the country. In other words, the rights of the State are superior to the rights of any individuals. That is a strong doctrine perhaps to preach, but it will be found to be absolutely true. It has been the price of liberty and freedom for all time, and always will be. The state, which is the accumulation and union of individuals is always superior to the units which compose the whole. The State at the present time says we want men, we want more men, they have not volunteered. We are bringing down legislation to conscript these men, or, to use a selective draft, or whatever you wish, and put them into line. These men will be selected without fear or favour by the powers that be.

It has been stated in the House on several occasions that our soldiers are not paid as they should be paid, and that we are making them serve for a very much less wage than they could earn in any of the ordinary walks of life. While that may be the case, can any gentleman present tell me of any soldier in the world who is better paid than the Canadian. I have yet to hear of him. Therefore, I do not think we can be accused of being niggardly. What was the pay of the French soldier when the war broke out? A penny a day, raised since, I believe, to five cents. The German pay is so small you do not hear of it at all. The British pay is less than half of ours, and the Australian pay is less than ours. Being in constant communication with those at the front, having blood relations there, I think I know what I am speaking about when I say that the Canadian soldier is one of the best treated men and one of the best soldiers the world has ever seen. The pay never was presumed to compensate him for his effort. The soldier's life is presumed to be sacrificed to the State. No money value can be placed on that life. It is beyond price, and cannot be measured by dollars and cents. It is a gift from God. A man who goes to the trenches, and lays his life on the altar of his country, cannot be paid in money. People have raised the bogey that the pay of the Canadian soldier is insufficient, but the pay never induces these men to join the ranks. The first contingent did not enlist because the men desired to draw $1.10 a day, nor did any of the subsequent contingents go to the front on account of the remuneration. They said: our country needs us at the front; by Divine Providence I have been created a man fit to serve; I am sound in wind and limb; I place my services on the altar of my country, and the $1.10 or $2, or $5 per day I get amounts to nothing; I am fighting because I believe in the cause. I am fighting because my King and country need me; I am fighting for the liberties of my people, and in order that the British race may be supreme in the future as it has been in the past; these are the things that have appealed to me—not the paltry $1.10 a day. Mr. Speaker, you cannot pay these men with money; it is folly to try to raise the bogey of our men being insufficiently paid and of that being the reason for lack of enlistment. In most instances, our men are getting all the pay that they expected, and all that they asked. But they do want to be sustained in their work; they ask that we at home, instead of bickering and quarrelling over minor matters of detail, should get together and, in conjunction with the boys overseas, present a united front to the Hun and give him to understand that we are in the fight to a finish. I do not like the clause of this Bill—it happens to be No. 13, the unlucky number—which limits the number of men required to 100,000. We may need more men than that. We must give all that the successful prosecution of the war requires; we have engaged to do our part to the utmost of our ability and to the limit of our resources. Therefore I say that this section of the Bill should be struck out.

It has been said that labour is opposed to conscription. Well, I come from a town in which 7,000 of the citizens work in factories and earn their daily bread at the bench. While a handful of them, in meeting assembled, did pass a resolution against conscription some weeks ago, I do not think that their opinion represents the attitude of labour. I do not believe that the views of the gentlemen who met in Ottawa represent the attitude of labour. I believe that the attitude of labour now is what it has been; the testimony of the men in the trenches is the best answer to the assertion that labour is opposed to conscription. From 100,000 to 150,000 workingmen are either fighting in the trenches or are ready to go to the front when they are needed. It is plainly evident that this war is a war of the people. Every class is in line to do its part in the prosecution of the war—from the richest to the poorest, from the highest to the lowest. To say that the wealthy man has not done anything because his wealth has not been conscripted is simply begging the question. I do not know that there are any millionaires in the community from which I come, but I believe that the sons of the well-to-do in the county of Brant have gone to the front in just as great numbers as the sons of the needy and the poor. The comradeship and the good feeling that has prevailed among the men and the officers who have gone to the front has done my heart good on many occasions. I know of university boys from Brantford, qualified lawyers and medical men, who have enlisted in the ranks. One young man in particular was offered a commission. He said: No, I am no soldier; I know my limitations; I know that without experience I am not fit to lead men; I will go and fight my way upwards from the ranks. That boy came from one of the best families in Brantford; he had been accustomed to the very best living that the city could furnish. He went overseas and put in a year and a half in the trenches as a private. He qualified for a lieutenant's commission, and a month afterwards fell while leading the platoon that my own son had been leading. His body has not been recovered and his friends do not know where that body lies. I mention that only to show the spirit that prevails among the men. I tell you, Mr. Speaker, that if we in this House had applied ourselves as diligently to carrying out the requirements of the war as we have to finding fault with each other, things would be very different from what they are to-day. This war is far from being over. The submarines are taking a very heavy toll of the mercantile marine; this week 27 or 28 of the largest British ships of the line have been sunk. The men at the front need help; the situation is serious. I believe that the House should put this measure through as quickly as possible and that both sides of the House should get behind it and make it successful. We should present a united front in obtaining the 100,000 men, or whatever number is required, drilling them, equipping them and getting them to the firing line, thus saving many lives and perhaps, materially shortening the war. It is up to Canada to do as she has done in the past. She has done nobly, but let her not now spoil her splendid record of three years by faltering or giving evidences of decay. Let her be just as resolute, just as firm as she was in August, 1914. Let us now be just as firmly resolved as we were at that time to carry the grand old flag to victory; to ensure the freedom and the liberty of the nations of Europe, both small and great. I have had occasion to criticise the great nation to the south of us; I have even been termed an anti-American. But I rejoice now that the people of the United States are shoulder to shoulder with us in the great fight for the liberty of the world. Only last January I criticised President Wilson; I thought that he deserved criticism. I want to withdraw that criticism now in same degree and give him credit for having thrown himself into the war as few statesmen on either side of the Atlantic have done. Every step that he has taken has been wisely conceived. In the United States they are giving the very best that they can of their wealth and of their energy to the prosecution of the war. They are forming aviation corps; sending ships across the sea and building more; taking other steps to help the Allies. That, Mr. Speaker, should give us encouragement. That should cause us to resolve anew that we will continue the great work we have undertaken. I believe that, by the providence of God, the British Empire and its Allies—France, Italy, Russia, Belgium, Serbia, Roumania, Japan and the United States —will secure a vindication of the principles of liberty and justice which they have enunciated and will be justified in their upholding of the right of smaller nations to live in peace and amity and to have absolute control of their own affairs.

Although history may contain pages that contain more words and tales that take longer to tell, history will contain no prouder or brighter page than that which tells of the noble part that has been played by the Dominion of Canada up to the present time on the battlefields of Europe, and if we at home are only as good, true, and honest in our hearts as the men whom we have sent to the front we shall have no regrets; we shall have nothing to recall; but we shall have the proud satisfaction of a good heart and a clear conscience in the presence of both God and man.

Mr. W. A. BUCHANAN (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, it is my intention to confine my remarks almost wholly to the measure before the House, and to give this House my reasons why it is my intention to support that measure. I am going to make my position clear at the commencement of my remarks. We are in a serious stage of the history of Canada; not only have we before us the winning of the war, but those of us who look at questions from a national standpoint are fearful for national unity, and in my remarks to-night I do not wish to say anything that will be a reflection upon any other province or section of the Dominion of Canada. I do not feel that I have any right to cast any reflection of that kind. I feel that if some of us, coming from other provinces of this country, had to face the conditions that have been faced in the province that has been frequently mentioned in this debate we would not be so boastful of our position in this war. No poison has been spread abroad in our provinces. If that poison had been spread abroad there might have been a different attitude on the part of many people in the other provinces at this particular period in our history.

I am in favour of conscription because I believe that this is Canada's war; that we are fighting for our own defence and for our own existence. That is why I have said, on many occasions since this war commenced, that we must give the last man and the last dollar to win it. Why do I say that? I do not want to boast that I can make my position clear to the people of other provinces that do not see as I do, but I believe that all fair-minded people throughout this country could be convinced that this war is actually Canada's war. If, after the war commenced, Great Britain had not gone into this struggle in Europe, and if we had not entered it, and if as a result of the war between Germany on the one hand and Russia and France on the other, Russia and France had been conquered, Germany would have been dominant in Europe, and Great Britain and the British Empire and the United States would have been in danger whether they went into the war or not. We may have to resort to conscription now, but under those circumstances we would have had to have larger armed forces; we would have had to spend more money in the maintenance of troops than we have ever had to do in our history, because we would have had to protect ourselves against the dominant power of the world. When Great Britain went into this war we were part of the British Empire.

and, consequently, we could be looked upon at once as a prize of the victor. If Germany could have reached us in the early stages of this war, no matter whether we had decided to participate or whether we had decided to remain out of the war, she would have reached us; she would have possessed us, and she would have had something to hold against Great Britain and the other Allies. For that reason I say that we had to go into the war; this war is ours. The only thing that prevented Germany from reaching us and the other parts of the British Empire was the existence of a power which Germany did not possess. Had Germany possessed that power, then her troops might have been on our shores to-day; our cities might have been destroyed, and many more of the lives of our citizens lost. If Germany should win in this war—and there is always that possibility—what would happen? If Germany should be in a position, after three years of war, to defeat great powers like France, Russia, Great Britain, and the United States, once the latter is prepared, then Germany would dominate the world; she would rule this world, she could dictate terms to the powers, and she could tell Great Britain that she wanted as a prize the Dominion of Canada. Could we prevent her taking Canada as a prize? I say to those who are not in favour of conscription to-day to keep in mind the fact that if those conditions should come about, we might be possessed by a nation that believes, not in conscription for to-day nor for a few days nor for a few years, but in military service for its citizens all the time. Is it not worth while that those of us in Canada who love liberty, freedom and democracy, that we should put forth every effort to prevent that occurring? Should we not adopt measures that we never thought of in the past, in order to maintain the principles we love, and in order to prevent this Dominion from becoming dominated by a power that does not believe in democracy, freedom, or justice? If all Canadians took the view that I take of our place in this war, they would support conscription; they would see to it that every available man was sent forward to help Canada and to help the Allies, and to maintain civilization as we want civilization to exist.

I would like to emphasize again the fact that, should Germany be a victor in this war, even if she were not in a position to possess us, she would force us into the position of spending more money in our defence and in maintaining a standing army. Is it not therefore better that we should spend the money and use the men now to prevent that happening? Sir, to my mind it is much better that we should now send overseas the greatest army we can possibly gather together, to prevent that fearful possibility occurring.

Another reason why I am in favour of conscription is this—we have sent many thousands of our young men across the seas to fight for us and for the principles we hold dear. Those men have enlisted voluntarily; they are fighting in the trenches to-day, or they are preparing to go across the channel to fight for us, or they are in Canada ready to leave our shores to participate in this war. We find that under the voluntary system at the present time we cannot get the necessary men to back up those brave fellows, and I am not going to vote in this House any other way than in favour of some measure that will send reinforcements to our boys, so that we can carry out our honest obligations to them. I wish that we were all imbued with the spirit that possesses many of those young men. It has been intimated that many men who went across the seas to participate in this war went over there out of a spirit of adventure, that some of them even went there because they could not get any work to do in Canada, but in my judgment the bulk of the men went over there knowing what they were fighting for; knowing they were fighting for Canada and for those great principles which I have mentioned. I remember reading a letter that came to a member of this House from his only son who went overseas with the First Contingent. He was an officer, and was one day instructed by his superior to lead a party of men up to a very dangerous position for the purpose of examining the territory. He realized it was likely to lead to his death, and he left a letter which was to be sent to his father in case he did not return. The young man fortunately was not killed, but was seriously wounded. He lost the sight of one of his eyes and is now back in Canada, proud of the part he played in this war. His instructions as to the letter were not carried out, and it was sent to his father. It was to this effect: "I am going to lead a party into a very dangerous position to-day. It is quite possible I may never return, but I do not want you to worry. You ought to be proud that you had a son who saw the issues of this war and was prepared to go forward and do his duty." That was the character of this young Canadian who was prepared to die for the principles which he felt were at issue in this great war. I am satisfied that the bulk of our men know what they are fighting for. They realize the issues involved in this war, and what the consequences would be if we were to lose.

I come from one of the new provinces of this Dominion. I represent a constituency which covers a very large territory, and although it has within its confines only two large centres, I think I am quite safe in saying that it has sent at least 7,000 men to the front. In the city where I reside about 3,000 men have been recruited. I do not mean to say they have been recruited from the city of Lethbridge alone, but they have been recruited at that point from the city and the surrounding territory. Now I could not conscientiously do anything else but back up these men, many of whom have enlisted because I stood on the platform and urged them to go and do their duty to their country. I could not face them when they come back if I had failed to support a measure of this kind; I want to be candid with the House and with my own constituents, and that is one of the reasons I am supporting this measure.

We have been asked to make suggestions as to the Bill. I should like to make some now, because there are some faults to be found with the Bill as I have examined it. I think there are many men who would be required in this country, farm labourers, railway men, miners and the like, who would fail to ask for exemption under this Act, because they would feel under the responsibility of going forward and joining the colours if they were called up. There are many men of this type who could not conscientiously ask to be exempted. I believe it would have been best under all circumstances to have had a system of registration. We would then have got information about all the individuals in every part of this country, and should have known whether a certain man ought to go and another man to stay. As I understand it, under the Bill a man must come forward and ask for exemption.

Mr. MEIGHEN: One can apply for another or for a number of others.

Mr. BUCHANAN: If that is the case I am perfectly satisfied, but I want to make it clear that instances of that kind might occur; I know they would occur in my own part of the country. Many men would not ask for exemption, and the board might not know the men's circumstances.

There is another matter that I should like to emphasize, and that is this. In all the communications I have had from my part of the country since the Bill was introduced and its contents made known, there is the feeling that it should be brought into effect without much delay. Now I am in agreement with those who urge that if possible we should give another chance to voluntary recruiting, but if we are not going to do that, if the need is as great as we are told it is, there should be no hesitation in bringing the Bill into effect.

There is another matter. In the provinces of the West at any rate, where the sentiment is absolutely sound behind this war, no man would be exempted by the boards that would be constituted in that part of the country unless he was absolutely entitled to exemption There is a possibility that in other parts of the country the sentiment of the boards would not be of that character and that men would be exempted who had no right to be exempted. There is the right to appeal under the Bill, but that involves delay. In the provinces of the West we have already fulfilled our obligations and raised more than our quota. With the sentiment of the boards out there behind the Act it might possibly be that from those provinces alone almost the whole of the 100,000 men required under the Act would be raised; there is that possibility; I do not say it would occur. This is certain, however: no slacker in Western Canada who is not required in that country in pursuits that are necessary for the successful prosecution of the war will be exempted by any of the boards appointed, unless the board should be dominated by men who would display favouritism to individuals, and I hope that will not be the case.

As to the amendment moved by my right hon. leader, I might say as a personal matter that I was not born into the Liberal doctrine. I did not inherit my Liberalism, but became possessed of it because of my high regard of Sir Wilfrid Laurier back in the days when I first commenced to take an interest in public affairs. I love and respect him, always have, and always hope to do so. He has been an ideal to me in many respects, but in this particular matter I honestly differ with him. I believe the view he has taken to be an absolutely honest view, and that he thinks it is in the best interests of unity and the welfare of the country. But I do not think the referendum would reach the object I have in view. I believe that conscription is necessary. I believe I am a member of this House at a critical time in the history of Canada and in the history of the world. I have a duty to perform, and I am prepared to perform it by declaring myself absolutely in favour of conscription. I am prepared to face my people on the stand I have taken, and to accept the consequences whatever they may be.

I do not want the men who, I feel, are neglecting their duty at this time, to have an opportunity of saying whether they should stay at home or not. I want to see these men go forward and serve their country. They have refused to go under a voluntary system, and they must go under some other system. And if these men go forward under a system of conscription, go to the front and perform their duty, they will come back to Canada, I believe, thankful to this Parliament that they were sent forward, even under compulsion, because they will feel in after years proud of the fact that they participated in this war, and we hope they will participate in it to save liberty, justice, and democracy and to prevent the domination of this world by the Germans.

I have very strong views on another matter which has been frequently mentioned in this debate, one that I have mentioned on other occasions during the present session. I will not use, in describing it, the term that is quite often used, because I think that term does not set forth its real meaning. I refer to taxation. We must have taxation that will make the people realize that we are undergoing a real strain on account of this war. My hon. friend, the president of the Patriotic Fund (Sir Herbert Ames) had a slogan, " Give until it hurts." I suggest that the Minister of Finance should tax the people until it hurts. We cannot expect to have conscription carried into effect and our young men who are sent to the front go forward satisfied unless they feel that those who are left at home also are bearing a heavy burden. This is not the case at the present time. I know in my own city men who are not being reached in any exceptional way by taxation, men of wealth who are not being forced to pay one red cent into the treasury of this country except through the tariff. These men also are neglecting their duty; they are financial shirkers. And if we are dealing with the men who are shirking their duty for service overseas why not deal also with the men who are shirking their duties at home? The income tax has been mentioned. I have a letter to-day from a very prominent citizen of Lethbridge giving his views on conscription. He declares himself in favour of conscription, but says, also, that he was in favour of the conscription of wealth—he uses those words. He intimates that, though he has an income of about $10,000 a year, he was not being reached in any way. He says that he and such as he ought to be reached, that there ought to be some form of taxation that will make them realize that the war is taking place and that they have to do their duty as much as the men who are forced to go overseas to defend the country. This gentleman is a liberal contributor to the Patriotic Fund, the Red Cross, and other good movements; he is one to whom we can go at any time and get a generous contribution for a good cause. Still, he feels that he is not doing his duty and that he ought to be taxed. The Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) told us this afternoon that financially everything was all right. But we must remember that when this war is over financially things may be all wrong. Now is the time to get at the people. They are prosperous; they are making money, many of them making money out of the prosperity due to this war. We should not hesitate to impose income taxes upon our people, and heavy income taxes. I could mention case after case that strengthens my opinion in favour of a tax of this nature. We do not want any favouritism in our war policy; everybody should be forced to make sacrifices at some time or other. There are many men of wealth who are not doing their part in this war. While many are giving handsomely to the Red Cross and the Patriotic Fund, everybody is not doing so. Many are not doing anything to maintain our position in this war If they will not do their duty voluntarily, then let us force these shirkers to come through with good contributions directly to the public treasury.

In closing, I wish to give expression to what I believe to be our duty at this time. I think it is our duty to establish in this country a government representative of all classes and all occupations—at least the occupations necessary to the prosecution of the war. In saying this, I make no reflections upon the Government or any member of it. In speaking as I do I wish to make reference to labour and agriculture especially. I quite appreciate the attitude that the labour men take in this matter of conscription. In my own city, the labour men are demanding what is called the conscription of wealth. They are quite satisfied to have conscription of manhood if there is conscription of wealth. But there are the same feelings between employers and employees as in times of peace. They want to see the man with money doing his part. If we had a Government at this time, whether partisan, or coalition, or National, with a real representative of labour, as one of its members, a man who had the confidence of labour from the Atlantic to the Pacific, I think we should avoid, for instance, strikes in the coal mines of western Canada; I think we should get the labouring men behind conscription and every other war measure.

Again, with regard to agriculture, there is talk, for instance, of fixing the price of wheat, and other measures affecting the farm. All this could be best done by having in the Government a real representative of the farmers, a man who could go to the farmers and have such influence with them that he could get them to do what is necessary. There are men of that kind, I know, in western Canada—big men, men of influence and ability, men thoroughly in earnest about this war. In all honesty, we cannot have a successful prosecution of the war until we have in existence in this country a government that has the confidence, not of one party only, but of the whole people. That is the request I make to-night—that we constitute in this country, for the period of the war at any rate, a government that shall have the confidence of the people, that will prosecute the war to a successful issue, a government that will not be for party but will be for the state entirely and all the time. If we have a government of that kind from now on until the conclusion of the war, many of the problems that face us will be solved; much of discord that exists will pass away.

I think I have made my position clear. I am in favour of conscription because I think it is the only possible method we now have left of providing reinforcements for our men at the front. I will support the measure and I will appear before my people and defend my course. I am satisfied that, from their record since the commencement of the present war to the present, they will endorse the attitude which I take with the view of doing everything possible to assist in carrying on this war to a successful conclusion.

On motion of Mr. Wilcox the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Sir Thomas White the House adjourned at 10.20 p.m.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

LABOUR STRIKE IN WESTERN MINES.

DIRECTOR OF COAL OPERATIONS APPOINTED.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister): I desire to lay on the Table two Orders in Council with respect to the difficulties which have occurred in the provinces of British Columbia and Alberta, in the district known as District 18. One of these Orders in Council constitutes a Director of Coal Operations for that District; the other appoints Mr. W. H. Armstrong, of the city of Vancouver to that position.

STATEMENT BY MR. L. J. GAUTHIER.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. L. J. GAUTHIER (St. Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, on my arrival here this morning, I took cognizance of the remarks made by you on Friday last and reported in Hansard of that day. In deference to your wishes as there expressed, I desire to say that there was no intention in my mind to reflect on you, Sir, when speaking on the amendment of the hon. member for Berthier (Mr. Barrette). My statement was directed against the Government. If anything in my remarks can be construed as reflecting on the Chair, I withdraw it.

PRIVATE BILLS.

FIRST READING OF SENATE BILLS.

Bill No. 101, respecting The Canada Preferred Insurance Company.—Mr. Stevens.

Bill No. 102, respecting The Western Canada Accident and Guarantee Insurance Company.—Mr. Bradbury.

THIRD READING.

Bill No. 86, respecting the Western Life Assurance Company.—Mr. Schaffner.

TORONTO, HAMILTON AND BUFFALO RAILWAY COMPANY.

House again in committee on Bill No. 39, respecting the Toronto, Hamilton and Buffalo Railway Company (Mr. Stewart), Mr. Blain in the Chair.

Mr. T. J. STEWART: I propose that this Bill should be amended by striking out sections 1 and 2, and I think that in that form it might be read the third time. I do not desire to take up the time of the committee in explaining the Bill, because I have done this once or twice already.

Mr. G. C. WILSON (Wentworth): This Bill affects only the town of Dundas and not any other part of the country. I am opposed to the withdrawal of sections 1 and 2, and I take that position at the request of the Town Council of Dundas whose representatives were present at the meeting of the committee by which this Bill was considered. At the meeting the Toronto, Hamilton and Buffalo Railway Company was represented by counsel, and the town of Dundas was represented by the mayor and members of the town council. The provision of the Bill granting an extension of twenty-nine years was opposed, and the committee amended it so as to provide for an extension of five years. If the House approves of that, I have nothing to say against the Bill; but I do object to dropping clauses 1 and 2. The Bill was carefully considered by the committee and there was a large majority in favour of the amendment, and I believe that the Bill should carry as it is.

Mr. T. J. STEWART: Considering the course the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. G. C. Wilson) has taken, it will be necessary for me to explain the Bill. This Bill arises through an agreement made between the town of Dundas and the Hamilton and Dundas Street Railway Company for the removal of freight to and from the town. Dundas is in a valley, and no steam roads go there, and it is necessary that the freight should be removed by electric railway. The agreement was for a period of twenty-one years, which was as long as it could be made, but it was provided in the agreement that the town of Dundas, if it chose, might pass a by-law, and get it approved by the Ontario Legislature, extending the term for twenty-nine years more, making a total of fifty years. This was afterwards done. The Hamilton and Dundas Street Railway Company entered into an agreement with the Toronto, Hamilton and Buffalo Railway Company, under which the latter company was to take the freight from the former at the end of their electric track. Practically, the action of the Ontario Legislature ratified the agreement with the Toronto, Hamilton and Buffalo Railway Company, but that legislature could not ratify it formally because the Toronto, Hamilton and Buffalo Railway has a Dominion charter, while the other road has a local charter. The agreement with the Toronto, Hamilton and Buffalo Railway Company could be ratified only by this Parliament. The company has come here to ask this Parliament to confirm the rights given by the town of Dundas, and to make this agreement binding for fifty years. The Toronto, Hamilton and Buffalo Railway Company has come here in good faith expecting that its agreement will be ratified by this Parliament. The committee saw fit to refuse that ratification. But, instead of simply refusing, they did that which, I am advised by the Law Clerk of this House, they had no right to do. The town of Dundas, and the Toronto, Hamilton and Buffalo Railway Company were represented before the committee, but the Hamilton and Dundas Railway Company was not represented. The committee amended the Bill so as to provide that the time fixed should be five years instead of twenty-nine years. In my opinion they had the right to confirm or to refuse the agreement for twenty-nine years, but this is the only legal right that the committee had.

The committee did not follow these rules but made a new agreement in the absence of the Hamilton and Dundas Street Railway which could not be legally done under the agreement. For that reason and because of their refusing to allow us to proceed with our Bill, I made the motion today to have it withdrawn. The town of Dundas is objecting to this Bill because they say that the Toronto, Hamilton and Buffalo Railway Company have no right to keep their cars in front of the doors of the people in Dundas. The Toronto, Hamilton and Buffalo Railway Company were not responsible for that for the simple reason that they were using the tracks of the Hamilton and Dundas Street Railway Company and therefore they did not have control of the track or the use of the track. But the people of the town of Dundas say it is unfair to keep these freight cars in front of the people's doors and the Toronto, Hamilton and Buffalo Railway company agreed to an expense of $15,000 for buying the right of way and removing the cars to some switching place in Dundas that would be suitable. That removed that objection. Then the town of Dundas said there was another objection; they did not want to be bothered by the smoke nuisance. They wanted the Toronto, Hamilton and Buffalo Company to buy two electric motors for removing freight cars that would cost the company $80,000. The interest on that investment would be $4,800 while the total profit obtained from handling freight in Dundas is only $5,000 and some odd dollars. Therefore the company said that there was not enough in it and said they were quite willing to drop out. The authorities of the town of Dundas said: We would be very glad. The hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Wilson) told me that they would be very glad if we would drop out of the town. The mayor of Dundas said that he would be very glad if our company would drop out but when we asked for the privilege of having our Bill withdrawn, they said: No, I do not know what answer to make to them. They want to force us to accept a Bill that we will not accept. I do not think it is fair that the company I represent should be forced to accept a Bill they do not want. For that reason I ask this committee to allow the company to withdraw these clauses and give the Bill its third reading.

Mr. NICKLE: When this Bill was before the Railway Committee it was well discussed. This is not a Bill that in any way touches the riding I represent, but I was in the Railway Committee when the matter was up for discussion. Shortly, the facts are these: Twenty-one years ago the town of Dundas entered into an arrangement with the street railway company. The agreement was made for a term of fifty years. By a provision of the Ontario statutes of that time, a municipality was prevented from entering into an agreement for a term exceeding twenty-one years. The municipality recognized that the agreement was illegal beyond the 21 years, and so also did the street railway company, who went to the legislature and had the agreement ratified in so far as it affected Dundas and the street railway company. I am a bit ahead, however, of my story in this respect. The street railway company subsequently to its entering into the agreement with the town of Dundas, made an arrangement with what I shall call the steam railway company by which the street railway company extended to the steam railway company certain privileges over the street railway company's tracks for a period of fifty years. That agreement was also ratified by the Ontario Legislature. For some reason that was not disclosed to the committee, the steam railway company, which had its incorporation from this Parliament, stood by for twenty years and never came to secure the ratification of the agreement in so far as it was concerned. At the expiration of twenty years they come before this Parliament, and in the face of the most acute objections from the town of Dundas, who assert that the main street of their town is being destroyed, that their citizens are being annoyed by the smoke and noise incidental to railway traffic, try to force upon Dundas an agreement for twenty-nine years, which the town of Dundas does not want. I cannot understand why the street railway company were not represented before the committee. This Bill was not before the committee once, but, I think possibly twice or thrice, and if the street railway company wishes to be heard there is no reason why they should not have been present. The committee felt that they were confronted with this difficulty: It seemed to be an obvious hardship to throw the Bill out altogether because that would practically deprive the town of Dundas of steam railway accommodation. It is all very well for the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Stewart) to come here and say that they are quite prepared to drop the Bill and leave the town of Dundas entirely helpless. The committee thought that Dundas was entitled to protection. As the two railway companies and the town had entered into an agreement that was at its inception illegal, it was felt that the town of Dundas should not be compelled to recognize a twenty-nine years' extension or to submit to an agreement that was working great hardship to its citizens. At the time the agreements were made between the two railways and the town the policy of this Parliament, and the policy of the Legislature of Ontario, was against protracted agreements, because they felt that the rights of the people might not be adequately protected. It would be unreasonable that this Parliament should impose on the town of Dundas an agreement for a further term of twenty-nine years when the railway company most particularly concerned stood by for twenty-one years without seeking parliamentary ratification knowing that at the expiration of twenty-one years if ratification was not obtained from this Parliament neither Dundas nor the street railway company could compel them to carry out that agreement now they have come and asked for a further extension of twenty years because they think it an advantageous agreement. If it had been a disadvantageous agreement they could have repudiated responsibility after twenty-one years.

Mr. STEWART: We do not ask to be relieved of responsibility. We brought this Bill here and we ask to be allowed to withdraw these clauses. We do not create any liability. The lawyer from Kingston, being a lawyer, ought to know that very well. He is mistaken when he says that the agreement has been in existence for less than twenty-one years. The agreement has been in existence for less than that, for about twenty years and it has another year to run. We are advised by more than half a dozen lawyers that the committee have no right whatever to pass that limitation for five years and they have no right to make a renewal of the agreement. We ask that we be allowed to withdraw those clauses. We are not treating the town of Dundas unfairly. Furthermore the Toronto, Hamilton and Buffalo Company is under a Dominion charter. They want to have the freight removed by electric power. One of the arguments is that the Dominion Railway Board has no power in this transaction because one portion of the road is under an Ontario charter and the other under a Dominion charter. If that be true, the town of Dundas if they have no other purpose in view, on the face of it, would not insist on what they are doing to-day because if the Dominion Railway Commission have no authority to order these cars to be removed by electric power they could not so order them. But, we have agreed to allow such legislation to go through this House as would place the Toronto, Hamilton and Buffalo Company entirely under the Dominion Railway Board. We have offered to do everything that was fair but we want the two clauses left out of this Bill. We are not going to accept the Bill as it is and we take the ground that the committee have no right to amend the Bill. Therefore, we should be allowed to amend these clauses.

Mr. G. C. WILSON (Wentworth): The remarks of the hon. gentleman for West Hamilton (Mr. Stewart) would lead one to think that we were asking that this road be electrified right away. The town of Dundas is not asking any such thing. The railway company is asking for an extension for twenty-nine years. We, in turn, in the town of Dundas, have asked that it be extended for five years only, and then, if the company comply with the regulations and do what is right by the town, there will be nothing to prevent Parliament further extending the time. Our request is a fair and reasonable one. The matter was well threshed out in the committee. The hon. member for West Hamilton is not interested in this railway, while the town of Dundas is. I have a letter from the mayor of the town, which I shall read. It is as follows:

Dundas, Ont., Canada,
June 23, 1917.

Copy of Resolution.

Whereas, Bill No. 39 respecting T. H. & B. Railway was amended by the Railway Committee of the House of Commons to provide for the termination of the agreement between T. H. & B. Ry. and H. & D. Ry. in November, 1922, and

Whereas, the T. H. & B. Ry. have notified our manufacturers that their freight service will probably be withdrawn in November, 1918, and Whereas, Bill No. 39 has yet to be passed by the House, and the T. H. & B. have threatened to withdraw the clauses therein relating to said agrement.

Be it resolved,

That this council request our local member, G. C. Wilson, Esq., M.P., to use his best endeavours to prevent the withdrawal of the amended clauses referred to and to have the clauses as amended by the Railway Committee adopted by the House.

And that a copy of this resolution be forwarded to G. C. Wilson, Esq., M.P., and to Richard Blain, Esq., M.P., Chairman of Railway Committee of House of Commons.

Chas. E. Dickson, Mayor.

Let me further say that this is a threat on the part of the railway company that they will withdraw their freight service. This whole matter was threshed out in the committee. The Toronto, Hamilton and Buffalo railway at its inception, wanted $30,000 from the town. That demand was turned down by the people and the railway want to get their hands on our throat again, and practically strangle the town if this House gives them permission to do so. I do not think the House will. I think that the House will agree that it is fair to give a five year extension and if the railway take their cars off the streets and put in their own sidings and so on, appropriate action can be taken. The company do not own a mile of track or a piece of property in the town. They run over the Hamilton and Dundas railway; they do not own a siding, as all the sidings are private. Therefore it is not taking anything away from the company or interfering with their rights, and I hope the committee will agree to this clause as amended.

Mr. T. J. STEWART: If my contentions are right, the railway committee of this House had no right whatever to pass this amendment. Then I do not think it would be wise for the House to adopt it. If there is any doubt about the right of the committee to amend the Bill in any way, then I do not suppose the House will want to pass the Bill with that amended clause in. Why should we not allow the Bill to stand over until to-night and have legal opinion on it? I have a legal opinion, and your solicitors tell me that the committee had no right to do this. I did not know that this opposition was coming up to-day. The town of Dundas did not say that they were going to oppose the Bill. Mr. Wilson has said all along that the town would be glad if the company would withdraw it, and now to-day I have no one here except myself. There were lawyers in the committee who took the ground that the committee had no right to make the amendment. Mr. Wilson never gave me any idea he would oppose the withdrawing of this clause, and so I think that, to say the least, it is playing a little sharp.

Mr. G. C. WILSON: If there is sharp practice I am not guilty. The Bill was brought up in my absence on Friday. I have no excuse for not being here, but had I known it was coming up I would have been here. I am following the instructions of the town, the only corporation really interested in this matter. The hon. member for Hamilton (Mr Stewart) is not interested, as the railway does not run through his constituency. Practically the only reason why he should take an interest in the Bill is that he must be interested in the T. H. and B. more than in the town of Dundas, and I would ask to have the Bill put through as it is.

Mr. T. J. STEWART: I can assure you I am not interested in any way in the T. H. and B. railway. I never had any stock in it and never intend to. I am not interested except that I was asked to allow the Bill to go through in my name, and I agreed. After the Bill had been before the House for some time I was informed that the town of Dundas was going to oppose it. My hon. friend from Dundas (Mr. Wilson) and I have always been exceedingly friendly, and I am very sorry that this clash has come up between us. I am interested in this just as any member is interested in a Bill which he undertakes to put through the House; it is his duty to be fair and honest to the persons in whose behalf the Bill is introduced.

Mr. NESBITT: I suggest that we let the Bill stand and let these gentlemen get together.

Mr. G. C. WILSON: I have tried that three times already.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Blain): The committee will notice in the first section of the Bill, which I have just read, a change was made in the date; instead of extending it for the full period it has been extended only until 1922, that is an extension of five years.

Mr. NESBITT: Is that one of the clauses to which the hon. member for Hamilton objects?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Blain): That is the clause now before the committee. The hon. member for Hamilton moves that this clause be struck out, along with another clause that is to come later, clause 2.

Mr. CARROLL: Would not that kill the Bill altogether?

Mr. NESBITT: We do not know anything about the agreement. The members of the Railway Committee who were present when it was discussed no doubt know all about it, but unfortunately I had to go to another committee on that day. I think we had better allow the Bill to stand till we see if we cannot get some more information.

Mr. T. J. STEWART: I am a little surprised at the movement to put the Bill through. No one has had the courage to say that my contention that the committee had no right to make the amendment. Then why should anyone try to shove something through that has no right to go through? Why not allow the Bill to stand over until to-night in order that it may be looked into?

Mr. CARROLL: If I remember rightly, this Bill has been before the committee at five or six sittings, and I do not think our allowing it to stand over until to-night or for two weeks will get us any further, because the parties who could not agree in the committee after five or six sittings are not likely to come together now. As to the legal question which the hon. member for Hamilton brings up, if this Parliament has the right to extend the agreement for twenty-nine years, as the company are asking, I, as a layman, would say that we certainly had the right to extend it for five years.

Mr. T. J. STEWART: Do you contend that this Government have a right to make an agreement to bind me when I am in British Columbia, or somewhere else, and have had nothing to do with the making of it?

Mr. CARROLL: That is what my hon. friend was trying to impose on Dundas. The town did not want to accept twenty-nine years, but the hon. member and his friends were trying to force on the town an agreement which it did not want. My only reason for rising is that as a member of the committee I do not believe that the company should be given any further extension of time in this matter, or that further consideration would get us any further than we are now.

Mr. KNOWLES: While the members of the committee may have had opportunity of familiarizing themselves with this somewhat complicated matter—a matter which is evidently of very great importance—I accept in good faith what the member for Hamilton (Mr. T. J. Stewart) an hon. gentleman in good standing in the House—has said, as indicating that certain things connected with this matter should be considered more thoroughly than members of this committee are capable of considering them. I speak now more particularly of members who did not attend the sittings of the Railway Committee; for if the names were polled it would doubtless be found that not more than half the members of the committee were present at the meetings. For my part, I am quite incapable of expressing anything like an intelligent opinion on this controversial matter without having discussed it or having had an opportunity of looking into it more fully. In deference to the member for Hamilton, and with due regard to the merits of the case, I think that we should let this matter stand for consideration at a future date. This would be only fair to those who are called upon to express an opinion; to do so now would be merely making a shot in the dark. I move, therefore, that further consideration of the Bill be deferred.

Mr. T. J. STEWART: Some hon. gentlemen have said that the committee held four, five or six meetings. I wish to say—and I am sure that no hon. gentleman can successfully contradict me—that the committee really had only one meeting. It is all very fine to say that we had half a dozen meetings, but the rules provide that the quorum of the committee shall consist of a certain number of members, and owing to inability to make a quorum we had only one meeting, and that was the last time the committee was called before the Bill came to the House.

Mr. CARVELL: I feel like seconding the motion of the member for Moosejaw (Mr. Knowles) for this reason: I dislike registering my vote in respect of a matter about which I know nothing whatever. I thought that when the member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) took part in the discussion this afternoon, he would give us some explanation of the matter, but unfortunately he did not go far enough to convey anything to my mind. I say frankly that if I were called upon to vote on this Bill I should not know how to vote; I do not know anything about it. I would like to see gentlemen representing the different aspects of the question take sufficient time to explain their respective contentions, so that those who were not in the Railway Committee would be able to vote intelligently on the subject. Otherwise, I suggest that consideration of the matter be deferred until we get the necessary information.

Mr. NICKLE: I shall again endeavour to make myself clear, perhaps taking more time than I originally did. My information concerning the matter is, of course, gained from the records and from the information given to the Railway Committee. Some twenty years ago the town of Dundas entered into an agreement with what I shall term the street railway company. By the terms of that agreement they gave certain rights and privileges over the streets of the town of Dundas to the street railway company for the term of fifty years.

Mr. T. J. STEWART: Agreement for twenty-one years.

Mr. NICKLE: They gave certain rights and privileges to the street railway company for the term of fifty years, as defined by the agreement. At that time it was against the policy of the provincial legislature to permit municipalities to bind themselves for a longer term than twenty-one years. Possibly the member for Hamilton is right in this: that the agreement was stated to be of legal effect for twenty-one years; and that it would become legally binding for the further term of twenty-nine years if legal ratification was secured from the province and from the Dominion. The street railway company then entered into an arrangement with what I shall term the steam railway company, by which they gave running rights and privileges over the steam railway company for a period of fifty years.

Mr. NESBITT: When was that agreement entered into?

Mr. NICKLE: Very shortly after the original arrangement was made between the town of Dundas and the street railway company.

Mr. CARVELL: Was the town a party to this transaction?

Mr. NICKLE: The town was not a party to that agreement, but there is no doubt that the town was cognizant of the fact that the agreement was being made.

Mr. NESBITT: That is, the agreement between the street railway company and the steam railway company?

Mr. NICKLE: Yes.

Mr. T. J. STEWART: Did not the town of Dundas make the agreement with the Hamilton and Dundas Street Railway Company first?

Mr. NICKLE: Yes.

Mr. STEWART: You said that the town was not a party to the agreement.

Mr. NICKLE: I said that the town of Dundas was not a party to the agreement made between the steam railway company and the street railway company; but there is no doubt but that the town of Dundas had knowledge that the agreement was being made and approved.

Mr. KNOWLES: What ground has the hon. gentleman for believing that the municipality was cognizant of the making of the agreement?

Mr. NICKLE: If I may be permitted to finish what I have to say, I shall endeavour to make the matter abundantly clear; I shall then be glad to answer any questions that may be put.

The town of Dundas and the street railway company then made application to the Ontario Legislature for ratification of the agreements between the town of Dundas and the street railway company and between the steam railway company and the street railway company and the provincial legislature ratified the two agreements. The net legal effect of that seems to have been that in so far as the provincial legislature could ratify the agreements they were binding on the steam railway company, the steam railway company, the street railway company, and the town of Dundas. The steam railway company, however, was incorporated by Dominion charter and was therefore amenable to the principles of Dominion law. By the principles of Dominion law at that time, the steam railway company and the street railway company had no right to enter into an agreement for a longer term than twenty-one years. For some reason not explained, neither the town, the steam railway company nor the street railway company ever came to the Dominion Parliament and asked for a ratification of the agreement between the steam railway company and the street railway company. Twenty years have passed; conditions in the town of Dundas have very radically changed. It is admitted by all parties that the agreements were valid as among the three for the term of twenty-one years, but not of legal effect—although not void—for any term beyond the twenty-one years. After the expiration of twenty years the steam railway company comes to this House and asks that the town of Dundas be compelled to recognize the agreement as drawn twenty years ago for a further term of twenty-nine years after the expiration of about one year. The town of Dundas says: no; we were not a party to that agreement between the steam railway company and the street railway company.

Mr. NESBITT: When the street railway company and the steam railway company went to the provincial Government to have the agreement ratified, was the town of Dundas willing that that agreement should be ratified for the term of fifty years?

Mr. NICKLE: I say it concurred in that; it was agreeable, and the agreement was ratified by the provincial legislature for the term of fifty years. But the town of Dundas now says this: the steam railway company, by virtue of its agreement with the street railway company was bound only for the term of twenty-one years. For twenty years they slept on their rights. They now realize they have a good thing, and, although they could have escaped liability at the expiration of twenty-one years if the agreement had been to their disadvantage—their solicitor admitted this when I questioned him—their agreement not having been ratified by this Parliament, they now ask Parliament to make the agreement binding for a futher period of twenty-nine years. The position the Railway Committee took was this: if you wanted that agreement ratified you should have come to Parliament twenty years ago and obligated yourselves to perform your part of the contract. If through your laches twenty years have passed and you now, because you think it an advantageous privilege, ask Parliament to do what the town does not want you to do, we are not going to impose on the town any limitations or restrictions that are not now acceptable to its people. The steam railroad does not own the tracks; they have no sidings of their own, the sidings being privately owned by companies or individuals; the main track belongs to the street railway company. The citizens of the town are inconvenienced by smoke and noise and life is made unbearable on the main street of the town. The committee said we are not going to do now what the policy of the Dominion Parliament was against at the time the agreement was made: that is, bind the generation of to-day by an arrangement illegally entered into by the generation of twenty years ago. Then the committee were confronted with this problem: The twenty-one-year agreement expires in about one year, and if it is not extended, at the end of about a year the town of Dundas would be deprived of its steam railway connection.

Since the committee said that the agreement should be extended for five years, the steam railway company have notified the town of Dundas that at the expiration of twenty-one years, the legal term, they are going to discontinue the operation of their road in the town of Dundas and then Dundas will have no steam railway connection. The committee said: That is not a fair thing to do, you will have had twenty-one years' use of this franchise in Dundas, and if the town does not want to extend the agreement for 29 years, then you should stand by the agreement for a few years so that all the parties may have an opportunity of adjusting their conditions. The hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. T. J. Stewart) raises the point—and I can express no legal opinion on it—that the Railway Committee have no right to make a new agreement for the street railway company and the steam railway company; that they have a right only to ratify the original agreement or throw out the Bill. The hon. member says the committee have no right to extend the agreement for four or five years. The steam railway company asked that the original agreement between them and the street railway company should be ratified. The steam railway company says: If you do not ratify the agreement in toto, we will quit in a year. The Railway Committee says: You should do nothing of the sort; under all the conditions you should give the town of Dundas a reasonable service, say for four or five years.

Mr. CARVELL: What does the town say?

Mr. NICKLE: The town says: We want a chance to turn around and make other arrangements; give an extension of the agreement for five years more; then, if the steam railway company are willing to build their own tracks and get off our main street, we are willing to concur in a reasonable arrangement, but the generation of to-day are not willing to be bound for twenty-nine years more owing to the ill-advised arrangement of twenty years ago.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The town of Dundas and the street railway company are both bound by the agreement for fifty years, that having been ratified by the provincial legislature.

Mr. NICKLE: That is, the agreement between the town and the street railway company is made applicable for fifty years.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The Toronto, Hamilton and Buffalo Railway Company come here and simply ask that, so far as they are concerned, being a Dominion corporation, this agreement already ratified as to the town and as to the street railway company, shall be ratified by this Parliament as to the Toronto, Hamilton and Buffalo Railway Company, and made binding.

Mr. NICKLE: That is not the fact. They ask that an agreement between the street railway company and the steam railway company to which the town was not a party by signature, be made binding for the term of fifty years, and by implication then, it would be binding on the town, and the steam railway company would have the right to run steam cars over the street railway company's tracks for 29 years from the expiration of the 21 year term.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Has the Ontario legislature not ratified the agreement between the street railway company and the Toronto Hamilton and Buffalo Railway Company?

Mr. NICKLE: Yes.

Mr. PUGSLEY: We have an agreement between the town and the street railway company ratified by the provincial legislature for fifty years—

Mr. NESBITT: And the town was agreeable to that?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Yes. We have an agreement between the street railway company and the Toronto, Hamilton and Buffalo Railway Company also ratified by the provincial legislature, and made binding as against the street railway company for fifty years. Therefore, we have the provincial legislature, by legislation within its jurisdiction, binding both the town of Dundas and the street railway company for fifty years, but it is alleged that the provincial legislature has no jurisdiction over the Toronto, Hamilton and Buffalo Railway Company, it having a Dominion charter. As I understand it, the Toronto, Hamilton and Buffalo Railway Company is asking that that agreement be ratified by this Parliament, which ratification will have the effect of making the agreement binding on the three corporations. Has this Parliament any right as against the town of Dundas and as against the street railway company to alter the legislation of the Ontario Legislature? I do not think so, and I would agree at the present time with the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. T. J. Stewart) that this Parliament must reject the Bill altogether or else ratify the agreement, it cannot alter the agreement.

Mr. STEWART: The hon. member for St. John is correct in his view. The hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) attempted to keep back what was favourable to my side of the question. He wanted to think that the town of Dundas had nothing whatever to do with this agreement. The town entered into this agreement with the Hamilton and Dundas Street Railway Company, knowing perfectly well that they were going to make a bargain with the steam road. It was understood that these three or four parties were going to enter into this agreement. What difference does it make to the town of Dundas what railroad takes the freight from the Dundas road? The Hamilton and Dundas Street Railway Company made an agreement with the steam railway company before the town passed the by-law asking the legislature for an extension of twenty-nine years. The town of Dundas was pleased with the agreement, and asked the Ontario Legislature to make it binding. Now they come here to-day and object to our withdrawing the Bill. If the Bill goes through with an extension of five years, we will not accept it, but we are willing to permit such legislation to be put through as will place the Toronto, Hamilton and Buffalo Railway Company entirely under the control of the Dominion Railway Board, and if they are under that Board, the town of Dundas will surely have no complaint to make. The railway will have to comply with every order issued by the Railway Board, and there can therefore be no unfair treatment. Hon. members will see that there is something that has not been brought to light, because the town made this agreement in good faith, and now because we want our side ratified, and put in the same position as the town of Dundas, they say: No. They are like the dog in the manger; they do not want to eat and they will not let anybody else eat. I appeal to hon. members to allow this Bill to stand over until we get a legal opinion on the matter. I claim that the committee has no right to alter the agreement. Surely hon. gentlemen are not going to press this Bill through to-day if this Parliament has no right to alter the agreement.

Mr. NESBITT: How long after the original agreement is drawn up between the three parties, was it confirmed by the Ontario Legislature?

Mr. STEWART: At the first session of the Ontario Legislature after the agreement was signed.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The questions that arise in connection with this Bill seem to be of a somewhat complex character, both so far as the facts are concerned and in respect of the legal questions that have arisen. It is alleged, as I understand it, by the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. T. J. Stewart); that the applicant companies have the right either to have the agreement ratified in its entirety or not at all, and that this House has really no jurisdiction to make another agreement between the parties.

That point is emphasized by what was said by the hon. member for St. John. As I understand it, the only change that is made in the agreement by the terms of this Bill is with respect to the time it shall be in force. Under the circumstances it seems to me that the considerations that have been put forward might very well be referred to the Department of Justice for consideration and report. I would, therefore, move that the committee rise and report progress.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterick).

LIEUTENANT-COLONEL McSPADDEN.

* Mr. MURPHY:

1. Has Lieutenant-Colonel McSpadden, of Vancouver, been on the pay-roll of the Government since the outbreak of war?
2. If not, from what date did he begin to draw pay?
3. What amount has he received to date, and what have been his duties?
4. Has the Government hired Lieutenant-Colonel McSpadden's automobile?
5. If so, from what date, and how much has been paid therefor?
6. For what purpose was the said automobile used by the Government?
7. Was the chauffeur of the said automobile a man with military rank?
8. If so, did he receive double pay?
9. Did the said Lieutenant-Colonel McSpadden sell to the Government a site for the drill hall in Grandview at the east end of Vancouver?
10. If so, how much did the Government pay therefor?
11. What is the description of the lots purchased for the site of the said drill hall?

Sir EDWARD KEMP:

1. Yes.
2. Answered by 1 and 3.
3. $7,106.35 to 31st May, 1917. Officer commanding 11th Regiment (Home Guard), from 10th August, 1914, to date. Lieutenant-Colonel McSpadden's regiment defended the wireless station at Point Grey. Part of the battalion also defended Prince Rupert in the early days of the war. The force was used for defence on bridges and other public works. He recruited a large portion of the 7th Battalion, 1st Contingent, also 199th Irish Fusiliers, and a large number of drafts of other battalions.

GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS—TRACADIE SIDING.

Mr. SINCLAIR:

1. Is there a siding on the Intercolonial Railway at Tracadie, N.S., for the accommodation of one Abram Myatt?
2. If so, when was it built?
3. After being built, was it taken up and the rails removed?
4. If so, were they replaced, and on what date?
5. Why was this siding taken up?
6. Why was it replaced?
7. Did Abram Myatt pay anything to the Intercolonial Railway on account of the said siding?
8. If so, when, and how much?

Mr. COCHRANE:

1. No. There is a public siding at Mileage 103.1, Mulgrave subdivision.
2. Siding was put in during July, 1916.
3. Rails were not removed, but frog and switch gear was taken up October 10, 1916.
4. Frog and switch gear was replaced on October 18, 1916.
5. Frog and switch gear was required for urgent need, equipping Halifax terminals for handling war supplies overseas.
6. To make the siding again available for use.
7. No.
8. Answered by No. 7.

MR. JOSEPH MAXIMILIAN DANIS.

Mr. MICHAUD:

1. Is Mr. Joseph Maximilian Danis an employee in any part of the Government service?
2. If so, when was he appointed?
3. Was he appointed a messenger on the House of Commons' staff?

3. No.
4. Answered by No. 3.
5. Yes.
6. From January 8 to March 22, 1917.
7. Yes.
8. $1,200.
9. Yes.
10. $600.
11. No.

MAJOR ALFRED LEFEBVRE.

Mr. PAPINEAU:

1. Has the Government since the 3rd of May last demanded the reimbursement of the separation allowance alleged to have been overpaid to the wife of Major Alfred Lefebvre?
2. If so, what has been the result of such demand?
3. Is the Government aware as to whether or not the said Major Alfred Lefebvre, whose wife may have unduly received the said separation allowance from August, 1916, to April, 1917, is in the service of the Government as Assistant Collector for Inland Revenue at Valleyfield, at the salary of $1,200 per annum?

Sir EDWARD KEMP:

1. Refund was demanded on May 2.

2. No result so far, but matter being pressed.

3. Captain Lefebvre signed an application for separation allowance, in which he stated that he had not been employed by the Dominion Government since 1st June, 1916. On reference to Department of Inland Revenue, it was learned that he drew full pay as deputy collector at Valleyfield, Quebec, during February, March, April and May, 1916, when he appears to have left the Civil Service.

MR. ARMAND LAVERGNE.

Mr. EDWARDS:

1. Has Armand Lavergne been appointed by this Government to obtain recruits or in any other military capacity?

2. If so, when and by whose order was he so appointed, what rank does he hold, and what pay does he receive?

3. How much money, if any, has been paid to the said Armand Lavergne for military services since the war began?

Sir EDWARD KEMP:

1. No.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. None.

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS.

RELEASE OF EDWARD LEVI BAUGH.

Mr. MURPHY moved:

For a copy of the reports made by the Trial Judge and the Penitentiary Surgeons in connection with the release from penitentiary of Edward Levi Baugh.

Mr. DOHERTY: There is no objection to producing these papers except the judge's report.

Mr. MURPHY: Very well.

Motion as amended agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MORNING SITTINGS DEFERRED.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN moved:

That on and from Tuesday the 26th instant, and until the end of the session, the House shall meet each day at 11 o'clock in the morning, and that in addition to the usual intermission at 6 o'clock, p.m., there shall be an intermission from one to three o'clock, p.m.

He said: In view of the considerable amount of business still before the House, and in view also of the apparently lengthy debate upon the Compulsory Service Bill, as to which of course there is no desire to prevent the fullest possible discussion, perhaps my right hon. friend would have no objection to the passing of this motion.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: My right hon. friend has alluded to the very important debate on the Compulsory Service Bill. I think nobody will complain of the length of the speeches that have been made or say that the debate has not served a useful purpose. I would ask my right hon. friend to let this motion stand at least until the debate on the Compulsory Service Bill has been concluded. After ample latitude has been given to every hon. member to speak on this Bill I shall have no objection to facilitating the business of the House as much as possible.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not want to be understood as complaining of the debate as it has proceeded; I am not speaking in a critical way at all; I think it has been a useful debate. My object in making this motion was to afford even greater opportunity to hon. members who desire to speak on the Bill. I could hardly undertake to let the motion stand until the debate is concluded because that might be a very large order indeed. I will, however, let it stand for the present and renew it perhaps in a couple of days. In the meantime we may ascertain what are the probabilities of concluding the debate within a reasonable period under present conditions.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Very well.

Hon. WM. PUGSLEY (St. John): I desire to interpose a very strong objection to having morning sessions. They are all right in the case of a parliament which rises at six o'clock in the evening, but this House sits until eleven and twelve, and if necessary, one o'clock in the morning. I think it is unfair to expect members who have attended the evening sessions to be present again in the morning at eleven o'clock. It has an injurious effect upon their health. I know that the attendance at morning sittings after a late night is very wearing upon one's health.

To hold morning sittings now would prevent the committees, including the Committee on Public Accounts, from discharging their duties. It is customary to have morning sittings only when the end of the session is in sight, and when, as my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) has suggested, it is the general sense of the House that it is desirable to get through. Now, we are led to believe, not only by what has been stated by the leader of the House, but also by what we see in the newspapers, that there is a very considerable amount of public business still to be considered, including some which has not yet been brought down. This indicates that it is too early to begin the morning sittings. I voice my own protest against such a proposal; I do not think it wise to begin the morning sittings at this stage of the session, for it will prevent members of the House from fairly and properly discharging their public duties.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: There will be opportunity to take into consideration what has been said when this motion is renewed. But meantime, I would point out that forenoon sittings are by no means a new departure in this Parliament. I have been familiar with them, and have had to endure them for many years in the past. Even since I entered this House twenty-one years ago, there has hardly been a session in which forenoon sittings have not been in vogue at some time, and often they have begun at an earlier stage of the session than this. The reason which the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) has advanced seems to me not against but rather in favour of the proposal; for, if there is, as he suggests, a great deal of public business still to be considered, there is a stronger case than there otherwise would be for beginning morning sittings at the earliest day. However, we will let the matter stand for the moment, and of course my hon. friend will have the right to renew his objections when the subject is again before the House.

Mr. MACDONALD: I would suggest that, especially if we are to have morning sittings, the adjournment at six o'clock should be until nine instead of until eight. That will not interfere with the progress of business. Adjournment only from six to eight means pretty rapid dining and a hurried return to the House. I think it would be better all around to make the hour nine o'clock.

Mr. NESBITT: My suggestion is that, no matter at what time we meet, we should adjourn not later than 11 o'clock in the evening. Let us not have any of these sittings until two o'clock in the morning.

Motion stands.

[Mr. Pugsley.]

ADJOURNMENT FOR DOMINION DAY.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN moved:

That when this House adjourns on Friday, the 29th day of June next, it stand adjourned until Tuesday, the 3rd day of July.

He said: The second of July has been set apart for very important ceremonies in commemoration of the fiftieth anniversary of Confederation, and it seems quite appropriate that we should adjourn on that day.

Motion agreed to.

MILITARY SERVICE ACT, 1917.

DEBATE CONTINUED ON MOTION FOR SECOND READING AND ON THE AMENDMENTS.

Consideration of the motion of the Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden (Prime Minister) for the second reading of Bill No. 75, Military Service Act, 1917, and the amendment of Sir Wilfrid Laurier thereto, and on the amendment to the amendment by Mr. Barrette, resumed from Friday, June 22.

Hon. Sir EDWARD KEMP (Minister of Militia and Defence): Mr. Speaker, since this war began the Canadian army in France has taken part in a good many difficult battles and has won for itself great credit and has brought great honour to Canada. The victory which seems to have attracted particular attention of late is Vimy Ridge. I have to-day received from Lord Beaverbrook the following letter:

Historical Section
Canadian War Records Office,
14 Clifford Street, Bond Street, W.1,
June 8th, 1917.

The Rt. Hon. Sir A. E. Kemp, K.C.M.G., M.P., Minister of Militia and Defence,
Ottawa, Canada.

Dear Sir Edward,—

I am sending you by registered post, under separate cover, to-day, two copies of an "Order of the Day," published by Field Marshal Sir Douglas Haig after the battle of Vimy Ridge. You will notice that he placed the capture of Vimy Ridge first in the Order. I have had these prepared on parchment and signed personally by Sir Douglas Haig. I suggest that one of them might be made use of in the House of Commons, Ottawa.

Will you kindly let me know if you receive these in due course, and if you approve of their form.

Yours faithfully,
Beaverbrook.

The special Order of the Day referred to is not long, and I am sure hon. members will be glad to hear it read. After reading it, I will lay it on the Table, and I would suggest that perhaps the Clerk of the House may have it framed that it may be preserved:

Special Order of the Day
By Field-Marshal Sir Douglas Haig,
GC.B., G.C.V.O., K.C.I.E.,
Commander-in-Chief, British Armies in France.

The Field-Marshal Commanding-in-Chief desires to express to all ranks his great satisfaction on the important successes achieved on the 9th instant by the First and Third Armies. The manner in which the operations were prepared and carried out reflects the greatest credit on commanders, staffs and troops.

The capture of the renowned Vimy Ridge is an achievement of the highest order of which Canada may well be proud.

The performance of the VI, VII and VIII Corps of the Third Army in surmounting the difficulties which confronted them is proof of very great skill and gallantry.

The Royal Artillery, Heavy, Siege and Field, by its untiring efforts and accurate fire, prepared the way for and supported the advance of the infantry in the most efficient manner.

The splendid work of the Royal Flying Corps under very adverse weather conditions and in face of most determined opposition has contributed largely to the success of the operations and calls for the highest praise.

The heavy branch of the Machine Gun Corps has been of material assistance and has, under difficult circumstances, played a useful part.

The Cavalry Corps and Corps Mounted Troops have taken the fullest advantage of such openings for cavalry action as the course of the operations has so far afforded.

The Royal Engineers, both in the field and in their work behind the line, have carried out their many duties with the thoroughness and efficiency in which they are never found wanting; while all the various special corps and services which took part in the battle, as well as the administrative services, and departments on which the armies depend for their maintenance, have taken their full share in bringing within reach the great success gained.

The Second, Fourth and Fifth Armies have played their part admirably in keeping the enemy employed on their respective fronts, while to the Fourth and Fifth Armies in particular belongs the credit of having opened the way for these fresh successes by their splendid achievements on the Somme and the Ancre.

The Commander-in-Chief desires to convey his warmest congratulations to all ranks of the armies which he has the honour to command on the great success already achieved by their untiring and self-sacrificing efforts, and on the prospects of further successes which have been opened.

D. Haig, F.M.

General Headquarters,
12th April, 1917.

In resuming this debate, I think there is more than one reason why we should approach the subject in a serious frame of mind. In the first place, we have sent overseas a tremendous army of over 330,000 troops, and the losses due to the war among these troops have been the cause of great hardship and suffering. Another reason is that there is a great difference of opinion in this House itself with respect to the course we desire to pursue. In the South African war we were very pleased and proud that even a small army volunteered to go overseas in support of a great principle. We were proud that we had men in this country who were brave, who were venturesome, who were patriotic, who were willing to volunteer for service on that occasion, and who thereby brought credit to their country.

When we look back to the time previous to August 1914 and consider what was in our minds then, when we consider the peace which prevailed not only in Canada but all over the world and when we remember the blessing of peace, we cannot but feel that if any one had predicted that by this time we would have recruited an army of over 400,000 and sent overseas an army of over 330,000, we would have said that the person responsible for such a prediction was hardly in a sane state of mind. Yet, that has been done by this country. That is one of the reasons why, taken in connection with the incidents to which I have referred, we should now be serious in respect to the discussion of this question.

The question before the House is whether there should be a new form of recruiting, whether we should go on in the old way or proceed by the system of the selective draft and it is on this point that there appears to be a wide difference of opinion. For myself I do not see why there should be any great difference of opinion. We are trying to meet existing conditions and I believe that this Bill will meet the conditions and give a fair measure of satisfaction in so far as enlistment is concerned. There has been a very strong feeling existing in many parts of the country in regard to what has taken place in the past and in regard to the method of recruiting which was adopted. Great pressure has been brought to bear on members of both sides of this House to formulate some system or scheme. Some members of this House during vacation, as well as during the time Parliament has been sitting, have visited the trenches in France and they have come back and told us many things which were interesting and many things upon which we might base our judgment in respect to future operations in regard to the carrying on of the war. I wish that some of my hon. friends in this House who are opposing this Bill could visit certain parts of the country and hear what fathers, mothers, sisters, brothers and orphans have to say and how they feel regarding the voluntary system on which we have been relying. In referring to that, I desire to say that it has performed its part, it has done good service and it was the only system which we could have proceeded upon, and I approve of it in so far as that is concerned. But, I wish some hon. gentlemen who are opposing the Bill could go among the people where the recruiting has been heaviest and hear what they have to say about the inequalities and injustices of voluntary enlistment. If they did this they would come back to this House with an entirely different opinion in respect to the Bill which is now under consideration.

This is no time for recrimination in this house. In the heat of debate sharp words pass from one side to the other and that has been the custom from time immemorial. At the present time, however, I feel that this should be absent from this discussion. There are no politics in this question, there is no room for politics or political advantage in any shape or form. I regret that there were no means found by which the coalition arrangement which was proposed could have been brought to a successful conclusion. As far as I am concerned, and I think I can speak for my colleagues, there was no one who criticised the proposal of the Prime Minister in saying to our opponents that he would let them have half the seats in the Cabinet. There was never any criticism raised in regard to that proposal of the Prime Minister and I believe that if it had been carried out it would have resulted in great advantage. Now that it has not been carried out, we must proceed to work out this problem in the best way possible in order to help to win the war. We cannot fail to admire the splendid exhibition of unanimity of feeling in regard to the method they have adopted in the United States with reference to enlistment. I wish we could feel in this country that we had advanced as they have advanced in that regard. My right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), in speaking to the motion, seemed to pay a good deal of attention to incidents spread over the last century but which did not seem to me to have very much bearing on the present situation. He referred also at some length, as did other speakers, to the question of the meaning of the Militia Act introduced into this House by his Government in 1904 and amended in that year. It was pointed out by himself, as it has been by other members of this House, that under this Act we could not send troops outside of the borders of this country to fight. I do not think that it is a very important matter for discussion as to whether that Act permitted us to do that or not. We have sent troops outside of the country and both sides have approved of the course which has been taken. However, it might be useful to refer to the Militia Act, 1904, and while opinions have been given to the House, and while the opinion of Sir Charles Fitzpatrick, the Minister of Justice of that day, seemed to set aside the theory propounded by the leader of the Opposition, yet there are some other opinions which to my mind are more important than any of the opinions that were given to the House. I am surprised that the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Lapointe), who is learned in the law, and other hon. members, have failed to bring to the attention of the House a very important opinion to which I am about to refer. While I say I do not think it is very important whether the Militia Act, 1904, for which the right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition, as he was then in power, is responsible, permitted us to send troops out of Canada or not, we might as well understand what that Act really did mean. I have no hesitation in concluding that it meant that we could send troops out of the country and that it was designed for that very thing. Since this war began a very important judgment was rendered by a jurist of high authority. I am sure that the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) will recognize the gentleman to whom I am going to refer as a very high authority because he not only bears his name but is considered to be one of the most eminent jurists to be found in the province of Quebec. Before this gentleman, Sir Francois Lemieux, there came a habeas corpus proceeding for the purpose of releasing Felix Pierre Fournier, private in the 171st battalion, directed to the officer commanding the battalion. The object of the proceeding was to have Private Fournier freed or discharged from service on the ground, among others, that Private Fournier's enlistment in a corps which was to be sent out of Canada was null and void because the Parliament of Canada had no power to create or organize an Expeditionary Force for service out of Canada. In Canadian Criminal Cases Reports, 1915-16, on page 415, is to be found a judgment of Sir Francis Lemieux, Chief Justice of the Superior Court of the province of Quebec. I shall read that part of the judgment which has reference to this particular case:

Another of petitioner's contentions is that Private Fournier's enlistment in the Expeditionary Force, i.e., in a corps which is to be sent abroad and merged with the English troops, is null, seeing that the Canadian Parliament is not vested with the necessary power or jurisdiction to create or organize such expeditionary forces and is legally empowered but to deal with the defence of the country.

And we have been cited section 91 of the B.N.A. Act, which reads as follows:: "It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons, to make laws for the peace, order and good government of Canada. . . . The exclusive authority of the Parliament of Canada extends to all matters concerning . . . 7. Militia, military and naval service and defence."

Such is the section of our constitution pointed to when it is contended that militia and military service are to be made use of for the defence of the country only and not to act as an auxiliary force for the benefit of another country.

On the other hand the Militia Act (R.S.C. ch. 41, Sec. 69) enacts that the Governor in Council may place the militia or any part thereof on active service anywhere in Canada and also beyond Canada, for the defence thereof, at any time when it appears advisable so to do by reason of emergency.

On this particular point, it will not be amiss to repeat with the most noteworthy of our public men, among whom are authorities of some repute on constitutional law, that from the moment Great Britain is at war, her colonies are equally at war. The fact that the Allies have captured all of Germany's colonies since the opening of hostilities is a striking case in point.

In my humble opinion, the defence of Canada implies not only the power to safeguard the territory itself and the lives and property of Canadians, it further includes the faculty recognized in international law to prevent, by all legitimate means, the invasion, ruin and sacking of the country, in attacking the enemy in his own country, pursuing him everywhere, destroying his resources, giving him no rest until he be reduced to utter powerlessness. The very legitimate necessity of opposing an onslaught quite naturally justifies the attack of the enemy in his own country or wherever he may seek refuge. It often is by taking the offensive, attacking and invading, that the defence of one's own country may be better attended to. It would indeed be imprudent, if not utterly reckless, for a country at war, to be content with a defensive strategy and to refrain from hostilities until the country were invaded and sacked.

Surely, it is useless to insist; it is obvious that Canada has the unquestionable constitutional right to raise troops and to send them overseas for the defence of the Empire, which defence embraces and guarantees that of Canada herself. The enlistment in an expeditionary corps is therefore legal and valid.

That is the part of the judgment of Sir Francis Lemieux which has reference to the point to which I have referred. As I have said, I do not think that the Militia Act as amended in 1904 need be discussed at any great length in its bearing on this point. It is clear to my mind that in the amendment of the Act made in 1904 it was intended that troops might be sent out of Canada, in accordance with my argument. If the argument of the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) should be correct, Canada would never have any enemies to invade her if they proceeded on this theory, because then what country would go outside its own borders? So it seems to me from that standpoint also, his argument falls to the ground.

Reference was also made by the right hon. leader of the Opposition to the fact that we in Canada need not fear invasion from Germany; but that if there was an invasion we would be visited with German insolence, cruelties and barbarities. That is no doubt true. If Germany invaded Canada we would have the same kind of insolence, cruelties and barbarities that she has visited upon Belgium and France. If we have not been subjected to those things it has been because of the assistance we ourselves have rendered in France, and because the armies of France and Britain met the enemy in France, and also because of the dominance of the British navy which guaranteed that Britain is still mistress of the seas. I do not believe in the theory that when we see the enemy just outside the three mile limit, or just beyond our borders on land, preparing to attack Canada, we should not proceed to attack him. It seems to me that there is very little indeed in such an argument.

The right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and other speakers have referred to a referendum, and my right hon. friend has moved an amendment providing for one on the question whether or not this Bill should be enforced. The right hon. gentleman asks, why should we not have a referendum? We have votes for soldiers. A Bill was passed providing that our soldiers might vote and that they could vote. At the time this Bill was passed, there were a great many soldiers in Canada who, under the Bill, would be allowed to vote, and very few soldiers at the front. Exactly the reverse condition exists to-day; there are very few soldiers in Canada, and a tremendous number at the front and in England. Can one conceive of anything more distasteful to the soldier himself when fighting in this struggle for his life and existence than to have such a question brought to his attention and have a ballot box stuck under his nose in the trenches if, in fact, such a thing would be allowed? Therefore it seems to me that our soldiers who are fighting so valiantly would be put under a tremendous handicap in respect to a referendum, in the first place in reference to the secrecy of the ballot. Every slacker might vote quietly and secretly, and as the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) has said, vote against the Bill coming into operation.

Another serious handicap would be the alien enemy vote, which no doubt would be of some consequence. We would, therefore, handicap our soldiers at the front by loading this referendum up with, first, a secret ballot, second, the slacker vote, and third, the alien enemy vote.

I have referred to voluntary recruiting. I believe that it has served a most excellent purpose. We have raised a tremendous army under it, but we desire now to improve the conditions under which enlistment takes place, and to adopt the selective draft system instead. The selective draft is also needed at the present time for the purpose of furnishing more troops to be sent to the front. I believe that such a proposal as this would have been necessary even if voluntary recruiting had kept pace with what it was in the earlier part of the war, because of the injustices, the inequalities, and the haphazard methods of voluntary enlistment, which have burned themselves into the hearts of the people of this country. I desire to point out some of these injustices. Reference has been made to the coercive tendency of this Bill. Can any one imagine a worse form of coercion than that which has existed in some of the towns and cities of this country under the system which has been in vogue and of which we have all approved in the past? A young man would, perhaps, be buttonholed two or three times a day, perhaps ostracised in some sections of the society in which he moved, because he had not joined the forces. There may have been reasons, there doubtless have been many reasons, why that young man had not been able to go to the front, perhaps some physical infirmity which was not known to his friends. I say that, so far as coercion is concerned, there is no worse form of coercion than that which has dogged many young men in this country, and this is one of the things that has ripened public opinion for something better.

In all parts of the country those who have taken an active part in recruiting are in favour of some form of a selective draft system.

I should like to mention to the House a few instances that have come to my attention; I have heard of hundreds of similar cases. About 15 or 20 miles from Ottawa, at Kars, Ontario, live Mr. and Mrs. Cyrus Scobie. Six of their sons have enlisted, and the seventh, who is a doctor, is taking out a commission in the Army Medical Corps. Five of the sons have gone overseas and have seen active service at the front; of these, two have won commissions since their enlistment. I noticed in a local newspaper the record of the family of Mr. and Mrs. Denis Carrigan, of Westville, N.S. Six of their sons have enlisted; all have proceeded overseas; three have been wounded. The seventh son was debarred from service on account of weak eyesight. A friend of mine in Toronto, Mr. Lockhart Gordon, has four sons, who have all enlisted. These young men all had promising careers in civil life. One was killed, one is missing, and one is severely injured and incapacitated for further service. The remaining son is in command of a battalion at the front. I could cite hundreds of cases of a similar character.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Suppose four sons had gone and one was left at home, could that son be forcibly taken under this Bill?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I suppose he could be; but the tribunal—

Mr. PUGSLEY: There is no exception for him.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The tribunal, which will be free from any political or other influence of an unfair character, will settle that matter.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It could not, under this Bill.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Absolutely.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Absolutely not. Exemption is to be granted only on account of important financial obligations, family ties or things of that sort.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I disagree with my hon. friend, but I shall not now stop to argue the matter with him, and for this reason: the Prime Minister said more than once since this Bill was introduced that he would welcome suggestions, from members on the opposite side or from any one in the House, that are made with a view to improving this Bill. That is what the Prime Minister said, and I stand by what he said.

Compulsory service under the system proposed will do away with unjust and unfair treatment; I believe that enlistment under this law will be more popular than enlistment has recently been under the voluntary method.

I wish to point out that in the month of May the total enlistments amounted to 6,407. Of this number enlistments in the railway construction and forestry corps were 1,842; in the artillery, 955; in the infantry, 1,208; miscellaneous, 2,402—" miscellaneous " meaning such corps as cavalry, engineers, Army Medical Corps, Army Dental Corps, Army Service Corps, and various branches of the service, numbering about twenty-three in all.

Mr. MACDONALD: When was recruiting for the artillery stopped?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I was just coming to that. Recruiting for the artillery was stopped a week or ten days ago, the reason being that there were more recruits for artillery in Canada and in England than were needed. The artillery seems to attract recruits more than some of the other branches of the military service; it is one of the popular branches. Under the voluntary system the man who wishes to join the army selects the corps or unit in which he wants to serve.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Those who have enlisted for the artillery would hardly go to England until they had a year's drilling. Is the stoppage of recruiting for the artillery only temporary, or is it permanent?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The stoppage is temporary, until we get caught up. We have a surplus of artillery.

Mr. PUGSLEY: In Canada?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: In Canada, and also in England.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Does the minister say that when a man voluntarily enlists for service in the Imperial army he cannot be transferred to any other part of the service?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: They can be transferred to any part of the service, but when they go voluntarily into a certain branch of the service we have to keep faith with them. We cannot say: although you enlisted in the artillery, we shall use some sort of influence to get you into the infantry —I do not think that is fair. What is needed at the front more than anything else is infantry; that is what the authorities overseas are crying out for. Of the 6,407 who enlisted in May, only 1,208 were infantry. I have given a little time and attention to this matter, because it seems to me that it is a point which has been overlooked in the discussion of this Bill.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The minister says that the English authorities are crying out for infantry.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Our own authorities overseas.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That would be in writing, would it not? Can the minister submit to the House any communications showing that it is infantry that they are crying out for?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I have not any written information here, but I may tell the hon. gentleman that the communications we have had from Great Britain indicate that they need infantry.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The Prime Minister has informed the House that it is railway construction and forestry corps that they are crying out for.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Yes, he told the truth when he said that. They do want forestry and railway construction corps. I understand that lately some of our forestry men have been going to France; a great many of them are also employed in England. It is true that they need men for these branches of the service as well.

It is contended by some that we should not now have conscription or selective draft because in the early stages of the war some one said that conscription would not be necessary; that there would be no conscription. A good many things were said and thought in the early stages of the war about matters which have been vastly changed by the war's duration. The whole situation has changed because of the unexpected length of the war.

An authority who recently came over from Great Britain to the United States said that the war is only beginning, and it would be rash for anyone to predict when it will end. Out of a population of 1,583,000 of military age such as we have in Canada, 100,000 men fit for military service seem to be but a small quota and would, if they were carefully selected cause very little inconvenience to the industries of the country. About a year ago at this time there was a marked decrease in voluntary enlistment. As the figures have already been placed upon Hansard, I will not take up the time of the House in referring to them again. For several months past the number of enlistments has varied from 5,000 to 7,000 a month, there being a spurt every now and then because of special efforts that were put forth.

Mr. MACDONALD: On April 28, the minister stated that the Government had not, up to that time, considered the question either of introducing conscription into Canada or of putting into force the terms of the Militia Act. When did the Government first consider the question of introducing conscription, and when did they first come to a decision?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I would refer the hon. member to the statement made in this House by the Prime Minister in the first speech which he made after he returned from England. He is the authority on that point.

Mr. MACDONALD: The minister, as Minister of Militia, made a definite statement in the House on April 28, that, up to that date, the Government had not considered the question of conscription. When did they first consider it?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The Prime Minister first introduced the question of conscription into this House. I must ask my hon. friend to ask the Prime Minister when he first considered that question and when the Government first considered it.

Mr. MACDONALD: You are the Minister of Militia and you ought to know.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The Prime Minister first introduced that question into the House.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Then I understand the Prime Minister introduced the question into this House, and the Government considered it afterwards. That is the inference.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I am quite willing to leave my hon. friends from St. John and Pictou to fight the matter out with the Prime Minister.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The minister is making a speech and it is only by courtesy that he has been answering questions.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Many of my friends from Quebec have made statements in regard to recruiting in that province, and I think it best to be frank and to make as clear a statement as possible in regard to the matter. I desire to discuss the matter without giving the slightest offence to my hon. friends from Quebec, and I am sure they will understand that. Every method of recruiting that was adopted in other parts of the country was adopted in Quebec. I have a statement here which shows that recruiting reached the highest point in March of last year when the number was 32,819. The reason that recruiting was more successful in other parts of the country than in Quebec was because the whole population, men, women and children, became interested in recruiting; every one, clergyman as well as sportsman, politician and member of Parliament, all put his shoulder to the wheel and recruiting received such an impetus, nothing could stop it. My hon. friends from Quebec will know best whether or not those conditions existed in their province; I am not going to attempt to say what conditions existed in their province, because that would be presumption on my part. If they did not exist in Quebec, the success in recruiting would not be as great as in other parts of the country, and as a matter of fact, it was not.

Mr. MEDERIC MARTIN: The war commenced on the 4th of August, 1914, and the mayor of Montreal had a resolution passed on the 5th of August stating that all employees of the city of Montreal who enlisted for overseas service would be paid their salaries while they were absent. In other provinces, that was not done. In Quebec we have done many things like that to encourage recruiting. Did the Government take that action in connection with civil servants?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: So far as the Government is concerned, they do pay the salaries of civil servants who have enlisted.

Mr. MARTIN: Did they take that action before the 5th of August?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I do not know, but I think they did so pretty early in the war.

Mr. MARTIN: I did it before the Government.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. E. Lapointe) questioned the correctness of a return which I laid on the table of the House in regard to the number of enlistments of British-born, Canadian-born, speaking the English language, and Canadian-born speaking the French language. He did not think that return could be correct because he had noticed in the casualty lists the names of a great many French Canadians. I do not think my hon. friend, as a lawyer, can claim that that is sufficient evidence to bring forward to show that the return in question is incorrect. During all the time that I have been in this House, I do not think I have ever before heard of the correctness of a return laid on the Table being questioned. That return, so far as I know, is absolutely correct; that is to say, it is as nearly correct as it is possible to have such a return correct. I shall be very glad to have this matter discussed in committee. The exact figures are these:

Number of soldiers born in Canada and speaking the English language who had gone overseas on the 30th of April last, 125,245; number of British subjects, born outside of Canada, who had gone overseas on the 30th of April last, 155,095; number of French Canadian soldiers commanded by officers speaking the French language, serving with units organized in the province of Quebec, 5,443; number of soldiers speaking the French language, commanded by officers speaking the English language, belonging to units organized in the province of Quebec, 1,536; 1,217 is the number of soldiers speaking the French language said to have been with the first contingent at Valcartier. I have allowed three-quarters of those as coming from the province of Quebec. That would make 913. Total number of French Canadians enlisted in Quebec who had gone overseas up to the 30th of April, 1917, 7,892.

The number of French Canadians, including Acadians, enlisted throughout Canada was 5,904. This made a total of 14,100. I can assure my hon. friend from Kamouraska (Mr. Lapointe), who raised this question in the House, that the greatest possible care was taken in compiling this return, and the figures are as approximately correct as they can be.

Mr. CARVELL: What was the number of French Canadians and Acadians who enlisted in the province of New Brunswick?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The return does not show that.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE (Kamouraska): Upon what information does the department rely in determining the language spoken by the soldiers? For instance, I know a good many French Canadians by the name of Fraser, Warren, McKenzie, and so on, who speak the French language only.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: It is a very long story, and I shall be very glad to go into it thoroughly and to answer any other questions relative to these matters when we are in committee.

My hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) referred to a certain recruiting officer in Montreal known as the Rev. Major C. A. Williams. He thought it was unreasonable to have a Methodist clergyman recruiting amongst French Canadians in Montreal. I believe the hon. member for Rouville and this clergyman are old friends and on intimate terms.. The Rev. Major C. A. Williams was not appointed for the purpose of recruiting amongst 5 p.m. French Canadians. An attempt was made to get certain clergy of the Roman Catholic church in the province of Quebec to co-operate in recruiting, but these effects did not meet with success. I repeat that Major Williams was not appointed for the purpose of recruiting amongst the French Canadians. He is a gentleman of very high standing in Montreal, and has done splendid recruiting work amongst the English-speaking population there. There have always been attempts to form committees and associations to help recruiting. The last attempt —and some reference has been made to this —was made by an officer of very high repute indeed, General Lessard. Accompanied by Colonel Blondin he started a campaign for recruits in the province of Quebec. Both of them canvassed many parts of the province, and their efforts were rewarded by the enlistment of 221 soldiers, made up as follows:

Recruits obtained in the province of Quebec	92
Transfers from Winnipeg, Calgary and Edmonton	90
Transfers from other units, men who were left behind in hospital and afterwards got well	74
Number of discharged and transferred..	35
Net result	221

General Lessard and Colonel Blondin put up a splendid campaign, and I have no doubt that General Lessard's influence was of great value in securing recruits from that province. Lieutenant-Colonel A. M. Labelle of the 64th Regiment also did his best to secure recruits. As results were not as good as anticipated, the officers of all French Canadian regiments were authorized to recruit, and they did so. A return will be brought down in a few days giving the names of the officers engaged in recruiting in the province of Quebec and the amounts paid to them; there has been a little delay in getting the return compiled. These officers did their best to get recruits for the different regiments and for the drafts that went overseas.

Mr. MARTIN: The hon. gentleman mentioned Colonel Labelle. Does he know that this gentleman has three sons, and not one of them has gone to the front?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I am not personally acquainted with him.

Mr. MARTIN: He has not sent one of his three sons to the front.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I should like to say a word or two with reference to the Home Defence scheme which was announced on March 6, 1917. As hon. gentlemen know, there has been talk from time to time in this country of men enlisting for home defence who would not care to go overseas, and it has been suggested more than once that some scheme whereby men could enlist for home defence only would meet with considerable success. The militia force in Canada has become almost less than a skeleton, if that were possible, since the war began. Practically all the officers and men of the militia who were medically fit have gone overseas, and there is now only a very limited force in Canada. The overseas authorities had asked us to send troops over to England while the daylight was short and the submarines had less chance of operating successfully. When that request came we had about 50,000 Canadian Expeditionary Force troops in Canada, and we determined to send them over. It was felt, however, that we should have some defence force in Canada. That has always been the policy in this country, and it has been the policy of this Government ever since the war started, it being impossible to leave a country without troops in time of war. Because of this request for troops from the overseas authorities, and because of the depleted condition of the militia force in Canada, and because of the general idea that there were a great many men in this country who would enlist for home defence but not for overseas service—because we all know that it was largely through the efforts of the militia force that such splendid results in recruiting were secured—it was thought desirable to institute this campaign as a last new effort in voluntary recruiting. Side by side with that a campaign was carried on for overseas enlistments. It was thought that enlistments for home defence would stimulate enlistment for overseas, but it was found that the young men did not enlist in the home defence force except in a very limited number indeed. Only city battalions were authorized, and it was thought desirable not to interfere more than was absolutely necessary with the employment of men in agriculture.

Mr. OLIVER: When was the campaign for home defence begun?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: It was authorized on the 15th March, 1917. Since that time however, the United States has come into the war, and the necessity for home defence, of course, has lessened.

Now the question of reinforcements is of importance. A statement has been laid on the Table showing the summary strength of all units of the Canadian Expeditionary Force in England, and a sufficient number of copies have been printed for the use of hon. members. This shows the strength of these forces as on 14th May, 1917. A good many members, in looking at that table, have been surprised at the number of our troops in England on that date, the total being 126,241. That seems like a very considerable army for this country to have in England. But when we note how the troops are divided into the different categories, and units, we see how it is that there are so few men, comparatively, for the infantry and ready for the trenches. The Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden), in introducing the Bill, went into this matter very carefully, and explained the make-up of the different categories, here entitled A, B, C, D and E, and showed how these were subdivided in the different units, 23 in number, and how these were further subdivided. I need not elaborate these figures. No doubt, when the Bill is in committee, hon. members will have further questions to ask—

Mr. PUGSLEY: As I understood the Prime Minister, he did not explain the matter in the way suggested by the Minister of Militia. He said that there were a large number in England, but gave as the reason that they still required training before being sent to the trenches.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: If the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) will refer to the speech of the Prime Minister on introducing the Bill on the 11th June he will see that the right hon. gentleman explained the matter fully, and will get a full understanding of how these units are subdivided.

Mr. PUGSLEY: When it is said that a large number of men are not available, that might be explained in different ways. It might be, for instance, that the men had become invalided. I would like to know how many are supposed to be fit for military service and how many are delayed owing to the need of further training.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: There is delay for various reasons. There are 28,000 at present in England in a category, who are ready to go to France.

Mr. PUGSLEY: How many of these are in the infantry?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I have not the details before me. I wish to refer to something that was said by some hon. gentlemen opposite as to retarding enlistment. Enlistment has not been retarded; enlistment by voluntary methods is going on today, as it has gone on from the beginning of the war. So far as I know, no attempt was ever made to retard it.

My hon. friend from West Lambton (Mr. Pardee) suggested that we might pursue the voluntary system further. But the reason against this course is that which I have suggested to the House—that we cannot select the unit into which we desire to have the men go, and consequently they go into the most popular branches of the service, and the infantry is left without sufficient troops. Besides, the difficulty arises that men are taken from occupations where they are needed, leaving at home men who could be spared for the front. It seems to me the time has come when all this should be regulated. The hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. E. Lapointe) is pessimistic. He fears that there will be inequality in the administration of the measure, that there will be "discrimination, favouritism, and patronage." It seems to me that such a thing is imposible, considering the way the tribunals are formed and the safeguards that are thrown around the administration of the measure.

The sorrows and grievances attendant upon our participation in the war, and which are incident thereto, reflect themselves doubtless to a greater extent than in any other place in the department over which I have the honour to preside. From this position one can look out over the whole theatre. One sees the obstacles to be overcome, he sees the heartburnings, and realizes that the greater part of the people of this country harbour deep convictions in their hearts regarding many aspects of the war. A sentiment, I believe, has developed in this country which speaks in thunder tones. It asks that the lives of those who have been sacrificed shall not be spent in vain; that the sorrows of the mothers, the fathers, the brothers and the sisters, the orphans, shall not go for naught. This sentiment is deeper in the hearts of the people in those parts of the country which have sent the most soldiers to the front.

The contestants are now engaged in a life and death struggle. Owing to a great extent to the Russian situation, the combat is now more fierce than at any time since 1914, the burden having fallen upon the mother countries of the two great races in Canada.

Those who have been at the front, and who have written both poetry and prose, reflect more keenly the situation than can any words that I might utter. The poem read in the House by the hon. member for South Wellington, "In Flanders Fields" will have more influence upon this country than the writer ever imagined. Several of such poems and writings have come into my possession, and I feel that they convey to the hearts and minds of the people deeper thoughts than could any words of mine. I desire to read two references to the war. The probability is that hon. members have already read them. They are not poetry like the contribution read by my hon. friend from South Wellington, written by a friend of his own, Jack McCrae. Perry Robinson, telegraphing from British headquarters in France, describes at length the horrible desolation of Vimy Ridge. Referring to the Canadian cemetery there, he says:

> "In the middle of the waste on the summit of Vimy Ridge there is a little group of white painted wooden crosses marking the graves of the Seaforth Highlanders of Canada, who fell in the capture of the ridge. These Canadian Seaforths were mostly British Columbians. A long, long way they came to die, these long-limbed sons of Victoria, Vancouver, Westminster and Nanaimo. Some came even farther, for they came from the far off slopes and peaks of the mountains or upper waters of the Fraser river, when they heard the call.

> "Many other feet will tread the same journey after them, the feet of pilgrims, who through generations yet to be born, will come here as to a shrine. The little graveyard will be as a flame of inspiration to Canada in the ages, for there was nothing finer done in the war than the achievement of those western men on the ridge."

Stewart Lyon, whom most of the members of this House know, only last week sent the following despatch:

> Yesterday, while out visiting the front, I saw an incident that proves that the finer feelings of the men are not blunted by daily contact with death. Three bodies of victims of the enemy artillery lay on a mortuary truck, awaiting removal to the cemetery behind the lines. Each was wrapped up in his blanket, which is the universal substitute at the front for a winding sheet and coffin. A companion of the dead lads, himself a young fellow, barely out of his teens, had risen early and gone out into the wood of "The Swallows" to find some flowers that he might lay upon the breasts of his friends as a last tribute of affection. He returned carrying an armful of roses, wet with the dew of morn and shedding their fragrance widely. It was a touch of poetic sentiment amid the grit and prose of war.

Later in the woods we came upon the place where the roses grew in great abundance. In a small clearing girt about by German wire entanglements lay the ruins of an isolated cottage. A shell had so smashed it that scarcely one brick remained unbroken. Around this heap of "war desolation" bloomed a rose garden that must have been the pride of its owner. A refugee far from the roses she had tended with still evident care, the woman of the rose garden, would find consolation in the thought that her flowers had lain on the breasts of men who came from the surf-beaten shores of Canada to redeem her garden with their life blood.

These things speak louder to the people of this country than any words I can utter. The sufferings of 68,629 wounded speak to us; 2,460 prisoners of war in Germany send their appeal; 28,550 dead call to us in the words of Jack McCrea.

The Bill which has been introduced is not for the purpose of doing an injustice to any one; it is to ameliorate the conditions which now exist, not only looking forward to the filling of the ranks at the front, but to provide equal, right, and just treatment to those in Canada who want to bring about better order in respect to enlistment.

The measure is not a political measure; the Government in framing and introducing it never looked upon it in this way and as one which would bring political kudos. But the Government could not refrain from instituting so fair and just a measure under all the circumstances.

The Government may or may not go down to defeat under this measure; but rather than not to have taken such a step it would be better for the Government to have been defeated a hundred times.

It is our duty to supply men equal to the wastage at the front. How could we ever look these grand men in the face when they return did we not promptly and steadily fill up the gaps. How could we bear to see our splendid battalions dwindle to half or one-third their strength, thereby losing their morale, and fretting their hearts out because we had forgotten and left them to their fate, and we ourselves had become tired. It is only by reinforcements that we can maintain our honour in France, in Canada and in the British Empire.

Mr. W. M. GERMAN (Welland): Mr. Speaker, I rise with a good deal of trepidation to address the House, for I realize that the seriousness of the occasion demands not only our intelligent thinking but the courageous action of every man in Canada. I would approach this subject dispassionately and with a desire to arrive at a conclusion which would be not only satisfactory to myself but to those whom I have the honour to represent and to the people of the country generally. We have a duty to perform to our country, to our King and to our Empire, and how best to perform that duty is the question which we are to consider at the present time. While our sons, our relations and our countrymen are fighting and dying that freedom may live, it is our duty to see to it that we do not deal a greater blow to freedom in this country by our actions in this House. "Win the war," as announced the other day by the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Murphy, was the slogan of the country. Win the war is our wish, our desire. At the beginning of the war the Montreal Star sent throughout the whole country, and to all members of Parliament, a telegram. I had one, asking what, in my view, was Canada's duty in the emergency. My reply was that Canada should spend her last dollar and give her last man to secure success in this conflict. I have not changed my mind, I am of the same opinion, that Canada should give her last dollar and give her last man to win this great war for freedom. The most effectual way to produce the last dollar and the last man to the winning of the war, is the question to be considered.

I have a resolution passed at a meeting in my own town of Welland a few nights ago. It was a public meeting addressed by Mr. Arthur Hawkes and gotten up by the Welland branch of the Organization of Resources Committee at the request of the Win the War Association. A like meeting was addressed by Mr. Hawkes in Niagara Falls the night before. These meetings are part of a province-wide campaign of education on the conscription issue. At the meeting in Welland a resolution was moved by Mr. John H. Crow and seconded by W. J. Hickey and unanimously passed, strongly urging myself as their member to speak and vote for the Military Service Bill and to use my utmost influence for a coalition Government. At that meeting, which was held in the course of a win-the-war campaign on the conscription issue, Mr. Hawkes used words that would naturally have a considerable effect on any resolution which might be passed. Mr. Hawkes words were:

> I hope I have not given the impression that Quebec will not accept conscription. My fear is that it will not without a referendum. It is only just to Sir Wilfrid Laurier to say that he pledges his support to conscription if the country proves that it wants conscription. I believe, too, that the clergy in Quebec would see that the law is enforced. What I want to emphasize is that I believe Canada can have conscription and national unity too.

And, Sir, I am prepared to subscribe to those words of Mr. Hawkes: If conscription is necessary, I believe that, by adopting a proper method, we can have conscription and national unity also. I have received this resolution, passed unanimously at that meeting in Welland after Mr. Hawkes had made that observation. Undoubtedly the resolution would be influenced to some extent by the remarks of Mr. Hawkes who was the principal speaker. I have also had resolutions and statements, letters, communications, from many individuals, associations and organizations in that county and other parts of Canada, some in favour of this referendum proposal, some of them opposed absolutely to conscription. Thus we see that there are resolutions and suggestions and propositions not only in favour of conscription but opposed to conscription, and in favour of a referendum and conscription if necessary. It seems to me, in view of that situation, only one course is open to a member of Parliament, and so far as I am concerned I shall follow that course; that is to decide for myself as to what stand I shall take in regard to this matter, and leave my action to the judgment of the people. That, Sir, is the position that I propose to take. I cannot speak for the people of the county of Welland because the people of that county have not, except by letters, resolutions and so on sent to me, expressed their views on that subject. On that subject I do not represent the people of the county of Welland, and no man in this House represents the constituents of any part of Canada. So, Sir, all that I can do, and what I will do as courageously as I can and as intelligently as I may, is to express my own views on this important subject and leave the result to the judgment of the people whom I represent.

The boys of our country have gone to the war. The son of the very gentleman who moved this resolution, a bright young man who was just finishing his medical course at Toronto University, enlisted and went to the war, and received rewards for distinguished bravery over there. His dead body fills a hero's grave. Other friends of mine in that country, numbers of them, have had their sons go to the war—some of them have been crippled for life, many of them have been killed. A son of mine is in a machine gun section some place there, and while I speak his mangled remains may be lying on the shell-torn plains of Flanders. Around me sit men whose sons have paid the last sacrifice. Shall it be said that we shall stand in the way of winning this war or doing anything that mortal man can do to win this war? I think, Sir, that no one will say that or should say that.

As I have said, my suggestion was, and I believe it is right, that the last dollar and the last man should be devoted to the winning of this war. But how is that to be done? My hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) has given notice of a resolution in regard to the raising of money in advance of anything that the Government has done or suggested. The Minister of Finance last year and this year was requested and urged to do something towards, to use the expression which has been employed, the conscription of wealth, the procuring of the last dollar to the winning of this war, but nothing has been done. My hon. friend from South Renfrew has given notice of a resolution for the procuring of money; the Government has given notice of a resolution for the procuring of the men, and it is to that that I shall devote my attention. It is acknowledged that voluntary recruiting has fallen down. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) in his remarks said that, after about three years, voluntary recruiting has fallen down. That is admitted on all sides. Well, is it much wonder that voluntary recruiting has fallen down? I do not wish to criticise to too great an extent, but I might be allowed this expression of opinion, that everything the Government has touched in regard to this war so far has fallen down. Their national service scheme fell down, and fell down lamentably; their home defence scheme fell down, and fell down lamentably; their voluntary recruiting has fallen down, and fallen down lamentably. Why? The ex-Minister of Militia and Defence (Sir Sam Hughes) gives some reasons—I think that I can give another good reason which has come directly within my own observation. In the beginning of this war, as the Minister of Militia rightly said only a short time ago, every man, woman and child throughout the province of Ontario put his shoulder to the wheel and did everything he could to procure enlistment, and that continued for some little time until the serpent of politics began to raise its slimy head, and then what happened? Patriotic endeavour began to wither and die, and it was politics that caused the death of that effort, and politics only. I am not charging the Prime Minister, perhaps, with knowledge of this—but had politics been kept out of the voluntary recruiting system, we would have had voluntary recruiting to-day as energetically as ever it was carried on. But, Sir, that was one of the reasons why it fell down, and fell down so lamentably.

Undoubtedly this House has the power to pass this Bill, but as was stated by the leader of the Opposition, we have no right to pass this Bill without the approval of the people. I should like to see a Bill passed which would bring about compulsory service, but I want to see a Bill passed that will be effective and that will have the approval of the people behind it. Unless you pass a Bill with the approval of the people behind it, you might as well not pass any Bill.

It is said that the Parliament of Great Britain, which passed a Conscription Bill, has outlived the term for which it was elected. That is quite right; but what a difference there is between the situation in Great Britain and the situation in Canada. In the first place, in Great Britain they have a coalition government. The Minister of Militia said this afternoon that he was sorry that a coalition government had not been formed in Canada. I am sorry also that a coalition government had not been formed in Canada—but when should a coalition government have been formed? Now, or when the war began? Hon. gentlemen talk now about a coalition government after the Government's mismanaging everything as badly as everything could be mismanaged. They produce a policy which they know would not be accepted by the leader of the Opposition, and they say: join us in a coalition government, help us pass this conpulsion Bill, and then the coalition government will appeal to the people. Sir, had they fairly, honestly, and patriotically desired the formation of a coalition government, or, what might be called a national government—a government behind which the people could stand—they would have made the proposal not to-day, but a year or two years ago. That is what they did in England at the beginning of the war.

Further, the British Government, being a coalition Government, has been in touch with the people from the day the war began. They have had by-elections—three, four, and five every year—since the war began. In this Parliament twenty constituencies which should be represented under the redistribution measure are not represented. There has been no expression of opinion from the people in any one constituency since the war began as to the conduct of this Government in the management of our part in the war. The only expressions of opinion obtained have come in the way of resolutions adopted by different societies and communications sent to members of Parliament. I say, therefore, that there is absolutely no comparison between the situation in England and the situation in Canada.

I admit that the need for men is imperative. In this terrific struggle in which the Allied nations are engaged, men are being slaughtered by thousands, and their places must be filled if the war is to be won by the Allied nations. Men must be got; that is the need of the hour. The Government says: We will pass this Bill. The right hon. leader of the Opposition proposes what is, in my opinion, a better, safer and surer course: that of asking the people whether they are in favour of compulsory service for the remainder of the war. The Prime Minister has spoken of a general election. The member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) said the other day that we were to have a general election. But the question of compulsory service cannot be properly settled through the medium of a general election—there are too many side issues to be considered; too many sins of commission and omission on the part of the Government have to be discussed and criticised. The question of conscription, therefore, could not in a general election be treated as it should be treated or given the consideration that it deserves. To my mind, the only way is to go straight to the people, with candour and with courage. And if we do, I am sure that we shall not go in vain; I believe that the people will support the measure.

The question is whether this Bill shall be further proceeded with, or whether we shall stop now and submit the matter to the people for their approval or disapproval. That is the issue in this discussion. Whether we do or do not need the men; whether we are in favour of conscription now or of its adoption later, is not the issue at this moment. The question is: Shall this matter be submitted to the people? Some members of this House, and some prominent gentlemen out of the House, have said: We do not favour a referendum, because we believe that the people are overwhelmingly against conscription. In the name of high Heaven, what doctrine is that to preach in this country? We will not ask the people for their approval or disapproval of a proposed measure, because we believe that the people are absolutely opposed to it; therefore we will try to force it upon them! That is the doctrine which these gentlemen advocate. For my part, I will never subscribe to a doctrine of that kind. It is Prussianism; it may be Toryism, but it is not Liberalism and it is not democracy—and to Liberalism and democracy I pin my faith. The leader of the Opposition says: Trust the people. I trust the people, and in doing so I follow in the footsteps of such illustrious Liberals as Baldwin, Lafontaine, Brown, Dorion and Mowat.

I am proud to-day to assist our great leader to carry aloft the banner of Liberalism so nobly raised by these eminent gentlemen. Only a few days ago one of England's greatest statesmen, a gentleman born in the purple almost, a Tory of the Tories, uttered from the Speaker's dais in this chamber these words, which should be engraved in enduring marble:—

> Ever more clearly as the months go on, it becomes evident that this is becoming a world war between the powers of democracy on the one side and the powers of autocracy on the other side. We in this room, whatever shades of differences may separate us, can, in such a contest take only one side. We can only be on the side of democracy
> We are convinced that for every human combination who have reached the degree of civilization and development that has been reached by all the great western communities, there is but one form of Government, under whatever name it may be called and that is the Government in which the ultimate control lies with the people. We have staked our last dollar upon democracy, and if democracy fail us we are bankrupt indeed. But I know that democracy will not fail us.

That is the way I feel about that matter, that democracy will not fail us on this occasion and on this question. In my opinion there never was and never will be an occasion so grave or a condition so critical that we can afford to ignore the basic principles of democracy and pass legislation in this House against the expressed wishes of the people.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. W. M. GERMAN (Welland) (Resuming): At six o'clock I was reading to the House the eloquent words used by the Right Hon. A. J. Balfour when he addressed this House a few weeks ago, and I think one sentence of his is worth repeating:

> There is but one form of government, under whatever name it may be called, and that is the government in which the ultimate control lies with the people.

That is the doctrine in which I was brought up and have always lived; it is the principle which I always intend to maintain, in season and out of season, irrespective of what any one else may do, irrespective of what any newspaper may say. I say that we in this House would be better employed if at this hour we were going through the country endeavouring to induce the people to agree to the proposals which have been submitted by the Government, than enacting here a law against the wishes of the people. If by dispassionate appeal, by moral suasion and friendly intercourse, we cannot get the people to agree to these proposals, we can never get the people to agree to them when they are embodied in enforced legislation. This law cannot be enforced if it is against the wishes of the people, and if some hon. gentlemen who have spoken in this House are correct in their judgment the wishes of the people are absolutely opposed to the principle of conscription. Punitive legislation such as this has never been placed on the statute book and enforced unless there was behind it a predominant public opinion. I have heard that statement made on several occasions by the Hon. Sir Oliver Mowat and by practically every man of thought in Canada; it has been made by the present Prime Minister, it has been made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce in this House in regard to temperance legislation.

The experience of the past is a better guide than present theories, and the experience of the past teaches every man who has given any thought at all to this question that punitive legislation cannot be enforced unless public opinion is in its favour.

Let me cite one very pronounced example. In many of the states of the Union —states in which there is a law-abiding, honest, chivalrous and intelligent population—positive laws have been enacted against lynching. But of what effect have they been? In many of the states when a diabolical crime has been committed and the people fear that fitting punishment will not be meted out, a lynching takes place, although the laws against it are most stringent. Did any one ever hear of a person in those states of the Union being even prosecuted, much less convicted, for taking part in a lynching? No. Why? Simply because public sentiment among the law-abiding citizens in those sections appears to be in favour of lynching under certain circumstances. There are instances of that continually.

Take the case of Ireland. The British Parliament has passed a conscription law, but it was not applied to Ireland. Why was it not applied to Ireland as well as to England and Wales and Scotland? Because public sentiment in Ireland was against it. I apprehend that the British Government knew the law could not be enforced in Ireland, that it would do more harm than good if they attempted to enforce it. What further has happened? For centuries Ireland has been governed by laws made in England against the will of the Irish people. The result has been murder, bloodshed, and anarchy almost. Why? Because public sentiment in Ireland was against the legislation. But now the British people have come to their senses. At long last they have decided that the people of Ireland must rule and shall rule themselves. They have said to the people of Ireland: "Go your own way to this extent. Select men from among yourselves and work out a suitable form of government. When you have settled upon that form of government we will embody it in legislation at Westminster, and peace and harmony will then reign instead of anarchy and rebellion." Is not that an object lesson to us in this crisis?

Some people say: Why hesitate? Pass this law. I hesitate because there is a pronounced public sentiment against the law as at present being enacted. I doubt very much whether, if the people were educated on this matter, they would oppose the law so strongly; I do not believe they would. If we went to the people honestly and fairly and gave them an opportunity to express their opinion in a referendum, without reference to any political conditions, without any circumstances to detract their mind from the one question of winning the war, I believe we should get an expression of popular opinion in favour of the Bill. It is because I believe you will get an expression of popular opinion in its favour that I am in favour of the amendment before the House. What does our honoured leader say about this matter? Here are his words:

> What I propose is that we should have a referendum and a consultation of the people upon this question. I have taken the referendum, not that I have been very favourable towards it, but I find that the idea of the referendum has made enormous progress in Canada, and that it has been adopted by the political associations in the western provinces as a method of political action. If we are to have peace, if there is to be unity, we must meet the wishes of the labouring classes, who have asked for this privilege. When the consultation with the people has been had, when the verdict has been pronounced, I pledge my word, my reputation, that to the verdict, such as it is, every man will have to submit, and I claim to speak at least so far as is concerned the province from which I come. Is that an unfair situation, is that an unfair appeal? Can anybody say that it is not in accordance with true democratic principles? This I leave to the consideration of those whom I see before me.

I say that it is so fair, so true to democratic principles, that I, for one, support it now and continually. I want a Bill that can be made effective, and it is for that reason that I support this proposition. It is alleged that time will be lost if there is a referendum. How long would it take? The Minister of Militia has told us that we could not get the soldiers' votes. But the Government are the people who have assured us that we could get the soldiers' votes. They intended to have an election last year.

An hon. MEMBER: Two years ago.

Mr. GERMAN: Yes. And they were going to take the soldiers' votes. Their ballot boxes and ballots are over there in England now. They could cable to the High Commissioner in London the form of ballot: "Are you in favour of compulsory military service in Canada during the progress of this war? Yes or no." That ballot could be printed there and distributed among the soldiers, and they could get the vote of the soldiers as quickly as you can get a vote here. It would take six weeks at the outside. Give the women votes. I will cast my vote with the mothers of this country; I am not afraid to give the women votes in this referendum. Let every person who has an interest in this war have a vote in this matter. Having taken a referendum, you will have a full expression of the people's will, and we will carry out in legislation the will of the people, no matter what it may be. Time will not be lost—time will be gained.

The hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) says we shall have an election.

The Prime Minister says: pass the Bill and then have an election and coalition government. Did any one ever hear of a contest of physical strength in which one contestant says to the other: "I will shackle your feet and hands, I will tie your elbows, and having shackled you to my satisfaction I will match strength with you?" That is the way it would be if a coalition government passed this Bill and submitted it to the people. With both parties united on this principle, with every organization in their support, and the people without organization and without leadership, what possible chance would they have to express an opinion? They would not submit to that any more than they would submit to this proposition if it is forced on them now. But give the people a chance to express their opinion freely and frankly at the polls, and I for one believe that the majority of the people would be in its favour. That is why I say have a referendum.

I trust the proposition we make will be accepted. I believe it is the safest proposition; it is the only democratic proposition. But, if the proposition is refused, what then? The occasion is grave, the possibilities are grave. I would like the Government to adopt the proposition in favour of a referendum, but if they refuse, then, in consequence of the gravity of the situation, I will not by my vote stand in the way of the Government putting the Bill through and making it a success, if they can, and desire to.

Now, I ask, what is going to happen? It is said that coming events cast their shadows before. The shadows of coming events are hanging over us now, and beneath those shadows I venture to express an opinion as to what the events themselves will be. I do not wish to impute motives, but you will see that this is what will happen. This Bill will pass this House. In about six weeks, or, perhaps, more, it will receive the assent of His Excellency the Governor General. The Government will then immediately appoint their officials, who will immediately begin to draw their pay. They will then begin to make regulations, for the making of which they intend to take power. They will, perhaps, issue a proclamation calling up the first section of recruits. And they will stop there. Their courts of appeal, the machinery with which this Bill is weighted, will stop the proceedings from that time on. And they will have an election.

They will dissolve this Parliament, they will go to the country and say: We want the approval of the people to this Conscription Bill. We will have an election, not on conscription—that will not be the issue—but the issue will be between English and French, between Protestant and Catholic. We will have an election which will not be excelled by the villainous P.P.A. election in this province of Ontario in the campaign against Sir Oliver Mowat in 1894, the enmities from which have not died out yet. I do not want to see that. I would like to see this matter amicably settled now by sending it to the people for their approval or disapproval. If you do that you will get harmony; if you do not you will have disunion and disruption. I feel strongly on this matter because I have seen in our province of Ontario these same questions raised and I feel in my soul that the question will be raised now. I fear that this is not a Bill to gain recruits; it is more like a Bill to gain an election. They had a Minister of Militia who was striving to win the war, they have a Minister of Public Works who strives to win elections. They put out the Minister of Militia who was striving to win the war and they keep the Minister of Public Works who strives to win elections. It is more like winning an election than it is like winnng the war.

I do not know that I should occupy the time of this House any further. I have stated my position with as great fairness as I am capable of. I contend that the safe way, the sure way, the only way to bring about compulsory military service is to secure the will of the people in favour of that policy and then carry it out. If you have not the will of the people in favour of it, you will have discontent, distrust, disunion and disaster. Get the will of the people and all that discontent is done away with. I would like to adopt the eloquent words of the Prime Minister in closing the speech with which he introduced this Bill. I would in thought call to our deliberations our brave comrades who have fought, and the spirits of those who will fight no more, and in their presence, and with all the solemnity that presence would command, I would say that I will do everything that in me lies to bring about success and victory for the allied cause in this great struggle for freedom and to see to it that the sacrifices which have been made shall not have been made in vain. But in doing that I will endeavour to maintain unity in thought and action between all classes of people in this country for whose freedom those brave comrades have made their sacrifice and given their lives.

Hon. ALBERT SEVIGNY (Minister of Inland Revenue): Mr. Speaker, for a period of nearly three years we have witnessed the horrible war which has brought terror upon the world. From the beginning of hostilities we realized the strength of our enemies and it has been with the most painful anxiety that we have seen the German armies throw down everything in their way and rush towards Paris and Calais. Before the entry of England into the conflict the question came from the province of Quebec as one voice: "What will England do?" The answer was given that England had decided to throw her great power and all her resources against Germany, and we experienced a return of hope in our souls. It was then that all the representatives of our people, with enthusiasm, and without the slightest hesitation, swore to take up arms, make all the sacrifices necessary and stick to the Allies till the day of victory.

Enormous sums of money were voted, thousands of soldiers were trained, and each time the Government asked for additional sacrifices, the representatives of the people gave their consent. In 1911 not a single member of this Parliament had received the mandate to authorize the Government to carry on the war, but the people did not reproach the members for having consented to our participation. If England, France or Canada had provoked the war our people might have conducted themselves differently, but in the presence of the ferocious enemy who caused this great evil to come on the world, our population unanimously stood up and since then it has never weakened its firm decision to avenge outraged civilization, justice and liberty.

It is the outraged conscience of our people which has given us an absolute mandate. Last year, when the question came before us of the prolongation of the term of the present Parliament for another year, not a single member declared that it would be an injustice to the Canadian people, and the Canadian people have never complained of the conduct of its representatives. No one can deny that the prolongation has had for its only reason the war. In Canada, as in France, England, Italy, Japan, Belgium, Roumania, Serbia, in Montenegro and the United States, and in all the British and French colonies, it has been understood that the struggle was waged for civilization and that the greatest sacrifices were demanded in order to be victorious on the battlefield. It is in the following terms that a resumé of the situation was made by the representative of France, whom we had the honour to receive in this House a few weeks ago:

"It is the great conflict between triumphant autocracy—which we have already thrown down, in a large measure by the arms of our soldiers—it is the great conflict between triumphant autocracy, which wants to rule the world, and democracy, which simply wants to regenerate. It is the great conflict between absolute monarchs, who consider the people as their tools, and wish to conquer the bodies, and democracy which wants to elevate the spirit, the conscience and the soul."

The people of democratic Canada especially would not submit to German civilization. It is to prevent this danger that her sons have died like heroes; that our women have grieved and suffered from the remembrance of their absence, and that our country has worked and sacrificed these three years. Each one can judge the events of this epoch as he wishes.

It is not my intention to retaliate the insults of those who have cruelly insulted me during the last month; it is not my intention to review the past for the purpose of demonstrating how unjustifiable those attacks have been.

My intention is to admire and help the 400,000 of my Canadian compatriots who have died for my country, or are ready to die, facing the enemy, far from Canada where they might have remained instead of sacrificing themselves for their country. To those who threaten my life and the lives of my family I say that I am not more in danger than the soldiers in the trenches.

Since the talk on conscription has been under way an agitation against this Bill has taken place in the province of Quebec and pressure has been brought upon me for my resignation from the Government. I considered I should resist this pressure for the following reasons:

On the 27th December, 1916, the Prime Minister of Canada made the following statement, which was published in all the newspapers of the country:

You have asked for the assurance that under no circumstances will conscription be undertaken or carried out. As I stated to you at our interview, I must decline to give any such assurance. I hope that conscription may not be necessary, but if it should prove the only effective method to preserve the existence of the state and of the institutions and liberties which we enjoy, I should consider it necessary and I should not hesitate to act accordingly.

A few days afterwards one of the departments presided over by a French Canadian became vacant by the death of Hon. Mr. Casgrain. When the question came up of replacing Hon. Mr. Casgrain, if the Prime Minister had decided to choose a Canadian of English origin, I know that all the French Canadians, Conservatives, Liberals, and Nationalists, would have declared that it was an injustice, and would have strongly criticised that decision.

I was chosen, and no one blamed me for having entered a Government the chief of which had made, two weeks before my being sworn into office, the statements which I have just quoted. An election took place in the county which elected me in 1911. Everywhere, in 20 meetings, I stated that it was the policy of the Government to carry the war to the end at the price of the greatest sacrifice, and that it was our duty to support our soldiers.

In that election many newspaper men accompanied me and their reports will show that I always spoke in the frankest manner of our duties in the crisis through which we are now passing. Our adversaries made a spectre of conscription, and used the National Service cards, which my electors had received a few days before, to make it appear before the people that we were to have conscription. I answered these attacks by explaining that the National Service cards did not have to do with conscription in any way and that if a measure of conscription should be adopted it would be submitted to both Houses and decided by the representatives of the people.

The electors of my county knew what the Government which I had just entered had done since the beginning of the war, so far as expenses and military recruiting were concerned. The statement made on December 27, 1916, by the Prime Minister was known by all the inhabitants of Canada. The electors of Dorchester elected me with a greater majority than in 1911 if you consider the number of votes in each election.

What does the vote given at this election mean from a constitutional point of view? Does it not mean that the war policy of the Government was approved, as it has been approved by the members for the past three years, and has not this policy of the Government been to make every sacrifice to carry the war to a successful end, as far as conscription if necessary, as the Prime Minister stated on December 27, 1916, that is to say, a month before the election in Dorchester, which took place on January 27, 1917.

It was a war Government which I entered on January 8, 1917, and in assuming the heavy responsibility which was laid upon me, I have thought that in a war it is often the unforeseen which awaits a government, like the chief of an army, and that the developments of the war must inspire the measures to be taken to resist the enemy.

To-day the Government, conscious of its duty, perfectly informed of the seriousness of the situation, in the face of Russia demobilized, in the face of the greater effort Germany is making on account of Russia's inaction, in the face of appeals from our soldiers, who have written the finest pages of our history with English and French blood from Canada, in the face of unbounded sacrifices of our Allies, who are groaning under the weight of German oppression, the Government, I say, asks the nine provinces of Canada to furnish 100,000 men to carry on the battle to the end. It is for this reason that I am asked to resign. But why is not the same thing asked of my colleagues from British Columbia, Alberta, Manitoba, Ontario, and the Maritime Provinces?

Why should the province of Quebec now cease to be represented in the Government of Canada, after all her representatives in Parliament have approved of her part in the war for the last three years? Why should our minority be isolated on this continent of America, where we are surrounded by English provinces and by the American nation with her 100,000,000 inhabitants?

If my colleague Blondin and I would abandon the Government, what other French Canadians would consent to succeed us? And tell me if, with the expression of opinion in the English provinces, among the Liberals as well as among the Conservatives, we would not see an alliance being formed which would exclude the French Canadians? To-day the broad-minded man who occupies the position of Prime Minister does not refuse us a part of the representation, but if we refuse it ourselves, could we reproach him if he invited those of English origin to take our place?

When we think of the sacrifices which the world has been making for the last three years, we here in Canada should thank God, who has spared us up to the present; and, for my part, I do not want to complain of my isolation in performing my duty.

I have before me a man of 76 years of age who is ending his career by seeing the two races more divided than ever. History will tell what he could have done but did not try to do. It will tell about my colleague Blondin and myself, what we wanted to do—and thank God if it may be that in a certain measure we succeed.

Many of my right minded compatriots have advised me to stick to my post, and I thank them for their advice. I know that in the performance of my duty I may end my political career, but such a sacrifice would be still less great than the one which has been made by our soldiers who have died on the field of honour, while making for us a bulwark of their breasts. Mr. Speaker, I want to communicate to the House a letter which I have received from a man I do not know, but whose father has played a very important part in the history of our country:—

National Trust Building,
Winnipeg, June 11th, 1917.

The Hon. Albert Sévigny,
House of Commons,
Ottawa, Ont.

My dear Mr. Sévigny,

Although a stranger to you, I cannot refrain from addressing you as I have done and from writing to congratulate you most warmly on your patriotism in deciding to retain your Portfolio. I have always had a deep and warm interest in my French Canadian fellow-citizens, whom I used to know extremely well when I was a boy and a young man, and it would be very strange if this were not the case, as, during my father's long political career, he never had a friend with whom his relations were so intimate, in whom he placed so much confidence and for whom he had such a deep affection, as Sir George E. Cartier, with the possible exception of Sir Charles Tupper. Sir George and he (I mean my father) were, as you, of course, learned from history, generally known as "The Siamese Twins" and it was to a great extent due to their joint efforts that Confederation was possible. Such being the case, I cannot but regard with horror the prospect of seeing our people divided on racial lines, for I can conceive no greater misfortune that could befall our young Dominion. It is impossible for me, or any one else, to foretell what the consequence might be, but that they would be serious no one can doubt, and I congratulate you on playing the part of a true patriot in doing what in you lies, and that is much to avoid such a catastrophe. It must have required no small amount of moral courage to take the position you are doing, when, by adopting a different course and appealing to the passions and prejudices of your compatriots, you might, and probably would, have greatly increased your popularity with them. This, however, could at best been have temporary, and I am sure you have adopted what in the end will prove to have been the wisest course.

With kindest regards and best wishes for your future success in every way, I remain,

Yours very sincerely,
(Sgd) Hugh J Macdonald

The member for Kamouraska (Mr. E. Lapointe) said in his speech that public opinion in the English provinces, the United States, France and England, had been poisoned against French Canadians. Will what has been going on in this House and in our province since the conscription measure was spoken of restore public opinion in our favour? No; far from it. The people will still more firmly believe that the French Canadians refuse to enlist and to take their part in the present war. How can it be otherwise, surrounded as we are, we French Canadians, with a population which does not understand our language, and consequently does not read our newspapers and our books?

We must regretfully admit that in the English provinces and in the United States those persons are very scarce who take the trouble of defending us or even of trying to understand us. The result is that the public believes what is said about us and renders its judgment accordingly.

Many members have stated that effective measures to stimulate recruiting in the province of Quebec have not been employed since the beginning of the war. I think, however, that the time has come to speak frankly. I do not hesitate to say that the French Canadians have not used the means they should have employed. In my opinion, a French Canadian organization, independent of politics, and composed of earnest men, should have been formed long ago in the province of Quebec to encourage recruiting. Furthermore, we should have completely put aside our political feuds. If our public men had worked hand in hand and had placed before our people the question of the war as it presented itself, it would have been easier to have the province of Quebec answer the appeal with the other provinces of the Dominion. Various influences have strongly contributed to paralyse recruiting. If we had had an organization composed of earnest men who would have taken upon themselves the responsibility of consulting the Government respecting the measures to be taken in our province, I am convinced that this organization would have triumphed over those which were discouraging recruiting.

To prove to you that French Canadians know how to do their duty when unfavourable influences are not exerted, let us look at what has taken place in the English provinces. We will see that French-Canadians have answered the call in great numbers. This fact was brought out by the figures which were submitted to the House a few days ago by the Minister of Militia.

Let us look at what took place in the United States when the American Government applied to all men from 21 to 31 years of age to register for conscription.

I sent the following message to Hon. A. J. Pothier, of Woonsocket, and Mr. L. N. Asselin, of Biddeford, Maine:

> Please tell me how French Canadians and Americans of French origin have answered to the application of the American Government to establish conscription in the United States.

I received from Mr. L. N. Asselin, of Biddeford, Maine, colonization agent for the Canadian Government, the following message:

> In Maine, I may say generally New England, French Canadians and French Americans have answered call conscription unanimously and heartily. Locally 792 French Canadians registered.

I received the following answer from Hon. A. J. Pothier, of Rhode Island:

> Franco-Americans have answered loyally and patriotically to conscription. Fair number of French American volunteers enlisted.

I received also from the newspaper L'Opinion Publique, of Worcester, Mass., U.S.A., the following message:

> Our French compatriots have answered to the call of the country with loyalty and unanimity which deserves the admiration of all. We exceed all other elements of the population for the figures of enlistments.

Many soldiers returned from the front have expressed to me the greatest praise of French Canadians who are in the army. To-day we have but to mention the brave deeds of the 22nd regiment before an audience in the province of Quebec to see that our population is proud of the conduct of these brave men.

Unfortunately there are too many narrow-minded people who have undertaken the task of hindering our population from doing as others have done. Since the question of conscription came up, men of talent, in newspapers or in public meetings, denounce our participation in the war, making believe, to succeed better in their denunciation, that the country is ruined, that we have done enough, and that we owe nothing to England. Some others, more brave, advise people to stay here to defend Canada if ever Germany wants to come here to attack us. To those who tell me the country is ruined, I answer, as far as the province of Quebec is concerned, that that province has never been more prosperous. The farmers have made a fortune since the beginning of the war; everywhere in the cities there is much work to do.

I know as well as any one that the expenses of the war are heavy, but as we have decided to take part in the conflict, we could not hope to carry on the war with prayers alone. If the Allies were to begin to consider the great sacrifices of money which they have made for three years, they would certainly feel, if they were like the economists of our country, that the time had come to stop the struggle. Those who say that we have done enough are those who would have wanted to do nothing from the beginning and who have done nothing else since that time but arouse passions and prejudices, while receiving their large salaries.

Some people say that we are not concerned in this war. It is certain that we have not wished nor provoked this terrible scourge which is sowing in the world devastation, mourning and ruin. However, in spite of the fact that we have not wished nor provoked the conflict, the fact remains that we are in the war in spite of ourselves, and we must accept the fact, and the terrible consequences.

It is a regrettable situation. It is a situation extremely critical for us. But it is not a question of knowing if it is in spite of us or with our consent that the European nations launched themselves against each other in the month of August, 1914. We have but one thing to do, and that is to realize the sorrowful state of affairs; to realize that we are at war; that we are living in a troublous period in the history of the world, and that, unfortunately, we must bear the terrible consequences.

We must then accept the brutal fact of the war and that leads me to ask, Mr. Speaker, if it was possible for us to remain out of the conflict. I do not think so. Some people have said: "If we were in the United States, we would be free from all this trouble." Those people were mistaken. Despite ourselves, we have been drawn into the war, as the United States themselves were a few months ago. But how many insults and indignities was not our neighbour of the South, the great American Republic, subjected to before entering the war. They endured all that was humanely possible to bear before definitely entering into the conflict. The time came, however, when endurance could no longer be tolerated and the greatest and most powerful of all neutral countries on earth cast its sword into the balance to assure the triumph of democracy and crush forever the Huns who are eager to enslave humanity.

Such has been the fate of the United States, and such would have been our fate if, in the month of August, 1914, we had refrained from entering into the struggle. We would inevitably have been drawn into the battle, as were our powerful neighbours of the South. If one of the most peaceful nations of the globe could not keep away from the horrors of the battlefields, how could we remain indifferent to the great drama which is being enacted to-day on the European continent, and on the great seas of the world?

Others, Mr. Speaker, have said: "We owe nothing to England, so why fight for her?" To those I answer: We are not fighting for England, but we are fighting with England. England is fighting to protect her Empire; we are fighting to protect our territory. In the same way we are fighting, not for France, but with France. We know fairly well that if France is conquered

9 p.m. England will be conquered also, and that Canada would then suffer the horrors of defeat. If England were defeated the territory of our Mother Country would be invaded, and then it would require only six more days for the Germans to invade Canada. The time would be passed then to organize armies and issue the call to arms. Our country would be pillaged and plundered, our population slaughtered, and we would witness the horrors and crimes committed in Belgium and in northern France by the barbarians of the twentieth century. When we study the situation we should consider ourselves fortunate, indeed, to defend our country on foreign territory, especially when we know what misery and distress have been inflicted on the inhabitants of northern France and Belgium, whom a cruel invader has robbed of their homes and possessions, and who to-day, in order to regain possession of those villages where they were born and grew up, are forced to shell the places they have loved so well. So, we are not fighting for England, but for ourselves, and it is to secure liberty for ourselves and for those who will follow us that we are fighting to-day. Since I have proved that we are fighting, not for England, but for ourselves, it is needless to ask if we owe anything to England.

But there is one point on which it is not permitted to differ, viz.: since the beginning of the war the British fleet has kept the route from America to Europe open, and we have thus been permitted to export our products at prices so remunerative that our population has never been so prosperous as since 1914. The British fleet has kept the way free for our commerce, and that fact has been worth millions to us. What would have happened without the British fleet? We would not have been able to export to Europe a single bushel of grain or a single manufactured article. Our harvest of 1914 would have remained on our hands. The United States would have been in the same position. The farmer, with his harvest of 1914 on his hands, would not have sown his land in 1915, and as early as 1915 famine would have prevailed in the great cities of Canada and of the United States. The farmer would have said: Why should I work my land at such a high cost when I cannot market my products? Consequently our cities would have suffered from lack of production. The large cities of Russia are actually suffering from famine. The Russian farmers are producing for themselves only. Blockaded by land and sea, they were unable to export the surplus of their harvest of 1914. They used to export about 300 million bushels of wheat. In 1915, as their harvest of 1914 was still on their hands, farming was considerably decreased. In 1916, they produced enough for themselves only, and as a result, the inhabitants of the large cities are famishing. This economic situation, due to the blockade, is more disastrous to the Russian people than the invasion of their territory by the Germans. Russia is virtually under the ban of an embargo imposed by Germany.

We owe more than that to England, because, without England's powerful fleet, this British colony, Canada, would have been conquered by the Germans as the German colonies were by the Allies. What would have happened to Canada if the British fleet had not cleared the seas of the German fleet? We would have seen our cities, such as Halifax, St. John, and Quebec, bombarded by the German fleet and forced to accept the conditions imposed upon our country. Our people would have been crushed with taxation, and instead of the abundance we have known since 1914, we would have experienced misery and poverty as Belgium did.

The reason why we do not stand humiliated in face of the services rendered us is to be found in the presence of our Canadian boys at Ypres, Festubert, Givenchy, St. Eloi, Neuve Chapelle, Courcelette, Vimy, and those who stand prepared, up to the last, to die in defence of the cause, with the soldiers of England, of France, and soon of the United States. If valuable services have been rendered us, let us be proud of those who enable us to say that we also have done our share, and let us not forget that our boys kept the Germans from reaching Calais in 1915. Let those who have sacrificed themselves for us, as we have sacrificed ourselves for them, speak. This is what M. Viviani said to us but a few weeks ago:

> Yes, Sir, your Canadian boys have fought along with the English and French troops without paying any heed to racial differences. Under the flags of all the Allies they have all shown a similar courage. It must not be forgotten that in the month of February, near the Belgian frontier, in a country devastated by floods, after the terrific assault of the German soldiers by means of asphyxiating gases —Germany, the country that has caused science to swerve from its true ends, and, instead of pouring its benefits upon mankind, has visited humanity with manifold evils and crimes —the same Germany has had to meet your Canadian soldiers. On that terrific day, your sons, rising in their might, saved the situation.
> And throughout many battles, throughout numerous and recent victories, the soldiers of Canada stood up heroically against the foe. Even at this moment, we have before our eyes your boys, so alert, so athletic, so brave, the first to storm, victoriously carrying their flag to those heights of Vimy which were reputed to be impregnable.

I am proud to see in this chamber one of our heroes of Vimy in the person of our colleague, the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Arthurs).

Let us solemnly register these words of Marshall Joffre:

> What the soldiers of Montreal and of Canada have accomplished will always be appreciated in France. The soldiers of Canada are courageous; they despise death, and their bravery equals that of the French troops. I thank you for what you have said and hope that your words will bear fruit, but send along more men, we need them all.

The law authorizes the raising of 100,000 men, in nine provinces. I do not know what number of men the tribunals of each province will decide to send to the army, but let us suppose it will be as follows: British Columbia, 10,000; Alberta, 10,000; Saskatchewan, 10,000; Manitoba, 10,000; Ontario, 25,000; Quebec, 25,000; New Brunswick, 5,000; Nova Scotia, 5,000; Prince Edward Island, 2,000. We reach a total of 102,000 men; the law authorizes but 100,000. The Government thinks they can be found, but once more, I say the tribunals will decide.

The leader of the Opposition stated the other day that he regretted that the French Canadians were not in greater number in our expeditionary forces. I ask him, and I also ask his followers from Quebec who are in favour of our participation, as they have proved to be since the beginning of the war, if they think that Quebec would be ruined if she had furnished 25,000 more French Canadians. I know that the leader of the Opposition, the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux), the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. E. Lapointe), and all the other members for the province of Quebec would be as happy as I to say that we have 25,000 more French Canadians in the army. I know that we would recall this fact with pride, to state that we have done our share as have all the others. I know that the French Canadians would be proud to have many regiments like the 22nd, which has shed such glory upon the French Canadians' name. If the province of Quebec had furnished 25,000 more men, would she be ruined? Without hesitation, I say, no. Will she be in a position to furnish them under this Bill? That is for the tribunals to decide, just as in the other provinces. No difference will exist between the French Canadians of Quebec and the English Canadians of the other provinces.

Our public men will be in a position to see that the law is carried out with justice to every one. Furthermore, a French Canadian organization should be formed to take special care of our soldiers and of their families. This organization could ask the Government to place French Canadian officers in charge of the military commands of our province, and I am sure that this request would be favourably received; and the same could be done in regard to promotions. This measure would restore the harmony between the two races and remove certain grievances which actually divide us.

In concluding, I say to my fellow citizens that we are proud of our ancestors of 1775 and of 1812 who saved this country for Great Britain. We are proud of these words so often repeated: "The last shot for the defence of the British flag shall be fired by French Canadians." We are proud of our pontifical Zouaves and we have cause to be proud of them. They have fought for sacred causes. But never a more sacred cause has called men to the flag than that of the present war, and millions have so far answered the call.

For our glorious ancestors dead on the battlefield; for our brothers who died or are ready to die in the trenches; for the sacred cause of justice, religion, democracy and civilization; so that our children and our grandchildren may be proud of us as we of our ancestors; to have understanding between the two races which God has placed in this young and great country; so that our fellow citizens of other provinces be treated with justice; so that our compatriots of the United States who set us such a noble example may be proud of us; so that France may live with our dear mother tongue; so that the British Empire may still be the greatest power of the world and give us the pride to continue to bear our title of British subjects; so that Canada and the American continent may never be threatened by Germany; so that we may take part in the triumph and not be isolated and despised when the bell of victory shall ring—for all this, I say it is worth while to shed our blood. Others may say what they wish, but for my part, I accept.

Hon. WILLIAM PUGSLEY (St. John): Mr. Speaker, I am very sorry indeed that the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue impaired what in most respects was a very admirable speech by the reference he made at the commencement to my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition. Let me say to that hon. gentleman that in future years the historian will say: There is no man occupying a place in Canadian history who has done more to promote harmony between the two races than my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition. His whole life has been devoted to that cause. Others might have won in a larger measure than he did the approval of his compatriots, but he has always sacrificed his personal ambition to his desire to promote unity and to add to the grandeur of our glorious Dominion. He has known no race and no creed, but has been in all respects and at all times a true Canadian citizen. I am sorry, as I have said, that my hon. friend made the reference which he did to my right hon. leader.

There is just one other remark which I have to make in regard to the hon. gentleman. He says there are many people in the province of Quebec to-day who are saying that Canada owes nothing to England. Let me ask my hon. friend if that statement is made by gentlemen who have great respect for my hon. friend. Is it made by those who listened to the hon. gentleman himself years ago when on platform after platform he stated that Canada owed nothing to England and should take no part in the wars of the Empire? True, Sir, down in Valleyfield not long ago the hon. gentleman said that when he made that statement he was young and his mind immature, his intellect had not been fully developed, he was only 30 years of age. Down in our part of the country it is generally supposed that fish is a very good article of diet, which leads to mental development, but let me say that I think there is no better food than the food which the hon. gentleman gets at the Government crib, for it seems to have developed his intellect and to have brought him at last to a right way of thinking, and to an appreciation of the duty which every man in this country owes to Canada and to the Empire.

The hon. gentleman said to-night that a great crisis has arisen. He intimated that the people of the province that he represents in the Government are greatly agitated over this question. If that is so, why does he not unite with my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, who has moved an amendment to the Bill calculated to promote harmony and unity between the different races in this country, and calculated also to serve the best ends of Canada and the Empire in this great world war? Why does he not do that, and show that he is prepared to sacrifice his place in the Government for the good of his country?

With regard to the question before the House, in my opinion the proper time to have introduced a measure of compulsory service was when this war broke out. The public men of this country knew then as well as they know to-day that this would be a conflict of giants. They knew then as well as they know now that Germany had been preparing for this war for 50 years, that she was armed to the teeth with great guns and plenty of ammunition, and that it would be a long and hard struggle. If the Government thought that it would be desirable at any time to introduce compulsory service into this country, the time to introduce it was when the war broke out, just as the United States Government, immediately war was declared, provided means for the enlistment of her soldiers. This Government, however, did not do that. You will remember, Sir, that at the session of August, 1914, my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition was asked by the Government to assist in putting through as speedily as possible the different war measures which the Government desired to pass. My right hon. friend readily acquiesced. He took part in voting all the money that the Government required and assisted in every way, so far as this Parliament could assist, in the financial operations necessary to send our boys to the front. Not a murmur of dissatisfaction was raised against what the Government proposed to do. This side of the House assured the Government that anything they required for the carrying on of the war would be cheerfully given; and from that day to this, that has been the policy pursued by this side. There was no suggestion that conscription would be resorted to; there was no suggestion that the compulsory system then or at any time was likely to be found better than the voluntary. To-day, the Government is trying to take shelter, so far as this Bill is concerned, behind the fact that the Militia Act of 1904 provided for compulsory service. They say they are making no change in principle, but merely an alteration in detail. I do not believe the Government at that time thought that the Militia Act would enable them to do what they are doing, and what this country has supported them in doing, namely, sending hundreds of thousands of our young men across the seas to fight the battles of the Empire, of freedom and of civilization, and to crush German militarism. To-day they seek an excuse for what they propose that this Parliament—which has extended beyond the term for which it was elected by the people—should do; and they seek also to afford the enemies in the province of Quebec of the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) an opportunity of saying that this Bill is not more stringent in its provisions than the Militia Act of 1904, which was passed under the guidance of the Government of which that right hon. gentleman was the head. Other members who have spoken in support of this Bill claim that under the Militia Act the same thing could be done which is proposed to be done under this Act. The leader of the Government (Sir Robert Borden) went so far as to say that the Act of 1904 was the same as the Act that was in force before that statute was passed—similar in its provisions, but with a very slight difference in its terms. In order to show you that that was not the case, let me call attention to the Act that was in force before 1904, which will be found in the Revised Statutes of 1886. Section 79 of that Act, which is the section corresponding with section 69 in the Act of 1904, provides:

> Her Majesty may call out the Militia, or any part thereof, for active service either within or without Canada, at any time when it appears advisable so to do by reason of war, invasion or insurrection, or danger of any of them.

The power to call out the militia was not limited to an occasion which made that calling out necessary "for the defence of Canada." The words "for the defence of Canada" were omitted from the Revised Statutes. When this Parliament, in 1904, re-enacted the militia law, it sought to make it clear that the intent of the Militia Act was that our soldiers should be called out to serve, inside or outside the country, only for the defence of Canada. That is the material point in which the Act of 1904 differs from the Act of 1868 which was re-enacted in the Revised Statutes of 1886. Now, the Prime Minister and the newspaper supporters of the Government in the province of Quebec, such as L'Evenement, claim that the Liberal party is responsible for this conscription law, the law of compulsory service passed in 1904. But the change in that year was made for the purpose of making it clear that the militia could not be sent outside of Canada except for the defence of Canada. When this war broke out—no matter what we may think of it to-day—the people of Canada had no thought for their own safety and their own defence. They recognized that this was a case in which Germany had ruthlessly broken her treaties with Belgium and ruthlessly invaded France; that the British Empire must fill the breach in defence of liberty and civilization; and Canada determined to throw in her lot with the Empire. We did not think of Canada, but of the Empire, and of the noble ideals for which that Empire and the Allied nations were waging this war. With a unanimity which was wonderful the people of Canada themselves, and as represented in this Parliament, agreed that our boys who volunteered should be sent to the front to fight for these ideals. Surely it comes with ill grace from the Prime Minister to say that his excuse for the proposed law is that it is not a departure from the Act of 1904, that it does not change the principle of that Act but only some of its details. The Minister of Militia (Sir Edward Kemp) emphasized this phase of the argument. Let me, then, even at the risk of repeating what was put before the House when my hon. friend from Kamouraska (Mr. Ernest Lapointe) and my hon. friend from St. Johns-Iberville (Mr. Demers) spoke, read what took place in the session of 1904. Sir Frederick Borden was then Minister of Militia, and he it was who had charge of the Bill. Speaking under the advice he had, he said that the reason for putting in the Bill the words "for the defence of Canada" was that this had been the spirit in which the Militia Acts had been administered, and that he was only making the matter clear so that it could not be questioned. I find that it was argued that as the law then stood troops could be sent under the Militia Act in defence of the Empire; but the reason for putting in these words was that the power should be restricted. In one part of his remarks, Sir Frederick Borden said:

Sir Frederick Borden: That is the idea in the organization of any militia force—it is a home force for home service. When the troops were sent from Canada to South Africa, as I have said, it was not considered that the Militia Act which is now in existence, and the important clause of which in this connection the hon. member for Colchester (Mr. Gourley), has quoted, was sufficient to justify the organization of a militia force to be sent to South Africa; consequently, volunteers were called for and the force was organized purely as a voluntary service, and one in no way whatever connected with the militia at all.

Mr. Sam Hughes: That was an Imperial force.

Sir Frederick Borden: It was a volunteer force.

Mr. Gourley: With the hon. Minster's permission I would ask him a question. If there is no change of policy will he allow the old section to stand? It is far better worded than this new one.

Sir Frederick Borden: It seems to me that we have made clear in this section exactly what is understood as the object of a militia force in every country. In the mother country and in every province of this Dominion prior to Confederation, this has been the rule. We are always able to meet times of stress and emergency. If it becomes necessary to send troops to assist the Empire at distant points, we always have the means at hand of doing so. Parliament can be called and a special force organized, or the same thing can be repeated that was done before—volunteers can offer their services and those services can be availed of. I think it is very much better to leave the section as it is.

That is exactly what was done in this case. Instead of acting under the compulsory provision of the Militia Act, Parliament gave the money to enable the Government to organize this force of volunteers into this splendid army of 420,000 men; it was organized and a large portion of it was sent forward to Europe for the purpose of doing battle for the Empire. Then, at page 6,494 of Hansard, I find the following:—

Mr. Maclean: I would ask the minister if it is not the case that under the old section of the law as it now stands the militia of Canada could be used for the defence of the Empire and sent out of this country for that purpose? But under the proposed law that is strictly prohibited.

That is the view which he took.

Sir Frederick Borden: No. I am advised, and was advised at the time of the South African trouble, for instance, that under the law we could not do that.

Mr. Sam Hughes: Could not do what?

Sir Frederick Borden: That we could not send the militia to South Africa for service; under the law we were not able to do so. The present law has been changed, as I say, in conformity with that view, and in sympathy with the idea which, as I said, controls the militia of the mother country and the militia of every one of the colonies of the Empire, where you will find precisely the same clause. . . .

Mr. Osler: What is the meaning of the words "for the defence of Canada?"

Sir Frederick Borden: Suppose that Canada were invaded, it might be the very best means of defence to immediately send an army into foreign territory.

Mr. Osler: Quite so, but is not the existing law better and more definite; which says:

"Her Majesty may call out the militia, or any part thereof, for active service either within or without Canada, at any time that it appears advisable to do so, by reason of war."

Mr. Osler and others were arguing that the limitation of these words "for the defence of Canada" should not be included, but that the law should be left as it was.

Mr. Sam Hughes: I think there is no question as to the right of the Government to send troops anywhere for the defence of the Empire. If Canada wished her troops to take part with the imperial troops anywhere else than in Canada, for the immediate defence of the Empire, that could be accomplished as was done in England during the South African war, when whole regiments of English militia enrolled only to serve in the British Isles, volunteered for service in South Africa.

There was no further discussion and the Bill passed as introduced by the then Minister of Militia. Mr. Sam Hughes became the Minister of Militia in this Government; he was Minister of Militia when this war broke out, and he proceeded at once to organize under the volunteer system, recognizing, as he must have done, from the discussion which took place in 1904, that this was a case in which Parliament should act entirely independently of the compulsory provision of the Militia Act, and that the soldiers who should be sent over should be sent as volunteers.

What I complain of is that this Government is asking Parliament to make a radical change of enormous consequence in what both parties agreed to in the course which they adopted in connection with this war and is asking Parliament to do that after its life, in so far as that life had been given to it by the people of this country, has ceased to be. It is asking that this shall be done in the face of strong opposition in this House and in the face of tremendous opposition on the part of the people of this country. This Government has no right to do that. I protest, in the name of the people of the province from which I come, that this ought not to be done. It is a usurpation of authority which this Government ought not to be guilty of.

But further than that, it is contrary to the solemn declaration which the Government made to this Parliament and made to my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition in the session of 1916, when the Government obtained an extension of its life. What took place at that time? You will remember, Mr. Speaker, very well. In the speech from the Throne it was declared that the Government intended to introduce into Parliament a resolution asking the Imperial Parliament to extend its term either for the war or a limited period, and in the debate on the address, having in contemplation that an extension of the life of Parliament would be asked for, the leader of the Opposition referred to the fact that the Prime Minister had made a promise to the Imperial Government that 500,000 men should be sent from Canada, and he said: This seems to be a very large contract; I will make no criticism as to this at this time, but I trust it will not mean conscription. He went on to refer to the way in which the bogey of conscription had been raised at the time the Naval Act was passed in 1910 when, in the province of Quebec, the hon. gentleman who has just addressed the House (Mr. Sevigny) and his colleagues went through the different constituencies and declared that the enactment of the naval law meant the imposition of conscription upon the young men of Canada. The leader of the Opposition referred to this bogey of conscription and declared from his place in this Parliament, and with the full responsibility which rested on him as the leader of a great party in this country, that there would be no conscription in Canada. He declared—not that there was not likely to be conscription in Canada but that " there will be no conscription in Canada." He went on to say, in order to allay the very thought that conscription would come in Canada, that the leader of the Government ought to make a pronouncement upon the question. Is that not to be taken as a serious matter when the leader of a great party in this country defines his own position, particularly in view of the fact that an extension of the life of Parliament is being asked and when it was expected that the two parties would unite in carrying on the war? Was it not important that the leader of the Opposition should define his position and that the leader of the Government should also define his? Let me call your attention to what the Prime Minister said on that occasion. He said:

My right hon. friend has alluded to conscription—to the idea in this country or elsewhere that there may be conscription in Canada.

That there may be conscription in Canada.

In speaking in the first two or three months of this war I made it clear to the people of Canada that we did not propose any conscription. I repeat that announcement to-day with emphasis.

I repeat, he said, that announcement to-day with emphasis. Is no consideration to be given by Parliament to the fact that there was a positive statement, upon the one side by the leader of the Opposition, that there would be no conscription in this country, even though a promise had been made that 500,000 men should be sent to the front, with his invitation to the Prime Minister to declare his position in order to assure the country upon the point, and, upon the other, by the Prime Minister declaring that two or three months after the war he had said that there would be no conscription and he desired to repeat that statement with emphasis?

Not long afterwards the resolution for the extension of Parliament was introduced. I ask you, Sir, if that resolution would have been passed without the practically unanimous consent of this House. We have the statement of the leader of the Government that if there was any opposition to it on the part of the Liberal party he would withdraw the resolution. He said that he recognized that the resolution could not be passed except by unanimous consent, and I repeat to you, knowing what took place at that session, that if it had been suggested for a moment that there was any question as to the Government keeping faith with this Parliament and with the people of this country upon the question of conscription, his policy in respect to which had then been declared by the Prime Minister, that resolution for the extension of Parliament never would have been passed, and before October, 1916, there necessarily would have been an appeal to the people of Canada, and the people's voice would have been heard as to who should hold the reins of office in Canada.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Hear, hear.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Now to come down with this Bill and to refuse the amendment that it shall be left to the people to determine is a breach of faith of the grossest possible character, not alone with the right hon. leader of the Opposition, but with the members of this House and with the people of this country.

One hon. gentleman opposite has said that in these times of war he would puncture the constitution to pieces. I suppose he would say, too, that in this time of war there is no condemnation to be meted out to public men who break their promises, who disregard their pledges. I suppose he will say that. But, Sir, I think upon sober reflection the members of this House and the people of this country will entertain a different view. Further, when that resolution for the extension of Parliament came before this House, the leader of the Government said that he had had discussions with the right hon. leader of the Opposition with regard to the extension and as to what should take place if the extension were granted. There was to be no party warfare; if vacancies occurred by-elections were to be held and in each case the representative of the party which had held the seat before was to be elected by acclamation. But there was to be no party warfare. Yet only one year afterwards we find the right hon. leader of the Government coming down and proposing a measure which must necessarily be regarded as most partisan in its character, inasmuch as a large number of the members of this House are firmly and unalterably opposed to it, and inasmuch as some millions of the people of this country are also determinedly opposed to it. How could you get a measure more partisan in its character? For a measure to be partisan, simply means that upon it Parliament and the people of this country are divided, and, as I say, there never was a measure introduced in any Parliament which from that standpoint is more partisan than the Bill now before this House. At that time the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), in his address in support of the resolution, referred to the fact that all was harmony, that the members of this House were united in the prosecution of the war, and he said:

> We are now at the beginning of the third campaign, and at this stage we may well appropriate to ourselves the invocation of the American poet:
>
> Our fathers' God! from out whose hand
> The centuries fall like grains of sand,
> We meet to-day, united, free,
> Loyal to our land and Thee,
> To thank Thee for the era done
> And trust Thee for the opening one.
> In the words of the poet, we meet to-day, united, free.

But we now have this Bill introduced into this moribund Parliament by a Government which is not here through the suffrages of the people of this country, but is holding power by the vote of this House, owing to the fact that we asked the Imperial Parliament to keep us in office beyond our term. This moribund Government is asking this moribund Parliament to pass this law of conscription, which will interfere with the liberties of the young men of this country. Whether, under other circumstances, it would be right or wrong to introduce such a measure, I need not say at the present time, but, by reason of their introducing this measure, Parliament is divided, the people of this country are torn asunder, and no man can tell what will be the outcome if this Bill is passed into law and an attempt is made to enforce it by compulsion. What a different picture is presented to-day from that which was presented to the people of this country a little more than one year ago! Now, Sir, is there any need of this? As I said before, the time to introduce a law of conscription was when the war broke out. At that time a vigorous effort should have been made by a non-party Government to organize for the national service the wealth and all the industries and all the resources of this country for the purpose of winning this war and doing the very best which it was possible for Canada to do in connection with that great purpose. That was the time to act. But this Government has done nothing in that direction. As has been said by hon. gentlemen who have spoken, as has even been said by hon. gentlemen on this side who have felt constrained to support this measure, from the beginning of the war until now, partisanship, party spirit, party patronage, have entered into almost every act of this Government in connection with the carrying on of the war. Apart from sending our young men to the front, they have taken no steps to organize the national resources of this country, no steps to make the wealth of this country respond to its duty in connection with the carrying on of this war. All they have thought of is to get our young men to the front; all they think of to-day is to pass a law of conscription under which they can send their officers throughout this country and take the young men from their homes, take them from their mothers, their fathers, their sisters, their sweethearts, their wives, and send them across the seas—that is all they think of. They have not built a ship. They have not built a ship to carry the products of Canada across the ocean. They have not taken one single step to cheapen transportation in order that England and our Allies may be supplied with food which may be needed, and needed in the most dreadful way, before the war is through. They have taken no steps to control food prices in this country. They have allowed the cost of living to go up by leaps and bounds, so that the young man who has gone to the front and who has left his wife or family at home, is to-day in the greatest possible anxiety as to the way in which they are able to live on the small means which they receive. They have done nothing to assist in the production of food. They have seen the prospect of the crops being less and less from year to year owing to the scarcity of farm labour. They have had appeals made to them by members of this House and by the people to assist the farmers by putting fertilizers and farm tractors on the free list so that thousands, and tens of thousands, and hundreds of thousands of acres might be put under cultivation, as could have been done if reasonable and progressive methods had been pursued, but they have done absolutely nothing. As I said, all that they think of, the only thing in respect to which apparently they think they have any duty at all, is to send our young men to the front.

I ask you, Sir, is it necessary to introduce this measure at this time? Canada has enlisted over 400,000 men for military service. As the Minister of Finance said the other day, the effort which Canada has put forward can be described as nothing less than a mighty effort, unparalleled in history. If Canada's effort were equalled by the people of the great republic to the south, they would send between six and seven million young men across the ocean to fight the battle of freedom as Canada has been fighting it side by side with the Allies during the past three years. The question is, after the putting forth of this great effort, is this the time to introduce conscription? Is it necessary to do so? We have endeavoured, but in vain, to get accurate figures from the Minister of Militia and from gentlemen who have spoken on behalf of the Government. When I asked the Minister of Labour, who knows about as much concerning Government matters as any other member of the Government—I am not quite sure, Sir, whether you will regard that as high praise—if the report in the newspapers was true that last month voluntary enlistments in Canada had reached about 7,000, what did he say? Bear in mind that before I had asked him the question he, a responsible minister of the Government, had told the House that voluntary enlistment had absolutely fallen down; that we could not get any more men; that the only thing to do was to resort to conscription. In response to my inquiry whether 7,000 men had actually enlisted in the month of May, the Minister of Labour replied that he did not know anything about it; he could not answer. Yet, he, a member of the Government, who is willing to take upon himself the responsibility of passing a law under which 100,000 young men can be deprived of their liberty, was not able to give the House any figures to show the necessity for such a course of action. To-day the Minister of Militia stated that 420,000 men had enlisted and that 330,000 had gone overseas. That would leave 90,000 still in Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, no.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Yes, 330,000 had gone across the seas.

Sir HERBERT AMES: Of that 90,000 fully half did not stay in the service.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That has not been explained to us. The member for St. Antoine may know about these things, but he is not a member of the Government; he is not the gentleman to whom we have a right to look for information of this kind. These are the figures which were given to us: 420,000 had enlisted, 330,000 had been sent across the ocean; there were 130,000 in France and 126,000 still in England. The casualties have amounted to 87,000 or 90,000. If the Minister of Militia is right, and we are still raising in Canada 70,000 to 80,000 men a year, the figures are these: We have in Canada 90,000 men. If we get in a year 80,000 more, that will be 170,000. Add to that number 126,000 who are in England, and you will have available within a year about 300,000 men for the service of the Empire, in addition to those now at the front.

Mr. MURPHY: But you will have no election cry against Quebec.

Sir HERBERT AMES: I understand that there are not over 17,000 men in Canada who are in training for combatant service?

Mr. PUGSLEY: The hon. gentleman should at once be favourably considered for the position of Minister of Militia, or of assistant to the minister.

Sir HERBERT AMES: I have quite enough on my hands at present.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Well, we will put it at 17,000. Out of 90,000, only 17,000 remain; that means that 73,000 men who enlisted in Canada have disappeared. Of that we have no explanation. The minister did tell us that 126,000 men were in England, ready for service or being prepared for service. There were 90,000 men in Canada, 73,000 of whom, the member for St. Antoine has kindly informed us, have disappeared, so that only 17,000 remain. However, if you add to these 17,000 the 126,000 who are in England and the 80,000 men that we would raise in a year under voluntary enlistment, you have upwards of 200,000 men available inside of a year for service at the front or for training in England. Mr. Speaker, that is not a bad showing, nearly at the end of the third year of the war. I am unable for the life of me to see why the Prime Minister, in the face of the pledges and promises which he made to the people, should introduce this measure. I fail to see any justification for such a course at the present time. One ought to take this stand whether he be in favour of conscription or against it: Having started upon the policy of carrying on the war by voluntary enlistment—Canada having contributed to the Empire far beyond what anybody dreamed was possible, thereby gaining the admiration of the whole world—we should not resort to compulsory service until every other resource has been exhausted and until absolute necessity arises.

The Prime Minister says that the crying need to-day is for infantry. What did he say when he came from England? He talks about the call from the trenches—a call which I doubt he ever heard. I doubt if the men in the trenches would feel it in accordance with the oath which they took to offer any complaint or make any representations with regard to what should or should not be done for them. But the Prime Minister made some very interesting remarks as to what he saw at the front. He is reported as follows, on page 1610 of Hansard of this year:

> I was particularly proud to have the privilege of seeing Courcelette, because the Canadians distinguished themselves in its capture, and in that attack and on other battlefields, no regiment bore itself more worthily than the 22nd French Canadian regiment, which did splendid work in every engagement in which it participated.

That statement ought to be remembered by those newspaper men who write those savage articles about Quebec and who speak about civil war and about its being a very good thing if our soldiers, while passing through Quebec on their way to fight the Germans, would have a little fight with the French Canadians. It ought to be a rebuke to hon. members like the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Steele), who, at a meeting of the Liberal-Conservative Convention held the other night at Mitchell, in his constituency, is reported in the Montreal Star to have said that the people of Quebec did not want to engage in this war; that they would sooner fight the people of Ontario than fight the Germans.

Mr. STEELE: I should have excepted the 8,000 who have enlisted from the province of Quebec.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The hon. member, I am sorry to say, admits the truth of the report made of the speech delivered by him on that occasion. It is language like that, coming from responsible members of this House; it is writings like that appearing in newspapers in Ontario, which incite racial passions and prejudices in Quebec. That is a course which should be frowned down by every hon. member who loves his country and who wishes to see his fellow countrymen of all races live in peace and unity. The Prime Minister says further:—

> The Canadian Railway Construction Corps is performing work of the most vital importance. As far back as 1915 it was, I believe, suggested to the war authorities that railways could be constructed behind the fighting line and utilized to great advantage. The matter was not taken up immediately; but it has been taken up since, and one of the chief requests that we received from the War Office while we were in England was for additional men for the Canadian Railway Construction Corps and for the Canadian Forestry Corps. What I have said of the Canadian Railway Construction Corps applies with equal force to the Canadian Forestry Corps The work of these units is not so impressive, but is almost equally important as that of the combatant forces. It is absolutely necessary, as things are at present, that Great Britain should cut down to the utmost the tonnage for the conveyance of articles other than food supplies, and timber takes up an enormous quantity of tonnage. Therefore, in Great Britain and France forests are being sacrificed to-day on every hand in order that the necessary timber for the prosecution of the war may be provided. It is universally admitted on the other side of the Atlantic that the Canadian Forestry Corps is most highly efficient, and the request to us is that we shall send men in as large numbers as possible to assist in the work which they are carrying on.

That, he tells us, when making his statement to Parliament, is the request that was made to him upon the other side. A few days afterwards, when he submits the Bill for military service, he says: Oh, it is infantry that is required; the crying need is for infantry. The voice which he heard in regard to infantry is, I believe, not the voice of the Imperial authorities, but the voice of Toronto; it is the voice of those who do not want to see voluntary enlistment carried on; it is the voice of those who want a measure of conscription introduced; it is the voice of those who wish to raise racial cries and issues in this country. I am sure the people of this country will agree that by a vigorous effort the Government could easily secure in four months 100,000 men to engage in railway construction work and forestry work, and those are the very men that the military authorities on the other side say would be so useful to the Empire. Yet, when we are asked to pass this Conscription Bill, the Government tell us: We want young men to go into the trenches; we have more artillery men than we require. We have no word such as that from any military authority in England; the only word we have is to send all the men we can for forestry service and for railway construction work. I have seen a despatch from Mr. Stewart Lyon, special correspondent of the Canadian Press, dated the 21st of June, in which he says:

> The drafts from the Canadian depots in England to make good the wastage in the corps are of good quality.

This is sent from the Canadian headquarters in France:

> I hear nothing but praise for the new men, especially the artillery drafts.

The Canadian artillery men have covered themselves and their country with glory upon the battlefields. They are the very best men in the service, young men of great intelligence and skill. They have been of enormous benefit, and their ability has been recognized by the highest artillery officers in England. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) knows that one young man, Major Magee, from St. John, has done most magnificent work, which is beyond all praise, and that has been the case with all the artillery men whom Canada has sent to the front. The artillery requires great ingenuity, originative ability, executive skill and high intelligence, and these qualities are usually possessed by our Canadian boys, perhaps to a greater extent than by the soldiers of any other country. Yet when we have an opportunity to secure such men, when our boys are crying for an opportunity to enlist, when during the last month some 1,400 have enlisted for the artillery service, the order goes out from Ottawa: We do not want any more artillery men; stop recruiting for the artillery. Yet next week, I am sure we shall hear some hon. members saying: This is a battle of big guns and shells; this is a battle of engineers.

Mr. ARTHURS: Has the hon. member read the synopsis of the men now in England wherein it is stated that on the 14th of May there were available for military service, 279 artillery officers and 3,700 artillery men who were apparently not required for the artillery?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Yes, but does it follow that, because an officer or a man is in England available for service, he is not needed in France? Of course, he is not needed until men are killed, until vacancies occur, but those men are waiting in England to take the place of men who are killed or wounded or who become ill.

That is why 126,000 troops remain in England as reserves in training for the battle front till the call comes for them to go. Hon. gentlemen opposite say: Are we to leave our young men, those splendid young men, for whom no word of praise can be too high, without support? Certainly not. The moment they arrive in England they become units of the Imperial army. They go under the command of the Imperial officers, and are sent to the front; their disposition and everything connected with them is under the control of the British army. If we fail to put into force this law of conscription but take steps to stimulate recruiting, and if the war continues for one, two, or even three years, and Canada cannot send quite enough men to fill up the gaps, is it to be said that the Imperial army officers are going to leave the Canadians to be hacked to pieces in the great work they are doing for the Empire? Why, it passes my comprehension how any one can suggest such a thing. Is this the time to take this great departure? Is this the time to introduce this extraordinary measure which, no matter how it is enforced, must necessarily be encompassed with great hardships, with much anguish, with bitter tears, and many a broken heart. Is this the time, when the great republic to the South of us has just entered into this momentous struggle; when they are raising money not by the million but by the billion; when 9,500,000 of their young men have registered for military service; is this the time when, if they do their part as nobly as Canada has done her part, they will have between 6,000,000 and 7,000,000 men at the front. And, Sir, are they not bound to take a part equally as noble as that which Canada has taken? Is it not their war as much as ours? For three years the men of Canada have been fighting on the battle line for the freedom of the world, fighting for the safety of America as well as for the safety of Canada, fighting to overthrow Prussian aggression, fighting to prevent Germany obtaining dominant power over the world, which would mean over the United States as well as over Europe. Canada has been fighting the battle of the United States, and we have the right now that the United States are in the war to expect the United States boys to take their place on the battle line and fight as the Canadian boys have fought, fight, if need be, side by side with the Canadian boys. We have a right to expect that.

Hon. gentlemen ask: Will you allow the boys to be forsaken? Why, Sir, what will happen if the war goes on for two or three years and the right to levy this 100,000 men has been exhausted? Do you not think that the United States and the Imperial Army will back up our young men? Or are we to go on year after year draining the life of our country? Is it not only reasonable that we should do all that is humanly possible in order to win this war, by the sending of our men, by the husbanding of our resources, by stimulating food production, by marshalling the industries of the country into the service of our Dominion and the Empire? It is right that we should do all that we can, but there must not be expected of us more than it is humanly possible to do. In view of the entry of the United States into this world war, and in view of the figures I have presented to the House, there seems to be to be no reason for the extraordinary measure which is now being submitted for the consideration of the House. It is a step which, as I said at the outset, if it was to be taken at all, ought to have been taken at the commencement of the war, and which measure ought not to be resorted to now except in case of the direct necessity, and which ought not to be passed except by a parliament having a mandate from the people to pass such a law.

This Parliament was induced by solemn declarations by the leaders of both parties to pass a resolution asking the Imperial Government to extend the life of parliament—something which this Parliament would never have thought of for a moment if it had been suggested that during this extended life this great departure would have been taken. Why do I say that, Sir? What were we asking for last session? We were asking the Imperial Parliament to amend the British North America Act, which is the constitution under which our provinces came into this great Confederation. All our people depend upon the constitution, but more especially do the people of the neighboring province of Quebec, because it is the constitution which preserves to them their laws, their language, their religion, and their customs. They look with jealousy, and properly so, upon any proposal to amend the Constitution. It has been held by the courts of the country that the Act of Confederation is in the nature of a contract between the different provinces of this Confederation, and you know, Sir, as well as I do that the Imperial Government would not have thought for a single moment of altering that constitution unless it felt it had the consent of the people of every province of this Dominion. If there had been any suggestion last session of this measure being introduced by this moribund Parliament, there would have been intense opposition on the part of members of this House to extending the term of Parliament, and not even the far-reaching influence of the right hon. leader of the Opposition, if he had taken strong ground in favour of the extension, would have been sufficient to enable the measure to be passed. Some hon. gentlemen are talking of extending the term of Parliament again. I do not know what may be the view of this House, because I have not consulted with any one as to what should be done when the question comes up, but in view of what is taking place now, in view of the unreasonable, the improper and autocratic effort of this Government to pass this measure through Parliament under the circumstances I have mentioned and in spite of the pledges that have been given, I declare that I will not repeat the blunder of which I was guilty at the last session of Parliament. Never again, if this measure is pressed through, would I feel that it would be safe to have an amendment to our constitution if we had to rely upon the pledges made by the gentlemen at present occupying seats on the treasury benches.

To my mind we are right on the verge of the greatest crisis which ever faced this fair Confederation. It is well to be frank about it; it is well to look matters right in the face. My hon. friend from Welland (Mr. German) referred to the fact that the British Parliament in its wisdom had declined to apply the conscription law to Ireland because it was contrary to the general sentiment of the people of that country. There was one reference which he might have made as to the undesirability and impossibility of imposing any law upon an unwilling people.

In the case of great communities living together, they judge the law by the common sentiment; and the truth was laid down centuries ago: vox populi, vox Dei. What most of the people believe, they think, is the law that ought to be observed; and any law which gives you the common sentiment of the people, and particularly the common sense of the people, is, they are apt to think, the law which ought to be obeyed. What happened when the British Government proposed to impose the law for Home Rule upon Ireland? The people of Ulster, comprising I think, only about two millions of people —hon. gentlemen will correct me if I am wrong—no more people than in the province of Quebec, showed signs of resistance. They even formed armies and the leader of the army formed to resist the enforcement of the law for Home Rule, was Sir Edward Carson who is now the First Lord of the Admiralty. Most people would say, who are not familiar with public sentiment, that it was strange that loyal people like the people of Ulster, famed for centuries for their devotion to the British Crown, should propose to resist a law passed by the British Parliament. And yet these people were determined to fight that law if the attempt was made to impose it upon them. You may say they were wrong; I may say they were wrong. At the same time, the gentleman who led them along these lines was not condemned very much by the Imperial authorities, for as I have said, he is now in charge of one of the most important departments of the Imperial Service. And so, to compare small things with great, in my own province, when I was a comparatively young man, a law was passed with regard to education in the common schools. Those who thought like myself and who are of the same religion with myself, thought it not an unreasonable law which took away certain alleged rights from a portion of the people of the province. The people who framed it never thought that the law would not be loyally accepted. It was put in force, and in one section of the country, the very first time an attempt was made to collect taxes by the arrest of one of the ratepayers, three men sacrificed their lives. That shows that when racial passions are aroused there is no saying what the end will be. Hon. gentlemen opposite have lighted a fire that may attain proportions far beyond what they expect. I trust it may not; I pray God it may not. There is a way to stop it, and that course the Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Sevigny) can take if he wants to, in the interests of harmony and good will and the happiness of the people. He can persuade this Government to agree to this referendum. It does not declare for or against conscription; all it says is that the further consideration of the measure shall be postponed until the judgment of the people has been obtained upon it by means of a referendum. It will only mean a delay of three or four weeks at the most. Parliament can go on with its work—there is plenty of work to do—and before the time for prorogation comes around in the ordinary course a return of the vote will be made, and Parliament will know whether the people approve of conscription or disapprove of it.

It has been said by some hon. gentlemen opposite that this is contrary to the British constitutional system. That is absurd; it is such a statement as men make who want to becloud the issue, who, though they are carrying through a measure, want to go to the people, and, by means of appeals upon questions of personal popularity, upon all kinds of other questions besides the one at issue, hope to so divert public attention that there will be no decision upon the question. If this question be left to the people on a referendum it will be stripped of all other considerations. The question whether this Government have, during the last three years, been guilty of wrong-doing and blundering, or whether they have been right and are paragons of virtue—it will be deprived of all these considerations, and will be brought down simply to this: Are you in favour of the principle of the Bill establishing conscription for Canada, or are you not?

Something has been said about taking the vote of the soldiers. Of course, take the vote of the soldiers; no vote would be worthy of being considered unless it included the vote of the soldiers. In the case of a general election it was proposed to take the soldiers' vote. I would not surround this referendum vote even with any very great safeguards, for it is simply a referendum. The mails could be utilized to send the questions to the soldiers at the front. Let them sign their votes before their commanding officers and return by letter to the proper official at Ottawa. In this way you would get the votes returned from the soldiers as soon as you need them. And you will have their vote, recorded, as it ought to be recorded. As to the idea that this is contrary to British principles, how do they happen to have it in Australia? That is one of the great oversea dominions, and the constitution of the commonwealth was the Act of the Imperial Parliament. In the case of many municipal bodies, even a small proportion of the electorate can demand a referendum on any question. They have a right to do that instead of waiting until the time of election comes around. The referendum has grown in favour among the progressive communities of the world. I know no better way to obtain the declaration of the will of the people on this question than by leaving it to them by a referendum.

As has been so well said in this House, the people ought to be regarded as the governing body. They are the court of last resort. The Finance Minister (Sir Thomas White) said that we ought not to leave it to the people, we ought to lead the people. Possibly, the people may not admire the way in which they have been led during the last three years. They have been led through the mire of scandal, and graft, and bungling, and mistakes of all kinds—bungling in connection with horses; graft in connection with the purchase of drugs; graft in connection with the manufacture of fuses; bungling of the worst kind in connection with the production of shells. The people may not want to be led. They may prefer to have this question left to them stripped of all other considerations so that they may decide for themselves, yea or nay according to their own judgment. They are just as capable of forming a judgment as to what will be in the best interests of the country as this Government is of forming it for them.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to have kept the House so long, but entertaining the view which I do that this Parliament has no right, no mandate, to pass this Bill, that the attempt of the Government to do so is simply an autocratic attempt on its part to disregard the wishes of the people, having in view the fact that this Parliament does not represent the people of this country, that we are not here by the votes of the people but by our own vote which extended our life for the period of a year, I am utterly and unalterably opposed to this Bill and opposed to it going to its second reading. I shall vote for the referendum because I want the question to go to the people. If the amendment for the referendum is voted down, there is no other logical course for me to pursue than to vote against the second reading of the Bill. I repeat, there is no other logical course open to me. I feel it is my duty to vote against it and I intend to discharge my duty. If the Bill goes to the third reading, I shall feel that it is only consistent for me, in the performance of my duty, to vote against the third reading.

I say that, coming as I do from the grand, loyal city of St. John, the city to which more than one hundred and twenty-five years ago thousands of people came, although in the midst of great hardships, in order to live under the British flag. If there is any constituency in this country that is loyal to the core, it is the city from which I come, inhabited as it is by people who were and are prepared to make every sacrifice for the defence of the flag and the Empire. But I shall take the responsibility of the course that I have decided upon. I shall do my duty as I see it clearly before me, and then I shall leave it to the people of my constituency to exercise their judgment as to whether I have done right or wrong. I take the course which I do in the full confidence that I am doing what will be most effective towards producing peace and harmony in this country, towards increasing the happiness and prosperity of the people and which will be to the lasting advantage of the country to which I am so attached, a country which, through these two great races, we want to see united forever in peace and harmony, and a country which will become the greatest of the overseas dominions of the Empire and one of the brightest jewels in Britain's Crown.

On motion of Mr. Arthurs, the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Crothers, the House adjourned at 10.30 p.m.

Tuesday, June 26, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

SENATE BILLS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill No. 104, respecting The Vancouver Life Insurance Company.—Mr. Stevens.

Bill No. 105, to incorporate The English Valley and Hudson Bay Railway Company. —Mr. Webster.

Bill No. 106, for the relief of Rozilla Lamb. —Mr. Douglas.

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT BOARD.

Mr. ROCHE moved that the House on to-morrow take into consideration the following proposed resolution:

That the resolution of April 23, to establish a Board to be called the Soldier Settlement Board and to effect the other objects set out in the said resolution be amended and that the maximum amount that the Board may loan to settlers be increased from two thousand dollars to two thousand five hundred dollars.

Motion agreed to.

LABOUR STRIKE IN WESTERN MINES.

DIRECTOR OF COAL MINING OPERATIONS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. W. A. BUCHANAN (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers) a few questions on a matter of urgent importance. Yesterday there was laid on the table of the House an Order in Council appointing Mr. Armstrong of Vancouver to look after the operation of mines in western Canada. As I understand it, he is first to make inquiries and investigations which will delay the operation of the mines. I had understood that the Government had fully decided to take over and operate the mines and that Mr. Armstrong had been placed in charge of this work. I want to know whether these investigations and inquiries are to be made and whether the operation of the mines is to be delayed. I would think that the Government had sufficient information now to decide what is the best policy to pursue.

I am also advised that the gentleman who has been appointed is not a friend of organized labour, but that, on the contrary he has been opposed to organized labour. If that is the case, I would suggest that it is a bad appointment to make in dealing with a labour problem in western Canada. I would also ask the minister, in fairness to the House and the country, to make a complete statement in regard to the negotiations and efforts to bring about a settlement of the strike. I think Parliament and the country are entitled to a full statement especially when the Government has in view such drastic action in connection with the operation of the mines.

Hon. T. W. CROTHERS (Minister of Labour): The statement of my hon. friend about the Director of Coal Operations in district No. 18 being opposed to organized labour is the first intimation of that sort that I have had concerning Mr. Armstrong. Mr. Armstrong reached Calgary yesterday, and his instructions are to have operations resumed at once. No inquiry will be necessary further than to ascertain the general condition there before the men will go to work. I had a wire from him to-day to say that he would wire me to-morrow definitely. I expect he will succeed in getting the men to go to work at once, and he will make whatever inquiries are necessary afterwards. As to the full statement that my hon. friend desires, I may say to him that the House has made an order for a return of all the correspondence concerning this matter, which is very voluminous. It is being prepared now, and when it is laid on the Table he will have the disclosure of the negotiations which he desires.

Mr. BUCHANAN: I would like to ask the minister if, in ordering the men to return to work, they are to have their demands complied with by the commissioner representing the Government. Are they to be paid what they have been asking for?

Mr. CROTHERS: I expect that the director will settle that matter. I do not know the terms upon which they are returning to work, but I am satisfied they will return to work right away.

Mr. OLIVER: I notice in the Order in Council that was laid on the Table yesterday that authority was conferred on the gentleman appointed to control mines in southern Alberta and southeast Kootenay. I wish to know just what is the condition in regard to the mines in Northern Alberta.

Mr. CROTHERS: I have not the Order in Council before me, but my recollection is that it takes in the southeasterly part of British Columbia and the southwesterly part of Alberta, covering what is generally known in that part of the country as district

No. 18. I am not quite certain how far north that extends.

Mr. OLIVER: I would respectfully ask the minister to inform the House at the earliest convenient date how far this Order does extend. It is probably the most remarkable Order that has yet been issued in Canada, and there is a very great difference created between those mines that are under it and those that are not. It is of great importance that we should know which mines are under the Order and which, if any, are not. In view of the importance of this Order and of the action that necessarily follows it, it is essential that this House and the country should know, not by a return laid on the Table of papers which do not carry their own explanation, but on the responsibility of the Minister of Labour, what the negotiations between the parties were, and why and how those negotiations failed to come to a satisfactory conclusion. This country is going into a tremendous experiment, and we have a right to begin at the beginning and know why.

MILITARY SERVICE ACT, 1917.

DEBATE CONTINUED ON MOTION FOR SECOND READING AND ON THE AMENDMENTS.

Consideration of the motion of the Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden (Prime Minister) for the second reading of Bill No. 75, Military Service Act, 1917, and the amendment of Sir Wilfrid Laurier thereto, and the amendment to the amendment by Mr. Barette, resumed from Monday, June 25.

Mr. JAMES ARTHURS (Parry Sound): Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to take up the time of the House at any length, but I believe it is due to myself, in justice to those men whom I took overseas and the men with whom I have been associated more or less in France, that I should say something concerning the matter now before this House. It has been said, I believe, by the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver), that members of this House who were in the military service were not in a position to give an unbiased opinion upon this matter. I take issue with the hon. gentleman and say I believe that the men who know the conditions, the men who have given their services, the men who have engaged in recruiting in Canada, the men who have raised battalions under the voluntary system, the men who have taken these battalions overseas, and in some cases at least have had an opportunity of seeing actual conditions in France, are in the best position to decide this matter, or at least to give an opinion upon it. There are no two opinions among the men actually at the front, and I honestly believe that if every member of this House had had an opportunity of viewing the battlefront in France and along the western front, there would not to-day be a single voice raised against the passage of this Bill, or a vote against it. Personally I do not care, nor do I think the man at the front cares whether the reinforcements which he needs are raised under the Militia Act, under this compulsory service Bill, or under any other Act. The only condition that he demands is that these reinforcements be sent forward at the earliest possible date. In this matter I think it is absolutely idle to discuss other than the present and future conditions. The men whose interests in this Bill are greatest do not care what the Prime Minister said or what the leader of the Opposition said or what any other man said in 1914 or at any other time in regard to conscription, nor does he care to have any discussion as to the constitutionality of this Act or as to the feelings of any part of Canada, introduced for the purpose of delaying the passage of this Bill. The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) last night said that this was a partisan measure. This measure is supported by the best elements of his own party. It is opposed only by those who expect to profit politically by that opposition, and in that respect only is it a political measure.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: From your own party.

Mr. ARTHURS: That may be so. There may be members in the Conservative party in the past who oppose this for the very same reason and other reasons which I shall explain to the House later on. The chief arguments of the opponents of this Bill are absolute threats against the balance of Canada if this measure is carried to its logical conclusion. I wish to contrast for a moment the speeches of two members, both of whom have always been political opponents of my own, but who have been political friends of one another for many years, both members of the party of which the hon. member for St. John has been and is a member. I refer to the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Pardee) and the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Gauthier). I shall quote first a few words from the speech of the hon. member for Lambton, a speech which I think every man in Canada should hear:

This is not the day for soft words and soft actions. The time has long since gone by for that. Now the Canadian people, men and women, need an awakening which can only come through strong individual and concentrated leadership. Failing that, everything is at a standstill; failing that, our last condition may be worse than our first.

We must not think too much of party; we must remember that whatever party be in power, our country remains and her problems remain with her. The fate of parties, to my mind, matters not so long as we do our part for the cause of liberty and right and the preservation of our democratic institutions. Four hundred thousand of our people have gone; they went voluntarily as young, red-blooded Canadians should have gone. Does anybody think for a moment that they went because they loved war and all that it means? No. They went from the highest motives of national and Imperial feeling; they went to uphold the liberty that our fathers and forefathers have secured and handed down to us. Now that they have gone, now that they are there, dying, bleeding, sacrificing themselves in this greatest war for principle, honour, and liberty, is it not the duty of the Canadian people, and of this Parliament to see to it that the men who have gone shall have the backing of the men who stay at home?

I want to contrast that for a moment with the closing words of the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Gauthier), who said:

Before resuming my seat I shall be very frank with the House. I want to make a few remarks in the name of my people.

His people—not the people of Canada, but his people.

This is one of the most solemn hours of my life. It may be the last opportunity I shall have of addressing the House of Commons and my country. I say to the Government: If you press this measure through, my people, declaring that this Government has no mandate, will use the very Bill itself to fight the matter out. We acknowledge that in this fight there will be pain and suffering. We may have to go to the direst consequences.

If that is not a threat I do not know what a threat means.

My people are willing to go to the limit if you impose upon them such a piece of legislation; I believe they are right and I will do as they intend to do.

The Liberal members who are opposing this measure in this debate, as a rule, it appears to me, seem ignorant of the true state of this war and of its importance so far as Canada is concerned.

In the early stages of this war many of us, perhaps all, were of the opinion that we were in this war as a part of the British Empire, to help the Mother Country. Many of us believed that the war was entirely, so far as Great Britain was concerned, to fulfil her treaty obligations, and to vindicate the right of the smaller nations. Those who have had the privilege of seeing the war as it is are no longer of that opinion. It is borne in upon them that this is a fight to the finish, a fight for life and death for all the democracies concerned in it, and that Canada is just as vitally concerned in the issue as France or Belgium. It is idle for any one in Canada to say that Canadians are doing their duty if they defend Canada when an invasion occurs, or that they are not afraid of invasion. If this war is decided against the Allies, it will not be necessary for Germany to invade Canada, in order to attain her object, and, even if it were otherwise, Mr. Speaker, what could these men who now profess to be so willing to defend Canada do if invasion occurred? The hon. gentleman from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) speaking in the House the other day, made the boast for his province:

We want the men from Ontario to feel that their fellow-citizens in the province of Quebec are prepared to defend their country. We want the people of the west to realize that if the Hun ever came to Canada it would be up the St. Lawrence river and the citizens of Canada would be the first to meet him. The citizens of Quebec have been called upon to meet the invader before.

Expressions of this kind, Mr. Speaker, only tend to show how little some members of this House realize the situation. The question before the House at the present time appears to me to be whether or not this compulsory service Bill is necessary, in order to provide the needed reinforcements for the men in France. There appears to be no question regarding the desirability of reinforcing the men now at the front. It is agreed, perhaps by silent consent in some cases, that we are morally bound to support the men who have already honoured themselves and gone forward. We have boasted, with good reason, that our Canadians blocked the way to Calais, that they were in the forefront on the Somme, that they took the famous Vimy Ridge. Are we going to quit now? Every man knows the answer. The answer is the words, Mr. Speaker, of the old song we hear so frequently in France, "We are going to see the whole thing through."

Every Canadian is proud of the voluntary system. It worked well for a while. We were proud of the results achieved by it. It did more than was ever expected of it. At the commencement of the war, during the short session of 1914, every member of this House thought Canada was doing exceedingly well when we sent forward 30,000 men, and, when a second contin-gent was proposed, many of our people thought it was entirely unnecessary. This number has been increased from time to time, until, according to the figures that we now have before us, 420,000 men have enlisted. During the fall of 1915, and the beginning of the spring of 1916, an extraordinary effort was put forward, through most of the provinces of Canada, for recruiting. Hundreds of men and women gave their services voluntarily and freely to help this cause. Hundreds of thousands of dollars were subscribed by private parties to this end. Meetings were held in every city, town and hamlet in Ontario, and many other provinces, and the result was that we raised many battalions in a very short time. But the number of men willing to enlist decreased, and eventually, it became very difficult to secure recruits. Some people say that politics was the reason why voluntary recruiting failed. There may be something in that, Mr. Speaker, but if there is, the blame lies, not upon the party on this side of the House, but upon those on the other side, who repeatedly went round, declaring that the whole game was run along political lines. However, the real reasons for this falling off were; in the first place, in some parts, particularly the province of Ontario, that every available man had gone to the front. It was not thought possible to secure more recruits, because they were not there, and, in the other case, the only men who were left were men who were absolutely essential to the workings of the farm and the industries in that part of the province.

An hon. MEMBER: The same in Quebec.

Mr. ARTHURS: The recruits from the portion of Quebec province from which my hon. friend comes, were not very great in number. But the principal cause was, Mr. Speaker—and there is no use beating about the bush—that the man who was available refused to go until he saw the slacker enlisting. In my riding hundreds of able-bodied men, French Canadians mostly—I am sorry to say this, but I have to say it in all fairness—were brought in to take the places of men who had voluntarily gone to defend the Empire, and when the recruiting officer asked others to enlist the answer he received was: "When you get these slackers to do their duty, I will certainly go also." It was not because these men were afraid to go forward, but they saw the absolute unfairness of the system whereby the slackers could stay at home, and their brothers, fathers, and cousins went forward. While we were proud of the voluntary system, I might say that it is always unfair, and its unfairness became more marked as the long war dragged along. Under the voluntary system, a father enlists, leaving in many cases, a large family, which is a charge upon the country, while the able bodied slacker remains at home. Under this voluntary system, the only son of a widow goes forward to do his duty, while three, four, or five sons on an adjoining farm remain at home. These are conditions which are inevitable under the voluntary system. But, Mr. Speaker, there are thousands of men in Canada who, to-day, could go forward and do their duty. These men are not engaged in agriculture, or in trades essential to the prosecution of this war, and they are, to-day, perhaps, frequenting the pool-rooms and other places of amusement. These are the men at whom this Bill aims.

I might say, however, that if the province of Quebec had done its duty, this Bill would have been entirely unnecessary, and the required 500,000 men would have been raised. Why did Quebec not do its duty? Some of the reasons given, I may say, are very childish. The leader of the Opposition stated, as one of his principal reasons why the men of the province of Quebec had not enlisted as freely as he would have desired, that some men were disarmed in 1760, during the continuance of a war then existing, and a few days after the surrender of Montreal to the British. He did not say that this ancient law—which as a matter of fact was a mere regulation—continued to exist, or that it had any effect afterwards. He also stated, in contrasting the enlistment of the British born, the English Canadian born, and the French Canadian born, that the English born enlisted more freely because they had not been so long in Canada. He also said that the English Canadian born had enlisted more freely than the French Canadian born because they had not been so long in the country as the French. I cannot see how a French Canadian of eighteen, twenty, or twenty-five years of age can possibly have been any longer in this country than an English Canadian born at the same time, but that is the kind of reasoning which we have from some hon. members. The hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) says: While the French Canadians have not enlisted—and he is quite willing to admit that they have not—wait until the Hun arrives on the shores of the St. Lawrence and they will be on hand to do their duty. He also states that the French Canadians did not enlist because the right men were not sent to ask them to enlist. I noticed from a statement made in a speech the other day that a decided effort had been put forward by the one man who, the hon. member for Rouville said, was necessary in order to conduct a successful recruiting campaign in Quebec. Col. Blondin and Major General Lessard conducted a campaign in Quebec, and while somebody was good enough to say that they had recruited 211 men, from an analysis of the figures we find that in all this campaign only 92 of those men enlisted from Quebec. This took place before the Conscription Bill was brought down; it was during the time when my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley) said that recruiting was going on well under the voluntary system. In spite, however, of the fact that the people of Quebec had General Lessard, the most acceptable man who was available for that province, and that his efforts were backed up by those of a member of the Government, who undoubtedly tried to do his duty, during that campaign the total enlistment from Quebec was only 92.

Mr. GAUVREAU: The hon. member is giving the lie to the Postmaster General (Mr. Blondin) himself.

An hon. MEMBER: He was sent too late.

Mr. ARTHURS: If he was sent too late, how is recruiting under the voluntary system good at the present time? The real reason why the enlistments from Quebec are not in proportion to the enlistments from the other provinces is because the Liberal party in Quebec have been playing the political game, and the political game only. It was said openly in Quebec: This is the Englishman's war; let the Ontario man go, so much the better for us.

Mr. MEDERIC MARTIN: That is similar to what was said in 1911 by the Nationalists.

Mr. ARTHURS: It was said and published in Quebec that: Unless the English-speaking people give us what we want, we will not enlist. What the French-speaking people wanted was the right to defy or to alter materially a law of Ontario. There is no question about that. The other night the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) was making an appeal to hon. members from Quebec to go home to their province and carry on an active recruiting campaign for a couple of weeks in order to see if this matter could not be settled by a last effort to secure, under the voluntary system, the needed reinforcements. The hon. member for Montcalm (Mr. Lafortune) interrupted him with this remark:

> Mr. Lafortune: If we in Quebec do as the hon. member from Brantford suggests will the Government repeal the School Act of Ontario?
> Mr. Cockshutt: I am hardly ready to discuss the bilingual question on the present occasion.
> Mr. Lafortune: And we are not ready to go.

This is the true secret why Quebec has not done her duty. According to a return brought down in this House, the number of French Canadians enlisted in the province of Quebec is 6,979.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: 14,000.

Mr. ARTHURS: I will refer to the 14,000 later on; I am speaking of enlistments in Quebec province. The total French Canadian population of Quebec is approximately 1,600,000, so that the rate of enlistment is rather less than one-half of one per cent. The total enlistment of French Canadians in all Canada amounts to 14,100. This is the official list and I believe it to be correct. In my battalion I enlisted a number of French Canadians, many of whom after enlisting were transferred to Quebec battalions, either upon their own request or upon the request of the militia authorities at Ottawa. Many made all sorts of excuses in order to procure their discharge, and in some cases evidence was produced that the same man had previously pretended to suffer from every disease from lunacy to housemaid's knee so that he might procure his discharge. Many deserted. Desertion was rendered easy because, as a rule, these men were well behaved soldiers, and I know that in my battalion when leave was requested, there was no reasonable excuse why a soldier from Quebec should not receive exactly the same treatment as a soldier from Ontario, and the soldier would go to visit his friends in Quebec, but he never came back. In the majority of cases, I honestly believe that these men joined some Quebec battalion; I think they were too brave and too good men absolutely to desert in the ordinary sense of the word, and I do not think they did. If, as I presume, they joined some Quebec battalion, they would thereby double the number of so-called French Canadians enlistments.

Mr. ROBB: Is the inference we are to draw from the hon. member's remarks, that the French Canadians in the battahe raised were men who originally came from Quebec?

Mr. ARTHURS: I do not know whether they did or not; I presume they did. In my riding, there is a large French Canadian population, and we are glad of it.

Mr. ROBB: The hon. member has just stated that French Canadians left his battalion to go home to Quebec.

Mr. ARTHURS: That is quite true.

Mr. ROBB: Then they must have come from Quebec.

Mr. ARTHURS: In some cases they went to visit their friends in Quebec, and in other cases they went to Quebec to join battalions in which their friends were. These men work in the mills; they are not all permanent residents of the district which I have the honour to represent. The majority are voters in my riding, although they may have friends and relatives in Quebec, and if they had enough money coming to them, I saw no reason why they should not visit their friends in Quebec, just as any soldier from my county might visit his friends in Ontario. I endeavoured to treat every man in my battalion in an equally fair manner, and although I had experience of men deserting in this way, I still gave men permission to visit their friends or relatives, because I saw no reason for detaining one well conducted man because another man had not done what was right. Personally, I have nothing to say against those men; I believe in the majority of cases they were honest, conscientious men. The French Canadians who went overseas with me and who fought in France, were as good as any other soldiers and were true Canadians. The unfortunate thing is that we have not enough of them.

Mr. ROBB: The inference we must draw from the hon. gentleman's reference to the Quebec men who joined his battalion at Parry Sound is that Quebec men were credited as residents of Ontario.

Mr. ARTHURS: The Quebec men who enlisted in my battalion were credited as French Canadians enlisted in Canada. I made more than one return. While the ex-Minister of Militia was minister, the military authorities requested me to give them week by week the number of French Canadians who enlisted in my battalion. I was also requested to transfer to Quebec battalion French Canadians who enlisted in my battalion. I did so for a time, but later on I refused to do so, and the balance of the French Canadians in my battalion went over with me to England or France. That is the exact situation; I do not wish any misapprehension in the matter.

Mr. MEDERIC MARTIN: How many French Canadians went to war with you to France?

Mr. ARTHURS: Very few.

Mr. MEDERIC MARTIN: I am asking for the number.

Mr. ARTHURS: I suppose there would be about 20 or 25. I can let my hon. friend know the exact number later, if he wants to know. There were also a couple of cases in my battalion of French Canadians who had enlisted no less than four times in different regiments. This is another reason why the enlistment figures for French Canadians are abnormally puffed up. These two men had enlisted as early as in the 22nd Battalion from Quebec; they deserted and eventually drifted into my battalion. They deserted again, and I had the honour not long ago of arresting one of them in the city of Ottawa; and I think he is still behind the bars. The fact remains that the province of Quebec with its 1,600,000 French Canadian inhabitants has sent to the front to-day only one battalion, the 22nd, comprising in round figures 1,000 men. I have nothing but praise for the 22nd Battalion and the other battalions who are engaged with the Canadians at the front at the present time, but I think it is a shame that hon. members from the province of Quebec should oppose this Bill instead of being actively engaged in securing the men that are required to reinforce the 22nd Battalion.

There is in England one reserve battalion composed entirely of French Canadians. I was in close touch with them for a week or two when I was in England, and I know that the battalion is largely composed of officers and n.c.o's; there are very few privates in the battalions.

Mr. CARROLL: What has become of the rest of the 8,000 men who enlisted in the province of Quebec?

Mr. ARTHURS: The hon. member will remember that I have stated that according to the figures I have, only 6,900 enlisted in the province of Quebec.

Mr. CARROLL: What has become of the balance anyway?

Mr. ARTHURS: Probably they deserted too. It must be remembered that the enlistment of 6,900 men does not necessarily mean that number of men at the front. Many men after enlistment become unfit. They are subject to sickness, accident, disease and death just as are men who have not enlisted, and the forces are continually being depleted from these causes, if from no other. Desertions also account for a considerable number.

According to the figures given by the Premier the other evening, 325,000 in all have been sent overseas. About 126,000 are still in England or were in England on the 14th of May, and of these, 27,000 were available for immediate service in France. In his speech last night the hon. member for St. John, using suppositious figures, placed the number of men in Canada at 17,000, and the number who could be obtained under the present system at 80,000. He then said, "Here are sufficient reinforcements in Canada to last for a whole year." That is an absolute fallacy. The 126,000 men in England are not 126,000 men newly sent over from Canada. They are what is left of the 326,000 men who have already gone forward, and include the staff, which is quite large in England, those in hospitals, amounting to between 18,000 and 20,000, and the Army Service Corps, which must be maintained in England, and which numbers many thousands. The various noncombatant units have also to be kept up. So the actual number of men fit to fight must necessarily be small as compared with the total number in reserve in England at any particular time.

There are in England about 12,900 men who should be returned to Canada. Personally I do not believe that any man should be kept in England who is unfit to fight in France, or about to become unfit. Every man in Class B now in England should be returned to Canada in order to provide the necessary labour required on our farms and in our factories. These men are perfectly fit in the ordinary sense of the word, but unfit for service in France simply through some minor defect in their eyesight, hearing, feet, or something of that kind, and which probably has been discovered after their enlistment. To my mind there is no earthly reason why these 12,900 men should be kept in England, except that if our losses should be as large in the future as they have been in the past, it would be absolutely necessary to send these men to France unless the needed reinforcements went forward from Canada.

Just a word about the referendum. I did not intend to say anything about this, for I do not think it is necessary. To my mind the referendum is a farce. We have only had one referendum in Canada, and that was on the prohibition question. On that occasion the leader of the Opposition in words just as eloquent as he used the other day, said he would give the country a referendum and if the people decided in favour of prohibition, prohibition they should have. The referendum was held and the people decided in favour of prohibition by a considerable majority. One of the provinces of the Dominion of Canada, however decided they did not want prohibition, and the result was that the right hon. leader said: "We cannot pass this Act because all the provinces are not in favour of it." That situation is exactly the opposite of what we have to-day. I can see no reason why we should get any further ahead by having a referendum to-day, than we did on that occasion. After all, what is the referendum to decide? We are all agreed—I think the leader of the Opposition and every man behind him are agreed—that it is absolutely necessary to send forward reinforcements for our men at the front. The hon. member for St. John last night very eloquently said that this Bill would tear the child from its mother, the husband from his wife, and the lover from his sweetheart. This Bill is for the very purpose of preventing that. We believe that under selective conscription we shall get the number of men required, and they will be the men who can most easily be spared. The Compulsory Service Act will avoid the very trouble that was in the mind of the hon. member for St. John. There is not a man within sound of my voice who does not know of hundreds of cases where it was an absolute shame to have men go to the front leaving their wives and families a charge upon the public. It is to avoid this very condition that the Conscription Bill is brought in. Both sides of the House are agreed that it is absolutely necessary to get the men, and I say quite frankly that all a referendum could decide would be what class of men should go forward.

In order to prove the absolute necessity for reinforcements, I will read a short extract from a letter sent by General Currie the other day to the Prime Minister of this Dominion. General Currie is the greatest Canadian soldier to-day. He is the man who has charge of all our Canadians at the front, the man who is responsible for their well-being, for their leadership and for everything connected with them so far as France is concerned. This is what he said:

> I note with special gratification your assurance that the troops in the field can rely upon Canada giving them all necessary support. They have given of their blood freely to maintain their nation's honour and now confidently expect that the full fruits of their sacrifice will not be prejudiced. It is an imperative and urgent necessity that steps be immediately taken to ensure that sufficient drafts of officers and men are sent from Canada to keep the corps at its full strength.

Mr. Speaker, this Bill is necessary because many men at the front have been without a day's leave for over twelve months, some of them for over eighteen months. Men are in the line in France who should have medical attendance for diseases and minor ailments and who are compelled to take their places in the trenches without such attendance, as the officers cannot afford to allow them the necessary time. Platoons and corps go up into the line far under strength, which makes the work much harder for those who go. There should be reserves right at hand, and I agree with the former Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes), who said in his recent speech that it would be far wiser to have our reserves close behind the lines in France rather than in England, for various reasons. I have spoken to hundreds of our men in France, and I did not meet one who did not ask for conscription, not because they were afraid for themselves, but because they see the absolute unfairness of the voluntary system. Their fathers are working overtime on the farm while others on adjoining farms keep their sons at home. Slackers are taking their jobs in factories at from $4 to $8 a day, while they are working hard in France, risking their lives, and are paid the magnificent sum of twenty cents a day—that is all that the soldier gets to-day in France. It is absolutely unfair to the Canadians in France that they should not be supported, that they should not have the necessary rest, or that they should not know that every man in Canada is doing his duty as they themselves are.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I know the hon. member (Mr. Arthurs) does not wish to leave a wrong impression. A soldier in France gets more than twenty cents a day—the balance over that amount is credited to him.

Mr. ARTHURS: The soldier is paid thirty-five francs a month. The balance, as stated by the ex-Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes) is placed at his credit. If the poor fellow lives long enough, he gets it when he comes back. But all he gets in France is approximately twenty cents a day.

I have been quoted by some newspapers in the province of Quebec, copied, I believe, by the Toronto Star, as being opposed to conscription. I have always been in favour of compulsory service, and I am now. I am in favour of this Bill, and I will support it regardless of political or any other consequences, because I feel that in doing so I am voicing the opinion of the great majority of loyal Canadians, and I am doing what ninety-nine per cent of the men at the front wish me to do. I have been requested by all I came in contact with in France to support compulsory service and make all do their fair share.

I have seen our boys enduring all sorts of hardships at the front. I have seen a battalion of our men twelve days in the front line, in mud often knee deep, standing in mud and water all night without relief, every night for that time. I have seen our brave boys wounded, thousands of them, and never heard a groan or a complaint. I have seen them die, bravely, cheerfully facing the enemy, and cheering for Canada. The cemeteries of France shall always be dear to Canadians. I should not be doing my duty to these men; I should not be worthy of my place in this House if I did not vote for this Bill which is necessary to give our boys the support now needed and to ensure that those who have died shall not have sacrificed their lives in vain.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my views upon this question have received so much publicity that I trust that I shall not need to trespass upon the time of the House at too great length. I do not think that there is any doubt anywhere as to where I stand. I shall support the Government's measure; support it with a clear conscience and a stout heart, believing that it is absolutely in the best interests of the country, of the Empire, of the world, and of the cause of civilization for which we are fighting.

I desire to approach the consideration of the question in the cold light of facts and reason, and to avoid altogether the language of passion or recrimination. There is no man in this House or in this country who is more opposed by nature and by training to compulsion—unnecessary compulsion—than I am. But I think that if there is one lesson which every sensible man has learned in the last three years it is that in the course of a war like this no one connected with it can afford to cling to his previous predilections and to refuse to adapt himself to the circumstances and exigencies of the time. I heard my right hon. friend and leader (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) criticise, or rather oppose conscription, as I understood him, on the ground that the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) had said we would never resort to it. Well, I do not know whether the Prime Minister ever said any thing so strong as that. If he did, and is resorting to conscription, I am grateful, Sir, that he is greater in his gifts of patriotism than in his gifts of prophecy.

Think of what we have seen in the course of this war. England, that true home of freedom and of individualism, has been turned into a State-run bureaucracy. The Government has taken hold of mines and forests, of farms and factories, and the war is being better prosecuted because they have done it than if these things had remained in private hands. We must distinguish very sharply on the question between peace and war, and between conscription in peace and conscription in war. Conscription in peace is part of the machinery of a militaristic state, it is part and parcel of that militarism which—we are told on all hands, as we have been told by my right hon. friends on both sides of this House—it is the object of this war to put an end to. Conscription in war is the expedient of a country which is in dire extremity and must take the steps necessary to put forth its greatest efforts. I take it that that distinction is perfectly clear. I take it that the fact that we were not in favour of conscription before the war measures that we were not militarists before the war; but being in a war like this, and every man being in it, I believe it becomes the part of common sense to adapt ourselves to the needs of the moment. That is exactly the case with Mr. Lloyd George. There is no man in this House who is a stronger anti-conscriptionist that Mr. Lloyd George was; there is no man in the world who is a stronger anti-militarist than Mr. Lloyd George is at the present moment, but, he has put aside all his previous predilections and become the chief advocate of conscription because he realizes that this is a war to end war, and so a man may be thoroughly logical and true to his previous convictions if he adopts conscription to put an end to conscription.

Exactly the same thing is happening in the United States. Does any one contend that the United States is turning its back on its whole pacific history? Does any one contend that the people of the United States to-day are more in favour of the war than ever they were? We have noted the reluctance with which they went to war, the slow steps by which the President led the people up to the inevitable decision. I contend that the United States is in exactly the same position as Mr. Lloyd George at the present time. They are as pacific as ever they were when they adopt conscription, and the procession of men on the day when registration took place must have filled every impartial and thoughtful mind with admiration for that great people. If there is anything that should inspire us it is to see those 10,000,000 young Americans who left their homes under compulsion—or under the President's call, shall I say?—to register their names as citizens of a common country, and soldiers, if need be to fight and die for that country.

Conscription is the only fair method in the last analysis under circumstances such as those we find ourselves in now. It is the only method under which we can fill up the gaps in our ranks. Who can go on the platform in this country and plead that it is fair, that it is even decent, that one family in one district, or one province—and I do not name any province—should be able to shelter in comfort and prosperity beneath the flag, that other people, other provinces, and other men are fighting for? It is the only practical method. In Britain it is notorious that whole battalions which had enlisted under the voluntary principle had to be brought back from France to Lancashire because it was found in the course of the war that these men were more useful in Lancashire than in France. That is a very important consideration. Conscription is necessary at this stage of the war to say who shall stay at home as well as to say who shall go. It is the method by which you are going to organize your nation and get the last ounce of strength out of the nation either for service at home or for service abroad as the wisdom of those making the choice shall dictate.

It is said in some parts of the country, and my right hon. friend and leader rather indicated a predilection for that doctrine, I think, by the quotations he made from the Militia Act: that the proper place for a Canadian to fight is on the soil of Canada. In the same quarters of the country where this is said, it is called England's war. As an Englishman with a vein of Scotch in me--Scotch logic I mean—it surely is permissible for me to ask the question: Is England fighting her battle on England's soil? England, Sir, is fighting this war wherever she sees the turban of a Turk or a helmet of a Teuton. She is fighting it in Egypt, in Mesopotamia, in Macedonia, in Belgium, but she is fighting it most of all in France. It is there that she is pouring out her blood in small rivers. My friends will forgive me—I know they will forgive me—when I say to them that if there is one consideration that should have made every drop of French blood in Canada course more rapidly, it is the consideration that Englishmen by the million are on the soil where the language of France is spoken and where the literature of France is produced, of which literature we have men as proud in Canada as they are proud of it in France herself.

Talk about not sending the right recruiting agents to one part of the country or the other! Who was the recruiting agent that the led the sons of the Empire to leap to the colours in every portion of the world and to come trooping across the seven seas? I will tell you in one word—it was Belgium. That was the recruiting agent. Belgium, guaranteed her neutrality and independence by Britain, and therefore by the British Empire—guaranteed it also by Germany—Belgium was trodden under foot by Germany and to every full-blooded man under the flag that meant that there was only one course for him to pursue. They felt: If the Huns trod Belgium under foot we must meet them with our last man and our last dollar, fight on the opposite side of the ditch and see that Belgium was restored to all that could be restored to her. And, if Belgium needed no assistance in the way of a recruiting agent what shall be said of the north east of France? Those who have been on the spot know what is happening in that country—the beautiful fields turned under, the very inside of the earth turned up, the villages desolated. These things have happened and what is happening there to-day?

I wonder if those who hesitate about what they should do on this Bill reflect that the present moment in France, as the Teuton is compelled to retire, he is taking with him every French female above the age of 14 years to work, to suffer, and God knows what else. These are the recruiting agents that appealed to the wide dominions of this Empire. May I add, not uncharitably, I hope, that if men will not listen to this, neither would they listen to one risen from the dead.

I have referred to Germany's methods of war at the present moment. Do I need to impress upon this House that the events of the moment on the battlefront, demand this Bill. Have we all read the figures on the bulletin to-day of the casualties in the last raid on London—150 dead in the heart of the Empire where the flag floats that floats over us—and, we are as morally bound to act as men in support of the flag as they are in London.

One hundred and fifty killed and four hundred and thirty injured in the last German air raid, most of the killed women and children, little children going to school! That is going on now. Cargoes of Canadian produce going to Britain are being sent to the bottom of the sea at the present moment by the thousand tons. That is going on now. That cargo which we sell now is as important to us as to the British who are going to buy it, as a commercial transaction; it is more important to them from the eating point of view, of course. That is how close the war is to us at the moment. Those are the circumstances that we are living through.

And watch the diplomacy of the Huns to-day, following exactly the traditions that came down from that old blackguard —whom I could never understand God Almighty letting die in his bed, Frederick the Great, called Great because, as we all know who have read anything of his history, he was so great in defeat. At the end of the Seven Years War, beaten on the field past all hope of redemption, he tried to win his way by diplomacy, and, unfortunately, by his diplomacy he fooled Great Britain at the moment. History is repeating itself to-day. There is no doubt that we are gradually getting the better of them on the field, very gradually and very slowly, and what do they do then? The powers that be in Germany use the very socialists whom they hate, and whose views they hate, and try to get them into Russia and into Stockholm and into other places to mix with their fellow workmen, and so to win by diplomacy what they can not win by arms. That is going on at the moment, and if we removed our hand from the plough in this matter we would be faced by the danger, one of the greatest that could possibly threaten the world, of an early and therefore an inconclusive peace. That is the greatest danger to the world at this moment: that the war-weariness of the nations will compel the people to come together, and that an inconclusive peace will be arranged. But from all I have seen of Canadians, I do not think they will take any part in that business.

And if we had an inconclusive peace, what would it mean? It would mean that the Romanoffs would be replaced upon the throne of Russia; that Constantine would probably go back to the throne of Greece, that the Hohenzollerns' hold upon the necks of the German people would be tightened and renewed, and that of the Hapsburgs upon the people of Austria. And for ourselves, what would it mean? It would mean that, just as surely as the next generation of men come around, this would have to be done again by our children or our grandchildren. May I make a personal allusion? I have a little toddling grandchild on my farm out West to-day, whose father was stricken with a gunshot wound in the neck two weeks ago. I say to you, Sir, that on my soul and conscience, I support this Bill because I believe it is part of the necessary machinery which will save that little fellow, a born Canuck, and thousands of others like him, from ever going through what his father and his uncles are going through at the present time.

I was surprised at so astute a gentleman as my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley) using an argument last evening which appears to me to be the very weakest argument that could be addressed to the Canadian nation. I am only talking about his argument, I never talk personalities at all. The hon. member for St. John said that there was no need for hurry—as I understood him, although I have not Hansard by me—now that America was in the field. Well, I am proud that America is in the field. There is a nation in this world which has never fought except to conquer or at least to come out of the contest with the honours divided, except in one case, when she was not conquered, but withdrew her troops from the field, and that is the little nation of Great Britain. But America's record in regard to wars is even greater, because in the beginning of her history, much against her will, she resisted what I consider were the false fiscal proposals of British statesmen of that time, and won her independence from the Mother Country. In the middle of the last century her sons waded in their own blood to keep the unity of their nation and to free the slave; and it is a magnificent spectacle to see that great nation, at the beginning of the twentieth century, coming at last to be possibly the decisive factor in this greatest of all world wars. A splendid history, the spectacle is grand to look at. But it is only half the spectacle. The other picture— the old mother who lost the great colony by acts of statesmen's folly at the time, reunited once more to her heart and in spirit and in soul and in purpose, and the two great empires marching out together with our Allies to save the world's civilization. Is that the moment that I as a Canadian am to be told that we should go a little more easily? The majority of Canadians, Sir, are not built that way. A great example never deters a well set up man from doing his duty, it leads him to do it more strongly and better. Where should Canada be when the British Empire and the United States are marching side by side? She should be where she has been from the beginning, in the front of the battle—she will be there. The glories of this little people were not exhausted at Courcelette, at Vimy Ridge or at any other of the battles where they have won immortal glory for themselves—the glories of this little people are going to be extended, but not, by taking advantage of the entry of the United States into the war, to go a little more slowly.

We are told that organized labour is against this Bill. Well, I do not think so; I do not believe it; I think it is a slander. If it were so it would be a very unfortunate thing for organized labour, and I agree with my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) on this point. We approach our way of thinking from different points. I do not know that he was ever a radical in the English sense of the term, but in the school of politics in which I was raised, I did not believe in calling a lord by a big "L;" neither do I believe in pronouncing labour with a big "L." Either labour or lord, or anything between the two, is just as good as he is himself; I value a man for what he is and what he is capable of. And organized labour, after all, has only 65,000 enrolled members in this country. A great many of those thousands we can say are not opposed to this Bill, because we have had the evidence of the gallant gentleman who preceded me (Mr. Arthurs) that nearly every man at the front wants the Bill, wants conscription, wants compulsory service, and there are thousands of organized labourers in the trenches in France and Flanders.

But to the extent that that view has prevailed with the leaders of organized labour, it is a most unfortunate, and, I think, indefensible viewpoint—indefensible, in the first place, because, if Germany won this war, it would be bad enough for all of us, but there are none for whom it would be so bad as the organized labourer. He would then get conscription with a vengeance, morning, noon and night, every day in the year. In the second place, I cannot understand how organized labour can be opposed to compulsory service, because they are themselves, as members of trades unions, very considerable conscriptionists. If a man in their trade does not join the union, does not work the hours of the union, or if he works when the union does not want him to work at all, he is called a black-leg. I do not want to use that term in regard to anybody in Canada, least of all to the leaders of organized labour, but I will permit myself to say that the national blacklegs, if there are such things, are not in France and Flanders to-day. They must be somewhere else. Organized labour should be the easiest people in the world to persuade that conscription for national purposes is a good thing. Surely, according to their own tenets, if they conscript in the interests of their trade—using the very considerable compulsion of trades union rules in the interests of their trade—the greater includes the less, and we must be logical, and we must really have taken up their position when we propose to conscript in the interests of the nation.

On this head, however, I have endeavoured to learn what labour men are thinking, and what I think is that they are opposed to this Bill, as if it were the only thing that the Government were going to do in the coming months to bring about that, after all, we need at the moment, and that is an organization of the moral power, an organization, and a mobilization, shall I say, of the moral power, material power, and the man power of Canada. That is what we need at the present moment. I told the Government a few months ago that their strength in regard to this measure is that it is aimed to put Canada on all fours with Britain and the United States, and practically every other belligerent country, and that is a very great strength. The weakness of the Government is in this, if I may say so, that, while they copy the United States and Great Britain in bringing in this Bill for the organization and mobilization of our man power, they have been tardy and backward in regard to what I consider the proper methods of taxation for such a time as we are passing through. I was not long in placing myself on record on this question. In the first short war session, lasting five days, I expressed regret that the Minister of Finance did not introduce an income tax. The value of such a tax, and the absolute duty of introducing it has been impressed upon the minister every session since the war began, and the reason is obvious. We cannot fight this war on the principle of limited liability. We are in it to the last man and the last dollar, and we must not stop. We must get the dollar. The other belligerent countries are taxing themselves until they suffer, and no one has suffered, sacrificed and served more freely and more splendidly than the very richest people in England. Many of them are sitting up nights in the House of Commons to vote the heaviest taxes upon themselves which have ever been placed upon the shoulders of human beings, and that is an example of patriotism that falls only short, as, of course, it must fall short, of the sacrifice which is made by the man who goes into the trenches and lays down his life for his friend, his flag and his country. These heavy burdens are being imposed on the people in England, and we should follow suit.

While I am speaking in regard to organized labour, I would suggest very seriously, and in a friendly spirit to the Government, that they will make their passage through the country much smoother, if they give due weight to this proposition: Sweep all patronage out of the military service.

The Government has done an excellent thing in appointing food and fuel controllers. That is along the line of the organization of material resources. From my point of view, I say to the Government: You would do a still better thing if you gave fuel and food free of customs duties, and then you would give these controllers something to organize about? I am afraid, Sir, that the doctrine of free fuel would not find absolute acceptance, even on my own side of the House. Do some of these things, do anything else that you can, following the example of the countries with whom you are in alliance, and beside whom you are fighting, and you will disarm a great deal of the opposition of organized labour, such as it is.

I listened to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Arthurs) who preceded me, with very great pleasure. He referred to the number of men in England not needed there. If they are not needed there they should get back to the habits of their early boyhood, and go on a farm. I could do with some of them out in the West. I would put a very fine comb very liberally through the men in khaki both in England and in Canada, and see that every man wearing khaki and drawing pay is giving services to the country, or I would get rid of him.

I have indicated, I think, in a way that will be understood, that I am supporting the Bill. It follows, of course, that I am not in much sympathy with the referendum. I was taught not to be in sympathy with referendum for I have been a very good follower of my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, perhaps a little skittish, as he might call me, and difficult to control at times, but I will remind him at this moment that, when he came back to the old House defeated, I was one of the first of his followers in the Chamber to tell him I never received anything from him, and never wanted anything, but I was prouder of him in defeat than I had ever been before, because he stood for a principle and died politically for a principle. That was not an attitude of unfriendliness on my part. We had a naval debate some years ago, and if my memory does not fail me, there was something in the nature of a referendum moved at that time. Referendums seem to take origin in Quebec. The hon. Mr. Monk moved a referendum, and my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) had not much use for it.

Mr. MACDONALD: That was in 1910.

Mr. CLARK: It does not matter if it was in 1019; I am not giving lessons in history; I am trying to deal with a serious problem. If my memory is wrong as to dates, it is nevertheless all right. My right hon. friend indicated then very scant respect for a referendum. He called it un-British. But now he will not forgive the Prime Minister for changing his mind on a more important point: conscription of men for the trenches. I consider that, after all, the clear cut policy of this Bill. The referendum idea, it will be seen, follows some rather remarkable passages in the history of the country.

I am honestly very much put out, because I think my right hon. friend, towards the end of a career which, in my humble judgment, has made him the greatest Canadian we have ever produced in politics, is taking a position in which he will be misunderstood by numbers of those who have walked with him, fought with him, won with him, and been defeated with him. My right hon. friend says: My policy is the same as that of the Premier—Win the war. Well, so say we all. At a certain point in the history of Canada, just as at a certain point in the history of nearly all the other portions of the Empire, a proposition, which seems to have been of the most generous description, comes for a coalition Government, so that we can make better progress towards the winning of the war. The impartial historian of the future will record that the offer was magnificent, and therefore, I am afraid the declinature of the offer will be described as not quite in that moral category. "Win the war" is the common policy of both sides of this House. The Prime Minister, having failed to get the coalition he wanted, brings down a Conscription Bill, and we must remember that conscription is in force in nearly all other countries.

Mr. MARCIL: The Prime Minister brought down the Conscription Bill before proposing a coalition Government.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: When was the Bill brought down? My hon. friend (Mr. Marcil) is a former Speaker of this House, and he ought to know when a Bill is supposed to be submitted to the House.

Mr. MARCIL: The condition of coalition was to carry conscription.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Yes, to win the war. How does my hon. friend from Bonaventure expect to win the war? Not by orations, however eloquent. You can win the war only by putting men on the firing line. Again my right hon. friend runs what I consider a very grave risk of being misunderstood, because when it comes to something practical in the way of winning the war, he speaks in opposition to conscription. He made no bones of his position, and I admire him for his honesty. His speech was a speech against conscription; we all know where he stands in the matter.

I suppose, one of these days, the Government, if it lives up to its programme, will bring down—just as it did last year, with the idea of preserving the unity of the nation—a proposition for the extension of Parliament. According to the morning papers, when that happens, my right hon. friend indicated the way he will go when he applauded the remarks of the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) last night, who said he would not repeat the mistake of last year and vote for an extension of the term of Parliament. If my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) repeats the mistake of last year and if he accompanies his action by as eloquent and persuasive a speech as he made on that occasion, he will do something that will make all the people of Canada proud of him. But he is not going to do that. If it is a question of getting men for the trenches, or of a coalition Government, or of winning the war by keeping the people united and, if possible, avoiding an election during the acute stages of the war—it does not matter what the question is—my right hon. friend takes a road opposite to that of the Government. I want to be quite candid; I do not believe it will be possible to persuade a large number of our fellow citizens that those who are responsible for such a policy are thinking more of winning elections than of winning the war.

I want to come a little more specifically to the referendum, and to give my reasons for being absolutely opposed to it. The first ground of my opposition to a referendum is that there is something deplorable and indescribably mean, as it appears to my mind—I am not characterizing the action of any one else—in the idea of taking a referendum from the people at home as to what is to happen on the firing line, when you cannot by any device you may conceive get the full opinion of the men on the firing line. My objection to a referendum is exactly my objection to an election in war time. Of course, I know we had a soldiers' voting Bill, and when it was brought into Parliament I spoke pretty frankly as to what I thought of that being of any use. You cannot conduct an election at Vimy Ridge; the soldiers are engaged in too serious business there. It is impossible to secure a full vote of the men at the front. And, that would be equally true of an election or of a referendum. I have been consistent in regard to the matter. As regards an election, I think at one time or another I have had almost every hon. gentleman in this House in agreement with me. For about five minutes after war broke out we were in good agreement. Sometimes one side has been more opposed to an election than the other, and sometimes the other more than the one. There has been a little politics in more than one quarter of the globe. My first objection, therefore, to a referendum is that you cannot possibly do justice to the best men and the best voters you have. I say that without fear of successful contradiction. You cannot do justice to that section of your electorate who are fighting for us; they will be debarred from having a full voice in the proceedings of an election. There is a collateral thought in connection with that, that, by this proposition you absolutely put a premium on neglect of national duty, because you enhance in value the votes of those who stay at home, and you enhance in value the votes of those parts of the country which have recruited the least number of men. Is that, to upstanding Canadians not a strong objection to this proposition? My hon. friend (Mr. Arthurs) said: The greatest objection to a referendum is that it will get us nowhere, and I agree with that. By the way, this referendum is very interesting to me on the grounds of its parentage. It has a very dubious parentage. The mover of the referendum amendment—shall I say the father of the referendum—is my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) who is frankly opposed to conscription. But the mother——

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: —or rather I should say, the stepfather of the amendment is absolutely a fierce conscriptionist. Therefore, I venture to repeat that the parentage of this referendum is a little dubious. We will suppose that the referendum is taken, and that according to the views of the father and the foster-father of the amendment, a general election follows. What is going to happeen? Suppose my right hon. friend is returned to power with a majority of Liberals at his back; where would he be in regard to conscription? I suppose my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) would sit down in a Cabinet with my right hon. friend, and on personal grounds, I should be glad to see him there. The first question that comes up is: What are we going to do about this policy of winning the war? I have no doubt that my right hon. friend will be able to get along better with the hon. member for Edmonton than he did with the Prime Minister; but where are they logically in the matter? Suppose, during war time, with our boys dying at the front looking to us for reinforcements, you have a Cabinet in power whose father is a strong anti-conscriptionist and whose foster-father is just as fierce a conscriptionist; where would be your effectiveness in bringing in conscription or any other measure for the successful prosecution of the war? A Cabinet constituted on such principles would be no good for Armageddon—they would really be the first promise of a millenium. The lion from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) would lie down with the lamb from Quebec (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), with a little child, perhaps from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald), to lead them.

I do not want to forget before sitting down that with the majority of the people of this country this war is a serious business, much too serious to be committed to two opposite lines of policy in a general election. I shall support this measure on its second reading, and I shall vote against the referendum, because I believe this law is one more step in the long series of events, bcoming very long now, which have been marshalling Canada into her proud place in the front rank of the nations of the world —another of that necessary series of events by which Canada is moulding her own destiny at the moment that she is helping so mightily in moulding the destiny of the world and the future of the world's civilization. The greatness of the cause, the gloriousness and the certainty of the coming triumph, the honour of our country, and above all the needs of the boys make me feel sure that in this House and in this country not only this step but every other that is needed and that will be provided, as I believe, by my right hon. friend (Sir Robert Borden) until the war is won, will be supported up to the hilt.

Mr. ONESIPHORE TURGEON (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I might perhaps be permitted to say before proceeding with the remarks I have to make on this Bill, that the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) who has just sat down has perhaps never had a more sincere admirer of his policies and eloquence than I. In order not to delay the House I shall be as brief as possible. I shall have nothing new to say, no principles that I have not enunciated before—principles which, notwithstanding the eloquent address of my hon. friend from Red Deer, are as dear to me to-day as ever before. The hon. member from Red Deer looks at this question from an international standpoint. If he had been with us for thirty or forty years more he would perhaps have given us different counsel. He might perhaps have inspired us with a love for our constitution and for the traditions of this country.

I come from the largest Acadian constituency in the Maritime Provinces. The French population of Canada has not received many eulogies since I have been in the House to-day, but let me tell you, Sir, that I was perhaps the first person in Gloucester county and northern New Brunswick to call on my compatriots to fight in the cause of humanity and for the Empire. Gloucester county is entirely an agricultural constituency, but I am proud to say that nearly 1,000 of our young men have responded to my appeal for recruits, ninety per cent of them Acadians. In the first year of the war I went from district to district, from parish to parish, urging our young men to join their fellow Canadians from the West and East, and to sacrifice their lives, if need be, in the sacred cause of humanity and civilization. I told them when they came back they would be the idols of the nation, and that if they should not come back, their names would be written in letters of gold in the roll of Canadian heroes, while the gates of Heaven would open to their soul. Many of the Acadians of Gloucester county who have enlisted have been recruited in other parts of Canada, in Ottawa, for instance, Quebec and Valcartier. Some of our young men, wishing to avoid the sadness of parting, would leave their old fireside telling their parents they were going to other cities to find work, and would then enlist in a different part of the country. They had enlisted in the 165th Acadian Regiment, but hundreds of them had enrolled before that regiment was started; they have enlisted in the 26th Battalion under Colonel McVeity, whose name has been famous in Canada for a long time, and they have enlisted in the 104th and other battalions. The English battalions have in their ranks hundreds of Acadians from the county of Gloucester and other counties in Northern New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. In the English battalion which was recruited from the counties of Restigouche, Gloucester and Northumberland, and which was fully equipped last December, there are 740 Acadians. So I think I may say that the Acadians of Gloucester county and the other counties of New Brunswick have done their duty in a most noble manner. Every Acadian family in Gloucester county is represented at the front. I have moved among the Acadian people for the last 46 years, and I look upon them as my own brothers and sisters. Letters come to me every day from mothers whose sons have gone to the front, perhaps at my special instigation, asking me for the assistance that they greatly require and asking me also to look after the modest estates of their boys.

The blood in my veins is French, and I am proud of it. I am proud also of being a Canadian. But while I am proudest of this great Dominion and all that it is and all that it has done, and of my citizenship as a Canadian, I am proud no less of being a British subject. I know that, even in the time when there seems to be danger that the harmony of our races will be broken, that days shall come to us of grief or pain, depression or distress, we may look to the British Crown, under which freedom is assured to all subjects of that Crown on all the shores of the seven seas. Upon that Crown we rely for the maintenance of our constitution, and for our rights and privileges now and in the future.

Our boys are fighting at the front for the great cause of humanity, for the maintenance of the Empire, for the existence of the democracies of the world and the spread of democracy throughout the world. We all agree with the lofty ideals and aims so eloquently expressed by my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark), and for these aims and ideals it is that we are ready to sacrifice the last man and the last dollar. But the permanent good of democracy in any country will never be achieved save by the application of democratic principles and under the guidance of democratic statesmanship. This applies to Canada as it applies to every country.

I wish to make my remarks as brief as possible. And when I have finished I think you will agree that what I say is logically in keeping with my career from the beginning. I was but a young man just out of college when I had to take part in events arising out of the school trouble which agitated the province of New Brunswick. I was the first man, perhaps, among the minority to call upon our people to keep the peace, to stand by the constitution, to do the best possible under the circumstances. That advice was accepted, and we have prospered and done well in New Brunswick ever since. Had we stood only on what we believed to be our rights, had we carried out the resolution which our people had first formed, the history of New Brunswick might not have been so happy as that which has been written of the past forty years.

To-day we have two propositions before the House. The first is that of the Prime Minister, a conscription measure—give it whatever name you like. The other is the proposition of the right hon. leader of the Opposition, suggested by him, not with the aim of having his people in Quebec take no part in this war, but with a view to reaching a solution of this question which will be a real solution, and in the hope that we maintain the system under which we have lived, and which is certainly the more noble, as the soldier who goes to the front voluntarily is more noble than the one who must be dragged there by the neck. That is what I have asked our people at home. I have told them we do not want conscription in Canada and we are fighting against it. I wanted them to go to the front in order to avoid the bringing in of conscription in the British Empire, and more particularly in Canada. And they have gone, as I have said, in response to my word. That is the motive of my right hon. friend. As I have said, we have a constitution in this country, and things can be done in accordance with that constitution. Though the leader of the Opposition has proposed this plan of a referendum, rather than change at once our traditions and our laws, which have been in force for a century or more, some of our friends, like the hon. member for Red Deer, have not thought proper to follow their leader in this matter. The plan of a referendum which these hon. gentlemen oppose, I will try to prove, is the best means to assist our boys at the front and to strengthen our prosecution of the war, while at the same time securing at home for the future the harmony which we have enjoyed in the past. My hon. and respected colleague, the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham), has not seen his way to stand by his leader on this occasion. We hear him say, however, that that leader had directed the policy of the country on many an arduous occasion, and has succeeded in advancing the country's interest while maintaining harmony among all classes. More particularly was this true in 1896, when against storm threatening in the country, he stood for provincial rights, and won the support even of men who had up to that time been his opponents. In 1905 he created two provinces of the West and gave them constitutions under which they have prospered and advanced, and under which the future happiness of their people seems secure. Again, in 1910, he entered upon the work of creating a Canadian navy which would not only defend the shores of Canada, but, in case of urgency, would be at the command of the British Admiralty to assist the great work of Empire defence.

It has been my pleasure to hear my hon. friend recite all these great achievements of my right hon. leader, his efforts in behalf of the country and the benefits which would have accrued to Canada if reciprocity with the United States had received the support of the people. My hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) has accorded to the French Canadian people the virtues of chivalry, bravery, truthfulness and logic. As I heard him laying down his premises I was indulging in the hope that his logic would bring him to a different conclusion from that which he reached. However, this is a matter of conscience. His conscience is not my conscience; nor is it the conscience of my right hon. leader, and therefore we have nothing further to say on that question. Any pilot is good enough in calm weather and smooth water, but the pilot who, through many storms and against the madness of the waves and the fury of the elements, has always brought his ship in safety to port is the pilot to whom we look hoping and trusting that he will again, notwithstanding the storm that is brewing to-day, bring the ship of Canada to safety, thus promoting the harmony of races, the prosperity of the country and the glory of the Empire.

I am not standing alone with my leader. I appreciate that I am in company with my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver), a pioneer of the West, with my hon. friend, the generous Scotch Presbyterian from North Sydney (Mr. McKenzie), with the learned men from Russell (Mr. Murphy) and St. John (Mr. Pugsley) and again, although I regret not to see him here, with my hon. friend from Welland (Mr. German), the great exponent of true British Liberalism, the advocate of the maintenance of our constitution, working and speaking for harmony of the races, and a faithful disciple of the late Sir Oliver Mowat, who, like many other of the distinguished men of Canada, has now passed from the scene.

We have a constitution, and I maintain that everything we do in this Parliament should be done according to this constitution. We talk of losing time and of not having time to do certain things. Since the Prime Minister has come back from the front and from England, and since he gave his address on the 18th May, we could have had an election with the result that this would not be a rump Parliament, but a Parliament with a mandate from the people. To-day it has no such mandate. I have stated when addressing my constituents and the people of neighbouring counties, that the law of the country was that our troops should go under the voluntary system and I have always maintained that that was the only constitutional way in which they could go. I do not wish to take up the time of the House, but in order to place my position properly before my people, the soldiers I have sent across and the parents of those soldiers, I will cite the Order in Council, which my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) has read in the House, and which is dated August 1, 1914, when war had scarcely yet been declared by England. It is as follows:

> In view of the impending danger of war involving the Empire my Advisers are anxiously considering the most effective means of rendering every possible aid and they welcome any suggestions and advice which Imperial naval and military authorities may deem it expedient to offer. They are confident that a considerable force would be available for service abroad. A question has been mooted respecting the status of any Canadian force serving abroad as under section 69 of Canadian Militia Act the active militia can only be placed on actual service beyond Canada for the defence thereof.

That was the construction given to the Militia Act of that time. This question has been elaborately discussed in this House but that was the interpretation of the Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General. If that was their interpretation, it is my right to stand by that interpretation while it is also my own. I need not go any further. I believe that will be sufficient. The question of compulsion was discussed in this House. I shall not take up the time of the House by referring to Hansard to confirm what I am about to say, although I could do so if necessary, but I have always said in this House that I was opposed to conscription because it was not constitutional and that it could only be adopted by constitutional means. I have often said that in this House and I am perhaps not the only member who has said it. When, in 1916, the question of the extension of Parliament was under consideration, I laid before the House my objections to the proposed extension and I emphasized the comparative uselessness of a Parliament re-elected by itself instead of by a proper use of the constitution. I claim that this Parliament is moribund because its term of office has been extended by our own will. We may say it has been extended by an Imperial Act. It has been extended by an Imperial Act but that Imperial Act has no right to exist because, as I stated at the time, the only possible way to amend the constitution in order to extend the term of Parliament is to have a conference of the provinces of Canada and to obtain their unanimous consent.

The British North America Act may be likened to a treaty between the provinces of Canada, between the people of the East and those of the West. One of our great constitutional establishments is our representation in this House; that was the question of most vital concern at the time of Confederation, more particularly to the provinces by the sea, the smaller provinces, who were afraid of meeting a preponderance of representatives from the West in the near future, to their possible disadvantage. So it was provided that no amendment could be made until that first step had been taken. It is not the duty of the Imperial Parliament, when asked to extend the life of this Parliament, to inquire from this Parliament if that step had been taken; it was their natural inference to presume that it had been taken by this Parliament. Although I am not a lawyer, I have given a great deal of thought to this question of the only mode of amending the constitution; I have studied it all my lifetime, and I say that if to-day the position of this Parliament were to be referred to the Privy Council, the Privy Council would dismiss us to-morrow morning.

Mr. GRAHAM: It might not be a bad thing.

Mr. TURGEON: It might not be a bad thing, and I wish we could do it with as much expedition as our friends opposite desire to pass this measure. I say that we have no mandate to be here, our position is ephemeral; this Parliament really has no existence. And so, when we ask for a referendum, we ask for it because we know that the people of Canada to-day are aware that we are here without a mandate. When, in January, 1916, the question was debated, public opinion had not yet settled upon our position. A great class of people in Canada, especially those engaged in the manufacture of munitions, who were earning thousands of dollars every day, did not want an election; everything was going on well, they said, do not disturb us. Others, influenced also by a desire not to be disturbed, said the same thing. But the country would have been less disturbed by an election eighteen months ago than it may possibly be disturbed to-day by this measure, however reluctant we may be to create any disturbance.

I do not see the great objection to an election or a referendum in this country; I do not see that it would be a calamity in time of war. I have more confidence in the sober judgment and the sober qualities of the people of Canada than to think that to-day, because it is war time, the war being fought out on battlefields remote from Canada, we would not be able to conduct ourselves like men, like Canadians, like British subjects, on the day of an election, just as we could on the day before and the day after. In my opinion it is an insult to the intelligence and the morality of the people of Canada to say that they could not, on one day, go to the polls as they have gone for the last one hundred years, and as they will have to go for all time to come. An election is the only possible means of clearing the minds of the people, who know that we are here without a mandate, and may perhaps attribute unworthy motives to us in sitting here drawing our indemnities and paying the salaries of ministers and all the expenses of this Parliament without the authority and consent of the people, which is the greatest crime against British precedents and policy.

I do not say that we should look solely to the conscription of blood to-day. The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) said that he had asked from the first session after the outbreak of war for the imposition of an income tax. I have been as loud as he or any other member in urging an income tax; I did so only a month ago when speaking on the Budget of this session. Every time we have asked for the imposition of such a tax, the Minister of Finance has smiled away our proposal; and even to-day, when the Government can hear the voice of the people as expressed at various meetings and through newspapers, and know that they cannot avoid the establishment of some kind of conscription of wealth or some form of income tax, he tells us that there are a great many difficulties in the way, that perhaps later on they will impose an income tax. We have told him all the benefits that could be derived from it. I cited to him the advantage of the large increase in the income tax recently made by the Congress of the United States, under which those in receipt of a million dollars a year are taxed to 40 per cent or 45 per cent. The hon. Minister of Finance has replied to the member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) that it was a costly way of collecting taxes, and that perhaps he would not derive enough revenue from the tax to pay for the cost of administering it. I claim that if the minister would only look amongst his colleagues in the cabinet, among the millionaires of the cabinet, he would see that we could raise enough money by such a tax on them to pay the expenses of collecting the income tax throughout the country.

In 1915 the Prime Minister came back from England and from the front, and in a very eloquent speech in England before returning to Canada he declared to the people of the British Empire and of Canada, that, so far as Canada was concerned, the whole power of the nation would be consecrated to the task of winning the war. From that day on we have been asking for the conscription of the whole strength and power of the nation in these matters, yet nothing has been done. To-day my hon. friend comes with another message from the front, to fill the gaps. We are bound to fill the gaps as strongly as Canada can possibly do it to-day. They tell us that, failing reinforcements from Canada, our friends may be decimated in such a way that the British authorities would allow our Canadian army corps to be disbanded, and would not replenish their ranks by soldiers from England or other parts of the Empire. I say that to put this argument before the country is an injury to the British name and to the British fame, and to the British military authorities on the other side. We want to send all the men we can, all the men we can spare, and when my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) asks for a referendum he says that, if the majority of the people of Canada vote in favour of conscription, he will submit to it, and the members from Quebec will go willingly into their constituencies, and advocate abiding by the law. Everybody in Canada knows that there is no more law abiding people in the country than the French Canadians. If the Minister of Militia and my colleague from New Brunswick were here to-day, I would make the same statement to them. I will go to the county of Gloucester, and take the same position, and I think my voice in that county would amount to something. But, Mr. Speaker, the action which this Government is taking is not the proper one. For the last three years we have asked them to conscript the wealth. People say, "We do not understand what is meant by conscription of wealth," but put it in any form you like, call it income tax or anything else, it comes to the same thing. I believe my right hon. friend to-day is commencing at the wrong end in calling for conscription of manhood, before first conscripting wealth and incomes. We are told that England has passed a conscription law, but England is not in the same position. She has raised an immense army, comprising millions of men. Lord Roberts wished to raise a voluntary army, and it was thought it might not be necessary to establish conscription of manhood. I do not believe the army of Britain has benefited a great deal from the conscription of manhood. The recruits would have come later, under the voluntary system which is adopted in other places. I think we should commence by the conscription of wealth, resources, and utilities. One of the best informed men in the industrial line, Lord Rhondda, was sent out here in 1915, to suggest to this Government the conscription of wealth and nationalization of the services of the country. He advocated the nationalization of the large shops at Winnipeg and other places in order that they might be converted into munition works. Our authorities did not listen to the suggestion made by Lord Rhondda. Conscription has been adopted in England, but let me tell hon. gentlemen that this Government has had advice very recently from a great authority, Sir Joseph Ward, the former Prime Minister of New Zealand. Speaking at Winnipeg a few weeks ago, he said:

> Britain would never have been able to introduce conscription of her men if she had not first practically conscripted the wealth of the country. She could never have put it through. If you are going to call upon certain men in this country to go out and sacrifice their all—their lives if need be—you must be prepared, you men of wealth, to see that they are properly pensioned, to see that your money is employed in the country's behalf where you cannot give yourselves, to provide the wherewithal. Canada has done magnificently, but she must go on; there must be no turning back.

That is the advice given to the Government of this country. We have the advice of the labour element. They are calling first of all for the conscription of wealth, and, if required later on, conscription of labour. We are told that the labour element is not of one mind. Resolutions have been passed by a majority of the members of these labour unions, otherwise they would not have been forwarded to Parliament. Therefore, the majority of the labour men view the situation with the same seriousness as we view it. Not merely members on this side of the House, but members on the other side, and particularly members from Ontario, advocate conscription of wealth to-day, no matter what the result may be, so far as the present and future generations are concerned.

Last night in the great loyal city of Toronto the council met to discuss this matter and to send resolutions to the representatives of the people. A despatch, dated 25th June, from Toronto to the Ottawa papers reads as follows:

Toronto, June 25.—The Toronto city council showed itself to be anything but unanimous for the present Military Service Act of the Borden Government when this afternoon it defeated by a vote of thirteen to two a motion to force conscription on the eligible man power of the civic service, and listened without protest to vigorous speeches by two leaders of the council denouncing the conscription of flesh and blood without the conscription of wealth.

The motion under debate provided that all single employees of the permanent staff of the corporation or those married since the beginning of the war eligible for military service be given until July 9th to enlist or forfeit their positions. Ald. S. Ryding, the mover, and Ald. H. H. Ball, the seconder, were the only two members of council who spoke in support of the motion.

Increase Soldiers' Pay.

At an earlier stage of the meeting Ald. J. G. Ramsden, chairman of the works committee, had introduced a motion urging the Dominion Government to increase the pay of the men at the front and this motion had carried without discussion. In speaking to the conscription of civic employees motion Ald. Ramsden took occasion to combine the two motions in his argument by declaring, "It is said if we pay the men at the front as they should be paid that the country will be bankrupt. Bourassa has said so, I presume he means bankrupt as far as cash is concerned. Bankrupt be damned.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. TURGEON: I am quoting from the newspaper. The article continues:

As far as I am concerned let it be bankrupt in cash three times over rather than bankrupt in honor, integrity and justice.

I have always advocated in this House increasing the pay of our soldiers and increasing the pensions. We are to-day paying men working on munitions and on almost any other kind of work two, three, five to ten dollars a day. Any man who works in the streets of our cities is to-day receiving from $2 to $2.50 a day, and we ask that the pay of our soldiers be increased from $1.10 to $1.75 or even, if you like, to $2 a day. We are told, however, that the sacrifices incurred by our boys cannot be compensated in cash. We know quite well that the wealth of the country will not be sufficient compensation for the sacrifices incurred by one soldier who goes overseas with the true sentiment of fighting for civilization and christianity. The valour of the soldiers is his own; the duty of the State is to recompense him and his dependents to the full extent of its power. We are told that we have a debt of $2,000,000,000, and that we cannot afford to increase the pay of our soldiers. What difference will it make if, at the end of the war, after having paid our soldiers as generously as we can, our debt is increased by a few hundred million dollars? Let us increase their pay and their pensions so that when they come back they will feel, as we told them when they went away, that they are the idols of the country. We give a pittance of $480 a year to a soldier who comes back totally disabled and unfit to earn a living. The non-commissioned officer who comes back in the same condition receives a pension of $610, and a lieutenant, $720. We should give the rank and file a pension of $720 a year and have only one class; and if that pension be not enough, let us make it $800 a year. The pension to the commissioned officers could remain as it is, because although we value their services, they will possibly be able to live in comfort on the amount allotted to them. It is the man whom we want to send overseas whom we should encourage and assure that when he goes overseas those dependent upon him will be looked after. I suggest also that the separation allowance for a dependent wife or mother should be increased from twenty to thirty dollars a month, so that our people will see that the State, in asking large sacrifices from our soldiers, is also willing to make every possible sacrifice in return.

Not only has Canada to supply reinforcements for the men at the front, but she has to supply foodstuffs not only to our own soldiers, but to the soldiers of Great Britain and of the Allies. To-day, England, France and Italy, depend upon the United States and Canada for the maintenance of the lives of their civil populations as well as of their immense armies at the front, and if by misfortune, Canada cannot do her share towards meeting the demand, there will be hunger and famine in those countries. What would happen should the war last another year or two and should the crop this fall and next be not what it should be? We know that the acreage sown this year is smaller than it was two or three years ago, and we shall therefore not be able to send as great a quantity of foodstuffs as we sent last year and the year before, and in the United States, owing to the mobilization of their army, immense as it will be, although in comparison with the populations of the two countries it cannot compare with the army which Canada has sent, there will probably be a smaller surplus crop available. Lord Rhondda, who two years ago appealed for the nationalization of the resources of the country for the winning of the war, is to-day appealing to Canada for production, without which the people of England and France will suffer misery and famine. This is the report of an interview with Lord Rhondda in London on the 19th of June. I will read only what refers to Canada:

> I hope I shall not be misconstrued or thought impatient if I say that the sooner your food administration measures are enacted, the sooner we shall breathe more easily.

He is pressing to have these measures put in effect in the United States in order that he may be able to breathe more freely for the safety of the English people. He goes on to say:

> At present our policy and the practical details of our buying are rendered more difficult, more complex, by the uncertainty regarding the future. My experiences in America before and since the war have given me an unusual opportunity of appreciating the vastness of her resources. If these are organized to their full capacity, I am confident that the German hope of starving the Allies or of causing civilians unrest by the scarcity of food or high prices, is doomed to failure. We are doing what we can "off our own bat" by increasing home production and decreasing consumption, but in the main the solution of the primary problem of supplies lies in the hands of our American allies and Canada. I am sure they will not "let us down."

That is the appeal made on the 19th of June last in London by Lord Rhondda, the food controller of Great Britain, and we must therefore, take steps to render all possible assistance to the Empire in supplying not only men but foodstuffs.

I cannot agree with the statement that voluntary recruiting is dead. Canada's achievement in the way of recruiting from the beginning of the war until a month or six weeks ago has been the admiration of the world outside of Canada. We have enlisted over 400,000 men out of a population of, say 7,000,000, scattered over a country stretching a distance of over 3,000 miles from the Atlantic to the Pacific, a population, a large part of which is engaged in farming and with so many young men required for work on the farms. Yet from east and west, men have enlisted in large numbers, and every province has subscribed large sums of money to assist in the prosecution of the war.

During the last three months enlistments in Canada have not been so bad as reported. The hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) gave figures the other day showing that in the months of March, April and May there had been an average enlistment of about 6,000 a month. That is a very creditable record when we remember that at that time the Government were discouraging recruiting; these recruits were obtained in spite of the authorities. I believe that a government fresh from the people could appeal successfully not only to men for the front, but to our industrial and commercial men, and that we should then be able to get the 100,000 men required, and an organization that would ensure a constant stream of supplies for the front. A government with a mandate from the people would be able to form a coalition government, if need be, which would certainly be able to draw up a programme that would make conscription unnecessary in Canada. I am sure that such a government would be welcome to the people of this country.

Some hon. gentlemen have said that we are wasting time talking about the constitution. Why, only a few days ago the most eloquent orator Great Britain has produced, Hon. A. J. Balfour, told us in this very chamber to trust democracy, and the words of that great statesman were re-echoed by my right hon. leader when he asked that this question be submitted to the people in the form of a referendum. Hon. gentlemen may say what they like against it, but the referendum is certainly becoming more popular among British people all over the Empire. The western provinces have adopted it in provincial matters; it is of the very essence of democracy. It has been said that because the hon. member for Edmonton is a supporter of conscription, he is against the constitution, but he has too logical a mind not to see the difference between conscription with a mandate from the people, and conscription without; there is as much difference between the two as between democracy and autocracy, as between liberty and freedom and the militarism against which we are fighting to-day.

My hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce, always logical and eloquent, has made light of the constitution. He knows my feelings on the constitution, and therefore I hope he will not be offended if I tell him I resented his remarks. The constitution comes first all the time, and with all people. What did Thomas Jefferson say?

> The will of the majority should prevail. If it does not, then the Constitution in any democratic state is violated.

We want the people to rule in this country. We want them to be educated on this question. Abraham Lincoln said:

> The people are the rightful masters of both congresses and courts, not to overthrow the Constitution, but to overthrow the men who pervert the Constitution.

There are men in this Parliament today who would pervert the constitution of Canada. Let us have this Bill submitted as speedily as possible to the people either by referendum or by general election. If both a referendum and an election are decided on, they could be held on the same day to save time and expense. I might cite one other authority, the Manchester Guardian, a paper whose standing in the British Empire is very high. I have often heard the hon. member for Red Deer approving its doctrines. Commenting upon the Prime Minister's reluctance to submit this Bill to the people, and the proposal of the leader of the Opposition for a referendum, the Manchester Guardian says:

> It is so clearly the more honest procedure that the Canadian Government is not likely to incur the odium of enforcing it.

That is strong language. Let me refer for a moment to what has been done in Australia, the loyalty of whose people no one will question. Hon. gentlemen say that this country is not loyal because there are some French people in it. Now in Austraila I do not suppose there is a single French Canadian. A referendum was held in Australia on the question of conscription, and the loyal people there voted against it. We cannot blame Quebec for the defeat of the referendum in Australia, at all events. My hon. friend from Parry Sound (Mr. Arthurs) who finds nothing in the province of Quebec to appeal to his soul or mind might go to Australia and take a lesson from the British people there.

I have said nothing new. I have stood by the constitution ever since 1873, when the trouble arose in my county over the New Brunswick school question, as mentioned by the hon. member for St. John last night. I was strongly opposed then to any amendment to the constitution, because I knew that one amendment led to others, and the constitution might in that way eventually be destroyed.

Therefore, when we call for a referendum, we are just as loyal as any who oppose it, just as desirous of helping our young men across the sea and of sending more to their assistance. But we want these men to go in the spirit of democracy; and we hope that when they have done their bit and return to Canada, they will, as citizens of this Dominion, stand for democracy in time of peace as they have stood for democracy and against militarism in time of war and under the greatest possible sacrifices.

PRIVATE BILLS.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill No. 101, respecting the Canada Preferred Insurance Company.—Mr. Stevens.

Bill No. 102, respecting the Western Canada Accident and Guarantee Insurance Company.—Mr. Bradbury.

MILITARY SERVICE ACT, 1917.

Consideration of the proposed motion of Sir Robert Borden for the second reading of Bill No. 75, Military Service Act, 1917, resumed.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, the Bill before the House does not lend itself to extended debate and I suppose it might well be said that every viewpoint of the question has been already touched upon by preceding speakers. In the circumstances, I might well have remained silent, but finding myself in disagreement upon the measure with my leader, and with many of my political friends; realizing my responsibility for the vote which I shall give upon the Bill, I feel compelled to briefly give to the House my views as to the principle of the measure. I do not intend discussing any of the provisions of the Bill. An opportunity for so doing will be presented to every hon. member of the House and when that time arrives I shall deem it my duty to discuss the provisions of the Bill with frankness and candour and to suggest to the Government the amendments which I think should be made.

During my remarks, I do not desire at all to refer to the matter of the mobilization and utilization of the resources of the nation for the purpose of carrying on the war. That has been introduced into the debate and has been referred to by many hon. gentlemen upon this side of the House. I agree fully with the views which they have expressed, but the suggestion involves so much that I feel that I should rather debate the same on another occasion which no doubt will present itself to the House.

The party system of politics may have its objectionable features. It may be, as Pope said, "the madness of the many for the gain of the few." but it is only when one finds himself in disagreement with his leader and the majority of his party that he realizes the strength of political associations and the warm attachment which comes from a long comradeship in party politics. These embarrassments have been very much softened by the generous pronouncement of my leader in extending to his supporters the utmost freedom to take the course which they thought fit upon the Bill, which far transcends political considerations and which is deserving of the most candid and impartial treatment. This announcement of our leader was not sought for; it was not asked for; it came from him spontaneously. It was particularly characteristic of the man and truly reflects his intelligent liberalism.

I appreciate fully the viewpoint of my party friends who differ from me, and particularly with the viewpoint of my friends from the province of Quebec. I think I can appreciate all that in history, tradition and experience which contributes to that conclusion. I can hear them say that the views of their leader are their views, and where he leads they will follow. That is all clear to me and I understand it thoroughly. No one will question the importance and gravity of the Bill which we are now considering. Inevitably, it creates a more profound interest in and out of Parliament than any question which we have had before us since Confederation. There is in this country, in some degree or other, amongst all classes of the people, a traditional repugnance to compulsory military service. We cannot escape, try how we will, a well defined division of public opinion. That division is applicable to the whole country; it is applicable to both parties, diverse principles are involved and the distinctions are fundamental in their character. Inevitably, therefore, we find a very substantial body of opinion in every part of Canada against the measure, which opinion, I think, we must all respect and recognize. In opposing this view, it is only my desire to speak with modesty and without arrogance or dogmatism. I think that I clearly realize the strength of the position of those who take a view opposite to that which I propose taking. If I were dissatisfied with the opinion held in some section of Canada, in some province, I would deem it my duty, in my feeble way, to point out to them the path of duty, or the proper conception of the principles involved in the Bill, rather than attack offensively such views which I believe are conscientiously held. I somewhat regret that this afternoon, in one or two spots of the debate, there did seem to be evidence of a spirit for which I personally did not care. For one very definite reason I felt constrained to intervene in this debate, and that is because I desire to make reference to certain views which have been frequently expressed in regard to our position in this war. A variety of views have been expressed, and I have in mind statements made, not in this Parliament but outside of it, in respect to our actual position in the war. Newspapers report men from time to time as saying that we are fighting for Great Britain, that we are aiding the Allies and not one of the Allies, that we are not in the war primarily as a belligerent, fighting for ourselves and our country, but rather out of filial regard for Great Britain, or from purely altruistic and humanitarian motives alone. Some few days ago Mr. Henri Bourassa, a prominent publicist of Quebec, said that his province was not interested in the war, a view which I believe does not truly reflect the best opinion of the province of Quebec, and I am sure it does not reflect the opinion of hon. gentlemen on either side of the House from that province, and particularly might I say this of my friends from Quebec upon this side of the House, whom I know better. These views are heard frequently; they are not heard in one province alone. If I am correct in this, I say that such views should be discussed with candour and with frankness, because they go to the very foundation of this Bill. We should be clear in our conception of our position in this war and the purposes for which we fight, for if we are not, then our faith in the cause for which we contend will not be clearly established. For that reason I do not purpose apologizing to the House if I occupy its time for a few minutes in discussing the matters to which I have just referred.

We have now been in this war for two and one-half years, and I say it is strange to me how often I have heard expressed the statements which I have just indicated. It may be that these views are quite prevalent, and that they have militated against recruiting in this country. If such views were widely held we could not expect anything but an intermittent and indifferent and divided interest in this country in respect to the war. Whether we like it or not, we were subject to invasion and attack and invasion was the settled policy of the enemy. Let there be no difference of opinion on that point; there cannot, I submit, be any view to the contrary, that is well founded. Our participation in this war was inevitable for defensive purposes alone, and defensive war does not mean that it must be waged in one's own country. It is an untenable doctrine to propound in modern days that because an army has not actually penetrated into one's country that therefore that country is not at war and not vitally interested, and should not assume the aggressive. The German Empire would have struck at Canada as quickly as it struck at Great Britain, if it could. They endeavoured, I have no doubt, to attack our coast line in the early days of the war. The battle of the Falkland islands was a battle fought to protect the coasts of Canada. We are liable to bombardment of our coasts at any moment, although that danger is now remote. Canadian ships were sunk in the earlier days of the war, and I think in one instance before our policy in regard to the war was declared by Parliament. Canadian lives and property have been lost on our own and on neutral shipping; international bridges were destroyed and public works in this country were attacked by Germans, and the defence made by these offenders was that the acts were committed by them as soldiers of the German Empire against a country with which they were at war. The vigilant secret service of the United States, I have no doubt, if the truth were known, protected our country against assault on many an occasion. It may be true as well, for aught I know, that the secret service of Canada protected us against many a premeditated assault by those resident in the United States who still counted themselves as citizens and soldiers of the German Empire. A fellow Canadian and a fellow member of this House to-day, languishes in a German military prison. He was arrested in a country in which he had a right to be, by a nation which had no right to be in that country— a burglar and criminal nation. This act was the natural and logical sequence of the outrage committed by Germany against the sovereignty of Belgium. The arrest of the Hon. Dr. Beland is as much an attack upon the honour and integrity of Canada as was the initial invasion of Belgium by the enemy an attack upon its integrity. I have no doubt that the flag that flies over us whispers to him the hope of his freedom and restoration to his native country, and, if God spares his life, I have no doubt that hope will be realized.

In the early days of this war, I think I may truthfully say, we lacked a campaign of education in this country as to the causes and the purposes of the war and the reason of our participation therein, and for this lack in a great measure we have since suffered. I repeat that we hear it frequently said that we are fighting for Great Britain and not as a principal belligerent. That view is only possible by shutting one's eyes to the political evolution of recent years as to the constitution of the British Empire. Nothing, in my judgment, could be more erroneous. I disagree with that view to-day and I have always disagreed with it, and I believe it is mischievous. It is true that Great Britain has saved us from the horrors of actual invasion. It is true that she has protected our trade and commerce, and by reason of that fact, we are enjoying a material prosperity equal to if not greater than that of ante bellum days. It is true that Great Briain is the ancestral home of a majority of the citizens of this country, which fact naturally evokes a spirit of loyalty and devotion to the country which is fighting for the democracy of the whole world. It is true the British flag is the herald of mercy as well as of might, not only for us, but for many other countries of this world to-day. I submit these reasons alone would have justified our participation in the war, and, doubtless, were a tremendous factor in impelling us in the first instance to participate in this war. But Germany was a strong maritime power. She had the will and the power to strike at any part of the British Empire, and it is now quite clear that that had long been her intention. But, notwithstanding this, I think it is well that we have in our minds correctly our political and constitutional relations with Great Britain, as component parts of one Empire. This country is not owned by Great Britain. Great Britain and Canada each form a distinct part of one Empire, and such alone are the political relations of one to the other. The autonomy of the one is as complete as the autonomy of the other. It is only by resorting to historical and political fictions, that are long since dead, that you can establish the doctrine of the sovereignty of one and the subjection of the other. We are fighting with Great Britain, and not for Great Britain. The latter proposition would import an idea of subjection, which should not exist in the minds of the citizens of this country. It is not the correct idea, and I fear it has been productive of more or less harm. It is true the efforts of the Empire are co-ordinated for Imperial purposes, but it is also true that these efforts are co-ordinated in the interest of the autonomous parts of the Empire as well. In the debate in the American Congress, on the occasion of that body considering whether or not it would support the President in his declaration of war against Germany, it was submitted by opponents of the President that the proposed action of the United States was designed more for the purpose of aiding Great Britain than for the defence of principle or democracy. I am glad to say that that view does not prevail generally in the United States. One of the stoutest opponents of the entry of the United States into the war was Senator Lafollette. Upon the floor of Congress he stated that, as the purpose of the nation was only to assist Great Britain, it would be better for them to furnish Great Britain with money for the purpose of carrying on the war by the purchase of Canada. He was graceful enough to suggest that they should leave Canada in the possession of Canadians until the end of the war, even if they paid the purchase money at once. The idea prevails therefore in foreign countries as well, that the condition of sovereignty and subjection exists in our political and constitutional relations with Great Britain, and the sooner we dispel that idea the better it will be for Canada. Let us understand properly what the British Empire means. Do not let us destroy its grandeur by misconceptions. But there is, Mr. Speaker, the consideration of self-interest and self-protection, which, after all, is the great motive power behind every great national and individual effort. In this war we are fighting in defense of Canada, and we are resisting an invasion of Canada just as surely as Great Britain is resisting an invasion of the United Kingdom. It is said, in connection with the South African war, by one speaker, I think, on this side of the House, that the circumstances were quite similar to the present war. I do not agree with that view. It was not possible for the Dutch republic to have struck at Canada. She was powerless in that respect, being without a navy; but in this case, by no means could we have kept outside the vortex of the war, even if we had so wished. We should be thankful that the battle line where fight our Canadian soldiers to protect us against actual invasion is in foreign lands, and not upon Canadian soil. Thank God, we are spared that sorrow. But though we are separated by thousands of miles of ocean from the actual scene of the conflict, we are fighting with the Allies, not for the Allies, in defence of our own country. War cannot be conducted on purely defensive lines. A country's defence can frequently be made by aggressive means, and not always within her own territory. That is particularly true of the present war, and probably will be true of future wars. In the supreme moment of our history, I cannot but feel, Sir, that in very truth the foreign soil where fight Canadian soldiers, is really Canadian soil. This thought was beautifully expressed by a young Englishman of distinction in the realm of literature, Rupert Brook, in a beautiful poem well known to many hon. gentlemen of the House, and written, I think, just shortly before he gave up his life at Galipoli, when he wrote the words—

> If I should die, think only this of me:
> That there's some corner of a foreign field
> That is forever—England.

I say we are in this war as an interested principal. We have, for more than two years, been fighting in defence of our country, and against actual invasion. Canadians, in the after years, when they visit the many corners of foreign fields, where are buried our fallen heroes, will truly feel that such spots are forever part of Canada, and they will, in imagination at least, project our territorial bounds to those points upon foreign soil.

I cannot, Mr. Speaker, give adherence to the view that our Militia Act contemplates power only to strike the enemy when within our own territorial bounds. It seems to me that would render the Militia Act absolutely useless. The idea further contemplates that we must remain quiescent, until the enemy are actually within the bounds of our country before we are justified in striking. The absurdity of this position is self evident. Could that contention be legally maintained, then the constitution should be amended. There is a higher law than the constitution, and if needs be, the constitution must sometimes bend to meet national necessities.

But are we not justified and supported in our efforts in this war by reasons and motives which are higher than Imperial interest, and Canadian self interest, as suggested in the splendid speech of the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Pardee)? Who is there in this country that has intelligently observed the march of events from the beginning of this war down to the present moment, who does not believe that we are in the path of right, justice, humanity and duty in placing, for the protection of the world's civilization, our military strength, whatever measure it may be, in the scale against the barbaric and brutal militarism of Germany. Shall not our efforts, judged by these high considerations, go down the ages to our eternal credit, to the enrichment of our Canadian history, and a rich legacy for those who will follow us as citizens in this country?

We hear the question asked: Why should we become embroiled in the old-world issues? Owen Wister, in his very readable book, "Pentecost of Calamity," which hon. gentlemen no doubt know well, says that "He who talks of the old world and the new world, talks in a dead language." The interests and the destinies of this continent are involved in the destinies of the old world. The world he compared to a boat which never grows in size, but the occupants of which grow in number. If any occupant commences rocking the boat, it is the duty of all other occupants that love safety and peace to control the disturber, and if necessary, to throw him overboard.

If Canada were a republic and absolutely dissociated from the British Empire, she would, I venture to say, be in this war as a belligerent. She is peopled by a breed of men who would fight against a nation that has filled the world with astonishment and horror; that has hurled calamity against the whole universe and grievously sinned against civilization. She would not see democracy and freedom and national human rights crushed out without proferring a saving hand. Her people would ultimately do as our neighbours in the United States decided to do, in order that democracy might not perish from the earth. They would at least do what the little South American republics aspire to do. They would quickly realize that the liberty of their constitution was in danger; they would fight for its preservation in foreign lands if the battle line was there, and they would even break the bounds of the constitution, if needs be, for after all it is the spirit of the people and not its political institutions that safeguard its freedom. They too would have turned a willing ear to the importunities of France and Belgium to save their countries from the aggressor and their peoples from immolation and a despot's lust, and we would be unworthy of the races from which we come if we were not willing to strike against the enemy in so just a cause. We are not a warlike country nor a warlike people. If that is our attitude, then we should be active in this war, because it is a war against war, as they speak of it in France, and the same idea was expressed this afternoon by some hon. gentlemen. We are not favourable to militarism, but if we despise and hate militarism, this is a splendid opportunity to destroy it, or at least to weaken it, for essentially is this a war against militarism.

Then, Mr. Speaker, relegating to the background all the events, reasons and causes leading up to the war, do you not think that the conduct of the war by Germany, on the one hand, and by the Allied nations, on the other, should clearly point out to us our path of duty? If the question as to which nation is responsible for the commencement of the war was in doubt surely the manner in which the war, since its commencement has been conducted by the Allied nations on one hand and the Central powers on the other, can there be any doubt upon which side our military strength should be cast? Witness the death of Edith Cavell, the sinking of the Lusitania, the desolation of that part of France behind the battle lines, the immolation of its innocent and defenceless people, the attacks upon defenceless noncombatants; then place against that the splendid and generous attitude so often taken by Great Britain and France in their conduct towards the enemy, when, in many instances, they might well have displayed a different spirit. Witness, as one example, the conduct of the French priest at the Cathedral of Rheims, when German wounded soldiers were being taken from the cathedral and were about to be attacked by French soldiers. This venerable priest stood upon the steps and raising both hands, he cried: "Stop soldiers, remember the ancient name and chivalry af France." As a writer of that incident states, hearts throughout the world throbbed upon reading of the incident, and eyes were wet with tears that never saw the Cathedral of Rheims. No matter how assured one felt about the strength and justice of our position in entering the war, who can but realize the contrast in the manner in which the war has been conducted by the principal belligerents of each side. Is it not clear that our duty is to vigorously carry on.

I must apologize for my lengthy remarks upon this phase of our relation to the world's great issue. I know that every member of this House is as much aware of its importance and as well informed upon it as I am. But, after all, everything is involved in it. It has often been said—and it will bear reiteration. With this clearly in view our duties and our obligations in the premises will be so much the clearer. If we believe the issue is serious, and it is, if civilization and human rights are in jeopardy, and they are, if our country and its future is in danger, and it is, then our course from the beginning was and is now well chartered and well marked.

What is the purpose and scope of the Bill which is now before the House? Purely as a piece of legislation does it in principle introduce anything which has not been a part of our statute law since Confederation. I can understand how there might be a difference of opinion as to when the Act should be put into force, but surely, in principle, it is legislation that any country at war or even at peace might well have incorporated in its statute law.

What is our law at the present time in respect to military service? All men between the ages of 18 and 60 are liable to service within or without the Dominion whenever it is deemed advisable to call them up by reason of war or invasion; that is practically the reading of the statute. We entered this war of our own volition, a free people, by and through the Parliament of a free country. We believed that the issues involved were of the first importance, and that we were liable to attack and invasion by the enemy; there can be no question about that. Now, in principle, is the Bill out of harmony with the obligations which we assumed when we decided to enter the war? In all the circumstances, is not this measure one which wisdom dictates? Apart from our immediate needs, might it not be the part of wisdom to enact this legislation for our future protection and our future guidance? The Bill in my judgment is only amendatory of the Militia Act. Its purpose is simply to modify the Act so as to make it effective, if needs be, to meet the necessities or exigencies of the present or some future time. It means nothing more and nothing less. I cannot bring myself to believe that we are contending about a piece of proposed legislation which in itself presents a new principle to this Parliament or to this country. The principle is already upon our statute books, and has been there for 50 years without occasioning any adverse comment. Therefore, I modestly submit that I cannot view the principle of the Bill as do some hon. gentlemen. But whether the principle should be applied now or in the near future is a matter concerning which we may fairly and honestly differ. Do the conditions justify the contemplated application of the Militia Act as proposed to be amended by this Bill? As I have already remarked, there is a clear division of opinion as to the respective merits of voluntary and obligatory military service. The exponents of each system differ in a fundamental principle, and, therefore, they are irreconcilable. But, after all, is that the real question involved in the Bill? Is not the question rather one as to our national necessities and as to whether a military necessity exists for more man power, rather than a question of which principle is correct, that of the voluntary system or that of the obligatory system? Do we need the man power? If so, how are we to get it? After all, is not that the question? Is the question of voluntary service as opposed to obligatory service the real question before us? If it is a question of necessity one would naturally ask: Has the necessity been established? Is the evidence before us as to the necessity sufficient to justify the passing of this Bill? I do not intend to make a survey of all the evidence available for or against the proposition, or for determining upon which side lies the preponderance of evidence. One man with one son at the front may say that no further men should be sent to the front. Another man, or a mother, who is, perhaps, in humbler circumstances and has four sons at the front, is of the opinion that we should send further troops to the battle line. Some say that our troops are amply supplied with reserves, another, perhaps a soldier who has fought and suffered, says that further reserves are urgently required. Another will say that the cause for which we contend is so sacred that the absolute maximum is alone sufficient to discharge our duty. Others say that we have gone as far as our financial resources will allow, and, of course, there is a limit in that direction. Some say that before we add to our military forces in Europe the United States should put into the field five or six million men. It is pointed out, in answer to this, that the more men the United States puts into the battle line and the sooner they do it the sooner the war will be over, and the less will be the sacrifice of Canadian life. One is confused by the variety and number of opinions. I do not hesitate to say that there is a vast section of public opinion which feels that the Government's statement in this respect is not yet complete, and that a more exhaustive and clearer statement should be made as to our military necessities. In the circumstances, I think that all the facts should be placed before the people of this country in the clearest possible manner. It may be that hon. gentlemen around me are fully seized of all the facts. They may be satisfied that the necessity for future additions to our military strength has been established. But we must remember that outside of this Parliament there is a vast electorate, who are entitled to the fullest and clearest information on this subject.

I am influenced to the conclusion that the necessity has been established; because that is the view of the Government, who are in possession of the actual facts; because it seems to be the judgment of our military advisers; because from private sources we occasionally receive evidences confirmatory of this fact; and lastly, because there seems to be a unanimous demand on the part of every belligerent nation of the world for more man-power and I cannot make myself believe that Canada is an exception. If further men are required to support our soldiers and to fight in France, then I say it is a compelling demand and one which no man can lightly cast aside. If it is true that more men are required, then in justice to those who fight and out of respect to the memory of those who have died we should feel obliged to bring forth the quota of men which is stated by the Government as being necessary. At least for myself I shall not take the responsibility of saying that further men are not required and thus oppose the Bill. Therefore it is that I intend to vote for the principle of the Bill and against any delay in the second reading—that is I shall vote against the amendments. If a submission of the issue to the people should be deemed proper and desirable, I should choose the pathway of a general election in preference to a referendum; but in reference to that I do not express an opinion to-night. It will come before us on another and more fitting occasion for extended debate, and when it does I shall be very glad to give to the House my views upon it.

I have endeavoured to show that we are vitally interested in this war; that the necessity has been established for additions to our manpower strength; and that further troops should be despatched to Europe as reserves. In my mind the question naturally arises, is it necessary, in order to meet these necessities, that the provisions of the Bill when enacted, be put into effect? Just a few words upon that point. There can be no doubt, as has been said frequently by speakers on both sides of the House, that voluntary enlistment in Canada was highly creditable indeed. No credit whatever is due to the Government, or to the nation; the credit is due to the men who enlisted; it is to them alone that the credit is due. The glory is ours. The credit is due to the men who enlisted. Therefore do I say that I do not care to hear the statement, "We have done splendidly; we have done nobly;" all the credit is due to the men who enlisted. It is true, of course, that the nation in other respects has played its part well.

The late Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes) addressed the House last week, and one would imagine that all the glory and credit of this war, so far as Canada is concerned, was his. All the mistakes and shortcomings in the administration of the war he, in the most generous fashion, passes along to his late colleagues, and they do not seem to resent the same very vigorously. The hon. gentleman seems to be under the obsession that as a soldier he is super-human, that he has all the characteristics of omnipotence, omnipresence and omniscience. Putting everything together, I have no doubt that in his own mind he is quite sure that at the beginning of August, 1914, figuratively speaking and in the military sense, this part of the North American continent was without form and void, and darkness was upon the deep. And after that, I suppose he will claim, he brought forth the light; and in imitation of High Example, he divided the night from the day; but I observe that immediately he made this division, he took all the light to himself and left all the rest of his fellow countrymen in darkness. Then, he created an army of 33,000 men; and I suppose that when he comes to write his autobiography he will say, in order to show his ability to do things contrary to the ways of God Almighty, that he made these men out of the ribs of women. The administrative career of my hon. friend, instead of being one which he should have so persistently and so offensively boasted of, is one that was not at all creditable, but one that has brought forth much of the turmoil which we have to-day. He says his recruiting career was magnificent, and it was infallible; I say that he was an obstacle to recruiting and in no sense was he helpful to it. The other day the hon. gentleman thrust my name into his speech because I have refused his personal solicitations to debate here his personal grievances against the minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White). I told him the other day, while he was addressing the House, that he deliberately gave instructions that a young man living in my city was by his directions refused enlistment. I thought I would be able to read the letter which was sent by the Department of Militia here to headquarters at Halifax, directing that under no circumstances should this young man, who was desirous of fighting for his King and country, be permitted to enlist. The hon. gentleman stated that this was done because, as correspondent of a Nova Scotia newspaper, while in England, this young man had written letters to his paper criticising the conduct and management of Salisbury camp. Mr. Speaker, one could hardly imagine that it could happen anywhere in the British Empire, that a young, intelligent man anxious to fight—and not as an officer but as a private—was to be refused enlistment under the direction of the Minister of Militia.

The most bitter and unrelenting newspaper criticism against the war administration in England has come from Lord Northcliffe who was the other day honoured with a very high appointment to the United States. We also remember that in the early days of the war, a Montreal genteman, sir Herbert Holt, returned from England and very vigorously criticised the conduct of the war by the British authorities and for a few days it caused a considerable stir in this country. I suppose it will yet transpire that, if Sir Herbert Holt has unfortunately no sons, some fool Liberal or Conservative Government will force him into the British peerage because he criticised the conduct of the war by the British war authorities. Here was a case where a young man was willing to serve as a private and anxious to fight for his King and country and it was apparently the policy of the Minister of Militia to prevent him if he possibly could. Mr. Speaker, will you please pardon this diversion? I do not want to provoke any partisan discussion but I cannot help but protest when I hear the threatenings of that hon. gentleman hurled against the leader of the Opposition and other gentlemen on this side and against hon. gentlemen opposite, looking for smiles here, plaudits there. I hate skim milk, masquerading as cream, man as superman, human weakness as infallibility, and when I hear it, I protest. I do not say this with malice. Naturally, I am disposed to be generous and I quite appreciate the position of the late Minister of Militia. It is always sad, to look upon an exiled monarch, longing for his kingdom, crown and sceptre. He always thinks of right forever on the scaffold, wrong forever on the throne. Yes, that administrative record did not help recruiting, and I want to say to hon. gentlemen opposite that it makes it very difficult for many hon. gentlemen on this side of the House to take the position which they do by reason of the many just criticisms made by citizens of this country in respect of that record. That administrative record has planted the seed of distrust in the minds of our people, and has militated against recruiting. It makes it difficult for the public to accept with favour and confidence the proposals of the Bill and offers a justification for the suggestion that there should be a further trial of voluntary enlistment after the Bill becomes law and before it is enforced.

I am of the opinion that in any event it should not be put into immediate operation. I do not make this statement casually or perfunctorily. I say it earnestly and sincerely. I would make the statement if I were before my constituents tomorrow and I would make it as a matter of policy. I am of the belief that a further campaign of education is necessary and desirable in this country to make clear to our people our military necessities and the purposes of the war. It took the best of our countrymen some time to catch the true vision of the real significance of the war. Some may have been slower than others. Let us not be too critical, but let us be fair and generous in assigning causes. Should a further appeal be made to our people, I believe that our young men who have so nobly responded in the past will make a further and sufficient response if given another opportunity for voluntary enlistment under the inspiration of the sincere and united efforts of all leaders of public opinion in this country. Having put our hands to the plough, I cannot make myself believe that the young manhood of this country now want to look back. I believe that they would rather prefer seeing a magnificent beginning end in a blaze of glory. At any rate, is it not worth a trial? It will be regrettable if resort has to be made to the present Bill to secure the relatively small number who are needed if a united and sincere effort on the part of our leaders of all shades of public opinion in this country would bring forth the desired number of men. If that fails and our needs still continue, then our path is made all the clearer. If we could but realize, all of us in this country, the gravity of our position, the imminent danger of the cause for which we are contending, if we could forget our political differences for the moment, and they are trifling after all as compared with the supreme question confronting us, we would regardless of party, race or creed, walk in spirit at least, hand in hand, across No Man's land into the enemy's trenches where fight our soldiers for Canada, and in defence of Canada, in order that we might live our lives in our accustomed way. If we could approach the question in that spirit I believe the suggestion which I have made, and which has been made by other hon. gentlemen, is a practicable one and one that should be tried. In that spirit I believe we could accomplish our ends and meet our immediate necessities. In that spirit let me say we should stand behind those who have fought for us and the memory of those who have consecrated with their blood the principles for which we contend.

Is it too late, Mr. Speaker, to make this appeal? My closing remarks this evening are that before the provisions of the Bill, after enactment, are put into effect, there should be a sincere and united effort on the part of everybody in every province in this country to secure the result which we all wish by a final appeal for voluntary enlistment. There has been considerable political manoeuvring on the part of both sides since the beginning of the war. It would be purposeless and useless to deny that. Political propaganda has been carried on by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. If they indulged in any just criticism whatever, it would inevitably be termed political propaganda by hon. gentlemen opposite. Party politics may have been carried on by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, but, on the other hand, party politics has been certainly practised by hon. gentlemen opposite. Are they willing to abandon their practices in party politics in order to make it possible to carry out successfully the suggestion which I have made?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes, yes.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: If my hon. friends opposite are willing to do so, I am sure that hon. gentlemen on this side of the House would be willing to join with them. With such an effort on our part, I cannot make myself believe that we could not accomplish everything we desire by united effort; and in a very brief space of time, without putting into force the provisions of the Bill after it becomes law.

Mr. ROGERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It would be a splendid thing, if, even at this late period of the war, we could approximate that period in our political history described by the English poet when he put into the mouth of the Roman minstrel who, when singing about the heroic past of his country, mournfully referred to the time

When none were for the party, and all were for the State.

That is the attitude which I think should characterize hon. gentlemen on both sides of this House, and if that were possible, I believe the suggestion which has been made by several hon. gentlemen already could be carried out, that our military necessities could yet be accomplished, without the enforcement of the Bill, by further but brief efforts to secure enlistment voluntarily.

Mr. DONALD SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): Mr. Speaker, it is with some reluctance that I rise to speak after listening to the eloquent address just delivered by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean). I must also admit that as the days have been passing I have become more impatient at the delay, possibly without very good reason in view of the address that we heard this afternoon by the hon. member from Red Deer (Mr. Clark), from which I can quite understand that a public discussion of the question at issue and the Bill now before the House might possibly have a good effect throughout Canada. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat has told us that he thought a further campaign of education throughout Canada necessary. If that is the case, and it is possible that it may be so, then perhaps a discussion such as is taking place here in this Chamber will accomplish that better and more effectually than it could be accomplished in any other way. I feel, I have thought for some time, that the people of Canada have not been fully awake to the seriousness of the situation that confronts the people of the world at the present time. We are allied with the most progressive nations of the world in a world war. This war is our war, just as much as it is that of any other country. I think that that ought to sink down into the minds of every one. Do not think for one moment that we are fighting some one else's battles. We are fighting our own battles, we are fighting for a principle. There are two principles in conflict in this world at the present time; one is going to overcome the other, and that other is going to be blotted out of existence. We believe that we are in the right, and it is our duty, holding that belief, to do everything possible to see that victory rests on the banners of the Allies. I may be pardoned if, in order to make my own position clear, I make reference to some remarks which I made in the House in the war session of 1914. In moving the address in reply to the speech from the Throne, I said:—

> Dark and threatening clouds have been visible on the horizon for several years. These have at last burst forth like a tornado, and threaten the whole world with the most terrific and devastating war the world has ever seen. The greatest disaster of recorded time is at hand; many millions of men are now engaged in one of the most desperate and fearful struggles the mind of man can conceive of.

I also said:—

> The Government are to be commended for their promptness in immediately taking action to forward troops and munitions of war, without waiting for Parliament to assemble, with the certain assurance that the sentiment of the people of Canada and of Parliament would endorse and sustain such action.

And further on:—

> The war may be a long and bitter one; the loss of life is sure to be enormous; suffering and want may come to many who are dependent on those who go to the front, or who may fall in battle. It is therefore the duty of the people of Canada and the Government of Canada to make provision for the alleviation of such suffering and want. Would not the tribute we would be called upon to pay be most beggarly when compared with the sacrifice, the tribute of life-blood paid by our country's defenders? There is no sacrifice the occasion demands that the people of Canada are not prepared to make. Let our response to the needs of the Empire be immediate and sufficient.

Those were the sentiments that I held at that time. I may say, also, in connection with that matter, that in the war session of August, 1914, we had no mandate from the people for the action that we took upon that occasion, yet not a dissenting voice was heard throughout Canada with regard to our action. I believe that the contention that is advanced at this time that we do not hold a mandate to enforce an Act that has been on the statute books of this country since Confederation is not well founded. I believe that we hold as much of a mandate to-day and more than when we took steps to enter into this war. Nearly three years have passed since that time. We now look upon these questions from a different point of view. I believe that any man who would have suggested then that we would, at the end of three years, be still engaged in this desperate conflict, and that the issue would be still undecided, would have been laughed at. When Lord Kitchener, who was asked by the British Government to take charge of the military operations of Great Britain, accepted office he did so on the understanding that if, at the end of three years, the war was not decided some one else would take the office he occupied. I believe he had a clear vision as to the conditions confronting the people of Great Britain, confronting the people of the whole world.

When you realize that the enemy entered, after careful and deliberate preparation, upon the campaign which is now being waged, covering a period of forty or fifty years, and that they took every possible precaution to make as effective as they possibly could the machinery by which they hoped to subdue the world and make themselves its masters, you can rest assured that the other nations, who had not made such preparation, were very badly handicapped indeed. When we recall the events that have taken place since this war began, it seems almost miraculous that the enemy did not succeed in the early months of the war. There are three outstanding features in connection with that war which, to my mind, have made it impossible for the enemy to succeed. The first was the heroic stand taken by the little army of Belgium, when the enemy invaded that country. They held them up for several weeks; they disarranged their plans so much that what was termed by the German Emperor "the contemptible little army of Great Britain" was transported over the Channel to France, and met the invader when they came to Belgium. They put up such a fight as was never fought before on the retreat from Mons, and they enabled the French generals to mature their plans to mobilize the army, so that when the Germans got within sight of the walls of Paris, General Joffre's army was able to hurl the invader back. To my mind these are two of the things that saved the situation. The third great factor, I believe, is the British Navy. The navy of Great Britain has done a work during this war which we do not fully appreciate. They have made it possible for the people of Canada, and the people of the whole world, to carry on business in such a way that they feel very little of the effects of the war. As a matter of fact, did hon. gentlemen ever know, during the whole history of Canada, when we enjoyed greater prosperity than is enjoyed at the present, largely owing to the fact that our commerce is uninterrupted? Prices and wages are high. True, the cost of living is high, but there is abundance of work for everybody. These are some of the things that we should not lose sight of. One of the principal causes of the great prosperity that we are enjoying was first the establishment of munition manufactories in this country. The enormous sums of money that have been expended here by the British Government have had a tremendous effect on the prosperity of the country. These are a few of the things that have enabled us to go on and do business in a way, that I am afraid, has led a great many people to lose sight of the ultimate goal we have in view. In the early days of the struggle, when that army of Germany was smashing through Belgium, when they were invading France, you know how eagerly we looked for the morning papers—yes, during our sleeping hours we could scarcely let pass from our minds the menace that was then marching on at the heart of France, and we felt that, if they conquered France, it would be a long uphill struggle, if we ever were able to subdue the enemy. We watched events carefully, and when we found that the Prussians were stopped, and that, as month after month passed, we had strong hopes that the enemy would be repelled as soon as we could get supplies of munitions and reinforcements forwarded to the front.

The marvel of the whole world is the manner in which Great Britain has mobilized her forces, and the way in which she has carried on the manufacture of munitions, and has equipped her army of 5,500,000 men, as compared with an army of 150,000 men when war broke out. That was one of the greatest feats that has ever been accomplished by any nation in the history of the world. Canada did not hesitate. We entered upon this struggle at the very outset, and when a nervous tremor was felt throughout the length and breadth of this country as to what would happen should the enemy reach Paris, our men were coming forward by the thousands and tens of thousands. Our Government agreed to send a first contingent of 20,000 men overseas, and, instead of sending 20,000, they sent 33,000. They could not hold the men back. They were coming so fast they could not equip and take care of them, and 33,000 men were sent over a very few weeks after the war broke out. The men still kept coming on by the thousands, faster than they could be equipped, taken care of, and trained. That is something to be wondered at, in a peace loving country like Canada, which had no military men, and which was anxious to live in peace. During 1915 men were coming forward in large numbers. The war was becoming more serious, as time passed on, and it was found the enemy were not able to make any progress on the western front, but, in the meantime, other countries were being conquered and subdued, and Germany to-day holds practically the whole of Poland. The Germans have over-run Rumania, Serbia, Albania, and a large portion of France and Belgium, and there the enemy stands to-day, unconquered and unsubdued. We have strong faith that they will be conquered ultimately, but let me say, Mr. Speaker, that it is only by a tremendous effort on the part of the people of the Allies that the enemy will be subdued. The failure of Russia in the last few weeks has weakened the Allies tremendously. It has released the tremendous army which Germany had in the east, and has made it all the more difficult to drive them back on the west.

Sir, there is a difference of opinion in this House, and there is a difference of opinion throughout the country, with regard to the measure that is now before this House. It is not identical with the Militia Act that was enacted in 1868, but it is very similar. It is not so drastic, I believe it is a much more reasonable measure than the former Act.

I may say that I have been in favour of compulsory service for some time, and, in order to make clear my views on that question, I may just refer to an address which I delivered at a recruiting meeting in Woodstock, on April 10, 1916, to which reference was made in several of the Toronto papers at the time. The language I used upon that occasion was as follows:

> All honor to the men who have already gone to the front, many of whom will never come back, and when we read of the heavy casualties from time to time, we realize the growing need for more men in this great struggle.
> Never before has the call been so clear and imperative. We have prided ourselves in the matter of recruiting. We have not, as yet, found the necessity for conscription here, but I want to say that the State has claims upon us that some may think to be an infringement of rights.

I believe the time is coming if it has not already arrived, when there should be a judicious selection of men to fight the battles of the Empire.

I should be sorry to think that it should have to come, but it is quite impossible. There are strong arguments to justify it. When we find one man with perhaps a wife and five or six children, going to the front, and another man, single, and with no other ties holding him back, we begin to question the system in vogue.

I have had no reason to change my views since a year ago; in fact, I have become strengthened in my conviction. I believe that the system that has been in vogue in this country has, from a good many standpoints, not been the proper one. At the outset of this war, it would have been impossible to put into force any other system than the voluntary system, but I do not believe it was the best system. The enforcement of the old Militia Act which has been on the statute books of this country for many years, would be a great injustice at this time, after three years of war have passed, and after over 400,000 men have enlisted voluntarily. A judicial selection of men is the only proper course for Canada to pursue at the present time. It has been pointed out by hon. gentlemen opposite that the United States have adopted at the outset a compulsory military service. It is very easy for them to do so. They have had the advantage of what has been going on in other countries since the commencement of the war. The people of Canada did not hesitate; they adopted methods to suit conditions as they existed in this country at that time, and they have sometimes to readjust matters in order to meet changed conditions. When the Prime Minister was in the Old Country during the long adjournment of Parliament, he was certainly in a position to secure the most definite information as to the need for reinforcements at the front, and he must have received that information, because almost immediately on his return to Canada, he announced that a measure of compulsory service was to be introduced. Why should he make that statement immediately on his arrival in this country? Because of the fact that recruiting in Canada had fallen off to such an extent that the wastage of war was not being met under the voluntary system, and that it was a question either of introducing a measure of compulsory service or of the divisions of our army in France and Belgium gradually dwindling away to nothing.

We have heard a good deal of criticism from hon. gentlemen opposite in regard to recruiting. I have been filled with admiration for the courage displayed by some hon. gentlemen opposite in taking a stand in opposition to those with whom they have been associated for many years. Party ties are strong, and it is not a very pleasant task to sever them even on such a question as this, and it must have required a good deal of courage on their part to take the stand they did. This, however, is a time that tries men, when the very best that is in them must come to the surface, when their consciences must be their guide. Therefore, I give those gentlemen credit for being actuated by high motives. Some hon. gentlemen opposite do not agree with the leader of the Opposition who has taken a very firm stand in opposition to this measure, and who has moved an amendment that a referendum should be submitted to the people of Canada in order to find out their views on the matter. He has received strong support from some of the leading men in the Liberal party in his position. The hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) the other night took a very strong stand with regard to the question of a referendum, and other hon. gentlemen opposite have spoken along similar lines. It is quite evident, therefore, that in this House there are many hon. members who have very strong views in favour of compulsory service, and that there are other hon. members who have equally strong views in opposition to that measure. But why should compulsory service be necessary? As I said a moment ago, it is necessary because men have not been volunteering as readily as they are required, because the wastage of our army has not been met. Quite a number of hon. members who have spoken in this debate have placed before the House the figures showing what the several provinces have done in the way of recruiting, and it appears that in one of the great provinces of this Dominion, recruiting has not been such as we would like to have seen it; that it has not been anything like on a par with the recruiting that has taken place in other provinces. Had recruiting in that province been as successful as in the other provinces, there would be no necessity to-day for introducing a measure of compulsory military service.

I have followed with a good deal of interest the arguments advanced and the attempts made to justify the slowness of recruiting in Quebec. This is a time when we might as well say in this House what is in our minds as say it outside, and hon. gentlemen opposite, whether they agree with me on other matters or not, I am sure, will much prefer that that should be done. I take issue with the leader of the Opposition when he tries to make excuses for the people of Quebec, stating that the British-born volunteer more readily than the Canadian-born, because the former have not been so long in Canada as the latter, and their feeling for the Old Country is, therefore, stronger. The figures do not justify any such contention, because there is in Canada a race of people who were here long before the French came to the shores of Canada. I refer to the Indians of this country. One hundred and five thousand Indians do not forget that they have sent 2,000 volunteers to the front. The most magnificent response that has been made by any race in Canada has been made by the Indians, who have not been given very generous treatment, and who have been deprived of the franchise. One would think that if there were in this country any one who had a grievance against the Government, or against the people of another race, it would have been the Indians of Canada. We were told by hon. gentlemen opposite that the French had been deprived of their arms shortly after the conquest; we were also told that the attitude of the other provinces towards Quebec had something to do with its failure to recruit in proportion to the enlistments in the other provinces. The hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux), in dealing with the matter, referred to the French Premier Clemenceau when he welcomed the British delegation at Paris, and he quoted the words used on that occasion by Mr. Clemenceau, and then spoke as follows:

> To my fellowmen of British extraction, I say: "We are awaiting you since the Plains of Abraham and since the battle of St. Foye. Why do you not trust us, as your fellow-men, as your partners, just as the British overseas have trusted the Boers, as they have trusted the Scotch, as they are about to trust the Irish, after so many years of misunderstanding and miseries?"

Other hon. gentlemen have made reference to the injustice that has been done to Quebec. I think it was the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) who was interruped in his speech the other evening by the hon. member for Montcalm (Mr. Lafortune) asking: "If we do as you request, will you repeal the school law in Ontario?" The hon. member for Brantford replied that he was not prepared to discuss the question, and then the hon. member for Montcalm said, "Neither are we prepared to go." That is an exhibition of what was in the mind of at least one hon. member of this House. The hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil), not only this session but in previous sessions, has often made the statement that credit for the fact that Canada is a British colony at the present time is due to Quebec. Had it not been for Quebec, he said, the chances are that Canada would not now be under British rule, and that statement has also been made by other hon. gentlemen. In this connection I should like to call the attention of the House to an address that was delivered at the 49th Convocation of the University of Chicago by none other than the late Sir George W. Ross. The subject was "The Political Cleavage of North America". He dealt with the question very fully, going back to the congress that was held at Philadelphia in 1774, and quoting from the journals of that congress. In order to make clear just what were the views of the people of the province of Quebec with regard to the offers that were made to them by the President of the United States and others to induce them to come into the Union, I shall read a few paragraphs from the address delivered by Sir George W. Ross. He said:

> Now it is a rather strange circumstance in the history of this continent that the Declaration of Rights, which laid the foundation of the American Republic, practically laid the foundation of the Dominion of Canada. If this statement is historically true, we can claim a share in the pride you feel in that memorable gathering out of which has sprung your great Republic, with its wonderful record of democracy and achievement. Let us examine the validity of this statement.
>
> The call to the first Continental Congress in 1774 was responded to by all the North American colonies, excepting Georgia and Canada. I have not seen any good reason why Canada did not appear there. It might have been on account of the difficulties of transportation, or because the French Canadians, who were accustomed to taxation under the French Government prior to the conquest of 1759, did not object to the Stamp Act. But it is not to the absence of representatives from Canada that I desire to call attention, but rather to the objections taken by the Congress to the concessions made by Great Britain to the French Canadians in the Quebec Act of 1774. After reciting the grievances from which the colonists suffered under the misgovernment of His Majesty's ministers the Congress denounced the concessions made to the French Canadians already referred to, but more especially to the provisions of the Quebec Act of 1774. This Act was characterized as an Act "which recognized the Catholic religion, abolished the equitable jurisdiction of England and, ignoring the antagonistic faith of the old colonies, their laws and governments, set up civil and spiritual tyranny in Canada to the great danger of the neighboring provinces which had so much aided Britain to conquer our country. Nor can we suppress our astonishment that a British parliament should ever consent to establish in that colony a religion that often drenched your island in blood and disseminated impiety, bigotry, persecution, murder and rebellion throughout every part of the world."

This was the fly in the pot of ointment. The denunciation of the privileges conceded to the French Canadians, and particularly their religion, in such specific and forcible terms, could not fail to restrain any desire they might have to throw off their allegiance to Great Britain. On the one hand, they had the guarantee of perfect security and the enjoyment of their civil and religious liberties by a solemn treaty subsequently embodied in an Act of the British Parliament.

I believe that Sir George W. Ross in that speech gave us the strongest reason why Quebec did not agree to the offers that were made by the people of the United States. The very fact that they had a greater degree of liberty and freedom under British rule than they ever had under French rule, or could possibly hope to have in the United States or elsewhere, was one of the main reasons why they decided to remain as they were.

We all know the difficulties that beset the statesmen of this country at the time of Confederation, and that it was only by a compromise on the part of the various provinces that Confederation was brought about. I shall quote from a few addresses that were delivered on that occasion. The first is by Henry Joly, member for Lotbiniere (afterwards Sir Henri Joly de Lotbiniere):

I have asked of myself with all seriousness, where then are the aspirations of the French Canadians? I have always imagined, indeed I still imagine, that they all centre in one point, the maintenance of their nationality as a shield destined for the protection of the institutions they hold most dear. For a whole century this has ever been the aim of the French Canadians . In the long years of adversity they have never for a moment lost sight of it.

Sir George E. Cartier, after quoting from Washington's proclamation, said:

We see what promises, what seductive offers were made by the Republican General to the French Canadians. But they were made in vain.

Quoting from the proclamation by Baron D'Estaing, commander of the French fleet which was acting in aid of the American Revolutionary party, he said:

The French Canadians realized their situation too well. They understood that they would preserve intact their institutions, their language and their religion by adhesion to the British Crown. But if they had accepted the offers of Washington it is probable that there would not have existed to-day a vestige of British power on this continent, and that the French Canadians would also have seen their nationality disappear.

These are the views that were expressed over 50 years ago in regard to the attitude of the French Canadians at that time. The present leader of the Opposition, during the session of 1913, made the following statement which appeared in the Hansard of that year:

Nor do I admit that we owe gratitude to Great Britain because she has spent money to defend this country. Sir, sovereignty implies defence, and so long as Britain was sovereign over Canada, it was her duty to defend Canada. If we were a colony still, we should have the right to claim this defence at the hands of the mother country. But to-day we are a free nation. Yet, I have already said that we do owe a debt of gratitude to Great Britain. I proclaim it to the world. And why should we be grateful? Not because she has defended us, not because she has loaned us money, but because of the liberality of the regime she has introduced here. And especially do we of the province of Quebec owe gratitude to her—I say so without hesitation—because she has permitted us to become a nation within her empire. That is the ground upon which I rest our gratitude to the mother country.

These are some of the views that go to refute the suggestion of the hon. member for Rouville the other day that the English-speaking provinces of Canada were doing an injustice to the people of Quebec. I do not like to discuss matters of this kind. I feel that there is ample room in this great country of Canada for all our people to grow up and develop. The people of Ontario are certainly not jealous of the people of Quebec; they are not anxious to deprive them of any rights they enjoy to-day, but at the same time they do not like the people of Quebec to interfere in legislation that has been passed in Ontario, and which is quite in accordance with the constitution of this country.

I do not think that a question of that kind should be an issue in this country at present.. In my opinion, the right hon. leader of the Opposition, by his attitude in this House a year ago on a question agitating the minds of the people in eastern Ontario, the bilingual question, did a great deal to intensify the antagonistic feeling existing in the province of Quebec. If he had adopted a different attitude, if he had endeavoured to use the great ability which he undoubtedly possesses in influencing the people of the province of Quebec, I believe they would have responded much more readily than they have done. The people of Quebec are of one of the finest races in Europe. They have reason to be proud of their ancestry: old France fighting doggedly for her life, is an inspiration to-day for all the world. I say that this war is doubly their cause, even more than it is the cause of those of English birth, in view of the position of their motherland; and I have always said that the man who forgets the land from which his ancestors come, whatever land that may be, is a a poor specimen of humanity. The attitude of the leader of the Opposition on the occasion to which I have referred did not help to allay the feeling that existed in the province of Quebec.

The criticisms levelled at the Government with regard to the lack of recruiting in Quebec have been demonstrated by what has transpired to be absolutely without foundation. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) has suggested that this Bill, after it passes, should not be put into effect until a further recruiting campaign is entered upon throughout Canada. This position, I believe, has no strong foundation. In the past few months an attempt has been made in the province of Quebec under the man, General Lessard, who, according to the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux), could appeal to the people of that province more than any other. I was amazed, dumbfounded, yesterday when the Minister of Militia laid the statement before the House showing the actual results of that recruiting campaign all over the great province of Quebec. The result was 221 recruits; and it appears that even half of these were not recruited in the province of Quebec. It is quite evident that compulsion must be used, or we will have to desert the men at the front. That is the question, the only question, with which we are concerned. The measure, I believe, will be put through this House and it must be put into effect and put into effect quickly. There has been altogether too much delay already. Time has been wasted, days and weeks have been passed in this House, and we are not making very rapid progress. Let us try to realize that men are doggedly fighting our battles at the front, men who have been in the ranks now for upwards of two and a half years, some of them war-worn and weary and needing a respite which cannot be given them. I say it is a crying shame, it is one of the greatest outrages that has ever taken place in the history of Canada or of the world, if these men must be kept there, year after year, year after year, without opportunity to get away and recuperate. I listened to the eloquent member for Rouville when he took exception to the statement made by the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie). He said:

> Let me tell my hon. friend from South Wellington that I have as much at stake in this war as he has. I am one of those who have given up an only son to fight the battle of liberty. At the age of 18 he left the university classroom to fight for his King and country, but he went with unfaltering steps to fight as a volunteer, not as conscript; the two things are quite different. Perhaps it is because I have French blood in my veins, but I make quite a distinction between voluntarily offering to fight and fighting under compulsion. That is the essential difference between my hon. friend and myself, and it is quite a difference, I am free to admit.

I congratulate the hon. member from Rouville on having a son with that spirit. If a man has a son who is of military age and physically fit, and that son has not the spirit to offer his services to his country, he has good reason to feel ashamed of that son. I hope the hon. gentleman's son will return to him safe and in good health after the war is over. But on the very day the hon. member was making his statement, I received a letter from one of my constituents enclosing two letters which he had received from his son, a boy—yes, a boy, for I tried to put his name on the woters' list last year and he was objected to by the friends of our friends opposite because he was not old enough. This young man went over with the first contingent as a volunteer, and has been in the thick of the fight ever since. He has been through many engagements where his comrades have fallen around him. His own brother was with him, and fell at Vimy Ridge. The boy to whom I refer was wounded in the same engagement. He writes from a hospital in France, asking his friends if I could not by some means get him leave of absence for three months. Just for three months. He felt that he was on the verge of a breakdown and could not stand the life much longer. Yet, is there any prospect of his getting that respite? Is there anybody who would volunteer and take the place of that boy and let him off for three months after nearly three years of that life? Here is a case that should touch the heart of any one. Let me say to the hon. member for Rouville who, I am sorry to say, is not in his seat, that I understand his son has not yet left the province of Quebec—I do not know whether I am rightly informed on that point or not. I am told that he is a member of the battalion that is being raised by Col. Blondin. If that is the case, I should think that the hon. member for Rouville would be one of the first men who would come forward and advocate conscription, so that the regiment could be filled up and his boy get away to the front, rather than let him pine away here in the province of Quebec with no prospect of getting over for a long time.

I fear I am taking up too much time, but I wish to refer to remarks made by a number of hon. gentlemen opposite who have signified their intention of voting for this Bill and against the amendment. It was rather amusing how some of them endeavoured to retain their standing in the party, and to make it appear that they were heartily in accord with their leader except on this measure.

They tried to put the whole blame for the failure of recruiting on the shoulders of the Government. Recruiting in Canada has been a tremendous success and is due to the men themselves as the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) has said. As far as the county of Oxford is concerned, which I know better than any other part of Canada, no more pressure was exercised by the Government there than in Quebec or any other part of Canada; it was absolutely owing to the action of the men themselves and the efforts of the people in the county that recruiting became so successful there. There was a time when the Government found a great deal of difficulty in equipping and training the men, they were coming in so swiftly. But, after a few months, a change came over the country. There were whisperings and insinuations. Finally they became louder and louder. Statements were made in the House accusing the Government of all kinds of iniquities and a lack of business methods in connection with the administration of the war. They were not charges, because it was denied afterwards by the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) when the matter came up that any charges had been made. I am referring now to what were known as the Kyte charges. The people were right on edge, as it were. Statements were made in such a manner as to lead one to suppose that they were based upon substantial facts. The same thing applied to the purchase of submarines on the Pacific coast immediately after the war was declared and to the purchase of the boots that were furnished to the soldiers. Hon. gentlemen opposite did everything in their power to discredit the Government, and to create a suspicion in the minds of the people that the Government were not acting as they should have acted.

I want to point out in contrast to that the attitude of the Prime Minister and the Government. When the first of these statements were made, he immediately took steps to appoint a commissioner to investigate any charges of mismanagement that were made by any one and the commissioner appointed for the purpose went throughout Canada in order to facilitate inquiry into statements of this kind, with the result of which investigation hon. gentlemen are all familiar. You remember, when Camp Borden was opened up, all the Liberal press and the leaders of the Liberal party blamed the Government for the laying out of that camp and talked about the injustice that was being done to the men in sending them to that camp. This was just at the time that recruiting was beginning to fall off. I have not the slightest doubt that the Liberal party and press are in no small measure responsible for the falling off in recruiting at that time.

I want to say a word in regard to the danger to Canada. The leader of the Opposition referring to the Prime Minister in his speech in this House on the 18th June stated:

> I claim against him that there never was any danger of invasion of Canada on the part of Germany. If I have taken the position I have hitherto taken it is not because I feared an invasion of Canada by Germany. Nobody could say consistently that at this time, or at any time within the three years of the war, Canada was for one instant in danger of invasion. If I have taken the position I have taken, if I have been, as I was and as I am, in favour of our participation in the war, it was not because I feared invasion but because I believed that the victory of Germany would mean for Canada, as for the rest of the world, envelopment in the black shroud of German insolence, cruelties, and barbarities.

He was opposed to going outside of Canada to fight the battles of Canada when he made that statement. On December 8, 1916, the right hon. gentleman made a speech in the city of Quebec, and I take from the Toronto Globe a report of that speech. I shall just quote a part of it. He said that:—

> There was not a country in the world which would not be affected to the roots of its being if Germany won. If she won it would be the fall of Great Britain, of France, of Russia, and of Italy, and there would remain only Germany and the United States. The anxiety shown by President Wilson had shown how he realized the peril.
> Sir Wilfrid then read extracts from a plan prepared for the German General Staff and published before the war, showing that it was their intention to add two more provinces to those taken from France. He could prove that the German idea was the imposition of Deutschtum, or German domination, on the world, and he added that the war had shown how near they had come to succeeding. If it was possible for merchant submarines to enter

United States ports it was possible for armed submarines to enter Halifax, St. John and Quebec ports

The right hon. gentleman has evidently changed his mind since he delivered that address in Quebec. We have the authority of a former president of the United States for the statement that the British fleet was the only reason why the United States had not been subjected to invasion by Germany, that the British fleet was the only protection the United States had before they entered into this war, and it is quite evident that if it had not been for the United States we might have had to meet the German in Canada. Is it not much better that we should meet him in France and Belgium rather than in Canada? This battle is our battle just as much as it is the battle of France, Belgium, Britain, Italy, or any of those countries that are now fighting the enemy.

Now, I would like to say a word or two in regard to a matter that has been discussed quite freely throughout the country during the last few weeks, and that is the efforts that have been made by the Prime Minister for the formation of a coalition Government. Some hon. gentlemen opposite ask: Why were not those attempts made earlier in the war; why was not the leader of the Opposition approached before with a view to his entering a government of this kind? Let me say to the hon. gentlemen who advance that argument that the leader of the Opposition took a stand previous to the war and that up to the present day he has never shown that he was a penitent, or regretted the step that he took upon that occasion. You remember that at the time we were endeavouring to put a measure through this House to assist Great Britain to build three dreadnoughts, to strengthen and make more effective the British fleet, how he opposed that measure. Only a few weeks before war was declared we found him in this House taunting the Prime Minister and the Government with regard to their views on that question. He said:—

Emergency, who speaks to-day of emergency. Twelve months have passed since my right hon. friend the Prime Minister introduced his measure. Twelve months and more have passed since that time when he saw the German peril. He saw Germany almost ready to jump at the throat of Great Britain; he saw clouds on the horizon; he saw these clouds rent by lightning; he heard the murmur and rumbling of distant thunders. But my right hon. friend to-day may live in peace, the atmosphere is pure, the sky is clear. I do not charge any intention of deceit on the part of the Prime Minister in this regard.

[Mr Sutherland.]

This was delivered in the very year war was declared. Later on in that year, within a few weeks of the declaration of war, he again taunted the Prime Minister with regard to his attitude in regard to this question. These are some of the things that we should not allow to pass from our minds. If the right hon. leader of the Opposition had expressed any regret that he had taken the wrong stand with regard to that question, it might have been somewhat different.

Now, Sir, I wish to refer for a moment to the efforts that were made by the Prime Minister to secure a coalition on his return from the Old Land after Parliament resumed here a few weeks ago. He came back from England fully seized with the peril menacing the whole world, fully realizing the difficulties and obstacles we have yet to overcome. He made the announcement that compulsory service will have to be brought into effect in order to replenish the ranks of the Canadians at the front. I believe that the correspondence that took place between the Prime Minister and the right hon. leader of the Opposition on that occasion has not yet been placed on Hansard. I wish to read that correspondence in order to show that the right hon. the Prime Minister offered every possible inducement to the right hon. gentlemen opposite to accept the proposition which he offered on that occasion, that he was absolutely sincere in his desire to secure their co-operation in order to further the interests of the country and of the Allies. The letter of the right hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier to the Prime Minister is as follows:

Ottawa, Ont., June 6, 1917.

Dear Sir Robert:—

On the 24th of May you asked me to meet you on the following day, which I did. After explaining fully the conditions of the war in the light of knowledge acquired during your recent visit to Great Britain, you stated the reasons which had led you to the conclusion that compulsory service was necessary, and you explained to me the provisions of the Military Service Bill.

You then proposed the formation of a coalition government, upon the basis that, outside of the Prime Minister, each of the two political parties should have an equal representation in the Cabinet, and you emphasized the importance of avoiding, if possible, an election during the war.

I told you at once that if my co-operation was desired, I regretted that I had not been invited before you had announced the policy of compulsory service, as I dreaded very serious difficulties if a conscription law was passed by the present Parliament. You rejoined that you had thought it preferable to invite me after the policy had been enunciated, rather than before.

At an interview which took place on Tuesday, the 29th of May, you suggested to me that you thought it necessary to hold a caucus of your supporters but desired to consult me before doing so. I suggested to you that to hold a caucus pending negotiations would not likely tend towards the object to be attained. At the same time I suggested that as I wanted to consult particularly Sir Lomer Gouin and some other friends, I would like to have a clear statement in writing of your proposal, which you formulated as follows:

That a coalition government should be formed; that the Military Service Bill should be passed; that a pledge should be given not to enforce it until after a general election; that Parliament should be dissolved and the coalition government should seek a mandate from the people.

At the conference on Friday, the 1st of June, and again on Monday, the 4th, the possible personnel of a coalition government was considered, some not insuperable difficulties in that personnel were anticipated and the subject not concluded.

On Wednesday, the 6th of June, the final conference took place, at which I announced that I had not seen my way clear to join the Government on the terms proposed. I asked you at the same time if conscription was the only basis, to which you replied in the affirmative.

At this and previous interviews, I always stated to you that whenever conscription was adopted, after a consultation of the people, I would certainly urge in every possible way obedience to the law.

Believe me, yours sincerely,

Wilfrid Laurier.

Right Honorable Sir Robert L. Borden,
P.C., G.C.M.G., Ottawa, Ont.

To this Sir Robert replied on June 7:

Ottawa, Ont., June 7, 1917.

Dear Sir Wilfrid Laurier:—

I beg to acknowledge your letter of yesterday in which you set forth the substance of recent negotiations respecting the formation of a coalition government.

At our first interview you had expressed the opinion that compulsory service should not be enforced until it had been approved by a referendum or at a general election. It was for this reason that I submitted the further proposal on the 29th of May, which is described in the fourth paragraph of your letter.

I agree that it was the policy of compulsory service which in your judgment made it impossible for you to join a coalition government. I was convinced that compulsory service was necessary and must be included in the policy of the proposed coalition. You, on the other hand, decided that you could not accept such a policy, and that you could not join a government which adopted it.

Yours faithfully,

R. L. Borden.

The Right Honorable Sir Wilfrid Laurier, P.C., at House of Commons, Ottawa.

There was a straight issue, a difference of opinion with regard to this question; and in consequence of that difference of opinion between the Prime Minister and the leader of the Opposition, nothing resulted from the negotiations. But notwithstanding the attitude of the right hon. leader of the Opposition, there is in the ranks of the Liberal party in this House and there is among the ranks of the Liberals throughout the length and breadth of Canada, a strong feeling in favour of the attitude taken by the Prime Minister, a feeling that will justify, I believe, still further recognition being made of some of those people who have expressed their views on this question. This question is too serious a one to be made a party issue. Party politics never looked so mean and contemptible in my eyes and in the eyes of the people of this country as at the present time, when you contrast party politics with the sacrifices made since the outbreak of this war by those heroic men who are at the front fighting our battles for us. I hope that further efforts will be made by the Government to recognize the opinion of other elements of this country, not that I have any criticisms to offer with regard to the men now constituting the Government. I believe that there never was in the whole history of Canada a Government whose members have laboured more diligently, more earnestly, more sincerely than have the members of this Government. They have given all the best that they possess in the interest of the cause we have at heart. I believe that there never was—and there never will be again—a Prime Minister of Canada who has had a heavier burden to carry than has the Prime Minister since this war came about. There are tremendous questions outside of the war, that would be enough to engage the attention of any other Government, and these continual and unjustifiable criticisms that are being levelled at the Government do not make matters easier. The bringing of this war to a successful issue is to my mind the most important thing that we have to contend with now. With reference to a referendum, I have absolutely no use for it myself. I do not think that is in keeping with responsible Government. Some hon. gentlemen opposite may say that this Parliament has outlived the time for which it was elected, that we have to-day no mandate from the people.

I believe that there never was a time since this Government came into power in 1911 when there was less desire on the part of the people of Canada for an election than there is at the present time. They would much prefer that the two parties should come together, settle their differences, and carry this war to a successful issue, rather than have the whole country engaged in the turmoil which would accompany an election. I desire to say further, Mr. Speaker, as far as the referendum is concerned, that it is unfair, unjust, and there is not one strong argument that can be advanced in favour of such a proposition. The very fact that you would find aligned against those in favour of selective conscription men who, if they were doing their duty, would be in the ranks, is the strongest argument why they should not have an opportunity to place themselves on record. We are at war, and we are experiencing a different condition from anything that has heretofore confronted the people of Canada. I want to say that this state is made up of different individuals who are subject to the laws of the state. The individual who enjoys the advantages of Government in this country and the protection of the state has to discharge his duties to that state when the very life and existence of that state is in the balance. The demands of the state are supreme to all other demands, and when the state requires men to fight in its defence, then, Sir, it is not a matter of submitting a referendum to the people, but a matter of enforcing the military laws of the country and making those men do their duty. I want to say further, Mr. Speaker, that the men at the front do not want a referendum, and I believe those men at the front would scorn to put their mark on the ballot in a cause such as this. I say further that, to my mind, this is a plea that is absolutely unworthy of the right hon. gentleman who has moved the amendment to the Bill now before the House.

Let me ask the right hon. leader of the Opposition, the mover of the amendment, to submit a referendum to the people of Canada, to say whether compulsion should be used to secure men to support those on the battle line, now that the volunteer system fails to do so. What other course is left, unless we abandon these men and see our gallant army, made up of the Canadian divisions, dwindle and pass away?

Let him have his way. Send out your secret ballot. Place it in the hands of the people of Canada. Ask them to decide the question. What would the response be? I can see in my mind's eye how readily some would respond, how eagerly the pacifist who made the war possible would sign, the coward, the slacker, the man too proud to fight would be first at the poll to mark the ballot. Now the alien enemy within our gates—and they are many—how they would applaud the hon. gentlemen for the privilege of his secret ballot, giving them an opportunity to even up with the Canadians on the battle line; every one of them would be out to mark his ballot. But still the fight goes on. The ranks of the men on the battle line are growing thinner, and ever thinner. These grim, silent, war weary veterans, many of whom have borne the brunt of the brutal conflict for upwards of two years are doggedly holding on, ever confident that reinforcements from their home land will soon be at hand. And now, when the limit of their endurance has been almost reached, the right hon. gentleman approaches them with his referendum ballot, explains to them its object and the reason for adopting it and asks them to say whether they would favour compulsion being used to secure support for them, or whether they should be left to their fate, and the cause for which they have been contending during the past three years, and which they have ever had in mind as the goal of their ambition, should be given up. These men, who have endured trials and agonies indescribable, who gave up friends, homes and loved ones that we might continue to enjoy the benefits and liberties our heroic ancestors had acquired for us at a great cost of blood and sacrifice; these men who have done their full duty and have received the congratulations and plaudits of their allied comrades on their gallant conduct whether on the advance or when standing firm under the concentrated attack of the hordes of the enemy with his murderous gasses, knowing that many thousands of their comrades are sleeping their last sleep beneath the soil of a foreign land, knowing that thousands of their comrades have returned to Canada, whose maimed and broken bodies are evidence of their unfitness for further service, but who would give the people of Canada the true story of the pressing need for men, confident that assistance will be speedily forthcoming as soon as the people of Canada realize the pressing need.

This is the condition at the front, when the right hon. gentleman arrives with his secret ballot for them to mark in the quiet and privacy of their trenches and dug-outs, and asks them to say whether they would be kind enough to say whether they would be in favour of compulsion being used to secure men to support them; to force Canadians from their comfortable homes, from their families and children and their luxuries to relieve them of some of the heavy task which they had voluntarily assumed as a duty; to give them a respite for ever so short a time. These proud spirited men, with honour as their motto emblazoned on their shield, are to be asked to take a chance on a throw of loaded dice with the pacifist, the conscientious objector, the coward, the slacker and the alien enemy within our gates, who have adopted as their shield a secret ballot. What reception would the right hon. gentleman receive? What would be the response of these grim proud spirited heroes? Every man of them would fling the insult back in your teeth and consign you and your cowardly ballot to a warmer place than the south of France, and well might they say, if that is the spirit of those left in Canada, which name they had placed high on the scroll of fame by their gallant deeds and sacrifices, if this is the code of honour left in Canada we will fight as long as human endurance will hold out and go down to our graves with those gallant comrades who have preceded us, facing the foe with the keenest, the bitterest wound in their broken hearts, inflicted not by the enemy but by those whom they have left at home, and for whom they have been fighting during these weary months.

Mr. JACQUES BUREAU (Three Rivers and St. Maurice): I cannot give a silent vote on this matter, because I consider it to be the most important question ever submitted to the Canadian people. It affects two of the greatest gifts of the citizen, his life and his liberty. In considering this measure, one who is a true democrat and a true Canadian deserving the support of his fellow citizens, must use his sober judgment, and analyse carefully the consequences of the measure, scrutinize thoroughly the motives that inspired it, search with care, and ascertain the sentiments and opinions of those he represents. We have a right, and it is our duty, to express our opinions and our sentiments on this matter. Whatever opinions may be expressed or whatever threats may be made, we are willing to go before the country on the stand we are taking, and to face all fair-minded men.

I desire to say at the outset that what we seek is light on the subject, not abuse. What we want is unity and confidence in one another, not disunion and distrust. No one is more in sympathy with the Allies or more desires the winning of this war than we Canadians of French origin in Quebec, because living in a country where we are in the minority, where we have had to suffer and are now suffering in silence in order to avoid struggle and strife, and where pledges and treaties are our only safeguards, we are in close sympathy with those European nations, such as Belgium, Serbia and the other smaller Balkan states which occupy a similar position to ours in Canada, although not as minorities, yet as weaker powers. Our respect for Great Britain for having entered into an equitable contract with us at the time of the Quebec Act is well known, and my hon. friend (Mr. Sutherland) has confirmed the statement made in this House by the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux), namely, that if it had not been for the senior Canadians, whom some hon. members are pleased to call French Canadians, the British flag would not be floating on this building today, and we would not be discussing the question of conscription. The hon. member for South Oxford, after doing us the compliment of putting us in an inferior position to the Indians of this country, showed that we had some heart anyway. He quoted statements to show that in 1774 propositions were made to Lower Canada to join the American Republic. History shows that Canada was given the opportunity of becoming an independent republic; but, according to the element which the hon. member represents, we are not capable of noble sentiments and motives, therefore he endeavours to deprecate our act of loyalty on the ground that it was inspired by egotism; that, after thinking the matter over, we decided that we would not be as free; that we would not have as much liberty to practice our religion, to speak our language and to use our laws, under American rule (or as a republic, which would be ridiculous), as under a treaty with Great Britain. That shows that we understood what the contract was, and we endeavoured, in consideration of fair play on the part of Great Britain in carrying out her share of it, to show that we were going to carry out our share, without any regret.

Our sympathies for France, whence our ancestors came were great. I remember in 1871, at the time of the Franco-Prussian war the sorrow that was displayed in Canada by the senior Canadians when Germany defeated France. Others alongside of us laughed and rejoiced; we bore our grief in silence. I have shown what feelings of gratitude and sympathy we have for the two nations which are now fighting for the liberty of the world. I make the statement because by word of mouth and by expressions in certain newspapers we have been taxed with being pro-Germans. Of course, the truth is that we have never had any sympathy for Germany, which is the natural enemy of France, and that our sentiments of distrust and antipathy for the Germans were not born yesterday. It is, therefore, most unjustifiable to endeavour to classify us as some hon. gentlemen opposite have done. I speak here to-night as a Canadian; I would rather not use the word "French Canadian," or the word "English Canadian;" I would use the word "Canadian." But if I were to endeavour to make a distinction between the races which compose Canada I would speak of us as the senior Canadians, as we are, and who, I claim, are the only true, genuine Canadians, and of the junior Canadians, who are in the majority at the present time.

Listening to the speeches that have been delivered so far by hon. gentlemen opposite, one would be inclined to think that we are opposed to the winning of this war by the Allied nations. Hon. gentlemen opposite tell us that the war must be won. Certainly, the war must be won. That is not the question before the House. We are all agreed in regard to that question. In the short session of 1914 not a voice was raised in opposition to the proposals of the Government; we said to the Government: We give you carte blanche; go on and win this war. The question now before this House is: Are we to have conscription without first consulting the people? Are we to legislate on matters affecting so vitally all the people of this country without having their consent? For my part, I do not purpose tearing another piece out of the constitution. I object to the Bill, and I am in favour of a referendum, because I believe that if we are in a democratic country we ought not to legislate as to the life or liberty of the subject unless we have special authority by statute, and in that case we must live within the four corners of that statute, or unless we have a special mandate from the people.

The legal aspect of the question has been discussed, and I believe it has been shown beyond a doubt that the clause upon which we now rely to impose conscription on this country, or to send troops overseas never meant what hon. gentlemen opposite want it to mean to-day. The hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. E. Lapointe) the other day made an irrefutable argument to show what the meaning of the existing law is. It is well known that when you are going to give the true interpretation of a statute, you do not give it the interpretation that will suit your purpose for the time being, but the meaning that he who made the law wanted to convey. To do this you must go back and follow from its inception the legislation, seeing what the intent has been ever since such legislation was enacted, and putting all those facts together with the various objections and the different statements made by the parties interested in the measure, you can come to a correct interpretation. I had expected the Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen) to answer the argument of my hon. friend from Kamouraska.

Knowing the ingenuity and astuteness of the Solicitor General, I was surprised at the poor answer he made. My hon. friend from Kamouraska had cited all the laws from 1808 to 1868 to show that "without" in the phrase "within or without Canada," referring to the calling out of militia in the case of emergency, meant contiguous territory. To that, the first answer of the Solicitor General was that nobody had given this interpretation to the law so far, and he said that the speech of the hon. member for Kamouraska "was made for distribution in the province of Quebec." Let me tell my hon. friend that the people of Quebec do not need to have the speech of the hon. member for Kamouraska distributed among them to know what the clause means. It has been discussed and re-discussed and over-discussed ever since 1911. You know, Mr. Speaker, all the discussions that have been held on this clause, and all the ink that has been spilled over it.

The second answer of the Solicitor General was that the interpretation "expressing doubt about our right to send troops overseas" is shared by no one except political agitators. I am not going to quote, but it will be remembered that on the 1st of August, 1914—I think the extract will be found in the Hansard report of the speech of my right hon. leader the other day—a despatch was sent by the Governor General to the Imperial authorities stating that his Government was willing to help in case of war, which then seemed to be imminent, and the question was mooted whether under section 69 the Government had authority to send troops overseas. Now, at that time the Solicitor General and the Minister of Justice were in office. They had at their service to interpret the statutes a man of unquestioned authority and of the highest qualifications, a man through whose hands this particular law had passed in 1904 when it was presented to the House, a man who has published a book on Constitutional Cases—the Deputy Minister of Justice, Mr. E. L. Newcombe. I think he is a sufficiently high legal authority, and I say that the Solicitor General and the Minister of Justice were either derelict in their duty in not looking up the law and getting sufficient information about it, or else they came to the conclusion that they had absolutely no authority to send troops abroad under this Militia Act.

On the 5th of August, 1914, another message was sent to the Imperial authorities by the Governor General, but not from himself; he always states "my advisors." Who were his advisors? One of them was my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and he has had a wide experience in legislation. The Governor General states in that communication that his advisors had some doubts. And what did they ask? Did they call upon the Militia Act? No, they asked His Majesty the King to put the Canadian Force under sections 175 and 176 of the British Army Act. Is that in conformity with the statement of the Solicitor General that the interpretation given to the clause by the hon. member for Kamouraska could only have been given by a political agitator? Personally, I am well content to be in company with such political agitators as His Royal Highness the Duke of Connaught.

Then the Solicitor General gave his third answer. The hon. member for Kamouraska had quoted the words of the Minister of Militia of 1904 and of the ex-Minister of Militia of the present Cabinet. The Solicitor General, following his usual practice of meeting argument by argument and reason by reason, said: "Who have you for authority? A doctor and an editor." Since when, Mr. Speaker, has Canada or the Parliament of Canada delegated to the gentlemen of the legal profession the exclusive right to present Bills in this House, to discuss and explain them and have them adopted? Since when has the legal profession had the monopoly of knowing what they want to express. The Solicitor General quoted Sir Charles Fitzpatrick as saying that the troops could be sent to India, and then he discarded the explanation given by the Minister of Militia. If my hon friend will look at the Hansard of 1904, vol. 4, p. 6471, he will see that Sir Charles Fitzpatrick said:

> When drafting a law I want to know what the party who introduced the Bill has in his mind. My functions are limited to giving effect to the intentions of the person introducing the Bill.

Therefore I conclude that the higher authority as between the Minister of Justice and the head of a department introducing a Bill, is the head of the department who knows exactly what he wants, and simply sends his Bill to the Minister of Justice to have it put in proper legal form. That is one of the reasons why I claim that the sudden change in the interpretation of the law which has taken place recently is only to suit the convenience of hon. gentlemen opposite, who know that this measure is unpopular and want to say: "You did this yourselves; you are responsible for it."

There is another reason why I object to the Bill. I have said before, and I cannot repeat it too often, that we in this Parliament when dealing with the life and liberty of the subject should at least be the representatives of those subjects. When the extension of Parliament was granted it was never contemplated that such a radical change as this would be brought about in our domestic life. We are to-day in session under and by virtue of the Imperial Act. We are practically an Imperial Parliament, and the Imperial Parliament, having no right to deal with the life and liberty of the Canadian subject, cannot, I maintain, delegate that right to the Parliament of Canada. If we passed this Act we would not only be setting a bad precedent, but doing something that was most undemocratic and most unconstitutional.

My third reason for opposing the Bill—and this reason was adduced when the British Conscription Bill was introduced at Westminster—is that a law of this kind should not be passed without the general consent of the people, or at least the Government should have the confidence of the people; I claim that both are lacking in this case. The ex-Minister of Militia has stated that the members of the Cabinet had no confidence in one another. In a speech at Lindsay he said that they were poking their noses into each other's departments and watching each other, and that when he arrived at New York he was told to be careful as he was going to be murdered politically for standing so loyally behind the leader of the Government, and that the Finance Minister was after his scalp. Is that a properly constituted Cabinet? Are you going to tell me that the people of this country will have confidence in a Cabinet the members of which have no confidence in one another? I say; No. I will not tolerate any such agglomeration legislating upon the life and liberty of the subject.

There is another reason for my opposition. It may not appeal to my friends on the other side, it may not appeal to the junior Canadians; but it appeals to us the senior Canadians, and it appeals to me. We are not opposing this Bill for the purpose of creating delay, nor for political reasons; we are fighting for the preservation of our ideals, and one of those ideals is the sacredness of pledges, or, to use the words of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) "plighted faith." We have had promises made. All over the province of Quebec we have been told, and repeatedly told, that conscription would not be put in force. There is no emergency that I can see that has happened since to call for conscription without first asking those men to whom we have promised that conscription would never be put in force to say whether or not they have changed their minds as the Government has changed its mind since the promise was made. We are interested in seeing that pledges and treaties are respected, because we are the senior Canadians and the minority; but now that the majority of the stock of the concern seems to have got into the hands of the juniors knowing their own views on these matters, we will not tolerate, if we can help it, that treaties and pledges in Canada shall be treated as the Prussians have treated theirs. When they call us "pro-Germans", and "Prussians," it makes me smile. If we are to judge men by their deeds, the inclination of these hon. gentlemen is toward Prussianism rather that toward democracy and liberty.

This is not a military question only, it is also a social and economic question. A statement has been made in this House, and not contradicted so far, that if we send another hundred thousand men across the seas we cannot produce enough to help the Allies and prevent them from suffering from famine. I read in the Free Press only the other day an account of a meeting held in Ottawa, taken part in by farmers and by members of the Board of Trade. At that meeting, a gentlemen named Black, if I remember his name correctly, a Government official, made the statement that this year's wheat crop would be between 20,000,000 and 30,000,000 bushels short. A farmer who spoke made the statement that what they wanted was help, otherwise they could not cultivate their farms. Lord Rhondda has made the same appeal—

An hon. MEMBER: And Lord Shaughnessy.

Mr. BUREAU: Yes, Lord Shaughnessy the same. And in the Montreal Star of to-night I find a despatch from London, dated to-day, containing this statement made to the Associated Press by right hon. R. E. Prothero, Minister of Agriculture:

"The outcome of the war," said Mr. Prothero, "may ultimately hang on the question of food supplies, and the American farmer is allotted the essential part to play in the great struggle for freedom."

Mr. Prothero then discussed the value of co-operation of the American farmers and continued:

There is risk that the shortage of food may strain endurance to the breaking point There is as yet no indication that we even have distantly approached that point, but endurance might snap if, for instance, the milk supply failed through inability to feed the dairy herd, because then the lives of little children would be threatened. Thus, there is a greater question involved in food supply than the loss of ordinary comforts of life, or even reduction in its accustomed necessities.

"For this reason it is a welcome relief to us to know that the farmers of the United States are co-operating with the Allies, that they fully realize the essential part they play in this struggle for freedom, that they are bringing into their work the spirit of self-sacrifice and endurance and that they are determined to put out the last ounce of their strength to win the war on the ploughlands of the United States. Here and there, God speed the plough!"

That is not an appeal from this side of the House or from people who want to embarrass the Government, but from the Minister of Agriculture in the British ministry. The hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) the other day read to the House an advertisement published in a Chicago paper at the instance of the Government, calling for 60,000 men to come to Canada to till the soil, and offering these men the guarantees that if they would come they should not be conscripted. Why should we now take the men who are coming from the United States, give our money to the Americans, and send our own men to the battlefield? I say, if you cannot fill the gaps with five divisions, make it four; if you cannot do it with four, make it three; but do not become guilty of murder, do not leave the man who has gone to the front to famish; do not let the soldiers die of hunger. I see the Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers) smiling, but I can tell him that nothing has been brought before the House to show that the taking of more men from the country will not impair our agricultural industry.

There is another phase of this subject, and it is with certain pain, or regret, that

I touch upon it. Reasons have been given why conscription was imposed; but the way the leaves move generally indicates the way in which the wind blows. I find that the reasons so far given are an imputation upon the province in which I live. Although the subject is grave, the expressions of these gentlemen concerning it are evidently a vent for feelings that must have been pent up for a long time. The Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen) in the course of his speech the other day told us: We of English-speaking Canada have the kindest feelings towards our French compatriots. Thinking of the Toronto Orange Sentinel, of the Toronto News, of the Kingston and Hamilton papers, I said to myself: These men are great verbal acrobats, because if the sentiments expressed by these papers towards the province of Quebec are kindly sentiments, I do not understand English.

It is said that voluntary enrolment has been a failure. In presenting this Bill the Prime Minister said that in 1915 and 1916, delegations came to him and asked him to suspend or lessen recruiting.

The ex-Minister of Militia says that in March, 1916, he was not told to drop recruiting but he was told to go slow and let it rest awhile. Therefore, if voluntary recruiting has not been a success it was not due to the fault of any one except those who had put a damper on it. The ex-Minister of Militia says that the heads of the great industries were after the Prime Minister fearing that they would be short of labour. He, in his ordinary gallant way, says: They came before me but I kicked them out; the Prime Minister did not have his back stiff enough to kick them out and so he gave in. He also says that they went after the hon. the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) and that he was afraid that Toronto would be up in arms. Yet these hon. gentlemen say that voluntary enlistment has failed. If it has it is because they stopped it.

Now, I desire to say a word in regard to the operation of the system in the province of Quebec. My hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) made a statement the other night which was jeered at by our Conservative friends opposite who have spoken against recruiting in Quebec. He said that one of the faults of the Government was that they had not employed proper officers for recruiting in Quebec. I back up that statement. If they had sent to Toronto, or anywhere in Ontario, as a recruiting officer, a French Canadian who could not speak a word of English, what would have been the response to his efforts? They would not have tolerated him for a minute, they would have escorted him to the train and said: Go and learn English and call again. In Quebec, the Solicitor General says, of course with kindly feelings always that the numbers of French recruiting officers were legion and that when he got the list, he thought it was the list of recruits that he had. If they were legion what have they done? The services of an officer whom I know and whom I have seen at work commanding camps at Three Rivers, having as many as 10,000 or 15,000 men under him at a time, a man who has had experience and who is well qualified, was at their disposal, I refer to Colonel Pelletier whom I saw in active service during the Northwest rebellion. He was wounded on the field, he came back, was put in command of the Quebec district and went from there to the South African war. They cannot say that this man had no experience. He was liked by the men who came to the camp at Three Rivers, they had confidence in him and he liked them. Colonel Roy was an officer in much the same position. General Lessard was another officer of standing and when I hear the statement made that he secured no recruits, my reply to that is, that he did not start well, that he was not encouraged, that he started with Colonel Blondin who had been opposed to recruiting all his life, and the people were rather reluctant to think that he had changed his views on his way to Damascus. General Lessard started and the Government thought it might be a success but they did not want it to be a success in Quebec.

If a man is going to war, if he is going to give his life or shed his blood for any cause, he wants to go with a man that he trusts and in whom he has confidence. He wants to go with a man whose sympathy he knows he can command. If we are to judge by the expressions of feeling that we have had from a certain element, the French Canadian has no reason, no justification, to believe that he would get any sympathy from people outside of his own race. I was astounded when I read in the papers that at a meeting in Queen's Park, which was mentioned by my hon. friend from Russell (Mr. Murphy), a returned soldier made the statement that if the Government would conscript the foreigners the returned soldiers would fight the French Canadians. I do not object to that statement so much as I do to the manner in which it was received, what is worse, because it expresses a feeling which ought not to be tolerated in this country, was the ovation that took place amongst the auditors when that statement was made. That feeling is not confined to Toronto, it has gone farther. It was published in the press broadcast that wounded soldiers had been insulted in the streets of the city of Quebec and that soldiers' trains had been stoned at Fraserville and Rivière du Loup. We asked for an investigation and the report has been deposited on the table of the House. Let me read from the report of the gentlemen who were appointed by the Government to investigate the incident in order to show the House whether any case has been made out against voluntary recruiting in Quebec. In clause 10 of the report No. 172, it is stated that:

Owing to the strong feeling of the majority of the soldiers that the province of Quebec has not as yet done her full duty in sending troops over, they express their views to the citizens in strong terms whenever occasion offers and this had an apparent effect on the volunteer services in these localities.

It is useless to say, Sir, that these accusations were not founded on fact that the report of the commission showed that there was no ground for them and further that in certain instances the soldiers had attacked the civilians and it was only in retaliation that they received anything from them. Were these people satisfied to have these slurs cast upon the French Canadians within the borders of Canada? No, Sir. Just to show the animus, and to show the position that we are in, I propose to put a cablegram before the House. The report of this military commission is dated the 18th day of May. On the 19th June a cable was sent from London addressed to the hon. member for Rouville. It reads as follows:

Hon. Rodolphe Lemieux, Ottawa.

Major from British Columbia pretends to a pressman that his regiment was attacked and insulted passing through Quebec province. Can you send me report of enquiry committee?

(Sgd) Pelletier.

Mr. Pelletier is the representative of the province of Quebec in London. As my hon. friend from Rouville stated in this House, the American press is being poisoned. Now somebody is trying to poison the mind of the English people on the other side of the ocean knowing that the statements made are untrue, knowing that an investigation by the military authorities has been held and a report made to the contrary, and yet a month after that report is made this despatch is sent in order to ascertain the truth of statements made by men who are across the ocean, officers of the Canadian army.

[Mr. Bureau.]

Mr. LAFORTUNE: Who sends that message?

Mr. BUREAU: Mr. Pelletier, the Commissioner of the province of Quebec in London. Do they want to stop in England? No, Sir: they go further; they cross the channel and go right to the trenches. The other day I read in a newspaper a letter from a young French Canadian from the province of Quebec, stating that even in the trenches practically the only thing they had to read was a paper which was circulated, a paper which was slurring and slandering the French-Canadians. It is a Toronto paper, which has for its title Jack Canuck. That is the kind of literature they get in the trenches, and that is the kind of respect that is shown not only for the slacker, but for the man who has gone to the front to shed his blood.

Not only since the beginning of the war but for a long time before, we have been insulted; but we have borne our ills with patience. The element which is so active against us cannot realize the position. Let me tell them that the French Canadians did not come to this side of the ocean in palatial steel steamers. When the Frenchman came to America he did not proceed to the Windsor hotel, there to spread a map of Canada before him, pull out his cheque book and decide where he was going to invest his thousands of dollars. He did not come either to seek wealth. His arms and his capital were courage and a strong heart. The wealth he was seeking was peace and happiness. The twin screw steel palace that he had was nothing but a small bark, and when he fastened it to the shore of the St. Lawrence, when he stepped on the shore, there to wrest and conquer from the forest and from the aborigines a piece of land on which he could live in peace and raise his family he was satisfied. What he wanted was to create a home for his descendants, to worship his God according to his creed, to speak his language, and to find happiness with his family by his fireside. This man cannot have the same mentality as the man who came to Canada twenty-five or thirty years ago. This man is rooted to the soil, and his only country in the world is the spot bought by his forefathers by the sweat of their brows, and paid for with their blood. We are proud of the French blood that flows in our veins, but you cannot call us French we are Canadians. The fortune of war went against us one day; we had to change companions and to submit to a new regime. We did it, we accepted the new companions, to live in peace with them. At that time, Sir, the partner senior was holding the majority of the stock, 70,000 against 3,000 when men of his blood called Lafayette and Rochambault came and made him a proposition to forego his allegiance and join the American republic; he said no. He was loyal, he knew that he had sworn allegiance to his new associates. Let those who doubt the loyalty of that man go down into the province of Quebec, on the national highway along the St. Lawrence, and there they will see that the French Canadians has in front of his house the witness of his pledge, they will see on every farm the cross, standing there to remind the French Canadians that he cannot be a perjurer to the British Crown—and he never will be.

To show the animus of a certain element, I need only refer to what occurred this afternoon. I was amazed at the answers made by the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Arthurs). My friend from Cape Breton asked him a question. The member for Parry Sound was making a statement that there were only a thousand French Canadians left at the front, that one regiment had been decimated, that only commissioned and non-commissioned officers were in England. Upon that my friend asked him a question something as follows: You made the statement that there were 5,000 or 6,000 French-Canadians; one regiment has been decimated, 1,000 are in the trenches, where are the others? The hon. member replied: They must have deserted.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Shame, shame.

Mr. BUREAU: Sir, is that noble, is that generous, I ask you, is that British—is it even decent? I say no.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: It is German.

Mr. BUREAU: Do you think that a mother with a heart in her breast or a father with blood in his veins will tell his son to enroll under men who express such sentiments as that? What treatment can he expect? You say: Go and fight the Prussians; in the name of liberty, in the name of democracy, go and fight the Prussians. Why? Because he has called his pledges scraps of paper, because he has put his heel on the weaker nation, Belgium; because he has tried to wipe from the earth the smaller nations of the Balkans; and in the same breath you treat your fellow countrymen, you treat the men in the trenches, in this way. Read the casualty lists, and you will see that some men have deserted to go to a better land; some have deserted by shedding their blood; some have deserted by taking Courcelette, and I ask a gentleman who says he has been in the trenches, a gentleman who says he has raised a regiment and who has nothing but words of scorn for men who have lost their lives, I ask: Are we going to enroll with such people? No. And then, Sir, those gentlemen will come—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Do not call him a gentleman.

Mr. BUREAU: I am not calling him, I am talking about the gentlemen on the other side generally. They will come and call us the white-livered brigade, the cold-feet association, the slacker band. Do they think we are going to follow their footsteps? Who is the man who is foolish enough to go and enroll when he knows he will have a greater fight with the men who are commanding him than he will have with the Prussian when he meets him? The insinuations, the implications, the slurs and slanders against my fellow countrymen were started by a certain element in the neighbouring province of Ontario. Mind you we exempt certain good-willed people. A movement was made to try and bring about a better understanding between the two provinces. There was the bonne entente delegation. I had the pleasure of being present when they came to Three Rivers, and I may say that they were all delighted and some were surprised at what they saw. A return visit was made, but some titled editors laughed and scoffed at it. Why, Sir, what we want now is unity. What we want now is not strife and struggle; we want to understand that we are a common people fighting for a common cause, and that there is no superior and no inferior race in this country. I will never consent to be a party to ratify broken pledges. I will never consent to be content when one class of the citizens is being brushed aside with the hand as unworthy of being Canadians.

As I have said, the member for Parry Sound (Mr. Arthurs) and the member for North York (Mr. D. A. Armstrong) are not the only ones. We, who depend upon treaties and pledges for our safeguard, have heard the statement made in this House, by members who claimed they represented the people, that they did not care for the constitution I will quote the speech so that I will not be unfair to the hon. gentleman. Mr. Armstrong of North York started with the usual complimentary address:

I must say that the reason why conscription faces us to-day is because French Canada has failed to do its duty.

Further on he says:

I personally do not care two straws whether it is constitutional or not. Personally I would puncture the constitution a dozen times, if it was necessary, in order to stand by the boys at the front and to uphold Canada's arm in this struggle.

Going back to the opening of his address, I find he made the following statement:

Those who know the political history of the part of the province from which I come know that the riding of North York has long claimed to be the birthplace and cradle of reform; that it has given to the public life of Canada men like George Brown, William Lyon Mackenzie, Sir William Mulock and Sir Allen Aylesworth, names that are closely interwoven with the history and principle of old time Liberalism.

Sir William Lyon Mackenzie and George Brown are gone, but there are men living to-day who must find a considerable change in the constituency of North York. I had the pleasure of being closely associated with one of them, Sir Allen Aylesworth, and no man had more respect for the constitution than he had, and I ask myself, how is it that to-day North York is sending to Parliament a man who wants to puncture the constitution? He had better go and puncture the Prussians first. What are we fighting for and what are we asked to fight for? The very same thing that the Allies are fighting for. We are asked to fight because the constitution, or pledge or treaty that Germany signed, protecting a smaller nation, Belgium, has been treated as a scrap of paper. The hon. member from North York says, "I will tear in pieces the treaty or contract which safeguards you as a minority. In the name of liberty, I enslave you. In the name of democracy I shackle you." I remember the indignation of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce when we passed legislation creating new provinces. I was reminded of the preacher in an old church in the southern states, when he made us hear the rattling of the shackles on the young man on the plains of the Northwest, and when he made them cry, "Give me liberty or give me death." What are we to expect? Has Prussia been transported to America. Has Kaiserism been implanted in Ottawa? Has the gentleman gone into hysterics, or is it mental aberration? I do not know what to think. My people do not know what to think. Are we going to be slaves, or are we going to be treated as slaves. I say, No.

The ex-Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes) said the other day that one of the influences which worked against recruiting was that some young people would get on the platform and call the others slackers. And he says the young men who were called slackers would get their backs against the wall and say, "We will not enroll." Mr. Speaker, do not let our friends believe that, because we do not hold the majority of the stock in this association, we are going to run away. Don't let them think that abuse or threats are going to scare us, either inside or outside of this House.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BUREAU: Look at the way the Hon. gentleman from Parry Sound, (Mr. Arthurs) opened his remarks. The first thing was to quote the member from St. Hyacinthe whose remarks were interpreted as meaning resistance to the enforcement of the bill. Why should the Hon. gentleman be scandalized? Is there not to-day in the British Cabinet a man who said he would resist by force of arms the law sanctioned by his King? The same gentleman was presented with a sword on a certain occasion by his supporters as a mark of approval for the stand taken by him on the Home Rule question. On that particular occasion, the government which the member for Parry Sound supports, was represented at the ceremony by the present Canadian Minister of Railways and Canals. Does he reprove the British Government or does he reprove the Canadian Government? No, Sir, but he brings this forward try and cast suspicion and disloyalty upon a member because he is from the province of Quebec. I see my friend from North Grey (Mr. Middlebro) in the House to-night. While speaking the other day he asked my hon. leader in this House: "Who leads public opinion in the province of Quebec?" He was trying to fasten on him the responsibility for all the slurs and slanders which are heaped upon us. Who are the leaders of public opinion? He said, "The leader of the Opposition will go down to Quebec and with Sir Lomer Gouin, will carry 60 seats out of 65. Can you not find in Quebec five or six men of good will, who will preach to their fellow citizens that they have to enroll?" I ask the hon. gentleman from North Grey, who is the leader of public opinion in Ontario? Who is the man that goes to that province, and comes back to this House in 1911 with 69 seats out of 82? Can he not find among his fellow men or politicians, among his Tory friends, five or six men of good will, who will go through the province of Ontario and say, "Stop this abuse. We do not ask you to shed your blood, we do not ask you to fight, but we ask you to stop slurring and slandering, and when you get on the platform, do not deprecate your fellow citizens residing in the next province." Let me make the prediction that when peace is restored among ourselves there will be no more recrimination against Quebec. Let me tell my hon. friends on the other side of the House that the Canadian of Quebec is not afraid of the Prussian. He is more afraid of the man who lives alongside of him, from whom he receives no sympathy, but in whom he feels there is hatred in his heart against the French. We cannot hate but we can distrust. It is not in our nature to enjoy pain in others. It is not in our nature to stand suffering. We can distrust but when do we distrust? We distrust when we feel that we are hated, and we feel that we are hated when there is a systematic campaign of slander going on. When this venom filters into the United States, we feel it; when it goes across the ocean, we feel it; when it goes into the trenches at the front, we feel it; but when it comes into this House of Commons, we feel it worse.

My hon. friend from South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie), when closing his remarks the other day, made an appeal to hon. members, stating that the call for men came from the dead. If the shades of the dead were to pass over this House and to witness what is going on, they would say: Have we sacrificed our lives for naught? Have we shed our blood to make slaves of free men? Are you going to disgrace us by having flowers placed upon our tombs by slaves instead of by free men? Have you called us in the name of liberty to help enslave and shackle others? If you have called us in the name of liberty to have treaties respected, do not imitate Prussianism, send free men to plant flowers on our graves, but do not send slaves, respect treaties but do not despise them; that would be the call of the dead. What kind of an army are you going to have if you force men to serve at the front? There is an old saying that was in vogue at the time of the Civil war that it took two good soldiers to keep a recruit in line. I am not a military man, I do not know whether that is true or not.

Some hon. members have referred to a question put by the hon. member for Montcalm (Mr. Lafortune), who said: If we enlist, will you repeal the school law? This question they think is ridiculous. There are three things that are dear to the French Canadian heart—his fireside, his faith, and his language. We all know that the roots of that tree which has grown so big in 300 years cannot be pulled out. The French Canadian will die to defend his fireside; but hon. gentlemen put forward as being the next best proposition: Isolate Quebec, and in order to isolate it, create a feeling against it; try to get those French Canadian fellows so indignant over the bad treatment we are giving them that, in their indignation, they will do something that will justify us in saying: You are rebels and do not deserve the protection of the law; and treating us as so many Indians of whom the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) spoke, they will say: Go back to your reservation and stay there. As to the French Canadian's faith, what has not been said against the clergy of Quebec? What has not been written against them? Even in this House, they were called parasites by an ex-minister of the Crown, and he stated that they ought to be cast away. I read in a newspaper the other day that there were 80,000 of those parasites who ought to be put out of the country. The fact of the matter is that hon. gentleman opposite do not have anything against the clergy; they know that the clergy have been doing noble work, but hon. gentlemen opposite are trying to get at one of those things that are dear to the heart of the French Canadian. As to his language, last year, when in this House we asked for an expression of sympathy for those French Canadians who lived in Ontario, we were turned down.

Mr. LALOR: The hon. member says that upon this side of the House reflections have been cast upon the clergy of Quebec. Will he kindly explain who cast those reflections?

Mr. BUREAU: The hon. member for Victoria (Sir Sam Hughes)—I cannot speak as to the year.

Mr. MEDERIC MARTIN: In 1910.

An hon. MEMBER: We have not forgotten that.

Mr. BUREAU: We discussed in this House a motion asking for an expression of sympathy for those French Canadians who live in Ontario, asking whether in the opinion of this House it would be well not to abolish the teaching of the French language in the schools of Ontario. We remember how that motion was received, and I will abstain from going into details. The French Canadians of Ontario, when they made that request, were practically told: Those privileges ars constitutional; they do not extend beyond the limits of Quebec, and your privileges are co-extensive therewith. Therefore, the only conclusion to be drawn, although it was not put in so many words, was: If you want to enjoy those privileges, go back to the province of Quebec. I have here an expression of opinion, not by a French Canadian, not in a paper published in Quebec, not even in a paper published in Canada or in the United States, but in an English paper called the New Witness and edited by Mr. G. K. Chesterton. On page 78 of the issue of May 24, 1917, I find the following:

As we are in the act of celebrating Empire day, it may be well to consider what is the charter of the Empire, General Smuts said recently: "The British Empire, or this British Commonwealth of Nations, does not stand for unity, standardization, or assimilation, or denationalization; but it stands for a fuller, a richer, and more various life among all the nations that compose it. And even nations who have fought against you, like my own, must feel that they and their interests, their language, their religions, and all their cultural interests, are as safe and as secure under the British flag as those of the children of your household and your own blood."

This is the comment of the editor:

And at this very moment, in Canada, we are giving the lie to his words. The slander that the French Canadian has been a slacker in the war, which has been given a good deal of publicity, was bad enough. But that slander has been effectually rebutted by the Montreal paper, La Presse. What is now happening is more serious than mere vulgar abuse. The French Canadian is being robbed of his language. Despite our solemn guarantees, the use of French in the Manitoba Legislature has long ceased; but now the separate French schools have been abolished—a few months ago the final blow was struck. In Ontario it is now a crime to teach French to little French Canadian boys and girls in French Canadian schools. The penalty is a fine of $500 or six months' imprisonment. In the event of the French-speaking people of Ontario refusing to submit meekly to this iniquitous rule, they are threatened with the fate of Manitoba; their schools will be suppressed. What does General Smuts say? "Even nations that have fought against you feel that their interests, their language, their religions, and all their cultured interests are as safe under the British flag as those of the children of your own household and your own blood." But in the war of American Independence the French Canadians stood by the British flag—and this is their reward! Redress has already been refused by the Privy Council. But we cannot be content to know on Empire day that in this "free" Empire of ours we are imitating so slavishly the methods of Prussia in Poland and Alsace-Lorraine.

That is not from the pen of a Frenchman or from a newspaper in Quebec, but from an English paper published in London. How does this compare with the Toronto News of 2nd June, 1914, shortly before the war? It boldly repudiates the pledge and says, "One-hundred-year-old treaties must be interpreted in the light of new circumstances." Just exactly two months and three days later the Prussian Chancellor was using the same language in the German Reichstag. Now they are telling us: You of the province of Quebec have no enthusiasm, or inspiration. How can we have it, Sir, when we have to fight at home. We are being attacked as if we were to be isolated. We are being slandered and slurred. Is that an encouragement or an inspiration to us? In the hour when we close our eyes to the sun where will we find the friend, where could the word of consolation so sadly needed in that hour come from? When we see around us nothing but hatred and slander, when we hear no word of sympathy, I for one can feel no enthusiasm.

But that is not all. Why does the Government refuse a referendum? The Minister of Trade and Commerce said this was a dilatory motion moved for the purpose of gaining time. The Prime Minister has offered an election but has refused a referendum, and is has been stated in this House on both sides that the referendum was refused because it was feared it would be defeated. Even those on this side of the House who do not share our views have expressed the same opinion. My hon. friend from South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) urged that we have an open vote, because there were men who were opposed to conscription, he said, who dare not express their views.

Mr. Speaker, a man who dare not speak his mind has no right to call his neighbour a slacker. A man who has not the courage to stand up in a free parliament and say what he thinks, or stand up in a free country and express his opinion, has no right to call his neighbour a coward. The coward is he who is afraid to speak his mind when he thinks he is in the right. Kaiser-like, this Government, knowing the people do not want conscription, say: We will put our heel on their necks; we will be the masters. Is that democracy? Is it in the name of a democracy such as that, that we are going to compel our race, who have ideals, to enlist? Sir, that is no inspiration to us. We do not want to fight for liberty in Europe and create a condition of slavery in Canada. We do not want to fight for democracy in Europe and establish autocracy in Canada. The time has passed when we can be called to slavery in the name of liberty, and to love in the name of hatred. Let us get together. I have spoken my mind without any reservation and without any malice. I have stated the facts as they are, and put the case as I conceive it to be. That being done I repeat my appeal to my hon. friend from North Grey. I appeal to him and to all the ministers of the Cabinet to find half a dozen men of good will who will stop this campaign of slander and calumny in Ontario and other English-speaking provinces against French-Canadians. Not till then shall we have peace and unity. Do not think because we are in a minority that we are heartless; we feel all the more on that account. We can only appeal to sympathy, and how can conditions be bettered when that sympathy is lacking, and distrust and worse is in the hearts of those to whom we appeal. If this campaign of slander were stopped and good-will were established between the two races it would not be necessary to put a Conscription Bill on the statute book to get French Canadians from the province of Quebec to enlist. When you show some sympathy to the French Canadian of the province of Quebec he will reciprocate and show how he is loyal and true. The things that are so dear to him, his fireside, his language, and his faith, are the only things that have kept him patient under circumstances where any other man would have lost his patience. It is his love for the land that he has discovered and conquered that has kept him silent. If I were a young man eligible to enlist I would consider that the condition I have exposed would justify me in not enlisting. If the people of Quebec have not responded the fault is not with the right hon. leader of the Opposition or members on this side of the House from the province of Quebec, but it is for the reasons I have stated.

Mr. FERDINAND JOSEPH ROBIDOUX (Kent, N.B.): Mr. Speaker, I would take no part in this debate did I not feel bound to raise my voice in support of the measure introduced by the Prime Minister, and I take this position believing it to be in the best interests of the race to which I belong, as well as of the country generally. I have followed with close attention the debate which has taken place in this House during the last few days, and it seems to me that there are a few things which have been pretty conclusively established, the first of which is the fact that the principle of compulsory military service has been embodied in our statute law ever since Confederation. It is therefore quite clear that the proposed Military Service Act does not introduce into the legislation of this country any new principle as far as compulsion for the defence of Canada is concerned, except in so far as it provides that troops shall be raised by selective drafts and not by the methods laid down in the Militia Act, which require that the men be selected by ballot. The new Act does not trust to luck for the selection of the men; it provides that the selection shall be made in an intelligent manner, having regard to the requirements of the great industries of the country, chief among which must necessarily rank agriculture and the fisheries, which are the most important agencies of food production.

In the second place, it has been shown beyond question that the Governor in Council already has the power, under the terms of the Militia Act of 1904, to send Canadian troops beyond the limits of Canada for the defence of Canada in a case of emergency. The hon. member for Kamouraska has cited old statutes in force before Confederation, in which it was specially stipulated that the militia could be called out and marched to any place without the province, but conterminous therewith for the purpose of repelling or meeting an attack. My hon. friend cited those old statutes in an endeavour to prove that under the present Militia Act the same limitations applied. But in my judgment he has only succeeded in proving exactly the contrary proposition to that which he sought to establish. In the Militia Act of 1868, drafted by Sir George Etienne Cartier, as well as in the Act of 1904, the word "conterminous" has been eliminated, showing conclusively that the framers of the new law had in contemplation certain circumstances which might arise and might compel Canada to send her troops even beyond the seas to fight for the defence of Canada. Otherwise the word "conterminous" would have been left in the statute. Moreover the words uttered by the then Minister of Justice, Sir Charles Fitzpatrick, at the time the clause dealing with this matter was adopted, words which have already been quoted in this House, evidently show that this is the true and proper construction to put on that clause.

There is another fact which, clear and distinct, looms out of this debate and out of the events which transpired in this country at the outbreak of the war. Canada went into this war, not only because Great Britain and the Empire were threatened by a grave danger, not merely for the purpose of helping Great Britain and France in the tremendous struggle into which the unjust aggression of Germany had thrust them without cause or warning; but Canada entered this war for the stern and fixed purpose of protecting herself and her people against a grave and serious danger which would inevitably become a disaster should Germany win out. It was mainly this sentiment of self-preservation which prompted the people of this country at the outbreak of the war, and ever since, without distinction of race and creed, to unite in a common voluntary effort to resist the German menace and help crush it, and upon this sentiment chiefly rested the appeal which was made to the youth of Canada in order to urge them to enlist and fly to the defence of our country.

Finally it has been shown by the Prime Minister, and it has been generally admitted by those who have spoken in this debate, that the system of voluntary enlistment had ceased to yield the requisite number of men to maintain the Canadian troops at full strength at the front. While this state of affairs is to be regretted, at the same time I agree with those who hold that voluntary enlistment has not been a failure. My own native province, the province of New Brunswick, has done wonders under the voluntary system. It gave me a good deal of satisfaction the other day to hear the former Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes), quoting from a memorandum on recruiting which he had addressed to the Prime Minister on July 10, 1916, state that " it must be borne in mind that the Acadians have done magnificently." While I might not be justified in saying that the Acadians in proportion to numbers have enlisted as well as their English-speaking fellow citizens in my province—and there are good and valid reasons which I need not give here which can account for this—still it can indeed be stated truthfully that they have nobly answered the call to arms and that they have performed their duty as Canadians and British subjects in a splendid manner. But, Sir, the attitude taken by my compatriots in the present war is in line with the best traditions of the past. In years gone by, in the hour of their country's need, they never failed to respond to the call of duty. As far back as in the year 1812, when they had just begun to recuperate from the hardships of evil days, when hostilities broke out between Great Britain and the United States, we find them faithfully and courageously serving their king and country in the militia of their respective provinces. A few days ago I came across an old militia list containing the names of a comparatively large number of Acadians from my own county, the county of Kent, the population of which was small in those days, the names of men who, within a month after the declaration of war, had enlisted to fight for their country. I would like, with your permission, Mr. Speaker, and the consent of the House, to put these names on Hansard as a matter of record:

MILITIA LIST, KENT COUNTY, 1812-1815.

Saint Louis—Romain Voutour, Charles Henry, Oliver Bariault, Jacques Henry, Jean Baptiste Johnson, Jean Johnson, Pierre Thebaud.

Saint Charles—Raphael Richard, Jacques Daigle, Pierre Luc Robichaud, Fabien Daigle, Jean Louis Daigle.

Buctouche—Francois Cormier, Andre Jaillet, Laurent LeBlanc, Thadee Bastarache, Moise Bastarache, Denis Cormier, Benoni Girouard, Joseph Girouard, Placide DesRoches, Benoni Savoie, Placide Richard, Marin Girouard.

Cocagne—Benoni Bourque, Usebe Leger, Georges Breau, Honore Desprez, Hubert Lirette, Cyrille Gueguen, Placide Gueguen

Grand Digue—Thomas Poirier, Maurice Hache, Isaac Hache, Louis Arseneau, Joachim Gallant, Placide Poirier, Fleurant Caissie.

Baie des Winds—Louis Guimond, Benoni Meunier, Dominique Martin, Louis Mazerolle.

Our young men have enlisted to bear their share in the present great struggle, because they had a proper appreciation of the free institutions under which we have lived and prospered; because they prized highly the rights and privileges of British citizenship, and because they did not want German rule and Prussian militarism to prevail. They enlisted also because of the appeals which were made to them by the highest authorities in their church and by the public men to whom they looked for leadership. Let me quote in this connection the eloquent and earnest words uttered by His Lordship Bishop Edward LeBlanc, the Acadian bishop of the diocese of Saint John, in my province, at a mass meeting held in the city of St. John a short time after the outbreak of war. I wish to put on record the eloquent words of that distinguished prelate as they are a true and faithful expression of the sentiments which have animated and guided the Acadians in the present crisis. Having stated that it was a happy coincidence that his first utterance on a public platform in the loyal city of St. John should be for the noble purpose of encouraging our young men to enlist for the defence of the Motherland and that he was heartily in accord with the object of the meeting, and that he should consider he was lacking in patriotism and in his duty to the Empire were he, the leader of the Catholic people of St. John, to remain absent or silent on that occasion, he proceeded to say:

We are living in perilous times; war is being brought home to us in a way we never experienced before. England, our Motherland, and France, the land of our ancestors, the two nations that are in the forefront of civilization and human liberties, are to-day fighting desperately against a powerful foe; they are engaged in a struggle the issue of which is still uncertain. "The British Empire is now fighting for its existence. I want every citizen to understand this cardinal fact," said Lord Kitchener the other day.

As Canadians our cause is bound up with the cause of Great Britain; her interests are ours. If England falls, we are going to fall with her, and we are going to lose all the glorious privileges we enjoy as citizens of the British Empire. Canada, now so free and so happy, so blessed by God with such great resources, Canada that has such a brilliant future before her, will be reduced to a condition of vassalage and crushed under the iron heel of a foreign and unsympathetic ruler.

Failure for England in this war will mean England's destruction and even success will have to be dearly paid for; but, let us thank God, the age of chivalry is not passed; there is still enough patriotism and heroism in the young men of this province to make a supreme effort now for England's cause. Our hope is in our young men; to them we look to uphold the honour and the glory of the British Empire, of that Empire which, rather than to break its plighted word to little Belgium has been willing to sacrifice the best and noblest of her sons.

I need not enter here at length into the causes that led to this terrible war; I need not dwell on the violation of the neutrality of Belgium, that wonderful little kingdom which the Bishop of Salford called "the victim and the saviour of Europe." I need not recall the breaking of a treaty which the powers had solemnly promised to keep intact, or England's entente with France for the protection of the channel ports. Above all this stands the one great fact that England did not want this war, but now that she has been forced into it, it is our duty as loyal subjects of His Majesty the King to uphold her cause and to rally to her defence.

Young men of New Brunswick, we appeal to you not to allow Britain, to whom we are indebted for our civil and religious beliefs, for our just laws, and for the protection and prosperity that we enjoy, to have her very existence imperilled without striking a blow in her defence. To-night from over the seas is wafted to us the cry of the Motherland: More men, more men! It is England's call to arms. Let every man who is willing to heed that cry enlist.

It will not do for Canadians to be behind; better things are expected of us; we want our best and bravest sons from this province and from the different parts of Canada to go forth to stem the tide of hostile aggression, to say to the enemies of the Empire, this far shall you come but no farther.

Remember, young men, it is just possible that unless you strike a blow now in defence of the Mother Country, our days of prosperity may soon be ended. The enemy is dangerously near our doors. The fall of Antwerp, the occupation of Ostend and the disastrous battle off the Chilean coast a few days ago threatens them. Would it not be possible to have enacted here and in our quiet country homes tragic scenes similar to those which have taken place in Belgium,—and in northern France,—prosperous villages where once reigned peace and contentment now burnt, or destroyed, magnificent cathedrals and public buildings laid in ruins, millions of innocent and suffering people seeking refuge in other lands.

Go forth to battle now, while the future of Canada is being fought for on the plains and river banks of France. Let the spirit of patriotism prompt you to-night to say "England never did, nor ever shall be at the proud foot of a conqueror."

At a late date in January 1917, Bishop LeBlanc in a pastoral letter again urged the young men to enlist and he wrote:

As long as the world will last, nations will have recourse to arms whenever principles are to be defended on pain of dishonour. At present, it is British freedom against Prussian tyranny; it is a struggle for right and civilization against brutal force and despotism. Realizing the justice of our cause, it is our duty to assist the Empire by every means in our power. There is no use minimizing the danger to which we are exposed. The outlook is very serious. It is to be regretted that people do not take the matter more seriously to heart. Men who are physically fit are still wanted in the army; in the matter of enlisting there should be no delay.

Chief Justice Landry, another eminent Acadian and also a recognized leader of public opinion in New Brunswick, spoke in the same strain on many occasions; so did Senator Poirier; so did my good friend the member for Gloucester (Mr. Turgeon) and other men occupying leading positions in public life as well as in the church. No man in the public life of the province of New Brunswick ever had a better and a truer conception of the many and precious advantages derived from British rule and British institutions and of the corresponding responsibilities which these advantages involve than had Mr. Justice Landry, and he did not hesitate to advise his fellow-countrymen to join the colours in this war. I shall not quote from the many speeches which he delivered on recruiting and which were published in the papers, but I shall read a letter which he wrote to Mr. Raymond Leger, the Mayor of Shediac, on November 25, 1914; I quote the letter because it contains in writing, over his own signature, the views of a man who devoted his whole life to the advancement of his own people and whose greatest ambition was to secure for them that position which they have attained in the Government of the country. I translate the letter which was written in French:

Saint John, N.B.,
November 25, 1914.

Mr. Leger, Mayor, Shediac, N.B.
Dear Sir:

I regret to be unable to be present at the patriotic meeting to be held in Shediac. If my presence or my voice can stimulate the worthy and necessary work of recruiting, they both are with you to-night, although much to my regret I personally cannot be present.

Two of my sons have taken the steps to reach the firing line and I would view with satisfaction, however dire is the necessity thereof, the voluntary enlistment of one member of each Acadian family in New Brunswick. Our ancestors were heroes in the days of adversity; may their descendants display as much patriotism and heroism in the crisis which is now threatening the very foundation of Christian civilization.

May they play an honourable part in that gigantic struggle the issue of which may imperil the British Empire and carry with it the triumph of an aggressive militarism, unless the full resources of the nation are available.

(Sgd) P. A Landry.

Let me say here that later on Chief Justice Landry became so imbued with the importance of the war, in so far as it affected Canada, and so impressed with the necessity to mobilize the forces of the nation that he did not hesitate publicly to advocate conscription, and he did so at a meeting of the Supreme Court in the city of St. John, observing at the same time that it was the fairest and most equitable system of raising an army.

Now, Sir, I am only repeating what has already been stated over and over again in the debate when I say that, to-day, Canada is face to face with a situation the extreme gravity of which cannot be overestimated. It is evident that we have reached the point where we must either adopt new methods to do that which voluntary recruiting is not doing and maintain our forces at the front, or we must gradually drop out of the war. In other words, the time has come when we must make up our minds either to remain in the war to a finish or practically get out of it.

Mr. Speaker, I think I voice the sentiment of this country when I say that the Canadian people, English and French speaking, are determined to stand by Great Britain and her Allies until this war has been carried to a victorious conclusion. They are so determined because they know that so long as Great Britain shall be in danger, Canada will equally be in danger and that, in the words used by Bishop LeBlanc, "If England falls, we are going to fall with her."

Speaking for the people I have the honour to represent, I think I can say that they are in accord with the great majority of the people of Canada on this question; that while the idea of compulsion is repugnant to them, they will not hesitate, when they realize the seriousness of the situation, to assume cheerfully and bravely their full share of responsibility in the prosecution of the war. They have behaved magnificently in the past and they will so conduct themselves in the future however difficult may be the task before them.

I must register my protest against the unfortunate remarks which were made in this House by the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. L. J. Gauthier) at the close of his speech. The words which he uttered were not worthy of himself and of this Canadian parliament; they were certainly not worthy of the great race to which we both belong, and I will venture to say that they do not voice the sober sense of the people of the province of Quebec.

I see no reason why there should be a distinct line of cleavage over this question between the two great races which have inhabited Canada for a century and more and have made it what it is to-day. Their interests are identical; they have the same love for freedom and liberty and for those British institutions which are the best guaranty of liberty and freedom; they are facing a common foe in the trenches of Flanders and of France, and French and English lads are fighting side by side, making the supreme sacrifice and laying down their lives for the common cause.

Sir, I believe that, fortunately for Canada, the deeds of bravery and of heroism which have been performed by the sons of French Canadians at Courcelette, at Vimy Ridge and elsewhere on the bloody battlefields of France, will play a far greater part and will wield a much broader influence in shaping the future destinies of this country than will the irresponsible speeches of demagogues and political agitators.

Under no other flag and under no other possible form of Government would we enjoy as large a measure of freedom and of protection as we now have under the British flag. For this reason, and for other reasons which I have given, convinced as

I am that the destinies of Canada are closely linked with those of the Empire; feeling as I do that the French Canadian race has more at stake in the present conflict than any other element of the population of Canada, for, should Germany win this war we would lose many of the precious rights and privileges we now have; believing as I do that, not only is it necessary, but that it is fair as well to the men who have already gone into the trenches, that sufficient reinforcements be provided for our troops in France, I will support the Bill.

On motion of Mr. Carvell the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Burrell the House adjourned at 12.15 a.m. Wednesday.

Wednesday, June 27, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

QUESTIONS.

DR. NEILLY OF NEW GLASGOW.

Mr. KYTE:

1. Has Dr. Neilly, of New Glasgow, N.S., been connected with the Overseas Dental Corps?
2. If so, is he still so connected?
3. Is he on leave?
4. If so, when does such leave expire?

Sir EDWARD KEMP:

1. Yes.
2 and 3 answered by No. 1.
4. On July 23rd, 1917.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY—CLAIM FOR DAMAGES.

Mr. LANCTOT:

1. Have Ludovic Poitras and Zephirin Gagnon, who claim to have suffered injury in an accident at Chaudière, on the Intercolonial Railway, made a claim from the Department of Justice for a Petition of Right?
2. If so, at what date?
3. Has such request been acceded to? If not, why not?

Mr. DOHERTY:

1. Yes.
2. May 7, 1917.
3. No. The Minister of Justice has not yet received the necessary information and papers relating to the claims set forth in the said petitions of right to enable him to decide whether or not he should recommend the granting of fiats upon the petitions.

PRIVILEGE.

CORRECTION BY SIR THOMAS WHITE OF EDITORIAL IN TORONTO GLOBE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I rise to a question of privilege. My attention has been drawn to an editorial in the Toronto Globe which is founded upon wholly erroneous information and which reflects somewhat on me as Minister of Finance. It is headed "Where the Money Goes." I quote:

> Within twelve months the Dominion Government has paid to a few favoured industries, chiefly for the production of iron and steel, the sum of $21,669,965.
>
> In his Budget statement on April 24 the Finance Minister reported that the entire yield of the business profits tax in twelve months had been $15,000,000. The revenue from the same source in the current accounting period of twelve months is estimated at $20,000,000.

After dealing with the bounty system, the editorial goes on:

> On the eve of a measure to conscript the manhood of the country the case for a more courageous and progressive financial policy at Ottawa is unanswerable.

Similar statements as to the payment out of $20,000,000 in bounties during the past year have been made in the Montreal Journal of Commerce, and in many other papers throughout Canada. With reference to this Globe editorial and the other editorials to which I have referred, I desire to say that the bounties upon iron and steel expired five years ago, in 1911, and have not been renewed. The result is that no money has been paid out by way of bounty upon iron and steel production in Canada for the past five years. The Montreal Journal of Commerce, in its issue of June 26, made a complete withdrawal of the statement which it had published in an earlier issue respecting the matter. I draw this matter to the attention of the House because the sum is so large and because, as I have stated, it seems to reflect on the administration of the Finance Department.

PRIVILEGE—SIR SAM HUGHES.

CORRESPONDENCE WITH MR. MARK IRISH RESPECTING RECRUITING.

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir SAM HUGHES: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. On June 20, I received the following telegram from Mr. Mark H. Irish:

> Toronto, Ont., June 20, 1917
> Lieut.-General Hon. Sir Sam Hughes, K.C.B.,
> House of Commons,
> Ottawa, Ont.
>
> Press reports of your speech in the House yesterday credit you with saying that I urged the Prime Minister some months back to let up on recruiting. I have never spoken to Sir Robert nor any other Minister of the Crown either Federal or Provincial on the subject of recruiting. I do not and never have held the views you attribute to me. In my opinion recruiting properly done is a stimulus not a retardant to the production of munitions. You should not have made the statement you did regarding me because such statement is not founded on facts.

Mark H. Irish.

Passing over the paternalism and general tone assumed by the outfit to which that gentleman belongs, I shall read my reply, which I sent immediately, without looking up Hansard.

Ottawa, June 20, 1917.

Mark H Irish, M.P.P., Toronto.

Replying to yours. You spoke to me many times on the question of scarcity of labour for munitions and advocated some plan of control. The assertions made by you then all pointed to a limitation within definite lines of service, something bordering on controlling employment of men thus interfering with the will of men in recruiting. I did not intend to say you spoke to Sir Robert. You spoke with me repeatedly on the subject.

Sam Hughes.

I have looked up Hansard and I find, on page 2546, that I said:

Mark Irish of the Imperial Munitions Board, Mr. Flavelle of the Imperial Munitions Board and others have been insistent in their demands that these men would not be taken.

This statement follows a sentence to the effect that the Finance Minister had told the Prime Minister that there was a perfect storm brewing in Toronto:

And that agitation was due to the fact that men could not be obtained as workers.

The two sentences are entirely distinct, and every statement I made is absolutely true. Not only did Mr. Irish speak to me once, but twenty times, till I told him he was becoming a perfect nuisance in his agitation, which was not to stop recruiting, but to prevent men who were wanted on the Munitions Board recruiting. I assured him then, as I assure the country to-day, that there were tens of thousands of men not working, who were anxious to work, but could not get work.

An hon. MEMBER: Who sent that telegram?

Sir SAM HUGHES: The telegram I have read was from Mark H. Irish who is connected with the Munitions Board.

MOOSEJAW NEWS—PATRONAGE.

Mr. W. E. KNOWLES (Moosejaw): On the 20th of April, 1917, I asked a question of the Secretary of State (Mr. Patenaude) and received a promise from the minister. The discussion in Hansard is as follows:

Mr. Knowles: To what extent does the Moosejaw News obtain patronage as a result of the minister's discretion?

[Sir Sam Hughes.]

Mr. Patenaude: I can bring down the information.

Mr. Knowles: Will the minister let me know early next week how much the Moosejaw News has received lately?

Mr. Patenaude: Yes.

That is over a month ago and I have recently written asking for the information, and have not even had an acknowledgment. I draw the matter to the attention of the Government, and desire to have the information placed in Hansard.

SALARY OF POSTAL CLERKS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. W. E. KNOWLES (Moosejaw): On May 31, 1917, I asked the following question:

Mr. W. E. Knowles: Will the Acting Postmaster General tell us what is to be done with regard to the prospective salary increases for the postal clerks, including carriers? The hon. gentleman is no doubt aware that the different associations have been asking for increases.

The answer given me at that time appears in Hansard as follows:

Hon. Mr. Patenaude: I shall probably be able to answer my hon. friend in two or three days.

That occurred in May, and I would ask if some information could not be furnished at the present time. The answer to the former question will require some consideration, perhaps, but the latter question might be answered now.

Hon. Mr. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice): With regard to the last mentioned question, since it has fallen upon my shoulders to bear the burden of the Postmaster General's Department, I have taken up the matter, and I will have, presently, ready for submission to council, a suggestion looking to an improvement in the smaller salaries of the employees of the post office, which I hope will be dealt with very promptly.

INTERIOR AND INDIAN DEPARTMENTS —ENLISTMENTS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. FRANK OLIVER (Edmonton): Some weeks ago I asked the question, which was passed as an order for return. The return asked for was in regard to the employees of the Interior and Indian Departments who had enlisted for overseas service, and the arrangements made with them by the department. So far as I am aware, that return has not yet been produced. It is important that it should be forthcoming during the course of the present discussion on the Military Service Bill. I ask the minister to have it brought down without delay.

PRIVILEGE.

STATEMENT BY MR. BUREAU.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. JACQUES BUREAU: I rise to a question of privilege. In the Montreal Gazette of to-day I observe a headline which reads:

> Mr. Bureau wants Laurier and Gouin to tour the province.

I never expressed any such desire. On the contrary I appealed to the member for North Grey (Mr. Middlebro) and the Prime Minister to tour the province of Ontario and try to stop the campaign that was waged against Quebec. I make this declaration, so that I will not be told that I never denied it.

MILITARY SERVICE ACT, 1917.

DEBATE CONTINUED ON MOTION FOR SECOND READING AND ON THE AMENDMENTS.

Consideration of the motion of the right hon. Sir Robert Borden (Prime Minister) for the second reading of Bill 75, Military Service Act, 1917, and the amendment thereto, and the amendment to the amendment by Mr. Barette, resumed from Tuesday, June 26th.

Mr. F. B. CARVELL (Carleton, N.B.): Mr. Speaker, As my position on this very important matter is perhaps not as well known as that of my hon. colleague from Red Deer (Mr. Clark), I feel it is incumbent upon me, in view of the position I intend to take, to state in the simplest and shortest language possible, the views which I entertain, and the vote which I intend to give, on this very important measure which is now before the House of Commons. I find myself, perhaps, in the most peculiar position of any member in this House, from the fact that for the past two years and a half no man has criticised the conduct of the Government, in the management of the war, to the extent that I have. I honestly believed in my criticism, and I am convinced that I had good ground for making every statement which I made. I believed that partisanship was running rampant all over the Dominion of Canada in the conduct of this war, and, as a member of Parliament, to whose knowledge these matters had come, I felt it my duty to make them public, and I made them public in as forcible a manner as I knew how. I have no apology to make, and take back nothing which I have said. I only wish to say that in the future, notwithstanding the attitude I may take to-day, if in my judgment, the conduct of this war by the Government is such as to require criticism, I hope I shall have the courage to perform the duties for which I was sent to this Parliament. I have nothing further to say regarding what has taken place in the past.

I look upon the condition of affairs at present, and on what may take place in the future, as of very much more importance than what has taken place during the past two or three years of war. I have taken a very serious view of this war from the beginning—perhaps too serious—but, Sir, it has been in my thoughts constantly, as I think it will be, until the closing scenes of this great drama. I was attending court in St. John on the 4th August, 1914, and on the morning of that day I read in the newspapers that war had been declared, and I immediately sent a telegram to my chief (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) telling him that in my judgment he should offer the Government his full support in anything that was necessary, in order that Canada should do her duty in the conduct of the war. I have taken that attitude, both privately and publicly, ever since that time, and I still take that attitude. I think there is nothing which Canada is so much interested in at the present time as that we should do our full duty to bring the war to a successful conclusion, in order that liberty, justice and righteousness may have a chance upon the earth in the future.

The Prime Minister, who is charged with the responsibility of conducting the affairs of this country in this crisis, came back from the seat of the Empire a month or six weeks ago, and he made the statement that they needed more men at the front, and he also stated, it is said without consultation with his political friends—and I know without consultation with my political friends—that the only way to get those men was to introduce a Bill for compulsory military service. It has been said by many of my friends that in doing so he was actuated by political motives. I know nothing about that, Sir, and for the purposes of my argument I care very little. The Prime Minister of this country declares we need more men. Every responsible official, both civil and military, of the two great nations, France and England, who are really waging this war, from the 4th day of August down to the present time, have sent out the cry, "We need men and more men, and still more men." That cry has gone forth the world over. It is going forth to-day in the United States, and all over the civilized world. From every country which is fighting against the Hun to-day comes the cry: "We need more men." The Prime Minister says that on the 1st day of January 1916, he promised the Allied Governments that Canada would send half a million men. He regards that as a pledge. I do not so regard it, but I really believe that Canada stands pledged, from the day this war began to the present time, and will stand pledged until the final conclusion of this great conflict, to send every man who can be possibly spared from the ordinary vocations of life. I do not care whether the number be 50,000, 75,000, 100,000 or more; I look upon it as our duty to send all the men we possibly can, in order to make this war the success that the whole civilized world is praying that it will be.

The Prime Minister says that we cannot secure a sufficient number of men by voluntary enlistment; therefore it is necessary to introduce a measure of compulsory military service. I do not know whether or not he is right in that statement. I do believe that recruiting in Canada has not had a fair show; I do believe that party patronage has been exercised in the matter of recruiting to an extent which even members of the Government must be heartily sorry for. Not only do I believe this; I know it. I am speaking about my own section of the country; gentlemen sitting around me in this Chamber who represent different parts of Canada know that what I am saying is true. Whether a sufficient number of men can be obtained by voluntary recruiting, I do not know; but I do know that the Prime Minister says that we must adopt more forcible measures for obtaining men than we have adopted in the past. When a man in his position takes that view, I have not the nerve to say that he is wrong and that I am right. I put the burden on him, and I am willing to stand by him as far as it is possible for me to do so in order that he may get all the men that he wants.

I do not intend to discuss the terms of the Bill. With some of its details I am not entirely pleased, but if it passes the second reading and reaches the committee stage, every member will have the right to discuss these matters, propose amendments, if necessary, and endeavour to make the Bill as workable as possible.

I sometimes wonder whether I approach from a proper standpoint a consideration of the position which we occupy in this great world-struggle, or whether I stand alone in my views. But if every man could view this matter as I do, I do not think there would be much question as to what Canada should do. I do not know whether I have been possessed of the same kind of loyalty and patriotism as that which some of my friends from Ontario seem to possess. I am not always willing to take my hat off and bow down to every Englishman that I happen to meet on the street, but I do take my hat off to the 150,000 Canadians British-born who gave up their jobs, threw down their tools, and joined the colours the moment war was declared. Whatever opinions we may have as to the past and future of our Empire, we must recognize the splendid manner in which our British-born have rallied to the flag, from the Arctic ocean to the 49th parallel of latitude, and from the Atlantic to the Pacific. They have gone not by thousands, but by tens of thousands. Thousands have made the supreme sacrifice; tens of thousands will come back to Canada, if they ever do come back, maimed, disfigured, probably as wards of the people. I hope that the people will not be remiss in the duty which they owe to these brave men as well as to the rest of the Canadians who are taking part in this great fight. I do admire British institutions; I believe I am as loyal a British subject as any man in Canada. I do admire British laws, British sense of justice, British literature. I admire the way the British people do things in the world. I feel that I am in the judgment of every member of this House when I say that the ideals that have gone forth from the British Islands have been the foundation of the liberty of the world. But I do not concur in the view that Canada is fighting for England or because England wants her to fight; I do not support any other view than that we are simply doing our duty as Canadians. After the eloquent exposition of this aspect of the matter presented by the Minister of Inland Revenue (Hon. Albert Sévigny) two nights ago, and after the very logical presentation of it made by my colleague from Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) only last evening, it would be a waste of time for me to state the position which Canada really occupies in this war. I am not very much concerned whether under the Militia Act as it now stands the Prime Minister has the right to call up the men of Canada and send them beyond the confines of our country for military service. Personally, I think that a strict interpretation of that Act might be against the contention of the Prime Minister; yet, under present conditions, I would not hesitate to give the Act a broader meaning and say that under it the Government have the right to send the militia of Canada out of Canada for the defence of the Empire. It matters very little to me, therefore, whether the Prime Minister is right in his contention. If he is not right, yet says that he wants more power; that he wants Canada put in a position to do her duty better than she has been doing it, I consider it the duty of every member of the House and of every voter in Canada to give the matter his most earnest and careful consideration in the light of present conditions.

Perhaps few people appreciate the position in which some members on this side of the House found themselves in the consideration of this very important matter. But I think we all agree that we must have more men in order to win the war. We agree that the war must be won; the only difference of opinion seems to be as to the manner in which the men should be obtained. To the man who says: you are fighting for England in this war, I say: we are fighting for ourselves in this war. No man reveres the autonomy of Canada more than I do; no man believes more strongly than I do that Canada should manage her own affairs. Because I believe that I am convinced that it is our duty to do everything we possibly can to assist the rest of the civilized world in bringing order out of the present chaos.

Is this England's war? Did England start this war? Has England any more to do with it than the eight or ten other allied nations have? The history of the war from its commencement covers a period of only three years; every man here is familiar with it. Every one knows that Germany started the war by declaring war upon France and Russia and by ruthlessly trampling upon Belgium, whose integrity she had guaranteed some years before to maintain. The question which Britain had to face was whether she should stand by her pledged word to little Belgium, or allow the Hun to trample that country under foot. Perhaps no more momentous question was ever considered by a civilized country than that which the British statesmen had to consider within forty-eight hours of the declaration of war and the invasion of Belgium by Germany.

I do not often read quotations in this House, but in going over the debates of the first session of Parliament after the beginning of the war I was so struck with the wonderful presentation of this aspect of the case made by my honoured leader (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) that I wish to ask the House to listen while I read one paragraph from the memorable speech made by the right hon. gentleman on the 19th day of August, 1914. It puts the case of the British Empire in language so much more noble than I could use, that I can do no better service than to reproduce the words in the light of present circumstances:—

> Sir, it will go down on a still nobler page of history that England could have averted this war if she had been willing to forego the position which she has maintained for many centuries at the head of European civilization, if she had been willing to desert her allies, to sacrifice her obligations; to allow the German Emperor to bully heroic Belgium, to trample upon defenceless Luxemburg, to rush upon isolated France, and to put down his booted heel upon continental Europe. At that price England would have secured peace; but her answer to the German Emperor was: "Your proposals are infamous." And, rather than accept them, England has entered this war; and there is not to-day in the universe a British subject, there is not outside the British Empire a single man, whose admiration for England is not greater by reason of this firm and noble attitude.

I might ask any man who says we owe nothing to England and have no right to fight for the Empire in this war, what has brought the United States into this great conflict? The United States did not enter the war to fight for England or France or Russia or Italy or Canada; not by any means. She remained out of this war just as long as her decency and public spirit would allow her to do so, but when the time came that the Germans were continually throwing insults in her face, sinking her ships upon the high seas, and breaking the treaties which she had made, that great Anglo-Saxon country rose up in her might and said: "We are not going to fight for England, but we are going to fight for ourselves. We are going to see this thing through and put the German Empire where it belongs." The United States are going ahead in a way to command the admiration of the world, and in a way which I have no doubt will produce results; it is quite possible that she will be the deciding factor in this great struggle, which we all earnestly hope may come to a successful end in the not far distant future.

I was in the United States a few days ago, and it was one of the most inspiring sights of my life. I spent a day in Boston, a day in Portland, Maine, and two days in Bangor, Maine. I met bankers, professional men, lawyers, business men and labouring men, and I never heard a man talk about the war who did not stand up and say: "We are in this thing and are going to see it through." I was over there on the last day of their wonderful Liberty Loan, when between two and three billion dollars were raised, and every man who had been able to contribute seemed to be proud that he had done something to put his nation and the Allies in a position to win this great war. Perhaps I would not be considered out of order if I related one little incident in connection with some labouring men. I was in a garage, where a man besmeared with grease was on the floor under my car. A fellow workman came along and said: "Did you get your notice last night from the Government?" "Yes," was the reply. "What are you going to do about it?" "I am going to do just what they tell me to do." That was the spirit I found in every part of the United States that I visited. I only wish I could find the same spirit all over Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. CARVELL: I hope that some of my hon. friends who cheer that remark and are so much affected with Quebec-phobia will not think I am referring altogether to Quebec, for there are slackers all over Canada, and it is because of the condition of affairs not only in the province of Quebec but in Canada as a whole that I am constrained to stand behind the Government on this momentous question.

I sympathize and sympathize heartily, perhaps to a greater extent than any other man in this House, with the right hon. gentleman who has been my esteemed leader ever since I have known anything about politics in Canada—a man in whose judgment and integrity I have absolute and supreme confidence, a man whose one aim in life has been to weld into one great whole the two great races in this country. I realize to as great an extent at least as any other man in this House the position which he occupies to-day and has occupied ever since this measure was introduced. Knowing the position which he occupies, and the position which his friends and my friends occupy, I am better able to sympathize with him than are gentlemen who are not so intimately acquainted with the real condition of affairs. My right hon. leader realizes, as I think every person in Canada must realize, that this Bill is extremely unpopular in his native province of Quebec. I do not think there is any use in dissembling that; there is no question whatever about its being true. I am not going to hark back and say who is responsible for the condition of affairs which unhappily exists at the present time. But we do know that certain English-speaking Canadians in 1910 and 1911 spent their money, not by tens of thousands, but by hundreds of thousands of dollars, to sow broadcast throughout Quebec and amongst the French-speaking people of Canada, the doctrine that they owed nothing to England and that the whole policy of Laurier and his party was to introduce conscription in the province of Quebec. For seven long years they have spent their money and assiduously preached that seditious doctrine in that part of the country; and to-day they are reaping the whirlwind. Canada is also reaping the whirlwind, and my right hon. leader finds himself in the position he is in to-day very largely because of the attitude of the gentlemen whose names have heretofore been mentioned in this House, and who are pretty well known in Canada as the men who have been guilty of the conduct to which I have alluded.

But, Sir, that does not change the fact that we are up against a really serious problem; it does not change the fact that Canada must raise more men, and, as I said before, the whole question is, how shall Canada get the men? Shall she go on with the voluntary system, or introduce compulsory service?

My right hon. leader proposes a referendum, and pledges that if a referendum is held and the vote is in favour of conscription, he will ask his people to support it and to recognize it as the law of the land. I think the most depressing day of my life was yesterday when I sat here and listened to three speeches in particular, which in my judgment revealed a condition of affairs in Canada for which every true Canadian should be sorry, and for which he should try to seek a remedy. I have listened to one hon. gentleman who has been a soldier and has returned from the front, practically branding every French Canadian who enlisted in his regiment as a renegade and a deserter.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Shame on him.

Mr. CARVELL: I listened to another hon. gentleman who I believe hopes to be Minister of Agriculture in the near future comparing the French race in Canada with the red man. and the comparison he made was very much in favour of the red man. Then I heard another hon. gentleman, my good friend from Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau), practically say to the people of Canada that because the people of Ontario were insulting the French Canadians, the French Canadians were not going to enlist and do their duty in this war.

An hon. MEMBER: Shame again.

Mr. CARVELL: You may say "shame again" if you want to, but I tell you this kind of thing has brought to my mind thoughts which had never been there before. The thought comes to me: Is this the net result of three years of war? Is it for this that we have gone through all the troubles and trials, all the agonies of this terrible time?—is it for this that the men of Canada have shed their blood and women have given their tears for the last three years? Mr. Speaker, if ever there was a time when the wise men of Canada, wise men of all political parties, of all religious beliefs, of all nationalities, ought to get their heads together and see if there cannot be some way to get away from this terrible condition of affairs, this is the time. I know of no man, I care not whether he be French or English, who is a greater enemy of the state than the man who, at this time of national stress, deliberately charges his fellow and neighbour as being a rebel and a traitor to the country because that neighbour does not agree with him as to action to be taken. There must be some better way of getting at this thing than the way indicated in what we heard here yesterday and in what we have heard to-day. There must be some set of men in Canada who are big enough to find a way out of this condition of affairs.

One of the pleasantest things I have heard since this debate began was the statement made by the hon. member for Kent, N.B., (Mr. Robidoux) setting forth the condition of affairs that we have in our little province down by the sea. We are not saints in the province of New Brunswick—we do not profess to be. We fight our elections with as great bitterness, perhaps, as the people of any portion of the Dominion. But we have shown the people of this country that French and English, Scotch and Irish, Protestant and Catholic—all classes and all creeds—can live together in peace and harmony. We are able to show the people of Quebec and Ontario, that different nationalities can live together, respect one another, respect one another's beliefs and creeds and nationalities. I was proud and happy when I heard my hon. friend read—I was going to read it to-day, but he has made it unnecessary—the noble address of the Lord Bishop of St. John in appealing to his people in the early stages of this war to enlist. The hon. gentleman read portions of that great encylical—I wish he had read it all, for it was all published in the newspapers—issued by that prelate a few months ago, again urging his people to come forth and do their duty. And the members of that church, French and Irish, have done their duty in a manner which reflects credit upon the province and upon the whole Dominion. Let me say also, no man in Canada deserves a greater mead of praise than does my hon. friend and colleague from Gloucester (Mr. Turgeon) who spoke here yesterday. That hon. gentleman travelled all over his own county in company with his colleague in the local legislature, the present Minister of Public Works (Mr. Veniot), appealing to the people to stand up and fight for what is right and true and just in this war—not to fight for England, but to fight for Canada, for civilization. The result was that a thousand of their compatriots in one county alone volunteered. Many of them laid down their lives on the field of glory, and many more, I fear, will follow before these days of stress are over. And what is true of Gloucester is true of every other county of New Brunswick in which there are French and Irish people. And when I come from my own province, where we live in peace and harmony, and see the terrible condition of affairs that exists between Quebec and Ontario, it is enough to make any thoughtful man pause and wonder whether there is not some way by which we can bring about a better condition of affairs than we have at the present time.

Some of my hon. friends say: Let the people rule; hand this over to the people of Canada by means of a referendum and abide by their decision. I find no fault with the man who says, let the people rule. There is not a stronger democrat in Canada than I am; there is no man who, under ordinary conditions, has greater faith in the people than I have. But I am constrained to come to the conclusion that we are at war, and this is not an ordinary political matter; it is a question of life or death for civilization. The men whom we shall send from Canada from now to the end of the war may be the deciding factor between success and failure. I do not say this will be so; I say it may be so.

When Great Britain decided to go into the war in August, 1914, they did not first take the opinion of the people by means of a referendum. They hardly even called Parliament together. The heads of the nation got together and had hurried consultations. They decided that their duty was to go ahead, that Britain should stand by her treaties and protect her neighbours. And they did. The Canadian Government did not call for a referendum when the war broke out; they called for volunteers. Then Parliament was assembled, and when we came together, we voted everything that the Government wanted, we passed the War Measures Act, and in effect said to the Government: Go ahead, do your duty. The United States did not ask for a referendum when they decided to go into the war. There had been an election only a few months before. And, as well as I can judge, having been in New York and other American cities during that campaign, President Wilson ran more as a pacifist than as an advocate of war, and I believe that more men opposed to war in the United States voted for him than voted for his opponent. Yet when the time came that the United States felt that they ought to engage in the war, there was no referendum. They called together their elected representatives in Congress, and Congress said: Go ahead. And they went ahead. In what position are we in Canada different from Britain, France, Italy, or the United States? True, I admit, this is a moribund Parliament. I rather agree that we all made a mistake in voting to extend the life of Parliament a year ago. However, we did it unanimously and we believed we were working for the best. But we are, as things stand to-day, the Parliament of Canada. This country is at war, and the war is the most terrible that the world has ever known. We are called upon to act and to bear our responsibilities as long as we form the Canadian Parliament, and the man who is not ready to face his duty in this matter is not fit to be a member of this Parliament.

My logical friend from Welland (Mr. German) the other night said he was in favour of a referendum. Yet he said that we must have men, and more men, and still more men, in order to win the war. And his logical mind told him that he must believe that a referendum would result in favour of the Conscription Bill. Sir, I am not the keeper of my brother's conscience; I am the last man in the world to force any other man to vote with me who does not wish to vote with me. I hope I am big enough to give any man who differs from me the credit of being just as honest in his convictions as I am honest in mine. And I have just as much respect for the honesty of the man who declares he will vote for the referendum as I have for my own. But I cannot help asking: Should the referendum be defeated, what then? That is a question I cannot get around. I do not say it will be defeated. I do not say that Parliament ought to pass a law if it is sure that in doing so it is going against the will of the people. But again I come back to my first proposition: This country is at war and must have men; this country must go on doing its duty. Again I say: Suppose the referendum is defeated, what then? And, not being the keeper of any other man's conscience, I have no fault to find with the man who says he is willing to take this chance. But so far as I am concerned, I can only say, it is not good enough for me. Therefore, I am constrained to vote against my leader on this question of referendum, and those of us who feel that way must logically be compelled to go on and vote for the second reading of the Bill.

Perhaps the one incident in the whole history of things during the last two or three years which has created the greatest impression on my mind, and which has led me to the conclusion at which I have arrived, is what took place in this Chamber just two or three weeks ago when that great French statesman, Rene Viviani, addressed the House of Commons and Senate. Unfortunately, I was not able to understand every word that that distinguished gentleman said although I could follow him fairly well and could tell what he was talking about. But, I have read and re-read the translated report of his speech in Hansard and I must say that I felt the inspiration of his eloquence and earnestness. It seemed to me as I sat here and listened to him that he closed every period of his speech by the appeal: For God's sake come over and help us. I almost felt the desperation of the man as he seemed to say: We have stood out against this onslaught for the last three years; we cannot hold out much longer; won't you give us material support in men and money? France, the most chivalrous nation in the world has supported the burden for three years; millions of her men have faced the enemy; they have been mown down by thousands and hundreds of thousands; a large portion of the country has been made desolate and this distinguished representative of that great nation comes to us and says: Come over and help us. As far as I am concerned, I am not the man who will refuse to respond to the call to action which that man addressed to us.

But, Sir, while my intention is to vote for this Bill, I do not think there is any man in Canada to whom the word "conscription" is as repugnant as it is to me. Many hon. members have said that in their judgment conscription is the proper form of raising an army and from the purely material standpoint of getting the men who ought to go and leaving the men who ought to remain, probably that is correct. But had this Bill been proposed a year ago, I would not have voted for it. I do not believe in conscription. I believe in freedom as far as it is possible to have freedom upon the earth. I am glad that up to the present time it has not been necessary to attempt to take away from any man in Canada the freedom which is bestowed upon him by the constitution. So long as we were getting all the men we reasonably required by the voluntary system I was opposed to conscription, and if I believed to-day that we could get all the men we might require I would still be opposed to conscription. Believing that the voluntary system has not been honestly carried out, I do hope that the Government will delay the practical enforcement of this Act until voluntary enlistment has had a fair chance. I am not going to hark back to past events or to point out to the Government its sins of omission or commission, but I must say that all over the country the Government has not done its duty. The petty, party patronage system has militated against the best interests of recruiting in all parts of Canada. I do not know what the condition may be in other parts of Canada, but I know that in eastern Canada party patronage has been the greatest curse that this country has ever known.

I do not know that we have all done our duty, but I do know that by a united, concerted effort, coupled with the abolition of the party system, in the last three years, very much more could have been done throughout eastern Canada than has been done, and I believe that the same is true all over Canada. I hope the Government will give voluntary recruiting one more chance. Let the men of Canada get together. Every man who is a Canadian, every man who wants to see the country prosper, every man who wants to see the war won, every Liberal, every Conservative, every Frenchman, every Englishman, men of every nationality and of every colour and race—let people get together and make one great, mighty attempt to get the number of men required. I do ask that this legislation shall not be put into force until after that is done. But if we fail, then you have my full consent to get the men, to get them by any means possible. I do hope that before this is done an honest, united effort will be made and thus avoid the necessity of applying this Act, which most of us, I think, on both sides of the House, hate to support at the present time.

I do not know whether most of the members of this House realize what it means to me to vote against my leader. I believe very few do. I think very few men realize what it means to vote against the man whom you have followed as loyally as I have, and in whose judgment you have had such supreme confidence as I have had in that of my leader since I have been a member of this House, now some thirteen years. But, Sir, as I view the matter, and for the reasons which I have given, I feel constrained to take the course which I have indicated. At the same time I want my friends to feel, and I want my opponent to feel, that I still have faith in the honesty, integrity, loyalty and uprightness of the great man who has led the Liberal party for the last thirty years, and who I hope will lead it on to greater victories in the future than have been achieved in the past.

Mr. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I desire to preface my remarks this afternoon by again placing on Hansard the touching lines which were quoted by the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie), in his admirable address:—

In Flanders' Fields.

In Flanders' fields the poppies blow
Between the crosses, row on row,
That mark our place, and in the sky
The larks still bravely singing, fly,
Scarce heard amidst the guns below.
We are the Dead. Short days ago
We lived, felt dawn, saw sunset glow,
Loved and were loved, and now we lie
In Flanders' fields.

Take up our quarrel with the foe,
To you from falling hands we throw
The torch,—be yours to hold it high;
If ye break faith with us who die,
We shall not sleep though poppies grow
In Flanders' fields.

Beneath these crosses erected amongst the poppies of Flanders fields lie some of the men from the county of Frontenac—too many I am sorry to say—and I regard the lines of this Canadian soldier, written on the field of battle, as a direct appeal to me as the representative of the county of Frontenac, and one which I am expected to pass on to the people of my county, that we may not forget the men who have given their lives in this great cause; that we will not break faith with the men still living, but, that we will give them the reinforcements which they need in order to carry on this great struggle.

I regard it as a direct appeal to me and I have no hesitation in saying that it is my intention to give this Bill my very hearty and cordial support because I believe it is the only means whereby we can do our duty to the men who have gone to the front and who are at present fighting in this great cause. It is up to us, as the representatives of the Canadian people, to consider the position in which our country is placed and to consider the conditions at the present time. The conditions as they are to-day in Canada, have not been created in the last twenty-four hours, nor in the last two or three years. These conditions are not satisfactory to-day, and I will venture to say that in making that statement every member of this House will agree with me. Conditions, such as there are in this country, are not the result of what has transpired during the last two or three years but as the result of years and years of wrong teaching and wrong directing.

If we, as representatives of the people, are to do our full duty, we must look matters fairly and squarely in the face, state facts as we find them, and draw conclusions from those facts fairly and honestly. It will be necessary for me to place a few figures on Hansard with respect to recruiting in this country. Every preceding speaker has made reference to recruiting and enlistment and has given his opinion, adverse or otherwise, of the means and methods adopted by this Government in securing recruits by the voluntary system. I must place on Hansard some figures in order to make my future remarks intelligible. The enlistments by provinces up to May, 15th of this year, according to a return brought down in this House, were:

Province.	Enlistments.
Ontario	173,078
Quebec	45,277
Maritime Provinces	38,200
Manitoba and Saskatchewan	79,779
Alberta	35,477
British Columbia	40,264
Yukon	2,327
Total	414,402

On the 1st of January, 1916, the right hon. the Prime Minister announced the authorizing of the raising of half a million men in Canada. The legitimate or fair share of each province in that half million men asked for, according to population, would be as follows:

Province.	Proportion of Recruits.
Quebec	138,298
Maritime Provinces	65,957
Manitoba and Saskatchewan	70,213
Alberta	34,517
British Columbia	29,787

If you take those figures in conjunction with those I gave as enlistments, it will be seen that Ontario has contributed 101 per cent of the number which, according to population, that province should contribute to the half million men authorized. Quebec has contributed only 32 per cent; the Maritime Provinces 58 per cent; Manitoba and Saskatchewan 112 per cent; Alberta 102 per cent; and British Columbia 137 per cent. If Quebec had recruited as well as the Maritime Provinces, it would have meant 34,935 more men in uniform to-day, and would bring our total up to 449,367 men. If Quebec had done as well as Ontario, our total enlistment to-day would be 508,805 men.

I want to ask two questions, both of which I think are pertinent: 1, Why should not Quebec do as well as any of the other provinces? and, 2, why has Quebec not done as well as any of the other provinces? I think I may ask these questions of many hon. gentlemen here without being accused of raising race issues. It is a question of fact, it is a matter for us, as members of this House of Parliament, representatives of the people, to ask ourselves calmly why this is the case. There must be reasons for it, and it is our duty to try to find out what those reasons are, and to apply a remedy if it is within our power to do so.

I wish to consider this matter from another standpoint. According to the last census, the French population of Canada was 2,054,890. Of these, 1,605,339 were in the province of Quebec, and 449,551 were in the other provinces. A return tabled on June 14, and signed by the Adjutant General, says that from the outbreak of the war until April 30, 1911, only 14,100 French Canadians had enlisted from all Canada and proceeded overseas. That is seven-tenths of one per cent of the French population of Canada. Sir, how many of these were from Quebec? According to the same return, 6,917, exclusive of those who went with the first contingent, were from the province of Quebec. If we add to that 6,917 the 1,217 French Canadians who were with the First Contingent, according to that return, crediting the whole 1,217 to the province of Quebec, it will give 8,134 men overseas from the province of Quebec, out of a population of 1,605,339, or about one-half of one per cent. If we credit the half of that 1,217 to Quebec, it would give us about 7,500 French-Canadians from that province overseas, or less than one-half of one per cent.

What of the French Canadians who enlisted outside of Quebec? The returns show that 6,512 French Canadians have answered the call from outside the province of Quebec, out of a population of 449,551, or nearly one and one-half per cent. If the French Canadians of Quebec had responded as well as the French Canadians in the provinces outside of Quebec, they would have had some 17,000 more men overseas than they have at the present time, 17,000 more representatives of their race in France, sharing in and adding to the glories which their compatriots gained at Courcelette and other places along the western battle front. I may ask, I think, without being accused of any wrong motive, why there is this difference of sentiment amongst the French Canadians outside of Quebec and those within that province, and I say it is our duty to endeavour to find an honest answer to that question and to apply a proper remedy to that condition. Out of a population of 3,564,792 English-speaking Canadians born in Canada, 125,245 have proceeded overseas, or over three and one-half per cent. Out of a population of 813,714 of English-speaking people born outside of Canada, 155,095, or 19 per cent, have answered the call of King and country. And let me say that I endorse most heartily the words of approval and commendation uttered by the hon. member for Carleton, N.B. (Mr. Carvell) of the conduct of British-born Canadians in responding to the call of their King and country. We have been wont in the past to sneer somewhat at some of the oddities of the Englishman who comes to this country, and who perhaps affects an eyeglass. Well, the Englishman in the future can come to this country, and he can wear a ring in his nose if he wants to, and one in each ear.

I will take off my hat to the Englishman, when it comes to a matter of his doing his duty, and responding to the call of his country in the great cause. Up to April, 1917, 44,937 men had enlisted from Quebec. That is 32 per cent of Quebec's allotment or fair share of the half million men authorized. It is certainly most remarkable that the French Canadians, who comprise 78 per cent of the population of Quebec, should supply less than one-fifth of the enlistments of that province, while the English- speaking men of the province of Quebec, who comprise 15 per cent of its population, should supply over four-fifths of the recruits from that province. Again I say this is a matter for us to inquire into, to endeavour to find a remedy for it. In this connection, allow me to add that, of the 316,103 English in Quebec, from whom four-fifths of the recruits of that province have been drawn, 245,212 were born in Canada, and 70,891 in the United Kingdom, or other parts of the British Empire. These are plain, cold, hard facts, and if we find the Quebec recruiting figures unsatisfactory—and I think we do—it is up to us to try and ascertain the cause of this condition of things, and to honestly try to apply a remedy.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to draw attention to the statements made by the right hon. leader of the Opposition, in the course of his speech in this debate. Referring to a statement of the Prime Minister he said:

> I say that he (the Prime Minister) could not under the Act as it is send anybody across the ocean to serve in the war.

I do not read the Militia Act in that way, but I am not a lawyer. However, I want to quote the opinion given by a very eminent lawyer and statesman on this very point. There appeared in the Toronto Globe on October 4, 1899, a statement made by the right hon. leader of the Opposition, in regard to our sending troops to South Africa at the outbreak of the Boer war. The following statement is attributed to the right hon. gentleman:

> "There exists a great deal of misconception in the country regarding the powers of the Government in the present crisis. As I understand the Militia Act, and I may say that I have given it some study of late, our volunteers are enrolled to be used in the defence of the Dominion. They are Canadian troops to be used to fight for Canada's defence. Perhaps the most widespread misapprehension is that they cannot be sent out of Canada. To my mind it is clear that cases might arise when they might be sent to a foreign land to fight. To postulate a case: Suppose that Spain should declare war upon Great Britain. Spain has, or had, a navy, and that navy might be being got ready to assail Canada as part of the Empire. Sometimes the best method of defending one's self is to attack, and in that case Canadian soldiers might certainly be sent to Spain, and it is quite certain that they legally might be so despatched to the Iberian Peninsula. The case of the South African Republic is not analagous.

I might say that, in the brief session of 1914, when we had under consideration the resolution for the appropriation of $50,000,000 for war purposes, the right hon. gentleman paid particular attention to matters in connection with that vote. He called attention to the fact that the money was voted for the conduct of military or naval operations in or beyond Canada, and for the carrying out of any measures, deemed necessary or advisable by the Governor in Council, in consequence of the existence of a state of war. I maintain this is one of the measures deemed necessary by the Governor in Council to be carried out in consequence of this country being in a state of war, and I think an expression of opinion of that kind by the right hon. leader of the Opposition was, in itself, an endorsation of the power of the Government to send troops overseas.

It has been said that the Prime Minister, speaking in this House, expressed himself against conscription. No doubt that is true. I think I am correct in saying that Lloyd George, the present Prime Minister of England, when conscription was first suggested in England, went so far as to threaten to resign from the British Cabinet if that suggestion were carried into effect, and yet the Right Hon. Lloyd George came to see the necessity of conscription as the only means of providing the men required to maintain the English forces in France. I might also say that not only is there a strong feeling among the men overseas, the rank and file, that more men are required, but I am sure I am right in saying that the men who are at the head of our forces in France to-day, General Turner and General Currie, both of whom, I am told, are Liberals, are very emphatic and urgent in their request that more men should be sent overseas, and sent as speedily as it is possible to send them.

I want to draw attention to another statement made by the right hon. leader of the Opposition in discussing this question in the debate. He said:

> He (the Prime Minister) said the other day, and he has just repeated it, that the first line of our defence to-day is in Flanders and France. I claim against him that there never was any danger of invasion of Canada on the part of Germany. If I have taken the position I have hitherto taken it is not because I feared an invasion of Canada by Germany.

These are the words of the right hon. gentleman uttered in this House a short time ago. I want this House to contrast those sentences with the expression of opinion by the same right hon. gentleman, in that brief session of Parliament, held at the outbreak of the war, 19th August, 1914. His words as recorded in Hansard are:

> "Our territory is liable to attack and invasion. No one pretends that our maritime cities on the Pacific and Atlantic are free from the possibility of insult by an audacious corsair who descending suddenly upon our shores might subject them to an insolent raid and decamp with his booty before punishment could reach him. This is not an unfounded dread of danger; this is no mere illusion; it is a real and indeed aproximate danger, since it is a matter of notoriety that both on the Pacific and on the Atlantic there are German cruisers whose mission is to inflict all the injury they can upon our commerce, and even to raid our cities should they find our harbours unguarded."

Those were the words of the right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition and who has proposed this referendum, and I say that those words are in direct contrast to his statement of a few days ago, where he said that he did not believe there was ever any danger of invasion of Canada on the part of Germany. Be that as it may, if this country is not to be invaded by Germany, it will be because we make things so hot for the Germans over in Flanders on that western front that they will not have time to come over here and invade us. The first line of Canada's defence is in Flanders, and is it not far better for us that we maintain that line and prevent the Germans from breaking through and subsequently attacking this country? We do not want any atrocities committed in Canada such as the Germans have committed in Belgium and in Northeastern France.

The right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) has given certain reasons why conscription should not be enforced in Canada. I want to give a reason which he placed on Hansard on January 17, 1916, when he said:

> Apart from any other, one paramount reason, which is on top of all the others, is that we could not adopt conscription in Canada without giving a severe blow to our policy of immigration.

That was the reason advanced against conscription by the right hon. gentleman on January 17, 1916. Well, if Germany wins the war, neither the right hon. gentleman nor anybody else will need to concern himself about an immigration policy for Canada. Germany will look after that part of it; Germany will conduct a vigorous immigration policy if she wins in this war. The right hon. gentleman went on to say:—

> But if it were to be known that conscription existed in Canada, it would, I repeat, deal a severe blow to our hopes in that respect. Why, the very thought of conscription has had a detrimental effect on our settlements in the north-west.

He went on to quote a report published in an American newspaper, stating that certain American farmers who had made their way into the Canadian Northwest had, on the outbreak of war, taken fright and gone back across the boundary line into the United States. May I ask what people are going to be scared from emigrating to Canada because of conscription? Not the people of the United States, because they have conscription there, and they know what it means. Not the people of the British Isles, for they have conscription there also. Not the people of France, Russia, or Italy, for each of those countries have conscription. What peoples, then, are likely to be prevented from coming into Canada after the war is over because of our having adopted a policy of conscription? I maintain that there is absolutely nothing in that argument advanced by the right hon. gentleman.

The right hon. gentleman advanced other reasons, which were not so much against conscription, I take it, as they were reasons why enlistments had failed so lamentably in the province of Quebec. He said that when the war broke out both parties in the House agreed that it was the duty of the Canadian people to participate in the war to the fulness of our resources. "To the fulness of our resources" includes men as well as everything else. He went on to say:—

> I must make an exception to that. The ratification was not unanimous. There has been a minority which has always protested against our attitude, and that minority is the Nationalist party in the province of Quebec, who took the position from the start that it was a crime for the Canadian people to participate in this war. Not only did they use that strong language, but again and again in the Nationalist press they have asserted, and still assert, that we have taken our present position simply because we are subject to the imperious dictation of the British authorities.

Further he said that these > same Nationalists would deny us the liberty, when we see France threatened with dismantlement, when we see Belgium actually under the foot of the conqueror, of helping in the defence of France and of Belgium.

He said further:—

> It is not because they hate France, it is not because they hate Belgium, but because we cannot in this war help France or help Belgium without at the same time helping England.

Further on he said that the Nationalists asserted that Canada had no direct or material interest in this war. He continued:—

> And, every day we read in their press that if Germany were to triumph it would be of no material injury to Canada, that Canada would remain just in the position that Canada is in to-day.

I think I am right in drawing the conclusion that in these expressions regarding the minority in Quebec we have a reason, in part at least, why men have not enlisted in greater numbers in that province.

The right hon. gentleman also said:—

> Should Germany triumph there would be nations that would rue the day of their indifference and supineness.

May I not also say that should Germany triumph, Quebec would rue the day of its indifference and supineness in the matter of enlistment? Mr. Speaker, I honestly believe that the worst enemies of Quebec and of the French Canadians are those men in and out of that province who have tried to prevent the French Canadians of Quebec from enlisting as they should enlist, having regard to their numbers. I care not whether they live in Quebec or are members of this House; I say that the men who have by word or deed encouraged men in Quebec not to enlist are the worst enemies of that province. I believe that, in time, the people of Quebec, realizing that, will look upon these men not as their champions and friends, but as their worst enemies.

Mr. MEDERIC MARTIN: Do you mean by those words that the Nationalists of 1911 who are now sitting on the Treasury benches are responsible for this condition?

Mr. EDWARDS: That is a question that ought to be answered, and that I will answer; I have no intention of evading it. I am going to refer to the Nationalists, and I am going to refer also to some who are not Nationalists, including the hon. gentleman who has just sat down. I do not want to be misunderstood in my references to the Nationalists; I have no use for them—and I have said so in this House before now.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: But your leader seems to have had some use for them.

Mr. EDWARDS: And your leader seems to have a good deal of use for them now.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: Oh, no.

Mr. EDWARDS: Let us come out into the open, face to face, and find out where we on this side and hon. gentlemen on the other side, including the leader of the Opposition, stand in regard to the matter. I believe it is my duty as a representative of the Canadian people to place these matters squarely before the House and the country as I see them; and if I am wrong, I shall be glad to be corrected and to be shown wherein I am in error. Where does the right hon. gentleman stand, and where has he stood, in regard to Canada's participation in Britain's wars? Where did he stand in regard to Canada's participation in the South African war? Is it not an historical fact that he held back on that occasion until public sentiment practically compelled him to send our soldiers overseas—and that he then sent them on the c.o.d. principle? I may be accused of recrimination when I make that assertion, but it is either true or not true. I make it because I believe that it is true, and if hon. gentlemen challenge it, I want them to show me in what respect it is wrong; I want them not to abuse me because I state what I believe to be a fact.

Where did the right hon. gentleman stand in regard to Canada's participation in the wars of the Empire when he attended the Imperial conferences in London? Did he line up with those who want to prosecute the war to a finish, or was not his stand at those conferences more in line with the first plank of the Nationalist platform, which is, "No participation by Canada in the wars of Great Britain? What was his position in regard to the proposal of the Government for contributing three dreadnoughts to the British navy? Was he for participation? Was not his stand exactly in line with the first plank of the Nationalist platform? Accuse the Nationalists, if you like, and I am with you in regard to the first plank of their platform, which is absolutely indefensible; but do not think that by abusing the Nationalists you can exculpate the right hon. leader of the Opposition in regard to the doctrines which he has repeatedly endorsed in this House and country. How did the German press regard the action of the Canadian Senate in voting against the three dreadnoughts? We know what the naval expert of the British Government said in regard to the battle of Jutland, that great battle of Beattie's: "If we had had three or four more dreadnoughts on that occasion we could have wiped out the German navy." Why did not we have three or four dreadnoughts there, and why was not the German navy wiped out? It was because the right hon. leader of the Opposition was opposed to Canada giving three dreadnoughts, and because his partisan Senate did his bidding and killed the Bill. What did the German press say about the action of the Canadian Senate? On June 5, 1913, the Hamburger Nachrichten said:

> Whatever may be decided upon later, the actual decision of the Canadian Senate means at any rate a heavy moral and material loss for the defence of the Empire, for Mr. Borden's promise had been foolishly enough counted on. His offer made an enormous impression on the whole world. This impression will not only now be destroyed but people will everywhere obtain the conviction that England cannot depend upon such help from her colonies.

The Morning Post, an English newspaper, said:

> By rivals and enemies the decision will be eagerly welcomed. By friends it will be regarded as ominous. The impression must inevitably be created that the solidarity of the Empire is a myth and that those powers which would like to see the overthrow of British naval supremacy need not be discouraged with their efforts by the thought that their challenge would be met by the united resources of the mother country and of every one of the daughter States.

Is not Germany to-day getting encouragement from the referendum proposed by the right hon. leader of the Opposition, and just as much encouragement as she is getting from the dastardly doctrines preached by the Nationalists in the province of Quebec? Are not the enemies of Great Britain and our Allies taking encouragement from this referendum proposal? Are they not justified in regarding Canadian unity as a myth in the face of that referendum proposal?

But let us go a little further. In a former session the present Prime Minister asked Sir Wilfrid Laurier, then Prime Minister, what a Canadian ship would do if she met an enemy ship on the high seas; would she attack the enemy ship? What did the right hon. gentleman reply?

> I do not know that she will fight.

That is what he is saying by this referendum: I do not know that we will send the men. He goes on:

> I do not know that she should fight, either.

That is just what is being said again to-day in regard to sending men overseas. Some men say: I do not know that we should send any more men overseas. He goes on:

She should not fight until the Goverment by which she is commissioned have determined whether she should go into the war. That is the position we take, my hon. friend takes a different position. He says that without any question, under all circumstances, we are bound to send our ships into the war. We take a different position, and we say:—Let the country judge between us

I maintain that the attitude adopted by the right hon. leader of the Opposition was certainly more in line with the first plank of the Nationalist platform than with the Conservative platform. In the same debate Sir Robert Borden said:

I understood the Prime Minister to say that our ships would not fight until they were ordered to do so, and, therefore, they would in effect be neutral until the Governor in Council had made an order that they should participate in the war. Have I mis-stated my hon friend's position?

Sir Wilfrid Laurier—No.

Mr. R. L. Borden—Then, inasmuch as our ships, under the conditions mentioned, will be practically neutral, I would like to know whether our ports and harbours will also be neutral in the same way?

Sir Wilfrid Laurier—I do not understand what my hon. friend means by asking if they would be neutral. If he means after an enemy has come into our harbour, then it will be time to resist them with our fleet.

Hon. gentlemen opposite are to-day preaching the same doctrine, whether it be Nationalist doctrine or anything else. They say: It is time enough to fight the Germans when they invade Canada; it is not up to us to send men overseas to fight them. Sir Robert Borden continued:

Mr. R. L. Borden—But if our ships do not attack the enemy when they meet the enemy on the high seas, on the same principle may not the enemy's fleet come into our harbour without resistance or attack, without fear of aggression? Surely, that can be done, if it is feasible for the country owning those harbours to maintain neutrality on the high seas.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier—That would be a question to determine any time that a warship entered a Canadian port.

That is what the right hon. gentleman said: Wait until the German cruisers put into Halifax or St. John Harbour or arrive off the city of Quebec. Then let the Government summon Parliament to decide what is to be done with those enemy cruisers. I say that the position taken then by the present leader of the Opposition is exactly in line with the first plank of the Nationalist platform, No participation by Canada in the wars of Great Britain. Our position is exactly the opposite. We say: Do not wait until the German cruisers get into our harbours, but fight them on the high seas. Do not wait until the German puts his dirty foot on our Canadian soil and butchers our women and children, before taking up arms. Take the war into his own territory and see that there are not enough Huns left to perpetrate the atrocities here that were committed in France and Belgium.

Who first suggested the referendum? Was it the right hon. leader of the Opposition? Every hon. gentleman in this House knows that when this Military Service Act was submitted to the House by the Prime Minister, the leader of the Opposition skated all round it; he took time to consider it. If at that time he had got right up in his place and said: You have been to the front and have consulted with our generals and the men in possession of the facts, and you come back and say that men are urgently needed at the front, therefore, although I am opposed to the principle of conscription, in view of the urgent need, I will favour that method of getting the men—if, I say, he had risen to the occasion in that way as a great statesman would have done, I venture to say that we should have heard very little, if any, of this talk in the province of Quebec. We should never have heard men in that province threatening to turn their guns against their neighbours in Canada rather than against the enemy. The population of the province of Quebec would have suppressed men like Tancrede Marsil, Bourassa and Armand Lavergne, who should have been put in prison long ago.

Mr. MEDERIC MARTIN: How about Mr. Blondin?

Mr. EDWARDS: He has taken a course in the last few months which my hon. friend might very well emulate. But who was it that suggested the referendum? The first man in the province of Quebec to suggest a referendum was that man, Henri Bourassa, in his paper, Le Devoir. This referendum was suggested by the leader of the Nationalist party; it was proposed in this House by the leader of the Liberal party. And it was seconded here by a man who, if his words mean anything, while opposing conscription in this House—for he seconds the motion for a referendum—is in favour of conscription and would go so far as to take every man from the province of Quebec to make up the hundred thousand.

What is the second plank in the Nationalist platform?

To spurn attempts at recruiting for British troops.

The hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) rolled that under his tongue and dwelt upon it in his speech. Who is it who for months past has been giving effect to the second plank of the Nationalist platform? Can he say that a single man in the Conservative party has given encouragement or effect to that plank? But who has given effect and encouragement to it? The Lemieux Clubs, the Young Liberal Clubs, of Montreal and other places in Quebec. Not for one moment can he deny it. Again and again the young Liberals in the city of Montreal have carried out that second plank. What did they do at the meeting in Montreal addressed by General Lessard and Colonel Blondin? Did not they do their utmost to prevent recruiting? Did not they again carry out to the letter the admonition given in the second plank of the Nationalist platform? These are the men, these Nationalists of the province of Quebec, who are lined up to give opposition to conscription to-day. Hon. gentlemen opposite cannot truthfully deny that.

The hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) says that the French Canadian mind is a logical mind, because it does not change with changed conditions. He says that the French Canadian does not change overnight, and we do; therefore, we are not logical. It seems to me that that is the reverse of logical. I do not see how one can claim that a man is logical who will stick to the same opinion notwithstanding changed conditions. I should suppose that the man was giving evidence of a logical mind who would change his position as conditions warrant. However that is the position taken by the hon. member for South Renfrew. He also went on to refer to the Nationalist platform adopted in 1911, as did other hon gentlemen; and, as questions have been asked me, I am justified in going into this matter. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Graham) said:

The doctrine preached previous to 1911 in Quebec that we owed nothing to Great Britain and should not send a man to fight her battles had more to do with the slowness of recruiting in Quebec than any other cause.

I believe that is true. The doctrine preached in the province of Quebec in 1911, and since, and before—

Mr. MEDERIC MARTIN: Since Confederation.

[Mr. Edwards.]

Mr. SPEAKER: If an hon. member wishes to speak he should rise and address the Chair. Interruptions of this kind do not accord with the decorum of debate.

Mr. EDWARDS: The hon. member for South Renfrew said, in approaching this particular question:

This is a delicate point. I wish to speak of this without recrimination but merely as a matter of history and of fact.

May I be allowed to preface the remarks I am about to make by taking these words of the hon. gentleman as my own. He went on to say that men told the French Canadians that it was no part of their duty to enlist to fight overseas. I wonder if he thinks that talk of that kind is a greater encouragement for the French Canadians not to enlist than this referendum amendment by the leader of the Opposition? When did this sort of talk start in Quebec? Who encouraged it? Who was it who planted the seeds of distrust and suspicion of Britain in the French Canadian mind? Who nourished the idea of separation and kept alive in the French Canadian mind the thought of independence? Who taught the French Canadians to regard their connection with Britain as a yoke of bondage? Who gave encouragement and support to distrust of the Constitution in that province? Did all this start with the Nationalists? Why, Bourassa, Lavergne, and the other Nationalists were in the kindergarten class when the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) was a professor in the college of that thought.

Mr. LANCTOT: That will help recruiting.

Mr. EDWARDS: I do not think it will have much effect on recruiting, one way or the other, in the part of the country you come from.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is contrary to the rules of order for one member of the House to address another in the second person. A member of this House is to be referred to as "the hon. member."

Mr. EDWARDS: Then I will call him the hon. member, Mr. Speaker. Let us go back in our history. I wish to quote a few words uttered by one of the greatest statesmen this country ever produced, Sir George Etienne Cartier. Speaking in 1869 he said:

Canadian people desire to remain faithful to the old monarchial flag of Great Britain, that flag which waves over all seas, that flag which tyranny has never been able to overcome, that flag which symbolizes true liberty.

Canadians know that if they wish to become really great they have only to continue their union with the mother country, so as to share in her power, her prestige and her glory.

I venture to say that if we had a Sir George Etienne Cartier to-day as leader of the French Canadian race in this country, instead of the right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition, we should have had from the province of Quebec as many recruits in proportion to its population as we have had from any other province of Canada. Let this House contrast the words of that great statesman which I have just quoted with some remarks which have fallen from the lips of the right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition. Then I would ask this House, in all seriousness, if these expressions of opinion are calculated to strengthen Canada's connection with Great Britain, or to increase the love for Britain or for British institutions. Let me quote further from some utterances of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, in his past career. He once said:

The only tie that binds Canada to the mother country is a sentiment of affection. But this dependence will not always last. Even now Canada and England have very different interests, and the day will come—necessarily—when they will have to part.

Such expressions as that were preparing the French Canadian mind for separation from Britain and the severing of their connection with Britain and British interests. These are the words of the right hon. the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). These are also his words:

I hold out to my fellow-countrymen the idea of independence.

Again.

Is there a Canadian anywhere who would not hail with joy the day when we would be deprived of the services of British diplomacy?

Again.

I am ready any day, whether I am charged with annexation or not to take a yankee dollar in preference to an English shilling.

I have again and again repeated that the goal of my aspiration is the independence of Canada, to see an independent nation in due course of time.

It is the duty of every man here to state what he believes to be facts, to give an honest comment on those facts and to try and find out the causes of the attitude of the people of Quebec. I am not blaming the mass of the people of Quebec but I am blaming the leaders, or the men who call themselves the leaders of the people in Quebec. I am honestly endeavouring to get at the cause of the condition that exists at the present time. Let me quote from another French Canadian.

Mr. DEVLIN: Will the hon. gentleman give me the page of Hansard where he will find these words of the leader of the Opposition?

Mr. EDWARDS: I regret that I am unable at this moment to give the hon. gentleman the page but I will promise him that I will get for him the page of Hansard where these words are.

Mr. DEVLIN: Could the hon. gentleman give me the year?

Mr. EDWARDS: No, I will not undertake to specify the year nor the date, but I will undertake to make good my assertion that these words were used by the right hon. gentleman. I think my hon. friend will admit that that is fair.

Mr. KNOWLES: Does the hon. gentleman refer to all his extracts when he says that we will find them in Hansard?

Mr. EDWARDS: Yes, all of these will be found in Hansard. Mr. Mercier, who was Premier of the province of Quebec from 1887 to 1891, spoke at Sohmer Park advocating cutting the tie with Britain and the establishment in Quebec of a French Canadian nation. He used these words:

Taking everything into account French Canadians owe nothing to England. If they had prospered it was not because of England but in spite of her and if England had done them good it had also done them still greater harm. You have colonial dependence. I offer you independence; you have ruin and misery; I offer you fortune and prosperity.

Speaking later at Fall River, Massachusetts, to a meeting composed of French Canadians, he said:

I appeal to you to always be ready to assist your compatriots in Canada who are struggling for liberty and the only thing wanted to release them from their present bondage is independence

I quote these words for the reason that that gentleman occupied a very prominent position in public life in the province of Quebec. He was seeking re-election after he made use of the words I have quoted. The right hon. the leader of the Opposition went to Quebec and uttered these words:

Mr. Mercier is the greatest Canadian since the time of Papineau. I believe with Mr. Mercier and I am here to make him prevail.

So that, Mr. Speaker, in considering what the Nationalists have done and what the Nationalists say, and their attitude at the present time, it behooves us to go back in history and find out if the Nationalists are entirely to blame for the state of mind which exists in Quebec at the present time. I contend they are not entirely to blame. The right hon. gentleman at various times in his career has unfortunately given expression to opinions and let words drop from his lips which were calculated to weaken the tie which binds this country, and the French Canadians, to the Mother Country, and which were calculated to lessen their respect for Britain and British interests. I repeat what I said at the outset. These things which have been lying beneath the surface of the political stream for years and years and threatening the very existence of this Confederation, have now come to the surface, and the expressions which have fallen from the lips of the right hon. gentleman are, in my judgment, largely responsible for the condition of affairs existing in Quebec to-day.

But, are the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) and other members of the Liberal party entirely clear with respect to this matter? They have in times past voted for a doctrine designed to separate this country from Britain and the Empire. In proof of that statement I want to refer them to some of their literature which was issued in 1891, and which is entitled "Facts for Farmers." If you will look at page 12 of this interesting pamphlet, you will find that these hon. gentlemen advocated annexation to the United States, and told how it would be brought about, said that God would bless the union, and all the rest of it.

Mr. DEVLIN: By whom? Will the hon. gentleman not admit that that movement was started by Sir John Abbott, at one time the Prime Minister of Canada?

Mr. EDWARDS: I repeat that the Liberal party in 1891 scattered literature throughout this country advocating the annexation of Canada to the United States. Does the hon. gentleman deny it?

Mr. DEVLIN: I never received any and I know of none.

Mr. EDWARDS: Probably in your case they did not think it was necessary to send you any. It was sent nevertheless.

Mr. DEVLIN: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. I not only ask for a retraction, but I also ask that the hon. gentleman in retracting give the reason why he made that statement.

[Mr. Edwards.]

Mr. EDWARDS: What is it that you want me to retract?

Mr. DEVLIN: I presume the hon. gentleman knows what he says when he makes a statement.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) had in his mind a question as to the loyalty of the hon. member for Wright (Mr. Devlin), he should retract.

Mr. EDWARDS: Whatever I may have had in my mind, I cannot retract what I did not utter. If you will show me anything I have said which in your opinion I should retract, I shall do so.

Mr. SPEAKER: As I understood the point of order raised by the hon. member for Wright, he had the idea that the remark of the hon. member for Frontenac questioned his loyalty. If the hon. member for Frontenac did so, he would not be in order.

Mr. EDWARDS: I have no desire to evade the rule in any particular. I did not impute disloyalty to the hon. member for Wright. If he so understood me I am very sorry. I said that the Liberal party, in 1891, issued literature—which they did issue—advocating the annexation of Canada to the United States. That is what I said. The hon. gentleman said he did not see any of that literature. I am not responsible for that; I did not have charge of sending it out. As a matter of fact, I repeat again that the literature was sent out. Now, since the matter has gone that far, I shall quote from their campaign literature of 1891.

Mr. KNOWLES: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. We are discussing a certain question and debating it before you. We are debating whether we should approve the principle of this Bill which has been brought down by the Prime Minister. I submit that there must be some relevancy in the remarks of any hon. member. It is ruled in this House by a preponderating majority that it is out of order to read newspapers that are up to date, which are only a few days old, and I submit that it is much more irrelevant to read an alleged and as yet unproved pamphlet which seems to have been resurrected from a period of twenty-five years ago.

Mr. SPEAKER: Do I understand that the point of order has reference to the reading of selections from newspapers?

Mr. KNOWLES: On the ground of irrelevancy.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is quite competent for the hon. member to read extracts from newspapers if they have a bearing on the argument, and, as I understand it, his argument has to do with the matter of recruiting in Quebec, and he is proceeding to give his reasons. It may be that his argument is somewhat remote, but, as I understand it, it is relevant and in order.

Mr. EDWARDS: The point I have been endeavouring to make, perhaps not with the astuteness and cleverness with which it would be made by a gentleman of the brilliancy of the hon. gentleman from Moosejaw (Mr. Knowles), is that it was our duty as representatives of the people to try to ascertain the causes for certain sentiments which exist in this country, and, having ascertained them, to honestly seek to arrive at a remedy. I maintain that I have a perfect right to quote anything which, in my judgment, tends to show those causes.

Mr. KNOWLES: I submit that the hon. member is out of order in discussing a point of order already settled. The point of order has been settled in his favour, and now he is proceeding to discuss it.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) has the floor. So long as he does not question the decision of the chair it is quite competent for him to refer to it.

Mr. EDWARDS: The pamphlet that was issued by the Liberal party in 1891, and which, in my judgment, had a tendency to mould public opinion in the wrong direction, on page 12, contains the following:—

> But supposing that a better relation with the United States did contribute towards a growth in the annexation sentiment. Suppose if, on the one hand, she consented to a commercial union between her children on this side of the ocean and the result was an enlarged emigration from the U. S. and a changed political condition in Parliament by which an annexation resolution should pass—what is there to be horrified at in that prospect? If, in the future, the people of Canada desire to join the great constellation of commonwealths that so illustrate the greatness of this continent, what possible objection could there be? Annexation is a bugbear which a weak sentimentality has clothed with features that are repulsive, but which, upon examination, might be found to be the most attractive and most winning of events.
> This we certainly can do by breaking down the commercial barrier between the two countries, learn to understand each other better and if the winning forces of commerce and their attractive institutions make the great continent of North America one nation, then God will bless the union. To achieve a commercial relation with the American people is an object therefore, of the highest duty, worthy of the noblest efforts of the best men of the country.
> The great Liberal party, which to-day represents a majority of the voters of the Dominion in Parliament, but which is in opposition to the existing Government, has adopted as the main plank in its platform this question of unrestricted reciprocity, and it will go to the polls within eighteen months with that cause inscribed upon its banner.

I think that sort of doctrine was unfortunate, unfortunate because it tended, I allege, to mould public opinion in this country in the wrong direction. But, Sir, the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham), in the course of his remarks, deprecated the raising of racial issues. The hon. gentleman attended a convention of Liberals in Nipissing in April, 1915. A Mr. Young was nominated as the Liberal candidate for this House. The hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham), in the course of his remarks on that occasion, called on all French Canadians to vote for Mr. Young and thus support Sir Wilfrid Laurier. He then went on to say:

> Every French Canadian who allows himself to be led away by voting for a Tory was sticking his knife in their great Chief's back.

That is the report of the Toronto Globe on April 15, 1915. I say that the hon. member for South Renfrew, in making that appeal, was making a direct appeal to race against race. There is no getting around that. The hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Lapointe) was present on the same occasion and addressed the convention in his native tongue, condemning Mr. Gordon, now Senator Gordon, for wanting an appeal to the people on the Naval Act. So that we have, I think, on that occasion the member for South Renfrew and the member for Kamouraska, while the war was in progress, making an appeal to the people along racial lines. The hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) the other day in the House made use of this statement:

> If it requires 100,000 men from the province of Quebec for the province of Quebec to do its share, then certainly take the 100,000; but my hon. friend does not suggest that it requires that.

Now, Sir, Quebec's share of the 500,000, as I said a while ago is 138,298. She has given 8,000. Alberta has given 102 per cent of its share of the 500,000. Alberta has given 7,800 more than its share of the 400,000 that we have already raised. Quebec has given 102,560 less than its share of the 400,000 already raised, according to her population. Therefore, according to the statement of the hon. gentleman who seconds this motion for a referendum, the proper thing to do is to make each province or each part of the country first of all contribute its share until all are on an equality, and then go ahead with whatever scheme you think fit. The hon. gentleman who seconds this resolution would take every one of the 100,000 men asked for from the province of Quebec before he took a man from any other province. There is no getting away from that, it is absolutely indisputable. The hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) was asked a question by Sir Herbert Ames:

Sir Herbert Ames: What do you propose to do for the men at the front?

And his answer, as it will be found in Hansard, was:

Hon. Mr. Lemieux: To keep the men on the farms of Canada to produce wheat and send them food, for one thing, and to equip them with munitions.

So here we have what the hon. member for Rouville conceives to be his duty in this matter, what he conceives to be the duty of the people of Canada. If he is consistent he is telling the people of Quebec: it is not up to you, it is not up to this country, to conscript men to send overseas; but it is our duty to see that the men who are already over there shall get all they want to eat, shall have plenty of guns and plenty of ammunition. And if you follow out his argument to its logical conclusion, he takes the position that the men who are overseas now shall go unsupported except in regard to their food and the provision of arms and ammunition to enable them to carry on the fight.

They may stay there until the last man drops, but according to the hon. member (Mr. Lemieux) no recruits will be sent over to help them, unless they can be obtained by voluntary enlistment. The hon. gentleman from Rouville on the 18th January, 1916, in the House of Commons, made a definite promise to the people of Canada and the men overseas. He said:

In six months, the turn of the tide having taken place, the public of the province of Quebec will have been educated—yes, educated as regards this war, because the population being largely rural, and having enjoyed peace for a hundred years, is not, as many would think, so much affected by events in Europe as other sections of Canada, because it is Canadian born, seven, eight, nine, ten generations back. I say that the public, having been made acquainted with the facts concerning the war, thanks to the eloquence of the right hon. leader of the Opposition, thanks to the campaign of my hon. friend the Postmaster General, thanks to the articles published by the Quebec press—within six months we shall have nearer 20,000 that 15,000 new recruits in the province of Quebec.

[Mr. Edwards.]

When the hon. gentleman made that statement and gave that pledge on the floor of this House, it was up to him to try and carry it out, and to see that men were sent overseas. Perhaps he did try to carry it out. If he honestly tried to implement his promise, and failed, it seems to me he should support this Bill and see that the men he promised shall go overseas to the assistance of the men already there. The hon. gentleman from St. John (Mr. Pugsley, in his opening remarks, was somewhat facetious. He followed the Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Sevigny), and he made the following statement:

I think there is no better food than the food which the hon. gentleman gets at the Government crib, for it seems to have developed his intellect and to have brought him at last to a right way of thinking, and to an appreciation of the duty which every man in this country owes to Canada and to the Empire.

The hon. gentleman spoke feelingly in regard to the hon. minister feeding at the Government crib. The hon. member for St. John fed there many long years, and there was no restriction on the quantity of pap the hon. gentleman took. There must have been something wrong with the quality of it, for it never had the same effect on him as it had on the Minister of Inland Revenue, for it never seemed to inspire him to right methods of thinking, or to awaken him to the needs of Canada or the Empire. The hon. gentleman from St. John has been suffering from political indigestion for a period of about eight years, and it is not to be wondered at. He has acute attacks of that malady at different times. He says that we should have adopted compulsory service at the beginning of the war, that the Government knew that Germany had been preparing for the war for 50 years, and that it would be a gigantic struggle. What position did the hon. gentleman take in this House just a few months before the war began? Did he not jeer and sneer at this Government when the Prime Minister told this House and the country that danger was imminent? He laughed at the idea of Germany having any sinister motive, and scorned the idea of Germany attacking any other country. The hon. gentleman from St. John made another reference in his speech, which I cannot allow to pass. He said:

The voice which he heard in regard to infantry is, I believe, not the voice of the Imperial authorities, but the voice of Toronto; it is the voice of those who do not want to see voluntary enlistment carried on; it is the voice of those who want a measure of conscription introduced; it is the voice of those who wish to raise racial cries and issues in this country.

That was the statement made by the hon. gentleman from St. John. It was the voice of the people of Toronto raising racial cries and issues in this country. A short time ago a large meeting was held in Toronto, called by the Liberals of that city, and the men who addressed that meeting were the member for Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark), Mr. N. W. Rowell, leader of the Liberal party in Ontario, the Rev. Father Minnehan, George Lindsey, and Robert McKay, K.C., and the advertisement calling that meeting was signed by fifty prominent Liberals of Toronto and Ontario. I find there such names as W. I. Jaffray, Aemilius Jarvis, Dr. G. W. Ross, son of the former Prime Minister of Ontario; A. E. Dyment, S. V. Blake, H. M. Mowat, K.C., George Lindsey, Leighton McCarthy, and others. These are the gentlemen who, according to the hon. gentleman from St. John, wished to raise racial issues in this country. That is his statement. What has been the record of the hon. member from St. John (Mr. Pugsley). Away back in 1896 he was an outstanding Liberal-Conservative, and was chosen by the convention to run as the candidate in Kings county, New Brunswick. The issue in 1896 was the Manitoba School Act, and the Remedial Bill, proposed by the Conservative Government. Owing to some local difficulty, or dissensions in the party, the present member for St. John withdrew his candidature in Kings county, and, in withdrawing, expressed his loyal adhesion to Conservative principles and the Conservative party, and stated it would be better for the party if he withdrew from the contest. A short time later an independent party arose, and asked him to run as their candidate, and he took the platform as an independent. He ran as the candidate of the independent party, and appealed to the people showing his hostility to the Remedial Bill, and appealed to the people on racial and religious grounds for their support. I may say, in passing, that he did not seem to have the confidence of the people, because he was not only defeated, but lost his deposit. At all events, that was the position he took. Then the Liberals were elected in 1896, and within three weeks of the coming into power of that party, the hon. gentleman from St. John was the loudest and staunchest Liberal from the Atlantic to the Pacific. There is the gentleman, who, looking out for himself, undertakes to charge the most representative men we have in Ontario with wishing to raise racial and religious issues in connection with conscription. The hon. member for St. John, in his speech, made use of these words:

If we fail to put into force this law of conscription but take steps to stimulate recruiting, and if the war continues for one, two, or even three years, and Canada cannot send quite enough men to fill up the gaps, is it to be said that the Imperial army officers are going to leave the Canadians to be hacked to pieces in the great work they are doing for the Empire? Why, it passes my comprehension how any one can suggest such a thing. Is this the time to take this great departure?

So it passes the comprehension of the hon. gentleman from St. John how the people of England and France would allow our Canadian boys to be hacked to pieces, but it does not pass his comprehension how we, in Canada, can allow them to be cut to pieces. We can stand here with our arms folded, and let the war proceed. I would like the hon. gentleman from St. John, were in his place, to tell me how many meetings he has addressed in New Brunswick or in this country in favour of recruiting?

I venture to say that he has not addressed one meeting on behalf of recruiting—and I will tell you why: because somebody in the back of the hall might call up to him: why doesn't Lieut. J. A. Pugsley, of St. John, go?

Some hon. gentlemen have seen fit to blame the Government because a sufficient number of men have not enlisted. The reason why enlistment has been successful in Ontario and in the western provinces is because members of Parliament from Ontario and the West, Grits and Tories, have led in the recruiting. The reason why enlistment has not been as successful in Quebec as it might have been is because gentlemen like the member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) were opposed to it. Can any one who listened to the member for Three Rivers yesterday imagine his being an influence in favour of recruiting in his part of the country? Is it any wonder that so few have answered the call in the Quebec military district, when persons in that part of the country take the attitude that the member for Three Rivers took here yesterday? During the course of his remarks the hon. gentleman said:

I say, if you cannot fill the gaps with five divisions, make it four; if you cannot do it with four, make it three; but do not become guilty of murder, do not leave the man who has gone to the front to famish; do not let the soldiers die of hunger.

The member for Three Rivers says: Do not let the soldiers over there die of starvation. They may die any other way they like—bullets, shrapnel and that sort of thing—but do not let them die of starvation. The shame of it. An hon. gentleman priding himself on his French blood—I have nothing to say against that—with the tri-colour of France hanging in full view before him, gets up and says that if you cannot maintain five Canadian divisions at the front without sending more men, cut the number of divisions down to four, three, or even two, if necessary. But do not, he says, force men to go over to keep up those divisions. What does that mean? If you cut down the number of divisions from five to four, or from four to three, it means that France, who has enlisted the services of every available man, old and young; whose women and children have made sacrifices; whose clergy and priests have gone into the trenches to fight—France, bleeding from every pore, must take up more of that battle line. Either that, or Britain must do it—simply because we do not send more men across to France to back up our soldiers who are fighting. Shame on the man who comes into this House, whether he be French or English, who makes such a suggestion.

Mr. SPEAKER: I hope the hon. member will refer to members of the House as "hon. members," not as " men."

Mr. EDWARDS: I shall endeavour so to do, Mr. Speaker. The member for Welland (Mr. German) and the member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) reminded the House that Ireland had been exempted from conscription, and said that was a reason why we should exempt Quebec. Will any member of this House suggest that, as an amendment to this Bill, we should exempt Quebec? Would the member for Wright (Mr. Devlin) stand for that for one minute? I do not believe he would; I do not believe that the other members from Quebec would stand for it. To exempt Quebec from the operations of this measure would be to insult that province. But that Quebec should be exempted is the only inference we can gather from the argument adduced by the member for Welland. Canada and Ireland are not in the same position. Divisions of opinion with regard to Home Rule have been causing trouble in Ireland during all these years. There is no such issue as that in Canada, for we have Home Rule; therefore that argument was ill-advised.

Hon. gentlemen opposite have had some flings at the Minister of Inland Revenue. What crimes has he committed? They allege that in the election of 1911 the Minister of Inland Revenue took the position that the Nationalists take: No participation in Britain's wars. Well, whatever position the Minister of Inland Revenue took or did not take in 1911 or prior to that year, in the election which preceded his occupancy of the position which he now holds he did take a pronounced position against the doctrine of the Nationalists; he did take a pronounced position in favour of Canada's participation in the wars of the Empire. If there is anything in what hon. gentlemen opposite say, they contend that the minister should be punished because he did not stick to the doctrine which they allege, through their leader, to be a wrong doctrine. The member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) said in this House on January 19, last:

If the present Minister of Inland Revenue had preached this week and last week the same gospel to the electors of Dorchester that he preached in 1911, he would have been elected by acclamation.

The member for Bonaventure says that if the Minister of Inland Revenue had continued to preach the doctrine which he preached in 1911 he would have been elected by acclamation; but, because he did not continue to preach that doctrine, he should be punished.

The leader of the Opposition has said:—

I blame him—

That is the Minister of Inland Revenue.

—and his party for proclaiming in the province of Quebec that under no circumstances should Canada ever take part in the wars of Great Britain.

Surely, if the minister, having taken a position which was wrong, receded from that position to a right position, he ought to be commended, not blamed. But the leader of the Opposition blames him for receding from that position, and brings to bear upon him a cannon stuffed to the muzzle with the ammunition of anti-British doctrine.

Conscription of wealth has been referred to. Mr. Speaker, many men in this country have made millions by exploiting the resources of Canada, and I am in favour of the Government's taking such action as will get at some of the accumulated wealth of the millionaires. Perhaps it would be a good idea to constitute a joint committee, consisting of members of both sides of the House, to take the necessary preliminary steps. Many hon. gentlemen in this House would be very valuable on a committee of that kind. If we are going to conscript wealth, a great deal of study will be necessary, and on such a committee we should have men who are well qualified by their experience to give valuable aid and advice. All the resources of the country will have to be considered. In considering the farmers, who would be able to give more admirable advice than the member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell)? He ought to be able to make valuable suggestions to such a committee as to how to get hay and things of that kind which needed to be conscripted or commandeered. In regard to royalties on mines, and that sort of thing, the member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) would be a most valuable addition to such a committee. The member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) could surely give valuable advice and information as to how some people out West get hold of large land and timber tracts, and thereby enable the committee to get after those people and commandeer some of that wealth. Then, the member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) would be able to give general information along all these lines. He would be specially valuable for the purpose of showing how bank overdrafts and things of that sort are handled. I say in all seriousness that such a committee could give very valuable advice, indeed.

I would also suggest as another way of raising money in this country that the Government should seriously consider imposing a heavy tax upon those who have been made Knights, Barons, Lords and that sort of thing. If we are to have conscription of men by classes, why not have classes in the conscripting of titles? A man with the title of 'Sir' could give, say, half a million dollars for the honour, and Barons and Lords could contribute at least a million dollars. It is remarkable that only those who are very wealthy seem to get these honours. If there are men in Canada who have exploited this country and become wealthy and have received knighthoods, let them give of their wealth, and give liberally. I would not suggest imposing a tax upon the honorary colonels, because really so long as the Government permits a man like Armand Lavergne to call himself a colonel, I would consider a dollar apiece too high for the title. I cannot really understand why men allow themselves to be called colonel, so long as Armand Lavergne retains that title.

Mr. PROULX: There are many honorary colonels in this House who have rendered little service but have received a large amount of military pay. Armand Lavergne has received no pay at all.

Mr. EDWARDS: I do not know whether he has or not, but if he did not receive pay I presume it was merely because he could not get it.

Mr. PROULX: He is a real colonel, not an honorary one.

Mr. EDWARDS: My hon. friend may have his opinion of Armand Lavergne and I have mine, and mine is not a very high one.

There is before the House the Bill for selective conscription, an amendment calling for a referendum, and another amendment calling for a six months' hoist. It is worthy of note that the mover and seconder of the amendment for the six months' hoist are alleged to have been made lieutenants in 1915. I wish to place on Hansard the opinion which one of these gentlemen expressed in 1915.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to interrupt, but I wish the hon. gentleman, in referring to members of this House, would speak of them as hon. gentlemen or hon. members.

Mr. EDWARDS: Do I understand that it is not permissible to refer to a member as a member?

Mr. SPEAKER: It is quite proper, but I understood my hon. friend to say "gentleman," instead of "hon. gentleman."

Mr. EDWARDS: I will try and remember to use the adjective in future, but I did not think any man would take exception to my calling him a gentleman. I certainly did not use the word with any intention of being disrespectful. The hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Achim), who seconded the motion for the six months' hoist, and who, I believe, also seconded the Address in the session of 1915, spoke as follows on February 8, 1915:

> Not a single one of these men (soldiers) has thought of arguing over his rights or duties not one of them has endeavoured to find out a clause of the Constitution behind which he might find refuge.
> Once the enemy is victorious on the continent and is master of the British Isles, it will be too late to take up arms for the defence of the country.
>
> I suggested a moment ago that defending the Empire under present conditions was equivalent to defending our own country.

I cannot see how the hon. member for Labelle can square his position of to-day with his utterances in the House which I have just quoted; however, that is up to him.

The case against the referendum could not be better summed up than in the language of the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. McCraney), who said:

> The referendum amendment recognizes no need, suggests no remedy, and applies no alternative.

Suppose a referendum is submitted to the people. Who is going to vote on that referendum? All those whose names appear on the voters' lists? If so, that will include thousands of Austrians and Germans who have been in this country perhaps only four or five years, and who might reasonably be expected to still have a warm regard for Austria and Germany. Would it be fair to allow these men to poll their votes on the referendum, when it would be impracticable to obtain the votes of the soldiers in the trenches? There is also in this country a certain sect called Mennonites, who I understand settled here on the distinct pledge of the Government that they would not be called on for military service. Their names, however, appear on the voters' lists. Would it be fair to allow these men who are exempt from military service to cast their vote in the referendum, when the soldiers at the front would not be allowed to cast theirs? I think it is only necessary to state these obvious objections to convince any person that this referendum should not receive the consideration of any person in this House or in the country. We are told that if the referendum carried it would be put into effect. What warrant have we for thinking that? Some years ago the right hon. gentleman who to-day leads the Opposition gave a distinct pledge to the people of Canada, when leader of a great party in this country, that if returned to power he would submit the question of prohibition to the people by way of referendum, and if the majority of the people of Canada decided in favour of prohibition, prohibition they should have. As it happened, the majority of the people of Canada did decide in favour of prohibition, but the majority of the people of the province of Quebec voted against prohibition, and the right hon. gentleman did not attempt to carry out his pledge to give the people of Canada a prohibition law.

The hon. member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Gauthier) in his address the other evening said that the British-born in this country are against the Bill, that they had left the country so as not to be called upon for military service. I take strong exception to that. The manner in which the British-born have answered the call does not warrant the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe in making any such insinuations as that. His remarks were entirely unfair, uncalled for, and quite incorrect. He also took exception to the statement of the Solicitor General that the Bill in its working out would bear more lightly on the province of Quebec than on other provinces for reasons which the Solicitor General gave. Commenting on this, the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Gauthier) said:

> We resent the insult whether direct or indirect. Thank Heaven we do not belong to a race of cowards. We are willing to do our share to the bitter end, and no man in this House nor in this country can tell us that if we vote for the Bill we shall be exempted. We do not want to be put in reserve.

It is quite proper to mention that supporting this motion for a referendum is doing that very thing. The sentiment of the province of Quebec is undoubtedly against conscription, if we are to believe what we read in the press and what is stated in this House by some hon. members. I contend that the course taken by the leader of the Opposition has the effect of placing the province of Quebec in reserve. I also wish to call attention to the closing words of the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe:

> I say to the Government: If you press this measure through, my people, declaring that this Government has no mandate, will use the very Bill itself to fight the matter out. We acknowledge that in this fight there will be pain and suffering. We may have to go to the direst consequences. My people are willing to go to the limit if you impose upon them such a piece of legislation; I believe they are right, and I will do as they intend to do.

That language is not calculated to bring recruits from the province of Quebec, nor to bring unity in this country. It is most unfortunate language for any hon. member of this House to use. Are we to believe that if this Bill passes—and becomes law—and it can only pass by obtaining the support of a majority of the representatives of the people gathered here from all parts of Canada—that the people of the province of Quebec will resist it to the point of violence? That is the only inference we can draw from the statement made by the hon. gentleman. If I were to make a statement of that kind in this House hon. gentlemen from Quebec would resent it very strongly, and would say that I had no right to use such language. I say that we have as much right to resent such a statement coming from one of the members from the province of Quebec as they would have to resent such a statement if made by myself. If the hon. gentleman's statement is true, we are certainly face to face with a most serious condition. The people of this country, no matter of what nationality, must understand that when the representatives of the people pass a law that law is to be obeyed. We cannot take any other ground. We cannot overlook the fact that we have people here drawn from all parts of the globe, people of all nationalities; and if the people of any one nationality carry resistance against the law to the point of violence, they are simply giving encouragement to those of other nationalities who know less about our laws and institutions, to do likewise. It is a state of affairs that cannot be tolerated for one moment.

The hon. member for Russell (Mr. Murphy) said that there was no call from the men overseas to come to their help. I may again refer him to the words of the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) to which I referred at the beginning of my remarks. We have a call from the men overseas, from the very soldiers who are on the battle line. We have a call from a Canadian leader, General Currie, who is in command of our men overseas. We have a call from the men who have fallen. We have a call from those who have been in the trenches doing their bit for months and months.

Some hon. gentlemen have advised the Government to postpone the bringing into effect of this Act. I do not agree with that view, and I will give my reasons. There are hundreds of men overseas to-day who never should have left Canada; there are hundreds and thousands of men in Canada who should be overseas. The voluntary system was all right, up to a time. By that system we were gathering men faster than we could equip them and send them overseas. But every hon. member knows that there came a time when it seemed necessary to send men out on the platform to urge, and, it would seem, to cajole and browbeat men into joining the ranks. There are some men who had courage enough to face the German bullets who had not courage enough to face the reputation of being slackers. As a result, many of these men who had not the courage to face the sneers of their compatriots enlisted and went overseas though they should never have gone. During the last week I received a letter from a lady in my constituency asking me to intercede with the Government to have her son returned. He is her only son. Her husband is ill and has been sent to a hospital, and will not be able to take up farm work. So that lady and her daughter are left to run a farm of 125 acres with about 25 head of cattle. That young man ought never to have gone overseas. But there are others who could be spared, easily spared, and who should be over there to take his place.

Furthermore, I wish to impress upon the House, in all fairness to the boys at the front, one plain fact. Many of those men have been over there a year and a half or two years, or more. They have been called upon to endure extreme hardship in the trenches. These men have bravely offered themselves and are ready to face all dangers. Under present conditions, they are kept on the firing line week after week and month after month, without any chance to rest and recuperate. These men are not only doing their bit but each of them is doing the bit of two or three others who are staying in Canada and making big money. That is not fair, it is not just, it is not right, it is not reasonable. I appeal to hon. members of this House to give this matter their earnest and careful and favourable consideration. I urge them to support this Bill, for I am firmly convinced that it is the only way in which we can at the present time supply the reinforcements for our men at the front of which they stand so much in need. We are not worthy the sacrifices they have made if we do not give them the reserves they need and the support they expect at our hands.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. E. B. DEVLIN (Wright): Mr. Speaker, the subject which is now before the House for discussion is certainly one of the most serious subjects we have had to decide on since Confederation, and no doubt one of the most serious subjects since the time of the cession of this country from the French to the English. In the few remarks which I purpose making this evening, I am going, even at the risk of lèse majesté, to treat the subject purely and simply from the point of view of a Canadian. I might preface what I intend to say by a word or two in answer to the hon. gentleman who preceded me (Mr. Edwards). He asks the question, why is it that in the province of Quebec there should not be more enthusiasm in favour of conscription. If I know anything about the province of Quebec, and I think I do, I have no hesitation in telling him that speeches such as he delivered this afternoon, and such as were delivered by the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Arthurs) yesterday, have more to do with inciting the people of Quebec against conscription than anything else I know of. When an hon. member of this House stands up to give his views upon a certain subject, and a subject of the gravity of the present one, and contents himself solely with making an attack upon one province, and then asks that province to be enthusiastic towards the measure which he pretends to advocate, I desire to say that such a position is illogical. I wondered when I heard those attacks whether those hon. gentlemen really wished to win this war or really wished to damn the province of Quebec. The hon. member from Frontenac has asked two questions. One is: Where was my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) in connection with the Boer war? The next question was: What was his position in the Imperial Conference, or Conferences? Whilst I am speaking I propose to say a few words as to the position of the leader of the Opposition both in connection with the Boer War and in connection with the Imperial Conferences. Further than that, the hon. member for Frontenac will pardon me if I pass over his other remarks in silence, as I think this House would have been better off, certainly Canada would have been better off, and certainly national unity would have been better off, if such utterances as he made had never been made in this House or out of it.

Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the measure which is before the House until it is submitted to the people for their opinion. Personally, I stand with the great majority of the people of the province of Quebec upon that ground and, personally again, when I say that I am opposed in principle to conscription, with the people of Quebec I am ready to forego my personal opinion and submit to the popular will. I am opposed personally to the measure before the House, first, because I do not believe that it is, in its present form, constitutional. Even if it were constitutional, it would so affect the national life of this country as to constitute a radical change which neither you, Sir, nor myself, nor, I claim, any hon. member of this House with the powers and the mandate which we have held since we were elected, has a right to commit the people to without their having first had an opportunity of pronouncing upon it. I say I do not believe that the measure in its present form is constitutional. My right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) has made the statement in this House that the principle of conscription for overseas service has been in the law since the time of the Act which was passed by Sir George Etienne Cartier and the members of this House in 1868. I want to deal with that question for a very few minutes. The section referred to is section 69 of the Militia Act, reading as follows:

> The Governor in Council may place the militia, or any part thereof, on active service anywhere in Canada, and also beyond Canada, for the defence thereof, at any time when it appears advisable so to do by reason of emergency.

When Sir George Etienne Cartier introduced that Act, he spoke as follows in this House on the 17th February, 1868:

> I deny that the proposed military system of the late Government would have implied, as Mr. Rankin asserted, the putting in usage of conscription.

"Pour mettre en usage la conscription" are the exact French words. Again, on the 31st March 1868, he said:

> The sole essential difference between this Bill and the one we proposed in 1862 is upon the subject of enrolment for which I did not ask consent. Under this new law enrolment by captains will cost $32,000.

Throughout all the speeches, if you read them carefully, you will find the idea of providing for military defence is based upon possible incursions or invasions from the United States. So strong was that idea in the minds of the legislators of that day, and immediately prior to it, that we find that Lord Carnarvon, in introducing the British North America Act in the British House of Commons, after his conference with the delegates of the Dominion of Canada, used this language:

> The question of military defence is a somewhat delicate one on which to touch. Military defence supposes war, and war in that part of the world could only be with that great Republic which lies south of our border.

Not only was that the doctrine followed by the men of 1867 and 1868 but, Sir Adolphe Caron, later on Minister of Militia and Defence, in introducing into Parliament the Act of 1883, which was practically a reproduction of the Act of 1868, spoke as follows in the House as reported in Hansard of April 10, 1883:

In Sir George Cartier's time, as now fortunately, we did not require a force for any aggressive purpose, or any other purpose, save securing the safety of the person, protecting property, and defending ourselves against any attack which might, as previously, give us occasion to resist and repel any disorganized, or small organized band crossing the frontier.

That position was thoroughly well recognized by the Prime Minister, because in the message which was sent by His Royal Highness the Governor General on August 1, 1914, we find:—

A question has been mooted respecting the status of any Canadian force serving abroad, as under section 69 of the Canadian Militia Act, the active militia can only be placed on actual service beyond Canada for the defence thereof.

At that time there was just as much necessity of placing the militia of Canada beyond Canada overseas as there is to-day; but the Prime Minister did not wish to take that attitude in this House and commit himself as a constitutional lawyer without saying that he had very grave doubts in his mind as to whether he could rightly take that attitude, and he sought the advice of the Imperial authorities.

The hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) wished to know what was the attitude of the right hon. leader of the Opposition at the Imperial Conferences. I will tell him that at the Conference of 1902 a memorandum of the War Office contained the following:—

Prior to the outbreak of the war in South Africa, so far as any general scheme for the defence of the Empire as a whole had been considered, it was assumed that the military responsibilities of our great self-governing colonies were limited to local defence and that the entire burden of furnishing reinforcements to any portion of the Empire against which a hostile attack in force might be directed must fall on the regular army. There may possibly have been some pious hope that in time of need the colonies might rally to the Mother Country, but no definite arrangements were made, nor were inquiries even on foot as to whether such aid might be expected, and if so, in what strength. Indeed, the necessity for it was by no means realized, and its reliability was doubted.

You will remember that at that time Mr. Chamberlain was making a desperate effort to commit Canada to take part in the wars of the Empire. My right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), then representing Canada, was strong in his stand that the delegates of Canada would not commit Canada to any policy wherein the troops of Canada would be called overseas, until first the people of Canada had pronounced upon it. To such proposals the Canadian delegates answered as follows:—

The Canadian Ministers regret that they have been unable to assent to the suggestion made by Lord Selborne respecting the navy, and by Mr St. John Broderick respecting the army. The Ministers desire to point out that their objections arise, not so much from the expense involved, as from a belief that the acceptance of the proposals would entail an important departure from the principle of colonial self-government

So strong was that opinion in the mind of my right hon. friend the leader of the Government (Sir Robert Borden) that he made the statement in this House, not that the Militia Act of 1868, or the subsequent Militia Acts, including the most recent amendments, would be put in force, but that no law of conscription would be introduced, thereby acknowledging that conscription was not in force in this country. The right hon. leader of the Government said that the first line of defence is in France and in Flanders. Theoretically and for all intents and purposes he may be right, but will he still contend that the putting of the principle of conscription into force, whether the Act is constitutional, or whether it is not, does not constitute a radical change in the national life of this country? I do not think so. I hardly think that the Prime Minister will go that far. He says that the first line of defence is in France and Flanders. Theoretically, I say again, he may be correct. He says, further, that Canada is defending herself and the Empire. I cannot follow him in that reasoning. Great Britain is defending France and Belgium; Canada and the other Dominions are aiding. So far I cannot admit that the Empire is on the defensive; I believe that we are still attacking. I cannot believe that our soldiers are called out to defend Canada. I take it that they are still voluntarily departing from our shores, imbued by the highest motives which can stir the hero, to defend Belgian neutrality and the rights of smaller nations to live a free life, fighting for the highest ideals of freedom and liberty. Will any man tell me, even my friend the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) who was so stirred after reading in the bulletin the other day that some bombs had fallen over England, will even he tell me that Great Britain is now on the defensive? The right hon. gentleman says so, but I have yet to hear any statesman in the Empire other than he make the statement that the Empire is now on the defensive. I cannot believe even the Prime Minister, when, standing alone in this House, he dares to make such a statement. But I can tell you that I do believe that the moment that Canada is in danger and the moment Canada is on her defence, then it will not be a matter of getting 500,000 men to rush to the colours, but every man, young and old, in this country will take up arms.

I object to conscription, Sir, because I am opposed to the principle of coercion. I am not a believer in coercive measures. The whole history of our country has been against coercion. Confederation was formed by the free will of the provinces to enter into a union. At the time of Confederation, whilst we had the might we did not consider that we had the right to coerce any other province of this Dominion into the union. Whenever any question arose as to coercing any section of the community or any province of the Dominion, immediately men in this House, upon both sides, stood up and said: hands off that section, or hands off that province. Coercion has proved a failure wherever it has been adopted, whether in Poland, in Prussia or in Ireland. Prussian militarism is the worst form of coercion. Our men are to-day fighting Prussian militarism—and yet there are hon. gentlemen in this House who are trying to establish it here. If, on the other hand, we are not going out from our shores to prove our attachment to British institutions, then I say that every Dominion sharing equally in Empire benefits must share equally in Empire obligations. Canada must not bear more than Australia, nor Australia more than New Zealand or India, in proportion to population and respective advantages.

My next reason for being opposed to conscription is that there are no military reasons given by the right hon. Prime Minister, nor by any member of this House who advocates the measure, why conscription should be enforced in this country. When the war broke out, all the Government was willing to do was to secure the financial and the industrial institutions of this country. All the Government seemed to be concerned with was to secure the manufacture of munitions in this country, and divide up the orders among their friends. The enormous war profits were to remain, and have remained, for the privileged few, and the Government, even to this day, has not the courage to say that they will conscript the wealth of this country and the industries of this country, but they are quite ready to say they will conscript the blood of the young men of this country. Patriotic citizens came forward, and did a great deal at the beginning of the war. They offered large amounts towards defraying the expenses of the young men who were eager to go to the fighting lines. Let me say, also, that I want to give credit to hon. gentlemen upon the opposite side of the House, as well as to hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, for what they have generously done, in aiding the Allies and aiding this country. I wish to refer, for instance, to the gallant member representing Ste. Antoine Division, Montreal (Sir Herbert Ames). I am witness to the efforts which he has made towards raising money in order to benefit the families of soldiers who have gone to the front. I think, Sir, credit should be given to such men as the hon. member for St. Antoine, for the noble efforts they have inaugurated, to the mothers and fathers of this country, who allowed their sons to go out, in the first place, and to the sons, who nobly went out to fight for what they believed to be the highest principles of freedom and civilization. But I fail to see in what way the Government can claim any benefit for any action they have taken. What have the Government done? They have squandered the people's money. They paid out the money of this country. It was not their money, but the money of the people. It was the taxes paid by the people of this country. In regard to that, without wishing to enter into any recriminations whatever, I must say that most extravagant uses were made of that money, and we have had several years of war scandals. What the Government did, however, was this: they fixed the number of those who might go, but they made no provision for the families of the men who went, or for the men who might return. When the storms of indignation arose in certain parts of the country, a half-hearted action was taken, in the way of pensions. So many men agreed to go from every province of Canada, but, according to the Minister of Militia, the Prime Minister instructed him to go slowly in recruiting. The time having come to meet the ultra imperial clamour in the country, the Prime Minister made up his mind, and made the statement upon his own authority, not upon the authority of this House, nor upon the authority of Council, that 500,000 men should go. He did not give any military reason for that. He did not supply this House with any information. He simply said that 500,000 men would go. Now he says that he cannot get this 500,000 men, and the only way to obtain them is to conscript those who remain, in order to make up the 500,000. I should like to know, Sir, before I cast a vote in favour of conscription, have the Imperial authorities asked us for more men? I see by the papers that General Currie, the general commanding the Canadian forces abroad, has said he requires more officers and more men. A statement was laid on the table of the House a few days ago, by the Government, to the effect that there were thousands of officers in England at the present moment. We know that officers are being returned to Canada, and the reason given is that there is no work for them to do. Does the Government wish to assume that, as General Currie said more officers and men are required, and that we must send more men and officers, or that we are simply to send the men. We have not that information, Sir, and in order to make up our minds just how we should vote, it is necessary that we should have it. Does England ask for reinforcements? We are told that there are 2,000,000 men in the way of reinforcements, in England. Further the statement is made that there are some 3,500,000 in England at the present moment of military age, who have escaped conscription. We are told further, since we must rely upon statements for our information in making up our minds upon this question, that there are in England, at the present moment 1,200,000 men who are occupied at works which are entirely useless in connection with the war, engaged in hotels, brokers' offices and theatres. I wonder if the hon. gentleman from Red Deer thought of those 1,200,000 men when he turned to us upon this side of the House, and said: "Do you know that at this moment, according to the bulletin, bombs are falling over the city of London?" That is information which we should have, and no such information has been given to us. What was the attitude in the British House of Commons when information was asked? It is to be found in the words of Sir Edward Grey, when he was advising the House of Commons what attitude should be taken. Here is what he said:

> The most awful responsibility is resting upon the Government in deciding what to advise the House of Commons to do. We have disclosed our mind to the House of Commons. We have disclosed the issue and the information which we have.

I ask hon. gentlemen, in all fairness to the members of this House, who have given this matter just as serious consideration as they have, in all fairness to the men throughout the provinces of this Dominion, have they given us reasonable information upon which we can base a judgment, or upon which they may base a judgment? Will the right hon. gentleman tell us that he has not that information? What does he say in this House? On June 15, 1917, in repeating the words of the Prime Minister of England; he said:

> The British Cabinet became for the time being an Imperial War Cabinet. While it was in session, its overseas members had access to all the information which was at the disposal of His Majesty's Government, and occupied a status of absolute equality with that of the members of the British War Cabinet. It had prolonged discussions on all the most vital aspects of Imperial policy, and came to important decisions in regard to them—decisions which will enable us to prosecute the war with increased unity and vigour, and which will be of the greatest value when it comes to the negotiations of peace.

I wanted to find out, before making up my mind on the subject, what information the Prime Minister had that he might give to this House. I asked him this question:

> Mr. Devlin: Was there any discussion as to what would be the best form to be adopted in prosecuting the war for a concerted action on the part of the different dominions beyond the seas?

After which the discussion proceeded:

> Sir Robert Borden: The institution of the Imperial Cabinet itself was entered upon with the view that the consultation thus brought about would result in greater unity of purpose and in more effective co-operation.
>
> Mr. Devlin: Was any decision reached by the members of that committee or Cabinet as to what concerted action should be taken by the Dominions beyond the seas?
> Sir Robert Borden: No special consideration was given to any matter of that kind. The deliberations were of a general character with regard to the conduct of the war and the task that had to be accomplished, and the best means of fulfilling that task.

And, Sir, the Prime Minister says that this measure is the result of his own judgment, not of anything that he heard during his attendance at the Imperial War Cabinet or from the Imperial authorities. He did not even question the Imperial authorities; he said that he would resent any questioning of the Imperial authorities on a matter of that kind. But when the naval proposals were before this House the Prime Minister did not hesitate to ask the Imperial authorities for advice. He then said that he had sought and obtained information from the Admiralty Department, which information was in the form of a memorandum; and wanted to commit the members of this House and the people of Canada to that memorandum, which was dictated by a gentleman who has since been put out of the British Cabinet. But would the Prime Minister refuse to seek information from the Imperial authorities upon a matter as weighty as this? Let me again refer to that famous despatch sent by His Royal Highness the Duke of Connaught from Ottawa on August 1, 1914, to the Imperial authorities. The first part of this despatch, which had been placed in the hands of His Royal Highness by the Prime Minister, says:

> In view of the impending danger of war involving the Empire, my advisers are anxiously considering the most effective means of rendering every possible aid, and they welcome any suggestions and advice which the Imperial naval and military authorities may deem it expedient to offer.

The Prime Minister of England tells us that the Prime Minister of this country has all the information necessary, but the Prime Minister says that he has no information bearing upon that point. He adds that he would repel any suggestion on the part of the Imperial authorities, though the very document which I hold in my hand shows that he sought their advice.

I am opposed to the adoption of the measure of conscription which is before the House until the people shall have pronounced upon it. It is suggested by way of amendment to the measure that a referendum be taken. The member for Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark) says that the proposal of a referendum originated in the province of Quebec. I say that the referendum originated from the people throughout Canada who wish the principles of democracy to continue in this country and who wish government for the people and by the people. The member for Red Deer, like a good many other hon. gentlemen in this House, is a thorough believer in anything and everything that comes from England. I should like to read to him the words of Mr. Balfour, leader of the Unionist party, delivered at a meeting in the Albert Hall in London on November 29, 1911, when the question before the people was that of tariff reform. Here is what he said:

> The advantage of a referendum is this: that the issue is quite clear and quite precise. A referendum has an enormous advantage. It does not involve a general election; it does not involve all the personal bitterness inevitably involved in a contest between the two competitors for a seat; it does not carry with it a change of government; and it does get a clear verdict from the people.

Whether or not you believe with me, Mr. Speaker, that section 69 of the Militia Act of Canada does not authorize conscription for overseas service, there is no doubt that the Government wish this House to concur in the principle of conscription for overseas service. I repeat what I said at the opening of my remarks; that the application of that principle, even if the principle be admitted, constitutes a radical change in the life of this country. I was elected in peace time to vote under the general mandate usually given members of Parliament, and have continued my tenure of office by my own vote. Can I conscientiously commit the 45,000 or 55,000 people whom I represent to a law such as this—changing, as it would, our national life—without first submitting the question to them? The debate so far has stirred men as no other debate in this House ever did. Each member is answerable to the dictates of his conscience; for my part, I cannot find it in mine to commit my constituents to such a radical change in their national life before they have pronounced upon the question.

A further consideration impels me most strongly to support the amendment of my right hon. friend. I have always been a firm believer in the national unity of this country. This measure, unless submitted to the people, will cause national friction; of that, Sir, you are as well aware as I am. If any hon. member had any doubt about it, he would have only to listen to the two speeches to which I have referred—those of the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) this afternoon and the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Arthurs) yesterday—to understand that the people of Quebec would naturally resent such statements made by such men, who, while not members of the Government, are of high standing among the Government followers. You will readily understand that the people of Quebec will resent such statements; that they will not accept the proposal made by the Government unless it is first submitted to the will of the people; unless the people shall have had a chance of declaring themselves upon it—if for no other reason than for the insults offered against that province by hon. members of this House.

Apparently the slogan has been "Win the war." But really it has been "Win the war and damn Quebec." If I had no other reason to say that there would be civil strife in the province from which I come, I need simply point to what was given by the Secretary of State (Mr. Patenaude) in his letter to the Prime Minister of this country as his sole reason for resigning from the Cabinet. This is what he said:

> From the moment you submitted this intention to the Council, I drew your attention to its extreme gravity and to the consequences which to my mind, would follow.

Further on he said:

> I have always thought, and do yet think, that the best interests of Canada make it a duty for the country to give to the cause of the Allies its most generous support. But to do this, I cannot concur in any measure which, in my estimation, imperils national unity. The proposed law, I have every reason to fear, threatens to destroy this unity, and to give rise throughout the country to keep internal divisions, of long duration, and even detrimental to the needs of the present moment. Indeed it is better to keep the country united in the present effort, than to attempt a mightier one at the cost of national disruption.

I wish these words were not true, but I think I know enough about the province of Quebec to know that they are true. I believe further, that if in support of the stand which I have conscientiously taken in this House, I were to make an attack upon any other provinces in the Dominion, hon. gentlemen of the House would resent it even more bitterly than I resent the attacks which have been made against my native province. But such an attack, so far from supporting the cause which I am advocating, would in my opinion tend solely to aggravate the ill-feeling that exists at the present time. To say that the people of the province of Quebec are not concerned in the welfare of the boys in the trenches is going very far, very far indeed. French Canadians may be at the front in only a few thousands, but those thousands of boys who have enlisted and gone overseas are as dear to the mothers and fathers and families of the province of Quebec as are the boys who have gone from the sister provinces imbued with the same idea, and the people of the province of Quebec will stand by those boys in the trenches in the way they deem best.

It has been urged that the right hon. leader of the Opposition has had a great deal to do with the lack of recruiting in the province of Quebec. I would humbly ask his pardon for touching on this matter at all, but some hon. members have made the statement that my right hon. leader has addressed only one recruiting meeting. Now I have been present upon the platform on several occasions when the right hon. gentleman has made speeches in the province of Quebec urging the young men to go of their own free will, saying that if he were young enough to take up arms he would be over there himself. An attack has been made against the right hon. leader of the Opposition, and at the present moment that attack comes from other provinces than the province of Quebec. I hardly think the right hon. leader of the Opposition requires any defence on my part, but if he would allow me to say a word, it would be this: No man in this country since the days of Lord Durham has devoted more time and attention to the study of the question of the races in this country than has the right hon. leader of the Opposition, and no man has been more successful than he in uniting the various elements in the population of this country. No man has been so tried by racial prejudices as he. Have you not felt, Mr. Speaker, over and over again since you and I came into this House that the right hon. gentleman has courageously faced the storm of conflicting opinion, never faltering in his devotion to the Empire, never failing in his love for his Canadian people. He has ever risen above race; he has been blind to prejudice; he has given his whole soul to the nation, and the nation has ever held him as an ideal. My hon. friend the member for Frontenac wants to know what stand the right hon. leader of the Opposition took in connection with the Boer war; I will tell him. He stood by the constitution of this country, and by the interests of the Empire. He faced prejudice coming not from other provinces alone, but from his own native province of Quebec. Seventeen years ago, under circumstances similar to those now prevailing, he said:

> If there is anything to which I have consecrated my political life it is the development of union and harmony between the different elements of our people. My friends may abandon me and withdraw their confidence from me; my party may take from me the leadership which they confided to me, but never will I deviate from the line of policy which I have traced for myself.

Would the hon. member for Frontenac get up in the face of prejudice from his own province and utter words as noble as those?

Mr. Speaker, friends to-day may differ. We on this side of the House have differed on this subject, it is a subject which lends itself to differences of opinion, but to-day the right hon. leader of the Opposition remains and will remain the most trusted, the most respected, and the most honoured leader of Liberalism in Canada, commanding the esteem and affection of every hon. gentleman who sits on this side of the House, and I ask hon. gentlemen to bear me out in that statement.

My concluding words are these. If I understand the basic principles of our Parliament, its attributes, and its constitution, they are founded upon the rights of the people and for the people of Canada. As a Canadian I want to say that the moment you attempt to legislate against the will of a great section of the people without giving them a chance to pronounce upon the measures proposed, you are legislating in spite of the rights of the people, and are infringing upon that constitution which has always been the guarantee of Canadian liberty and Canadian security. You are disrupting the work of Confederation, and that on the eve of the fiftieth anniversary of Confederation. You are throwing our province into the turmoil of strife, thereby defeating the very aim which we all have in view, the aiding of our Allies and standing by the boys in the trenches. No Government in this country, no Parliament, no political party, has a monopoly of patriotism, but all are imbued with the strongest possible love of country. You want to stand by the boys in the trenches? So do we. Those boys are as dear to us as they are to any hon. gentleman seated opposite. We will stand by them, and we will stand by them with hon. gentlemen opposite; but we must at least be allowed to say that in our judgment and in our conscience the measure taken by this Government will not have the effect of standing by the boys in the trenches.

Coercive measures are unnecessary, and they will be resented. Economy in your expenditure; the organization of your efforts to develop trade and industry; the encouragement of agriculture; increased production, are the urgent needs of to-day—to-morrow will bring other and new problems. Mr. Speaker, I have heard since my childhood that "Britons never shall be slaves." I say that Canadians never shall be slaves to an autocratic and irresponsible Government. And any Government which to-day, in view of the opinions openly expressed in this country, and knowing the temper of the Canadian people who may be for, or who may be against, the measure now proposed, attempts to enact it without the free will of the people being heard, is both autocratic and irresponsible.

Sir HERBERT AMES (Montreal, St. Antoine): Mr. Speaker, when a member of Parliament is called upon to decide his course of action, there are two conceptions of duty which have to be reckoned with. On the one hand, he may regard himself as the mouthpiece of his constituency; he may consider that he is here to record what he believes to be the will of the majority of those who sent him. On the other hand, occasions sometimes arise where he is in possession of fuller information, and has greater opportunities for consideration of a question than his constituents, and where the duty rests upon him to follow his conscience and to lead rather than follow those whom he represents. Most of us have been elected in this House as exponents of certain fixed principles. When a question arises that affects those principles, our course is easy, our constituents know what to expect of us, and we do what they ex-unforeseen and unexpected, we are thrown upon our own resources. We then are compelled to take stock of the situation; to arrive at decisions; to take a position; and we must be ready to stand or fall by that decision when the time comes for us to again meet those who sent us. Fortunate indeed is the member of the House whose personal inclinations, the known views of whose constituents, and the tenets of whose party all coincide. He has only to swim down the current; everything is going his way. He has very little occasion for self-glorification, less occasion for criticism of others whose position is difficult, and no occasion whatever to condemn the conscientious action of his fellow-members.

Since this measure was introduced in the House, I have received a number of communications from my constituents. These have come in the form of petitions, of resolutions, of personal letters. They are on both sides of the question; some are for and some are against the Bill. An organization in Montreal known as "La Ligue Patriotique des interets Canadiens," sent me a number of petitions signed extensively by people I know. Many of these are citizens of standing in my constituency; many of them are the wives and mothers of persons well known in my city. That is an example of what is coming on one side. On the other hand, I have received a resolution of the Board of Trade, the President of which is a French-Canadian, in favour of conscription. I have received

9 p.m. resolutions from various church organizations. And I have received two resolutions, one from the English and one from the French branch of the Great War Veterans of the Province of Quebec. Among the petitions I have received the one which in some respects is the most notable is that which comes from the French section of the Great War Veterans of the city of Montreal. I know the men who make up that organization. Many of them have served at the front with honour to themselves and to their race. The president, the vice-president, the secretary and the treasurer were all members of that famous 22nd Battalion which again and again has had its ranks filled up, and which has covered itself with glory, as we all so well know. These men, I think, can speak with some authority. They have been overseas; their motives cannot be impugned; they have themselves seen conditions at the front; they know the needs and the wastage; they have left their comrades still fighting; they have seen what it means when the Hun retreats from devastated France; they have every reason to know, to know to the full, what it would mean if we should lose this war. A resolution passed unanimously by a body of that kind is a resolution which I must certainly receive with respect. Let me read it to you. It is in French, but I think we shall all understand it just the same:—

Proposé par J. C. Poirier, appuyé par E. Frereault.

Considérant que l'enrôlement volontaire non-seulement dans Québec mais le Dominion entier est devenu pratiquement chose du passé. Considérant que pour seconder les efforts des Alliés et mener cette guerre à bonne fin, de nouvelles troupes sont immédiatement requises. Considérant que le Gouvernement a le pouvoir de mettre en force l'Acte de la milice.

Qu'il soit résolu:—

Que la section' française de Montréal, branche de l'Association des Vétérans de la Grande Guerre demande au Gouvernement d'imposer le service obligatoire pour tout homme valide de 20 à 45 ans de manière a ce:—

Riches comme pauvres
Professionnels comme ouvriers
Patrons comme employés

Mr. C. A. WILSON: Will the hon. gentleman be good enough to tell us by whom that is signed, or if it is signed at all?

Sir HERBERT AMES: It came to me in the official envelope of Association Canadienne des Vétérans de la Grande Guerre, section française; chambre 20, édifice "La Presse". Comité exécutif: N. Marion, président, C. Poirier, vice-président, E. Frereault, secrétaire, J. Boulay, trésorier, E. Turcot, sergent d'armes. Conseil: P. Vadboncœur, docteur E. Turgeon, H. Portugal.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: The hon. gentleman has not answered my question. I have received a similar document, but there are no signatures to it and no certificate with it.

Sir HERBERT AMES: Mine came in the official envelope from the Secretary's office.

Mr. MEDERIC MARTIN: Do you know how long that society has existed?

Sir HERBERT AMES: I understand that it has existed ever since these brave men came back from France.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: Can you find in the resolution anything relating particularly to the Bill that is before the House? You read it in French but I would like you to translate it into good English to show this House that it does not refer to the Bill before the House.

Sir HERBERT AMES: I will be glad to translate it into English or to read the English version as published in the papers. I shall read the whole extract:

At a meeting of the French section of the War Veterans' Association (L'Association Canadienne des Soldats de Retour du Front), held this morning in the rooms of the association, 20 La Presse Building, the following resolution, which will be sent forthwith to the Prime Minister of Canada, was adopted unanimously:

"Proposed by J. C. Poirier, vice-president of the association, seconded by E. Frerault, secretary:

"Considering that voluntary enlistment has practically ceased, not only in the province of Quebec but in the whole Dominion generally;

"Considering that the Government has the power to put the Militia Act into force, be it resolved:

"That the French Section of the District of the War Veterans' Association request that compulsory service be imposed on all available men in Canada between the ages of 20 and 45.

They go farther than we do.

"So that rich and poor, professional men and workers, employers and employees, married and single, aliens and citizens may take their share in the sacred cause which the Allies have been defending for the past three years."

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: Does not my hon. friend notice that in the resolution they are speaking of the Militia Act and is not that a very different thing?

Sir HERBERT AMES: I am quite willing to accept this as proof that they favour conscription. The last words of the resolution are sufficient indication as to what the purpose of the conscription is. Can I be of any further service to my hon. friend?

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: The hon. gentleman did not answer my question. I happen to have known the hon. gentleman for many years and I know how he can skip around questions.

Sir HERBERT AMES: Now, I cannot hope or expect to be able to satisfy all the signers of these petitions because they ask for absolutely opposite things. It remains for me only to pursue conscientiously my own path, and even if that does not appear to be in the interests of harmony, to do the best I can to persuade those who differ from me that the course I have adopted, is reasonable, right and necessary.

Now, what are the facts? No country was ever more unprepared for war than was the Dominion of Canada on the 1st of August, 1914. We had a standing army of 3,000 men and we had 60,000 men who had some little militia training. We had no expectation of being embroiled in any war either on this continent or anywhere else. The war came very suddenly, and, as the legislation under the constitution, provides, Parliament was summoned within fifteen days and Parliament met here and faced the situation as it then existed. We came from every part of Canada, the facts were laid before us, and, what did we do? We decided without a dissenting voice, without a word of protest, that Canada was in that war, that she was in it to the very limit and that the only bounds we should set would be the extent of the need and the maximum of our capacity. It was a unanimous decision. We reached that decision in ten days, adjourned and went to work as best we could, each one of us, to carry out the spirit and letter of that decision. We have met again and again and each time we have found that there were greater developments, greater calls upon us, greater needs, and we have tried to face them as they have come. The men of our first and following contingents went over with the understanding that we would back them up. The wives, mothers and relatives of those who went had the promise, not merely the implied promise, but a promise as formal as any Act could give them that if their sons, brothers and fathers went to the front, those who did not go with them but who remained in comfort at home would support them so long as they defended our interests over there. That was the pledge; that was the promise.

Hitherto we have been able to carry out that promise by voluntary effort. I have only words of the highest praise for the magnificent voluntary effort that has been put forward. It has been a marvellous thing that it has not been necessary before this to resort to conscription. If any one had asked me at the beginning of the war if we could raise 50,000 men, or 150,000, on the voluntary enlistment principle, I would have said: I doubt it. But, we have sent overseas 330,000 men raised by voluntary enlistment and we have enlisted a still further number. The response has been magnificent. But voluntary recruiting has reached its limit. It is a fact that we cannot get men by that method to-day. The figures are there. The voluntary method, do what we may, will yield but few more men. There is no use in our indulging in recriminations as to whether we have carried on the voluntary method in the best way or not. There is no use in talking first of one province and then of another along that line. The situation is too serious at the present time to permit of the waste of time in that sort of business. What we want to do here is to see how we can reinforce these men who are at the front. To abandon them would be unthinkable. To ask them to contract their lines, the lines that they have won inch by inch and foot by foot, lines on which their comrades have died, lines in which are the little cemeteries with their brave dead—to ask them to contract those lines and to entrust the holding of a certain section to others, would be to break their hearts, to weaken their morale and to make them feel that they had been abandoned far away from home by those for whom they were fighting.

They must be reinforced. But how? I take it that every man in this House wants to see them reinforced. I do not think there is any question about that. The only question is: How shall we do it? None of us desires to resort to compulsory enlistment, but will any one say that he knows of any other method by which these reinforcements can be obtained? They must be obtained and if they cannot be secured in any other way we shall have to do so as all the fighting nations are doing to-day, that is resort to the one systematic and scientific method, we shall have to resort to conscription.

There is nothing new about conscription. It is an absolutely fundamental principle of self-government. The enjoyment of liberties brings with it responsibility. Ever since the world began, and ever since civilized communities began to exist and govern themselves, we have necessarily had organization for defence. In the last analysis, every man, every woman and every child in this Dominion could be called upon to defend our rights, our liberties and our land. There is no questioning the fact that a conscription law has been in force in Canada for one hundred years at least and that as far as the statute-books are concerned, although many of us have not known it, and it could have been invoked legally at any time had the necessity arisen.

There was cited in this House the other night an extract from a judgment which expressed in better terms than I can state it what the defence of Canada implies. I refer to a judgment by the Chief Justice of the Superior Court of Quebec, the Hon. Sir Francois Lemieux. The judgment will be found in the records of the Superior Court of Quebec, volume 1, 1916. It is to be found at page 490 of the French version. Let me read the French version:

A mon humble avis, la défense du Canada comprend non seulement le droit de sauvegarder son territoire et la vie et la propriété des habitants, mais comporte de plus la faculté reconnue d'ailleurs par le droit international, de prévenir par tous les moyens admis la ruine et la dévastation du pays, en attaquant l'ennemi chez lui, en le poursuivant partout, en paralysant ses moyens d'action, le harcelant sans trève et le réduisant à l'impuissance. La nécessité bien légitime de la défense contre l'agression autorise naturellement l'attaque de l'ennemi chez lui ou ailleurs. C'est souvent en semant la détresse en pays ennemi qu'on assure le mieux la défense de son propre pays. Ce serait bien imprudent, pour ne pas dire plus, pour un pays en guerre, de s'en tenir à la defensive, d'attendre que son territoire fût envahi et dévasté pour songer à repousser l'ennemi.

This was read in English the other night, so perhaps I need not repeat it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Read it.

Sir HERBERT AMES: It is as follows:

In my humble opinion the defence of Canada implies not only the power to safeguard the territory itself and the lives and property of Canadians, it further includes the faculty recognized in international law to prevent, by all legitimate means, the invasion, ruin and sacking of the country, in attacking the enemy in his own country, pursuing him everywhere, destroying his resources, giving him no rest until he be reduced to utter powerlessness. The very legitimate necessity of opposing an onslaught quite naturally justifies the attack of the enemy in his own country or wherever he may seek refuge. It often is by taking the offensive, attacking and invading, that the defence of one's own country may be better attended to. It would indeed be imprudent, if not utterly reckless, for a country at war, to be content with a defensive strategy and to refrain from hostilities until the country were invaded and sacked.

I am sure that no one in this House or out of it will venture to suggest that the Chief Justice of Quebec, the Hon. Sir Francois Lemieux, is not an authority on matters of that kind, that he does not speak as a man who knows what he is speaking about. Every one will agree that he speaks as one who has studied deeply constitutional questions and is well qualified to give an opinion thereon. In his opinion, the best war of defence is a war of attack, wherever the enemy may be.

A good deal of time has been spent in this House in explaining the origin of the Militia Act of 1904, and going back and citing many of the opinions held at the time of the enactment of the original Militia Act and its various amendments There seems to me no real ground for contendng that even under the Act of 1904 conscription is not permissible. I think we all admit that the Act of 1904, under certain circumstances, contemplates wholesale conscription. The only difference of opinion is as to whether, under the old Militia Act, that conscription should be for men who could be sent, against their will, overseas. I do not pretend to discuss that point. I understand that Sir Charles Fitzpatrick, who was at the time Minister of Justice and who is now Chief Justice of Canada, was of opinion, when that Act was passed, that it did permit men to be sent overseas. I understand that that is the opinion of the law officers of the Crown to-day. Not being a lawyer, I am willing to accept that opinion, considering my own in that respect to be of no great value. But I do not think that is the vital question. In any event the principal question with us is, how can we do what we want to do? And if the law already on the statute books is not sufficient, the quickest and simplest course is to pass an Act that will be sufficient, and if I rightly read the Bill that is now before the House, section 2 covers the situation as fully as an Act can.

Every male British subject who comes within one of the classes . . . . shall be liable to be called out as hereinafter provided on active service in the Canadian Expeditionary Force for the defence of Canada, either in or beyond Canada,— —unless he falls under certain exemptions. We will all admit, I think, that this Act will meet the circumstances of the case, and if the old Act leaves any doubt, the sooner we can pass an Act in which the purpose, the destination and the method is clear, I think the better it will be for our country and its defence.

I have listened attentively to many of the speeches made in this House since this Bill was introduced. There is very little new that can now be said. We all admit that it only remains for us individually, so to speak, to make our confessions and to endeavour to clarify the situation in our own minds and those of our constituents. But certain objections have been raised, and those objections have been put forth with logic, with reason and with sincerity. I for my part feel that some of the objections should be answered, or that at least an attempt should be made to answer them.

The first objection that has been advanced is that the need for men is not so apparent as to justify this measure. The other night the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley), who sits on the opposite side of the House, attempted to show that there were 126,000 reserves in England and 90,000 here. His figures fell down completely when they were analyzed, but it is well that the actual figures should be placed on Hansard in concrete form. It is true that there are 126,000 men in England, but only one-half of those are combatants, 30,000 of them are ready for the firing line, 35,000 more will be fit in the course of the next few months; 65,000 all told will be the sum total of combatant reinforcements out of that 126,000 men. In Canada to-day there are less than 20,000 who may be regarded as in class A, that is men who will eventually be fit for the trenches. But the most significant figures of all are those in respect to infantry recruiting. We are told that the infantry losses are generally the greatest at the front. In April and May our casualties amounted to 23,939. These were largely infantry, and you will see that this involves a wastage of over 10,000 men a month.

How many men have we been recruiting throughout Canada during the last five months to make up the wastage in infantry? In January 5,707, in February there were 2,358; in March, 2,286; in April, 1,794; in May, 1,208 or an average of 2,670 infantrymen recruited in Canada since the year began. It needs no abstruse calculation in arithmetic to demonstrate that, if our casualties are 10,000 a month, and our infantry reinforcements not more than a quarter of that number, the time is not far distant when the infantry reinforcements on hand will be exhausted, unless some steps are taken to secure more men. It is true there were 34,376 enlistments in the first five months of this year, but a very large proportion of those is composed of non-combatants. They were 13,353 infantry, 4,187 artillerymen, 8,317 forestry and railroad construction battalions, 8,523 miscellaneous arms of the service. Not more than one half of the total number, therefore, may be considered as infantry and artillery, which are the real combatant forces. It takes from eight to twelve months to train men for the firing line, and, even if we should now raise the men authorized under the Bill, if it passes, it would be 1918, probably, before the first of them would be used for service in France. It, therefore, does not admit of delay, because the reserve that we have on hand will be exhausted by Christmas, and after Christmas, what are we to do for more men?

There is no man who is to-day better qualified to speak of the military situation than the commander in chief of our forces in France. Even at the risk of repeating what may have been said by others, I want to read the recent messages from General Sir Arthur Currie, who knows more about the military situation overseas than any other living man. When he received a telegram of congratulation upon his recent honour, from the Prime Minister of Canada, his reply contained this significant clause:

> It is an imperative and urgent necessity that steps be immediately taken to insure that sufficient drafts of officers and men are sent from Canada to keep the corps at its full strength.

And immediately after being interviewed by Mr. F. A. Mackenzie of the Montreal Star, General Currie said:

> "I've no wish to interfere with current political controversies, but my personal conviction is that the only solution to the problem of Canadian recruiting is conscription. I believe that many difficulties which now threaten the adoption of such a policy would disappear before prompt and bold action.
>
> "My experiences in France have shown me, not as a politician, but as a soldier, the necessity of conscription, if we desire to maintain at full strength our fighting divisions to the end."

Mr. MARTIN (St. Mary's, Montreal) (translation): Will the hon. gentleman allow me a question?

Sir HERBERT AMES: Certainly.

Mr. MARTIN: Is it not to your knowledge that the French Government has decided to send back home—unhappily I have not here the paper in which the statement is made—all the aged soldiers so they can help on the farms? How does the hon. gentleman explain the fact?

Sir HERBERT AMES: I am aware of that and we are doing the same thing here, for Canada.

Mr. MARTIN: It is better to keep them here, then.

Sir HERBERT AMES: In France, the Government has decided to send back home the aged soldiers, to do farm work. Here in Canada, we do not intend to send overseas old men and farmers; our aim is to draft young men only.

Mr. MARTIN: How will we then manage to turn out munitions? My hon. friend who represents St. Antoine division, in the City of Montreal knows as well as I do, that even at this moment it is very hard, if not impossible, to get all the labour required and that some very important work will have to be discontinued.

Sir HERBERT AMES: If my hon. friend will allow me we shall discuss this phase of the question later on.

Sir HERBERT AMES: There are none of us probably who have not friends overseas, probably none of us who have not relations and intimate friends in the firing line, and I ask those who are in receipt of letters from those boys overseas from week to week, what do the boys ask for? Do they not write and say: "Send us reinforcements; we need them more than anything else?" One of the bravest men I ever knew, and one of my personal friends, Colonel Victor Buchanan, killed not long ago, served in a Montreal Highland regiment. The last letter he wrote me had one note in it from end to end: "We need men; our Highland regiment is being filled up with drafts from every part of Canada; do tell the people of Montreal to send us more Montreal Highlanders, so that our ranks may be filled." Can any man with a sympathetic heart turn a deaf ear to letters from those he has known all his life, when they ask that they be not abandoned on the firing line?

Another objection which is raised is that this Parliament is incompetent to pass such an Act. It is said that Parliament is six years old, that there are twenty vacancies, and that a number of additional constituencies, under the new distribution, are entitled to members. That is an absolutely erroneous idea. No question can be raised, by any one who knows anything about legal or constitutional law, as to our right to pass such a measure as this. Our constitution is the British North America Act and its amendments. The amendments are just as valid as the Act. If the Act tells us that the life of Parliament is five years, and the amendment extends it to six, seven, ten, or twenty, the amendment is just as valid as the original Act, and any Act we may pass in this Parliament, while it is legally constituted, is equally valid, whether it be passed in the first or the last year of our incumbency in office. The question whether we have a moral right is another matter, but the legal right is absolutely incontestible. My hon. friend, the member for St. Mary's, the mayor of Montreal (Mr. Martin) asked me a question a moment ago as to whether we could spare the men. In his judgment, as first magistrate of the city of Montreal, he believed we could not. I would like to discuss that with him for a moment, because we are both interested alike in that great city. I have noticed in this Parliament that the hon. gentlemen who ask us to give the voluntary system another trial are the very ones who say we cannot spare the men. If we cannot spare the men raised by conscription, how can we spare them when they are raised by the voluntary system? In fact, the men that might be raised by a continuation of the voluntary system would be far less easily spared than the men that will be obtained by conscription.

Sir HERBERT AMES: Another plea that we sometimes hear is that conscription is going to tear the husband from his wife and the father from his little children, and break up the homes of this country by force. If we had had conscription at the beginning, there would have been no breaking up of homes. There are 75,000 married men that have left their wives and children and gone overseas. If there had been a systematic law upon the statute book at the beginning, it would not have been necessary to send these married men across, and, as I understand, under this Bill we expect to get 100,000 more men, I call the attention of this House to the fact that in all probability the full number would be obtained by calling up classes 1, 2 and 3, and those classes include only single men, or widowers without children, between the ages of 20 and 35.

The entire number of men, that this measure will call for, will be obtained without tearing a single husband from his wife or a single father from his loving children at home. Further, let me point out that there will be exceptions wherever they are expedient in the national interest. Men who are essential to the munition factories in Montreal will not be sent overseas; men who can be spared from the munition factories and whose places may be taken by returned soldiers, women or old men, will probably be sent overseas. But the readjustment will not seriously impair the efficiency of the munition factories.

We are told that it will ruin the country to send overseas another 100,000 men. According to the 1911 census, there were in Canada at that time 636,746 unmarried men between the ages of 20 and 35. As nearly as I can calculate the figures of the Patriotic Fund permit me to get fairly near it—about 235,000 unmarried men between the ages of 20 and 35, have gone overseas. Deduct that number from the total and you still have 400,000 unmarried men in Canada between the ages of 20 and 35 from whom the choice can be made to make up the number required by this measure. If one-quarter of the unmarried men now in Canada are selected with care and discretion, I believe they could be sent forward without seriously handicapping our industries. It was said the other night by the Minister of Inland Revenue that the quota for Quebec might be 25,000 men. That would be the one-eightieth part of the total population of Quebec. We have already enlisted nearly twice that number in Quebec; I do not believe that it would stop our industries if one-half as many men as have already gone were further sent from our good province.

The enforcement of this Act will be in the hands of the Department of Justice. That is one of the departments which we all admit is likely to be the most impartial, the less liable to be influenced by outside motives. A board of selection will be chosen. I trust that that board of selection will be composed of men representing every section, nationality and class throughout the whole Dominion. I trust that both sides of the House will co-operate in choosing that board. I would suggest that on that board there be representatives of the French-speaking people of Quebec and representatives of organized labour. Further, we should be willing to go outside the House in making up that board of selection. That board will choose half the members of the local boards and the Superior Court judges or their appointees will choose the remaining half. In any event one-half the membership of every local board will be appointed under judicial authority and the other half by a board of selection which this House and the Senate shall name. If there is any method by which greater impartiality can be shown; if members on the opposite side can make any suggestion with a view of making this Act absolutely fair to all concerned, I am sure the Government will accept their suggestions with great pleasure and work them into the Bill.

During the last two or three months I have been very much interested in watching the wonderful manner in which our American cousins have gone into this war. It so happened that I was in Washington just before war was declared by the United States, speaking on behalf of the Navy League Fund, and I had opportunities of discussing with the leading naval and military authorities what would be done by the United States in case war was declared. Although the army authorities were strongly in favour of a selective draft system, they were not at all certain that they could secure its ratification by the Senate and House of Representatives. I was, therefore, considerably surprised when I found that the United States had adopted a measure of conscription by selective draft. They established a law which provided that every man between 21 and 30 should register on June 5. Ten million men throughout the United States registered on that day. They then made the allotment of quotas in the several states, and they are now by ballot drafting what men are needed to make up the first 500,000

The United States had apparently less reason for being interested in this war than had Canada. The United States, like ourselves, have no material profit to make out of this war and are less liable to be ravaged than we are if the Germans should win. Yet, profiting by the experience and mistakes of others, they are taking up their war measures with a wisdom and celerity which cannot be too highly commended.

Last week I was in Worcester and Springfield, Massachussetts, speaking to magnificent audiences in connection with Red Cross Funds. They raised, as you know, $110,000,000 in the United States for this purpose during the past week. I was entertained by a member of Congress in the state of Massachussetts, and I asked him about that registration on the 5th of June. I said: Did you have any trouble with your registration? None whatever, he replied. Did you find any unwillingness on the part of your population to register? None whatever, he said. You have a good many of my fellow-countrymen here; were they willing to register? Every man, he said, registered. When I went to the town of Northampton I was told something that made me feel proud of my country and of the province in which I was born. When the day of registration arrived every Canadian in that town went to mass in the morning. They arranged a procession, with their flags and full regalia. The whole Canadian population of that town went to the registration booth, with the young men between 21 and 30 in a special platoon by themselves, and every man between those ages registered and is ready and willing, if drafted, to fight overseas in this common cause.

The example of Australia has been cited. That is not a very good example for hon. gentlemen on the other side to cite, because Australia, which has a population about two-thirds that of Canada, up to the first of May, had sent 362,000 men, or one man out of every fourteen. If we had done as well as Australia we should have sent 540,000 men and conscription would not as yet be necessary in order to keep up our lines. New Zealand has had conscription for some time, and has found the measure to work admirably.

The criticism that I believe to be of the greatest weight—the one which appeals to me more than any other—is the criticism that this measure finds our people unprepared for its acceptance. I think that is true. We all admit it; some of us admit it with considerable regret. The people of Canada were not prepared for this announcement. They are not prepared to-day for the acceptance of conscription, but I believe that they will be prepared for it by the time the law is put into force. We do not realize the enormous changes that each year brings in connection with the war. It is only now sinking into us what this war really means.

Each year our preconceptions are necessarily changed, and we find ourselves face to face with new conditions. It is my belief that the Prime Minister of Canada up to the end of 1916 had no intention or expectation of bringing in a measure of conscription. I believe he was sincere when he said he did not anticipate that that would be necessary. However, he went over to England and spent two months there. He took part in the Imperial War Council; he visited France and met our own boys at the front; he talked with our generals and considered the whole situation; and knowing him as I do, I believe that he was persuaded against his will. I know that when he came back to Canada he was convinced that conscription alone would keep up our lines, and therefore the announcement was made.

Things have greatly changed in the last few months. It is not fair to say, because we were unprepared for conscription six months ago and did not believe it would be necessary in this country, that therefore we are bound not to have conscription. What has happened? In the first place Russia has collapsed. Where we had expected to have the Russian steam roller moving this year with its millions on the eastern front, and bringing out German reserves to stem it, on the contrary we find that three-quarters of a million Germans have been withdrawn from the Russian front and sent over to France to fight against our forces there. Consequently the demand for reinforcements on the western front is far greater than was anticipated. More than that; it means that the war will not end this year, perhaps not next year, and possibly not the year after that.

There is another unexpected feature which has changed the situation, and that is that the United States have agreed to a measure of conscription. Look at the emigration figures for the last four or five years and you will see that there has been considerable egress of Canadians to the other side. It would have been unwise for Canada to endeavour to pass a measure of conscription while the United States did not have a similar law. It would have meant that a considerable number of people would have slipped over the line, and we would have lost just that number. But with conscription on both sides of the line that is avoided. The introduction of a measure of conscription in the United States has changed the situation here and makes it not only possible but advisable for us to have conscription here.

But the main reason for its adoption is the falling off in recruiting. When only 1,200 infantrymen can be recruited in Canada in a single month, and when our casualties for the same period amount to ten times that number, it makes every thoughtful man pause and say that something must be done. So a new policy has become necessary. The opposition to the measure is to my mind largely due to lack of appreciation of the conditions, and that imposes upon every true Canadian the necessity of endeavouring to make the actual situation known, and of meeting differences of opinion fairly by argument, and endeavouring to persuade opponents of the measure to adopt the course which he believes should be taken.

We sometimes hear in this House mention of the conscription of wealth. It is not unnatural that those who are called upon to send their sons to the front should feel that wealthy men should give handsomely of their money to support the Allied cause. I think I know something about how that general demand originated. Ever since the war began I have been travelling up and down Canada, talking to people in an endeavour to get them to contribute to the Patriotic Fund. The people of this country have given magnificently, more than $25,000,000 having been contributed for the wives and dependent relatives of our soldiers. But again and again, when I have sat down with some of these patriotic committees and talked of raising large sums of money, they have said: "Yes we will raise the money, but there are one or two men here who will not contribute, and their refusal hinders us more than anything else." Many princely gifts have been made since this war began. I want to pay tribute to the men of wealth who have given over and over again in lavish measure. I know men of wealth who are living in the simplest possible manner, giving away as much as they are using—half their incomes. I had breakfast with a gentleman the other morning who has voluntarily given $200,000 since the war began to the various war charities, and he is prepared to give more. Now these men are giving today far more than they would contribute under any form of taxation that the Finance Minister would dare impose upon the people of Canada. He would not take by law one tithe of what some of them are giving voluntarily to-day. Yet there are the exceptions of which I spoke, and if the Minister of Finance can concoct any scheme by which these exceptions can be made to contribute in some way to the war, he will have my vote and heartiest sympathy.

I represent a constituency which is Canada in miniature. I have, in about the same proportion that you will find throughout the Dominion, the various elements which make up our total population. I regard that as one of the happiest circumstances in connection with my parliamentary career, as it gives me an opportunity to understand different points of view and to realize that there are many men who are just as conscientious in their views as I am or anyone else can be. In connection with this measure I shall find it necessary to offend some of these people. It will be my duty to endeavour to explain to them why I feel that this Bill must pass. I shall try to secure harmony by getting them to see the matter as I see it. I would not have the members of this House imagine, because some irresponsible young men break windows occasionally in Montreal, that we have not free speech in my province. I do not think there is a province in the Dominion where the two sides of a question are discussed more fairly or more fully than they are at the hustings and on the platforms throughout the province of Quebec. Free speech is not dead, and never will be. I expect to have the opportunity of meeting men whose opinions differ from mine, but I am confident that they will give me a fair hearing and extend to me the same courtesy that I should receive if I were speaking for the very cause which they themselves represent. I have represented for the last twenty years men whose views differ from my own, and I have yet to be treated for the first time with discourtesy, or not allowed a fair hearing.

In a newspaper I picked up the other day I saw a recommendation that Quebec should be exempted from this Bill. I venture to say that if any one should have the temerity to introduce into this House a resolution to exempt Quebec from this Bill, every French Canadian in the House would vote against it. Our people are a proud-spirited race. They may use every constitutional method of opposing what they do not endorse, but they do not wish to be classed with any specially exempted peoples.

I am opposed to a referendum because I think even after a referendum we should be no further ahead than we were before. I hope the Government will pass this Bill and that the Opposition and every member of this House will assist in every possible way to make it the most workable Bill possible. Personally I should be glad to see an opportunity given for the electorate to speak before the Bill is put into force, but that is my individual opinion. I believe that this Bill will pass this House and that when the need is realized and the conditions are understood, the measure will be accepted by the country. I believe that when it has passed this House and been accepted by a majority in the country, it will be obeyed by every class of our community.

M. C. A. GAUVREAU (Témiscouata) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, it is now twenty years that I have been sitting in this Parliament of Canada, and never before have we been confronted with so important, I should say so poignant, a measure as the bill introduced by the Prime Minister of Canada, to be known as: The Military Service Act of 1917. He might just as well have entitled it the Conscription law, had he not feared to impress somewhat too vividly the imagination of the people of this country.

For twenty years, with my colleagues in this House, some of them vanished long ago, the others still around me, I have witnessed the slow but progressive evolution of our country's politics, written every day, politics which our children will study later on, which we ourselves have studied before 1896, some of us to learn the great lessons of the past, the others to find therein inspiration and foresight, whilst arming ourselves for future struggles.

For twenty years I have witnessed in this House some memorable struggles, placing in now and then my humble speech, but always with a sincere desire of aiding to solve the great problems offered by the moral, industrial, religious and social development of a nation in course of formation and which asserts itself as the years pass by.

I have taken part in the debates upon important question, such as: the schools of Manitoba, the National Transcontinental, the Quebec bridge enterprise, Canada's participation in the South African war, Laurier's naval bill, reciprocity, the schools of Keewatin and the bilingual question. These questions have been the most important raised in this House, but, Mr. Speaker, none of them has ever been as momentous or as grave as the one which we are called upon to discuss to-day.

I understand that the war has given rise to new problems which have not only set athinking the great statesmen of Europe, but have given much concern to the statesmen of both political parties in this country, alike interested.

On August 4, 1914, when war was declared, Canada felt that she was perhaps at the turning point in her history, on a new road, and after three years of conflict, after three years of an atrocious and desolating war which makes Europe bleed, where perhaps, before long, we may see in France and in Belgium as many crosses on heroes' graves as we can see soldiers yet standing to defend Liberty's cause, we are asking ourselves what are we to do? That is the very question I am also asking myself.

In the first place, I ask myself: should we have taken part in this war? Without any hesitation, I answer yes. One day, Mr. Speaker, the hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfred Laurier) stated in this House: that when England is at war, Canada is alike at war—which was not understood by a large portion of our population.

A certain school of thought that is well known, has made it its study to stir up the province of Quebec against the Liberal party and its leader, with what success everybody knows. But events as they unfolded have nobly vindicated our revered leader, as the very same words that he has uttered have also fallen from the lips of princes of the Church and from the mouth of eminent members of the hierarchy and of political men of both parties in our province.

Was it our duty to participate in this war? I unhesitatingly say yes. How were we to co-operate in this great work? Were we bound to participate in it to the fulness of our resources? Had we to take part in it, even at the risk of bankruptcy for Canada, as was stated at the outbreak of war, by the hon. solicitor general (Mr. Meighen)? I have the greatest respect for the opinion of the hon. Solicitor General, but I do not share his views in that regard, nor can I bring myself to believe in and endorse such principle, because, as the saying goes, "well ordained charity begins at home." Should we take part in this war to our last man and to our last dollar? This doctrine has been advocated in this House by honest and sincere men. Sir, I respect honest and sincere men who have the courage of their convictions, but I cannot subscribe to such a doctrine and I claim for my convictions the respectful consideration which should always be granted to conscientious opinions.

New, Sir, what were we to do? What we had to do, was to help Great Britain and the Allies in winning this war, to render all the assistance in our power, by any reasonable means at our command, in supplying such essentials for the successful pursuit of war operations as military man power, money, munitions and produce of the farm.

As to military man power, I shall deal with it later on.

As to farm produce, the tillers of the soil have resolutely set to work, thus showing that in that way not only could they help the Allies but that they might perhaps, some day, come to the assistance of the country, by preventing the gaunt specter of starvation stalking over Canadian highways.

Now, as to military man-power, Sir, we had to raise recruits. But under what system? Could recruiting be carried on under any other method than the voluntary system? It never occurred to or entered the mind of any man in Canada that troops could be levied in Canada, for the defence of the Empire, under any other system than voluntary enlistment? Such is the policy and the wording of the Act. The fathers of Confederation never contemplated anything else, as witness this enactment in the Act: "Should ever conscription take place, it will be for the defence of the country, and whenever troops are sent outside of Canada, it will also be for the defence of the country." Should my statement be questioned, I need only cite the very statement made by the former Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes), quoted by my hon. friend from Kamouraska (Mr. Lapointe), when he said that he could not read in the law that he had any authority to ask Parliament to allow troops other than volunteers to leave the country for the defence of England, except under such provisions as were made later on.

Should any doubts, still be entertained on that score, Sir, I would invoke the despatch sent by the Duke of Connaught to the Secretary of State for the Colonies:

Should we still harbour any doubts, they ought to be dispelled in face of the despatch that was sent which has been read to the House. How did voluntary enlistment work? Some say that it has been successful, while others say that it has been a failure.

For my part I say this, that in the province of Quebec, the voluntary system has not been given fair play nor such full scope as it should have had.

I was surprised to hear the statement made in this House the other night by the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) in connection with recruiting in the province of Ontario.

I was surprised to hear the hon. gentleman state that but for the patriotic action of the Ontario people, at a time when the Government were doing absolutely nothing, there would have occurred considerable delay in the sending of troops overseas, while they were fighting like blazes around the table of the Privy Council about contracts to be let, the people of the province of Ontario were paying out of their pocket; they were busy organizing regiments and paying for their equipment. Meanwhile, men with a dismal countenance were seen prowling about the Privy Council and the Parliament buildings, awaiting an opportunity for hearing when they could grasp the fat contract which would allow them to pocket enormous sums of money.

This reminds me of a picture of the epic wars of the past, when, in the wake of great armies, vultures and ravens were often to be seen, on the watch for an opportunity to spring upon and lacerate their first victim, a soldier fallen on the battle field. Now, allow me, Sir, to give you an idea of the kind of voluntary enlistment that has been carried on throughout the province of Quebec. In my opinion, Sir, the voluntary system could have worked wonders in the province of Quebec, had it been entrusted to men conversant with the mentality of the two great races in our country. Quebec could have supplied Great Britain and the Allies with all the troops such a self-governing colony as Canada could send across the ocean, for the defence of the most sacred rights of the nations trodden under foot by the barbarians of 1870, by the spoliators and assassins of 1914, and the baby-killers of 1917. Our fellow countrymen would have volunteered in larger numbers had the Government taken the necessary means but, as a matter of fact, they were first and last an out and out party Government. They were determined to prosecute the business of the war in their own way, so as to get all the credit for the winning of the war. They have made everything subservient to patronage, to political favoritism, by debarring the Liberals from any important post or office. Quebec was slighted and passed over, as if it were a negligible quantity in Confederation. They did not show themselves able to select, for recruiting, men who would have appealed to the heart of the people and won them over to the cause of enlistment by warning them against neglecting to answer the call of duty at this tragic hour for humanity and the liberties of the world.

As a consequence, our people, apparently it may be, did not display as much enthusiasm as the other races in this country, and what with the revival of the ill-feeling of old against the papacy, and with the memories of the frictions of the past between French and English springing up again in the mind of the sons of the former conquerors and the sons of those who were conquered—without having been so conquered, strictly speaking—there arose a premeditated conspiracy, which was even encouraged, as the sequel of a policy which will be termed by the future historian as nefarious to the best interests of Canada, in short, Sir, a policy in pursuance of which, the province of Quebec was branded as guilty of disloyalty. The province of Quebec guilty of disloyalty forsooth! the French Canadians a disloyal people indeed! But, Sir, our history, from the days of the conquest down to Confederation gives the most unqualified lie to such a statement.

They say that our people did not enlist in sufficient numbers. How could you expect recruiting in Quebec to have been as active and as successful as elsewhere, to quote the eloquent remarks of my hon. friend from Kamouraska (Mr. E. Lapointe), in face of the slanderous campaign carried on against them and in view of the insults heaped upon the province?

Now, allow me, Sir, to give you a sample of the statements and editorials that appear in the press:

Let us have conscription, anyhow, and have civil war if necessary, has been the argument of the extremists. We have got to have war sometime to teach Quebec that Canada is an English speaking protestant country, not to be dominated by a single priest-ridden province. And we may as well have it now when we are armed for the fighting in Europe. We can let our loyal troops of Ontario and the Western provinces stop in Quebec on their way to Europe long enough to practice on the French Canadians as a part of their training for handling Germans.

Mr. Speaker, let me ask the hon gentlemen opposite what would be their feelings if they were in the place of the French Canadians and subjected to such insults as are being launched against them? Would they not boil with anger on being thus insulted and vilified and if they did not carry things to extremes, I confess, I am unable to form a picture of English mentality.

Sir, when the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pusgley) alluded, the other day, to the editorial I have just quoted, hon. gentlemen were heard laughing and jeering.

As I mused on that incident, I though how strange was the mental make-up of some our fellow-countrymen. Better than ever I understood, Sir, what kind of political jetsam is drifting into this Parliament, on the waves of fanaticism, lashed into fury since 1911 in the English-speaking provinces and particularly in the province of Ontario.

Quebec, they say, did not answer the call of duty; they have not enlisted. Things have gone to such lengths, Sir, that a newspaper which does not sympathize with us, Liberals, La Patrie of Montreal, the organ of the hon. minister of Electioneering, has published the following editorial. Kindly allow me, Sir, to read that editorial which is not lengthy but very interesting. I should like some hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House to understand it and I hope a translation of it will appear in Hansard:

The French Canadians in the armies.

An official return which has just been brought down in the House of Commons shows that 14,245 French Canadians have enlisted to serve in the British army. Troughout the Dominion, 125,245 English Canadians have enlisted, while 155,095 British born have enlisted in the Canadian expeditionary forces.

These figures do not justify the reproaches, nay, the injuries, which certain newspapers of Ontario and elsewhere have with so much persistency flung in the face of the French Canadians of the province of Quebec.

The French Canadians' contribution to the defence of Canada and of the Empire should not be regarded as a contemptible one, so much the less that France, England and the Canadian army's chief commanding officers have on more than one occasion declared that no soldiers had shown more dauntless courage, more resourcefulness and more endurance than the French Canadians.

These official figures do not establish the fact that the French Canadians, in proportion to their numbers in the Dominion, have furnished as many recruits as the Canadians of English origin. And we know before hand that it is from that point of view they will be considered by those organs which are only looking for a new opportunity to slander the province of Quebec and the French Canadian race. Yet, that is a false and unjust way of looking at it. It is no more proper to upbraid the French Canadians for not having enlisted in as large numbers as their fellow citizens of English descent, than it would be to accuse our English compatriots in this country because they did not enlist in as large numbers as the British born Canadians.

In both cases, one must consider the circumstance, as pointed out by our local contemporary The Gazette.

The presence of fourteen thousand young French Canadians in the oversea contingents, says our confrere, should make an impression upon those who criticise their race. Our French-speaking fellow citizens in certain parts of the country have received less encouragement to enlist than those who are English-speaking; lately, they received no encouragement at all. Reproaches are no incentive.

Moreover, as enlistment was voluntary, it necessarily follows that no one had the right to blame our province, whatever might be the numbers of our fellow citizens answering the call.

On the whole, and under the particular circumstances offered here, as well as the irritating pressure made by the other provinces, the province of Quebec is far from having any reason to blush for the share it has taken in national defence.

Unbiassed opinion, when passions will have ceased to affect our English-speaking fellow citizens, will bear evidence to the fact that it has admirably behaved.

I will leave this clipping from La Patrie of Montreal to the meditation of my friends on the other side of the House.

Not only, Mr. Speaker, was it stated that we had not enlisted, but the most odious campaign imaginable was started against the French language in the province of Ontario. I will only refer to it to state that this irritating question has had some importance in Quebec; the rights of the French language have been ostracized to substitute the German in the schools of Ontario.

Now, Mr Speaker, to this iniquitous persecution and to insults of every kind, they have attempted to add the vilest calumnies. I intend to refer to the most deplorable incidents which have happened, just whilst the French Canadians of the province of Quebec were doing even more than their best to show their sympathy to the soldiers crossing the province. I will mention the case of Fraserville, which is in the county of Temiscouata. When the trains full of soldiers passed through this locality, the ladies and the citizens of Fraserville would go to the station and give the boys cigarettes and other dainties. What was their reward? The most infamous accusations from the province of Ontario and, sometimes, even insults from the soldiers themselves.

A few days ago, the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. McCraney) spoke of that bad father who gave his children stones when they were begging for bread. Did not the same thing happen in the province of Quebec, as the soldiers passed through it, when the citizens of Fraserville were insulted for having shown their sympathy? When this question was raised in this House, the right hon. leader of the Opposition was eager to have an investigation and it was granted to him.

The hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) has given, last evening, the findings of that inquiry; that the people of the province of Quebec are exonerated of all offences charged, is the summing up of it all, and I was not surprised to learn that it was the very behaviour of the soldiers themselves that had occasioned those incidents, and that they had been prompted to such excesses, beyond measure, by the perusal of inflammatory editorials, daily published by the Ontario newspapers about the province of Quebec.

I would ask the Prime Minister to be kind enough to have a special copy of this report made and to address it to the member for Dufferin (Mr. Best) for the trouble he went to in laying before the House the charges I have just alluded to.

As he was acting, undoubtedly under the inspiration of a sincere desire to aid the union of races in this country, that copy of the report will be most valuable for him, especially so when a good Liberal will have beaten him, as he deserves it, in his constituency.

There is, in this country, a man who, more than any other one probably, has tried, by his articles, unjust as well as abusive, against the province of Quebec, to break up the union and the ' bonne entente' between the two races in this Dominion, and who, more than any other, has sought to abet the English provinces against the French province of Quebec, by his writings, so violent that they exceeded the limits of decency and of honesty.

This man, Sir, is called John Willison, of Toronto. Not the John Willison who has written the admirable life of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, but the John Willison whom the Government of this country has had the weakness of recommending to our King to be knighted and who, to-morrow, perhaps, may be raised to the Senate by these gentlemen, for having overtopped by the full height of his narrow head the tallest detractors of the French race in this country. For men of John Willison's caliber, there is only one thing to do: To the wall! after Joffre's laconic but splendid expression!

We were living almost in peace before that. Our race has known the gloomy days of defeat; it has suffered the military yoke after the conquest; it has had the bloody hours of the rebellion of 1837-38, and when the Confederation at last melted into one Dominion the provinces of Canada, Quebec began to breathe more freely, having the idea that the British flag would be her best protection. Reverting with still greater energy to the tilling of her bountiful soil, she witnessed the growth, development and increasing influence of her peaceful population, obedient to the laws, respectful of order, of the civilian and religious authority which had always been her best safeguard. But Mr, Speaker, in the year 1909 at the very announcement of a naval policy, of a new scheme for a Canadian navy for the defence of the coasts of Canada, as well as to go to the assistance of the Empire in times of danger, after the Canadian government had so decreed it, we had seen, in the province of Quebec, men rise and the populous centers through the townships and the remotest concessions, and cry: "That means your own participation in the war. If you vote for Laurier's navy, it will be for England to whom we owe nothing, for England who is obliged to protect us and to defend us." I was then asked that Laurier be put out of power, because that would be so they said, the only way to prevent that nefarious measure becomng the law of the country.

Everybody knows, Mr. Speaker, the result of the Drummond-Arthabaska election. and then, September 21, 1911, the Borden party at the helm, with the Nationalists at their side, and since then, it has been Imperialism everywhere and before anything else, it has been the dreadnoughts at a cost of $35,000,000 of which the Liberal Senate has fortunately rid us, in the very interest of England and of the present war, as events themselves have demonstrated it to all on both sides of the ocean. War was let loose on the world in August 1914. Canada got into the war from the moment England did, nobly and valiantly, declare war, that, in honour and in justice, she must respect her pledged word and her signature affixed to solemn agreements.

It is here that the history of our participation in the war becomes interesting and discloses novel aspects as to our position in the Empire.

What should we do for the Empire and the Allies and how far were we to go in the sacrifice of men and of money, as our contribution to this grand work for the defeat of German autocracy? England never expected from us more than 150,000 men; the balance being unattached, were to remain on the land, in order to produce what was needed for the Allies as well as for the people of Canada, and the others should be employed in the making of war ammunition. But, Mr, Speaker, one fine morning as if he had suddenly awakened from a nightmare, the premier of this country, without consulting anybody, without consulting neither his colleagues nor Parliament, said to England: "Canada offers you 500,000 men."

What did we do, Mr. Speaker? We accepted the situation just as it was in the province of Quebec. The leader of the Opposition and his lieutenants, such as the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) and the hon. member for Kamouraska and almost all the Liberal members of the province of Quebec, made it a point to tell their constituents that they should do their utmost for the defence of the Empire; we called public meetings. For my own part, Mr. Speaker, I have held meetings in my county—I have held several—it is true that I spoke against the Government, it is true that I denounced autocracy, it is true that I denounced robberies and plunders, but, Mr. Speaker, I had the courage to tell my electors: "This is a just war, it is almost a holy war, it is almost a crusade, and you must do your duty, ever without restraint, without being compelled by anybody." Mr. Speaker, we did go through our parishes and we told our electors to enlist.

Thank God! the Liberals of the province of Quebec are not preachers of disloyalty, we leave that to the people who, during the Dorchester election, told the voters: "If conscription is adopted, just cross the boundary." We do not belong to that class of people.

To those who could not enlist, we said: "Contribute money to the Patriotic Fund." I am glad to see here present the hon. member for St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames). He knows that at Rivière-du-Loup, we have a branch office of the Patriotic Fund which operates from Montmagny as far as Gaspé. I have the honour to be its president and the hon. member for Kamouraska is one of its members. There, we applied ourselves, from the outbreak of the war, to provide for the needs and comforts of the wives of the soldiers who had been sent overseas. It will not be a matter for surprise if I say that, at the present moment, we are paying, if I am not mistaken, $1,200 per month to the wives and children of our soldiers who have gone to the front.

Secondly, Mr. Speaker, we were urging, all along, our people to enlist and we always understood that there was no necessity for conscription.

The hon. member for Rouville did not need conscription to give his only son to the force which will soon cross overseas. My hon. friend, the member for Bagot (Mr. Marcile), has given his two sons and he did not require conscription and, if I wanted to make a personal reference, I would say, Mr. Speaker, I have not waited for conscription to give my eldest son. He is with the British fleet which perhaps saved the Allies, with that British fleet which may perchance be the one factor to ensure final victory to the forces fighting under the Allies' banners.

If the honourable minister of Marine (Mr. Hazen) were here, I would ask him if, a fortnight ago, the second of the sons whom Providence has given me did not request from him his entrance in the navy to go on patrol duty along the coasts of Nova Scotia, and the third, the last one, who has just completed his education, would go and join his brothers, if he was not so weak; and I would be glad of it, Mr. Speaker, and do you know why? Not only to defend Canada and the Empire, not only to do his duty as a citizen, but to show to the people of Ontario that in the province of Quebec we are no cowards and that we know how to perform our duty without any admonition to do so.

Then, why conscription? Is there any necessity for it, Mr. Speaker? I answer straight forward: No. Why? For me, Mr. Speaker, volunteering has demonstrated that, with more discrimination, there would have been a superabundance of recruits.

By sending over 400,000 men to the front, Canada has even exceeded the number that England expected from us, and it is more than our conditions warranted us to send, if we consider our daily requirements. If, with the sending of troops, conscription of wealth in this country had been immediately decreed, there would have been no occasion for our sending over these 100,000 or more extra men, whom conscription is intended to wrest from us to the detriment of Canada's economic organization.

And what, Mr. Speaker, of the disturbance which this measure cannot fail to create in our national life, of the trouble it will stir up, of the bitterness it will cause between the races inhabiting the country, of the misfortunes which will endure for years and years to come? For all these reasons and for many others mentioned by the speakers who have preceded me, I say that conscription has no justification and that is should never have been submitted to this House and to the country.

If the Prime Minister of Canada had risen above his desire of extricating his country from the difficulties which five years of maladministration have created for himself and for his colleagues; if he had devoted the energies of all those around him as well as of his fellow-workers, to the success of the cause of the Empire and of its allies, instead of trying to secure to his Government a longer lease of life; had he listened to the suggestions of Canadian patriotism, instead of catering to the wishes of unscrupulous and scheming politicians, Canada would have with her 400,000 men and her immense natural wealth, enormously aided the cause whose final success we all have at heart, and to-day the gaunt spectre of conscription, would not be looming over our national life, at a critical moment, to undo all that we have heretofore accomplished for England and for Canada.

Some statements of the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Gauthier) have shocked hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. What has he said that was so unusual? He stated to the Prime Minister of this country: If you want to force conscription without the consent of the people, we shall find a means of defending ourselves; we shall fight the Bill with the Bill itself. Has he said that we have done too much for England? Has he said that we ought to cease sending our men to the front? He only stated: We live in a free country; we want to hear the voice of the people and if you are to force this measure through as autocrats would do, we shall resist. How? We will protect ourselves by means of this very Bill. The hon. member from St. Hyacinthe has warned the Prime Minister against what would happen if this measure was enforced. He told him that there might be tears and wailing. The right hon. gentleman has been well cautioned and forewarned means forearmed. The hon. member is certainly a good political opponent, having warned the Prime Minister that should conscription be forced upon the people without their consent, it would create indignation and ill-feeling all over the country. Some people will wash their hands of this whole affair, but the responsibility will be laid at the door of the Prime Minister.

Has the hon. member from St. Hyacinthe gone any further than Sir Edward Carson who threatened to rise up in arms against his King, should an attempt be made to force Home Rule upon Ulster?

Has he gone further than the labour unions who in a solemn convention stated that they opposed conscription by all available means? Is not the resignation of the former Secretary of State another warning to the Prime Minister?

The right hon. gentleman intends to enforce conscription in spite of all. I leave the responsibility with him. But there is this to be said: if the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe is to be blamed for having spoken his mind, for having told the truth, for my part I congratulate him and I shall tell the House that had he not done so, the member from Temiscouata would have said so. Even had I been alone, I would have so stated.

I would not like to be disagreeable to the hon. member from Kent (Mr. Robidoux), but I deny him the right to cast censure on my hon. friend from St. Hyacinthe. The hon. member from Kent has his hands full justifying his attitude in the House; let him be satisfied with that. My hon. friend from St. Hyacinthe has been brave enough to speak his mind in the House, that is to state the plain truth. Has the hon. member from Kent voiced the opinion of those he is supposed to represent here? I do not think so. A short visit to his constituency might have convinced him that the Acadian people, the major part of them, are not of the same mind as he is. It may be that on the horizon of his brief political life he has gazed upon the big reward which would enable him to live happily during the remainder of his life. I will give him advice by the way. Let him hurry up before the election, because if he does not get it before, I do not hesitate to say that he will be disappointed. The result of the election in New Brunswick shows which way the wind is beginning to blow, not only here, but in other parts, which have suprises in store.

An hon. MEMBER: In the West also.

Mr. GAUVREAU: Now, Mr. Speaker, I come to another question. I cannot close my remarks without attending to the hon. member from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) who said yesterday in his address exactly what we expected him to say. He has been true to himself. Let me tell him that his remarks and his brutal attack upon Sir Wilfrid Laurier have not fallen on stony ground and that they shall bear fruit in the future. There is one sure thing it is that some insults are too vile to reach the serene spheres where the leader of the liberal party holds sway. It is strange how some people have but to go over the interprovincial bridge to become experts in the act of throwing mud upon all those who surpass them by all their glorious past, their honest conscience and their magnificent record as statesmen.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier may well rest in peace. Pigmies have never harmed giants, neither in politics nor even when conscription is spoken of. The hon. member has gone so far as to insult the province of Quebec. He did so, I shall not say, in the German style, but in that Teutonic style which characterizes him. He spoke of the lamb of the province of Quebec, meaning no doubt the emblematic lamb which we have in our national pageants during the St. John the Baptist festivities.

His intention no doubt was to reward those who had welcomed him so enthusiastically and who had feasted him in the old city of Champlain when he had gone to address them.

Mr. Speaker, I shall tell him, hoping that he will read my remarks, that there are lambs that are not easily shorn and that he and his new confederates might learn it at their own expense and sooner than they expect should they try to force conscription upon an unwilling people.

Before concluding, Sir, I would like to say a few words about the amendment to the amendment submitted by the hon. member from Berthier. Really, people should not care much about it for it is a farce, as the hon. member from St. Hyacinthe has so justly termed it. The trick is easily detected so much so that its author is soon found out. The right hon. Prime Minister stated in this House that the Government had not heard of it. He would not swear though that some member of his Government had no part in it.

It is held somewhere, Mr. Speaker, that by voting for the amendment to the amendment submitted by the hon. member from Berthier, we are striking at the very root of the Bill. I do not think so. The six months' hoist would leave too many chances of a revival, while by referring the Bill to the people, it would not be heard of in this country for all ages to come, when the people would have voted upon it and crushed it, as I believe they would do.

The amendment to the amendment is the exact counterpart of the petitions which have been sent to the hon. member and laid upon the Table of the House. What do those petitions say? That this nefarious Bill be not passed by the Parliament until it is submitted to the people by means of a referendum or an election. The hon. member from Berthier moves that the Bill be read this day six months. He is not serious; he has played his hand badly. I do not know whether he holds the joker or the blank card, but his hand is no good for the people hold all the trump cards and mind what I say, Sir, they shall win the game.

That is why I will vote against the conscription Bill with the full force of my convictions which I hold to be sincere for they are an heirloom from the past, from our history, from our situation within the Empire and from the requirements of the hour.

I shall vote first against the amendment to the amendment submitted by the hon. member from Berthier because, as I said, it is a farce, a clumsy snare laid for honest Liberals. We will not be entrapped.

I shall vote against the first and second reading of the Bill, because I want the people to have their say first, and should the amendment of our honoured leader be defeated, as it may be, then I shall oppose with the utmost energy the second and third readings, knowing beforehand that should this Bill be put upon the statute books of Canada and should it be attempted afterwards to enforce it disorders would ensue the disastrous results of which, not only for Confederation but for peace so desirable at this moment cannot be estimated at present.

I entreat the Prime Minister not to go any further with his conscription Bill, but to pause before plunging this country in the turmoil of conflict denunciations and all accompanying evils, and to accept rather the amendment submitted by the right hon. leader of the Opposition. While thus entreating him, I will make mine the words spoken by the late Joseph Adolphe Chapleau during a memorable epoch of his life and say: "Then silence the sectarians and the irreconcilables and let the powerful voice of the people be heard by means of a referendum."

Mr. H. BOULAY (Rimouski) (translation): Mr. Speaker, at last we have reached one of the most solemn stages in our colonial history, namely, our formal and forcible participation in the wars of the Empire.

Notwithstanding the outcry of the newspapers and in spite of the solemn promises of many distinguished public men that there would be no conscription in this country, the Prime Minister, after offering 500,000 men, after going to England to be sure that conditions were urgent, comes back with a most outspoken and most foreboding statement, saying that he had made up his mind to enforce conscription. Universal rejoicing among the disabled and the exempted but sneers and gnashings among those who are liable to conscription.

It is not a source of great pleasure to me to have to-day to address the House and the country on a subject such as this; but the hour is a solemn one, and I am bound to make my views.

We are opposing conscription for different reasons which deserve consideration:

1. Because our traditions, our constitution, our status as a colony are opposed to it;

2. Because we have already sent overseas to help the Allies a sufficient number of men considering our population and our financial means;

3. Because the mandate which we received from the people in 1911 does not enable as to enact such a measure, especially without beforehand consulting the people;

4. Because we are not as fairly dealt with as we should be by the English speaking majority in this country, and because a feeling has been created by the Liberal party in 1896, and by ourselves in 1911, in opposition to the levying of troops of any kind. I may add that this measure is contrary to our traditions, because we have a responsible Government in this country. Our representative public men, whenever we were called upon to legislate on questions of war, a militia bill, or amendments thereto, have always expressed the view that Canada could not send her troops outside the country, except, and exclusively, for the purpose of its own defence. I remember distinctly that, in 1885, in connection with the Nile expedition, the British government applied to Sir John A. Macdonald, then premier of Canada, for troops to help her in that war, and what was his answer? He said: we are ready to send volunteers, on the condition you will pay all the expenses. True, Sir John A. Macdonald did not profess the imperialistic views which are current to-day. He was as broad-minded a statesman as our present politicians, but never did he think of enacting conscription. It was left to this school born of the imperialistic, religious and political fanaticism, to make a display of the principles which have been boomed in this country after the demise of that great statesman, to drive us into the vortex of militarism, to promise every aid possible to England, as Laurier did in 1897 and subsequently at public meetings in England, thus paving the way for the Transvaal expedition, and later on enacting the militia act of 1904, a stepping stone to this measure of compulsion.

I have just mentioned the Militia Act of 1904. I will humbly submit that we do not need a new compulsory measure to enable us to raise all the troops which we wish to send overseas. Section 69 of that Act clearly says:

> The Governor in Council may place the Militia, or any part thereof, on active service, anywhere in Canada, and beyond Canada, for the defence thereof, at any time when it appears advisable so to do by reason of emergency.

On this point I am at one with the hon. ex-minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes), and the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen) and many others. The Act of 1904 provides for the sending of troops outside of Canada, and who among the hon. members of the Opposition at that time occupying seats in this House, voiced a protest. The hon. member from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) was here, and I believe also Mr. Henri Bourassa the member for Labelle. Sir Frederick Borden might well have taken another view. Mr. Henri Bourasa writes:

> Half a century after confederation, the Prime Minister of Canada, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, accepts the principle: When England is at war, Canada is also at war. His conclusion is that Canada must assume "all the responsibilities of a nation," and, agreeing with his colleague, Mr. Fielding, fastens upon the Parliament of the colony the creation of a fleet, "Canadian in time of peace but Imperial in time of war," in order to support England in all her conflicts "just or injust."
> The Canadian ministers at the time concluded with the Imperial authorities an agreement which places, in time of war, the naval forces of Canada at the disposal of a Government whose policy and action completely escape the control and the votes of the Canadian people. Their successors, the Conservative ministers, strike more directly and more decisively at the principles laid down half a century ago: they had adopted by this House a Bill granting a contribution to the Imperial navy, over which the Canadian Government exert no authority whatever. Later on, when this war broke out, the two parties joined hands in destroying at their very foundation the principles unanimously accepted in 1851, in 1854 and 1862, as the only principles in agreement with the British constitution and the relationship in vogue between the mother country and the colonies. They assert the obligation of Canada to take part in a war absolutely foreign to us; they raise a greater army than Wellington had at Waterloo; they put the whole burden of that army upon Canada, and yet they give to the Imperial authorities its absolute command and use.

We carried on the electoral campaign of 1911 with the slogan that we should not take any part in the wars of England, and up to that time we were right. We did not foresee at that time the present conflict in which we are fighting more for ourselves than for England or France, notwithstanding all claims to the contrary. We have a direct interest, and even if we had not sent any troops overseas, if England suffered defeat, the Germans would not give us credit for our good will. Our Dominion would be the first victim of their brutalities, and the people understood it so well, that from the Atlantic to the Pacific, very few protests were sounded against the sending of volunteers.

However, can we ask England to be grateful for all that we are doing? Can we expect to be reimbursed of the millions of dollars we are spending for troops and munitions, in any other way that mere thanks from the high politicians and their newspapers? Judging from the experience of the past, we may unhesitatingly answer: no.

We will not even be consulted when the treaty of peace will be made at the end of this terrible war in which we are taking part, and the platonic thanks which we will receive then will be the only compensation we will get for the extraordinary imperialistic wave which is rolling just now over the country, and which brought Sir Robert Borden, without consulting the great bulk of its friends, to involve us in the present war, and finally to force upon us this extraordinary conscription bill which means the destruction of our autonomy and the complete overthrow of our political ideas of the past.

I contend that we have enlisted a sufficient number of men by the voluntary system, and that it would at least be well to continue in the same ways. We have enlisted over 400,000 men, and considering our population of not much over 7,000,000, it is a fine achievement. We are told that the French Canadians have not contributed their quota. It is a well known fact that French Canadians, all born in Canada, have enlisted by hundreds and by thousands in the English regiments in the West, at the very opening of the war. Under our own eyes here, in Ottawa, French Canadians from Hull and the surrounding counties have been enlisted in Ontario battalions. Notwithstanding any ill-feeling entertained towards them, they were sought as recruits, on account of their splendid qualities.

If French Canadians are so guilty, so indifferent and so cowardly, how is it that we cannot get from the department of Militia the exact information we have been seeking for two years past as to the number of French Canadians enlisted to date, and also the number of American citizens and foreigners which have come from England by hundreds, for the very purpose of enlisting in the Canadian forces right at the beginning of the war, because our pay to the soldiers was higher than that in England? That is well known to the officials of Quebec harbour and also to the citizens of that city.

But we have only to read the mournful daily lists of casualties since the beginning of the war, to see that thousands of soldiers have given the address of their next of kin in the British Islands. Let us deduct these men from those born in this country and the proportion of our detractors' friends will be considerably reduced. Let us also look over the figures of the census of 1911, and we will see that in each of the western and Ontario provinces, hundreds of thousands of immigrants have enthusiastically enlisted in the first months of the war, glad as they were, not only to show their loyalty to motherland, but also to find a good opportunity to return to their country, there being no longer any work for them in Canada on account of the cessation of railway construction. Many of them were without work in the streets of our cities, in Edmonton and all over the West. I remember that during the winter of 1914, western papers announced that five thousand men were without work in the streets of Edmonton only. In order to find the number of citizens born in this country, in each of the provinces of Canada, and the number of the foreign born, let us open the census of 1911, which gives the following figures: in the four western provinces, out of a total population of 1,715,189, we find that 870,051, more than half, are born in English countries or elsewhere. Is it not reasonable and logical that those foreigners, most of them without any ties in Canada should have been the first to enlist for the reasons previously stated.

Ontario boasts of having sent 176,000 men. Here again, let us refer to the census of 1911, and what do we find? That Ontario had at that time—it is probably much higher now, six years later—703,127 men over twenty-one years of age from a total population of 2,423,274 (pages 457 and 458, vol. 2), whereas Quebec, with a population of 2,003,232 inhabitants, had only 476,666 men over the age of twenty-one a difference of 226,461 or 50 per cent in the total male population of the two provinces. If the same proportion is established for the male population between the ages of eighteen and twenty-one, 15,000 more men are to be added to the male population of Ontario, and that would give that province a male population of at least 241,000 over that of Quebec. If Ontario, according to the reports brought down, has enlisted, to date, 176,000 men, that is not in due proportion to her surplus male population over Quebec. Besides, it is not to my knowledge that a single man from Ontario has enlisted in a Quebec regiment, whereas it has been quite different with us, as I have already explained. And again, what are the conditions in Ontario? In 1911, that province had a foreign born population of 407,829, whereas the foreign born population of Quebec was 146,533. Then, as stated by the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Middlebro) on the 20th June, (see Hansard, page 2617) the province of Quebec has given 44,000 men. My impression is that this last figure may be accepted as giving a fairly accurate idea of the number of French Canadians that have enlisted. It is quite ridiculous to speak of 7,000 or even 15,000 when we had 2,000 men in the first expeditionary force alone, and when we know that at least 2,000 French Canadians from the three counties of Rimouski, Bonaventure and Gaspé have enlisted. Moreover Quebec is essentially an agricultural country and our large lumber industry is carried on exclusively by male labourers, whereas in a great number of the industries of Ontario woman labour can replace man labour, so here again, the situation is quite different in the two provinces.

To establish the soundness of such statements, we have not only the census to rely upon. As we all know, the French families of Quebec are much larger, and, even with an equal total population, we could yet have fewer men subject to military service. This difference of 241,000 or 50 per cent in the male population between Ontario and Quebec, in 1911, and a difference of only 25 per cent in the total population, proves beyond the possibility of a doubt the correctness of our calculations. In the face of the above figures that cannot be disputed, I maintain that those who for the last two years have made themselves the slanderers of the province of Quebec are engaging in an unpatriotic campaign, are fomenting disunion and hate between the two great races of this country and are performing a work well calculated to cool the ardour of the most enthusiastic among us.

It is painful for any man to have to disprove unjust accusations. But what must be painful for the individual is much more so in the case of a whole race.

As long as the attacks and the slanders were confined to that dirty sheet called The Orange Sentinel and the members of the section, we were content with despising our traducers. But during the last few years, the most violent attacks emanating from the inveterate enemies of our creed and our race have been re-echoed by important newspapers in the English provinces. If I had not a clear conscience, I would not utter a single word in defence, but knowing that the French Canadians are wrongly accused, I feel that I cannot stand it any longer. During these critical times, while the French Canadians are being submitted to unremitting abuse, I may well face our accusers and ask them, in the words of Cicero "How long will you try our patience?" How long will you gratuitously impugn our loyalty? I say gratuitously, because no correct figures are available at the department of Militia.

The English Canadians would never have accepted peaceably the moral wrongs we have been subjected to, during those two years, by the fanaties who are heaping their slanders upon our heads. Finding themselves short of new arguments and having failed to arouse our resentment, they have invented sham insults to the soldiers from the west, on their way through the province of Quebec. That new charge has been shown, after investigation to be absolutely foundationless and the result would have been the same on all the other points, if impartial investigations had been conducted.

By the way I must say a few words about that investigation, and my remarks will be based on the report of the English commissioners that cannot be suspected of having glossed over the facts.

Sessional Papers No. 172.

FINDING.

The Court of Inquiry appointed by the Adjutant General by orders dated the 1st of May, 1917, for the purpose of collecting and recording evidence in connection with the allegations contained in several newspapers that troop-trains had been stoned passing through Rivière du Loup, P.Q., and other places, and for the purpose of collecting and recording any other evidence which, in the opinion of the members of the court, in any way relates to or has a bearing on this matter,

Report as Follows:

1. The Court assembled at the city of Quebec on May 9, 1917, and took the evidence of one witness, and then proceeded to Rivière du Loup where twenty-three witnesses were examined; after which the court adjourned to sit at St. John, N.B., to take the evidence of members of the 217th Battalion, and finally concluded its sitting at Mont Joli.

2. The Court could not get any direct evidence that there was stone-throwing at troop-trains by the citizens of Rivère du Loup, but the Court believes that there is some foundation for the rumours circulated amongst the citizens themselves that on one occasion in October, 1916, a few stones were thrown at one train. The circumstances were as follows:—

One Sunday evening towards the beginning of October, a train with two cars attached filled with the men from the 132nd Battalion stopped at Rivière du Loup. Some of the men detrained and began asking young men why they were not in khaki, and, not receiving a satisfactory reply, used insulting language, and several were assaulted by the soldiers without provocation. This aroused considerable indignation and a group of youths formed apparently with the intention of throwing stones by way of retaliation. The station constable, noticing this, dispersed them, and, although there is no direct evidence, it would appear that at least some of them threw stones from a point beyond the station as the train was pulling out.

3. There is nothing in the evidence to show that there was any organized intention to do this before the arrival of the train and the incident above referred to.

4. Referring to the accusation in one of the newspapers that the 204th Battalion had been stoned, the Court obtained the evidence of the train crew of both sections of the train which conveyed the battalion through Rivière du Loup. None of these witnesses either saw or heard of any such occurrence and the citizens and the railway officials at Rivière du Loup had never even heard of it.

5. The Court could obtain no evidence with reference to the alleged stoning of the 176th Battalion.

6. Dealing with the case of the 217th Battalion, referred to the Court by special message from the Adjutant General, the Court assembled at St. John, N.B., where that battalion was stationed, and examined twelve members of the battalion. From this evidence it was shown that at least four missles, and not more than six, were thrown at the first and second coaches of the second section of the train as it was leaving the station at Mont Joli. The circumstances were as follows:—

About five o'clock on the evening of April 6, 1917, the second section of the train conveying the 217th Battalion stopped at Mont Joli and remained there for about an hour. During that period some soldiers belonging to the Canadian Army Medical Corps, the Canadian Army Service Corps and the 217th Battalion offered the same insults to the citizens as in the case of the trouble at Rivière du Loup, and this was resented by a small number of young men, mostly between the ages of sixteen and twenty, who answered back in the same vein. To avoid any possible trouble, the Mayor of Mont Joli, who was present, cleared all citizens from the station, while the soldiers were ordered to remain inside the train. As the train was leaving, a few stones and cinders were thrown at the car—three of which came through the windows. These were evidently thrown by some of the young fellows who had previously been on the platform and who had hidden behind some freight cars lying about 150 yards beyond the station platform.

7. In addition to these facts, admitted by the soldiers themselves, the citizens gave additional evidence that the soldiers had thrown potatoes and other articles of food, and snow, ice and cinders at the citizens without any provocation whatever. In fact a complaint was made to that effect that very same day by a citizen of Mont Joli to the Adjutant General by wire.

8. From all the evidence which the Court could obtain there is nothing to show either hostility or unfriendliness on the part of the citizens of Rivière du Loup or Mont Joli towards the soldiers.

9. Any stone-throwing at troop-trains there may have been were the acts of a few individuals angered at the moment by the treatment they had received from the soldiers while passing through.

10. Owing to the strong feeling of the majority of the soldiers that the province of Quebec has not, as yet, done her full share of sending troops over, they express their opinions to the citizens in strong terms whenever occasion offers, and this has had a deterrent effect on the volunteer service in these localities.

11. The Court is of the opinion that all necessary steps should be taken to prevent similar occurrences in the future.

Sessional Papers No. 173.

FINDING.

The Court of Inquiry appointed by the Adjutant General by Orders dated the 1st May, 1917, for the purpose of collecting and recording evidence in connection with the allegations contained in several newspapers accusing the citizens of Quebec of maltreating, or allowing to be maltreated, soldiers returning from the war and passing through or sojourning in Quebec, and for the purpose of collecting and recording any other evidence which, in the opinion of the members of the Court, in any way relates to or has a bearing on the matter, reports as follows:—

1. The Court assembled in Quebec on Monday, May 27, 1917, and took the evidence of twenty-two witnesses under oath, and then adjourned to Toronto to take the evidence of witnesses whose names had been furnished by the newspapers in which the reports were published.

2. The evidence taken was received from the Mayor, Chief of Civil Police, Provost-Marshal, the Provincial Police, the Harbour Police, the City Detectives, the Officer Commanding and the Sergeant-Major of the Discharge Depot, the Civil Magistrates, the Revenue Department, the Military Staff of M.D. No. 5, the Great War Veterans' Association, the Khaki Club, the Patriotic Fund, the Convalescent Home, a Minister of the Methodist Church, and several returned soldiers and citizens, in addition to which the Court visited the College Street Hospital in Toronto and made inquiries at the Base Hospital, Toronto, for the purpose of obtaining all evidence that could possibly have any bearing on the subject under investigation.

3. From the evidence it appears clear to the Court that there is no hostility or ill-feelng on the part of any class of citizens in Quebec towards returned soldiers or any other soldiers, nor does there appear to have been any maltreatment of returned soldiers by any class of citizens, nor has any such treatment been permitted.

4. The evidence discloses that some soldiers have obtained liquor without any restriction, some of which appears to have been of a very inferior quality, and, being under its influence, they have caused some minor disturbances, the blame for which cannot be placed under the citizens of Quebec.

5. Whenever any misconduct on the part of the soldiers has come to the notice of the civil authorities, the offenders in all cases appear to have been handed over to the military authorities to deal with—the greatest harmony existing between the civil and military authorities.

6. The evidence discloses that latterly there has grown up an indifference on the part of French Canadian citizens towards soldiers in general, largely due, in the belief of the Court, to the continual accusations that the French Canadians are disloyal and hostile to any participation in the war.

7. Owing to this indifference and to the belief firmly fixed in the minds of the great majority of soldiers that the province of Quebec has not done her duty in the war, minor incidents, which would otherwise have passed unnoticed, have been grossly exaggerated and given rise to the accusations published.

The Court is of the opinion:—

1. That there is no foundation whatever for the articles published in certain newspapers submitted to and investigated by this Court.

2. That all newspapers should be prohibited from publishing articles of this nature.

3. That the sale of liquor to soldiers in the city of Quebec should be absolutely prohibited.

E. S. Wigleth, Col., President.

J. Ostell, Gregor Barcley, Major. } Members.

Signed at Ottawa, this 18th day of May, 1917.

[Mr. Boulay.]

This investigation was held in Quebec on the complaint of some officers commanding the troop passing through the province of Quebec, and especially my county of Rimouski.

Certain allegations were made by the member for Dufferin (Mr. Best), who seemed to be glad to make these charges against the citizens of Quebec. I wish that he were here to listen to a denial of those charges, not only on my own part, but on the part of the commissioners who were chosen to make the investigation. I expected that, on the receipt of the report of the commissioners, the member for Dufferin would at least get up and say that he had been deceived and that the report which he had given to the House and to the country was entirely false and unfounded. He did not do this, however, and it is my duty to-night as the representative of one of the counties against which this accusation was directed, to tell the hon. gentleman that he should have retracted what he said on that occasion. The facts may have been misrepresented to him, but having made the charges he should have accepted the verdict of the Commission and have made a statement to the House to that effect.

Now, leaving out of consideration the facts which have been established by the above figures beyond all possibility of disproof, and admitting for the sake of argument that the province of Quebec did not give to the cause the number of soldiers that was expected of her, I say that the situation in which we are placed in this country by the will of the majority, the numberless persecutions we are made to suffer, against our language, our schools and our religion, would fully justify our standing aloof in the present war, if we had no other motives to fall in line but the gratitude we owe the majority in this country. If we look back to the past and delve into history, we easily understand why the French Canadian cannot throw all his efforts in this struggle with the same spirit and courage that animate his persecutors. Were we not spurred on by the alliance of England, France and Belgium, leagued together for the defence of violated rights and desecrated treaties, no French Canadian, when he sees his race the constant prey of detractors in this country, would be justified in ever pulling a trigger. I am in duty bound to tell this House and the country the truth, the whole truth.

While admitting that the French Canadians of the province of Quebec have not answered the call to arms in very large numbers, one must take into account the various reasons which have helped to withhold them. If we go back to the origins of the French and English nations, we find between them a deep-rooted rivalry from the very first centuries of the Middle Ages; during all that time, until the defeat of Napoleon in 1815, British armies have constantly waged war on French territory. And while those two countries were battling in Europe on land and sea, a like struggle was being waged in America, especially in Canada. Immediately after the foundation of Quebec in 1608, the Iroquois Indians, whom the New England settlers supplied with arms, massacred our missionaries and the French pioneers of Canada and Acadia. And there is still subsisting the painful emotion caused by the barbarous expulsion of the Acadians in 1755, the wiping out of an entire peaceful people, an act for which its authors are branded in history with a mark of infamy.

Before the English conquest in 1760, the arms of the two nations in Canada were continually pitted against each other; there was between the two races an incessant enmity. After the conquest, the struggle passed from the battlefield to the economic and social arena. Ever unabashed, the English laid hold of everything within their reach; they monopolized trade. Attempts were made to Anglicize the French left in the country and to instil into their minds tenets contrary to their faith. At different periods their language was the object of legislative attacks, until the numberless persecutions became intolerable and resulted in the disastrous troubles of 1837-38. The conquerors had apparently forgotten the events of 1775, 1812 and 1814, when the French Canadians saved Canada for England. All the sacrifices of our fathers were counted for nought, and before being allowed to breathe the air of liberty they had to take up arms.

In 1867, the old Canadian provinces got together and secured the enactment of the British North America Act. Confederation, at the time of its passing, was by a large number believed to be a blessing, but now one wonders if it is not the most disastrous compact the province of Quebec ever entered into. I say disastrous, because the Fathers of Confederation who represented the province of Quebec were led into traps from which we cannot extricate ourselves. Thus while our friends from Ontario saw to it that the Act should read in express terms that in the province of Quebec the English language will enjoy equal rights with French, the same privilege was denied the French language in Ontario. The Quebec legislators would say at the time: "We must trust the English majority and expect generous treatment at their hands; we have their word, what more is needed."

Such were the arguments used to secure from the inhabitants of Quebec their acceptance of the most perfidious and nefarious compact that could be devised, and which has proved the source of all the language and racial troubles that exist to-day between the French Canadians and the province of Ontario. Without any guarantee being required, we have been surrendered, and without guarantees we are left to-day, left at the tender mercies of a fanaticism which radiates from the University of Toronto and spreads to the legislature and the press. Our rights in Manitoba had been guaranteed, but the English majority, German-like, tore up its treaties and repudiated its signature.

Since 1867, in all the provinces of the Dominion, the English element is attempting to get the upper hand, and denying our rights. The province of Quebec deeply resents those injustices. Take the Civil Service; it is practically controlled by the English-speaking people. They get the best situations. I could prove my statement by quoting from the list I have here before me the nationality of the higher officials of the service. The figures are from last year's public accounts. There are:

French Canadians..	27
English-speaking..	152

Our population entitles us to 50 of those positions instead of 27. Those conditions—I would not like my hon. friends on the other side to be deceived by the figures just quoted—existed in 1911, when we came into power; the grievance is one of long standing; things even went from bad to worse under the Liberal rule. In 1896, when we were defeated, there were four French-speaking deputy ministers in various departments, while in 1911 only one was left. Things have improved since, for to-day there are three French-speaking deputy ministers.

The same discrimination is to be found in the various classes of the public service. One can go into many of the offices without being able to get any one who understands French, and a French Canadian who succeeds to an English official has to perform the same duties for a smaller remuneration. That is the case with the harbourmaster of Quebec, the captain of the Princess, a boat of the Fisheries Department, etc. If a French Canadian seeks an appointment all sorts of qualifications are required of him that are not required of an English Canadian, or an English-born applicant. Oftentimes when an investigation is to be carried out in the province of Quebec, English-speaking judges or commissioners are appointed, who cannot speak French. Even in the management of the Intercolonial we have to submit to the most crying discrimination. Last year I quoted figures that bear out my statement. All our applications are thrown out. The reply is always sure to come: " No vacancy," or " Too late." On part of the Matapedia branch English travellers were allowed on certain trains, while a Frenchman was refused the same privilege.

But what is the use of attempting a complete enumeration of all our grievances? The list is too long. They are well known to all the French population of the Dominion; they have existed and continue to exist from generation to generation. People who have, as I have, the privilege of belonging to a family whose ancestors settled on Canadian soil at the beginning of the 17th century, ten generations back, know of all those facts.

My object in going into those few details is to have the House and the country understand more clearly the feelings of the French Canadians at the time war was declared. Tell me, Mr. Speaker, what has been done from the very start of the conflict to incite and induce French Canadians to do their bit. The Quebec members have never been consulted either on the appointment of recruiting officers or regimental officers or on war purchases. No horses were bought in my constituency, and of all the millions of dollars spent since the war began, not a cent was spent in the counties around the Gulf. Yet must I say to the credit of my constituents of Rimouski and Matane that all those insults have been brushed aside and we have nobly done our duty. Scores and scores of brave young soldiers from my constituency have fallen on the battlefields of Flanders and France and our quota of recruits amounts to over eight hundred men. The same credit is due the counties of Bonaventure and Gaspé; their children generously answered the call. More than forty soldiers enlisted in my own parish of Sayabec. Three of my nephews are at the front, one of whom has only lately made the glorious sacrifice of his life at Vimy. From the start, our compatriots enlisted in large numbers in English regiments, where they had to submit to ill-treatment and abuse. As soon as French Canadian regiments got across, they were dismembered. Why not have allowed them to keep their identity and their officers? Necessities of war? Then why not have warned them? Was it right to enlist them under false pretenses? Why should they all be placed in the infantry and not be allowed to enlist in the artillery?

Those men were led to believe that they were going to the front with officers of their own race, with men they knew and whom they looked up to as to their fathers and protectors. Why, once in England, were they made to undergo tortures that recall the barbarous practices of mediaeval centuries? If I understand the information of a returned soldier, an intelligent man, who was wounded in action, soldiers are compelled for the slightest offence to run for ten hours within a fixed course, with a load of seventy-five pounds, and being allowed only five minutes rest every twenty minutes. Sometimes they are made to keep their arms stretched out for hours at a time. Those atrocities are reported and are not such as to help enlistment. I am told from the same source that such gross injustices without proper motive are committed that there have been soldiers who shot at their officers. Those reports circulated among a people accustomed to breathe the pure air of American freedom are no inducement for the slackers to join the ranks.

Who can wonder now, after all those insults and with such poor methods of securing recruits, that the French Canadians are not very anxious to accept the sacrifice, when they know beforehand that their merit and their gallantry on the battlefield will not be recognized, and that in many cases they will not even be allowed to wear the stripes of their rank.

I heard the hon. member for Rouville state that a Protestant clergyman by the name of Williams had been appointed head of recruiting in the province of Quebec. Where could be found a more odious and systematic persecution of a race proud of its past, conscious of its dignity and jealous of its destinies?

It must also be taken into account that 75 to 80 per cent of our population consists of farmers, and that to clear and break new land requires more hands than are required by the English farmers of the western prairies or of the more favoured portions of Canada.

It must besides be considered that in almost all the English provinces the teaching of French in our own schools is discouraged where not completely proscribed, as in Manitoba and Ontario, although these provinces have been fertilized by the blood of French missionaries and settlers, so almost everywhere in the Dominion we have manifest injustices to complain of. Our schools are a standing grievance that rankles deep. When one thinks of the situation in which we are placed in every sphere of life, in the Civil Service, as regards our educational and even religious aspirations; when the methods of recruiting and the treatment meted out to us since the beginning of the war are taken into account, then one cannot blame my compatriots if, under those conditions, they hesitate before making the supreme sacrifice. I for one cannot find it in my heart to censure them, although I have never ceased preaching to them that they must do their duty, enlist in numbers, obliterate the past, ignore the present, turn their eyes away from the vexations to which they are subjected by a certain section of the people of the Dominion, and think only of Great Britain and of the true Britishers, who live across from France, and one of whom told me one day anent the persecutions we have to endure from those of his race in Canada: "Never mind them, they know not what they do. . . . .The true Britisher is on your side." When Belgium is devastated, laid waste, bleeding, because she would keep her pledge; when France's every soldier is proving himself a hero; when Canada's own welfare depends on the issue, and because Canada's first line of trenches, Canada's frontiers are now in Flanders, our gallant Canadian youth must not hesitate to make every sacrifice. We must prove our loyalty to the British Crown so long as the hour of our independence has not struck. France! Belgium! England! Long live they!

I have shown, I think, with figures that the province of Quebec has furnished as many Canadian-born soldiers as the other provinces, and that even if we have stood somewhat aloof, our conduct is fully justified by the attitude towards us of a certain bigoted and prejudiced section of the people, by the inefficient methods of recruiting resorted to by the Department of Militia from the start, and by the constant abuse to which we are subjected.

I say further: Stop these villainous attacks, call off your persecution of our language and our schools, especially in Manitoba and Ontario, and thousands of my compatriots will readily take up arms and jump into the trenches.

This rancour against the French of Canada is one of long standing. In 1846, when a Militia Bill was under consideration, Sir E. P. Taché addressed himself to his English countrymen in the following words, which I find in Mr. Henri Bourassa's book entitled: "What We Owe England":

> Only be fair to the French Canadians, and you will see that their gallant battalions will be the first to rush to the frontier and make of their bodies a rampart against any invasion. The habit has grown too far of calumniating those brave people; too frequently they are described as ungovernable malcontents; the press too often accuses them of disloyalty and sedition, claiming for the other race the exclusive practice of the opposite virtues. To those detractors I say: You are deceived; we appeal to the mother country; treat us as brothers and not as bastards and rest assured that we shall never forget our oath of allegiance to the day when the last shot shall be fired by a French Canadian in the defence of Great Britain.

In the third place, I claim that the mandate we received from the electorate in 1911 does not empower us to vote for the present Bill. Everywhere I spoke I pledged myself to oppose any appropriation to build a navy, or to hand over millions in aid of the British navy, and I have faithfully kept that pledge. Twice already I have stated in this House that the obligations we are imposing on Canada in this war are out of all proportion to our resources and our revenue, and I stand by that statement. The policy adopted in 1911 to oppose strenuously the proposals of the new Prime Minister should still actuate us in considering the Conscription Bill. Notwithstanding the statements to the contrary of our party leaders, I still hold to the opinion that voluntary enlistment, in the future as in the past, is the best mode of recruiting in Canada. We are told that men are needed to reinforce the units now at the front, but surely the entry of the United States into the war will bring to our armies a sufficient number of men to compensate to a large extent the help we might give at the expense of our agriculture and our industries, and at the risk of starving the Allies by reducing the production of our fields. National interest is averse to all other but voluntary enlistment. I may even vote against the amendment of the right hon. leader of the Opposition, because in a way it is a mitigated scheme of conscription in so far that should the referendum carry my right hon. friend is pledged to compulsory service. In fact, it would be sure to carry, because it would rally a solid vote from the soldiers as well as their relatives and friends, as was pointed out by the hon. member from North Grey (Mr. Middlebro), and that vote would be of itself sufficient to carry the referendum by an immense majority. I have received numerous petitions from the electors of my county, asking me to vote against any form of compulsory service, whether introduced by Sir Robert Borden or Sir Wilfrid Laurier. I have come to the conclusion that I should comply with the wishes of my electors. And in any case, what faith can we place in Sir Wilfrid Laurier and his party when we read the declarations made by him in the House of Commons at various times since the 12th of December, 1912? Does he not favour placing at the disposal of Great Britain all our resources, both in men and money, and for the further information of the hon. members, I shall quote what he stated in this House on December 12, 1912:

> This is the Australian policy; this ought to be the Canadian policy. I insist once more upon what is stated in the memorandum: There is no emergency, there is no immediate danger, there is no prospective danger. If there were an emergency, if England were in danger—no, I will not use that expression; I will not say if England were in danger, but simply if England were on trial with one or two or more of the great powers of Europe, my right hon. friend might come and ask, not $35,000,000, but twice, three times, four times $35,000,000. We would put at the disposal of England all the resources of Canada; there would not be a single dissentient voice. Oh, ye Tory jingoes, is that the amount of the sacrifice you are prepared to make? You are ready to furnish admirals, rear-admirals, commodores, captains, officers of all grades, plumes, feathers and gold lace; but you leave it to England to supply the bone and sinews on board those ships. You say that these ships shall bear Canadian names. That will be the only thing Canadian about them. You hire somebody to do your work; in other words, you are ready to do anything except the fighting.

And farther on:

> Is that the true policy? It is a hybrid policy, it is a cross between jingoism and nationalism. Unless I mistake the spirit of the Canadian people, if they are true to their ideals, if they are true to their own blood, no matter to what province they belong, they will not be satisfied with this hybrid policy, but they will insist that their contribution shall be a contribution of money and of men as well, as was provided in our resolution of 1909.
> Mr. Speaker, it is not money that England wants at this moment. England never was wealthier than she is at the present time; her coffers are overflowing. What she wants are the hearts, the brains and the brawn of her subjects all over the world.

After such statements can we believe that the right hon. leader of the Opposition is disposed to refuse his support to every scheme of compulsory service? Can we put stock in his amendment when he is well aware that a referendum might result in a majority in favour of conscription? As I am against all form of conscription, I have decided to vote against the Laurier amendment and the main motion and vote for the Barrette amendment, which would mean the death of the Bill.

Mr. M. MARTIN (St. Mary's, Montreal) (Translation): Will my hon. friend allow me to put a question?

Mr. BOULAY (Translation): Certainly.

Mr. MARTIN (Translation): You stated just now that the referendum would likely carry. On what do you base your opinion?

Mr. BOULAY (Translation): I have stated my reasons. If you take the soldiers' votes, 400,000 of them, together with that of their relatives and friends, say 400,000 more, you have a total of 800,000, while in 1911 the total vote polled was only 1,300,000. Supposing that the number of electors has increased very little since 1911, then deduct 800,000 from 1,300,000 and we clearly would be a minority.

Mr. MARTIN (Translation): The soldiers overseas, from all reports, are more strongly against conscription than those in this country.

Mr. BOULAY (Translation): I do not believe it.

How can we manage to obtain immigrants from Europe, who come to America to enjoy liberty and freedom? After putting this Act on our statute-books, how can we hold out to them that in Canada they will be free from European militarism?

We are told that unless we send reinforcements we must withdraw our troops from the front. My reply is similar to what other hon. members have already said: If we cannot maintain four divisions, then let us have only three and if it is impossible to keep three to full strength, let us have only two, provided we stay within the bounds of our means and resources.

The other day I listened to the strong plea of the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) in favour of an appeal to the people by way of a referendum, and I was taken aback at some of his statements. I was wondering whether I was listening to the same member for Rouville, to the same Postmaster General of the Laurier Cabinet, who in 1911, addressing a public meeting at St. Hyacinthe, denounced Bourassa?

Is he really the same Liberal leader who in the campaign of 1911 went from parish to parish decrying nationalism? Is he really that same Grit orator who since 1911 has constantly inveigled not only against Henri Bourassa but against all the Nationalists, because, forsooth, the latter, and it is their only crime, had advised Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the Liberals to submit a referendum to the people at the time of the general elections in order to feel the pulse of the people on the question of a Canadian navy and that of free trade with the United States—

Mr. MARTIN (Translation): And of boring holes in the British flag—

Mr. BOULAY (Translation): What sudden happening is responsible for this sudden turning around of the hon. member for Rouville? Did the Liberal chieftain hold council with Mr. Bourassa and bargain for the support of the Nationalists by adopting their tenets and coming before the House to acknowledge that they were mistaken in 1911 and to repudiate all they said against Nationalism? Have they accepted all the policies we advocated then and are still ready to endorse on the same question, in order to take by storm the seats of the mighty?

Mr. DELISLE (Portneuf) (Translation): So you acknowledge having been elected as a Nationalist?

Mr. BOULAY (Translation): Certainly. Why then this alliance, this face about? The hon. member for Rouville alone can explain the enigma. If Mr. Bourassa and those who followed him in 1911 were traitors in defending their principles, what are we to believe of the hon. member for Rouville and all those who share his views on conscription? To me, their conversion appears somewhat strange and I view it with a certain amount of suspicion.

I will conclude my remarks with a few words in English. There are but few of our English-speaking friends in their places at this time, but I desire that these should understand a summary of what I have already said in French. Besides, it will show that we have the two languages in the province of Quebec including the county of Rimouski. In the early days of August, 1914, when Germany had declared war on France and Belgium, we French Canadians lived hours that were lengthened by great anxiety. The eyes of all our people were turned towards England, and we expected from moment to moment the despatch which would make known that she had decided to take her place by the side of France and Belgium. I must remind my French-speaking fellow-countrymen that we should have been the first to charge England with cowardice and treason if she had hesitated for one single day to give the assistance which those countries needed. We expected that England would enter the fight to save her honour, to show her reverence for treaties solemnly entered upon, to crush barbarism, and to defend her trade and her colonies. Every man learned in these matters, every public man, every man of sense, knew what would be the consequence for Canada should England enter the fight. Do not let anybody believe that the French Canadians are indifferent to this war, or are disregardful of the mother country, for they realize that in this time of trial she has done only what they wished her to do and is fulfilling their desires in carrying on the fight. In this life and death struggle Britain has always had our full sympathies. In the early days of the war a large number of French Canadians enlisted, and if the current of that enlistment has grown less since those early days, it is due to the fact with which I have already dealt in my remarks in French, and also to the fact that a large number of local leaders among the Liberals in the back parishes have done their best to stop it altogether. I blame in this connection also some persons of high standing in public life who have done exactly the contrary of what they should have done, and have created a condition of mind among the public of which, in the future, they may be the first to complain.

Let me quote as an example the case of my own village. I did what I could to encourage our young men to enlist, and I must say to the honour of my parish priest that from the very start of the war he acted in a manner befitting a minister of religion and a true and loyal citizen of the country. He used every means to encourage our boys to go to the front. And what was the result? Over forty men of our village have enlisted. Some of them have fallen gloriously on the field of battle, and many are wounded. What has been done in my village could have been done in a great many others, and I am confident that the same results would have followed.

Mr. MARTIN: With the permission of the hon. gentleman, I would ask if he has any sons?

Mr. BOULAY: I have no boys that could enlist. But I have just stated to the House that I have three nephews who could leave, and they have left.

Mr. MARTIN: But your sons?

Mr. BOULAY: My sons are married men and they have proper regard for the obligations which they have taken upon themselves.

In considering this whole question, we cannot lose sight of the facts of history. If England has been compelled to enter this frightful war in 1914, we cannot avoid believing that she is largely responsible for it, and that to-day she pays the penalty of the tenderness she showed for Germany in 1870. I remember well those mournful days in the history of France, when the roar of the enemy's guns resounded over her fair fields, and the papers brought us daily reports of the successive defeats of our old mother country. Our hearts were full of sorrow, for we were sharers in the misfortune of France. When France, torn and bleeding, signed the treaty which extorted from her Alsace-Lorraine and an indemnity of five billions of dollars, we French Canadians swore eternal hate of Germany; we anticipated the day when revenge would be taken; and meantime we held England largely responsible for the crushing of her brave neighbour. Now that England understands the situation, she realizes that she then committed the greatest political and commercial error of her national life in allowing the only nation to be crushed which could make a rampart for the protection of her trade. Now, she devotes all her energy to the defence of France and Belgium, and we applaud her efforts, and are ready, as we have been from the start, to uphold her in this fight in every way that is in our power. Every intelligent French Canadian admits that we must take part in this war; he knows that in doing so we are defending our homes, our wives, and our children. But the man of French blood does not like constraint; he does not like to be forced to do his duty, nor does he like, more than any other man, to be insulted because of his creed and because of his ideas of freedom.

Since the foundation of Quebec we have been exposed to vexations from our fellow-citizens of English speech. While we are discussing this Bill in this House German methods are used in Ottawa and in Toronto to restrict the liberty of French Canadians. While we are discussing what would be the best means of liberating the people of old Europe from slavery, the president of the French School Commission of Ottawa is in jail or is exposed to be put in jail. Five Christian Brothers, teachers in our schools, are tried in Toronto, charged with the awful crime of teaching French to little French boys. And Genest—what is his crime? Why he has paid the French school teachers. And all this while the blood of old France and of England is shed on the battlefield in a noble effort to crush German barbarism. In 1874 began for good the persecution against our schools in New Brunswick. In 1890, in Manitoba, and almost everywhere in the Dominion outside the province of Quebec our countrymen were suffering more or less from injustice. Nothing is more painful, nothing makes me feel more heartbroken, than to receive a letter from a French Canadian who writes in English because, as he explains, he has had no French education.

Fanaticism is the plague of our country; and such persecutions as those to which I have referred are the work of its supporters. They say that this is done in order to show us how to be good citizens. They are most anxious about the education of our children, and they want to teach them by force only the one language, when we want to teach them two. They do these things, they tell us, because also they are afraid of French domination over the whole of Canada. When have we intended or shown any desire for domination? How do we use our English-speaking citizens in the province of Quebec? I call on them to declare before this country how they are treated. Every French Canadian has a heartfelt respect for his neighbour, and no one need fear any compulsion from him, nor any effort dictated by ambition to impose our will or our creed upon others. What do we ask? What do we need? Liberty under just laws; the same liberty to practise our religion that we are willing to grant all others to practise theirs; liberty to teach our own language to our children. We know our own interests, and we do not expect the Orange Sentinel and its supporters, nor do we expect the Irish Catholics, to look after those interests. We know that if we wish to live and do business in this country our children must learn the English language. And from Gaspé to Ottawa, or Timiskaming, we are teaching our children English as we have opportunity. We need nobody to show us the advisability of this course, as we need nobody to exercise coercion upon us.

To bring peace in this Canada of ours is very simple; leave us alone and give us justice. Is this asking too much?

As to the situation immediately under discussion in this House, I suggest the following as a remedy: Give the voluntary system of enlistment another trial. Ask all members of Parliament, all public men, all clergymen in the province of Quebec, to use their personal influence with those of their compatriots with whom they come in contact. Guarantee to all who enlist that the unity of the battalions formed on this side shall be maintained in the field until their annihilation. Let the people of Ontario stop their campaign against our faith, and our traditions. But above all, and first of all, erase from the statutes of all provinces in the Dominion all provisions forbidding the teaching of French. If a new campaign of voluntary enlistment is entered upon, with the proper men to carry it out, I am sure that the French blood that flows in our veins, the same blood that flows in the veins of the heroic Frenchmen overseas, will cause our people to do their duty to the utmost limit.

But, on the contrary, if you undertake to exercise compulsion, the result will disappoint your expectations. The hon. member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Gauthier) has given a pretty good idea of the attitude and state of mind of the people of the province of Quebec and the situation which will result if an attempt is made to enforce conscription upon them. I hope I have made the situation clear enough to be understood by every man in this country, even the least far-seeing. There is time yet to avert that situation. Later on it may be too late and the link of Confederation may be severed in this struggle for life. The announcement that our schools shall be free everywhere in Canada would be greeted with delight and from the highest to the lowest amongst the French Canadian people the appreciation would be so great that thousands of men would offer their lives willingly and would be happy to die for the liberty of the world and of Canada

Mr. PAUL ARTHUR SEGUIN (L'Assomption): Mr. Speaker, the question which we are now debating is beyond a doubt the most serious of all that has ever been introduced in the Parliament of Canada. I would, therefore, like to discuss it on its actual merits and, to such an end, I wish to lay aside all personal interest, all party interest as well as all false sentimentality. At the risk of shocking a certain number of my friends on the other side and, who knows, some of my fellow-member on this side of the House, I contend that, in order to handle this delicate and ticklish question, to see it, in a word, in its proper light, I am obliged to carefully cut out certain high sounding words which have indeed a fine effect in phraseology, but which, also, are apt to falsify logic, such as "patriotism", "Empire", "flag", "civilization", "freedom of the people", and what not?

Before entering into the main subject, I may well be allowed, I imagine, to make a digression and express my astonishment at a thing which would seem incredible, were we not passing through an epoch wherein the most incredible facts are still the most current ones in our daily life. And that incredible, astounding fact, is the promise which the hon. Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) has made to the Imperial authorities of an army of five hundred thousand men, whereby we may be compelled to enlist from 50,000 to 100,000 more Canadians to be sent over to the battlefields of the old world.

We have then reached that point, in the democratic country which is, or better, which was ours, on this land of all sound liberties, upon this vast area of soil where both political parties have always made it a duty to act only through the popular will, we have then reached that point, do I say, where we are at the mercy of a Government leader who dares to make promises, without previously consulting either his ministers or the members of the House, and for less this good people who pay, indeed more than ever before, since they are giving their money and their blood, but have no more, alas! the privilege of governing.

I have just said "without consulting his ministers" and I do not believe I am wrong, since, during his memorable recruiting campaign, the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Blondin) has never missed an opportunity to prophesy, as pythoness-like as possible, that we never would have military conscription in this country, and that, within fifteen days, at the most, before the hon. Prime Minister's return; and I do not believe I am wrong, for the hon. Secretary of State (Mr. Patenaude) always answered with his most sunshiny, his most know-it-all and his most negative smile to every one who would put to him the troublesome question: "When is conscription coming?" Besides, the noble attitude taken by the latter, in giving up his seat in the Cabinet, proves that he had not been consulted. As to the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Sevigny), I will say nothing, because everybody knows that he has retained Dorchester only by the strength of his arguments against compulsory service.

And to think that there are still some foolish people—among whom I am obliged to class myself—who are still capable of a certain astonishment!

I will now come to the main question and plainly state, from the very start,—what, I am sure, will surprise no one—that I am squarely opposed to any form of military conscription, be it called "selective" or any other name, except that only conscription which would have for its object the actual defence of the Canadian soil against invaders.

The reasons for my opposition are various, and I owe it to myself as well as to my constituents to make a review of them.

In the first place, we do not have, any of us, the required mandate to vote conscription. It is a very fine thing to be most zealous and to work for the Empire's safety, but yet must we have a mandate to do it. There is no use concealing the facts, let us frankly ask one another the question: Whom do we represent here? There is no other possible answer than this one: We represent nobody. Our mandate has expired almost a year ago, and if we are here, it is not by the will of the people; it is not our electors who maintain us here, since we are here by the will of a power that has nothing in common with our people but the sole colonial tie which binds us to Great Britain. If, therefore, our mandate is defunct, since we are sitting here without representing anybody, by what right could we go and vote such a coercive measure as that of conscription?

Should we, without a mandate, settle matters of administration or continue attending to routine, we might escape censure. But that, without any mandate, we should pass an Act which interests the people not only in their welfare, not only in their material tranquility, but which concerns the very lives of their sons, I contend that it would be taking the most arbitrary, the most unjust and the most iniquitous step possible. More than that, even were we sitting here by the popular will, even if our mandate were not expired and had we full power to legislate upon matters of public order, I contend that it would still be unjust, arbitrary and iniquitous to pass a law imposing military conscription, without previously consulting our constituents on such a question.

But another question arises: Has it ever been recorded in the world's history that compulsory military service had been enforced on the inhabitants of a colony, except for the defence of its territory? I do not think so. Is not the gaping chasm which lies between colonist and citizen quite apparent to all? Is it then so long ago that, in the mother country they referred to colonists with undisguised contempt? How, I ask you, could the order be given to colonists: You shall leave your country, you will abandon your families without any protection, your land at the mercy of any foe that may come, and you will cross the sea to come and defend the mother country. I repeat it, it is sheer madness.

More than 420,000 of these colonials have already enlisted to fight for the mother country. This is not the proper time to look into the motives which induced them to enlist. We know that they have gone overseas but we do not know how many will ever come back. I would like to see inscribed in golden letters the names of those heroes in the annals of this country. But I fear very much that this wish will never come true. Colonials are often called upon to build empires, but very seldom do their names get into the pages of history.

So, 420,000 young men have enlisted. That does not include the Frenchmen, the Belgians, the Russians, the Italians who answered the call of their mother country and left our shores at the beginning of the war to join the colours. Those reservists must have numbered at least 15,000 or 20,000, so that between 430,000 and 440,000 people from this country, of all nationalities, have answered the call.

Our mixed population does not comprise exclusively French Canadians and English Canadians; all the races are represented here, foes and friends alike. Germans, Austrians, Turks and Bulgarians are to be found in great number among our population. We have also many representatives of the neutral countries: Sweden, Norway, Holland, Spain, etc. We have besides our native Indians reserves, as well as those made up of foreign immigrants. If we deduct from our total population the representatives of all these foreign nationalities that cannot be forced to join the colours, I maintain that in proportion to our population, we have put forth a greater effort than the mother country.

It is not only with man power that we can help win the war. I am inclined to think that the Government, from the start, have overlooked that great truth. I will not speak of the irretrievable omission, but confine my remarks to the blunders that it is not too late to undo if the Government will only set themselves earnestly to the task.

We are told that more men are wanted in Europe. Why then do you not use compulsion in regard to the Frenchmen, the Belgians, the Italians and the Russians, as well as the Englishmen, that have taken refuge in this country? Why do you not oblige them to join their respective regiments? I mean, of course, those of military age. We have not to concern ourselves with their physical fitness or the state of their health. In their country they could at least replace those who are forced to do duty behind the lines.

Among the slackers I have mentioned the Englishmen, the British-born. I am doing it, mark, without the least ill-will, but is it fair to keep here, in the Civil Service or in our large corporations so many young Englishmen that the Colonial Office have sent to this country? Is it just to leave them undisturbed when we are sending, under compulsion, our own fellow-citizens to fight for the safety of the Empire? Let the Government make up a list of all those slackers in all the departments and you will be astonished to see what fine regiments could be raised in that way.

Has the Government done all in their power to help win the war? Why then, even at this very late date, are Germans, and Germans and still more Germans to be found in all the departments of the Civil Service? There are Germans in the Department of Agriculture, even amongst the chief clerks. There are Germans at the Observatory, in the Department of Militia, in the Department of Mines, everywhere.

For the last three years the public have been wondering at this state of affairs and to all our questions the Government have been satisfied with making the same answer: "These Germans are good Germans." Good Germans, indeed, for they never miss an opportunity to help their country. If I am asked for the proof, I find it in a report "Products and By-Products of Coal" which has been brought to my notice by the directors of a well known institution of learning, in my country. This report has been prepared by Mr. Stansfield, with a wish, I suppose, to please his chief, Mr. Eugene Haanel, one of those good Germans, who is the head of the Mining Division in the report deals with the dye industry and here are some of the things that are to be found in that report:

> In confirmation of the above statement that it is at present impraticable to found a coal-tar dye industry in Canada, the following paragraphs are quoted from an interview with Dr. Bernhard C. Hesse, of New York.

In other words, as a proof of our inferiority and our shortcoming in the industrial field, the author of the report offers the opinion of a German. That seems to me to be the limit, especially when it is known that the interview mentioned in the report is dated September 14, 1914, that is to say, during the war, and that the report itself has been printed in 1915.

In this most disinterested opinion, one may read very edifying sentences, such as the following; for instance:

> Germany's supremacy in this field has been for more than 30 years a standing challenge not only to the chemists and capitalists of the United States, but to the chemists and capitalists of all the rest of the world as well.
> The truth seems to be that the whole of this industry cannot be successfully transplanted, and attempts to transplant part only have not resulted in any selft-contained and independent industry anywhere, but in an industry the real roots of which are still in German soil.

How delicate a matter, is it not, to boom the country of "Kultur" in one of the Canadian Government departments! It is harmless, will I be told, and nothing can result of it; well, I for one, find in these lines an insult to the Anglo-Saxon race as well as to the French race, in pretending that they are inferior to the German race in any line of industry. But it is good Germans who write it, and you cannot touch it, for during the last three years that war is being waged, this Government keeps them with a most paternal solicitude in the fat jobs they enjoy to the detriment of the real Canadians, who could fill such positions with as much ability and, in any case, with a keener sense of proportion.

Do you want another example? I will surprise no one when I state that the secretary of the Minister of Marine is a German. Why is it necessary that a German should fill this important office? I don't know. A naturalized German, it is true; but it must be admitted that, at the outbreak of war, it was a most wise thing for the Germans to be naturalized, and it might be added that naturalization, just like a minister's promise, does not amount to much. Now, if I am well informed, the said secretary had a near relation of his, a German like himself and, like him also, probably naturalized at the beginning of the war. This German enlisted in the Canadian army; he was made a sergeant and he took part in the battle of Courcelette. He was neither wounded nor killed he only disappeared and some time later he was reported prisoner in Germany. In a letter he wrote to one of his old comrades, he complained of the Teuton's barbarity that condemned him to occupy his leisure time in a shell factory. The farce is evident; if that man had not been a spy, he would not, being a German, have escaped the firing squad where the Germans have always sent any of their own they found fighting against them. But nothing of this must be reported to our Government who have such overweening regard for the Civil Service officials of German origin.

Let us return to this conscription question. I have said that Canada has done her share. I have said that considering, on the one hand, our numbers as a people and, on the other hand, the number of those who enlisted, it may be said that we have made a greater effort than the British people. I do not say that we should stop recruiting, but I do say that our past record is a guarantee for the future. I submit that a compulsory service Bill will not result in a marked increase in the number of enlisted soldiers and that it will be a menace to peace at home. I contend that just now, the best means of bringing about final victory is the organisation of our economic resources. The day is not distant when we shall be asked to contribute, not soldiers but food. What is our Government doing to provide for the years of dearth that are forthcoming? Do they indeed beleive that the 400,000 or 500,000 men who have gone have not caused an awful gap in every branch of the trade as well as of commerce. Labour has become so scarce in the country places that our farmers are unable to cultivate all their lands; they are already anxiously asking themselves how they will be able to take in their crops. Have our Government done anything to prevent the alarming increase in the cost of living? The speculators are keeping on their work at their heart's content; those who govern won't listen and they look in other directions. One thing only concerns them: to send more men to the mother country. The only fixed idea of our Prime Minister is the fulfilment of the promise which the overseas military authorities have wrung from him; it is his nightmare, his obsession: one hundred thousand men!... one hundred thousand men!... He must find them at any price. The trusts are about to starve our people; no matter—one hundred thousand men!—If the Government does not attend to it immediately, we will have this winter, in spite of the controller, a dreadful dearth of fuel; no matter, one hundred thousand men! Agriculture and the national trades are short of hands; no matter, one hundred thousand men! It is useless to try and argue, so long as those hundred thousand men have not come out of Jupiter's thigh. We should not forget that Canada's population is so much the sparser that the country covers an immense territory. But the friends of conscription see men everywhere; they don't see anything else; they forget that the men are indispensable to the good working of our economic machinery in every one of its wheels.

It may be that the moving picture theatres in the large centres, that the pool rooms and the shows are filled with idle youths. Do you think conscription will reach these boys? Seventy-five per cent of these cigarette smokers are not fit to pass the medical test and half of the rest are rich men's sons whom protection will keep away from the rosters.

There is a question which it is my duty to touch upon here. I do it with a certain hesitation, for it is an exceedingly delicate one. It is that of the province of Quebec and of her present situation as regards the other provinces. The French Canadians have been upbraided for their indifference in the present conflict and for their reluctance to answer the call of the mother-country. Were we to believe certain fanatical sheets of the English provinces, and also some members of this House, the province of Quebec, and especially the French Canadians, remained absolutely deaf to that call. Exaggerations were resorted to, in order to make abuses easier. Other English papers and also other English speaking members, more honest, more loyal and more broad-minded, have replied to these calumniators and that is sufficient. If I refer to it here, it is only to try and show that the French Canadians' situation at the present hour is an exceptional one. Shall I be rightly understood when I say that the instinct of preservation, the strongest sentiment that exists, is leading the French Canadians in spite of themselves? There are English Canadians—and legions of them—who are English before being Canadians and who, unsuspectingly, are ready to sacrifice the interests, even the future, of the colony to those of their mother country. I do not wish to blame them, for their blood is up, and blood will tell. But neither can they blame my fellow-people for being Canadians before being British, and even for being French Canadians before being only Canadians. In this case also, blood must tell.

Yes, without suspecting it, the racial instinct is at work among us French Canadians. Instinctively, we feel that it would be dangerous for us to weaken ourselves beyond measure, because we know that for the struggle to come, we can rely only on our own forces. Foreign immigration benefits only the English element in this country: Irishmen, Swedes, Scotchmen, Americans, Germans, Norwegians, Finlanders, Austrians, Greeks, Bulgarians, Turks or Doukhobors, all, in a hundred years hence, will have dissolved themselves in the English element, having its character, its language, its manners and its ideal. No one, except a few Frenchmen or Belgians, will have joined the French Canadian race. We must, I repeat it, depend only on our own resources. Now, instinct does not reason in face of a danger. The French Canadian is attached to his land, to his soil, to his old province; persuade him, if you can, to go and get killed for the salvation of the Empire, he will go; but do not attempt to send him there by force; he will cling to his green maples, and you will find that his arms are too robust for you to break their grip. For the French Canadian does not see things in the same light as the English Canadian does; and the great pity of it all is that the English Canadian cannot or will not understand that there are always different ways of considering a question. Will you say that we lack patriotism? Let any foe, whoever he may be, invade the old soil so dear to every Canadian and then you may judge our patriotism. The facts of our past history would be renewed. And if ever Canada were to suffer an invasion, the foe would soon see more Salaberrys arise. But it is useless, absolutely useless to attempt to impose conscription upon a people that does not want it, because it has its own reasons for not wanting it.

If there be so much loyalty in the other provinces, if those provinces are so eager to go and win glory upon the European fields of battle, why don't they impose conscription upon themselves? There is nothing to prevent them from doing so. Must Quebec be at the fore, for others to jump in? My opinion, I will state it frankly, is that, at the bottom, the sister provinces are very glad to witness the opposition made by the province of Quebec and which may perhaps turn to their own benefit. Have a referendum upon this conscription question, and of the nine provinces, there will be nine to vote against it. This referendum is a necessity; it is for the people to decide this question. Is it because a negative answer is feared that the imposition of conscription is wanted? It really would be unfortunate, if this fact was lost sight of, that it is not all to pass this Act, but that its most important phase would be the carrying out of its provisions. It would also be its most difficult feature. If the people do not want conscription—and you could only know that by consulting them—will the mere fact that you have passed that law make them change their minds and bring them bound hands and feet at your disposal? And if this measure becomes law, and you attempt to enforce it; if, when it has become a law, you should try and impose it and the people should refuse, what will you do? Have you ever considered, you, the friends of conscription, what may be the outcome of it all?

You want to pass this law because the time is short, do you say; that is why you refuse to ask the people their opinion and that, deliberately, you propose to do a monstrous act? Is not that a false pretence? If, instead of shifting as they have been doing, the Government had honestly understood their duty and had submitted the question to the people, they would already know where they stand. The people are and must remain the masters of their destinies; the Government forget that the people are the masters and that we, the members, are only their servants. Under present circumstances, the Government seem to intend making of the people a herd of slaves.

I have refrained from discussing the merits of this Bill; much could be said on that subject; but it would only be a waste of time and useless trouble, for, even if it were perfect and a model act in its kind, I would still feel obliged to vote against such a bill, believing that the people, and the people alone, I repeat it, have the right of deciding so momentous question.

I could not conclude without saying a word of praise and of admiration toward the Liberal party's revered leader. In refusing, as he has done, to associate with the ministers for the passing of a compulsory enlisting Act, he has set an example of that true democracy that does respect the rights and the obligations of the citizens. He has avoided the snare laid for him. He has devoted his life to the building up of the Canadian country; his efforts have always had for their object to make of Canada a united nation in the Empire. To-day, through the Government's action, Canada reverts once more to the status of a mere crown colony, crouching under the imperialist rod. He who had dreamed of a Canada greater, stronger and prouder, will not bear the responsibility for such a downfall before history. More than ever before, I am happy to follow in the footsteps of a worthy leader and I shall vote with pleasure for the amendment of the right hon. leader of the Opposition, who wants the people to be consulted before the tax of blood is imposed upon them.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE (Montreal, St. James): Mr. Speaker, having followed very attentively the different phases of the debate on this important question, and having devoted the best study and reflection possible to me to the issue which the present Bill establishes, I have come to the conclusion that my first impressions were right, and that my determination to oppose conscription, under any form, was well founded. I have the honour of representing a very large and important section of the city of Montreal; thousands of my electors have conveyed to me, in different ways and at different times, both individually and collectively, their desire that I should voice their views and opinions by opposing any form of coalition government, any further extension of Parliament, and any project of conscription. And I may say, in passing, that the hon. member who represents another very important section of the city of Montreal has himself admitted that from his own division he has received many and many petitions against conscription. Therefore, there is no doubt that I have truly grasped the views of my constituents and represent their opinions when I say I am against conscription. Such being the unanimous will of my electors, and such being my own inclination, I will trespass but briefly on the indulgence of the House, while I set forth some of the many reasons which urge me to adopt the stand I have taken on this occasion.

I need not at this moment refer any further to the coalition question, because that seems now to be a dead issue. As to the prolongation of the parliamentary term beyond the period already accorded, I will reserve for the appearance of such a proposal all argument in opposition to it. However, I cannot refrain from making one statement, which applies to the general trend of the present Government's policy and which concerns the idea of extension of Parliamentary terms. Eighty years ago, in Upper and Lower Canada, our fathers fought against the Family Compact and the bureaucracy of that day, and succeeded in securing for their sons the boon of popular representation thirty years later, in 1867. It has flourished and borne fruit for fifty years; and I object to celebrate the half-century of our Confederation by either the uprooting of that tree, or the splitting of it into fragments by driving in the wedge, under blows of an Imperialistic hammer, that is calculated to deprive our children of its protection, its shade and its fruits.

The immediate question under discussion is that of conscription; and on that I desire to register my emphatic opposition to any such scheme. I do so all the more heartily, because I am deeply convinced that it is a menace to the constitutional liberties that we have been taught to expect and that we have ever enjoyed under the protection of the British flag. I do so because, in my mind, it is an insult to the manhood and patriotism of Canadians. I do so because it is the outcome of hysterical sentiments created by the overstrain upon the nerves of public men by the conditions of unrest in the world to-day. I do so on account of the manner in which it has been sprung upon a people long led to believe that no such scheme was in contemplation. I do so, above all, on account of the autocratic spirit that underlies its conception, its presentation and its prosecution.

Bear with me a moment while I attempt to explain: There are two great and antagonistic principles animating the contending Powers in this terrible war. On the side of the Central Powers, Germany and her allies, we find the standard of autocracy raised and the doctrine of brute force and Kaiserism preached with fire, sword and shell. On the side of Great Britain, France and her allies, we see the standard of democratic freedom lifted aloft and the sublime doctrine of popular liberty and constitutional rights advocated in accents of thunder. It is for the triumph of that democracy over the monster of autocracy that Canada has joined in this struggle, and that she has freely, loyally, unshackled and uncoerced, sent forth to the conflict far more than a fair proportion of her manhood. The methods adopted by the Government of to-day to attempt to implement the unreflecting promise of an over-excited Prime Minister, are in exact accordance with the autocratic spirit against which the Allies are fighting, and for the destruction of which this very measure is supposed to have been conceived and introduced. The refusal of the Government, which has long out-lived its constitutional existence, to allow the people of Canada to have a voice in the issue or a word in the deciding of the fate of their dearest and most precious assets, is purely and simply the illustration in this land of the Kaiserism of Europe, and the putting into harsh practice here of the methods that have raised the indignation and the battle spirit of the civilized world. Elected in times of peace, with a mandate to administer the affairs of a country in a state of tranquility, the Government, having reached the end of its term, makes use of the war excuse to cling to power and to avoid a verdict from those who gave its members their original mandate.

As far as carrying on the affairs of Canada, with a view to performing a fair and rational duty in this struggle is concerned, the Opposition has never declined to lend every possible assistance to the Government; but, when it comes to a radical change in national conditions, and to the introduction of methods savouring strongly of coercion and compulsion, it is the inalienable right of the people of this Dominion—the people whose lives and blood are given to the cause, and whose money and sacrifices foot the terrible debt of the nation—to be consulted and to have a voice in this sudden dislocation of their destiny. Had the Government consulted the people first, we would know what they had to say regarding this measure; but to promise that conscription would never be resorted to, to then hurl it unexpectedly at the head of the nation, to do so in a most autocratic and Prussian-like manner, and then, to tell us, if not in words at least in actions, that all the magnificent voluntary achievements of Canada must be wiped off the page of our war-history, and that we are to be presented to the world as a nation of cowards, whose participation in the struggle had to be forced by the lash of conscription; to do all this is unspeakably unjust to Canada and can have but two results: that of keeping a dead Government in apparent and deceptive life for a brief time longer, and of placing the stigma of poltroonery on the character of the Canadian people for all time to come. The Government to-day represents the spirit of German autocracy; the Opposition represents the democratic and liberty loving spirit if the Allies. Listening to the advocates of conscription, one would be glad to believe that the entire fate of the Allied nations in this war depended upon Canada, and the fifty or one hundred thousand men that she could add to her contingents already at the front or on their way there. Is it conceivable to any rational mind that Great Britain entered upon this war with the expectation of having to rely upon distant and thinly populated Canada to ensure her success? Does any one imagine for a moment that the fate of the millions in arms on the vast expanses of the battle grounds of Europe can be affected more or less by the addition of another 100,000 from Canada? The plain fact is that our additional contingent would not be more than a drop of water in the bucket, as far as the ultimate result of the war is concerned. And it is more so on account of the two-fold fact that the fresh contingent would be necessarily undisciplined and unprepared men, and that, being recruited by main force, it would naturally consist of real slackers. Slackers are men who can go, but will not go of their own free will, but who are none the less cowards when forced into uniform. After the magnificent showing made by Canada, after the four hundred thousand of heroic and voluntarily enlisted brave fellows, we are going to send a division of cowards and slackers to represent this country in the belligerent camps of the Continent. Is not that a disheartening proposal—one of the most unpatriotic ever conceived by a Government?

I have heard and read the speeches of some of those prominent, and I trust sincere, Liberals who spoke on this question, and who announced their determination to vote against the amendment presented by the leader of the Opposition. In particular, did I note the remarkable and extraordinary speech of the hon. member for South Renfrew—one of the leading Ontario members of the Opposition party. In all that speech, as well as in the others I refer to, there was not the shadow of a shade of reason for their opposition to the amendment, while they each and all advanced every legitimate reason why they should not vote as they have announced. The attitude of these gentlemen on this issue has but confirmed more and more my views that our leader was right, as he has always been right and as subsequent circumstances have invariably proven him to be right. The amendment calls for a pronouncement from the people of Canada upon this the most vital question since that of Confederation, and either a referendum or a general election can alone clear the atmosphere and make it possible for any Government to proceed in a constitutional manner and with the sanction of the people of Canada.

I will not be a party to robbing the immense electorate of this Dominion of the right to say who shall administer the affairs of the country, and in what manner the Government is expected to fulfill its mandate. I am against conscription. I demand elections. The spirit of imperialistic autocracy that introduced this measure is the same that dictated the coercion laws of England against Ireland, and of Russia against Poland. England and Russia both fight against that same spirit to-day; our fathers fought against it in '37, and Canada is not to be set back eighty years in her advancement along the highway of liberty, and of representation by the people and for the people.

The fault for all lack of recruiting in Ontario, in Quebec, and elsewhere in Canada has been sufficiently and amply laid at the door of the Government by the various speakers who addressed the House, be they for or against conscription, on this side. I need not go over that overwhelming proof of the Government's mismanagement, and its effort to hide its own failures by casting the blame on the people of Canada, and making the world believe that compulsory measures were necessary with our population. But I will strongly insist on the Government's lack of policy in not giving the proper inducements to recruits.

The story is a sad one. No man who has gone to the front has had any assurance that if he were killed, or wounded, his own family at home would be provided for by the country in whose service he sacrificed either his life or his future; no system of pensions, no adequate remuneration, no guarantee that the members of the soldier's family would not be pauperized and left on the charity of the public.

Throughout Canada there are tens of thousands to-day who have not met with even the paltry fair treatment that was expected of the Canadian Government by the men who went freely to the front. What we need more than conscription is some practical and effective method of safeguarding the families of the men who have enlisted. In the trenches to-day there are numbers whose hearts are sore, thinking of the misery they have left behind them for those who depended on them for comfort and livelihood. This has been one huge deception from beginning to end.

I cannot but emphasize the statement that errors have been committed, and are still being committed, in recruiting. I will read a letter to this effect written to the editor of the Citizen, Ottawa, under the heading of "National Service all Round", and signed " Equal Rights."

I concur absolutely in what he says in the letter, which reads as follows:—

National Service All Round.

Editor, Citizen.—Of course, if Conscription of manhood is necessary, it should be accompanied by conscription of wealth.

[Mr. L. A. Lapointe.]

It is comforting for men above military age to talk of sending their younger compatriots to fulfil their duty in the trenches, but do they think that the younger ones alone have a duty to perform? Do they think that the sacrifices should be borne by one class only of men?

On one side, a certain class of the community is asked to renounce all that they have earned by diligent and hard work, and to go to the trenches, where they may have to lay down their lives on the altar of the country.

On the other hand, those who are no more deserving, no more hard working, but who happen to be a few days above the age limit, or who are under some maybe small physical disabilities, will remain very comfortably in their homes, keeping their positions, getting big salaries, and making no sacrifice whatever, just as if they were not the least concerned in the preservation of the country.

Let me mention a few cases that will illustrate the situation. They are not special cases; thousands of them will happen.

A young man, 28 years of age, has by his hard work, assiduity, and good behaviour risen to the position of accountant in a bank or commercial institution, where he gets a salary of $1,500 to $2,000 per year. Satisfied that his future is good, he has got married and is the father of one or two babies. He has taken life insurance to protect his wife and children in case of a sudden or premature death. His future looks bright, his home cheerful, and the world smiles on him. The call comes for his class; he knows that war is a terrible thing and that he must answer, and he goes. What is the result for him? Disaster, absolute and irreparable. He forfeits his position. The paltry $20 or $30 a month that the Government hands to his wife, added to his princely pay of $1.10 a day, are just sufficient to prevent his family from dying of hunger. The home has to be closed, the insurance policy dropped, and if the worst happens and his life is taken, his wife and children, for whom he had created a bright future, are condemned to misery and drudgery all their lives.

The same applies to all other cases of successful young clerks, promising business men, skillful apprentices, steadfast labourers and workers. And at the same time that they put on khaki, their companions, not called by the war, will step into their positions, enjoy all the advantages, get the pay, and sacrifice nothing. Whilst those who donned khaki will be shedding their blood, the manufacturers, the rich, the millionaires will be heaping up new millions. Whilst the wives and children of the soldiers will be mourning them and working at starvation wages for a living, the wives and children of those who have not gone will be displaying expensive dresses, riding in luxurious limousines, holding dogs on their knees, the food for which the soldiers' children would probably not be able to get.

Conscription of manhood means for some sacrifice of all, for the others sacrifice of nothing. What should be done, for sacrifice there must be? If the services of men on the farm, in the munition factories, in the offices, which are rated as indispensable, are worth $4, $5 or $10 a day, is it not just that the services of men who are indispensable in the trenches should be paid as much? The advantage would still be with the home work, for it entails no danger.

Surely a country which is willing to pay high wages to its mechanics, its business men, etc., should not bargain to pay less than equal wages to those who are giving their blood in its defence!

Of course, all those whose purse would be touched by such a measure will raise their hands to heaven and say that it is impossible, that it would ruin the country. It shows their sincerity, when they talk of sacrificing the last dollar. Their motto is: make the others sacrifice their last drop of blood, and their last dollar. I wonder if the Government would ever attain its object should this Bill be put into force. I doubt it very much. I presume that the Bill will unfortunately get its second reading and then I will have an opportunity of discussing its clauses in Committee of the Whole. I reserve to myself the right at that stage to express my views on the different clauses of this Bill; but I cannot let this occasion pass without giving it a proper title. Instead of calling it a Bill of Conscription, I would rather call it a Bill of Exemptions, Exceptions and Patronage. I have got only to put before the House section 11 as an example. It is as follows:

11. (1) At any time before a date to be fixed in the proclamation mentioned in section four, an application may be made, by or in respect of any man in the class or subclass called out by such proclamation to a local tribunal established in the province in which such man ordinarily resides, for a certificate of exemption on any of the following grounds.

Remember this is before the Bill is in force at all. Follow now closely the exemptions, and tell me if there is any rational expectation of securing recruitment by means of this unique, useless and vexatious enactment? Subsection (a) provides:

(a) That it is expedient in the national interest that the man should, instead of being employed in military service, be engaged in other work in which he is habitually engaged

Practically every man in Canada would come within this exemption.

(b) That it is expedient in the national interest that the man should, instead of being employed in military service, be engaged in other work in which he wishes to be engaged and for which he has special qualifications.

Still worse: it is made optional to work at what suits him best.

(c) That it is expedient in the national interest that, instead of being employed in military service, he should continue to be educated or trained for any work for which he is then being educated or trained.

Every student and apprentice in Canada could take advantake of this paragraph.

(d) That serious hardship would ensue, if the man were placed on active service, owing to his exceptional financial or business obligations or domestic position;

Where is the man whose financial or domestic relations and conditions might not be invoked as an exemption?

(e) Ill health or infirmity;

This is simply a question of getting a certificate from a doctor. If a man was sick in the morning he could get a certificate from the doctor and be exempted by the tribunal.

(f) That he conscientiously objects to the undertaking of combatant service and is prohibited from so doing by the tenets and articles of faith, in effect at the date of the passing of this Act, of any organized religious denomination existing and well recognized in Canada at such date, and to which he in good faith belongs.

And if any of the grounds of such application be established, a certificate of exemption shall be granted to such man.

The faith of almost every Christian claims "Thou shalt not kill." My hon. friend the member for St. Lawrence (Mr. Bickerdike) has a strong plea here for his anti-hanging theories.

I go further. When we take these exemptions as a whole, the judges may, in their discretion go so far as to keep at home men who would have liked to go voluntarily, and I know that some would take advantage of all these general exemptions. I am told that already some members of this House have written to certain of their electors telling them that they should bring their sons to their farms.

As you see, Mr. Speaker, the Bill does not stipulate in clear and precise terms the exemptions, but formulates a general exemption after the creating of the different tribunals for registering, appeals, etc., all the people exercising their discretion in virtue of clause 11. I contend that this clause would render the Bill futile and useless, because there will be so much discretion exercised in virtue of it and other clauses that conscripts will be very few.

Why should the Government create such perturbation and general disturbance in this country by introducing such a Bill, at such a time, for the levy of a few thousand men, when, according to the Government's admission, there are still 126,000 soldiers and officers of all ranks in England who have not yet crossed over to France, and when everybody can see scores of others in khaki parading the streets of our cities, who have perhaps been enlisted for years but have never been instructed to go overseas? In the face of so much duplicity, deception and maladministration I cannot but register with my whole heart and soul a vote against this impracticable, anti-Canadian and unpatriotic measure—against all forms of conscription, of tyranny, autocracy—against all attempts to reduce to ashes the liberties of the Canadian people and the constitutional autonomy of Canada.

It is needless for me to repeat what has been clear to this House ever since this debate began, that my province and my people are the objects of unjust and unpatriotic attack. Were I to raise my voice in their defence, it might be claimed that I am speaking for those to whom I belong and in whom I have a special interest. I prefer to hear the voice of one not of my race, not of my province, not of Canada; I prefer to leave the floor, so to speak, to one whose place in the ranks of British authorship must command respect, and whose patriotism has won for him a high station amongst the men of thought, of culture and of weight in the British Empire. Instead of my own feeble voice, I will ask you to listen to the powerful and influential expression of Sir Arthur Conan Doyle:

The French Canadians.

I do want to take my hat off once again to the French Canadian. He came of a small people. At the time of the British occupation, I doubt if there were more than a hundred thousand of them, and yet the mark they have left by their bravery and activity upon this continent is an ineffacable one. You pass right through the territory of the United States, down the valleys of the Illinois and of the Mississippi, and everywhere you come across French names: Marquette, Joliet, St. Louis, Mobile, New Orleans. How come these here? It was the French Canadian who, when the English colonies were still clinging to the edge of the ocean, pushed round from the north into the heart of the land. French Canadians first traversed the great American rivers and sighted the American Rockies. Keep farther north and still their footsteps are always marked deep in the soil before you. Cross the whole vast plain of Central Canada, and reach the mountains. What is that called, you ask? That is Mount Miette. And that? That is Tête Jaune. And that lake? It is Lake Brulé. They were more than scouts in front of an army. They were so far ahead that the army will take a century yet before it reaches their outposts. Brave, enduring, light-hearted, romantic, they were and are a fascinating race. The ideals of the British and of the French stock may not be the same, but while the future of the country must surely be upon British lines, the French will leave their mark deeply upon it. Five hundred years hence their blood will be looked upon as the aristocratic and distinctive blood of Canada, and even as the Englishman is proud of his Norman ancestors, so the most British Canadian will proudly trace back his pedigree to the point where some ancestor had married with a Taschereau or a De Lotbiniére. It seems to me that the British cannot be too delicate in their dealings with such a people. They are not a subject people, but partners in empire and should always be treated so.

[Mr. L. A. Lapointe.]

In taking my seat I may say that I have always respected the opinions of others. I trust that my opinions will be respected, because I speak sincerely, but I have no respect for fanaticism. I have no prejudices and never had any regarding race or creed.

On motion of Mr. Neely, the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Sir Thomas White the House adjourned at 1.15 a.m. Thursday.

Thursday, June 28, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by asterisks.)

WAR LOAN BONDS.

Mr. DEVLIN:

1. What is the number of bond issues of the war loan, and the amount of each?
2. What rate of interest does each bear?
3. What price did each issue sell at?
4. What was the actual amount received by the Government from each sale?
5. What amount has been paid to brokers or others for selling the bonds?
6. What was the amount, if any, of other expenses in connection with the sales of said bonds?

Sir THOMAS WHITE:

1, 2 and 3. Three bond issues as follows: 5 per cent 1915-25 war loan, $100,000,000, issue price 97½; 5 per cent 1916-31 war loan, $100,000,000, issue price 97½; 5 per cent 1917-37 war loan, $150,000,000, issue price 96.

4. 1915-25 war loan, $97,003,600.27; 1916-31 war loan, $97,789,580.17; 1917-37 war loan, $139,882,508.04—to date; returns not yet completed.

5. Brokers. Recognized bond and stock brokers were allowed a commission on allotments made on applications bearing their stamp, as follows:

1915-25 and 1916-31 loans, one-quarter of one per cent; 1917-37 loan, three-eighths of one per cent.

Banks. Arrangements were made with the banks for a commission as under: 1915-25 war loan, one-quarter of one per cent; 1916-31 war loan, one-half of one per cent; 1917-37 war loan, nine-twentieths of one per cent.

For the above commission the banks agreed to receive on behalf of the Government at all their branches subscriptions and payments therefor, deliver provisional receipts, interim certificates and bonds and keep the necessary accounts in connection therewith; to cash at all their branches throughout Canada the coupons of the issues free of exchange; to use their best endeavours through their several offices throughout Canada to obtain public subscriptions to the loans. The banks also agreed to make, if required, cash subscriptions of $50,000,000 to the 1916-31 issue and of $60,000,000 to the 1917-37 issue.

6. Clerical assistance and office contingencies: 1915-25 war loan, $14,130.36; 1916-31 war loan, $26,998.24; 1917-37 war loan, $19,748.38 to 31st May, 1917.

Advertising: 1915-25 war loan, $36,023.16; 1916-31 war loan, $50,626.67—to 31st May, 1917; 1917-37 war loan, $23,367.89—to 31st May, 1917.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MORNING SITTINGS.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I gave notice that I shall move to-morrow that the House sit in the forenoon, on and after Tuesday, 3rd July.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I hope my hon. friend will consider the advisability of deferring the consideration of the question of morning sittings until the debate on the Military Service Bill is concluded. If he thinks the debate has been unduly prolonged, or that there has been obstruction, I would not object, but no such condition is alleged to exist. I think it would be well to conclude the debate before we consider the question of morning sittings.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I should be glad to consider the suggestion, but I do not see the reasons on which my right hon. friend's proposal is based. I do not wish to restrict the debate upon this Bill. The proposal I am making is giving greater opportunity for hon. members to be heard without unduly prolonging the debate. This is the usual course to pursue. The debate at this stage of the season is likely to occupy a great deal of time.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I would not say that. It is the most important question we have had before us during the session. When it is disposed of, I shall be happy to facilitate the business before the House, as far as possible. But, in the meantime, we are all very busy, and we cannot see the end of the session at the present time. I would impress upon my right hon. friend the desirability of permitting latitude upon this debate, and we will try to facilitate matters when the debate is concluded.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Can my right hon. friend tell me when the debate on the second reading is likely to be concluded?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I think I shall be able to inform the right hon. leader to-morrow.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: That is a circumstance that might influence my judgment very much. The motion may stand.

REPORT OF INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION.

LAKE OF THE WOODS WATER LEVEL.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister): Some time ago my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition made an inquiry with regard to the report of the International Joint Commission fixing the level of the waters of the Lake of the Woods. The report had really been made at the time I gave my answer, although it had not come to my personal attention. I have made inquiries, and I find that it is being printed, and that the printing will occupy some considerable time as the report is voluminous. For that reason, I thought it desirable to obtain a short abstract, in order that the House might be informed as to the commission's recommendation. The memorandum of the report, which I obtained from the Secretary of the Canadian Section of the International Joint Commission, reads as follows:

Lake of the Woods Report.

The Final Report of the International Joint Commission in the matter of the Lake of the Woods Reference was filed here and in Washington on June 12. In answer to the questions submitted by the Governments of Canada and the United States, the Commission recommends the maintenance of an ordinary maximum stage of 1061.25 (sea level datum) on the Lake of the Woods, with an extreme range from 1056 to 1062.50. The former level would only be reached in years of excessive drought, and the latter in years of excessive precipitation. The level recommended the Commission believes to be in the best interests of all concerned on both sides of the international boundary. It recognizes the water-power interests, particularly those on the Winnipeg river supplying light and power to the city of Winnipeg, as the dominant interests in the Lake of the Woods region, and the level recommended is one that will be of very great benefit to those interests. At the same time the interests of navigation, lumbering, fisheries and agriculture have been effectively safeguarded. The Commission's Report sets forth the means by which the proposed level is to be maintained. The outflow capacity of the Lake of the Woods is to be increased at a cost of about $175,000. Compensation is recommended to interests at the outlets of the lake and on the Winnipeg river, amounting to $25,000 and $30,000 respectively; to the owners of lands that will be flooded, on the United States side, $164,000, and in Canada, $81,000; and for protection along the water-front of Warroad and other towns, $115,000. The project involves the utilization of Rainy lake and other lakes tributary to the Lake of the Woods as immense reservoirs for the storage of water. It is recommended that the general direction of the proposed system of regulation be vested in the Commission; and that the actual control of the dams and regulating works at Kettle Falls, Koochiching Falls and Kenora, be put in the hands of an International Board of Engineers, with one reservation however. The dams at Kenora being in Canadian territory, the Commission recommends the creation also of a Domestic Board, to be appointed by the Governments of Canada and Ontario. This Board would control all the works at the outlets of the Lake of the Woods so long as the level of the lake remained between 1056 and 1061. When it should fall below the former or rise above the latter figure, the International Board would assume control. The Commission bases its recommendation on the fact that as long as the level of the lake remains between 1056 and 1061, Canadian interests only will be affected; while above and below those levels, international interests will be affected, and the International Board should therefore control the situation.

As soon as the report is printed it will be laid on the Table and made available to members of the House.

INQUIRY INTO LOSS OF ALCOHOL.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. STEELE: I wish to make an inquiry of the Minister of Militia, based upon the following item appearing in the London Free Press of yesterday:

A board of officers, composed as under, will assemble on Wednesday next, the 27th instant, at 10.30 a.m., for the purpose of inquiring into and reporting upon the loss of alcohol on charge to the medical stores, M. D. No. 1.

I wish to inquire—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I think the hon. member had better place this question on the Order Paper. It is not of such importance as to require the attention of the House on the Orders of the Day.

PRIVILEGE.

Mr. HERMENEGILDE BOULAY (Rimouski) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of privilege. I noticed in the "Citizen", of the 28th instant, an item which reads as follows:—

Mr. Boulay resented the manner in which French-Canadians had been treated, and referred to the reports of the affair at Rivière du Loup which had been referred to in the House by Dr. Edwards. As to this, Mr. Boulay read the report of the investigation into the affair, but complained that in spite of this report Dr. Edwards had not had the courtesy to withdraw his statements.

In justice to the member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) I may say that I did not refer to him in my speech. The only hon. gentleman I mentioned was the member for Dufferin (Mr. Best).

LABOUR STRIKE IN WESTERN MINES.

MESSAGE FROM DIRECTOR OF COAL MINING.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. T. W. CROTHERS: (Minister of Labour): I have a message from the Director of Coal Mining which I wish to read to the House. Mr. Armstrong reached Calgary only on Monday of this week; yesterday he sent me the following message:

Calgary, Alta., June 27, 1917.

Hon. T. W. Crothers, Minister of Labour,
Ottawa, Ont.

Directions issued to-day have been accepted and endorsed by Policy Committee and are being distributed, beginning to-night, to various camps, and I confidently expect that men will go back to work by next Tuesday. Operators have answered by stating they will loyally comply and will be glad to render any assistance in their power towards the production and supply of coal and coke from district eighteen. Some specific cases require particular treatment, which I will deal with later. Propose remaining here until mines are working. Will then proceed to Ottawa.

W. H. Armstrong.

Mr. OLIVER: May I repeat a question that I have already put to the minister several times: Does district 18 include the mines in and adjacent to the Jasper Pass?

Mr. CROTHERS: I am not very familiar with the geography of that part of the country, but I have another letter which I might read to my hon. friend. It was written on the 22nd of this month, by the manager of the Canadian Coal Sales Company of Winnipeg, and is as follows:

We beg to inform you that if you receive any inquiries for coal, you can obtain at present one thousand tons and over per day from the Edmonton district, and east and west thereof.

The mines in that district will appreciate to be supplied with orders as they are only working half the time, due to the scarcity of orders. We admit that the fact of mines in southern Alberta being closed down prevents the coal dealers in southern Alberta and Saskatchewan from getting their supplies from this district as in the past, but nothing prevents them from getting all the coal they require from the Tofield, Edmonton, Wabamun and Estevan coal fields, which are only working half the time at present and were closed down during the months of March, April and May for lack of orders.

We beg to state that the complaints about coal shortage in the West are done by people who are not acquainted with the facts or by people who will not give themselves the trouble to look around and get their supply elsewhere.

Our company alone can easily ship daily from the above coal fields five hundred tons over their present shipments. We admit that the above coals are not as good as the southern Alberta ones, but they give very good satisfaction at the Edmonton Power Plant, Saskatchewan Power plant, etc.

Our experience for the last ten years has been that the mines in western Canada had to close from April to August for the lack of market. As winter comes there is generally a scramble for coal and the mines are not capable of mining it quick enough. Would it not be possible to have the Government suggest to the various town councils to see that their respective local coal dealers get their yearly coal supplies during the months of April, May, June and July, when the railways are idle, and also the mines.

There are at present enough coal mines in Alberta and Saskatchewan, when in operation, to take care of more than the demand of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba, and even supply Ontario if the freight rates were not so excessive.

Hoping the above may be of use, and holding ourselves entirely at your disposal to supply the requirements of any party requiring coal.

The member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) has found fault about conditions there. If the substance of this letter is true, there is no lack of coal in Edmonton and vicinity.

Mr. OLIVER: The mines my hon. friend has been reading about are the domestic coal mines in the vicinity of Edmonton. There never was any report of trouble in these mines. It was reported, however, that the steam coal mines—the Jasper Park Collieries, the Brulé Lake Collieries, the Mountain Park Collieries and Pacific Pass Collieries—were shut down in sympathy with the strike in the south. I should be gratified if my hon. friend would find out whether the strike in those particular mines still continues and whether or not those mines are included in District 18.

Mr. CROTHERS: I do not think that the mines my hon. friend mentions are included in District 18. But mines northerly from District 18 have generally followed conditions in the mines in District 18; when there is a strike in District 18, there is a strike in the mines further north, and when the men in District 18 return to work, the men in the mines further north return to work also under similar conditions. I have no doubt that when the mines in District 18 open next week, the mines in the districts further north will open also.

Mr. OLIVER: In the steam coal mines that I have mentioned, the men did not take part in the original strike in the southern Alberta mines. It is only within the last two weeks that they went on strike, supposedly in sympathy with the southern Alberta mines. The mines in District 18 are under the direction of the director appointed by the Government, but the mines that I have mentioned are not, according to a statement of the minister, under that control.

Mr. CROTHERS: I do not think they are.

Mr. OLIVER: Therefore, the question whether the men in those mines in northern Alberta have gone back to work or not, is a separate question from the one concerning the mines in District 18.

Mr. CROTHERS: The men in the mines in northern Alberta always follow the course taken by the men in the mines in District 18.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: We could, of course, take into consideration the advisability of extending the jurisdiction of the director appointed so as to include the mines to which the hon. member for Edmonton alludes, if the men should not go back to work as the Minister of Labour expects they will.

Mr. OLIVER: Quite so, but I do not wish to be understood as urging the extension of the jurisdiction of the directors. I am anxious, first of all, to know what the action of the mine operators is.

PRIVILEGE—SIR SAM HUGHES.

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir SAM HUGHES: I find in Hansard of June 26, the statement made by the hon.

junior member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean), that on one occasion while I was Minister of Militia, I directed:

—that under no circumstances should this young man—

Referring to a certain young man.

—who was desirous of fighting for his King and country, be permitted to enlist

The facts are, as outlined the other day in this House, that this young man, who was, at the time, not desirous of fighting for King and country, went over to the front as a newspaper correspondent, and he wrote back, as the public will well remember, a series of the most slanderous, malicious and false articles that ever came from the pen of any one professing to be a journalist. I thought at that time that this young man was a member of one of the battalions; I learned afterwards that he was not. Later on, after he had returned to Canada, a request came before me to make this young man an officer. Being under the impression that he had previously been in the Canadian Expeditionary Force, I issued an order that under no consideration should he be promoted or taken on to the strength again, if, being a soldier, he had written those articles, unless he made reparation, as he afterwards did. As soon as I learned that this young man had seen the error of his ways and was desirous of enlisting, I took him on the force, and I believe, although I forget the details of the matter, he became an officer.

I find this further statement concerning myself from the hon. junior member for Halifax, which, from first to last, is absolutely without one particle of foundation in fact:—

The other day he thrust my name into his speech because I have refused his personal solicitations to debate here his personal grievances against the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White).

If my recollection serves me aright, the hon. member stuck his own nose into the debate the other night, so that his statement is wrong. I have no personal grievance against the Minister of Finance, nor against any other member of this House. The facts concerning a conversation I had with the hon junior member for Halifax are these. I was talking with some hon. gentlemen, and as the hon. junior member for Halifax came up to us, some one remarked that the financial critic of the Opposition was coming. Speaking jocularly, I said that I did not endorse the situation that there was such a thing as a financial critic of the Opposition; at least, that we had not had any evidence of it; that I thought any school boy could have done about as well the the hon. gentleman had done. That was the sum and substance of the conversation. After the repudiation of a conversation which I had over a year ago with the hon. member, I would never be found holding another conversation with him, except in the presence of witnesses.

MILITARY SERVICE ACT, 1917.

DEBATE CONTINUED ON MOTION FOR SECOND READING AND ON THE AMENDMENTS.

Consideration of the motion of the Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden (Prime Minister) for the second reading of Bill 75, Military Service Act, 1917, and the amendment thereto, and the amendment to the amendment by Mr. Barrette, resumed from Tuesday, June 27.

Mr. D. B. NEELY (Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, I am sure no question before this House has given individual members more opportunity for serious consideration of their duty to themselves, their constituents and their country, than has the Bill that is now before the House. Theory is all very well in its way, but we in Canada are face to face with certain actual conditions which must be met, and it is in view of those actual conditions that each of us for himself must come to a conclusion, according to the light of his individual conscience, as to the best way to meet them. I have no patience with the man or woman in this country who says that this is not Canada's war, and that, therefore, a limit should be put to the amount of effort that Canada shall put forth in the prosecution of the war. If this is not Canada's war, then this Parliament had no right in August, 1914, to take the stand it did in voting money and supplies in order to send an expeditionary force to France and Flanders to take its position side by side with the armies of our Allies there. On the other hand, if we were right then in entering into the war at all, we can be right now only by putting forth every effort in man-power and in the material resources of this country in order to ensure that this war shall be brought to a successful conclusion. This House and this country do not need to be told what objects are sought and desired by our enemies, the Central Powers of Europe. We know that Germany's object in this war is not merely the acquisition of a certain small territory, or territories, on the continent of Europe, but that she seeks domination of the free nations of the world; and as we rank ourselves as one of those free nations, we cannot escape the conclusion that Canada has as much right to use every resource in her power to prosecute this war to a successful conclusion as has any other power engaged in it.

The preparedness of our enemies to carry out the object which they had in mind is evidenced by the fact that after almost three years of continuous and bitter warfare, we—and by " we " I mean practically all the free nations of the world—still find ourselves face to face with a determined and stubborn enemy. Though we have had more or less success in different spheres of operations, I am not optimistic enough to think that we have by any means reached the point where we can expect the unconditional surrender of the central powers. Confronted as we are by this formidable foe, and with the end of the struggle not yet in sight, I fail absolutely to understand the attitude of any citizen of this country who can stand up and say before the people of this country and our Allies that Canada has done enough. If we had not sufficient reason for entering the war in August 1914, the German conduct of the war from that date to the present time, their barbarities on land and sea, their throwing aside of every moral consideration and of every principle of international law in dealing with neutral lives and neutral shipping, would furnish us with a sufficient reason why to-day, as a self-respecting free nation we could not keep our forces out of the field.

We have, Sir, the great example of the republic to the South, which kept out of the war as long as she could. But there came a time when even those of pro-German sympathies in the States must in their heart of hearts have come to the conclusion that if the United States was to maintain her national self-respect she could no longer keep out of the war. Had we not entered the war in August 1914 we should have found ourselves in the same position as the United States of America.

Citizenship in a free country like Canada carries with it obligations and responsibilities, and in my judgment the man who says that this Parliament has not the right to pass a measure such as is now before the House does not properly appreciate the responsibility that goes with the privilege of being a citizen of a free and democratic country. The very foundation of organized society, in my judgment, is that we are banded together for one common purpose, and the primary purpose for which we are banded together is the protection of the lives and property of the individual subjects of the state. As a free citizen of this country if I am injured in person or property at home or abroad I have the right to call upon the state to which I owe my allegiance to give me redress, not as a favour, but as a right. If that be true, the converse is also true—that when the state is in jeopardy from enemies within or without she has the right to place her hand on the shoulders of every one of her citizens and bid them come forward for the defence of home and country. Sir, in that very principle, which is the foundation of organized society, I find the authority for the passing of such a measure by this Parliament, or by the legislature of any democratic country under circumstances similar to those which now exist. No man in this House has greater respect and admiration for my right hon. leader than I, but I must say that the same process of reasoning that leads me to vote for the Bill also constrains me to vote against the motion of my right hon. leader. If it is the duty of the state to protect the individual, and the duty of the individual to protect the state in time of stress or danger, then I say it is not a proper thing to ask the people of this country to say by means of a referendum whether individual citizens shall come forward and do their duty or not. I maintain that the obligation rests upon them to come forward whether they be willing or not, and I think—and I say this with all respect for the opinions of others—that this House would be divesting itself of its due and proper responsibility if we were to consent to deal with this question in the way proposed by my right hon. leader.

If the principle of compulsory service is right and proper to-day, it was equally right and proper two years ago, when a special session of this Parliament was summoned shortly after the outbreak of war. But for some reason or other this Government and this Parliament then decided not to adopt this logical and businesslike method of dealing with the situation; they would rather depend upon the spontaneous patriotism of the citizens of this country.

Following that course, there grew up in the minds of the people, men of military age and others, the conviction and belief that Canada had adopted a course in this matter which was to be permanent, and that no other course would be adopted no matter what eventualities the war might bring forth. Whether the people were right in coming to that conclusion or not, I am not prepared to say; but we must admit that a great many people did come to that conclusion. We are bound to make some mistakes, I admit; that cannot be avoided. We did not enter upon this war in a businesslike way; events have proved that; but we did intend to do our best. If we made our mistake, at least others are benefiting by that mistake. And I say to this House and the country: Hats off to the great republic to the south, that, while slow to enter into this conflict, now that it has entered upon it, has entered upon it as a business proposition. The object of that business proposition is the putting down of German domination in Europe and the establishing of free democracies throughout the world. But they have had the benefit of the mistakes that we have made.

Having adopted a certain course contrary to the principle which is now invoked in this Bill for securing further aid for our army, it is a question to be seriously considered whether we should not seek some other way than the way proposed by this Bill. A measure of this sort must have behind it the national sentiment of the people in order to be successful; and, Sir, in my judgment, there was the great initial error that we made when we entered upon this war. We called our men to the colours; we provided for their transport and did it in a remarkably short space of time; but there was one thing which we neglected to do, and we are suffering to-day as a consequence of that neglect—we neglected to mobilize the national sentiment of this country. Perhaps that was partly due to our failure to properly appreciate the seriousness and the magnitude of the task that lay before us, but I think this Government missed the opportunity of a century perhaps, when at the outset of this struggle, they were not the first to initiate those steps tending to co-operation between all the varied bodies of sentiment in this country that have been necessary in other parts of the Empire before a conscription measure could be placed upon the statute book. They have conscription in Great Britain and in New Zealand, and it may yet come in Australia. What is the history of conscription in Great Britain? To read the history of conscription, you must first read the history of government in Great Britain. That history tells of a change from a party government to a coalition government, then to another coalition, until you have to-day practically a military dictatorship. But, if you have a military dictatorship in Great Britain, it is a dictatorship which represents in itself every section and every sentiment of the people of that country. The reason that compulsory service was accepted in Great Britain as readily, as freely and happily as it has been, lies in that very fact, and also in the fact that before the Government of Great Britain undertook to conscript the man-power of the country, it put its hands on the wealth and conscripted that for the benefit of the nation. Our little sister, New Zealand, very early in the war found what she had to do in order to put compulsory service into effect.

I say again that I see very serious trouble ahead of us in respect to the enforcement of this measure, unless, before the measure becomes operative—not before it becomes law but before it becomes operative—something is done to mobilize the national sentiment and to secure national unity. There are those who say that it is too late for any such proposals. I absolutely fail to see why it is too late for something in the line I have suggested to be carried out. It is true that my right hon. friend and leader (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) objects to this measure becoming operative at the present time and being made operative by the present Government. Then, in my judgment, there is an alternative course. That alternative course is that, this Parliament having passed this Bill, as there is every prospect it will do, again the leaders of the two great parties should get together and see if some method cannot be evolved by which we shall secure the maximum amount of assistance for our boys at the front and at the same time preserve that national unity which was sought by the Fathers of Confederation when they brought the original provinces of Canada together. It can be done, and, in my judgment, it should be done. It should be done even now. Shall we plunge this country into strife, shall we destroy the foundations of Confederation, shall we create schism, if by any method that can be suggested by the patriotism and the zeal for the common good that must inspire the leaders of public thought in this country, the leaders of the two great political parties these results can be avoided? If a way can be found by united patriotism to lead us out from this unfortunate position that may spell national disaster, and yet at the same time obtain the results we all seek to obtain, namely, the mobilization of Canada's efforts, of Canada's resources in men and of material wealth for the prosecution of the war, surely it is worth while making the attempt.

I fail to see any other course open to the people of this country. We are to-day approaching the fiftieth anniversary of the foundation of confederation—we might say the Golden Wedding day of the provinces of this great Dominion. And, Sir, since the laying of the foundation stone of this confederation men have toiled and struggled in this country, building stone upon stone, until to-day we have this great commonwealth stretching from ocean to ocean, a future empire on this North American continent. Among the names that will be written in history as those of men who have performed great and noble work in building up this country, there will stand prominent the name of my honoured leader (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). And, Sir, it grieves me, as a native-born Canadian, to see anything occur, in this time of crisis and strife, that is likely to endanger that which it has taken fifty years to build up. If our confederation is now disrupted, it will take a century to place us again in the position in which we were prior to the outbreak of this horrible war. The maintenance and upbuilding of our confederation is, I am sure, the aim and object of every one of us on both sides of the House. Whether we support or do not support this Bill, we have one common object, the winning of the war. Does any one tell me that, while my right hon. leader is opposed to the application of this measure at the present time, he is not imbued with as earnest a desire to win this war as any other man in this House? The man who tells me that, I brand, Sir, as a partisan, and not as a friend of this country. The man who, on either side of this House or in this country, to-day attempts by his words to set one section of this Dominion of Canada, against another, consciously or unconsciously, is just as much an enemy of the empire and of the country as if he were facing our soldiers in the trenches over in Flanders. The situation is altogether too serious for party bickering and party strife in this country; and if that can be avoided, if there is yet a possibility, and I think there is, of the mobilization of national sentiment and national effort in this country for the winning of the war, without the bringing on of party struggle and party strife, history will write it against this Parliament and against this Government and against the leaders of both sides of this House as a crime if they do not first exhaust every effort of statesmanship, of diplomacy, of resource and of deliberation in the effort to work out a solution that will mean a continuance of those friendly feelings that have existed between the various portions of Canada, and that will, at the same time, mean our vigorous prosecution of this war. That is the ideal I hold. I am not here to support an abstract principle so much as to speak for this ideal, which must be dear to every one of us to-day, or we cannot class ourselves as true patriots. I am not suggesting anything further than the broad lines on which I consider an arrangement and an understanding may be arrived at, even at this late date. Within a very few days this country will be celebrating the fiftieth anniversary of its confederation, and there could be no more opportune time for every member of this House, every 4 p.m. member of this Government, for the leader of the Government and for my right hon. friend who leads the Opposition, for every one of us, as we go to the altar of patriotism, dropping by our side party bickering, party strife, every selfish consideration,—I say there could be no more opportune time for each and every one of us to dedicate ourselves to the cause of our country and to the successful prosecution of this war, which means not only the freedom of Europe but the freedom of North America and of Canada.

With those thoughts in mind and with that desire strong in my heart, I am free to say that, while I am voting for the principle of this Bill—that is what is involved in voting for the second reading—and while I am constrained to vote against the amendment proposed by my right hon. leader (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), my one strong and consuming desire in offering my thoughts to this House and to this country is that even now, with this Bill under consideration, there may yet be found a way which will not only redound to the unity and to the credit of Canada, but will bring to our boys in the trenches that help and that succour which we all recognize they need, and which we are all determined they shall have.

Mr. J. L. CHABOT (Ottawa): Mr. Speaker, it is regrettable, I might say unfortunate, that at this present time, when Canada and the Motherland and the British Empire are passing through the most critical period of their national lives, dissensions tinged with provincialism should have occurred, and that scenes painfully unpatriotic in their purpose should have been enacted in certain sections of the country, and that in this great crisis, in even the very smallest degree, a feeling of bitterness should develop in this House. This is a time when the representatives of the people, the members of this House, should be prepared to lay aside all political feelings and all national differences, with a view of preserving harmony and presenting a united front, not only to Canada but to the whole world.

If this condition of affairs does not exist here, the fault does not lie with the right hon. Prime Minister, (Sir Robert Borden) nor with the gentlemen who sit on this side of the House. In view of the momentous issue confronting Canada at this present moment, I feel it my duty to support a measure whose main purpose is to bring this war to a speedy, and I fervently pray, a successful determination; to win the war, to maintain the prestige and power of the Union Jack, and what it stands for; to protect our freedom, and to save the very national life of Canada.

I do not intend discussing the details of the Bill presented for our consideration. The matter has been gone into so thoroughly and so fully that I fear that any lengthy explanation or extended elaboration on my part along those lines would be superfluous. The selective Military Bill brought down by the Prime Minister of this country appeals to me as an intelligent and practical modification of the Canadian Militia Act established and promulgated at the time of Confederation and subsequently re-affirmed and re-endorsed, with a few alterations, in 1904. There is no doubt in my mind that when this Bill becomes law its provisions will be carefully and very judicially carried into effect, and I consider it my duty to give this Bill my undivided support for many reasons, but mainly because its chief aim is to sustain the gallantry of the men who have been fighting for our homes and our country, because it is intended to relieve the men who for months have endured untold hardship and privation in the trenches. It is intended to fill the gaps in the ranks of divisions, which ranks have been very materially thinned in the last few months, and it is intended to avenge the loss of Canada's best and purest blood, which has been shed freely upon the fields of France and Flanders, and surely it has not been shed in vain.

Furthermore, the passage of this Bill will assist in bringing this terrible conflict to a definite, and I trust, decisive issue. A referendum such as proposed in amendment by the right hon. leader of the Opposition is in my opinion opposed to the idea and is contrary to the spirit of responsible and representative government.

We, in this House, are the representatives of the people of Canada. This Parliament is composed of men of integrity, men of ability, experience and initiative, men possessing a more thorough knowledge of the existing conditions, men who are more competent judges of the present situation than the general public. We are the custodians of the honour and national life of this country, and, therefore, we should be the arbiters in any matter vitally concerning its constitution and welfare. Besides, a referendum would not be a fair test of public opinion, because in different sections of this country sentimentality and prejudice might, and would outweigh the sense of duty of the people. Again, 300,000 of our soldiers are at the front, and would find it difficult to cast their ballots, while the thousands of slackers in this country would be in a position to use their influence and exercise their franchise to the fullest extent.

Mr. Speaker, the right hon. leader of the Opposition, when he moved his amendment, declared, rather emphatically, that at no time since the beginning of the war had he feared any danger of invasion of Canada on the part of Germany, and he also made little of the opinion and claim that Canada's first lines of defence were in the trenches of France and Belgium. I cannot understand how a gentleman possessed of an unusually keen sense of intuition, of splendid faculty for analysis, and of a wide range of information, that a gentleman possessing such eminent accomplishments, should entertain such an opinion. It reminds me of the manner in which hon. members spoke in regard to the menace, peril, or danger which we referred to during the discussion of the Naval Bill in 1913. Notwithstanding the information which we had received in the form of a memorandum from the Admiralty, we were told at that time that the supposed danger did not exist, that our fears were imaginary, and that our contentions were illusionary. But the peril came sooner than we expected, and fell upon us with a full measure of vengeance and unmistakeable violence. Does the right hon. gentleman believe that, if this war were won by the Central Powers, Canada would not be in danger of invasion? Does he believe that if the Germans, in their first rush for Paris, had reached their objective point, Canada would not have been in danger? Does he think that if the 200,000 Germans on their march to Calais had not been stopped at Langemark by the 32,000 Canadians, who, undergoing their baptism of fire with unfortunately disastrous results, and against overwhelming odds, by their courage and their valour held back that army of Germans for seventy-two hours, and effectually checked their advance to Calais—if the Germans had reached Calais—would not England, and Canada also, have been in danger of invasion? Does the right hon. gentleman believe that if the German fleet had defeated the British navy and the allied fleet on the sea, or had at any time broken through the British naval cordon that surrounded them—thank God Britannia still rules the waves—it would not have become a source of great danger, not only to England but to America? I need only quote what Roosevelt, the ex-president of the United States, mentioned in one of his speeches. He declared that the British navy, and the British navy alone, kept the Germans away from the shores of America. I also wish to remind the right hon. gentleman that the most potent factor in the development of the spirit of pan-Germanism, whereby Germany expected to dominate the world, control its commerce and rule its destinies, was not only begotten by greed for power and wealth, but chiefly by the ardent—I might say insane—desire of the German Government for territorial expansion and aggrandisement. For many years previous to the war the surplus population of Germany had been fast outgrowing its geographical limits, and thousands of Germans have been migrating to foreign lands; and the German government, anxious to keep them within the bounds of a greater and wider German Empire, cast a covetous eye on the British Empire, whose magnitude and vastness are such that the sun never sets on it. And if in this war the Germans were victorious, does my right hon. friend for one moment believe that the Germans would not cast a covetous eye on Canada—the most important of the overseas dominions—a country whose area is vast, whose possibilities are great and whose resources are innumerable? They certainly would, and I, therefore, have no hesitation in declaring that Canada is now safe but was not safe while the Motherland was in danger; and further that the safety of this country, since this war began, has depended to a large extent on the defence of the Motherland, and that our first lines of defence are undoubtedly in the trenches of France and Belgium.

The member for Rouville (Mr. Lemiuex) and the member for Kamouraska (Mr. E. Lapointe) declared with emphasis and a certain amount of pathos that this Bill was a direct and flagrant violation of pledges made by the Prime Minister and members of the Cabinet since the beginning of the war. I hope these gentlemen are sufficiently well informed and fair-minded to admit that war conditions to-day are quite different from what they were a year ago; that a process of transformation, in matters affecting the war as well as in matters affecting the ordinary affairs of the whole world, has been gradually going on from month to month, almost from week to week. Opinions expressed and promises made a year ago might not—perhaps would not—hold good to-day. Let me remind these hon. gentlemen of the present attitude of Russia; of the entrance of the United States into this terrible conflict; of the deeds of heroic France, which has been almost bled white during the last year; of the carrying out of the submarine warfare on a much larger scale and in a much more destructive manner.

The member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) the other evening strongly emphasized the assertion that the Government was moribund and irresponsible and that it did not command the confidence of the people because it had outlived its legal life. Let me remind the hon. gentleman that the life of this Parliament was extended on the strength of a resolution, passed unanimously, petitioning His Majesty and the Imperial Government to amend the British North America Act with a view of granting an extension of the life of this Parliament for another year in order to prevent a political conflict at a time when it would have been wholly undesirable and prejudicial to the best interests of Canada. For that reason, and in the light of common sense, fairness and equity, I consider that this Government is as legally constituted to-day as it was a year ago.

In reference to what I said in connection with the remarks made by the members for Rouville and Kamouraska, may I point out that during the last year the armies of the Allies have carried on a more offensive campaign; that larger quantities of ammunition have been at their disposal; that the use of more formidable weapons and more dangerous implements of war have created a demand for men, and more men; and that that was one of the reasons which led to the presentation of this Bill.

The right hon. leader of the Opposition, referring to the delinquencies in the matter of enlistment in Quebec, gave a very incomplete explanation and made a very weak defence. I am willing to agree with the right hon. gentleman and others who have spoken on the subject that conditions in Quebec are somewhat different from what they are in other provinces; that Quebec is almost essentially an agricultural province; that its men marry at an early age and assume domestic responsibilities and obligations which married men in other provinces do not assume. I am willing to agree with hon. gentlemen in respect of many other reasons which have been put forth in justification of conditions in Quebec. But if recruiting in Quebec has not come up to expectations, it is because the people of that province have not received the encouragement or the enlightenment to which they were entitled. I do not mean from officials of the Government; I mean from men who are their leaders; men who are their representatives in this House; men who should have been their counsellors and guides from the beginning of the war and should have done what we have accomplished in Ontario. The French Canadians are a peaceful, God-fearing and law-abiding people. They love their homes and their country; they are patriotic to the core; they are brave and courageous. I need only mention the battle of Courcelette as a striking example and a convincing proof of the valour, the dash and the bravery of the French Canadian troops at the front. But the people of that province are more sentimental and more impressionable than their English-speaking fellow-citizens; consequently, they are more easily influenced. Unfortunately, since the outbreak of this war they have allowed themselves to be misguided and ill-advised by a certain few in Quebec whose teachings, actions and writings since the beginning of the war have proved them to be false to their Canadian citizenship and to their standing as British subjects—and they should have been treated accordingly. I am a French Canadian, representing a constituency in Ontario. I love my mother tongue as dearly as any French Canadian in this House or in the country. I feel proud of the language of my ancestors, the history of whose country is as glorious as it is wonderful. I am particularly proud of the record of France since the beginning of the war, because of the valour, the courage and the chivalry of her soldiers, the spirit of self-sacrifice, the self-denial, the patriotism, the devotedness and the initiative of her people, and the wonderful military feats and accomplishments of her armies, have enlisted the admiration of the whole world. But I declare that I am first and foremost a Canadian; I am proud to be a British subject.

During the past few weeks I have received many threatening letters, describing the various methods of death intended for me should I vote for conscription, conveying choice epithets galore, and qualifying me as a traitor and coward if I should support the Compulsion Bill. All I have to say as to this is that I have no fear. If doing my duty as I understand it; if telling this House how dearly I love Canada, how reverently I honour the flag, how sincerely I respect and esteem my compatriots in Quebec, and how deeply I admire the British Empire, France and the Allies, or if expressing the sentiments of my true and sincere loyalty—if that be cowardice, then I say that I am not ashamed to be branded as a coward.

The French Canadians of Ontario have answered the call of duty in a fairly satisfactory way. My compatriots in Ottawa, the city which I have the honour of representing in this House, as well as in the neighbouring and military districts, have contributed their fair quota of men to the Canadian militia service, 1,587 having enlisted from this military district. The casualty lists show that these men have been doing and are doing their duty faithfully and well, while the honour roll published from day to day sadly attests to the fact that many have made the supreme sacrifice, and, I have no doubt, have faced danger as fearlessly and have met death as courageously and ungrudgingly as any other class of Canadian soldiers at the front.

The union of the two great races in Canada was sealed in blood in 1776, when shoulder to shoulder the English and French defended Quebec against an invading army. What the English soldiers did for Canada and the Empire at Lundy's Lane and Queenston Heights, a handful of French soldiers under de Salaberry at Chateauguay accomplished in 1812, and since that date the English and French of this country have grown up into a common brotherhood, the brotherhood of the Canadian people. They have been living in peace; they have had their differences, they may have had their quarrels, but under the Union Jack the French Canadians of Quebec and the rest of Canada enjoy liberty and protection, religious, national and political. They speak their own language; they make their own laws; they exercise their franchise as they see fit, and they worship at the altars where their forefathers knelt. They value their Canadian citizenship as highly as does any other class of Canadians in this country.

I firmly believe that when the purport and tenor of this Bill are fully and properly explained to the people of Quebec, they will be willing to do their share and to discharge their national duty as faithfully as any other class of citizens of this country. I say this, notwithstanding the dire threat delivered in stentorian tones and with dramatic effect by the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. L. J. Gauthier) a few nights ago. While the French Canadians have and enjoy rights, they must realize, as I realize, that they have obligations to fulfil. Our Canadian soldiers on the battle-fields of France and Belgium, fighting for the flag, for the Empire, for liberty and for our own country, have, by their valour, their courage, and particularly their adaptability and resourcefulness, covered themselves with glory. The Canadian physicians, surgeons and nurses have, at the front and in the hospitals, done themselves proud in the eyes of the whole world because of their devotion to duty, their spirit of self-sacrifice, their unselfishness and their all round good work.

If I be permitted to digress, I would like to say that the Canadian physicians and surgeons on the field, as well as in the hospitals, ably assisted by the nurses, who, since the war began, have rendered invaluable aid in various spheres, have performed their multifold duties and arduous labours in a manner which has elicited the admiration of the British and the Allies alike, have won the approval of all well-thinking people, and have earned the profound gratitude of thousands of sick and wounded soldiers who have come under their care; and the administration and organization of our hospitals both in France and in England are, to my mind, satisfactory and excellent. Shortcomings and mistakes may have been made, but we must admit that the undertaking has been immense, intricate and far reaching. I wish to state most emphatically, from what I know of the conditions existing in those institutions, that the man who stated that the Canadian Medical Service had failed to an almost criminal degree, erred in judgment and observation; drew wrong conclusions and was animated by a feeling of unreasonable animus and failed in the discharge of his duty.

Canada has made many sacrifices since this war has commenced; the people have endeavoured to honourably discharge their duty for the cause of humanity and civilization, and if this terrific contest is protracted, we, in conjunction with the Allies, should be prepared to spend our last dollar and to expend the last ounce of mental energy and physical strength which we possess. We should be prepared to put forth our strongest endeavours to reasonably increase our man-power at the front, with a view to bringing the Germans to their knees and crushing militarism and Prussian autocracy, thereby ensuring to the whole world a permanent and lasting peace.

Mr. A. B. McCOIG (West Kent) Mr. Speaker, in rising to say a few words on this, undoubtedly the most important question that has ever been before Parliament, at least since I have had the honour of being a member, I wish at the outset to say that I have the good fortune to represent possibly the largest urban and rural constituency in Ontario. In that constituency we have citizens of every nationality and of different religions. I am glad to say, however, that from those different denominations I have never received a letter asking me not to do what I thought was the very best in the interest of the future of this country and of the British Empire. I am more fortunate than my hon. friend (Mr. Chabot), who has stated that he has received many letters threatening him if he took one stand or the other. The only proposition put up to me by any of my constituents was not to support the amendment to the amendment, which means that we are to do nothing to assist the Mother Country. From my constituency, of which I am justly proud, we have sent 2,000 men to take part in the great struggle which is now going on. Many of those men have been fortunate enough to return. Many of them have come back wounded, and many of them have made the supreme sacrifice on the battle-fields of France and Flanders. Many of them are in the trenches at the present time. We cannot give these men too good treatment. On many occasions when I have listened to hon. members speaking about how we should get recruits, the thought has impressed itself upon me that if the members of this House were serious and would make some further compensation to those men, other men would be more encouraged to enlist. Those men enlisted voluntarily at a time when the cost of living in this country was much less than it is at the present time.

These men have agreed to serve their country for $1.10 a day. If they could have been home last winter and seen the hardship their families had to contend with, I feel satisfied they would demand that the Government increase their pay before they return. The Government might tax large incomes of $10,000 and upwards, which would mean a considerable sum in the treasury by the time when these men return, and if they did not return the money would enable their families to make a new start in life. Many of our industries are thus setting aside large sums of money for the hard times that are expected after the war.

The hon. member for Montreal, St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames) said last night that it was impossible to get any more recruits. I feel satisfied that if we doubled the pay of the soldiers we would be able to get the number of men the Prime Minister promised without any form of compulsory service. Let me read a despatch in this connection:

800 Chicago Students For Canada's Farms.

Chicago, April 26.—The Agricultural College of the University of Illinois has given 800 students to Canada to help harvest the "war-winning wheat crop." The first contingent, composed of nearly 500 men, left Chicago for the Saskatoon district in western Canada tonight.

The Canadian Government guarantees the boys a minimum wage of $50 a month and board, it pays two-thirds of their railroad fare in Canada, and promises each of them a homestead of 160 acres after they have served six months harvesting the 1917 crop.

If this be true, I ask this Government to give the boys at the front who are protecting this young nation the same consideration after the war is over. I believe we should then be able to get the required number of men. I have another advertisement here which appeared in the different American newspapers up to the 1st of May last:

Farm Hands Wanted.

Western Canada Farmers Require 50,000 American Farm Labourers at Once?

Urgent demand sent out for farm help by the Government of Canada. Good wages. Steady employment. Low railway fares. Pleasant surroundings. Comfortable homes. No Compulsory Military Service. Farm hands from the United States are absolutely guaranteed against conscription. This advertisement is to secure farm help to replace Canadian farmers who have enlisted for the war.

A splendid opportunity for the young man to investigate western Canada's agricultural offerings, and to do so at no expense. Only those accustomed to farming need apply.

For particulars as to railway rates and districts where labour is required, or other information regarding western Canada, apply to

Am I unreasonable in making this plea for the soldiers at the front, of whom so many kind and complimentary things have been said by every hon. gentleman who has spoken in this debate? Am I asking too much when I ask Parliament to supplement the pay of the men who are rendering such great service at the front for this country and the Empire, and to offer a higher amount to the men they propose to coerce into military service in the future?

The county which I have the honour to represent in this House has sent many boys to the Royal Military School at Kingston to take the artillery course. This course costs the parents from $800 to $1,200. On the first day of June many of my constituents who had taken this course at Kingston were sent overseas. They had had a thorough training in the artillery branch of the service, and naturally expected to continue in that branch, but after they arrived in England they were transferred from the artillery to the infantry. This was not done by the British authorities; they had nothing to do with it whatever. The whole matter was in the hands of the Canadian officials. In view of the treatment meted out to these men, how can the Government expect to get more recruits from that county? As the Prime Minister is not in his seat, I appeal to the hon. gentleman who is leading the House to give this matter his immediate and serious attention, and have this wrong righted. If the people are to have confidence in recruiting officers, the Government must stand behind the pledges given at the time of enlistment, and not transfer men from one unit to another contrary to the understanding at the time of enlistment.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) said the other day that what Canada wanted was leadership. These are his words:

I prefer that this House of Commons—not fresh from the people, but yet from the people—I prefer that they, having knowledge which others in large degree cannot have, should give the people of this country a lead in this great matter.

With that I am absolutely in accord. When the National Service campaign was being carried on and cards were being sent out, hundreds of men came to me and asked if they would be subject to compulsory service if they signed the cards. I assured them on the word of the Prime Minister of this country that we would not have compulsory service in Canada. I also told them that the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers), when acting for the Prime Minister, had assured the labour delegates who waited on him that registration was no step towards compulsion. I also pointed out that the right hon. leader of the Opposition had stated that we should not have compulsory service in Canada. I have also here an interview in the Toronto Mail and Empire of October 10, 1916, with Hon. Mr. Hearst, Premier of Ontario:

> The Prime Minister found little, if any, sentiment among the British people, favouring compulsory service in Canada. There may be some among Canadian army men, but the British people have received so much more help from Canada than they looked for at the outset, that they are not disposed to demand more.

When we have such authorities making the statement that there will be no compulsion in this country, can you be surprised when you hear that there is some opposition to this proposal, and especially in the absence of an educational campaign to place before the people the reasons for adopting a measure of this kind? While I am alluding to the views of those who, I admit, are amongst the foremost men in Canada, I think I might appropriately refer to an editorial which appeared in a paper that enjoys the greatest reputation for reliability and enterprise in supplying war news to the people of this land. In reply to criticism with regard to the stand that paper had taken, the Toronto Globe published the following in its editorial columns:

> The Globe, in its editorial columns, has constantly pointed out that in a country such as Canada conscription is an impossibility, and that no responsible statesman of either party, capable of forming or leading a Canadian War Ministry, would propose compulsory service. Nor has The Globe unduly criticised the failure of the Borden Government to do more than it has done to assist volunteer recruiting. The criticisms of The Globe and of most Liberal papers have been exceedingly mild when compared with the vitriolic denunciations of the Toronto Telegram, the Winnipeg Telegram, the Montreal Mail, and other journals that have absolutely no sympathy with the Liberal party.

Mr. LAFORTUNE: Will the hon. gentleman tell me if the Globe has changed its opinion since?

Mr. McCOIG: I am not the editor of the Globe.

An hon. MEMBER: What is the date of that?

Mr. McCOIG: It is dated July 13, 1916. When the announcement had been made by all these leading gentlemen and by such a reputable journal as the Toronto Globe, can you be surprised that men throughout the country had expected that compulsory service would not be an issue in the future? That was the reason why I assured every constituent of mine who came and talked with me that compulsory service would not be an issue until such time as there should be a general election, or at least until it was submitted to the people through the medium of a referendum. I stand in that position at the present time. As far as the Bill before Parliament is concerned, I am desirous of doing everything possible to assist in having it carried through if it is going to be any assistance whatever to the Allies in their great struggle. While I support it, I grant there are portions of the Bill that are more favourable to the objects sought to be accomplished than are the provisions of the Militia Act, now upon the statute-book. I feel that in this new measure there will be an advantage and therefore I feel bound to support it. But, not wishing to appear illogical, not wishing to take a stand which may seem inconsistent to some people, I want to assure the House that having promised my constituents that I would support a referendum under which the question will be submitted to the people, and not having an opportunity of doing it on the third reading, which would be the proper time, I intend to support the referendum when the opportunity presents itself.

We have had many speakers on both sides giving the question of a referendum very scanty consideration and referring to it as an improper method to adopt on an occasion of this kind. I have heard some observations by the hon. Mr. Balfour read in this House and I believe it is perfectly in order to read them again. These are the words of Mr. Balfour who addressed this House a short time ago. Speaking on November 29, 1911, on the question of tariff reform, he made the following statement:

> The advantage of a referendum is this: that the issue is quite clear and quite precise. A referendum has an enormous advantage. It does not involve a general election; it does not involve all the personal bitterness inevitably involved in a contest between the two competitors for a seat; it does not carry with it a change of government; and it does get a clear verdict from the people.

I doubt if there is any one here who will question the great ability of the Hon. Mr. Balfour, or the importance that must be attached to any statement that he makes.

Now, coming back to the province of Ontario, I would remind the House of the campaign which is proceeding in favour of the adoption of war-time prohibition. Every

hon. member of this House must have had a petition sent to him asking for the adoption of a prohibitory measure. We have had petitions sent to us, not from one organization in the city of Toronto, but from every church in every section of the country —certainly from every part of my own county, and I have no doubt they have been sent from other counties as well—asking for war-time prohibition. What do the signers of these petitions say? The petitioners ask that the manufacture and importation into the Dominion of Canada of intoxicating liquors and beverages shall cease, or words to that effect:

> Or in the alternative, if it is deemed desirable to have a vote of the electors on the question, that your honourable body may pass such an Act to go into operation within three months of the voting thereon.

Does any hon. member of this House say that these men, representing the leading religious organizations of this country, are not justified in sending an appeal to this Parliament asking us, if we cannot agree on this great question, to give them a chance to have a referendum, in order that they may express their opinions at the polls? If a request of that kind is made by these representative men with regard to the question of prohibition, I feel, when I say that I intend to support a referendum on conscription, that I am only doing what I believe to be the proper thing in consulting the people on such an important question as this. We recall that in days gone by we had in Ontario that grand old statesman, Sir Oliver Mowat, whose success in public life was largely due to the fact that he adopted the motto: Trust the people. With reference to the present measure, it is proposed to place upon the statute book legislation which many speakers have said will not have the endorsation of a majority of the people. In that connection let me call the attention of the House to the stand taken by a distinguished gentleman who has recently been appointed to an important office by the Government of Canada, and who, while a member of the Government of Ontario, pointed out the futility of placing a measure on the statute book unless it had behind it the support of a majority of the people. I refer to Hon. W. J. Hanna, who has recently been appointed food controller of Canada. When introducing legislation in the Legislature of Ontario with reference to local option, he said that no legislation should be placed upon the statute books unless it had the endorsation and support of at least three-fifths of the electors to ensure its enforcement. No one will question the opinion of that distinguished leader of the Conservative party, who has now gone to his reward, the late Sir James Whitney, and he expressed the opinion on many occasions that any Act that was passed by the legislature of the province should have the endorsation of at least three-fifths of the people if it was to be properly and honestly carried out.

Now, I come back to the question of conscription. It has been stated in this House that conscription, if submitted to a referendum would be defeated by three to one. Well, if this measure has not at least a majority, how do you expect that it will be properly enforced in the face of such strong opposition unless you give time to conduct a campaign to educate the people to a realization of the necessity of the measure, so that they may be fully acquainted with the facts? A referendum would give an opportunity to every man who was serious in his desire to do his part in this great struggle, to assist in educating the people and show them why this legislation should be passed. It would take no longer to conduct an educational campaign along this line than it would take to hold an election. The Prime Minister said: Pass the Bill, this Bill, then set it aside, form a coalition government and we will appeal to the country before putting it into effect. It would take no longer to have a referendum than it would do to carry out the suggestion of the Prime Minister culminating in a general election. It would not only take less time but in the meantime we would be able to take a most important step toward the holding of a true referendum. The Prime Minister has promised to bring down a woman suffrage bill. No one denies that he intends to do it. The passing of that measure and the holding of the referendum on conscription would give the women of the country an opportunity of casting their votes upon the most important question that the electors have ever been required to pronounce upon. It would be their duty to give the matter very serious consideration, something that the women of Canada are quite capable of doing. Would it not be a fresh token of respect and regard on the part of this Parliament to give them that privilege, especially when they have rendered such great service in this struggle? They have rendered a greater service possibly than any other class of the people of Canada unless it be the men who are in the trenches. Trust the women and give them an opportunity of voting on this question, and if you do I feel satisfied that the result will be all that we could wish.

We had a campaign carried on during last spring by the Government urging greater food production. That was a campaign that we were all willing to take part in, and in that campaign the statement was made and repeated that increased production was not only urgent but absolutely necessary. Let me draw the attention of the House to the statement of the right hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) that Canada's need was great in this matter. We have in the Ottawa Citizen the report of a statement made by the Hon. Mr. Balfour at Washington in which he said that what was needed was "food first; military aid later." The article in the Citizen is headed in this way:

> Food First, Military Aid Later
> Is the Request of the Entente War Commission to the United States Government.
> Allies have pooled all food supplies but France and Italy still face acute shortage. Commission may establish board of experts in U. S. to act until end of war.

Then it goes on to state that what the Allies need most is food and not men. Mr. Balfour was only a ship or two ahead of the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) in coming from the Old Land, and will any member of this Parliament say that Mr. Balfour was not in touch with the requirements of the Allies to as great an extent as the Prime Minister who came over only a few days later? Then, we have a statement from old London made by Lord Rhondda, the Food Commissioner on June 19:

> Allies rely on Canada and U. S. to supply food. We are doing what we can off our own bat by increasing home production and decreasing consumption, but in the main the solution of the primary problem of supplies lies in the hands of our American Allies and Canada. I am sure they will not "let us down."

Shall we accept the leadership of the Minister of Trade and Commerce in this matter or shall we rely upon the words uttered by the Controller of Food in old England and also the statement of Mr. Balfour? We have the Minister of Trade and Commerce saying one thing and we have these British statesmen saying another. Let us give this question serious consideration before we take a rash step for fear it may not be the right one and for fear it may be considered as a reaching for political effect.

I would point out to the House that under the voluntary system this young country has raised as large an army as has ever been produced in the history of the world out of the same population. If this young nation enjoys the credit and distinction of this great achievement, is it not an incentive to us to join together and by a united effort try to get the required number of men without having to apply coercion or compulsion to the young manhood of this country? Let us only say that we will do this and I feel satisfied that Canada will have the proud distinction, a record which will be handed down from generation to generation, of being the only nation that was able to raise a volunteer army of 500,000 men. Let me appeal to the Government, if this campaign is carried on, to establish large military districts throughout Canada. We could carry on a campaign in these military districts for the number of men assigned to each according to population and where these districts give the required number of men it should be understood that the compulsory service measure, even though enacted, will not be applied.

Mr. EUGENE PAQUET (L'Islet): Mr. Speaker, the hon. George P. Graham, Sir Wilfrid Laurier's first lieutenant, approves Sir Robert Borden's policy of compulsory military service and he contends that every Liberal member is perfectly free to act, to speak and to vote as his conscience dictates. He seems to believe that freedom of speech does not exist in the Liberal-Conservative party.

I have been sitting here in the House of Commons for the past thirteen years and I have parted with Sir Robert Borden on several momentous occasions. I may assert that no one appreciates more than the Prime Minister of Canada the frankness shown by the members of this deliberative body in expressing their opinion.

The hon. Mr. Graham states that the fundamental principle of the Liberal doctrine is based upon the respect for individual liberty. How can the hon. member invoke that principle when journalists, imbued indeed with the Liberal idea, keep on proclaiming that the French Canadians now occupying a seat in Sir Robert Borden's cabinet should be considered as traitors to their race and to their province?

I am impelled by that respect for individual liberty in expressing my belief that the French Canadian ministers, approving as they do a bill which I intend to fight as vigourously as possible, do so because they are satisfied that, by resisting the popular impulse, at the very risk of thereby ending their political life, they may be of service to their fellow-man.

I might be allowed to apply to the present situation a reflection which was made in this House by a most distinguished French Canadian: If French Canadians, Conservative or Liberal, continue to be represented henceforth in the Dominion cabinet, they may owe that privilege to the Ministers who are in it to-day.

I respect the motives which urge the Prime Minister to introduce a bill, inspired, as he says, by a deep sense of our duty. But I feel obliged to oppose this measure, because I believe that Canada's participation in this war should be voluntary. I demand that the people be consulted, in order to ensure the preservation of our national unity: the good work accomplished by the Fathers of the Confederation.

I have always contended that Canada should defend her territory and her liberties. From the very beginning of the war, our native country and our liberty have been threatened. Canada was thereby threatened with a change of institutions and the imposition of the Prussian yoke. Germany could not find a more fertile land to feed her immense population, to expand her trade and to extend her barbarous domination.

It has often been said that Canada was the British crown's brightest jewel. Should that crown become decayed or broken, what would become of the jewel? The archbishop of Montreal has declared; "We are a colony of England and therefore, should England be defeated, Germany's first prey would be Canada. Now, we do not want to be Germans. That is why we must do all we can, since Canada's destiny is linked with success of the British arms."

On November 8, 1914, Mr. Henri Bourassa wrote: "Canada, an Anglo-French nation, bound to England and to France by a thousand ties, ethical, special, intellectual and economic, has a vital interest in the maintenance of France and of England, of their prestige, of their power, of their world-wide action. It is therefore her national duty to contribute, in the full measure of her forces and by her own particular means of action, to the triumph and above all to the maintenance of France and England's combined efforts."

On May 18, 1917, Sir Robert Borden exclaimed: "There are other places besides the soil of a country itself where the battle for its liberties and its institutions can be fought, and I venture to think that, if this war should end in defeat, Canada, in all the years to come, would be under the shadow of German military domination."

These words go to show that the Canadian nation, directly interested in this war, could not remain unconcerned by the European conflict: "Horrible unbridling of a nation of prey whose passions let loose find, in the brutal realism of war, their national course."

"This war," has declared Mr. Asquith, then Premier of the United Kingdom, "is a national war. We shall keep on to the end, until entire reparation has been made to Belgium, until France has recovered her lost provinces and security, until Europe has been delivered from the incubus of armaments, and the world from the monstrosity of Prussian militarism."

So are we fighting with Great Britain to repel the invader and for the triumph of those democratic ideas so well analyzed in this House by Mr. Balfour. It is as much Canada's war as it is England's war. It is yours, Mr. Speaker, it is mine. It is the war of every Canadian and of every British subject.

At the opening of hostilities, the leaders of the nation have declared that Canada's participation in the war was absolutely voluntary. "Free participation, free enlistment." Such were the words that rang forth throughout the country. The Canadian people has given a solemn assent to these feelings. Indeed, at the call to the colours, 400,000 sons of Canada, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, have willingly responded and have joined the allied troops to defend the country and defeat Prussian militarism. They know that our security at the present time rests with the British fleet. Our brethren, leaving Canada to drive back the German hordes, knew that England had not willed the war, but had risen in a body to refuse to accept the infamous proposal of William II who was violating Belgium's neutrality in defiance of the treaties signed by his grandsire. At the first call to the colours, the most authoritative voices in the clergy of various denominations, in the Canadian press, in the political associations of the country united themselves in the defence of the Allies' cause against a foe who believes only in might, cynically laughs at his own atrocities, tramples upon the most sacred agreements, ruthlessly kills children, women and old men, and transgresses the laws of humanity, the law of nations and the respect of pledged troth. Odious doctrines have perverted the moral intellect of the Germanic race. Allow me to quote the following words which William II addressed one day to recruits in Potsdam:

"Recruits! before God's consecrated servant and in front of this altar, you have sworn me fidelity. You are still too young to well understand the full meaning of that word. You have sworn to be faithful to me, that is to say that, becoming my soldiers, you have given yourselves over to me, soul and body. You have now but one foe; my foe. It is possible that in these days of socialist plots, I may order you to fire upon your kinsmen, your fathers and mothers—God spare you that!—but know ye well that, even then, it is my orders you shall have to obey without grumbling. God and I have heard your oath of fealty to your war chief. . ."

The German Kaiser claims the empire of the very souls of his soldiers. He is cruel enough to tell them that he has the right to order them the shooting of their fathers or their mothers and that, if needs be, they must execute his orders without grumbling. In the face of such monstrous language that cries to Heaven for vengeance and in the face of the German army's most tyrannical deeds, the Canadian people have voluntarily made, both in men and in cash, sacrifices unparalleled in our history in order to expedite the Allies victory. Voluntarily, the rich and the poor have subscribed to the Patriotic Fund and to the works for the war, in order to aid our valiant defenders' families, our motherland's mariners and the sufferers both in Belgium and in France. Canada's military effort has called forth the Allied nations admiration. On the battle fields of Festubert, of St. Eloi, of Courcelette and of Vimy, the Canadians had accomplished feats the glory of which shall never die. The people have responded to the call by revealing treasures of energy, of devotion and of charity. In the face of these sacrifices, the Government should not lay aside the volunteering system and offer violence to the feelings of a large portion of the population by making the service a compulsory one. Men! Men! And still more men! cry the partisans of selective conscription. Nevertheless, during the year ending May 31, 1917, the total number of men enlisted amounted to 85,306 and the total losses reached the figure of 75,492. Therefore the recruits have exceeded by almost 10,000 the number of vacancies to be filled. Among those set down on the loss columns, a large number of wounded soldiers have already returned or will return to the front. Is that what can be called the utter failure of voluntary recruiting? I am satisfied that voluntary enlistment, if well organized, would be in keeping with the military effort which is to be expected from Canada. Enlightened economists remind us that we should not lose sight of our country's youthfulness, its resources and its future. They are rightfully asking themselves whether conscription would not, after all, render England a negative service by sterilizing in the finest of her colonies all the germs of future life.

While the Canadian army is heroically struggling in order to expel the invader from Belgium and from France, we should says the economist, concern ourselves about economical organization and the evolving of a constructive policy.

Before the war, Canada needed all her men to continue the conquest of the soil. Europe is not producing as she did in the past years, because her soil is turned upside down and her able-bodied men are all at war. The farmers are entreated to give, more than ever before, all their care and attention to the tilling of the land. The authorities have even called upon foreign labour. In accelerating the desertion of husbandry by means of compulsory recruiting, we would be making a mistake that must react upon our economic life. We should not forget the assistance, especially agricultural, which our country, more than any other one, is able to give England and the allied nations. Exports from Canada and from the United States, needed to supply the Allies' needs, should be immensely larger than under normal conditions. In such an emergency is it wise to throw into the War furnace 100,000 more young Canadians?

And should the war last somewhat longer, will not the leaders of the Government, taking their inspiration from the principle of compulsory military service laid down in their new legislation, demand still more victims?

Ever since January 17, 1916, I have gone by the word of our political leaders and asserted that compulsory service would not be imposed upon the Canadian people. When the National Service cards were being distributed, I advised my electors to submit to the wishes of the Government; I gave them the assurance that these cards had no reference to compulsory service. In public meetings, I quoted the words of Sir Robert Borden, of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and of the honourable member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Descarries), to demonstrate that there would be no conscription, I am not therefore surprised to hear voices raised in the province of Quebec in protest against this bill.

Messrs. Viviani and Balfour have recalled the supreme sacrifices of the Canadians. With the grandest eloquence they have hailed our soldiers who are fighting, suffering and dying for the holy cause.

After these sublime sacrifices, it would be unjust to violently tear away from Canada her sons and to forcibly levy the imposition of blood.

To impose conscription under such circumstances, without consulting the people, why! wouldn't that be doing injury to the devotion, to the sacrifices and to the heroism of the Canadian people?

It is impossible for me to approve an enactment, the enforcement of which might endanger our national unity.

As the honourable Mr. Patenaude wrote to Sir Robert Borden, on June 18:

> The proposed law, I have every reason to fear, threatens to destroy this unity, and to give rise throughout the country to deep internal divisions of long duration, and even detrimental to the needs of the present moment.
>
> Indeed it is better to keep the country united in the present effort than to attempt a mightier one at the cost of national disruption.

The honourable Mr. Patenaude perfectly expressed my own opinion as to the new Military Service Act.

I believe this is a fit occasion to make a few remarks about the French Canadians' military effort during this war.

Ill-advised journalists have been, these two years, incessantly abusing the French Canadians because the latter have not contributed as many volunteers as the province of Ontario has done to the oversea service.

According to Government statistics, the number of French Canadians who have enlisted is estimated at 14,100. I am convinced, from a serious study, that the French Canadians' contribution to the general recruiting is far larger than is inferred on insufficient evidence. As an historian has rightly stated it: "The number of our compatriots in active service is not the only criterion of our loyal determination to contribute to the success of the Allies whose cause for the future of civilization, for England, for France is to us so dear and so sacred."

I sincerely trust that justice will be meted out to us. We find among our English-speaking fellow-citizens numerous defenders. They know that since the cession of Canada to England, the French Canadians have been somehow the champions of British domination upon Canadian soil.

During the darkest days of our history, the French Canadians have loyally and generously fought for the British crown. In the American war of independence, our militia men placed themselves under the British government's orders and saved Canada for England. From 1760 to 1840, the English bureaucrats, through their persecution, impelled agricultural development, paralyzed trade and commerce in the province of Quebec. Nevertheless, our fathers' loyalty remained unshaken. And when, in 1813, the United States tried to seize upon Canada, our militia, commanded by Mr. de Salaberry, drove back the foreigners. I may boldly proclaim that British institutions rest, in the province of Quebec, upon immovable foundations.

It is true that the province of Quebec has not supplied men for the war in the same ratio as the population of the other provinces. We should consider that Quebec's rural population is much larger than the urban, and that recruiting is carried on more easily in towns. Some one has written: "When it is a matter of warfare and of battles, we like to share in the glory attached to it. The fascination of arms springs from the prestige of the chiefs who set off their own valour and that of their soldiers." We have not been given French Canadian leaders; only one regiment has succeeded in getting a fair opening and in pulling through. The others that followed on have lost their identity in England and in France. All that counts in the present organization has been a staff almost exclusively English. How many French Canadians are there in the superior ranks? The very few compatriots who cut a nominal figure in high ranks have been so intimidated and circumvented, that they are unwittingly and helplessly so, rather a cause of discouragement.

Colonel Blondin has sounded the right note when recruiting in the province of Quebec. If the hon. Minister of Militia had organized, at the very outset of the war, a well directed campaign, the results would have been different. Since the conquest, the authorities have not encouraged the militarist idea among the French Canadians. In a general way, my compatriots seem to have been systematically ignored in the Militia Department. How could our people show any enthusiasm for enlisting when both editors and legislators consign the French Canadians of Ontario to the same standing as the Germans as far as education is concerned? Why should our people rush to the recruiting booths, when English-speaking Canadians want the fusion of races, ostracize our language and try to disposses us of our holdings? One of us has said: "What we have we hold." Such is my compatriots! rallying-cry to resist the organized attacks against our faith, our traditions and our language. The struggle which the French Canadians of Ontario and of Manitoba have to keep up for the maintenance of their language and the preservation of their schools has largely contributed to impede recruiting.

For a few months past, I have been expecting an official truce, but those who are hostile to our tongue will not disarm and are even now trying to send to jail the defenders of our language in the city of Ottawa. So strange an aggression has revived a regrettable feud. Therefore, those who persist in refusing to give our race its due; those who abuse us since 1914; those who keep on persecuting our compatriots in the capital of Canada, destroy enlisting in the province of Quebec. If this unfortunate question of the bilingual schools were settled in a fair way, the French Canadians' participation would be more effective.

Several liberal speakers have stated that the Nationalist campaign of 1910 and of 1911 had paralysed enlisting in the province of Quebec. They seem to have forgotten some most important facts of our history. As a matter of fact, in 1885, General Laurie and Colonel Williams proposed the levy of two regiments to aid the Empire and asked the Canadian Government to pay part of the expense. Sir John A. Macdonald, consulted by Lord Landsdowne, wrote that Canada ought not contribute to the wars of the Empire.

Let us recall the Liberal policy of 1896. One could read in L'Electeur: "Why fight for England?" In 1896, the Liberal party in the province of Quebec opposed any participation of Canada in the wars of the Empire. Le Canada, organ of the Liberal party, in 1907, opposed all contribution on the part of Canada to the defence of England. It approved any Canadian policy of abstention. In 1910, in the course of the debates upon the Naval Act, and during the electoral campaign of 1911, several Liberals in the province of Quebec were bent on lessening the Government's schemes and reduced them to a simple maritime policy. Some spoke of the creation of a navy which Canada might lend to England, others, of the creation of an exclusively Canadian fleet to be controlled by us and by us alone. And even some others again found in this navy the best instrument to conquer our independence.

The Liberals of the province of Quebec, although supporting the Naval Act proposition, seemed opposed to Canada's participating in the wars of the Empire.

The Liberal party has always, previous to March 29, 1909, advocated the doctrine which the Nationalists defended in 1910 and in 1911. To prove this I might refer to the reports of the various imperial conferences. They show that the Liberal party has deeply engraved in the heart of the French Canadians the principle of Canada's non-participation in the wars of the Empire.

In the judgment of the vast majority of the French Canadians, this traditional principle is inscribed in the Constitution. The supreme reason of their opposition to enlistment and to compulsory service consists, as it seems to me, in their sincere attachment to Canada which is their only country.

The French Canadian mentality is to-day entangled by obstacles which might be removed through a consultation of the people. Indeed, my compatriots have the sense of order and discipline and they would submit to the verdict rendered by the majority. Therefore I ask the Prime Minister, as did the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Pardee), and other members of this House, to make, previous to putting this bill into force, a last and sincere appeal to the patriotism of our Canadian youths, to go voluntarily to the assistance of their brethren at the front. I do ask this in order to try and settle a situation full of difficulties and internecine struggles. Otherwise you are deepening a chasm between the two great races who form the Canadian nation and between classes that should respect and love one another. What would be the usefulness of the new law, if our country is rushed into an unwholesome agitation?

The adoption of this measure under such circumstances would be more hurtful than useful to the Allies' cause. Just think, Mr. Speaker, of the touchiness of the races and of the working classes. This irritability must be taken into account. It may be suddenly stirred up, powerful and threatening. Are the various classes of our society and the Canadians of all races condemned to inflict upon one another the most painful injuries by the enforcement of an Act the results of which are doubtful?

The referendum offers itself with a sort of serene majesty to act as a moderator. Let us accept it in the interest of national unity. We are writing to-day one of the most important pages in our history. Should the government, in justice toward the people they represent, forcibly enlist the Canadians for oversea service, after the nation has already voluntarily made such immense sacrifices in this war.

I ask for an appeal to the people, so as to dispense with doing violence to the feelings of a large portion of the Canadian people.

I ask for a consultation of the people, in order to maintain union among the various races and not to endanger the work of the fathers of Confederation.

If we establish a comparison between the number of our people and the extent of our country, between our financial resources and the obligations we have taken upon ourselves, we come to this conclusion that the share Canada has already assumed voluntarily in the great war can compare with that of any other country, if it does not exceed it.

In the opinion of our ministers, these noble efforts are not sufficient. They should at least regulate their new position by consulting the people. I do not believe my mandate authorizes me to modify in so serious a manner our country's traditions. In this war of universal democracy against military despotism; in this war of liberty against tyranny, this Government should accept the very democratic principle of popular consultation. As a journalist has expressed it: "The voice of the people should lose nothing of its efficacy and of its eloquence in a democratic country which has already made such a splendid struggle against tyranny and political absolutism."

In Australia, Mr. Hughes, the prime minister, has not seen fit to have the Australian congress decree conscription for outside service, without asking the electors' opinion by means of a plebiscite. The majority has rejected compulsory service. Since then, Mr. Hughes has had a general election and he has been kept in power. If Mr. Hughes believes conscription necessary, he will again submit the question to the electors, through a plebiciste. I ask the Canadian government the same favour.

The people who will pay the imposition of blood have given me no mandate to deprive them of their liberty. Therefore I pray the Government to consult the people by means of a plebiscite. Is not the right of consultation one of the British subject's most universally recognized privileges. Parliament should not impose upon the people an important modification of its social and constitutional administration before having obtained the nation's consent.

We are, it is true, in extraordinary conditions, but do the members elected in 1911 represent public opinion when voting upon a measure which so deeply affects our national existence?

The present Parliament is sitting only by virtue of an act of its own creation, since its normal term has expired eight months ago.

Should this Parliament, elected when the question of war in no way existed, involve the country into a new policy which raises the strongest protest in several parts of the country? I do not believe I have the right to bind the population of Canada without inviting it to express its opinion. My constituents strongly protest against the compulsory military service. If the majority of the Canadian electors declare in favour of selective conscription, the French Canadians shall do their duty and respect the law.

The protests which are voiced against conscription from every part of the country should induce the Government to call for a plebiscite.

I have performed my duty by urging a referendum which cannot effect a change of government. If we are plunged in the whirlpool of militarism, I shall not be responsible for the violating of the Canadian people's rights.

Will the referendum be approved by the majority of the House? Many expected it a few days ago, but we now see Sir Wilfrid Laurier's lieutenants, in the English speaking provinces, approve of conscription and condemn the referendum. In my opinion, should we have general elections and the Liberals obtain the control of the administration, the majority of the Liberal members would impose compulsory service.

According to the debates of this House, the Conservative party and some distinguished members of the Liberal party shall be responsible for the adoption of this measure.

If this bill is adopted by both Houses and sanctioned by His Excellency the Governor General, I shall appeal to my compatriots to show due respect of the law, in order to restore union and harmony among the different classes and the different races.

The French Canadians, having all in their hearts the greatness of their country, will surely rally under the flag of the Bonne Entente. My compatriots are the most interested in the triumph of the Allies. We need the prestige of France to set off the splendour of our national development.

As Lieut.-Col. L. G. Desjardins has written it, in his splendid work: "England, Canada and the great war." We may say and think whatever we please, but we cannot help it; France, grand, powerful, respected, shall always be one of the mainstays of our future. We therefore have the best reasons to wish for her success, jointly with her powerful Allies, and to desire that the cordial union which binds her to the British Empire be perpetuated, thus procuring us all the advantages we have good reason to anticipate therefrom.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. ALPHONSE VERVILLE (Maisonneuve): Mr. Speaker, it is my intention to treat this question from a standpoint different from that of any hon. gentleman who has participated in this debate. I shall discuss it, not from the standpoint of nationality, or of province, but simply from that of organized labour. I, as other members of this House, who have so far addressed Parliament and the country, understand my full responsibility, and whatever I may say, at the outset I will state that I assume all the responsibility. I do not pretend to say that the discussion will be pleasing, perhaps, to a certain class of society, but it may be pleasing to others. But when a member rises in this House, it is for a purpose, and that purpose is to express his opinion as he sees fit, provided he keeps within the rules of order.

The great departure from our economic system, which the Government proposes to make in the enactment of the measure under discussion forces every one to consider the economic and national effects, as well as the general results, of such a radical change. This change may have for effect a general disruption of our economic power. Far be it from me to attempt to discuss this important subject from the constitutional point of view, but nothing prevents one from discussing its economical aspect.

The question of the day is, have we exhausted our man-power? According to the Prime Minister, we have not; according to others, we have; so then, it is a question of judgment based on figures at our command. As far as I can judge, we had exhausted this power before we reached the figure of 400,000 soldiers for overseas service. Amongst the different classes which compose our nation, two are specially called upon to state their attitude toward the world's battle now raging in Europe and the part which each has taken and proposes to take in the future. These classes are the wealthy and the poorer classes. In many quarters they would be called the exploiters and the exploited.

So far, the former class has controlled everything even in the sanctuary of Parliament; the autocracy of capital is becoming more and more a menace to the well-being of our Dominion. They have succeeded without great efforts in creating a large number of millionaires who are tumbling over one another in the rush for titles. They have succeeded in having these titles spread over the head of many undeserving men, and in that respect we are ridiculed by our neighbours as well as by our own sound-thinking people. Is it because a large number of our man power have willingly and voluntarily embraced military life, and a large number have gone to the soil of France, have fought and died to prevent Prussian military system being established in Canada?—Is it because many have never seen the field of hostilities yet and perhaps never will?— Is it because many are receiving good appointments and enjoying fat salaries without doing much good to the country?—Is it for these reasons that so many in this class have been knighted? It is perhaps fair to expose before the public the part that each of them has and is now playing in this great struggle, so as to establish for each their responsibility, and to show which of them has been the greatest factor, as well as the amount of patriotism shown in each case.

To any observer of human nature, there are times in life when occasion presents itself to appreciate the real value of sacrifice, and it must not be measured by words, but by deeds, with allowance made for the position in which each of us is placed and for the real motives that have influenced his decision. The former class I will admit, have cleverly set in operation the machinery at their command—nearly all the newspapers of the land, reviews of all kinds, literature, pamphlets of all sorts, have been in circulation to stimulate patriotism among the people. They have appealed to the generosity of every one to assist those who suffer through the war. In many quarters this has appeared as philanthropy, and has really been philanthropy, perhaps, in a few cases. They have organized large plants and institutions to manufacture implements of war material.

they have tried to revolutionize our system of transportation. They have opened industries which had never seen the light in our country before. They have recommended the increase in food production. They have recommended thrift to all classes of society. They have accumulated a large capital so as to finance the operations of the country.

The latter class also have done their share. They have furnished voluntarily seventy-five per cent of the 411,000 men already enlisted—that is, over 318,000 of our forces. They have set and kept in operation all the industries of the land. They have been, and are still, keeping in operation our whole system of transportation. They have produced the necessaries of life. They have increased production in many cases to a maximum. Through their labour they have been the means of increasing the wealth of many. They have been and are still the brain power of the machine. To sum up, they have and are still the economic power of the land.

With these few reasons set forth before this Parliament, it is proper to analyse, which of these two classes has been more useful, has done more to win the war, and has shown more patriotism. If we consider the motives of the former classes in their philanthropic, as well as in their patriotic action, we must believe that selfishness has been the determining factor with many.

Let us put the question: Is it patriotism to manufacture implements of war at scandalous profits, after being well provided, by guarantees from the Government—that is, from the people's money? Is it patriotism to secure contracts of millions of dollars at exorbitant figures, taking advantage of the needs of our soldiers in the trenches? Was it patriotism to organize a staff of middlemen so as to rob right and left the treasury of our country as well as that of the Allies? Is it patriotism to speculate in the most vital part of the soldier's existence, that is on foodstuffs? Was it patriotism to charge scandalous prices for land on which our soldiers were to be trained? Was it patriotism to charge on money loaned to the country percentages that made us the laughing stock of our neighbour? Was it patriotism to grant contracts to firms in the United States instead of to firms in Canada? Was it patriotism to prevent industries being nationalized for the better prosecution of the war? Was it patriotism to compel workingmen to contribute so many days' wages to the Red Cross or Patriotic Funds, while it was known that many could not make both ends meet, and publish in large headlines the fact that such an amount has been subscribed by such a firm?

Was it patriotism to reduce the wages of working men so as to make larger profits, regardless of fat prices received on contracts? Was it patriotism that induced them to force many employees to enlist, while many parasites were left in cafés, ballrooms, cricket and golf grounds? Was it patriotism that induced them to prevent the rank and file from buying foodstuffs at reasonable prices? And so on, all along the line. These make up but a very small percentage of the reasons for the patriotism of the wealthy classes. They are, perhaps, these so-called fathers of society who are demanding the enactment of this measure, knowing full well that they have the means to evade the law. They are playing their strongest trump card against a referendum because they are accustomed to command and to lead rather than to be controlled. This class of our population are in need of nothing. Food and the other necessities of life, regardless of price, are plentiful, so far as they are concerned. They have the power to command the powers that be to enact legislation from which they will derive large profits. If I were to take the figures of the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Middlebro), showing the amounts paid by way of taxation on profits, they would be convincing enough without giving any more. He has spread them on Hansard, and it does not take a great mathematician to figure them out. I submit that this very faction is somewhat responsible for the present legislation. The word "exemption" is equivalent to the word "protection." I am tempted to say that some pray that the present struggle may last some time yet, so that they may make scandalous profits. What has been done since the beginning of the war to get back to the treasury of the country some of this conscience money by the inauguration of a system of taxation which would not exist if these people had not been permitted to make such profits? And, of course, if that system of taxation had not existed, the expenses of collection would have been saved.

I admit that war can only be won, not by sentiment, but by practical common sense. I do not believe in the displays of sentiment that we witness, day in and day out, in this House. Those who are not displaying so much sentiment may be just as loyal as others. What is winning the war in Europe? The word " socialism " has been used more than once in this House; it has scared many people in different parts of the country. When I look at what is happening in Great Britain, in France, in Italy, and in all the Allied countries, I see that it is the principle of socialism which is now winning the war. When Britain took possession of the railways, mines and industries she applied the principle of socialism with a view to winning the war. I ask the present Government what they have done in that respect? If they have been afraid to take action because of the word " socialism." I hope that they will apply another name to it, and take steps to do what has been done in the Old Country.

I believe that I can speak for a great majority of the wage-earners of Canada. I know their sentiments and their feeling; if any take issue with me they make up a small minority. I have had the experience of struggling for life; it is something not easy to forget. In the name of those for whom I speak I take issue w th the Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers), as well as with the member for Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark), when they say that labour is in favour of conscription. I say that labour is against any kind of compulsion. The other day the member for Red Deer stated that organized labour adopts the principle of conscription because it compels persons to join the different trades unions. No one can show me in the constitution or rules of organized labour anywhere anything which indicates that organized labour compels anybody to work with them if he does not want to do so. The principles adopted by organized labour are based on freedom. If a member of a labour union does not want to work with those who do not belong to the union it is his right to refrain.

The same applies to the opposite case: if a man who does not belong to the association does not want to work with members of it, he does not have to do so. We do not prevent the employer from employing whoever he likes; at the same time we maintain, and rightly so, that he cannot compel us to work with those men if we do not want to do so. This is the principle which has been adopted in every strike in the country if there are any exceptions, they are very few. Those who say, therefore, that the principle of compulsion is embodied in the constitution or rules and regulations of trade unions, are making a great mistake. I shall later, in a very few words, expose the fallacy of that argument.

Compulsion is the very evil that labour has been fighting against for more than half a century, in time of peace as well as in time of war. Labour men are free and independent; free and independent they want to remain. I do not want the country to believe that organized labour is afraid of war. They have had to engage many times in the struggle between capital and labour; besides, when you consider the number of men belonging to labour organizations who are now at the front, you realize the truth of my contention. I understood the Minister of Labour, when he was giving some figures the other day, to say that organized labour at the front did not amount to so very much, after all, because there were only about—

Mr. CROTHERS: I did not say anything of the sort.

Mr. VERVILLE: I understood it that way; I accept my hon. friend's correction. Remember if there were 30,000 men at the front who belonged to labour organizations, 90 per cent of those men would have families. If you figure the number of citizens throughout the country that these men represent, you will find that they have done more than their share. I say, therefore, that they are not afraid of war.

Labour men do not forget the blood shed by their forefathers in order to obtain the advantages of a system of free association. What they got was never secured through the good-will of other classes. Every foot of ground obtained by them has cost as many lives as the present war, although in different form.

And still they are willing to join the colours, but they want to have a voice in the administration and in the enactment of the legislation by which they will have to abide. They have been trained in a school which teaches that the referendum is the most democratic platform upon which all can stand. They also have been taught that they are the producers of the wealth of the world, and that man-power is superior to all other power in the land. Is it possible to believe that with their economic education they would accept compulsion without a referendum?

The Prime Minister, in his address when moving the second reading of this Bill, expressed what I would consider a threat from the soldiers who will return after the war is over. I have too much respect for my fellow man who has gone to fight the battle of civilization not to resent an insult—I use the word unwillingly, for I know the extreme politeness of my right hon. friend. Nevertheless, he insinuated that the soldiers who will return will have lost all their dignity, their spirit of fraternity, their manhood to the extent of being a menace to the public security. Never will I believe that. Never will I permit any one to attack them in their dignity as workingmen without entering the strongest protest. My fellow-workingmen have known each other too long; too many are closely related and connected with one another to believe that. Did my right hon. friend think when he made those remarks that they might have a double meaning? Has he thought that the soldiers of industry are as essential as the soldiers at the front? He has, for he has said so. The soldiers of industry have made up their mind to produce everything necessary to provide for their fellow men—the best of implements and the best of food. They believe that it is not man-power which is needed at the present time, but supplies of all sorts. They know that the difficulty of transportation is a big factor; they also know that the United States are endeavouring to solve this problem, and from information at their disposal they are convinced that for Canada it is not man-power but food that is needed on the field of battle. Let me give a quotation here in support of my argument that it is man-power that is badly needed in this country. I do not want to go over the material which my hon. friend from West Kent (Mr. McCoig) brought forward this afternoon, to show the different advertisements appearing in the United States for men to come to work in this country. As he has stated, they are required to go on the farms. I have a small newspaper, La Justice de Biddeford, published in the United States.

Mr. LEMIEUX: In the state of Maine?

Mr. VERVILLE: Yes. In the first column there is a small item calling attention to an advertisement in another column. I will read it first in French, and then I will try to translate it into English if I can. The article is as follows:

Nous attirons l'attention des ouvriers textiles sur l'annonce de la Dominion Textile Co., que l'on trouvera dans une autre colonne. Cette compagnie opre de bonne calaires pour ceux qui désireraient aller travailler à Magog, P.Q.

This is the translation:

Detailed information as to the condition of life, lodging, etc., will be given in each village designated. Write in French or in English, or address yourself in person to Bureau de Placement, Dominion Textile Company, Ltd., 112 Rue St. James, Montreal, P.Q. The factories are at St. Henri, P.Q.; Montmorency Falls, P.Q.; Hochelaga, Que.; Magog, Que.; Cote St. Paul, Que.; Kingston, Ont.

Every one knows that Biddleford is quite a factory centre. I am not speaking now of the farming industry. I am speaking simply of textile industries. I have given this advertisement in this American paper to show that there is a scarcity of labour at the present time, and I believe that I am not far wrong when I say that 400,000 is the maximum man-power that we can reasonably send to the front.

It has been stated in this House that man-power should be called upon before accumulated wealth. The arguments, how ever in support of that statement do not appear to be reasonable. Without any compulsion we have succeeded in calling to the colours over 400,000 men, or about one-fifth of our man-power between the ages of 20 and 45 years, and before we endeavour to proceed any further by compulsion, we should extract from the accumulated wealth at least the same percentage. Why has not the Government taken such action before presenting the present Bill? They would then have had some excuse, but not a dollar except under the unfair system of taxation which now prevails, has been taken.

Was I right when I said that the power of organized capital had a great deal to do in the administration of public affairs? But, though their power may be great, it is as nothing compared with the power of the creator of wealth. This power if put into operation would lead to the entire disruption of our present system. Organized labour has notified the Government and the country in that respect. When they say that they will use all the means at their disposal to oppose compulsion I want this Parliament and the country to know that means a general strike. And what would a strike mean under present conditions? It would mean a calamity. Would any one assume responsibility for that? If responsibility there be it rests upon those who prevent the masses from pronouncing themselves on the present measure. They alone who prevent the people from expressing themselves on this measure will be charged with disloyalty by the soldiers at the front. On them will fall all the responsibility—responsibility, perhaps, for the greatest disruption of our productive power.

The Government must not believe that organized labour does not appreciate the Government's full responsibility in this matter. I want this Parliament to understand that, even if the whole of organized labour were to be exempted, their determination would not be altered one iota; it is a question of principle, and it involves too many years of sacrifice for them to be indifferent. The Government has no right to plunge this country into the dark days of a general strike.

The Government must be big enough to understand the errors they have already committed. They must understand that organized labour has been ignored ever since the war began, and that organized labour certainly was not consulted on the present measure.

The Minister of Labour the other night read from a newspaper which I take myself. I can tell him that if organized labour in the United States had furnished the same number of men in proportion to population as we have in Canada, every one of them over there would be against compulsion to-day. During the latter part of March I happened to be in the United States, visiting Detroit, Chicago, Minneapolis, Cleveland and Buffalo. President Wilson's Bill was not presented to Congress until the 2nd day of April. When I was in Chicago I spoke to three of the heads of organized labour, and learned that President Wilson had had a conference with them ten days before the Bill was introduced. The President took them into his confidence and asked what support he might expect, and as a result a large committee was formed. If the United States Government could do that, why could not this Government consult organized labour before this measure was introduced? Why have this Government not consulted organized labour at any time during the last three years. They say: Oh, it is too late now; we have to get the men. During the last ten days the whole cry in this House has been: We want more men. Apparently it does not matter who is going to make the munitions and produce the food so long as men are got for the front. In the United States, before the Bill was presented to Congress, organized labour in the United States stipulated that not a dollar of profit beyond what was reasonable should be allowed to the large business concerns of the United States Many business firms in that country offered to manufacture goods at cost price. What a different condition of affairs we see in Canada. If anybody in this country made such an offer as that, we should erect a handsome monument to him in one of the biggest squares in Ottawa. I cannot divulge the confidential information that was entrusted to me, but I am at liberty to say that the President of the United States would not move until he had organized labour behind him. In the United States, through the co-operation of organized labour, men are moved to where they can do the most necessary work. Hon. gentlemen opposite may say that is one of the objects of this Bill. I claim that the Government are greatly to blame for not taking organized labour into their confidence. It may not be too late even yet.

I may be told that organized labour represents only a small proportion of the wage-earners of this country, but we must not forget the number of their dependents and those who are in sympathy with them. It is needless for me to give the figures because they are well known to all. But, taking the figures which the Minister of Labour gave, 65,000—

Mr. CROTHERS: I did not give that figure at any time. What I said was that the membership of organized labour in Canada amounted to 160,000, and of that number 30,000 had gone to the front. Taking organized labour as one-fifth of the total wage-earners of Canada, I said that if those who were not members of organized labour enlisted in the same proportion as those who were, 150,000 wage-earners would be fighting at the front.

Mr. VERVILLE: Surely my hon. friend, being Minister of Labour, must know the figures. He knows very well that a certain portion of organized labour is affiliated with the Trades Congress and that another portion is not. As I was saying, the number of dependents and those in sympathy with organized labour is very large, and the only way to find out their opinion is by means of a referendum.

If, at the beginning of the war, the Government had taken organized labour into its confidence, as has been done in other countries, the present position would be brighter. It is perhaps not yet too late, for I honestly believe that if a referendum were taken and the principle of the present measure was endorsed by any majority of the people, organized labour would, as usual, submit loyally to the decision——

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Hear, hear.

Mr. VERVILLE: —and do all in their power to see it carried out. It may be that we would have a contrary result, and then, were organized labour called upon to do their part under the voluntary system, they would answer to the call so long as the productive powers of the country were not paralyzed.

My hon. friend from Parry Sound (Mr. Arthurs) the other day told us that there are at least 12,000 Canadians in Great Britain at the present time whose presence is absolutely unnecessary. We have been told that each one of the soldiers costs the country about $1,000 a year. Taking the figures quoted by the hon. gentleman, 12,000 —and doubtless his figures are conservative—as each of these men would cost $1,000 a year, or $2.75 per day, it costs us $32,000 per day to keep 12,000 men on the other side of the ocean who are absolutely useless, as has been stated here. This is equal to an expenditure of $960,000 per month. This country is spending $960,000 per month, for what? To keep 12,000 men on the other side who are absolutely useless, and who probably could be of great use in this country. I should probably be safe in saying that $1,000,000 a month would not be an exaggeration, but I am taking my hon. friend's figures. That is, we are spending $1,000,000 per month for nothing at all. Is this because we want to say that we have so many hundred thousand men on British soil? Is it because we want to say that we have 120,000 or more men on the soil of Britain, who I suppose have never set foot on the soil of France? Is it for that reason? If it is, I would advise the Department of Militia to call all of those men back to Canada as quickly as possible and put them on farms or in industries where they could be productively employed, and then, Sir, we could ask for voluntary enlistment and the labourmen of this country could not say: how is it possible to maintain production when we are short of hands in every part of the country? I said that I would not be guilty of advocating a general strike; I would not be guilty of that.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Hear, hear.

Mr. VERVILLE: Perhaps nobody knows better than I do what that means, and I only wish that the present Government would understand it as well as I do and realize the danger that lies in a general strike. I do not want to go into details, because they are horrors, not only for the members of this House, but for the country and for the Allies, and would be a possible menace to the successful carrying on of the war. But we must bear in mind that if you are going to force that class of men by compulsion without their being consulted, whoever is responsible for that will have to answer not only to the country but to many other countries on the other side, and my hope is that this will not come to pass. I conclude by borrowing the utterance of a great statesman, one who has been quoted as an authority in many cases, the immortal Abraham Lincoln. The language of Abraham Lincoln, the great president of the United States, has been quoted in this House more than once; I have quoted it myself. This great statesman did not very often make mistakes, and he is regarded here and everywhere as having been a grand old man. In a speech delivered by him at Hartford, Connecticut, in 1860, referring to the New England shoemakers' strike, he said:

Thank God we have a system of labour where there can be a strike. Whatever the pressure, there is a point where the workingman may stop.

Now, Sir, if a man like Abraham Lincoln would make such a statement as that before thousands of people, not only the strikers but the people of the city of Hartford, do not those words apply absolutely to this country at the present time? With him I will say: Thank God, labour has a weapon that it can use intelligently, and no power on earth can contest that right. My last appeal to the Government, to the Parliament and to the country, is, for the love of unity, for the love of the constitution under which we are governed, for the love of those soldiers now at the front, and of those they have left behind, and for the love of humanity, let us have a referendum.

Mr. W. G. WEICHEL (Waterloo, North): Mr. Speaker, I do not see how any one can rise on this occasion without feeling that the responsibility of a representative in the Canadian House of Commons to-day is very serious and very grave. Many striking sentiments have been expressed during the course of this debate, and the one thing that stands out very clearly and distinctly is the honesty of purpose which has characterized the debate from the very beginning. I feel that right conclusions regarding great national and vital questions as they concern our country at the present time can be reached only by conscientiously and honestly striving to understand existing conditions as they appeal to us to-day. To me the situation is serious. If any man will look at the map of Europe, he will see that the responsibilities of Great Britain and her Allies in this great struggle are very grave, and that the obstacles to be overcome before this war is won are still great. A business man to-day does not know where he is for twenty-four hours at a stretch, because conditions are upside down. The Russian situation, although it has cleared somewhat during the last week or two, still looks ominous to most of us, while the submarine menace, as we all know, is just as grave to-day and just as dangerous, so far as the integrity of the Empire is concerned, as it was weeks ago. These conditions appeal to me, and therefore I am one of those members of this House of Commons who to-day feel their responsibility in a crisis such as we are passing through. And, therefore, to cut the matter short, I am going to vote in favour of the Bill. There are two proposals before the House, and we are familiar with both of them. We have heard them discussed by a good many members since the debate began. We have heard from the Prime Minister. He has been across the water. He has met the men in the old land. They, no doubt, have given him information which has caused him to come back to his native land, and to ask the Parliament of Canada to pass the Military Service Bill. The other proposal is an amendment moved by the right hon. leader of the Opposition, that a referendum be taken on this matter. Sir, it is needless and unnecessary for me to quote figures to-night, and I do not wish to occupy more time than necessary. The figures have been quoted by other speakers. All I wish to say is that, in my opinion, the Military Service Bill is a whole-hearted effort to win the war, while the referendum, on the other hand, means delay, and, as one of the speakers pointed out the other day, leads us nowhere. We have had referendums in the past, and they have only been a farce. For a few minutes, allow me to refer to some other matters, before I take up the consideration of the Bill.

I well remember those ominous and fateful days preceding the war. I was then on a trip out West, and never shall I forget the shrill voice of the newsboys on the streets of the city of Winnipeg, when, on that fateful day, they broke the news to the people of that city, in the early hours of the morning, that England had declared war on Germany. Sir, you can readily understand that war between England and Germany had a terrible meaning for me, and, like a flash, my position was revealed to me. Hon. members in this House know my ancestry. I am the only one of the 221 members in this House whose parentage is German, and I wish to take this opportunity to-night, realizing my position—and I know that the members of the House will appreciate my position—to thank every member of the House, irrespective of party, and the Government, for the many acts of kindness that have been extended to me, and to my people, since the war began. I represent a constituency, Sir, where the greater majority of the people are of German ancestry, and the war has certainly produced changes in the sentiments of the people of that riding, but I am happy to state that, although there were some differences of opinion—and these, Sir, I am sorry to say, were greatly exaggerated by the newspapers of this country—to-day there is unity of purpose on the part of the people in the riding of North Waterloo. There is only one thing that lies before them, Mr. Speaker, and that is their duty, and they are going to do it to the very limit.

We have heard several hon. gentlemen in the House refer to the voluntary enlistment. I shall have something to say about that. The results in my riding were fair. They might have been better, but, take it as a whole, they were quite satisfactory. The rural population of my riding includes many of the class of people called the Mennonites, who are exempt from military service, as are other classes of conscientious objectors. These people came to Canada over a hundred years ago from Pennsylvania, and, travelling up the Grand river, settled in the county of Waterloo. They are God-fearing, plain living people, and I pay this tribute to them here to-night, that no finer set of people can be found in the whole Dominion of Canada than the Mennonite farmers of Waterloo. But, Sir, let it be understood by this House to-night that we could not get any volunteers from these people who are exempted from military service; and therefore our enlistments came entirely from the city of Kitchener, the town of Waterloo, the village of Elmira, and two or three smaller hamlets near by. I think I am quite safe in making the statement that we have enlisted over 1,000 men in North Waterloo. And of that number, nearly 300 were boys of German ancestry. I do not wish to apologize for my people, because I think they have done quite well. They did very well as far as the Patriotic Fund was concerned. They stand very high in the estimation of the chairman of that fund. They worked night and day to make the Belgian and Red Cross Relief Funds successful and were most ably supported by the ladies of our district. We have heard a very great deal about patriotism and loyalty in the Dominion of Canada during the past two or three years, and I wish to say that loyalty and patriotism, as I have learned to size it up, count for naught if not backed up with something more than flag-waving and loud talk.

Coming down to the Military Service Bill Mr. Speaker, I might say to you—and I am honest and conscientious in my conviction—that I was always opposed to compulsory service. I do not like the word "conscription." I am democratic in my ideas along these lines. But the situation, as it has been presented to me in this House, compels me to sidetrack any opinions I may have had in the past on this question, and to cast my vote in favour of this Bill because I believe it is in the interests of our common country. After reading this measure, I prefer this Bill to the Militia Act. I think it is more comprehensive and more businesslike in its terms, I think selective conscription is better suited to the best interests of this country than the system of choosing men in a haphazard manner. Besides it will enable every kind of labour to be supplied.

I was surprised to hear a statement made by an hon. gentleman who, it is supposed, expects to be the next Minister of Labour—the member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Verville). He said—and this, no doubt, will go broadcast through the country to-morrow—that if the measure passed, a general strike would be declared by the labour unions in Canada. I consider that a rash statement to make at this time. Suppose the boys in the trenches should organize a general strike and refuse to fight for us because we declined to send them help; what about our institutions then? What about all that we hold dear? Statements of that kind are absolutely out of place; the people do not want to listen to them. The people want their representatives in this House to discuss these matters in a manly way, not to spread—shall I call it sedition?—among the people, or to speak as my hon. friend spoke a few minutes ago.

The Military Service Bill appeals to me because men are not to be conscripted for a single purpose. It was a wise step on the part of the Government to provide that the general purpose of the Bill should be to fulfil every requirement necessary to the carrying on of the war. Agricultural interests are not to be deprived of farm help. The farmers have been urged to greater production. Would you to-day deprive the farmers of their help, who are doing such magnificent work in producing foodstuffs to win the war? Would you cripple an industry which is so essential to the winning of the war? Some hon. gentlemen have said that the Bill does not provide for this particular purpose, but I believe that it does. and that same is outlined and featured in the Bill.

I believe also that any amendments brought forward by any member of this House, irrespective of party, will be warmly welcomed by the Government.

What is expected of a representative who has been elected by the people to this House of Commons? I have travelled considerably throughout the country since the war began, and the conclusion I have come to is that there is a whole-hearted purpose among the people to-day, that of winning the war. As far as I am concerned, my duty is clear, whether I win or lose at the next election. Mr. Speaker, I would rather go down to defeat ten thousand times than side-track an issue like this, which means so much to my country.

The old line of political talk is distasteful to the people of to-day. What they want is action, quick action and plenty of it. Sir, the men at the front are waiting to see what we are going to do. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Verville) said that there were many labour men in the trenches. I think that these labour men who are in the trenches do not differ in their views respecting this matter from the 200,000 or 300,000 other men who are fighting the battles of Canada in France. I believe that all our soldiers are united on this question, and that they expect the Parliament of Canada to pass this measure without delay. I take my hat off to the soldier. I know many a fine fellow who exchanged a remunerative position for the paltry little sum which he receives to-day in uniform. As a citizen of Canada I cannot help appreciating the great work that is being done to-day by the men at the front, and I am the last man to deny them the reinforcements which they so badly need. We have often seen the soldiers pass by. We bade them God-speed, sent them to the firing line—and then quietly settled back in our easy chairs and waited for news from the front. These men are to-day in France; they are working for us; they are dying for us. What are we going to do for them? That is the question that is now before this House and before this country.

I was across the international boundary line a few days ago, and I met several prominent gentlemen in New York City. I never was prouder in my life than I was when I listened to what these men had to say about Canada's part in the war. It would do your heart good, Sir, to hear what they said about what Canada did under the voluntary system. Canada's effort is one of the grandest spectacles ever presented to the world. With a population of barely 8,000,000, she organized, equipped and sent overseas a force of between 300,000 and 400,000 men. And Canada has every reason to feel proud of the achievements of her sons at the front.

We have heard a great deal about patriotism. What is it that makes a man love a country? Because it is the land that gave him birth. "The land that gave us birth" is surely pressed upon us now as something paramount to every other consideration. The man who loves his country, is her faithful standard-bearer, and tries by every means in his power to keep her high above her rivals, must be considered a true and worthy patriot. But if he is inactive and lukewarm in her cause and does not with all his might uphold her institutions and everything that will have a tendency to elevate her in the eyes of the world, he must be looked upon with distrust, if not with contempt. What is it, after all, that makes a country? Lands, forests, rivers, mines? True, there is inspiration in these things. But, Sir, a country is nothing without its men. Some time ago, in reading the works of a certain author, I came across the following paragraphs:

> The very same country whose scenery, tame or bold, charming or awful, has been the inspiration of gallant generations may, as the wheel of time turns, fall to indolent savages, listless slaves or sordid money-getters.
> It is the nation, not the land, which makes the patriot, and if the nation degenerates, the land becomes only a monument, not a dwelling. Let the nation rouse itself, and the country may be a palace and a temple once more.

In this war, democracy as we have it here is forced by autocracy as they have it in Germany to accept temporary conscription in order that the issue of this great struggle may once for all be settled. Why, I know hundreds, yea, thousands of men who left the Old Land to live in democratic countries in North-America. These people preferred living under British institutions and they continue to do so to-day because they are guaranteed freedom of speech and liberty of conscience, and they much prefer to live on the broad acres of Canada to passing their future existence in congested Europe.

I am voting for this Bill because I feel it is a necessary expedient during a grave crisis that has overtaken our Empire; but while I am doing that, I hope and trust that militarism will never rear its ugly head in this country. Militarism is a cold code. My ancestors knew something about it, and what I know about militarism makes me abhor it from the bottom of my heart. Its unwritten laws are as unchangeable as the laws of the Medes and Persians. Under this code the end justifies the means—any act is entirely all right because it is done to serve the end. It is against the doctrine of "live and let live," and against the individual himself be he English, French, German or any other nationality.

Voltaire, the famous Frenchman, once stated that while France ruled the land and England the sea, Germany ruled the clouds. I am fully convinced, Sir, that there are two Germanys. Old Germany is the Germany that gave the world Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, and Goethe's Faust. It is the Germany that gave the world the Fairy Tales of Grimm, and that gave to the world Humperdinck, Schubert, Schumann, Schiller, Heine, Hauptmann, Brahms, Mozart, Liszt and Wagner. That Germany still lives to-day. It exists away down deep, gasping and groaning under the autocracy that has been imposed all over it. It is the Germany that President Wilson had in mind when he stated: "We have no quarrel with the German people." No, Mr. Speaker, we are at war with the thing that caused the symbol of Germany to change from the learned college professor to the military autocrat.

Shall we say that commerce and industry have so taken possession of the public mind that there is no further room for patriotism? Has the spirit of democracy, in its workings towards individualism of charcter, unfitted our citizens for sacrifice on behalf of the welfare of the nation as a whole? I am positive that this is not the case. The splendid response of our volunteers since the war began, the deeds of valour performed in many hard-fought fights and the whole-souled effort of the people at home are evidence enough for me that the national spirit is not decadent. What was saved for us in the past must be preserved.

Let me say a few words with regard to discrimination along race lines. If there is in this House one man who knows something about racial prejudice, that man is myself. I never knew what racial prejudice meant until August, 1914. From that time on, I have known what it is to have insult and ridicule and everything else that makes life unenviable heaped upon one. When I hear hon. gentlemen from the province of Quebec speaking about racial prejudice, I came to the conclusion that the prejudice against my race must be of a different brand from that against theirs. Discrimination along the lines of religion, of birthplace, of race, of language, is un-British and absolutely wrong. We must not forget that this is a cosmopolitan country. For years, you have let the bars down and have invited hundreds and thousands of people from foreign lands to settle in the Dominion of Canada. These people came here and made a home for themselves. Speaking for my own people, I know that through thrift and industry they have succeeded nobly. But let me say to the Government that the sooner the laws of the country with regard to naturalization are amended, the better for all concerned. I know men who have lived in my riding for thirty, forty or fifty years. They have succeeded well in life, and their first and second generations to-day are growing up around them. Those men have done public duty; they have served on the school boards of our cities and towns, and some of them have been aldermen. Yet to-day many of them find themselves disfranchised. There is a saying that ignorance of the law excuses no man; but I for one and others must take upon ourselves certain responsibilities which we did not fulfil before to those people, simply because no one in this country ever expected that we should get into such a war as is raging at the present time. There are men who have lived in my riding for forty-three years who thought that by taking the oath of allegiance they became British subjects, and when the time came they could not produce their naturalization papers and they were disfranchised. Yet some of those men have boys in the trenches at the front. Therefore, I say that the sooner these matters are remedied, the better for the unity of the different races in this Dominion of Canada.

Let me now relate a story of what happened not long ago in my house. I was summoned into my library and I found an old man of over seventy years of age sitting there. He said to me: "Mr. Weichel, is it permissible for me to speak to you in German?" I said: "My dear friend, we are not fighting languages, and I will try, if possible, to follow you." He said: "Will you get my boy out of the army?" Such inquiries, no doubt, are not new to most hon. members. I said: "How long has he been in?" He said, "Eleven months." I said, "I am sorry, my dear friend, but I am afraid that you cannot expect the Government of the Dominion of Canada to clothe and equip and drill your boy for eleven months and then simply ask me to come and take him out of the army again." "Well," he said, "I would not have asked this of you but mother is very anxious, for the boy has weak lungs. He has had pneumonia once and pleurisy twice, and she thinks it would be injurious to his health to send him into the trenches." I said: "I am very sorry, but I will do what a representative can do. I will lay the matter before the Officer Commanding the District and see what he has to say about it." He got up, and a big tear rolled down his face. "I am very sorry," he said, "that I worried you to-night, but it was for mother's sake; she wanted to keep the last one." "What do you mean by the last one, my dear friend?" I asked. He said, "I have three boys with the Canadian Mounted Rifles in France." To-day that man who has given his all—his four sons—finds himself without naturalization papers. Three of his sons are in France fighting our battles, and he is here with no vote. Many have given their sons for the cause among them many members of this House. My brother's boy is wearing the King's uniform and is to-day in the trenches in France so that patriotism does not exist only with a few races in this country.

In view of the cleavage between the races of this country at the present time, I would urge that we take mighty good care how we handle people from the moment they arrive in this country. I would compel every citizen of Canada to be Canadian and British in soul as well as in name, and let the high standard of their work be their citizenship. That is the only way in which we can become a united country. Racial bitterness has a tendency to destroy the unity of races in Canada. I am a young man, and many of you have been here for years, but I want to say that nothing hurts me more than the cleavage which exists between the two great races of this country at the present time. I wish I were a magician and could dispel all these recriminations; they certainly do no good. I feel that both sides may be to blame.

We must not forget that day by day the loyal spirit of our people grows stronger. Narrowness of thought, unreasoning strife, and violent denunciation of things that must be done to preserve the Empire, cannot resist its influence. The destiny of our Empire and of others is in the balance. Could we but be given to understand how much we must depend upon the preservation of our democratic institutions, would not a new spirit take possession of the people. Racial prejudices would not be tolerated for a moment, and these evils, so disastrous to a young nation like Canada, would go down before the march of an outraged people.

We sing "God save the King," and have sung it ever since we were children. "Send him victorious," we say. But how can he be victorious unless we send somebody to win the victory for him? For my part, I have the most implicit faith in our Empire. I have faith in the strong and loyal heart of our common country, which clings fast to liberty and sooner or later rights wrongs and uproots evils. Racial prejudice has to a certain extent dislocated matters in Canada. In my opinion, this is only a sign towards new adjustments. Out of it all will come a new people, who, after passing through this fiery ordeal cleansed and purified, will appreciate more than ever British institutions as we have them to-day. Freedom and justice for all who live in these broad lands will be guaranteed anew, and democracy will have for them a newer and a broader meaning than in the past.

Mr. WILLIAM POWER (Quebec West): Mr. Speaker, the important question at present before the House is one on which I have no desire to give a silent vote, for it will live not alone in the life of the present generation, but of those to come, and whether our assistance to the present war by compulsory service will be beneficial or not is the question of the hour.

Our boys who have so earnestly volunteered to carry the honour and the flag of Canada in this great conflict have brought lustre and honour on Canada. Their prowess, whether on the fields of Langemarck, Givenchy, or later on the far-famed ridge of Vimy, have earned the respect not only of the Allied nations, but of our opponents in this great struggle. Little did the people of Quebec, or of Canada, dream, when from that old city a flotilla bearing Canada's sons heaved their anchors and hied away to England's shores to stand shoulder to shoulder with the sons of England, Scotland, Ireland and Wales, that the whole world would, within a few short months, resound with their praises. But, Mr. Speaker, this was an army of men gathered from the Atlantic to the Pacific, acting together with but one impulse. Duty had called them, and there was a voluntary response, not the shackling of compulsion such as to-day is proposed to be inflicted throughout this country. Our pride in the glorious past is to be levelled to the ground, and men in free Canada are to be shackled and manacled in order that they may be forced to fight for freedom and justice.

For me, to-day, standing in this House, the self-elected representative of one of the divisions of this country, on my own shoulders and conscience alone rests the responsibility for my vote. I owe no responsibility to any elector of my division, as my mandate from them expired in October, 1916. Therefore, my responsibility on their behalf ceases, and in voting on this extraordinary measure I shall act solely and entirely for myself, and not for any elector of my division. In giving this vote, I may draw upon myself the rancour of men who through patriotic motives favour conscription, and perhaps the plaudits of men who for just as honourable reasons are opposed to the same. I fear not the first, nor do I seek the latter. My duty is plain and apparent: never shall I by my vote force any compulsory measure upon my fellow-men without the people of this Dominion having had a fair opportunity to pronounce a verdict upon it.

I shall no doubt be reproached in my native city and perhaps by some of my own flesh and blood for not assisting the soldiers at the front by my vote on this Bill. If I considered this Bill an earnest and sincere effort on the part of the Government to assist the men at the front, would I desert those near and dear to me? I am not an egotist, but if there is any hon. gentleman in this House who has good reason to take an interest in this contest it is the humble individual who stands before you. Five of those who are nearest and dearest to me have been in the conflict since its earliest days. One of those boys was gassed on the bloody field of Langemarck, the second is lying wounded in the Crimean Hospital at Woolwich, and the three others are doing duty somewhere in Flanders. I may be reproached by them, but if I thought it was the purpose to assist the soldiers at the front by this measure, I would be the last man to oppose it. But, in my own heart and conscience I feel that there is something underlying this measure, an object which I will not dare to bring before this House because the passions and prejudices of men are running very high. The day will come when the people of this country will know the object for which this measure has been brought before the House.

I am not a lawyer, I am only an ordinary business man, and I will not attempt to go through and dissect this Bill, nor to deal with the many classes of exceptions contained therein. That is the duty of lawyers. But there are exemptions which, if the Government put this Bill through in the interests of the country and the soldiers at the front, they must consider, and I will take these up one after the other.

As we hear on the floor of this House, as we have heard from the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White), so we have heard from the food controller of the Mother Country, that it is not men we want; it is food to feed our people and soldiers. The cry goes abroad: Produce, produce, produce. If such is the case, are the farmers and farmers' sons going to be conscripted by this measure? No, I say they must and will be exempted. Secondly, there are great munition factories scattered throughout the length and breadth of this land. With the promoters of the factories I have no concern. For those men who have, with the cognizance of the Government, profited out of the life-blood and honour of our soldiers at the front, I have nothing to say. But in these factories are hundreds and thousands of humble toilers who are working night and day in order that we may send munitions to our soldiers at the front. Are these men going to be conscripted? No, they will also be exempted. Thirdly, we have our great railway systems extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific. On these railroads hundreds and thousands of the ablest, brightest and noblest men that any country ever produced are working day and night in order to maintain the trade and commerce of this country, to bring the grain from the great West to the seaboard and to bring munitions to the seaboard. I ask you, Mr. Speaker: Are these men going to be conscripted? No, Sir, they will be exempted. Fourth, we have hundreds and thousands of dock labourers at the seaports and lake ports of this Dominion working night and day owing to the scarcity of tonnage in order to assist our soldier boys at the front. Are they going to be conscripted? No, they too will be exempted. Fifth, from the whole world a cry goes up to the terrible menace of the German submarines which are daily and hourly doing their utmost to torpedo and sink the many vessels bringing food and supplies to our Allies and our soldiers. The cry goes up: We must replace these vessels. In the United States and Canada men are toiling night and day to put in operation the many deserted shipyards in order to build new vessels and thereby help our Allies. Can this great work be done by waving a magic wand and without the assistance of labour? Can we find men to build ships if this Bill passes? No, we must have labour, and I ask if these men are going to be conscripted? No, they are not; they must be exempt. A coal controller has been appointed by the Government of the day. Is he going to go down into the bowels of the earth and bring up these miners? In the interests of shipping, of the railways, of our own firesides, it is necessary that we shall have miners remaining in the coal mines. Are these men to be conscripted? No, they will be exempt.

Then, I ask: Whom is this Compulsory Bill going to send to the front to assist our brave volunteers? I have heard hon. gentlemen in this House declaring there are thousands and thousands of young men to be found around the cities, towns and villages in Canada. I have heard it said by the hon. member for Parry Sound the so-called hero of Vimy Ridge who stated he said good bye to hundreds of his men at the front. Why did he leave, what for? Was it to come to this House to raise passion and prejudice against the province of Quebec, and to be acclaimed as a hero by the Minister of Inland Revenue? Are these the men whom we are going to send to the front to protect our brave volunteers? Are the men who go prowling around at night in our towns and villages, night hawks, barroom loafers, horse thieves, gamblers, men whose carcases are loaded down with liquor and who are steeped in debauchery of the most degraded kind—are these the men that this Bill is going to send to protect our noble soldier boys? No, I would sooner let my son meet a soldier's death upon the field of Flanders than that he should be protected by such men and I am not certain but that most of the fathers and mothers of our soldiers would feel the same as I do. I am ashamed of the actions of some of the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House who have chided and derided members of His Majesty's loyal Opposition and who have charged that our opposition to this measure was merely due to partisanship. There is no partisanship about me where the interests of the boys at the front are concerned. The men who say such things about the members of the Opposition know not the feelings of the good, the patriotic, mother, when the glorious news is flashed across this country from the Atlantic to the Pacific of victories at Langemarck or elsewhere, or the anguish which is mingled with her pride, when at the end of the message she reads the words: "Casualties are heavy."

Do some of these gentlemen ever realize the feelings of these patriotic mothers who, when this news is flashed across the Atlantic, lie in their beds at night waiting for the dawn when they shall read the daily press, not to see the fashion plates, not to see the social items, where Sir this or Lady that has been attending some tea party, not to read of the plaudits bestowed upon the eloquence of hon. members in this House; no, but to read the long list of casualties to see if there are included the names of those who are near and dear to them. But with even greater dread do they wait in their humble homes throughout the breadth of Canada for the tinkling of that bell which will bring to their homes that cold, dastardly telegram which emanates from the Militia Department at Ottawa: Regret your son is killed, your son is missing, probably is a prisoner; your son is wounded, lies dangerously ill at clearing station number one or number two. Then, when the poor mother seeks for further information from Ottawa, what is the response? We know nothing more. And yet these men dare to say that the members of His Majesty's loyal Opposition are disloyal to their country. Those are the men who want to send their sons and our sons to stand shoulder to shoulder with a ragged, ruffianly mob collected throughout the streets of our cities under this compulsory measure. What is the cause of this Bill being before the House? It is the cause of the fall of many a man, it is pride. It was pride on the part of the Kaiser that brought on this cruel war, and to-day, Sir, I am sorry to say from my seat in this House that it is pride on the part of the hon. Prime Minister of this Dominion (Sir Robert Borden), a man for whom I personally have the greatest respect, although I am sorry to say I have not much respect for some of his colleagues—but it was pride, I say, on the part of the hon. leader of the Government that led him to launch this Bill before the country, to declare that his party were pledged to it, and they must carry it through this House. It was then, Sir, that he offered the gloved hand of conscription to our honoured leader of His Majesty's loyal Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier).

He said to him: come with me into a Cabinet, let us form a coalition government; we will pass a conscriptive Act in the House and then we will go before the people and ask them to ratify it. But this is not asking them to ratify it, this is dictating to them. Had the right hon. leader of the Government given the ungloved hand of peace, friendship and conciliation to him who has devoted his life to upholding the national honour and unity of Canada, had he given the ungloved hand of friendship and conciliation to him, even at this late stage, and said to him: come with me down to my native province, come with me down to the sea, let us stand in the old historic town of Halifax shoulder to shoulder appealing to the people for recruits to assist our boys at the front; then come down with me through the towns and villages of Nova Scotia, down through New Brunswick, over to Prince Edward Island, and then on to the old province of Quebec; bring with you from the Liberal party your leading men; they are true Canadians, Canadians who love the grand old Union Jack, that flag of which we Canadians are so proud, that flag which has brought to us liberty and justice, —bring with you true loyal Canadians, men who love Great Britain, who love the Empire, bring them to the province of Quebec, bring them to the old city of Quebec, and there united, standing upon the pedestal of that monument which overlooks the St. Lawrence—the noblest monument that is to be found in the world to-day, that monument erected to the victor and the vanquished, that monument erected to the heroic deeds of Wolfe and Montcalm, that monument whose every stone speaks peace, unity, conciliation—let us stand together around that monument, Liberals and Conservatives, Englishmen and Frenchmen, Catholics and Protestants, and rally around us the youth, the strength and the manhood of that province; then let us continue on to the metropolis of Montreal, on to the golden fields of Ontario, even on to the Pacific coast. I will venture to say, Sir, from my seat in this House, that had this been done, before the snow shall whiten Canadian ground, we should have hundreds and thousands of good and true volunteers to assist our boys at the front. But with a compulsory Act, I say the snows will come and the snows will go, and the boys will still be waiting at the front to hear the tread of those so-called men who are to be enlisted under this compulsory measure.

Mr. Speaker, I regret that I have detained this House so long. We are now upon the eve of celebrating the glorious festival of the fiftieth anniversary of Confederation, and I trust and hope that there can be found men in this country who will yet unite the different classes and creeds throughout Canada so that we can show a united front on the fiftieth anniversary of the foundation of Confederation.

Mr. Speaker, so far as I am concerned, there are but two words, vox populi.

Mr. P. MICHAUD (Victoria, N.B.): It is not my intention to dwell at great length on this important measure. There never was such an important Bill before this House since Confederation, and although all the ground has been practically well covered, it is my duty to make a few remarks on this subject. We have noticed all through this country great agitation, and from the information we have it is only fair to say that this measure will not be accepted without much discussion. What will be the consequence if this Government undertakes to pass this Act without authority from the Canadian nation? I remember the definition of government by Washington. He said: "Government is not reason, it is not eloquence, it is force. Like fire, it is a dangerous master. Never for a moment should it be left to irresponsible action. I will add to irresponsible party."

We notice in Canada the busy rich class urging strongly upon this Government the passing of this measure of conscription, the conscription of manhood. And what has the right hon. leader of this House done to keep his friends from agitating so strongly such a drastic measure? In England and in New Zealand they could never have had conscription of manhood unless they had conscripted wealth to a large extent.

At the beginning of the war a special session was called by the present Government; members from beyond the Rockies to the Atlantic, from both parties, left their homes to attend. The whole Canadian nation was well represented at that important session. We voted on that occasion, without a word of dissent, $50,000,000, and, since that date, we have voted hundreds of millions of dollars. As the country knows, we have fully performed our duty, for all we want is to win the war. In none of the British colonies was a conscription Bill adopted without first having consulted the people, or without having taken the precaution to consult both political parties, before introducing such a measure. In this House we have the leader of the Government conducting the business of the war without, to my knowledge, having taken the trouble on any occasion, except one, to ask the members of the Opposition to co-operate with the supporters of the Government in endeavouring to find a solution of this question. The Government had all the money required to carry on the war. During the three years' struggle many millionaires have been created in Canada. People of all classes are taxed heavily under the changed tariff, and we are now in this position: not only have we loaded upon the Canadian people a burden, which has already caused some disturbance in many centres, but we are going to pass conscription on manhood, without consulting the electors of this country. The labourers who are absolutely required to work in the manufacture of munitions have asked for a referendum. The fishermen who have to supply the fish to the country and to the Allies also desire a referendum. The farmer, who has to supply grain and meat in order to carry this war to a successful issue, has made the same request.

At the request of my constituents, I am asking this Government to trust the Canadian nation and to have a referendum on the question of conscription. But the members of the Government of this country will not trust any one but themselves. And what will be the result? We have at the head of this Government politicians who are too partisan to carry on successfully the administration of the affairs of this country. How easy it would have been for the right hon. leader of the House, from the beginning of the war, to have taken the whole Canadian nation into his confidence. On the advice of his colleagues, he lost the opportunity of making himself the leader of the nation. Had the Prime Minister called our leader to his councils at the beginning of the war, no such drastic measure would be before us at the present time. The whole country would have been protected from the action of the speculators, moneys voted for war expenditures would have been more evenly divided, the breadwinners of the country would pay a reasonable price for their daily bread, and harmony would reign amongst all classes. The labourer would be better satisfied, the farmer would be paid more for his products, because no middlemen or speculators would share the profits on the products, for both these classes would have disappeared. The cry is: "Produce more" and the speculator says, "Let me buy more, let me put more products into the cold storage, and fix a price for those products which will suit me."

I may be asked: What has this to do with the Bill before the House? The Government refused to trust the people of the country, for the reason that the Government have imposed upon the people; and consequently the party in power has every reason to be afraid of its master. I will not hesitate to take into my confidence the people who have sent me here to represent them. Why not trust those who have elected you? If you are afraid of them, that goes to show that you have not fulfilled your duties in connection with this war. Sooner or later we shall have to give an account of our conduct in this House, and I, for one, will not hesitate to tell the electors of my constituency that, on a measure such as the one before us, I have not refused to consult them.

The people of this country have lost confidence in the present Government and the supporters of the Administration have also lost confidence in the people, and that is the reason why the Government refused to submit to the people, for their approval, the greatest measure ever presented to the House.

Agricultural colleges and universities in the United States are taking part in a plan for a national mobilization of food production. It is alleged in the Review of Reviews that food production in the United States is not keeping pace with the increase of population, and also with the increased demand for food. It refers to Canada and Western Europe as being countries where the production of food is reduced, yet their own capacity in that direction is their strongest war asset. This capacity of food production is almost certain, however, to be reduced even below the level of positive need, by any system of indiscriminate enlistment from the farm, with no plan for labour replacement. There must, therefore, be enlistment for food production, as a part of any military plan of mobilization, and such enlistment must be as definite as enlistment for service at the front. The American universities and colleges are looking to the War Department to protect the food production as vigorously as it protects any other means of national defence. What have we done to assure the farmers in Canada that in future, and as long as the war lasts, the production of food will be fully looked after? Canada is the granary of the British Empire, and means to make its fields productive to the fullest extent should not be neglected. If we need more men at the front, we also need more men on farms, and the problem which the nation at large should be called upon to decide is as to whether or not more good can be done by supplying more food to the Allies or more men. We have heard members in this House say the people should be led. Yes, this is true, but not led when not one of us in this Chamber has a mandate to lead them. Explain the position of the country to your constituents. Let them know the importance of winning the war; make an appeal to their sound judgment, and you will have, in return, a reply which will convince you that they realize, as much as any of us, the importance of winning the war.

It is my most sincere conviction that they who have been bearing the burden of the high cost of living, and who have sent their sons overseas in humanity's cause, will continue to make sacrifices without being compelled to do so under the Bill now before the House. Let us, with one mind, devote ourselves to the winning of the war. Let us be a united people, having only one purpose in view.

Two-thirds of the population of New Brunswick are English-speaking, and one-third French Acadian and French Canadian, yet in that province the people are one. There are no difficulties between the French and the English-speaking peoples, because we understand and respect one another. The majority of the people are not following the advice received a few weeks ago from somewhere in Ontario. The English-speaking Canadians in New Brunswick know that the French-speaking Canadians and Acadians are doing their full duty. Like our English-speaking friends, we have our history. To the history of Canada we have contributed many pages, which are read at the firesides of our French Canadian people, who shed tears as they read. My ancestors became British subjects about two centuries ago; to-day their descendants willingly form part of the great army of the Allies in the fight for freedom and liberty. The French Acadians and French Canadians in New Brunswick have enlisted in good numbers. What is the trouble with the highly-paid political campaign writers in Ontario who are sending to New Brunswick literature similar to that which is being used against the province of Quebec? I ask my friends on the other side of the House to stop sending that seditious literature, for we want to continue to respect one another; we want to continue to work together for the one great purpose of winning the war.

My masters in politics are the electors in the section of Canada which I represent, and the result of their decision through the medium of a referendum on this question shall be my guide in respect to such an important measure as that which is now before the House.

Mr. E. W. TOBIN (Richmond and Wolfe): Mr. Speaker, as I do not wish to give a silent vote on this important question, I ask the indulgence of the House while I state my views with regard to it.

The life of the present Parliament has now expired, and the present Government and their followers do not represent the will of the people. The introduction of conscription involves a constitutional change such as was never even dreamed of by the people of Canada when electing their representatives at Ottawa—to say nothing of the fact that the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) and other members of the Government have repeatedly stated that it was not the intention to introduce conscription. The introduction of conscription by the Prime Minister is a step towards autocracy and kaiserism and away from democracy. The Canadian boys at the front are fighting against autocracy and kaiserism and for the principles of democracy.

What objection can there be to an appeal to the people, the true masters in all such cases, but particularly in this one? Are the present Government afraid of the people? And if they are afraid of the people, is it because they believe that the people will vote down conscription? If that is their belief, their sole aim in adopting conscription without a referendum is to impose upon the people something they do not want. If that is not autocracy and kaiser rule, I would like to know what it is.

One of the grounds upon which the Prime Minister proposed coalition to the leader of the Opposition was that conscription should be passed first and that the Government should go to the people afterwards. Why should they go to the people after the passing of conscription? Do you not think it would have been proper for the Prime Minister to approach the leader of the Opposition before announcing to the House and to the country that he intended to introduce conscription? But no; like all autocrats, he proposes his policy, and then says: You must do as I say, or there will be no coalition.

If the Prime Minister had had his heart in the winning of the war, should he not have united the two great parties in this country by calling upon the leader of the Opposition before he went to England, or even at the outbreak of the war? If he had done this, he would have had the co-operation of the leader of the Opposition and of the whole Liberal party since the beginning of the war. I can assure you that if that had been done, many blunders and much muddling would have been avoided. The right hon. leader of the Opposition and the Liberal party have shown, by their co-operation with the Government, by voting large credits and otherwise, that their heart is in the winning of the war. But they cannot be asked to go so far as to allow the people's money to be squandered and the public treasury to be looted. That is not in the interests of Canada or of the British Empire; nor is it the proper way to win the war. In order to win the war you have to keep Canada strong financially, agriculturally, industrially and economically, as well as strong in arms at the front.

I believe that the Government have failed in all of these points. I believe that the financing of the Finance Minister (Sir Thomas White)), borrowing money in Canada, when he could have got it as cheap or at a cheaper rate outside of Canada, is bad from every point of view. If the policy of borrowing outside of Canada had been followed, we to-day should have $300,000,000 more money in Canada than we actually have, and we should be that much stronger economically. The taxation imposed by the Finance Minister is unfair, because it tends to kill industries and to discourage the investment of capital, instead of to tax the incomes of those who receive the profits earned by companies.

No action was taken by the present Government to assist the farmers, except very recently, when for political purposes they introduced their free wheat resolution and told the farmers that they were going to arrange for agricultural credits. In my opinion, this was done, not for the purpose of assisting in the war, but for the purpose of helping the Conservative party. It was only when they thought that a general election was imminent that they brought in the free wheat resolution.

The Government have not kept Canada strong industrially. They have taxed industries in such a way as to cripple them and to prevent capital from being invested in this country. In addition to that, they have driven thousands of dollars outside of Canada for investment in foreign countries. Speaking from an economic standpoint, I say that the Government have done nothing to control the foodstuffs. They have done nothing to control the profits that were made by munition workers. They have done nothing to save in time of war; they have gone ahead with lavish expenditures not only for war purposes, but for every purpose that would tend to assist the Conservative party.

The methods followed up to the present in the matter of voluntary enlistment have taken from agriculture and other industries—including mining, the distribution of coal, and forestry exploitation—the quality and quantity of workmen of which these vital industries have absolute need. In consequence, we have the present high cost of living. If a measure of selective conscription had been adopted at the beginning of the war and applied with intelligence, it would have been somewhat of a remedy; but at present the adoption of conscription to increase the size of an army raised by voluntary enlistment can only make matters worse.

Some weeks before the entrance of the United States into the war the Government found it so necessary to fill the wide gaps in the agricultural army that it launched an appeal to the American workmen. This appeal was published in more than 700 American papers. The Government estimated at 70,000 the number of Agricultural workers that it was necessary to bring at any price from the United States. At the moment of the declaration of war by the President, 700 Americans or thereabouts had responded to Canada's appeal. Unfortunately, the authorities at Washington have put a sharp end to this drain on American manhood, and the agricultural army of Canada has not the 60,000 recruits which the Government judges it is absolutely necessary to have to allow us to produce on Canadian soil the food for which England has so pressing a need.

Comparing the military effort of Canada with those of England and France, we have actually in Europe or in training camps in Canada, 420,000 soldiers besides those in auxiliary service. If we estimate the population of Canada at the beginning of the war at 7,000,000 people, we have enrolled six per cent of our population for the European conflict. This is equivalent to an army of 2,400,000 for France, and 2,700,000 for the United Kingdom. Now, in spite of these figures on paper, England has not yet sent to France, in the two years and ten months of the war, this number of men. If we measure our military effort by the number of population, the figures of the effectives and the cost of the armies, the comparison is most striking. Canada has spent for its army three times more per soldier than England, and four times more than France. If we take into account the difference in the wages, pensions, transports, etc., these figures are modest. We must, therefore, multiply by four the corresponding figures attributed to France, and by three those attributed to England. Therefore, the cost of the actual army to Canada is equal to what it would have cost England for an army of 8,100,000, and France for an army of 9,600,000. This is more than our two Mother Countries would put into the field if the war should last five years. Now France and England are, apart from the United States, two of the richest nations in the world to-day, and Canada is one of the poorest.

In my opinion the Government have not done what they should have done for the encouragement of voluntary enlistment, and I would refer you to General Sir Sam Hughes' statement to this effect when he said that some months previous to his getting out of the Borden Cabinet, recruiting was not being encouraged, and if you will refer to a return laid on the table of the House, you will see that only $3,996 was spent for recruiting in Quebec, whereas in Ontario $18,544 was spent. As a matter of fact, no appeal for recruits was made throughout Quebec by the Conservative-Nationalist party. The first recruiting meeting held at St. Hyacinthe, a city of from 12,000 to 15,000 inhabitants, was held by General Lessard and the Postmaster General (Mr. Blondin) only a few weeks ago. The same can be said of many parts of Quebec where on many occasions the only recruiting officers that visited the French districts were Engish-speaking officers, who did not possess a word of French; in fact, the matter is so notorious that one can come to no other conclusion than that a deliberate attempt has been made to ostracize Quebec in order to allow the Conservative party to raise the race cry once more, and appeal to the English-speaking people against the French-speaking people.

I have the honour of representing a constituency composed, in a large part, of French Canadians, and no truer or more loyal people to the British Empire live in this Dominion. They have been educated to believe that Canada is their country; they are proud of the liberties they enjoy under British rule and under the Union Jack, and they are not deserving of the attacks that have been made upon them by the Conservative party and the Conservative press.

I said a moment ago that I thought that this policy was for the purpose of creating a feeling between the English speaking and the French-speaking people of this country. Allow me to say that I believe that the Conscription Bill was introduced for another purpose, namely; that of creating an election cry that would allow the Conservative party to appeal to the passions and prejudices of the English-speaking people of this country; and, Sir, if you want proof of this, read the Military Service Bill as introduced, and you will see that it is an appeal for party purposes, and not for conscription. Because the law as it stands is not enforceable, and I do not believe it was ever intended to be enforced, but was drafted simply for the purpose of creating a division among the people of this country. In an issue of this kind the question is: Are the people to rule, or are they to be ruled by Sir Robert Borden? There should be no question of race or language, and there is no need of raising what is popularly known as the race cry. The simple issue is: Should not this question be referred, by a Parliament that has been dead and buried for a year past, to the people of Canada for their verdict? Present the facts to the people and allow them to vote " yes " or " no " to conscription. The only way the question can be made one of race or creed is by the politicians making it one, because it is a pure question of the will of the people of this country, and one that is to be decided by the people and no one else. Why cannot the people of this country, although they are not all of English origin, decide this issue in the same way as the people of Australia, who are all English-speaking, and of British descent, have done? When they were called upon to decide this issue it was not a question of race or creed, but a question simply of whether the people of Australia were to change from voluntary enlistment, which they had adopted from Great Britain itself, to conscription. That is the issue here, and not one of race or creed.

Many people who are attacking the province of Quebec forget that the French Canadians were abandoned on the shores of the St. Lawrence river over three hundred years ago, and, although subsequently their colony was ceded to England, from the days of their abandonment to the present time they have looked to this country as their only country and their only home, not only professing loyalty, but showing their loyalty on many occasions by taking up arms on behalf of their new King. They remained always loyal, always good Canadians, always good British subjects, until the Nationalists and Conservatives started preaching the doctrine that French Canadians owed nothing to Great Britain. Nationalist eloquence and Conservative gold had its effect in the teaching of this doctrine, and in 1911 twenty odd candidates were returned from Quebec, elected on the doctrine that they owed nothing to England, or to the British Empire, and when you take into consideration the fact that in the recruiting that has been carried on Quebec has been purposely neglected and isolated, and nothing has been done to undo the harm that was done by the Nationalist-Conservative party, it is little wonder that volunteering has not been so enthusiastic in that province as in some of the others.

Before the Government propose conscription to the House it should place before the House and the country the full facts of the situation. They should let us know what is required for the production of food, for munition factories, for transportation, for the carrying on of coal operations and to keep all the great industries of this country going. They should let us know what the effect will be upon Canada itself if more men are taken out of this country, and give all the facts with regard to the requirements of men, not only at the front, but in keeping this country a strong live part of the British Empire in order that it may continue to do its proper part in this great war for democracy. Then when we have all these facts and figures we can, as sensible business men, decide as to what should be done. Let us see that there is no leaping in the dark—no more doing things first and thinking afterwards. Let us think, this time, before taking such a step as the introduction of conscription in this country. Let us think first and act afterwards, and I am convinced that no matter where these facts lead us, the people of this country will do what is best for the winning of the war. For these reasons I will vote against the Bill and support and vote for the amendment of my leader, and I will vote against the sub-amendment of the hon. member for Berthier (Mr. Barrette).

Mr. MEDERIC MARTIN (Saint Mary's, Montreal): Mr. Speaker, I must prelude my remarks with thanking the hon. member for Maskinongé (Mr. Bellemare) for giving me his turn so as to permit me to leave tomorrow to attend to my duties in the great metropolis.

For nearly nine days both sides of the House have been discussing the most important question which has risen since Confederation.

I have the honour, Mr. Speaker, of speaking on behalf of a population of 700,000 souls, which is more than several other members of this House can say.

Religious and racial questions have been mooted and insults hurled about. I may say that if there is one who has been insulted, besides the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), it is your humble servant, the mayor of Montreal, since he is a public man.

Allow me, Mr. Speaker, to explain and place the responsability where it belongs for what is now occurring in our province, and especially in the city of Montreal.

In 1911, when came the federal elections, there was a compact between three persons. One is now deceased, and I regret to mention here the name of Hon. Mr. Monk; the others are Mr. Bourassa and Mr.——

A great meeting was held in the village of Saint Eustache. I was not on the platform, but with the crowd in attendance, and if anybody then insulted the British flag, the Prime Minister of to-day and the prime minister of that time (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), they were those three gentlemen. They had undertaken to preach one policy in the province of Quebec and another in the West.

Their plan has succeeded. They went all over the different counties of the province of Quebec and deceived the electorate to such an extent that the former Prime Minister, who is now leader of the Opposition was defeated and twenty-two candidates supported by these three gentlemen were elected to this House with a mandate which they had never expected. Such was the compact.

After being insulted, as was the present Prime Minister, by these three gentlemen, including Mr. Monk and Mr. Bourassa, what happened the very next day? The portfolio of Public Works, the most important of the Borden Cabinet, was given to Mr. Monk, which well proves what I have just said.

Hon. Mr. Pelletier, to-day Judge Pelletier, for whom I have the highest consideration, and other honourable members on the other side of the House have mentioned the name of Mr. Armand Lavergne. Mr. Pelletier at the time was bowing low to Mr. Lavergne who was then but a young man, and was calling him his leader; yet here was he the very next day accepting the portfolio of Postmaster General. All the others went to the Government side. My hon. friend knows something of it; he well knows what happened in the province of Quebec.

Now, Sir, when you see such things, and others still worse, for I will show the means taken to deceive the people—I am not at all surprised at what is happening to-day in the province of Quebec.

Since Confederation, the Conservative party has always resorted to insult and has always had recourse to a double-faced policy; one for the province of Quebec and the other for the province of Ontario.

It was said in the province of Quebec when I was a boy, for I am concerned in elections since I am ten years old, that Sir Wilfrid Laurier was a traitor to his race, that he had sold Canada to England; they said in the West that Sir Wilfrid Laurier was not enough of an Imperialist, but a papist and the champion of Quebec only.

I have no hesitation in stating that those responsible for what is happening to-day are the Conservative Government and the twenty-two members who had the honour to be sent here, but who never heeded their mandate.

It was said in this House, Sir, that the province of Quebec was not loyal to the British flag, and that we have not done our duty.

There are two ways to solve the problem which is now submitted to us: We have to decide if our contribution must be in money, if we have to pay the toll of blood in sending men overseas or if our contribution will be by sending supplies to the Allies.

The city of Montreal alone, and if I speak here, it is in consequence of a resolution adopted by the city council of Montreal, dated June 5, 1917, and worded as follows:

Copy of the minute of proceedings of the special meeting of the Montreal Municipal Council, held on Tuesday, June 5, 1917.

The order of the day having been read for the consideration of a notice of motion by Alderman Mayrand on the question of conscription, are submitted and read: (a) A communication from His Honour the mayor, transmitting a letter from Mr. D. C. Houlé, secretary of a citizens' league re conscription; (b) petitions from Montreal citizens objecting to conscription for the oversea service.

Alderman Mayrand moves, seconded by Alderman Vandelac:

That the members of this council have always been of the opinion that Canada should do its full duty towards the triumph of the Empire and of the Allied powers; but they believe likewise that it is their duty to oppose any conscription scheme under whatever form it may be introduced, as long as it shall not have been approved by the people of Canada by means of a plebiscite, and to declare that the enforcing of the Militia Act or of all other conscription laws, far from reaching the object in view, would create throughout the country a useless perturbation and would prevent us from supplying the Empire and the Allies with all essentials needed for the prosecution of the war;

That copy of the present resolution be sent to Sir Robert Borden, Prime Minister of Canada, and to Sir Wilfrid Laurier, leader of the Opposition;

That His Honour the Mayor, Mr. Médéric Martin, M.P., be respectfully requested to submit the present resolution to the Federal authorities, together with the various petitions which have been sent to the Council, on this subject.

And, a discussion having ensued,

Alderman O'Connell moves, seconded by Alderman Blumenthal:

That the council now adjourns.

The council divided upon the said motion, as follows:

[Mr. M. Martin.]

For: O'Connell, Ward, Blumenthal, Macdonald, Weldon—5.

Against: Larivière, Turcot, Mayrand, Ménard, Vandelac, Houlé, Elie, Dubeau, Lamarre, Brodeur, Lafortune, Bédard—12.

And it is rejected.

And a discussion ensuing,

Alderman Ward moves, seconded by Alderman O'Connell:

Whereas the question now before the council is now the subject of the most serious attention of both political parties in Ottawa and that any intervention on the part of this council might be interpreted as a lack of confidence in the House of Commons and the Senate;

That the discussion of the motion now before the council be suspended until the Federal authorities shall have passed upon the question.

The said amendment being put, it was lost on division:

For: O'Connell, Ward, Blumenthal, Macdonald, Weldon—5.

Against: Larivière, Turcot, Mayrand, Ménard, Vandelac, Houlé, Elie, Dubeau, Lamarre, Brodeur, Lafortune, Bédard—12.

The main motion being put, it was carried, on division.

For: Larivière, Turcot, Mayrand, Ménard, Vandelac, Houlé, Elie, Dubeau, Lamarre, Brodeur, Lafortune, Bédard—12.

Against: O'Connell, Ward, Blumenthal, Macdonald, Weldon—5

Resolved: In consequence.

(Certified.)

(Signed) J. Crépeau,
Deputy Clerk of the City.

This resolution, Mr. Speaker, was adopted by a vote of 12 to 5; there was an amendment to adjourn moved by alderman O'Connell who, though not opposing conscription, wanted to delay the question in order to allow the two political parties of this country to decide the question, and he further stated that the adoption of such a resolution would be likely to hurt them to a great extent. It is said that Montreal, as well as the whole province of Quebec, generally, have not done their duty in the present war. I will take the liberty to mention to you the fact that we have adopted, since the beginning of the war, more than thirty resolutions, and the first, adopted by the Board of Commissioners and sanctioned by the Council, is good evidence we have done our duty. We have done, twenty-four hours after the war resolution, what the Government had not done and also what the Council of the Queen city of Toronto had not done. On August 4, 1914, when I saw that England was at war, as well as France, I submitted to the Board of Commissioners the following suggestion:

Resolution of August 5, 1914, with a view to pay half-salary to the families of the permanent employees who have left to defend their country.

I considered that the half-pay alone was not sufficient, and I did not weary. On the 17th of the same month, I went back before my colleagues and I had them adopt the following resolution:

Resolution of August 17, 1914, with a view to amend the resolution of August 5, 1914, so as to allow the payment of the salary in full.

That is what has been the attitude of the Montreal City Council, of those who represent the ideals of the people of Montreal, and would any one be right in coming to tell us that we have done nothing.

By means of thirty resolutions we have spent since the beginning of the war $7,580,791.51, distributed as follows.

Resolution dated October 5, 1914, granting $1,500 for ten beds in an hospital organized in Paris for the care of wounded soldiers.

Resolution dated October 5, 1914, granting $10,000 to the Belgian Fund.

Resolution dated November 24, 1914, granting $10,000 to the French National Fund.

Resolution dated August 28, 1914, advising the city council to vote $150,000 for the Patriotic Fund.

That amount was in answer to the first request we received for a contribution.

Resolution dated September 3, 1914, calling upon the municipal servants to subscribe to the Patriotic Fund—An amount of $12,509.39 was subscribed on that occasion.

Resolution dated March 8, 1915, advising the city council to grant an additional sum of $50,000 to give help to the unemployed labourers.

Resolution dated May 3, 1915, recommending a grant of $1,000 to the Montenegro Benevolent Fund.

Resolution dated May 18, 1915, recommending a grant of $5,000 in favour of the Red Cross Fund .

Resolution dated October 19, 1915, inviting the municipal servants to help the Red Cross Fund. The amount subscribed on that occasion was $8,323.13.

Resolution dated November 12, 1915, to raise to $10,000 our contribution to the Red Cross Fund.

Resolution dated November 23, 1915, granting $5,000 to the Khaki League.

Resolution dated January 26, 1916, inviting the municipal servants to subscribe to the Patriotic Fund. This subscription amounted to $16,462.29.

Resolution dated February 12, 1916, granting $300,000 for the Patriotic Fund, and towards helping several public benevolent associations.

From this grant $250,000 went to the Patriotic Fund and $50,000 to the Benevolent Associations.

Everybody knew at the time that there was no employment to be found in Montreal. The wives of the soldiers that had enlisted were starving and we had to vote the money to help them. How many people have I seen lining up in front of my office, every morning! Hundreds of mothers told me that they could do nothing to save their children from starvation. Is there any justification, Sir, for the charge that the province of Quebec has been lacking in patriotism?

Resolution dated March 18, 1916, recommending a grant of $25,000 to the St. Vincent de Paul Society.

I must state that that Society had never before applied for help from the city.

Resolution dated March 25, 1916, granting $10,000 to the Charity Organization Society of Montreal.

We have here, Mr. Speaker, the undeniable proof that we, the French Canadians of the Metropolis make no racial nor religious distinctions. We make a fair distribution of the grants and we see to it that equal justice is dealt to all deserving parties.

Resolution dated May 9, 1916, granting $4,000 to the Baron de Hirsch Institute and the Hebrew Benevolent Society.

Another proof, Mr. Speaker, that we are giving fair treatment to all people. A large number of Hebrew citizens were in such a plight that they could not provide their families with the necessaries of life. You know as well as I do, Mr. Speaker, that those people, as a rule, are not poor; they generally have fairly large amounts to their credit. But this time they had been caught napping.

I feel it my duty, on this occasion to offer my hearty congratulations to Mr. Beaubien, mayor of Outremont, and a brother of the hon. Senator Beaubien. He foresaw that a good many of our soldiers who are fighting for liberty, will come back blind and with the co-operation of the Grey Nuns, he laid the foundations of an institution in which those maimed heroes will find work and the means of making a living for themselves and their families. The Government had nothing to do with that organization; they could not think of everything.

It is often said that enlistments, in the province of Quebec, have not been satisfastory. What was the duty of the Government before proceeding to enlist our young men? I am speaking of the Canadians from the whole Dominion. For my part, I maintain that before enlisting our married men the Government should have provided for their wives and children; they should have provided for the wives of the soldiers a sufficient allowance for their maintenance and the maintenance and education of their children; they should have seen to it that the families of those soldiers who suffer a glorious death on the battle field, will not live in dire poverty till the end. The Government have done nothing to that end.

Hon. gentlemen have no idea of the number of complaints that come to me every day, as mayor of Montreal. Poor women come to my office and tell me that the head of the family has been killed and that they do not get a single dollar for the blood that has been generously poured in defence of the common cause.

Let me take up once more the list of the grants voted to help the various organizations in Montreal:

Resolution dated March 27, 1917, granting $1,500 to the association "Help to the Blind."
Resolution dated March 27, 1917, granting $2,500 to the "Comité de Culture."
Resolution dated June 8, 1917, granting $5,000 (budget of 1918) to the Overseas Campaign Fund of Y.M.C.A.
Budget of 1917. British Sailors' Club, $20,000.
Budget of 1917. Red Cross Society, $12,000, payable at the rate of $1,000 a month.
Contributions of the municipal servants, for 1917 (approximatively), $7,000.
To the deputation "Bonne Enterte," $86.50.
War Relief Fund, $10, $74, $140, $66.
For works on draining canals that were not urgent, but were executed to help the large army of unemployed, approximatively, $5,000,000.

Our contribution, to date, amounts to over $7,000,000. We have also voted one million dollars for the Patriotic Fund. I regret that my hon. friend for St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames) is not at his seat. He would bear testimony to the generosity and geniality with which the city of Montreal has answered every call for the Patriotic Fund. In justice for all interested parties I must say that this fund is well administered, notwithstanding the efforts of certain newspapers to cast discredit on those who have charge of its administration. In my capacity of Mayor of Montreal, I state positively that all the monies, to the last cent, have been judiciously and honestly distributed. It is hard work to stop the people from talking. There will always be found some one inclined to hurt his neighbour. As far as money is concerned, I have no hesitation to say that we have done more than any other province of the Dominion, in proportion to our wealth and our population.

On a certain date, in compliance with the wishes of the Imperial authorities, the Lieutenant Governor, Sir Evariste Leblanc, invited the province to organize a Tag Day for the benefit of the Red Cross. He asked me to take charge of the organization in the city of Montreal and do you know, Mr. Speaker, what was the result of a single day—eight hours—in the city of Montreal? We collected, in round numbers, no less than $93,000. Does not that compare favorably with what has been done by certain large contributors? The hon. member for St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames) told us last night, that certain big corporations had given $200,000; but remember that in eight hours time the workingman took nearly $100,000 out of his pocket. Is there not more generosity in this contribution of the workingman, than in the subcriptions of big corporations who—as it was explained last night by the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Verville) by several newspapers before that—made up for their losses by a cut of 20 per cent in the salaries of their staff? They have been generous at the expense of the workingman. There is no sense in reproaching Quebec with having failed to do her duty, and having exhibited a lack of loyalty to the British flag. We have constantly submitted to insults. You can have the proof of what I am saying, Mr. Speaker, by referring to Hansard, page 288, 229 and 707, Vol. I 1910-11, and pages 3219 and 3329, Vol. II of the same session. There you will find what the ex-Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes) said concerning the French Canadian clergy. We all remember what happened in this House, concerning the Eucharistic Congress, one night that a Catholic bishop was in the gallery.

We are bound to respect all creeds, and when insult is offered to what the French Canadian holds nearest to his heart, his religion, that is not calculated to promote harmony between the various elements of our population.

In spite of all that, Mr. Speaker, in spite of all which has been said against us, we are just and fair.

In the administration of the city of Montreal, we have Englishmen, we have Irishmen, we have Jews, we have all kinds of nationalities.

When I came into power, as mayor, two hundred policemen had to be engaged. One of the conditions I imposed was that the policemen should have a knowledge of both languages, not perfectly, but enough, so that when a tourist would ask for some information, these policemen would be able to furnish it, for every one knows that when a stranger visits a city and needs some information, he generally applies to the policemen. They must therefore speak both languages.

Do you know what happened to me?

The first one which I had to swear in, when I asked him if he had paid any money to get his position and put him a few other questions in French, started to cry, saying he could not understand a single word.

You can see in what a plight I was. I thought that if I refused him, I would be charged with discriminating between the English and the French Canadians, so I turned around and said to him: "Here, my boy, go back to the chief, take your uniform, I allow you three months' delay, and you come back to me three months hence to satisfy me that you are able to say a few words in French."

That was three years ago. He never came back to me, but later when I inquired about him from the chief, the latter declared: "He is the best man we have on the force."

A month and a half later, being obliged to swear in a new man, a French Canadian, who could not speak a word of English, I dismissed him, I refused to accept him.

Take our department, for instance; we have many which are split in two, in order to do justice to the English population. In the Parks department, there are two superintendents. Why? We could get along with only one. It was to be fair to the English speaking population. The Mountain Park superintendent is Mr. Henderson, and the various other parks are under the direction of Mr. Bernadet. In the various departments, even justice is dealt out.

In every department, we strive to be fair to all. Why do they not act the same way in Ontario? My own opinion is that they deliberately will not do it. Should we not live in harmony and help one another as brothers? Everybody remembers that, some three or four years ago, in a certain city of Ontario, there was only one French Canadian policeman, a Mr. Lambert, and he was discharged.

Mr. Speaker. when the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) was speaking in this House, two or three days ago, referring to the Prime Minister who was asking the hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) to form a Coalition Cabinet, with the object of having the French Canadians of the province of Quebec submit to the conscription law, did he not ask the Government to employ five or six of the most influential Ontario men in travelling over this province and in urging the population to discontinue the campaign of slander and abuse against the province of Quebec? No, I repeat it, as to the animosity which exists between these two provinces, we are in no wise responsible, we of the province of Quebec, and we do all that we possibly can to maintain the Bonne Entente.

Do you want another example? Every one knows that, very recently, a Bonne Entente delegation came to Montreal and afterwards visited the different other most important towns of the province of Quebec. In Montreal, this delegation was the object of an official reception, and we spared nothing to receive it well. What happened? In a small municipality, it had been thought fit to pass a vote of thanks to the mayor, but the same courtesy was not extended to the mayor of the Canadian metropolis. We have also had the visit of the Win-the-War delegation, the city council voted a sum of $2,500 for the good work undertaken by these gentlemen. Have we not done in Quebec all that we should do?

Now, some are surprised that Quebec does not enlist. To show that the hon. Prime Minister has not kept his word, although I must repeat what was said by the hon. leader of the Opposition, I will quote the words he said on January 17, 1917:

"I therefore asked the Prime Minister to positively state whether, yes or no, we would have conscription. Put into such a fix, my right hon. friend replied—here is his answer, when I asked him if his offer of 500,000 soldiers meant conscription, or not:

"My right hon. friend has spoken of conscription, of the idea entertained in this country or elsewhere that conscription might exist in Canada. Speaking during the first two or three months of the war, I have clearly had the Canadian people to understand that we did not intend to establish conscription. I again declare it explicitly."

This is not all, Mr. Speaker. Referring to the law which is now before this House, if we consult "La Presse" of December 7. 1916, we will find the words which were uttered, before an audience of 2,500 to 3,000 people, by the Prime Minister when a reception was given him in the Monument National in Montreal; we will be in a better position to see what kind of a man is the Prime Minister who to-day wants to impose such a brutal law. I understand that in the course of a year, circumstances may be altered; but I will point out that this reception was given on December 7, 1916, not more than six months ago. We shall see what say these so-called democrats who pretend to safeguard the people's interests, but who, in reality, safeguard the interests of the Empire. I will even say that it is we who take the true interests of this country, by supplying the Allies with both ammunitions and food. Here is then what the Prime Minister said:

"Canada is a State in a larger State, which is the Empire. Our country enjoys the benefits of a constitution which was granted to us fifty years ago, and which was written through the wisdom of the Fathers of the Confederation, men whose names are dear to every Canadian heart, the Macdonalds, the Cartiers, the Browns and the Tuppers.

It is true that there are no more such men on the Government side.

"By keeping within the limits of that Constitution, the people of Canada govern themselves, and every citizen exerts his personal and individual influence, when he is called upon to declare in which way he intends to be governed."

Is that what the Government is proclaiming to-day? That principle, Mr. Speaker, which was advocated in the Monument National, on December 7, 1916, by the Prime Minister, is the very one which the right hon. leader of the Opposition is putting into practice to-day.

"It is a right established conformably to the principles of every democratic government."

I repeat it, Mr. Speaker, is that what the Government wants to-day? The referendum which we are asking in the name of the whole people of Canada, they want to deny it and to impose an arbitrary law. Is not that exactly the condition as in Germany?

I say that it would be a good thing if the taxpayers of the country had the courage to come up here, in Ottawa, and make a clean sweep of the present Government, without injuring them, for no one has the right to do that. That is what should be done with these people who do not respect the Constitution, who do not respect the given word, who indeed do not respect anything, and here I refer most particularly to those members of the province of Quebec who are preaching to-day the very contrary of what they preached in 1911. Is this democracy? No, I claim they are autocrats and nothing else. Can anyone be surprised after all if, today, the province of Quebec turns a deaf ear to the Prime Minister's words?

I continue:

"But every right necessarily imposes a corresponding duty. The State protects the citizens, their person and their property; it sees to the enforcement of the laws and to good administration. Every citizen must, therefore, give a certain sum of service to the State, there never has been and perhaps there never will be an occasion to make that duty more imperative, more necessary, than the one now offered.

"For the Belgian and the French, the occupation of the national territory by the foe, the implacable manifestations of his iron hand, the terror inspired by his devastations constitute the most eloquent plea in favour of the organizing of the national service for every citizen. To us, the need seems more distant, but it is not the less real for all that.

That is what the Prime Minister had said if even, at that time, he had said: gentlemen, the circumstances are such that they compel us to change our minds, Canada is in danger, perhaps our own territory may be invaded by the Germans.

No, Mr. Speaker, never will Canada be invaded by the Germans. We have to protect us the United States, and on the other hand, we have England who will do everything possible to keep us among her colonies because it is her own interest to do so.

Here is what was said by the hon. member for Jacques-Cartier (Mr. Descarries), in reply to the speech from His Excellency the Governor General (See page 15 House of Commons Debates):

> I believe, in any case, Mr. Speaker, and I think I am voicing the opinion of the majority of the hon. members in stating that the constitution of the country forbids sending our soldiers to fight outside of Canada, without special legislation being enacted in this House and that no such legislation altering the very basis of our constitution would be enacted without its being first submitted to the people of Canada. No, Mr. Speaker, there can be no question of conscription. Obligatory enlistment is not needed. The people of Canada have given noble proof of their loyalty. Freely and voluntarily, four hundred thousand men have already answered the call. If they are required, one hundred thousand more will follow of their own free will. And thus the Prime Minister will have given to the Empire and the allied nations a royal and magnificent contribution to restore the peace of the world, which, let us hope, Providence will soon grant to Europe.

That was on January 18, I believe, or the 21st or 22nd. Mr. Speaker, with men who have no longer any mandate, men who are here only by their own will and by that of the Imperial Government, I say that they have not the right, as it suits their fancy, to try and take away the people's liberty, and especially so, after the speech made by the Prime Minister in the Monument National.

It is said and repeated that enlisting has not been a success. In Montreal, they put at the head of recruiting, as stated by my hon. friend the member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) a Protestant minister, a perfectly honest man, I attended the first meeting he held in a theater. The clergy have done all they could. When one considers how the Prime Minister has deceived his Grace the Archbishop of Montreal, about the National Service cards, can one be surprised that no one gives any more credit to the Prime Minister's words? Obviously, the people are incensed, that their own archbishop has not been respected. I regret to be obliged to say this. I concede that a common individual may make a mistake, but when it is the Prime Minister of Canada who, in the space of five or six months, changes his speech several times on the floor of the House. . .

I say that the defeat of that man is not distant. He will perhaps pass the Bill now being considered by this House, there is no doubt it will be adopted by the majority at his back and who do not respect the mandate entrusted to them. I regret to be forced to say this. As stated by the member for Maisonneuve, the workingman is intelligent, but we have our full measure of ills in Montreal, we don't want any thing of this.

Here is where we are at: we have reached the point of having a Government in no wise responsible, having no longer the right to legislate.

On the second of next month, the fiftieth anniversary of Confederation will be celebrated. It is the end of Confederation that is coming, nothing else, if we continue to insult one another. Most frequently, it is the fault of certain newspapers, in order to make a few dollars. I say that if such abuse is continued, if this law is passed, you will have, unfortunately, civil war in this country. We have enough war, enough hardships, without having the Government bring about what they are bringing about to-day.

The Prime Minister has promised 500,000 men to England. He had no right to do so. He should have, at least, consulted his ministers, he should have, at least, consulted the leader of the Opposition; but no, he leaves, he goes to England, he returns; at a given moment, completely changed, the pledged word is broken, there is no more constitution, the people doesn't count. The people can be deceived once, twice, but the third time, they strike hard.

Mr. Speaker, I rely upon the opinion of a clear-sighted man, I refer to the greatest Canadian living, after Sir Wilfrid Laurier (Lord Shaughnessy) a good Irishman, who has received the highest honours which England can bestow upon one of our own. What did he say, when he returned from England: "That if the Government gave 500,000 men, it was calculated to disorganize the country." This interview has been published in the press, therefore I pass over many things. I had promised my hon. friend, the member for Maskinongé (Mr. Bellemare) to speak only ten minutes; I beg his pardon if I am taking advantage of his good nature, but I do not want to resume my seat before having added a few more remarks.

We, of the province of Quebec, we believe we can better serve the interests of the Empire and of the Allies by supplying them with ammunitions and foodstuffs. That is what was stated by Lord Shaughnessey, and if there is a man well informed as to our situation from the economical point of view, he is really the one; for me, he is in Canada the man who knows best. He is at the head of a large institution, the Canadian Pacific, which alone is worth more than the city of Montreal, more than the city of Toronto. Here is a peer of England, who comes to us and declares that, in the interest of the Empire, as well as in the future interest of Canada, our duty is neither more nor less, to supply munitions and to feed the soldiers.

The member for Red Deer (Dr. M. Clark) said the other day that while we were discussing, some one hundred and thirty people had been killed by German bombs and that victuals and munitions intended for the Allies had been sunk, had been sent to the bottom of the sea.

Now, a conference was held most recently in New York city, between Mr. Emile Level, the representative of France, and Mr. Hoover, the United States' representative. England's representative, whose name has been mentioned a few minutes ago, did not attend that conference.

Here follows a report of it:

France's envoy demands a billion bushels of grain.

Emile Level exposes to Mr. Hoover the allied nations' as well as the neutrals' needs.

The task of the United States and of Canada. Our own farmers will have to supply a considerable amount of provisions over and above the ordinary production.

Washington, June 2, 1917.—The Allies, as well as the neutral countries, will need a billion bushels of grain during the next twelve months, besides what their respective countries can produce, according to a detailed statement prepared by Mr. H. C. Hoover, who has been appointed by President Wilson food controller for the United States.

According to Mr. Hoover, the United States and Canada will be called upon to furnish the greater part of this grain which the belligerent and the neutral nations will divide among themselves as follows, always after his own calculations:

	Flour.	Forage.
Great Britain	225,000,000	170,000,000
France	175,000,000	70,000,000
Italy	90,000,000	60,000,000
Belgium and Portugal	50,000,000
Neutrals in Europe.	10,000,000
Other neutrals	5,000,000	116,000,000
	665,000,000	416,000,000

The required quantity of wheat and fodder reaches at present 971,000,444 bushels, but Mr. Hoover asserts it will easily aggregate 1,000,000,000 bushels, as the losses due to the submarine warfare must also be considered.

The approximate figures set down by Mr. Hoover were published following an interview the latter had with Mr. Level, food controller for the French permanent commission. Mr. Level estimated the required needs at 560,000,000 bushels of wheat alone, leaving out the fodder. Forage is just as necessary for the Allies, said Mr. Hoover, as the corn used for bread, because the Allies need it to feed their cavalry horses, their milch-cows and their fat stock.

Naturally, it would be impossible for North America alone to supply all that grain; it should, however, furnish the greater part of it. At all events, this shows us more forcibly than ever the necessity for a strict control of all exports and prices in order to protect our supplies, and the importance of preserving our resources and of avoiding every possible wastage, in order to increase our exports.

The quantity of grain which the United States can afford to send to the Allies, as well as to neutral countries, will be determined by a special committee which will act together with Mr. Hoover. After the purchases have been made, the grain will be distributed among the Allied European nations.

Mr. Hoover already insists in a most forcible way upon the importance of increasing the consumption of vegetables this summer, in order to thereby save a larger part of the nation's stores of meat, corn and sugar.

Well now, Mr. Speaker, I say that we, of the province of Quebec, relying upon the knowledge of the right hon. leader of the Opposition and upon that of Lord Shaughnessy who, by the way, has more knowledge in his little finger than all the members on the other side of the House,—I do maintain that the best way to help the Allies is to increase our production in order to fill the requests made by these commissioners. Do you not think it would be far better to save the Allies from starvation--and starvation may be the indirect cause of the death of thousands and thousands of people—than to send a few more soldiers to the battlefields. I understand that soldiers are needed for the war, but I also understand that the soldiers must be fed. The side to win the final victory will be the one having the largest food supplies. Now, that is the way we, of the province of Quebec, understand our duty, and we consider that we are filling it by supporting the amendment moved by the right hon. leader of the Opposition rather than the Bill now submitted by this Government who want to enlist our people against their will.

I say, moreover, that the amendment proposed by the Nationalists is only a trick and nothing else. I have read in "Le Devoir" that Mr. Laurier was hardly better than Mr. Borden.

[Mr. Martin.]

To the statement made by this moribund Government, as they were designated by the leader of the Opposition--who, I am sure, will be Prime Minister before long—that the Canadian people are in favour of conscription, I answer that they are against it, from the Atlantic to the Pacific. The proof of it, they have been given thirty-six months in order to enlist. Those in favour of conscription are the ones who have no sons and whom this measure will not affect. For instance: the ministers of this Cabinet, of whom six have no children; four others have daughters, but no boys. There might be the Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Sévigny) who has one or two sons, I believe, but they are far too young to go to war.

Mr. BOULAY (Rimouski): Where did the hon. member get his information?

Mr. MARTIN: From good authority. As for yourself, it is true you have fourteen children, but not one of them has yet enlisted. You may have some nephews in the army, but no son of yours.

Who is in favour of the referendum? I aiswer: the people. Now, who are those in favour of conscription? The Montreal Board of Trade, the Government contract-holders and those beyond the age limit.

They want to give women the right to vote. Does anyone believe the women will vote for conscription? I am sure of the contrary.

As I said a few minutes ago, the people of Canada are against conscription and the reason I gave is that, during the thirty-six months which have elapsed since the war broke out, and all those who believed it was their duty to enlist have had all the required time to do it. And the real reason why a referendum is refused, is that the people would declare against compulsory enlistment. Some Ontario and Western newspapers would be in favour of an open vote upon this question, but that would be in order to prevent the people from giving their free opinion. Do you really believe that the farmer, who has not seen fit to induce his son to enlist, would now be disposed to have him sent away forcibly?

As for these gentlemen who have boys, Papa's own boys, who are sent to college until they are 25 or 30 years old, do you believe they will be in favour of conscription, when, for the past thirty-six months, they have not seen fit to advise them to enlist and to go and defend the cause of Liberty? Do you believe that the married women who have, until now, had plenty time to advise their husbands to enlist, do you think they will vote for conscription? I say no, for all those who wanted to get rid of their husbands, have already done so. Do you believe, Mr. Speaker, that the young girls would vote for conscription? The evidence is to the contrary, there have been more weddings than ever during the past four or five months; the young ladies feared conscription and would not let their friends depart. The proof of my statement is in the very Bill itself, which contains a special clause stipulating that young men married. on and after June 11, shall be considered as unmarried.

I declare, Mr. Speaker, that the present Government have not the right to pass such a law because they have no longer any mandate, and I say that you are doing just what Germany is doing. You are a murderous Government, nothing else, and you imitate the Kaiser.

A reproach was made to us, a few moments ago, that the enlisting had not been a success. I say that the Government should not have permitted those moving pictures, representing the horrors of the war. These scenes are reproduced here in a Sparks street theatre, as well as in our own theatres in Montreal. The only practical result has been to scare the people. The opinion prevailing among the people of Quebec is that the Government have tried by every possible means to stop enlistment. You have the case of General Wilson who is a perfect gentleman, but who does not know a word of French; if he does not know it, it is not our fault. If the Government had taken the necessary steps in order to stimulate enlisting, they would have had as much success as anywhere else. You have evidence of this in Major Asselin's regiment which was completed within two months, also in the case of a second regiment which was organized just as quickly.

Now, do you know what happened during Marshal Joffre's visit to Montreal.

When the time came for the inspection of the troops at the base of Mount Royal, where some 400,000 people were present, the general commanding the division could not say a word in French and as Marshal Joffre does not know any English, they could not understand one another. Marshal Joffre must have made this reflection: These soldiers must then all be English? Where are the French Canadians?

Mr. Speaker, the French Canadians of the province of Quebec cleaves to the soil. Our province is not like the other ones. We have only two big centres: Montreal and Quebec. There may well be Three Rivers, Hull and St. Johns, but when we speak of large centres, we have only two. We need all our manual labour for the manufacture of shells, which we are asked to make, and for all other articles required by the people of the province and of the other parts of the Dominion. What we need is farmers. The farmers clamour for help.

My hon. friend, the member for Parry Sound, in his speech yesterday, stated that Toronto, the province of Ontario, could not afford to give another man, that it was impossible, that they absolutely needed aid for farmers. It is the same thing in the province of Quebec. We stick to the native soil, but we also stick to our language and to our religion. We are, as said the member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) in his speech, the pioneers of this country. When the French landed here to colonize Canada, the first thing they did, in disembarking, was to plant the cross and to celebrate mass.

Now, Mr. Speaker, our Ontario friends are trying, by all ways and means, to insult our faith. We are strongly attached to it, and we have the right to believe as we please, just as much as they have the right to believe what they please. When it has come to the point of attacking that which is most sensible in the human being; his faith, his tongue and his nationality, I say that those who are doing it are doing a nefarious work and only disorganizing the "entente" which has been advocated for so many years by the hon. leader of the Opposition and by the Fathers of Confederation.

For what is happening to-day, Mr. Speaker, they are responsible. Now, let us discontinue these ill-boding struggles, let us shake hands, let us blot out these religious and racial differences; we are all Canadians; French or English, we are all Canadians. Will our Ontario brethren at last understand? I hope so. As for us, we are familiar with such maxims, our religion teaches it, we know that we should live as brothers in this world.

As was stated the other day by the hon. member for Three Rivers, it would be desirable to send into our sister-province five or six good men to say to these people: Put an end to these struggles. Life is too short. When war will be over, the question of sharing will arise between the nations. Do not get away with the idea that the United States are fighting for nothing. I know that the United States owe a great deal to France and specially to Lafayette, but it might very well happen that the province of Quebec, which is divided. . . exempted by an imaginary line, the 45th, it is possible that they might say: you will give us Quebec. It is not what I wish, but if this is kept going, you will see what will happen.

May I be allowed to recall a word uttered by the late hon. Mr. Mercier, stating that Confederation had been instituted, nevertheless, to serve the interests of a party, which was the Conservative party, and that it might mean the removal of the French Canadian influence.

Mr. Speaker, at the end of fifty years, the discussion upon this question of race, of religion and of language is still alive. His words come true.

Well now, Mr. Speaker, when we shall celebrate, next week, the fiftieth anniversary of Confederation, on the site where the Parliament buildings are being erected, I do hope that, then and there, an understanding will be for ever concluded, that it shall be stated that never hereafter we will attack one another. We, the French Canadians, we are always ready and we must do it, it is not a sacrifice, it is a duty; but the yellows, with their Orange press, are provoking trouble wherever they are. Why? Have we not the right to exist as much as they have? We are the pioneers here. Well, Mr. Speaker, to conclude, I say that the best way to serve the interests of the Empire and our own country's interests for the future, is not in sending men; we have sent 420,000. I do not say that we have done too much. No, we owed it to England, to do what we have done, and we should even do more, if possible, but that, we should do it voluntarily and not forcibly.

When two persons are forcibly united, divorce soon follows suit. That is what is going to happen, you will create civil war in the country; you are not able and you have no right to say to the 700,000 tax payers whom I represent, you have not the right, do I say, to take their own opinion away from them. A man's opinion for the community, that may be nothing, but a man's opinion for himself, that is everything, and it is what you are trying to take away from him.

The Prime Minister, not very long ago, before a large audience in the Monument National, in Montreal, often referred to Democracy. Democracy like those, we find them in Germany and here.

I shall support the amendment of my right hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition, because I believe that the people should be consulted, I am convinced of it, they are loudly crying for it, and it is the only way to obtain a fair and honest opinion. It is the only way that will give you the right and power to do what you may wish to do.

Mr. Speaker, if I have gone a little too far, I regret it; I should probably have restrained myself a little more, but in the heat of the debate, the fact that I was speaking on a question as important as the one now before us, and after having heard in this House all the speeches made by persons better informed than myself, I may perhaps have made some mistakes.

Now, take notice of what is going to happen.

The present Government's act means that you will have a third party here at the coming elections. That party will be called, just so, the Unionist Labor party, who certainly will not act as did the Nationalist party in 1911, but will stand between the two parties, and when a question of public interest will be brought before the House, the workman who has always taken a deep interest in all public matters, will as ever before keep his word and will thereby hold the balance of the two parties and have the people's rights duly respected.

Mr. Speaker, I understand that it is not the right time to do what I will now suggest, because we are at war, but I am one of those who are against war; I would like that, at a given moment, in the understanding which will take place, when this war will be settled after the war is over, I would like to see, as I say, every gun to the last one melted, every piece of ammunition cast into the deep seas, and a general disarmament ordered. There is no reason whatever for the nations to cut each other's throats as they are presently doing it. It is only family quarrels among the governments. Sometimes, these quarrels, these wars are only roused in the sole interest of the big manufacturers.

Indeed, what do you see after these wars? You see colossal fortunes spring up and all this wealth is always made, during the war, out of the people who, for centuries, can never get out of it; the families run into debt, they are left in misery for centuries. Therefore, I do not hesitate to declare that I am one of those who are opposed to war, and I believe that after this war, as I have just said it, there should be a general disarmament.

Among the questions which should be dealt with, after the war, one of the first should be that of creating a tribunal of universal peace, which, to my mind, should be composed of representatives of all the powers in the whole world, from the crowned heads to the lowest of the Indian tribes. That is what should be done in order that no nation in the future can attempt to do what is now going on. When we witness the painful spectacle which brings misfortune to the whole world, for the sake of a family quarrel between crowned heads, well, I say that this should stop, and the idea put forth by President Wilson will become a full reality.

Mr. Speaker, much more could be said upon this subjest, but I am through. I might, however, be allowed to say this more: Why send our men to the front if actually, as reported the other day by a newspaper, there are, according to the Minister af Labour, 3,500,000 men fit for military service, and that, of this number, 1,200,000 are to be found in the taverns, in the theatres and in the gambling places. Then, why not take these men and leave the population of Canada in a large country like ours, where we need labour for agriculture, in order that we be able to exist in the future.

Do they really mean to put us out of the way entirely, to replace us by others? It looks very much that way to us, it seems to be the present Prime Minister's policy.

No, the Government's act is a brutal act, which is not constitutional. This Parliament has not the right to legislate, because it has no mandate. You must appeal to the people and the people shall pronounce and decide.

I conclude by thanking this House for the kind attention given to me.

I will vote for the referendum proposed by the right hon. the leader of the Opposition, because the people want it and because I am here to do the people's will and not to do as I please. That is the way I understood my mandate and it is the way all the members should understand it.

Mr. A. BELLEMARE (Maskinongé): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for St. Marie (Mr. Martin) who has just spoken although it was my turn, promising to speak no longer than a quarter of an hour, or thereabouts, has broken his promise; how can he blame the Prime Minister for having broken his? May I be allowed to register a second protest against conscription? I say a second protest, because on the 30th January last, before the hon. Prime Minister's departure for England, I took the liberty to warn the House against this project which was even then threatening us as likely to be imposed upon the country. Indeed, at that time, I did believe that on his return from England, the Prime Minister would come back to us thoroughly imperialized and would force upon the country compulsory military service. I am entirely opposed to this Bill, and will be as long as the people will not have been consulted and declared their will. I say that we are opposed to the passage of the present Bill, because it is against the Constitution. Actually, if we ransack the pages of our political history since the establishment of the Parliament of Canada, we will not find a single instance where our great men, English and French Canadian, have at any time admitted the principle either of the colonies' intervention in the Imperial wars or even of going beyond our own territory, except for the exclusive defence of Canada. In that regard, Lord Elgin, who was one of our best Governors, wrote to Lord Grey, on December 18, 1854:

> Although I hold that so long as the colonists have no voice in the imperial councils they are entitled to look to the imperial authorities for protection against hostilities which they have no share in provoking, and that it is therefore fitting that imperial garrisons should be maintained at certain important military stations, such as Quebec, as a pledge that this protection, when the contingency occurs, will not be invoked in vain, I am confident that nothing will more effectually tend to the security of the empire or to the establishment of a high standard of national and manly morals among the colonists, than the assumption by themselves of some portion of the responsibility in respect of self-defence and the preservation of internal tranquillity, which has heretofore been cast upon the mother country. "Nevertheless, I am confident that if the inhabitants of the colony did assume a share of responsibility in the defence of their country and the preservation of internal order, a responsibility which until now has been entirely left to the mother country—nothing would more effectually tend to assure the empire's security and to establish in the colony a lofty national ideal and virile morals.

Holton, a minister in the Taché-McDonald cabinet, who was not a French Canadian, speaking of the Militia Act of 1855, said:

> This measure imposes to the province all the charges of an independent sovereignty without conference upon her sovereign rights and privileges. The ministry propose to tax the people in order to maintain a military force upon which they will exercise no control, and to pursue war operations decided upon without their having a voice in the decision.

And Galt said at the same date:

> In a case of war with the United States, a conflict which might arise from a quarrel in which we would have no interest but that would just the same cover our country with bloodshed, this measure would oblige us to maintain the militia under arms at our own expense.

Mr. Christie, a member, also adds:

> This Act confirms the principle of imposing without representation the tax required to pursue wars in the declaration of which we have no voice. It puts upon the people of Canada the obligation of supporting Great Britain in all her disputes with the United States, without having a voice in their settlement nor the right to be consulted.

And, a little later on, when a new Militia Bill was introduced by J. A. Macdonald, he says:

In case of war with the United States, England would undoubtedly be willing to spend her last penny and give her last man for our defence. It is her duty to do so; we shall receive the support of all her forces; we have, however, the evident duty of organizing a large and efficient army, whose object will be to fight on our own territory, for our own possessions, our own privileges and our own liberties.

Upon the overthrow of the Cartier-Macdonald administration, during the same period, Hon. Thomas Loranger, an ex-minister also said:

It is perfectly understood that Canada left to herself would not make war nor be drawn into war. Should the country enter into a conflict with a foreign power, it will be the consequence of England's quarrels with that power.

What did Lord Lansdowne do in the case of the expedition to Egypt? He did not ask Canada any compulsory assistance; he replied to the British Government:

That the Government is ready to approve of recruiting in Canada to serve in Egypt or elsewhere. These forces should be specially enlisted under the authority of the Imperial Army Discipline Act and taken from various local battalions, the entire expense to be borne by the Imperial Exchequer.

From what I have just quoted, it can be seen that the sentiment of the Canadian people was in favour of establishing a militia, but only for the defence of Canada, and that everywhere, at all times, the principle, that no Canadian troops could be sent outside of Canada to take part in England's wars, was recognized. It was openly declared that we were ready to defend ourselves for the preservation of our homes, but, at the same time, they refused to accept any principle that might involve us in the participation to external wars. That was the idea of the English of Canada, as well as of the French Canadians and no one can suspect lack of patriotism in a man like Colonel Rankin, who had been employed by the English Government to suppress the insurrection of 1837-1838 in the province of Quebec. That Bill, therefore, looks to me to run amuck with the constitution. That we should voluntarily assist the Empire in a universal war like this one, wherein the world civilization is at stake, that may be tolerated, but that we should be forcibly sent over there, seems to me illegal, unconstitutional, and it threatens to disturb the peace of Canada. We have no special mandate to impose such a measure. Last year, we granted ourselves a year's extension of our parliamentary term, so that the measure you would force upon the people is drastic and anti-national. I say anti-national, because, under the circumstances, we could render greater services to the Empire by employing our full manpower in agriculture, in munition factories, etc.

The wheat supply being almost exhausted in Europe, the world being under the menace of a general famine, I believe that we could, as I say, render greater services to the Allies, by providing them with foodstuffs in larger quantities.

A few days ago, I met a commercial traveller who used the following comparison. I will suppose that, crossing the Atlantic, you had three trunks to save; one contains the life of Canada, another the life of England and the third one, the life of France. The boat is sinking and they tell you that your trunks being fated, you can save one only. As a Canadian subject, which one are you going to save?

Obviously, it will be Canada's trunk which contains your own life. I was struck with that comparison, and considering the dangerous economic situation of Canada, I conclude that, "as true charity begins at home", we should moderate our participation in the present war and begin to safeguard ourselves before sinking into the depths of imperialism.

Some will say: the hon. Prime Minister has authorized 500,000 men, he must keep his promise. I will answer that never has the Canadian Parliament been consulted on this subject, neither has it given him any authority in the matter. We are told that we are in imminent danger; I say that nobody can prove such a statement and that, consequently, we should stick to volunteering. When I courted election for the first time in the county of Maskinongé, the mandate given me was to work against excessive imperialism, and the parishes of Maskinongé, Saint Léon, Louiseville, Saint Ursule, Saint Ignace du Lac, Saint Charles de Mandeville, Saint Paulin, Saint Didace, Saint Justin, Saint Alexis des Monts, etc., have sent me numerous petitions, strongly protesting against the passing of the conscription bill. Consequently, representing the opinion of my electors and out of respect for democracy, I declare in this House that I bow to the wish of my constituents. It will be thanks to the independents elected in 1911, if this measure be not adopted before the general elections.

It is we, the independent members, who will save the people from the spectre of compulsory service. It is thanks also to the doctrine of the referendum now adopted by the hon. leader of the Opposition, with the help of a certain number of his friends—who do not appear to me very numerous—if we obtain that the people be consulted before this Bill is enacted. I congratulate the members on the left of the Speaker who are in favour of the measure. In 1911, I myself, in my county, advocated the referendum on the Naval Service question. I wanted the people to be consulted, and the same to-day. I say that we advocated that policy in 1911. Indeed, how read the Saint Eustache resolutions, in that year? They were to the effect that no contribution of men and of money should be granted, unless authorized by a referendum. That is exactly, says Le Canada of June 21 what Sir Wilfrid Laurier proposes to-day. I will therefore support as strongly as I can this amendment or any other measure of a nature to prevent the adoption of this Bill. I am much afraid that it may be said, in affer years, of several among us, as Sir Hippolyte Lafontaine did say, one day, while speaking upon an important measure in the old parliament of United Canada: "You have saved the ministry, but you have sacrificed the people."

Mr. JOSEPH GIRARD (Chicoutimi-Saguenay (translation): Mr. Speaker, I deem it my duty on so momentous an occasion in Canada's parliamentary history to give a few explanations for the stand I have decided to take in regard to a Bill which the Prime Minister has seen fit to submit to this House for its approval.

As I am not a lawyer or in any sense versed in the law, I must refrain from discussing the legality or constitutionality of this measure. But, after closely following the discussions carried on by the principal legal lights of this House, after listening with surprise to statements made here by the best lawyers of the Liberal party in the various provinces, who regretfully part from their leader because they are in favour of the Bill, I am wondering whether in their inner conscience those men are not satisfied that this Bill is constitutional. I learned to know them, during the seventeen years I have met them in this House. I have had many evidences of their high sense of honour, of their disinterestedness and their enlightened patriotism, and I know that, in so serious a circumstance, they are acting only after most serious consideration and for reasons entirely free of sectarianism. Duty is their only guide. Hence it is evident to me that the Prime Minister and his colleagues have also, necessarily, been guided by the same sentiments of honour and of duty.

The same considerations prove to my mind the urgency of the measure. Moreover, if we consider the unpopularity of this law, a fact which the Government as the lowest of the electors could readilly foresee, it is plain that only the greatest emergency, vividly impressing itself on the minds of those in office, could impel them to take such action.

I may say to the Prime Minister that I accept with pleasure his momentous declaration, when presenting the Conscription Bill before the country, that he acted only as Prime Minister of Canada, performing his duty, and never under the pressure direct or indirect of any external influence. I respect him enough and I know too well his sense of honour to allow myself the liberty of questioning his word in any way whatever, above all when he gives it so solemnly as upon this occasion.

I am not of those who believe our Prime Ministers should be locked up in the country as traitors, and avoid the contact of the men who govern the Empire and the European nations. I rather believe that we have all to gain by letting our rulers travel abroad, in order that they may study and open all kinds of connections, to increase our trade facilities. Without being an Imperialist more than it is necessary, I do not believe Imperialism be such a dangerous scare-crow that we must avoid even the thought of it.

Neither am I in accord with those who contend that the Act of Confederation has been a mistake. On the contrary, Confederation has been the work of great men and an act of which the Canadians are proud. On the other hand, here comes the leader of the Opposition, a lawyer of long standing and a most experienced parliamentarian, supported by other important lawyers, contending that the law is unconstitutional and that this is not such an emergency as would justify such an action. His supporters come from all the provinces, especially from the province of Quebec, which is almost unanimous upon this question.

They maintain that volunteering is sufficient to provide the promised number of men, that Canada's effort is already too great for her population, and that to go any farther would be to drive the country to actual ruin. I notice that, on account of such claims, a minister representing the province of Quebec has resigned, fearing a danger for national unity, which Canada needs so much. In certain quarters it has been charged that the province of Quebec has not furnished her full quota of men, and they even go as far as to charge my province with being disloyal. If the Government should be credited with good faith, honour, uprightness and a strict sense of duty, one must also necessarily recognize in those of different opinions the same qualities and the same motives.

In my province there are well-read men with good judgment and moderate views, and who have long pondered and reflected before taking a stand. Therefore, to me—as I am no advocate nor lawyer—their judgment, once rendered, especially when these men are friends of the present Government, must be an almost infallible guide. It is true that the Conservatives of Quebec are not absolutely unanimous, but the large majority are opposed to the Bill. It is well understood that I only refer to the laymen. Then, is the law constitutional and is there an emergency? The majority of Parliament shall say and decide that question.

Indeed, we are facing a terrible problem, the consequences of which cannot be foreseen, especially if the element shouting rebellion predominates. But I cannot be led to believe that, in this abominable world-wide storm where the best pilots know no longer how to trim their sails, what is going on in Europe cannot be repeated here. Over there also, terrible resistances are encountered; there also they speak of revolts, but just when everything seems lost, the good common sense gains the upper hand and the rulers succeed in guiding their people towards the sole object of all the Allies and of the Canadians; the utter reduction of German barbarism.

Honest people, good citizens and responsible men are everywhere numerous enough to prevent a greater evil and let common sense have its way. But it is painful to me to hear in this House some authorized voices say they are not ready to admit that the people would be wrong in revolting.

Has Canada done her share generously? Yes, she astonishes the world. Can she go any further? Those who oppose the Bill say no, unless it be with great care and moderation. It is the almost unanimous contention of the province of Quebec.

In the district which I have the honour to represent, the friends of the Government, unanimously, were the first to address me long before the Bill was introduced; resolutions adopted in every parish, on the request of the central Conservative organization of the county, asking me to lay before the House their unanimous opposition to any conscription scheme, for the following reasons: Conscription endangers national unity, voluntary enlisting suffices, if well organized; Canada's financial situation is in jeopardy, seeing the immense debt already existing and daily increasing; in the country-places where is barely the number of farm-hands required for the agricultural production which must be daily increased; the cost of living is already too disproportionate; the Canadian industries cannot be maintained if the labour is reduced, and moreover the United States will send to the front millions of men who will be ready before the proposed Canadian levy.

My friends are those of the Government; they are unanimous with the Conservatives of my province. Among them, there are very wise men and men of great experience, and I must add that my adversaries think as they do. I have promised my electors that I would be the echo of their opinions; my duty, therefore, is to represent them here as they want me to upon this so important and so momentous question, and to vote against the Bill.

Now, why such an immovable opposition, by my friends, to the proposed law? First the assurance, often repeated, that there would be no conscription. At my request, the late lamented Hon. Mr. Casgrain held three meetings in my district—at one of these, he was accompanied by the Hon. Mr. Patenaude,—to explain Canada's situation in its true light, and give confidence to the population in the war organization. The word of these men was well received and respected by large audiences who had faith in their statements.

On this point, I believe I should add a few remarks. The Prime Minister, the leader of the Opposition, and all of us, we have spoken too much, although in good faith. All of us, we were in the first place satisfied that the war would not last so long, and no one could foresee all the complications which, since August 4, 1914, have arisen almost every day. Who could have foreseen Russia's defection? Who could have foreseen this abominable submarine war? Who are those who foresaw Rumania's disaster? Who are they who have not made mistakes, in Europe and in America, since the beginning of the war?

During the last fifty years, outside of Germany, who are those who had a clear foresight? England alone who, noiselessly, had so prepared the future that, when war was declared, she was able to bottle up, around Heligoland, the immense fleet of Germany which has not been able to stir since. And England has been able to keep the word she had given her colonies, to wit that she would protect them at all times.

I remember a day, in the good times of peace, when all was calm and serene, the Parliament of Canada saw fit to ask England to denounce her treaties with Germany; if England had not been able to bottle up the German fleet, I wonder if the Kaiser would not have remembered the action of Canada and crossed the Atlantic to avenge that denouncement of the treaty. And, therefore, if the provinces of eastern Canada, especially Quebec, are not like Belgium since October, 1914, that is due only to England's mighty fleet, to her foresight, to her respect for pledges and to her firm stand at the right moment. If the trade of Canada and of America has been practically continued since the declaration of war, because the high seas have been cleared of the pirates by the British fleet, that also we owe it to England. How much does it cost daily to the English people, that gigantic effort of which the British colonies reap the first benefit and the whole world besides? It is good to recall these facts.

How dearly the whole world is paying, at the present day, for having refused to believe in the constant growth, under its very eyes, of an infernal power whose intentions were plain, and whose sudden action was as much of a surprise that we are now forced to admit that it will probably take the entire strength of the nations of the world to reduce it.

Considering this universal lack of foresight, it is not surprising, I think, that the Prime Minister, the leader of the Opposition and all the members of this House should have made statements which it would have been preferable to dispense with, and the effect of which has been to mislead public opinion. But we must admit that, even in December last, in the face of the war's ever changing fortunes, the Prime Minister refused to guarantee that there would not be any conscription. It was a notice given to the whole country, and what was the result? All that work which has been done through winter, in Montreal and elsewhere, in order to create an opposition to the principle of conscription. If the efforts of Hon. Mr. Blondin have been so little productive, what is the cause of it; if not that a certain press was eager to ridicule him and that certain men, even in this House, tried to deprecate him? That is how public opinion was guided, and so the doctrines advocated have borne fruit. That preposterous organization of recruiting appeared so objectionable to the people in my district that, six months ago, I felt obliged to notify the Militia Department that I would no longer be responsible for its working and left it to them entirely henceforth; and, as a matter of fact, after I had repeatedly complained about the way things were being managed in my county, matters seemed to be going from bad to worse. And I informed them that the result of it was a public opinion wholly averse and opposed to everything in connection with the war.

And now we are reaping the fruits to-day and the harvest is a rich one: absolute and unanimous hostility to anything pertaining to the war, because what has been tasted of it only breathes of deceit, wastage and dishonesty.

Many times, among friends, we would say that all that immense scandal could be nothing but deliberate conspiracy against the Government, for all the strangers sent to do recruiting were undisguised Liberals, among whom two brothers of Dr. Michaud, the Liberal candidate chosen for the coming Federal elections of Chicoutimi, who had nothing else to do but to carry to his friend Elie certain cheques payable to soldiers' wives which he thus had the advantage of distributing. That is why I cannot help laughing when I hear people say that the Government was using recruiting to serve its political ends.

Necessarily, the odium of all this is laid at the door of the Government. But, for those who know, it should be attributed to the power behind the Throne who, I do not know how or why, can laugh at the minister and even resist him when he commands. The military laws, so I am told, are so made and, to overrule an officer, it would almost take the King himself. Indeed, the one, who, from the start, was responsible for that deplorable organization is very guilty, if results are to be taken into account.

I hold as responsible for this condition of affairs the headquarters whose formation I know nothing about, but who, through inexperience I hope, have created the sad situation we are in. In Quebec, they have established rather a breeding station where the best trimmers have succeeded in getting positions in large numbers, at high salaries, as recruiting officers, instead of leaving for the front. That is the manimous opinion in my district, where every one is asking for months past, why these good-for-nothings are not yet at the front. There, at least, they might earn the money we pay them. If recruiting has been done every where in Quebec as it was in my district, there is no reason to be surprised if they talk of revolt in some localities.

However, from my district, a good number of men are at the front since 1914. German bullets have reached several of them, and the Demeules, Dubé and Topping families mourn the loss of their sons, heroes who have fallen for the defence of the law of nations. The famous Capt. Tremblay, whose reputation as a fighter is widely known, is a son of the county I have the honour to represent; we have then done our share and we are proud of those who represent us at the front, but all the same, we believe we are perfectly right in making the objections we have to increased efforts.

It must also be admitted that as soon as it became known that the French Canadian forces, organized under the understanding that they would form units over there, under officers who spoke their own language, were being disbanded and sent here and there in foreign regiments, the enthusiasm cooled down enormously and it is only common sense. How many English Canadians would enlist if they were assured of being commanded by French Canadians from Quebec who would not speak English?

Here are the three great causes which, necessarily, have paralyzed recruiting in my district and throughout the province, and, indeed, they are most serious. First, the bad organization of the recruiting work; secondly, the disbanding, on the other side, of the French Canadian units, no longer commanded by officers of their language; thirdly, the education given since 1896, and even previously.

I am glad to acknowledge, as I think I should, that the present minister of Militia (Sir A. E. Kemp), since his coming into office, has shown himself much more sympathetic and much more energetic than his predecessor, in his relations with the public as regards the work of recruiting. It is my duty to make this statement which he greatly deserves, from all reports I have received regarding him. But he must allow me, in the name of public decency and of the respect due to him, to ask him to put out, as soon as possible, from my district, the remainder of the idle so-called recruiting agents, who have shocked public opinion by their presence for too long a time, and to accept the patriotic offer made by the united officers of the 18th regiment of Chicoutimi, who are desirous to handle recruiting in Chicoutimi-Saguenay, under Mr. J. E. A. Dubuc as honorary colonel. All of them, Conservative or Liberal, are citizens of good reputation; they enjoy the people's confidence. Major Lachance has the honour of having a youthful son at the front, who fought like a lion at Vimy. Let us try to please the people, specially in war times.

Had recruiting been well organized, the necessity for the proposed act would never have arisen and Canada would be proud to be at her post without having to go through the present crisis.

But it is easy to remedy the situation by resorting to proper means, creating a spirit of confidence which must soon develop, having merely been set back by the causes which I have just mentioned. The French Canadian is peaceful at home and his heart is in the right place. He loves his King, he is proud of his flag, and for it he will give his last drop of blood and his last cent. But he wants to be respected as a man, he wants to deal with honest people, and he wants to see his sacrifices appreciated at their real value, and lightened as much as possible by a friendly, sympathetic and even-handed leadership. Let me give you an instance to prove that voluntary recruitment, well organized and by popular men, gives good results. Captain Piuze, of Fraserville, a young man of good repute, has organized the 189th regiment in his district in a very short time. Major Asselin who, however, had fought the Nationalist battles in Quebec, has also formed a battalion in no time. Here are two striking instances that go to demonstrate most evidently that, when the organization is good, when the organizers are known and deserve confidence, the people do answer by confidence. But the treatment inflicted, later on, upon both these regiments, has had a dampening upon the people's enthusiasm. Let us then try again voluntary recruiting by men of good sense, like Piuze and Asselin —there is quite a number of them in Quebec —and we are sure to get the same results.

Not one discordant note was heard when Canada entered upon this war; it was a question of heart and of duty. Let us regret the deplorable errors of the past, but let us repair them by means which appeal to the heart that is not dead, but only sick on account of mistakes committed by subordinates who had the power to make them, and who have had the hateful courage to commit them.

Mr. Speaker, there is a great deal of talk about Quebec nowadays; in certain quarters, she is abused and insulted, and her sons are falling over there every day. Her clergy, so noble, is being made an object of public scorn and obloquy. For instance: that infernal card which was distributed in this very House. They have forgotten our bishops' collective letter of 1914, enjoining their flocks to do their duty in the war.

Let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, that the two first names my mother taught me were those of God and of the illustrious Queen Victoria, and all the French Canadian mothers were doing the same in those days and all of them have since upheld the same principles of education for their children, only substituting, when circumstances made it necessary, the name of the King. Every Sunday, at the foot of the altar, the French Canadian people pray God for their King and throughout Quebec, every one is proud of belonging to the British Empire. Therefore, how regrettable it is to find in the Dominion, westward from Quebec, some Englishmen, more English than the King, brutally attacking my province and her language and her children.

A few days ago, one of our good friends in this House was asking himself if it would not be possible to find twelve good men, independent men, who would go to Quebec and speak the language of the present times and appease the minds that, according to him, see things under a false light. This is a good idea which I accept, if my friend could on the same day find also in Ontario twelve good men independent citizens who would go through his own province to calm the people who scorn Quebec, who persecute her children while allowing them very little French and religious education in their schools; these same gentlemen should also go to Manitoba where they have completely turned out of the schools both Christ and the French tongue, and also into the two western provinces, where every year some new attempt is being made to also put out both French and religious instruction from the schools. What a splendid work these men would accomplish nowadays, if they could succeed in having the province of Quebec known as she actually is: the paradise of Liberty, where Protestants are masters of their schools as at home, and where the Irish Catholics are treated just as brothers; and if they also succeed in obtaining that in Ontario and particularly among our Irish Catholic co-religionists who do not speak our language, Quebec would be respected. During these dark stormy days, how good it would be to see all our family troubles forever gone!

To be fair, the position taken by Quebec does not speak disloyalty, no more than that taken by the English element which thinks like she does and which is larger than is generally admitted.

To stop a little, reflect and look into the future which is gloomy, that is prudence, that is wisdom, that is reasoning. The Germans must be beaten, that is agreed on by all; but in order to beat them the soldiers must be fed and clothed.

Now, in my district, we just have the farm labour we need; the large industries we have are often short of hands and the fisheries along our northern coast occupy the whole population, so much so that the mills of Clark City have to import men. And they would want to take away a portion of our manual labour. Those who live in the district know what the circumstances are; and so, the people do resist. An agricultural producer departing for the front would cause a deficit in the food production equal to that of thirty soldiers. Let us keep our farmers at home.

Then, there is the high cost of living; here is a problem which is appealing to all. It is almost beyond control, for neutral countries have to contend with it as much as ourselves. But it was particularly difficult of settlement in Canada, as long as the United States did not join the Allies. Now, it can be more eff ctually remedied by the joint work of both governments.

Upon this point, I wish to make a few remarks. In 1880, I landed at Lake St. John as a settler, to live on the land. Then and for the three or four years following, the settlers of the district I have the honour to represent, were facing the same problem. There was no war then, the country was prosperous and things were in a fair way. In those days, we paid flour $11 a barrel—and such flour—pork, 5 cents a pound, syrup $1.50 a gallon, salt $10 a bag, and it took three days to procure these indispensable articles. The wages were 50 cents a day, and in winter, the lumber dealers paid $10 and $12 per month, and young men would come to the Ottawa lumber camps where they got $15 to $20 a month, with their board included of course. And it was at that time, that people worked like Trojans in my district, to make of it the fine agricultural county, which the province of Quebec is so rightly proud of to-day. How is it that, nowadays, with salaries of $4, $5, $6 and $7 a day, people can hardly live?

At that time, Mr. Speaker, the unbridled extravagance which predominates to-day was absolutely unknown. The requirements of ease and of comfort, extended, as they are to-day and have been for several years, to their utmost limits, are the greatest cause of the present moral and financial disarray. It takes some money to support a family, but how much more will it not take for clothes, if the thought of the future and the idea of what is proper do not predominate? My explanation of the high cost of living is to be seen in the scandalous displays in every shop window. Should we not reproach ourselves, every one of us, in every rank of society, for having allowed to be created in our country that false education which has made the fortune of the shop keepers and maintained in poverty the workman and the farmer? If the prohibition campaign had been started 20 years ago, if intelligent economy, had been advocated, we should not hear so much of drunkenness, and there would be to-day less jewels, trinkets and silks, the sight of which are so painfully offensive to our common sense. Luxury is ever the parent of all vices and the cause of all ruin; let us throw it down, now is the time.

Since the present horrible war calls daily for money and still more money, why not tax heavily all the useless fancy goods which ruin our population? Have they not seen to this in England and are not the responsible men generally preaching economy? Have not the higher social classes set the example?

Let the Canadian Parliament seriously attend to this question and the cost of living will no longer be a bugbear. But, nevertheless, there must be no delay in laying the hands upon the vampires who are sucking the people's blood and getting rich in a dishonest way through iniquitous speculations.

Should we still take part in the war? I believe everyone is agreed on this point, in Quebec as elsewhere; but we ought to proceed with prudence, with calculation and with due care. The effort we have made is the wonder of the world; perhaps, have we, in our enthusiasm, proceeded too quickly? Then, let us now be cautious.

I have heard it repeated many a time that there are presently in the country one hundred thousand men who have no visible means of support, produce nothing, help nobody and are, for the greater part of them rather a public nuisance. If that be true—at all events, it is certain there is a large number of them in the cities—let us find them and send them across to fill the gaps; over there they will be useful, they will be a credit to the flag and their temporary absence from the country will do no harm.

Under the present Military Service Act, it would be an easy matter to reach them, by inserting a special section providing that the generally unemployed having no regular trade be the first called.

Mr. Speaker, we are now facing, I fear, not a political, but a national crisis. The parties are divided and the leader of the Opposition sees his dearest generals leave him in such numbers that, before long, his family will be greatly disunited. And the Government's forces will be very strong upon this conscription issue. Before long, Quebec shall stand alone solidly against this measure and facing the other provinces badly divided. And what next? What terrible responsibilities are being shouldered in these dreadful times; one cannot but tremble at the thought!

Quebec is intelligent, patriotic, sincere and loyal to the extreme; but Quebec believes it is time to look to the future and not rush blindly into bankruptcy. Quebec believes that conscription is useless, oppressive and contrary to Canada's interests. A certain part of the population thought that the leader of the Opposition would save the situation by his prestige over his party; but that was an illusion and it is evident that, were he in power with his friends, he would impose conscription, not selective, but by ballot which is still worse, and without referendum, as in 1910. Then, whither are we drifting?

The Conservative party of my province and of my county is unanimously opposed to the Bill. Among them are to be found men most friendly to the Premier, great thinkers and great philosophers. My duty in this House is to voice the opinion of my electors who are to a man, opposed to the measure; that duty I shall fulfil by speaking and voting against the bill. I so notified the Prime Minister a long time ago.

I must add that I sincerely regret to be forced to part with the Prime Minister upon a measure of such importance; I know that he is sincere, I know he is upright and that he is actuated solely by the idea of performing an urgent duty. I know the uprightness and the disinterestedness of his colleagues; I know that every one of them realizes the terrible responsibility he assumes; could they possibly be right?

Considering the situation in this House as I see it, I must admit that the future is far from being bright.

The leader of the Opposition, whom I respect, proposes that the present law be submitted to the people, before it be applied, for most serious reasons which he mentions; I know that his Quebec friends rely upon his great prestige to maintain his party and defeat the Government. He seems in favour of the principle of conscription, but he will not so state until the people has rendered his verdict, he has to second his motion, his former colleague who, for his part, is against the Bill because it does not go far enough; he would like to have it settled by drawing lots. What a difference between the arguments of the mover and those of the seconder!

But now his leading partisans who, every day, declare themselves in favour of the Bill, are compelled to state that they part with their leader with his permission, but that they remain in the Liberal party. Let us suppose a general election and the Borden Government defeated, what policy will the country face? Selective conscription will be defeated and then we will have conscription by drawing lots, as provided in the Militia Act. An interesting question to put to the electors. Why did not the leader of the Opposition, as he did in 1896, move the six months' hoist? Never has a similar political situation been witnessed to my mind, in this country. Would all this agitation resolve itself into a mere party move? What is now going on in Quebec is pregnant with suggestions. I received this letter signed by a man of the highest character and it reads as follows:

June 18, 1917.

Sir,—Will conscription pass (according to the newspapers, the Liberal members are going to vote for that Bill), or will there be general elections? Jos. Guay is giving lectures on agriculture; he gets the parish priest's endorsation and says nothing worth while. On the 18th, he gave four, at Hébertville, at St. Bruno, at St. Joseph d'Alma and at Delisle. He speaks for an hour; he says: When the agriculturist will come here later, listen to him carefully and follow his advice. If you listen to him, you will produce ten times more, but he ends by stating: I have a son at the front and I might say a few words about the war; and that is a pretext for speaking against the Government. Enough has been done or too much has been done. Borden had promised there would not be any conscription. By imposing it, he deceives the people. He has deceived Mgr. Bruchési. Then he gives the names of important people who have told him that Canada had done too much for the past two years. He says: Borden has tried to catch Laurier in his trap, but Laurier told him: "Go back, Satan, with thy coalition," and, immediately like the good old hen, he has called all his little ones under his wings, and at the roll-call, the Liberal party solid as a rock will vote against the Borden Bill which will jump into the lower regions under the eyes of Laurier, who is the saviour of the people. Then, in his thundering voice, he cries hurrah for the old rooster. That's Jos. Guay, all right.

I tell you these things, not to blame any one, but to keep you advised of what is going on here.

Yours truly...

Have the Quebec Government come to the point of sending their political heelers through our parishes, and announcing them as agricultural lecturers paid by the province?

This is a serious case which I believe it my duty to denounce immediately. Jos. Guay is an hotel-keeper of Chicoutimi, proprietor of the big six-room hotel called "La bonne ménagère", whose milk has stopped. He has Spanish blood and delights in Toreador tournaments. He is greatly interested in poultry and his young daughter is the President of the Chicoutimi Farming Ladies Circle, under her father's guidance. Two years ago, at his request, I obtained from the Government, for his circle, the shipment of twenty-five hens and one rooster for their hen house; the whole lot was duly received in good order, according to the official correspondence, but considering that the cost of living was already increasing, a way was devised to declare the hens sick—they had been put in the cellar of "La bonne ménagère", instead of placing them in the poultry-houses built with Federal money—and the boarders of "La bonne ménagère" ate the twenty-five hens, bragging, in the cars, that the Borden chickens were delicious. The rooster was left for the circle. I do not know whether Jos. Guay refers to this poultry-breeding experience of his in his lectures. I am giving it out to the public so that it may be recalled, should he forget.

The appeal to the people is a fine business. It is the people who govern. But, in the United States, are the people the rulers, when in November last they elected a peace Congress who set them at war a few days after their mandate was in force?

And does not our historical records show that the people's decision is null and void when, in most cases, election programs are burned on the night of votation and buried in the victory; 1896 and 1897 are there to demonstrate that fact.

We have here friends of the leader of the Opposition pretending that often the people prefer being guided to directing themselves; but the Liberal leader wants an appeal to the people; some of his lieutenants say no, because the people prefer to be led. The leader of the Opposition declares the Bill unconstitutional; his lieutenants reply that it is perfectly constitutional and they support it; but, at the same time, they declare they are all of them under the crook of the same leader.

In what state of chaos are we! What future is there in store for us? Many serious people are asking themselves that question and praying God that the national unity be not broken and that the people's good faith be not deceived. After having studied the facts, here is the situation as I understand it: If the Government were left alone with their friends, the Bill would perhaps not be adopted; then, it is the adhesion of almost all the leading English Liberals which makes the Government's position tenable and which will cause the Bill to be carried by a respectable majority, I believe. At this moment, the Liberal party must assume its equal share of responsibility, before the country and before the electorate, and the confidence of the anti-conscriptionists in the prestige of the leader of the Opposition is a terrible illusion. And these important members of the Liberal party, who assume that responsibility, I know them, they are all of them men of high education and perfectly upright in every respect. For them, the Bill is not directed against Quebec, as it is sometimes unfortunately stated. On this point, may I be allowed to publicly thank the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) and the hon. member for Red Deer (Dr. Clark) for the sincere sympathy towards my province I have heard them express, not long ago, in the course of a private conversation where I was not alone, as well as the embarrassment they felt in the face of the position taken by Quebec. And their other colleagues think the same way, I know it.

So then, here we have such important men who refrain from overthrowing a government which they have most severely criticised upon war questions and who extend their full support to pass a law of which they know the absolute unpopularity, as well as the terrible possibilities implied. Necessarily, conscience alone speaks and dictates to these men and I have no right to attribute to them any unworthy motive. It is not therefore a duty for every public man in the face of such a situation to urge the whole population of the country to be calm and every class of the society to remain within bounds?

Before resuming my seat, Mr. Speaker, I wish to make to the Prime Minister and to his colleagues, as well as to all those who support him, an appeal which springs from my very heart:

Considering that the population has not been prepared for the enforcement of the proposed Act;

Considering that it is evident that voluntary recruiting has not given the expected results on account of its thoroughly objectionable organization;

[Mr. Girard.]

Considering that its reorganization on a business and common sense basis might quickly give good results;

That, if the law passes, its application be suspended until there is absolute evidence of the failure of well organized volunteering and until the people have been consulted.

I may state that, in my district, there is no reason to fear a revolution, whatever be the Parliament's decision; but it is painful to hear vituperation against friends whom we respect.

Let me assure you also, Mr. Speaker, in concluding, that whatever may happen, the province of Quebec and my district, especially, in the future as in the past, on awakening every morning, shall hail, though perhaps with tears in their eyes, their God and their King. In both of them, I hope, and through them our rulers may finally find the right way to fulfil their present duty and preserve at the same time the national unity upon which depends the future of our fair Canada.

Should the Bill pass, the leaders of both parties in this House shall have a serious task to perform, if we are to preserve that national unity which must be saved, at the cost of any sacrifice. Such is the wish I express from the bottom of my heart: Be they equal to the task, for thereafter responsibilities there will be for them greater than ever. The whole country is watching them.

On motion of Mr. Boivin the debate was adojurned.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Hazen the House adjourned at 12.10 a.m.

Friday, June 29, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT.

Mr. SPEAKER informed the House that he had directed the Clerk of the House to lay upon the Table the report of the Librarian of Parliament and his recommendation in the matter of the appointment of Joseph Ludger Parr as clerk in the Library of Parliament.

DOMINION LANDS ACT AMENDMENT.

Hon. W. J. ROCHE (Minister of the Interior) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 107, to amend the Dominion Lands Act.

Mr. GRAHAM: Explain.

Mr. ROCHE: This Bill contains several minor amendments the purpose of which is to make our legislation harmonize with practices that have grown up in the department as a result of the war. There are, however, two or three amendments of greater importance. One is to accomplish the object intended to be accomplished by the amendment introduced by the member for Saskatoon (Mr. McCraney), but ruled out by the Speaker. The purpose of that amendment is, in the case of persons who are the owners of purchased homesteads or of pre-emptions, and who have performed all the necessary duties except that of making payment for the land, to enable a certificate of recommendation to issue, which shall be valid for twelve months. During that period the persons who have so purchased homesteads or pre-emptions will have the privilege of raising a loan upon the land in order to pay the Government price of the land.

Another amendment applies to abandoned homesteads upon which liens have been given in respect of seed grain or relief. Ordinarily, those who desire to secure abandoned homesteads may do so under the ordinary homestead conditions, but in order to protect the public from loss of money that had been advanced to the original entrant, whoever secures abandoned lands is required to pay off the seed grain lien. This applies to the securing of lands either by entry or by purchase. There are two or three other amendments of a minor character.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

PROPOSED MORNING SITTINGS POSTPONED.

On the motion being called:

Sir ROBERT BORDEN:

That on and from Tuesday the 3rd of July, and until the end of the session, the House shall meet each sitting day at 11 o'clock in the morning, and that in addition to the usual intermission at 6 o'clock, p.m., there shall be an intermission from one to three o'clock, p.m.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I had a conference with my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) about this motion. He represents to me that it would be better to sit later at night than to have morning sittings, particularly in view of the probability of their being hot weather during the coming month. He has also informed me that so far as he is aware the debate upon the second reading of the Military Service Bill will probably be concluded within two days—although, of course, it is difficult to fix an exact limit. In view of these considerations, I am content to let the motion stand. Perhaps I might venture to express the hope that in speaking upon the Bill hon. gentlemen will be as concise as may be consistent with their purpose of making their attitude absolutely plain to the House and to the country. If that can be done, the length of the debate may be curtailed without any disadvantage to the gentlemen who speak upon it, and with some advantage to the public interest by reason of our being enabled to conclude the business of the session at a somewhat earlier date than would otherwise be possible.

Motion stands.

MARBLE FOR PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. W. F. KAY (Missisquoi): I wish to make an inquiry based on an article in the Canadian Mining Journal. I will read it:

It is said that the marble for the new Houses of Parliament at Ottawa is to be purchased in the United States. The estimates call for marble to the value of $200,000. As there are in Ontario and Quebec deposits of suitable stone, it is strange that Canadian quarries are not to supply the marble needed for the Canadian public buildings. Does the fault lie with the Government, or the owners of the quarries?

I should like to ask whether there is any truth in that report.

Hon. ROBERT ROGERS: I am not aware that there is any truth in it. The committee in charge of the construction of the Parliament building are taking care to have purchased in Canada, as far as it is possible to do so, everything suitable for use in the construction of that building. I have not the exact facts in my mind, but I shall be glad to look them up, because I think that the statement quoted by my hon. friend is entirely incorrect.

MILITARY SERVICE ACT, 1917.

DEBATE CONTINUED ON MOTION FOR SECOND READING AND ON THE AMENDMENTS.

Consideration of the motion of the Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden (Prime Minister) for the second reading of Bill No. 75, Military Service Act, 1917, and the amendment of Sir Wilfrid Laurier thereto, and on the amendment to the amendment by Mr. Barrette, resumed from Thursday, June 28.

Mr. G. H. BOIVIN (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, since your appointment to the honourable position which you now hold, I have not taken up too much of the time of this House in discussing the different measures, some very good, others not so good, submitted by this Government for the successful prosecution of the great war in which Canada is engaged as part of the British Empire—a war, Sir, which every member of this House desires to see brought to a speedy and successful conclusion, not only for the honour and glory of our King, our country and our flag, but for the peace, liberty and civilization of the entire world.

The measure which now confronts us is so important, involving as it does the liberty of the subject, that I cannot vote thereon without explaining to this House and to this country, for the benefit at least of the electors whom I once represented here, the reasons why I intend to vote against the sub-amendment of the hon. member for Berthier (Mr. Barrette), if it is declared to be in order, for the amendment submitted by my right hon. leader, and if that amendment is defeated, then against the second and subsequent readings of the Military Service Bill.

Referring to the electors of Shefford county, I used the expression: "The electors whom I once represented here," because, Sir, when a majority of them gave me their votes and their confidence on September 21, 1911, they elected me as their representative for a term of five years—no more—and I feel that since the month of September, 1916, when another general election should have been held, I have no longer the same right and the same authority to express their views and voice their sentiments and opinions. I may be asked why I tacitly consented to a renewal of my mandate by an amendment to the Canadian constitution made by the Imperial Parliament at the unanimous request of both Houses of the Parliament of Canada. If so, I will promptly answer that when the petition asking for an extension of the present Parliament was unanimously approved by both parties in this House, I, like many other hon. members on this side, was under the impression that the war policy of the Government had been clearly defined and would be faithfully carried out. Its policy, as I then understood it, was to send to the trenches in France and Belgium, every Canadian citizen who had the courage and patriotism to enlist, to see that he was supplied with the best arms, ammunition and clothing that "science could devise or money could buy," to see that his dependents did not suffer at home during his absence, nor after his glorious death and that in case of his being returned, maimed, wounded and disabled, to surround him with all the care, attention and assistance that he so righteously deserved. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Burrell) had preached production and more production; the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) had counselled economy and more economy, and the Prime Minister had placed the natural resources of Canada at the disposal of the Mother Country, in order to insure the soldiers of England as well as those of Canada and their dependents, against famine and starvation, while they were risking their lives for the common cause. It is true that the Prime Minister had, a few days before the opening of the last session, without any authorization from Parliament or the country at large, promised that our contribution would attain the figure of 500,000 men. It was a New Year's gift from the Prime Minister to England, which was later ratified by an Order in Council, and subsequently called a pledge, although the Prime Minister himself admits that it should not be so considered. But pledge or unauthorized gift—call it what you like—that contribution was to be voluntary. This is proven by the statement made by the right hon. gentleman which, although already quoted during the course of this debate, I must repeat. Sir Robert Borden on January 17, 1916, said:

> My right hon. friend has alluded to conscription—to the idea in this country or elsewhere—that there may be conscription in Canada. In speaking in the first two or three months of this war I made it clear to the people of Canada that we did not propose conscription. I repeat that announcement to-day with emphasis.

Later on during the same session, when proposing the adoption of the petition to the Imperial Parliament, asking for an extension of the life of this Parliament, Sir Robert Borden on February 8, 1916, said:

> On the outbreak of war, the Government of Canada pledged the assistance of the Dominion to the Empire, and when the subject of war was brought before Parliament in the August session of 1914, the Government presented proposals regarding assistance to the Empire in the war upon a larger scale than had ever before been proposed or undertaken. It might have been urged by persons who are specially influenced by constitutional usage that a mandate from the electorate should have been then sought for that reason.
>
> The Government considered that public opinion was practically unanimous in supporting the course which the Government proposed.

Canada was thereby pledged by the then legally elected representatives of her people, without a dissenting voice, to the voluntary contribution of all that she could give and all that she could do, to avenge Belgium, punish Germany, for her disregard of treaty rights, and assure the continuance of that democracy, liberty, and freedom of which we always have been, yes, of which I hope we may always be so proud. We were to have no conscription, our contribution was to be voluntary, and our duty as members of Parliament resolved itself into carrying out the pledges made when we had a right to make them. We did not know, we could not believe, in spite of the then current rumours to this effect, that there would be troubles and disagreements in the Cabinet itself, and that politics, patronage and graft would continue to exist in the party opposite as has been clearly proven on many occasions since that date. We consented to an extension of our mandates to save the turmoil of a general election and to demonstrate to the world, what the people of Canada already knew, that unlike its opponents, the Liberal party was more concerned about winning the war than in attaining office and dispensing party favours to party friends. I have been told by speakers who favour this Bill, that, because conscription has been adopted in France, in England and in the United States, conscription must be adopted here. I will refer to England later on in my address and show that conscription has not been so popular nor so successful there as was originally hoped for. I remember the words of the hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Neely) yesterday, when he heaped praise upon the United States for their entry into this world-war, and for the immediate adoption of conscription in that country. With him and with those who applauded those words, I heartily agree.

It was a great date in the history of humanity when the United States entered this war. Despite the Monroe doctrine, despite German immigration, despite the ties of all kinds binding the two countries, the aggressive policy of Germany forced into the war the nation which was most firmly resolved to remain at peace. President Wilson conducted his policy from the first, like the great man of law that he is. His impassibility and his refusal to pass judgment sometimes surprised us, but his attitude from the very first gave his final decision the force of a verdict, the verdict of the conscience of humanity before the tribunal of history. But although the moral influence of the United States will be great, her material assistance counted in men—conscription and all—is for the present limited to less than one million—proportionately the same number sent by Canada during the first few months of the war. France has given, and is giving, the last drop of her blood. All honour to her for it.

But, Sir, even if because conscription was adopted in those countries, is that a reason for us to impose it upon the Canadian people? In which of those countries did the leader of the Government tell the people until the very last minute that conscription would not be necessary, and then impose it upon them witnout preparation and without education, like a cloud-burst from a clear blue sky. I blame this Government for having misled the people. If that is too strong a term, then, for having failed to inform them in advance of the gravity and dire necessities of the situation which confronts us. Is it any wonder that this Bill is not accepted with enthusiasm by all the people? Is it any wonder that hundreds of petitions bearing thousands of signatures from all parts of Canada, have been laid upon the table of this House, protesting against conscription and asking this Government to consult the people by means of a referendum before adopting this measure?

What mandate have I, what mandate have any of us, to do more than carry out the pledges made by this Government when, in the words of the Prime Minister himself, it had the people of Canada solidly behind it? Can it claim that solidarity now? Who can tell me that I would today be the member for Shefford, if an election had been held in 1916? Who can say that the Prime Minister would be the representative of Halifax city, much less that he would continue to hold his present position, if he had sought re-election as required by the unamended law in 1916? And if we had been so re-elected and returned upon the pledge then given of "No conscription in Canada," what authority would we now have to force our electors to become soldiers against their will? I will not pretend that this is an illegal Parliament. I do not say that our mandate could not legally be extended by the Imperial Parliament, but I do say that we should adopt no new policy and introduce no new measure of such vital importance without consulting the people. Besides, this Parliament is not complete. There are twenty-three vacant seats to be found here and those twenty-three votes which cannot be given, the eloquence and sound reason of those twenty-three unknown men who cannot be heard upon the merits of this measure, might possibly make a material and permanent difference in the result of the votes upon the Military Service Act.

Who will speak for the electors of Antigonish, whose member resigned on the 30th May, 1916? Who will speak for the electors of Bellechasse, whose member resigned on the 12th of May, 1916? For the electors of Brandon, whose member resigned on the 16th of July, 1915? For the electors of Brome, whose member, the late George H. Baker, was killed at Ypres on the 3rd June, 1916? For the electors of Carleton, Ontario, whose member resigned on the 28th June, 1916? For the electors of Grey East, whose member was appointed to the Senate on the 3rd of December last? For the electors of Hamilton East, whose member died on the 20th of June? For the electors of Kings and Albert whose member has recently been appointed to the Senate? For the electors of Kings, Nova Scotia, whose member resigned on the 24th of April, 1915? For the electors of Lincoln, whose member, the late Mr. Lancaster, died on the 4th of January, 1916? For the electors of Lisgar, whose member resigned on the 16th of July, 1915? For the electors of London, whose member died on the 12th December, 1916? For the electors of Montmagny, whose member resigned on the 6th of June, 1916? For the electors of Montmorency whose member also sits for Charlevoix? For the electors of Nicolet, whose member, Mr. Lamarche, resigned on the 21st of September, 1916? For the electors of Prince, P.E.I., whose member died on the 9th of March, 1915? For the electors of Quebec County, whose member died on the 29th December, 1916? For the electors of Regina, whose member resigned on the 20th of October, 1916? For the electors of Restigouche, whose member died on the 17th of November, 1915? For the electors of Soulanges, whose member also sits for Quebec East? For the electors of Yarmouth, whose member died in the memorable Parliament Buildings fire on the 3rd of February, 1916? For the electors of Stanstead, whose member died on the 17th of October, 1916? And last, but not least, who will speak for the electors of Terrebonne, whose member, Mr. Gedeon Rochon, died on the 11th of February, 1917, and to whom, in the absence of the Prime Minister, not even a passing reference was made in this House by the leaders whom he had served so faithfully and so well.

If I had authority to speak for the electors of Shefford and bind them by my vote in this House; if I was to vote upon this measure according to the wishes of the majority of those electors I could do nothing else than vote as I have already stated.

I do not pretend for a moment that they are all opposed to conscription; far from it. Three-quarters of the population and two-thirds of the electors are French Canadians. One-quarter of the population and one-third of the voters are English-speaking Canadians. Most all of the former and a large number of the latter are opposed to conscription and have frankly told me so. The majority of the English-speaking electors are in favour of conscription. They favour compulsory military service. Many leading citizens of my county and city, high up in the financial and business life of our Dominion, have not waited for conscription to give their lives, their brothers and their sons to our sacred cause. I cannot believe, Mr. Speaker, that after making such a sacrifice for British freedom and British democracy, they can to-day advocate that popular sovereignty be trampled under foot by a Parliament without a mandate from the people which it pretends to represent. They are in favour of conscription though their neighbours be against it. They believe that the majority of Canadians are in favour of compulsory military service, but whether this be so or not, they are willing that the people of Canada should be consulted, and they are prepared, believing, as they do, in government of the people by the people, to abide by the result of that referendum, whatever it may be. Is that not the spirit which should animate every true Canadian? Is not that the stand which should be taken by all those who, like my right hon. leader, desire that inter-racial and inter-provincial strife shall forever cease, and that upon the golden wedding anniversary of Confederation, peace, harmony and happiness shall prevail in every corner of our great Dominion? The French-Canadians are a small minority in this country. They are willing that in every matter where their rights and privileges are not concerned the will of the majority should prevail. This measure relates to militia and defence; it is a Federal matter, and all they ask is that the people of Canada be consulted. Not the people of Quebec, but the people of all Canada. They are ready and willing to submit to the will of the majority. Do they ask too much?

The majority of my electors desire a referendum, and if that referendum is refused they ask me to vote against the Bill. On the 20th of June I handed to the Clerk of this House a petition which bears 1,439 signatures, among which are to be found those of several of the aldermen of the city of Granby, the mayor of that city, the pastor and curates of the Catholic parish of the same name, and hundreds of our leading citizens, including that of a proud father of two sons, one of whom has been wounded and the other killed somewhere in France. The petition is as follows:

To The Honourable The House of Commons,
In Parliament Assembled.

The Petition of the undersigned inhabitants of the City and Township of Granby, in the County of Shefford, in the Province of Quebec
Respectfully represents

1. That on the 17th day of January, 1916, the right Honourable Sir Robert Borden, Prime Minister of Canada, speaking in the House of Commons, said: "I made it clear to the people of Canada that we did not propose any conscription. I repeat that announcement to-day with emphasis;"

2. That on the same date, the Right Honourable Sir Wilfrid Laurier, speaking in the House of Commons, said: "There is to be no conscription in Canada;"

3. That it was only after these statements had been made that the life of the present Parliament was extended by the Imperial Parliament;

4. That when the people of Canada through their representatives asked for the extension of the present Parliament, it was with the distinct understanding clearly stated by the leaders of both parties that there would be no conscription in this Dominion;

5. That on the 18th day of May, 1917, the Right Honourable Sir Robert Borden, Prime Minister, announced that he would introduce a measure into the House of Commons providing for compulsory military service in Canada;

6. That the present Parliament whose life was extended upon the express understanding that there would be no conscription, has no mandate to enact any law or resolution providing for conscription for overseas service;

Wherefore Your Petitioners pray that Your Honourable Body do not pass any Bill or Act imposing compulsory military service upon the people of Canada until the mandate of Your Honourable House has been renewed by means of a general election and until the people of Canada have been consulted by means of a referendum;

And, Your Petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

Granby, Que., June 3, 1917.

Copies of resolutions from four municipal councils in my county contain the same request. I am sure that the House will bear with me, while I read them in the exact words in which they were received:

Province of Quebec,
Municipality of Roxton Township.

At a special meeting of the municipal council of Roxton Township, in the county of Shefford, held in the Secretary Treasurer's office, in the village of Roxton Falls, Saturday, the 26th day of May, one thousand nine hundred and seventeen, at the ordinary hour of the sitting of said council, at which meeting were present councillors Hyacinthe Dupuy, Wilfrid Boileau, Alfred Brisebois, Edward Coté and Didace Bédard, all the councillors forming a quorum of the members of said council, with Mr. Damase Briu, the mayor, as chairman.

The Secretary-Treasurer was also present.

Councillor Charles Brisebois is absent, but he was duly notified.

Whereas it is understood that the Prime Minister of Canada, the Hon. R. L. Borden, is introducing a Bill, with a view to provide for conscription in the Dominion of Canada.

Moved by Councillor Hyacinthe Dupuy, seconded by Councillor Wilfrid Boileau,

That Mr. Georges Boivin, member for the county of Shefford in the House of Commons, be asked to give his vote against this law and that he demand by speech in Parliament that, before such measure be adopted, the people of the Dominion of Canada be called upon to express their views concerning it by means of general elections and that copy of the present resolution be addressed to the said Georges Boivin and to La Presse.

Unanimously adopted.

Province of Quebec,
Municipality of Roxton Falls Township.

At a monthly and regular meeting of the council of Roxton Falls Village, held Monday, the 7th day of May, one thousand nine hundred and seventeen, at the ordinary place and hour of the sittings of the council, in accordance with the provisions of the Municipal Code of the Province of Quebec; at which meeting thus adjourned were present: Mr. F. X. Racine, Mayor; Councillors J. B. Lavallée, P. D. McGrail, L. Beauregard, A. Racine, W. Despart, J. Bouchard, forming a quorum, with His Honour the Mayor as Chairman.

It is enacted by resolution of the council as follows:

Whereas the Prime Minister of Canada, the Hon. R. L. Borden, is introducing a bill which provides for conscription in the Dominion of Canada, it is moved by Councillor W. Despart, seconded by Councillor J. B. Lavallée, that Mr. Geo. H. Boivin, member for the county of Shefford in the House of Commons, be asked to vote against this law and that he demand by speech in Parliament that, before such measure be adopted, the people of the Dominion of Canada be called upon to express their views upon this question by means of a plebiscite, and that copies of the present resolution be addressed to the said Geo. H. Boivin and to the press.

Unanimously adopted.

Province of Quebec,
Municipality of the Parish of Ste. Anne de Stukely.

At a regular meeting of the council of the parish of Ste. Anne de Stukely, held Monday, the 7th day of May, one thousand nine hundred and seventeen and adjourned until the 4th day of June, at the ordinary place and hour of the sittings of the council, at which session, so adjourned, were present: Mr. Achille Lagrandeur, Mayor, Councillors Uldéric Brien, Félix Ther-rien, Ovila Petit, Joseph Allain, Edouard Casavant, Ferdinand Ducharme, forming a quorum, with His Honour the Mayor as Chairman.

It was moved by Councillor Félix Therrien, seconded by Councillor Ferdinand Ducharme, that the council of the parish of Ste. Anne de Stukely beg Mr. Geo. H. Boivin, member for the county of Shefford in the House of Commons, to give his vote against the Conscription Act and that he demand by speech to the Parliament of Canada that, before passing this measure, the people of Canada be called upon to express their opinion concerning it by means of a plebiscite and that copies of the present resolution be addressed to the said Geo. H. Boivin and to the Journal de Waterloo.

Unanimously adopted.

Province of Quebec,

Corporation of the Village of Ste. Prudentienne.

At a regular session of the municipal council of the village of Ste. Prudentienne (Roxton Pond) held the 5th day of June, 1917, were present: Mr. Dolphis Goyette, acting Mayor, and Councillors Hector Casavant, Dr. Emile Labelle, J. B. Lebrun and Félix Larose.

The following resolution was unanimously adopted.

Dr. Emile Labelle moves, seconded by Mr. Félix Larose, that the municipal council of the village of Ste. Prudentienne, representing the views of all the tax payers of this municipality, protest with all possible energy against the proposal of the Government of the Dominion of Canada to impose military conscription upon this country, without having previously consulted the electors by means of a plebiscite or general elections.

And that copies of the present resolution be sent to Sir Robert Borden, Prime Minister, to Sir Wilfrid Laurier, leader of the Opposition, to Mr. George H. Boivin, member for the county of Shefford, and to the newspapers.

As I stated before a certain percentage of my electors favour conscription and I respect their opinions as I respect those of every hon. member in this House who has spoken in favour of the measure, without insulting those of us who do not share his views. Like the hon. member for West Lambton, (Mr. Pardee) those electors are of the opinion that Canada's first duty is to send men and more men to fill the gaps in that human wall of Allied heroes whose bodies form a rampart against the flood of German barbarism and German autocracy. Like him their opinions have become convictions. They see a few hundred young men idle upon the streets of our cities and decide immediately that they should be in the trenches. And Sir, I agree with them, if those men cannot find work just as useful to the cause to be done at home. But who should decide this question as the court of last resort, if not the people of Canada?

Now Sir, let us see, why the majority of my electors do not believe in conscription as the best method of winning the war. The hon. member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Gauthier) has given us their economic reasons and figures in hand, have shown us the necessity of keeping our men at home for the proper administration, operation and development of the farms and factories upon which Great Britain so largely depends for its food and its ammunition.

The hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Lapointe) has delved into the pages of history and brought forth arguments, which even the able Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen) could not destroy, to prove that conscription for military service overseas is contrary to the spirit of our Milita Act and the Canadian constitution. The hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) whose reputation as a speaker of superior ability was well known to us all, delivered his masterpiece during the course of this debate and gave the moral objections which his compatriots have to the present measure.

The French Canadians have been taught for years that the truest and best patriotism is the love of that corner of the earth where they were born and where they hope to die, the attachment to that corner of the earth fertilized by the blood and ashes of their forefathers who on more than one occasion, and notably in 1776 and in 1812, fought to repulse the invader and maintain the supremacy of Great Britain under which they have learned that true democracy means, in addition to the respect of minorities, the government of the people by their freely elected representatives. As the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) stated the other day, they are a logical people. I take his word for the fact that they are more logical than he is himself. They cannot understand how in the name of democracy they can be forced, without consultation or consent, by a Parliament which has outlived the term for which it was elected, to take up arms and fight in Europe, even for the most sacred cause.

A Parliament maintained in office by a higher authority imposing conscription upon them, they consider to be autocracy and not democracy. Are they not right? Must we resort to German methods to defeat Germany? The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) who favoured us with his views upon this Bill, says that he is in favour of conscription in times of war to avoid conscription in times of peace. Conscription in peace is bad, conscription in war is worse unless it is the last and only way of winning the war. Cannot he trust the citizens of his adopted country to decide whether or not it must be imposed? If not, why did he ever take up his abode among people in whom he has so little confidence? His answer might be that he is familiar with conditions in Quebec and fears the French Canadian vote in that province. But, Sir, the majority of our citizens in Canada are of his own race, and if that majority decides in favour of the measure, the French Canadians of Quebec will bow to the will of that majority and, when they do, they will be found in the front ranks repeating the glorious exploits of their brothers who fought and died at Courcelette and elsewhere in the present war.

The population of loyal Ontario—I use the word loyal in its true sense, because its sons have enlisted numerously and nobly in the cause of the Empire of which they form a part, is larger than that of the province of Quebec and its voting power is proportionately much greater, owing to the fact that its number of children is much less. The population of western Canada is much greater than that of the Maritime Provinces, who so far have not been taxed with disloyalty. If Ontario outvotes Quebec; if western Canada outvotes eastern Canada, within two months conscription can be imposed upon all Canadian slackers with the consent and approval of a united people. But, said the hon. member for Carleton, what will happen if the result of a referendum is unfavourable to conscription? The answer is easy indeed. There will be no conscription and popular sovereignty will have achieved another victory without the loss of a single drop of blood. Voluntary recruiting will continue and if it does not, owing to the mistakes and misdeeds of the Government who have allowed graft and partisanship to creep into the very heart of the Canadian army, then the right hon. the Prime Minister and his colleagues will have to hand over the reins of office to other, if not better men. Would that be a national calamity? I am prepared to admit that worse men might be found, but less than a month ago every Conservative newspaper in Canada was urging the Prime Minister to get some that were better.

If the people are mistaken, it will be the duty of the new government to enlighten and educate them and again consult them before imposing conscription. But, Sir, I have no fear of the people making a mistake in this matter. I am prepared to put my opinion aside to adopt that of the majority. I ask only that they be consulted. I am not an ardent admirer of the referendum. I would prefer to see a general election with party lines obliterated and a candidate in every county supporting conscription and another opposing it. But, Sir, every one admits that to be impossible. There are men in both parties who support conscription, there are men in both parties who oppose it. Both are entitled to the respect of their opinions and convictions. The division is not alone upon racial or provincial lines.

My firm conviction is—and it is shared by many of my fellow members who support the Bill—that there are in every province of this Dominion a number of citizens who support conscription and a number who oppose it. If, as every one believes—except a few omnipotent beings who claim they should lead but who really attempt to drive their constituents—that the will of the majority should prevail, how better can it be ascertained than by allowing each and every voter in Canada, our soldiers included, alone in a polling booth with his conscience and his God, to answer truthfully the question: Are you in favour of conscription? If the result of the vote is not favourable to conscription it will mean that the present Government has not given the proper education to the people and removed the causes which might prevent a favourable vote. If it does not mean that, then it will mean that conscription is not necessary and that compulsory military service is not the best way to win the war.

This, Mr. Speaker, brings me back to the reasons why the majority of my electors do not consider conscription to be the best policy at the present time.

They are opposed to the measure because they cannot, even now, secure the farm labour required to till the soil of their province and supply the needs of the munition workers and other inhabitants of our cities and towns. They are opposed to conscription because they believe the words of Lord Shaughnessy, who has never been taxed with disloyalty, that Canada requires her men for her farms and factories. They are opposed to conscription because of the almost frantic appeals made by the Department of Agriculture for more production and greater production. They are opposed to conscription because they are aware of the fact that farm labourers for western Canada are advertised for in the American press and that they are promised immunity from compulsory service.

They are opposed to conscription because they have been told that there will be less wheat harvested in Canada this year than last year, and that there are this year less acres of wheat land under cultivation.

They are opposed to conscription because they consider it will be a great deterrent to European immigration after the war has been concluded and peace restored.

They are opposed to conscription because they are convinced that, with national service properly organized, the few thousand young men now found idle upon the streets of our cities could do better work and more effective work upon the farm than in the trenches.

They are opposed to conscription because they consider that Great Britain, with her small territory and large population, needs food supplies worse than men.

They are opposed to conscription because they have read of the German submarine campaign and the ravages it has caused in the merchant shipping of the Empire. They believe that more boats, both large and small, should be speedily built, and that our surplus men should be employed in building them.

They are opposed to conscription because it will, by placing conscripts and volunteers together, diminish the glory of our gallant boys now at the front.

They are opposed to conscription because they consider that Canada's contribution of 420,000 men should be proportionately equalled by the other allied nations and sister dominions before Canada is asked to do more.

They are opposed to conscription because they lack confidence in the present Government, and have their doubts about the fair and impartial operation of the selective system.

They are opposed to this measure because the age limit is even greater than the age limit in the conscription law of England, because married men with large families of children are placed in the same class and will be called at the same time as married men without children, and because the system of appeals for the privilege of exemption, from one tribunal to another, no matter how fair these tribunals may be, will favour the rich and prove a hardship to the poor.

They are opposed to conscription because they consider this war to be a war of attrition and their own country in no immediate danger of attack.

They are opposed to conscription as it is now proposed, because the present Bill conscripts man-power alone and leaves wealth and riches untouched.

They are opposed to conscription because Nationalist eloquence, paid for by Conservative gold, has argued that Canada owed nothing to England.

They are opposed to conscription because their boys who volunteered were not left under the command of the officers in whom they had confidence and to whom they had been confided by their fathers and mothers, but were sent to other regiments and their officers returned home.

They are opposed to conscription because the only member from my province who holds a mandate direct from the people, the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue, obtained that mandate under false pretences by assuring the electors of Dorchester that there would be no compulsory military service in Canada.

They are opposed to conscription because they love their province and their homes, and do not care to follow the advice of the Postmaster General and avoid service by crossing an unguarded boundary line of 4,000 miles between Canada and the United States.

They are opposed to conscription because selective conscription has not been a success in England, as evidenced by the following article entitled "The Great War," by Brigadier-General F. Z. Stone, in the Saturday Review, May 12, 1917:

"What are we doing to give them the men? Some of the tribunals have gone on strike, because they object to the revision of their findings by the appeal courts; friction is in many cases becoming increasingly evident between the military representation and the civil members of the local tribunals, Brig. Gen. E. A. Grove stated in a letter read at the sitting of the Chesham (Bucks) tribunal that there were 50,000 exemptions current in his district, most of which were unconditional without any time limit. He also stated that since January 1st 40,831 applications had been made for exemption, and three out of four men had been exempted. If this is representative of the average state of affairs throughout the country, we may, at all events, congratulate ourselves on the vastness of our untapped resources, whatever we may think of the spirit in which the call for men has been met hitherto.

They are opposed to conscription because, as pointed out so ably by the hon. member for Kamouraska, it is opposed to the spirit of the Canadian constitution.

They are opposed to conscription because they consider that the law was introduced more for the purpose of winning the next general election and causing people to overlook the scandals of this war Administration, than to assist in winning the war.

They are opposed to conscription because they fear that Canada, in spite of her vast natural resources, cannot do more than provide adequately for her volunteers and the pension fund required to do justice to the boys already at the front.

They are opposed to conscription because of the campaign of slander carried on against Quebec in the other provinces, and the statements made even by a minister of the Crown in this House, that the Bill was introduced because Quebec had not done its duty.

The Honourable the Minister of Labour, speaking in this House on June 20, 1917, said, as reported at page 2592 of the unrevised Hansard:

"If they (recruits) were to come as numerously from that province (Quebec) as they have from some of the other provinces, neither the Militia Act nor the Military Service Act would be necessary at all."

At page 2595, in the same speech, he throws out these remarks:

The question is not whether our sons fought valiantly at Queenston Heights or Chateauguay—some people think we should live on that as long as possible—but whether the sons of those sires have inherited the heroism and the valour that enabled their fathers to do credit to themselves and to their country on the field of battle. The spirits of our sires who fought at Queenston Heights and Chateauguay hover over us to-day; God grant that they do not look down upon any degenerate or recreant sons.

My answer to those remarks is not that Quebec has done as much as any other province, but that it has done more than it has received credit for, and more than any other province would have done under similar circumstances. There are men in our province, many of them, both Conservatives and Liberals, both English and French, who have sought for and found the reasons for the lack of enthusiasm among our people, so far as recruiting is concerned.

The hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) referred to the defects in the recruiting system. I need not repeat, but let me add that patronage and partisanship resulted in the dismissal, or placing upon the reserve list, of several men who were willing to sacrifice home, business, family and fortune, for the privilege of leading a battery or a battalion to meet the Germans.

I will cite just one example. It is the case of Col. J. Bruce Payne, of Granby. I cannot, without infringing upon the rules of debate, give all the details, but I propose to do so when the Militia Estimates are again considered in Committee of Supply. Col. J. Bruce Payne, who is a well known cigar manufacturer, had for years been in command of the 15th Shefford Field Battery, and had been for some time officer commanding the 7th Brigade. The fact that he was a Liberal in politics drew upon him the ire of Col. Morrison, Director of Artillery at Ottawa, and during the first days of the war Col. Payne was placed upon the reserve list of officers, without excuse other than a pretended offence, which was later brought home to another officer. The former Minister of Militia and Defence, to whose attention the matter was brought by myself, took the required steps to replace Col. Payne upon the active list, and soon after authorized him to recruit the 27th Battery for overseas service. He gladly accepted, left his large cigar business and other interests in the hands of his employees, and, having the confidence of his fellow-citizens, he found no difficulty in securing the consent of their parents to bring with him to England and France a large number of the young men who were members of his local battery. He successfully passed his medical examinations, and, after training at Valcartier and replacing several drafts made upon his battery, proceeded with it overseas. Some time after the arrival of the Battery at Westenhanger hutments in England, General Morrison, who had also gone overseas, was given command of the Artillery Division. Without reason or justification, so far as Col. Payne knows to this day, he was removed from his command and sent to Ross Barracks, where he remained for almost two months, and from where he sailed for home, to report for instructional duty, and later, secured his discharge. London Truth of November 3, 1915, has the following to say about General Morrison:—

"If there is any truth in statements current at Folkestone, the military authority in Canada will do well to keep an eye on Brigadier-General E. W. B. Morrison. This officer having gained the D.S.O. at the front, returned to take over, at the beginning of October, the command of the Canadian artillery training in that part of Kent. After about three weeks he summarily removed the officers commanding five batteries and an ammunition column commander. This was apparently done without warning or reason given. All these officers, some of whom, if not all, have come out in command of their batteries from Canada, are transferred to the Reserve Brigade which means that their prospects of going to the front are closed for an indefinite time in favour of the new selections of the brigadier. Such a wholesale shunting of men at such short notice will require a good deal of justification. The brigadier seems to have had in Canada the reputation of being rather "a harbitrary gent" and arbitrariness on the above scale may have its disadvantages in a voluntary army."

In the meantime, the fathers and mothers who confided their sons to Col. Payne have worried over the welfare of their children, and, in many cases, young boys have been kept from enlisting in other regiments owing to the incident just referred to. Col. Payne was removed from his command to please General Morrison, who wanted to even up old political scores in Canada and give the best positions to his own favourites.

The General remains in command of an Artillery Division and no redress is possible under this Government. Proper admonition to the political general, and, better still, his return to Canada, where he could be kept under the eyes of the Headquarter's Staff, would have assisted recruiting, but it would have spoiled the political game which must be played, even at the price of conscription.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT (Simcoe): Is the hon. gentleman not aware that Colonel Morrison is under the immediate control of the British General in charge over there?

Mr. BOIVIN: Precisely; I have no doubt about that whatever.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: Then how did political pull keep him there?

Mr. BOIVIN: I did not say that political pull kept him there, but I said that political pull sent Colonel Payne home.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: It is a good job that Colonel Morrison was kept there.

Mr. BOIVIN: In February, 1916, I had the honour of addressing two large recruiting meetings at Massey Hall in Toronto. I am not pretentious enough to believe that my voice was required to urge the people of Ontario to enlist, but I took advantage of the invitation to thank them for what they had done and were doing for Belgium and France, as well as for democracy and civilization.

I had my own province in mind when I went to Toronto to address those meetings.

I was anxious that Quebec should do its duty and I was already aware of a few of the reasons which rendered some, if not all of my compatriots, less enthusiastic about recruiting than they would otherwise have been. At that meeting I deprecated the speeches made by Bourassa and Lavergne in the province of Quebec, but in doing so I warned my audience that the school laws of Ontario were being used by many as an argument against recruiting in my province. Striking Regulation 17 from the school laws of Ontario would have sent more French Canadians to the front than this Military Service Bill. Remember, Sir, that I did not then discuss, and I do not propose to discuss now, the merits or the demerits of Ontario school legislation; that is a matter for Ontario to decide. But I say once more to the people of Ontario: even if you are justified in making the law you have made; even if the law is not as unfair to the French Canadians as they believe it to be; even if their refusal to obey the law is deserving of censure—would not the sending of 25,000 more men from Quebec to fight Germany have been worth the price of meeting the French Canadians half way and of giving to their children the right to study their geography and history and arithmetic in French? What reply can the recruiting officer or the public man who is appealing for recruits in Quebec, give to the man who says: You ask me to go and fight for liberty and democracy under the British flag. You want me to fight for the rights of small nations and minorities to govern themselves and enjoy their own religion, language and laws. You compare my liberties with those of German subjects. But what about Ontario and Manitoba? Are they not British provinces? My brother, my uncle, or my cousin, who lives there, tells me that he is deprived of the right to have his children taught their own language.

Mr. BLAIN: My hon. friend must know, if he knows anything about it, that that is absolutely incorrect.

Mr. BOIVIN: I am willing to admit that the statement of the Quebec peasant that his relatives are deprived of the right of having their children taught in their own language, may be incorrect. But when we endeavour to explain we have to produce Regulation 17, and admit that he is wrong for the first two years only and that after that he is absolutely right.

Mr. BLAIN: If the inspector makes the statement that the child shall be taught longer than two years the child is taught longer than two years. My hon. friend must remember that Regulation 17 was put upon the statute-book not as against the French-speaking minority, but as in their favour.

Mr. BOIVIN: All I can say is that it was a very queer way of favouring the French Canadian minority.

The hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Ernest Lapointe) seeing the condition of affairs, moved the following resolution in this House on May 9, 1916:

That it has long been the settled policy of Great Britain whenever a country passed under the sovereignty of the Crown by treaty or otherwise, to respect the religion, usages and language of the inhabitants who thus become British subjects:

That His Majesty's subjects of French origin in the province of Ontario complain that by recent legislation they have been to a large extent deprived of the privilege which they and their fathers have always enjoyed since Canada passed under the sovereignty of the British Crown, of having their children taught in French.

That this House especially at this time of universal sacrifice and anxiety, when all energies should be concentrated on the winning of the war, would, while fully recognizing the principle of provincial rights and the necessity of every child being given a thorough English education, respectfully suggest to the Legislative Assembly the wisdom of making it clear that the privilege of the children of French parentage of being taught in their mother tongue be not interfered with.

This was not a want of confidence motion. It had nothing to do with the policy of this Government. Still it was bitterly opposed by those same members who to-day claim that the province of Quebec is not doing its duty. It was voted upon on May 11, 1916, and defeated by a vote of 107 to 60. Do you not think, Mr. Speaker, that a united appeal from the Parliament to the legislature of Ontario would have had some weight with the Government of that province? If every one had said: this request is consistent with British liberty and British democracy; do you not think that such an appeal would have had its effect upon recruiting in Quebec? Instead, however, we were told by members on the other side of this House that the French Canadians had no rights outside the province of Quebec. The member for North Perth (Mr. Morphy) said:

It is absolutely admitted by the speakers on both sides of the House that there can be no just claim by the French Canadian people of Ontario to any legal right to the use of their language in the school system of that province.

The member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) put the following question to the member for South Toronto (Mr. Macdonell):

Is the descendant of a Frenchman whose family has lived in the Detroit river settlement for a hundred and fifty years a newcomer to Ontario?

To which the member for South Toronto replied:

He is entitled to only such rights and privileges as the constitution as the province of Ontario allows him.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACDONELL: Does the hon. gentleman want to break the constitution of any province?

Mr. BOIVIN: Not at all. But in the course of a speech in which the hon. gentleman endeavours to point out that the French Canadians are asking too much, he answers the question whether French Canadians have any rights in Ontario by saying: they are entitled to only such rights and privileges as the constitution of Ontario allows them. The people of Quebec, who regard their language as the most sacred right next to their life and their religion, and who were told that their rights were limited to their own province, took it for granted, Sir, that their rights and their obligations were co-existent, and that, as their rights and privileges were limited to Quebec, there also was to be found the limit of their obligations. I do not advance that theory, but I say that it is one of the things which retard recruiting in Quebec. Can they be blamed for this belief when the New Witness, a publication of London, England, the heart of the Empire, completing an article which was read by the member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) the other evening, which he found in its issue of May 24, adds the following in its issue of May 31, 1917:

By the help of a printer's error in last week's comment, we are now able to state very clearly the gravity of the French Canadian grievance. We said that French-speaking masters of Ontario were forbidden to teach French in their schools. Now, that obviously would not matter much, for all their scholars speak French—it is their mother tongue. What we meant to say was that the French-speaking masters are forbidden to teach their French-speaking scholars in French. A devlish trick! We published our comment on Empire Day, and that day was marked in Montreal by demonstrations against conscription, accompanied by the breaking of a few windows and the blacking of a few eyes. And now the English press invites you to consider the disloyalty of these French Canadians of Montreal. Luckily, in the province of Quebec there is a French-speaking majority, and the Legislature is unlikely to imitate the monstrous example of Ontario and Manitoba. But is it reasonable to expect that conscription will be welcomed by men of a race which is suffering elsewhere such tyranny from English-speaking majorities without hindrance from the Imperial Government? That they should have volunteered so freely was more than we had the right to expect. It was far more than Prussia expected of the Poles. That we shall get many more volunteers is doubtful. Apparently Ireland has taught us nothing. Once again, we are doing our best to estrange the people from our cause. But, say some, have we the right to say to Ontario that she shall not forbid the use of French in French Canadian schools? Certainly, we have that right. We ought not to allow her to do anything which offends against the principle of equal rights for all the peoples of the Empire, which is supposed to be the basis of our Imperial rule.

That is not a comment of mine. It is a comment made under date of May 31, 1917, by the New Witness, a paper published in the English language in London, England, the very heart of the British Empire.

Mr. BLAIN: How does my hon. friend account for the fact that in the French population of Ontario the percentage of enlistments was larger than it was in Quebec, if the grievance on the part of the French Canadian people was so great against the Ontario Government?

Mr. BOIVIN: I can give a very good answer to my hon. friend. From all along the Ottawa Valley in the province of Quebec, hundreds of French Canadian soldiers came to the city of Ottawa to enlist, and Ontario got the credit for their enlistment.

I desire to pay to the sub-amendment moved by the hon. member for Berthier (Mr. Barrette) a little more attention than it really deserves. The hon. member for North York (Mr. J. A. M. Armstrong) has said in this House that Sir Wilfrid Laurier personified French Canada. Does not that explain the telegram sent by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) previous to the 1911 elections approving all the methods employed in Quebec, and containing the now historic words "Anything to beat Laurier?" Does not that message agree with the prediction then made by the Prime Minister: "The voice of Toronto will be the voice of Canada?" The prediction has come true. To-day we see the result; but elections are coming, and something must be arranged to beat Laurier, to destroy the influence of a united Quebec, after the next election. The hon. member for Berthier (Mr. Barrette), and a cleverly engineered sub-amendment, will fill the Bill. A six months' hoist as a sub-amendment!

[Mr. Boivin.]

I have been told by many old and able parliamentarians that a point of order concerning any motion, amendment or sub-amendment, can be raised and discussed at any time before it has been voted upon by the House, or until the point has been considered and decided by the Speaker. I purpose this afternoon, Mr. Speaker, submitting an argument to the effect that this sub-amendment is out of order. I will ask you kindly to consider my remarks after they have been inscribed upon Hansard and you have had time to verify the authorities I may quote, and to give, on Tuesday or Wednesday next, a ruling upon the matter. Let me first say that I accept, fully and unreservedly, the statement made by the Prime Minister, that he had no knowledge of this sub-amendment, and the declaration of the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. L. J. Gauthier) that by his remarks he meant no reflection upon the fairness and integrity of the officer presiding over this Chamber. I take it for granted that the question of the sub-amendment being in order has never been seriously considered. I take the liberty of adding that the point of order raised is not for the purpose of avoiding a vote upon the sub-amendment, and I declare here and now, with the expressed approval of the members on this side who favour a referendum upon the matter, that they will vote against the sub-amendment if it remains before the House. I will vote against it, first, because, according to the admissions made in his speech by the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Boulay) it enables the Tory-Nationalists to assist the Government, by voting for it, then against the amendment of my right hon. leader, and later pretending in Quebec that Laurier was too much of an Imperialist in agreeing to accept the will of the majority, while their friends are pretending in Ontario that he is too much of a Nationalist in proposing a referendum. I will vote against it because my people are democrats and believe that the majority of the Canadian people should be consulted upon such an important question, and they do not want the matter shelved by a six months' hoist unless the referendum is first refused by this Parliament. I will vote against it because I do not consider it to be in order.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let us consider whether this sub-amendment is in order or not. I find in the Votes and Proceedings of June 18 the following:

Sir Robert Borden moved, That the Bill No. 75, An Act respecting Military Service, be now read a second time.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier moved in amendment thereto,—That all the words after the word "That" in the said motion be struck out and the following substituted therefor:—

"the further consideration of this Bill be deferred until the principle thereof has, by means of a Referendum, been submitted to and approved of by the electors of Canada."

And a Debate arising thereon, the said Debate was, on motion of Mr. Morrison, adjourned.

In the Votes and Proceedings of June 20, I find this:

The House resumed the adjourned Debate on the proposed motion of Sir Robert Borden for the second reading of Bill No. 75, An Act respecting Military Service and the proposed motion of Sir Wilfrid Laurier in amendment thereto:—"That all the words after the word "That" in the said motion be struck out and the following substituted therefor:—

"the further consideration of this Bill be deferred until the principle thereof has, by means of a Referendum, been submitted to and approved of by the electors of Canada."

And the question being proposed on the amendment:

Mr. Barrette moved in amendment to the said amendment,—that all the words after the word "That" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:—"this Bill be not now read a second time, but that it be read a second time this day six months."

And the Debate still continuing, the said Debate was, on motion of Mr. Pardee, adjourned.

I have read this, Sir, to point out to you the fact that when my right hon. leader moved his amendment, there was only one word left of the original motion. That was the word "that". His amendment begins with the words "the further consideration." The hon. member for Berthier (Mr. Barrette) comes along with a sub-amendment asking that all the words after "that" in the amendment be struck out, but there is no word "that" in the amendment.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BOIVIN: Hon. members should not laugh too soon. They will perhaps find some authorities that will make them cease smiling. This word "that" was what remained of the original motion. Sir Wilfrid Laurier's motion is struck out entirely, and the amendment of the hon. member for Berthier is inserted. I find in Bourinot's Parliamentary Procedure, edition of 1906, page 318, this statement:

When an amendment has been proposed, it is competent for any member to move an amendment to the same. In this case the original question is laid aside practically for the time being, and the first amendment becomes as it were, a substantive question. The Speaker will then submit the three motions in the order in which they are made, and first take the sense of the House on the last: "Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment to the amendment? If the amendment is rejected, it is regular to move another, provided of course, it is different in purport from that already negatived, as soon as the Speaker has again proposed the question: "Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment to the main motion?"

If the amendment be resolved in the affirmative, it will not be competent to move that it be struck out in whole or in part.

How could the amendment of Sir Wilfrid Laurier be amended by the sub-amendment of the hon. member for Berthier which strikes out every word of that amendment and makes it absolutely another amendment?

I quite agree that the six months' hoist is in order on the motion for the second reading of the Bill, providing it is proposed as an amendment to the main motion; but not otherwise. Hon. gentlemen opposite smiled a few moments ago; some of them even laughed outright. Do they know more about parliamentary procedure than Bourinot, who in his Parliamentary Procedure, 1906 edition, says at page 320:

Only two amendments can be proposed at the same time to a question. Some limit is necessary, and the usage has grown into law, that an amendment to an amendment is allowable, but that no motion to amend further can be entertained until one of the two amendments is disposed of.

A few lines below on the same page we find:

It has also been frequently ruled that an amendment which was merely an expanded negative cannot be proposed from the chair.

There may be a difference of opinion as to whether this is an expanded negative or not. But that is not all. Sir Erskine May, in his excellent work on Parliamentary Practice (Edition of 1906) at page 299, says:

Every amendment proposed to be made, either to a question or to a proposed amendment, should be so framed that, if agreed to by the House, the question or amendment, as amended, would be intelligible and consistent with itself.

I will now read the sub-amendment proposed by the hon. member for Berthier (Mr. Barrette):

That all the words after the word "That" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:—"this Bill be not now read a second time, but that it be read a second time this day six months."

If this sub-amendment is adopted, Sir, how are you going to put from the Chair the amendment of Sir Wilfrid Laurier as amended? Can you do so? Is the sub-amendment in order? Perhaps the authorities cited are not sufficient to satisfy hon. gentlemen opposite. May, at page 293 of his Parliamentary Practice says:

It is an imperative rule that every amendment must be relevant to the question on which the amendment is proposed.

And at page 298, I find:

When the original amendment is to leave out certain words, in order to insert or add other words—

That is absolutely the case here.

—no amendment can be moved to the words proposed to be substituted, until the House have resolved that the words proposed to be left out shall not stand part of the question.

And at page 299, I find this:

An amendment to a proposed amendment cannot be moved, if it proposes to leave out all the words of such proposed amendment; but in such a case the first amendment must be negatived before the second can be offered.

That, I maintain, is the position here. The sub-amendment of the hon. member for Berthier may be quite in order after the House has voted on the amendment proposed by my right hon. leader. I am not bringing this point up because I have any fear about the vote which will be given on this sub-amendment. I have already stated, with the authority of every honourable member on this side of the House who will vote for the referendum, that they will vote against the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Berthier. I shall do so myself. But I want to avoid establishing a precedent in this House, at a time of great excitement in this country, which perhaps will be invoked against us upon other Bills in days to come. My point of order has been submitted. I do not ask for a ruling, Sir, at the present time, but I ask you to give the point of order your attention, and to give your ruling before the vote is taken on the amendment.

I will not refer to the speech of the hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Girard) who preceded me. I moved the adjournment of the debate last night in an earnest endeavour to ascertain whether he was opposed to or in sympathy with the Government upon this question of conscription. I have read Hansard this morning, but I am no more enlightened concerning his intentions. I will not, after speaking so long, refer to the previous speeches. Allow me, however, to congratulate the hon. member for St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames) upon his faith and confidence in the valour of our Canadian soldiers, 100,000 of whom, according to his statement, are required to stop the onward march of 750,000 Germans released from the Russian front.

Let me address a word to the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) who thought the best kind of a speech to make would be another attack upon Laurier and Quebec. Quebec according to his figures had up to May 15 of the present year sent 45,277 men to the front. French Canadians with a population of 1,605,339 had only sent 6,917. This is the kind of argument often used by the detractors of our province, but they overlook the fact that there is another side to the argument. If 1,605,339 French Canadians sent 6,917 men to the front, then 316,103 English-speaking Canadians in that province sent the balance of 38,360—more than 10 per cent of their population, and they are therefore almost twice as loyal to the Empire as the constituents of my hon. friend from Frontenac or those of any other portion of Canada. The figures may be wrong, and the French Canadians may have done a little better than the hon. member would have us believe. If not, I can only account for the loyalty of my English-speaking friends from Quebec by saying that they reside in a province where they are in a minority, and where, owing to the just and fair treatment which they receive from their French Canadian fellow-citizens who form the majority, they are in a better position than any other to appreciate the true significance of British freedom and British fair play.

Just one word of reference to the address of the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue in connection with this debate. His reason for remaining in the Government with the Postmaster General is an excellent one. It is not conviction, it is not principle. I must quote his own words or I will not be believed. He said:

If my colleague Blondin and I would abandon the Government, what other French Canadians would consent to succeed us?

What a calamity it would be, Mr. Speaker, for his race and his country if the hon. minister resigned his portfolio! Especially in view of the fact that he is a good French Canadian, proud of the great men of his race and willing to do them justice!

Not long ago, speaking at a political gathering in Montreal he tried to secure a front page editorial in the Orange Sentinel by accusing Sir Wilfrid Laurier of having sown discord and hatred between the two races who inhabit this country, and in his recent speech he refers to my honoured leader as follows:

I have before me a man of 76 years of age who is ending his career by seeing the two races more divided than ever. History will tell what he could have done but did not try to do.

I listened with amazement to these words falling from the lips of the young minister, who has made several blunders in his comparatively short career. He has even confessed publicly that his blunders were due to his youth, and to the fact that he did not then know the right hon. the Prime Minister. He has told us he was only 29 or 30 years of age when he preached treason to his compatriots—

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: I rise to a point of order. Is it within the rules of the House for an hon. gentleman to say that an hon. member of this House has preached treason in the province of Quebec or anywhere else? That is what the hon. member has charged against the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I did not understand the hon. gentleman to say that the Minister of Inland Revenue had preached treason.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: Those were his exact words; that is why I rose to the point of order. Perhaps the hon. gentleman would not mind repeating what he said.

Mr. BOIVIN: If I could, in repeating the language of the Minister of Inland Revenue, use any other words than his own words, I would not use the word "treason," but what I said was this: That he had already excused himself for having preached treason when he was young in the province of Quebec. I made use of no other expression. I did not attribute treason to the minister.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I do not think the hon. member should use such language.

Mr. BOIVIN: I am not addressing that remark to the minister. I do not wish to insinuate that he is a traitor in any way. I am repeating the words which he used himself. If you rule that I have no right to repeat the words which he used himself, I bow to your ruling.

Mr. WRIGHT: Might not the hon. gentleman read the words from Hansard?

Mr. BOIVIN: I say that he is almost 40 now and we can hardly forgive his want of respect for the white locks of a man whose spotless life, whose ardent patriotism and whose broad statesmanship have been recognized in all parts of the world. The unfortunate allusion of the hon. minister to the grand old man of Canada will not soon be forgotten. His words of scorn will perhaps torture his conscience in years to come, when he will realize that he was the only public man who ever dared to justify his own conduct of former years by such remarks concerning his illustrious compatriot. Slightly younger than the hon. minister, but as a Canadian of his day and generation, may I be permitted to say that long after the name and career of Sevigny have been relegated to oblivion, the fair name and splendid career of Laurier will continue to live in the hearts and memories of his fellow Canadians, irrespective of race and creed. He has been severely attacked during this debate by certain members. History will say of him that he consecrated his talents to his native land and devoted his life to the unity of Canada. Posterity will recall that he was humble as he was great, and that, unlike certain politicians, he was the very essence of a gentleman, genial, kind, considerate, courteous and chivalrous to old and young, great and small, rich and poor alike.

He has, according to the hon. member for South Renfrew, been right upon many occasions in connection with the public business and affairs of this country, but he may be wrong now. That is where I differ from the hon. member for South Renfrew. He was right upon every occasion mentioned by the former Minister of Railways, and he is right now. His amendment has for its object to save the structure of Confederation from disruption and disintegration upon the occasion of its golden jubilee, and it will have my hearty support. I still hope that the Government will accept this amendment and that the people may be consulted upon this proposed law. Had I hoped otherwise I would put a pertinent question to the right hon. the Prime Minister, not directly, Mr. Speaker, because the rules forbid, but through you, Sir, I would ask: "Sir Robert Borden, are you the servant or the master of the people of Canada? If you are their servant, why do you refuse to consult them and obey their wishes? If you are their master, what is the difference between the Canadian Parliament and the German Reichstag?"

Mr. A. C. MACDONELL (South Toronto): Mr. Speaker, I shall, in the few remarks that I will address to the House this afternoon, not attempt to follow the vagaries the wanderings and the meanderings, to use no stronger terms, of the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat (Mr. Boivin), nor do I care to descend to the tone of debate that he adopted throughout the greater part of his speech. What he said has answered itself. If the one hundred and one reasons which he gave why the people he represents are opposed to conscription are analysed and argued out, they will be found to be good reasons why they should favour conscription. Be that as it may, he will have to settle that with his own people and with the people of Canada. We are not here to speak for localities or to consider individual interests. As I understand it, every member of this House is here to represent not only the particular constituency who sends him here, but Canada at large.

My apologies are due to the House for the very little time that I shall take up, because what does appeal to me is that every moment, every hour, every day that is lost in the passing and enforcing of this Act is a crime against "Canada in Flanders." The hon. member for Shefford spoke about the huge petitions that came to this House from all over Canada. That is quite an inaccurate statement to make, not to use any stronger term. I would say about those petitions that have been presented, doubtless by the hon. gentleman and many others from the province of Quebec, that if those who circulated them had devoted to recruiting the energy and time that they did to the circulation of those petitions it would have been better for Canada. The hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat has made no new points in this debate. We are here dealing with a very concrete matter which has been boiled down, during the course of this debate, to a very simple issue of fact. We are told by the philosophers of old that facts are stubborn things, and so they are. The eloquence of the right hon. the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and of those who sit behind him and support him cannot becloud the issue or the facts. What are the facts? We are at war; we all know that. Are we going to consider those who are fighting for us, the men that we sent to Flanders? If we are, then let me read a portion of a cablegram which was received on the 25th of this month by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) from General Currie who is now in supreme command of the Canadian troops as to the need or otherwise of the reinforcement of these troops at the front. General Currie in his message says, in part:

> I note with special gratification your assurance that the troops in the field can rely upon Canada giving them all necessary support. They have given their blood freely to maintain their nation's honour, and now confidently expect that the full fruits of their sacrifices will not be prejudiced. It is an imperative and urgent necessity that steps be immediately taken to ensure that sufficient drafts of officers and men are sent from Canada to keep the corps at its full strength.

That is known and undoubted; no one can controvert it; it is a fact. If we are to abandon these men, then argument ceases. Are we to do that or are we going to maintain our honour and support these men whom we sent over and who honourably went? Surely we are. Every man who has fallen, every wound that has been inflicted, is a call for reinforcements and General Currie has put that in concrete form and in a way that will appeal to everybody. The facts are there and really that is all there is to be said. We need the men. I do not desire to say anything that is acrimonious in this debate.

I desire to say nothing that would put province against province or neighbour against neighbour. This is a time when we should all unite, when, I would not say that the churches should close their doors, but they should close their ranks and come all together. All classes of our people should be united; there should be no race or creed that would separate our people. The provinces themselves should stand shoulder to shoulder. We should be one and united in this effort, for it is one that calls for the whole strength of our country, and if we are divided in making this effort, it must be very indifferent and unsuccessful. Much that has been said during this debate is to be deprecated because of the acrimony that has been cast into it with regard to race and creed. I was surprised to hear the hon. gentleman who has just spoken (Mr. Boivin) wandering over the universe and digging up the bilingual question. What has bilingualism to do with this Bill? We are at war. Are we one people or are we divided? Surely we must stand shoulder to shoulder, man to man, if we are to win this fight—that is the only way to win it.

The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) the other night said many things that could be cavilled at and disputed, but I shall refer to only one of them. He said that the Prime Minister was listening to the voice of Toronto, not to the voice of the soldiers in the trenches, in asking for more infantry at the front, and he went on to dilate upon that and raised racial matters and cries with reference to Toronto. Much has been said about Toronto. Toronto has no recriminations to make, nothing to say. Hon. members may talk about and abuse that city, but the record speaks for itself. What has been done in the Toronto military district, district No. 2? The total enlistments for No. 2 military district to the 15th of June, 1917, were 93,187, very nearly one-quarter of the whole force. Of these the total enlistments of Toronto men numbered 48,391. And yet this is the town that my hon. friend from St. John city and county (Mr. Pugsley) casts stones at; he would ridicule this place. So far as Toronto is concerned, and I am referring to it only because the hon. member for St. John has referred to it, all parties there are agreed. The hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) has pointed out how the parties there had agreed, and so they have; our Liberal friends have come along splendidly there, shoulder to shoulder with Conservative citizens. We know no politics there—I was going to say we know no church differences, but that is not quite correct; but the churches have come together, we are all one, we have church unions of all kinds, and our one thought is the war. The mind of every one there is where his heart is, with the Canadians in Flanders, and this whether the soldiers come from Quebec or from Ontario.

My right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), in his very eloquent speech the other afternoon, said that in his opinion the Parliament of Canada had no right to exercise compulsion, that it was a moribund Parliament, and so on. Let us analyse this statement for a moment. A moribund Parliament? Will my right hon. friend go back to the war session of about four days only, in August, 1914, when he joined with everybody in this House in holding high the hands of the powers that be, the Government of Canada, in sending men, in mobilizing our money, in mobilizing everything. That was a unanimous session, we all agreed to what was then being done. No one suggested that at any future date what was being done then would be questioned as the right hon. gentleman now questions it. Time went by. My right hon. friend knows the necessities of the occasion. No man could foresee what has happened; the wisest men in the world have been misled by the circumstances connected with this war. All that can be done is to make the best of conditions and situations. Who could foretell at that time or at any session that has intervened since, when everything was unanimous, the condition in which we are to-day on account of this war? It is a condition which makes the situation serious because of facts that every man in this House knows have arisen since the outbreak of war. There is no occasion to dilate on the urgency of the conditions, the need of men, the need of money, the necessities to prosecute this war in a manner that no one ever dreamed of. These things have impressed themselves upon the mind of every member. So it is that the parliamentary term was unanimously extended; Commons and Senate agreed to it; my right hon. friend was one of the foremost in agreeing to it; the Imperial Parliament put its imprimatur upon it, and what is the use of talking now of a moribund Parliament, harking back and wasting time on something that has been done and done properly, and has been concurred in by everybody? No one has been forced, no one has been coerced, and we are a Parliament properly constituted. Parliament has a duty to perform. Who else could perform that duty except Parliament? We all know that the situation to-day calls for action by the Government. The Government of a country must govern the country—a country cannot govern itself, it must be led, it must be governed.

What does my right hon. friend propose? I desire to be perfectly frank and fair, and I leave it to posterity to judge if the words I am now going to use are not correct. I say that the policy of the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) to-day is a policy of destruction; it contains no suggestion of any ways and means to accomplish things; it is simply to destroy, nothing must be done, apparently. Why does not the right hon. gentleman suggest something? What is his suggestion? Nothing but to tear down and destroy. The Government, on the contrary, is trying to keep the army at the front, trying to reinforce it; it is raising money to do so. My right hon. friend has always concurred in what has been done and why now at this last moment, when the men at the front are in direst need of reinforcements and strengthening, does he suggest nothing? So far as I can understand his speech, and I think I have done him justice, there is no proposal in it except that of a referendum. Now, what does a referendum mean? In fact a general election would be a straighter and cleaner and a more satisfactory procedure to take. I think it is safe to say, that all the church courts, municipal bodies, boards of trade and similar organizations throughout the country have gone on record as opposed to a referendum. That is a very general statement, but I think that, with certain local exceptions, it is a correct statement to make. What would the referendum mean. What would the referendum be? It is a taking term, a pleasant idea. A referendum to whom? The right hon. leader of the Opposition knows that, under the statute that gives to the soldiers the right to vote at elections, which is known as Chapter 11 of the Statutes of 1915, assented to on the 15th day of April, 1915, no right is given to the soldiers to vote on a referendum. The Act pre-supposes candidates and the volunteer, that is, the soldier at the front must mark his ballot as a vote for the Government, or the Opposition, or the independent candidate, as the case may be, for whom he desires to vote. What provision is there for soldiers voting on a referendum? My right hon. friend has not proposed to amend this Act so that soldiers might have a right to vote on a referendum. Moreover, how could the soldiers' vote be taken? Do not misunderstand me; I am not arguing in favour of a vote by the soldiers at the present time. We all know, those of us who have friends at the front—and I do not intend to speak of my own people who are at the front—what is going on at the front? We can almost hear the heart beats of the soldiers, almost hear the familiar voices of the absent. How can they, in the discharge of their duty, loving and serving their country in this noble manner how can they pass around a ballot box? What do they care about elections? They are fighting for their lives, for the life of their country, for the life of their Empire, side by side with other noble men from the Old Country, from home, and the other Allies. What facilities have they for taking a vote, even if there was a provision in the present Act giving votes to soldiers, to vote in the case of a referendum of this kind?

Then, too, what proportion of the voting population of Canada do the soldiers represent? We have some 425,000 soldiers overseas. The total vote in Canada at the last election was about 1,200,000, and statisticians have esimated that, having regard to the increase of population on the one hand, and having regard to the sending away of soldiers on the other, there are probably as many voters to-day in Canada as there were at the time of the last election. So that we have more than 25 per cent of the total vote of Canada overseas, as sodliers serving their country.

[Mr. Macdonell.]

Referendum is suggested. Referendum to whom? To slackers—those who have not faced their duty, who have not realized their duty? and to the foreign born. As I have said, most of the provinces have passed a law since the last general election giving women votes. How should they be provided for? What provision is there? Who should vote? If there were a referendum and a vote, there would have to be a Franchise Act passed, before the vote could be taken. What does that mean? That means delay, and delay would mean the very destruction of all we have in view. The prime necessity of the moment is expedition. The last thing we want, and the last thing we can afford to have, is delay. I notice my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, in speaking in the House the other day, prefaced his remarks with some very unhappy words—"Hear me for my cause." We know where those words came from. It was from the play of "Julius Caesar," and the words were used by Marcus Brutus, as he came fresh from Caesar's assassination, to explain to the citizens of Rome the death of Caesar. I am not drawing a parallel, but it is a very significant thing. The words are unhappy. They were taken from the unhappy reference that I have referred to, and there is a strange parallel between them—"Hear me for my cause"—my cause, the bleeding soldiers at the front, their wounds unstaunched, the soldiers appealing for reinforcements, help and succour. What does that all mean? It simply means the abandonment of the men who have gone, and the breaking of the pledges we made to them. My right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition is well aware—no man is better aware of what will happen in the event of Germany winning this war. It is not a probable thing, but it is certainly not impossible for her to win the war. My hon. friend, when speaking on this very Bill said: "I believe that the victory of Germany would mean for Canada, as for the rest of the world, envelopment in the black shroud of German insolence, cruelties and barbarities."

What does the right hon. gentleman propose in order to avoid this? This may come. It reminds me of the old legal plea of "Confession and avoidance". All lawyers are familiar with it. My right hon. friend confesses the danger and the urgency, he confesses what would happen to us if Germany should win the war, and, forsooth, he avoids it by some reference to a referendum or something of that kind the old plea of "confession and avoidance," and that is all there is in it.

What is the conscription provided for by this Bill? Is it a fair measure? Every hon. gentleman in this House will agree with me, I think, in saying that voluntary enlistment has outlived its day and done its work. Early in this year the last voluntary enlistment effort was made on the Home Defence plan. It was hoped that men would enlist for home defence, that they would catch the infection of the soldiers' life, and that a martial feeling would come over them, that they would go overseas and join the Canadian Expeditionary Force, and serve their country in that capacity. The home defence effort was enforced vigorously. It was tried and failed, and it is the last voluntary effort possible. I know of no other voluntary effort that is possible now. If there be any, let some person suggest. What is the situation? There being no further voluntary enlistment, we are compelled to adopt conscription, or to abandon our honour and our soldiers at the front. That seems to me the only way. The reasons that are given for opposing selective conscription and for supporting a referendum are various, but it is said by many hon. gentlemen in this House that we should have had conscription from the start. If we had adopted that policy at the commencement of the war, we would certainly have retained in this country many splendid men, and a great many other men, who could easily be spared I will not call them undesirables because they are Canadian citizens—could have gone and served their country overseas, but the Government desired to bear with the people, to make their burden as light as possible. They hoped the war would be won and they resorted to every expedient before resorting to selective conscription. But now, there being nothing left but selective compulsion, it is obvious that it must be adopted. It has been said that by sending more men overseas many of our industries, possibly agriculture, will be more or less interfered with. We cannot have our cake and eat it, but we must win this war. We cannot send our men over there and have them here. No man can be in two places at the same time. But there are still a great number of young men in this country, who can very well be spared. Every hon. gentleman in this House knows, in his own daily life, that thousands of men are going about the cities, to places of entertainment and amusement who could be spared, and there is no reason why a sufficient number of these men should not be sent. The provisions of this Bill are just and humane. Compare them to the lottery system, or the ballot system of the Militia Act, and they are vastly superior to it. As the Prime Minister has said and elaborated over and over again, the Government is only too willing to receive, and fully consider any and all amendments suggested, the idea being to make the burden of selective conscription as unoppressive as it is possible to make it, having regard to the object to be accomplished.

Perhaps it would be labouring an argument if I should refer to the power of Parment either to pass this Act and to put it into operation or to send men overseas under the present Militia Act. But what could be more plain and explicit than the statement made by the leader of the Government in this connection, and the section of the Act which he quoted to the House? Section 69 of the Militia Act, chapter 41 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, provides:—

> The Governor in Council may place the Militia, or any part thereof, on active service anywhere in Canada, and also beyond Canada for the defence thereof at any time when it appears advisable so to do by reason of emergency.

No doubt the leader of the Opposition recollects what took place when that section was enacted. The then Minister of Justice, as reported on page 8083 of Hansard of 1904, made it abundantly clear that under that section the Governor General in Council might send the Canadian militia overseas—say, to India—if in his opinion such a course was necessary. Let me, for the benefit of my friends from Quebec, whom my right hon. friend leads and represents, be reminiscent for a moment. My right hon. friend recollects the condition and history of the old militia of Canada. In 1649 a body of militia, consisting of about 50 men, existed for the protection of the settlers of the colony which is now Canada against the attacks of the Iroquois Indians. The population of the colony at that time was only 1,000. From that day to this we have had a constantly expanding militia, always available for service. In no place was that militia stronger or more willing to be called out than in Quebec; nor in any place did it give better service. The right hon. gentleman knows that at the time of the siege of Quebec, in 1775, the day was largely saved by his own compatriots, the French Canadian militia. In the war of 1812-14 we had an army of 41,000 or 42,000 troops, including about 13,000 British soldiers. I have no desire, especially in view of the splendid behaviour of our friends to the south, to refer to the war of 1812-14 in any other than a purely historical way. Noble men fought on both sides. Those of us who are familiar with our country's history, written as well as unwritten, know that many victories were won by the British and Canadian troops during that conflict. Many were won on American territory, all the way from Mackinaw to the State of Maine. Canadian soldiers invaded the territory of our neighbours to the south, even as they invaded our... Detroit fell; Buffalo, Black Rock, Ogdensburg and Oswego were captured. I ask hon. gentlemen: did our Canadian troops at that time wait for an Order in Council or an Act of Parliament before going across the boundary line and fighting outside of Canada? Should their victories now be annulled and declared unconstitutional—if that were possible—because they went outside of Canada, as my right hon. friend would say, contrary to the terms of the Militia Act? No. They went out and fought, and we know the result of that war, which preserved to the Empire the great heritage of Canada.

I have no desire to refer to Quebec in any terms other than those of fairness and encouragement to further effort. Much has been said in the House concerning the reasons why Quebec has not recruited as largely as she should. Upon that subject I make no comment. Facts are stubborn things, and speak for themselves. But hon. gentlemen from Quebec, and one hon. gentleman from Ontario, the member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham), complained about the recruiting system adopted by this Government in Quebec. They gave excuses for non-enlistment in Quebec, offering as one reason the fact that a Methodist clergyman, Rev. Mr. Williams, was sent to Montreal to assist recruiting. I should like to point out that Major-General Lessard—splendid soldier he is, too—was the officer commanding Military District No. 2 at Toronto at the outbreak of war. He was most active in recruiting after the outbreak of war. He held that post from December 1, 1912, to December 31, 1914, a period which included the first five months of the war, when recruiting was most active and successful. In December, 1914, he was selected to act as Inspector General in Eastern Canada, which position he has occupied up to the present time, with office and headquarters at Toronto. Major-General Lessard is a French Canadian who is proud of his nationality; he makes no bones about it. Did the presence of Major-General Lessard in Toronto hurt recruiting in that city? Has the fact that Sir Eugene Fiset, as good a soldier as can be found in Canada or out of it, and a French Canadian, has been Deputy Minister of Militia, made any difference to recruiting in Ontario? Not in the least. Let us forget such piffling things as the contention made by hon. gentlemen respecting the assignment of a Methodist clergyman to engage in recruiting in Quebec. I understand that some 500 recruiting officers were appointed for Quebec—I have not the exact figures, but I know that a large body of men were appointed. We in Toronto welcomed Major-General Lessard; no man did better work. He was liked, he was looked upon as a splendid soldier from Quebec. No man was more successful in getting the people of Toronto to stand by their arms than Major-General Lessard.

Without going into detail as to the figures of enlistment so far as the different nationalities are concerned, I wish to point out that enlistments among the Canadian-born speaking the English language amounted to 125,245, which is a very good showing. Enlistments among Canadians who were British-born amounted to 155,095. The enlistments among French Canadians in Quebec have already been put on record; I shall not show disparity between those figures and those which I have just given by referring further to them.

The member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Verville) referred last night to the attitude of labour in the matter of selective conscription. I wish to make a frank, and, if you will, a bold statement on that subject. The labour leaders, including the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Verville), who spoke in this House last night absolutely do not speak for labour in Canada. I know something about labour, and I say publicly that they misrepresent and degrade labour, and the day will come when labour will resent their statements. In the city of Toronto and the surrounding district, roughly speaking, 100,000 men have enlisted, and the great majority of the rank and file of those men are from the ranks of labour, and they are splendid men. The workingman nowadays has usually to live in the suburbs of a big city because he cannot afford to live in the downtown parts. There is in the northern part of Toronto a little suburb known as Earlscourt that is famous because it has sent more men to the front than any other part of Canada of its size has done. I say it with grief, pain and anguish, that in that village of Earlscourt one block contains twenty-four widows of workingmen who have died at the front or on active service. I am as much a workingman as the men who claim to speak for labour, and I say that they grossly misrepresent labour. Labour in other countries as well as in Canada is on our side. I notice this despatch of June 21 from Petrograd:

> The all-Russia Congress of workmen and soldiers to-day unanimously resolved upon an immediate Russian offensive.

The working people of Great Britain, Canada and all the Allies are with us in this war. In Great Britain there is no more splendid spectacle than the robust, manly stand of labour in this war. The working classes there have denied themselves many of their privileges; they have foregone many of their rules, regulations, bargains and agreements in order to stand shoulder to shoulder with the state, and the same is true of labour in Canada. Any man who attempts to say that the labouring classes of this country are not in favour of this war, is telling the people of this country what is not true. In Ontario, we have no stronger supporters of recruiting than the labouring classes. If one goes to any of the great recruiting meetings held throughout Ontario, one will find that nine out of ten of the people at those meetings who are applauding the speakers, supporting recruiting and enlisting, are what are commonly called the working classes.

Are not those who are opposing this Bill making a mountain out of a mole hill? Let us realize the facts. Facts are stubborn things. It has been estimated that the number of men in Canada to-day between the ages of twenty and forty-five who would be affected by this measure and who would be proper subjects of consideration under it for military service, amounts to 1,583,000. Of that number 100,000, or a little less than one man in fifteen can easily be spared. A proper and thorough inquiry and investigation, for which this Bill provides, can easily locate more than one man out of the fifteen who can well be spared to serve his country. We are not tearing a man from his wife or his family; we are not taking a man from a sick bed to serve at the front. Only those who are able to go and who have all the qualifications for going and who can be spared, will be called upon to go. There should be no hardships in the selection, and I do not believe there will be any. The statement laid on the Table by the Minister of Militia makes that plain.

Let me say a word about the need of reinforcements at the front. I do not think hon. members would ordinarily, on the public platform, make reference to certain facts to which we feel compelled to refer here, and one of those matters is the present condition of our recruiting and of our casualties. It was stated in this House recently that our casualities now run to something like 10,000 per month. The casualties for May amounted to 10,841, for April to 13,098, and they amounted to less than that during the earlier months of the year. During the last two or three months the casualties have risen enormously, and the enlistments have unfortunately decreased. The total enlistments for the five months, January, February, March, April and May, of this year are 33,712. The total casualties reported from overseas for the same period are 30,272. The total number of discharges in Canada, which are casualties in that sense, being men who have been sent to the hospitals here, is 12,366. Therefore, the total number of casualties reported from overseas and discharges in Canada amounts to 42,638 since the beginning of the year, as against a total number of enlistments of 33,712. The balance is on the wrong side of the books, and the situation is not improving. In the month of May the enlistments amounted to 6,407, whereas the casualties were 10,841. What are we going to do about the matter? The Prime Minister made it amply plain to the House, and it has been made plain by other speakers, that the urgent need is for infantry. In the statement placed before the House by the Minister of Militia, it appeared that there were 126,241 men in England, but the great majority of those men are not effectives. The infantry enlistment is very slight. Of the 6,407 men who enlisted in May, only 1,208 enlisted in the infantry. We cannot shut our eyes to the facts. If this condition continues, what is going to happen? The four divisions at the front will dwindle to three, the three to two and the two to one. Is that what we want? Surely not. Of the 126,241 soldiers in England, only about 28,000 are ready and able to go to France and Flanders.

With casualties at the rate of 10,000 a month, what margin have we, then, to draw upon? On the 4th of June, 1917, we had 136,000 troops of all ranks in France, and on the 1st of June, 1917, there were 17,353 troops of all ranks in Canada. Our forces here are almost depleted, because, since that date, we have continued sending troops overseas, especially since our neighbours to the south have entered the war. The Government to-day is face to face with a condition of dire necessity; the men have to be got.

Then, many of our soldiers are in hospitals. Over 7,000 members of the Canadian forces are under the care of the military Hospitals Commission in Canada. In addition to this, there are in Canadian and British hospitals in Great Britain 22,562 patients. These, of course, make a corresponding gap in our available fighting men available for the front. And yet we often hear the question asked in this House: where are our soldiers? Every man is doing his duty; every man is needed. What has happened to those who have gone? The Minister of Militia, in his speech the other day, gave a very full account of our casualties, which total 99,639. The total number of wounded is 68,629; prisoners of war, 2,460, and dead, 28,550. Something must be done; the devastation is continuing on an increasing scale.

The frontiers of Canada are the most open and extensive of any part of the British Empire. My right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition has been in the habit of pointing to the fact that there are no Germans near our borders, and we can, therefore, wait, he says, until the menace reaches this country. I can tell my right hon. friend that the only place to fight the foe is where we are fighting him now. It is preposterous to think of waiting till the Hun sets his foot in this country. If we wait for invasion, how are we going to protect ourselves?

In days to come Canada may be the centre of the Empire, the bridge, as it were, connecting and cementing the English-speaking races the world over. Having regard to the splendid behaviour of our neighbours to the south, and to the fact that we have sprung from those good old British loins overseas, the day may come when Canada will be the connecting link between British subjects in Europe and English-speaking peoples in the country to the south of us. There may be an English-speaking union; we do not know what will happen, but let us all get together. Let us realize our destiny and make ourselves worthy of it. Let us preserve our country intact, but far more important still, let us preserve our honour and the respect of our neighbours to the south and the good opinion of the people in the Old Country, so that we may be considered worthy to take our place side by side with the Old Country and the country to the south, and play our part in whatever may be the ultimate destiny of the great English-speaking nations of the world. Let us preserve our honour that we may have strength and character when that time comes.

In concluding, perhaps I cannot do better than quote in part a poem which is well-known to some hon. members:

> When the war drums beat no longer,
> And the battle flag is furled,
> In the Parliament of men,
> The federation of the world.

After the war, those of our soldiers who have come through will return to this country, and we all recollect what took place on the return of the heroes of the South African war. The whole country acclaimed their return; the scenes are still vivid in the minds of all of us, and these scenes will be re-enacted only on a greatly enlarged scale. But with these living men there will also return the spirits of the army of the dead. Those who have died overseas will return in spirit, their voices will echo in their households in this country. All that we can say of them is, "the pity of the men who paid the price." Let us realize now the conditions that will be with us after the war, and let us, as parliamentarians charged with this duty, take every step to meet the situation. Let us put in force this Act; it is the only thing we can do; it is our dernière resouree, as the French say. It is the only fair and reasonable thing to do. The Act will have my robust, full-hearted, thorough, and conscientious support, both in its passage through this House and in its operation.

Mr. W. F. CARROLL (South Cape Breton): Mr. Speaker, a great many speeches have been made on the subject which is now before the House, and much information has been given to hon. gentlemen and to the country on the question which we have been deliberating for the last fortnight or so. I shall detain the House only a very few moments with what I have to say, and I do not expect to add very much that is new to the debate.

Since August 1914 Canada has been participating in the greatest war with which this earth has been stricken. Personally, I do not care whether Canada's participation in this war has been for England or with England, whether our participation has been as one of the Allies or as part of one of the Allies. As a matter of fact, Canada has been fighting for human justice, human liberty, and for democracy and the free peoples of the world. In the session of August, 1914, no voice was raised against Canada's participation in this war. We met in the House of Commons a united Parliament, and we voted all the money that was required for Canada's participation in this war. Throughout the length and breadth of this land we were a united people. From north to south and east to west not a voice was raised against Canada's participation in the war, with perhaps the exception of a small section of the people of the province of Quebec, and I do not wish to say anything about the Nationalists, because they are entitled to their opinion, and must answer to their own conscience.

It is for that reason that, since the war began, I have done my humble bit to assist Canada in her participation in this struggle. Canada has done nobly under the voluntary system of recruiting and Canada's public men have done nobly in voting supplies to carry these men along. The time has now come when the people are told that voluntary enlistment has proved a failure. I do not think that is a fair way of putting it. When Canada, with a population of a little over 7,000,000 has contributed over 425,000 of her best to the cause of war I do not think that it can be truly said that voluntary enlistment has been a failure. I am not arguing for voluntary enlistment. It is true that voluntary enlistment at the present time is not as great as it was at the beginning of the war. It is but natural that having contributed over 425,000 men to this war, voluntary enlistment should be a little on the wane. It is not quite fair to the people of Canada to say that this sort of enlistment has proved a failure.

The question however, is as to whether we shall have to resort to conscription of the man power of Canada or whether we shall confine our efforts to the system which we have followed during the past two and a half years. Is it possible for the Government, the Parliament and people of Canada to so utilize the voluntary system of enlistment as to provide for the reinforcement of our boys at the front? Thus we are at the parting of the ways. The Prime Minister when he brought down his Bill, told us that in his opinion, and in the opinion of the Government, we must resort to conscription. To the people of Canada, as to all British peoples, the word "conscription" has in the past had rather a bad odour. A lot of objections that are raised to the Bill before the House are due to that fact. If it is proven to the people that in order to provide proper reinforcements and reserves for the Canadians in the trenches we must resort to conscription, I believe that people will forget the meaning which the word "conscription" has had for them in the past and will support the Bill.

But the question further arises as to whether or not there is sufficient before the House to inform us as to whether we must resort to conscription or not. I am not speaking for Canada; I do not know what has transpired in any of the other provinces, in the West, Ontario, or Quebec, beyond the fact that we have a general knowledge as to the number of men who have been enlisted in those provinces. But I have a fairly accurate idea of what did transpire in the province of Nova Scotia in regard to enlistment. We have raised a considerable number of men in Nova Scotia, and every regiment, battalion and draft authorized by this Government to be raised in Nova Scotia was raised and its ranks filled to overflowing by voluntary enlistment. We have raised the 64th, 25th, 107th, 112th, 85th, 185th, 193rd and 219th battalions, and we have also provided the 17th and 36th Field batteries. We have also contributed battalions which were raised in other parts of the province and with which I am not so familiar. We have also contributed, perhaps more than any other province, corps of tunnellers because in Nova Scotia we had an immense number of miners who were anxious to enlist and they enlisted as tunnellers. We have also recruited a forestry battalion. I am not saying that Nova Scotia has done its full share but the point I am making with respect to Nova Scotia is that no battalion, battery or draft was authorized but whose ranks were filled to overflowing under voluntary enlistment. I do not know what has happened in the other provinces.

It is true that Quebec has not done her share. There is no need of mincing matters; I say that Quebec has not done her share. I am not going to give any reasons and I am not going to talk about the reasons that were given in this House for her not doing her share. The fact stands out boldly and prominently that she has not contributed to the overseas forces of Canada what she should have. But, as I have already said, there are no facts which can be stated in this House to show that the voluntary system has been a failure in Nova Scotia. Within the year drafts were asked for to reinforce the Highland brigade, the 146th Battalion and the 36th Battery, the last of which went from the constituency which I represent. Drafts were asked for the 17th Battery, whose headquarters is also in the constituency which I represent. These drafts that were asked were not only supplied but the ranks were filled to overflowing and hundreds of young men were sent away. You may ask me for some testimony along that line. I picked up a paper from my riding a few days ago, the Sydney Post of June 26, and this is what it says regarding one of these artillery drafts:

> The draft depot at Sydney now has about forty men and about ten more are wanted to make up the complement. Lieut. Yetman told the reporter this morning that he was turning men down practically every day who were approaching him with a view to enlistment. Twelve young men from Glace Bay offered themselves for the battery yesterday, but owing to the fact that recruiting for the battery has been officially stopped they were not accepted.

I am not finding fault with the Government for having stopped recruiting for siege batteries or artillery because I understand there are sufficient recruits. But I do not think that these young men who came forward to enlist in the artillery would not enlist in any other branch of the service if there was an opportunity of doing so. There is a question too as to whether or not recruiting has been called off. I really think it is due to the people of Canada that the Prime Minister, for whom I have every regard as a Nova Scotian and as a big man, should in some way counteract the effect which the speech of the late Minister of Militia and Defence (Sir Sam Hughes) had when he spoke of the stoppage of recruiting in this country.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend may not have been here, but even if he was not it remains the fact that, when that question was raised a day or two ago, the right hon. leader of the Government (Sir Robert Borden) gave an unqualified denial to the statement or implication that he had ever called down recruiting or had in any way tried to retard it. That is on Hansard.

Mr. CARROLL: I was in the House when that statement was made. I would, of course, accept the word of the Prime Minister as readily as I would that of the ex-Minister of Militia and Defence. But the fact that the ex-Minister of Militia produced in this House a private and confidential letter by which he said he could prove his contention in the matter, has been a factor in making the people of this country believe that there was something in the statement that recruiting had been stopped. As a matter of fact, recruiting was stopped in some portions of this country—and I am not finding fault with the Government for having taken that course. Public recruiting meetings were forbidden in my native town and in the mining districts over a year ago. When recruiting for the 185th Battalion, we were never allowed to hold recruiting meetings in the mining districts; I daresay for good and sufficient reasons.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Hear, hear.

Mr. CARROLL: But, nevertheless, we had no difficulty in filling up the ranks, and when we hear hon. gentlemen speaking about slackers walking our streets, let me say that the recruiting for the 185th Battalion was done principally by personal canvass, and I had something to do with it; and I never approached a man with the object of having him enlist in that battalion or any other battalion being formed down there, who I thought should go, who refused to go. That is, I have never met a slacker in the county of Cape Breton. I have no doubt in the world that there are people in that county and in the Island who should be at the front and who are not there; but, so far as my personal experience is concerned, I have not met a slacker, because I have asked no man to go who refused to go. Of course, I was very careful to ask only men who I thought could go, and would go if the case was properly presented to them.

How am I to come to the conclusion that voluntary enlistment has been a failure in this country? I do not know. It has not been a failure in Nova Scotia, and I am willing to say that that province will supply by voluntary enlistment every man necessary for reinforcements for the battalions which it now has at the front. I have no doubt about that in the world. Many of these battalions went to reinforce battalions from other provinces. About that I have nothing to say; it was necessary and proper, and had to be done. So far as Nova Scotia is concerned, I do not think we shall have the least trouble in replenishing the broken ranks of our battalions at the front by voluntary enlistment. We have proved that in the past. The conditions may be different in other parts of Canada, but I have no doubt in the world of the truth of my statement. If I have a suggestion to make it is that I believe that if the proposition is placed before the provinces today to supply reinforcements by voluntary enlistment, it will be done without the assistance of this Bill. My friends will say: well, Quebec will not do her share. Well, leave Quebec out in the cold. I understand that she only has two battalions at the front. Surely the people of Quebec are proud enough and noble enough and true enough to their traditions and to the traditions of the British people to replenish the two battalions which they have at the front. I am sure that the people of the other provinces are. I think that this suggestion, even coming from a humble member of this House, is worthy of consideration, whether this Bill goes through or not. The fact is that we are only looking for reinforcements; we are, I understand, going to place no further divisions in the field. We have four divisions there now. As a matter of fact, we have four and practically one-half of another division, the fifth division. There has been no intimation from the Government whether that division is going to be authorized. But there was at least the basis of a division, and those men went to France before Vimy Ridge and fought there as a unit. That is a proposal which I think is worthy of some consideration, that whether this Bill goes through or not, each of the provinces be asked to supply by voluntary recruiting the reinforcements which are necessary to keep up its battalions at the front.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

MILITARY SERVICE ACT, 1917.

DEBATE CONTINUED ON MOTION FOR SECOND READING AND ON THE AMENDMENTS.

Mr. W. F. CARROLL (South Cape Breton) (resuming): Mr. Speaker, before the House rose at six o'clock, I was endeavouring to point out that in at least some portions of the country the voluntary system had not proved a failure. The Prime Minister, in introducing this Bill, said that for the year ending May, 1917, the number of enlistments in this country was 85,306 and the number of casualties, 75,000, so that in the past year there were over 10,000 more enlistments than there were casualties, and this is not taking into consideration the fact that a large proportion of those who come under the head of casualties would return to the front as effective soldiers. If the statement of the Prime Minister that during the next seven months we require 70,000 men to reinforce the four divisions at the front is correct, we have not lately been securing a suffiicient number of men to fill the bill. Every hon. member who cites figures as to the number of men we have in England and in Canada, I am sure, desires to give correct information to the House. This afternoon, the hon. member for South Toronto (Mr. Macdonell) said that out of the 126,241 men in England at the present time, only 28,000 were effectives. I know that the hon. member did not wish to mislead the House in that regard. What the Minister of Militia did say was that out of the 126,241 men in England, there were only 28,000 who were at the present time in a condition to go to the front. That does not mean that the balance of the men are not effectives. Reading over the list as presented to the House, I find that only 150 of the 126,241 men in England are termed as non-effectives; that is, that they are good for no branch of the service. The Government should give us more information as to where, outside of the particular province which has been so much discussed, voluntary enlistment has fallen down, because from the figures in regard to voluntary enlistment for the year ending May, 1917, we are bound to conclude that the voluntary system of recruiting has not fallen down for that period at least. From a memorandum given to the House the other day by the Minister of Militia we find that on June 4, there were in France 136,400 men, or about 56,000 over and above the four divisions. I do not wish to infer from that that the 56,000 are reinforcements for the four divisions; they are taken up in other branches of the service. In the near East and at St. Lucia there were 877; in England there were 108,736, and this included those who were on passage to England. In Canada, at that date, there were 17,353, making a total of 263,366. We were told that 425,000 men enlisted in Canada for overseas service, so that, subtracting the 263,366 accounted for on the 4th of June, we have a balance of 161,634. According to the figures given by the Prime Minister in introducing this Bill, 99,639 casualties have occurred since this war began, so that taking no account at all of those who were wounded, the number of whom amount to about 70,000, who would return to the front, we find a shortage of 61,995. I know those men can be accounted for, and I think the Minister of Militia should give us some further statement, that is, if it does not interfere with the secrecy which I know the Militia Department must have regard to in some matters. The people throughout the country are speaking about this; I do not know if they are making it a matter of criticism; but it is only fair when we, in this House, are asked to vote for a conscription measure, that these figures should be made a little plainer.

The Bill under discussion is for conscription, or for a selective draft; and if we could all call it a selective draft, I do not think there would be so much opposition to it in the country. As regards the question of a referendum, the leader of the Opposition says that there is one part of this country which is opposed to conscription, but he gives us his word of honour that if the people of this country will decide by their votes, either through the ballot or through a referendum, that conscription is necessary, the Conscription Act will be easy of enforcement. Otherwise he has his fears. Apart from the province of Quebec there is a large volume of opposition in this country to this measure, but I will deal with that later on.

The chief argument that has been made by those opposed to the referendum is that no time should be lost in putting the Act into operation. I would point out that in the negotiations between the Prime Minister and the leader of the Opposition for a coalition government, the Prime Minister said that if a coalition government was formed a general election would be held. To those who say that a referendum would delay the effectiveness of this Bill, I say that a general election, as was proposed by the Prime Minister, would delay it far more. The obvious inference from the correspondence passing between the two leaders is that the Prime Minister was of the opinion that the Act before being put into operation should be submitted to the people in some form or another. If we wish to get the people's verdict, what is wrong with the referendum? One of the greatest living English statesmen, Right Hon. A. J. Balfour, who spoke in this House only a few weeks, ago, said in London in 1911 when the question of tariff reform was before the people:

> The advantage of a referendum is this: that the issue is quite clear and quite precise. A referendum has an enormous advantage. It does not involve a general election; it does not involve all the personal bitterness inevitably involved in a contest between the two competitors for a seat; it does not carry with it a change of government; and it does get a clear verdict from the people.

You may say that conditions are different now, that these are war times. But the Prime Minister has proposed a general election in war times, and the referendum is no worse than a general election. I say that the people's opinion could be more readily and more directly taken by means of a referendum than by a general election, and that is one reason why I am in favour of the referendum. There is another part of Mr. Balfour's speech in this House not long ago which I wish to quote, and which I do not think has been quoted before in this debate:

> I know that the democracies of the old world as well as the new—whether they belong to the British Empire, or are outside of it; whether they speak the English language, or the language of other free nations —will come out of this struggle not merely triumphant in the military sense, not merely conquerors where victory is essential to civilization, but strengthened in their own inner life; more firmly convinced that the path of freedom is the only path to national greatness, and that the strength which is derived from having behind efforts the consent of a free people is greater than all the strength that can be secured by the most elaborate, the most tyrannical, and the most well thought-out system of military despotism.

I need not explain what he meant by that. Apply his language to the present case, it means that if the people's opinion is taken on the question of conscription, and the people vote for it, conscription will be more easily put into force; there is no question whatever about that.

Coming to the principle of the Bill, I repeat that the Bill as it stands at present is not popular in a great many parts of this country outside altogether of the province of Quebec. We have heard hon. gentlemen say that labour men in this country, both organized and unorganized, are not against the war. Of course they are not against the war, or against Canada's participation in it; no one has any doubt about that who has followed the events of the past two or three years. I do not pretend to be speaking for labour in this country, although I represent a constituency which has perhaps as large a labour vote as any other constituency in this country, but I say that although labour men are not opposed to the war, they are opposed to the Bill as it has been presented to the House.

That does not mean that they are opposed to conscription. They would, however, be more favourable to this measure if it had provided for the conscription of wealth. There are men in this country who profess not to know what conscription of wealth means. It is perhaps rather a vague term to one who has never heard it before, but the people of England know what conscription of wealth means, and so does my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark), who said in the special session of 1914 that one way in which money should be raised in this country for the purpose of carrying on the war was by means of an income tax. I had the proud privilege of advocating the same method of taxation at that time. I said, too, that the luxuries of the rich should be taxed, and that if possible the foodstuffs of the people of this country should be left alone for the time being. The people of New Zealand also know what conscription of wealth means, and I should like to read what a very eminent colonial statesman has said on this question. Sir Joseph Ward, formerly Prime Minister of New Zealand, and now Finance Minister in their coalition Government, on his way home from the Imperial Conference in London, said recently in a public speech at Winnipeg:

> Let me tell you, gentlemen, that you will have to do more than make up your minds to conscript the man power of the country—you will have to conscript the wealth also. . . . Britain would never have been able to introduce conscription—

"Introduce," mark you, not "pass."

> Britain would never have been able to introduce conscription of her men if she had not first practically conscripted the wealth of the country. She could never have put it through. If you are going to call upon certain men in this country to get out and sacrifice their all—their lives, if need be—you must be prepared, you men of wealth, to see that they are properly pensioned, to see that your money is employed in the country's behalf where you cannot give yourselves, to provide the wherewithal. Canada has done magnificently, but she must go on; there must be no turning back.

So say we all. Let us see whether Sir Joseph Ward was correct in saying that conscription of wealth preceded the conscription of men in England. He went even further and said that conscription of men would have been an impossibility in England if it had not been preceded by conscription of wealth. The facts are these: The Budget providing for the big increase in income taxation in England, which was at least a partial conscription of wealth, was brought down in the British House of Commons in September, 1915, and the Military Service Act, known as Act No. 1, did not receive the Royal Assent until some months after, January 27, 1916; so Sir Joseph Ward was right in that. Then the second Bill which conscripted married men and others came down a little later.

As far as the labour people are concerned, I believe they would have no objection in the wide world to conscription of the man-power of the country if they even had an assurance from the Finance Minister, or any responsible man in the Government that this would be followed by conscription of wealth. Why not? May I, before leaving this question, show what England has done towards conscripting wealth? They have had for many years in England an income tax but they increased it to an almost alarming extent after the war began. They are taking, by means of the income tax, some of the surplus wealth of the rich. That is conscripting wealth. We will take an example. A man with an income of $1,040—they begin pretty low in England too—pays a tax of $36. A man with an income of £5,000, or $25,000 a year pays $5,144 per year or a little over 85 cents on every $5 of his income. As the income gets larger the percentage increases. A man with an income of £20,000 or $100,000 pays an income tax of $30,145 a year or $1.20 on every $5 of his income. That is what they have done in England and Sir Joseph Ward told them that unless they did that conscription of man power would be impossible. I do not know enough about it to say whether he is right or wrong but he must know a good deal about the question. In addition to that, in England they impose a tax of fifty per cent on any business whose profits since the war began exceed the profits of the year previous to the war. The calculated revenue from this tax was £300,000,000 but as a matter of fact the actual revenue has exceeded that amount.

We have no assurance in this country that we are going to have any conscription of wealth. The labour man—and I suppose we are all labouring men—who is told that he must go to the front as provided by this Bill will say: Why is it that a man must be conscripted and sent forcibly to the front when wealthy people are left in the position that they can either voluntarily contribute their wealth or not contribute it at all? The wealthy people have done handsomely in their contributions to various charitable and patriotic organizations and funds, such as the Red Cross, Patriotic and other funds. The labour people are not opposed to Canada's participation in the war, they are in favour of it and have been since the beginning of the war, and whatever opposition they have to present to the conscription Bill is not an open opposition to conscription but it is an opposition to this Bill in that it does not in some way deal with conscription of wealth. I followed the other day very carefully the Minister of Finance in his speech on this question. In order to make sure, I read his speech, but I found no assurance in it that the wealth of the country was going to be disturbed by way of an income tax, conscription, or whatever you may call it, any more than it is at the present time. We may be told that he has conscripted some of the wealth of the country. He has; all honour to him for doing so. But, it is a very small proportion. Let me say again that if the people had an assurance from the Minister of Finance, or the Prime Minister, or the Minister of Trade and Commerce, or any other member of the cabinet who would have to deal with the question, that they would conscript wealth, it would take away a whole lot of opposition which is in this country and which will remain against this Conscription Bill.

With reference to the referendum, I desire to make just one more remark. If I had had the responsibility of dealing with this matter, I think that perhaps I would have timed my amendment somewhat differently. I think that I would have made my amendment to this Bill on the third reading, because then the Bill would be passed and the people would know exactly what they had to deal with. However, the motion for a referendum has come in a different spot and we cannot all be suited. This is only my personal opinion. One objection which has been brought against the referendum is that conscription would be defeated. I do not know that it would be defeated. On the contrary, even with the present condition of the Bill, I do not think it would be defeated, because if the people are convinced—which they are not now—that conscription is necessary, there is no doubt in my mind that there would be an overwhelming vote in favour of conscription if the question was submitted by means of a referendum. If there was the assurance which I spoke of before that an attempt would be made to conscript wealth, there would be absolutely no doubt of the vote which would be polled on the referendum.

This is a serious question. I hope every hon. member, whether he is on the other side or this side of the House, will believe me when I say that I have given it the most sincere consideration that I could possibly give any question. I am not going into the details of what has moved me to take the stand which I am taking in voting for the referendum. They are varied, and the House has heard them reiterated time and time again. I am not one of those who believe that there will be a rebellion in this country if an attempt is made to enforce the terms of the Conscription Bill. I do not believe there will be. Neither am I of the opinion of those who say that there will be labour strikes in order to prevent the terms of this Bill being put into effect. I do not believe there will be. When you come down to close quarters with the people, you will find that their hearts are in this struggle, and that they are too much in earnest in their determination to do everything they can to win this war, for any such action as that. While we may discuss this question from whatever angle we wish, and while we may look at it from all standpoints, when we come down to close quarters with the people, we will find that they are in favour of Canada's participation in this war to the last man and the last dollar. There is no doubt about the sentiment of the Canadian people in that regard. If we disagree as to just what is the proper method of getting men to make Canada's efforts more effective, it is not because our whole hearts are not in the winning of this war. I am, of course, speaking for myself.

In conclusion, let me say that perhaps there are too many bickerings in this House on both sides of the question; there is a little too much recrimination, there is a little too much talk about the province of Quebec, there is a little too much talk about the province of Ontario and about Toronto being the only place in Canada. We have been a united Canada in so far as carrying on the war and putting forth our best efforts are concerned. I believe we will remain a united Canada. If we do not there will be no man in this country more sorry than I am. Although a very young Canadian, I yield to no man in the desire to win this war. I yield to no man in this House or in this country in the desire to give our boys in the trenches the most effective and strongest reinforcements.

I have, perhaps, as many friends in the trenches as most members of this House. I have, perhaps, as many friends buried in the soil of Flanders as any man in this House. And if I am voting for a referendum I am not doing it to prevent reinforcements being sent over to help those boys; I am doing it because, after a sincere consideration of this Bill, I believe that voluntary enlistment should be given another chance in this country. If the Government want to put the Bill through, if it is true that they are going to have an election, as was said some days ago by the Prime Minister, in order to get the views of the people on the measure, I believe that the referendum would be the best way of ascertaining the views of the people. In that way there would be less bickering and fewer of the usual concomitants of a party election. If the referendum should fail, I would not stand in the way of passing the Bill; in fact, there would be no man in this country who would give it a better support in order to make it effective than I would. I would assist with all my heart in making it effective. But if the Bill passes, as no doubt it will, I believe it would be better for Canada and more likely to secure the required reinforcements if the two parties would unite in some effort—I am not now talking about a coalition Government—some united effort to give voluntary enlistment a last and final chance. I believe that the people of Canada will enlist. I believe that, if the proper facts are placed before them, they will enlist in as great numbers, proportionately, as they ever did. And I shall ask the Government, as the hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Neely) yesterday asked them, although we approach the matter from different standpoints, to give the voluntary method one more trial. If it does nothing else, that will promote and continue the unity which has prevailed in this country for the past two and one-half years, so far as our efforts in carrying on the war are concerned.

I may not be in the House when the Bill is in committee and do not wish to discuss its details. But may I be permitted to say that I hope the Government, assisted by the Opposition, will make some provision in the Bill for greater care in the physical and medical examination of the men procured under this measure. My friend from Parry Sound (Mr. Arthurs) said that there were some 12,000 men in England who would never become effective. I think he is right. I have said nothing of this matter in the House, but I have brought it to the attention of ministers. I think that much of this trouble is due to the fact that the examination of recruits was carried on in, to say the least, a very casual manner. There is no reason for that, and I say that that should be safeguarded in this Bill. If I am in the House when the Bill is in committee, I shall perhaps have something further to say on that subject. But, in conclusion, let me say that, whatever may become of this Bill, I believe that the people of Canada will give their whole heart and their united effort towards making it a success. If they do not, they are not worthy to have been protected by the British flag, they are not worthy of the name of Canadians, and far less are they worthy of the name of Britishers or democrats.

Mr. W. A. CLARKE (North Wellington): Mr. Speaker, it is with profound reluctance that, at this late hour in this important debate, I shall attempt to make a few remarks. Perhaps I would best serve the interests of our Dominion and of the allied cause if I simply said most emphatically and at once that it is my intention to support the Bill and to oppose the referendum, and then resume my seat. However, I come from a constituency which has done most creditably under the voluntary enlistment system, as have a great many of the counties throughout Ontario, and it may be well to explain my position more fully. I was very proud the other day as 9 p.m. a representative of the county of Wellington, to hear the splendid speech of my respected friend the member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie), and I have received a great many letters from impartial persons complimenting my hon. friend on his patriotic stand on this measure. Much as I have always respected him, I felt, at the conclusion of his address, like rising and giving him the most hearty applause I was capable of giving.

No man can find fault with the results that have been obtained under the system of voluntary enlistment. I remember quite well in the spring of 1914, before the war broke out, attending a large gathering in the city of Toronto under the auspices of the 48th Highlanders, a battalion now nearly altogether extinct, and I heard the ex-Minister of Militia deliver an address in which he stated that it would be possible for him to secure, equip and land in England, in case of war, a force of 20,000 soldiers. A ripple of laughter passed among his officers, and I think that very few believed that this was a possibility. But when the war broke out, we know what was accomplished under the guidance of that same gentleman, in six weeks. Since that time, under the voluntary system, throughout all Canada—and I am not here to criticise any one but to help in every way possible the winning of the war—the voluntary system of enlistment has produced the huge number of 425,000 soldiers. That is the kind of enlistment we like, that is what we were all so proud of, and that is what has placed this Dominion of Canada and this Parliament in the sun. We should be delighted if we could be sure that it was still possible, under voluntary enlistment, to procure the necessary number of soldiers to provide the required reinforcements to maintain our divisions now fighting in the great allied cause. But we know that that is not a possibility; we know from the figures that have been presented to us from time to time, from the figures read here this afternoon by the hon. member for South Toronto (Mr. Macdonell), that this condition no longer prevails.

The people throughout the Dominion of Canada are very anxious to be assured that some arrangement will be made, so that sufficient reinforcements will be sent over to supply the deficiency in the ranks of our men at the front. Referring to this Military Service Bill, I may say that they have had for many long years a compulsory service law in France. The great statesmen of England found it necessary to enact a similar law, and the great statesmen of the United States, profiting by our experience, or inexperience as the case may be, the moment war was declared enacted a law similar to the measure now before the House. That ought to be sufficient to justify our passing this measure. And if it be not sufficient, I would go still further and say that, after having listened to this debate for the last two weeks, having heard the leading statesmen on both sides declaring themselves in favour of this measure, and opposed to anything in the shape of a referendum, or anything else that would prevent us taking immediate action, I am convinced that we are adopting the right course.

I suppose it would be right for me to state my views in reference to a referendum. I think it is an utter impossibility to have a referendum which would satisfy the people of this country. Our men who have gone to the front—at least the remnants of them—at the present time are in such a position that they are not thinking of referendums, elections, or anything of that kind, and are not in a position to cast their votes. In my opinion, a referendum at the present time would be the most unfair and unjust thing that could possibly be presented to the people. Some have taken exception to this Bill because of the exemptions. As I understand it, certain classes, by reason of former legislation, are supposed, or considered, to be exempt from military service. I refer to the Doukhobors, Mennonites and others. Many people residing in Canada, and exercising the franchise at the present time, are possibly more objectionable than either of these classes. I know nothing about the Doukhobors, but I know something about the Mennonites. In Wellington and Waterloo counties we have a great number of these people. As the hon. member from Waterloo stated last night, they are a quiet, inoffensive, and prosperous people. They do not molest anybody, but simply attend to their duties as farmers. They entered this country under an agreement that they would not be called upon to fight the battles of the country. If that agreement holds good now I would have no objection to their still retaining the franchise. On the other hand, throughout the whole Dominion, we have very many foreigners of all kinds, and if we are to pass a measure excluding such foreigners from the right of franchise I would like to make the measure a sweeping one, and exclude every one except real British subjects, and including, of course, in the franchise these Mennonites and some others who came to Canada under a guarantee that they should not be called on to bear arms. After all, it appears to me that the House of Commons is a kind of select conscription itself. We are all elected as members of the House of Commons to represent different constituencies from all over the Dominion. We come here individually, if I understand aright, and take our oath that we will be loyal to our King and country. We have certain responsibilities, and I think it is up to each of us to ask himself whether he has done what he considers right, in the interest of the Empire to which we are so proud to belong. I should like to have all the members of the House come together, and conclude that they have a common cause. Let them get behind our chief, Sir Robert Borden, and show their sympathy, cease indulging in so much unnecessary and unwarranted criticism and pass this Bill. The hon. gentleman from Cape Breton (Mr. Carroll) said he did not think there would be any difficulty in securing men from any part of Nova Scotia, and that we should be able to secure sufficient recruits from the different provinces to make up the 500,000 men, the quota justly due from Canada. In my opinion that would be the correct thing to do. We could raise them hurriedly and get them in the fighting line, to relieve those who are now in the trenches. I think, by action of that kind, we will be maintaining the glory of the fair Dominion, and as a Parliament doing all that is expected from us.

Mr. J. A. C. ETHIER (Two Mountains) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, it has been said, in the course of this debate, that members of Parliament often have two different conceptions of the part they must act in the performance of their mandate; some are guided or influenced solely by their constituents, restricted outlook, the others by larger principles based upon the people's expression of opinion concerning the measures submitted to Parliament.

In the case now before us, I am sure that I represent the idea and the wishes of the county of Two Mountains, in particular and of the majority of the voters of the province of Quebec, but also, and I do believe it and sincerely assert it, the sentiments of the Canadian people of the whole Dominion. All of us, we have a common goal, the Allies' success and the crushing of the Huns; we only differ as to the means Canada should adopt in order to secure final victory.

The moment is too solemn to let it pass unperceived; that is why I believe it my duty to participate in this debate and to expose to my electors and to my country the attitude I propose taking. I have not the pretension, Mr. Speaker, to furnish any new argument after the long and judicious list of those already set forth against the conscription Bill and in favour of the referendum now under consideration. I simply desire to protest as strongly as I can and with the utmost energy against the adoption and the enforcement of this ill-boding, autocratic and antidemocratic bill; I do not want to lay the blame upon any of the provinces of the Dominion, or upon the result of voluntary recruitment, but I shall say, in spite of all that has been stated, the province of Quebec has done her duty. Neither am I of those who claim that we owe nothing to England or that we have done too much, but I do believe that we have done enough and that conscription destroys our autonomy, removes our liberty and leads us to ruin. I will not undertake to discuss the legal and constitutional principle of the proposed law.

The hon. leader of the Opposition, and after him, the hon. members for Rouville and for Kamouraska, among others, have demonstrated, without ambiguity and without sophistry, that our Militia Act, since its origin in 1808 up to that of Sir George Etienne Cartier in 1868, completed by that of Sir Wilfrid Laurier in 1904, has never contained any provision authorizing and permitting the sending of our militiamen beyond the ocean and beyond the frontier for other motives than the defence in case of invasion.

And, should the terms of the Cartier Act have given rise to any false interpretation in the sense of permitting the sending of our troops beyond the sea, the Laurier law of 1904 put an end to it by explicitly decreeing that the Canadian troops cannot be sent outside of Canada except for the defence thereof.

Mr. Speaker, under such an important circumstance for the future of Canada, it has again been attempted, as in 1896 and in 1911, to play a double game and to misrepresent the facts and actions, the conduct and the sincere and honest statements of the venerable and venerated leader of the Opposition, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, as published by the Daily Telegraph of Quebec, on June 12 instant, in an article entitled:

"Double Dealing Politics," and which reads as follows:

Double Dealing Politics.

The old campaign of misrepresentation in regard to Sir Wilfrid Laurier is already being revived again. To one section of the people of Canada, he is represented as an insular racialist. To another section he is represented as an imperialistic militarist. While the English Tory press hold him up as an enemy of Empire, the French Tory press hold him up as the foe of local autonomy. It is another manifestation of the campaign of 1911, when Laurier was declared to be an American annexationist in Ontario and a naval Anglophile in Quebec. Nothing could more clearly demonstrate the hypocrisy and partisan trickery of this two-faced Jason of Tory politics.

In pursuance of these tactics, the Ottawa correspondent of the local French Tory organ entirely distorts the facts in order to make it appear that Sir Wilfrid Laurier is responsible for the conscription law which Premier Borden is now proposing to put into force. It is declared that Borden is merely enforcing the act which Laurier put on the books in 1904. Laurier, the correspondent continues, enlarged the scope of the previous law of Georges Etienne Cartier in order to allow troops to be sent overseas.

This is absolutely contrary to the facts, as every student of Canadian political history knows. The Act passed by Georges Etienne Cartier allowed the conscription of troops for service outside of Canada for any purpose, when it was believed advisable. Laurier, on the other hand, limited the action of this broad measure, when in 1904 he replaced it by the present Act, which explicitly states that troops can only be used outside of Canada for the defence of this country. In passing this Act in the House of Commons, Sir Wilfrid Laurier carefully pointed out that the object of his law was to limit that of Georges Etienne Cartier, so that troops could be sent, beyond the borders of Canada, only for our own defence.

There are the facts. They may be verified from Hansard, and from the Statute Book. It is then manifestly unfair to adopt such tactics as those employed by the French correspondent of the Tory organ. And when these declarations are placed beside the imperialistic invectives hurled at Sir Wilfrid by the English Tory press, it is more than unfair. It is absurd.

Indeed, this proposal is not only unfair, it is absurd.

Besides, the Government, in introducing a new Bill to complete the Militia Act and allow the sending of the Canadian troops overseas, has taken a stand which clearly demonstrates that the interpretation given to it by the Prime Minister is not justifiable and is contrary to the legislator's intention, since he has seen fit to compel Parliament to amend that Act in order to attain his ends. At this stage of the debate, it would perhaps not be proper to discuss the different paragraphs of the Bill. However, you might allow me to quote some of them in support of what I have just submitted and of what I intend to suggest in the course of my comments. Bill 75 is entitled "An Act respecting Military Service," and the preamble reads as follows:

An Act Respecting Military Service.

Whereas by section ten of the Militia Act, chapter forty-one of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, it is enacted as follows:—

"All the male inhabitants of Canada, of the age of eighteen years and upwards, and under sixty, not exempt or disqualified by law, and being British subjects, shall be liable to service in the militia: Provided that the Governor General may require all the male inhabitants of Canada, capable of bearing arms, to serve in the case of a levée en masse."

And whereas by section sixty-nine of the said Act it is further enacted as follows:—

"The Governor in Council may place the militia, or any part thereof, on active service anywhere in Canada, and also beyond Canada, for the defence thereof, at any time when it appears advisable so to do by reason of emergency."

And whereas by the said Act it is further enacted that, if at any time enough men do not volunteer to complete the quota required, the men so liable to serve shall be drafted by ballot;

And whereas to maintain and support the Canadian Expeditionary Force now engaged in active service overseas for the defence and security of Canada, the preservation of the Empire and of human liberty, it is necessary to provide reinforcements for such Expeditionary Force;

And whereas enough men do not volunteer to provide such reinforcements;

And whereas, by reason of the large number of men who have already left agricultural and industrial pursuits in Canada to join such Expeditionary Force as volunteers, and of the necessity of sustaining under such conditions the productivity of the Dominion, it is expedient to secure the men still required, not by ballot as provided in the Militia Act, but by selective draft.

It contains, among other sections, section 2 which designates the persons liable for service, to wit:

2. (1) Every male British subject who comes within one of the classes described in section three of this Act, and who,—

(a) is ordinarily resident in Canada; or

(b) has been at any time since the fourth day of August, 1914, resident in Canada, shall be liable to be called out as hereinafter provided on active service in the Canadian Expeditionary Force for the defence of Canada, either in or beyond Canada, unless he

(a) comes within the exceptions set out in the schedule; or

(b) reaches the age of forty-five before the class or subclass to which he belongs, as described in section three, is called out.

Such service shall be for the duration of the present war and of demobilization after the conclusion of the war.

(2) Nothing in this Act shall prevent any man from voluntarily enlisting in the Canadian Expeditionary Force, so long as voluntary enlistment in such force is authorized.

Sections 5, 6, 7 and 10 provide for the establishment of three kinds of tribunals to put into operation this famous conscription: (1) the organization of local tribunals; (2) appeal tribunals, and (3) a central appeal judge, as section 11 prescribes and gives the grounds of exemption from compulsory military service and reads as follows: Section 11 of the Bill:

Exemptions.

11. (1) At any time before a date to be fixed in the proclamation mentioned in section four, an application may be made, by or in respect of any man in the class or subclass called out by such proclamation to a local tribunal established in the province in which such man ordinarily resides, for a certificate of exemption on any of the following grounds:

(a) That it is expedient in the national interest that the man should, instead of being employed in military service, be engaged in other work in which he is habitually engaged;

(b) That it is expedient in the national interest that the man should, instead of being employed in military service, be engaged in other work in which he wishes to be engaged and for which he has special qualifications;

(c) That it is expedient in the national interest that, instead of being employed in military service, he should continue to be educated or trained for any work for which he is then being educated or trained;

(d) That serious hardship would ensue, if the man were placed on active service, owing to his exceptional financial or business obligations or domestic position;

(e) Ill health or infirmity;

(f) That he conscientiously objects to the undertaking of combatant service and is prohibited from so doing by the tenets and articles of faith, in effect at the date of the passing of this Act, of any organized religious denomination existing and well recognized in Canada at such date, and to which he in good faith belongs;

and if any of the grounds of such application be established, a certificate of exemption shall be granted to such man.

The hon. Minister of Labour, the other day took to task the hon. member for Edmonton, as well as the hon. members opposed to this Bill, for being content with criticising its principle without suggesting any remedy to improve the situation. I have not the required authority to give advice to the right hon. Prime Minister, in so serious a matter; but I will take the liberty of giving my personal opinion. In the first place, I am against any compulsory military service under whatever shape or manner it may be presented, against any coalition movement at the present time, and against the extension of Parliament; and if military conscription must be imposed, it should be general and be applied to all men having the required age and fitness for service, without any exception or exemption. It should be proportioned to the population of each province, divided into districts.

Every citizen called into military service should be so conscripted by drawing lots; and, in this manner, the rich as well as the poor man, millionaire and labourer, professional and workingman, Catholic priest and Protestant minister; in a word, all the naturalized or British-born subjects would contribute in a just and fair measure to fill the roster of the Canadian army.

Why have selective conscription? Would the object be to protect a certain class of society to the other's prejudice, and these local and appeal tribunals which the law requires, will they not be in the hands and at the discretion of Government dependents and a source of injustice and of favouritism for the benefit of a few and to the detriment of the great majority of the people? If only the Act provided under what delay the appeal should be made and decided, but no, the term is indefinite, and provided one has the cash and is in a position to retain the services of an able and cunning lawyer, of the Conservative party, to suspend the local tribunal's decision and maintain the appeal in abeyance until the war is over, and the trick will be played.

Here is wherein I find that, in its very application, this Act is unjust, besides being unconstitutional. And even admitting for the sake of that conscription had become necessary, why to-day rather than when war was declared? Would it be because the Prime Minister had, on January 1, 1915, in a moment of imperialistic enthusiasm or aberration, on his own responsibility, sent the Canadian people his New Year's best wishes and as a gift, the promise made to England of sending her 500,000 men?

The Parliament and the Canadian people are nowise bound by this inconsiderate and irrational declaration. And have not the Prime Minister himself and his ministers, from August 4, until May 18, 1917, stated that conscription would never be decreed? Has he not openly asserted, to obtain, in 1916, the extension of Parliament, and to induce the Canadian people to answer the insidious and deceitful list of questions of the National Service cards, that the present Act would never be introduced into Parliament?

The soldiers at the front, says the Prime Minister, ask for reinforcements, the Canadian army's rosters must be filled. I have promised 500,000 men, I need 100,000 more, says he, to make good our aid to England and the promise I made to her, I must have conscription, compulsory military service.

Would it not be on the part of the Government a simple political manœuvre? I am prone to believe it in view of the statement made by the Colonial Secretary, Mr. Long, published by the Associated Press of June 21 inst., and which reads as follows:

London, June 21.—The Canadian Associated Press is authorized to say that the attention of Honourable Walter Long, Colonial Secretary, having been called to a suggestion in newspaper despatches that Sir Robert Borden had proposed conscription in Canada because he was urged to do so in the Imperial War Cabinet, he states there is not the smallest foundation for the suggestion that Premier Borden was urged to introduce conscription either in the Imperial War Cabinet or the conference. The matter was never even mentioned and the last thing the members of the home government would do is to interfere in the matter which is entirely one for Canada. Mr. Long further adds he saw Sir Robert Borden frequently up to the last day he was here and had no idea when he left he was going to propose the introduction of conscription on his return to Canada.

What happened then to the Prime Minister on returning to Canada? Did the spectre of general elections so distract him as to imagine the conscription of blood for the elections, as stated by the hon. member for Rouville?

Mr. Speaker, the reason of that promise of 500,000 men is nothing but a pretext.

But, from all that has been said and written upon the subject, one might conclude that conscription had become necessary to punish the province of Quebec, by pretending she has not done her duty through voluntary recruitment, and I would call this conscription, the conscription of racial and religious prejudices exacted by some Ontario jingoes who, to serve their hatred for everything that is French Canadian and Catholic, do not even hesitate to endanger the fabric of Confedertion and the national unity.

I find evidence of this in the statement of the hon. member for North York, who had the audacity to proclaim from the floor of this House, and before the whole country, that he would be ready to break the Confederation compact and to tear its pages, in order to attain his own ends; such language is worthy of the Huns who have mutilated, plundered and devastated heroic Belgium, in spite of international treaties and agreements and the law of nations. I also find the same evidence in the abusive, insulting and scurrilous speech of the member for Parry Sound against the French Canadians.

And it is after such indulging in such outrageous references, not to say more, that they join in saying that the province of Quebec has not done her full duty.

It is also with sentences like the following that they believe the province of Quebec is going to submit without protest and to uselessly sacrifice herself. The French Canadian members must have received under envelope, post-paid and through His Majesty's postal service, the gratuitious and anonymous insult upon card-board, to wit:

"War Cry: No priest of the Church of Rome shall levy any tax, tithe or toll in any of His Britannic Majesty's Dominions."

Can there be anything baser, more vile and a more outrageous affront cast in the face of the whole Catholic population of the Dominion? And that is the war cry of these people who are crying everywhere "Win the war." If it is with that infamous motto they believe in promoting recruitment in the province of Quebec, they are greatly mistaken.

I will cite another example on the same lines, published in La Patrie of June 20 instant. The Anglican Synod of Huron, after an address by Bishop Williams, has immediately adopted, yesterday, a resolution endorsing any selective conscription measure and demanding that it be put into operation as soon as possible. In his speech, Bishop Williams proposed that the Government undertake, if necessary, the task of enforcing compulsory service among the French Canadians.

"Should the rest of Canada, in their policy, submit to the domination of the faltering province of Quebec"? asked the bishop.

And to go still further, when every one in this House is striving—and I believe they are all honest about it—when every one is striving, do I say, to try and draw closer the ties that should unite us, on the eve of Confederation's fiftieth anniversary, whilst large preparations are being made throughout the country to duly celebrate that compact of 1867; here in the city of Ottawa, in the capital of the Dominion, we have a newspaper, taking advantage of the position it occupies in the press gallery, through its representative, to publish this evening, in the Journal, two pictures, illustrative of yesterday's debate: The picture of Mr. Alphonse Verville, M.P., and that of Mr. W. Weichel, M.P., with the following headline: "A French Canadian and a German Canadian."

On one side, below the picture of the hon. member for Maissoneuve (Mr. Verville) as a heading: "The Threat; I say that organized labour will do all it can against conscription. I want this House and the people of this country to know what that means; it means a general strike." On the other side, under the picture of the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Weichel), as a heading: "The reply; suppose the boys in the trenches organized a strike, and refused to fight because we refused to send them help? They want their representatives to stand up in a manly way and not support—shall I call it sedition"? No comments. On the one hand, the threat, do they insinuate.

The hon. member for Maisonneuve makes no threat in the remarks he makes as labour representative. He simply states, he simply gives an advice and a notice to the Prime Minister and to his Government; he notifies them that a strike may perhaps ensue, and in so doing, the member for Maisonneuve is faithful to his traditions, to the traditions of his family, of his race and of his origin.

The German Canadian on the other side of the House, who has just been commenting upon the remarks of the hon. member for Maisonneuve as bordering upon sedition, has, by that very statement, foresworn his ancestry.

To the man who betrays his origin and his ancestry I prefer the man who loves the land of his forefathers and its traditions.

Happily, Sir, among Anglo-Saxons there are to be found fair, impartial, broad-minded men who have vindicated the honour and loyalty of the French Canadians. And to the demagogues whose dangerous outbursts I have just referred to, let me quote the suggestion and sound advice given by the Reverend Johnson, who has protested, in a sermon delivered in the American Presbyterian Church at Montreal, against the campaign of vituperation and abuse carried on by our fellow-citizens of Ontario against the province of Quebec:

> Invectives and insults do not make for the maintenance of peace between the two races which compose the large majority of the people of Canada; on the contrary, an honest and sympathetic endeavour on the part of every member of the community to understand the feelings and ideals of his fellow-citizen is much more conducive to peace. For us now is the opportune time of recalling to mind the splendid history of Quebec, the bravery of her pioneers, the self-sacrifice of her first missionaries. Let the press and the clergy of Ontario put forth a serious effort to understand their French-speaking fellow-countrymen and they will thereby do more good than by exhibiting such a spirit as they are now displaying.

I should like to put on Hansard an expression of opinion from Mr. A. P. Willis, president of the large piano manufacturing concern. On the 27th instant he said:

> As most of our employees are French Canadians, I happen to know better than any one else the good feelings and the loyalty of the French Canadians. To those feelings of loyalty Sir Wilfrid Laurier himself gave expression the other day, at Ottawa, before Mr. Balfour, when he said:
>
> "The hearty welcome extended to Mr. Balfour, especially in this country, is not due alone to his great name and personality, but is associated with an even greater name, the name of England, the champion of liberty, the mother of living nations. All misunderstandings will disappear and Canadians, irrespective of their origin, English, French, Irish or Scotch, all Canadians, I say, will forget that they did not entertain the same opinion during the war. I know well the French Canadians. I know that they belong to a noble and proud race, and it would be an egregious mistake to believe that the war is going to set them at variance with their English-speaking fellow-countrymen.
>
> I should not even be surprised if, during the present war, we were to witness the alliance, the entente cordiale of the two great races which live in this country. For that purpose what is wanted is a great man who would spring up from the crowd and who would give it to understand to all Canadians that they are all equal, that they are here to stay and therefore they have to understand one another.
>
> And should we fail to find that man who will unite us during the war, we shall find, when peace is concluded, a common ground of understanding. Our French Canadian soldiers as well as our English Canadian soldiers, when they return from the battlefields, covered with glory, will co-operate with us and have us understand that those who did not go to war ought to be as united as those who have fought the battles of their country.

This frank and sincere statement formally gives the lie to the threats uttered by the Prime Minister, to the effect that, after the war, when the soldiers return to Canada, with fierce resentment and even rage in their hearts, they would resort to reprisals, if the required reinforcements for filling the gaps in their ranks be not forthcoming; in short, if the Conscription Bill were not passed.

Yes, Sir, we are loyal to the British Crown; we are just as loyal as are the Australian people who, for all that, rejected conscription; we are just as loyal as those colonels and lieutenant-colonels who were created and ushered into the military world under the regime of the former Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes), and who are now strutting about in the King's uniform, and parading through the streets of Ottawa, Montreal and London, and drawing, without fighting, or working, a pay which might best be devoted to the pay of our brave soldiers who are fighting at the front and in the trenches.

Was the province of Quebec disloyal when she raised 20,000 recruits and sent her most gallant sons to the firing line, as a contribution to the war which the Mother Country and the Allies are waging?

Did the province of Quebec prove disloyal when, at the inception of the war, she sent to the Allies, through the medium of her Prime Minister, Sir Lomer Gouin, $1,000,000 worth of cheese; when her towns and cities provided for and defrayed the cost of 1,300 beds for the wounded soldiers in the hospital at St. Cloud; when she sent cargoes of linen and clothes for the relief of our soldiers and for the martyrs of Belgium, through the medium of the committee "France-Amérique"; when she subscribed millions of dollars to the Patriotic Fund; when she procured for the Red Cross her best doctors, field hospital orderlies and her generous and heroic nurses? No, Sir, the French Canadian's heart is in the right place; and to him the motto of former days, "I remember," is no empty word, no mere catchword.

We have been branded as slackers by Ontario newspapers. Happily, that cowardly cry has been re-echoed nowhere else than in the mind of that pack of snarlers, and here again we have found a champion in the person of an eminent newspaper man of Toronto, who, by the way, is recognized as a warm conscriptionist, and who could not forbear from protesting against the unwarranted campaign of vituperation and abuse carried on against the province of Quebec. On June 20, he expressed himself at Niagara Falls as follows:

Above all considerations which demand that ignoble partisanship should be checked, bayoneted and buried stands the necessity of keeping the door open to harmony when the war is over. To make of the war in the Flanders a prelude to the war in Canada would be the most disastrous issue in Canadian history. It were folly to smile when one hears of civil war from the very people who were living in discord before the war started and fostering a race antagonism which is contrary to the larger development of the British ideal. Unfortunately, sooner or later war brings to the surface difficulties which heretofore had given rise to irritation and friction.

True, the change of heart of the Prime Minister in favour of conscription did precipitate a crisis which is more widespread and more intense in Quebec than in the other provinces and the utmost anxiety as to the complete mobilization of man-power is felt on account of Quebec.

With regard to that state of things, it is necessary to keep in sight certain considerations appealing to our dignity and patriotism.

1. The Prime Minister himself has proposed conscription only after having paid a visit to the scene of war and having received such information as are wanting to his fellow-countrymen.

2. The knowing ones who have endorsed the views of the conscriptionists ought to be wise enough not to denounce as disloyal the man who takes an attitude adopted by themselves, not so very long ago.

[Mr. Ethier.]

3. The Government has carried on no education campaign in Quebec, although it had become evident, from the very outset, that matters were decidedly taking an undesirable turn.

4. At the last general elections in Quebec, the leaders of the present Administration encouraged a campaign in that province which gave the Prime Minister now in power twenty followers, and in which the people were warned that a day should come when they would be conscripted to go and fight the battles of England. The Government now want to conscript those citizens for a war in which the Canadian army has been placed under the command of English generals whose nomination is in no way under the control of Canada and about whom we know very little, as shown by the facts in connection with the resignation of Sir Julian Byng. In Quebec they say: "We are only colonials fighting for England, our men being in the British army without Canada having its say in the matter and without being able to reach the men who may culpably sacrifice Canadian lives."

6. The assurance given by the Prime Minister to the hierarchy and to the labour leaders that the National Service cards were not meant to lead to conscription nor to the introduction of a conscription measure without the people being consulted.

The failure in certain English-speaking districts to have an enlistment in proportion to the number of available men makes it desirable that Ontario should deal with Ontario before devoting her attentions to a neighbouring province. When the Ontario-born shall have supplied as many men for the defence of Ontario as the British-born have supplied to Ontario and when the thousands of Ontario slackers who, according to the statements made by the Government have gone over to the United States, shall have been brought back to Canada, it may then perhaps be more reasonable to throw out insinuations against Quebec.

The fact which Ontario should consider is that for a whole year voluntary recruiting has been a failure, and that the Government is responsible for it.

No, Sir, the French Canadians are no slackers; and a proof conclusive, if proof were needed, is their attitude in December and January last, when the National Service was created. Neither did the clergy of the province of Quebec prove recreant to their duty, for they have taken the lead in that connection, as witness the following letter sent out by His Grace the Archbishop of Montreal, which I wish to put on Hansard:

Archbishop's Palace,

January 3, 1917.

Dearly beloved Brethren:

The newspapers have already informed you of the direction which we felt we should give to the clergy and members of the various religious institutes of our diocese, in regard to the question styled "The National Service."

We wish to give you the same direction, convinced that, in taking this line of conduct, we are acting in the best interests of our entire population. "This is not a question of politics." Nor is it either a question of conscription. For weighty and very wise reasons, which have been approved by eminent men, independent of all parties, the Government wishes to make, as is were, an inventory of all the forces, of all the resources which our country can command, from a commercial, agricultural and industrial standpoint.

The information which the Government solicits will be of great service during the war; it will be available after the war is over. For this reason a certain number of questions are put to citizens between the ages of sixteen and sixty-five. It is highly fitting that we should answer them. The answers from the country and cities will give an idea of family and social conditions in our province of Quebec which will redound to our credit. You will write these answers, very dear brethren, in all liberty, sincerely and loyally.

It is not necessary to ask yourselves what will be done in other parts of the country.

Let us set an example. Let us prove that we are actuated by an enlightened patriotism, and conformably to the teaching and traditions of the Catholic Church. Let us show respectful deference towards the civil authority within its rights.

Confident, my dear brethren, that you will fully follow our counsel, we reiterate the assurance of our affection and devotion.

(Signed) Paul,
Archbishop of Montreal.

Archbishop's Palace, January 3, 1917.

Is that the language of a slacker, of a disloyal man? The slackers, the impostors are those members of the Administration who did not scruple to deceive the Canadian hierarchy by inducing them, under false representations, to issue such a letter.

Now, what we have done in this war, to quote the words uttered by Sir Wilfrid Laurier on May 12, as recorded in Hansard:

What we have done, we have done for the cause of freedom, that cause for which France has already borne such a heavy burden and made such heavy sacrifices. I am proud to say to Mr. Viviani that what we have done we have done willingly, freely, voluntarily, and through no sense of compulsion. It was, indeed, the belief in many parts of the old world where the virtue of British institutions was not understood, that as soon as England became engaged in a war the result would be very different from what actually happened when this war broke out. It was the calculation of the German Emperor, of the German militarists, and of the German people, that if England became engaged in a war there would forthwith be civil war in Ireland, insurrection in India, and the British colonies would seize the opportunity to sever their connection with the Mother Country. Sir, we are not surprised that those views were entertained in Germany, because the German people have never understood the spirit of liberty. Contrary to all their calculations this paradox of an empire of free peoples has become a living thing under British institutions.

Mr. Viviani has also expressed to us the thanks and gratitude of the French people for the part borne by our soldiers on the battlefield.

That testimony of gratitude we accept; we accept it for our noble boys who have done their part in a manner to do credit to themselves and bring glory to their country. When we faced the thought of war, there may have been those amongst us who were apprehensive as to what might be the conduct of our young soldiers, soldiers not enured to war, not previously trained for military life, and for whom the first shock of battle might be a severe ordeal. Thank the Lord, we know to-day, and it is our pride to know, that they have borne themselves in a manner which proves that the blood in their veins has not degenerated.

Let us, therefore, begin by sending back to England all the blokes, all the slackers who have come over here to escape conscription in the Homeland, and who are now falling over each other and overcrowding the departments in Ottawa, more particularly the Militia Department, and who are depriving of employment our workingmen in the manufactories and in munitions factories.

Let me ask you, Sir, when the National Service was created, where the slackers and the cowards were to be found? At Detroit, to mention only one point at the frontier, English-speaking young men, for fear lest the National Service should lead to compulsory service, crossed the United States border to escape conscription. And did not the loyal Minister of Inland Revenue and his colleague the hon. Secretary of State encourage their fellow-countrymen in Dorchester county to step across the 45th line, to escape military service?

For what purpose does the Act provide for the compulsory selective service of manhood? It merely tends to discriminate in favour of the privileged class.

What is needed above all is conscription in intensive farming, in production, and in munitions, such as advocated by Lord Shaughnessy, and lastly, conscription of wealth.

Our soldiers protest against the disbanding of their regiments; they want their units to retain their identity overseas; they want good equipment, good rifles, good food, and protection at the hands of their officers. What the Allies want is not so much manpower as food to win the war, and in confirmation of my statement, I could quote no better authority than that of Mr. Hanna, who has just been appointed food controller by the Government:

The outstanding fact of the food situation, which it is imperative that every citizen of Canada should realize at once is that Great Britain, France, Italy, Belgium and their European allies are wholly unable to supply the allied armies at the front and on the way. For nearly three years their man power has been engaged in the direct work of war and in some cases large areas of their most productive lands have been overrun by the enemy. Their food shortage and the food to supply the armies of Canada and the United States must be wholly provided from this side of the Atlantic. The supply must also be sufficient to cover losses at sea. Australia, New Zealand, the Argentine Republic and other countries are not now available to relieve the situation because of their remoteness, and the shortage of tonnage.

Obligation on Every one.

The crop of storable foods grown in Canada and the United States suitable for shipment overseas threatens to be entirely inadequate to meet the demand unless the whole people determine by every means in their power to make up the shortage. Every individual is under a direct obligation to assist in rationing the allied forces. There must be national self-denial and national co-operation to provide the necessary supplies.

Time and investigation will be required to determine the best means of assuring adequate rations for the Canadian divisions and the allied nations and armies. But there are some measures that are so obviously right that we ask that they be adopted at once and that the men and women of the Dominion pledge themselves to their observance. They include:

Measures Necessary.

Maximum production.

The largest possible consumption of perishable foodstuffs in order to liberate the storable foods for transportation.

The adoption of war menus.

The prevention of food waste.

The utilization and creation of organized volunteer bodies to assist the food controller in increasing and conserving food supplies.

Use of perishable foods.

The restriction of ocean tonnage makes increased production and consumption of perishable foodstuffs at home imperative if the more easily transported commodities are to be released for export. The food problem of the Dominion is not measured by the domestic market, but by the needs of the Allied armies and nations. They require tremendous supplies of wheat, meats, fish, cheese, beans, canned and evaporated foods and other commodities. They cannot be rationed unless the Dominion saves such foodstuffs for export. Additional production of perishable products will be necessary to fill domestic wants. These can be met and waste prevented by national consumption of perishable foodstuffs. Fruits and vegetables in their seasons, should be the country's foods to the greatest possible extent.

Grave wastage.

Food is being wasted in the stores, hotels, restaurants, clubs and homes of the Dominion. It is the duty of every citizen dealing in or preparing and serving food to adopt measures which will eliminate waste entirely.

The adoption of war menus is a national duty if the country is to do its share in the provision of food essential to the successful prosecution of the war. There must be immediate voluntary action to curtail table excesses. The soldier lives simply. He is not given a choice of many dishes and delicacies.

Invites all assistance.

The efforts of the Dominion and Provincial Departments of Agriculture, other governmental organizations and the voluntary associations already at work are greatly appreciated. Their further assistance is earnestly invited. All organized bodies and every citizen should study means of conserving the non-perishable foods. There is equal need for increased production of perishable products. Where the work or organization has not already been done, we suggest that the mayors and reeves of urban communities take action at once, so that all available labour in the municipalities may be put at the service of those who need it, preference being given in every instance to those whose sons or husbands have gone to the front. There are many men in towns and villages who have had farm experience, whose services will be of great value in this connection.

Public realization of the true food position is imperative. We make an earnest appeal to the churches of the Dominion to lay the facts and the needs of the situation strongly before their congregations.

The soldiers at the front expect the men and women of Canada to do their share in providing the necessary food. They must not be disappointed. They will not be disappointed unless they are betrayed by the people at home. Any self-denial practiced in the homes of the Dominion will be insignificant in comparison with that of the Canadian and Allied armies or with the privations which millions of people in Belgium and Serbia continually suffer. Food conservation is essential to win the war.

What we need is a sound and honest Administration; what we want is a fresh mandate from the people, because the renewal of our mandate, which had expired a year ago, was obtained under false representations, and this Parliament exists none the less on sufferance.

The conscription of manhood we are asked to pass into law would spell the economic ruin of Canada, the loss of our national and political liberties, the dislocation and downfall of Confederation. I will go further, Sir, and say that it would be an act of treason towards England and towards the Allies to deprive them of the needed assistance and necessary means to bear the burden of war. And the people do not want to be a party to such treason.

The national debt now stands at $900,000,000, while it stood only at $336,000,000 when the war started, and at the end of the present year, it will have reached the enormous figure of $1,300,000,000.

To what extent shall that debt soon have piled up, if we keep pursuing such an extravagant policy as we are now carrying on, which will ultimately plunge the country into bankruptcy?

How I ask, are we going to provide for our returned soldiers and veterans, for the widows of the soldiers who died in battle, for our disabled soldiers, for our cripples, our invalids if we leave our young country depleted, and our immense territory undeveloped and untilled, and if we heap upon the shoulders of the future generations such a stupendous debt they will not be able to stand the strain. That is a post-war problem, that the Government should carefully work out, and then I do not think that this conscription of manhood will help them solve the problem. Hon. gentlemen are astonished at the stand taken by some Liberal members whose views do not tally with the opinions entertained by the right hon. leader of the Opposition on this question, and they rush to the conclusion that those Liberal members are endorsing the Conservative cause. And yet, every one of these hon. gentlemen, with the exception of my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) has explained his attitude in no equivocal way, and the future will tell the hon. gentlemen that the Liberals have absolute and supreme confidence in the honesty, integrity, loyalty and uprightness of the great man who has led the party for the last 30 years, and under his leadership, they will once more be able "to drive the thieves from the temple."

Now, Sir, I wonder what do the hon. gentlemen who sit behind this Government think of the resignation of the former Secretary of State (Mr. Patenaude) and the expression of opinion contained in his letter to the right hon. Prime Minister on date of June 5 in which he says in part what follows:

> I have always thought, and do yet think, that the best interests of Canada make it a duty for this country to give to the cause of the allies its most generous support. But to do this, I cannot concur in any measure which in my estimation imperils national unity. The proposed law, I have every reason to fear, threatens to destroy this unity, and to give rise throughout the country to deep internal divisions of long duration, and even detrimental to the needs of the present moment. Indeed it is better to keep the country united in the present effort than to attempt a mightier one at the cost of national disruption.
> I, therefore, find myself unable to approve of the proposed law, and the only course open to me is to offer my resignation as a minister of the Crown.

I can only congratulate the ex-Secretary of State for the dignified tone of his letter. I could not say as much of the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Sevigny). It seems to me that, by following the example of his elder, he would have been of better service to his country and to his compatriots. Time will assign to each his real worth.

The leader of the Opposition in Quebec, Mr. Arthur Sauvé, has himself also declared, at St. Benoit and at St. Rose, in terms just as strong, that, having formerly opposed imperialism, under the form of military co-operation, he could not now declare himself in favour of compulsion.

I will cite the language he used at St. Benoit:

> In my humble opinion, the desirability of conscription not having yet been demonstrated, I cannot approve it, and I am still convinced that its application would be most difficult, not to say impossible, and that it might exasperate our population, paralyze our initiative, throw perturbation into our economic domain and create disastrous disturbances.

Now, here is what he said at Ste. Rose:

> Canada has done her duty and the necessity for the new sacrifices which the Federal Government calls for has not yet been demonstrated. I am convinced that a referendum would prove that conscription is not more popular in the other provinces than it is in Quebec.

And he added:

> Canada has done enough.
>
> Canada has received many a token of admiration from the foreign countries and the intensity of her effort as well as the efficacy of her co-operation have been unanimously acknowledged. Considering this evidence, it must be admitted that Canada has done enough and that it is time for her to think of her own future if she does not wish to be ruined.
>
> Besides England does not oblige us to have conscription, such a measure pledging her to concede us later on inevitable sacrifices.

I rejoice at finding that, in spite of divergent views and past differences, Mr. Sauvé and I can meet on the same ground upon that vital question of conscription. I have nothing but praise for his noble attitude and his strong declarations upon this question.

Organized labour and the working man, individually, are also opposed to the measure. The hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Verville) has dealt with that side of the question in a masterly way. I will not therefore take up any time to discuss it. I wish, however, to have inserted in the Hansard some of the labour unions' resolutions expressing their disapproval and the reasons they give for it.

At the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, held in Ottawa from June 1 to June 4 instant, and at which more than eighty unions were represented, several questions relating to labour problems were discussed and among these was that of conscription. Resolutions, which had been adopted in all the different parts of the Dominion, were laid before the congress. After a seven hours' debate, among other resolution the following was adopted:

> Believing that the workers of Canada are looking for a lead on the attitude that should be assumed by them toward the proposed scheme of conscription, we recommend that the following conclusions be sent broadcast throughout Canada:
>
> On December 27, 1916, Premier Borden informed the executive of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, that if conscription should prove the only effective method to preserve the existence of the State and of the institutions and liberties which we enjoy, I should not hesitate to act accordingly.

We are positively of the opinion that this situation has not arrived.

The necessities for the effective conduct of the war are: Food, munitions, shipping, and military man power, and Canada is geographically well situated to supply the first named three essentials, and can do much to assist in winning the war by developing her production in these essentials to her fullest extent.

We are strongly of the opinion that this is the best service that Canada, with her small population, can render.

We declare ourselves as most emphatically opposed to the proposed conscription measure, and we urge the workers of Canada to oppose by every means in their power the enactment of such legislation.

This resolution was adopted as submitted by the entire delegation, with the exception of five votes in favour of conscription of men, but on condition that conscription of wealth would be included in the provisions of the same Act.

The Labour Federation of British Columbia have also entered their protest against conscription; they have addressed to the right hon. Prime Minister, to the leader of the Opposition and to the members of both sides of the House a copy of their resolution, dated June 8 inst., and which reads as follows:

1. That military or industrial conscription is the imposition of a form of servitude which is obnoxious to a so-called free people.

2. That militarism is the curse of present civilization, and a result of trade jeaousies between nations.

3. That military autocracy in Germany or any other country cannot be defeated by the establishment of the same form of autocracy in countries which have been free from them.

4. That the only people that can defeat so-called Prussianism is the people of Germany, and the adoption of a like system in this country only extends the evils of a Prussian military system to a people who have been free from such servitude, and who resent the attempt, "under any pretext," to foist upon them conscriptive measures, military or industrial, which would inevitably bring about a similar situation in this country, to that which obtains in countries cursed by compulsory military service.

5. Measures of this nature imposed upon a people under the guise of temporary necessity, have invariably become permanent institutions.

We ask that due consideration be given to our opposition, and would conclude by stating that it is the intention to use all the force at our command to resist conscription in any form.

On behalf of the Executive,

A. S. Wells, Secretary-Treasurer.
J. Naylor, President.

Attention should also be paid to the stand taken by the Trades and Labour Council of Calgary. On the 27th instant, it was decided to ask all the unions to take part on the scheme of a general strike which would be called as a means of protesting against conscription.

Will the Government, in the face of all these protests from all the parts of the Dominion, and from all classes of society, persist in imposing their military service law? I am confident of the contrary. Will the Prime Minister assume the risk and the responsibility of all the consequences that may follow, if those I have mentioned and of others even more serious which threaten us, especially that strike considered by organized labour? Will he provoke such a strike that will bring us dearth and famine and even, perhaps, revolution? I do not wish it, Mr. Speaker, far from me such a thought!

The only way to prevent the misfortunes which threaten us is, as hae been pointed out by the hon. leader of the Opposition: a referendum or else an appeal to the people by means of a general election.

I beg the hon. Prime Minister to reconsider his decision of May 18, as he has already done so more than once since August 4, 1914, upon this same question of conscription. I am satisfied that, after having duly considered and accepted the suggestion of Dr. L. G. Bland, of the Winnipeg Methodist Church, who wants the Prime Minister to convene in Ottawa representatives of all the public and religious bodies, of all the legal and medical associations, of the boards of trade all over the country, and of the labour organizations, to discuss the conscription issue, he will acknowledge his error, the fairness and appropriateness of the stand taken by the right hon. leader of the Opposition.

Before concluding, Mr. Speaker, I cannot pass over in silence the additional amendment of the hon. member for Berthier (Mr. Barrette) without giving my reason for opposing it. In my humble opinion it is a snare very badly set, a shift very poorly conceived, a commonplace trick inspired and prompted, if not by the Government, undoubtedly by one of its ministers, artist, musician and gentleman farmer. Like his leader, the member for Berthier can alter his opinion. On this June 6, 1916, he wrote to his electors the following:

Allow me, Mr. Secretary to repeat to you the statement I made last fall in Berthierville, in the presence of 6,000 electors of my county and of the surrounding country, when I stated that I was completely opposed to conscription. This year, on the very Sunday following the declaration made by the Prime Minister of Canada, I again stated before my fellow parishioners that I was entirely opposed to this measure of the Government. I was then doing a free act of my own, knowing that I was doing it for the best interest of my constituents.

I do hope that this statement will cheer the hearts of all the good French Canadians of my county and of my province.

Please accept, my dear friend, the expression of my most distinguished sentiments and believe me,

Yours most truly,

J. A. Barrette.

In the meantime he has found out that he requires six months to meditate and change his stand of June, 1917.

O tempora, o mores!

To sum up, I shall vote against the Barrette amendment to the amendment, for the Laurier amendment and against the second reading of the Bill imposing conscription; and, in so doing, I am following the dictates of my conscience, without any mental reservation, frankly and honest'y, and I believe I am in agreement with the views of the Canadian people, who wish to be consulted, either through a referendum or, better still, through a general election.

Mr. H. ACHIM (Labelle) (translation): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of attention to the hon. member for Two Mountains (Mr. Ethier) and I am happy to state that, beside all the qualities I know him to possess, he showed he was endowed with still another one, when he made a confession. It is a confession which the province of Quebec has been awaiting for almost six years. Of course, the hon. member for Two Mountains took occasion to state that all the members of this House are without a mandate. We, of the province of Quebec, have been satisfied for six years that the hon. member for Two Mountains was sitting here without a mandate. As a matter of fact, considering that the little incident I refer to is about six years old and that the member for Two Mountains has been occupying his seat in this House close on to six years without interruption, it may be assumed that he sits here by prescription, but I will not press the matter any further just now.

Being radically opposed to the principle of conscription, to the principle of the Bill now before this House, I shall not follow the hon. member for Two Mountains through the deep and detailed study he has made of it, section by section.

However, as the hon. member for Two Mountains has spoken at a certain length, what happens to long-winded orators was his lot: he has not remained throughout consistent with himself, as I shall show presently. But before so doing, let me state, Mr. Speaker, that I hold no mandate to defend the Bill, nor the Government, as the rest of my speech will prove later on. Speaking upon the Bill, the hon. member for Two Mountains exclaims that he is completely opposed to this selective conscription measure and he asks himself what selective conscription means and, in an outburst of eloquence of no uncertain breadth, he exclaims: "I will not have selective conscription, I want every one to go to the front, since conscription is needed."

He enumerates the different kinds of people who should go to the front and he ends by saying, with much generosity, that he wants to send overseas the "curés" as well as the Protestant ministers; but, a little further in his speech, he cries out: "What the Allies need is production and still more production."

Well, I repeat it, I have no mandate to defend the Bill, but I will say this: That selective conscription means that there are persons whose presence in this country is more essential than that of others. For instance, the presence of a farmer is of more consequence to the country than that of a bar-tender or of a store-clerk.

That is exactly the view of my hon. friend, the member for Two Mountains, and I will not offend his legal sense or his sense of the present responsibilities by believing that he is actually ignorant of what selective conscription means. Besides this, the hon. member for Two Mountains having taken the liberty of making an assertion which, to my mind, reflects on the Bench of this country, I think it is my duty, as a member of this House, to look up the matter. It is when he says that there is some distrust against that section of the Bill which provides for the appointment of two persons in order to choose among those who will be sent to the front and those who shall remain at home.

It is most evident that one of these two appointees, if I understand the Bill, should be designated by the Parliament of Canada or by the Minister of Justice and the other one—and that is where I find a guarantee of impartiality—by one of the district judges.

The hon. member for Two Mountains is, like myself, a country lawyer and he knows that we can most assuredly rely upon the impartiality of our magistrates who preside over the administration of justice in our districts.

There is another reference, made by the hon. member for Two Mountains, which concerns me in a particular way. Not that I hold a brief to defend the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. P. E. Blondin) who is now in active service, or the hon. minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Sevigny), because they are members of a Conservative Cabinet, but simply because they are both personal friends of mine. It is when he says that the hon. Postmaster General and the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue, during the Dorchester election, last winter, would have advised the electors of Dorchester, were conscription voted, to run away, to cross over the lines and go to the United States.

The hon. Secretary of State has made in this House a declaration to that effect, a declaration which, if I rightly understand Parliamentary procedure, must be accepted, which I have myself accepted, which the hon. members on the other side of this House have accepted, and which the hon. member for Two Mountains has no right to call in question.

In the absence of the hon. Secretary of State, I think I should defend him against such attacks, and as for the Minister of Inland Revenue, I do not believe he has ever mentioned such a thing in his speeches and he has not been accused, as far as I know, of having given any such advice to the electors of Dorchester.

I would be assuming too much, at this advanced stage of the debate, if I flattered myself with the thought of adding any new fact to the mass of information already supplied by the best speakers representing the three main conflicting views. Far from being able to aduce new facts, I believe is most difficult even to evolve from a further consideration of them arguments and conclusions different from those already stated in this House. But, coming from a province where the Bill we are now discussing has created, I shall not say more anxiety than elsewhere, but a commotion which has expressed itself more violently on the surface and made it the object of aspersions on the part of some hon. members, I believe it is my duty to say a few words which may help to dispel, if possible, the prejudices of those honourable gentlemen. My name having been mentioned as a seconder of the motion for the six months hoist, I think I should claim the attention of this House for a few minutes.

I have listened closely to all the speeches made heretofore, from the most important down, considering that no opinion is unimportant under such exceptional circumstances—I have even read them carefully over and you will perhaps allow me to interest myself more particularly to one of these which is not the less remarkable, both in its substance and in its form, that of my hon. friend the minister of Inland Revenue.

My congratulations to him in the first place for having remembered that the two party leaders have pledged themselves from the very start, in their own name and that of their followers, according to the very words of the leader of the Opposition: "That the discussion of this measure would bear the stamp of impartiality and moderation, that is would be free from all acrimony and bitterness."

While I think of it, Mr. Speaker, I may improve the opportunity to say a few words about the charges which have been made against me by the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Gauthier) and by the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards). These honourable gentlemen have thought fit to have this House amuse itself at my expense; the latter upbraids me for still being in this country, though an officer of the Canadian voluntary militia, I mean the 54th of Sherbrooke, an honour which I share with the hon. member for Berthier. There is a great difference between a volunteer officer and a conscript. It is true the hon. member for Frontenac is not an officer, but nothing prevents him from enlisting if he feels like it. The difierence there is between him and me is this he remains very quietly with his family and would compel all others to enlist, while I am also quietly at home, but without trying to force any one into active service.

I also wish to refer to some remarks emanating from the hon. member for Frontenac, concerning the honour I have had, some years ago, of seconding the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

The hon. member for Frontenac has no right to represent my conduct on that occasion as being inconsistent with the one I take to-day. When I accepted that honour, I did not suspect that the military craze which has taken hold of our country would impose upon us an effort out of proportion with our strength and our resources. I also said that I was in favour of Canada's participation in the war, on the condition that the Constitution be respected and that the constitutional status which binds us to Great Britain would not be violated. I was justified in taking such a stand at the time, but at the present moment, as the Bill introduced into this House tears into shreds the Canadian constitution, I propose to oppose it, and to do so as strenuously as I possibly can. If as a member I cannot approve of the views of the hon. minister, I am proud, as a friend, to acknowledge that he has succeeded in replacing the debate on a level where both leaders wished it to remain, above the range of political meanness to which certain members had lowered it.

If elevation of thought and beauty of expression were the equivalent of correctness of views, my hon. friend would have made the speech of his life.

Far from me the idea of crossing swords with the hon. minister—I have neither the inclination nor the capacity—but his stand upon this Bill being directly contrary to mine, one of us two must be wrong, and I will surprise no one by admitting that I do not believe it is your humble servant.

Were I as eloquent as my hon. friend, I would try to persuade him that the fault is on his side.

His whole speech leaves the impression that his attitude is inspired by the most disinterested sentiments, and I hasten to say that I believe him entirely sincere, although I attribute such sentiments to false ideas.

Here is what the minister says at page 2747 of Hansard, unrevised edition.

> Why should our minority be isolated on this continent of America, where we are surrounded by English provinces and by the American nation with her hundred million inhabitants?

This is a sincere feeling of concern; I admit that I have myself been a prey to it and that it has caused me long hesitation in deciding what policy I shall follow.

But considering the facts, was this disquiet justifiable? in fact, is our province isolated, when the whole Liberal party has the same ideas and is ready to give the same vote as the representatives of the province of Quebec?

I do not see that the Quebec delegation is in such bad company, when it follows the leader of the Opposition, a man in whom English Canada as well as French Canada, from coast to coast, have had entire confidence during fifteen years.

Is the province of Quebec isolated when it is in such company as that of the hon. member for St. John; the hon. member for Edmonton, and the hon. member for Pictou?

Is the province of Quebec isolated when it seems admitted that it is of one mind with the Maritime Provinces?

If such be isolation, allow me to say, Sir, that it is a splendid isolation.

No doubt the leader of the Opposition has seen leaving him talented men whom he held dear and who could render invaluable service for the defence of his ideas. But there is still around him a solid following of English members, and after hearing the speeches of both sides, I think that the first have sacrificed reason to sentiment, while the others have held to principles and sound doctrine.

With this theory of isolation, is it not to be assumed, after all, that outside of this House the majority of the electorate is in favour of conscription?

That is a gratuitous assumption, which the facts do not justify and which the hon. member for South Wellington admits to be false. Could I not answer it by the no less gratuitous but more probable statement that the great majority of the electors of the other provinces, including those of the ultra-loyal Ontario are opposed to conscription or at least in favour of a referendum?

As my opinion is well worth that of anyone else, whence he may come, I shall hold to it till the Government has had the courage to consult the people, the only one interested—the people who labour, who weep and who die in this war. No; I repeat again that the French Canadians are not alone in favour of a referendum.

Everyone outside of this House is loudly calling for it, and the voice of a whole people, whatever is done to smother it, will at last be heard.

Hon. Mr. SEVIGNY: Will my hon. friend allow me a question?

Mr. ACHIM: Certainly.

Hon. Mr. SEVIGNY: Concerning the isolation of which my hon. friend has just spoken does he think that it would be a boon for the French Canadians to have no more representation in the Government?

Mr. ACHIM: My hon. friend puts an exceedingly delicate question to which I could with difficulty reply without hurting his present feelings and without taking explicit exception to the course he has chosen to adopt. Much would have I preferred it had my hon. friend not raised the issue, but since he has, I have no option but to tell him that in my opinion it would be better.

Should ever a disruption occur in this country, Mr. Speaker, I say that it will not take place between the province of Quebec and the remainder of Canada, but between the province of Ontario and the rest of the Dominion. Yes Ontario, where the capitalists are attempting to crush the freedom of labour, Ontario whose manufacturers are attempting to restrain the freedom of trade, Ontario whose jingoes are trying to strangle freedom of conscience. I do say that if ever there is a disruption, that will be it, and the sooner the better perhaps.

Mr. Speaker, I am grieved beyond expression to have to utter such words and I pray you to believe that before bringing myself to utter them, many doleful hours have I gone through; I feel that old bonds are being severed which I had hoped would be permanent. In brief, Mr. Speaker, I must declare that in this House I shall vote on this question with the Liberal party; that at the next elections I shall vote for the anti-conscriptionist candidate, that I resign as conservative candidate in the county of Labelle and that in the province of Quebec I shall speak in favour of the Liberal party.

The Minister of Inland Revenue labours under another delusion which I should like to dispel. He gives the result of the Dorchester election as a verdict in favour of compulsory service. And such is my hon. friend's appreciation of his constituents that he argues—I epitomize—" What is the good of a referendum? We held one in Dorchester and Dorchester has spoken the verdict of all the electors of Canada. When Augustus had imbibed, Poland was full " " Quand Auguste avait bu, la Pologne était ivre ". The argument is more creditable to the electors of Dorchester than to the Minister's powers of interpretation. The part of his speech to which I refer is to be found at page 2497 of unrevised Hansard and reads as follows:

> What does the vote given at this election mean from a constitutional point of view? Does it not mean that the war policy of the Government was approved, as it has been approved by the members for the past three years, and has not this policy of the Government been to make every sacrifice to carry the war to a successful end, as far as conscription if necessary.

I agree with the whole paragraph save the following words: " As far as conscription if necessary ". To that statement I take the most strenuous objection, because those who did cast their votes for my hon. friend had in their minds not the statement made by the Prime Minister in his letter to workmen dated December 27, 1916, but the one he made long ago on the floor of this House, which was quoted by the right hon. leader of the Opposition and which may be found at page 2497 of unrevised Hansard:

> My right hon. friend has alluded to conscription—to the idea in this country or elsewhere that there may be conscription in Canada. In speaking in the first two or three months of this war I made it clear to the people of Canada that we did not propose any conscription. I repeat that announcement to-day with emphasis.

If my hon. friend insinuates that the electors of Dorchester by their vote, wished to approve of conscription, I must tell him that he would not be sitting on the treasury benches if at the election he had so declared himself.

In all justice however I must say that in the whole splendid campaign wherein I had the honour and pleasure of accompanying him, I never heard the minister, publicly or privately, oppose conscription. That is a tribute I owe to his sincerity. But my mandate is much less recent than that of the minister. I cannot oppose the principle of the referendum. My election, as that of most of the other members of this House, dates so far back that its mandate might after all be forgotten; but electors sometimes have a clearer memory that their representatives and my electors seem to stick to the motto of their province: " Ils se souviennent ", " They remember ".

I do not claim as many do that I know why I have been elected; I am no partisan of the doctrine that a member must in all things and ever do the will of his constituents, even if he realizes that it is founded on unjustifiable motives. My idea is that in 1911 my electors did not place in my hands a blank which I could fill as I cared.

What I do know is that, had I in 1911 stated I was in favour of conscription without the people being consulted, I should not have the privilege of a seat in this House. Now that the people's verdict has sent me here, I will not take advantage of it to rivet irons around the ankles of those who have elected me as the champion of their constitutional liberties.

For freedom, for democracy, for their brothers left behind, Canadians have equalled the very bravest at Givenchy, Langemarck, Courcelette and Vimy. They form a bulwark to our institutions those heroes of ours who live the cruel life of the trenches, writhe on a sick bed, or sleep the last sleep in the knolls of Flanders. The happy vision of a nation whose freedom and self-respect they have helped to maintain is to some a balm to their wounds and was to the others a solace at their last hour.

And that valued freedom, the freedom that inspires heroes, you now want to kill, while those young lives are sacrificing themselves for its sake; it is unreasonable and I will not be a party to it.

Mr. Speaker, I stated at the beginning of my remarks that I would take advantage of my seconding the amendment to the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Berthier in order to say a few words on the subject. Allow me, Sir, first to express my surprise at the meaning which my hon. friends of the Opposition seem to give to this second amendment, taking it for granted that the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe has been a true interpreter of their common opinion. Howsoever it be, the mouthpiece of the Liberal party in Montreal does not hesitate to state that obviously a trap is being set for the Liberals which they are not such fools as to step into.

The best-intentioned give credit to the hon. member for Berthier and myself for a cleverness in tactics which neither of us ever dreamt we possessed. But others there are, whose opinion it would be safer to take, who do think that we are not men who would steer between two courses, but that we are perfectly sincere, honestly believing that we express the opinion of the people of this country in this matter. Every one is free to choose whichever of those two opinions he cares, but I side with frankness leaving to my hon. friends of the Opposition any pretense at astuteness. I wish to add, as the hon. member for Berthier has done, that in seconding this amendment I have not yielded to any outside influence either from the Government or otherwise. After hearing the statements made by the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe I did long waver as to making my mind to follow him in the mud into which he floundered; but I deemed the present crisis too acute, the present contest to bloody to ridicule a man whose shoulders are weighted under so many burdens. In any case has he not taken upon himself the task of our vengeance by branding himself with the words everybody knows and which put him in the rank of the very lowest demagogues. But let him beware, the crisis will pass and people who live in glass houses should not throw stones.

Our amendment is put forward in such a spirit of loyalty, and is so devoid of partisanship that it should, meseems, rally all members who are good-intentioned and sincere and I must say that whatever be the position taken by the right hon. leader of the Opposition towards our motion, I shall nevertheless vote in favor of the amendment he has moved and so will do the hon. member for Berthier. Although the amendment to the amendment has a much greater bearing on the bill than the Laurier amendment and practically means its doom, I must state that not a member of this House is prouder than I am of being a British subject and appreciates more than I do the blessing of living under the British flag and that I am not yet forgetful that the English colonial system tolerates every freedom and fosters all ideals. My present position, whatever may be thought of it elsewhere, is that of a true Canadian.

Mr. HERMENEGILDE BOULAY (Rimouski) (translation): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. It being so late it seems to me that we ought to be at least twenty to listen to such a good speaker as the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Lanctot).

Mr. ROCH LANCTOT (Laprairie) having risen to speak:

Mr. HERMENEGILDE BOULAY (Rimouski) (translation): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. At this late hour the hon. member for Laprairie rises to speak, and he is such a fine orator it seems to me there should be at least a quorum of twenty members to listen to him. I call your attention to the fact that there is not a quorum present.

Mr. SPEAKER: I find that the point of order is well taken.

And a count having been taken, it was found that a quorum was not in the Chamber.

Mr. SPEAKER: There is not a quorum present. This House stands adjourned until Tuesday afternoon at three o'clock.

Accordingly, the House adjourned at 10.55 p.m. until Tuesday, July 3, at 3 o'clock.

Tuesday, July 3, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

MILITARY SERVICE ACT, 1917.

MOTION TO REINSTATE ORDER LAPSED FOR WANT OF A QUORUM.

Right Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister): In consequence of the House having failed to maintain a quorum on Friday evening, it becomes necessary for me to move, seconded by hon. Mr. Cochrane:

That the order of the day for "resuming the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Sir Robert Borden for the second reading of Bill No. 75, an Act respecting Military Service, the amendment of Sir Wilfrid Laurier thereto, and the amendment to the amendment by Mr. Barrette," having lapsed by reason of the House being declared adjourned for want of a quorum on the 29th ultimo, when the said order was under consideration be revived and placed on the Order Paper for consideration this day.

Hon. WM. PUGSLEY (St. John): No notice of this motion has been made by word of mouth, nor does it appear upon the Order Paper that this motion would be moved. I would submit, therefore, that it cannot be passed except by the unanimous consent of the House. I feel myself personally constrained to raise an objection to the motion and to urge that the rules of the House should be adhered to. On Friday last, when the Bill was under consideration, there was not a quorum in the House; there were only some eighteen members present. Perhaps it is not out of place to call attention to the fact that during the last week there was scarcely a day when, if any hon. member on this side of the House had taken the point of order that there was not a quorum, the House would have been counted out. On Friday evening, however, the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Boulay), an hon. member ordinarily supporting the Government, raised the objection that there was not a quorum. At that time there were only four members—

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Is the hon. member speaking to a point of order or on the motion?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I am stating my objections to the motion.

Mr. SPEAKER: The motion of itself does not permit of debate, but I would have no objection to a very limited discussion on the point of order. I hope the hon. member for St. John will confine his remarks strictly to the point of order.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I will confine my remarks to the point of order, but I thought it would not be out of place to state the reason which induced me to insist upon the point of order being ruled upon by Your Honour. The undoubted result of the House being counted out on Friday is that the second reading of the Bill is a dropped order. I call Your Honour's attention to Bourinot's Parliamentary Procedure, page 323:

> A "count out" will always supersede any question that is before the House; and if an order of the day for Supply, or for the reading or committal of a Bill, be under consideration at the time, and there is no quorum present, the House must be asked at a subsequent sitting to revive the question that may have lapsed in this way.

There are a number of authorities cited in the notes:

> 131 English Com. J. 391, 329; Forfeiture Relief Bill, ordered to be considered on a future day. 235 English Hansard, (3), 203; 131 English Com. J. 282-3, Committee of Supply. 137 Ib. 18, 297, 306, 483.

I would also call Your Honour's attention to May's Parliamentary Practice, page 263. I need not direct Your Honour's attention to the fact that wherever the Canadian rules do not specially provide, the English procedure, prior to Confederation, is made to apply. On page 263, May says:

> When an order of the day has been read, the proceedings thereon may be cut short by the adjournment of the House whilst those proceedings are in course of transaction. An order of the day, in such a case, or if, when the order is read, no day is appointed for its future consideration, drops off the notice paper, as the House has made no order thereon; and in committee the same result may be produced, either by a failure of a quorum of the House, or by resolution direct the Chairman to leave the Chair. To replace a dropped order of the day upon the notice paper, a motion is made before the commencement, or after the close, of public business, to appoint the order for a subsequent day.

It was quite open for a member of the Government on Friday evening to place upon the Order Paper a notice of motion fixing to-day for the revival of the discussion of this Bill. In that case, it would have appeared properly upon the Order Paper to-day, and hon. members intending to take part in the debate, seeing the notice on the Order Paper, would naturally be present to discharge their duty. As a matter of fact, I believe the hon. member who was speaking at the time the House was counted out, is not present because it was assumed that the discussion would not be resumed to-day by reason of the Bill having been dropped. May says:

> To replace a dropped order of the day upon the notice paper, a motion is made before the commencement, or after the close, of public business, to appoint the order for a subsequent day; and these motions are made without notice.

A member of the Government might on Friday night have placed upon the Order Paper a motion for consideration to-day. May goes on:

> If on such order of the day procedure had been commenced and interrupted, the proceeding thus revived is set down for resumption at the position indicated by the last decision of the House entered upon the Votes and Proceedings. If, however, it is essential that proceedings on an order of the day, cut short by an unexpected adjournment, should be resumed at the next sitting, to obtain that object a notice of motion is placed for that purpose, in the name of a minister of the Crown, upon the notice paper for the next sitting, at the commencement of public business, and the dropped order is placed, printed in italics, at the head of the list of the orders of the day.

Then there is another authority which is referred to in Bourinot as authority for the statement that such a motion may be made without notice, but a reference to the authority will show that it is simply a confirmation of the practice as laid down in May's Parliamentary Practice. The authority referred to is Blackmore's Speakers' Decisions, page 69:

"Count out. Effect of." If the House is counted out in any stage of a Bill the Bill becomes a dropped order. Blind and Deaf-Mute Children (Education) Bill. Observations. Vol. 249, pages 987-8. August 14, 1879.

Then further under the heading of "dropped order, revival of consideration," Blackmore says:

In the event of a Bill becoming a dropped order it is competent on a subsequent day, without notice, to move to fix a day for its being again considered.

So that my right hon. friend would be quite in order in moving to-day without notice to fix a subsequent day, such as tomorrow or the day after, as he might desire, for the Bill being again considered. Under these authorities, I believe, this motion cannot pass except by unanimous consent of the House; and I deem it my duty to raise the objection I do.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: So far as our practice is concerned, it is laid down in Bourinot's Parliamentary Procedure, page 538:

If a Bill becomes a dropped order by the counting out of the House it is competent for a member to revive it on a subsequent day without notice.

Mr. PUGSLEY: From which edition is the Prime Minister quoting?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The last edition, I think.

Mr. PUGSLEY: No, I think not.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Page 538 is the page given me by the Clerk of the House. As a matter of fact it has been the universal practice of our House when an Order of the Day lapses, to revive it at once. On many occasions, I myself have seen this. When Mr. Fielding was Minister of Finance, I have seen an amendment to the motion that the Speaker do now leave the Chair accepted by the Government of the day. The passing of such an amendment means that the order is superseded and becomes virtually a dropped order. The practice was to move immediately that the House do now resolve itself into Committee of Supply, without notice, and supply was taken up on the same day. A notable instance of the same character is found in the proceedings of the House of Commons of the United Kingdom of 22nd and 25th June, 1877. There was a motion that the Speaker do leave the Chair for the House to resolve itself into Committee of Supply. An hon. member proposed an amendment. At twenty minutes past nine on Friday the House was counted out, and on the following Monday the Chancellor of the Exchequer moved that the House do immediately resolve itself into Committee of Supply. After some debate as to the regularity of the motion, the Speaker declared it in order and it was accepted. The motion followed: "That the Speaker do now leave the Chair." On that motion being proposed, an hon. member moved an amendment. After considerable debate, the amendment was carried, and for the second time on the same day, the order that the House should resolve itself into Committee of Supply became a lapsed order. Whereupon the Chancellor of the Exchequer moved, for the second time on the same day, "That the House do immediately resolve itself into Committee of Supply." The motion was carried. It was then moved, "That the Speaker do now leave the Chair." A further amendment was proposed, and a debate took place. The amendment was defeated, and the House resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

I venture to think that the authority of Bourinot and the illustrations I have given from our own practice and from the British parliamentary practice are amply sufficient to sustain the regularity of the motion I have made.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My reply to my right hon. friend (Sir Robert Borden) shall be very brief. He referred to the practice in England, having reference to the House being counted out, in the evening. There is I believe a special rule that between eight and nine it is not necessary that a quorum should be present. Was the case to which the right hon. gentleman refers between eight and nine?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It was at twenty minutes after nine.

Mr. PUGSLEY: In that case any remark based upon the rule to which I have referred would not be applicable. It seems to me that where my right hon. friend is in error is in relying upon the text of Bourinot without having regard to the case cited by him. The authority upon which Bourinot relies is Blackmore's Speakers' Decisions, page 69, to which I have called attention already, the question that arose on the dicussion of the Sale of Intoxicating Liquors on Sunday (Ireland) Bill. The decision in that case was that:

> In the event of a Bill becoming a dropped order it is competent on a subsequent day, without notice, to move to fix a day for its being again considered.

That must be a day subsequent.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It does not say so.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I think it is undoubtedly so. The alternative method is given by May, as follows:

> If, however, it is essential that proceedings on an order of the day, cut short by an unexpected adjournment, should be resumed at the next sitting, to obtain that object a notice of motion is placed for that purpose, in the name of a minister of the Crown, upon the notice paper for the next sitting, at the commencement of public business; and the dropped order is placed, printed in italics, at the head of the list of the orders of the day.

I think it is very clear under these authorities that my right hon. friend has no right to move that the Bill be again placed on the Order Paper without having given notice, which, under the old rule, would be oral notice, but now means notice printed in the Order Paper. This ought to have been done, and the proposed departure from the established practice can only be taken by unanimous concent.

Mr. SPEAKER: Bourinot, 4th Edition, at page 538, says:

> If a Bill becomes a dropped order by the counting out of the House, it is competent for a member to revive it on a subsequent day without notice.

"Subsequent day" is a day after the day on which the order lapses, which lapse is caused by reason of a quorum not being present. That, I think, is the weight to be given to the word "subsequent," the word "subsequent" not having reference to a notice of motion. Also, I direct the attention of the House to May, 12th Edition, page 219:

> Certain formal motions which are necessary for the due transaction of business are also made without notice, before the commencement, or after the close of public business, such as motions for the first readings of bills received from the House of Lords; for the consideration of Lord's amendments forthwith, or upon a future day; for the postponement, the discharge, or the revival of an order of the day.

The question is arguable as to whether it is competent to proceed with this motion. But I point out to the House that we are in this respect breaking new ground, as the question has not before arisen in this House. That being so, the consideration that guides me is that there is no prejudice to the public business or to the public interest by reason of this motion being dealt with. On the other hand, if a motion of this character should require even a day's notice, it might so happen that the public interest would be prejudiced. Having anticipated that this discussion might arise, I have considered the question, and I am very clear in my opinion that the motion of the Prime Minister is in order, and that it is competent for the House to proceed with the order if the motion should carry.

Motion agreed to.

MILITARY SERVICE ACT, 1917.

COMMITTEE NAMED TO CONSIDER CORRECTNESS OF AN ENTRY IN THE VOTES AND PROCEEDINGS.

Mr. SPEAKER: At the last sitting of the House the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Boivin) raised a point of order with respect to a motion in amendment to an amendment submitted by the hon. member for Berthier (Mr. Barrette). In considering the point I discovered on examining the said amendment to the amendment as it appeared in the Votes and Proceedings that the entry is not a correct transcription of the motion placed in my hands by the hon. member for Berthier. If an error, or a wrong entry, is discovered immediately, it would appear to be competent for the Clerk of the House to have a correction made by entering an erratum; but where some time elapses before the error is discovered, such a correction could only be made by order of the House.

It is not only important that the records of the House should be exact, but there is the further consideration that a member ought not to be prejudiced by an act of an official of the House. To submit a motion that such correction be made, without proper evidence, might involve a debate without advantage. In my judgment, the matter is of sufficient importance to call for an inquiry by a select committee, which could be appointed forthwith, with permission to sit during the sessions of the House, and to which instructions should be given to report at the next sitting of the House, recommending an alteration in accordance with the facts. I have therefore placed a motion in the hands of the right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden).

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Mr. Speaker, I was not aware of any discrepancy between the motion as proposed and the record of it in the Votes and Proceedings. When you mentioned the matter to me, I suggested that you should submit the question to my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) as to the best course to be pursued. The motion which has been placed in my hands and which I move, seconded by my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, if he has no objection, is:

That a special committee of five members, to be named by Mr. Speaker, be appointed to inquire into the correctness of the entry of the amendment to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Berthier to the second reading of Bill No. 75, Military Service Act, 1917 as entered in the Votes and Proceedings of June 20; that the said special committee have leave to sit during the time the House is in session, with power to send for persons and papers; that it be instructed to recommend such alterations in the Votes and Proceedings as the facts may warrant; and that it be further instructed to report at the next sitting of the House.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I second the motion.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. SPEAKER: I name Messrs. Northrup, Boys, Barnard, Pugsley and Boivin to constitute this committee, and I would ask Mr. Northrup to convene the committee at the earliest possible moment this afternoon.

MILITARY SERVICE ACT, 1917.

DEBATE CONTINUED ON MOTION FOR SECOND READING AND ON THE AMENDMENTS.

Consideration of the motion of the Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden (Prime Minister) for the second reading of Bill No. 75, Military Service Act, 1917, and the amendment of Sir Wilfrid Laurier thereto, and on the amendment to the amendment by Mr. Barrette, resumed from Friday, June 29

Mr. PUGSLEY: I understand that the hon. member for Guysborough will resume the debate. I would like to suggest to my right hon. friend the Prime Minister that the House might fairly consent to the hon. member for Laprairie-Napierville (Mr. Lanctot) resuming his speech, which was interrupted by the sudden counting out of the House. He is not here to-day.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Certainly, that would go without saying. Of course, it would be most unfair to place any obstacle in the way of his speech.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): It would seem to the onlooker that this conscription proposal is not very popular with the supporters of this Government; otherwise, the House would not have been counted out for want of a quorum at the session on Friday night. Even the ministers themselves appear to have given up all hope of passing this Bill, or, apparently, they have lost interest in it; otherwise they would have prevented that catastrophe happening. We have about fourteen members of the Cabinet, and we have, I do not know how many, under secretaries besides; so that if we had had a full meeting of the Cabinet on Friday night, as we ought to have had when a vital question of this kind is before the country, the disaster would not have happened. But, Mr. Speaker, I am glad to see that they have rallied and that there is a better attendance here this afternoon. It looks to me as if, notwithstanding what happened on Friday night, the Government may still be able to carry on.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It is in compliment to my hon. friend.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I am glad to hear it. It is quite true that this debate has already occupied a considerable time, but in dealing with a great question such as the one which is now before the House, it is proper and desirable that each member should state the reasons for the vote he intends to give. I may say frankly, to begin with, that I intend to support the amendment moved by my leader. I do not take this course for the purpose of defeating this Bill, but for the purpose of making it more effective. Hon. members will agree with me that an important measure of this kind should not be enacted by a moribund Government without some kind of an appeal to the people. It should not be enacted unless we have behind it a strong body of public opinion. If we do enact it without that it will necessarily be a dead letter. Let us make no mistake; in the present state of public opinion, especially in the province of Quebec, this measure cannot be enforced. Hon. gentlemen opposite, and some of my hon. friends on this side, talk glibly about forcing the people to fight. We have no machinery in this country to force men to fight. We are not equipped, as they are in Germany, for that purpose. The Kaiser can make a law this morning, he can have it printed by the imperial press this afternoon, and to-morrow morning he can place it in the hands of the Prussian Guards and ask them to enforce it at the point of the bayonet. We have no such system in this country. We have no standing army to perform services of that kind. Macaulay once used the following language:—

I know of only two ways by which society can be governed—by public opinion and by the sword.

My leader is making a sincere attempt by this amendment to reconcile contending interests and parties and to govern this country by public opinion, and so far as this amendment is concerned I intend to stand by him. If the amendment carries, if it should be accepted by the Government, it will become part of the Bill. If on the other hand, the amendment is defeated, I do not intend to offer any opposition to the Bill going to committee. There are some important objections that I have to certain clauses of this Bill, and I hold myself free, when the Bill is in committee and on the third reading, to give such a vote and to take such a course as in my judgment will be in the public interest.

I may say further that, if the sub-amendment moved by the hon. member for Berthier (Mr. Barrette) is voted on, I will vote against it. I was somewhat surprised to see the six months' hoist to a Government Bill moved by an hon. gentleman who is such an enthusiastic supporter of this Government as is the hon. member for Berthier. There is an added reason for this surprise when we remember that the mover and the seconder of this motion were both recently honoured with commissions in His Majesty's forces by the present Government. There is reason to believe, however, that the action of these two hon. gentlemen will not in the least disturb the entente cordiale which has existed between the two wings of the Conservative party ever since the alliance between the Prime Minister and the leader of the Nationalist party in 1911.

I find it somewhat hard to understand the attitude of this Government in regard to consulting the people. Why should we not consult the people? Surely the people of this country are as loyal and as anxious to win this war as the Government is or as hon. gentlemen on this side or the other side of the House are. I was brought up under a different school. I learned my lessons from men who had learned their lessons on democracy at the feet of the late Hon. Joseph Howe. In the province of Nova Scotia, Howe was known as the tribune of the people. In the early days of the past century Howe found the province of Nova Scotia under the control of an oligarchy not unlike the present Administration and he determined that he would free the province from that rule. The fight was long and fierce, but he won out and he gave to the province of Nova Scotia the boon of responsible government. The motto of Howe during that conflict and the motto of the Liberal party in the province of Nova Scotia ever since that day has been: Let the people rule——

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Hear, hear.

Mr. SINCLAIR—and it is their motto to-day. I believe that Nova Scotia was the first province in Canada to gain this boon of responsible government; but the gospel spread to other provinces, the good work was taken up by such men as Baldwin, Lafontaine and Brown, and after a time all the provinces of Canada secured and now enjoy the great boon of responsible government. It looks to me now as if we would have to fight all this battle over again. Will any man say that we are to-day living under responsible government in this country? We are not, we are living under a government of party bosses that, in secret conclave and behind closed doors, decide what we shall have or shall not have, and it seems to me that it is our first duty to restore in this country responsible government. Do not imagine that the people of Canada do not prize the privilege of being consulted upon their own affairs. For one hundred years the Canadian people have striven to win the rights of a free democracy, and they have succeeded and what they have they will hold. I say that no far reaching measure like this should be enacted without some kind of an appeal to the people. I find it hard to understand the attitude of some hon. gentlemen on my own side of the House. The hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Pardee) seems to hold the view that a majority of the people of Canada are opposed to this measure, and that if we submitted it to them they would defeat it. That is what he said. I differ from my hon friend. I believe, Sir, that if this question was submitted to the people of Canada in a right manner, by the leaders of both parties, that it would not be defeated. But, in any case, what right have we to dictate to the people of Canada? Who are we that we should force our opinions and our will upon the people of this country against their will? Have we, Sir, some sort of divine right like that which is claimed by the Kaiser of Germany or by the late King of Greece?

A great deal has been said about the solid vote that would be given in Quebec against the referendum. If the principle of this Bill is defeated on a referendum in this country, it will not be by Quebec, because Quebec has not enough votes to defeat it. The blue-books show that the total registered vote in the Dominion in 1911, in all the provinces, was 1,820,742. The total registered vote in Quebec was only 455,288, or less than one-quarter of the whole registered vote of Canada, so that even if every elector in Quebec voted against conscription, which of course would not occur, you would still have 1,365,454 electors in the other parts of Canada to deal with. The total vote in Quebec, after all, is only about equal to the soldiers' vote, and everybody says that the soldiers are in favour of conscription. Thus the soldiers' vote, if taken, would offset the total vote of Quebec, and if it be true that we could not carry this measure by the majority of the rest of Canada, then, if you did pass it, it would be an absolutely dead letter, and so it should not be passed. It has been said that there would be difficulties about taking the votes of the soldiers, and that argument appeals to me. The soldiers ought to have an opportunity of voting upon this question. There would be no difficulty in taking the soldiers' vote in Canada or in England; but there are over 100,000 soldiers in France where there might be difficulty in taking their votes. I would propose, and I think it is a reasonable proposal and one that should be accepted, that it would be fair, if the Government decided to refer this matter to the people, to insert a clause in the Bill providing that the votes of soldiers on active service whose votes could not be conveniently taken at the front, should be counted as in favour of conscription. I make that proposal and I think it a fair one that could not be objected to by members of this House on either side, although I am only speaking for myself.

Then the delay that would be involved in taking a referendum has been dwelt upon. The right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) himself has settled that question because he has made a proposal that we should pass this Bill with a rider saying that it should not come into force until after a general election. If there is time for a general election—the Prime Minister knows more about the circumstances than anybody else—I submit that there is time for a referendum. The press supporting the Government and some hon. gentlemen also have tried to put forward the idea that our soldiers at the front are crying out for support, that they are in great straits, and that if we do not send them support, they will be overwhelmed at the front. Do you think, Sir, that this is true, or is that cry raised for political effect? I submit that there is no evidence on which to base such a statement. Do you think that, with a total battle line extending over five hundred miles, defended by six or seven millions of the best fighting men and the biggest guns in the world, our little bunch of four divisions are feeling anxious about their support?

Why, Sir, the statement is not true, and if it were true, it would be a very severe reflection on the British command. Such statements as that should not be made, because they are mischievous and tend to do harm. Surely our case for recruits is strong enough, without indulging in an exaggeration of that kind. Let it not be said that there is danger of Canadian soldiers being left to their fate, and being denied the necessary support by the British and French high commands at the front, for such is not the case. There is not the slightest danger, and there never was any danger, of our soldiers being deserted in that way.

Mr. CURRIE: How is it the Canadians had to hold their lines for nearly twelve days, without support, at the battle of Ypres? I was there and I know.

Mr. SINCLAIR: It could not have been that there were no reinforcements. If it be true that the hon. member was there he should have stayed there. But that is not the point. There is a reason, however, and a much better reason than that, why we should supply recruits. Every Canadian who has pride in his country, and red blood in his veins, wants to see the gaps filled by Canadians and our four divisions at the front kept up to full fighting strength. I trust we all agree that this must be done, and, if it cannot be done by voluntary enlistment, it must be done by conscription. I quite realize that this is a question on which there may be very strong differences of opinion, even among those who are anxious to arrive at the very best conclusion. I do not say that because a man does not agree with me his views are wrong, or that his conduct is improper. This is a free country. It is freedom we are fighting for, and the best way to deal with this question is to have a free and open discussion, and each man to say what he thinks. It is results we are after, and we cannot get results by quarrelling among ourselves. The way to get results is to keep cool, and to cultivate a spirit of unity and toleration. My honoured leader has spent the greater part of a long and useful life in a sincere effort to weld together the two great races in this country, and to create a vigorous Canadian sentiment, not only in the province of Quebec, but in the other provinces. Seven or eight years ago we all thought that he had succeeded, but a change came for the worst. An enemy came and sowed tares among the wheat. The enemy that sowed the tares was the Bourassas, Lavergnes, the Blondins and the Sevignys, at the time of the election in Drummond-Arthabaska, and I am sorry to say that the evil seed was blessed by my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce, when he gave voice to the slogan: "Anything to beat Laurier."

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I wish my hon. friend would give us the ipsissima verba of that blessing. I have asked for it before, but I could never get it.

Mr. SINCLAIR: My hon. friend should remember that himself. I do not want to be too hard on my hon. friend. I have a great deal of respect for the Minister of Trade and Commerce. He has had a very long, and, in many respects, a worthy career. He has had a varied experience in what Mr. Dooley calls the great university of this wicked world. No doubt, like other great men, the Minister of Trade and Commerce has made mistakes. We, on this side of the House, would not wish to be too hard on him. We would feel like forgiving him for these mistakes if he would show signs of repentance. I do not says that he has made too many mistakes. He once built a Canadian navy on wind. It looked fine. It looked trim and good and apparently fit to sail the seven seas, but within two or three years he blew it on the rocks with more wind, and it is now high and dry, and a total wreck. But the most regrettable incident of a long and distinguished career was his conduct, in a moment of weakness, I suppose, at the time of the election in Drummond-Arthabaska, but it did not end there. The evil seed was watered by the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden), and by my hon. friend the Minister of Railways (Mr. Cochrane). In 1911 the fertilizer was paid for by the member for Ste. Antoine Division, Montreal (Sir Herbert Ames), and we are now reaping the harvest, and a fine mess it is. I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that the people of this country will place the responsibility for that mess where it properly belongs, at the door of the present Administration. Sir, we are told by the Prime Minister that voluntary recruiting has failed, and that we must resort to compulsion. That statement has been disputed by many hon. members of this House, especially by my hon. friend from Cape Breton (Mr. Carroll), who told the House that voluntary enlistment had not failed in Nova Scotia. The evidence before the House on this point is not very clear. The statement of the Prime Minister may be true, and I am not going to say it is not true, but if the Prime Minister or the Minister of Militia would state the policy of the Government in regard to this matter, we would be better prepared to form an opinion. Is it our policy to send all the men we can to the front, or is it our policy to maintain four divisions at the front? We do not know. From the information we have we cannot tell what the policy of the Government is on that question. The Prime Minister of Australia has stated frankly that the Australian people are attempting to hold five divisions at the front, and to supply the recruits necessary to fill the gaps in those five divisions by voluntary enlistment, but we have no idea what we are attempting in Canada. I submit, Sir, that the House is entitled to more information on this question than we have yet received. The hon. member for South Ontario (Mr. Smith) a few days ago asked the following question:

1. What has been the total number of casualties in the Canadian Expeditionary Forces since June, 1916, to date?

Here is the answer:

Total number of casualties in Canadian Expeditionary Force from the 30th June, 1916, to June 5, 1917, is as follows:

Officers	2,957
Other ranks	62,592
Total	65,549

The second question is as follows:

2. What has been the total number of recruits enlisted in the Canadian Expeditionary Forces from June, 1916, to date?

The answer to that question is as follows:

The number of recruits enlisted in the Canadian Expeditionary Force from June 30, 1916, to May 31, 1917, was 74,510.

If you subtract one of these from the other, you find the excess of recruits over casualties during the past year is 8,961 I do not place much dependence upon these figures, because there is the wildest confusion in connection with all the information that we get on this question of recruiting. I could show you returns, Sir, which have been placed on the table of this House by the Government which prove that 70,000 men have disappeared altogether. They have enlisted, but they have not been killed; they are not wounded, they are not in the hospitals. They are not prisoners; they are not on the other side of the Atlantic, and they are not on this side of the Atlantic. They have disappeared as completely as the army of Sennacherib referred to in Bible story and the Lord knows where they are. That is an illustration of the kind of information that we are getting from the Militia Department.

The whole matter of getting men comes down to a question of method. Speaking for myself, I do not like compulsion. It may be necessary; if it is necessary I am going to support it, but I prefer the voluntary system. A similar preference prevails among the people of Australia—even among the soldiers of Australia, I am told; as was evidenced by their vote some months ago on the question of a referendum. The gaps in the ranks of the immortal Anzacs have so far been filled and will be filled by voluntary recruiting and no one will say they are not doing well. There is not much glory in fighting for King and country when you have to at the point of a bayonet. Napoleon Bonaparte is credited with saying that one volunteer is worth three conscripts, and I believe that he was right. A few days ago I read a report in the press that a Canadian soldier somewhere in France had captured seventeen armed Germans in a trench or dug-out and single-handed drove them into camp as prisoners. I do not know whether or not the story is true, but very likely it is. Does the Minister of Militia suppose that one German could capture seventeen Canadians?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: No.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Why? Because the Canadian soldier is a volunteer, while the German is a conscript. A few days ago a friend of mine was good enough to send me a thrilling story of the bravery of a Highland piper from Nova Scotia, who, amid the hail of shot and shell, climbed Vimy Ridge at the head of his company, playing the march of the Cameron men, with the Nova Scotia boys shouting and yelling behind him. Could an incident like this occur in an army of conscripts? I submit that it could not.

It is not force that we want in Canada. Hon. gentlemen opposite know that force will never succeed in this country. What we want is enthusiasm; what we want more than anything else at the present time is a Peter the Hermit who will travel this country from end to end and fire the blood and arouse the martial spirit of the people. The voluntary system has not had a fair trial. Recruiting could not be handled worse than it was handled in the province from which I come. The young men of Nova Scotia did splendidly, but whatever success we had in recruiting in that province was due to private enterprise and not to anything done by this Government. In many cases recruiting officers were selected through political influence, not on account of their merits. They were sent out to hold meetings in places where they had never been before, and to speak to people who had never heard of them, while local men who could have had some influence were totally ignored. Such a campaign as that could not succeed; the wonder is that the results were as good as they were.

But this mismanagement was not confined to Nova Scotia; it seems to have been widespread. The province of Quebec, we are told, fared even worse than Nova Scotia. For two years I have listened to the member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) urging the Government to send Major-General Lessard, or some such man, to the province of Quebec to take charge of recruiting. Why was Major-General Lessard not sent? Because he was not acceptable to the Government. It was not until the 29th of March of this year that the Government yielded, and then they sent Major-General Lessard under the wing of the Post-

4 p.m. master-General (Hon. P. E. Blondin). This was enough to damn the efforts of any man who attempted to perform the duties of a recruiting officer in the province of Quebec. In an interview given to the Montreal Gazette on May 21, the Postmaster-General himself said that if the province of Quebec had been properly organized under the direction of an officer like Major-General Lessard and the recruiting properly handled, the French-Canadians would have enlisted en masse. Why was the province of Quebec not properly organized? Who is to blame? The Postmaster-General himself was a member of the Government that failed to do its duty; my courageous friend the Minister of Inland Revenue (Hon. Albert Sévigny) was also a member of the Government.

Mr. CURRIE: The hon. gentleman knows that Major-General Lessard was Inspector-General in Quebec during all that time, and that he had the whole thing in his hands, just as the Inspector-Generals in the West had in their own districts.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I do not know anything of the kind. He had no authority before March 29. I never heard that excuse given by the Government until this moment.

Mr. CURRIE: I do not know whether it is an excuse or not. It is a fact, however, that Major-General Lessard was placed in charge of the eastern districts and Major-Genertl Steele of those in the west. That was immediately after the war broke out. Major-General Lessard is still Inspector-General in the Quebec district.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Inspector-General without instructions to act. I have no doubt that when my hon. friend speaks he will attempt to justify the placing of a Methodist clergyman at the head of recruiting in the province of Quebec. That is how the Government dealt with this matter. I have no objection to a Methodist clergyman being put in any responsible position, but my hon. friend will agree that it was an indiscreet appointment, to say the least, to place recruiting in the province of Quebec under the control of a Methodist clergyman. The member for Rouville put the case very well when he asked what would have happened if the Superior of the Jesuit Order had been placed in charge of recruiting in Ontario.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I made a very full explanation regarding Rev. Mr. Williams' appointment. He did not direct his efforts amongst the French-Canadian people. His efforts were directed entirely amongst the English-speaking people of the province, among whom there was a tremendous enlistment.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Still he was the chief recruiting officer for the province. I am not very familiar with these matters. I am quite willing to accept the statement of the minister.

May I suggest that there is no good reason why we should not follow the example of Australia? Australia plans to keep five divisions up to full strength by raising 7,000 recruits a month under the voluntary system. No later than yesterday I read the following despatch from Sydney, New South Wales. It is dated July 2, and is as follows:

> Contrary to general expectations, Premier Hughes has not announced another conscription referendum. He said the Government put forward its proposals last year for compulsory service on the basis that 16,500 troops per month were required to keep five Australian divisions at full fighting strength. Later experience happily proved the British War Office estimate too high. The Government now appealed to Australia to raise at least 7,000 recruits monthly voluntarily. It also desired to secure such an additional number of recruits as would enable leave to be given to the remaining members of the first division so that they may return to Australia for a rest.
> Premier Hughes was sure that if all sections worked harmoniously and the voices of the conscriptionists and anti-conscriptionists alike were silent, men would rally to the colours and honor Australia. The Government would apply forthwith to the policy of preference of employment for returned soldiers.

We raised 6,520 recruits in May under the voluntary system, without, so far as I can learn, making any effort at all. It would seem that if Australia can supply the wastage of five divisions with 7,000 recruits a month, we in Canada ought to be able to supply the wastage of four divisions.

Mr. CURRIE: I suppose the hon. member knows that the Australian militia is in training all the time, and that those recruits are volunteers from that body. The militia are called out by the Premier, according to categories, for training.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I do not think that affects my argument in any case. Mr. Speaker why do we find ourselves in the confusion in which we are to-day? Why was National Service a failure? Why was home defence a failure? Why was voluntary recruiting a failure, if indeed it has been a failure? I submit that all these failures can be traced to the same cause. These attempts to accomplish something were abortive very largely on account of the patronage system that is being adhered to by the present Administration. Let us look, for example, at the case of Sir Thomas Tait. When he was appointed head of the National Service Commission, his appointment was hailed with pleasure by every man in Canada, irrespective of party. What happened? Within three weeks we heard that Sir Thomas Tait had resigned his appointment. Why? Because he was interfered with, because he would not submit to party dictation, why, Sir, he was not permitted even to appoint his own secretary. His resignation was accepted and an extreme partisan put in his place.

There is another phase of this matter that I want to refer to shortly. I wish to lay down the principle that a measure so vital as this, involving the lives and hopes and fortunes of 100,000 young Canadians, should not be administered by a partisan Government. But hon. members opposite will say: We offered you a coalition. I do not wish to doubt the sincerity of the Prime Minister in regard to that offer, but if he really wanted a coalition, he took an extraordinary method of bringing it about. The courtship, to say the least, was a very clumsy affair. The Prime Minister told the public all about it before he spoke to the leader of the Opposition. Mr. Speaker I understand that you, Sir, have had some experience in these matters, and I will put it to you. Would any respectable young lady have anything to do with a fellow who first hired a hall and announced his intentions at a public meeting and then came to her with his proposal?

Mr. BURNHAM: Does the leader of the Opposition sustain the argument being indulged in by the hon. member?

Mr. SINCLAIR: I cannot say. My right hon. friend the Prime Minister must have done better than that in his domestic affairs. Had he not, he would not have succeeded as well as he has done. A coalition can be brought about only by "give and take." In this case it was "all take". If the Prime Minister really wanted a coalition, on his return from England, he should have sent for the leader of the Opposition and should have asked him to sit down at the table and talk the matter over and see if they could arrive at any common ground on which they could come together. But he did not do that. He throws the proposal down on the table of the House with a flourish and his supporters begin to cheer, and the Conservative press begin to wave the flag and to denounce the Grits and the French. The labour conventions protest against the proposal and an indignation meeting is called in the city of Montreal. After all this has happened, my right hon. friend comes to the leader of the Opposition with a cast-iron proposal—take it or leave it. Let us look for a moment at the proposal of the Prime Minister. The first thing is to form a coalition Government, then to pass the Conscription Bill and then to appeal to the country on the Conscription Bill. Under that proposal what opportunity would the country have to express any opinion? It would be the duty of the Prime Minister, if that agreement was carried out, to notify my opponent, provided I supported the coalition Government, to withdraw, and so with all the others. It would be the duty of the leader of the Opposition to ask all the Liberals throughout the country that are opposing Conservative candidates to withdraw. The result would be that this moribund Parliament would be elected by acclamation, and instead of one year's extension, we would have five years' extension.

Mr. BURNHAM: Do you exclude the people from nominating somebody?

Mr. SINCLAIR: No, but they would have to break away and form a new party. Is not that true?

Mr. BURNHAM: No.

Mr. SINCLAIR: It is certainly true because I assume that if the leaders went into a proposal of this kind, they would do so in good faith and would stand by one another. Would it not be better to be frank and above board and to extend Parliament at once for five years than to pretend to consult the people by a pre-arranged scheme that would absolutely prevent the people from expressing any opinion whatever? Is it any wonder that the leader of the Opposition, who believes in responsible government and not in junkerdom, should reject such a proposal as that? Notwithstanding all that my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark) said, with a flourish of his arm, that such a proposal was magnificent.

Mr. BURNHAM: He said it was magnanimous.

Mr. SINCLAIR: According to Hansard he said magnificent. All I have to say about that is "every man to his taste, as the old woman said when she kissed her cow." Besides the leader of the Government knew that no coalition was possible with the Minister of Public Works as a member of the Government. I think I have a right to assume, that fact from the attitude of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, and that my leader would not become a member of a government of which the Minister of Public Works was a member. What happened? We find by the correspondence that has been placed upon Hansard that during the very time that the coalition proposal was before the two leaders, the Prime Minister was conducting other correspondence ostensibly for the purpose of whitewashing the Minister of Public Works and retaining him in the Cabinet. Do you ask me how I know that? I know it by the dates in Hansard. It was announced in the press that the two leaders held their meetings after the 24th of May. The final meeting berween the leaders, according to a letter published in Hansard, took place on the 6th day of June. We also know from the correspondence that has been placed on Hansard that on the 28th of May the Minister of Public Works wrote to the Prime Minister asking for a new trial on the Galt charges, and on the 30th of May, two days later, the Prime Minister gave a favourable reply. Therefore, at the very date that the Prime Minister was pretending to carry on negotiations with the leader of the Opposition for a coalition, he was, behind the back of the leader of the Opposition, carrying on a secret correspondence, ostensibly for the purpose of whitewashing the Minister of Public Works, and retaining him in the Cabinet, knowing all the time that there could be no coalition with the Minister of Public Works a member of the new Government. I am not opposed to coalition. I regret very much the failure of the attempt of the two parties to get together. I am firmly convinced that a national government organized on broad lines representing all parties in this country, including labour, is the best solution of our present difficulties. Let me express the hope that if my leader is returned to power, as I believe he will be in the case of an election coming on, he will adopt this view and give this country a government in which, providing the war is going on, all parties will have confidence.

Hon. gentlemen have been emphasizing the necessity for more recruits. I have no doubt that recruits can be used to advantage. I am of the opinion that if every able-bodied man in Canada was enlisted and sent over to France, there would be plenty of work for them to do and they would be welcome there.

But there is something more important to this country, and that is honest, vigorous and efficient administration of our military affairs. If we are to succeed, if we are to do our part properly to win this war, three things are essential. The first is administration, the second money, and the third men. In my judgment, administration is the vital thing. You may have abundance of money, you may have a large army of courageous and devoted fighting men, but if the money is stolen or squandered, and the army mismanaged, you will end in failure, and the chances are you will end in disaster.

I trust, Mr. Speaker, you will not think that I am over-critical in my speech, for I do not desire to be. I recognize that this Government have had a gigantic task to perform, and I am quite willing to give them credit where credit is due. But I am not here to indulge in flattery or palaver. I think that in a serious time like this, plainness of speech is a duty, and I regard it as my duty, as a member of this House, to criticise and offer suggestions. That is the custom followed in the British House of Commons. In that House they call a spade a spade, and have done so ever since the war began. They discuss Cabinet changes, and even military mistakes, in the open. The British policy is to let the people know the truth and the whole truth. Only last week the details of the blunders in Mesopotamia were exposed to the public gaze. And I submit the British practice is the right practice. They have not much use over there for rubber-heeled statesmen, who either keep silent altogether or administer praise when they ought to criticise. In my opinion such men are not performing their proper functions as members of Parliament, I do not care on which side of the House they may sit. Therefore, before I sit down, I desire very respectfully to point out to the Prime Minister that there are certain other things besides the conscription of men that this Government can do, and ought to do, in order to help win this war. Two years ago the Prime Minister made an able, eloquent and stirring speech, in which he declared that "We should consecrate the whole wealth and resources of the nation towards the winning of this war." The announcement was well received by the people; it was head-lined in the press throughout the country. But the consecration never took place, or, if it did, it was but an empty ceremony. What is the use of "consecrating" our wealth if we still keep our money in our pockets? I propose that even at this late date we should decide to make a real consecration of our wealth to this purpose, even if in doing so we have to invade this House and extract some shekels from the pockets of the millionaires, who sit on the first and second rows of the Government benches—and, of course, if we have any millionaires on this side they must pay too; but I do not think we have; we are all poor but honest on this side of the House. And I propose that we should devote a part of the money so obtained to an increase in the soldier's pay. Is it reasonable that the man who cuts the grass in your garden, or digs in the street, should get $2.50 or $3 a day, and that the worker in a munition factory should get from $5 to $8 a day; and that the soldier, who works long hours, endures hardship, and exposes himself and risks his life, should be paid $1.10 a day and found? I know very well the soldiers are not fighting for money. But that is no reason why we should not do them justice.

Then, we should prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors. There was small reason for the existence of this traffic at the time the war broke out, and there is none at all now.

Again, we should either dispense with or force into some useful or productive occupation, the thousands of Government favourites who are now strutting about in the King's uniform and drawing the King's pay, but who neither fight nor work. My hon. friend from Parry Sound (Mr. Arthurs), I understand, is a military critic. He is also a supporter of the Administration. He made a statement in the House which, I think, was intended as a reflection on the French Canadians, but which turns out to be an indictment of the Government he is supporting. He said that when he was in England he found a whole battalion composed chiefly of officers and non-commissioned officers, with very few private soldiers. What does that mean? It means that the Minister of Militia, the department, and the Government, have been so lavish in appointing their friends to positions, that to get rid of them they had to send them out of the country and across the water in whole battalions. I do not know as much about war as does my hon. friend from Parry Sound, but I know this much—you cannot carry on a war without some fighting men; and if you have a battalion that is composed almost altogether of officers and with few fighting men, about the only thing that that battalion can do is to mark time and draw their pay. If the Government wish to continue such a battalion, instead of "win the war" their slogan should be "win the jobs."

We should also open the gates of promotion equally to men of both political parties. Another suggestion: Let the Government stop indulging in Highway Bills and other election dodges in the most critical period of the great war. Let them punish, and completely suppress, any newspaper, French or English, that devotes its pages to preventing recruiting, or to kindling the flames of hatred between the two great races of this country. Let us impartially and honestly enforce the principle of equal service all around. If we do that the young men in Canada will see that we are in earnest and will respond to the call.

And one thing more. We should adopt a more liberal pension scale than we now have, and we should do it at once. I am informed that there are hundreds, perhaps thousands, of widows and orphans who are depending on the cold charity of this country, who are not as well off to-day as they were when they had their husbands and fathers with them before the war. It is not sentimental speeches about the brave manner in which their husbands and fathers died that is wanted, but something to fill the cupboard.

And now as a last word: Let me appeal to the Prime Minister to throw himself upon the judgment of the people of this country by accepting the proposition of the leader of the Opposition. To my mind it is the only escape; it is the only way open to us to reconcile the province of Quebec. The leader of the Opposition has given his word that if we can secure a popular majority for this proposal the province of Quebec will submit. I have read, and reread, and pondered over his words, and I believe he is absolutely sincere and that he has taken this course because there is no other course open, and because he believes in his heart that it is in the best interests of Canada that he should take this course. Let me quote the pledge which he has made. Referring to the proposed referendum, he says:

> What I propose is that we should have a referendum and a consultation of the people upon this question. I have taken the referendum, not that I have been very favourable towards it, but I find that the idea of the referendum has made enormous progress in Canada, and that it has been adopted by the political associations in the western provinces as a method of political action. If we are to have peace, if there is to be unity, we must meet the wishes of the labouring classes, who have asked for this privilege. When the consultation with the people has been had, when the verdict has been pronounced, I pledge my word, my reputation, that to the verdict, such as it is, every man will have to submit, and I claim to speak at least so far as is concerned for the province from which I come.
> Is that an unfair situation, is that an unfair appeal? Can any one say that it is not in accordance with true democratic principles? This I leave to the consideration of those whom I see before me.

That, Mr. Speaker, is the offer. The issue in this debate is clear. We must choose between force and conciliation. The Prime Minister in effect says: There are certain people in this country, notably in the province of Quebec, who are not doing their duty; we will compel them to do their duty even if we have to do so at the point of the bayonet. The leader of the Opposition says: No, you have no authority to do that; first get authority; submit this matter to the electors of the country by a referendum; if the electors decide that this should be done, I will submit, and, in so far as I can speak for my province, they will submit, and both races will work together to carry out the will of the people. I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that the responsibility of the Prime Minister is heavy if he rejects that offer. If he accepts that offer there opens before us a vision of a united Canada, of the people of both great races standing shoulder to shoulder and striking their sturdiest blows in the cause of freedom. If, on the other hand, the proposal is rejected, we see a different picture. We have a vision of a country split in two, torn by internal strife and laying up a legacy of discord and hate for our children's children. Mr. Speaker, we are at the forks of the road, each of us must choose his path, and with these two pictures before my mind, I deem it my duty to vote for the amendment.

Hon. F. B. McCURDY (Parliamentary Secretary of the Department of Militia and Defence): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to say that the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) does not correctly reflect public opinion in the province of Nova Scotia on this occasion. His views are not the views of the people of that province. In fact he does not even speak for the Liberal party in Nova Scotia. The hon. member spoke with pride of the source of his political inspiration; he said that he had sat at the feet of that great tribune of the people, Joseph Howe. I wish to remind the House that in the years when that distinguished statesman wielded his greatest influence in his native province, he occupied the editor's chair of the Nova Scotian, now the Halifax Morning Chronicle. His precepts and teachings have been consistently followed by that steadfast and doughty Liberal newspaper. No one has ever accused it of being other than true to that party's traditions, and competent to speak with authority for the Liberal party in that province. Well, I notice that in the Chronicle of June 28, in a leading editorial entitled "Steady, Boys, Steady," it says:

The Morning Chronicle shares Mr. Maclean's beliefs.

And Mr. A. K. Maclean is opposed to a referendum, opposed to the policy supported by my hon. friend from Guysborough. So that my hon. friend (Mr. Sinclair) is quite out of step, even with the recognized exponent of Liberal thought in my native province.

Very rarely since the war broke out has the progress of this Parliament been delayed by remarks from me, and if at this time, when the call of the nation is for action rather than debate, I am impelled to speak, it is only because the information acquired in the prosecution of official duties has so impressed me that I feel it would be wrong to be silent.

I wish to say in the most positive manner that it is my conviction that the need for reinforcements is so pressing and urgent that the man who stands in the way of such being provided at the earliest possible moment is assuming a responsibility of the gravest possible character.

The importance of the outcome of the present struggle does not need to be emphasized. No one more eloquently than the leader of the Opposition himself has pointed out the extreme gravity of the crisis. Speaking on February 8, 1916, in this House, Hansard page 632, the right hon. gentleman used these words:

> "Sir, who talks of Empire to-day? There are other things greater even than the Empire, great as it is. Civilization is greater than the Empire, and civilization is the issue. . . . Who can doubt but that if Germany were to win it would be the end of all we hold sacred. For my own part I re-echo the words lately spoken by that workman of the docks of Liverpool, who discussing compulsion in England put an end to all doubts by exclaiming, "If Germany should win, nothing on God's earth would matter." I speak my whole soul and heart when I say that if Germany were to win I would be thankful that Providence should close my eyes before I saw the sun rising on such a day.

The unanimous applause which greeted these statements when uttered measured the approval of all members of this House in the sentiments expressed.

But within the past few days the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) questioned the expediency of Canada continuing to exert her strongest efforts. I think the hon. gentleman contended that Canada's effort should be modified because of the entrance of the United States into the war. If the words which I have quoted from the speech of the leader of the Opposition still represent the feeling of this House, as they reflected it when these words were uttered, it would have been more logical, and it would certainly have been more in line with the best opinion of this country if the hon. member for St. John had drawn the analogy between Canada's effort and that of Great Britain, rather than United States.

With every indication of sincerity, the hon. gentleman compared our population with that of United States, and argued that "because this war is as much their struggle as ours" the contribution of that country to the war should exceed 6,000,000 men. Could not the hon. gentleman quite as aptly have argued that, inasmuch as this struggle is as much ours as it is that of the Mother Country, our contribution of men should be as great relatively as that of Great Britain. Is he aware that more than 17 per cent of the total population of Great Britain, or almost 7,000,000 men, have enlisted for military service, and if Canada were to participate to the same relative extent, the Canadian Expeditionary Force would number not 421,767 as it stood on June 15, but 1,224,820. In suggesting that Canada so limit its efforts the hon. member may be speaking for a section of the population of this country, but if such a section exists in the part of Canada from which he and I come, then all I have to say is that it is a section of the population who keep their views very much to themselves, unless perchance they have communicated them to the hon. member for St. John. If the fine old loyalist city of St. John is correctly represented in this House by these expressions, then I am sure that my surprise that it be so will be shared by many members of the House.

The great question and the ominous one that faces us is "What is to be the decision in the present struggle of opposing forces on the field of battle.

We can win if all the Allies bring the whole of their strength to bear. There is the possibility that the Allies could win, and lives and property in Canada be kept safe, even without Canada exerting its full strength. But because there is such a possibility does such a prospect appeal to any full-blooded Canadian?

I am sure that the hon. gentleman who advises us to sit down and calculate to a nicety just how many of our liabilities we can shuffle over to our southern neighbours and just how little effort we can get off with does not correctly interpret the real temper of this country. The correct sentiment of the Canadian people was surely understood by the right hon. the Prime Minister when at the beginning of the war he decided to place Canada with all her resources on the side of right. He appreciated, with the best thought of Canada, what principles and issues were involved in the struggle. While other and larger nations hesitated and waited to inevitably drift in, Canada under his guidance found her place without a moment's hesitancy or delay.

It is, I am sure, a matter of gratification to every Canadian that the first offer of co-operation to reach the Mother Country from overseas came, as was fitting, from the oldest and strongest Dominion in the Empire. Before war had been declared and even before it was known to be inevitable, England had received by cable from Premier Borden the assurance of Canadian support. Hostilities had not been in progress sixty days before the largest fleet of transports and the biggest body of troops ever previously despatched at one time for overseas service in the history of the world had been mobilized, equipped and sent forward for service. Further reinforcements have continued to go forward, and in the words of the Prime Minister, so long as he is entrusted with the control of the destinies of Canada "What remains to be done will be measured only by Britain's need."

With the knowledge that has been gained of our great adversary and his methods; his cruelty, his barbarism, his duplicity, his total disregard of all the rights of any one, friend or foe, that stands in his way, his slaughter of innocent women and children, his murders on the high seas,—does any true Canadian regret the decision of August, 1914?

And having put our hand to the plough, shall we now turn back? Shall we with an increasing realization of the magnitude of our task now weaken or falter? Shall we fail to give our gallant boys at the front the support and reinforcements they imperiously ask for, and have the right to receive? To all such question the best spirit of Canada gives only one answer.

Canadian troops have been given a position of honour in the field. When I had the opportunity of visiting the armies in France in January last, they were undertaking to hold eleven miles of front along the Vimy Ridge. That name, then little known in this country, has since become a glorious tradition owing to the exploits of our men. They have defended the position at Vimy Ridge successfully and gloriously.

To hold this front required four divisions containing, among other arms of the service, approximately 52,000 infantry. A chain is as strong only as its weakest link; our attention must be riveted on our supply of infantry; that is the link we must watch. Furthermore, all other branches of our arms are subsidiary or complementary to it. The wastage in this arm of the service is figured at 15 per cent monthly. The actual wastage, of course, varies, but in operations such as are now progressing in France 15 per cent is under rather than over the real losses. We, therefore, at the present time require reinforcements of infantry to the number of 7,800 monthly. On May 14 according to the statement given to the House by the Minister of Militia, we had in England of class "A1" men immediately ready for the trenches, that is physically fit and with their training sufficiently advanced, and including those embodied in the 5th Division, 14,720 men of "A 1" class, or something less than two months reinforcements. There were also at the same time in England, other infantry whose training was not sufficiently far advanced or who were recovering from wounds or sickness, and men over 18 and not yet 19 years of age to the number of 22,460. There is only one other class of infantry reserves in England and those are part of the men mentioned in category "D" which contains infantry to the number of 9,476, which category is described as "men temporarily unfit for "A" "B" and "C" categories, but likely to be fit within 6 months." So that if all the men in classes 2 and 3 of category "A" and those over 18 but under 19 as well as "those who are temporarily unfit, but who are likely to be fit for service in 6 months" are included, we have as total reserves actual and prospective for the infantry in England 46,656. But these men will not all be fit within that time. Many who have been wounded, and become temporarily unfit for "A" "B" and "C" categories, will not be ready within that time.

Mr. KNOWLES: Could the hon. member give us any definite information as to when the 22,460 men will be available?

Mr. McCURDY: Supposing, for the sake of argument, that they could all be relied on to be fit within that period, then we have, on June 1, less than six months reinforcements in England for our infantry, and it must be remembered that in this calculation are included those who are not at the present moment sufficiently trained, or not in sufficiently fit physical condition for the trenches.

I have taken no account of the normal wastage among troops overseas but not actually in the trenches; such wastage, of course, exists, but, to the extent that it does exist, it further emphasizes the necessity for more men. And, as I have pointed out, we had at May 14 in England less than two months reinforcements of infantry ready for the trenches. So that, with less than 6 months infantry reinforcements of all classes in England on May 14, we turn to Canada to see what reserves are available here. At the end of May the infantry strength in Canada was, including troops embarked for overseas during May, less than 10,500. Even if all these were category "A1" men, they would represent less than six weeks reinforcements of wastage at the front, and they are not fit, and will not be for many months to come, owing to their training not being sufficiently advanced.

Furthermore, voluntary enlistments for infantry since January 1 have been on a meagre scale, so much so that when we deduct wastage in Canada, the number of such recruits enlisted since January 1 gives us no net result at all. For five months past this has been the condition prevailing. Under such circumstances, what course shall we follow? Shall we refuse to support the men who have gone to fight our battles? Shall we abandon them to their fate? Shall we refuse reinforcements to our forces?

Canada's forces must be considered as a unit. It is idle to talk of them being reinforced from or protected by, as the hon. member for St. John suggests, the armies of Britain, the United States, or any other allied country. To refill their thinning lines, to replace their fallen comrades, our gallant men turn not to the United States but to us who sent them forth. The proposition is put fairly to us: Shall we keep faith with them or desert them? There is no side-stepping the issue and time is swiftly passing. If the Act were to go into force at once, we could barely secure, before the end of the year, the necessary infantry reinforcements. It takes time to mobilize, train, equip and send the troops forward, and it seems to me that this Bill affords the only solution whereby these reinforcements can be provided.

That Canada has done admirably under the voluntary system is patent. We hear that expression constantly both at home and abroad. Perhaps its reiteration in Canada may have engendered too much complacency, and adversely affected further recruiting. That Canada has under the voluntary system done better than was expected is quite true. I remember distinctly a conversation that, just after the outbreak of war, I had with some of our most active and experienced militia officers. Their unanimous opinion was that Canada's total contribution of men could not exceed 75,000. Yet, already, over five and one-half times that number have joined the Canadian Expeditionary Force, and almost five times that number have already proceeded overseas.

The hon. member for St. John paid a well-deserved tribute to the work done by the Canadian artillery. This branch of the service has established a reputation which is second to none in the armies in the field. Artillery work naturally attracts young men of ambition, ingenuity and force, but our position overseas with regard to artillery is much better than it is for infantry. The overseas authorities advise that they have sufficient artillery reserves for the next twelve months. The conditions in England were such that it became necessary to make transfers from that branch to the infantry. While, of course, recruits signed up are attested for any branch of the service, yet on enlistment they have expected to choose the branch of their own preference, and if they are transferred to another later on, necessarily disappointment is occasioned. For these reasons, recruiting for artillery has temporarily stopped. Not that artillery reinforcements are needed less, but that infantry reinforcements are needed more, explains the temporary discontinuance of artillery recruiting.

In any event what should be the measure of Canada's effort? It seems to me the answer is simple. If we agree with the right hon. leader of the Opposition that we are fighting for all that makes life worth living, our national spirit will be content with nothing less than the utmost we can do. It may suit some nations and peoples to shelter themselves behind the defence and sacrifice of others, but that is not the Canadian spirit.

I am the last to fail to appreciate the greatness of Canada's magnificent effort up to date, but a study of statistics of the combatting armies in this titanic struggle proves that all ideas of war effort previous to Armageddon are obsolete and have to be discarded.

The liability to military service is as fundamental as the liability to obey any laws of the land. Our system of democracy implies an obligation on the part of the state to protect the citizen, but also implies the obligation on the part of the citizen to protect the state.

It has been stated emphatically by speakers taking part in this debate, both by those in favour of the Bill and those against it, that compulsory service should have been inaugurated at the beginning of the war. Even the hon. member for St. John, whose sympathetic nature is so stirred by the prospect of the anguish and bitter tears and broken hearts to be caused by the enforcement of compulsory service at this stage, is nevertheless emphatic in his assertion that a course should have been adopted at the beginning of the war which would have had the effect of inaugurating these miseries three years ago. His feelings are harrowed by the thought that under this measure "men will be taken from their mothers, their fathers, their sisters, their sweethearts and their wives and sent across the sea."

Does not my hon. friend appreciate that these same hardships and partings are and have been endured under our voluntary system? Do men who have voluntarily enlisted from a high sense of duty have no regrets over leaving loved ones at home? Would my hon. friend contend that the feelings of the man who is compelled by legislation to enlist are any more susceptible, sensitive, or worthy of consideration than those of the man whose compulsion comes only from his conscience and a sense of honour and duty? And does he contend that those gallant men who have voluntarily gone out are less dear to those they leave behind them than are those who will come under the operation of this Act?

This Act will, of course, entail suffering and heartaches. Since this war began the whole earth has been drenched with tears and rent with anguish, but we believe that the tears that have been shed and the anguish that has been suffered are destined to save from those very horrors the generations who will come after us and for whom we are trustees.

I fully agree with those who say, in the light of the knowledge we have to-day, that it would be better to have had compulsory service from the beginning. But who, I ask, expected at the beginning of the war that the conflict would be of such long duration, and that such sacrifices as have been called for would be demanded? In Great Britain, which is much nearer the scene of conflict, and where the contest can be better visualized, it was long after the beginning of the war before any suggestion of compulsory service was considered. The British authorities reckoned, as did many people in this country, that a few months would bring the defeat of the enemy, and, Anglo-Saxon-like, they took what now proves to have been only feeble steps to meet the danger. Finding their plans totally insufficient to insure victory, in the more threatening conditions which ensued, they revised them—as we must revise ours. Better, you say, compulsory service at the beginning; to which my reply is, better late than never.

If all the members of the House were to see the need as I see it, and as I believe the large majority do see it, they would not hesitate to take any action towards increasing the strength of Canadian arms, no matter how distasteful such action might be to portions of our population.

If our Allies held back—conforming with the advice of the hon. member for St. John, who suggests that we hold back—the result would certainly be disastrous. We, in common with our Allies, are fighting an enemy organized down to the minute. In this contest we cannot set the pace; we must give blow for blow. As he fights, as he is organized, so must we fight and organize. There is no other way to win. With the same effort, with the same organization as is used by the enemy, but with our greater numbers, our superior resources, and the justice of our cause, our ultimate triumph is certain.

Nothing, unfortunately, can take the place of man power in the firing line. Our other resources must and will be mobilized in the most effective manner, but the need of the moment is the provision of requisite manpower.

It has been said that volunteers give far better results on the field than an army which goes under some form of compulsion. The hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) this afternoon quoted the century-old opinion of Napoleon Bonaparte that one volunteer was worth three conscripts. Much to the satisfaction of the House, I am sure, he reinforced that opinion with his own. But any one who has followed the operations of the French army in the field and observed their record of achievement in the present war will experience difficulty in subscribing unqualifiedly to that view.

[Mr. McCurdy]

The outcome of this conflict is, in a material sense, the business of the State. If, with the consent of all parties, the future of the country has been pledged in the sum of upwards of a billion dollars, can it be said with any reason that the issue is a matter of local and individual concern, to be supported on the field only by those who choose to go out? Rather, it is the concern of the State to decide who can with the least economic loss be spared for military service.

5 p.m.

While the voluntary system has been wasteful, and while it has resulted in many going out whose places at the front could have been filled with less economic loss by others who have stayed behind, yet no doubt on sentimental grounds many will regret that its abandonment has been rendered necessary. I am convinced, however, that the continuance of this system under the present circumstances is not good business. All belligerent countries have realized this, and nearly all have long since come under a compulsory plan. The whole future of this country is clearly involved, and the time has come, in my opinion, for action in the interest of the State, regardless of personal considerations.

The present is a time of emergency, because of the necessity for obtaining infantry reinforcements. The amendment of the right hon. the leader of the Opposition is calculated, even under the most favourable circumstances, to consume much valuable time. How much time, even under the most favourable circumstances, would be lost?

Let us see what would happen if a majority of the members of this House were to vote for the amendment. Supposing it carried; what would happen? A new government would be formed. The organization of the new Administration would take time. That Government would then be bound to put the referendum to the people. In all decency, arrangements would have to be made to take such votes of soldiers in England and at the front as could be polled. Overseas transport to-day is, at best, slow and uncertain. I venture to say that this operation alone would consume at least three months. Then, supposing that the country, by referendum, approved of compulsory military service. The leader of the new Administration would proceed to enforce conscription. Before reinforcements could be secured to any extent, and while these political moves were being made, an overburdening load would be placed on our decimated forces at the front. Before effective reinforcements could reach France, the Canadian force would have disgracefully dwindled and Canada would, after four years of war, find herself where the United States was at the end of the first four weeks of the war.

And what would happen if the referendum showed a majority against compulsory military service? Such a result could only come from lack of information on the part of the people. Under such circumstances, is the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) wrong when he considers it the duty of this Parliament to give the country a lead? With the experience which I have necessarily acquired in the prosecution of official duties, I naturally know more about the operations of the military forces of Canada than I did a year ago. For the same reason I should know more about the need than do the majority of the voters in this country, and I will take the responsibility of voting for the measure, and I earnestly pray that it will be put into effect with the least possible delay.

What the occasion demands is not debate, not discussion, but action, decisive, unanimous action on the part of this Parliament. To use a quotation not unfamiliar in this House, "We cannot wait because time will not wait."

In introducing a proposal of a purely domestic and business nature, the right hon. leader of the Opposition, as reported in Hansard, 1903, page 7659, was moved to use these impassioned words:

> To those who urge upon us the policy of to-morrow and to-morrow, and to-morrow; to those who tell us, wait, wait, wait; to those who advise us to pause, to consider, to reflect, to calculate and to inquire, our answer is: No, this is not a time for deliberation, this is a time for action. The flood of tide is upon us that leads on to fortune; if we let it pass it may never recur again. If we let it pass the voyage of our national life, bright as it is to-day, will be bound in shallows. We cannot wait, because time does not wait; we cannot wait because, in these days of wonderful development time lost is doubly lost; we cannot wait because at this moment there is a transformation going on in the conditions of our national life which it would be folly to ignore and a crime to overlook; we cannot wait, because the prairies of the Northwest, which for countless ages have been roamed over by the wild herds of the bison or by the scarcely less wild tribes of red men, are now invaded from all sides by the white race. . . . Such is our duty; it is immediate and imperative. It is not of to-morrow, but of this day, of this hour, and of this minute. Heaven grant that it is not already too late!

Mr. Speaker, may I ask in this momentous crisis, when the destiny not only of Canada but of human liberty itself hangs trembling in the balance, is haste less imperative, is delay less dangerous?

Mr. W. E. KNOWLES (Moosejaw): Mr. Speaker, a large number of hon. members have already spoken on the subject now before the House, and those of us who are speaking before the close of the debate, are able to congratulate our predecessors, generally speaking, because their words have been moderate and their speeches on the whole have been free from taunt and from objectionable remarks. There is a time for bitter controversy in a party sense, and there is a time when bitter controversy is not the happiest thing, and my view is that in this debate those who have excluded from their remarks taunting observations and factional, partisan statements, have been the happier for doing so. While I am not very strong in that regard, I will endeavour to leave out of my remarks what is factional and partisan, and when a weaker brother attempts to achieve some of the accomplishments of the stronger brother, I trust he will receive some encouragement. I say this in all seriousness, because I believe that the present juncture is one which every man, in casting his vote, must ask himself whether he is doing so in the best interest of the military operations which are now being carried on. I do not believe any hon. gentleman, seriously considering the questions now being discussed in this Chamber, would, in the last resort, cast his vote from any other wish than that of the best interest of his country. No man would think seriously of casting a vote that, while it might help his party, might do so at the expense of his country.

It is wonderful how all the countries whom we call Allies, and ourselves, are in this war voluntarily because we believe it is right for us to be in this war. I like to go back to the day when Serbia refused the arrogant, impudent ultimatum of Austria. Serbia had before her the opportunity of following a path in which there would be no suffering, no sacrifice, no bloodshed, no death, no devastation. All that Serbia had to do was to accede to that insolent ultimatum, and she might have gone on her way in quietness and peace. Serbia knew what war meant; Serbia had only lately been through the Balkan wars; but even Serbia, composed of a people from whom we might not think we could learn much, taught us a lesson that before she would renounce her nationhood, she would pay all the price she might be called upon to pay and she would stand firm to her ideals as a nation. Serbia chose voluntarily the way of self-sacrifice.

What shall I say of Belgium? Hon. members will recall the way in which Belgium voluntarily entered this war. They will remember the request which the Kaiser sent to Belgium, that the people of Belgium might peaceably allow the forces of Germany to pass through their country, and his statement that he would pay the Belgians for all the damage done by his soldiers, and that no wanton damage would be done. But what would that have meant to Belgium? It would have meant the giving up of her nationhood, the sacrificing of her ideals. On the other hand, if she refused that offer, it meant the standing by her nationhood and the paying of the terrible price that we have seen Belgium pay. The people of Belgium, through their cabinet, never wavered. They said: Cost what it may, let the devastation be never so great; let the fire and the bloodshed and the sword come, yet we will be true to our national honour, and we will in no way violate our neutrality. Belgium has shown us the way of sacrifice and of honour.

May we not say the same thing of England above all others? We speak, almost ad nauseam, of how well Canada has done in this war. Canada has done nothing compared with what old England has done, neither financially, nor so far as female work is concerned, nor in the sacrifice of men. The Parliamentary Secretary for Military Affairs (Mr. McCurdy) told us a moment ago that in Great Britain they had given 17 per cent of their manhood, whereas we have given only about 3 per cent. What reason have we to pat ourselves on the back as though we had done wonderful things? In this country we have not learned to sacrifice ourselves in the voluntary way that the people of Great Britain have done. This whole war is filled with the lesson of voluntary service. We have voluntary conscription, if you will, each man conscripting himself. This war is to me like a crusade, with all these nations voluntarily marching out to fight for an ideal, for a sentiment, if you like to call it so. Great Britain did not have to go into this war. She might easily have remained outside of that bloody conflict had she wished, and not have paid the terrible price she has had to pay. She might have made millions of dollars out of this war had she so desired. But Great Britain had her traditions, and she knew that if she did not enter this war on the side of right, of principle; if she did not voluntarily throw herself into the great conflict, her shame would ring down through the centuries to come. We, in Canada, went into the war in the same way. The Prime Minister very properly at the commencement of this war, as expressing the view of the people of Canada irrespective of party, sent across the water the message that in this conflict that seemed then to be settling down upon Europe, this young nation wished it to be understood that we too were in this conflict for the preservation of civilization, and that we too were behind Great Britain to the last of our resources. Undoubtedly, this war has been full of lessons to us as to the strength of voluntary sacrifice and devotion to duty.

There is no question that the need for men is very great. We know that from what we read in the papers, from what we hear from returned soldiers and from what we gather from the memoranda that has been brought down in this House. We know it from a message which we had from Sir Arthur Currie. There is also no doubt that if the issue of this war should be unfavourable to our side, we would then bid farewell to all that we hold precious. On that subject there can be no debate.

At this juncture it is of the utmost importance that we should not leave undone anything that will increase our military power. Therefore, we come to the question: in handling of the situation now before us, by which means are we going to attain the maximum military power of which we are capable? The Prime Minister said that we should send half a million men. Without meaning the slightest offence, I take little stock in that statement. It is not a matter of sending half a million men, but of sending as many men as we can. If we can supply 700,000 men, there is no reason why we should send only 500,000; but if we can send only 400,000, then let it be that number—we shall have done our duty. The only rule to be observed is to obtain from the people of Canada the utmost possible military energy and power for the carrying on of the war, and how much that may be we cannot say in advance. Much will depend upon the prolongation of the war. If the hon. member from St. John (Mr. Pugsley) did say that we should withhold our contributions and stay our hands because the United States had come into the war,—I am not aware that he did say that—I can only say that I entertain the same view with regard to that utterance as was expressed by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queens (Mr. McCurdy). In my opinion, the fact that the United States has come into the contest should stimulate us more than ever to do our utmost for the carrying on of the war. So, the question to be considered, as I have said, is: How are you going to get the maximum fighting force?

The Government's answer to that question is to bring down this Bill. I am not now going into the record of the Government in this war—this is not the time for it; a time will come for us to express our views on that subject. The Prime Minister comes from the Old Country, and tells us that after visiting Great Britain he has decided that he wants conscription. And the only reason that I can gather from his statement on the subject—and I have carefully studied his speech—is that the boys at the front have sent a message that they want reinforcements. That is the argument, and the conclusion arrived at is that conscription is the best way. The boys at the front may have said that they want reinforcements; and they may need reinforcements; but it does not necessarily follow from this that we must have conscription. I should like to have heard some closer reasoning on this subject; I have not noticed that any of those who have spoken on this subject have addressed themselves to this hiatus in the reasoning. There is no argument about the need of reinforcements. It is mere waste of time for us to say that we want to win the war. After we have declared that we want to win the war it does not necessarily follow that we can win it better by means of conscription than by means of toleration and mediation. It is easy to say: "the boys at the front want reinforcements, therefore vote for conscription." That is easy, because it seems most popular; it wins the greatest applause; the man who says that can flatter himself that his name will go thundering down the centuries as that of a great patriot. But, as I have said, there seems to me something absent in the reasoning. I want to be shown why conscription will give us the best military results as opposed to every other possible way. If it could be shown that the boys in the trenches will have other Canadians by their side and fighting with them, and will have those men there sooner and in greater numbers by means of conscription than by any other means there would be no hesitation on my part in supporting conscription.

I am going to give the reasons why the policy of the Government does not commend itself to me, why the speeches made in support of that policy have not convinced me that conscription is going to result in giving us the greatest military power that is possible for us. If I am wrong in that let it be shown that I am wrong, and I shall be very glad to support conscription. Conscription is a beautiful thing when linked up with the idea of helping the boys in the trenches. Nobody questions our duty to those who are fighting for us. I agree that our nation will be judged by the way we have used the boys who have gone to fight our battles; there will be the real test of our manhood. I agree that it is not possible to do too much for our soldiers. It is for that very reason that I do not approve all that has been done with regard to that. I find, for instance, that in Moosejaw, when I got a man to trim my hedge, I pay him $3.50 a day—35 cents an hour. But the man in the trenches who risks his life in our defence is given $1.10 a day. That is not fair. We are told that other nations are not paying their men even as well as we do. I do not care about that; I believe there should be more of the fifty-fifty basis in the compensation for the sacrifices these men have made. So, I agree that we can do nothing that is too good for the boys in the trenches. But still I require to be shown that conscription is the way by which they can be most benefited.

Logically, and in principle, conscription is a method with which I can find no fault. It seems to me the same as with woman suffrage—there is no argument against it. I heard Mrs Pankhurst speak once, and, having heard her, I said, and have said ever since, that the argument was unanswerable. So, I say that conscription is right. It is equitable, it is just. It seems to me nothing can be truer than this—that, as the state gives the citizen its protection, the citizen in return must give his services in protecting the existence of the state. That being true, the citizen should offer his services in the hour of emergency for the protection of the state which has protected him. Selective conscription, I have no quarrel with, because I think it is right. Still we come back to the question: Why pass this Bill; why send our soldiers throughout the Dominion armed with warrants to bring in men, living men? For that is what will be the result of this legislation. Will this proceeding result in increasing our military strength; will it give us our maximum fighting power in men to send overseas? I am afraid it will not. And, speaking quite frankly, the trouble is, as we all know, in the province of Quebec. I am not going to say a word in defence of Quebec, nor a word against Quebec. This is a British country, a country of free men, and each man must use his own judgment in this free country. But that is not the question. The question is, what result will follow the physical enforcement of this law? That is what catches me. You send out your recruiting officers—is that what you are to call them—with warrants to go to Quebec and to bring in men to be trained as soldiers. I have not heard any person in this debate tell us how you are going to compel the men to come from the province of Quebec without sending more soldiers there to fetch them than they will bring with them. It is all very well to talk about getting even with Quebec; about putting Quebec in her place, and letting her know where she stands and all that kind of thing. I have heard both Liberals and Conservatives talk that way. In my opinion, the man who says that to-day is the best day to settle our troubles with Quebec has made up his mind without thinking the matter out; or, if he has thought it out, he wants to press our fighting power not against Germany, but against Quebec.

It will be a very hollow victory if you do overcome the people of the province of Quebec. It will do you no good if you do put Quebec where she belongs. It will not do one bit of good, even if all the Orangemen in Ontario should have their hearts set on seeing Quebec brought to her knees. We are not after Quebec; we are after Germany. One war is enough at a time, and one enemy is sufficient for the proper manipulation of the war. Can any person show us—no person has up to the present—how we can force the people of Quebec to accept this measure? What I say not only applies to Quebec but to the labouring organizations throughout the country, because they are against this Bill also. If anybody can show me how you are going to enforce this measure against public opinion in Quebec, and against the will of the labour organizations, I will be very pleased to be so convinced.

The matter will just resolve itself into this: We will take the French-speaking parishes of Quebec, the people having their own view and as individuals not being afraid of anybody. Nobody has ever questioned the honour or bravery of the French Canadian people. I do not know that I would ever think of suggesting it. The French Canadian will hold his own with the Ontario Orangeman any day as far as bravery goes. It is not that. But, you have men down there—two-legged men—and you want to get at those who are not willing to obey the law.

Mr. FRIPP: Why do you think they will not obey the law as well as anybody else?

Mr. KNOWLES: I think there is grave danger that it will result in an outbreak throughout the country.

Mr. BEST: The people of Quebec are not as loyal and as anxious to defend the Empire, as are the Orangemen of Ontario.

Mr. KNOWLES: Possibly the hon. gentleman (Mr. Best) is right. I would not care, for the purposes of this argument, if the people of Quebec were the worst traitors in the world; we want to combat Germany and we do not want to have a war with Quebec.

Mr. BEST: I do not think it is fair to try and stir up racial strife in that way. I think that remarks like those which the hon. gentleman has uttered will raise more strife than anything that the Orangemen of Ontario could say or do.

Mr. KNOWLES: That may be and I said at the outset that I was not going to raise any contentious matters or questions that were likely to disturb the harmony. Therefore, I will let the hon. member for Dufferin (Mr. Best) have his way and get along with my address. Then, the question I ask is: How are you going to enforce this law, once it is passed, in the province of Quebec? Let my honourable friend answer that when he speaks. Are you going to send soldiers to do it? Are you going to send them into the parishes of Quebec? You will want to get as many recruits as are necessary to make up the 500,000. The soldiers that you will send into Quebec to do this will be English-speaking soldiers because you could not get French-speaking soldiers to do it. If they are sent into the remote parishes they will not know the language of the people or the geography of the country and there will be no registration of the men who should enlist. What results can you expect from sending English-speaking soldiers into a strange country and amongst a strange and hostile people? You will find that it will take more than one English-speaking soldier for every single recruit you will bring out of Quebec. The hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Fripp) asks me how I know that the people of Quebec are not willing to co-operate in the carrying out of this Act. I do not say that they are going to fight the law but I do say that they will not harmoniously co-operate in enforcing the law. I think the hon. member for Dufferin will agree with the opinions expressed by a newspaper called the Sentinel and I think possibly the hon. member for Ottawa will also. I purpose to quote from the Sentinel to show the feeling and opinion, which, according to the Sentinel, exist in Quebec. I am not in all approving of that feeling, but if all the people in Quebec were traitors to-day that would not alter my view one bit. There never could be a more inopportune time to settle our troubles with Quebec than now because we have not sufficient fighting forces at our command to enable us to coerce Quebec. The Sentinel says:

> The Sentinel has pointed to the declarations by French leaders of their ambition to erect a French Canadian republic, the pacifist press and party have treated such statements as without foundation, and having their origin in a superheated brain. To-day, we find the outstanding clerical organ in Quebec openly advocating secession. La Croix, which speaks for the clergy of Quebec says: "How sweet it would be, in fact, to live in a Lower Canada separated from Upper Canada, yet subject as at present to the British Crown, administered by a French Canadian majority."

And it goes on to say that the time has come when they should seek to bring about that condition. The same paper, the issue of June 28, goes on as follows with reference to the plan of campaign:

> It should show the political social and religious disaster of Confederation on the one part, and on the other part the advantages Great Britain would obtain in according a political constitution which would give us a closer connection with the British Crown.

The Sentinel goes on:

> To remain under the authority of the British Crown, as indicated in this outline of the French ambition, is merely a veil drawn over their ultimate purpose of complete separation from Imperial control. The first step is to separate from the Dominion, and having accomplished that, when the disturbance incidental to it had passed, a demand would be made for independence, just as the Sinn Feiners in Ireland are doing to-day.

Then, later on it says:

> Three times in the history of Canada we have had civil war, and on every occasion, 1837, 1870, and in 1885, it was fomented by men of the French race. That they will give effect to these threats made in the face of the Prime Minister upon the floor of Parliament, is possible.

Again:

> Like the German Kaiser, they have been preparing for generations to accomplish a purpose which involves the destruction of Confederation.

So, it runs throughout the whole argument. When you have declarations made by gentlemen from the province of Quebec, that the people will not co-operate in the enforcement of this law, when you have had riots in the province of Quebec already, and when we all have information in a general way that there is an announced intention on the part of the people of Quebec to refuse to accept this measure, I fear that the passing of this Bill will not result in recruitment in that province. You will not force the people of Quebec to come forward in this way. Some hon. gentlemen say that the people will back down if you pass this Bill and call their bluff. I am afraid that is not true. You must remember that backing down in this case means backing down into the trenches, a more dangerous place than where they are now. Notwithstanding all this talk, I believe you could not call their bluff at this juncture. I fear that this Bill will not bring practical results and before I sit down I shall suggest what I believe to be the proper way of appealing to the law-abiding citizens of the province of Quebec who are all right if they are left alone by the agitators in that province. If the Nationalist agitators do not get hold of them they are as fine citizens as we have anywhere in Canada. The point I am making therefore is that at the present time the proper attitude to take with the province of Quebec is one of reasonable and manly conciliation and not one of bullying compulsion or force of any kind.

There is one thing that we need, I think hon. gentlemen will agree, and that is a united nation. You cannot successfully proceed with the war as a divided nation. If you have people in this country quarrelling amongst themselves, to that extent do you take away from your power to deal with the common enemy. Let us suppose that this Bill goes into force and let us look a year ahead; we will find our neighbour to the south of us, the United States, advancing successfully in the carrying on of the war with money, infantry, cavalry, aeroplanes and every thing else; we will find that others of our Allies have developed their fighting strength, as we trust they will, while we instead of developing our fighting strength and calling out our resources to the last man and the last dollar, within twelve months will find ourselves a quarrelling and divided country, the people of one province seeking to get even with the people of another province. We will when it is too late see the evils of this Bill.

It is only fear that such a condition may come to pass that makes me support the submission of this measure to the people of Canada in order that we may have their expression upon it. And, after all, do we not all get tired of this eternal wrangling and jangling between Ontario and Quebec? I think you will bear me out, Mr. Speaker, that in your province and in the Maritime Provinces generally—and I can speak for the western provinces—we are strangers to this bitter feeling. It is getting to be a tiresome thing in this House, this bitterness and wrangling and chewing the rag between Ontario and Quebec, each suspicious of the other, each trying to put the other in a false light. When I read an article such as I have read from the Sentinel, and realize that this kind of campaign is being carried on by a great wing of the Conservative party that wants to help the British Empire in its unity, I grow discouraged for the unity of the Dominion of Canada. So, I say, I believe that the best way to promote unity on this matter of conscription is by a referendum. Hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, from Quebec without exception, have pledged themselves that if a referendum is submitted to the people their constituents will abide hy the result. I do not think that a referendum is at all an obnoxious thing. Since when were we afraid to consult the people? Is there any reason why we should believe that we on this side of he House or hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House are possessed of more knowledge than their constituents? Will any one of us go back to his constituency and say: I know more than my electors? I am sure my hon. friend from Dufferin (Mr. Best) would not take that tack with his people, and I am sure that if he did they would not believe him; nor would mine believe me if I said that I had more knowledge than they. We are here and are what we are because we are supposed to represent faithfully the views of our constituents, and, I ask, since when have we possessed greater knowledge than our people, and since when is it against British principles that the will of the people should govern and rule on any great question that may come up for decision?

The labour people have also expressed themselves very strongly against the enactment of this Bill without a referendum. I have here a resolution sent to me in March last by the Trades and Labour Council of Moosejaw, a very important organization, because it has many allied labour activities associated with it. The resolution reads:

> That conscription be not put into effect until it has been submitted to a referendum vote of the people of Canada, and that the executive is hereby instructed to utilize all possible means of publicity and education to this end.

I have stated that personally I am in favour of conscription in its principle and in favour of referring the matter to the people at this juncture, thinking that this would conduce to unity and harmony much more than going ahead with the Bill in a drastic and compulsory way. If this is submitted to the people by a referendum I, as a citizen and not as a member, shall do all I can to see the principle carried, because I am in favour of conscription in principle.

We have heard hon. gentlemen on this side give reasons why they oppose a referendum. But it is remarkable, on reading the speeches of these hon. gentlemen that, without exception, they seem to come back to something different from the Bill and different from the Government's policy. I take, for example, the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. McCraney) who says distinctly that he supports the Bill, but he supports it with the thought in his mind that there must be a general election, evidently to ratify the Bill, but certainly a general election; and I presume that what he has in mind is that at a general election the Bill will be ratified. The Prime Minister said that, had a coalition Government accepted the Bill, he would have then submitted it to the people by means of a general election. The hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Pardee) says that he would ask that the Bill be not put into effect until one great, last, big appeal had been made to the people of Canada by way of voluntary enlistment. And, last of all, the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) distinctly says that this Bill will lead you to nowhere under a party Government. Why should he say that he will support a Bill that will lead to nowhere? He says this Bill will lead you nowhere and that it cannot be successfully administered by one party; and then he goes on to describe a coalition Government, with which I have no quarrel. But if the hon. member for Wellington is right in his logic and right in his belief that this Bill will not attain any results for you, why, in the name of Heaven, divide the people of Canada over a thing that is going to do no good whatever? If I thought this Bill would get for us the soldiers we want, I would not care if it drove Quebec out of Confederation, if it drove the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) out of public life, if it drove the right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) out of public life—I would call the breaking up of our Confederation a small thing if this Bill was going to be the means of winning this war for us. I would pay the price; I would say that the quid pro quo was such that it ought to be bought at any price; we ought to pay any price to win the war. But I am not going to throw my whole support behind a measure that I believe will not bring any results, that I believe in the main will tie our hands and handicap our efforts, and, instead of being an aid to us in a military sense, will take away from our real fighting force; and it is because I think this that I cannot see my way clear to support the Bill. The hon. member for South Wellington says that it will lead you nowhere. He says that the Bill cannot be successfully administered by a single party. If that is so, then why should we put such a Bill on the statute-book? Perhaps, as has been suggested, it will never be administered. Then I am against it because I am not in favour of placing measures on the statute-book with some suppressed, secret motive. I do not accuse the Government of anything of that kind, but if it is their intention never to put the Bill in force, I am against it, because I am opposed to voting for Bills which have any other object than that which appears on their face. I cannot support it without a referendum, because it will bring only schism and division and strife in the Dominion of Canada.

It has been declared in this House time and time again, and in the newspapers, that every man who leaves his party on this matter is a sort of hero and is a great follower of conviction, whose name will go down in history, and all that, because he is so sincere as to leave his party. I am not going to say anything direct or indirect about hon. gentlemen who have left the Liberal party. It is a very small matter to me compared with winning the war, and their grief at leaving the party is of smaller concern still. There is so much to grieve about in connection with the war that it is not a matter of national concern that certain men feel like crying because they are leaving the Liberal party. Nor is it of great importance what they say about their grief at withdrawing their support from my right hon. friend who leads the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). They talk of how they love him. We all love him, but there is no use talking about it, and I do not think the House is much concerned about these sentimental things anyway. But there may be two ways of looking at this thing. It does not necessarily follow that because a man leaves his party and goes the way he thinks his constituents will go, when there is a general election in sight, is any more a hero than the one who stays with his party. To leave his party when that party may be right is just as wrong as to stay with it when it is wrong.

In this instance, there may be many of us who just as conscientiously believe that the decision arrived at by our right hon. leader on the question of referendum is a correct decision, as others believe it is not the correct decision. Do not let us have any false heroes floating around the country. If they are bona fide heroes, let them be made colonels or knights, and be done with it. If they are all spurious heroes, the sooner we recognize that, the better for us all.

I wish to refer to the question of coalition. The right hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier has been much criticised because he did not accept what one speaker called the magnanimous offer of the Government. People make statements sometimes without thinking them out to their conclusion. The offer was made to the leader of the Opposition that he should go into a Cabinet which already had its policy outlined and its pathway defined. My right hon. friend the Prime Minister is a young and comparatively inexperienced statesman, compared with Sir Wilfrid Laurier, but in saying that I am not reflecting on the Prime Minister. The leader of the Opposition has the advantage in the matter of experience and seniority. As I understand the coalition proposition, it was like a consultation between lawyers or doctors. One doctor says "This case is grave and serious, I am afraid of my patient. I will have a consultation." Did you ever hear of a doctor calling in another physician—unless the other doctor was just a joke—and saying, "This man has a bad sickness, and probably going to die. I have diagnosed the case and prescribed for the patient. I have the medicine right here, and I have settled on what is going to be done, but you can come in and we will consult about it." Would a doctor listen to such a proposition? I suppose the only reason a doctor could be wanted in those circumstances, would be because he had a strong arm and could hold the patient while the medicine was being administered to him. No self-respecting doctor would be a party to such a consultation. Without being disrespectful to the Prime Minister, I may say it would seem to me like a mock proposition to ask Sir Wilfrid Laurier to go into the Cabinet, to hold a consultation on this problem when the Prime Minister had already decided what should be done. If I were to ask a man to come in and consult about some personal or political affair, which I considered a crisis and a grave problem, and said: "I want to talk it over, but I have decided it will be solved this way, and I do not want your opinion on it," who could say there could be any consultation between us in that case? I do not think the leader of the Opposition could give any other answer than the answer he did give to such a request. But there is another reason for his answer. We know the province of Quebec enters into this question. If the right hon. leader of the Opposition had gone into that Cabinet and endorsed conscription he would have done the greatest damage to the British Empire he could have done. I make that statement advisedly. We all know that the result of his acceptance of conscription would be that he would cease to be the leader in the province of Quebec, and to-morrow morning Henri Bourassa would hold the province of Quebec in the hollow of his hand, and such a state of affairs would be a menace to the British Empire. I make that statement without fear of contradiction. No person can seriously say that Sir Wilfrid could have led the people of Quebec to conscription. Anybody who knows public opinion in Quebec knows that no man living could lead them to it, and I say the result would be—and I only ask for fair consideration of this thought—that on the morning of the morrow Mr. Bourassa, the firebrand, the man that has taught these people, nursed them, and educated them in his anti-British school, would be the hero of the province of Quebec, and that would be a bad day for the British Empire. The men who talk so much about the British Empire, little as they may regard Sir Wilfrid Laurier, will have to agree with me that Quebec is safer under his leadership than in the hands of Henri Bourassa. I say that those who question the service of the right hon. leader of the Opposition to the Empire, and question his loyalty, as many are doing, have not given the matter much thought. I read in the newspapers that a gentleman stated in Knox Presbyterian church that Sir Wilfrid Laurier lacked patriotism in refusing the offer of coalition. I do not know who the gentleman is, but I say this statement and thousands of other utterances along similar lines are unjust, unfair and unworthy of Canadians, and render difficult the solution of the race problem in Canada. Our object in Canada is to have unity among the different races, and such statements render the accomplishment of that object more difficult. In the conduct of the war we require greater unity.

In closing, I want to say that, in my opinion, the Prime Minister's offer of coalition was right, but it should have been made before he announced that he was going to force conscription on the country. And, I would say that, better than referendum, better than compulsory service, the proper way to handle the subject is to revert to the condition of affairs before conscription was announced as the immediate policy of the Government. When the right hon. the Prime Minister came back from England he had full knowledge of the gravity of affairs. I say then and there he should have called the right hon. leader of the Opposition to assist him with his counsel, his wisdom, experience and undoubted loyalty to the Empire. Even now, there is nothing I wish for so much as this —although I do not suppose it will be done —that the Prime Minister should revert to the condition of affairs when he came from the Old Country—let conscription stand in abeyance, not abandon it, not renege upon it, but just say that conscription for the moment stands, and call Sir Wilfrid Laurier into a coalition Government, and if, under these conditions Sir Wilfrid Laurier will not coalesce with him, I for one, as a Liberal, say that I think the Liberal party will soon find a leader who will coalesce. But I believe that Sir Wilfrid Laurier acted rightly in refusing coalition under existing conditions, for the reasons which I have given. Let the Government begin de novo, Mr. Speaker, to discuss this matter, let both parties get together and see if, in real unity, they cannot get recruits. Let the French Canadian members go out among their people and see what they can do. They are not cowards. Nobody thinks that. They have been appealed to in the wrong way. I am not going into that matter, because I said I would not be critical. Our object is to avoid schism and disunion in this country, and I believe the Prime Minister has the power in his hands, even if he passed the Bill, to say: "It will stand in abeyance till we have an opportunity to discuss it," and apart from conscription let the two leaders and all the members of the House go out to the different places where they would have influence. I believe if that be done the unity of Canada will be preserved, and that the fighting force of this country will be inestimably greater than it will be if we waste our strength quarrelling among ourselves.

PRIVATE BILLS.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill No. 62, for the relief of Florence Amelia Kennedy.—Mr. Edwards.

Bill No. 94, to authorize the issue of a patent to James Wallace Tygard.—Mr. Fripp.

Bill No. 80, respecting a certain patent of the Sharp Rotary Ash Receiver Company, Incorporated.—Mr. Currie.

Bill No. 85, to incorporate the Canadian Council of the Girl Guides Association. (Without amendment.)—Mr. Northrup.

MILITARY SERVICE ACT, 1917.

DEBATE CONTINUED ON MOTION FOR SECOND READING AND ON THE AMENDMENTS.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE (North Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, the debate on the second reading of this Bill has been proceeding for a considerable time, and consequently it is with much diffidence that I rise to address the House on this important measure. Several matters, however, impel me to make some remarks on the measure before the House.

In the first place, I am one of the members of this House who have had the honour of serving at the front and who know something about the conditions there, and one of the reasons why I desire to speak in favour of the Bill is that it was intimated to me that I was opposed to some of its principles. To remain silent would perhaps lead to a wrong construction being placed on my attitude. In the second place, there have been introduced, in connection with this measure some objections which, to my mind, have not yet been satisfactorily answered. Having a little time on my hands I took the trouble to look up the authorities, if possible, to controvert statements made by hon. gentlemen opposite.

This is one of the greatest questions that have occupied the attention of this House since Confederation. We have had many momentous questions under discussion, but we have never before had such a war as this one, and we have never before had to discuss the question of conscripting the manhood of the country for the purposes of the war.

The House must be complimented upon the moderate tone of the principal speeches that have been delivered on this question, and it is my intention to discuss this subject with similar moderation. After all, nothing is to be gained by abuse, strong language or threats, because there is a little too much cold spring water running in the veins of the average Canadian for him to allow anybody to bluff or scare him with loud talk. Whatever we are going to do here, we are going to do it, and the laws we shall pass here must be observed.

I wish to point out to the House first some matters in connection with the war. There is no use in feeling any bitterness nor in stirring up any dissension over things that have occurred. Human nature is not infallible; none of us is infallible; the Government is not infallible. Some very grave mistakes have been made by every Government concerned in this war. The British Government has made a number of almost vital mistakes. For instance, the mistake was made of ordering that only 150,000 men should be sent to Europe in this war. Other mistakes of a similar character have been made by almost all the Allies with the exception of the French who seem to have been prepared for every eventuality. The last great mistake was made by Russia, and the one previous to that by Rumania. Therefore, there is no use harping upon what this Government has done in the past, because the Government, according to its own light, has been intent upon bringing this war to a successfull conclusion. We have it on the authority of the greatest orator the world has yet produced that a man is not to be blamed if he should make a mistake in trying to do good, because it is better to make a mistake in trying to do good than to do nothing at all.

We all remember very well when the House met immediately after the opening of the war, how enthusiastically we pledged our manhood to the service of the cause. The war at the front has continued, and our men have gone over there and have distinguished themselves above, I may say, all other armies to-day in the field. That is something we never expected they would do when they left this country. Our forces have been augmented from time to time as the occasion arose, various methods being adopted by different nations to raise their armies. We have raised our quota of 400,000 odd men so far by the voluntary system. When I returned to Canada, the voluntary system adopted was being used with great enthusiasm to raise a large force to take part in this war, and we were exceedingly successful. The methods of recruiting adopted then were common sense methods, and I am very sorry that they were departed from in any way, but circumstances always bring about changes. Members of Parliament and the business men of the country then joined together and formed recruiting committees and raised this great army which we have to-day at the front. Unfortunately, some people are anxious to get into the public eye, and there came then into the recruiting game certain elements that might very well have been left out. The matter was left in their weak hands, and the business men virtually departed from the scene to take up other lines of effort, and to-day we find that recruiting is not being carried on very successfully. There is no question, however, that Canada has no reason to be ashamed of the results achieved under the voluntary system. The greatest authorities on war, Clausewitz, Van der Goltz and other writers like Hambly, lay down the principle that if a country raises one in seventeen of its population for the purpose of a war, it is doing very well, and before this war in Europe, they did not expect any nation would raise any more than that proportion. Canada has if anything, exceeded that ratio. We have every reason to be proud of the efforts that have been put forth. Unfortunately the wastage of men is very great. Our troops are so gallant that they are used as shock troops, attacking troops, and they occasionally lose large numbers of men. They are, however, always successful, and this country has good reason to be proud that our troops have conquered the best troops that Europe has ever produce.

The fact remains that this war is lasting much longer than any of us expected. When I stated in this House about a year ago that this war would last another two years, an incredulous smile, as much as to say: "He does not know what he is talking about," appeared on the faces of most of the members, and some of them told me that the war would not last so long. We have only reached, in this war, a stage now where our troops are beginning to win. Every one who has been in the field knows exactly what the circumstances were when we went there first. We were too good, too true and too loyal to tell the people the great difficulties they laboured under. The British Government was hesitating what to do in the case, and no action could be got in any manner, shape or form by the late Administration under Mr. Asquith, who has been quoted so glibly by this House and who left his troops in France very much to their own resources. The great leader of the popular cause in England, Kitchener, whose works have lived after him, and whom history will place in the foremost rank of great Englishmen, stated that the war would last three years and the people did not believe him. He also stated that this war was one of attrition, that means a war of wearing down. We knew that when we went into the trenches, it did not take long to realize that the British were suffering most of the attrition. That time is now past, and we can now review the early course of the war without being under the ban of the censor. So far as attrition was concerned, we were losing from shell fire every day in the week during all the time we were there, three men to every one lost by the Germans. We felt the lack of guns, machine guns and ammunition. The first time a man went into the trenches and saw the German flares that were being thrown up by the thousands while the British had none, he realized what he was up against. Those days have gone by; we have secured the ascendancy now, but the more men we put into the field, the more men we shall have to fill up the gaps, and the sooner we will win. Even when our troops are not in action, two or three men on an average each day go down under shell fire, so that when a man has been in the trenches for seven months, it is understood that he is living on borrowed time.

We must raise more troops and we cannot wait until next year to raise them. It will take from six to nine months to train them, and they will be urgently needed about the beginning of next year. Are we to withdraw our troops? That would be universally regarded as a disgrace to our people. Consequently, the Government is compelled to adopt other methods than the voluntary system in order to raise these troops. While the voluntary system had its advantages, any one who has served with men in the front line trenches must realize after a very few days' experience the unfairness of volunteering. Young men are with you there, the flower of our country. There are married men there, who have left in this country families of small children, men who should never have gone to the war at all. As commanding officer I have received letters—and I am only one of many—letters from children whose fathers were serving with me, asking and praying me to look after their "daddy" that he might be spared to come back home to them. One cannot but be touched by that, and cannot but realize the injustice of a system that takes the father of small children out to serve in the trenches for three or four years while leaving young men at home in the billiard and pool rooms of the country, who give no consideration to the war except that war times enables them to earn wages of four or five dollars a day. Take the case of the only son of a widowed mother. The boy feels called upon as a patriot to go and serve in the war. I have known of such young men being killed. To this day there is one mother who calls me up about once a week on the telephone to tell me that she thinks her son is still living, that she has seen a picture of prisoners in Germany and thinks her boy is one of them, and will come back home to her—when I know very well that he will never come back. These are things that appeal to our sense of justice, and make us feel that it is unfair that the willing ones should carry all the burden instead of having that burden distributed fairly among all concerned. Any one who has considered the French method of conscription must come to the conclusion that it is the right method.

So, the Government was face to face with the question of raising more men. No more can be got by the voluntary system. Some hon. members have asked that another campaign under the voluntary system should be carried on. The members from the province of Quebec have made that appeal. Will they assure us that inside of sixty days they can raise 25,000 troops by the voluntary system? If they will rise in their places and say that, I will be one to favour suspending the Bill until that course has been tried. But we have no absolute assurance that they will raise a single man more by the voluntary system in any part of the country. So the Government has come to the conclusion that some law must be put into force to bring forward another quota of men.

Face to face with the issue, there were four courses open to the choice of the Government. The first was a cowardly one—to fold their hands and do nothing. Thank goodness, the Government saw its duty in this matter. As well as I can see, the Government has been true to its duty from the beginning of the war, and under very difficult circumstances. Nothing has been done, good or bad, that has not been criticised in the most violent manner. Members supporting the Government have been compelled to sit back and take no part in politics. The most trying thing that troops have to undergo is to lie in the open and be subject to shell and rifle fire, and not return the fire. That is the position in which the supporters of the Government have been since the war began. We all know the difficulties we have had to contend with, the violence of the attacks made upon us, not only the members of the Government but those on this side of the House especially who have seen it their duty to take part in the war. But that is a matter that we can pass over. The Government has decided not to fold its hands and send no more men to the front. It has come forward determined to pass a measure of conscription. True, this measure has been before the House for some time. And it is a fortunate thing in my opinion that this measure has been before the House for a few weeks. The people have been reading about this Bill and trying to find out what objections there are to the principle of it, and no objections have been raised except imaginary ones. Not one single objection has been raised that could be backed up by authority or precedent, which are the great guides for the work of this House.

The second course open to the Government would be to assume the responsibility of conscription itself—that is, to enforce the Militia Act. There can be no doubt that a construction can be placed upon the Militia Act under which the Government would be authorized to raise the necessary quota without coming to Parliament. There is room under the clauses of that Act for the Government to make regulations and adopt methods of conscription. However, the Government has seen fit not to take that course, but to adopt the third method, which is to bring the question here and leave to Parliament the responsibility of conscripting the manhood of the country.

The fourth course is that proposed by hon. gentlemen opposite, to refer the matter to the people in a referendum—some say an election.

The chief objection raised to the present course is one which has been mentioned again and again by speakers on the other side of the House, especially by those who speak in French. It is that we are breaking pledges or guarantees made with our compatriots in Quebec at the time of Confederation, to the effect that in case of war we would not have conscription and that they should not be compelled to send their quota to the war. We have been told again and again that we are worse than the Prussians, that we deal with treaties and solemn covenants as "scraps of paper." That point was raised by the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Ernest Lapointe) and also by the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). But not one of these hon. gentlemen has brought forward a single treaty, obligation, or scrap of paper, in the way of any compact before or after Confederation, that we are violating. I challenge them to bring forward a single line. On the other hand, I desire to point out that this very question was up at the time of Confederation. In 1862 a Militia Act was thrown out of the old Parliament of Upper and Lower Canada. The military force of the Crown was as urgent a matter to be dealt with at the time of Confederation as the union of the provinces. For the shadow of a great war was then over the country. We were threatened with invasion by the Fenians. We did not know at what moment fire and sword would be carried all over the provinces.

At that time, when Confederation was under discussion, four of the great men of this country, representing all parties and all races, were appointed by Parliament a delegation to go to England and discuss the terms of the Confederation compact. These men were George Brown, representing the Liberal party, the predecessor of the right hon. the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), Sir John Macdonald, the leader of the Conservative party; Sir George Etienne Cartier, the great French Canadian and Mr. Galt, who was the best financial authority of his time. These four gentlemen went to England and arrived at an agreement with the British Government upon the terms of Confederation. They embodied the agreement they made with the British Government in a report presented to the Parliament, which report may be found in the Confederation Papers. It is extremely important for us to know if at the time of that conference it was agreed that the people of Quebec were not liable to serve in case of war. Any pledge that was made to the Mother Country at that time we are entitled to carry out to its fullest extent, because this is the time when our obligations to the Mother Country must be carried out to the letter. I have before me a copy of that report. It will be found in the Sessional Papers of 1868, and it is No. 63. It is addressed to His Excellency the Honourable Viscount Monck, Governor General of British North America; it is signed by these four great fathers of Confederation, and it was presented to the Parliament that formed the union. It is signed by John A. Macdonald, George E. Cartier, George Brown and A. T. Galt, and the date of it is July 12, 1865. What have they to say on this particular question that we are discussing now? They say:

> The important question of the future military relations between the Mother Country and Canada received earnest and grave consideration. Before entering on the discussion of details, we referred to the recent debates in the Imperial Parliament on the subject of Canadian defences, and especially to the assertions confidently made by certain members of the House of Commons that Canada was incapable of efficient protection against invasion from her inland border.

Those statements were made in the British House of Commons at that time.

> We asked that a report on the whole subject of the defence of Canada, with plans and estimates, might be obtained from the highest military and naval authorities of Great Britain. Such a report was obtained and communicated to us confidentially—and we rejoice to say that it was calculated to remove all doubt as to the security of our country, so long as the hearts of our people remain firmly attached to the British flag, and the power of England is wielded in our defence.
>
> On the part of Canada—

Now, this is the pledge they gave on the part of Canada, and I would like hon. gentlemen to pay particular attention to that pledge:

> On the part of Canada we expressed the desire that this plan for the defence of all parts of the province should be taken as the basis of arrangement; and that a full and candid discussion should be had as to the share of the cost that ought to be borne respectively by the Imperial and Provincial Exchequers. We expressed the earnest wish of the people of Canada to perpetuate the happy existing connection with Great Britain, and their entire willingness to contribute to the defence of the Empire their full quota, according to their ability, of men and money.

That, Mr. Speaker, is the pledge that was made to the British Government and to the British Crown. They did not say that we were going to use our quota and our money for the defence of Canada. They said for the defence of the Empire. Canada was to be prepared at all times to send its quota of men and money for the defence of the Empire. They did not say after a referendum was held they were going to decide whether they would send men and provide money for the defence of the Empire or anything of that kind. Therefore, I say that no other pledge was at or before that time made between the British Government and Canada. Everything we have done since Confederation agrees with that pledge. Sir George E. Cartier, representing the people of Quebec, did not say that they would not agree to that. In fact, no sooner had Confederation been accomplished than the Militia Act was passed. Sir George E. Cartier, in bringing in that Act, put in the very clause that provided that the quota should be permitted to serve in any part of the Empire. That is the reason for the clause that is now in the Militia Act. Therefore, I ask: Who is tearing treaties apart; who is tearing up a "scrap of paper"? Great Britain has gone into this war. What for?—for the maintenance of treaties and of scraps of paper. The French nation has gone into this war for the same reason. Belgium, on account of a "scrap of paper," a treaty, denied the Germans the right to march over her soil, which, if she had permitted, she might have escaped war. Thousands of men's lives have been sacrificed for a "scrap of paper." Yet, such treaties are no more sacred nor binding on these nations and peoples than they are on us, who, through our representatives, agreed to give our quota of men or money for the defence of the Empire. It is very late in the day for hon. gentlemen opposite to come into this House and say that this measure involves a breach of a treaty. It does nothing of the kind. It fulfils a treaty. In passing this law we are implementing our solemn obligations. When they can show any authority, treaty, letter, memorandum or statement by any prominent leader of their race that they were not to support the principle that they were not to take part in the defence of the country or the Empire, it will be time for us to give consideration to their remarks.

The next important question that arises in connection with this measure is that of the method by which the men are to be impressed and embodied. It is said by the leader of the Opposition that conscription is a new word in Britain. At page 2499 of Hansard we find that the right hon. gentleman said:

> "Conscription is a new word in Britain."

Again:

> But Sir, it is a principle now admitted that if any new question comes up during the regime of a parliament, a question that would vastly change the whole condition of things in the country,—then under such circumstances it is preferable to have a dissolution and to have the people pass upon it.

I must compliment the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Lapointe) on the excellent moderation and tone of his speech, which, I think, had he not argued from false premises, would have been a very sound pronouncement indeed. But he did not know about this convention which was entered into between the representatives of Canada and the British Government, and therefore his reasoning was defective. This is what he said:

> I also oppose this Bill because it involves a radical and most serious change in our constitutional relations—

That does not sound very much like the quotation I gave to this House a few minutes ago.

> —and constitutes a departure from well-known principles agreed to by all parties as to the constitution of this Confederation.

I think I have obliterated that argument. I do not think that the hon. member for Kamouraska can deny the facts contained in the report presented to the Government and Parliament of Canada by Macdonald, Brown, Galt and Cartier as to our pledges to the Mother Country.

Now, Sir, let me enumerate the other points urged against the Bill by the speakers opposed to it.

(1) That conscription or the impressment of men to serve in the army is a new thing in British law.

(2) That to compel men so conscripted to serve outside their country is a new principle.

(3) That selective draft is a new method of taking a quota of men to serve in the army, and that this method might prove unreliable and unjust.

Of course there are a number of other petty arguments which are not aimed at the fundamental principles of this Bill.

This Bill is now at its second reading and there are undoubtedly some clauses in it that may be open for discussion; and I feel satisfied that the Government will be very glad to have it fairly criticised by members opposite and by all the members of this House, so that the result may be a really good Bill which will be a great credit to Canada. Sir, this country should act in all things in a way worthy of the men who are fighting for it at the front. Let us hope that eventually we shall pass such a Bill that will be regarded by future generations as a credit to the members of this Parliament.

But, Sir, we must meet the arguments which are advanced. The only question we can discuss at this stage is the fundamental principle of the Bill which is the question now before the House. Possibly we may not agree on some of its minor provisions. Whilst some opposition may be raised to some of the clauses of the Bill, what we are now about to vote upon is the principle contained in it, which is that this House should pass a conscription law.

The first objection I have mentioned is that this is a new law in Great Britain. I have taken considerable trouble to look up the law of Britain on the subject. I am not a lawyer, and there are several branches of law about which I do not know much. Legal members of this House have to deal with the civil law, the criminal law, the Code and various other laws; but the majority of the legal members of this House have had no occasion to read up military law or to trouble themselves with it unless they are soldiers, because the military code is very simple and is enforced by officers who in most cases are not lawyers. I have had to read up the military law and to study it because I had to administer it not only in camp and in civilian communities but also in the field. So I have had to study the military code and to know something of its history. The hon. members who have advanced the argument that a conscription law is a new thing in Great Britain, have not quoted one statute, law, treaty or precedent to support their arguments. It has been assumed by the great majority of them that the voluntary system was the primary law of England and had always been the law, from time immemorial. In taking up the question I wish to quote the authorities, even although some of them may be rather dull. The authorities I have selected can be found in almost any public library. They are the following: Stubbs' Constitutional History, a very popular work; Hallam's Constitutional History, also a very well known work. Taswell Langmead's Constitutional History; Clode's Military Forces of the Crown; Grose's Military Antiquities; Scott's History of the British Army; Lingard's History of England; Prof. Oman's History of the Art of War; Howell's State Trials (Ship Money case); also the ancient and modern statutes and journals of the British House of Commons and documents relating to the early history of the British colonies in North America dealt with by Hertz, "The Old Colonial System," a Manchester university publication. References to the ancient military laws will also be found in Coke on Littleton, and also in Blackstone. When the hon. member who preceded me argued that the British subject, on account of receiving protection from the State, must also defend the State, he was only quoting principles laid down in Blackstone and all the ancient legal books that he no doubt studied. He did not know that that is today the law of England.

Turning to the history of English military forces, there is one military force that has always existed, and that is the general levy. Before the conquest, every man capable of bearing arms and of military age, when the King summoned him, should go to what was known as the fyrd or the gathering of his county, with his arms, and go out in defence of his country. That is a law dating back beyond any written record. At the time of the Norman kings that law was enforced, and a general levy existed alongside the feudal levy given by men in England that is military service for rent. The general levy was called out in Norman times on several occasions. The first time it was called out by William II at Hastings in 1094. He intended to cross over to France to carry on war, and summoned a general levy of the people to go and serve. They were dismissed, however, without going across. There is no question that the statutes I shall quote, covering the period down to the restoration, all deal with this general levy, and show that the general levy was called out again and again, and that the men served in the general levy to fight for the defence of their country. These are the statutes: 13 Edward I, chapter 6; 34 Edward I, chapter 2; 2 Edward II, chapter 3 and chapter 4; Edward IV, chapter 5, section 13; Edward III, chapter 6; 5 Henry IV, chapter 3; 3 Henry VIII, chapter 3; 4 and 5 Phillip and Mary, chapter 2; and 1 Elizabeth, chapter 16. All of those statutes laid down the rule that male inhabitants of England who are called out by general levy must assemble at a certain point to be mentioned in each county and must bring their arms there and be prepared to serve their country under their sheriffs and officers. Not only were they brought together in a general levy again and again, but a quota was taken from this general levy and sent to serve in a foreign country. That was the law down to the Restoration of Charles II. I might say that the long Parliament dealt with this question, and since the Restoration there have been Acts dealing with this levy. For instance, in 1690, on the occasion of the French invasion, a general levy was called. During the rebellion of 1690 and the rebellion of 1745, in which my unfortunate Highland fellow countrymen took part, there were general levies. In 1757 a reorganization of the general levy was made on the basis of the ballot. That is, the ballot was instituted to make the selection of the quota from the general levy. In 1773 a motion was made in Parliament to suspend the ballot for the Militia. This was defeated. From 1815 on, the militia was allowed to fall into abeyance. Although the standing army was maintained the annual training of the levy was suspended. However, that old law is still continued in Great Britain annually by what is known as the Expiring Laws Continuance Act. I have here the latest copy of the Manual of the Military law of Britain, dated 1914, which I carried with me in the trenches. On page 164 of that manual there is a clause dealing with the general levy in which it says that:

> Although the feudal levy was abolished in 1660, the liability to serve in the general levy has never been extinguished, and remains not only in constitutional theory but also on the statutory, and practical form, of liability to serve both in the general and the local militia."

That is the law in England to-day, that is conscription so that conscription is not "a new word in Britain". The reason that, in England, they had to pass a conscription measure was that, about 1907, Lord Haldane, then Secretary for War, introduced and had passed through Parliament a law which provided for the reorganization of the army under what was known as the Territorial System. The militia battalions were embodied in this territorial system, and the Territorial Act, which is the Act now in force in England, contained a clause that the militia battalions of the territorial army should not have to serve abroad. When this war broke out a number of those battalions were called out. Some of the militia, and the yeomanry refused to volunteer to go abroad. The British Government laid down the law to these territorial battalions, and they said, "You will do either one of two things: you will volunteer for service in France, or you will disband" Those who volunteered to serve in France were accepted and embodied as Imperial battalions, and those who refused to serve abroad were disbanded. I may say, Sir, that, as far as this country is concerned, under the present Militia Act, certain regiments and certain men are sworn in, and if we accept the dictum laid down by hon. gentlemen opposite that men who are serving under the Militia Act are not entitled or cannot be compelled to serve abroad, then these militiamen will all escape service in France. I understand a number of men joined the Canadian defence force on the understanding that they would not serve abroad, and they can hold the Government to its contract.

The standing army of England was nearly always recruited by the voluntary system. That army was composed of paid men, and dates back to the time of the French wars when the Free Companies were recruited in Europe by certain individuals, and these men signed a contract to fight for certain individuals or countries. Every soldier that is enlisted to-day in the Canadian Expeditionary Force is a hired soldier. I might say that European conscripts affect to despise hired soldiers. The Germans call them mercenary. They say we are hired to kill. There is no doubt in the world that every soldier who has been enlisted in this country under the so-called voluntary system is a descendant of the mercenary or free companies. The contract is placed in his hand and it is called an "attestation paper." He swears to that contract, and he signs his name on it, and if he is brought before the court martial at the front, or in this country, if he wishes to deny the right of the commanding officer to try him he can say: "Produce the attestation paper," and they cannot try him by court martial or military law unless a copy of that contract is produced. The men who have enlisted in the standing army were always volunteers. That law only dates back a little over two hundred years. The voluntary system is thus a recent enactment as far as the army is concerned. It is a new system and it is not the fundamental basis of the English army. It was first adopted by the militia in 1758, and in that year a law was passed allowing a certain number of men to volunteer to serve in the militia or general levy. In 1810 volunteering was again allowed in the militia, and the volunteer system of 1852 was made the only system permissible under that Act as far as the militia of Great Britain is concerned. But the voluntary system is a new system, and for that reason, as far as we are concerned, we have nothing to do with the voluntary system, because we have never had any standing army based on the voluntary system as they have it in Great Britain. We have only had militia raised by volunteering or the ballot.

Another argument is raised against serving outside of the country. Whether troops are entitled to be impressed and taken out of the country is a question which has arisen, in connection with this bill and it is well for us to deal with that historically. The general levy of all the male population were compelled by law to serve out of the country. A quota fought at Cressy and at Agincourt. Objection was sometimes taken against the feudal levy serving outside the Kingdom, but there is no question that according to English law troops to serve abroad could be taken from the general levy. A quota from the general levy was taken abroad as early as the reign of Edward I. They called a general levy together, and they selected a number of men from the general levy, and sent them over to fight their battles in France. Again and again they were called together. In the reign of Elizabeth and the reign of Henry VIII the general levy had to furnish a quota for foreign wars. In the time of Queen Elizabeth it became an established prerogative of the British Crown that it was entitled to call a general levy and select or press a number of men to serve in the army and navy abroad. In fact, at the time of Charles I. the same question arose, and that was one of the difficulties mentioned in the Petition of Rights.

I come now to the question of the selective draft, and after I have dealt with that and shown you that that is a very old law indeed, you will see how it came about. The selective draft dates very far back. In Great Britain it was the original system of getting a quota of men for the army from the militia or general levy. The method was this: a certain number of gentlemen were commissioned in each county and each municipality by the Crown, and it was their duty to summon before them all those that should take up arms for the general levy, and they selected a certain number of these men who were supposed to serve in the army, and go and fight in the defence of their country, or go and fight abroad. This system of taking men became an abuse. These tribunals were called Commissions of a Array, they were subsequently called Commissions of Muster, and succeeding that, instead of having a number of men commissioned in each county, the king appointed one man called the Lord Lieutenant of the county. The Lord's Lieutenant of the county was after the Restoration appointed by Parliament. Any one who knows England knows who the Lord Lieutenant of the county is.

These Commissioners of Array formed a fruitful source of trouble for the Crown in those days. Shakespeare makes a reference to them, and Falstaff was apparently one of those commissioners. They would pick out a man and say to him: "You have to serve in the general levy." He would say, "I cannot leave my position," and they would say to him, "How much will you pay?" He would pay ten or twenty pounds to escape the levy, and during the reign of Charles I, not only were the men allowed to compound for service, but the counties and boroughs that were supposed to contribute so many men were allowed to compound to the Crown for so much money instead of furnishing the men. That was one of the methods of raising money without the consent of Parliament, and that procedure was petitioned against in the Petition of Right. Falstaff mentions this matter in one of Shakespeare's works, and whilst I am not saying it is the wrong method of raising men, still this House must realize that the selective system must be surrounded by a great many safeguards if we are going to see it carried out successfully, because there is no doubt that if a couple of men on a tribunal wish to be crooked in any part of the country they can release any number of men they wish in the neighbourhood from service in our army.

Before I proceed further with that, I might say that in choosing the method to select a quota the Government no doubt was influenced by two things. In the first place, they could, as provided in the Militia Act, select these men by a military tribunal. There is no doubt that a military tribunal as described by the hon. gentleman from Moosejaw in his speech today, going into a strange section of the country to pick out men would be a very disagreeable way of making the selection. That would have been the method under the old Militia Act. But the method chosen here is also the method adopted by the United States, and no doubt adopted for the purpose of leaving the method of selecting the men in the hands of a civilian body, so that it would not be subject to the same objection as if they were selected by military tribunals. My own idea is that the military tribunal and any tribunal appointed for the purpose of selecting the men should only be allowed to recommend the exemption of conscripts. All the exemptions should be passed upon and confirmed by higher authority. This is what Falstaff says; evidently he himself was one of the Commissioners of Array. In those days the tribunals engaged in selecting men for the army were made up of pretty crooked men. In Henry IV, Act II, Falstaff says:

> I have misused the King's press damnably. I have got in exchange of one hundred and fifty soldiers, three hundred and odd pounds. I press me none but good householders, yeomans' sons, inquire me out contracted bachelors, such as had been twice asked in banns, such a commodity of warm slaves as had as leave hear the devil as a drum; such as fear the report of a Culverin worse than a struck deer or a hurt wood-fowl . . . and they have bought out their services, and now my whole charge consists of . . . such as indeed were never soldiers, but discarded unjust serving men, younger sons of younger brothers, revolted tapsters, and ostlers trade fallen; cankers of a calm world and a long peace. Ten times more dishonourably ragged than an old faced ancient. And such have I to fill up the room of them that have bought out their services, that you would think I had one hundred and fifty tattered prodigals lately come from swine keeping. Nay, and the villians march wide betwixt the legs as if they had gyves on, for indeed I had most of them out of prison.

So you see that there is very little new in the world. The Government will have its hands full when it endeavours to carry out any law in such a way as to meet all the circumstances of the case and at the same time please everybody.

In 1898 the English Militia Act was amended so as to allow the militia to serve outside of Great Britain. For about eighty years previous to that time, it was not allowed to do that. When we raise the point that the militia should not serve outside of this country, we are raising a question which never arose under conditions similar to those which prevail to-day. When England was at war she did not hesitate to levy on the whole male population to fight in France or in any part of Europe. She has done that now; it is the fundamental law.

The question may now be asked: have we any precedent for sending militia out of the country? Have we, it may be asked, precedent for sending the Canadian militia out of the country for the defence of the Empire, leaving out altogether the promise made by Sir George E. Cartier, Sir John A. Macdonald and all the great Canadian leaders of that day, that Canada would give her quota of men and money for the defence not of Canada, but of the Empire? "Quota" means the selection of men who are able to serve: it would be applied to the men called out to serve under this Act. Is there anything to show that the Colonial militia was ever employed outside of the colony concerned? Any one who reads the history of the Colonial provinces to the south before the great rebellion against English rule knows that those provinces sent their militia away to fight in Canada and elsewhere. When the British were besieging Carthagena in Central America, the colonial provinces—they were not then known as States—sent 4,000 men to fight under General Vernon to assist in siege and capture of that stronghold. Those who read history know that the Colonial militia was sent to take part in the siege of Louisburg. No one could argue that the militia sent out by the colonies in what is now the United States were only sent to fight in territory which was "contiguous" to the borders of their own country. The Virginia militia fought in Canada; Virginia was a sovereign province in those days, so was Pennsylvania, yet they sent men and spent money to fight not only in Canada but in Cape Breton as well. These are well known facts, so that we are not propounding a new principle or establishing a new law to say that the men of Canada should or could be conscripted to serve outside of Canada. But, Sir, that law was established at the time of Confederation. When the project of Confederation was being brought about, a pledge was given to the British Government by Brown, Macdonald, Cartier and Galt. Let me quote it again:

> We express the earnest wish of the people of Canada to perpetuate the happy existing connection with Great Britain and their entire willingness to contribute to the defence of the Empire their full quota, according to their ability of men and money.

Who can deny the right of this Parliament to conscript a quota to "contribute to the defence of the Empire," in view of this most solemn treaty and pledge ever given by any public men in this country? This was the pledge given by a committee representing the Parliament of Canada, a committee that said to the British Government: we are at all times prepared to give our quota of men and money for the defence of the Empire. Not for the defence of Canada, mark you: for the defence of the Empire. No public man, no state, and no Parliament has since endeavoured to change that pledge. It has never been repudiated. If I represented or spoke for any section of the community that did not desire to be bound by that pledge I would feel heartily ashamed of myself. But every section of the country was bound; Quebec was solemnly bound on that occasion by Sir George E. Cartier. This pledge was implemented by the Militia Act passed by Sir George E. Cartier after Confederation, which provided that Canada's quota should be 50,000 men. Canada was only a small country at that time. Great Britain promised Canada that if Canada were invaded she would come to her assistance. Even at that time Canada was threatened with invasion; a hostile force invaded her territory in the following year. There were some little Englanders in the British House of Commons at that time, who said: what is the use of defending a few acres of snow? What is the use of spending time and wasting money in the defence of Canada? Let it go! But the British Government gave their pledge that they would defend Canada, just as they had previously pledged themselves to defend Belgium. To-day they are fighting for Belgium in fulfilment of that pledge, and to-morrow they would fight for Canada in fulfilment of the pledge given to us. Should we, therefore, not carry out our pledge?

I have given all the authorities bearing on this phase of the matter. I have quoted the law, although I am not a lawyer, and I do not think any hon. gentleman opposite who oppose the Bill can show that the position they have taken is correct, according to law or precedent.

An hon. gentleman who sits on one of the front benches opposite—he is not here at present—wants to conscript the wealth of the country. Our Minister of Finance has given an example to all countries in the matter of enabling a country to carry lightly the burden of a great war. He has shown that with proper financial management and with proper guidance of the people we can finance our part in the war ourselves, and that our people are ready at all times to produce millions of money for the carrying on of the war.

Every one knows that the reason we succeeded in the war which we waged a hundred years ago against Napoleon was because Pitt made war pay, and when all other countries of Europe were starving for want of money and for lack of supplies, the English treasury was full of gold, and her supplies were ample. Her factories were never as busy as they were then, and never in the history of England was her business in such a fine state as it was at that time. Lloyd George has followed the example of the great Pitt in endeavouring to make this war pay, and since he took charge of the Government of Britain, a great change has taken place there. For about a week after the war started, the only bank in England that paid out gold for its obligations was the Bank of Montreal of Canada. The Bank of England and the other great English banks suspended gold payments, but neither before nor since the commencement of the war has the Bank of Montreal suspended gold payments, and that is a great compliment to the financial strength of this country. The Minister of Finance has carried on the business affairs of this country with a great deal of wisdom. But there are those who say: Oh, tax tax, more tax, let us have some more taxes. The more taxes you raise, the more money you will squander. All that is needed is enough money to pay for the obligations of the Government, and if we have other obligations later on, we shall bring more taxes forward.

Mr. BURNHAM: Why do that?

Mr. CURRIE: Do you want to starve people by taxing them to the limit?

Mr. BURNHAM: Why do you do it?

Mr. CURRIE: I am going to tell you, if you will wait a minute. One set of people cry out against the Government because they do not tax land. In the last resort we might have to tax land. At one time England had to tax land two shillings an acre, but how would the farmers throughout this country feel if this Government were to tax their land fifty cents an acre? You would have a rebellion, and not an hon. member here who would advocate that policy at the present time if the money was not wanted, would be re-elected. I am satisfied, however, that if the money was required for the war, that every farmer in this country would be willing to pay as much as a dollar an acre for the protection of the Empire. What is the need for such a tax? The Minister of Finance has not yet shown that his balance is on the wrong side. His surplus is ample. He has no deficit, nor is the country bankrupt.

On the contrary, he shows a large surplus that is capable of paying both the needed principal and the interest on all the obligations of the country every year, even during the war. Then why do hon. gentlemen want more taxes?

Another set of hon. members want an income tax. Some of us have read Sterne's Sentimental Journey, in which he says every little while: "Oh, they do things better or differently in France." Many hon. members in this country say: Oh, they do it better in England; they do it differently in England. We all acknowledge that an income tax is one method of raising a revenue; the question is whether such a method is expedient at the present time. At this time those who are entirely dependent upon their incomes need all their money because things were never so high in value as they are just now. Then why do hon. members want to impose a tax on those people now? Why not wait and see if this war lasts another year or another two years? We may have to come to an income tax, but there is time enough for that. Keep cool.

Other hon. members want to conscript wealth. Conscription of wealth is a fine expression. Do they want conscription of wealth to be by a general levy, or do they want a selective process? If they want a general levy, we have that already, because every one, if he wears clothes or buys anything that is brought into the country, is paying his particular tax at the present time; we are all equal before the law. Do they want selective conscription? Yes, they want selective conscription of wealth; they want the monied people to pay. I have been dabbling in history, and I have been looking up to see if conscription of wealth is a new thing. I find it is a very old thing; it dates back to the time of Henry VIII. At that time, they wanted to be select in their conscription of wealth, and they conscripted the wealth of the churches, and that gave them enough money to go on with; the Crown was satisfied. In France, they were face to face with bankruptcy when they called the Assembly of Louis XIV together. In that assembly there was a party headed by Robespierre, Marat and Danton, who were crying continually for the conscription of wealth. The great Mirabeau stood against that idea. In one of his greatest speeches he said that they had no right to select a rich man and to take everything he had and to cast him out in order that the State should have money with which to carry on its business to avoid bankruptcy. But he died, and what was the result? The others had their way; they erected a knife, the guillotine, and they took the rich and wealthy and beheaded them and seized their money. They conscripted the money and estates of the church first and in that way the State was able, under those beautiful Republican gentlemen, to carry on its business for a year or two longer. Is that the kind of conscription of wealth that is necessary here? There are, in this country, many very wealthy, religious institutions which are controlled by lovable religious gentlemen who have never contributed a cent of their own wealth. They have dreamed their lives away, doing good deeds and the very increment of time has made them controllers of the richest corporations in the country.

An hon. MEMBER: They do not pay taxes.

Mr. CURRIE: I do not know anything about that, but if hon. members are going to conscript wealth, they would be conscripted first. That is the cry of the Red Republicans. The Reds in Russia to-day want to conscript wealth, also in Mexico, the authorities are conscripting wealth, the wealth of the church, by the same method. The moment you acknowledge that principle and you do away with the constitutional safe-guards which Parliament throws around money and wealth and the property of every one in this country, in that moment you are going to have a breakdown of society and a reproduction of what I have described. Is that the condition of things hon. gentlemen want in the neighbouring province? That is the actual state of affairs that they may have to face when they conscript wealth.

A good deal has been said about conscripts, and one would think that under this measure we are not going to secure any conscripts from Quebec. I have had the pleasure of having a number of French Canadians serve under me in this war. I have seen them in action and in peace, and every one that I have yet had acquaintance with in this war has belied the slurs that have been cast upon French Canadians by hon. gentlemen opposite. Never on any occasion have I seen one of those men falter in the face of the most deadly peril. Never have I seen them anything but happy under the most terrible conditions of mud and climate. They never fail; they are brave fighters. Can you tell me that men of that calibre are cowards and are going to refuse to serve their country if they are conscripted? That is unbelievable to me, and it is an insult to those people. According to Julius Caesar, when the call went forth for the Gaelic race, from which those men have sprung, to gather to the war, the last man who arrived on the scene was killed by his comrades for being late. Do you mean to tell me that people derived from that race are not capable of doing their duty and going to the war just the same as we are? It is an insult to them to say otherwise. I know that a few agitators in Quebec have been constantly grumbling and growling, saying that they should sever the British connection and making other statements of that nature, but they are men who have no standing in the country. There is a good deal of rich red blood in the veins of the people of Lower Canada. There is in that province a large element of cool-tempered, level-headed men just as there is in the neighbouring province of Ontario. The men from both those provinces have gone over the ridge at Vimy; they have never hesitated to go over the top, and when men of that breed are called upon to be conscripted, well, there may be small riots here and there, but they will serve. Why there was a riot at Camp Borden last year amongst the volunteers from Ontario who wanted to sit around the hotels in the cities instead of drilling and serving at the front. Those things occur, but the great body of the people of the two provinces are determined to carry out the pact which is the keystone of the edifice of Confederation. They occasionally have their quarrels just as a young wife and her husband sometimes have a little spat; sometimes an outcry arises in the house, but they do not want Bourassa as a divorce court lawyer; they are not having a divorce just yet, and this war will be finished and hon. gentlemen who have told us in this House that we are going to have internal strife, will feel heartily ashamed of themselves and of their speeches when they see them in future years in Hansard.

But, Mr. Speaker, we have had the example of men wanting to get the provinces into war before now. In Ontario they raised a row, about 1837. Great leaders went all over the country on horseback to call the people to arms against the Family Compact, and all that sort of thing. Very brave men, these politicians. At the same time a similar agitation was going on in Lower Canada. But I want to assure you, Mr. Speaker, that when the first gun went off, you could not see the heels of these politicians for dust. They all fled to the States, and it took about ten or fifteen years to rehabilitate them and attach any semblance of heroism to their deeds. But there is no United States to fly to now, gentlemen. There is only Iceland that these people can go to if they start a small war, and that is a great distance off. The common sense of Quebec, the influence of the men of Quebec who are doing their duty in the trenches is against this agitation; the men who represent the solid Quebec, pay no attention to it all. They have this agitation constantly with them. It is a phase of our era, just as we have it in the province of Ontario. Why, Sir, you would think to hear them, that the Liberal party was going to eat the whole Tory party of Ontario at one gulp—until there is an election, and then they go back and sit down for another six months. And it will be the same in Quebec.

A referendum is proposed. Once I voted in this House for a referendum. It was on the navy question. After studying the Confederation papers, after considering the terms of the contract between English and French Canada, I made up my mind that this Canadian navy question was a new question introduced into Parliament. Under the bargain made with the British Government the maritime defence of Canada was taken charge of by Great Britain, and we took charge of our own land defence. But if there was to be an independent navy in this country, and not a quota added to the British navy, the proper procedure, to my mind, was a referendum or an election. This question stirred up trouble because we were told even then that if the German navy came up the St. Lawrence it was a question whether the Canadian navy would fire on them or not. However, we let these little jokes pass. The proposal then before us, I thought, should go to a vote. But as to the Bill before this House, I have hunted up the authorities, and I do not find one instance, from the beginning of the British Parliament, in which a question of this kind was submitted to a referendum. Where are you going to find a precedent? In these matters Parliament has always governed, and we are only re-enacting here to-day laws that have been re-enacted again and again on the statute-books of England for over a thousand years. It has been an established principle that every man in England, or in the colonies, capable of bearing arms should come to the gathering and be counted one of the men for the defence of his country. That is what we are re-enacting.

I wish to again emphasize the pledge that I have already read on the part of Canada's representatives to perpetuate the happy existing connection with Great Britain and our declaring our willingness to contribute to the defence of the Empire—not of Canada only—our full quota of men and money. The men of this country have had a referendum before them, under the voluntary system, for over two years. Every young man of military age who wished to vote and was in favour of the voluntary system as against conscription was free to volunteer. There is nothing to keep these young fellows from volunteering to-day. Another hon. member has asked: How can you go to the trenches with a referendum? He was quite correct. There are many good Canadians in France to-day with little white crosses over their heads. How are you going to get them to vote on this question. Do you not think they were entitled to have a say? I prefer to speak on behalf of these men from Canada who have died for the Empire, to give my vote on their behalf in favour of this Bill now—I will assume that responsibility.

Another says: Appeal for more volunteers But we have appealed for volunteers, and no person who has had experience with the voluntary system in the front line of trenches would say that it is a just system. I wish to repeat and emphasize that. There are men here at home who should be serving, and there are men in the trenches who get no respite from their labours. It has been denied that there is any necessity for men. The hon. member who proceded me quoted figures and said: You have to show me that there is this necessity for men. Another hon. gentleman said this afternoon that there is no necessity for more men in the trenches. I have seen Canadian troops holding lines for three days, and every hour they were told assistance was coming. And, while holding these positions they lost not only ten per cent, of their numbers, but twenty per cent, thirty, forty per cent, and the last men put in were the cooks and the orderlies, and still there were sixty per cent of casualties for our First Division in those first great days of the fight at St. Julien—over 9,000 casualties out of fourteen thousand bayonets. These casualties rolled up while these men were holding the lines and waiting for succour. At last a British division came up, composed of men who had never fired a shot in their lives. Tell me that we did not need more men! We need more men at the front to-day, because day after day men are going into the trenches who have gone there day after day since the First Division went over. In my old battalion there is a quartermaster-sergeant, now regimental quartermaster-sergeant, who has never failed since we went to the trenches to go up with food for his men. Men are fighting there who are not allowed to sleep. At night they are not permitted, and there are many men—even strong men—who are so constituted that they cannot sleep in the daytime. Their reason ultimately gives way. Do they need a rest, or reliefs? The other troops get their regular leave. Of the English troops, every man is given leave once in every so many months, that he may go back home and see his own people. The same is true of the French; the poilu goes home to kiss his mother and meet his loved ones at stated times. But the Canadian does not come back home; there is only one thing that sends him home and that is a wound that incapacitates him for further service, or a wooden cross. If the wound is severe enough it means that he stays in France forever. Is it right that this country should leave its men in that position? It is terrible! You want delay; that is what Germany wants you to do. I do not want conscription. If it comes to a matter of personal desire, there is no man in this House who knows better the horrible conditions to which we are committing men under conscription than I do. I have seen men torn to pieces; I have seen them writhing in their death agony, men with whom I was speaking but a moment before.

I myself would be against conscription but the necessity of the case demands that we must send men. Our first duty is to those who serve. Whatever my personal objections may be, I must cast these aside. I have every pity, every regard for the conscript. In France a conscript is regarded as a holy person. I consider a conscript a man who is consecrated for service to his country. He is worthy of all our sympathies. We should be kind to them. No one would think of subjecting men to conscription in this country were it not for the duty that we owe to our troops at the front. Day by day a man has to go into the trenches with nobody to relieve him. You heard the figures read here this afternoon by the Parliamentary Secretary of the Department of Militia showing the need of troops at the front.

Somebody must go over and relieve these poor men who have been there since the beginning of the war. What are you going to do? Can you get men immediately by the voluntary system? No, the necessities of the case demand that we should apply the conscriptive principle. Canadians are sent into the trenches again and again until their reason often gives way, while the troops of other countries are relieved, Canadian soldiers are too proud to say that they want to come out to be relieved. I have seen a Canadian with his wounds bleeding run away from the hospital at London, go to Folkestone and cross to the assistance of his comrades.

That is the spirit that should animate the members of this House at this very minute. We should show that we are capable of some of the sacrifices of these men at the front who are consecrating their lives not only to the service of the Crown but of this country and to the carrying out of these very pledges which were made by the Fathers of Confederation. Let me conjure my friends from Quebec to forget their petty quarrels. There is no one in this country who should have any more personal feeling over the war than I should have about attacks and vile things said about me. Some people have been unkind enough to say something of this sort about the French Canadians. Let us settle all these petty, little things when the war is over. Let us unite now. Those who have served with the French Canadians know what they are worth and they want more of them. For this reason I say to those men in the province of Quebec: cease this agitation that is going to bring about so much unhappiness in this country. Let us not tear up this "scrap of paper," let us not be Prussians, and violate the pledge that was made at Confederation to the British people. Let me read once more this pledge:

> We expressed the earnest wish of the people of Canada to perpetuate the happy existing connection with Great Britain, and their entire willingness to contribute to the defence of the Empire their full quota, according to their ability, of men and money.

That pledge was given on behalf of Canada by Sir John Macdonald, Sir George E. Cartier, George Brown and A. T. Galt and the pledge has never been violated nor has it been rescinded from that day to this. Let this House and the people of this country now cease their quarrelling and fighting for the present and unite in a manly determination to carry out this pledge.

[Mr. Currie.]

Mr. LUCIEN T. PACAUD (Megantic): Mr. Speaker, I would surely consider myself lacking in a most solemn duty if I did not avail myself of this opportunity of expressing most frankly the views I entertain on what I consider the greatest measure ever presented to this Parliament. I appreciate, Sir, to the fullest the keen sense of responsibility which rests upon every hon. member of this House in dealing with a question which far surpasses in its consequences the course of our ordinary legislation. May this acknowledgment on my part be sufficient to assure the House that however strong may be my objections to this Bill no word of mine will intentionally at least carry with it the sting of bitterness or of passion. The words that the right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) uttered a few months ago in this House, in announcing to an unsuspecting people the intention of the Government to enact and enforce the conscription of man power in this country had barely fallen from his lips, when we were all of us witnesses of the intense excitement and deep feelings which these words and this new policy had aroused from one extremity of this country to the other. We heard the rising clamour of those who on the one hand gave expression of their views in favour of this measure. We heard the still more vigorous protests of those who on the other hand were strongly opposed to it. Through this issue, thrown so suddenly into our national arena, we clearly saw emerging from what was up to that time a united nation, the very keynote of our splendid efforts for three years, a national crisis not only acute in its present form but still more dangerous in its possibilities. This is the actual and unfortunate situation in which we find ourselves to-day. I do not wish to exaggerate its seriousness, nor do I wish to minimize its true meaning, but I feel that the hour is sufficiently grave to justify us in scrutinizing these events with an open eye and unprejudiced mind.

Were I to put in simple form what I conscientiously believe is at the very root of the present agitation throughout Canada, I would do so in these words: We are fighting for liberty abroad; we do not wish to surrender it at home. It is from this standpoint that I have endeavoured to form my judgment as to the merits of the Bill now before the House. Let us test it from that point of view. Canada has been at war for nearly three years. She entered into the struggle freely and willingly. From the very beginning she had a clear conception of what she was fighting for. A great power had challenged the democracies of the world. There is considerable difference between the two ideals. The allied nations believed in the liberty of each individual state to live its own life in its own way without any encroachment or interference from its neighbours. On the other hand, the central powers believed and still believe, in the domination by force of one power over the greater portion of the world. In other words, it was the battle of democracy versus autocracy, liberty versus servitude. That being the issue, the Government of the day found the nation at its back. There was no hesitancy, there was no recrimination. As soon as the word was given Canada was united and determined to share in this war and to win it. We all know what this national unity in so far as our participation in the struggle is concerned has achieved for Canada.

Four hundred thousand men have left our shores. What they have done on the battlefield will remain for ever the brightest page of our history. But in this page also, if I may be permitted to say so, can our lesson of to-day be learned and our real mission be unfolded. Let us not forget—I think it is well to remember it especially at this time—that we have achieved our great task because we adopted, from the very beginning, the system of voluntary service. By this system we got the men; by this system we evaded a dangerous controversy as to which course we were to follow in the long and rugged years that were to come. By this system we succeeded in concentrating the minds of the whole people of Canada on the one great issue. Sir, I ask you, prompted in doing so by the one thought which supersedes all others in my mind, had we at that time adopted conscription, if the events of to-day have any meaning, would we have achieved such a splendid success as we have? Would we not have raised a grave domestic question which would have introduced into this Parliament the deadly poison of class agitation and national unrest? To put the question is to answer it. We would have defeated the very end we had in view. The policy of this country has been at all times the voluntary system.

Mr. BURNHAM: Does the hon. member mean to assert that the voluntary system allowed people in this country to dispute any law? Is it not the force of overwhelming public opinion, as promulgated by the majority, that rules in this country in everything?

Mr. PACAUD: That is why we are for a referendum.

Mr. BURNHAM: Then the hon. gentleman would not object to conscription under those circumstances?

Mr. PACAUD: I bow to the will of the majority of the people of Canada. The voluntary system remained the policy of this country from 1914 to 1917. The two leaders of our political parties are on record as having declared in this very House, not longer than a year ago, that there would be no conscription in Canada for overseas service. The feeble rumours which were circulated at that time throughout the country that conscription was coming had, no doubt, reached their ears. They alike saw the danger. They alike desired to assure the country. They both pledged themselves to a policy of no conscription.

To-day the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) says: I stand by my pledge, no conscription until the people have decided upon its principle. The right hon. leader of the Government (Sir Robert Borden) says: Conscription at all costs, conscription right away, conscription behind the people's backs. That is the issue. For myself I, without hesitation, endorse the position taken by my leader, who stands by his pledge, who stands by the people of Canada and who stands by the voluntary system. I stand for the voluntary system. I do not believe it has failed. After listening to the speech of the ex-Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes) I am inclined more than ever to the suggestion that the fault lay with the Government, who lacked the spirit and the power to make it a success. I may be right or I may be wrong in this conclusion, but, whether right or wrong, I maintain that the tribunal of last resort to weigh the facts and pass judgment is the people of Canada themselves. Is not our position alike logical and constitutional? I use these words not without a purpose. I heard the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) reproaching the leader of the Opposition for talking about the constitution and urging his point in a logical way. He tells us this does not satisfy him. Sir, I am afraid that this war has not taught us all the same lesson. For myself, I believe that if before 1914 we had reason to pin our faith to constitutional methods of Government, we have far more reason to-day to steer still more closely within these lines when we have had before us for three years the example of an autocratic power such as Germany, when we have been able to measure to what depths it could stoop to achieve its ends. But, says the minister, if the necessity is upon us we must act. That is true. The failure of the Government to apply and practise this sound principle during the course of this war has been the cause of our principal complaint on this side of the House, and the reason of the general discontent throughout this country. But, Sir, there is no necessity which justifies this Government to usurp the rights of the people. Their right is to be heard on this momentous question. Our duty is to obey and respect their verdict. We have, Sir, before us a measure which embodies a new principle. True, the Prime Minister tried to impress this House and country with the belief that this Bill was founded on an old principle, which could be found in section 69 of the Canadian Militia Act. Why does he do so? He did so, Sir, because he recognized and appreciated how feeble would be his position if he failed to establish this contention, essential to his case. He felt that, without it, he could not meet the argument of those who based their plea for an appeal to the people on the very fact that a new principle, contrary to all the traditions of the Canadian people, was being enacted by this measure. Did he succeed? Sir, the answer of the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), an answer based on the very despatches sent by the Prime Minister himself, and on an Order in Council passed by the British Government who had been consulted on this very point at the very beginning of the war making our Canadian soldiers Imperial troops, is so complete, so thorough, that there can be no further doubt as to this: It is a new principle. What does this new principle involve? The compulsory military service abroad of the man power of Canada, the very thing the Prime Minister told us a year ago in this House he would not apply. We placed our faith in this pledge of the Prime Minister. We voted for the extension of this Parliament. We did so at the request of the Government to avoid any domestic controversy during war time, although we on this side of the House had long lost confidence in this Government. To-day, forgetting this pledge, casting aside the very reasons which they gave in asking for an extension, the Government comes forward with the most contentious measure which has ever been presented to this House, and asks this Parliament, which holds no longer any authority from the people, the power to enact a law which, for myself at least, I am convinced will do more harm than good to the great cause we have in view. Why should not the people be consulted? Why not a plebiscite? It cannot be a question of delay. It cannot be, as is so often stated, the immediate necessity of filling the gaps at the front. The Prime Minister himself, in his correspondence with the leader of the Opposition, makes it perfectly clear that if there had been a coalition he would not have enforced this Bill before appealing to the country for its endorsation. Surely, Sir, the Prime Minister would not have made this offer had he believed that the delay which might have resulted from such an appeal would have been in any way detrimental to our soldiers at the front. So, Sir, let us be frank. The reason for refusing a plebiscite is the fear of its defeat at the polls. Is that a democratic doctrine? Are we going to be the tools of those who wish to implant in this country the very system to defeat which we have given our very best blood in Europe? For myself, and for those whom I represent in this House, I will not cast my vote for and share in the responsibility for such a course.

Yet, Sir, in the face of this, when consultation with the people is suggested, it is called a miserable dilatory motion. It is brushed aside and scorned, as a trifle which deserves no consideration. No doubt we have in power a true Tory party, and Toryism was once defined by Gladstone as "Distrust of the people, qualified by fear." Never was there a truer application of a sound definition.

Mr. Speaker, special attention has been given in this debate to the province from which I come, and to the race to which I belong. Harsh words have been used, severe attacks have been delivered, unjust statements have been made. Our French Canadian soldiers who had enlisted were not spared the insult of slanderous insinuations. Were these words but the passing utterances of men, victims who were carried away by an outburst of passion, suddenly revealing to us the inner soul of the fanatic, I would be inclined, for my part, to brush them aside, knowing full well that they would not carry more weight in the country than the men who uttered them could command the respect of their fellow-countrymen. These words are far more significant.

They remind us that we are face to face with a condition far more serious. For a long time now, but specially since this war began, a systematic campaign has been waged against the French Canadian race. Let us be truthful in this matter. It has become the political weapon for the Tory press of Canada. The motive is clearly revealed to us. The object can be clearly traced. Anxious to save the Government from disaster, knowing full well that they could not succeed, basing their sole plea on the administrative record of this Government, they are trying to divert the minds of the people of Canada from the issue which spells sure defeat to this Government, by appealing once more to the prejudices of men, hoping and expecting, in this way, to save the Government. What is, Sir, the pretext of this campaign? It is said to be lack of recruiting in the province from which I come. The hon. leader of the Opposition, and those from my province who spoke after him, have given a clear and frank statement on this subject. They explained the conditions in Quebec. They showed what should have been done, and was not done. They pointed out the lack of system, the lack of good will, of proper education which undermined the feeble efforts that were made in my province to encourage enlistment. We heard a few days ago the remarkable speech of the hon. gentleman from Three Rivers. He placed before the bar of this House, in modest terms, but with a vigour and straightforwardness which, I am sure, will reach the hearts and minds of many people in this country, the case of Quebec, with its just complaints, its true aspirations and hopes. It is needless for me to repeat what was so eloquently and forcibly presented by those who have preceded me. To the fair-minded men in this country, from whatever province they come or to whatever nationality they belong, they are the vast majority, I ask them, read these speeches, ponder over them, and have in view the lesson which it was intended to convey. To those men, my countrymen, of whatever nationality they may be, who understand the paramount necessity of an earnest undertaking, whose vision is clear enough to see the danger arising from further misunderstanding and estrangement, I say: "Hear the case before judging of its merits." I appeal to their sense of justice. I ask them in what other province, outside of Quebec, was the cry of "No participation in the wars of the Empire" raised and spread as the gospel of truth? In no part of the Dominion, except in the province of Quebec. In what other province in this Dominion outside of Quebec was the issue which we are now discussing ever debated? In none. Will any fair-minded man tell me that, when this war broke out, the conditions in Quebec were similar to those existing in the other English provinces of the Dominion? And who is responsible for this condition of affairs? Who created this difference of mentality between the provinces of Quebec and the other provinces? It was the Nationalist party, represented by two members of this Government, the Nationalist party who had the financial backing of the present Government and of the Tory party of Canada, and who, to-day, victims of their own work, are the first and only ones to throw us the stone. Is this British fair play?

Mr. Speaker, we are passing through a most critical phase in our national existence. Our destiny is in our own hands. Let us not lose at home the benefits of our great sacrifices abroad. Let us trust the people. Without their verdict we are disunited. With their verdict, we are again one people, united in a common effort, clasping, in lasting comradeship, the hands now withheld in doubt.

Mr. ARTHUR LACHANCE (Quebec Centre) (translation): Mr. Speaker, at this stage of a debate which has been going on for more than two weeks, it would be rash on my part to lay claim to new arguments either for or against the Conscription Bill introduced by the Government. On either side, the subject has been threshed out so far as the House of Commons is concerned. All that remains to me, therefore, in order to avoid repetitions, is to briefly state what are my reasons for voting as I intend to do.

What has been the dominant reason for Canada's participation in the war of nations which is laying waste the old continent?

In the month of August 1914, the almost unanimous vote of the House of Commons, expressive of general public opinion, as voiced by the press and public speakers throughout the country, authorized Canada's intervention in the bloody conflict, even then almost world-wide, which had been precipitated during the last days of July.

Was it solely the fact that England was fighting that brought about this decision? No, Mr. Speaker. For the greater part of us, if not for all of us, this was inspired by an even more generous sentiment.

Germany, in defiance of her own signature, had brutally pounced upon Belgium, a small, defenceless, neutral nation, with a view, by violence and torture, to pave the way for a sweeping invasion of France, the ultimate object of the move being to invade the British Isles and strike at the Empire's industrial, commercial and naval supremacy.

General public opinion condemned that outrageous repudiation of a nation's solemn pledge; it saw in it, above all, a principle of undeniable justice to be avenged and to be sanctioned once more, and if possible, forever. Accordingly, the whole world cheered France, England and Russia as they entered the lists.

Is there anything strange in the fact that Canada, peopled by Englishmen and Frenchmen, should of her own accord have offered to draw the sword, young as she is, for the vindication of international honour? The contrary attitude would indeed have been astonishing, most painfully astonishing to me.

Parliament, however, authorized that participation after being given an assurance on the part of the Government that military service would be voluntary. And how often was not that engagement repeated in this House, as well as outside of it, by the Prime Minister, by his colleagues and by his partisans? How often also, upon the faith of such declarations, have not the leader of the Opposition and his followers confirmed it to their constituents?

This pledge was given from the very inception of the war in a despatch of His Royal Highness the Governor General sent by the Prime Minister to the Secretary of State for the Colonies and dated August 1, 1914.

Let us read this despatch:

In view of the impending danger of war involving the Empire, my Advisers are anxiously considering the most effective means of rendering every possible aid and they welcome any suggestions and advice which Imperial naval and military authorities may deem it expedient to offer. They are confident that a considerable force would be available for service abroad. A question has been mooted respecting the status of any Canadian force serving abroad as under section 69 of Canadian Militia Act the active militia can only be placed on actual service beyond Canada for the defence thereof.

It has been suggested that regiments might enlist as Imperial troops for stated periods, Canadian Government undertaking to make all necessary provision for their equipment, pay and maintenance.

As will be seen, it was recognized by the president of the Council that the Canadian troops could not be sent across the sea, under the Militia Act of Canada and that they should be sent only as serving voluntarily in the war. The same condition is to be found in a despatch sent by the Governor General dated 5th of August, in which it is asked that the Government of Great Britain should issue an order to enlist our soldiers for the British army, as they were volunteers:

My Government being desirous of putting beyond doubt status of Canadian volunteers requests that His Majesty may be pleased to issue an order bringing these volunteers under sections 175 and 176 of the Army Act.

The same pledge is reiterated by the Government in their order in Council of August 6, authorizing the mobilization of Militia units, such units to be composed of officers and men who were willing to volunteer for overseas service under the British Crown.

The Committee of the Privy Council have had before them a report, dated 6th August, 1914, from the Minister of Militia and Defence, representing—in view of the state of war now existing between the United Kingdom, and the Dominions, Colonies, and Dependencies of the British Empire on the one side, and Germany on the other side, creating a menace to the well-being and integrity of the Empire, and having regard to the duty of the Dominion of Canada as one of those Dominions to provide for its own defence and to assist in maintaining the integrity and honour of the Empire—that it is desirable to mobilize Militia units of the various arms of the service of such effective strength as may from time to time be determined by Your Royal Highness in Council, such units to be composed of officers and men who are willing to volunteer for overseas service under the British Crown.

Again, in the debate on the Address during the session of 1916, the Prime Minister stated that there would be no compulsory service.

My right hon. friend has alluded to conscription—to the idea in this country or elsewhere that there may be conscription in Canada. In speaking in the first two or three months of this war I made it clear to the people of Canada that we did not propose any conscription. I repeat that announcement to-day with emphasis.

The Government reiterated the same pledge in their Order in Council passed on the 16th of March last authorizing the Minister of Militia to raise 500,000 men for home defence. That appeal was made under the Militia Act of Canada, but they took good care to add that this partial mobilization applied only to service in Canada for home defence.

To raise 50,000 men for home defence, excluding troops already called out under Order in Council dated August 6, 1914, and that it forms part of the force of 500,000 men to which reference is made in Order in Council dated January 12, 1916. It is understood that the conditions of enlistment applying to the above-mentioned partial mobilization of the active militia apply only to service in Canada for home defence.

Such were the official statements which determined the nature of the military service authorized by Parliament. Such was the position from August, 1914, to May 17, 1917. Unexpectedly, on May 18, Mr. Prime Minister made a regular back down, and like a bolt from the blue, this Conscription Bill came down which staggered the House being totally uncalled for, confiscating uselessly as it does the liberty of the subject, in short, legislation which will ultimately prove prejudicial to the best interests of the Allies, in so far as Canada is concerned. Let me say here, Sir, that this measure has bred in the minds of the people a deep feeling of distrust.

The people of this country have been led into error, and henceforth they will mistrust the Government on this war question even more than on any other issue. They are under the impression that, through reprehensible manoeuvres, they have been befooled into giving assent to our participation in the war and to the exigencies that have flowed from it. In fact, Sir, what member of this Parliament would affirm that, at the outset, the people would have approved of our intervention, had not the Government formally pledged themselves to a strictly voluntary service?

Who is the hon. gentleman who pretends that the people would have assented to the various measures taken from the very outset of the war, three years ago, had the administration even given a hint that they were contemplating conscription?

Who would say that when the extension of the term of Parliament came up before the House in 1916, the general stand of the people of Canada, which was then rather a passive one, would not have been different, had they anticipated or even suspected that this compulsory service was being contemplated?

Had such a project been disclosed, never would the powers of Parliament have been extended, as the people would have objected to it, as they were opposed to conscription. Half the people have already manifested their opposition to conscription, not only in the province of Quebec, but throughout the whole Dominion, as shown by the numerous petitions received from every section of the country from labour unions, farmers, clerks, municipal bodies and other associations.

Besides, the fact has been acknowledged by many hon. members who have stated that they opposed a referendum or the holding of a general election, because, in their opinion, the verdict returned by the country would be adverse to the proposed Bill. What then? Do those hon. gentlemen mean to impose such legislation in defiance of the will of the majority of the electorate, legislation, I say in pursuance of which the life of the citizens is at stake? Is not such legislation the very negation of our representative system? In such a case, we should no longer have Government by the people, but merely representatives autocratically substituting for the will of the people their own personal opinion, at a time when they no longer have any mandate for legislating on conscription, and should they happen to have a mandate, rather hold it in order to oppose compulsory service.

It is even on that latter ground that I oppose the amendment to the amendment giving the Bill the six months' hoist. I oppose conscription, but I will accept it, should the majority of the electorate approve of it. However, it remains to be known beyond a doubt to which side leans the majority and how could it be so ascertained, except by the vote of the people? Of what right do you claim to prevent, by this amendment to the amendment, the people of Canada from expressing their opinion? What we are asked to do in the petitions that have been sent to Parliament is not voting down or killing the Bill but that the electors should vote on the issue.

I think that the hon. gentlemen who are introducing or advocating this amendment to the amendment show themselves just as arbitrary as those who support this Bill, being well aware that the people antagonize it. I for one cannot approve of this new and radical departure in our participation in this war, in this breaking away from our former policy, altogether at variance with the formal pledges given by the Government, as to which I happen to stand committed, through having adhered to those guarantees in the past and through the representations given to my constituents. I cannot endorse this Bill, the far reaching results of which nobody can foresee. I could not approve of this policy unheard of so far in our history, this new departure from our past traditions, unless it could be shown that the people were willing to accept it, and "a fortiori" am I bound to oppose it, when I am satisfied that the people condemn it.

But there is another branch of the subject of which I wish to speak now. Is the despatching of those 100,000 men warranted by the economical conditions of the country? On what ground do the Government rest their claim for imposing conscription upon the country? There is but one reason alleged by them, and it is this, that as enough men do not volunteer to complete the quota required, it becomes necessary to resort to conscription, in order to maintain at full strength our expeditionary forces on the firing line. I grant it, as a general proposition; but it should first be shown that those 100,000 men will be of greater use to the Allies overseas than they would be here. Where is the proof of that fact to be found? When, on the 1st January 1916, the Prime Minister increased the expeditionary forces to 500,000 men, had he first of all ascertained whether such a policy was warranted by the economical conditions of the country? There is absolutely nothing to show that he had done so. Even to-day, what is there before the House to show us that those 100,000 men would better serve the interests of the Allies overseas than they would do here in the industries producing for war purposes and in the establishments dedicated to our national existence?

And should those 100,000 men remaining in the country be of greater practical use to the common cause, who would object to other men in the ranks of the Allied armies filling up the gaps in the Canadian army?

Many authorized voices have declared in the press and before public meetings that under present circumstances, the levy of 100,000 men would result in creating disturbances in the farming industry, in crippling our finances and throwing out of gear our industrial machinery, which would affect prejudicially Canada and indirectly the cause of the Allies.

What are the Allies clamoring for? Is it not for munitions, for food and ships for transportation? Why do you not open shipyards and encourage as much as possible shipbuilding? Under the circumstances, assisting the Allies in that particular branch is an imperious necessity, while by so doing, you should be encouraging an infant industry of the greatest importance to the country. But will the Government rest satisfied with this appeal to coercion? By no means, because next year there will be another levy of 100,000 men and as many more within two years. Did not the Minister of Finance state before the House a few days ago, that the war would be of long duration?

As will be seen, this new departure, this breaking away from our traditions, along the line followed by the Administration, may result most disastrously for Canada and for the cause of the Allies. You would be labouring under a delusion, in attempting to maintain in their integrity our Canadian forces, without providing for a corresponding efficient maintenance of our economical situation.

Now what was the position a year ago? What is our position to-day? The cost of living is going sky-high, prices are soaring and have reached fantastic figures altogether out of proportion to the revenue of the people. There does not seem to be any other remedy but a greater production, but so far the Government have not suggested any. But how are we to have more production without securing more labour? Where is labour to be found? Last year in the West of Canada there was an urgent demand sent out for farm help by the farmers, but to no purpose. Last winter agents were sent out by the Government for recruiting 50,000 farm hands in the United States, but they did not get any. And yet, despite this shortage of labour, the people were amazed on hearing that 50,000 men have been called under the colours for the defence of the country. Against whom was the country to be defended? The question has so far remained unanswered. A most bewildering thing, indeed all the same, that mobilization which resulted in uselessly stationing in various camps, forts and citadels of Canada 50,000 men, at a time when the neighbouring Republic was being explored by Government agents for recruiting the farm hands and labourers needed in our cities and on the farms.

But what we are justified in inferring from that policy is this: the Government cannot prove that the 100,000 men whom they contemplate despatching to Europe will be of greater use to the Allies, than they would be here. Do not all those facts show that this conscription Bill originates in the temerity of the Prime Minister apparently enacting on his own responsibility, on the 1st January 1916, that the expeditionary forces should be increased to 500,000 men.

This message seems to have been at first the ipse dixit of a Government leader who, on a New-Year's day woke up in the attitude of a Caesar. But had he well pondered over the still latent possibilities of voluntary enlistment on the abundance or shortage of labour for the production of food and all the essentials and necessities for the effective prosecution of the war? That does not seem to have been the case. That there was temerity has been shown by the events, the message did not meet with the anticipated success.

But, because the Prime Minister did not rightly size up the probable results of voluntary enlistment, was he warranted on that ground in resorting to coercion, in defiance of the most formal pledges given, from the very inception of the war?

In addition to the question as to the desirability of conscripting Canadian manhood, there is the legal and constitutional issue. In this connection, I have in mind the axiom so often quoted in debate: "When Great Britain is at war, Canada is at war." Granted, but this axiom should be thus qualified: a belligerent with Great Britain has the right of attacking our country, even though Canada were standing aloof in the conflict; in case of such an attack, Canada could not invoke the status of neutrality.

But this axiom does not convey the meaning that Canada ought to participate in all the wars of Great Britain or that, even if she took part in any war she could not withdraw from it.

Under the Constitution, Canada could recall to the last man all her expeditionary forces, being in no way bound to send overseas men to fight in this world-shaking war.

To the accuracy of that statement an eminent statesman, the right hon. Arthur James Balfour bore witness in this House. From his oration of May 28, delivered before the House of Commons and the members of the Senate in joint session, let me quote what follows:

> Moreover, remember that the foreign speculators about the British Empire must have thought before the war began. They said to themselves: This loosely constructed State resembles nothing that has ever existed in history before; it is held together by no coercive power; the Government of the Mother Country cannot raise a corporal's guard in Canada, Australia, New Zealand, or wherever you will; she can not raise a shilling of taxation; she has no power. When, unexpectedly, without giving an opportunity for preparation or discussion, or propaganda, war burst upon the world, even those animated by such a feeling might well have doubted whether this great Empire—each unit of which had it in its power to hold aloof had it so desired—might act as one organization animated by one soul, moved by one purpose and driving towards one end.

As will be seen from the above quotation, the Government of the Mother Country could not raise a corporal's guard in Canada nor in any other colony, and every colony could have stood aloof, had it so desired. Therefore, granted that if Great Britain has no power to coerce us into participating in her wars, how can the Government take authority to enact legislation for coercing us? No, the Government have no such power, neither in justice nor in equity.

Among the obligations involved in the status of citizenship is that of military service for the defence of one's country: but you could not quote a single case of legislation imposing military service for the defence of another country.

Now, to put it in a nutshell, what the Government said amounts to this: conscription is a case of emergency or at least it is the unavoidable result of Canada's participation in the conflict, as it is necessary to fill up the gaps and to maintain at full strength our expeditionary forces.

Now, to this I reply: You have secured our participation under false representations, because you kept repeating "ad nauseam" that there would be no such emergency and no such conscription as a consequence; and you cannot frame a law for conscripting Canadian manhood grounded on a consent which was not given freely, but erroneously, and that is the reason why I say that you should appeal to the people, in order to get the power that is lacking and which you cannot bestow on yourselves. Up to a few weeks ago, did any one pretend that our Canadian manhood could be conscripted and sent abroad in order to fight the battles of England and the Allies?

Besides, how could such a departure have been contemplated, in view of the fact that under the Militia Act of Canada no troops could be sent abroad on voluntary service? The leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) has made that point very clear; he has grounded his opinion on the views held by the Prime Minister and the Government in the despatches of August 1 and 5, 1914, to the Secretary of State for the Colonies and in the order in council of August 6 authorizing the mobilization of the first contingent.

This interpretation squares with the policy and the principles embodied in all the legislation relating to the Militia Acts enacted in Canada. This was fully shown by my hon. friend from Kamouraska (Mr. Lapointe) in the exhaustive review which he made of that legislation, going back as far as 1808 and resting his case on the best authorities and the most competent exponents of the policy of that legislation.

It follows, beyond the shadow of a doubt, that the Militia Act of Canada has nothing to do with the proposed conscription Bill; that the Government who pretend to graft it on the Militia Act are not acting in good faith; that Great Britain has no right to compel the people of Canada to go and fight her battles, and "a fortiori", that the Government have no right to enact a law in order to force upon the people compulsory service.

I approved of Canada participating in this world-war, and I do not feel regret for it, as the cause of the Allies deserves the cooperation of all those who are far or near connected with it. In the province of Quebec, a certain school of thought has been manifesting, more ostensibly than they have been doing in some of the other provinces, its opposition to the country participating in the war. In the opinion of this group of anti-participationists there is no blinking the fact that our entry in the war results from what they think was the blameworthy stand taken, at the time of the South African war in 1898, and from the legislation enacted in 1909 and 1910 in connection with the Naval service and also from the contribution of $35,000,000 for the construction of these dreadnoughts to be incorporated in the British navy. But there is no similarity. In those three instances the question was as to the desirability of the Government proffering the assistance of Canada to the mother country. Now it is no longer a question of Great Britain prosecuting a redress or a conquest, but it is a case of the most peace-loving nations which, after repeatedly ignoring the most humiliating provocations, are now rising in their might and taking up arms on behalf of international law or the law of nations, and in vindication of the treaties guaranteeing the neutrality of Belgium, which Germany might and autocracy pretend to trample upon with impunity; in short it is the case of a nation, threatening all liberty, despising all the rights bequeathed to the world by the English Revolution and the French Revolution. Thus is spite of the anguish of spirit and the heart-rending anxiety we were a prey to, from the inception of this orgy of destruction, I am still of opinion that Canada has done right in helping those of her sons who volunteered to go overseas and whose valour in this world-shaking war has stood equal to the noble cause espoused by them.

Undoubtedly being given that we are at war, we should grieve at having erased from our national records such glorious deeds as those performed by our soldiers who held high the honour of Canada on so many battle fields; those soldiers, I say, who at Ypres and Saint Julien saved Calais, those who died at Festubert and Givenchy and Saint Eloi, those who fell at Neuve Chapelle, those who gave their lives at Courcelette and who offered the supreme sacrifice at Vimy.

In the same order of things, Canada has risen to the height of the cause for which she is fighting, and the magnitude of the effort exerted by her has been recognized by military leaders and statesmen alike. In proportion, our contribution as a whole is ahead of that of any other colony and it has been estimated that even the United States would stand our equal only when they have put in the field an army of five or six million soldiers.

Now, Mr. Speaker, should we not be disregarding, to a certain extent, that great generosity on the part of the people, were we to introduce coercion for the purpose of increasing a contribution which, as admitted by competent parties, has already reached the extreme limit of this country's economic power?

Considering the results already obtained, voluntary enlisment, reinvigorated, skilfully directed, kept alive, would indeed have brought to a worthy completion Canada's participation in the war.

In order to justify conscription, Great Britain's example is invoked, but there is no analogy between the two cases. England had signed the treaty which Germany has torn to pieces; on pain of everlasting disgrace, she owed it to her honour to see that her signature respected, putting, if necessary, into the effort her last man and her last shilling. Canada on the other hand had signed no treaty; legally and constitutionally she was in no wise obliged to intervene in this war; her sacrifices have been inspired by her magnanimity and were made to the full extent of her resources.

Because Canada, heeding her generosity and self sacrifice, has sent over and maintained to this day an army at the front, is it logical to take for granted that she is bound to continue maintaining it in full numbers, notwithstanding any other considerations, when volunteering proves inadequate and when, on the other hand, volunteering has been the determining, essential, sine qua non reason for our original participation?

Arguing from our colonial status, some people in this country speak and protest as if Canada should be sacrificed to the insatiable Moloch that is, for the past three years, swallowing up the vital forces of the old world; as if Canada should trail along until spiritless, bloodless and emaciated, she drops gasping at the Allies' feet.

No! no!

A colony, be it so; but a free and self-governing country whose citizen has the right and alike the duty of speaking his mind. Canada is your country as well as it is ours, but in a different manner. Our ancestors were its discoverers and settlers; they have brought to it civilization; wherefore is it our country not in the sense that it is yours, you, Englishmen, Irishmen, Scotchmen, who may claim also another country as your own. Our fathers have spread over it the atmosphere of liberty; it needed, it is true, a revolution and bloodshed, but liberty, indeed, never had any other cradle nor any other nursing; besides, there is not a single Canadian, who stops to reflect, that does not applaud to-day that revolution of yesterday. How is it, therefore, that you cannot understand our fear lest a misplaced generosity should throw this country into a deadly state of languor, should paralyze our growth, and that, without improving to a perceptible degree the Allies' general situation.

That is the point upon which we ask the judgment of all Canadians. This country has already given too liberally of its blood and its gold, that the Government should to-day mercilessly treat it as liable to unlimited taxation and hard labour, whether in its individual or in its national life, and pay no heed to the views or the will of the people.

Canada must remain in the struggle, that is the feeling of all of us; but the Government wants to introduce coercion; we answer: You have no right to do it without the consent of the citizens. Let, therefore, the question be submitted to them. What do you fear? If you are convinced that conscription is necessary, you will have no trouble in satisfying the people of its necessity. Do you mistrust them? And why should you, if you are in good faith, if you have, as you contend, performed your duty. Would it be that you foresee a hostile verdict upon conscription? In my opinion, yes, that is the reason for your refusal. But then, it is the ipse dixit of a government group in defiance of the popular will.

As a parting word, let me say: Trust the people; they will be your supreme support, your only strength in the crisis which Canada, as the rest of the world, is going through; they are broad-minded, generous; sacrifices are easy to them; they will lighten your path. But if you have no confidence in them, in the people who have entrusted you with their destinies, they, your masters and your judges as they are ours, how can you expect us to have faith in you?

Mr. C. A. WILSON (Laval): Mr. Speaker, the Bill for compulsory military service which the Government has drawn up and presented to this House has been so thoroughly discussed and so fully examined in all its bearings that very little is left to be said on the subject. However, on such a solemn occasion I deem it my duty to state my views concerning the Bill.

All are of one accord on the main question; the sole thought of every citizen of this Dominion is the success of the Allies in this mighty struggle. Since we have entered upon this war, rightly or wrongly, the fact remains that we are now in it to the finish. It would be useless for me now to enter into any of the questions touching upon the wisdom or otherwise of our present participation in the conflict, or to devote time to the consideration of the necessity of bending all our might to secure ultimate victory.

At the outset of the war the Allies believed in an early triumph. They thought that in a short time—three months or so, at the most—their troops would enter in triumph the city of Berlin, that the heroic King of the Belgians would be reseated on his throne, and that the people of that noble little country would be given back their rights and privileges and be in a position to enjoy all the blessings of a permanent peace. For three years the Allies have battled. The thunder of war has been ceaseless; the sacrifices endured have been beyond number, yet the dawn of victory does not appear on the horizon. These are not words of despair, nor do they indicate any lessening of faith in the cause. On the contrary, I am absolutely convinced that ultimate victory will crown the efforts of the Allied armies.

I do not intend to occupy the time of the House in going over the different parts taken by the various Allies in this stupendous struggle. The question that occupies our attention at this moment concerns not only England, Belgium, France, or Italy; it concerns our own selves in Canada.

No one questions whether or not our efforts should be carried on to the end; for my part, I am convinced that that is the paramount duty of the hour. Effort means the use of force or strength, and it behooves us to know what our strength is, its nature, its extent, what the maximum of development necessary in order to secure the best that is in us. It is on this latter point that ideas and opinions differ. The difficulty is not insurmountable, the problem not without a solution; but it is necessary to lay aside all political interests and racial and religious prejudices, and approach the solving of the issue with open minds, generous hearts and clear brains.

The Government, realizing the position that Canada holds in regard to the Empire, thought well to take a share in this great struggle, called Parliament together, and received all the support possible from a united people through their representatives.

First, the necessity was for men at the front, and then for the means of providing for them. The Government employed the voluntary system of enrolment. At that time everyone believed in the effectiveness of that system, provided it was wisely and properly put in movement. What has been the result? In the work of recruiting this Dominion has performed miracles. England herself has declared through her most authoritative voices—even that of Mr. Balfour in this very House some weeks ago—that Canada deserves unlimited thanks for all she has done for the Allies, and that the conduct of her sons on the fields of Europe has surpassed the most sanguine expectations. Even the American people, a people pretty well accustomed to magnify their own achievements, could not refrain from paying homage to the magnificent and gigantic efforts of Canada at the beginning and on through this war of giants. They found that Canada, with an entire voting population of 1,600,000 men, including old men and men of all ages, as well as a vast number of inhabitants from other lands, had, without any coercion or enforcement, freely and voluntarily enrolled over 420,000 volunteers and sent over 330,000 of them beyond the seas to assist France and England on the fields of Flanders and elsewhere. And they marvelled at the achievement.

With these facts and figures before us, we cannot but say that the voluntary system in Canada, with all the difficulties incident to enlistment, has succeeded beyond all expectations. In support of this contention, I would like to quote from the Wall Street Journal of the 18th June instant, which organ, under the heading, "Conscription in Canada," makes the following estimate of this country's doings:

> Canada has a voting population of 1,600,000, including the old and feeble, and a relatively large number of Germans and Austrians of recent citizenship. Volunteer enlistments are over 400,000, and over 300,000 men have gone to England and France. Casualties run up to nearly 100,000. It cannot be said, therefore, that the volunteer system, with all of its faults of wastage of men, money and supplies, did not at least enlist popular support.
>
> Some time ago, national service was taken up and the industrial population of the Dominion has been classified, and an effort has been made to enlist men of fighting age who could be most economically dispensed with. Now, to round out the national service organization of the Dominion, a bill has been introduced for conscription.

I draw your attention specially to the following paragraph:

> When the history of the Dominion in this war shall have been written, it will not be recorded that she voluntarily failed to meet the high expectations of her Premier, for volunteers were in abundance, as they have always been. But it was necessary, even though late, to have due regard to an equitable distribution of the burden by localities and with reference to the state of industry, and in this way make good the pledge of Sir Robert Borden that Canada would stand at least half a million men overseas.
> The achievements of the volunteer Canadian contingents will survive in the traditions of the north long after every monument to commemorate them shall have perished.

This appreciation, which I consider as just and fair, brings me to the conclusion that, had it not been for the imprudent promise made by the Prime Minister in a moment of perhaps irreflection, the 500,000 men of whom he spoke would to-day be under the colours through the voluntary system. But that promise created a feeling of astonishment and stampede amongst a people who, considering themselves to be free men, did not wish to cut slices from their own liberty in order to secure the liberties of others. Such an appreciation on the part of the United States is not surprising, coming from a people who have themselves enjoyed the greatest amount of liberty in the world, and who are the personification of democracy in its fullest sense. But it is not enough to be a free people, you must practise freedom. I understand there are periods when great evils can be avoided only at the cost of great sacrifices. But efforts made for liberty should not lead to anarchy; it is very good to provide for men, but it is also essential to equip them and provide for them. Listen to a French writer on this subject. In the month of June of this year, Mr. Albert Peyronnet, of France said:

> It would appear that the first thing is to drive the enemy off the national soil. Doubtlessly correct. But to drive him, the combatant must be fed, we must plant, and to plant we must sow; seed and plants are required; these must be brought to their destination; transportation facilities are needed; and if we have none we must get them, cost what it may, and place them at the disposal of those who, while filled with courage and good will, are without the means and the implements to perform their work. While our soldiers are performing their duties for our freedom, they must be supplied.

Many comments have been made as to the reasons why enlistment in Quebec, if it has not failed, has slackened to a certain extent. Let us examine a few cold facts, and then although they may have been viewed from different angles by different observers, it is very easy for us to draw conclusions.

In the first place, Mr. Speaker, I wish to express my opinion on some of those striking movements, those flashes of bright action which, at times, certain men perform, and which gain for them, if not fame, at least a degree of passing notoriety. Those deeds may be admirable in themselves, as far as they go, but the grave danger lies in the fact that the performer sometimes fails to gauge the ultimate and far-reaching consequence of that which, for the moment, appears worthy of praise. The lightning stroke is both brilliant and dazzling, but where it falls, generally ruin and ashes are to be found. We have an example of this in the action of the former member for Nicolet (Mr. Lamarche). With a splendid gesture he declared that he would not sit in Parliament, and that he resigned his seat as a protest against what he considered the unconstitutional and unworthy course taken by this Government in its retention of power without any mandate from the people. But Mr. Lamarche, unsupported by his other political associates, simply isolated himself and wrought an injustice to the very cause which he now eloquently advocates. Would he not be more useful, more effective, more patriotic and far more serviceable were he in this House to-day to register his vote against conscription, than to deliver orations, no matter how eloquent, against that pernicious principle?

Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Sevigny) who last week delivered his plea on the floor of Parliament, has been as inconsistent as have been all the other Nationalists in the political arena of the past few years. I listened very attentively to that hon. gentleman's explanations, and I have come to the conclusion that they explain nothing at all. I desire to be perfectly parliamentary in dealing with this phase of the issue before us; but I cannot help being to some extent severe; severe, but just, I hope. The Minister of Inland Revenue declared that French Canadians in various parts of the Dominion did well in recruiting, and that in Quebec they would have done equally well, had it not been for their leaders and the lack of sincerity in those leaders when encouraging enlistment. These are not his exact words, but they are the purport of them. Such is the central idea expressed by the hon. gentleman in his special pleading on Monday last. When I heard such excuses coming from the lips of that hon. gentleman, I sought for some word in the English or the French language to qualify properly the audacity of the statements. In 1910 and 1911 the men who preached a crusade throughout Quebec against all idea of conscription and of military or naval service, or any participation in wars of the Empire were the Postmaster General (Mr. Blondin), the Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Sevigny) and their Nationalist brethren. The young lads of fifteen and sixteen years of age whom they taught to resist all thought of helping England, and in whom they implanted the idea that the Laurier Naval Bill was intended to send them as food for cannon on the fields of Europe or on the high seas, are to-day the young men of twenty-one or twenty-two whom these self-same apostles seek to force into the ranks of overseas regiments. Imagine the preacher of such doctrines arising to-day, simply because he is in possession of a portfolio, and blaming the leaders of public thought in Quebec for the lack of recruiting. The ex-Secretary of State (Mr. Patenaude) has been deceived, as the country has been deceived, but he has resigned his portfolio and has thus entered the strongest and most effective protest possible against the systematic deception perpetrated in Canada. Unlike Mr. Lamarche, the ex-Secretary of State remains in the House to vote against conscription; unlike the Minister of Inland Revenue he gives up his seat in the Cabinet to retain his liberty and to do his duty to his people and his province. But what am I to say of the course taken by the Minister of Inland Revenue? What a great day this Government has afforded him in return for his complete change of front; he has breakfasted off the shreds of his own principles; he has dined in the Speaker's chair; he now takes his supper at the council table of this conglomerate Cabinet; and he expects perhaps, to be allowed to sleep in the silent comforts of the Senate. What an example of the selling of a birthright for a mess of political pottage. The minister seems to have gone, in his brief career, the entire round of the political zodiac. But where I do not agree with him is when he pretends that he is retaining his seat in the Cabinet in order that French Canadians may not be deprived of representation in the Government. He is holding his portfolio under equally false pretences —because he and his associate no more represent the French Canadians than they do Australians or New Zealanders. But this is only one more of the deceptions he has learned in the school of political deceit wherein he has learned his lessons of late. Do I exaggerate?

Let us turn to that school and to its headmaster. The Prime Minister and his party came into power mainly through the misrepresentations made in Quebec by the Nationalist crowd, who were ready to burn the country provided they could down Laurier. His Navy Act, which the Nationalists opposed tooth and nail and which the Borden party promised to efface from the statute-book if returned to power, still stands on the statutes, and this Government, in the face of events, dare not carry out its promise to repeal it. Nor would the Nationalists who then demanded its repeal, attempt to-day to repeat the arguments with which they deceived half of Quebec. Worthy pupils of a very worthy, or unworthy master. Bourassa yesterday; Borden to-day—different teachers, but professing the same principles, and putting those principles into practice each in his own way and according to his opportunities. I accuse this Government and its Prime Minister of repeated and reiterated misrepresentations; at all events they cannot be characterized more mildly than by styling them "dust-throwing into the eyes of the people."

Many times, has this Government, through its Prime Minister or other members of its combination, played a game of deceit with the people of Canada. On Tuesday night my hon. friend from Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau), in a masterly address, characterized by mildness, heart, fairness, fearlessness and every fine quality that belongs to the well-born French Canadian, exposed the miserable and un-British, narrow and anti-Canadian slanders that seem to have been specially concocted to carry on a campaign of unpatriotic persecution against my province. No need that I should mar that irrefutable oration by any repetitions of its indictments. It has been shown in this House, numberless times, and it has never been refuted, that the Prime Minister and his acolytes, the ministers from the province of Quebec, have constantly assured the country that conscription would never be resorted to by this Government. Had the Premier the idea of ultimately springing this issue on the people at that time? I do not know; perhaps not; perhaps his head was turned by some occult imperialistic influence during his otherwise fruitless trip to Europe last winter and last spring. Be that as it may, he and some of his ministers, must have assured the Archbishop of Montreal, either in writing or verbally, or both, that the National Service Card—the worst fiasco that the Government has ever perpetrated—was not the forerunner of conscription. On this I would like to hear from some of these gentlemen, in particular the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty). Until refuted, or at least until denied, this self-evident fact must be taken for granted. It was a huge deception, backed by false representations of the worst kind. In this did the Premier and his Government deceive the people of my province. To-day they are reaping what they sowed in that hour. The eyes of the people are opened to the treachery of which they were the plaything and to the rule of deceit of which they are the victims.

I commend to the attention of the House the answer given by the right hon. the Prime Minister to a question put by the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Murphy) on 18th June:—

Mr. Murphy: 1. Has there been any correspondence between the Government or any member thereof, and any Prelate or Prelates in the province of Quebec on the subject of conscription?

2. If so, will the correspondence be laid on the table of the House, and when?

And this was the answer:—

Sir Robert Borden: There is no official correspondence on the subject—

No "official" correspondence. But was there any?

Mr. LEMIEUX: Officious.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: Yes, any officious correspondence, as remarked by the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux).

—and the Government has no information in regard to the private correspondence of any member of the Government.

I leave it to the House to judge whether the complaint made by the Archbishop of Montreal on this subject, which complaint has been reported in the papers, was well founded or not. I think it was in my own county—

An hon. MEMBER: No, St. Benoit.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: Yes, at St. Benoit, in the county of Two Mountains, that the Archbishop stated that he had been deceived by some member of the Government. But, instead of full information being given to the public and to this House, we have the answer which I have just read. Having thus broken their own word and their own promises, I am not surprised that the gentlemen opposite fear the people and cling to their seats despite the public clamour.

Let me read briefly from an editorial article which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen of this morning. It deals with the charge that Bourassa is the associate of the leader of the Opposition, or vice versa. The article is entitled " Playing it Fair." It says:—

To the unbiased observer there is no more pathetic symptom of the weakness of the Administration in the conduct of the war than the tendency of the partisan press to shift responsibility for the situation in Quebec to the shoulders of the leader of the Opposition. As antagonism to the compulsory military measure becomes more pronounced in the neighbouring province the Administration press all over the country, instead of attempting to find some rational solution for the problem, redoubles its efforts to make it clear that Sir Wilfrid alone is to blame for the difficulties that are being revealed in the attitude of Quebec. Politically, this may be intended to draw attention from the Nationalist alliance with the Conservative party in 1911, an alliance emphasized in a significant manner by the recent retirement of Hon. Mr. Patenaude from the Cabinet, but while this may have some value in an electioneering sense, it is an affront to the intelligence of the average Canadian to tell him, as does a local contemporary, that the province of Quebec virtually awaited a lead from Sir Wilfrid Laurier in the matter of conscription, and that the attitude of that statesman in the House determined to large degree the stand of the French Canadian province. It is worse than dishonest to assert that Sir Wilfrid handed Quebec over to Bourassa. The fact is that the influence of Bourassa was strong enough in 1911 to defeat Sir Wilfrid Laurier in the Dominion by almost dividing the number of seats in Quebec province.

The editorial closes with these words:

To blame the situation in Quebec on the leader of the Opposition is a cheap political expedient and lacks the spirit of manliness.

The appreciation which I was quoting from the Wall Street Journal a few minutes ago, you will notice, points out specially that it is as necessary to have due regard to an equitable distribution of the burden by localities and with reference to the state of industry, and in this way to make good the pledge of the Prime Minister that Canada would send at least half a million men overseas.. Equitable distribution and the pledge of the Prime Minister will illustrate la raison de naissance if not la raison d'être of this proposed legislation. So much has been said about this pledge that I do not propose to comment at any length in favour of it. Suffice it to say that for my part, I qualify it as imprudent, inconsiderate, presumptious, unauthorized, and tainted with jingoism. He wanted to outdo somebody, to "go one better " as is said in common parlance. And " the morning after the night before " when this promise had been flashed, he realized, I presume, that he had gone very far—too far —but he made up his mind to live up to his imprudence and make good at any price, even if he had to ruin Canada in men and money, sacrifice its autonomy and treat the British Act of Confederation as a "scrap of paper."

This is one of the considerations we are called upon to weigh, and I do not hesitate a minute to put it aside and consider it absolutely worthless and weightless. But the "equitable distribution" is worth considering.

At first glance it will be seen that the volunteering system adopted by the Government at the start would produce inequality. Inequality is in the very nature of voluntarism, and the Government, unless composed of blind men, could not do otherwise than foresee and expect inequality, discrepancy, difference in number. It was sure in advance that one part of the country would produce more man-power that another part, one province, one city, one town, one village, one hamlet one county, one parish, one township, one village would produce more or less than others. They knew that this system would engender comparison, friction, uneasiness, more especially in a bi-racial bi-lingual country like Canada and where all creeds are professed. Such a result, such an inevitable accomplishment having been achieved, the Government cannot now recriminate and complain. It is its own offspring, its own child. Though this system had grave disadvantages on the one hand, it had great advantages on the other, the most precious of which was that every man could of his own free will mould his conduct according to the dictation of his conscience.

I mentioned comparison a few moments ago. It happened that every other province, especially Ontario, compared itself with Quebec and found the latter wanting, lacking, "slacking," to use the consecrated terms complained—inde irae et lacrimae. From this day we had all kinds of insinuations and slanders, insults and appeals to religion, race and language—insults which have been met and repelled.

But the point I want to make is this. If a slacker is more or less to blame, more or less of a criminal, what difference is there between a slacker in Ontario, or the other English-speaking provinces, and a slacker in Quebec? None. If any, the slacker of British parentage is more to blame. if blame should be attached, than the slacker of French blood, because his ties with the Motherland are linked more closely.

It is all very well to brag about loyalty and patriotism, but the fact remains that according to the figures given as a proposed basis for the conscription of 100,000 men, 75,000 will have to be enrolled in the English provinces and 25,000 in Quebec. Make all kinds of comparisons if you like now. If Quebec is slacking twenty-five per cent, the other provinces are slacking seventy-five per cent. But if it is a crime for a French-Canadian to slack, what would it be for a British Canadian?—a glory, I suppose. And to think that the Imperial Government had to enact conscription in the British Isles to stimulate the Briton's patriotism, while a whole English continent, Australia, with no Quebec within its confines, refused to have recourse to conscription, and nobody to blame them in this House!

I agree with many of the reasons that were enunciated in support of the proposal for a referendum, accepting as I do the principle that the people are the sovereign master of their destinies, and I deny anybody the right to dictate to the people without their consent. If any one doubts the soundness and prudence of this doctrine, let him become a student of the situation in Russia, China, Portugal or Greece.

Let us profit by the examples of others and the lessons they unfold, and apply them to Canada, I say, that neither compulsion nor conscription was ever before applied in this country. The people claim the right to have a say in a question which involves their lives, rights, obligations, privileges and property.

As to the insults, insinuations and slanders which have been offered in this House, they are the results of a campaign of fanaticism and ignorance carried on in Ontario and other English provinces and Quebec. Let us be frank about it; we have been abused so much by the Nationalists of Quebec and by their counterparts in Ontario and elsewhere, that we have become accustomed to it. At times, left to ourselves, we might have enjoyed the spectacle of a regular scrap between the two camps of our opponents if it had not been so sad, so unhuman, so depressing.

This measure has created a state of excitement amongst the people, and has given rise to all kinds of passions, religious, racial and political, which has spread to such an extent that some of the honourable members are asking themselves if we are not on the verge of civil war. We must admit that the people are excited, amazed and indignant over this unconstitutional measure, and want to have their say in the matter. Why not consult the people? The answer of my honourable friends who oppose the referendum is provoking and autocratic, unfair, unjust and insulting to the people of this country, because, they say, we know better than the people do. They say: We do not care for your opinion, we will send you to death without your consent, we are the masters of your destinies and we will pass this law against your will, or at all events without your consent. But what is the use of taking up the time of the House any longer. This measure will be enacted by the sheer force of the majority.

Before resuming my seat let me, en passant, take up the remark made by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark), in which he drew the comparison between the lion and the lamb. I wonder whether he intended to present an allegory, as a writer, Colonel Merrit, puts it:

> Both in war and in peace, so long as man is man, the weak will go to the wall and just as surely, so long as animal is animal, when the lion lies down with the lamb, it will only be when the lamb is inside the lion.

My hon. friend from Red Deer may feel assured that the lamb of Quebec will not lie down in this way, and it is better not to provoke that lamb too severely nowadays. The offender may find out that he has mixed up his animals, and that what he took for the lamb may prove to be the lion. He may have been a little bit mixed in his vision the other day.

Mr. DOHERTY: You might have indigestion.

Mr. WILSON: The Minister of Justice is very familiar with conditions in Quebec, and I think he is afraid of a bad meal when he goes back home. But what is the good of all that campaign of insult and slander? What benefit can be derived from it? In what way can the cause of the Allies, the cause of Canada, of Confederation, of union between the races in this country, be advanced by this pernicious and contemptible campaign? Has the Confederation of Canada to be cemented by blood, by a civil war? Are we to stain one more page of too many pages of our history already stained with the blood of our heroes and martyrs? Let us hope that the right hon. leader of the Government will pause, and in order to avoid greater calamities, will drop this Bill, or at least appeal to the people, restore peace and harmony, help the cause of the Allies, and avoid the calamities that were pointed out to this House by his former colleague who a few days ago tendered his resignation.

Mr. GUSTAVE BOYER (Vaudreuil) (translation): Mr. Speaker, I certainly could not find a better beginning for the protest I desire to register against the coercive measure which the Government wishes to force through the House without consulting the people, than by reading here a resolution adopted by all the mayors of my county, at a meeting held in Vaudreuil, the county town, on June 13 last.

As for me, I find in this resolution the whole subject matter of my speech.

Here is the resolution:

To the honourable Members of the House of Commons in Parliament assembled.

Extract from the proceedings of the municipal council of the county of Vaudreuil, adopted at its general session of the thirteenth of June, one thousand nine hundred and seventeen, literally takes as follows:

Moved by Counciller D. Bellemare, mayor of the parish of St. Lazare, seconded by Councillor Joseph E. Quesnel, mayor of the parish of Rigaud, and unanimously carried:

"Whereas the present Government no longer Minister of Canada, has just laid before the Canadian Parliament a Bill providing for military conscription for the overseas service;

"Whereas the present Government no longer hold a mandate from the people to pass such a Bill;

"Whereas this Bill is contrary to the Constitution which governs us, and to the country's traditions;

"Whereas we are governed by democratic institutions, and that the people should be consulted upon all important measures, with greater reason upon a measure which demands the blood and the gold of the nation;

"Be it resolved that this council strongly opposes the enactment of military conscription in this country before the consent of the majority of the people has been obtained by means of a referendum;

"And that a copy of the present resolution be sent to the House of Commons, to Sir Robert Borden and to Mr. Gustave Boyer, representative of the county in the House of Commons.

"And the petitioners shall always pray."

Given at Vaudreuil, this 16th of June, 1917.

True copy.

(Signed) J. N. Legault,
Asst.-Sec.-Treas.

This resolution was unanimously adopted by all the mayors of the county, not excepting a single one. Besides the two already mentioned in the resolution, were also present: Messrs. J. N. Lefebvre, county registrar and mayor of the village of Vaudreuil; Antoine Lalonde, of the parish of Vaudreuil; Azilda Daoust, of Ile Perrot; John McNaughton, of Como; Galt Brown, of Pointe Fortune; Ludger Cadieux, of St. Rédempteur; Emery Quesnel, of Ste. Marthe and James Berry, of Ste. Justine de Newton.

Two other municipalities have no representatives on the county council, on account of their having a city charter. I am speaking of Dorion and Rigaud, but, nevertheless, I may state that their mayors would have been of the same opinion as their colleagues, at least the first mentioned, in whose name I can officially speak. And what is most noticeable in this resolution, is its moderation. It is all fair play. It simply requests that the people be given an opportunity to be heard on a measure of such importance. Another fact which deserves consideration is that this county council has three English-speaking mayors who join in this petition.

Besides this protest coming from the most authorized body of my county, I laid before this House other petitions signed by several thousand people. Most of these petitions had been signed at the suggestion of the reeve of the county, and they call for either a referendum or a general election before this measure be adopted. Other petitions, from private parties, have also been sent to me and duly received, I have likewise laid them on the Table.

I may state, Mr. Speaker, that I was most happy to see such a general protest on the part of my constituents, for it encouraged me and confirmed me in the attitude I had decided to take, from the very moment this Bill was introduced.

The population of Vaudreuil county, Mr Speaker, is composed of peaceful people, law-abiding, fond of harmony and, above all, anxious to live on good terms with their English compatriots who cut quite a figure in the total population. And I would venture to assert that if all the English and French Canadians in the country could agree as they do in my constituency we never would have any knotty problem to solve.

How much, therefore, do I deplore the tone upon which the present debate is proceeding. The conscription issue has been completely set aside by some hon. members on the other side of the House, who saw fit to base their arguments upon racial grounds Truly, one might be led to believe that conscription is not a military question but rather a racial issue.

Mr. Speaker, this principle at stake does not appeal to me in such a light. To my mind, this measure is before Parliament just as all the other great questions have come before this House, but, because of its vital importance, it awakens a general interest throughout the country. On this question, the province of Quebec, among all the provinces, counts for one, no more no less, and I fail to see why some people are trying to have these proposals pivot solely around that province.

As I have just said, compulsory service is a matter of vital importance and it should not be considered from the several points of view of the two great races inhabiting this country, but rather from the standpoint of the whole nation from the Atlantic to the Pacific, according to their opinion of its citizens either for or against conscription. And I understand that the Liberals who are fighting this measure are not doing it to the aspirations of one race, but are voicing the anti-conscriptionist sentiment, as it is to be found in every one of the nine provinces of confederation. If the French Liberal members have stood in this House to defend the stand taken by their province, it is in reply to the provocations they have been subjected to by the Conservative members sitting on your right. And I would appeal to the hon. Prime Minister's sense of justice to check the vehement out-pourings of his partisans who, by their senseless appeals, are actually raising a rancour from which no good results can be expected.

These rumours of revolt which might arise, here and there, in the province of Quebec should cause no undue alarm, for I am honestly convinced that the only revolt that might likely break out in this country, would be between conscriptionists and anti-conscriptionists, to whatever race they may belong. And the riot which took place in Winnipeg not more than a few days ago, bears ample evidence.

I shall vote against the Military Service Bill for three reasons:

Firstly, because I have no confidence in the honesty or in the ability of the present Government;

Secondly, because this Parliament is presently sitting without any mandate but that of its own members, and therefore, has not, in the meaning of the constitution, any rightful existence;

Thirdly, because the establishment of compulsory service is an economic error and, adopted without the people's consent, would become an arbitrary act and a menace to confederation.

In order to make good my first argument, to wit.: that I have no confidence in the present Government, I will not lose any time in citing the long list of scandalous matters which have been charged against them, more particularly since the beginning of the war, although long previous to 1914, the Government had already made several vents in their coat of arms. Never did scandals arouse public opinion to such a degree as those connected with the supply of ammunition, equipment and all other war material. And what a pitiable defence have they not offered for every charge laid against the Government, or against some of its ministers.

The honest and independent public opinion of this country has long ago lost all confidence in the present Government. When I speak of the Government's incapacity, I am perfectly justified by what has unfortunately occurred: its unpardonable errors, its extravagant expenditure in the organization of the contingents. the grotesque and costly performances of its ex-Minister of Militia—its Napoleon the little, as Victor Hugo liked to nickname the last French emperor, who provoked the disaster of 1870—the exorbitant prices paid right and left for war supplies, the unrestrained squandering at the Valcartier camp; the quarrels of Camp Borden; the painful and condemnatory report made by Dr Bruce upon the Canadian hospital's service in England, and many other blunders the enumeration of which would by itself take up my whole time. However, the emergency is too great a one for me to exact today this rendering of accounts in connection with which the people of this country, willing or not must foot the bill. But, a matter about which the Government betrays its utter inefficiency and about which we have the right of demanding a severe and immediate accounting, is its criminal unconcern to protect the people against the vampires of every description, who are taking advantage of them and subjecting them to the horrors of the high cost of living. The poor people cannot maintain that equanimity for the morrow which may keep the millionaires who sit here as ministers or as members of the present Parliament. No. the working man, whether in the mills or on the land, to whom every other day brings trouble and uneasiness for his family and for himself, has to bear, during the terrible period we are now passing through, the adverse lot of hardships, the constant labour under the yoke, and the privations due to the lack of comfort, to the high cost of foodstuffs, of fuel, of clothing and of all the other necessaries of life.

The people who have been asked their generous and loyal contributions to this great war, the people who have answered so liberally, had at least the right to rely upon the Government's strong co-operation to be protected against the trusts of every description. I am therefore right when I charge the present Government with being unfit for the great task it had assumed, to wit.: to protect the labouring classes of this country. In the face of such facts, I am convinced that it would be unwise to let the Government venture into such a serious policy as that of adopting conscription without consulting the people, the sovereign dispenser.

My second argument is that we hold no lawful mandate and that we are sitting here solely on our own authority. In 1914, we passed an Act, the purport of which was to allow the Government to make a redistribution of the constituencies in the provinces, that is to say, to increase or reduce their numbers, according to their respective populations. From this fact, the representation of the House of Commons, from 221 as it is to-day will be increased to 235 at the next general election. That is to say that, since October 1916, these 14 new divisions are entitled to have a representative in this House. Under our Constitution a Parliament must never last more than five years. Now, the one elected in September, 1911, therefore ended in October, 1916.

Again, if things had been thus, that is to say, if the present Government had not believed itself indispensable to the preservation of the Empire in the first place, and to that of its political friends in the second place, we would have had elections in 1915 or 1916, and the population of this country would be now fully represented in this House. At the present date, although this Parliament has exceeded its term, of the 235 constituencies which should be represented, 23 are vacant through death or other causes of absence, and 14 are unrepresented; these being left here, as present members, to decide upon the important matter of conscription, only 198 members, when there should be 235.

In 1914, the war broke out. The Liberal party assented to a truce, in order not to hinder in any way the work of the Government who had decided to give its full co-operation. Although, at that time, the hon. Prime Minister had before his eyes the example of the British and French Governments, where the cabinets were reorganized by the joining in of the different party leaders until then opposed to one another, he saw nothing, and he never thought of asking the Liberal leaders to come into his government; a step which would have assured a more effective and a more honest participation.

In 1916, the Government asked for an extension of Parliament and it appears that, lest they should appear as being disloyal to the Empire, the Liberals had to give in. Jingoism had been so heated up that they had to consent. But it was clearly understood that the extended term which was to end in October, 1917, the Government should not bring about any coercive measure, such as conscription.

According to that agreement, this extension was unanimously voted by the House and ratified by the Imperial Government. What then has since happened that the Liberals' generosity and good faith should have been so grossly deceived? The hon. Prime Minister has declared on more than one occasion that he would not impose consciption. On January 17, 1916, especially, a month before the extension was granted, he spoke as follows in this very House:

> In speaking in the first two or three months of this war, I made it clear to the people of Canada that we did not propose any conscription, I repeat that announcement to-day with emphasis.

He also authorized his ministers to give the same promise. The hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) took advantage of it to pay his respects to the Archbishop of Montreal. The hon. Minister of Inland Revenue made all he could of it in his Dorchester election. The hon. Colonel the Postmaster General went so far as to indulge in puzzles about conscription; in substance, he stated to the timorous voters of that division:

> You need not fear conscription; in any case, should it ever be imposed upon you, you have only to cross the line.

Now then, what happened, that conscription should to-day become an order of the day and that the Prime Minister should mean to impose it upon the country in such a peremptory fashion, in spite of the agreement made, in spite of his own declarations, of his ministers' declarations, and at the cost even of an unlawful act to be committed by a lapsed parliament?

Would it be that, during his last journey to London, it had been demonstrated to the Prime Minister that there was an urgent call for soldiers? Well, not so, if I can judge from the following official statement:

London, June 21.—The Canadian Associated Press is authorized to say that the attention of Honorable Walter Long, colonial secretry, having been called to a suggestion in newspaper despatches that Sir Robert Borden had proposed conscription in Canada because he was urged to do so in the Imperial War Cabinet, he states there is not the smallest foundation for the suggestion that Premier Borden was urged to introduce conscription either in the Imperial War Cabinet or the conference. The matter was never even mentioned and the last thing the members of the home government would do is to interfere in the matter which is entirely one for Canada. Mr. Long further adds he saw Sir Robert Borden frequently up to the last day he was here and had no idea when he left he was going to propose the introduction of conscription on his return to Canada.

The hon. member for Wright (Mr. Devlin) stated, the other day, in this House—and he must be well informed—that England had 3,000,000 soldiers on the reserve forces, and that the same country had 1,500,000 young men not yet enlisted. Quite recently, the Prime Minister asked the leader of the Opposition to join him in forming a coalition cabinet. It was somewhat late, indeed, as the war had been declared for over two years and a half. At all events, the first condition laid down by the leader of the Opposition was the withdrawal of the conscription Bill. This condition sine qua non could not satisfy the Prime Minister who, on the contrary, wanted the Opposition leader's co-operation to cloak his act. Now, if the Liberal party can be upbraided for having consented to that extension of Parliament, these facts should exonerate it. As I said a moment ago, Parliament should have been prorogued in October 1916, it has been extended for one year, that is until the month of October, 1917. Therefore, this prolongation term expires four months hence, when we should have general elections. But they are now already speaking of a further extension, for salvation, as far as the Canadian jingoes can see it, depends exclusively on the maintenance of the present Government in permanent power. No, really, did we not know the ravenous appetite of the Tories in this country, we would be led to believe that the present executive has a providential mission. Other British colonies have had their elections, New Zealand and Australia. Each and everyone of the provinces of this country have had their own. The Conservative party have felt their bitter result, and even not later than this very week, the results in Saskatchewan have disagreeably tinkled in their ears. And, nevertheless, the war did not fare any worse. Oh no, there is only Canada, wherein all the democratic institutions which govern us must be broken, in order to, and against the will of the people who is the sovereign arbiter, establish stringent laws which are reproved by the very large majority.

I find it strange that it should be contended by some people that the Liberals strongly criticise the Government's conduct for the simple pleasure of worrying them or of running them down and putting them out of power. But, should the Opposition be blamed for having been vigilant? On every occasion, we have denounced the scandals, as it was our duty so to do, and it was only with difficulty that the Prime Minister condescended to give sham investigations, and the guilty parties have never been troubled. All those monopolizers enjoy immunity, always under the pretense of patriotism. But why not put it the other way? That we find it strange that a Government without any mandate from the people should thus cling to power. In our country, it is war that makes the Government to hold fast; in other countries, war causes them to change as often as circumstances warrant it.

If the Liberals exact due respect for the constitution, what is there so strange in that? In all these tactics on the part of the Conservatives, it strikes me that it is not the interest they have for the Empire that inspires their action. That is only the pretext. The reason, the only true one, is that they are afraid of facing public opinion with such a disreputable record.

We are in this country ruled by a democratic government, that is to say that everything in this government is amenable to the people itself. the representatives are directly responsible to the people, and nothing can be done without the latter's approval. And that is why the parliamentary term has been limited to five years, after which the members are obliged to go before their constituents and give an account of their trust to their constituents, who are the supreme arbiters; the latter either approve or disapprove the past conduct or the future plans of their representatives.

Therefore, every enactment of vital importance to the people should be passed upon by the people itself, just as the Liberals have done it for the Naval Service question and for reciprocity. Neither the Government nor Parliament have the right to adopt a measure setting the country towards an unknown destination, containing in itself extremely serious consequences, not only for the national unity,—I mean the good understanding between the two great races who live in this country and which was referred to in many a speech—but especially for the very preservation of the people's welfare. The people, in my opinion, under these circumstances, have more than any one else, the right to say if they will consent to venture into the prosecution of a policy which may lead to bankruptcy, not only the country, generally speaking, but would also infallibly fall upon the property of every inhabitant respectively.

I have heard the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers) also the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen), in their speeches, deny to a certain extent the sovereignty of the people, and insinuate that the latter should be governed, even contrary to its own opinion, according to circumstances, or if the Government should see fit to do it. It is undoubtedly this same trend of opinion which caused the two hon. members for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) and of West Lambton (Mr. Pardee), who seceded from their party upon the referendum amendment and prefer supporting the conscription Bill, to state that, if the conscription issue was submitted to the people, the latter's verdict would go against its enactment.

Such an admission on the part of several hon. members leaves us in a state of perplexity. They are then disposed to make a most serious infringement to the constitution which governs us, and once entered upon that path, it will not take many years before we have in this country an autocratic government which will care for the people only pro forma. The latter will have no more prorogatives in the affairs of State, except of paying the expenditure and assuming whatever responsibilities may follow, be they good or bad.

Why extol so much the beauties of democracy, that is to say the government of the people by the people, if, upon a question of life or death as this one, it is even refused the right to give its opinion.

In this very House, I heard not long ago two distinguished men speaking to us. One represented France, the other, Great Britain. Both of them displayed before us, in most eloquent and wonderful terms the beauty of democracy, symbol of most absolute liberty for every people. Democracy, were we told, is the safest guarantee for the preservation of civilization, it is the doctrine of equality; but what! it is through it that is manifested the people's will which must ever and everywhere be sovereign!

Mr. Viviani lives in a chivalerous country whose history is resplendent with heroic deeds. For many years past, in the statutes of that country there exists the obligation for all, rich and poor, aristocrats or common labourer, to rush to arms whenever the country is in danger. In the ranks of their armies, there is no caste, no privileged class, all are equal.

In England, the law did not oblige any one to take up arms, it is true, in case of war, for confident in her fleet which ensured her the supremacy of the seas and having, on the other hand, only a very restricted territory to defend, that country, as I say, did not foresee so terrific a conflict as the one which stains with the blood of millions now the European continent, and which would one day compel her to send to the battle front millions of her soldiers.

Now, in these two countries, France and England, what did happen since the declaration of war? From the very beginning the different parties hushed their combative spirit in order to have but one thing in view: the country's preservation. All efforts were directed towards a common end, that of victory, and for that purpose, the world has seen united in one same government the leaders of all factions who had till then been opposed to one another. In France, the adversaries of yore were now fast friends; all had hereafter one sole ambition, that of winning, of driving back the Teutonic invasion, which forty five years of active preparations had made, not only threatening, but terrific.

And not withstanding this first concentration of the moral forces of the nation's leaders, several ministries have succeeded one another. In France, they have changed their government as often as circumstances, always rapidly varying in this war, demanded it. And what a fine example of disinterestedness and of patriotism! Those holding power to-day would become on the morrow simple co-operators; leaving to others, without spite or resentment, the authority until then vested in them, knowing that France's destinies demanded those personal sacrifices.

In England also, we find similar instances of sublime patriotism on the part of the Liberal government. At the very outset, Mr. Asquith invited Mr. Bonar Law, the leader of the Opposition, and his followers, to form a National government. Later, Mr. Asquith himself resigned to make room for Mr. Lloyd George.

On the sea, England was formidable. Unfortunately, her land army was not equal to the gigantic struggle just starting. She realized that fact immediately. And then, how admirable is that enormous effort, which she has been keeping up for close on to three years, in organizing and sending to the front these legions which have not only helped France to check the Teuton hordes but that have also victoriously driven back the foe in battles which will remain memorable.

At the outbreak of hostilities, England had no compulsory service, and conscious of the fact that she would soon need a considerable army and that she must first rely upon her own forces, she decided to establish it. But what I admire in her, in spite of the danger which was menacing her on all sides, is that she only resorted to this extremity after having exhausted every possible means of volunteering, and when, finally, she found it necessary to impose compulsory service, the people had already received an education consistent with its duties. And even her conscriptive law exempts Ireland from the compulsory service and it contains no death penalty against the refractory ones.

So much for these two great nations, among those who are engaged in the dreadful struggle of bloodshed, of mourning, of tears and of irreparable disasters! For them it was the supreme hour: the result of the battle depended upon their resistance and the heads of these nations, firmly supported by their respective people, undertook it immediately; so that patriotism on the one hand was equalled only by heroism on the other. The service was not only compulsory, it was imperious; that is clear and we have for both these nations the greatest admiration. These nations were compelled to war, they were personally concerned and they had to take every measure to avoid being crushed.

Although Canada's obligations and degree of participation in this war cannot be compared with the obligations and with the duty of the allied countries, on their own account, I am still asking myself why the hon. Prime Minister has not, at the very beginning of the war, followed such a fine example of disinterestedness as that I have just cited. Why did he not bring together the moral forces of the nation? Why did he not secure in that solemn hour, the wholehearted co-operation of the party leaders?

[M. Boyer.]

No; on the contrary, his policy has remained a party policy, a near-sighted policy, a policy of patronage which could only, sooner or later, produce the sad plight of the present hour. We certainly would not be to-day reduced to the point of wishing to impose this brutal measure of conscription if all efforts had been directed from the start towards securing a common object and directed in peace and harmony.

In support of my third argument, Mr. Speaker, I will say that, beside the Government's evident inefficiency ever since war began, its inability to reduce the cost of living, besides the numerous scandals which overburden it, there is, Mr. Speaker, another question which in importance surpasses all others and which we should seriously consider: That is the economic question.

The hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen) may declare as often as he pleases, "that Canada will be put into bankruptcy, if it is necessary"—and, the hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Cochrane) may repeat what he stated in the House the other day, "that he would send overseas all our rails to the last one, if need be" these are not yet accomplished facts, and I do hope that, before long, the people will have something to say upon the more than hazardous dispositions of these ministers and of their Government, the apparent inspirer of their statements.

I know that this question causes a great deal of uneasiness among financiers, I do not refer to those who because panic-stricken when the proposal to enact conscription of wealth was discussed in the House; but to those who do not accumulate riches to the detriment of others.

Recently, I read in the Financial Post, a paper published in Toronto, in its edition of May 26, 1917, the following item:

> Canada's national debt, at the present hour, is approaching $2,000,000,000, before the war ends, it will probably reach $3,000,000,000.
>
> A pretty big sum for seven and a half million people to owe.
>
> It means that every business man, every farmer, every mechanic will have to pay, for interest, for current expenses and towards paying off a little of the sinking fund, between four and five hundred dollars each year.
>
> It is an appalling outlook.

According to the Tablet, an English paper, the countries hereunder mentioned spend monthly the following amounts:

Great Britain	$250,000,000
France	125,000,000
Italy	50,000,000

which would give Great Britain, with her 45,000,000 inhabitants, $5.55 per capita monthly, or $66.60 per annum.

France, with her 40,000,000, $3 12 per capita, or $37.44 per annum.

Italy, with her 35,000,000, $1.43 per capita, or $17.16 per annum.

And Canada, with her 7,200,000, $4.17 per capita monthly, or $50.04 per year, per capita, counting men, women and children, if it is true that we are spending $1,000,000 a day. Therefore, Canada spends, per capita, only $16.50 less than Great Britain, and $12.10 per capita more than France, and $32.88 more than Italy.

In these figures, it should be taken into consideration that these three countries pay very little to their soldiers, but that does not in any way diminish what Canada has to pay.

Is it not again the hon. Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) who said here, in this House, that the United States' effort, in order to equal that made up to date by Canada—would require from them an expenditure of $67,000,000,000 and the organizing of an army of 5,740,000 men?

Now, let us for a moment consider our financial situation. In 1911, when the present government came into power, our debt amounted to $336,000,000. In his budget speech, the hon. the Minister of Finance informs us:

> That it now exceeds $900,000,000, an amount which our official statements will not, however, establish before a few months hence, and that our national debt might well reach $1,200,000,000.

The hon. minister informs us that all the expenditure incurred on account of the war, will constitute a special debt, called the war debt, which will be reimbursed several years after the restoration of peace. Now, what will be the amount of the annual interests on this loan and what resources will we have to meet this interest, besides, naturally, our ordinary administration expenses, urgent works and others, without forgetting the interest on the $336,000,000 debt, which existed before the war?

The hon. minister has told us that the total revenue, for the last fiscal year, ending March last, has been $232,000,000, accruing from three principal sources, as follows: customs, $134,000,000; excise, $24,000,000, and war taxes, $12,500,000.

Last year's current expenses amounted to $172,000,000, leaving a surplus of $60,000,000 which have been paid to the war capital account. From all this, we must conclude that, after the war, our debt will be between $1,300,000,000 and $1,500,000,000 upon which we shall pay interest, and besides, from $25,000,000 to $30,000,000 for pensions, which will represent, at the minimum, an annual sum of $100,000,000 and, of course, besides the expense for general administration and public works generally. If, in the course of the last fiscal year, our ordinary expenditure has alone figured for $172,000,000, let us admit they will remain at the same figure for a long time; with the war interests, our general expenditure to be met would amount to almost $300,000,000 per annum.

What will we have in order to face such a large annual budget? The hon. Minister of Finance does truly tell us that the revenue for the last fiscal year amounted to $232,000,000, which would still leave a difference of nearly $70,000,000 to cover by some kind of taxation; but, we should not lose sight of the fact that this $232,000,000 revenue is made up of temporary assets, the outcome of the war, thus the $134,000,000 of customs's receipts and the $24,000,000 of excise are largely attributable to duties upon raw material imported from abroad, to be used in the manufacturing of ammunition. When, after the war, those imports will no more be made, the revenue will be largely decreased and, consequently, the difference to be covered in our annual revenue will be far larger. It will not be only $70,000,000, but almost $100,000,000 which will have to be levied upon the people outside of the ordinary taxes and duties. Last year, the war tax brought $12,500,000 to the Government, after the Minister of Finance's own testimony. Well, let us imagine the prodigious leap it will have to make when, after the war, the country will have to meet the interest upon the war debt and the pensions. Will it be able to do it without resorting to direct taxation? I am afraid not. The figures I am now giving can only increase, instead of being reduced, for in this appropriation I do not count the amount we shall have to pay for all sorts of ammunition. The hon. Minister of Finance stated in this House, at the end of the last session, that, at present, England was paying for the ammunition supplied to the Canadian soldiers, but that, after the war, there would be a settlement and we would be obliged to pay about one-thirteenth of the amount spent by England for the purchase of ammunition. Therefore, for every thirteen million which England spends in munitions, we shall be called upon to pay one million. You will agree with me that this item will form an enormous amount, especially when you will consider that the Imperial government for munition purchases is spending by the hundreds of millions.

In 1911, under the late Administration, when Canada was in its period of progress, we expended $87,774,000 and our revenue exceeded that expenditure by several millions, which we employed in meeting the interest charges on our capital debt. Future has therefore in stock for us some hard problems to solve. Our export trade amounts to $2,000,000,000. At first sight, we might be led to believe that such an enormous figure should bring a large revenue to the Government, but that is a mistake. The clearest profit of all that trade and of all that commerce goes directly to the manufacturers and, above all, to the war contract manipulators. The profits accumulated by the munition manufacturers are exorbitant. Fortunes have been created and many an individual, who was a poor man yesterday, is to-day a millionaire. As soon as war is over, this fictitious trade will largely fall. Ask the working men of any description, who have toiled and are still toiling in the factories, how much, at the end of each week with the high cost of living, they can save? After the war, the working men will be out of work, they may probably suffer privation verging on to famine, while their employer of yesterday will strut amid the gold which war industries have brought to his door. What should be done that we might usefully take part in the war? The Allies cry for food and munitions, for munitions and food. That is what we need, do they say. The English and French commissions have come to the United States, arrangements have been made, and that country has advanced them at once several thousand millions of dollars, but not in currency, only in food and ammunition.

Is it by imposing conscription that we can better fill their wishes?

In Canada, this Government and all the provincial governments have advocated and commended agricultural overproduction, the country places have been flooded with agricultural bulletins and pamphlets, in short, a most active campaign was everywhere inaugurated on those lines. The result up to date has not been a marvellous one. Will it be so to-morrow? Some doubt may be entertained when it is known that farmers are everywhere short of hands, for, from the beginning of the war, the farmers' boys, in large numbers, have gone to the cities where they were attracted by the high wages paid in the munition shops. Here they took the places of the working men and of the other labourers who had enlisted, in the first days of the war, to escape starvation which was then threatening the country. Indeed, we recall those armies of unemployed who made public demonstrations and cried for work. During the following year, the old shops, and new shops were opened everywhere to manufacture munitions, and they have all been filled, half, if not three-quarters of them, by men from the country places.

The official reports from the various provinces of the Dominion show that the lack of farm labour is already and everywhere giving rise to serious anxieties.

I now borrow from the Avenir du Nord a compilation of opinions given by the leaders of the agricultural movement.

Mr. Arthur S. Barnstead, secretary of the Industrial and Immigration department of Nova Scotia, writes in the Gazette Agricole du Canada:

> The labour problem will evidently be a most difficult one to solve in Nova Scotia, this year. We have until now depended for our labour upon the emigrating farmers who would come here from Great Britain. Not only is this resource gone, but thousands of our young farmers are to-day overseas on active military service. The situation is far from cheerful.

Mr. W. A. Riddell, superintendent of trade and labour, in the Public Works department, of the province of Ontario, writes as follows:

> Scarcity of help in Ontario is being felt just as much as in the other provinces. We have evidence of this in the following statement:
>
> We could employ five hundred farm labourers in our locality, writes a mayor to us. The same mail contained a letter asking for a farm boy and stating: We could employ a whole load of young men in this neighbourhood.
>
> We have five agents at work in the United States, soliciting men to come and work in Canada. The kind of help that can at present be secured in the United States for farm labour, is somewhat poor in quality.

Mr. F. Auld, Deputy Minister of Agriculture in the province of Saskatchewan, writes:

> Our agricultural production will be limited, this year, on account of the scarcity of labour, and that is why we have decided to make a special effort in order to recruit all the old farmers and all the old farm hands, to help to get in the harvest.

Special agricultural agents of this province are just now in the United States.

Mr. H. A. Craig, Deputy Minister of Agriculture in the province of Alberta, writes in his turn:

Last winter, all those interested in the question of crop production have expressed some anxiety on account of the evident labour scarcity. The number of young men employed on farms is far inferior to what we could employ, for a very large number of young men of Alberta have enlisted for overseas service.

Mr. Wm. E. Scott, Deputy Minister of Agriculture, in British Columbia, writes as follows:

But the labour question is the greatest difficulty; it is the obstacle which for the time being prevents the increase in production. The farmer perfectly understands that it is his patriotic duty to do all he can in order to increase the food supply; he would do it, if he could get the necessary labour. It is, at this very time, a most distressing question in British Columbia and its solution is very hard to find.

We cannot expect much aid from the United States, because they are suffering from conditions similar to our own, and the farm labour is just as scarce.

It must not be forgotten that nearly 35,000 men have left the province for overseas service, since war began.

Hon. Martin Burrell, Minister of Agriculture, reminds his fellow-citizens of the importance of intensive culture, and then he adds:

Looking towards the gloomy days which may bring this third year of the war, the hardest one yet, we realize more and more the vital importance of the food factor in the final outcome. The Government urges farmers to hold on, a matter of increasing difficulty; I do so, not in view of the rise in the prices which will undoubtedly affect every commodity, but because of the precious and most special assistance which Canadian agriculture can extend to the Empire at this critical hour.

The hon. member for Calgary (Mr. Bennett), director of the National Service, stated on February 28, that:

In all probability, the lack of foodstuffs will be felt still more keenly before the next harvest in Great Britain, in France and in Italy, and as, of all the Dominions, Canada is the less distant from those countries, the latter are naturally looking to us; they see in us their first source of supply.

The lack of labourers, did he add, is the main difficulty in the way for realizing these objects and we intend making extraordinary efforts to find the proper remedy.

And this paper most sensibly concludes:

Is that the means to accomplish this end, by carrying on an exaggerated military mobilization, and by even imposing it though conscription?

Our agricultural start, far from being accelerated, has slackened since the war began. From 1910 to 1911, in one year, the number of sowed acres in the West had increased by 3,500,000; from 1912 to 1916, in four years, the increase has been only of 1,500,000.

And it is in the face of such a serious declaration, Mr. Speaker, in spite of this general state of uneasiness, stated and proved by all the provinces of the Dominion, that the Government wants to impose compulsory service, that is to say, to further drain our already reduced population, to increase the difficulties created by the lack of manual labour, and to imperil our agricultural production which is of vital importance for us, for the Empire and for the Allies.

Canada's foremost duty, to-day even more than in the past, is to increase her agricultural production, in order to provide for the victualling of the Empire and of the other allied nations whom the situation created by the war threatens with actual famine.

Let us increase our agricultural production. That is what we are called upon to do from all sides.

More than ever, in the face of present events, of the urgent calls for agricultural overproduction and of the statements of the competent men I have just quoted, I believe that the Government should let the working men remain in the cities and the tillers on their farms.

Canada has made a noble effort up to date, the part she has played is an admirable one, and for the future she should confine herself to produce and still produce.

It must also be considered that, if such a marked depopulating of our rural districts keeps going on, either for the army or for the city munition shops, it will be calculated to wholly upset our economic fabric, and expose us to incurable ills, not for ourselves alone, but also for the Allies who are clamoring for food. Where and how are we going to get it for them, if recruiting be continued with such energy, and especially if it be made compulsory, for there is no middle course possible, if you drain the shops, the labour market, the city stores; the next day, it will be the country places that will be requisitioned for men to fill the gaps.

And I could not conclude this argument in a better way than by quoting the testimony of a man who should be considered as an authority in keeping with the high position he occupies:

Making use of the man power.

The question is rather one of organization than of recruiting without measure.

Under this heading, Mr. Henry Pate, deputy and secretary of the army commission in the French Parliament, wrote, in January last, in the Paris Journal an article from which we quote the following lines which should be read and pondered over: "There is, in every effort, what one sees, for instance the keys of the finger board, and there is what one cannot see, the mechanism. What would be, without the mechanism that commands, the war which our foes compel us to wage? Let us make up our minds to grasp the problem. Understanding the war does not consist in considering the war under its simpler aspect, recruiting exceedingly large numbers of men at the risk of imperilling the very bases of any prolonged action. Neither does it consist in adopting measures which are practically fruitless from the military point of view and which are of such a nature as to deeply perturb manufacturing and economic production."

It is intended to impose conscription; why so? It is to overcome a spreading uneasiness, to repair a failure in recruiting, or to show an untimely and inconsiderate zeal.

But before going to such an extremity, would it not be of common discretion to wisely consider if we have not, until now, participated in this war to a reasonable extent, and in proportion to our population and to the wealth of our country?

There are eyes who will not see and ears who will not hear. From their talk, one would take it that the aid given by Canada to England amounts to naught. Let us review the facts for a moment: the effort made and the aid given by our country during this war is something to be wondered at. Since the declaration of war, Canada has nobly done her duty, as compared to her population and her wealth. An army numbering 420,000 men of all ranks has been enlisted; 125,000 are already at the front, while 126,000 are in reserve in England. According to a report submitted by the Minister of Militia, 100,000 soldiers have already fallen on the field of honour, either killed, wounded or made prisoners. A large number, still in Canada, are only awaiting the order to embark.

All honour to the heroes who face the foe's fire! They have shed their blood upon the plains of Flanders, at Langemarck, at Saint Julien, at Courcelette, at Vimy. Thousands of them have fallen heroically, engraving, in immortal letters on the tablets of history, the name of our country. Let us do homage to our braves whose valiance was great, as great as the magnitude of the task they had undertaken, for it was voluntarily that they rallied to the British flag.

Besides all this, Canada who, before the war, had a debt of $336,000,000, will soon have one of $1,300,000,000. Add to this also, the high cost of living, in this country, which is putting every family in narrow circumstances.

Well now, in the face of this admirable participation of our country heretofore, who could take us to task for failing to do our duty? Great Britain is certainly not complaining. Then, why should the Prime Minister of this country resort to this extreme and arbitrary measure, when the most interested country, Great Britain, has not even requested him to do so? Why so much haste in rushing the country into troubles which can entail nothing but evil, if the country itself do not so decree it after an appeal to the people?

And I do repeat it; if, from the very beginning of the war, the Prime Minister had appealed to the Liberals and formed a national government, our effort would certainly have been more successful and at no greater expense. And we would not to-day have to resort to conscription.

Now, what is really this compulsory service bill? The Government, by this Bill, is cajoling more than one class of society, and one has only to belong to them, as all and everyone of them would be exempted from the draft. The exemption clause is so wide that it may cover all cases; for it does not specifically state what classes, what callings shall be exempted; it does not mention the farmer's son any more than the workman employed in the munition shops. It simply states that: "a tribunal may decide whether it is expedient, in the national interest, that such or such a man, then appealing to it, should instead of being employed in military service, be engaged in other work in which he is habitually engaged." And in section 12 of the present Act, the Government reserves the right to make regulations to secure the full, effective and expeditious operation and enforcement of this Act.

We have indeed been told in the House, that the farmer's sons would be exempted, but up to what number, two, three, four, we do not know; that is in the tribunal's discretion. And the munition workers and others who will be dismissed from the shops just before enlistment opens, will they have ceased to be useful to the national interest, on account of the arbitrary measure taken against them? These are so many open questions. But, at all events, the law shall be the same for all. As soon as the order will have been given to apply it, all those whom it concerns, class after class, according to their age and condition, will be automatically enlisted. If they wish to be exempted, they may afterwards appeal to the said tribunal.

And another point upon which I would like to call the attention of the House, is that the Bill does not specify that the Government may enlist only 100,000 men. As the Bill is framed, the Government may go up to the age limit of enlistable men. If certain fanatics were to be believed, the province of Quebec were the only province opposing compulsory service. Well, that is not proven; only a referendum could bring out the facts. Moreover, the inhabitants of that province are charged with every crime and overloaded with every hardship; they are called disloyal and pro-Germans, and some hot-headed people, who have evidently more belly than brains, such as the editors of the Orange Sentinel and the Toronto News and notable chieftains of the Orange order, threaten us with all kinds of dire punishment. Fortunately, the sound and enlightened majority of our population know how matters stand; they are well aware that this persecution is stirred up by a boisterous minority and do not hold responsible for it the bulk of the English Canadian. And as the latter, indeed, judge the French Canadians in another light than that in which their agitating compatriots hold our race, they likewise understand that the acts of the agitators in our own midst are not chargeable to the mass of the French Canadians. It is a well known fact that opposition to conscription has been manifested from Vancouver to Halifax. Have not the English labour associations declared themselves unanimously against the measure? Upon this question of intensive recruiting, was it not Lord Shaughnessy, president of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, who, on March 12, 1916, made before the Montreal Board of Trade a statement somewhat as follows: Canada has performed wonders, but I cannot believe that the proposal that we raise 500,000 men, is either practical or possible. We have so many things to attend to, munitions to manufacture, lands to till, we are asked to help in feeding the British nation, and lastly, we have our financial problem to solve. By sending over 500,000 men from Canada, we would make among the labouring people of this country a gap which might bring most serious results.

And yet I believe this eminent citizen, is indeed a political friend of the Government The Government intends to enforce compulsory military service, Mr. Speaker, and seek elsewhere the required labour; it is spending several thousand dollars advertising in the American newspapers for farm hands to fill the places of those who are gone. What said the working men of Canada at their convention in Ottawa, on June 11, 1917?

For an efficient participation in the war, it is not compulsory service we need, and we are positively of the opinion that:

> The necessities for the effective conduct of the war are: Food, munitions, shipping and military man power, and Canada is geographically well situated to supply the first named three essentials and can do much to assist in winning the war by developing her production of these essentials to her fullest extent.
> We are strongly of the opinion that this is the best service that Canada, with her small population, can render. We declare ourselves as most emphatically opposed to the proposed conscription measure, and we urge the workers of Canada to oppose by every means in their power enactment of such legislation.

When this Bill was announced by the Prime Minister, anti-conscriptionist demonstrations took place in Montreal. Such a course was most likely in a city of 700,000 souls, where the labouring masses are numerous, where meetings of thousands of men can be called like a train of gunpowder. It is easy to understand that, in such populous centres, there should have been scuffles, even disorders, but in the country-places of the province of Quebec, everything ran its usual peaceful course; the farmers have simply voiced their protests, through their municipal councils or by petitions.

But what is there so abnormal, so anti-patriotic, in these protests against an unpopular measure? Were not similar meetings held even in the city of Toronto, the hotbed of the purest jingoism? It is true that in this luminary-city of Canada, the principle of free speech was scorned and the soldiery did brutally break up the peaceful meeting which the common people intended to hold. In Guelph, the same thing happened, and the English citizens, who boast of their freedom in this country of Canada, were very roughly handled, by the soldiery again. In Winnipeg and in Vancouver, likewise, popular meetings of honest citizens, of the common people, of the men who sweat and toil to earn their living, have had a similar fate.

Truly, what a fine civilization is that preached by a Canadian government who, to defend a democratic principle in Flanders, or to have the citizens of this country appreciate the full beauty of free opinion, of free conscience and of civilization, would be ready to have their own fellow-citizens massacred right now. Therefore, it is not only in Montreal that consciences are revolting against the conscription Bill. From every part of Canada protests are coming, from Englishmen, from Scotsmen, from Irishmen, as well as from the French Canadians. But the yellow sheets of Ontario take good care to close their eyes to what is going on everywhere else, to fill their columns with filth only against the province of Quebec. Their object is most apparent, for, to have conscription passed, they think it necessary to overheat their fellowmen's patriotism by giving vent to an unwholesome hatred against the French element of this country. But, fortunately, the fair and honest element of our English compatriots are not disposed that way and they let every one bear his own duties and responsibilities. In that also do we trust.

But was it not in Calgary that, at a public meeting, they sang "God save the people" instead of "God save the King"?

If all the hon. members whom I have heard speaking in favour of compulsory service, since the opening of this debate, should likewise be within the scope of this Act and were, like all those it may reach, obliged to put on the uniform and go to the front, I am wondering if they would have spoken with the same fervour and enthusiasm. It is all very well for them to allege age, function or any of the causes of exemption included in this Bill; but it seems to me their loyalty would show itself in a much better light, if they gave the best proof of its sincerity, by enlisting. They should follow the example of Kerensky who has bravely put himself at the head of the Russian troops, for in the rear of the firing-lines there are positions to be filled by men of forty-five years of age and over, by members of the learned professions as well as by mechanics, by millionaires as well as by paupers.

And should these hon. gentlemen, who endeavour to increase by compulsion the contingents already sent to Europe give evidence of all the eagerness and the courage to do the duty they preach to others, I am satisfied that the example, set from so high, would induce thousands of other brave men to do the same. And I might add that such an example of disinterestedness would find an echo even in those who just now deny them the right to impose this coercive measure.

These remarks are addressed not only to the conscriptionist members of this House, but also to the advocates of this compulsory measure outside of these premises, who are preaching the fulfilment of a duty they are beforehand assured of being rid. In other words, they are conscriptionists less for themselves than for others.

I shall vote against the amendment to the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Berthier (Mr. Barrette). A six months hoist would not settle the question; it would only suspend for that space of time the anguish of the country, that is all, while a referendum or a general election would settle the question once for all. If the majority of the voters of this country declare themselves against conscription, the over-excited minds will revert to order and the country will resume with more fervor the work of efficiently assisting the Allies. If, on the contrary, the majority of the electors should vote for conscription, there will be only one course to take, that of bravely submitting.

For us, French Canadians, our sentiments are vastly different from theirs, for we have no particular attachment to France or to England. For France, we still return the remembrance of far away associations; we above all have much admiration for her. It is France herself, with her conception of beauty, with her literature, her arts, her science and her democracy that we love.

To England, we owe loyalty for the granting of the liberties we enjoy, and which permit us to live so peacefully in our homes, —for we cannot hold her responsible for our domestic quarrels embittered through the fanaticism of certain people of this country. But, our English and our Scottish compatriots in the Dominion, have more than a kindly feeling and remembrance for England; she is doubly their mother-country.

The Englishman, the Scotsman, who have emigrated at the time of the conquest have come to settle in a country which had become their own. The British flag which, upon the citadel of Quebec, took the place of the Fleur-de-lis, has never since ceased to shield them.

Our ancestors who took the oath of allegiance, and centuries have caused us to forget later on, the one who had abandoned us, without ever remembering us. Now, English immigration, begun at the start, has always been continued uninterruptedly since then, and that is why we should not wonder nor blame our English fellow citizens for that loyalty which draws them towards the country of their origin, neither should we hurt their heart feelings. However, while admiring in our neighbours that patriotism which arms them in defence of the land of their origin, and the greatness of the cause which inspires them, I am asking myself how it is that so many of them have not yet understood that we also, the French Canadians, we likewise feed upon an ideal of patriotism for everything pertaining to our race. The soul of our English fellow-citizen enthuses at the thought of the mother country; no one thinks of denying them that noble feeling; but they should at the same time realize that the preservation of a language by a people is likewise entitled to great respect. The Canadian of French origin has but one country, Canada, while the English, the Scottish, the Irish Canadian have each two countries. That is why, upon a question of such importance as that of compulsory service, the best means to take not to bring these elements to clash, is indeed that of a referendum, and I shall vote for it. The British Crown, in granting to the French Canadians the privileges which duly enjoys every British subject, did consequently guarantee them all the rights which this quality confers in its most absolute meaning. And is that what is happening? I say no, and that, most of the time, they have to be satisfied with what the majority feels like relinquishing to them. Whilst, in the province of Quebec, where the English are the minority, the latter enjoy under the provincial government the greatest liberty in the organization of their educational system, in the other provinces, where the French Canadians are in a minority, they only enjoy a few concessions. If the latter claim what they believe to be fair and just, if their compatriots of the province of Quebec take their part, they are accused of disloyalty and of rebellion.

Anyone who judges matters dispassionately and impartially must admit that these continuous discussions and this ostracism of the French language, in the schools of certain provinces, have only created bitterness between the two great races who divide the country between themselves.

No one admires more than I do the patriotism of our English compatriots who long for Great Britain's triumph, but how much I do wish also that they too could understand the respect they should likewise profess for a whole people who want to preserve their language.

In 1867, a solemn compact was made by the two nations, English and French. That contract stipulated to each its privileges and its obligations. Nothing is more sacred that the pledged word and more official than the magna charta of Confederation. Why does one of the contracting parties to this memorable document now wish, in defiance of honour and of its solemn promise, pass over and consider the Confederation Act, which guarantees the equality of the French race in this country, "as a mere scrap of paper." Is it that we are here living in Germany? Should the sons of those who have signed and approved the Act of 1867 be less honourable and less conciliating than their fathers? The latter have made a compact, which their sons should in honour respect, and in so doing, peace and harmony would be restored in this country. And then the two great races inhabiting it, uniting their common efforts, would in mutual love and respect, work out their destinies.

On motion of Mr. Kyte the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Doherty for the adjournment of the House:

Mr. GRAHAM: I suppose we shall have the report to-morrow of the special committee, with reference to the amendment to the amendment moved by Mr. Barrette.

Mr. BURRELL: The report has been made to the Speaker.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 11.50 p.m.

Wednesday, July 4, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

MILITARY SERVICE ACT, 1917.

REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE NAMED TO CONSIDER CORRECTNESS OF AN ENTRY IN THE VOTES AND PROCEEDINGS.

Mr. W. B. NORTHRUP (East Hastings) presented the report of the Special Committee named to consider correctness of an entry in the Votes and Proceedings, as follows:

Your committee beg to report that they have had certain witnesses before them, to wit: His Honour the Speaker, Dr. T. B. Flint, Clerk of the House, Mr. Arthur Beauchesne, Assistant Clerk of the House, and Mr. R. P. King, Chief Clerk of Votes and Proceedings, and find as follows:—

That the proposed amendment to the amendment submitted by the hon. member for Berthier (Mr. Barrette) was written both in French and English, the French version being as follows:

Que tous les mots du dit amendment après le mot "suivants" soient retranchés et remplacês par ce qui suit: "Ce Bill ne soit pas maintenant lu une deuxième fois, mais qu'il soit lu une deuxième fois dans six mois de ce jour," and the English translation reading as follows:

That all the words of the said amendment after the word "therefore" be left out and replaced by the following: "this Bill be not now read a second time, but it be read a second time this day six months."

That the English rendering is a correct translation of the French.

That the proper official being of the opinion that the language could be improved so as to accord with precedent, and accordingly making the change deemed by him necessary, had the amendment to the amendment inserted in the Votes and Proceedings as follows:

"M. Barrette propose comme amendement au dit amendement:

"Que tous les mots du dit amendement après le mot "que" soient retranchés et remplacés par les suivants: "Ce Bill ne soit pas maintenant lu une deuxième fois, mais qu'il soit lu une deuxième fois dans six mois de ce jour."

"That all the words of the said amendment after the word "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor: "This Bill be not now read a second time, but that it be read a second time this day six months."

The committee are of the opinion that the change referred to was made in good faith, without any idea on the part of the official in question that it would alter the substance of the remainder of the amendment to the amendment.

The committee recommend that authority be given by the House to change the wording of the amendment to the amendment as it appears in the Votes and Proceedings, and also in Hansard, by inserting the amendment to the amendment in the actual form in which it was handed to His Honour the Speaker and submitted by him to the House, and that such alterations be made.

Mr. GRAHAM: I suppose this does not settle the point of order raised?

Mr. SPEAKER: It has no bearing on the point of order.

Mr. PUGSLEY: All the committee did was to ascertain the facts and report to the House.

On the motion of Mr. Northrup the report was concurred in.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by asterisks.)

J. H. LEWIS.

Mr. DELISLE:

1. Is there any one named J. H. Lewis employed in the stores branch of the Post Office Department?
2. If so, is he a British subject?
3. Has the Government been informed that a person employed under the name is a reservist of the German army and the name of Lewis under which he is known is not his real name?
4. If the Government has been so informed, has it ascertained correctness or otherwise of such information?

Mr. DOHERTY:

1. Yes, for a period of over thirty years.
2. Yes, having been born in the United States but father being a British subject by birth and descent.
3. The Government has been informed that Mr. Lewis was a reservist of the German army, but has ascertained that Mr. Lewis is not a German subject, and is not now and never has been in any way connected with the German army, and is therefore not a reservist; and that Lewis is his real name.
4. Answered by No. 3.

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER:

For a statement of rails and all other material taken from the Transcontinental Railway, the Intercolonial and any other railroad, shipped to France or ready to be shipped, giving a description of each locality, and maps, where above material was taken from. Also a statement showing to what Government rails have yet to be delivered.

DAYLIGHT SAVING BILL.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. WILLIAM PUGSLEY (St. John): I should like to call the attention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce to Bill No. 82, which stands on the Order Paper for second reading. This Bill, which is to provide that the time in Canada be advanced during the summer months, is not being proceeded with as rapidly as the summer is going. My object in rising is to ask whether it is the intention of the Government to proceed with the Bill this session. I have had a good deal of correspondence from gentlemen in various parts of the country who would like an opportunity to be heard by the Government before the Bill gets its second reading.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: On account of the debate on the Military Service Act, which is taking up the time of the House and takes precedence over other business, it has been found impossible to proceed with the Bill during the last fortnight, but when that debate passes away, as in due time we hope it will, the Daylight Saving Bill will follow in its wake.

GOVERNMENT GRAIN ELEVATORS.

CANADA GRAIN ACT AMENDMENT.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. W. E. KNOWLES (Moosejaw): Has the Minister of Trade and Commerce decided whether he will accept my Bill in connection with Government elevators in the West, relating to claims made by injured workmen and that sort of thing?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I do not think it would be advisable to accept the proposed legislation of my hon. friend, and I will give my reasons later when we take up the question of elevators.

COST OF LIVING IN THE YUKON.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Edmonton): I again desire to ask the Government a question in regard to the high cost of living in the Yukon. I have been favoured with another telegram on the subject which I should like to bring to the attention of the Government. It is dated Dawson, Yukon Territory, June 29, and reads as follows:

Mr. SPEAKER: I assume that the hon. member purposes to lay the groundwork for a question?

Mr. OLIVER: I stated that I was going to ask a question in regard to the matter. The telegram reads:

Dawson, Y.T., June 29, 1917.

Hon. Frank Oliver,
Ottawa, Ont.

Ottawa despatches state Dawson business men deny our statements and claim allegations of administrator complying with dealers unfounded. We never alleged administrator was dealers' accomplice. We stated administrator evinced sympathy and partiality to companies and that local administration was obedient servant big business. We repeat statements. Given opportunity will prove them. Situation for working people is desperate; growing worse daily; quick action necessary, hence these telegrams. We pay for ours; business men tell us Government frank theirs, and that they were asked to eulogize administrator in theirs but flatly refused. Eighty per cent local business people alien. Ninety per cent alien born. Few women in our leagues but have relatives at front. Our word is good as aliens. We demand proper investigation Pueblo mine disaster. Six men killed last March through inexcusable negligence. Prompt inspection demanded before new force one hundred men commence work as contemplated. We ask immediate investigation high cost of living; adjustment labour troubles between our companies and employees; suspension and investigation Administrator Williams; better service to Yukon from Dawson news in return for many thousands federal and territorial monies. Failing this our last appeal to Premier we appeal to Canadian public. Prompt and considerate action regarding telegram June first would have averted strike. Our final word, wages must go up or extortionate prices come down.

Geraldine Sharp,
Secretary Yukon Women's Protective League.
Marie Fotheringham,
Secretary Yukon Progressive League.

I wish to ask the Government if the strike alluded to here is still in progress, and also if the price of flour still remains as it was stated to be in the telegram I read to the House some weeks ago.

Hon. T. W. CROTHERS (Minister of Labour): I have no recent information—nothing further than I conveyed to the House some days ago.

Mr. OLIVER: If I might be permitted, I would suggest that there is an administrator of Yukon affairs, and I think it would be only ordinary courtesy to the House and to the country if the minister would be good enough to inquire from the administrator and give the House the information.

Mr. CROTHERS: A lengthy reply was read some days ago from the administrator of the Yukon. While I do not remember the exact wording, I do remember that it contradicted substantially the statements which the hon. member has conveyed to the House this afternoon and which he has read several times before.

Mr. OLIVER: If the minister (Mr. Crothers) will excuse me, it did not contradict those statements. It did make certain general statements. I have asked the Government certain specific questions, and I would appreciate, and I think the House would appreciate the courtesy that would cause a definite reply to be given.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I have not received communications upon the subject for some time from the association which, it appears, is communicating with my hon. friend (Mr. Oliver). I will examine the telegram he has read, and I will consider the advisability of making further inquiries.

SUPPLY.

ADDITIONAL GENERAL VOTE OF ONE-SIXTH FOR 1917-18.

On motion of Sir Thomas White (Minister of Finance), the House went into Committee of Supply, Mr. Blain in the Chair.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The three months' vote of supply which was previously granted has expired. The right hon. Prime Minister has taken the matter up with the right hon. leader of the Opposition and has arranged for a further supply for two months. I beg to move that an amount of not less than one-sixth of the several items in the Estimates for 1917-18 be granted.

Mr. PUGSLEY: This proposed vote will cover two months and presumably will carry us close to the end of the session. But there are certain items in regard to which I shall desire information, such as some of those to be voted for the Department of Public Works. I assume that, though this motion is carried, it is understood that ample time will be afforded for the consideration of the various items.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I can assure my hon. friend (Mr. Pugsley) that ample time will be given for any discussion which he or any other member may wish.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: It is understood, of course, that such a vote as this will not prejudice any member speaking to any of the items. This has always been the understanding when such votes have been passed.

[Mr. Crothers.]

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: That is always the understanding. This vote is granted in order that the public business may be carried on, and that civil servants and others may not be deprived of money justly coming to them from the Government.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I understand, too, that no objection will be taken to a discussion on going into Supply on a day when ordinarily such discussion is not in order.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: We will not raise any technical point of that kind.

Mr. LEMIEUX: As we are now voting the salaries for two months for the Civil Service, I will ask the Minister of Finance to consider giving a little lift to the messengers and the elevator men. I have received several petitions on the subject and have promised to bring the matter to the hon. gentleman's attention. By the Bill which this House has passed he has provided for the civil servants, and I would ask him if he intends, later, to do something for the messengers and elevator men.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The messengers have been dealt with in the Bill which was passed by this House and, I understand, by the Senate. So far as the Outside Service is concerned, I have already referred hon. members who have asked questions on the subject to the supplementary estimates which may contain votes which enable the ministers to make such recommendations as they deem proper. I am not able to pronounce specifically with regard to the elevator men,—and I suppose my hon. friend is not punning on the word "lift."

Mr. KNOWLES: In May last, I asked the then Postmaster General for information as to the application of the post office clerks and letter carriers for increase of salary. I was informed by the then Postmaster General that he would have the information for me in two or three days. I have quite a number of constituents who are interested in this matter, and since the occasion to which I have referred, I have heard from the post office clerks and mail carriers of Regina, which city is not now represented in this House, but to which I am the nearest sitting member; and it is a genuine disappointment to all those interested that the promise made many weeks ago has not been fulfilled. No doubt the promise was made in good faith, but it is unfortunate that a promise should be made of information to be given in two or three days and then have two months elapse without the information forthcoming. Cannot the Government give some information as to the application of the postal clerks and letter carriers for increased salaries? I strongly recommend this to the Government. The increased cost of living is so well established that it goes without saying that these faithful servants of the public should receive some remuneration in addition to what they received when the cost of living was less. Not only do I ask for an answer, but I trust that the answer will be favourable.

Mr. DOHERTY: If the hon. gentleman had been present in the House when I made an attempt that did not meet with success to proceed with the post office estimates, he would have heard the information then given. That was some weeks ago. I then said that this matter is one that would have to be dealt with in the supplementary estimates, and that it is proposed to insert in the supplementary estimates an item to provide an additional allowance, in view of existing conditions, to the lower salaried post office employees.

Mr. KNOWLES: I do not think that the minister should lecture me because I do not know what has been said in the House. I asked a question on this subject many weeks ago, and repeated the question a few days ago. The minister himself then said that he hoped to have the information soon. It must have been prior to that answer that this information was given in the House. Then was the time to inform me that this information was on Hansard, and not at this late date.

I wish to ask a similar question of the Minister of the Interior. In the West there are many clerks in the Dominion Lands offices whose salaries are the same as when the cost of living was lower. I am informed that these salaries are not adequate to meet the present cost of living. Has this matter been called to the attention of the minister and has he given consideration to it? I trust that he will give it favourable consideration.

Mr. ROCHE: I have had numerous requests along these lines on behalf of these public servants in the lands offices, and have given the matter consideration. I was waiting to see the legislation to be passed for the Outside Service in Ottawa, which has been referred to by the Minister of Finance, in order to decide what action I should take. However, I would draw the attention of the hon. gentleman to the fact that when my estimates were up I was severely criticised because I had such a large expenditure in connection with the Civil Service.

Mr. KNOWLES: That might be possible. The minister may have too many of them. He probably has a great many civil servants who are not doing anything, and money may be extravagantly spent and men still be underpaid. I am appealing on behalf of those who are not receiving enough, but who are doing a good day's work. There are some, even under this Government.

Resolutions reported.

WAYS AND MEANS.

The House in Committee of Ways and Means, Mr. Blain in the Chair.

Sir THOMAS WHITE (Minister of Finance) moved:

That towards making good the supply granted to His Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the financial year ending 31st March, 1918, the sum of $16,118,106.25 be granted out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada.

Motion agreed to.

Sir THOMAS WHITE (Minister of Finance) moved:

That towards making good the supply granted to His Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the financial year ending 31st March, 1918, the sum of $24,054,845.38 be granted out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada.

Motion agreed to.

Resolutions reported and concurred in:

SUPPLY BILL.

Sir THOMAS WHITE thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 108, for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending 31st March, 1918.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first time.

MILITARY SERVICE ACT, 1917.

DEBATE CONTINUED ON MOTION FOR SECOND READING AND ON THE AMENDMENTS.

Consideration of the motion of the Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden (Prime Minister) for the second reading of Bill No. 75, Military Service Act, 1917, and the amendment of Sir Wilfrid Laurier thereto, and on the amendment to the amendment by Mr. Barrette, resumed from Tuesday, 3rd July.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD (Pictou): Mr. Speaker, in approaching the consideration of this very important question, I do so with the desire and with the feeling that it is the duty of every hon. member of this House to face the conditions as they exist in this country at the present time. I need not, and will not, refer to many of the addresses which have been made to this House, in which, I think, the real condition and position of Canada have, to a very large extent, been disregarded. I consider it is the duty of every member of this House, and of every citizen of this country, to be animated by two feelings at this time: First, that we may, to the best of our ability, render the best service, and play our full part as a nation in this war for freedom, and against the military despotism of Germany. Secondly, that we may have peace at home, present a united front to the enemy and keep our country free from discord and division, so that we will be worthy of the effort our sons are making, and evoke for Canada their pride and devotion when the boys come home again.

Mr. Speaker, for myself I have no misgivings as to the attitude that the individual Canadian should assume at this time. This is not an occasion when one should worry over the problem whether or not we are fighting for Britain. We are fighting, Sir, for Britain and with Britain. We are fighting for France and with France; for the United States of America, for Italy, for Russia; we are fighting for and with all those free countries, animated by a common purpose and idea, namely, that the militarism of Germany and the domination of that power which is attempted to be asserted by its ruler, may be put an end to, and that democracy and the rule of the people, may be the guiding element in the days that are to come. That cause is one which is so high, so noble, and so worthy that, let me say, Mr. Speaker, had the right hon. gentleman, who is the Premier of this country, appreciated that these were the real issues in this war, long ago all the forces of this country would have been mobilized, in order that we might render, in every way, to our cause, the best possible service. Long ago it was the duty of my right hon. friend to have conferred with Great Britain, with France, and, during the last two months, with the United States, as to what our part should be in this war, and what was the best service that we could render to this great cause. First, as to the food supply upon which these nations can rely, and which we can produce. There comes across the sea, from the old land—which those of us, Scotch, English and Irish, are proud to call our home land—a call for food for the people. There comes also a further call, which my right hon. friend has not heeded in that he, by conference, should have arranged with the Allies as to the proper supply of our munitions, our minerals and our mineral products, which they require, and which they should have from us. He should have arranged to determine as to the transportation which we were to provide and to the ships in which we could transport the products of our Dominion to the Mother Country.

In addition to that, there should have been a conference as to the number of men that we should furnish, having regard to our population and to the needs at the front. In reference to all of these matters, there should have been conference and mobilization long ago. To the extent that my right hon. friend lagged in his duty and put off the making of proper arrangements in regard to all these matters, he has been responsible for failure and is to be blamed for the present condition under which Canada is not giving her full service to the Mother Country. If we had to-day what we should have had long ago, a proper mobilization and organization of all these resources, a generous, united and enthusiastic people would have seen that all things necessary were supplied. But, instead of deliberate organization and mobilization of our resources, what have we had since the war began? Nothing but hysteria. Month after month, year after year, instead of calm deliberation and cool attention to those conditions which history tells us are necessary to victory, we have been going from one hysteria to the other, without regard to consequences. For instance, at the beginning of the war the Government, instead of providing machine guns and making them available for war purposes, permitted the raising of subscriptions throughout the country for this and other purposes, without the slightest guidance or direction. A generous response was made by the people to whom these appeals were directed in no organized form. But since the handing over of the money to the Government, what evidence have we of any organization in regard to matters of that kind?

Every hon. gentleman in this House has been waiting for the election contest which my right hon. friend kept hanging over the heads of the people.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACDONALD: On no less than three occasions indisputable evidences were given of my right hon. friend's intention to precipitate an election. In 1915 the Minister of Public Works (Hon. Robert Rogers) stated in this House that in respect of such a petty question in war time as representation in the Senate the people of Canada were calling upon the Government in tones of thunder to bring on an election. My right hon. friend yielded to the efforts of that gentleman to this extent: ballots were printed, ballot boxes were sent to England, and every preparation was made for an election. Since then the same condition has gone on. My right hon. friend has been keen in his regard for political considerations; and now, in the light of a condition arising for the first time and affecting the whole country, he suggests that politics should be forgotten for the moment and that we should face this condition together.

Then, take the story of the national service propaganda last year. By virtue of the last powers given him by the War Measures Act, my right hon. friend appointed a commission which he called the National Service Commission. He quarrelled with the chairman of that commission over a question of political patronage, and then appointed the member for Calgary (Mr. R. B. Bennett) as chairman. Then a campaign was carried on throughout the country—for what? Was there no wastage at the front last year? Was it not necessary last year that the places of the boys who went out and died should be filled? Did my hon. friend find out only a month ago that there was wastage at the front? My right hon. friend and his colleague went through the country discussing matters of patriotic concern. But it turns out now, after the propaganda is all over, that the object of that campaign was not to secure the filling of wastages at the front, but to find men to work on the farms and in other places.

Then, take the absolutely undignified incident that occurred only six months ago, the dispute that arose between the right hon. gentleman and the then Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes). The letters which were made public at that time had no parallel in English or Canadian parliamentary history. If the statements they contained were true, those letters disclosed a condition of affairs within the cabinet which showed that the Government were not worrying about filling the wastages at the front. These are a few of the curious performances which have characterized the administration of hon. gentlemen opposite in connection with the war.

The hysteria seems to have affected some hon. gentlemen on this side. Take, for instance, the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark). Last year the member for Red Deer gave evidence of being affected by hysteria. When criticisms of a most legitimate and proper character were being made by gentlemen on this side with a view to seeing that the administration of military affairs in Canada should be wisely carried on, that hon. gentleman undertook to denounce every one of his former confreres. A similar obsession seemed to have affected the hon. gentleman some few weeks ago.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, no.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: He can look after himself.

Mr. SPEAKER: When hon. gentlemen wish to speak they should do the House the courtesy of rising.

Mr. MACDONALD: When hon. gentlemen recall that the member for Red Deer was one of those in Great Britain who preached against Great Britain's taking any part in securing the freedom of South Africa they will wonder whether there is not something in the suggestion of hysteria. I would remind hon. gentlemen, also, that a little over a year ago the member for Red Deer intimated that he was proud of the position taken by Sir John Simon, who retired from the British Government because he did not believe in conscription, and that he had congratulated Sir John Simon upon his sturdy defence of Liberalism. I have some ground, therefore, for suggesting that the member for Red Deer has been affected by some sort of hysteria. Fortunately, the plain people of this land, who have been watching what the Government has been doing, have not been afflicted with hysteria. Where the people have had opportunity of expressing their views in respect of provincial affairs their votes have been against the Conservative party, largely, if not wholly, on account of the way the Government has been managing Canada's part in the war. Let me give you an illustration. A little over a week ago there was an election in Saskatchewan. The slogan of the Conservative party in that election campaign was: vote for Willoughby, the Conservative leader, and for Borden. That campaign cry was met in this way by the Regina Leader:—

It means expressing approval of the Borden Government's military administration, including its "political colonels," the profiteering in munition contracts, political favoritism in the army and in the awarding of contracts for army supplies; in a word, approval of the whole inefficient, graft-ridden administration of Canada's part in the war.

The people of Saskatchewan, after considering the issue, gave their verdict overwhelmingly only a week ago.

If this Government were in earnest in regard to this matter, what should they have done from the beginning of the war? Why has the Minister of Finance not made proper financial provision for the needs of the country at the present time and for the future? He has adhered to the policy which he announced two years ago, namely, that the proper thing to do was to make posterity pay for this war; in other words, to make the boys who have gone out to fight and if needs be to die for us, pay for this war when they return. Has there been the slightest evidence of economy in the public administration? While there are spasmodic evidences of it at the present time, in the previous two years there has been a reckless expenditure in all the public services, and not the slightest sign of a desire to economize. The Minister of Finance has taxed industry under what he calls a Business Profit Tax, but he will not and has not touched accumulated wealth. During the last session and in the present session hon. gentlemen on this side of the House have pointed out to him the fact that the debt of this country is reaching tremendous proportions. Already this year it amounts to $1,250,000,000. We have also urged that he should make those who have more money than they need contribute something towards the necessities of the state. The Minister of Finance replied: At some time in the dim and distant future I may possibly impose an income tax, but I want posterity to pay for this war. He is perfectly willing to go into the homes of the poor and levy taxes upon them for our war expenditures, but he hesitates to touch the pockets of the rich. In the United States, when the Liberty Loan was placed before the American people, not a banker charged the Government a single cent of commission for getting the money, but the Minister of Finance never asked the financial people of this country to be patriotic enough to give their services free in regard to the floating of our war loan. Why should we not, in these days of blood and strife, and while the tumult is still going on, make the accumulated wealth of this country contribute its share towards the winning of the war?

What has been done during the last three years towards organizing and mobilizing all the resources of this country? Day after day, session after session, hon. gentlemen on this side of the House have pointed out to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers) that the faces of the poor in this land were being ground down, and that they were compelled to pay enormous prices for the right to live in this country. Day after day the plea was made that some action should be taken to remedy this condition of affairs, and what answer did the Minister of Labour give? He passed an Order in Council—which everybody in this House and in this country knew was absolutely ineffective in every way, and which did not furnish any adequate remedy for the necessities of the people of this country. I give in proof of that my hon. friend's own words:

> In July, 1914, just before the war began, the index figure of the Labour Department showing wholesale prices stood at 134.6. In November of 1916, when the Government passed its control regulations, the index figure was 198.4. In February, 1917, when the regulations had been in force four months, it stood at 217.3, and was moving upward with more momentum than before. In July, 1914, the estimated cost of a weekly budget of food for an average Canadian family was $7.42. In November, 1916, when the new regulations went into force, it was $9.81. In February, 1917, after four months' operation of the regulations, it had risen to $10.46 and was still going up.

Was that organization or mobilization of all the forces of Canada in order that we might support this great cause to which we all give adhesion? On the contrary, that is an evidence of an utter disregard of all the conditions and is similar to the disregard that has characterized every other branch of the Government.

For two and one-half years, there was not the slightest attempt to organize in any way the coal supplies of this country; not a single effort was made to ensure that the people of this country should, in the wintry days, be kept warm at the lowest possible cost. When we asked that the request of the gentleman who came from Lloyd George that we should build ships and more ships, should be granted, and when we pointed out that the great republic to the south of us had had a conference, which this Government never took the time to have, and that the United States authorities were providing ships, working in close touch with the Mother Country, what did the Minister of Trade and Commerce say to us? We are permitting the Imperial Government, through the Imperial Munitions Board to build ships in Canada, and we are loaning $10,000,000 to them for that purpose, but as for us, we will not spend a dollar. That showed no mobilization of resources and no effort on the part of this Government to provide for this, the greatest necessity, which is becoming of more vital importance every day this war continues. There was no effort to see that our Allies might get from Canada, the nearest overseas Dominion, who ought to give her supplies most liberally, everything they require in connection with the war. This Government says: not a ship shall we build and not a dollar shall we spend in order that Canada may play her part in this war.

Two years ago, we upon this side of the House, and last year my hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) urged upon the Minister of Railways that ample provision of rolling stock of all kinds should be made for the transportation of all the products that were going overseas, and at the same time for the adequate accommodation of the internal trade of the country. Was anything done? The trade of Canada was practically paralyzed for two years as a result of the inactivity of the Government. Was there any mobilization of Canada's resources in order that she might play her part in the war? To-day, by the policy of drift and inattention on the part of the Government, the railway situation in this country has been allowed to become most serious, and it will require the deepest wisdom of every gentleman in this House to solve the problem.

There was a call for the mobilization of the agricultural, industrial, transportation, and natural resources of this country. The need was great. The demand was made that we should give our all to aid in this war. Why was that call not answered? When it was urged that the Government take steps to reduce the cost of living to the wives and families of those who had gone to the front to fight and die, the Minister of Labour, instead of grappling with the problem, had an Order in Council passed that was not worth the paper it was written on. And so the situation that I have described was created, and created by this Government. Was it the fault of the Canadian people? No. From every village and hamlet in this country, from our cities and towns, men have gone out voluntarily, moved solely by a spirit of patriotism to fight in this great cause, while at home their mothers and wives and sisters have worked for their comfort with a devotion that has never been exampled in history. It is not the fault of the Canadian people that we are to-day facing in this land a situation that requires the wisest guidance of the shrewdest minds. Are hon. gentlemen who sit behind this Government responsible for this condition? I am not prepared to say that they are. I believe that there are men on the other side of the House who have done their best to recruit and train men for this war, and the splendid efforts they have made should command the admiration of everybody in this country. Are hon. gentlemen on this side of the House responsible for the condition we find ourselves in to-day? Why, Sir, from that fateful day in August, 1914, when the word went out that this world-war had begun, we on this side of the House have supported the Government and voted all the money that has been required from day to day and year to year to carry on the war. We have asked our sons to go and fight, and they have gone, Liberals and Tories alike. Who then is responsible for this condition? It is the fault of the hon. gentlemen who sit on the Treasury benches, and who throw into the arena the Bill which is now before us.

Where has my right hon. friend the Prime Minister stood on this question of conscription? Day after day he has solemnly asserted on public occasions that he was opposed to conscripting Canadian manhood, that he believed the voluntary system was the best way in which Canada could help the Empire; we have all heard him say that. He said the same thing to representatives of organized labour in this country. He caused or permitted his Minister of the Interior in the autumn of last year down to the 1st of May this year, to advertise to the people of the great nation to the south of us that conscription in Canada was deemed neither desirable nor necessary. But during all those days the war was going on; our boys were dying at the front and gaps were being made in the ranks; the hearts of our people were being harrowed, and yet the Prime Minister could not see the necessity for conscription.

In order that there may be no doubt where the responsibility lies, let me read a question I asked of the Government on April 30 of this year just two months ago:

Mr. Macdonald: In view of the position taken by the Government through the Premier last year that they were emphatically not in favour of conscription, and of the letter of the Minister of the Interior published in the western United States, and advertisements published by the Interior Department to the effect that conscription was not deemed either advisable or necessary in Canada, I would like to ask the Minister of Militia and Defence whether it is the intention of the Government to change their policy in regard to enlistment and provide for a policy of conscription, or whether they intend to put in force compulsorily the provisions of the Militia Act.

During all that time the men were dying at the front just as they are now; the losses were just as great if not greater. What do you think, Sir, the then Minister of Militia replied in answer to my question? He said:

The question to which my hon. friend refers has not yet had the consideration of the Government.

Sir SAM HUGHES: My hon. friend spoke of the "then" Minister of Militia. Does that refer to me?

Mr. MACDONALD: No, I was referring to the present Minister of Militia. We have had two Ministers of Militia and I confuse them sometimes. I do know, however that the ex-Minister of Militia previous to his resignation last autumn had said that while he was in control of the military forces of this country he could raise 200,000 men by the voluntary system in Ontario alone. In answer to my question on the 30th of April the present Minister of Militia, with all the authority which attaches to his position, told the House that the Government had never considered putting a conscriptive law in force in this country. That was only two months ago. At that time the boys were dying at the front. The whole of this Dominion was calling for the mobilization of all our resources, and yet the Government had never considered this proposal.

Let us follow events a little further. My right hon. friend the Prime Minister went to England and visited the men at the front. As late as April we all thought that the Fifth Division had gone to France, commanded by the son of the ex-Minister of Militia. But they have not gone. What stopped them? The war was going on, and our men were dying just as they are today. My right hon. friend says that he never for a single moment while he was in England discussed the question of conscription in Canada; he is on record as making that statement. What did he discuss in England? Did he go over there to find out whether voluntary recruiting had failed in Canada? Not at all; what did the people overseas know about voluntary recruiting in Canada? My right hon. friend did not believe that voluntary recruiting had failed in this country when he sailed for Canada in April. He had no conscription ideas in England, and yet he comes back to this country and tells the House on the 18th of May that he proposes to introduce conscription. His announcement almost synchronized with the preliminary statement made by one of his colleagues who accompanied him on his visit to Europe, and who in an interview at Montreal stated that he thought conscription would have to come in this country. Where did my right hon. friend find out that voluntary recruiting had failed in Canada? Who told him it had failed?

When did he discover it? All the facts show that this Bill was introduced into this House, and this question thrown into the arena, for political purposes, and not for the reasons suggested by my right hon. friend. Had he come back actuated only by the highest ideals and desiring united action by the people, including those represented on this side of the House, why did not he, before making an announcement which was not warranted by the previous history, come to my right hon. leader, lay before him what he believed to be the case, and ask him, untrammelled and without conditions, to join him in order that the Canadian people might move forward in one grand united effort to play their full part in the war? We are told that coalition would be a splendid thing. My right hon. friend did not learn in England that volunteer recruiting had failed. He made his announcement about conscription, and then he came to ask my right hon. leader to join him. He was playing politics when he made that announcement and asked for coalition. The evidence is absolutely clear; it is proven on the face of the Bill itself. The right hon. Prime Minister and those who support him tell us about the great need for troops at the front. But this Bill is not to come into force when it passes this House, as it ought to, if the need is so great; it is not to come into force until proclamation, by Order in Council. He talks about the need of troops at the front, yet he knows in his heart that the need was not so great; for he himself said: Let us have a coalition and, let us not bring the Bill into force, and we will have an election some time in the autumn before the Bill is brought into effect.

I will not go into the figures in detail as they have been given from time to time. We had the figures of 14th May, then the figures of 7th June, and the Under Secretary (Mr. McCurdy), speaking in the House yesterday, gave us a new set of figures. I gather from these figures and from the statements made by hon. gentlemen opposite that we have about 136,400 men in France, and about 108,736 in England. On 14th May, there were in England 84,000 of all ranks available for reinforcements before the end of the year, and infantry exclusive of men in hospital 47,478 men. The need of men was not so great but that my right hon. friend could play politics and could postpone the sending of aid until we had an election. It is plain that under the proposition made by the Prime Minister to the leader of the Opposition there could not be a man sent to France to fight in this war until the autumn of 1918—not a man. And the Prime Minister knew it if he was well advised.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I take exception to that statement; I knew nothing of the kind.

Mr. MACDONALD: Then the right hon. gentleman had not taken the opportunity to consult about it. Let me show him what would have taken place under this proposition. Were the election held in October it would not be possible for the newly organized Parliament to be in existence here until November. After November, according to this Bill, local boards would have to be appointed all over this country. After the local boards were appointed every man who claimed exemption from service could make his appeal to the county court, afterwards to the judge of the Superior Court in his district, and afterwards even to the Supreme Court of Canada. Men could not be mobilized for training until the spring of 1918. And, if my right hon. friend will ask his Minister of Militia with regard to the time necessary to train men and transport them across the ocean, he will learn that they could not have had a man in France until the autumn of 1918, as I have said.

Now, there are in this House five groups in relation to this measure. First, there are those who are in favour of the six months' hoist of this Bill, who practically say that Canada has done enough in the war and are opposed to conscription in any form or at any time. Second, there are those who are anxious that Canada should play the full part of which she is capable in this war, and who desire, in order that disunion should be avoided, that the principle of the Bill should be submitted to the people for ratification before it goes into force. Third, there are those who favour the Bill, but are anxious that further efforts should be made for voluntary recruiting before the Bill is proclaimed. Fourth, there are those who want to pass the Bill as it stands, but not to enforce it until after an election. And, fifth, there are those who want the Bill passed and put into force immediately. For the benefit of the gentlemen who take any one of the last four grounds, I should like to discuss the Bill in principle for a moment or two.

I take the ground that this Bill is not a bona fide attempt to deal with the problem, and I propose to prove that from the evidence contained in the Bill itself. In the first place, there is no provision for the registration of the man-power of this nation. In Great Britain, where conscription was ultimately adopted, there were, first, various schemes of registration—the Lord Derby scheme and others. All the preliminaries were gone through by which the authorities learned the number of men in Great Britain, with particulars about every man—his age, occupation, capacities, all the needed information—so that when the time came to send out the recruiting officer that recruiting officer could put his hand on the man he wanted. In the United States they dealt with this problem sternly, properly, as it would have been dealt with in Canada if this Government had not been absolutely ineffective from the beginning. In the United States a simple method was provided under which the aid of the municipal authorities all over that great republic was enlisted to make a roll of the available men. On the tenth day of June, when the labours of the day were concluded, there were forwarded to the military authorities of the United States complete statements of the man-power of the nation, showing, with relation to every man, his age, residence, trade, or occupation, and all other necessary facts. When they require these men they know where to find them. Have we in Canada had any registration, any attempt to bring home to the people the sternness of the situation, any attempt to put down in black and white the facts with regard to our man-power, so that the authorities may know what that man-power is?

Have we anything of that kind in this Bill? No, there is nothing of the kind. When the Bill was introduced, I asked the right hon. gentleman whether he intended to have registration, and he said he did not. I say that the absence of a provision for registration is evidence that the Government do not intend to put this Bill into effect with any degree of haste. Having failed to provide for registration, what are they going on for their data? They are going on the census which is seven years old, and they are going on the National Service data. The National Service data was obtained, according to the statement made by responsible labour men in this country, under the representation that National Service was not for men to fight but for men to work. Do you not think that that is a very singular and very peculiar kind of basis for people to start from who are anxious to deal with this problem in a stern way in keeping with all the eloquent addresses we have heard in this House? The evidence of the failure to grapple with this question from the standpoint of the gentlemen who hold views such as I have mentioned, is beyond all doubt. Take, for instance, the men in the first class from twenty years up: How is the gentleman who has to deal with this matter from a military standpoint to find out from the census returns or from any other source the whereabouts of a boy who was eighteen years old two years ago, when this war began? How are you ever going to get the names? Where is the gentleman who is going to mobilize these people to get the data on which to start? It is absolutely impossible under this Bill. Why, Sir, in the United States they provide that every man between eighteen and forty-five having no dependents of any kind and not engaged in employment essential to the national security had to register on a certain day; they had all the names of these people on the register. My hon. friends are not proceeding in that way.

Take the provision in regard to the Board of Selection. My right hon. friend (Sir Robert Borden) claimed great credit for the method of appointing local tribunals. That is subsection 3 of section 6 which reads as follows:

> Each local tribunal shall consist of two members. One member shall be appointed by a Board of Selection to be established by joint resolution of the Senate and House of Commons.

That means, when you get it translated into ordinary Anglo-Saxon, that the Government of Canada, through their appointees on that Board of Selection, are going to appoint one of the members of the local board, and the consequence will be that you have the same pernicious political influence that has blasted the ideals of a large number of the Canadian people, in operation under this Bill. If a county court judge is a good enough man to select one member of this local board, he is good enough to select two. There can be no possible justification, unless there is a desire to interject politics into this question, for this Government reserving to itself the appointment of one of the members of these local boards, through the committee of selection. If the Bill proposed is bona fide, let a county court judge appoint both. If he is a person to appoint one member of the board, he is a proper person to appoint the other.

Why all this elaboration in regard to appeals, if the need is so great and my right hon. friend is sincere? You will have this result: The man who has money enough to go and retain a lawyer to raise the legal question as to the meaning of "national interest" in the first three exemption clauses can carry his case to the Supreme Court of Canada, while the poor beggar at home who has not enough money to fee a lawyer cannot appeal. The man with money can prolong his hearing for months and months. The evidence is that these gentlemen do not believe in their hearts that there is such urgent necessity, because if they did so believe they would have a Bill of such a character that there would be no question about it.

Then, let us come to the proposition as to what national interest is. I asked my right hon. friend when he introduced this Bill whether there would be any definition by this House of the words "national interest." My right hon. friend said there would be none, that it was proposed to define national interest by the regulations that were to be made by the Government. In other words, this Government is reserving to itself the right to say who shall go and who shall not go. Respecting to the full, as I do, the position taken by men in this country who believe that conscription is imperative at this moment, I say that when this Government reserves to itself the right to define national interest, it thereby wipes out all the enthusiasm of these people, and when the people come to study this thing closely, they will realize that this Government is playing politics more than anything else.

Are the agriculturists of this country to be exempted or are they not? My hon. friend the Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen) frankly told the people of Quebec the other day that they need not worry about this Bill; they were nearly all farmers, and they were going to be exempt. Is there anything of that kind in the Bill? Nothing of the kind. The words "national interest" are left entirely in the hands of this Government, to give whatever definition of it they like.

Let us look at the figures as to the occupations of the different people in Canada as defined by the census of 1911. I am giving now the figures of all those from ten years of age to the oldest man in the country. The numbers engaged in the different occupations were as follows: Agriculture, 917,848; building trades, 245,990; domestic and personal service, 75,133; civil and municipal government, 72,531; fishing and hunting, 42,901; manufacturing, 392,781; mining, 62,706; professions, 62,781; trade and merchandise, 240,903; transportation (which includes sailors and railway men and so on), 210,692, making a total of 2,358,813. Now, is this Bill intended to exempt agriculturists? I should like to know from the right hon. gentleman. I pause for a reply.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My hon. friend is capable of reading the Bill and drawing his own conclusions. As to the particular provisions, this is not the time to discuss them. We shall discuss them in committee.

Mr. MACDONALD: With all deference to my right hon. friend, I think this is the time, and I think it is about time that somebody in this discussion did find out what this Bill is providing for.

I want to know, and the country wants to know, whether the 917,848 men who are engaged in agriculture are to be exempted, or whether they are not. I want to know what the Solicitor General, who did discuss the details of the Bill, meant when he intimated to the people of Quebec that they need not worry about this thing. He said they had large families, that they got married young, that they were all working on the farms, and they need not worry about it. The Prime Minister will not tell me whether that is so or not. There is in the preamble of the Bill this statement:

> And whereas, by reason of the large number of men who have already left agricultural and industrial pursuits in Canada to join such Expeditionary Force as volunteers, and of the necessity of sustaining, under such conditions, the productivity of the Dominion, it is expedient to secure the men still required, not by ballot as provided in the Militia Act, but by selective draft.

That is in the preamble, but not in the enacting clauses. All that is in the enacting clause of the Bill is the proviso that the man who can show a local board that it is in the national interest that he should continue in the employment he is then engaged in, may be exempt. The Solicitor General indicated that the farmers were to be exempt. Connected with industries, manufacturing and industrial plants we have 392,000 men. In other words, in the agricultural and industrial classes there are 1,300,000, so that 200,000 more than half the working people of Canada are connected with those two industries. In Great Britain, they do not take the sailors or the railwaymen. In Canada there are 210,000 transportation employees. Adding these figures, we have 1,500,000 men exempted. Then what about the miners, Mr. Speaker? Are the miners to be taken, or are they not? They are an essential element in this country. We are appointing commissions giving complete control to gentlemen to deal with this problem of the production of coal, in order that next winter our people may not freeze to death. Are the miners of Canada to be taken under this Bill? Then there are 34,547 men engaged in the fishing industry in Canada. In Great Britain they are exempt. In Canada they are the greatest producers of cheap food that you can find all over the country. If these gentlemen on the other side of the House had organized the national resources of this country, the cost of living in central Canada would not have been so great as it is. If the fish obtained in the Maritime Provinces and on the Pacific coast had been taken to our Canadian cities, it would have reduced the cost of living. Should the fishermen be conscripted? In the United States, I observe they exempt civil and municipal government employees, which classes make 72,531 in Canada. Are they to be exempt in Canada? There are men in the professions, 62,781. There is no question about them. I guess they will have to go. No doubt the lawyers and the doctors will have to go.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is a problem. It depends on whether it is in the national interest that they should go.

Mr. EDWARDS: It would be in the national interest that the lawyers should go.

Mr. MACDONALD: Referring to the lumbering industry of Canada, the number of men engaged in forestry is 42,901. Are those men to go? I am citing these figures for the purpose of showing that it is about time, in the discussion of this serious measure, that we had some pronouncement to the country as to what is really meant by this Bill. Are we going to leave it in the hands of this Government to say what national interest means, and to say that Tom Jones has to go and Dick Smith may stay? Any one familiar with the conditions in England and Scotland knows that, as a result of having left to the local boards in Great Britain the sole determination of this question of national interest, the gravest dissatisfaction has arisen. There is a suspicion of favouritism. There is a feeling that there has been discrimination, and in the operation and carrying out of the measure, conditions of the gravest character which should not have arisen now prevail, and the consequence is that the poorer people of the Old Country are discontented. My right hon. friend must have heard that when he was over there. My right hon. friend has another proposition—

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Will the hon. gentleman tell me what he is going to suggest on this point, when the House goes into committee?

Mr. MACDONALD: I will give my right hon. friend many suggestions. I will give him one at once. My hon. friend has, as I say, for political purposes merely, introduced a measure, the details of which he declines to explain, and, in the interests of the country, I am calling the attention of the people to the fact that the Prime Minister will not furnish an explanation. I will give the hon. gentleman an illustration. Paragraph "C" of section 11, referring to exemptions, reads:

> That it is expedient in the national interest that, instead of being employed in the military service, he should continue to be educated or trained for any work for which he is then being educated or trained.

What does that mean? It means that if one has a boy between 20 and 25 years of age going to college, and can afford to keep him there, and can afford to go to the local board and say, "Here is a boy I am educating and training, and it is important he should finish his education and training," that boy can stay at home, while the son of the poor man, who does not go to college, who has to work for his living, and get it as best he can, has not the advantage of that exemption. I say that exemption should be wiped out.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACDONALD: Subsection "D" of section 11 reads:

> That serious hardship would ensue if the man were placed on active service, owing to his exceptional financial or business obligations or domestic position.

Let me give an instance. Dealing with the case of the poor man dependent upon his daily work for a living, who has purchased a home on the instalment plan, or having gotten his home together, has obtained some furniture on the instalment plan and not paid for it, does he come within this category? I think not. I think this means that a man between the age of 20 and 45, who is engaged in some important business, can pay a lawyer, go before the Board and prove that his financial position is such, and the matters depending upon him are such, that he should be exempt. In the eyes of the man who wants to perform full service in this great cause, is there any reason why the poor man should be taken, and the rich man left at home? That will happen under that section.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Does the hon. gentleman favour striking out that provision?

Mr. MACDONALD: I certainly would not permit a clause of that kind to be put in without a definition, so that there would be no discrimination against the poor man, as there apparently is, in that section, as drawn. Why, in this curious measure, should a clause be inserted that it should not come into effect except by Order in Council? There is no more reason why this Bill should not go into effect on the day that His Excellency gives assent to it than there is why any Bill passed by Parliament should not become effective when sanctioned. My hon. friend may have some good reason for inserting that provision. He may have an election in mind, but I warn the Prime Minister that many a man whose soul is stirred will be keeping his eye on him when he decides to make this provision.

This Bill is based on a peculiar statement in the preamble. You will observe that in the preamble, after reciting the provisions of the Militia Act, the clause says:

> And whereas enough men do not volunteer to provide such reinforcements.

In other words, according to all geneses upon which legislation is perfected, if men volunteer in sufficient numbers, there is no need for this Bill. I decline to assent to the suggestion that voluntary enlistment in Canada has failed. If it has lagged behind; if the youth of the land have not responded as they should, it is the fault of the Government. In the first place, more inducements of a material character should have been held out to the men who were asked to go to the front. To ask a man who had a family depending upon him to give up his work and accept $1.10 a day as a private was not calculated to lead men to believe that the state was generous in its dealings with volunteers. More harm has been done to recruiting by the manner in which the assigned pay and separation allowances have been handled than has been done in any other way. Many wives who were depending upon their 55 cents a day did not get their cheque when the month came around; others did not get their separation allowances when they should have got them. Would that have a tendency to arouse enthusiasm among the people? Wives of men at the front have begged members of the House to intercede for them at Ottawa and endeavour to have their money sent to them. These persons have spoken to their friends and relatives about the way they were being treated. Would that instil enthusiasm into the people? Why did not the Government insure the lives of men who left dependents behind them, in order that, without legal technicalities or red tape, their relatives would be enabled to get a certain sum of money if injury should come to their dear ones who had gone away?

Then, Sir, consider the breaking up of the regiments. Consider the extent to which sentimental ties were broken when regiments were disbanded. Look at the way the Irish boys of Montreal were treated. Consider the conditions in my own province. By vigorous effort, there were organized four battalions which were full of the sentiment and enthusiasm that are characteristic of men of the Scottish race. These battalions went out with the full assurance that they would go to the front as units. A week after they landed on the other side, an order came for a draft. They used to tell us that the British authorities asked for these drafts, but the British authorities did not ask for this draft; it was asked for and made by the Canadian authorities in Great Britain appointed by this Government. When they made the draft, did they take one of the battalions and send it over with its officers? No; they proceeded to slash the whole of the four battalions, crippling and destroying them, so that to-day only two remain out of the four that left our province to fight together in this great cause. Is that calculated to arouse the enthusiasm of the boys whom we have been asking to volunteer? Not at all.

Mr. EDWARDS: How would the hon. gentleman fill up the wastage?

Mr. MACDONALD: I am showing that this Government says: As a result of our maladministration, mistakes and failures, we cannot get any more recruits; therefore, we must have conscription.

I need not relate the story of political management in connection with the war; it is known everywhere. The purchase of supplies was placed in the hands of local patronage committees; no medical men who were not Conservatives were permitted to examine recruits and the ideals of our people were blunted.

Let me say here that the country has a right to know definitely the circumstances in connection with the stopping of recruiting a year ago. On the one hand we have a positive and definite statement made in this House by the ex-Minister of Militia, and on the other hand we have a modified denial by the Prime Minister. The country has a right to know what occurred between these two gentlemen and whether or not recruiting was halted, if not stopped, as a result of anything that took place last year. If the efforts in the matter of recruiting had been maintained with all the vigour and enthusiasm of previous years, there would have been no necessity for throwing this apple of discord, the Military Service Bill, before the Canadian people.

The people of Canada have no faith in the present militia officials of this Government. We had in this country various generals whose names were household words when they were sent over here by the British Government. They were such men of recognized ability in military matters as Lord Dundonald, General Lake, General Mackenzie. How many people in Canada ever heard of the man who is now general officer commanding the forces in this country? Who ever saw him commanding any of the military camps in Canada? What influence has his personality upon the Canadian people? Who ever heard tell of General Gwatkin except a few persons in Ottawa? Australia has its General Birdwood, whose name is a household word in that Dominion, and who takes overseas the men who enlist under him. Who is this General Gwatkin, upon whom the Canadian people are asked to pin their faith as their military leader? The present Minister of Militia and his parliamentary secretary are genial men, but what do they know of military organization? What have they tried to learn? They have simply marked time. If you want to find out anything about anybody on the other side, you are told: We will cable to England and find out. If a soldier is seriously wounded, many weary days must pass before information can be gained as to what has happened to him. The methods of the Government in this respect have caused the people to feel that the present Administration is weak, inefficient and incompetent.

I am rather inclined to inquire of some of the gentlemen opposite who have been overseas as to what is the actual position occupied by Sir George Perley, whose title is Overseas Minister of Militia. If they would speak frankly I know what they would say. I have here a letter that was written by a colonel in England on the last day of March:

> There never was such dissatisfaction in the world as exists in the Canadian forces, all things seem to be subordinated to politics, and pull, and everybody here recognizes it. I have heard many men who have been prominent Conservatives all their lives; some have been members at Ottawa, and others of provincial Houses, declare that all they wanted was a chance to get even with the present Government.

Indeed, it is stated that a certain member of the other side of this House has said that when he took his battalion overseas, he took over 1,100 Conservatives, and when he returned he left 1,100 opponents of this Government behind him. This colonel makes this further statement:

> The present Canadian administration in London are trying to gain the confidence of the forces, and I think General Turner is honest in his work. I had a talk with him the other day and he assured me there was no politics in the present appointments, but when you notice Bob Roger's son as his personal aide sitting outside his door, and Major Montague, a son of the doctor of that name, in the next room, and when you have to see these men and state your business before you can see the General, even if you have a definite appointment, then you begin to wonder what the game is, and it is the same all through everything, if you have not a political standing, you don't count.

I take from the Calgary News-Telegram a letter written on June 22, by Private A. H. McPherson, No. 116838, 11th O.B., C.M.R.:

> It is the duty of every young man who has no one to support but himself to enlist and help out his country in time of trouble. In this way there would be no need for conscription. I do not think it a good policy for a "rump" government to pass conscription without first putting it to the people. In this way our country will be saved and brought into unity. Otherwise, I fear there is going to be a rupture, and I am of the opinion that the Prime Minister was right when he said that he dreaded the coming home of the boys from the trenches. There was some truth in his statement that he dreaded their coming.

When such statements are made with reference to the voluntary system of recruiting and everything else in connection with the management of the war and the leadership of the men who have gone forth so gladly and proudly to fight; is it any wonder that we ask here that there should be some regeneration, a development of new ideals in this House and in this country? That is the situation.

I said in the beginning that I would speak of conditions and not of theories. I have attempted to outline briefly and as earnestly and effectively as I know how the facts as they appear to me and they cannot be questioned.

Some very unkind statements have been made as to the attitude of the labouring classes. I have seen in the Conservative newspapers published in my province a very abusive article reflecting upon Mr. J. C. Watters. I have known Mr. Watters for the last four or five years, and any one who has met him must agree with me that he is a very thoughtful gentleman, and, in my opinion, one of the highest type of men who have ever been connected with labour in this country. He has had the confidence of this Government. My right hon. friend and his Government appointed Mr. J. C. Watters on that Economic Commission which was created by the Government. When there was a conference at Washington a short time ago with the representatives of Great Britain who came over here, Mr. J. C. Watters was one of the men whom this Government selected to take down to Washington with their representatives to confer upon questions relating to the war. Therefore when Mr. Watters speaks on these matters, we have no right to disregard him. We can not say that, because the sons of labour have gone out and fought valiantly in this war, their brethren at home have no right to express their views. The labour leaders represent 160,000 men associated with labour in this country, and in dealing with an important question of this character, we should carefully consider their position. You cannot brush them aside and tell them that they are slackers, or traitors. They represent a large body of people, and Mr. Watters is a gentleman of the highest possible ideals. The labour people say that they went to the Prime Minister and discussed these questions from time to time. They say: When our organization at Vancouver took a position in regard to this question of conscription, and when later on, at Toronto, we dealt with this matter, we proposed the nationalization of all the aids necessary and the conscription of all the power of the nation for the prosecution of the war. We cannot find fault with them for that. We may not all of us agree with them as to the nationalization of all the industries of this country, but when these gentlemen, at this time, when the future of Canada is at stake, submit these matters to us for our consideration and say to us: We must have conscription of all the resources of the nation, you cannot brush these people aside; they must be heard, and if their plea is a good one it must be considered. In the proceedings of the Trades and Labour Congress, held last year, they stated their position in regard to munitions as follows:—

5 p.m.

When it was known by the Executive Council that the conditions resulting from the outbreak of war would necessitate the manufacture of munitions in Canada, it was urged that the Government undertake the same by utilizing their various shops for that purpose. . . .

All things being equal as between Government shops and those of a contractor, the same conditions as to hours of labour and as to quantity and quality of work performed, the Government, by undertaking its own work, saves the profits otherwise taken by the contractor, the amount of which profits can be distributed in the shape of higher wages to the employee and at reduced cost to the Government. This has been demonstrated in Great Britain, South Africa, New Zealand and Australia.

They ask that such action should be taken. They say: Hand in hand with conscription of men, if you are going to have that, let us have conscription in other things also. Have they not a right to be heard? In the circular issued last year by Mr. Watters, after the National Service propaganda had begun, and when certain of his associates had complained because he had asked them to sign these cards and return them, he made this statement:—

At the three conventions of the Congress held since the outbreak of war the policy adopted was to "lend every assistance possible to the Allies in a mighty endeavour to secure early and final victory for the cause of freedom and democracy." This policy was qualified at the Vancouver convention by the adoption of "unchangeable opposition to all that savours of conscription." At the Toronto convention the war policy of the Congress was still further modified by opposing registration. . . .

The opposition to registration which developed at the Toronto convention was based on the assumption that it was only a preliminary step to conscription such as had taken place in Great Britain. There is a wide difference, however, between the system adopted in Great Britain and that in Canada. The purposes of the two systems are, also, very dissimilar, according to the statement made by the Premier, Sir Robert L. Borden.

The system of registration put into operation in Great Britain led to conscription, the system of registration in Canada is designed to lead away from conscription. The Prime Minister and the Director General of the National Service Board were both emphatic in their assertions as to there being no connection between registration and conscription. They were equally emphatic as to the purely voluntary nature of the service to be rendered for military, industrial and agricultural purposes in calling on every individual to fill out the cards. The purpose, as vouched for by the First Minister of the Dominion, of the registration plan, therefore, is to secure such information as will demonstrate how and in what particular our efforts may be best directed to give effect to the declared war policy of the Congress itself.

Should the Government undertake to adopt military or even industrial conscription a wholly different state of affairs would obtain. The action of the Vancouver convention, reaffirmed at Toronto, clearly sets forth the position of the Congress in unqualified opposition to conscription.

That was penned last summer before the question of conscription was raised, and it was given as a defence by Mr. Watters to critics, because he had asked the labour men to sign and return the cards because he had the assurance of the Prime Minister that the cards meant, not conscription, but merely registration .

Here is another statement:

If the Government is sincere in its determination to "consecrate the power of the nation" to the cause of the Allies and democracy and not dictated to nor influenced by "Downing Street," or the dominating privileged interests in Canada nor simply actuated by miserable political party considerations, the conscription of man power will follow and not precede that of wealth and the nationalization of every industry necessary for the prosecution of the war. Until the Government gives proof that conscription is, in the words of the Prime Minister, "the only effective method to preserve the existence of the State and of the institutions and liberties which we enjoy," organized labor has every warrant in seeking its defeat by both their economic and political power.

That is the position of labour. They say to the people of Canada: If you are going to take men—and you told us you were not—deal first with wealth and with the industries of this country, so that the best possible service can be given by the whole country to the war. They ask that the measure be submitted to the people for consideration, but that request is disregarded.

Now I come to the other problem that faces us, dealing here with conditions again—and not with theories. We have in this country over 2,000,000 people who speak the French language. The census returns of seven years ago show that one out of every three men in this country speaks the French language. The position, therefore, of the province of Quebec in this Confederation cannot be ignored. We all know that the issue in the province of Quebec six years ago was not reciprocity, but whether the Laurier naval policy meant the conscription of the people of that province. A continuous propaganda was carried on from every church-door almost, in the province of Quebec by the Postmaster General and the Minister of Inland Revenue against participation by Canada in Britain's wars, and the charge was made that because our leader desired the people of this country to help maintain the supremacy of Great Britain on the sea by building a Canadian navy, which both the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Prime Minister of this country had approved in 1909, conscription was to follow. Men were sent up and down the province of Quebec, to take the names of young men available for conscription to excite the people. Men who are now ministers in this Government fell on their knees on public platforms and prayed that Quebec might be saved from the awful calamity that was being brought upon it by Sir Wilfrid Laurier. In 1911 twenty-four men from Quebec were elected to this Parliament who were absolutely pledged against anything in the way of Canada's participation in Great Britain's wars. The result has been that this Government has lost the confidence of the plain people of the province of Quebec—and that is not overpainting the situation. We must never forget that the French have been here longest; they have their roots in the soil. Their ancestors, unlike those of us of Scotch or English or Irish blood, did not come from the Old Land within the last one hundred years. We are bound to the Old Land by family ties, the most potent of all influences, but France deserted the French in this country in 1759, and the people of the province of Quebec have now no tie with France except that they speak the French language. They are devoted solely and wholly to this Canadian land, which has been their home and the home of their fathers for the last two centuries. They are a modest, a brave and a chivalrous people, tillers of the soil, and animated with a love for this country greater perhaps than that of any other section of our population. What part of this country other than the province of Quebec has given to Canada songs breathing such an admiration for this land as "O, Canada, mon pays mes amours" and the other home songs and "O, Canada" which are heard in every home in the province of Quebec.

We all know that there is a feeling of disappointment throughout Canada because the French have not recruited satisfactorily. Everywhere you hear the question asked: Why have not the French Canadians volunteered? I have already given one or two reasons out of many and I might mention another, a small one, perhaps, but indicative of different conditions. How much has been spent in the province of Quebec and Ontario in educating the people on the issues involved in this war? In Ontario, $18,566.37 was spent in advertising for recruits. In Quebec $3,446.19 was spent amongst the English papers, and how much do you think amongst the French papers of that province? Only $550.79. In Prince Edward Island, a little province with 90,000 people, $1,000 in round numbers was spent in advertising—$999.16 to be exact. It is all very well to say the French have not recruited, and that we are going to force them to do their duty by this Bill. Nearly every minister of the Crown has said that in turn, but the Solicitor General, realizing the danger, took a different line. He said:

> Rather, on the other hand, for just and good reasons—not because that province desires any favouritism for it gets no favouritism but for just and good reasons, this Bill in its results will work more lightly on the province of Quebec than on any other province in Canada. In what way will it work so lightly? In the first place, the province of Quebec is an agricultural province. A much larger proportion of the population of that province is engaged in agriculture than in the case at least with any other of the other old provinces of Canada. . . . Therefore, the exemption clauses, applied evenly and fairly all over this Dominion, as is the intent, will, for just and good and sound reasons, be of more value to the province of Quebec than to any other province of Canada.

What does that mean? Let us frankly face the situation. We know that everybody in this country is asking: Why don't the French Canadians volunteer? Hon. gentlemen say they are going to make them enlist by means of this Bill. The Solicitor General, however, takes the position that the Bill will fall more lightly on the province of Quebec than on other provinces, and therefore we must not say much about it. There is an evident insincerity there.

There is only one way in which the whole power of the nation can be devoted to the cause, and that is by a Bill which will make every part of the nation do its duty from one end of the Dominion to the other.

And according to the Solicitor General, this Bill is not going to do that. So, you have the solution of the problem as offered by the Government in these two stories, —the story told by one group that we are going to make Quebec go, and the story told by another that not as many men are to go from Quebec as from other parts of the country. The men who really want this Bill should declare that every man in the country must be treated fairly and that when the Bill is enforced the regulations under it shall be so drawn that all parts of the country must contribute equally.

But notwithstanding all that has gone by, notwithstanding our lack of faith in the conditions existing since 1911, notwithstanding that we have been attacked and vilified; the French Canadians say to the rest of the Canadian people: submit this whole question to a referendum, and as citizens of Canada we will accept the verdict of the people and abide by the results. In the face of conditions as they are, with Canada as she is and as we hope she shall be, is this an unreasonable condition?

Then, what is our duty? As I stated in the beginning, I am animated by the desire, above all else, that we in Canada should play our full part in this war. The Government has so mismanaged affairs, they have so dealt with pledges given in relation to matters touching the very life of the people at this time, that for the moment recruiting has subsided. The Government itself has abandoned it since taking up the policy embodied in this Bill. I can speak for myself, and I believe I can speak for many hon. gentlemen on this side; certainly I can speak for my own province, when I say that if proper conditions are created, and if the members of this House, Liberals and Conservatives, go to the people, each in his own locality, and show the people what is at stake in this war, and ask them to come forward as Canadians and as British citizens and give their best, and their all, in order that Canada may play her part, they will not be found wanting. Is not that a fair proposition to make? Is it not a hopeful and workable proposition in view of the fact that even under adverse conditions the people have given over 400,000 men voluntarily and of their own free will, to maintain the cause of justice and civilization in this war? Recall the conditions in 1914 when the war broke out. In those days we should have received with surprise the statement, had it been made, that in three years Canada would have 400,000 men fighting in this great cause. And yet those men came. Do you mean to tell me that more will not come if the cause is properly presented to the people? I am ready to go to my own people and make the appeal. And I am sure that if all the members in this House will go and show the people the greatness of the cause and the need for Canadian unity and Canadian action, the response will not be wanting.

In the meantime let us submit this question to the Canadian people. I have shown by the provisions of this Bill, and by the method with which this question has been dealt with, that this Government do not mean to put its provisions into force in the way in which it is alleged the necessities of the case demand. Therefore, why should not we turn to labour, and also to these two million people of French extraction in Canada—who do not take the position that they are not interested in this war, but who simply say, in view of all that has passed, we object to being coerced as Ireland was; we want to go freely—and deal with them along lines of conciliation and true leadership? Look at Australia. They have there no race problem as we have; yet, working along constitutional lines, they have submitted a referendum on this question, and under the statesmanship of William Hughes they are working out the problem. They will work out a solution of this problem, and they will maintain a commonwealth which will go on to greater and greater prosperity in the days yet to be.

There come to this House day by day petitions from all parts of the country signed by people who desire the destruction of the liquor traffic. They declare that the record of that traffic is one of the most nefarious the world has ever known, and that that traffic is as worthy of destruction as is German militarism. Yet, what do they ask of this Parliament? They ask that this Parliament should submit to a referendum the question of whether or not this traffic should be abolished. This is the very voice of democracy; it is a recognition of the principle that lies at the root of the issues that are being determined between Germany and the world to-day. And shall we not listen to that voice? We must listen to it if we are to preserve this land with its freedom and its possibilities for our boys when they come home again. We must not introduce in this land the doctrine that the son of the labourer, born in the quiet cottage, is any less worthy before the law than he who was in a mansion overlooking half a county. Yet is not that what you declare in effect, if you say to labour to-day: we do not regard your voice, and it matters nothing, even though you believe that we have misled you and have followed a path which we said we would not follow. We must not allow that for the sake of the Canada that is yet to be. We must not create race divisions in this country. When I hear our friends talk about "these Frenchmen," I recall the history of the great nation to which we are so proud to belong. Are all the British race men of Saxon blood? No, Sir. They came to the tight little island people from many different nations of Europe—Angles, Saxons, Danes and Normans, and the Celts came to Scotland and Ireland. In the old land they had their difficulties of race, they had their problems to deal with, as we have in Canada. They worked out their destiny by good will and toleration, and they welded into one all these conflicting elements, making the imperial nation of to-day. We will follow where Britain has led, and by a policy of conciliation and good will among all the people of different nationalities, we will establish on this northern half of this continent a nation anxious only for the greatness of Canada, proud first and last of being Canadians and of being a nation within the great British Empire. Were that great leader, the late Sir John Macdonald, here to-day, animated by the feelings which guided him in dealing with these problems fifty years ago, he would tell how this situation should be met.

Mr. DAVIDSON: Would you support him?

Mr. MACDONALD: I certainly would support Sir John Macdonald on this question, because I know the position he would take. His career as a statesman is proof that if he were dealing with the questions confronting the Canadian people to-day, he would guide them along lines of toleration and good will, and not along lines of force and of coercion.

We should aim to build up in Canada a nation loving its land, a land of the free and home of the brave—powerful in its freedom to stand by the Empire in peace and in war. Wise men laid the foundations of our nation. On the basis of good will and toleration, they sought to prepare the conditions under which we might go on and attain our great destiny. If we, at the opening of the last half of our first century, fail to realize the broad principles on which they constructed their edifice, we shall not do our duty to this nation. Lord Shaughnessy, the other day, in a message to the Canadian people, said:

> The fifty years of Confederation have been fifty years of growing intercourse between East and West, but we still have much to learn of each other. In a time of crisis such as the present, it is our first duty to overlook differences of creed, of local interest, and of origin, and remember only that we are Canadian citizens of a great Empire which has taken up the cause of freedom against the aggression of a military caste. We must temper our criticism of each other's apparent shortcomings and devote our whole energies to the triumph of freedom and to constructive national effort.

We might well all follow the model here given by Lord Shaughnessy—that should be the purpose of all of us to-day—and out of the mists of the present, animated by the desire to play our full part in this great contest, let us trust our people and not coerce them; and by appealing to their best ideals of sacrifice and service we will get the highest results and keep this nation loyal and free, worthy of the great traditions of the past and strong and sure, prepared to face the future and its problems with pride and confidence.

Mr. ROCH LANCTOT (Laprairie-Napierville) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, last Friday, at a few minutes to eleven o'clock, I rose in this House to take up the discussion of this conscription Bill which we have been considering for more than two weeks. I had scarcely opened my mouth and uttered two words: "Mr. Speaker" when my hon. friend from Rimouski (Mr. Boulay) immediately sprang to his feet, upon a point of order, and asked if there was a quorum of the House. You had the roll called by the deputy Clerk of the House who stated, after taking down the names of the members present, that there was no quorum, so that the House was then adjourned until Tuesday, yesterday, at three o'clock in the afternoon.

I may add, Mr. Speaker, that to-day, I will tell you immediately that I am against conscription, in case my hon. friend for Rimouski should again rise on a point of order and there would be no quorum in this House. Therefore, I immediately declare myself against conscription.

This Bill, which we have been here discussing for over two weeks, is so far-reaching in its effects as regards the people of this country, that everyone is wondering where the Prime Minister is leading us to, as the Prime Minister has so often declared, in this House and elsewhere, that the pursuit of this war would forever be continued under the volunteering system.

In the course of the debate, in this House, on January 17, 1916, the hon. Prime Minister, speaking after the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) declared, explicitly that there never would be any conscription in this country. There is, therefore, nothing strange in the fact that the people of this country should want this war carried on without having such a measure of compulsion passed by Parliament.

As for me, I do not need this conscription Bill to say that I condemn the Government. On several occasions, I have spoken in this House about the carrying on of this war, stating that the Government had led us to bankruptcy, and after putting us in bankruptcy, they now want furthermore the blood of our children.

I agree with the great French and English statesmen. I have always agreed with the big London dailies which have, almost all of them, declared in their columns that to ask the people of Canada 150,000 men, was an extraordinary effort, and that England would never ask so much.

The people of this country have decided to do more than that—I commend the soldiers who have volunteered and enlisted—but, unfortunately, those who will have to foot the bill, after the war, will think as I do, that the enlisting went too far, even voluntarily.

Conscription, in my humble opinion, dates from the moment this Government has attempted to follow in the footsteps of the British government. We have had, some six months ago, the National Service cards, the Government wanting to know the man power of the nation, so they said. Our good papers of Montreal and all over the country, among them that sanctimonious Patrie of Montreal, which circulates in our counties declare day after day in its columns that there was no harm in signing those National Service cards; that the people should obey the State, and it was merely to know the man power of the nation, to work on the farms, to work in the ammunition factories, etc.

I had already declared, previously, in the county of Laprairie-Napierville, that this Government would surely bring about conscription, because I always remembered the statement made by the Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen) in his own province of Manitoba, that for this war, as he put it, we should give our last dollar and send our last man.

The hon. Solicitor General counts for much in this Government. It is he who gets the Government out of its difficulties, and I believe he is the Prime Minister's right bower. I may add, Mr. Speaker, that he is often called upon to defind its wrongdoings, for his party gets often enough in a quandary.

I therefore did tell them, at home, that we would have conscription. The Prime Minister has not fooled me; I know the Prime Minister better than my electors do, and even better than our bishops of the province of Quebec, who had taken his word and told us: submit, because the State demands it.

As to the National Service, my parish priest read that letter, which had been sent to him by his bishop and, after Divine service, I openly declared that I knew too well the right hon. Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) too well to have faith in his word and I further stated that these National Service cards were a step towards conscription. I also declared that, in the cases of dogma and religion, I followed the bishop's advice, but that, in politics, I claimed to be better informed than he could possibly be. To-day, these same people admit that I had then spoken the truth and that, indeed, I knew what was going on.

The Government and the politicians, of both parties, are not agreed upon this Military Service Act. Not being a lawyer, but a farmer, I will refrain from discussing pro or con, but I am comforted when I think that, in a general way, laws are made so that nobody can understand them.

Mr. BOULAY (Rimouski): (Translation) Not even the lawyers?

Mr. LANCTOT (Translation): The reason is to enable lawyers to make use of their accomplishments, and I am not at all surprised when I see that they do not quite agree upon this Compulsory Service Act. But, Mr. Speaker, this legal entanglement has, nevertheless, a bad side; it makes our judges grow old too soon and, consequently, we have to pay them pensions too young. At all events, I am glad that we have an ex-judge as Minister of Justice; he grasps my meaning and he may perhaps extend his co-operation towards changing present conditions. Now, that he enjoys fairly good health, that he has recovered his nerve and —no mean consideration,—that he receives a fair indemnity as a retired judge, minister and deputy, I say that he should turn all his efforts to improving the Militia Act of this country or any other Act, so that we may be able to discuss them in an intelligent way. Why not insert in the Militia Act that our troops shall be levied only for the defence of Canada, unconditionally? Now, Mr. Speaker, the best evidence of the fact that the Government do not understand our laws, as I stated a moment ago, is that they have not seen fit to rely upon the existing Militia Act, to levy volunteers and send them overseas. After all, that Militia Act may perhaps not be as bad as might be imagined, since the Government could not use it for sending our troops away.

Upon several occasions, I have declared, in this House, that I was in favour of a reasonable participation in this war; even to-day, I am of the same mind, and I believe all rational people will suport me in such an attitude; but when the people of this country are asked to bleed themselves to such an extent, I say: Let us stop, it is more than time to do it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what are the reasons given by the Prime Minister to justify the introduction of this conscription Bill? The reasons alleged are that our soldiers are loudly demanding reinforcements and, secondly, that we have trenches to defend in France and in Flanders. To this, I reply that we have no trenches in France, not having been consulted before the declaration of war and that, probably, we will not be consulted either when the matter of signing peace comes up. To my mind, it Was Canada's duty to aid the Allies in this war, but, I repeat it, having had nothing to do with the declaration of war, I maintain that we have no trenches to defend in Europe and that the countries who have and who must defend their trenches are France, England and Italy, but not Canada. That is why I oppose, as forcibly as I can, the sending of men to the other side.

We must be fair, Mr. Speaker. The son must assist his father, but he must do so according to his means. If, in helping his father, the son is going to ruin, I say that it is his duty to refuse his assistance. Applying that simile to Canada—and it is appropriate—I say that we must not go any further. I have spoken of this ticklish war question with many people and every one of them has told me that the stand I have taken in this House is surely that which should be taken by all the members and by the Prime Minister himself, if they have at heart the interests of the people whom they represent, before siding with the nations of Europe.

Mr. BOULAY: (Translation) Even the leader of the Opposition?

Mr. LANCTOT: (Translation) Certainly. What did really happen during this journey to England of the Premier and of his two colleagues, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) and the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. R. Rogers)?

I presume that the Minister of Public Works has had a great deal to do with this Bill for, if I can judge from what I read in the newspapers of this country, and especially in the papers friendly to the Minister of Public Works, something was needed to divert public poinion from the Minister of Public Works himself.

Mr. Speaker, you know that there has been a judgment rendered by a commission sitting in Winnipeg, out of which the Minister of Public Works has emerged something to the worse and on his last leg. Therefore, so as to face the electorate, it became somewhat necessary to save appearances, and, in order to shield a little the Minister of Public Works, to introduce this conscription Bill, so that nothing else could be discussed during the coming electoral campaign Conscription will, in fact, be the main topic of discussion in Quebec and in Ontario; but it will be discussed from one point of view in Quebec and from another one in Ontario.

I believe that the Bill is the master stroke of the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. Speaker, this Bill, and the clauses of which I have read, is called a "Selective" bill. The Government will be able to take soldiers wherever they please. The friends of the Government will say in the West: This is not for you; in Ontario, again it will probably not be for them, because they have done their duty, but we wish to reach Quebec, which has not given enough recruits,

The minister who just now represents the province of Quebec, Hon. Mr. Sévigny, was in Quebec last Sunday; he has given every one his share in Quebec; he is going to send from the city of Montreal 10,000 men; from the city of Quebec 1,000; from the municipalities, which number 1,200, ten each, I believe. That is not much, so he says, but I would like to know who are those who are ready to go, from Montreal, from Quebec and all the municipalities?

As the hon. minister belongs to the old city of Champlain, to Quebec city; as he is strongly in favour of conscription and of war, I do hope he will be the first one to leave Quebec and give the example to the other young men of that city to go and fight the good battles of the Empire. He is young and, moreover, this gentleman is a man of means. The wife of the hon. minister is well to do—it is far more cheerful, when you set out for the trenches, to leave your wife with enough to eat, as would say my good friend from Montcalm (M. Lafortune), to have some savings, and with her husband in the trenches, she will be comfortable during his absence.

Mr. Speaker, this conscription business will certainly lead to putting the two races at loggerheads in this country. By the Confederation compact—the fiftieth anniversary of which we have just celebrated—it had been decided that both nations, English and French, would retain their rights and respect their obligations. What is more sacred to us, French Canadians, than our language, our faith, our religion; and the enjoyment of these privileges in the way that Englishmen in this country have it, is denied us in several provinces of the Confederation, is denied us by the majority of the people?

We are asked, we French Canadians, to go and fight in France, in Flanders, to compel the Boches overseas, as they are called, or the Huns, respect the rights of the small nations; to have them respect Belgium's neutrality. That is very fine. But if, on the one hand, we, the French Canadians, are bound to go and see that the treaties, the agreements made by the great powers, be respected, to see that the rights of the weak be respected; I contend that, surely, in this country, the Englishmen should say: You, French Canadians of Quebec, you, French Canadians of Ontario and of Manitoba, you are weak, we shall give you your rights, and now enlist. There would be good sense in that. But, no, they maltreat the French Canadians, and then say: Enlist, go and defend those who are being outraged across the ocean, but as for you, here, we'll keep on maltreating you, and go on just the same.

Mr. Speaker, I have stated it on many occasions in this House, and I do state it again that, as a French Canadian, and being myself of military age, I shall not vote, for anything in the world, in favour of a measure which might enlist me under such circumstances; I would not enlist. I have always declared, and I declare it again, that not one single Canadian should enlist when we see how we are at present treated in this country, for, Mr. Speaker, it is not only in Germany that Boches are to be found; there are some in Ontario and in Manitoba, they are to be found in both political parties. It is here, that we, the French Canadians, must stand up and tell them: which foe have we got to face. But why always persecute the French Canadian and tell him he is not doing his duty, when that majority in the country is forever interfering with our rights and will not even grant the French Canadians, in this capital city of Ottawa, the right to have their children learn their mother tongue?

Is it a wonder now, if you go down into the province of Quebec, that among these same people, who know what is going on here, in Ontario, and in Manitoba, recruiting should be at a standstill? Mr. Speaker, I say they are right, they should remain at home and await developments.

Now, as to this conscription Bill, whom will it cause to go and fight for the Empire and for France? It will reach only our poor people, while the folk of the Board of Trade of Montreal, of Toronto and of the whole country, that is to say, the big wigs, the millionaires, those who are coining money out of the war,—as I see some of them in front of me, in this House,—these people have long been wanting conscription. They are in favour of conscription, they want the war to last as long as possible in order to hoard up still more millions.

We have even in this Government millionaires who favour conscription. Somebody has spoken of conscripting riches—the conscription of wealth. I would be in favour of extending conscription to all the millionaires who want conscription. I want to be fair. I would exempt all those who do not speak of it, but for all the millionaires in favour of conscription, I would introduce another Bill in Parliament, I would bring in and submit a Bill which would not be No. 75, but No. 76, and I would say: all millionaires of the country in favour of conscription will be left with $100,000 the day after to-morrow, and they shall retain no more, they will be allowed to start business over again, as in the past; but in the meantime they shall be left with $100,000 only. Rightly or wrongly, I understand there are about 300 of these gentlemen in the country. It may be exaggerated, I do not know. If there be 300, according to what I mean to do, by seizing 90 per 100, that would make a fine amount. There are some having more than one million, some have five millions, ten millions. With such a sum of money, we could send off 100,000 men, to suit these gentlemen. but I would want the men sent away on these gentlemen's behalf, to be paid $3 a day. That is not all. The wives of these soldiers should be maintained, during their husbands' absence, on the same style as the wives and children of these millionaires; that is to say, there would be no more use for this conscription Bill, and all these millionaires would be happy, since they want to continue the war and favour conscription. I think that is the best means to give them satisfaction.

Now, I have got several observations to make. As I see on the other side, members who understand me, the hon. member for St. Antoine (Mr. Ames) for instance, I beg of him to transmit to the Prime Minister and to his colleagues, the message I suggest, as to the Bill I would like to introduce.

Mr. Speaker, I spoke a moment ago of our millionaires of this country, of those very people who positively want to have 100,000 more Canadians sent over to the battlefields of Europe, in order to allow these gentlemen to make money. It is for this same reason that I suggest to the Government, when this conscription Bill will have been disposed of by this House, that they introduce another Bill bearing No. 76, and the object of which would be to seize 90 per cent of these gentlemen's money, in order to send off these 100,000 soldiers and to pay them well. If my suggestion be not accepted by the Government, is it necessary to send overseas 100,000 soldiers chosen among the people of this country, and that the Canadians remaining in the country provide for their expenses?

Let us first examine the present situation in Europe. England, so state several members who have taken part in this debate, has, at the very least, three million men who are not enlisted, three million men who have not answered their country's call and whom compulsory service, such as it exists in England, cannot reach. If my information is correct, there are at present in England, more than two million men ready to go and fight in France. I am further told that there are over a million young men, employed in the banks, in brokers' offices, in the theatres and in the moving-picture halls, who, like the others, are not yet enlisted. If such is the case, Mr. Speaker, why should Canada be called upon to do more in this war than England? If it be true that this war is Canada's war, it is still a hundred times more true that it is England's war, because for our mother country it is a question of life or death. In this war England has at stake the supremacy of the sea, and the supremacy of trade, whilst for us, for Canada, it would be no more, no less, only a change of master.
