I do not mean to say, Mr. Speaker, that I would be ready to change masters, but my idea is this one, that the outcome of the war is of much greater consequence for England than for us, because England is not used to be under master's lash, while, as far as we are concerned, we already have had two in the past and it would not be so hard on us to have a third one. I have stated more than once, in my previous remarks, that we had no trenches to defend, and that is certainly true. The Government tell us that we should fill the gaps made in our ranks by the foe and make good the terrible losses sustained lately my the Allies. Have we not, in England, as I have just said, two million men that might serve for the same purpose? I will go further. For some time past we have a new ally in this conflict. The United States have just entered into the fray; if that country, with its population of 112,000,000 and the wealth of the whole world, if that country, do I say, makes an effort in proportion to the one made by Canada since the beginning of the war, that means that they should send into the trenches of France and of Belgium, from 6,000,000 to 7,000,000 soldiers. It seems to me that the United States are more interested than we are in this war; they have been attacked while we have not, their ships have been attacked and sunk with many lives on board. I, therefore, say to the Government: Do put a stop right off to this war craze and do not lead the people of this country at such a pace to ruin, when others, more interested than we are, having both people and wealth, can, without any apparent effort, furnish those 100,000 soldiers we were to send, and even more. That seems to me as logical as indisputable. There is not a single sensible man, knowing this state of things, that could reply, plausibly, I will say more. with a speck of common sense, that Canada has not done her duty. The whole country acknowledges that the effort made by Canada, i. e. the enlisting of more than 400,000 men, out of a population such as our own, deducting all the foreign races living on our territory, and also the numerous exemptions specified, is most worthy of admiration. I therefore maintain that Canada has contributed to the same extent as any other nation fighting under the Allied standards.

Now, were there any reason to impose conscription in this country, it seems to me that should rather have been done some eight or ten months ago, when Russia's efforts had somewhat slackened, being short both of arms and ammunition; the revolution which broke out in that country might have been considered a reason for the British colonies to make a greater effort. But, when all those clouds have rolled by, when Russia has recently fought such battles with as great a success as at the beginning of the war, when the entrance of the United States into the conflict puts at the Allies' disposal inexhaustible treasures of men and of money, I do not actually see why the Canadian people should be asked to further bleed themselves.

Both the United States and Canada have had quite recently the visit of an eminent British statesman, I mean the hon. Mr. Balfour, who was honoured in the most important cities of the neighbouring republic, where he delivered quite a number of speeches. On every occasion, he always declared that the most urgent need of the present hour was not men, but ships, ships, and still more ships, as well as foodstuffs, for Europe was threatened with famine. He also came to Canada and did speak to the two Houses gathered in this hall. In his speech here, I do not find that he asked for soldiers, but on the contrary, he made a pressing appeal to the farmers, asking them to increase production for, did he say, foodstuffs are the great need of the present times He is not the only one, Mr. Speaker; other representative men, no less eminent, have expressed similar views. In June 1916, Sir George Paish wrote in the Statist:

> Victory over militarism will depend as much upon the farmers of the world generally and upon those of America and Canada, in particular, as upon the armies at the front.

In a recent number of the Echo de Paris, a noted writer, Mr. Maurice Barrés, writes as follows:

> We, the Allies, have the superiority of numbers and, in the Franco-British lines, we have even a million men more than the Germans facing us. As to the industrial supremacy, it is decidedly in our favour, on account of America entering in to the war.

In another French publication, the Paris Journal, Senator Humbert writes as follows:

> Stocks are exhausted. The neutrals themselves have come down to the allowance system. The new arrivals are lessening in number. Famine is threatening the whole world. I had foreseen, some twenty months ago, the present consequence of this dreadful crisis, when I said: Let us spare our reserves. But I was not listened to, no more than when I demanded a year ahead guns and ammunitions. Is not the danger most apparent to-day? There is only one remedy: to call back from the front-lines two or three hundred thousand Frenchmen, of the older classes, and settle them once more on the land. Such are the necessary means of recuperation. The condition of the armies, the immense numerical superiority of the Allies, on the Western front, compared with their opponents, permit of adopting without delay this method of recuperation. Let us hurry, for it is already very late, and to-morrow, perhaps, it will be too late.

In the face of these statesments by such eminent citizens, both in France and in England, I would like to know why the Government still persists in sending over soldiers and yet more soldiers, when France herself admits that it would be appropriate to recall home two or three hundred thousand men who are presently fighting in the trenches, in order to apply them to farm labour. Is it not true, Mr. Speaker, that, in Canada, the farmers cannot get the necessary labour, because these same people prefer to go and work in the munition shops where they earn $3, $5 and even $7 a day? We, farmers, cannot pay such excessive wages, specially in the province of Quebec, where farming pays less than in the western provinces, where wheat is particularly grown, although there may be other grain, but on a smaller scale. As forces, who are doing mixed farming, we cannot pay more than $30 per month for this kind of labour. I may frankly tell you that any farmer of the province of Quebec who would pay more than that, could not live there, and pay any interest however low the rate, if he owes anything on his land.

Now, you have also read in the newspapers, the opinion of a man of this country, the largest manager, I believe, there is in Canada, I want to speak of Baron Shaughnessy, whose views evidently, are worthy of consideration. I am not acquainted with him personally, I do not know his politics although I believe him to be a staunch Conservative, but, at all events, has he not, on more than one occasion, warned the Government? Has he not done it publicly, before the Montreal Board of Trade, in the presence of the ex-minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes) when he called upon him to stop volunteering? That was during the winter of 1916. Did he not warn us not to go too quick in the matter; that the people of the country could not stand such an extravagance; that some day the bill would have to be footed, and that, if war was to keep on, said he, one year more, we, in Canada, would be at war a year and a half or two years after the others, because, as he said, if you really intend sending 400,000 men to the other side of the Atlantic, it will take at last a year and a half or two years before you get them back from the front. Therefore do I say, Mr. Speaker, that upon such a statement, coming from such an authority, from a man who knows our country so well; for he personally took a hand in its development and he thoroughly knows our needs; knowing, above all, what is going on across the seas, the warning of this man is most opportune. I believe that he came to Ottawa quite recently, he must have warned the Premier—I was not present—but, I really believe he must have warned him of the danger he was running, as Prime Minister of this country, in bringing down a policy so contrary to the interests of this country, his conscription policy.

In the face of such a state of affairs, I do not understand and I never will understand—and I am not the only one in the country—that a Government having no mandate from the people, that is to say, that 105 men, or so, who support the Government in this House, in order to please perhaps the jingoes of a certain portion of the country, or to carry the elections, could impose upon a people of 7,000,000 souls compulsory military service without beforehand this Government consulting the people. I find this a most extraordinary proceeding in a country like ours. Australia, a British colony like ours, but composed almost entirely of Englishmen, has acted quite differently, the people of Australia were against conscription; they did prove it by the vote they gave upon the referendum which the Government had submitted to them. They defeated the Conscription Bill by their vote. General elections have been held since. Did the Prime Minister of Austraia ever declare to the people of his country that conscription would be applied, in Australia, without another vote being taken by means of a referendum? And here, in this Canada, where we number over 2,000,000 French Canadians in the province of Quebec, we whose ancestors have been here for centuries, we who have opened up Canada to civilization, in spite of what may say some hon. gentlemen, such as the member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) who spoke of the lamb of Quebec, we would be saddled with conscription without even being consulted! That shall not be. The lamb of Quebec, may I say to my friend Dr. Clark, is not mischievous towards its compatriots; the lamb of Quebec is the same lamb that gives the Englishmen of Quebec what they have the right to have; the Quebec Englishman is treated as the French Canadian lamb of Quebec; he has his schools, he practises his cult in his own way, he prays to his God as he sees fit, he is dealt with in the same way as the French Canadian in Quebec. I wish the member for Red Deer, who came to this country some fourteen or fifteen years ago, had made a better study of the history of the lamb of Quebec. I would tell the hon. member that, if he possesses a large farm to-day in the west, it is because the lamb of Quebec had gone forth, opening this country to civilization.

[M. Lanctot.]

And yet, this fine domain does not cost him much, I congratulate him, but the lamb of Quebec did greatly contribute to it.

I should have thought that a man who has gone through Oxford University, landed here a few years ago, would have said to the Englishmen of Ontario and elsewhere: You do not know, you, what the French Canadians are; you do not know, you, what these Frenchmen are, but I, who come from overseas, I know what are the Frenchmen of France, and in Quebec, you have the offspring of these Frenchmen.

My friend from Red Deer should have thought, when he spoke of the lamb of Quebec, of what these same Frenchmen have done at Verdun, in France, for the defence of civilization, before abusing the Frenchmen of Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to be very long now; however, I have some more remarks to submit to you. I always like to speak of this country's public debt.

As a business man, I learned that in order to get on in this world, in order to make a success of any undertaking, we must not go piling on deficits, and I wonder where the hon. Minister of Finance and where this Government will land the people of this country, should the war last a year or two years more, or possibly, three years. The gross debt to-day, is close on $1,500,000,000. Some will tell you, the Montreal papers, La Patrie and others in the Government's pay, will say that the debt is $800,000,000. Mr. Speaker, I say that the gross debt is the actual debt of the country, and that the assets which the Government holds, in many cases, are worth nothing; but the actual indebtedness is the gross debt. We will have, moreover, before long to see to the financing of our railroads, that is to say, the Grand Trunk Pacific, the Grand Trunk, the Canadian Northern. We will have to add to our national debt not less than $800,000,000 or $900,000,000. That must be done soon, for they are verging on bankruptcy. If we keep on as we are now started, great gods! where are we going to? Two years hence, our debt will have reached the three thousand million dollar mark. And the Prime Minister who has no mandate from the people, who has gone to England came back to us with a conscription scheme, which means adding some more hundreds of millions to our indebtedness. I would like to know if the Prime Minister of Canada represents the people of Canada, or if he does not represent the mother-country or the Imperial War Council in England?

I tell you that the Prime Minister of Canada should first represent the people of this country and take their interests, that is a thing we have not been able to discover since these gentlemen are governing us; but the hour will come when the people of this country will have their say about those who have been leading us to bankruptcy and to ruin for almost six years. But, Mr. Speaker, let the Government bring before this House as many conscription Bills as they please, let them try to disfranchise all the people they can in this country, there will always be enough left to punish them as they deserve.

I shall vote for the referendum, in favor of the amendment moved by the right hon. leader of the Opposition; I shall wote against the conscription Bill, and when this Government will come and ask for another extension, I propose to speak and to vote against it, for, Mr. Speaker, had I thought for one moment that the Government, when they solicited from us last year another lease of life for Parliament in order to carry on the war, that they would have enacted conscription, I frankly declare that I, for one, would never have agreed to such extension. Since they have done so without any mandate, without the Opposition's authorization, I propose to speak and vote against it.

There is another thing I almost forgot to say: the Government through their leader, after introducing their conscription Bill, have attempted to form a coalition government, tried to get the " rouges " with them in order to have the people swallow this conscription question, in spite of themselves. Even had I known I was to be the only one to do so, I would have denounced, single-handed, all those who would have formed that coalition government. If there was any justification for a coalition government, before passing the Bill, I say there is a hundred times more justification for an appeal to the people after the passing of this conscription Bill, and I beg the Prime Minister to ponder a little on what he is doing, and not impose this Bill upon the people of this country without beforehand consulting them.

That is all I had to say to you, Mr. Speaker, and I thank you for listening to me.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. CLARENCE JAMESON (Digby): Mr. Speaker, it is my intention to occupy but a few moments of the time of the House, as I feel that at this hour the country is calling for acts, not for words.

I listened to the speech of the member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald), to-day with a great deal of interest, especially when he was dealing with the amendment of the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) which calls for a referendum. My hon. friend's speech was energetic; it was more than energetic; it was lengthy; it was an able defence of a very weak cause. My hon. friend is an able lawyer, but the inherent weakness of his case was that the leader of the Opposition has heretofore been opposed to the principle of referendum. My hon. friend went on to contrast the sad, sad days under Conservative rule with the glad, glad days under a Liberal ministry, and he charged the ministers of this Government with various sins of omission and commission. He compared the pure government of by-gone days with this Government, which he painted so darkly. As he compared them, I was reminded of those lines in the opera Utopia with which you Mr. Speaker, and the members of the House are doubtless familiar. You remember that the princess presented the lawyer to her father the king, in these words:

A complicated gentleman allow me to present
Of all the arts and faculties, the terse embodiment;
He's a great arithmetician who can demonstrate with ease,
That two and two make three or five or anything you please.
A wondrous logician, he can make it clear to you
That black is white when looked at from the proper point of view.
A marvellous philologist, he'll undertake to show
That "yes" is but another and a neater form of "No."

As I listened to my hon. friend from Pictou I thought how marvellous the coincidence that the poet could have described so accurately the hon. member and the lawyer in the opera within the same ten lines of poetry. But my hon. friend's better nature finally came to the surface and although at the commencement of his speech he most vigorously attacked the ministry, he threw out, I think, the olive branch, and as he closed I almost felt that he was willing to accept a seat in a coalition government. And, Mr. Speaker, if the hon. gentleman were to enter a coalition government or any other government, he would bring ability, energy, application, and enthusiasm to the Cabinet. I am sure that no person will agree more readily with me than the hon. gentleman himself when I say in all sincerity that he would be a very successful minister.

The Military Service Bill which the right hon. the Prime Minister has introduced provides for the raising of 100,000 men as reinforcements for overseas service by means of the selective draft, that number being required in the future upon the highest military authority. Every one who has familiarized himself with existing conditions knows that these men are available, without drawing upon labour engaged in the vital or essential industries of the country.

The right hon. the leader of the Opposition has proposed an amendment that the principle of the Bill be referred to the people of Canada by means of a plebiscite; a cautious policy in time of peace, but one which the right hon. gentleman did not heretofore favour; a faltering and dangerous policy, I believe, in time of war, with 20 per cent of our voters overseas, and one which will not provide the required men.

The hon. member for Berthier (Mr. Barrette) has moved an amendment to defer the further consideration of this Bill for six months, which is the parliamentary method of stating that Canada has no business in this war; a question which was disposed of, once and for all, in August 1914, when this Parliament unanimously pledged Canada's participation in this sacred cause to a triumphant conclusion.

The question can thus be condensed to one as to which system shall be carried out in future, that of voluntary service or the selective draft. Voluntary service has hitherto proved sufficient in small wars. Many supposed it would always meet our requirements, and had all parts of Canada contributed equally, it might have served in this war. However, it has proved inadequate and improvident. In my opinion, voluntary enlistment has proceeded far enough; it has proceeded so far as already to strain the economic efficiency of Canada. If proceeded with further it cannot but seriously impair our economic efficiency, by drawing men from the vital and essential industries, with possible dire consequences to this country. Most of us appreciate the fact that the world is confronted with a food shortage, one which may result in a famine so widespread that the famine of ancient Egypt would appear trivial by comparison. The western hemisphere, and Canada in particular, is especially favourably situated in this respect, for Canada is an exporting country. But, even in Canada, unless we see to it in time, there may be a serious shrinkage of food production, with equally serious consequences to ourselves and our Allies, who, in some measure, are dependent upon us. This means that our man-power engaged in the vital and essential industries must be kept at productive work, to prevent the danger of disaster both at home and abroad.

Now, to those who still favour voluntary service, I would ask, if, by some magical or new method, the 100,000 men required could be secured by voluntary enlistment within three months, could Canada afford to spare them? The answer must be certainly not, but why? Every member of this House, in his heart of hearts, knows that not 25 per cent of these men, no not 10 per cent of them, would be those that a selective draft would yield. The selective draft would reach those who have not enlisted, and who will not voluntarily enlist, the very men the country can spare, namely, the men engaged in non-essential industries. This, the tribunals provided for by the Bill would decide. It is, therefore, to the men whom the country can spare that our soldiers must look for reinforcements, and, by voluntary enlistment, they cannot be obtained. Hence, the choice is not between voluntary enlistment and conscription, but is really between reinforcements by conscription, on the one hand, and no conscription and no reinforcements on the other.

In my opinion the Bill should pass and the amendments should not be adopted. If the referendum carries, what does it mean? It means that we pass a vote of want of confidence in ourselves, and in this House. A vote of want of confidence, which the people of Canada following our lead would certainly ratify, if the question were referred to them by means of a plebiscite.

I impute motives to no man. Every member of this House is the keeper of his own conscience, but, as I view it, if either the amendment to defer the consideration of the Bill, or the amendment to refer the principle of the Bill to the people by a plebiscite, be adopted, it means, if not in purpose yet certainly in effect, that Canada's sustained participation in this war ends. Ends not because valour has forsaken the breasts of Canada's soldiers in the trenches, but ends because, shall I not say it?—ends because the spirit of betrayal of our soldiers has entered the breasts of those in Canada, whom they voluntarily went overseas to defend. It means that we, in this House, think more of our political lives than of the lives of those Canadians who, with their crushed and bleeding bodies, helped to stem the tide of Prussian barbarism, which otherwise would have overrun the world.

To-day, for the world and for Canada, peril stands in the gateway. It did not cease to exist when the Huns dug themselves in, from the sea to the Alps. Young Canadian volunteers thrust themselves between us and that human torrent of hate and fury, which seeks to submerge civilization, law and order. The line they hold is as vital to our safety as the line which is held by Great Britain or by France. For them in the trenches there is not rest day or night, Sunday or week day. Every moment they are defending those in Canada of whom we in this Parliament are the representatives. They cannot always get sufficient time off to restore exhausted nature, because of ceaseless bombardment and lack of reinforcements. Meantime in Canada the Lord's Day Act and eight hour law protect from overtime the men whom the country can spare, the men engaged in non-essential industries, the men whom this Bill only can prevail upon to go overseas. Should that line give way, either for lack of reinforcements or for any other reason, and the Huns win down to the French coast, the only law this country would eventually know would be the will of the Kaiser and Von Hindenburg. Almost 2,000 years ago, the Emperor Nero fiddled while Rome burned, and history has never let the shameful fact be forgotten. Shall the Parliament of Canada in effect duplicate his despicable act? I trust not.

My conception of the situation is this: That no member of this House can escape his responsibility. Be he prominent or be he the reverse, history will record of him for future generations that in the supreme hour he stood for either national dignity or for national decadence;

That every member must line up for or against those men in the trenches and for or against the future existence of Canada as the free country it now is. For let it not be forgotten that those who leave others to defend them necessarily become thereby their vassals;

That the alternative of this Bill virtually means, so far at least as we are concerned, the abandonment of our voluntary defenders to their fate and the abandonment of our country to the most ruthless foe the powers of darkness have ever let loose upon the earth.

What human standards or rules of conduct have thus far survived this awful war —a war whose battle line is 3,000 miles in length; a war in which thirty millions of armed men have contended; a war which will shape the destinies of nine hundred million human beings; a war with, literally, its thousand battles and shaking a hundred thrones? If in this war all other standards have been swept away, two at least have survived. One is that standard of physical and moral courage which Canadian soldiers have assisted in elevating to its loftiest plane; the other is that standard of national and international good faith which requires of us that we supply reinforcements to those soldiers in the trenches. They at least have worthily performed their duty in the face of stupendous difficulties—difficulties relatively much greater than those with which we in this House and in this country are confronted. If we face our difficulties as a united Parliament and people, they will lessen and finally disappear. Therefore I would say to my fellow members in this House: Let the Parliament of Canada, setting aside all other considerations, emulate the example of our forces in the field, face courageously our difficulties and, by overcoming them, prove ourselves worthy of the sacrifices which our men across the seas have made as well for us as for our people and our country.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES (Kings, P.E.I.): Mr. Speaker, my remarks upon this Bill will be very brief, but I wish to place on record the position I take with regard to it I consider that the strenuous and serious times through which we are passing make it necessary for the Parliament and people of Canada to exercise the greatest moderation and prudence, lest in our efforts to preserve the peace of the world we lose our own.

The right Hon. A. J. Balfour, when he was here a few weeks ago, said:

> We are convinced that for every human combination that has reached the degree of civilization and development that has been reached by all the great western communities, there is but one form of government, under whatever name it may be called, and that is the government in which the ultimate control lies with the people. We have staked our last dollar upon democracy, and if democracy fail us we are bankrupt indeed. But I know that democracy will not fail us.

I sincerely hope that Mr. Balfour's vision in regard to the ultimate triumph of democracy may be fulfilled.

The Government, as well as several influential newspapers throughout the country, tell us that voluntary enlistment has broken down and that if we are to do our fair share in the prosecution of this terrible war, compulsory service must be resorted to immediately. If these statements be true, a case for compulsory service is made out. But are they true? The mere fact that the number of men now offering themselves for overseas service is much less than in the early days of the war is not of itself sufficient proof that the voluntary system has failed. The number of men able to go to the front and the number of men that Canada can spare for overseas service, even under the most urgent circumstances, must necessarily grow less as the months and years go by.

Again it is stated, and, I think, proved, that the voluntary system has never received anything like a fair trial. Hear what a minister and an ex-minister of the Crown say in this regard. The Postmaster General (Mr. Blondin), who went down to Quebec some weeks ago to recruit, says of his experience there:—

> Short as it was, it was enough to show that if Quebec had been well organized from the French-Canadian point of view at the beginning of the war, and if the organization had been immediately placed under the direction of a man like General Lessard, and an appeal made to all French Canadians to enlist in French Canadian units and preserve their identity, Quebec would have replied en masse.

Who was to blame for the discreditable way in which the business of recruiting was handled in Quebec? Surely the Government of which Colonel Blondin was and is a member, and his colleagues from that province were and are supporters. Surely it was the duty of the Government to see that the viewpoint of the French Canadians in Quebec received some consideration. It would almost seem as if every proper sentiment in Quebec had been outraged to prevent recruiting, so that the voluntary system might break down, or that that province might be charged with lack of patriotism. If this be so, what a terrible responsibility rests upon the Government as a whole, but particularly upon the French Canadian members of the Government. I am led to make these remarks from the fact that in every other province of the Dominion the Canadians of French descent responded to the call of duty in proportion to their numbers as nobly as any other class of the population except the British born.

About the campaign that was waged in Quebec by the so-called Nationalists in 1910 and 1911, aided, abetted, encouraged and financed by the Conservative party I will not say anything beyond stating that if the English-speaking members of the Government and the English-speaking members of the party have a conscience, it must give them many a pang for the pernicious seed which they helped to sow on that occasion, the harvest of which we are now reaping.

The spectacle that was presented only a month or two ago in Quebec would be ludicrous if it were not so serious, and the Government should be ashamed of itself. Col. Blondin, a member of the Government, and General Lessard recruiting for the overseas forces, and at the same time Col. Armand Lavergne in military uniform, and in the service and pay of the Government, recruiting for home defence, and denouncing the sending of troops beyond the seas. In the name of common sense why were troops needed for home defence? Who were going to attack us in Canada? The present Minister of Militia (Sir Edward Kemp) is a business man and is supposed to have some sense. Would he in his private business put half of his office staff at work to undo what the other half was trying to do, and expect success? Col. Blondin, a member of the Government, and Col. Lavergne, in the service of the Government, opposing each other and rehearsing in public "The Comedy of Errors!" The people, as you might expect, either laughed at the pantomime, or turned away in disgust.

But the worst performance of all, if there can be degrees of comparison in anything the Government has done in regard to recruiting, was the admission by the Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Sevigny) that he had tried to get a man appointed to a lucrative position in the Civil Service because he had opposed recruiting in Quebec by publishing articles in his paper against it, and he thought that would be a good way to stop him. Yet under those circumstances the Government has the hardihood to blame Sir Wilfrid Laurier for the situation there.

But unfortunate as the situation is in that province, it is exaggerated and misrepresented by several newspapers in Ontario, and with what object? The object of promoting racial harmony, I suppose. A few days ago the hon. member for North

Grey (Mr. Middlebro) who will not be accused of being prejudiced in favour of Quebec, gave us the total enlistments from each province, and Quebec was credited with 44,000. The figures seemed to have been compiled with a great deal of care and were, no doubt, accurate, because other hon. gentlemen from Ontario, speaking since, have made them larger. The papers to which I have referred, have stated, day in and day out, week in and week out, that the total enlistments from Quebec are but 29,000. What can be the object of such misrepresentation, and why is it resorted to? The Lord only knows. It is evident, however, that the winning of the war is not the only object of all Canadians at the present time. Listen to what the ex-Minister of Militia and Defence (Sir Sam Hughes) says in regard to the way in which voluntary recruiting was handled in the province of Quebec and in all the other provinces. Only a few days ago he stated in this House that several members of the Government had hampered him in his recruiting work, and that finally the Prime Minister himself had asked him to "go slow." He said that the Government had been influenced by the war profiteers who did not want to have their business interfered with by having the number of their employees reduced or their immense profits curtailed, and he further stated that he had documentary evidence, even letters from the Prime Minister himself, to prove these statements. But we have additional evidence of the changed attitude of the Government towards voluntary enlistment. In the early days of the war they passed an Order in Council giving the members of the Civil Service who enlisted their military pay and their Civil Service pay as well.

This was more than generous. Later on, they passed another Order in Council giving them an amount equal to their Civil Service pay only, and last spring they passed another Order in Council cutting out the Civil Service pay entirely and giving them military pay only. This was tantamount to telling them they did not want any more of them to enlist, and that they would be penalized if they did enlist. And when we add to this the fact that some of the ministers publicly stated they would not allow their clerks or officials to enlist because of the inconvenience it would make in the office work, can you wonder, Mr. Speaker, that private employers would hesitate to reduce their office and their other help to the point of great personal inconvenience?

But probably the worst blow that voluntary recruiting did or could receive was the outstanding fact that from the day that war was declared the object of the Government seemed to be how best to enrich their party friends and benefit themselves politically, as witness the nauseating scandals that were brought to light in the purchase of horses, drugs, binoculars, motor trucks, and, in fact, everything that was purchased for the army; as witness the evolutions of that notorious scoundrel, Col. J. Wesley Allison, who with a few Yankee associates, was able to walk off with a million dollars, who was able to give his lady stenographer a present of $105,000, his flute player $50,000, and other pals from $10,000 to $70,000 each; who was able by reason of his association with the Government to bring into Canada from the United States trainloads and scow loads of goods without paying a cent of duty on them, or without even having them entered or examined at the customs house. There was no danger of Col. Allison losing his soul by trucking and trading with the Yankees. He was able to sell millions of rounds of Government ammunition from the Government arsenal in Quebec at a profit of tens of thousands of dollars to himself. As witness the further fact that the ex-Minister of Militia was able to give his lady stenographer a shovel contract whereby the taxpayers of Canada were mulcted out of thirty or forty thousand dollars. And, as witness the still further fact that the grafting and the profiteering were not stopped or even checked in Canada until Lloyd George, with all the multifarious duties, responsibilities and burdens which he was carrying, had to send a man across three thousand miles of ocean to save the taxpayers of the Dominion and the taxpayers of the Old Land from being literally robbed of tens of millions of dollars, while our Government of fourteen men were looking hopelessly or helplessly on, and either could not or would not bend their little finger to end the disgraceful orgie. Such a condition of things would not only stop recruiting, but would almost justify any action on the part of an outraged people.

I have stated that from the day war was declared the object of the Government seemed to be how best to enrich their party friends and benefit themselves politically; and to carry out this purpose it was necessary that Liberals be carefully excluded from all positions of honour or emolument, and that from time to time it be insinuated and in fact stated that the Liberal party from Sir Wilfrid Laurier down was tainted with disloyalty. Liberals, of course, were expected to take their full share of the burdens and sacrifices, and to their eternal credit be it said they did not shirk their duty in this regard. To prove this statement I will cite some instances from my own province of which I have personal knowledge.

The first two young men from our province to make the supreme sacrifice were from Liberal households—McKinnon and McManus. In their boyhood they had been playmates and schoolmates, and in their early manhood, companions. Now they sleep not far apart in the soil of France. McKinnon's father kept a small lighthouse on the coast, but was dismissed from that position by this Government. Was there any resentment in McKinnon's heart or in his son's heart? Well, actions speak louder than words. I suppose the McKinnons were disloyal.

The next case I will mention is that of Capt. McDonald. Capt. McDonald had sailed the seven seas in charge of square rigged ships, had been in command of freight and passenger steamers, but his wife being in poor health he was willing to accept an inferior position at home where he could be near his family. Consequently the late Government gave him charge of one of the dredges. He is a splendid type of citizen, and his record in the 9 p.m. department was first class in every respect. He was no political partisan in any sense of the word, having voted but two or three times in his life, being generally away at sea when an election would be held. The Conservative members from Prince Edward Island and every man in Canada who knows Capt. McDonald will endorse every word I have said in his behalf. Did his record save him? No, he was dismissed from the service. When the war broke out his three sons were of military age—splendid specimens of young manhood, and all at work; boys of their type would not be idle. Donald heard the call and went with the first contingent. He has been twice wounded, recuperated at one of the base hospitals, and is back fighting again in the trenches. About eighteen months ago, George, the second son, volunteered. He has been at the front about a year. These boys did not resent the treatment their father had received. I suppose the McDonald family are disloyal.

[Mr. J. J. Hughes.]

Now what I particularly complain of is this: There are a number of military positions on Prince Edward Island all filled by Conservatives. Some of the men who fill these positions have neither sons nor near relatives at the front. Some of these positions Captain McDonald could creditably fill. Has he been invited to do so? Oh no. He is a Liberal and no Liberal need apply, except for a position in the trenches. Are there many military positions of emolument on Prince Edward Island? I think there must be a good many. A few days ago I put this question on the Order Paper:

> What are the names and addresses of the parties on P.E.I. who have been engaged or who are now engaged in recruiting for the army and navy or doing other work of a like military character, since August, 1914? 2. What remuneration or pay does each of the said parties receive, and what allowance is given for travelling or other expenses? 3. What is the total amount each person has received up to the 1st June, 1917?

This question was changed to an order of the House for a return, the number employed being so large, I presume, that it was not easy to count and tabulate the several amounts that had been paid, and give the same in an answer of ordinary length. Consequently the question was changed into an order for a return. When we get the return I venture a statement that a Liberal will not be found on the list, with the exception perhaps of one or two medical examiners.

The next case that comes to my mind is that of Louis Meurant, a Frenchman and a Liberal. Louis had a large family of children, and when the war broke out his eldest son was just of military age. Louis was only a poor working man who was not supposed to know or to feel much. He needed his son's help as much, I think, as the Minister of Trade and Commerce needed the assistance of his private secretary, whom he would not allow to enlist. Did Louis hesitate or weigh the consequences? No, twelve or fifteen young men were going from the town with the first contingent, and Meurant asked his son if he were going to be one of the number. The boy answered that he did not know. The father said "yes, you are going to be one of the number. If you do not go I will go. One of us is going anyhow." Of course the boy went, and a few months ago he was invalided home seriously wounded. These are but samples, and this is the spirit that was behind voluntary enlistment in the early days of the war, grand, noble, incomparable. This is the spirit that would still be behind it but for the mean, sordid, inhuman, diabolical grafting and profiteering, some of which has been brought to light, and further, if it were not for the cowardly and villainous insinuations, backed up and supported by action, that Liberals are not as loyal and as whole-heartedly devoted to the winning of the war as are their Conservative fellow-countrymen.

Can it be truthfully said that the voluntary system has broken down in Canada when we have sent across the seas a larger army in proportion to our population than has ever been raised by voluntaryism in the world's history? When we remember that our seven and a half millions are scattered over a country as large as Europe or the United States of America, it will be seen that we have done wonders to accomplish this and to keep all our essential industries going at the same time.

Now a word or two with respect to the principle of this Bill. Conscription is, of course, the fair and democratic method of conducting a war such as that in which we are now engaged, but it must be conscription all round. Conscription of everything that is necessary to the winning of the war. It has been well said that you cannot compensate a man, in a monetary sense, for the sacrifice of his life—but that is no reason why all the compensation that is possible to make should not be given him or his family. Those who cannot fight should be willing to surrender all they have, if need be, to win the war, and to compensate, as far as possible, those who offer their lives. On the other hand, it is a great privilege to be able to fight,—a privilege that comes to but a few men, viz., the young, the hardy, and the strong. We shall all die in a few years anyhow and

"Where can man die better than fighting fearful odds
For the ashes of his fathers and the temples

Is there a man in all Canada who would not die fighting for the protection of his own home, or his father's home, or his neighbour's home, from the ravisher and the destroyer?—and what is the nation but the aggregation of its homes. And in my opinion Canadian homes are being as truly protected on the battle-fields of Europe as they could be protected at Halifax or St. John or on the banks of the St. Lawrence. Therefore, a measure, call it what you like, that places upon everybody the burden he is best able to bear is both fair and democratic. But because it is fair and democratic, it must be conceived in fairness and above and beyond all, it must be administered in fairness. This is the crux of the question, and with all the good will in the world, and looking at the thing as dispassionately as I can view it, I must say that this Government, judging from its record, will not enforce conscription fairly. Therein lies the danger. Men will put up with a great deal of unfairness under a voluntary system, but they will not submit to unfairness and compulsion at the same time, and they would not be Canadians if they did. And is it fair to say to one man you may work in a munitions factory at from three to six or eight dollars a day, and to another you shall risk your life in the trenches and put up with all the discomforts of warfare for $1.10 a day? The people will not submit to such discrimination.

Everybody will admit that this question has been sprung upon Parliament and the people without any education or preparation whatever, and under these circumstances, people will wonder whether it is for the purpose of helping to win the war or whether it is for the purpose of covering up in the excitement and turmoil it is sure to cause, the record of the Government and the record of a minister who, to say the least, is under grave suspicion. If we bear in mind a few facts in connection with the question they may perhaps enable us to form a correct judgment upon this point. From the beginning of the war till the Prime Minister returned from England a few weeks ago, every utterance of the Government was against conscription. Last fall the Director General of National Service (Mr. R. B. Bennett) declared at a public meeting that what he had seen and heard in the West in company with the Premier convinced him that conscription would be followed by civil war. And when the Civil Service cards were sent out, the clergymen who were asked to encourage the people to sign them were told to announce that it did not mean conscription, and they so announced. Last spring the Minister of the Interior issued circular letters inviting immigrants from the United States, and stating that conscription would not be applied in Canada. And during this session on April 30, the present Minister of Militia announced in the House that the Government had never even considered conscription. Now what did all this mean if it was not to prepare the public mind against the idea of conscription, and that conscription in itself was a thing to be avoided? More than that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) and the Minister of Finance went up and down the country telling us that production and more production was the thing that was needed. I will admit that circumstances and conditions might have changed to justify this change on the part of the Government, but where is the evidence of that—we have received none.

Did the British Government suggest to the Prime Minister when he was in England the adoption of this policy? No, they did not. The Prime Minister when introducing the Bill stated—see Hansard, page 2280:

> Some people with a diseased imagination have asserted that I took my present course at the request or dictation of the British Government. No more absolute falsehood was ever uttered by human lips. The subject was never discussed between myself and any member of the British Government. If there had been any such suggestion from them, I for one, would not have tolerated it.

Now, Sir, I do not for one moment pretend to have any knowledge of high statecraft, but I think the man on the street will ask what the Premier went to the Imperial Conference for, if not to give and receive suggestions. Where could the Premier go, if not to the British Government or some member of it, to get information as to what it was advisable or necessary for Canada to do, or try to do? Did the Prime Minister get his information by inspiration on the ship that carried him home across the Atlantic? Would it have been a bad thing if the Prime Minister had not only consulted the British Government, but the United States Government as well, and the best minds in Canada also, as to what we were expected to do, or could do, in the stupendous struggle in which we are all engaged? It appears to me that it would only be by such consultation that our joint efforts could be properly organized and coordinated. But the right hon. leader of the Government knew it all and did not need the advice of anybody.

> Now let us see what the Right Hon. A. J. Balfour, who came to America a few days after the arrival of the Prime Minister, thought in regard to this matter. He said that what was needed by England and her Allies was "Food first and military aid later."

Then we have the declaration of Lord Rhondda, Food Controller of Great Britain, on the 19th of last month. He said:

> The Allies rely on Canada and the United States to supply food. We are doing what we can off our own bat by increasing home production and decreasing consumption, but in the main the solution of the primary problem of supplies lies in the hands of our American Allies and Canada. I am sure they will not "let us down."

Later still we have the statement of our own food controller, Hon. Mr. Hanna, who declares that:

> Great Britain, France, Italy, Belgium and their European allies are wholly unable to supply the Allied armies at the front, and the quantity needed to maintain the campaign must come largely from this side of the Atlantic. If in a month or so people on the continent begin to note the effects of the war on their breakfast tables they will know that they are curtailing their appetites in a great cause.

Mr. Hoover, the American Food Controller, agrees with these men, and some of the most experienced and practical men in Canada have stated that we cannot take any more men from the essential industries without crippling our productive capacity.

Does the Prime Minister know more than all these men put together? If so he must have got the knowledge he possesses by inspiration, because up till the time he returned from England neither he nor any of his Cabinet in Canada had the remotest idea that conscription would be necessary. And right here a serious question arises—if up to a few weeks ago, and having been at war for two years and nine months, our Government were totally ignorant in regard to what was vitally necessary to sustain our troops in the field at proper fighting strength, then no greater proof of incompetence ever was or could be given to the people.

Another thought that strikes me in regard to this statement of the Premier that he would not tolerate a suggestion from the British Government or any member of it with respect to this matter is this: Suppose Sir Wilfrid Laurier had returned from an Imperial Conference and made such a statement, why Sir, he would be denounced from one end of Canada to the other, and the statement itself would be held up as proof positive of disloyalty. Of course no one would question Sir Robert Borden's loyalty. But, then, I forgot, a Tory cannot be disloyal; the thing would be impossible.

A statement made by the Prime Minister in moving the second reading of the Bill deserves, I think, more consideration than it has hitherto received either in the House or in the country. Here it is:

> If what are left of 400,000 such men come back to Canada with fierce resentment, and even rage in their hearts, conscious that they have been deserted and betrayed, how shall we meet them when they ask the reason? I am not so much concerned for the day when this Bill becomes law, as for the day when these men return if it is rejected.

Here we have the plain, unvarnished and tremendously important fact, that the Premier did not hesitate to threaten the Commons of Canada with the wrath of the soldiers if the members dared to exercise their constitutional rights by voting according to the dictates of their conscience and according to what they believed to be in the true interests of the country.

Of course there was no evidence of what the army thought in regard to the matter under consideration, and at the time the Premier spoke there was no certainty as to how the members would vote, but this does not change the gravity and seriousness of the First Minister's threat, but rather emphasizes it. Here we have the civil power threatened with the wrath of the military power, if the civil power dares to exercise its rights and its proper functions. Here is the spirit of Prussian militarism displayed by the Premier, consciously or unconsciously, in all its naked deformity. Here we have the spirit behind the Zabern incident, when the Prussian military officer cut down the lame shoemaker on the street because the latter did not salute the officer in true subservient style. Is the danger of losing our own liberties while fighting to preserve the liberties of the world so remote after all? Even the Montreal Gazette, good Tory organ that it is, in its issue of to-day rebukes the Prime Minister for making a statement calculated to incite the military against the civil population.

In some quarters it is stated that this Bill is aimed at Quebec, that the people of that province having failed to do their duty, conscription is necessary to compel them to discharge that duty. In fact, it has been stated that but for the slackness of Quebec the Bill would not be necessary at all. Here is what the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Arthurs) stated:

> I might say, however, that if the province of Quebec had done its duty, this Bill would have been entirely unnecessary, and the required 500,000 men would have been raised.

But the hon. the Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen) the other day said the Bill was not aimed at Quebec so much as at some of the other provinces, and that very few men from Quebec would be called to the colours under its provisions. Remember, this is the man who framed the Bill and who, consequently, knows more about its provisions, and will have more to do with its enforcement, than any other man in Canada. That there may be no mistake, let me quote his exact words:

> We of English-speaking Canada have the kindest feelings towards our French Canadian compatriots. We realize that there are certain considerations having to do with this subject of recruiting that apply to them that do not apply with the same force to us. This Bill in its results will work more lightly on the Province of Quebec than on any other province in Canada.

So we are to have not only favoritism and discrimination as between individuals, as we have had all along, but favouritism and discrimination as between provinces. I ask in all sincerity: Is this a Bill to help win the war, or a Bill to help win elections? Are we gambling with the flesh and blood of the nation?

In addition to this the Bill is not to come into force until it is proclaimed by the Governor in Council, and it may be a long time until the proclamation is issued. So the more the Bill is examined and the more it is explained, the more clearly do we see there is more politics in it than appears on the surface, and the more clearly do we observe the hope that in the noise and the confusion it will cause many many things will be forgotten; that, for instance, the slimy trail of the serpent of grafting and private profiteering which disgraced the country may be forgotten.

The reason I intend to vote for the amendment moved by the right honourable leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) is that it is one way of consulting the people—and the people should and must be consulted. Some of the members supporting the Government say that a referendum is not necessary, because the vast majority of the people are in favour of the Bill. If that be so, the referendum is most desirable, because we will then have conscription and a united Canada behind it. Other members supporting the Government, and some members of the Government themselves say they will not have a referendum because conscription would be defeated by a large majority. If that be so, how in the name of common sense do the Government expect to enforce conscription, except by strife and insurrection—and is that the way they intend to win the war? Again, some people say that the referendum is un-British. Well, it was not considered un-British in Australia, but perhaps they are not as loyal there as we are in Canada —not loyal enough to satisfy our Tory friends and some of our lachrymose friends on this side of the House. Nor was it considered un-British in England, because the Right Hon. A. J. Balfour, leader of the Unionist party, speaking upon such a prosaic thing as the tariff, said:—

The advantage of a referendum is this: that the issue is quite clear and quite precise. A referendum has an enormous advantage. It does not involve a general election; it does not involve all the personal bitterness inevitably involved in a contest between the two competitors for a seat; it does not carry with it a change of government; and it does get a clear verdict from the people.

But perhaps Balfour is not British enough for our high Tory friends.

So far as I am personally concerned, what I believe in most of all is a general election, because it, better than anything else, will clear the atmosphere—that is, providing we have an honest election. If, however, the Government tampers with the constitution and holds an election with loaded dice, they will infuse a spirit of unrest and dissatisfaction into the people of this country which will lead to dire results, the end of which no man can see. Only the day before yesterday we celebrated the fiftieth birthday of Confederation—the fiftieth anniversary of our national life, and reference was naturally made to all we had accomplished in the last half century. But, once again I say, this Government, by using arbitrary and harsh methods and following the policy upon which they appear to have embarked, can start a conflagration which will not be extinguished in the next fifty years.

If we have a general election and the Government be returned to power—which God forbid—they will come back, if not purified, at least strengthened by having a mandate from the people. They can then enforce conscription with some show of reason, and I for one, whether in Parliament or out of Parliament, shall give them all reasonable assistance in the enforcement thereof. On the other hand, if they force this conscription Bill through, and also by reason of their majority in this House and in the Senate, force the extension resolutions through, and then try to enforce conscription in the arbitrary and unfair manner I fear they will employ, we shall have Prussianism—naked Prussianism—and I tremble for the consequences. Only a miracle will prevent strife and all its consequent evils. If the Liberals be returned to power we shall have an honest democratic Government in which the people will have confidence; a Government that will employ all the resources of the country towards winning the war, employing conscription for that purpose if necessary, but conscription all around. I do not believe it would be necessary, however, because, the people knowing they could trust the Government to act honestly and impartially, many would flock to the colours with the same zeal, the same courage, and the same enthusiasm that were manifested in the early days of the war.

Therefore, the best thing the Government could do would be to acknowledge their incompetence, resign, and ask His Excellency the Governor General to summon Sir Wilfrid Laurier. The people could then apply to them the saying which was long ago applied to Charles I, that nothing in his whole life became him like the leaving of it.

Mr. JAMES MORRIS (Châteauguay): Mr. Speaker, in rising to ask the attention of the House for a few moments, I have no thought of prolonging the debate, because I feel that it has already been extended a little longer than is necessary. In fact, I do not think there should have been any debate on this question. That is my honest opinion. But, Sir, I feel that I should not give a silent vote on this question. I feel that this question of conscription has been augmented, or made to appear much greater than it really is. A year ago there was no man in this country who was more opposed to conscription than I was, for the simple reason that I had given it very little consideration, fully believing that we would never require it in this country, and I am sorry to-day that we are obliged to resort to it. I feel that it would have been a glorious thing for this Canada of ours had we been able to supply the required number of men voluntarily. But when that failed what was there left for us to do? Of all the speakers whom I have heard in this House during this debate, not one single man has offered a suggestion whereby we could improve on the measure proposed. Therefore, when I come to examine this question and ask myself if there is any other method whereby we can do our duty, I am compelled to answer that there is absolutely none. So I feel that I have a great question before me, which I have to solve for myself. Formerly I was opposed to conscription, but when the question was placed before me, and before the people of Canada, and when I realized that all other methods of raising men had failed, I felt bound to come to a decision, as the Government were bound to come to a decision, as to what could be done. And what could be done?

Not a man in this House offered any suggestion as to how that could be done, otherwise than by conscription. Therefore, when I saw that such a measure was necessary, I naturally gave it some thought, and the question gave me many anxious moments before I reached a decision. I know full well that I am going to vote against the wishes of a great many of my electors. If I voted otherwise, I would vote against the wishes of many of my electors who hold opposite views. Therefore, I might say, I am pretty nearly between the devil and the deep sea. I felt that, as a representative of one of the most important constituencies of Quebec, I had a duty to perform. I had to come to a decision, and to set aside the wishes on both sides of some of my electors, and it was up to me to do what I believed to be my duty. There comes a time in the life of every man when he must decide between love and duty. Perhaps love did not enter into this question, but personal interest entered into it, and I am ready to lay aside personal interest and do what I believe is my duty in the interest of my province, of the Empire, and of humanity. I will do my duty and take the consequences. It certainly would have been a great pleasure to me, had we been able to raise the required number of men without resorting to conscription, but within the last few months, it has been clearly proven, inside of this House and outside, that the voluntary system has failed, and that we must do something else. Under the circumstances, in my humble opinion, we cannot desert the boys who are fighting for us in France. My hon. friend from St. John and Iberville (Mr. Demers) thought that we had done enough, and that we should allow other armies to take the place of our Canadian boys. I say the hon. gentleman does not understand the nature of the Anglo-Saxon race, or he never would have made such a statement in this House.

We have heard a great deal about democracy. It is stated that this measure is contrary to the spirit of democracy. I would like to call attention to the fact that alongside of us we have the greatest democracy on the face of the globe. It does not seem to interfere with the spirit of democracy in the United States to pass such a measure as that which we are considering to-day. We hear no complaint from them. They have entered this war quite recently. They are an independent nation and are not under the same obligations as we are, because we are part of the British Empire, and when the British Empire is at war we are at war. The United States is in a different position. To-day the United States has passed a Bill similar to the one we are considering, and I maintain that the spirit of this Bill is more in harmony with the true spirit of democracy than any suggestion I have heard from the other side of the House. The fundamental principle of democracy is equalization of men. One man is considered the equal of another. That is the true spirit of democracy and that is what we are trying to establish by this Bill. I was at first as much opposed to it as any man in this House, but after studying the nature of the Bill, and the manner in which it is going to be enforced, I feel it is more in harmony with the true spirit of democracy than any proposal that has been made in this House. Therefore, to attain the object we have in view, I stand ready to support the Bill, not because I believe it is in the interest of Jimmie Morris, or any other individual, but because I believe it to be a measure of liberty and justice to every man. I shall after supporting the measure return to my home perfectly satisfied that I have done my duty to myself, to my electors and to my country. I am ready, Mr. Speaker, to take the consequences. Furthermore, I believe that, when the nature of this Bill is perfectly understood by the people of Quebec, it will be looked upon by them in a different light from what it is to-day. What are the arguments being advanced at the present time? It is stated to the people of Quebec that we are tearing the children from their mothers and throwing them into the front trenches to be butchered. Is that a proper spirit? Is that the manner in which we should recruit? We have heard a great deal about recruiting, but I say that, since this debate began, I have heard arguments which would render it almost impossible to recruit in Quebec. We have heard a great deal of criticism of certain things that have been said by certain men on this side of the House during an election in Drummond-Arthabaska, and elsewhere in Quebec in 1911. We must not forget, however, that that was during a political campaign, and we are not engaged in a political campaign to-day. We are up against one of the most grave and serious propositions that ever faced this House or the civilized world, with the greatest Empire the world has ever known shaken to her very foundations. Is it not up to every true Canadian to set aside all other considerations in such a crisis? And, Mr. Speaker, the time will come when we will not speak of French Canadians, or English Canadians but "Canadians", regardless of national origin, and only recognizing the distinction of being citizens of Canada. To-day, I am sorry to say, reference has been made very frequently in this debate to the French Canadians. No man in this House has had better opportunity of knowing the nature of the French Canadian people than I. I have been brought up amongst them, and the best friends I have in the province of Quebec, or in the whole Dominion, are French Canadians. They are friends of my youth. I used to go to school with them. There is no class of people on the earth who have a better sense of fair play than the French Canadian people and my presence in this House is sufficient proof of that statement. The French Canadians have a majority in my county, but they have elected me, an Englishman. It has been an understood thing in my county, for many years back, that we should send an English speaking representative to the Parliament at Ottawa, and a French Canadian to the Quebec Legislature, and that agreement has never been broken. Therefore, I am justified in saying that our French Canadian friends have as great a sense of justice and fair play as any people in this whole Dominion.

As far as recruiting is concerned I cannot understand the situation in the province of Quebec. Outside the province of Quebec, French Canadians have volunteered as freely as the members of any other nationality. Why is it that our friends in Quebec have not come up to the mark? I can make every allowance for the French Canadians under ordinary circumstances, but this case I cannot understand. Two or three days after Austria had declared war upon Serbia, the eyes of the whole civilized world were fixed upon England. Nowhere was England's course more anxiously watched than in the province of Quebec, and when the news was flashed across the Atlantic that England had come to the rescue of France, a sigh of relief came up from the heart of every French Canadian in the province of Quebec. I know that deep down in the heart of every French Canadian there is a love of his mother country. How could any descendant of the noble French race deny his allegiance to or his love for his mother country? The love of country comes next to the love of God, and I feel that in the heart of every French Canadian there is an admiration for old France that nothing can erase. Unfortunately, immediately after that news came to this country, the cry was started —by whom or upon whose authority I do not know: we owe nothing to France; she turned out certain religious organizations.

That was not a sufficient reason for inaction; that was a political matter. The same thing happened in other countries—but the spirit of old France remained there, and there it will remain. It is worthy of note that many years ago Atilla, the leader of the Huns, who had set out to overrun Europe, was turned back on the plains of France. Future history will record that in this war the Hun of this day met defeat on the plains of France. That will be another glorious page in France's history. Some men are to-day shouting "a bas l'Angleterre," and that kind of thing; but that does not express the true sentiment of the French Canadian. It does not, at any rate, express the sentiment of the people in the rural districts, where one gets a better idea, perhaps, of the true sentiment of the people. In the cities the people are influenced by men of the type of Bourassa and Tancrede Marsil. These men will disappear in due course of time, but the true spirit of the French Canadian will remain forever.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Will the hon. gentleman tell me in what part of the province of Quebec he heard the words "à bas l'Angleterre"?

Mr. MORRIS: I have read them in the press of the city of Montreal. I have not the records here, but the hon. gentleman knows that the words appear in the press many times. I admit that they were not written by responsible men; nevertheless, the spirit that provoked them was aroused by the men who were at the head at meetings held in opposition to conscription. But I repeat that these words do not represent the true spirit of the French Canadian people.

It has been said by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House that Quebec would rise in revolt if this Bill should become law. Mr. Speaker, that is false. From what I know of the French Canadian people, if this Bill becomes law they will submit to it just the same as you or I will. It may not be agreeable to them, but they will see the justice of the Bill when it is properly explained to them. Instead of preaching sedition and treason, as members of this House have done, let hon. gentlemen go out into their counties and do as was done in the other provinces. Let the men who influence public opinion go out and do their duty. Let the clergy do their duty in Quebec as the clergy have done their duty in the other provinces. The matter of the duty of the people has been taken up in the other provinces by the churches, by the public men, by all classes of the people. We knew what our duty was; the spirit of the Canadian people backed us up; every man went into the fight and did what he could. Had that been done in Quebec since the beginning of the war, we would have had a greater number of recruits from that province than from any other province in the Dominion. From no other province in the whole Dominion could we have expected greater enlistment than from the province of Quebec. But public opinion in that province has been led astray by the false doctrine that has been drummed into and preached to the people—doctrine that for years back has never been denied or contradicted. But the French Canadians are, down in their hearts, just as good as I am; just as loyal as I am.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Thank you.

Mr. MORRIS: But they have been falsely trained. It has been suggested by some hon. gentlemen—and I am not averse to the suggestion—that we give voluntary enlistment another chance. Voluntary recruiting has failed, but the system still prevails. Let hon. gentlemen who are advocating voluntary enlistment get busy, go into their counties, and start a campaign under that system. Let them not preach such doctrine as was preached by the member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Gauthier), or the member for St. John and Iberville (Mr. Demers). That kind of doctrine will never help recruiting. Let them preach the true doctrine of patriotism and of our duty to our country; the people of Quebec will understand it just as well as you or I understand it. They know what they owe to the British Empire; they know what the British flag means to them; they appreciate the protection that they have enjoyed for many years and the privileges that have been granted to them under British rule. But if the people of that province continue to be under the influence of the false doctrines that have been preached to them we cannot expect any different results from those that have obtained. Many French Canadian soldiers have returned to this country; let them be employed to engage in recruiting campaigns among the people of Quebec and to explain present conditions relating to the war. If this is done the habitants will understand the situation just as well as we do.

I venture to say that those habitants will understand the situation just as well as we do. They have just as great a sense of honour and of justice as any of us have. They know the horrors that have been perpetrated by the enemy just as well as we do, and they are ready to avenge those who have suffered from the barbarity of the foe. But, we have to point them to the proper course, and we have to counteract the effects of the evil doctrine that has for years been preached to the French Canadian people in Quebec.

Mr. MEDERIC MARTIN: The hon. member a few minutes ago told the various Quebec members to do their share in encouraging enlistments. The hon. member is a member from Quebec province. Has he done so himself? Has he asked his people to enlist, and if so, what have they said?

Mr. MORRIS: I am glad the hon. member has brought up that question. Early in the war I had the pleasure of taking part at a recruiting meeting. A young officer who, poor young fellow, is to-day buried in France, was sent to my county, and he came to a village adjoining mine. We called a meeting—and what I say will perhaps bear out a little of the criticism that has been offered as to the manner of recruiting in our province. I do not cast any reflections upon the Government for what was done. They selected the men they thought were proper, but sometimes a man who is appointed for a certain purpose, is not always able to fill the position as it should be filled. At all events I had with me on the platform that night two Presbyterian ministers from my immediate neighbourhood. We laid before the people the cause as best we could. This young officer stated his case, and finally when he had finished, he tied up his belongings and was about to leave the meeting. I said to him: My friend, do not you think it would be advisable for you to go down amongst the crowd and speak to the young men; I know that in the audience are a number of young men who, by the interest they have taken in what has been said, are ready to volunteer. The young officer immediately admitted the propriety of such a course. He went down amongst the audience, and I accompanied him and introduced him to a number of young men. The result was that fifteen young men enlisted that night. Four of them were rejected, but since that night forty others have followed the example of those fifteen young men. That is the spirit of the Canadian people when they understand the situation. That course was not taken in many other counties in Quebec. In Laprairie-Napierville the people were advised not to enlist and not to contribute to the Patriotic and the Red Cross Funds. They were told: Save your money for some other purpose. Could one expect recruits from a county where that doctrine was preached? That is one of the reasons why recruiting has not succeeded in Quebec. Hon. members speak about what was said years ago, but those are political questions, and it is the leaders of the people in the province of Quebec whom I blame for the want of success in recruiting.

I have said already that it grieves me to be forced to vote contrary to the wishes of a great many of my electors, old warriors who have fought for me twice in my political campaigns, and whom I had the honour of leading to a Conservative victory in my county for the first time since Confederation. But I have a duty to perform, and in coming to a decision, I have given due consideration to the question before the House, and if I should have to give up my life on account of the course I have decided to pursue, I am ready to make the sacrifice, to do what I believe is my duty. As I said I am ready to take the consequences of my action. I am the representative of the old county of Chateauguay, and I do not want the finger of scorn to be pointed at that county. Should I vote against this measure and do as the hon. member for St. John and Iberville (Mr. Demers) advises us to do, I feel that the finger of scorn would be pointed at me and at my county for all time to come. That hon. member practically advises us to throw up the sponge—to quit. As I have said before, he does not know the spirit of the Anglo-Saxon race or he would never have made such a statement.

There is one feature in connection with conscription that, partly on account of the attitude that I am taking I should explain to the House, and that is the duty that I owe and the duty that every French Canadian and every other Canadian owes to the Empire. Let the people understand that duty and there will be no need for discussion on this Bill; the Bill would be passed unanimously.

I do not attempt to criticise any statements made in regard to the referendum, but there is one phase of the question on which I have not yet received any light. We are told by the hon. member for Welland (Mr. German) that he was fully in accord with conscription, that he felt it was the duty of Canada to force enlistment, and that he believed the people in Canada would support a referendum on that question. If he believes that, it is his duty as a representative of the people to vote for conscription. Why refer the matter by a referendum to the people of Canada if the people are in favour of it? Has the hon. member not a duty to perform? What was he elected for? Was he elected to go back to his people every time a question came up in this House, and to ask them how he should vote? I told some of my electors the other day: "Gentlemen, when you elected me, you did not elect me into slavery. I am an independent man; I am going to vote according to the dictates of my conscience, and I am ready to take the consequences." That is what I intend to do on this question.

There is another feature that we must take into consideration as regards this referendum. Some gentlemen have told us that they are absolutely in accord with this Bill. Let us suppose that we take a referendum and that conscription is defeated. In that event, where would we stand? Either those hon. members will have to vote for this measure against the wishes of the people of Canada—and then what will happen?—or else, we shall have to throw up the sponge and say: We will no longer support the men who have voluntarily gone to the front.

If we do that, I say that the finger of scorn will be pointed at Canada for centuries to come. I sincerely trust that it will never be done.

Mr. J. A. DESCARRIES (Jacques Cartier): Mr. Speaker, I propose detaining the House, a few minutes only. I do not intend to discuss all the points which may be raised for or against the question now before this House, to wit.: the passing of a conscription Bill to send 100,000 men overseas to fight Germany and her allies.

During more than two weeks, this Parliamentary hall has resounded with the eloquent accents of representatives of Canada, some demanding conscription, others opposing it. The pledges of the leaders of the nation, assuring the people that there would be no conscription, have been recalled; on the one hand, it has been attempted to prove that conscription was necessary because it was absolutely needed to replace our Canadian soldiers falling on the battlefields; on the other hand, it was stated that Canada has nobly done her share in this war which afflicts humanity and that at all events, volunteering, if it were properly operated, could fill the depleted rosters of our forces. The partisans of conscription, at least some of them, have in bitter terms attributed to the province of Quebec the so-called failure of volunteering, by claiming that the French Canadians had not enlisted in sufficient numbers; the opponents of conscription retorted by showing that the province of Quebec occupies a very special position in the Dominion and in the British Empire and that if her contribution of men in the expeditionary forces has not been as large as that of other provinces, it was due to the inadequate or defective methods employed in recruiting and to the feelings of hatred as well as the aspersions directed against her people who are in spite of all, loyal to the Empire and to the British crown. Against conscription has also been raised the argument of the economic condition of Canada who, according to a large number of members, cannot make a bigger effort in men and in money without running into bankruptcy or, at least, without putting herself in a disastrous position for years and years to come. It has been further stated that the sending of our Canadian militia beyond Canada, to go and battle in Europe, was such an extraordinary enactment that is should not be done without the consent of the people, expressed by means of a referendum or in a general election, especially so in view of the fact that the present Parliament has exceeded the constitutional lease of life and that it exists only in virtue of an extension granted by its own members, a fact which a large number of citizens do not consider as giving it the power to pass a law largely interfering with the rights of the citizen as regards military service.

Other reasons have been put forth which escape my memory just now for I am making this review off hand, not having had time to read the reports of the speeches made in this House.

As I stated at the beginning, Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to take up once more the views advocated in the course of the debate and make in regard to them more or less appropriate comments. What I do want is simply to vindicate the stand I take before this House and the country, upon the question now under consideration.

I have already stated, in the speech I made in answer to the speech of His Excellency, the Governor General, at the opening of this session, that I was against conscription and that there could not be any question of conscription to send soldiers out to fight with the Allies.

I have publicly stated, at a meeting in Lachine, which is in the county of Jacques Cartier, which I have the honour to represent, that I was against conscription; can I now change my opinion? Has the debate which has been going on in this House, convinced me that I was wrong in speaking as I have done? Conscientiously, I am forced to answer that my opinion has not changed.

I do deeply regret to find myself under the necessity of opposing the demand made by the leader of my party, the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) I have always had for this illustrious statesman the highest respect and in him, the greatest confidence. But I would be a miscreant if, as representative of the people, I did not follow the dictates of my conscience; I would deserve the contempt of my constituents and of the whole country, if I did not live up to the mandate entrusted to me. I have received numerous petitions, containing thousands of signatures, from the electors of my county, asking me to oppose conscription, but, Mr. Speaker, my opposition will not be a seditious one.

I am not against the assistance to be given to the Empire and to the Allies. I want the assistance given to England to be of a voluntary character. Let efficient means of propaganda be taken, and the 100,000 men, whom you want to obtain through conscription, will soon be found.

As for me, there is a peremptory reason which compels me to oppose conscription. It is that reason I intend to submit to this honourable House. In my opinion, this objection is well worth considering. If well taken the Bill which is now submitted, should it ever become law, would be ultra vires, null and void. I submit that Canada is not a sovereign state. She has no international status; her legislative powers are limited to those granted her by the British North America Act, which is an Imperial Statute. Now, this Act does not enable our Parliament to pass an Act providing for the sending, by conscription, of subjects of Canada, to go and fight in Europe or in other foreign countries.

All that we find in the aforesaid statute is, in section 91 and its subsection, "that it will be lawful for the King, upon the advice and with the consent of the Senate and of the House of Commons, to make laws for the peace, the order and the good government of Canada and, in particular, for the militia, the military service, the naval service and the defence of the country".

Will any one contend that, in consequence of the section I have just quoted, Canada has the right to declare war to any country whatever? Certainly not.

Todd, the well known authority on constitutional and parliamentary law, says at page 388, of the second edition of his work:

> In affairs of peace and war which, are essentially of Imperial concern, this supremacy of the Crown must be everywhere maintained inviolate.

We cannot, Mr. Speaker, address a foreign country without the co-operation of the English ambassador. If you want, for instance, to obtain the extradition of any party from the United States, you must apply to the British ambassador. Canada can only make certain fiscal arrangements, she cannot make any international treaty. Admitting that this Parliament had the right to establish conscription for the defence of her attacked territory, she certainly has not the right to send conscripts into foreign countries, beyond the seas, and make war to assist friendly nations, for such an enterprise would constitute an act of warfare which alone the Imperial Parliament can do.

In order to be able to lawfully send conscripts to Europe, in the war zone, we should have to do as we have done for the extension of the term of this Parliament, that is to say, have the Imperial Parliament, from which this Parliament holds its powers, amend the British North America Act, and authorize us to send conscripts to the battlefields where is being waged this great war which is presently desolating the whole world.

Let us suppose, Mr. Speaker, that England had not taken part in the war, and that Canada had a French majority who would wish to help France fighting against Germany, would not the sending of our conscripted soldiers, for that purpose, constitute an act of warfare which England would be obliged to disavow and to prevent, if she did not want to enter the war herself?

Who can say that England, under such circumstances, would not have the right of so doing, for she cannot allow her colonies to draw her into any war without the consent of the Imperial Parliament.

Now, we do not have even now that approval in the Constitutional Act of Canada nor in any amendment to that Act. Therefore, if the Bill, which is now submitted to this hon. House, should become law, that law, in my opinion, will be ultra vires. Therefore, it might be attacked by any conscripted citizen, by means of a habeas corpus and it would be impossible to enforce it.

Mr. Speaker, I have nothing to add, except that, in consequence of what I have just said, it is my duty to vote for the amendment to the amendment of the hon. member for Berthier (Mr. Barrette), because I consider the proposed Bill unconstitutional. If that amendment is lost, I will vote for the amendment of the hon. member for Quebec-East (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) because I consider that a conscription Act to send our soldiers abroad is such a novel and extraordinary measure, that before entering it definitely in our statutes, it should be submitted to the approbation of the electorate of this country. Finally, if this amendment is also defeated, I will register my vote against the second reading of the Bill, as a protest against the principle of unconstitutional enactment it contains.

Mr. WILLIAM STEWART LOGGIE (Northumberland, N.B.): Mr. Speaker, if I speak with some feeling on rising to address the House on this occasion it is because I realize, to some extent at least, the seriousness of the situation with which we are dealing. In August 1914 we were called together as representatives of the people of Canada to deal with the question of taking part in this dreadful conflict. We met here for less than a week and unanimously decided to do our bit in defence of home and liberty. We undertook to do our part and send our men to the front, supplying them with the necessary munitions as far as possible, not at the request of any other nation, but voluntarily and unanimously. No one will deny that our men have done splendidly. Men from my own county have come forward in a wonderful manner. My own province has done magnificently, standing second on the list in the pro rata of enlistment. My home town of about 4,500 inhabitants has suffered over fifty death casualties. The situation is a most serious one. It is in my thoughts day and night, and if I speak with some feeling it is because of my intense interest in the situation in which we find ourselves to-day.

The right hon. leader of the Government comes back from the old land and from the war zone and tells the people of Canada that more fighting men are needed to maintain the standard which we have set for ourselves. He further tells us that the Government of the day are unable to get these men by voluntary enlistment, which is the system we have always had in this country in war time. He has placed that situation before us very frankly, and I shall deal with that in a moment or two. Canada, as I understand it, pledged herself at the time of Confederation to take part in the defence of her country. It will do no harm to put on Hansard again the words that were used on that occasion by Sir John A. Macdonald, Sir George Cartier, George Brown and A. T. Galt:

> We expressed the earnest wish of the people of Canada to perpetuate the happy existing connection with Great Britain, and their entire willingness to contribute to the defence of the Empire their full quota, according to their ability, of men and money.

That is what we are doing to-day; that is what we promised to do in August 1914; and shall we fall down on our pledge? That is the momentous question before the people of Canada to-day. As I see it, we are in honour bound to live up to that pledge, bound to send the men required to fill up the gaps caused by our fallen heroes. How are we to do that? The Prime Minister tells us that he has exhausted all means of getting the men by voluntary enlistment. He now proposes the system of selective draft, which is not altogether a new principle for it has been on our statute-book since the time of Confederation. There was some question, I admit, up to 1904 whether we could send our troops outside of Canada, but, as I understand it, in that year it was made clear by the statement of the Minister of Justice that in the opinion of the Government of that day, if men were needed outside of Canada for the defence thereof, troops could be sent to India, if need be. If that be true, I cannot see that we are very far afield in enforcing this principle. I admit that the principle has never been enforced, although it has been on our statute-book for years, and for that reason it may now appear rather drastic. I confess I do not like the word "force" any more than do my hon. friends who have spoken on this side of the House, and under conditions existing in 1914 and 1915 when we were getting a goodly number of recruits I do not think it would have been wise to enforce a compulsory law. In the early days of the war the United Kingdom did not force their men to go to the front, but got them by voluntary enlistment, and I think we were wise in following their example. If we had attempted to enforce such a measure as this before the need really existed—and the need is present now because we cannot get the men by the ordinary methods—we might have found ourselves in a difficult situation.

I wonder if this principle of compulsion does not already run like a golden thread, as it were, through the statute-books of Canada. Is it not a fact that the State to-day protects my home by force? If I sell a bill of goods to a customer in whom I have implicit confidence, but who for some reason does not do his duty towards me, the State steps in at a certain time and compels him to do his duty. The principle of force, as I see it, appears before us at almost every turn in the statute-books. Not only does the State protect my home, but it protects me when abroad in a foreign land. Let me cite one case which was put on Hansard a few years ago. Hon. gentlemen from the province of Quebec know that some years ago in one of the Latin countries of Europe there was almost a revolution because it was thought some prominent man had been executed after an unfair trial. Dissatisfaction spread through the land where the execution took place, and beyond, to Italy.

In Italy we have a Canadian institution, a college for the education of young men for the priesthood. The reverend gentleman in charge of that institution was told that there was danger of a possible riot and revolution, and was asked what he would do in such a case. Listen to his answer; the answer of a Canadian in the city of Rome: "The British flag is my talisman." So I say, the British flag, even in foreign countries, forces others to protect my interests, if my interests are threatened. And we should all do well if we emulated the example of that clergyman; let us ever hold high that talismanic flag. Speaking on the Budget a few weeks ago, and before the Prime Minister returned from Europe, I made the statement, as Hansard will show, that the Government of the day were responsible for finding the necessary men to fulfil the pledge—if I may so call it; I do not know that it is necessarily looked upon as a pledge, but the leader of the Government since coming back has so interpreted it—that had been given; and I said that they ought to make overtures to the Opposition with a view to getting the men, by voluntary enlistment or otherwise. I do not think it was fair—I say so frankly—for the Government first to come to their finding as to what should be done and then make overtures. I think they erred in judgment, I think they lacked in tact in handling this tense situation; they should have approached the leader of the Opposition before deciding as to action; they should have asked the co-operation and advice of the Liberals of the country, as represented by my revered leader. Had this been done, I question very much if we would have been in the position in which we find ourselves to-day.

Now, as to the future. It is evident that in order to keep three divisions in the fighting line we must have more men than are now being recruited. I do not know that I can prove that better than by quoting the statement placed before the House by the Department of Militia and Defence, and dated May 14, 1917. This statement gives a summary of strength of the units of the Canadian Expeditionary Force in England. At the time of this statement, as I understand the situation, there were three divisions in the fighting line, each divsion made up of practically 27,000 men. That is, we had 81,000 men in the fighting line. Then, we have a fourth division in the rear. Thus we had in France on the 14th May last 108,000 men. In England we had at that date, ready to go over to France, 26,359 men. Perhaps there were in addition some officers. We had in England also 29,927 men in training. These men were not fit then, and probably would not be fit for some months. We had 5,147 casualties in England who were being trained and hardened and made fit for the front. We had, in addition, 3,469 men who were being trained and would be ready to go to the front as soon as they reached the age of nineteen years. Thus we had in France 108,000 men, and in England 61,902 men who would be fit for trench work when properly trained. But the sad part of the story is that during April and May the casualties were considerably over 10,000 for each month. On this basis, six months would take for the fighting line every man we have available in England and would leave us without any reserves in England at all. And, if I understand the situation correctly, it will take about 10,000 men each month to keep up the standard we are now maintaining at the front, and that we are in duty bound to maintain—three divisions of a total of about 81,000 men. If we cannot get these men by voluntary enlistment, I think we are in duty bound to get them some other way.

I am willing to admit that the Prime Minister's proposal is somewhat drastic. But, after all, I cannot bring myself to the conclusion that he is unfair or unreasonable, if the country is in jeopardy, and from the fact I have already stated, I think the country is in jeopardy. More than that, I think the heroic deeds of our boys ought to make the enforcement of a collective draft acceptable in the urgent circumstances in which we find ourselves.

[Mr. Loggie.]

These boys have done splendid work. Let me cite one proof of it. Early in the war it was said by one of the Prussian officers high in authority, that, "If it had not been for the Canadian rats the German army would be in Calais." The words "Canadian rats" were not very complimentary; but the noble work done in preventing the German army from reaching Calais will go down in history and will stand forever to the credit of our Canadian boys.

In order to show the House to some extent how I feel on this situation, let me cite just one short paragraph from a letter written recently in France by my son to his sister:

> What is the news regarding conscription or a coalition Cabinet? I am strong for conscription myself. What does father think of it?

I say that I cannot do other than support the Government in their proposal to enforce the selective draft, as, in my judgment, nothing else is proposed that meets the situation. I am convinced that in the interest of the State there are times —and this is one of them—when the people should speak through their elected representatives in Parliament rather more than yea or nay on a question that has to do with the defence of the State. On general principles, the people must and do rule, but when the State is in jeopardy, it is incumbent on the duly elected members to speak and act for the people.

This brings me to the amendment moved by my beloved and revered leader, with whom I exceedingly regret I cannot vote on this occasion, for the first time in my life. But I give him praise, I give him nothing more than his due, when I say that he has told his followers to act as their conscientious convictions lead them. I honour him for this proper action in this national matter. I also recognize that he too is guided by his convictions, and that his interest in the State is not any less than mine or that of any other hon. member in this House. More than that, he has guided the ship of state during many a storm safely to anchor in the calm waters of peace and prosperity. I am sure that if his guiding hand remains at the helm, even though he be leader of the Opposition, no disaster will overtake us if he can help it.

The object the Government have is to get the necessary men by selective draft, while that of the amendment is to do the same thing if the people first say yes. That is the only difference. My right hon. leader, in addressing the House, said that the Government said we needed more men, and my right hon. leader in replying admitted that more men were required, but said that he thought the object in view could be better attained in another way. I cannot see it just as my leader does, for this reason: As I said, the amendment is the same as the Bill, except that the people are to be first asked to say yes. The amendment, however, to my mind, does not provide for getting the men if the people, by a small or large majority, say no. But it would have this effect, that the men could not be sent by selective draft to complete the work that we have unanimously undertaken. In other words, the hands of the Government, or the hands of any Government, as I see it, would be tied. I understand that the hands of the Australian Government, so far as selective draft is concerned, are tied to-day, and will be tied until there is another referendum. And so the hands of this Government, or of any Government, will be tied until the nay is reversed to a yea by another referendum vote. I cannot see my way clear to take that risk. I cannot bring myself to believe that I would be doing right to the State in taking the risk involved in the amendment. If righteousness exalteth a nation, then right doing on the part of the members of this House and the people of Canada must tend thereunto. Hence my duty is to vote for the Bill and against the amendment of my hon. leader.

I feel that the young men of Canada who are so situated that they would come within the operation of the conscription law, young men whose removal from their present occupation would not be considered as detrimental to the State, should make the honourable choice of enlisting, if only out of admiration for the brave men who have fallen. I am going to ask whose war this is? I hear the answer from some hon. gentleman opposite: we are fighting for England. I cannot understand on what foundation they base that statement. Where is the logic in the statement that we are fighting for England? England did not ask us to fight. When we came here in 1914 there was not a word said to this country that England made any request from Canada, as I understand. We are not fighting for England, for the United Kingdom; we are fighting for ourselves. We are fighting for the Empire of which we form an important part. I do not think that we ought to have the doctrine spread abroad that we are in this war at the request of England. We are in this war because of the doctrine of the unity of a family. It is true that the centre is in London, but, nevertheless, let me use the statement of my honoured leader, when England is at war Canada is at war, because whatever hurts England hurts Canada. We are a part of a whole, and as I see it we are fighting for ourselves just as much as the English soldier is fighting for the United Kingdom. We in Canada are fighting for the protection of our Canadian people and our citizenship. But, we are doing more than that. Why is England fighting? Why did England enter the war? Because Germany had done a wrong thing, because Germany said she was going to tear a treaty to pieces. She did more than that.

She acknowledged she was wrong, and offered to do the right thing, as far as she could, after the war was over. That was very plausible, but I say that England realized that if Germany would break the treaty in order to serve her own selfish ends, there was no telling what she would do after that, if she got a chance. If her armies got to Calais—and thank Heaven our Canadian boys stopped them from getting there—what would happen? If they got to Paris and to Havre, as they very nearly succeeded in doing, what would happen the cities along the English Channel? I realize that if Germany had made very much more headway than she did, and if our armies had not come along at the critical time, this war might not have been even as favourable to us to-day as it is. It has certainly been a deadly struggle. I do not suppose any hon. member in this House believed, when war was declared in 1914, that in 1917 we would be discussing this question in Parliament. I say we decided ourselves, in this House, without any request from any portion of the British Empire, on the course we should take. We are units of that Empire, and, as a unit, we had to perform our duty in defence of home and the Empire. Then we have this glory that we have never had before, and it is quite an experience to us, that we are not only fighting for ourselves, but we are fighting with the greatest nations in the world, and one of them is that chivalrous nation, France. I do a large business with France, and I find the merchants of that country straightforward and business-like men. I desire to pay the compliment to the French-Canadians in my own county, where I do a large amount of business. I believe they are loyal to the land that has given them birth, and loyal to the land that protects them, and if the land and flag protects a man, I see no reason why that man should not be bound to protect the flag, in case of urgency or necessity.

Now I come to a more difficult question, because the question after all is really what of the future? The past is history, but what of the future? If the Bill becomes law, what then? The hon. gentleman from Chateauguay, in speaking a few minutes ago, lectured the gentlemen on this side of the House, and told them to go down to their own counties and preach patriotism. I do not think he should have confined it to members on this side of the House, but should have cast his eye around him, and inquired whether that remark could not justly be applied to hon. gentlemen on that side of the House as well. I think it would have been better if he had not made that remark. The question which bothers me is, what is to become of this Bill, and what will be the result of our placing it on the Statute Book? First of all, I have a suggestion to make. I do not know, perhaps, that there is very much merit in it, but no harm will be done by putting it on Hansard. I think there should be a mutual understanding between the leaders on both sides of the House, and that there should be an honest effort made for the extension of the life of Parliament. My hon. friend from the county adjoining my constituency says, "Shame," but I will give my reason for it, and hon. gentlemen can take it for what it is worth. I do not say that one side alone could accomplish anything, and if hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House are bringing down a Bill for the extension of the life of Parliament, they should seek the co-operation, in some satisfactory way, with the leaders on this side of the House. If that cannot be done, it is another question altogether. Then, secondly, if the Bill passes through the regular stages and becomes law, there should be a renewed effort made to bring about a coalition Government, and after that is done I think there should be a final effort made for voluntary enlistment. I really cannot help thinking that there are sufficient men with large ideas in this country, on both sides of the House, to bring about this very desirable situation, which I think would be a very happy start for the new half century, but if we cannot have this happy condition, and cannot get the men by voluntary enlistment, I think there should be an effort made on both sides of the House for selective draft. That would not be opposed, at any rate, to any great extent, in any place in Canada.

An hon. MEMBER: That will be taking them by the throat and conscripting them.

Mr. LOGGIE: I do not think it is altogether doing that. It is certainly not doing it any more than they are doing it in England. We as a rule look up to our British institutions and the example of the Motherland. Their case is not any more urgent than ours, and I do not see any complaint from the Old Country that men are being taken by the throat. If the case is placed properly before the men, I do not think you will find many men in Canada who will not do their fair share. The Bill provides for the men necessary on the farm, in the fishing industry, the mine and the munition plant. It is a selective draft. If there be any partisanship in it, it will kill the chances of it being a success. It must be above partisanship, and that is why I would like to see some effort made to bring about an understanding between the two parties, because to make this selective draft a success, I believe it ought to be administered by the two great parties in Canada to-day, and they should be brought together by some means. Whether it should be by election is another question. Personally, while I do not mind an election of itself, I do not like the idea of an election with this question as the battle cry. But if it is not possible to avoid that, each man will have to do his duty, regardless of the consequences. But I wish to make another suggestion, and it is this: If the leader of the Opposition were made the leader of a coalition Government, I believe that with the co-operation of his friends in this House the necessary men could be secured by voluntary enlistment, or, if that failed, by selective draft. My only authority for saying that is my own conviction; I believe that that could be brought about. If my suggestions are not practicable or feasible, I can only say that we had better have an election, and the sooner the better.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. LOGGIE: I will tell you what should happen after an election is held. Whoever the winner is—whether he be the right hon. gentleman who sits to your right, Mr. Speaker, or my revered and honoured leader—he should form a coalition Government to manage our state affairs until the war is over. If this can be done by the leader of the party that wins at the polls, a great service will be rendered to the people.

Each member of this House has the right —and a glorious heritage it is—to vote according to his convictions. But, Sir, each member should do more than that. He should be vigilant in furthering the interests of his country, in season and out of season. Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty; it is the price that we must pay to maintain the privileges and the liberties that we have enjoyed in the past in this glorious young nation—a nation within a nation, the greatest Empire in the world.

Mr. A. A. MONDOU (Yamaska) (translation): Mr. Speaker, I have felt some hesitation in dealing with such an important matter as that which is now submitted to the consideration of this House; but taking into account the present condition of public mind in this country, I think it my duty to show the reasons why I am opposed to the government measure! I hope the House will pardon me if I have to go a few years back so as to show in stronger light the responsibilities incurred by the promoters of this Bill towards the electors of Canada. We are urged by the Government to insert in our statute book this proposal concerning a kind of military conscription which is called selective.

On the other hand, the Opposition want this measure to be beforehand submitted to the Canadian people and declares, through its authorized leader, that they will assist the Government in having it practically and immediately enforced should the majority of the people, consulted by way of a referendum, pronounce itself in favour of the measure, whereas my honourable friend from Berthier would have the House dispose of this bill forthwith by refusing, under the guise of the six months' hoist, to recognize its principle. The answer which I shall be ready to give when those several proposals are put to the House will be the direct outcome of my previous stand.

Having never complained of the fact that Canada was taking part in the present war, having, on the contrary, always approved of it in principle, I do not very well see how I could take upon myself to vote against the principle of conscription to-day, before the Canadian people are called upon to render their own verdict. Is it or is it not the wish of our people that its participation which, up to this date, has been voluntary and free, should become obligatory and compulsory? It must be remembered that our Militia Act, drafted by Cartier and revised under Laurier in 1904, states clearly, in section 69, that, should volunteering not answer the purpose, the Government would have a right to resort to conscription. In fine, do the Canadian people think that our soldiers, now fighting beyond Canada, are fighting for the defence of Canada? As far as I am concerned, I cannot deny the people the right to settle by themselves such a momentous and important question. I wish to know what they think of it, and I may add at once that, in accord with the leader of the Opposition, I shall abide by the judgment of the Canadian electorate. Accordingly, as I do not wish to substitute my own will to that of the people, clearly expressed by way of a referendum, and as I confess having no mandate, under the circumstances, to speak out what I think of the matter, I shall vote against the sub-amendment of the honourable member for Berthier. As for the amendment proposed by the honourable leader of the Opposition, it shall have my full support. And, in truth, I am unable to understand why the Government persist in denying the people, conscious as they are of their power and aware of the baneful possibilities of its exercise, the right to decide such an important matter. At this critical hour of our national life the people would give this great question all the attention which it deserves. Besides, be the conditions in a free country what they may, it is for the people to finally decide.

I am perfectly willing to admit that the Prime Minister is actuated by the best of intentions, by an intense patriotism, even; but I cannot admit, however, that he has the monopoly of that quality. Accordingly I think I should frankly state that, having neglected, from the outbreak of this war, to inspire his policy with the Canadian spirit, he would, no doubt, to-day be less fearful and apprehensive of a referendum "somewhere in England." Mr. Speaker, a question of capital importance for the welfare of Canada has been agitated for nearly ten years in this country, and it must be admitted that the proceeding in the course of this and former parliaments has been somewhat stormy ever since. In fact, during the session of 1910 a Naval Service Bill was introduced and adopted by Parliament in spite of the Opposition, then under the leadership of the present Prime Minister, who advocated the idea that the people should be consulted. Just think of it! We were to spend some ten million dollars to build in this country a navy which would be a Canadian navy and could assist the mother country in war time.

I have already said in this House and I repeat to-day that the Naval Service Act was the only cause for which the Laurier Government was driven from power, and as Cartier was defeated for having carried through the Militia Act by means of which our defence on land was organized, so did Sir Wilfrid Laurier lose power because he had introduced and carried through his Naval Bill providing for our defence on sea. I owe it to history to say, however, that I took no part in the campaign against the Naval Act and its complements, a campaign which was carried on for nearly two years in the province of Quebec, under the paternal and benevolent eye of the present Prime Minister and of his Siamese brother the Minister of Justice. However, I did not suspect, at the time, that this double-dealing had no other immediate purpose than the triumph of the Tory party of old, over the policy of Baldwin-Lafontaine, MacNab-Morin and Macdonald-Cartier. True to the political principles of those men which alone had got me elected to this House, I did not hesitate, on two different occasions, to ask, by way of a resolution, full and complete justice for the Catholic or Protestant minority in the territory of Keewatin which was purported to be annexed to the province of Manitoba. Then again, at the following session, when the present Prime Minister, back from England, expressed, in the speech from the Throne, his desire to change the nature of our constitutional relations with the mother country, I did not hesitate for a moment to urge, also by way of a resolution, that our political and constitutional status should not be changed. That amendment was opposed by the Prime Minister, who stated that be could not accept it, because its adoption, said he, would preclude Canada from raising a finger for the defence of the Empire. During that same session I supported the leader of the Opposition in an effort to defeat the Government measure by which we were called upon to vote $35,000,000 as a contribution towards increasing the naval forces of the Empire.

Once more, on that occasion, I stated the grounds of my stand on that question, and honour be to the Canadian Senate who refused, in that case, to concur in the decision of the majority of this House! But, how fanciful the course of events, and how inconsistent the Tory policy! Those zealous apostles of the rights of the people as against the Laurier Naval Act, were then seen to refuse a plebiscite, or a referendum. and, God help me! general elections on this proposal of later date.

In the early days of this Parliament, Mr. Speaker, always for the sole purpose of remaining true to my promises towards the electors of my constituency, I hastened to ask the Government as to whether they intended to make good the word given to the electorate of the whole country to the effect that the Naval Bill would be repealed as soon as they took office, and on the 4th of March, 1912, I asked the Government the following question:

1. Is it the intention of the Government to propose that the Naval Act be repealed?
2. If so, does the Government intend, should such repeal take place, to introduce another Bill expressing the views of the Government in this connection?
3. If such further proposal is introduced, is it the intention of the Government to submit it to the approval of the people before it is enforced?

To this question the Government answered through the Minister of Marine (Hon. Mr. Hazen) as follows:

The answer to each of those three questions is: "Yes".

I paid no heed to the diplomatic note which the honourable Minister of Marine thought it proper to append to the main part of that answer.

It is now up to the House and to the country to pass judgment as they see fit to do, in the light of the present events, upon a Government so regardless of the most solemn pledges. As for me, I had the satisfaction of having discharged my duty and, I was about to forget it, I had the approbation of a man who, at the time, was a prospective senator of our province.

After all, I was easily comforted, from the 1st of August, 1914, the date on which the present war was declared, by the thought that the present Government which, up to that time, had been unwilling to do anything towards organizing the defence of our country on sea, might at least, thanks to the foresight and political genius of a statesman of our race, and I venture to say the greatest we have had since the days of Cartier, utilize our naval units for the protection of our coasts and provide for our most elementary defence.

Honourable members will perhaps understand a little more clearly that this statement of mine is neither gratuitous nor dictated by circumstances, when they have been made aware of the fact that, speaking at Sherbrooke, the queen city of the Eastern Townships in our province, previous to the present war, that is, on the 14th of May, 1913, I stated that, from the day England was engaged in a war threatening to the destinies of the British Empire, it would be the duty of Canada to assist the mother country. Who will say that the destinies of the British Empire are not at stake in the present war? Who will venture to claim that, in the present war, England is not fighting for the most rightful and the noblest of causes? Let others give themselves up to minute and perhaps untimely inquiries as to the faults and errors of England; as for me, I have no wish to scrutinize the hidden thoughts of the British statesmen and, in accord with Cardinal Mercier, I take the undoubted fact, the fact which nobody can deny: While Germany was violating clause 7 of the treaty signed at London on the 17th of April, 1839, by King Leopold in the name of Belgium, of the first part, and by the Emperor of Austria, the King of France, the Queen of England, the King of Prussia and the Emperor of Russia, of the second part, England remained true to her oath. This I do not seek to minimize, but would rather seek to magnify, for it becomes a well-born child to commend all commendable acts of his forerunners. Therefore, taking into account the various events which have preceded and brought about the war, I have been and I am still of opinion that Canada should participate in this war voluntarily and freely. However, and I state it emphatically, I do not agree with those who believe that when England is at war, Canada is also at war. Proceeding from a normal and generous sentiment, this participation is one of a special character which it is most difficult to limit, and that is why I wish, first of all, that the Canadian people who, I think, are actuated by those same sentiments, should, of their own motion, determine that limit. It would not be so if the question were to fulfil and to execute an obligation; for, as a limit is necessarily implied in all obligations, that limit would be fixed and determined.

Mr. Speaker, I am not unaware of the fact that the present participation of Canada is helping France, and I am proud to be of French descent; but as England is fighting for England, so is my participation looking to Canada first and then to England the free institutions of which have so far preserved our nationality. That is why, in August, 1914—and I say this purposely—the Parliament of Canada was perfectly unanimous in voting, as a matter of urgency, $50,000,000 to pay the expenses of sending volunteers only. Need I quote, here, the words uttered within the precincts of this Parliament, on the 28th of May last, by A. J. Balfour, the great British statesman and democrat, who appreciated the nature of this participation in the light of the constitution by which we are governed?

> The Government of the Mother Country cannot raise a corporal's guard in Canada, Australia, New Zealand, or wherever you will; she can not raise a shilling of taxation; she has no power. (Hansard, House of Commons, May 28th, 1917.)

Unfortunately for Canada, its Militia Department was administered, at the time, by a man whose fitness for filling such an important position, even under ordinary circumstances might have been doubted. Redent developments made his position more important than that of the Prime Minister and it seemed only natural that the management of this department should be confided to some other than the regular representative of the Orange lodges. Nevertheless, and I have no hesitation in stating the fact, in spite of all outside as well as inside clamours, the Prime Minister continued his confidence in the Minister of Militia until the revelations of a commission which was extra-judicial and non-parliamentary—for more would have been known—forced the Prime Minister decidedly to break with the representative of the lodges who had made our military organization sectarian in its character to the extent that not only the French Canadians, but even the Anglo Canadians whose fitness was not recognized by a whole hive of middlemen, wearing, or not, the military uniform, were denied finding favour with the department.

Notwithstanding such difficulties, I may say it to the glory of our people, the system of voluntary enlistment succeeded beyond our most optimistic expectations.

Our military organization, under the direction of the Minister of Militia, was absolutely defective from the outset because it had the defence of the Empire rather than of Canada as its object. In a word, it was sought to have Canada play a leading part in this war, whereas, taking our financial position, our population and our resources into account, our help to England should have been limited to the exact proportion in which Canada could contribute. The Department of Militia was left for three years under the almost exclusive control of the member for Victoria and Haliburton as we may call him so now that he is sitting here with us instead of taking his place in the trenches "somewhere in France," as he gave us to understand that he would do when he delivered a certain speech in New York, in which he first promised—before the Prime Minister did—to send 300,000 soldiers from Canada, and even 500,000 if need be.

Untiring worker, since he left the cabinet he first thought of getting chosen again as a Tory candidate in Victoria, where he met another opportunity to abuse the French Canadians of this country at a political meeting held recently. A few days after, he came to the House and, in the absence of the Prime Minister, he put on the Orders of the Day a resolution which entailed compulsory service for others.

Are we to presume that, when the Prime Minister was back here, he again yielded to the influence of this evil spirit? At any rate, in the same way that he had supported the request for 500,000 men, so did he introduce, just after his return from England, such a military conscription Bill as the ex-Minister of Militia said he desired.

History must have a very severe judgment in reserve for the men who, to-day, would turn this voluntary, free and generous contribution of our people into an obligation, and who, by the very fact, are paralysing the efforts of Canada while the war is raging, the most portentous war England ever had to wage. In fact, and it should not be forgotten, Mr. Speaker, the untimely and, to express the whole of my thought, the unskilful manner in which the Prime Minister submitted this Bill to Parliament has alienated from him certain sympathies which he would now try in vain to get back. I would say, further, that the nature of the debate which has been carried on in this House for a fortnight, has caused every earnest listener to understand that one should rather take interest in the unity of Canada, henceforth, before looking to the unity of the Empire.

Certain English papers of this country, like certain members of this House, vie with each other in denouncing the disloyalty of the French Canadians who. they say, deliberately refuse to enlist and seem to have become unworthy of the consideration granted to all British subjects. Shall I say it? This movement against the province of Quebec seems to be more especially marked in the province of Ontario, which would appear to have nothing more at heart than to see Quebec isolated from the rest of Confederation. Unless I am mistaken about the intention of that province with respect to us, it is not at all unlikely that the conditions might be reversed and that the province which longed to isolate another should be isolated itself.

The Canadians of French descent have done their share in this war, if we consider the impediments of every kind and description which were set in their way. I shall only speak of the nature of those impediments in general terms, as several members have dealt with it more in greater detail. Our people are attached to the soil upon which their ancestors have settled, and in their estimation, Canada is the only country worth while to them. When this country was conquered, the French Canadians were disarmed lest they should not willingly submit to the new régime, and yet, the history of the struggles rendered necessary for the defence of our soil has recorded the names of no worthier defenders than they were. Not so long ago our gallant 65th Regiment did great honour to itself in the western prairies by calming an agitation by which peace and order were threatened in the interior of the country. By the way, may I recall, right here, the order according to which severe instructions were given a few years ago to the effect that this French regiment should present arms no more in honour of the Most High. What a sound military teaching, and what better means than this could be resorted to in order to make the sovereign power of the King of England more respected! The assertion is made repeatedly in certain quarters that the present Bill is aimed especially at the province of Quebec. I yet refuse to believe it. If it were so, now would be the time for us to investigate the real meaning of our political and constitutional status in this Confederation, the fiftieth anniversary of which we have just celebrated. We have attained manhood, and before we reach old age which would imply a heavier loss of the privileges guaranteed to us by Confederation, we shall seriously consider the advisability of asking that the federal covenant be set aside. There must be no superior race or inferior race in this country. Those who have associated together as a confederation must enjoy equal rights, and as to us, French Canadians, we have, so far, respected our obligations to the extent that the province of Quebec—and I do not hesitate to say it—may well be quoted as an example to all the rest of Canada for the fair treatment granted by her to minorities, within her limits, they enjoy all the privileges guaranteed to them by the constitution. Is it so, Mr. Speaker, with the minorities in the other provinces? Was it so in New Brunswick in 1872? Has it been so in Manitoba ever since 1890? Is it so in this province of Ontario? Do our fellow countrymen enjoy a full and complete liberty in the matter of school teaching? As an answer to this, you hold out to us the letter of the law, but we appeal to the spirit of this same law, and adding hypocrisy to abuse, certain members of this House declare, at times, that rule 17 was adopted in the province of Ontario, in order that the teaching of the French language in that province might be favoured to greater extent. No, long enough have statements of the kind been read by us with an excessive equanimity, and the House will allow me to recall, in this connection, the clatter indulged in by the lodges when the ex-Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier) thought fit to have a postal card printed in English and French and distributed in Ontario as well as in Quebec. Ontario, have I said, is practically wrong in taking a position so inimical to minorities, because, in due time, all the minorities in Canada might perhaps adopt as their slogan that of the province of Quebec: "I remember". The province of Ontario has been all-powerful with the present Administration, she has made an ill use of that power, even, by the fact that she was instrumental in delaying, so far, the construction of the Georgian Bay canal, a national enterprise above all, and which would have brought about closer relations between the eastern and the western part of Canada, and the opening of the most direct route through the St. Lawrence river up to the head of the Great Lakes.

I should not conclude my remarks, Mr. Speaker, without stating openly that I am not scared beyond measure by the furious outcry which may be directed against our province—— I say our province, for I am confident that right-minded people of the great and beautiful province of Ontario are with us. We rely also on the farming community of the West to silence the ambitions, inordinate in many cases, of the Ontario manufacturers. As to our good friends of the Maritime Provinces, I do not think they would find any advantage in parting with their good neighbours of the province of Quebec. May the province of Ontario be inspired, at last, with a true Canadian spirit and never compel her sister provinces to adopt measures for paralyzing her action so necessary to our national life, thereby averting the possibility of a central empire being created in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, it would have been my pleasure to address this House in the language of the majority, but as long as it will be sought in this province and outside of this House, to preclude the French children from learning the French languague at school, I shall deem it my duty to speak, here, the language guaranteed to us by the constitution, thanks to the efforts of the Liberal-Conservative party, and in spite of the systematic opposition of the Tory party. So that no doubt is left in any mind as to the broadmindedness of the province of Quebec in general and of the electors of the county which I have the honour to represent. I may say that the county of Yamaska elected, for twelve consecutive years, as its representative at the local legislature the only English-speaking and Protestant elector who resided within the limits of that county, I mean the late Justice Wurtele.

Mr. Speaker, any one may call me a Conservative, a Nationalist or a Liberal if he likes; to my mind, a question of this nature admits of no party, we are guided solely by the sentiment which is in the heart of each of us.

However, I hope that after listening to me no one shall doubt that I intend henceforth to support the distinguished statesman who does credit to the Canadian Liberal party which under his far-seeing guidance represents, better than any other, heretofore, the true aspirations of our race.

Mr. LEVI THOMSON (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Loggie) has said that in this war we are fighting for Canada. That is quite true, but I think we should take a broader view of the struggle than that. There has been some discussion as to whether or not Canada is in any special danger on account of this war. Canada may not be in any special danger, but the world is in very grave danger. This is a world war, and will have world-wide effects, and the welfare of humanity is of more importance than even the welfare of Canada. We are citizens of the world as well as citizens of Canada, and I believe the real interest of humanity is to do our best in the winning of the war. I have been reluctantly forced to the conclusion that, in order to do our proper part, it is advisable that we should adopt the principle of conscription. I would be ashamed to admit that I had otherwise than reluctantly come to a conclusion that would cause me to give a vote to force men to fight and, if needs be, to die in this terrible war. But having come to that conclusion I do not feel it is necessary for me to offer any apologies for differing from my leader on this question. I heartily concur in all that has been said in praise of the leader of the Liberal party by those who have felt it necessary on this occasion to differ from him. I have more confidence in the judgment of the leader of the Liberal party than in that of any other member of this House; but our actions must be guided by our own judgment and not by the judgment of someone else, and in voting on this question, I will follow the dictates of my conscience.

We on this side have received a great deal of advice from the press of this country on both sides of politics. We have been solemnly warned that we should not play politics with conscription, and we have been warned with equal solemnity of the result to our party if we should vote for a referendum; that is, we must not play politics on the question of conscription, but we must play politics on the question of a referendum. I refuse to play politics on either question. The Journal-Press of this city on the 21st of June made the statement that I justified my willingness

> To make bed-fellows of anti-conscriptionists on the ground that the grain growers' platform which I had signed, had contained the plank favouring a referendum.

I have never on any occasion, either to myself or to any one else, justified my proposed vote on any such ground. I know but one way to justify my vote on this question, and that is by voting as I believe to be right. The Journal-Press continues:

> Even this hon. member would rush to the support of the Government if he thought there was any danger of the amendment carrying and the Government being defeated.

I do not purpose swallowing my convictions to save the Liberal party, and I am not going to swallow them to save the Conservative party. That is not the way in which parties are saved. I believe the Liberal party is well worth saving, but I do not believe the Conservative party is.

We have heard a great deal about the responsibility of the Government for the condition of affairs as it now exists and for the failure of recruiting. I quite agree that the Government is very largely responsible for that condition, but I think that the French Canadian agitators of Quebec and the anti-French agitators of Ontario must share the responsibility. I believe every hon. member of this House feels, from the bottom of his heart, that it is true that the control of the war organization of this country has been rotten with partisanship and patronage, and that is doing a great deal to upset the confidence of the people in the administration of affairs. The sooner that condition is remedied, the better.

I agree also that the failure to conscript wealth has had a great deal to do with the failure of the public to have in the Administration that confidence that is necessary in all cases. Let me quote, with approval now, a few words from the Journal-Press of 26th of June on the question of the conscription of wealth:

> Knowledge on the part of all, that everybody was being made to do the utmost would be an addition of immeasurable strength to our effort.

Nothing can be truer than that statement. It is necessary at all times that there should be public confidence in the actions of the Government, and in the history of Canada there has been no time when that has been more necessary than the present, although it seems to me that our hon. friends opposite have failed to recognize the fact. We are told that we are raising as much from the wealth of the country as is needed to be raised from the wealthy classes for the purposes of the war. I do not believe that; I take issue with that statement immediately. We should have paid very much more than we have done of the war expenditures of the year from direct taxation which should be imposed upon the wealthy men of the country, and we should take less from the poor man through our outrageously high customs tariff. Further than that, we require to raise much more money each year to deal honestly with our men at the front. We are paying them $1.10 a day, whereas unskilled labourers receive much more than that for perfectly safe work. A farm labourer in my locality can earn from $500 to $600 a year; he must get in addition three squares meals a day, regularly served, and he must have comfortable accommodation and bed or he will not stay. Our men at the front are in daily danger of mutilation and death; they are living in every discomfort that one can imagine; they are living in the midst of mud and dirt and surrounded by rats and vermin; they have to undergo all the horrors of war, and still we are not paying them as much as we pay our unskilled labourers. Some of the fiercest denunciations of the prophets of old were hurled against those who defrauded the labourer of his hire, but every day we are defrauding our labourers at the front of their hire, and now we are proposing to compel men to fight, and yet we are not going to pay them a reasonable wage for the suffering they will have to undergo. The fact that the Allies are not paying a reasonable wage is no excuse for us.

We hear a great deal about our duty to our boys in the trenches. The man who speaks most eloquently about our duty to our boys in the trenches is the man over military age, with a good income, who has no sons of military age, either in the trenches or elsewhere, who pays such sums to the Patriotic and Red Cross funds as do not inconvenience him in the least, and who pays his employees in comfort at home from $2 to $7 a day. Those whose hearts are in the trenches, whose flesh and blood are in the trenches, and in the hospitals and graves of France, cannot speak so glibly about these things. It is time we cut out this sentimental slobbering about our duty to our boys in the trenches until we are prepared to deal honestly with them.

We have heard a good deal about the probable working out of this measure, and I quite agree with the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) in his suggestions as to what the probable working out will be unless the provisions are materially changed. I do not purpose dealing with those provisions now. We shall have an opportunity of dealing with them later on, but they certainly must be drastically changed before this measure will be in anything like workable shape. It may be that the Government, in bringing this Bill before us, is merely playing a political game. I do not know whether that is the case or not, but we are placed in a certain position, and I am not going to discuss the question as to who is to blame for that position. We are placed in it and we must face it. It does not matter to me whether the Government is dealing with this question honestly or not; I must deal with it honestly, and I purpose voting for conscription, because I believe it is the proper way in which to face the position in which we are placed. We have entered into the war for the benefit of humanity, and the obligation is on us to do our best to win the war as speedily as possible. That obligation is just as great upon us as it is upon Great Britain and France, and those countries have found it necessary to adopt conscription, and it is advisable that we should do the same. The call for men, food and munitions is so great that it is necessary to get them with as little economic disturbance as possible, and it is only by selective conscription that that can be done. I have watched the work of recruiting in my own locality. In my own town a friend of mine is in charge of recruiting. Not a political friend but a personal friend. Were he a political friend he would not be in charge. My political friends may go to the trenches but that is the only possible connection with this war that is open to them, and that is true of hon. members on this side generally. I believe that this friend of mine of whom I speak has done his work faithfully and well to the best of his ability. He has been well supported, but the work of late has been most unsuccessful.

The results are practically nil. It seems to me that the voluntary plan is wasteful at the present stage, and has been wasteful for the past eighteen months; it should have been changed at that time. Though I have come to this conclusion I do not propose to criticise those who think differently. Each has to think this matter out for himself, and vote as he believes to be right. I believe that conscription was more needed a year ago than it is now, and that it would have been much more effective if it had been put in force then, but I would not have voted for it a year ago as I was not in favour of it then.

The Government, if they are honest, were opposed to conscription a few weeks ago. The Government are turncoats on this question, and so am I, but I do not propose to criticise those who do not turn their coats at the same moment as myself; I think it would be very bad taste.

We are asked to avoid playing politics on the conscription issue, but at the same time they ask us to be guided by the possible effects on our party of a vote for the referendum. If that is not playing politics, I do not know what playing politics means.

I do not approve of the way this conscription measure was brought before the House. I think it was as badly timed and as badly staged as it possibly could be. Neither do I approve of the way the referendum proposal came before the House. But conscription and the referendum are before us, and I propose to vote on the principle of conscription and on the principle of the referendum, no matter how they were brought before the House. If the Government will pledge themselves to submit the question of conscription to the people by way of referendum, if they desire the principle of the Bill to be first approved, I will support them. My own idea is that the best way should be to approve of the principle of the Bill, and afterwards get it in shape either before or after a referendum. The Bill could even be got in shape while the people were getting ready to vote on the question. I will support the Government in whatever step they take so long as the question is first submitted to the people. I propose to vote for submitting it to the people whenever I get the chance.

It has been argued that if it is right to take a vote of the people on conscription, a vote should have been taken before we entered the war. I do not want to accuse any one of insincerity, but I can hardly see how any one who advances that argument can think for one moment that there is anything in it. It would have been absolutely impossible to have taken a vote on the question of entering the war; there would have been no time for it. More than that, in August, 1914, the public were practically unanimous that we should enter the war. It would have been utter nonsense to have taken a vote of the people on that question.

Two very large and very important sections of the community are now strongly opposed, not to carrying on the war, but to a certain plan for carrying on the war; they are strongly opposed to conscription.

I was in favour of direct legislation long before I became a member of this House. I placed myself publicly on record in favour of direct legislation before the principle was adopted as a plank of the platform of the Grain Growers' Association of my province. When the naval question was up in this House I suggested that the Government submit the question to the people in the form of a referendum. Later on an amendment was moved by a Nationalist member of the House that the measure be submitted to the people by way of referendum. I knew that a vote for the nationalist amendment would be unpopular with my leaders, but I believed it was right to vote for the amendment, and I voted for it accordingly.

It has been argued that we should not submit the conscription measure to the people by way of referendum because the measure would be defeated. Surely that is a horrible reason, with all respect to those who advance it. The fact remains, however, that for every man who gives that opinion publicly dozens give it privately. I believe the expectation that the measure would be defeated in a referendum is largely responsible for the opposition to the referendum amendment. What does that mean? We say that we are fighting in this war for democracy as opposed to autocracy. Now a democratic government, as I understand it, is government of the people, for the people, by the people, that is majority rule. What is autocracy? Autocracy is the rule of the many by a select few, and some people want that select few to be hon. gentlemen in this House. They want the members of this House to rule whether the people approve or not; that is minority rule. I think those who urge us to vote against the referendum because conscription would be defeated, are placing themselves in a peculiar position. They are asking our boys to fight and die for principles which they themselves refuse to put into practice. They would force our men to go out and kill Germans for fighting for principles which they themselves practise.

The Kaiser claims a divine right to rule Germany. Well, about a half a century ago the people of Germany selected an emperor to rule over them, and they provided means for the appointment of a successor to that emperor after his death. The German Emperor, on the strength of this, claims a divine right to rule. We were elected to this House some years ago. For what? To represent the people of Canada. But now some are claiming the right, not to represent the people of Canada, but to misrepresent them and to rule over them. What is the difference then, between the situation here and that in Germany? In Germany they have one big Kaiser, and in Canada we have a lot of little would-be Kaisers,—that is about the difference as I see it.

We are told that we must lead public opinion. But the proposition put forward is, not to lead public opinion but to muzzle it. I am quite willing to take my part in leading public opinion, but I do not care to take part in muzzling it. We are told that it would be better to have a general election instead of a referendum. No reason has been given for that, and I suppose that is because no reason can be given. Why should we adopt that plan unless for the purpose of finding out what the people want —getting the views of the people? But, if we want to get the views of the people, the simplest way is a referendum. After a referendum has been held we shall actually know what the people want. Why should we have an election? The only reason I can see is to confuse the issue and defeat the will of the people; I have not heard any other reason given. In a general election the issues will be obscured; and, so far as the boys at the front are concerned, very much obscured. If we ask the soldiers to vote for or against conscription, they will know what they were doing; but, with the present confusion of political parties in Canada, in a general election they would not know what they are doing; they might want to vote for conscription but at the same time they would be voting against it. I think that in most English-speaking constituencies the majority are in favour of conscription. But those in favour of conscription are divided into two parties. What would be the result? In the constituency in which sixty per cent of the people are in favour of conscription and forty opposed to it, what are they going to do? The anti-conscriptionists are not fools altogether; there will be a Liberal conscriptionist nominated and a Conservative conscriptionist nominated. This will divide the conscriptionist vote, naturally anti-conscriptionists would win and that will mean minority rule. I do not know that that sort of minority rule would be very popular, or that it is just, fair and reasonable.

I am in favour of the referendum because I think it is the quickest way to get support for our men in the trenches. I am satisfied as to that, and cannot see an argument in support of any other plan. We could in a very few weeks have the whole question settled by this means; and I am satisfied that if the question is fairly put before the people conscription will carry. I am willing to do my part in trying to have it carried. And I am prepared at all times to trust the people. While I try to make clear here what is the best plan, I recognize that, in this House, as in the country, the majority must rule. If the amendment in favour of a referendum is voted down, I will do what I can to make this Bill workable; and my feeling is that we ought all to do the same. But I say we should trust the people. I would like to make one last appeal to the Government to trust the people. If they do not trust the people how can they expect the people to trust them? And why should the people trust them? If the Government refuse to have faith in the people, I think that the people, at the first opportunity will hurl this faithless Government from power. But if we have faith in the people, we establish democracy in Government, which, we say, is the principle for which this whole war is fought.

Mr. LOUIS J. PAPINEAU (Beauharnois): (translation): Mr. Speaker, before proceeding with the remarks I have to make about the very important question now under consideration, I will take the liberty of calling attention to the statements made by some of the hon. members of this House.

The hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers) has told us that, if the province of Quebec had answered the call for volunteers as did the other provinces, there would have been no necessity for introducing a compulsory service Bill. The hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen) assures us, on his part, that the province of Quebec will be the least affected. The hon. member for North York (Mr. Armstrong) asserts as the raison d'être of this measure that the French Canadian has not done his duty. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) also deplores that efficient methods have not been adopted in Quebec, so as to educate the French population to the most important and vital questions raised by the present conflict. La Patrie of June 19, 1917, reproduced the following item from the Mail and Empire of Toronto:

The Mail and Empire admits that the Military Service Bill will affect Quebec more seriously than the other provinces.

> When our volunteers offered themselves, did they make conditions? Did they say, "We will not go unless men from Quebec volunteer in due proportion?" They did not. And is French-speaking Canada, through the medium of recreant partisans of small calibre in English-speaking Canada, to dictate conditions in the matter of compulsory service?
> There has not been equality of sacrifice. Quebec, with its large population, has not figured largely in the recruiting of the army. The Military Service Bill will rectify that inequality in so far as reinforcements are concerned. The 50,000 or 100,000 or whatever other number of new forces are to be raised to support our men at the front, will be drafted on a basis equitable to all the provinces. It is a measure to ensure equality of sacrifice. * * *

The hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Arthurs) has told us there was not one available man in Ontario, and my hon. friend from South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) states that in the city of Guelph, there are three or four hundred men he hopes to reach through this Bill.

As you can see, Mr. Speaker, the object is compulsory service because, according to the quotations I have just read, the province of Quebec has shirked her duty. It is therefore, worth while to examine those various statements and see whether they are well-founded or not. I will try to be brief and say very frankly what kind of a situation has been made to that province, since the beginning of the war, as far as enlistment is concerned. I do not wish to repeat here what has already been said, but I will submit to you, Mr. Speaker, a few observations that may perhaps put the conditions in their true light.

Long before the month of August, 1914, the general impression was that a war, with the enormous armaments of the nations taking part in it, could not be of long duration. Europe, according to public opinion, expected the conflict and years had been spent in making the required preparations. The burden of armaments was crushing the nations under ever increasing taxation and rendered, so to speak, the catastrophe inevitable. So, as soon as war had been declared, the general impression was that, with the modern war machinery, it might last only a few months, six at the most. It has been lasting for almost three years and the end is not yet. However, in August, 1914, that impression of a most fierce and disastrous war, but of very short duration, did exist.

Enlistment and the levy of battalions in the province of Quebec were not conducted in such a way as to encourage and induce the French Canadians to enlist. What were the intentions or the designs of those who organized recruiting? I believe that politics, here again, played a nefarious part.

I understand that, when the first contingent was organized, two French Canadian battalions were incorporated in it, and that five thousand French Canadians who tried to enlist, could find no place in those ranks. Later on, a French Canadian offered to raise a battalion, but his offer was turned down, English Canadians had been authorized to form other battalions and he should have to wait. Mr. so and so and Mr. another must be given the preference before a new authorization could be granted, which by the way, has never been given. There has been, as far as I can see, politics at the bottom of this whole matter. I cite this case, but is it the only one? Who can tell us there have not been many similar ones? I do assert that, even in this third year of the war, they still persisted in thwarting the recruiting among the French Canadians. I know that they may deny what I now say here, because I do not want to be formal and I refuse to give any details. However, I believe that the facts I mention are well grounded.

In his speech, the hon. Minister of Militia (Sir A. E. Kemp) has mentioned the name of Lieut.-Col. A. M. Labelle. He told us that this officer had done all he could towards recruiting. My hon. friend from Saint Mary's (Mr. Martin) told him that Col. Labelle had three sons and that not one of them had gone to the front. I must say that, in fact, this officer has three sons, one aged 13, another 18, and the third, who is 22 years old, is in the service since August 7, 1914.

In 1914, there was in the Militia Department a patronage list, and on November 17, 1914, the name of Lieut.-Col. Labelle was placed on that list, as evidenced by the following letter:

[Mr. Papineau.]

Minister's Office,
Ottawa, November 17, 1914.

Dear Colonel Labelle,

As requested by Mr. H. B. Ames, M.P., I have had much pleasure in placing your name upon the Patronage List of this department.

Faithfully,
(Signed) Sam. Hughes.

Lt.-Colonel A. M. Labelle,
34 Versailles St.,
Montréal, Que.

What was the object of this proceeding? I do not know. What I do know is that Lieut.- Col. Labelle was a good officer who had been 16 years in the Militia before the declaration of war. The Militia Council reports for the years 1912 and 1913 give praise to him and to his battalion. That of 1912 states that the commander of the 65th Battalion is a zealous and enthusiastic officer, perfectly understanding his duties. In 1913, the Militia Council communicated to him the following remarks from the Inspecting officer:

A very fine regiment and, thanks to the wonderful energy and zeal of its commander, it has made great progress at camp.

On September 9, 1915, Lieut.-Col. A. M. Labelle offered to recruit and organize a battalion for service in Europe and addressed his request to the ex-Minister of Militia. He stated that in the district where his battalion was being recruited, there were at least 400 men who would enlist under his command. Many had previously been in active service and all were trained soldiers. He wrote that he had been promised the funds required for the purchase of a machine gun, if he were permitted to raise that new battalion. He added that he had the co-operation of sixteen efficient officers and suggested as second commanding officer Capt. C. T. W. Etches, who had taken part in the South African War. As to his capacity for organizing and commanding this battalion, he referred the minister to his military record. On October 14, 1915, he renewed his offer to the 4th Military District C. O., in Montreal. On October 25, 1915, he received an answer thanking him for his offer and informing him that, for the present, the organizing of a battalion for overseas service could not be considered.

Lieut.-Col. Labelle continued doing his duty and he did what he could, as the Minister of Militia declared before this House, in his speech of June 25. I believe they were wrong in refusing that offer.

Two months later, January 1, 1916, the Right Hon. Prime Minister raised his offer of soldiers for the overseas service to 500,000 men, and on July 16, 1916, the Minister of Militia made him a report wherein we read the following:

At the time you offered the half-million, it was as well known as it is now, that Quebec was not doing her duty, nor were some other parts of Canada doing theirs, although it must be borne in mind that the Acadians have done magnificently and I firmly believe that it is possible to get Quebec to fall into line later.

Recruiting was already ebbling and yet, two months previous, the formation of new battalions could not be entertained. In that same report, I read the following:

So far as recruiting for the future in Canada is concerned, your promise of half a million men could easily be fulfilled. But it will not be fulfilled, if you permit yourself to be hampered by raising little drafts here and little drafts there, sent over in charge of junior lieutenants.

If it was so easy as he said, I regret, and the whole country will regret it also, that he did not attend to it. I have just told you, Mr. Speaker, that in October, 1915, recruiting was not progressing. However, about that time, not later than January or February, 1916, a new battalion, the 206th was authorized. It was during the period when the Government authorized recruiting in localities where they could levy 25 men or more. That is what the ex-Minister of Militia mentions as the 3rd recruiting method, in his letter of July 5, 1916, which he quoted in the course of the debate. According to this system, I understand that the recruits were left in their own localities, if they were 25 or over and could board there. They were paid $1.10 and 75 cents for their daily allowance. As these men were given to understand they would never leave the country, the proposition was an alluring one. And so the recruiting went on fine, but it did not last long, and in June, at Valcartier, a large number of these recruits unfit for service were discharged. One of them had swollen veins; another was flat-footed; another was ruptured; one or two were maimed, having been the victims of some accident a few yers before their enlistment. I know that one of these had two fingers of his right hand missing. The battalion was disbanded, and a Montreal paper informed us that about ten of its officers were liable to pass before a military tribunal. I add, without further comment, that the commander of this battalion was an ex-Conservative candidate. There have also been other abuses and I wish to particularly refer to the enlistment of more youths of fifteen, sixteen and seventeen years of age, without their parents' consent and knowledge. Here are a few cases I may quote to the House: Israël Sauvé, enlisted in June 1915, at 16, in the 69th; Alfred Martin, No. 2158489, born May 23, 1901, enlisted March last in the 230th battalion of Ontario. It is a Forestry battalion, as I understand it. Armand Martin, born March 29, 1900, No. 1090400, and Adelard Faubert, No. 1090401, born January 26, 1900. All of them are French Canadians of the province of Quebec and are in battalions of the province of Ontario. I consider that these youths ought not to have been accepted, and that before long they will be returned home for the work is too much for them and they will probably be a burden to their families and to the State.

I mention these few facts in order to demonstrate how recruiting was carried on in a portion of the province of Quebec. Whence I infer that if volunteering has given only the results obtained and which are being so harshly criticized to-day—it is because the Government has not taken the proper means to obtain better ones, and did not care to do so. Complaints are being made, and rightly so, I believe, about the treatment given to the soldiers returned from the front, if I can judge by a case which I happened to come across quite recently: Private Jos. Delisle was wounded at Ypres. He has his discharge, his conduct has been good. He received a bayonet wound in the right fore-arm, and a piece of shrapnel tore off his right elbow. He was laid up for eleven months in various hospitals and convalescent wards. He returned to the country and was discharged at Quebec, on January 31, 1917. This soldier is twenty-six years of age and a married man. The Pension Commission, upon a report of advisers, which declare that his elbow-joint is anchylosed and that this incapacity is probably a permanent one, grant him a pension of $8 per month. He maintains that his elbow was torn off by a splinter of a shell, and I believe he ought to know what he's talking about. I do not intend to discuss this case, but I refer to it in order to establish, with the other facts I have already related, that you cannot expect to get soldiers with such treatment. I do not want to take up the time of the House in repeating arguments against conscription, from the legal or the economic point of view, both of which have been so well and so thoroughly discussed. I will take the liberty of making only one remark upon this subject. Recently, I received a letter informing me that the Government intend calling in Chinese to take the places of the men they want to compel and send over to the front. My correspondent asserts that his representative, my hon. friend from Chateauguay (Mr. Morris) has stated in his own presence that the Government had already sent for 35,000 of them; that he had seen some of them at work and had been surprised to find them such good men. We are told that we need soldiers to fill the gaps, that we must go and relieve those who have gone away. We have promised to send them all the assistance in men that they might need, and for that, we must have conscription.

Who ever thought of conscription when these soldiers left? Who spoke of it? Nobody even thought of it. They went away as volunteers and they could not expect any but volunteers like themselves to join them at the front. If they ask for more than that, their demand is extravagant. And when the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) intimates that, if conscription is not adopted, the soldiers returning from the front may perhaps commit excesses to take revenge for not having received the desired reinforcements, if however they did desire any, I say that such language is an incentive to riot and to civil war without any plausible motive, and that he is uselessly trying to intimidate the country by such talk. The Right Hon. Prime Minister has on that occasion, spoken in terms unworthy of the high position he occupies.

I find it strange, but I am not surprised, when some honourable gentleman who boils with indignation at certain utterances of my honourable friend from St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Gauthier), finds fault with the speech of the Prime Minister which lends itself to some such interpretation.

We have in France and in England about 240,000 men, that is twelve divisions. There are four divisions, comprising 80,000 men, on the firing lines. If we deduct two more divisions for the auxiliary services, there still remain 6 divisions or 120,000 men on the reserve. It seems to me that in continuing the voluntary recruiting system, it would be an easy matter to supply the required number of soldiers, without resorting to conscription.

The New York Times of June 29 last, commenting on the fact that the American troops will be commanded by their American general and independent of all other control—but this General consulting and acting in concert with the commanders of the French and British armies, says that this will prevent jealousy and discontent, as was the case for Canada, because our soldiers, under the orders of the British authorities, have suffered hardships.

Are our soldiers sent more often than in their turn to the most exposed points? One might believe it. If such were the case, we must expect not only a levy of 50,000 or 100,000 men, but that many others will have to follow, and sooner than is generally expected.

After having announced his conscription policy, the Prime Minister proposed to the leader of the Opposition to form a coalition ministry, in order to have this measure adopted, and afterwards call for a general election to have this Act approved by the electorate. The Right Hon. Prime Minister contends that the seriousness of the situation made his coalition proposal not only desirable but even necessary. The parleying came to nothing, the Right Hon. leader of the Opposition stating that he could not accept a coalition having conscription as a basis. These negotiations were continued from May 24 to June 6.

The debate upon the second reading of this conscription Bill was opened June 18. On the 19th, the ex-Minister of Militia made this assertion:

> It is a well known fact that up to two weeks ago, distinguished members of the cabinet stated that there would be no compulsory service.

So, while negotiations were going on to have a coalition based upon conscription, having conscription as its essential condition, some ministers were declaring that there would be no compulsion. During these coalition negotiations, the Government entered on the Orders of the Day the Railway Act, which they had already introduced and then withdrawn in 1913. They might have even added the Naval Act, as a guarantee of their good faith. These two measures, being the most controversial of this Parliament, might well have been included in the henceforth famous coalition scheme.

Mr. Speaker, if conscription had been, I will not say necessary, but only useful to maintain Canada's effort in this war, it should have been easy for the Prime Minister to demonstrate that fact to the hon. leader of the Opposition. Had there been urgency, as it is said, it would have been so much easier to show it. Under such circumstances, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister had no need to offer a coalition government; in my opinion, it was an insult freely given, and a miserable political manœuvre for purely political ends. No, there was no necessity for a coalition of the political parties. I very well know, and nobody doubts it, in this House and in the country, that if the conscription measure proposed by the Government had been necessary, the Right hon. leader of the Opposition would have so declared it, and while demanding that it be submitted to the people, he would have at the same time asked the people to approve it. The Opposition leader's patriotism is not based or dependent on either coalition or any political combination whatever. In truth, the idea of proposing the coalition of the political parties to pass a conscription Bill and then, by means of this union of both parties, resort to elections in order to enforce it on the people, is distinctly Tory. And, indeed, it did come and it could only come from a Conservative government. If the proposition to adopt this Act and then have an election to have it ratified is reasonable and for the general good of the country, and not merely a political manœuvre, why do not the Government adopt that policy? They have only to consent to consult the people and the Bill will go through to-morrow.

In moving his amendment to the amendment, the hon. member for Berthier (Mr. Barrette) stated that he had received from the various parishes of his county resolutions or petitions from his constituents demanding the referendum or elections, and he inserted in Hansard the very text of one of these resolutions.

The Government having stated their intention to have this Act adopted without referendum or elections, it seems to me that, if the hon. member for Berthier wished to comply with his electors' demand, he had only to vote in favour of the referendum proposed by the Right hon. leader of the Opposition, or else ask for general elections. But no, that did not suit the hon. member's purpose. His electors ask him a popular consultation, referendum or election, and he does not want them to decide the question themselves.

As this Parliament has no longer any legal existence and as we are here because we have voted ourselves an extension of time, it seems to me that the request of our electors, or rather of the electors of our counties—they are no longer electors, strictly speaking, since the month of October last—it is we who have appointed ourselves their representatives, it seems to me, therefore, that we should strictly comply with the requests they may submit to us, especially upon such an important question.

I have also received, Mr. Speaker, like the hon. member for Berthier, resolutions from the electors of my county, demanding a popular consultation. They ask that the question now under consideration be submitted to their own decision. I consider this demand entirely legitimate and reasonable. I shall not assume to decide it for them and, consequently, I will vote against the amendment to the amendment, in favour of the amendment asking for a referendum, and against the adoption of this Bill, so long as it has not been submitted to the Canadian people for approval.

Mr. DONALD NICHOLSON (Queens, P.E.I.): Mr. Speaker, my apology for addressing you at this late hour is that I do not desire to give a silent vote on this important question. When we look at the flags of the Allies with which this Chamber is decorated, we are reminded that at the commencement of the war, if the British Empire, to which we belong, had stood aside and remained neutral, permitting the German Empire to crush France, we and the Empire generally would have been spared a great loss of our manhood and a great outpouring of our wealth. But if the Empire had taken this course, would we, as Canadians, have been proud of our connection with the British Empire? No, Sir, I think that if the Empire had taken such a course, the feeling in this country would be in favour of tearing down the British flag and starting out as an honest independent and self-respecting nation. We as Canadians would never have endorsed such a course.

The object of the Bill now before the House is to obtain further men for the battle-front. Marshal Joffre, when in Montreal, emphasized the need of Canada sending more men. Sir Arthur Currie, the present commander of our forces in France, sent out a call to Canada to come over and help relieve the over-worked battalions who have been subjected to a great strain for the past two years and longer.

The number of voluntary enlistments in Canada has been a source of great pride to us and has far exceeded our expectations; but, at the same time, there are quite a number who could be spared and who would go if a campaign to secure further enlistments were started by the members of this House, with the object of winning the war instead of trying to obtain party advantage. The mover of the amendment which calls for a referendum (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) said that Canada was not in danger of being invaded, which strengthens my opinion that he is not heartily in sympathy with sending men to Europe. The hon. member for North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) stated that he was against the Bill but favoured the amendment owing to the fact that he wished to follow his leader. This reminds me of an incident at the battle of Killicrankie. Scotland was invaded by a foe and the Government mustered the clans and appointed a leader. On the day of the battle two of the clans did not appear. Instead they hid behind crags and on the moors, and acted as the hon. gentleman is acting, simply because their chief, for certain reasons, refused, on the day of battle and trial, to join heartily with the rest of his country. We have here two regiments; some of the Liberals from the lower provinces and the province of Quebec are like snipers; they stand back when the country is invaded and refuse to take their part in its defence, simply and solely, according to their arguments, because of their great respect for their leader. The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) insinuated that the Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Sevigny) was responsible for the poor recruiting in Quebec owing to alleged statements of six years ago, and he emphasized the fact that the minister was at that time thirty years old. We remember the time when the hon. member for St. John was forty years old and ran a campaign in St. John against his present leader, when he would not support Sir Charles Tupper, the leader of the Conservative party, in the elections of 1896, nor would he support the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier)—he wanted to become the leader of a party of his own. I wish that at some time he would explain to this House his reasons for that course. He now appears to have a great admiration for the right hon. gentleman. Judging from the speech of the hon. member for St. John, everything in connection with the war is being done wrong. You would imagine that the hon. member knew considerably more than General Haig or General Joffre, judging by the way he lectured the Government on their conduct of the war.

Much has been said about conscription of wealth and the imposition of an income tax. That is a serious problem that at an early date will have to be faced. Let me remind you that Canada to-day is practically on its own resources as to borrowing. We have large debts maturing, and these we shall be obliged to finance ourselves. Last year the revenue taken from the people was $230,000,000, almost $1,000,000 more than the usual amount. In addition to that, during the last two years there has been a very large contribution of money by the people of Canada; about $500,000,000 has been invested in war bonds by Canadians. I fear that before long there will be a stringency in the money market, so it is not wise to withdraw too much money from the people of Canada to-day. That is why it is not desirable at this time to devote too much money to the retirement of maturing debts.

When this war is over we will have increased taxes, and it will tax the ingenuity of the Finance Minister and Parliament to provide ways and means. I would suggest that an increase duty be placed on cigars, cigarettes and imported raw leaf cigar wrappers as high as 200 boxes, so as to encourage the growth of that style of leaf in this country. Twenty years ago the United States placed a duty of $1.85 on cigar wrappers. Now the best wrappers in the world are raised in Connecticut, owing to protection provided. The climate of some parts of Quebec is well adapted to raising that kind of leaf. In fact, it has been demonstrated. There is another suggestion made by Mr. W. F. Maclean, of York, and, if the facts are as he alleges with regard to nickel product, a large revenue could be obtained by imposing an export on that commodity, which is indispensable for the manufacture of certain articles.

In conclusion, I would appeal to my friends from Quebec to hold another caucus and place their great leader in his proper place amongst the statesmen of the Empire, by withdrawing the amendment and supporting the Bill. Let us all go to our constituents as serious men facing a great emergency. If you do not do so you place your leader and yourself in a position of antagonism to the rest of Canada, yes, further, to the United States, leave England out if you will, but what of France? We have heard Viviani, also Marshal Joffre, whose emphatic call was for men.

Mr. Speaker, I intend to vote for this Bill, because I remember the Lusitania incident, where that ship was torpedoed without warning, and men and women were heartlessly drowned. I remember, also, of the cruel murder of Edith Cavell, an angel of mercy, who was taken and heartlessly executed by this cruel German power. I remember, also, our friend, who used to sit alongside of me, who is now in a grave in France. I refer to our late colleague, Mr. Harry Baker, who sacrificed his young life in the interests of his country. There is another voice, Sir, in connection with this question, and that comes from Germany. It is not the Kaiser nor Hindenburg, but the voice of a colleague in this House, who was taken from his young bride, and incarcerated in a German prison and held there three years. When his wife died, they would not let him view the remains, even if accompanied by a guard. Things like that make me feel that I should support this Bill, in order to send men overseas to assist to break down the power of that nation, which is a menace to civilization. I am rather surprised at the tactics of the Opposition. It is well to have two political parties in this country, but I do not think the Liberals, especially those from Quebec, are treating their leader properly, and he is not treating the country as he should. He has been loyally supported in the lower provinces. At one time he had a solid eighteen supporters from Nova Scotia. Gentlemen rise in Parliament and blame his defeat on what? On Mr. Bourassa. They say he is the man who defeated them. I desire to say that I would not be in this House now, were it not for the issue that was placed before the country by the Liberal party in the election of 1911. The county I represent was in favour of the Liberal party, but that party was defeated solely on the reciprocity issue. The people of this country, not only in the lower provinces, but in Ontario and Quebec, largely turned against the Government on that question. It appears to me foolish for a gentleman to state that the people of this country are carried away by appeals to prejudice. I do not believe that anything of that sort will have any weight, and I do not think such appeals will place the country in a better position. What will be said when the vote is taken to-morrow night? Supposing one corner of Canada is against the remaining provinces, you are putting your leader up against the sentiment of the whole country. What will be said in London after the vote is taken? Surprise will be expressed. What will be said in France? Berlin, no doubt, and Vienna will be pleased. Constantinople, especially, will rejoice. You are backing up a power which has massacred the Armenians, and, by your conduct in voting against this measure, you are upholding the rule and power of Turkey.

Mr. LAFORTUNE (Montcalm) (translation): Mr. Speaker, I beg to inform you that I am desirous of addressing the House after the learned member who has just resumed his seat (Mr. Nicholson, Queens, P.E.I.); but in view of the lateness of the hour it seems to me that it may be deemed a hardship to detain the House any longer. Therefore, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think the hon. gentleman had better proceed a little while according to the arrangement.

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM: What arrangement?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: We desire to conclude the debate to-morrow night. However, my hon. friend from Montcalm (Mr. Lafortune) desires to move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. LAFORTUNE: Yes.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Under the circumstances, I think I will consent.

Motion agreed to.

On motion of Sir Thomas White the House adjourned at 12.35 a.m. Thursday.

Thursday, July 5, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

QUESTIONS.

APPOINTMENTS UNDER O. C., 1 JAN., 1917.

*Mr. MURPHY:

1. How many appointments have been made to date by each department of the Government under the Order in Council of January 1, 1917, amending Section 22 of the Civil Service Act.
2. How many of said appointments are temporary, and how many permanent?

Mr. SEVIGNY:

Department of Interior: 1, four; 2, all temporary.

Department of Mines: 1, two; 2, one permanent and one temporary.

Department of Militia and Defence: 1, Fifty-four; 2, all temporary.

CAPTAIN ALFRED LEFEBVRE.

Mr. PAPINEAU:

Why is it that Captain Alfred Lefebvre has signed a declaration respecting the separation allowance to his wife in which he stated that he was not in the employ of the Canadian Government before June, 1916, and that the said allowance was paid from February 10, 1916, to April 30, 1917?

Sir EDWARD KEMP:

1. Capt. Alfred Lefebvre did not sign such a declaration. He did, however, sign a certificate that he had not been an employee of the Government since 1st June, 1916. The over payment of separation allowance to his wife was due to a clerical error of one of the untrained clerks in the Assigned Pay Branch. This clerk has been dismissed. As already explained, steps have been taken to obtain a refund of the overpayment.

Mr. PAPINEAU:

1. Since what date has Alfred Lefebvre been employed by the Government as sub-collector of Inland Revenue at Valleyfield?
2. What amount has he received for his services in this capacity during the fiscal year ending April 1, 1917?
3. Has the said Alfred Lefebvre been always occupied in this employment since his appointment?
4. If not, for what reason and during what period has he not been occupied in such position?
5. Has he received any salary during his absence from service?
6. What is his salary or compensation per annum?

Mr. SEVIGNY:

1. April 16, 1912.
2. $771.20.
3. No.
4. Enlisted as captain in the 206th Battalion, which battalion was later amalgamated with the 163rd Regiment, from February 10, 1916, and returned to his duties as deputy collector on July 16, 1916.
5. Received the difference between military pay and civil pay.
6. $1,200.

PRIVILEGE—MR. MONDOU.

Mr. A. A. MONDOU (Yamaska): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to raise a question of privilege. The Montreal Gazette, in its edition of this morning reports my speech last night in this House in part as follows:

> Mr. Mondou paid a typical eulogy to Sir Wilfrid Laurier as the greatest French Canadian statesman since Cartier, and concluded: "Whether they call me Liberal, Conservative or Nationalist, there is no party in a question of this kind. However, after my address tonight, no one can doubt that from now on I intend to support that great French Canadian statesman, who has done more than any other man to realize the aspirations of our race."

Hansard shows the statement that I made, which is as follows:

> However, I hope that after listening to me no one shall doubt that I intend henceforth to support the distinguished statesman who does credit to the Canadian Liberal party which under his far-seeing guidance represents, better than any other, heretofore, the true aspirations of our race.

I understand that the Journal Press and the Citizen, both of Ottawa, have made comments to the same effect, as the Gazette, and I take also exception to what those two papers have stated in that connection.

MILITARY SERVICE ACT, 1917.

DEBATE CONTINUED ON MOTION FOR SECOND READING AND ON THE AMENDMENTS.

Consideration of the motion of the Right Hon Sir Robert Borden (Prime Minister) for the second reading of Bill No. 75, Military Service Act, 1917, and the amendment of Sir Wilfrid Laurier thereto, and on the amendment to the amendment by Mr. Barrette, resumed from Wednesday, 4th July.

Mr. D. A. LAFORTUNE (Montcalm) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, in politics very queer things happen, but there are also troublesome things, necessary things, disagreeable and sometimes even pleasant things. In the political world, we are called upon to make sacrifices of all kinds, but I willingly condone all that my opponents have done against me. If there be a moment of satisfaction to me, it is now that I have the honour and pleasure of rising before this honourable House to discuss such a momentous question; it is a great compensation for every sacrifice that I have willingly made in the past.

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to greet new friends, to see them sitting in our midst and I hope that there will be many more ere long.

I have listened most attentively, with a great deal of pleasure, and I will even say dutifully, to all that has been said on either side. I have read and read again very carefully all that has been written; I have scrutinized the situation and pondered over the pros and cons, so as to properly ascertain my position. To-day, being called to speak for the electors of that fine and large county of Montcalm, it is a pleasure to me to be able to declare my views and my convictions on behalf of those good electors. A great many hon. members of this House have supported the conscription Bill and a great many others also have taken exception to it. In discussing this momentous question we are bound to respect the opinions of everybody, while bringing into the debate as much impartiality and fairness as possible. I would have been remiss in my duty had I not discussed this Bill, and now I hasten to state that I disapprove of it and that I strongly support the amendment submitted by the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and I will endeavour to state why I share the views of my revered leader.

Mr. Speaker, it is rather ticklish to begin a speech after the hon. members who have spoken on both sides of this subject, for it is almost entirely exhausted. How can I find a new argument? What can I do, in order to not sift anew everything that has already been said? That is a pretty hard undertaking.

We have, on the right side of the Speaker of this House, most distinguished men, lawyers, scholars, old parliamentarians, in a word, as I said at the start, men of the highest distinction, who have discussed this Bill under all its aspects, in all its forms and phases. On the other hand, we have on the left men just as distinguished who have also spoken on the same subject, and I am afraid that I may not be equal to the situation; I fear that I cannot do full and fair justice to the people I have the honour to represent and that I may annoy the hon. members who have both the task and obligation of hearing me through. Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, I shall do all I can to fulfil my obligations.

The electors of the county of Montcalm have sent me petitions in large numbers; every parish in my county, and there are quite a number of them, have signed these petitions and all of them contain a great list of signatures, asking me to oppose this Bill. I laid these petitions on the Table, Mr. Speaker, and I have the assurance that they have all been duly received, even if they have not all been welcomed. At all events, I have done my duty, as you have done yours in paying due respect to these petitions I have laid before the House.

I have visited the county I represent and discussed the situation with my good electors; I listened to the arguments made by many of them and I may tell you that those in favour of this Bill are pretty scarce and that it is a hard job to find them. The opinion is formed in a decisive way and the people are most determined. There is no possible mistake, they disapprove of that Bill and when you will have to enforce it, I greatly fear you will find it a difficult, not to say an impossible task.

I have been all over the county where I have had the honour to live for the past thirty-two years, I mean Jacques-Cartier county, the old time Conservative county, which has been in days gone by represented by the most important, the most influential and the most worthy men of the province of Quebec, I might perhaps say, of the whole Dominion, I wish to allude specially to the hon. F. D. Monk, who represented this county from 1896 until his death. I still hear him, when from his seat in this House before he had resigned as member of the Cabinet, before the struggles of 1910 and 1914, declaring in this House: Mr. Speaker, we owe nothing to England who owes us everything; it is she who is indebted to us for having preserved for her, in its entirety the finest of all her colonies, Canada. I hear him again, from his seat, when he declared: No, never shall we spend a cent for the Laurier navy before consulting the people.

How times have changed! I did listen to those words, and I saw the hon. members now sitting on the right, applaud, rejoice, clapping their hands as loud as they could, when the late lamented Mr. Monk uttered these words. I do say, Mr. Speaker, how times have changed! It is very right to say that the years, the months, the days follow on but that they never are the same. And when I peruse the Hansard, when I read over again the debates of those days and find out what was then said by hon. gentlemen of the other side, who were then sitting on this side, what a change!

As I have said, Mr. Speaker, at the outset, let us respect the opinions of every one, we are in a free country—as regards the past, at any rate,—and let every one express his convictions, his opinions; but do not criticise more than you should. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that I have really the right to say that the times have materially changed. To-day, Liberals, Conservatives, Nationalists are hand in hand, they are agreed to fight this Conscription Bill; not all, however. I would prefer seeing a larger number on our side. I would have wished that all the members of the fine province of Quebec, of the grand old province of Quebec, were united and had acted as the hon. member for Yamaska (Mr. Mondou). Honour be to him! As did the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Paquet). Every other hon. gentleman from the province of Quebec has joined us in our protest against this Bill, and it seems to me that my immediate duty is to offer, on behalf of my constituents, my most sincere thanks to these good gentlemen, and I would want them to take one more step forward, I would like to see them cross over to this side of the House, one after the other, and come and stand with us under our grand Liberal flag. That flag so grand, so wide, without—I was about to say something which would probably have displeased those gentlemen, but I will not say it—this flag so wide, so grand, that it can shield and cover every man of good-will, and I am sure that none of these gentlemen would have regretted having made that splendid move just executed by the hon. member for Yamaska. He is really a brave one!

Just so. The hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Achim) should not be left out. He is a young man, and courageous. Though a staunch Conservative, and loyal to his party, he did not fear to come and sit with us. For a half day's work, that is not too bad. I am told, Mr. Speaker, that there is a third one. When it starts, it's like snow-rolling, it swells quick, and before I take my seat, I hope there will be others. The French Canadians of the Dominion, the well-thinking Englishmen, and English Canadians, the Irishmen are with us.

Ah! how proud, Mr. Speaker, I felt a few days ago, when I attended an exclusively Irish meeting, made up of the most representative, the most influential and financially the strongest men of the large city of Montreal, the Queen of the Dominion, although Toronto people may think otherwise. I was proud of being among these gentlemen—not as an Irishman but as a mere spectator. There were present, the ex-Mayor of Montreal, Dr. Guerin, who is an authority at home; my colleague on the bench, Mr. Joseph Walsh, ex-member for St. Ann's, who was replaced by the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) a distinguished gentleman whom I would like to see on our side, and I regret that he is not, for he would have expressed, had he been there, the unanimous sentiments of the division which he represents as an Irishman. How proud I was, Mr. Speaker, to see St. Ann's division bringing together all the best men of that district. Its representative was not there, I don't know whether he had been invited or not, but the hon. Minister of Justice was not there. He should have been present, it would have given him an idea of what was going on; he would have realized the unanimous sentiment of his own electorate, protesting and condemning this proposed legislation.

The hon. Minister of Justice is jointly and severally responsible for this enactment, being a member of the Cabinet, but I do not think he ever gave life to that child. I know the hon. Minister of Justice, he is a distinguished citizen, a legal luminary, an ex-professor of the great McGill University, for a long time a judge of the Superior Court of Montreal, a credit to himself, to his compatriots and to his country. Were he on this side of the House and giving his support to what his good electors of St. Ann's are demanding. I was reading over this morning the resolution adopted by the electors of that division, absolutely condemning this law. It seems to me that, had he been there, he would have given in to that sentiment and, instead of occupying a seat on the other side, he would be on our side, I am sure of it. It many yet come to pass.

I have attended, Mr. Speaker, several meetings held in Montreal, that fair metropolis, under the patronage and the immediate guardianship of the distinguished member for St. Mary's (Mr. Martin), who is familiar with the feelings of the electors he represents, and when I speak of the St. Mary's division, I am speaking of all Montreal, from north to south, from east to west, the outskirts and the heart of the city, no one wants that law.

Mr. Speaker, if you attended any one of these meetings, you would stare in surprise; you would return home, I am satisfied, with something of that feeling, which is unanimous in Montreal, that this Act is condemned by all that is most worthy and most representative throughout the great metropolis.

I have taken a part in several of these meetings. You cannot find a discordant voice: "No conscription; down with conscription, we have done our duty, nobly done our duty, and nobody will thus lead us to be slaughtered!" That is what was heard.

You have in Quebec—Quebec, the source of patriotism, the source of true Liberalism—in Quebec it can be nothing strange, for they have as their mandatory the most distinguished leader of the Opposition, Sir Wilfrid Laurier—there have been meetings held in Quebec, in several places, unanimously condemning this Bill. Three Rivers, the capital city of my hon. colleague, Mr. Jacques Bureau. You must have perceived, Mr. Speaker, that Jacques Bureau is not the man on the street. You have listened to him religiously, you have followed his arguments, as we have also done on this side of the House—these gentlemen across did not say much, but by their very silence they approved him. What a masterly speech was that speech delivered by the hon. Mr. Bureau! The strongest arguments, irrefutable arguments, to which no one has yet replied, and I do not think any one can go counter to his statements. I was delighted to hear him, my friends are almost beside themselves, so proud were they of him, and rightly too. Jacques Bureau has enormously gained in the estimation of all, and it must have been the best day in all his political career, I am sure of that, any way.

We have also heard in this House the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Gauthier). I fully endorse all the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe has said. He has been reproached for having gone too far; he has not gone any farther than he should; what he said was not intended as a threat, but as a protest, a warning to ministers should they persist in putting through such a Bill, and especially should they insist on enforcing it, so well satisfied am I that this legislation cannot be carried out, and in a few moments, Mr. Speaker, I shall attempt to show why.

Meetings were also held in Sorel, the country of the strong men. When I speak of Sorel men, you had better stand aside, Mr. Speaker. Meetings took place in Joliette—the land of the Babys, the Godins, the Oliviers, all the wisest men of the North country—and here I must say that it was an inspiration to me to see the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. Guilbault) leave his sick couch, impotent, almost dying, making superhuman efforts in order to come here to protest personally against this iniquitous law; I pay due homage to that generous heart who did understand the full responsibility impending, and who, in spite of all, realized what his duty was, and fulfilled it. I say: All honour to him.

I held a meeting in Lachine, and I can tell you that among those present there were many French Canadians, Englishmen, Irishmen and even Jews, and I must say that there was not a single dissentient voice in the protest voiced against this Bill. I was asked if any French Canadian could be found to support this law. I told them that there was not a single dissentient voice in were few and far between; and if ever any of those French Canadians should come to Lachine, I would let them know that the canal is not far distant.

Another similar meeting was also held in Sherbrooke. You must notice, Mr. Speaker, that Sherbrooke does not only count French Canadians, but that, on the contrary, its population is rather mixed; at that meeting, which was largely attended, all energetically protested against conscription.

Another meeting was likewise held in St. Jerome, the county of the men who were to have their wrists cut off. I remember that in those days they held public meetings to protest against that enactment of the hon. leader of the Opposition. We shall repeal that legislation, did they say, we shall destroy the statutes containing it, and, if we do not succeed, we will cut our own wrists off. I defy any one to go and see if any wrist is missing to-day. I must add that the promoter and leader of that wrist-cutting operation has his own more steadfast than ever, especially so since he is in the Government manger, drawing quite a handsome salary. I respect him, for, after all, he is perfectly entitled, like anybody else, to be a railway commissioner, but it is a remarkable fact that, since he holds that position, he no more talks of having his hands cut off, and yet that Act is still on our statute books.

I have held two big meetings in Ville-Emard, and I can assure you it was quite a sight to look at those working men, that laborious class of people, that class who only ask for protection and for justice, protest as strongly as they could against this iniquitious conscription Act; I am glad indeed to speak to-day on behalf of the electors of Jacques Cartier, the county where I will have the honour of making my next political fight. Some of those good Conservatives on the other side of this House, declared that the hon. member for Montcalm should be shelved. They tried to put me out of this fine Montcalm county, but they couldn't do it. They then thought it over and decided that the best means was to do away with the constituency itself; that is what they did, but I shall get even with them by capturing another county from them. I will capture Jacques Cartier, I am confident I will, and when I do return to this House, it will be on behalf of the electors of that county. Some may observe that the votes are not yet counted. That is true, but after my own calculations, it should give an overwhelming Liberal majority.

The town of St. Laurent where I have the honour to reside, the town par excellence, with respect to education, with its college, its convent and its numerous schools, has also protested energetically against the Bill now before this House. Most recently, after divine service, we have seen, in the church of St. Laurent, a whole population kneeling down and imploring God to enlighten the men who are governing us so that this conscription Act be not adopted. Afterwards, tables were placed in front of the church, so that all the people, men, women and children, might sign the petitions which I laid before this House as a protest. I repeat it, Mr. Speaker, in that section of the country, there are not two opinions; the conscription Act is absolutely condemned.

Other meetings were likewise held in the city of Maisonneuve, which contains thousands and thousands of workingmen among its population; the same in the city of Levis, in St. Henri, near Montreal, and in Ste. Cunégonde, where thousands upon thousands of men employed in the large local mills have most strongly protested and signed numerous petitions.

In Berthierville, it was the same. In the town of L'Assomption—the heart of our venerated leader Sir Wilfrid Laurier must beat more strongly when I mention L'Assomption and its classical college where he spent the best years of his life—and the Laurentian town did protest. Here, I delay, when I speak of St. Lin; one should stop one moment and cogitate; it is the cradle of the Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier. Well, I tell you, Mr. Speaker, there also, as everywhere else, they have protested, they have done all they could possibly do. In the town of Pointe Claire—where next Sunday your humble servants shall be present, being specially invited to speak and protest against that enactment; in the town of Dorval; at Ste. Anne de Bellevue, in the city of Nicolet, I met there a few days ago a clever young man, a confrere of great distinction, I refer to Mr. Chassé, a Montreal lawyer. Mr. Chassé, had accepted to be a candidate in Nicolet county, as standard-bearer of the Conservative party, and when he learned that the Conscription Bill was before this House, his candidature came to an end; he sent his resignation as a Conservative candidate, entirely repudiating the law which his old friends had just laid before this chair. Will he run as a Liberal candidate? I do not know, but a sure thing, he will never support this Act, and he can never support the men who have conceived it.

Mr. Speaker, have you had and have you seen or heard of any contradictory meetings held in favour of this Act? Not at all. Not a single meeting has been held, to my knowledge, in favour of the Bill now before you.

Mr. Speaker, I maintain that this Bill is illegal, unjust, that it is discriminating oppressive, vexatious, unconstitutional, and in no way applicable, as I shall endeavour to shhow. In the first place, I say it is illegal, because those who wish to pass it have not the right to do so; they have no mandate, and I have only to refer to the arguments made by the worthy leader of the Opposition to prove it. We are not at present legislators, we are only administrators. To be a legislator, you must have a mandate authorizing you to make laws. Well, we have no such mandate. The hon. members who have previously spoken have clearly defined the situation. The Hon. Mr. Murphy, ex-Secretary of State, has well explained it; the Hon. Dr. Pugsley has well discussed it also the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald); Mr. C. A. Wilson, of Laval, has discussed it; the hon. member for Iberville, Mr. Joseph Demers, has well discussed the question, as all honourable gentlemen who have preceded me and they are no newcomers, they are men well versed in constitutional law, and when I see hon. gentlemen of such standing risk their reputations as parliamentarians, as lawyers in their respective districts, when I see these men taking upon themselves the defence of such a position I feel I am in good company, and I have no fear to ratify what they said. I know there are hon. gentlemen on the other side who have made much noise, who have spoken about the constitution, who have spoken of laws. I have much respect for all these hon. gentlemen, but there are many among them who do not know much about law; they are greater experts at the plough.

One hon. gentleman who made a big flurry, found it very odd that the French Canadians of Quebec should not be of his opinion. I readily believe that he has studied some, and that he has a certain fund of information, but, after all such is not his mandate, such is not his profession, and one can certainly take exception to what he says without offending him. I will say to this hon. gentleman: I prefer believing what the right hon. leader of the Opposition has said, I would rather accept the statements of the hon. Mr. Pugsley, or those of the hon. Mr. Murphy. I prefer going by what the hon. members of this side of the House have said upon this question, than those other gentlemen. Dr. Edwards, member for Frontenac, is a most distinguished man, but he knows more about pills than about the constitution. I would not like to hurt his feelings, but let each one stick to his trade, to his profession. I believe this gentleman has yet a great deal to learn about the constitution, and with all due respect, I may be allowed to differ from him. I say that this Act is illegal, because we have no mandate to pass it. In the first place, it is unjust. Why is it unjust? Because, as a result of that Act, you mean to impose obligations we are not held to assume. We have indeed agreed to help, and I still wish to help, but from that does not mean that we will agree to do what you now want us to do, when we are in nowise obliged to do it and I say: your law is entirely unjust.

This Act is discriminating. Why? Because we are asked to do in this country what is not demanded from other countries. The law is discriminating, because it is not universal. I very well understand, if the Empire should ask every British subject to do, each and every one of them, one and the same thing, that would be equality; but, in the present case, Canada is asked to do what they dare not ask any one else to do.

I was reading, this very morning, that the Premier of Australia had just declared that enlistment would remain voluntary. So there is no compulsion in Australia, another colony of the Empire, but they must impose it in Canada first, in this dear old Canada they love so well, they are so fond of, yes, Canada will be first. Well, I am chary of your preference, of your favours, of your gifts, I am apprehensive when you thus ask Canada to do what others are not asked to do. I say it is a discriminating law.

What would you say, Mr. Speaker, if, in a city like Montreal, the mayor, who is here just now, would have his municipal government pass a regulation by which he would say: the carters of Chaboillez Square will pay so much a piece, the carters of St. Mary's ward another amount, and the carters of St. Jean Baptiste still another amount of money? He would be told: You are mad; you should know and you must know that, be it in virtue of a law or a by-law, all must be treated the same way, no favour, no favouritism, no privileges, every one has equal rights. Well, then, I say that we, the British subjects of Canada, we are not put on the same footing as the subjects of the other colonies, by the imposition of a law which they do not want to impose elsewhere.

I say that every discriminating law is unconstitutional, and the power of disallowance, of which we are so jealous, and which His Majesty has the right to exercise, His Majesty may, at any given moment, exercise his right to annul such an Act. The laws enacted here, Mr. Speaker, must be ratified on the other side. The laws of the province of Quebec are ratified within two years by the Dominion Parliament. The laws passed by the Dominion Government must be sanctioned by His Majesty, by the Imperial Government. Well, I wonder if the Imperial Parliament would sanction such an unjust, such a discriminatory law as this one. I do humbly say no. This law is unconstitutional and should not be adopted, because such was the understanding, when the lease of life of this Parliament was extended one year.

I was reading, this morning, the speech of the right hon. leader of the Opposition and I found therein a most serious charge made against the Government. The right hon. gentleman states that this extension was granted with the formal understanding that it was only for the guidance and the good administration of the affairs of the country and that the proposal would never have been entertained, if this Bill had only been mentioned. I do repeat it, that is a very serious charge, in my humble opinion, for it means that the hon. leader of the Opposition and his followers, who have agreed to this extension, have been deceived. In other words, it means this: you have induced me to grant you an extension of time and to ask my followers to support you on this question, and you have deceived me. "Well, Mr. Speaker, if we cannot find any good faith in those who govern us, if honour and integrity cannot be found in our rulers, I now ask you the question: what will be the outcome? I do hope that the hon. Prime Minister will give us some explanations on this subject.

I say that this law is vexatious for us French Canadians, as well as for the English and Scotch Canadians of this country. Is it not sad, indeed, to find that, in spite of the sacrifices made, after contributing to the Canadian expeditionary forces more than 423,000 men, we are nevertheless charged with not having done our duty? Is that what the hon. member for Chateauguay (Mr. Morris) calls the failure of voluntary enlistment? Let him beware of failure for himself, of the discomfiture which awaits him in his county? A man may go into bankruptcy and still the sum of his assets be greater than that of his liabilities; he may be in straitened circumstances only temporarily, but I don't believe that is the case of the member for Chateauguay. He will have to give a strict and true account to his electors and may he beware of being more than temporarily crippled, for he should not forget that in Chateauguay the French Canadians, who compose three-fourths of the population, will ask him to account for his vote in favour of conscription.

I have stated the reasons for which I consider this Act unconstitutional and vexatious, let us now see whether its enforcement is possible. I say no. You cannot attain the desired object with a law so drafted. What is the penalty imposed by the Act upon those who will not submit to it? The Act says: If you do not submit, you will be sentenced to jail! Well, then, what will they do? They will go to jail, that's all. I owe to Sir Lomer Gouin, Prime Minister of the province of Quebec, my sincere congratulations for having had the clever idea of having had proper cells made at Bordeaux for our future state prisoners. You will send to jail those who do not obey; but you must not forget that this will not send them to war. After having spent three years in the state prisons, they will be free. Then, what becomes of your law? Can you force these men to go to the fields of battle? Will the Government have gained anything after they have quartered, clothed and boarded, for three years, at the expense of the state, these men who want to evade the law at any price? I say, Mr. Speaker, that a law the execution of which is impossible in its very principle is good for nothing, because its application would not be practical and it could not attain its object. The only result of this Act will have been to cause trouble in this country.

Our mandate has expired long ago. The mandate which I have obtained in 1911, in that struggle, one of the fiercest I have had to sustain in all my political career—for I had to contend against both the Conservatives and the Nationalists—that mandate, Sir, was good for five years only. I must confess that, in that contest, I had quite a hard time of it, but I hope that, in the future, these good Nationalists will be with me, since I shall be with them. Just as in the case of all the hon. members of this House, my mandate has lapsed; we have remained in office only by virture of our own vote. Is that a mandate? I contend that we are duly empowered to carry on the ordinary business of Government; but that does not give us the right to send a whole people to slaughter; and the people of this country contend, as I do, that we have not the power to do it. Personally, I would have no objection to remain as a member without undergoing an election; that costs less and it is much easier; but we are living in a country where the people have the right to choose the members they wish to represent them and to be governed by whomsoever they deem fit for the task. It has been said that, in a stable it is not always the best horse that eats the most, and the same thing may be said of politics. The people are the master, to them belongs the right to judge in the last resort. Besides, you know this as well as I do: nothing is so uncertain as politics; I might even venture to add that it is as in matters of courtship, where one must be very careful until the young lady has given her assent.

I would not care to recall sad memories to my right hon. leader, but I will mention that momentous struggle he fought when he was elected by an overwhelming majority; the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie honoured him later by admitting him into his cabinet. At the next election, they succeeded in defeating him, the village merchant, a Mr. Bourbeau, being elected in his stead; a perfectly honest man no doubt, but who, after all, should not have been preferred to the noblest and most eloquent man to be found.

But Sir Wilfrid Laurier took a signal revenge; he turned towards Quebec, the old Capital, and, as experience has well shown, it is not an easy thing to wrest it from him—Yes, Sir, the people should not be ignored, I know that through my own experience, for I also have suffered defeat. I then say Mr. Speaker, that the mandate, if it may be called a mandate, which we now hold, does not go beyond purely administrative matters. There are in our Constitution three powers: The legislative, the executive and the administrative power. The legislative power has disappeared with the lapsing of our mandate, the executive power is continued in force for ordinary matters; therefore, all that is left us is the administrative power and we can only expedite public business in the people's interest, until the people give us a new mandate. Therefore, I have no hesitation in asserting that the State prisoner, the one who will have been arrested for having refused to obey that Act, will enjoy adequate protection under our laws.

There are under our laws five writs of royal prerogative. The British Crown maintained, at the time of the conquest, these writs of royal prerogative which are still extant for our protection, thank God. We have the mandamus, the certiorari, the quo warranto, the writ of prohibition and, last but not the least, the habeas corpus.

When these gentlemen will arrest a British subject for having disobeyed the Act, they will send him to Bordeaux; but, first, they will bring him before the magistrate, and the prisoner relying on the constitution, will appeal to the court. He will say: Let them show in virtue of what principle I have been arrested and imprisoned. If the law invoked against me were constitutional the authority entrusted with the duty of applying it would say so, and this man will be told: Sir, you are free this legislation is void even should the Prime Minister and all his fellow workers, even should the Premier and all the other councillors of His Majesty declare our law is valid, the Courts whose duty it is to carry it out would hold otherwise.

The hon. Minister of Justice has been a Judge of the Superior Court, and he knows that I am right—Should I go before him with a man arrested in virtue of an unconstitutional law, the hon. minister would be the first to set that man at liberty. He knows the law, he knows the constitution. Why does he take a hand in such legislation as this? I respect his opinion, his conduct, his convictions, but I am sure if he were not in politics, if he were still in the sanctuary of Justice, he would not hesitate for a moment and would immediately confirm what I have just said, that this law is unconstitutional, is not worth anything and that a writ of habeas corpus, issued in the King's name, asking the reason wherefor I am arrested and sentenced, would undoubtedly restore my rights. But politics is a cloak for many misdeeds.

Mr. Speaker, I have, everywhere I have gone, pleaded the cause of the people; I said, everywhere I went and had the honour of being heard, that there would be no conscription. What were my reasons for saying so? My reasons? Why! What the Prime Minister had declared in the speech from the Throne, on the letters addressed to the archbishops and bishops; on their declarations.

I see in his seat, Mr. Speaker, a man to whom I have something to say and I take occasion of his presence to offer him my most sincere congratulations, I mean the ex-Secretary of State, hon. Mr. Patenaude. He has, indeed, done an admirable feat. He held a high position in the cabinet. Young, with a grand future in sight, full of hope, taking a keen interest in his duties, he sacrificed everything in order to keep his pledged word. That is really grand. I say to the hon. ex-minister, all honour to you, sir. The people shall give you credit for that; the people have seen in you a statesman, a strong man, a man who does not hesitate to break away from his former friends, from his party, from his high position. You do honour to the pledged troth, honour be to you. I would have liked to see the others follow suit. They have not willed it. It is their own business; but the people shall remember it. Beware. When the people kick, they kick for good. No one has the right, Mr. Speaker, to fool the people. Everyone has the right to hold opinions contrary to those of his opponents; everyone has the right to change his convictions; everyone has the right to abandon a leader, if he does not approve of him; every one has the right to condemn his policy, if it does not suit him; but, none have the right to deceive the people. You would not forgive a servant who lied to you; no one forgives a servant who would say anything but the truth; and our public men, those who govern, those who direct the people, those men to whom are entrusted honour, wealth, integrity, uprightness, all that we hold most precious in this world, would be permitted to play false. I say, that is not what I have been taught in my country, and I say to the hon. Mr. Patenaude, ex-minister: Why not come with us, come and sit with your old colleagues, you will be well cared for and be given due justice, because the stand you have taken was a most honourable one, and it must be a great satisfaction to be able to say to yourself that you have been faithful to the call of duty.

Mr. Speaker, I was present in my own country church, when our learned parish priest ascended the pulpit and said: "My children, I have just learned that the National Service cards are not being signed; you are probably afraid that it may be the first step towards conscription, well, I tell you now, from this pulpit, that we are duly authorized to say to you that there will be no conscription. We have the pledged word of those who govern that you can sign the National Service cards without any apprehension, that there will be no conscription." Then, every one, or almost every one, did sign. This same scene took place in every church, throughout the province; the parish priests mounted their pulpits and advised their flocks to sign, because those in power had given assurance that there would be no conscription. The cards had scarcely been signed when conscription came. Where do you find sincerity here? Where do you find frankness? Where do you find honour, soliciting the citizens through their pastors' own lips, to sign the National Service cards, with the guarantee that the rulers of the country had just declared to these reverend gentlemen that there would be no conscription. The archbishop of Montreal, Mgr. Bruchesi, almost died of grief when he learned he had been so grossly deceived, after having given instructions to the whole clergy of his diocese to speak of those cards from the pulpit. He has taken the trouble to write over his signature that he has been deceived, odiously deceived. Well, here now, we have come to the point of disbelieving what our own bishops tell us, the archbishop's word is not to be accepted, for he is himself deceived. Do you think this thing will last very long, Mr. Speaker? Have you got to stand such a rule much longer? I do hope not. I hope that, ere long, we shall have an Administration we can take some stock in, upon which we may depend, for truly it is more than painful, in a country like ours, to be compelled to openly declare to all the people that there is no longer any trust to be placed in those who govern us. They say: by means of the Act we want to pass we will gather the military forces and send them beyond Canada. The honourable members on this side of the House have demonstrated that such an Act could not be passed under our constitution. The matter has been well discussed, from every point of view, the most able men have stated that military forces could not be raised here to be sent beyond Canada. I read and read over again, Mr. Speaker, the British North America Act, as well as the 1904 amendment, and there is no equivocation, no ambiguity possible, no possibility of a doubt. When the law is not clear, when an act is unsatisfactory, when there is ambiguity or equivocation, when a double interpretation can be given to a law, the spirit may be taken preferably to the text, but authors who expound the rules for the interpretation of statutes tell us: You cannot and you must not substitute the spirit to the letter of a law when its text is formal.

When the text of an Act is clear, positive and precise, when there is no reason to doubt, to substitute to the text the spirit of the Act would be a violation of every legal principle; the spirit may be substituted to the text, only in case of open doubt. But, in this case, the law is so plain that it is impossible to show the shade of a suspicion and it takes the vast and powerful imagination of the honourable gentlemen on the other side of this House to find even a subject of discussion. You cannot ask Canadians, our Canadian militia, to take any part, against their will, in wars beyond Canadian territory. But do they say, it is Canada's war which is now being waged in Europe. I say no; it is not Canada's war. Canada has not made any declaration of war to anybody whatever; Canada has not been attacked and it is Canada's war only in the Government's mind and in that of their friends.

As I have said a few moments ago, Mr. Speaker, Canada has nobly done its duty; it has contributed more than 423,000 soldiers; it has spent almost fabulous sums of money and the sacrifices of all kind and nature it has imposed upon itself are countless; we have gone even beyond our means, I contend it is sheer madness to say that Canada will give her last copper and her last man to save the Empire.

What a fine argument! Must then Canada be ruined, that bankruptcy be completed, in order to save the Empire? "Save the Empire!" such is the cry of these good gentlemen; it pays them so well. Who will contend that when two houses are on fire, your neighbor's and your own, that you should go and save your neighbour's house first, and let your wife and children perish with every other thing you held most dear? I am, indeed, very fond of those Englishmen across the sea; I have never seen them nor met them, but I do really love a great deal more the children of my own country. I have no kin in England, Mr. Speaker, but I have in Canada generations and generations, whilst these gentlemen just landed here immediately want to take the best places around the table. I am quite willing to give them a fair opportunity in this country, but I mean, before all, to preserve my kinsmen and my friends, as well as this parcel of land which is, so to speak, a portion of my own existence, and upon which I have spent so much labour. They may say that we should give our last cent to save the Empire; as for me, I shall say I have no more to give.

When the treaty of peace will be signed, what compensation will Canada get? Do you believe Canada will be invited to share in the spoils? One would have to be very silly to so believe. For my part, in spite of the tremendous sacrifices we have made, I am convinced that we shall be completely ignored at the hour of the final settlement of accounts. England will have her share; Belgium, her own; France, Russia and the other nations will likewise receive their share of indemnity, but Canada will have absolutely nothing. Where then will we stand? We shall have taxes to pay for a hundred years to come; we shall have to provide for and relieve all our invalids and maimed, not mentioning the pensions we shall have to pay for hundreds of years to come. Therefore, in order to meet those obligations, I say that we must preserve a portion of our property, whilst if we do ruin ourselves to day, we will never be able to meet such obligations. Mr. Speaker, I do really like the Empire, but I love my own country far better. I may be wrong, but such are my sentiments, all the same.

We have now come to the point of tearing up our railway tracks. They are no longer content with throwing away millions after millions of dollars; here now comes along our Minister of Railways (Mr. Cochrane) who is shipping our railroad tracks over to Europe. I would not be in the least surprised if, before long, we should be forced to come to Ottawa on foot and all that, just to please the Empire. I am actually wondering when and where we are going to stop.

Mr. Speaker, we are just now passing through a most serious period of financial stringency. Business men who had, until now successfully speculated, have found themselves suddenly ruined; business men of the highest standing have found themselves in such straits that they could no longer meet their liabilities. I repeat it, this crisis has been most disastrous, most painful, and it is in such a time that we hear these hon. gentlemen say that it is for us to give our last cent for the Empire. As for me, I must describe their conduct as extraordinary and extravagant.

In the political world, we are told that Sir Wilfrid Laurier has rather bad grace asking for a referendum on the conscription Bill seeing that he did not offer any in connection with the Naval Act. That is really the main objection that is raised, as far as I can see. I will take the liberty of thus answering that objection. The Naval Bill was voted upon and I am one of those who voted in favour of it. On March 29, 1909, the proposal of the hon. Prime Minister—who was then Sir Wilfrid Laurier—was submitted to the House and unanimously carried. The late hon. F. D. Monk, who was not present in the House, when this measure was submitted, when he did return—in explaining his absence, on March 29, 1909, when the resolution had been voted —added that, had he been present, he would have voted in favour of it. Such is the declaration of the late member for Jacques Cartier, and any one can read it, for it is inserted in the Hansard.

The principle of the Naval Act having been practically accepted by both sides of the House at the time, can the present situation be compared with the one then existing? When the people, represented by both sides of the House, agree; when the members agree that the principle of a law is acceptable, why make an appeal to the people? Such is my contention, Mr. Speaker, and I believe my answer is a good one. More than that, when the Naval Act was voted, we were within the limits of our mandate; we had only served three years of our term, therefore, as members, we were not, according to the expression of the worthy leader of the Opposition, a moribund Government.

There is nothing very nice in being told such things, to have this Government called a moribund Government, and do the honourable gentlemen on the other side fret over it? They don't seem to be in any way offended; they accept it as a dainty. A moribund Government! Were I the Prime Minister, I would really be offended, if anybody told me that, but as I am not the Premier, there is no danger.

Then I say that there is no possible comparison with the stand taken by the members on your left demanding a referendum upon the present Act, while none was asked for the Naval Act. A third reason, Mr. Speaker, is that the Naval Act was no conscription law; the Naval Act was a free law, a voluntary law, nobody was forced to enlist. it was all volunteering; but in this case, attention! They want to enlist us in spite of ourselves, without a shadow of resistance, saying: Enlist to go and defend the Empire, the Empire is in danger. Well, it is the honourable members on the other side of the House who say that. Those who speak on behalf of the Empire don't say that, they do not ask us men, they do not ask us soldiers, they do not ask us to go and fight over there. They may have asked us potatoes, wheat, oats, eggs, ham, bacon, etc., they want to have provisions, and in lieu of provisions, the Premier and his friends substitute men. Well, I prefer taking the word of the Right Honourable Mr. Balfour, who came here and from your chair, Mr. Speaker, spoke to us in this House; I would rather take his word, I say, than the talk of the honourable members on the other side of the House. The Right Honourable Mr. Balfour said:

"What we need the most, is food, munitions". He knows his business, he is a man from the old country, he knows what is going on overseas. Well, Mr. Speaker, I prefer taking the word of that honourable gentleman than that of these gentlemen here who say: "We want young men, more young men, and still more young men." Well, let them send their own sons across the seas!

I remember, Mr. Speaker, the fight made against the Laurier navy. I was a candidate at the time, and I had against me distinguished citizens, the most popular speakers, the strongest men, tribunes of great repute, I had against me, may I say, men whose slogan was: "cursed navy, down with the navy; accursed law, hateful law, iniquitous law, down with the navy." And several of our friends were defeated by means of such appeals; several lieutenants of Mr. Laurier suffered defeat as a result. Not I, they couldn't beat me, I cannot be beaten, but many have left their bones, many were the victims of such a campaign. Well then, Mr. Speaker, as I have said: how times have changed. They no more say: Cursed marine. Down with the marine. The day after the victory, they cried: Hurrah for the navy, long live the navy. And we saw entering this cabinet, men who had fought us most bitterly, men who had the most violently assailed that Naval Act, who henceforth accepted it, and instead of tearing the page of the Statute which contained that infamous law, that cynical law, that accursed law, as they used to call it, put a stop to all opposition, and have not protested since. You may be sure, they won't touch it.

I say to these gentlemen: Beware. Curses, like chickens, come home to roost. You have defeated us by running down the Naval Bill in every way, the people shall never believe you henceforth, the people will say: we have no faith in you; we cannot trust you; you have deceived us and if you have done so once, you may do so again. It's just like the drunkard: Once a drunkard, always a drunkard. They have no more confidence in you, and when I hear the hon. gentlemen state that the province of Quebec has not done her duty, that the province of Quebec has not given enough volunteers, I have the right to answer: if you only knew the heart of the people of Quebec, and if you could realize what a memory they have; if you did know that no one can lie to us with impunity; if you knew that we remember what you have done, when those who were opposing us boldly told us, Mr. Speaker: the children and the grandchildren of the members who voted in favour of this infamous law shall curse their fathers; that the children and the grandchildren would curse the members who had dared to vote in favour of that Naval Act—that we would be accursed by our own children, because we had followed the dictates of our conscience, because we had relied on our own judgment, because we had voted according to our convictions. These gentlemen told us that our children would curse us, because we had listened to the voice of conscience, because we had taken counsel with ourselves, and such was our reward. I say: no, our children will not curse us when they will come and kneel down in the parish churchyard, to pray and drop a tear; they will be grateful that their father had had the hear to do what a good citizen should do; use his own judgment, according to his conscience.

In those times, I tell you, it was mournful to hear these gentlemen say: Mr. Laurier has gone to London and has bought two old tubs that had been discarded, and were lying in the London dockyards, two old ships which are not worth the iron they were built of, those old tubs are valueless. However, they were very glad to have those two old tubs to protect themselves when war broke out. At any rate, the Laurier navy was a Canadian navy. In spending what was necessary to purchase those two ships, our assets were not reduced, we had the equivalent of the few hundred thousand dollars which the Government paid for them; to-day, when they are spending millions on millions, when they are ruining the country without any compensation, it seems to me I have the right to say: hold on! stop there! that won't do! leave us something for a rainy day, a crust of bread for the hard times to come, we will help as much as we can, but don't ruin the country utterly for the Empire's sake.

Mr. Speaker, I will now say a few words about coalition. I have always understood that a coalition scheme was a kind of partnership scheme, a partnership in which Liberals and Conservatives would join in to do business together. Well, when it is a question of going into partnership with anyone, you begin by taking stock, you look into the moral value of the association of your new partners, you examine the financial standing of the new associates, you try to find out the honourableness, the character of the fellows who want to contract with you. If one's moral standing is not good, I will not enter into partnership with him, because I would be considered no better than him; if his financial standing is not good and I become his partner, he will ruin me; if his character, honour, integrity, responsibility, are not good, I will have nothing to do with him.

Well, I say that it would have been more than a blunder, it would have been a crime on the part of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, to have entered into a partnership with those gentlemen under such circumstance. What! to go into partnership with those ruined men, lost in the estimation of the public several of whom are discredited, men who are not fit to remain in the cabinet, whom the Prime Minister is bound to turn out. To join in with men like those, that would have been a crime on the part of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. We only associate with men whose moral and financial standing, whose character and respectability are on a par with our own. We cannot associate with people who are fallen or on the point of falling.

What! The Prime Minister asked Sir Wilfrid Laurier: Do come and help me, Sir Wilfrid, I can't stand it any longer, I can no longer do anything, I am sinking, I am going into bankruptcy, do come to my rescue, I will take your hand and settle matters. The honourable leader of the Opposition might have agreed to that, but your humble servant would certainly not have given his consent nor would he have associated with the Government.

Everything is going from bad to worse in the cabinet. Let us take for instance the late Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes); they just told him: Get out of here; they have just told the honourable Minister of Public Works (Mr. Robert Rogers) that his conduct is so honourable that he must temporarily withdraw from the cabinet; but as a consolation, they add that two Superior Court Judges will do their very best to whitewash him; and it is with men of such a character they would have us associate. Was it not taking Laurier for a school-boy? If my honourable leader had fallen into such a trap, I would have despaired of my race, of my country and of my chief. No, Mr. Speaker, there is no possible association with people in such a bad plight with people who are always at loggerheads with one another and who have no confidence in one another. I say that it is preferable to spend your whole life in the shades of Opposition than to find yourself in such bad company.

The general demand to-day is to encourage the farmers to promote agriculture and to increase production. That's very easy to say, but you must have the means to do it. How do you want the farmer to increase his agricultural production? How can the farm increase its revenue? Labour is getting scarcer all the time; farm labourers are demanding excessive wages and even if you are willing to pay the price, you cannot get them. Labourers living near the large cities, prefer working in the factories and mills of every description, the farmers being unable to pay them sufficient living wages. It is the same with people of various trades, they quit their workshops to go into the shell and munition factories, for the good reason that it pays them far better. Those who are familiar with farming can speak knowingly, and they will tell you that if you send any more of our Canadians overseas you simply expose agriculture to complete ruin, and the farms will be deserted. Upon this topic, Mr. Speaker, I can speak from experience, for I have been operating for the past thirty-two years a thirty acre farm near Montreal. I have made great sacrifices towards improving that property; labourers work it year in and year out, and I tell you that, presently, farming is seriously shackled for want of hands. I say, moreover, that it is an impracticable undertaking to try and take away more men from this country for service abroad. Should we not begin by providing for our industries and the operating of our manufactures; how shall we do it if we have not the required hands? The Government certainly must know that the country is already suffering from this lack of men. Frequently, we see steamers coming into port with some 700 or 800 young Englishmen on board; we see them strutting, with a new walking stick, along the streets of Montreal. They come over to our country to fill the places of our French Canadian boys who are expelled from our stores and our mills, in order to force them, in a sense, to enlist.

Mr. PAQUET (L'Islet) (Translation): Will the hon. member allow me one question?

Mr. LAFORTUNE (Translation): Certainly.

Mr. PAQUET (Translation): Has the hon. member information to justify his assertion that the French Canadians are replaced in the munition factories by Englishmen just come from the British Isles?

Mr. LAFORTUNE (Translation): Certainly, I am not afraid to assert it.

Mr. PAQUET (Translation): The charge is a most serious one.

Mr. LAFORUNE (Translation): Most serious, I admit it; but I do, nevertheless, declare that, in many cases, French Canadians are turned out of doors and that their places are given, a few days later, to your Englishmen just landed from London. The very thing happened in a shell factory in my own village; these French Canadians were told: "Why don't you enlist? Why don't you go and help the Empire?" They were thus forced to sacrifice themselves and to give up all they held most dear, in order to save the Empire.

Mr. Speaker, I am of the opinion of the learned member for L'Islet, when he stated in his eloquent and so moderate speech—that if recruiting had been conducted in a sensible way in the province of Quebec, it would have been most successful. Men have been sent to do recruiting in Montreal who certainly were not qualified for such positions, men who could not speak a word of French. Was that the right means to take if you wanted to induce our Canadians to enlist? In the province of Quebec, although the English population is very small, we employ on our police force only men who can speak both languages and my hon. friend from St. Mary's (Mr. Martin) who is also mayor of Montreal, and whom I see in his seat, can confirm this assertion. In the face of these facts, I am actually surprised that the French Canadians have enlisted in such large numbers.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member for L'Islet has done justice to his compatriots of Quebec, when he stated that if recruiting in Quebec had not given the expected results, it was not the fault of the French Canadians themselves, but that it was rather on account of the methods which have been adopted.

Before I take my seat, you will permit me a final observation. Is it true, as have declared several hon. members on the other side, that the French Canadians have not done their duty? To those hon. gentlemen, I will say: You are mistaken. The French Canadians have never shirked their duty, as have said and repeated several members on this side of the House. I say that it is not among the French Canadians you will find cowards and timorous men. Besides, we have proved it before today, fear finds no place with us. When struggles have been started for what the Canadian holds most sacred; his country, his language, his religion or his schools, you have seen all these noble hearts ready to defend those rights. I will even go further, I will say that all far-reaching reforms have originated in Quebec; her citizens have always taken a hand in forwarding great movements.

When we see in the province of Ontario that the French language is shackled, and by those who cast aspersions on us, who abuse us for not doing enough for the Empire, I may answer to these Ontario people: Deal fairly with us, if you wish us to help you. Do justice to the French Canadians, to those who speak French over there. Try, if you dare, to blot out the French words which are on His Majesty's coat of arms: "Honi soit qui mal y pense." Try it then, and see if you can replace them by English words. French is the language of the great nations; French is the language in which are drafted all important social and political documents. You cannot, I say, replace those words.

It is no fault of mine, if you do not understand our mentality; it is not my fault if you do not understand what we are.

When I see Quebec men, like the honourable Mr. Cochrane, like the honourable Mr. Rogers, also from Quebec, who allow us to be insulted by the men of Ontario, I say to them: You do not love your province, you are not equal to your task, you who have risen from the ranks of the province of Quebec. I understand that, with you, politics smothers your better feelings. As for me, as long as I have a seat in this House, I shall never be afraid to say to the men of Ontario, I will never be afraid to say to all who are good enough to listen to me, that the men of Quebec are just as good as the men of Ontario.

Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend from Montcalm (Mr. Lafortune), who has showered me with some compliments, and who made some observations with regard to me not quite so complimentary, will pardon me if I do not undertake to take up seriatim the different matters which he has dealt with in his somewhat prolonged address. The question with which we are concerned presents itself to my mind from a very different point of view from that from which the hon. gentleman evidently looks at it. I may have occasion to refer, as I proceed, to one or two of the subjects to which he has adverted, but he will forgive me if, before doing that, I say something that seems to me vital to be said in connection with the consideration of this very momentous question. More than one hon. gentleman in this House has already said—and many of them among those who are supporting this measure—that the idea of compulsion in itself was repugnant to them. Some of them have gone further and claimed to entertain a special and superlative repugnance to it. Let me say that none among them more than I find it repugnant in itself. And when I say it is repugnant in itself, let it be understood that I do not mean to say merely that it is repugnant to me, looking at it from the point of view of my being the person, or among the persons, to be subjected to it. It is repugnant to me in that sense, but it is vastly more so to find myself in a position where it becomes my duty to be one among those who say that now, and at this time, it is necessary that compulsion, in the manner provided in this Bill, should be imposed upon others, in order that Canada may do her entire duty, and that she may do it in the method which shall so operate as to make the performance of that duty impair, in the least possible degree, the performance of other duties that are incumbent upon her and her people to-day, and impose upon her—although that is a secondary consideration—the least possible sacrifice.

5 p.m. Mr. Speaker, duty is the subject of my story. I have listened to a large part of this debate, I have read the remarks of those hon. gentlemen whom it was not my privilege to hear, and let me say to you in all frankness, that I have waited till this moment in this debate before speaking myself, to see whether, among all the able men who have taken part in it, among particularly the many able men who have spoken in opposition to this measure, any one of them would advance a reason that would justify me in saying that it was not my duty to continue to give the Bill my support.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. DOHERTY: If, with all the great intellectual power that these gentlemen possess; if, with all the research that they have given to the examination of the question, if with all the zeal that inspired them to find that sufficient reason, they have not succeeded in finding it—and I would have welcomed that reason—it looks to me clear, as it did when this measure was proposed, and as when I gave my assent to the suggestion that it should be proposed, that it was the duty of this Government to propose it, and that it still is the duty of this Government and of the members of this House to support it. I respect the views of every man, and I have no quarrel with those whose consciences inspire in them the belief that their duty lies in another direction. For me the path of duty is absolutely clear with regard to this question, and it is because that path of duty is so clear that I find myself to-day impelled to intervene in this debate at this last moment.

I have said that duty is the subject of my story. If I intervene in this debate, it is because I fain would emphasize, so far as it may be possible for me to do, the necessity—I would rather say the obligation—that in my judgment lies upon one and all of us to concentrate our minds in our dealing with this question upon that one thing: our duty to Canada. So concentrating our minds, let me say, Mr. Speaker, I think that it would be well for all of us to try, for the time being at all events, to put aside many considerations which might naturally influence each and every one of us in arriving at a conclusion as to what our own individual course of action upon the question should be. Let me not be misunderstood. I am not undertaking to criticise what other hon. members may have considered it their duty to say, as supporting one view or the other upon this measure, but I permit myself to say that it has been a matter of very great regret to me, as I have sat here listening to this debate, to see how far and to what extent it had drifted into inter-provincial and inter-racial—shall I say recriminations? I do not want to use any harsh language, but I think perhaps that word is not stronger than may be properly applied. It strikes me that there is no question, considered by itself, that it should have been so possible to debate, without any reference whatsoever to the race of any man, or to the province from which he came.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Lafortune) who has just resumed his seat has found fault with one gentleman and another, whose names he has mentioned, on this side of the House, because, as he said, they sat silent and said no word in defence of the province of Quebec. May I be permitted to say, Mr. Speaker, that in this wide Dominion there is no province, in my judgment, of which a man may be more proud to be a citizen than my native province of Quebec. I have no apologies to make for her. She holds her place in this Confederation, and it is good for this Confederation that she does. We live in that province, men of different races and creeds, and may I be permitted to suggest that we be left to ourselves to deal with the faults and the virtues of the province of Quebec? That is equally true if you reverse the situation. May I not say to my friends from the province of Quebec that in the discussion of this question, perhaps it was not necessary that we should refer to the faults and the virtues of our fellow Canadians from the province of Ontario. Can we not for the moment forget those things? Can we not too forget the differences of race that exist? Things have been said from one point of view and from the other that, frankly, I do not think it could have been pleasant for any Canadian to hear. It does seem to me that it was most unfortunate that it should have been thought necessary to say these things in the discussion of a question whose decision is of such vast import to this our common country, and in regard to which it is of such prime importance that whatever that decision be, it may, when it is once reached, be presented for acceptance to a united people.

We are of different races in this country, but we are all Canadians. I have suggested that we forget for the moment that we are of different races. I do not want to suggest that it is desirable that we should drive from our memories the history of our progenitors. I firmly believe that there is no greater or more overpowering influence that directs the actions of men than the race feeling, and no call which men respond to more readily than that of the blood. It works for great and good results. I am not here, therefore, to suggest to anybody that it is his duty to forget those from whom he descends, or to repudiate the race to which he belongs. But, there is a time and a place for everything. Here, to-day, when we are dealing with a question, a right or a wrong decision on which will carry with it consequences that none of us can foresee—consequences that will have to be borne, not by ourselves alone, but by our children and our children's children for many generations—am I not right in saying that it is incumbent upon us to concentrate our minds upon the one fact that we are all Canadians, and that this is a question of what is the duty of Canadians to Canada here and now.

I would have made no reference to the matter of which I am about to speak if the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat (Mr. Lafortune) had not taken upon himself the responsibility of telling you, Mr. Speaker, and this House, not only what my constituents in the division of Montreal, St. Anne, thought about this question, but that he has come here to tell us the settled conviction of every Canadian of Irish blood within this country, and he says that they are all convinced the same way. The hon. gentleman will allow me to question his authority for making that statement. The men of my blood speak for themselves, and the men of my blood who have the glorious privilege of being Canadians, are as thorough Canadians as breathe within the limits of the territory of this country. They do not need the direction of my very good and very highly esteemed friend from Montcalm to tell them what they ought to think about this subject. The hon. gentleman was eloquent about the lack of mandate with regard to a great many other things, and as he spoke I asked myself whence came his mandate to speak in this House for all Canadians of the Irish race. There was not one exception; he knew all about it. Then he bewailed my sad fate: that I should be standing alone, separated from them all. I thank him for his sympathy, but I do not feel that I need it.

The people of my race are as intelligent a people—I am paying them a high compliment when I say that—as the people of the race of the hon. member for Montcalm. That means that they are quite capable of judging for themselves, and that they will consider this matter from the standpoint of Canadians anxious to do their duty. I do not doubt that there will be differences of opinion among them; some will reach one conclusion, and some will reach another. But they will not, as the member for Montcalm says they will, in one body pronounce themselves absolutely on one side of a question, with regard to which there are argument, serious arguments pro and con. The hon. gentleman is entirely mistaken when he undertakes the responsibility of making that suggestion. He will allow me, further, to submit that he is a little rash in assuming that responsibility simply as the result of attendance at a meeting convened by gentlemen, all of them my very good and very highly esteemed friends, but all of them members of the Liberal party in Montreal. The member for Montcalm went to that meeting and, in consequence, apparently considers that to him has been handed over, as it were, the entire Irish race in Canada, and he comes here and represents that the Irish race in Canada are throwing their weight and judgment in one scale in regard to this matter. That is not exceedingly modest on his part; moreover, I do not know that it is quite respectful to the people for whom he undertook to speak. Nothing is more dangerous than for a man of one race to speak for the people of another, unless it be for a man of one race to undertake to instruct the people of another in regard to their duty. I should have made no reference at all to the race to which I belong if it had not been for the somewhat extraordinary undertaking of the hon. member for Montcalm. When I go back to my constituents to render an account of what I have said, what I have done, and what I purpose doing on this question, I shall go to meet them all as Canadians, of whatever race they may be, and I shall make my justification to them all. It would be a matter of great regret to me if these Canadians of my own race should disagree with me upon this question. But they will exercise their judgment, and they will credit me with the sincerity for which I give credit to them and to the men of any other race who may reach a conclusion different from my own. But I shall not ask the member for Montcalm to intervene or to mediate between me and my constituents, of whatever race they may be. I shall go forth with a good conscience; I shall meet all my friends in St. Anne's and whatever their view may be they will greet me as they have greeted me in the past, notwithstanding this judgment upon me by the hon. member for Montcalm. Down in St. Anne's we do have differences of opinion, differences of race, differences upon political questions. But I am proud to say that we live together as good friends, having confidence and trust in each other, and that we can maintain that condition of affairs without the kind attention of the hon. member for Montcalm.

I have said that we ought to get rid of all consideration of the fact that we are of different races or different creeds, or that we come from different provinces, because at this time one great question concerns our common country, Canada. I have said a word about my feeling for my own province of Quebec; I felt that I owed it that. But since we have had questions of race, may I add one word about the race that has been criticised in this House. I question no man's right to say what he believes to be pertinent and relevant; and I am in the judgment of every other member of the House whether what I say be proper or not. But in view of what has been said, I desire to dissociate myself — I go further and say that I absolutely dissociate this Government — from any suggestion that anything in this measure is directed against any one part of the country, against the province of Quebec, against any one race in the country, or in particular against the French Canadian people. I have heard the criticism, and I have heard the defence. To me, there is one overpowering, all-answering defence, and that is that we proceeded to recruit under a voluntary system. What does recruiting under a voluntary system mean? It means that this Government and this Parliament and the Canadian public practically unanimously took the position that upon the question of recruiting each man was absolutely free to act according to his own judgment and his own conscience. Nobody took the responsibility of indicating that a man had any duty to discharge one way or the other. The principle of voluntary recruitment means that every man has the right to decide for himself; that his responsibility is to his own conscience. That being the case, I do not think that it is within the jurisdiction of any one to condemn a man because he exercised a recognized right. On the other hand, I have heard much that was said as against the criticisms made; and, frankly, a good deal of that I would be just as glad not to have heard. I do not undertake to determine whether these contentions were well founded. At any rate they did not seem to me to be quite necessary; sometimes one may be on the defensive, and still overlap a little into unnecessary offensive. I should like to get out of that atmosphere; I should like to approach this question purely and simply from the point of view of a Canadian.

What is the question? The question is: What is Canada's duty at this moment under conditions as they exist now? In August of 1914, Canada went to war. It is not very material now to discuss why she went to war. She went to war of her own volition, as was evidenced by the unanimous action of the membership of this House, enthusiastically endorsed by the voice of practically all the people of Canada. Since then she has been at war, and to-day in the first place the question is: Should she withdraw from that war? In my opinion that is the one question, because we must either go forward to enact this Bill or we should withdraw from the war. I know that other people whose opinions I respect do not look at the matter in that way, but that is the way it presents itself to my mind. Why do I say that? We have a certain force at the front. I have not heard it suggested that the force that has gone to the front is greater than represents Canada's fair share in this common enterprise into which we have gone with Great Britain and the Allied Nations. This measure proposes what? To send an additional force, to add people to our force. This measure purposes providing reinforcements so that the force that is at the front may be maintained. It seems to me either we must provide those reinforcements, or we must withdraw from the war, because our force at the front is, day by day, being depleted. There are people who say that we never should have gone into the war, and people who say: Now we have exhausted our effort we should go no further; let our battalions disappear, and let Canada cease to be known as an active participant in this great struggle for the defence of Christian civilization upon this globe. Those men, in my opinion, are absolutely logical when they say: No conscription. I do not say they are right, because I do not agree with their premises. But the men who say that we ought to go on with this war, but that we ought not to take to-day, under the conditions of to-day, the step that this measure purposes taking, are, in my judgment—I speak with all respect—absolutely illogical. I say that for two reasons. In the first place, I do not know and I do not care whose is the fault or what are the causes that brought it about, but I do know that persistence in the voluntary system is not bringing us the men as fast as they are required. I have not heard that statement seriously controverted. The second reason comes to me from the arguments I have heard against conscription. As I have said I have listened and I have read attentively and carefully, looking for the reason that would justify my withdrawing from the position that I have taken, and I have not found it. But among the reasons that I have listened to, the one that struck me as having very considerable force, was the argument based upon the assertion that, under present conditions in Canada, we need and we can use every man for purposes of a nature to give more valuable and more effective support for the armies of the Allies than we can give by sending him to war. I have been impressed by that argument. If the facts upon which it is made to rest were established to me, I am not at this moment prepared to say that I might not think that was the reason that would relieve me of this duty that to-day weighs so heavily upon my shoulders. But I say that out of that argument has come to me the conclusive reason why we should proceed, (if we are not going to drop out of this war and send no more men) to obtain our men by selective conscription. If the statements of fact upon which some hon. members advanced that argument, be absolutely sound, what will this measure do? It will establish their soundness. I wondered often as I listened to the discussion in this House, and I wondered more as I read discussions out of this House, to what extent this measure had been read and its principle grasped by the people of this country. In the face of what I have just stated, this measure is strenuously resisted by people who say that we must not send another man because we cannot spare another man. If hon. members have confidence in their affirmation, why do they so strongly oppose our finding out whether it is true or not? For my part I am quite satisfied that they are mistaken. I think, as has been said repeatedly in this House, we all of us have before our eyes to-day the evidence that they are mistaken.

Mr. MEDERIC MARTIN: Does the Minister of Justice mean by his statement that Lord Shaughnessy was mistaken when, on his coming here from England, he said that the only thing to do was to produce for the Allies?

Mr. DOHERTY: I have not suggested that we should not produce for the Allies, and I think if the hon. member will wait until I get through he will see there is no contradiction between what I am saying and Lord Shaughnessy's proposition, even as he states it, though I am very far from believing that he states it correctly. Lord Shaughnessy and a great many others—and I have no criticism to make—have insisted upon the importance of our producing to help the Allies. I am not aware that Lord Shaughnessy has ever said that that was the only thing we had to do. We have many duties in this matter; we are trying to deal with one of them now, and at the proper time and the proper place I trust we shall be able to overtake all our duties. But the way to get all those duties done is not to tie this House up indefinitely in resistance to the measure that is proposed to do one duty, and the one which seems to us to present the most imperious call upon us.

To me the second and the conclusive argument why we should proceed to get the men we want by this measure of selective conscription rather than by voluntary enlistment—even if voluntary enlistment were producing men as fast as it did in its best days—lies in what those hon. gentlemen have put forward as the very basis for their affirmation that we should have no conscription at all. Just to the extent that they are right in their facts, just to the extent that we cannot spare men from Canada, does it become imperatively necessary for us to see that when we send more men we shall send those and those only who can be spared. This is a measure to ascertain who can be spared, and because they argue that nobody can be spared, gentlemen get up and say: "You must stop right here; you must not find out who can be spared. We tell you nobody can be spared, so stop your measure." What are they apprehensive of? Can they be so convinced that nobody can be spared, when they are so frightened of inquiry being made whether anybody can be spared? I do not agree with them in their statement that nobody can be spared. I am absolutely confident that there are still many men whom we can spare for this great work which is essential for the maintenance of Canada's honour. I am willing to take the risk of having the matter fully and carefully investigated as under this measure it is proposed to be investigated and I shall have to take the consequences if that investigation proves me to be wrong. So I say that just because it is true that we have reached the stage where we have to scrutinize carefully just whom we can spare and whom we cannot, it has become the duty of the Government of this country and of the members of this House and of the people of this country to say to the voluntary system: Halt there. We cannot afford to let who will go. Many of those who would go, we need at home and as the Act says, it is more in the national interest that they should remain at home than enlist: Canada needs those men. If we continued with the voluntary system, what has happened in the past would undoubtedly be repeated in the future; the men most valuable at home would go, as they have gone before, and the men who might make excellent soldiers but who are doing no useful work at home would stay in Canada and help consume the very products that we are urged to save so as to send them to Great Britain and the Allies.

To me at least it seems quite clear that we owe it to Canada to see that there shall be a selection of the men who are to go, and that those go who can be spared, and those stay who are absolutely needed at home. As I have said that reason has come to me as the result of reflection on the strongest argument put forward as a reason against sending anybody at all, namely, that we could not spare a man. I do not believe that latter proposition, but I do believe that there is this element of truth in it: that the time has come when it behooves us to carefully scrutinize the men who go and the men who stay. That being so, it becomes the duty of those who are responsible for seeing that Canada does her full duty in this war, to take steps that will bring about the result that the man most useful as a soldier shall be a soldier and that the man mose useful for the great work of production and for maintaining our people here at home shall be utilized for that purpose, or at all events that he shall have the opportunity of turning his energies to the fulfilment of that purpose.

Bear in mind, Mr. Speaker, that it might be absolutely true that we need in this country every man for the work of production, agricultural and industrial, and it might be true at the same time that there were many men in this country whom we could let go, because, unfortunately, every man who is at home here is not helping in the work of industrial and agricultural production, and so far I have not heard it suggested that there is any method by which the men who are doing nothing can be compelled to work in industrial or agricultural production. It is quite possible that the men who are not so engaged, whether that ought to be or not, might, under military discipline, make good soldiers. Canada cannot abandon her effort, and I am not going to discuss that, because, if what has already been said in this House has not convinced those who heard it, that Canada cannot in honour abandon her effort, then for my part I abandon hope of carrying that conviction to their minds. That is my starting point, and I think that the general sense of this House is that that is true. If we are to do our duty there is only one course open to us, and that is that we should provide additional men by selective conscription, not to save this man or that man from going to the war, not as some hon. gentlemen are at pains to insinuate, because we are looking for a method of discrimination between one man and another, but in order that we may see to it that both of Canada's duties are performed, one of which duties is that to which my hon. friend from St. Mary's (Mr. Martin) attaches such great importance.

Let me say just a few words on what this measure means. It has struck me, in listening to this debate, that it might not have been a bad idea if we had departed from the usual practice and first examined the provisions of the Bill in order to grasp and thoroughly understand its principle. Had we done this, I think we should have been in a better position to discuss the measure. Much of the debate has been upon a principle of conscription, assumed to mean a system under which every man from twenty to forty-five years of age, without regard to condition, domestic relations, occupation, or the distress which might fall upon an abandoned family, was to be taken by force and marched out to the war. And a great deal of the public opinion that my hon. friend from Montcalm (Mr. Lafortune) sought to show by promenading us from parish to parish in the province of Quebec, is based upon the representation that that is what is proposed to be done. But when you look at the Bill you find that it restricts the number of men to be raised to one hundred thousand. Note, that is not a minimum, but a maximum. In the second place, the Bill provides means intended to enable us to ascertain, as I have already said, who can be spared. We have had some criticism of the proposed system. Some hon. gentlemen say it will give an advantage to the rich man at the expense of the poor. If I am not mistaken the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) said it was a system under which discrimination of all sorts was possible; that the measure had been prepared for the very purpose of making discrimination on racial, or provincial, or religious lines, or discrimination as between the rich man and the poor. That was far from the minds of those who drafted the measure. And, more than that, it has been stated by the Prime Minister that suggestions for the improvement of the Bill will be welcomed. Let me say to the hon. members who are at such great pains to have it go forth to the people that there is a desire to discriminate against the poor or against any other class: Come with your suggestion, and it will be welcomed; if you have a better method, to make it sure that there shall be no discrimination, let us know what it is. There is no other desire in the heart of anybody who stands behind the Bill than to find the most effective method of preventing discrimination of any kind. Under this Bill the rich man's son will go under the same conditions as the poor man's son; the man of any province the man of any race, the man of one religion, will go absolutely under the same conditions as the man of another. There is, from beginning to end of this Bill, nothing upon which can be based what I venture to call the unworthy suggestion put forward that there is hidden in it somewhere the germ of unjust discrimination. But I repeat what I have already said: If any man suspects the existence of that defect, let him tell us how to remove it. The men who have made these suggestions are able, astute, capable men; surely they can find means to make more sure the purpose we have in mind. The suggestion to which I have referred, I say, is unworthy of the men who made it, not only because, in my judgment, there is nothing in the measure to justify it, but because they know that if they have a better suggestion, it will be acceptable, and because they know also that statements of that kind can have but one effect—to add to the already too-much inflamed condition of a public mind which is not yet thoroughly informed upon the imperative necessity of this measure, and more particularly not yet thoroughly informed upon what the putting into effect of the measure will mean throughout the country. I register my most emphatic protest against that sort of insinuation. It is unfair to us who stand behind the Bill—but that is a minor matter—it is the contribution of the hon. gentlemen who make it, to add to the already disturbed condition of public opinion.

Here is a measure that is far from being what it has been represented to be, viz., a measure of conscription which is going to take away man, woman and child. We have had pitiful descriptions of the husband snatched away from his wife and children, and of distressful conditions that, it is said, will surround the enforcement of the measure. We want one hundred thousand men, and before any married man is asked to go under the terms of the Bill we shall have exhausted the supply of men from twenty to thirty-five years of age who are unmarried and fit to go. I shall not go into figures which have been given already, but it would appear to be beyond peradventure that this married man, whose fate we have been asked to bemoan, will not be called upon under this measure; he will certainly not be called upon until every man of the class I have described has been called upon and has given his services. But the picture that has been drawn is really the picture of what has happened under the voluntary system. The man with a wife and young children, who, because he was of high heart and had a strong sense of duty, responded to the call that his heart and conscience put upon him, or yielded to the pressure of public opinion that necessarily existed under what we call the "voluntary" system, went under the distressing circumstances so pathetically enlarged upon. How many and many a father has left this country and gone over, to give his life in this great struggle, or to return crippled and unable to support that family; while men with no dependents, men of leisure, men with money, men who did not need to devote themselves to production, men without ties, with no one dependent upon them, sat at home—and, under the voluntary system, sat at home in the exercise of their absolute right. I say that this is a measure for the protection of the family; it is not a measure that threatens them with the dire consequences that have been spoken of.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice) (resuming): When the House rose I had been dealing with what I conceived to be the principle of the Bill, and I had endeavoured to make clear what some of its principal dispositions were. I had taken occasion to make some observations in regard to certain insinuations that some of its dispositions revealed a desire to create or make possible discriminations in the administration of the Act. May I just add upon that subject one observation? Hon. gentlemen suggest that the measure, in some of its terms, makes discrimination possible and they impute to this Government therefore the intention to bring about that result. Do they quite realize that the first thing this Government did, after the Bill was drafted, was to make a proposition that hon. gentlemen from the other side should come into the Administration, displacing a number of those who are here now and that, unless they were going to be parties to the working out of this discrimination which they say the Government contemplated, it would be absolutely impossible. Could there be any more manifest evidence that there could have been no ulterior purpose at all events in the working of any of these dispositions than the readiness and willingness to confide their administration to the newly constituted government which would be equally representative of what is now the Opposition and what is now the party that happens to be in power and that would be not merely composed for one-half of it, of gentlemen who would be nominated by the present leader of the Opposition, but if my memory serves me aright, would be composed for the other half of gentlemen who would sit in that Government subject to the veto of the right hon. gentleman who represents the Opposition? Surely, at all events, we can claim that we have an absolute defence against this insinuation of some ulterior purpose hidden or—I do not know whether hon. gentlemen go so far as to say —apparent, on the face of this measure. Furthermore, this invitation, of suggestions to meet possible objections to any particular provision, or series of provisions, has been extended and certainly will be acted upon.

Before I pass to another phase, may I just, by way of transition, say one word upon the fact that certain hon. gentlemen have taken occasion of the discussion of this measure to refer to what they consider the numerous sins of omission and commission of this Administration. How can that bear upon the question we are called upon to deal with, the question of whether the method proposed is necessary and advisable and is the one which the conditions in which we find ourselves impose upon us the duty of adopting? Again, I point out that simultaneously with the presentation of this measure the Government offered to disappear and allow it to be administered by a newly constituted Government composed in the manner which I indicated a few moments ago. Surely that makes it evident that we have just one question to deal with, and that we may pass without further observation from the objections, grievous as they may appear in the eyes of some hon. gentlemen and which have no bearing upon the question as to whether this measure should or should not be adopted.

Now, I pass to the consideration of another matter that calls certainly for an observation from me and which has arisen out of this debate. We have heard a great deal about pledges and promises. We have heard something about broken faith and we have listened to very eloquent denunciations of this Government whose pledged honour, hon. gentlemen say, has been violated. I think we even heard something about scraps of paper. I, in particular, had the pleasure of sitting here and hearing the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux), the hon. member for Laval (Mr.

Wilson) and the hon. member for Montcalm (Mr. Lafortune) to-day refer to a matter in regard to which I desire to say a word. The affirmation was made that conscription was a bad thing for Canada because of what the Minister of Justice had said to a very distinguished prelate in Montreal whose name I would not think of introducing into this discussion. It was alleged that I had said a thing which was not true. The hon. member for Rouville was delicate in his expression in that regard but I think he fairly conveyed that meaning. My hon. friend from Laval was less delicate. Before he got through with me he told this House that I had made all sorts of false representations to this reverend gentleman. Then, we go on up in a crescendo. The hon. member for Montcalm did not make any bones about it at all. I do not know whether he felt called upon to go one better than the hon. member for Laval but he did not hesitate to state that I had lied to the archbishop. As far as the pledges of this Government are concerned, it is not for me to deal with this subject. Hon. members have heard recited what have been described as the pledges of this Government. It takes a good deal of determination to find a case of broken promises, to read into the declarations which these hon. gentlemen have read, a promise of future action under all circumstances no matter what might happen. Is a Government never to be free to state what its actual policy is, never to be free to state that it has not certain things in contemplation without being held to have bound itself that never in the future (no matter how conditions or circumstances may change, no matter what knowledge may come to it that it had not at the time that of statement of policy) would it take any course different from that which it was actually following and had then in contemplation? That is the proposition.

We hear about the bankrupt honour of this Government and about its broken pledges. I am told that I made all sorts of false representations, and that I lied to a very distinguished gentleman and a very valued friend of mine. I have adverted to the statements that were made on behalf of this Government. Let me say one word as to the statements which I made, wherein I am told to-day that I lied. In the first place, let me say that I would not dream of contradicting any statement made by the distinguished gentleman to whom I refer, as to what I said to him. I accept his statement as to that as unquestionably true, and I have no doubt that I conveyed to him the meaning which he now attaches to it. It looks as though the desire of the hon. gentleman was to put me in contradiction with this distinguished gentleman, who has my respect and veneration. I say with truth as well as with pride, that I count him among my most valued and respected friends, and if that be their desire, they certainly shall not succeed. I have no hesitation in saying that what I said was true at the time, and is just as true to-day. I said that the National Service cards had no connection, near or far, with conscription. I say that to-day, and it is true. Gentlemen have been through the province of Quebec who were so fond of talking conscription that one would almost believe that they sighed for the day when it might come, or, at all events, might be proposed, in order that they might use the fact to further their political advancement. These gentlemen had been making statements in Quebec, and I shall not say they lied. I have more consideration for the hon. gentleman from Montcalm (Mr. Lafortune) than apparently he has for me. They have been stating what perhaps they did not know to be false, but what they certainly did not know to be true, namely that the National Service cards were a step in the direction of conscription. I stated at the time that that was untrue, and I say to-night that it is untrue and I defy any body to establish the contrary. And because, forsooth, I told that truth, hon. gentlemen talk about my having lied, and they talk about my broken faith and about all sorts of representations that I made. I expressed my absolute conviction, as a conviction and an opinion, that conscription would not come in this country, and I believed it absolutely. If the gentleman to whom that statement was made understood it to be a promise, and said that I made it, let it be well understood. I am not denying that what I said may have justified the view he took of it, though I venture to say nothing was further from my mind, at the moment, than that I was making a promise. Let it be clearly understood I made no such promise. Had I undertaken to make such a promise, hon. gentlemen would have a right to reproach me, not for the breaking but for the making of it. I recognize that that would be a grave offence. Mark you, I refer to a promise such as the one I am reproached for having broken, and such as the hon. leader of the Government is reproached for having failed to keep. I say that if any public man should undertake to promise that he would not adopt a certain course, no matter how clearly circumstances might make it his duty to adopt that course, he would be gravely to be condemned for making such a promise. And, when circumstances which he did not control made it his imperative duty, in the interests of his country, or brought home to his mind the conviction that it was his imperative duty in the interests of his country, to take the course that he had promised not to take, would hon. gentlemen contend that he should say, "Yes, it is quite clear now, the salvation of my country depends upon a certain course being taken, I am the man who is in a position to take it, I alone, can set on foot the measures to bring it about, but I made a promise, and I must stand by it, and see the honour of my country lost, and see the soldiers of my country left unsupported, and see possible defeat come to those to whom I have pledged my assistance, and see the cause that I thought of such importance as to justify my plunging my country into war go down to disgraceful defeat, because, forsooth, I rashly and unwisely made a promise?" I say, Mr. Speaker, that a man who, in those circumstances, would feel that he was withheld from doing that which was his clear duty, gravely as he had offended in making the rash promise, would offend more gravely by keeping it. I see my hon. friend from Montcalm smiling at me in a calm way. I put a case before him. I have heard people speak in the strongest way against the use of firearms. I have heard men say that never, under any circumstances, or under any conditions, was a man justified in carrying a firearm, or in using it against his neighbour. Suppose a man, having made that declaration and pledge, finds himself in a situation where his house has been broken into by a powerful ruffian, who, perhaps, proceeded to outrage his wife and his daughter; the firearm lies right by his hand. Would the member for Montcalm say that the husband should fold his arms with the remark: oh, I made a promise; I shall not interfere?

Mr. LAFORTUNE: I never said that.

Mr. DOHERTY: The member for Montcalm—and the member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) also, if I may judge from what he said the other evening, with his hands in the air, about the "broken faith" of this Government—would stand behind that husband and say: beware, your broken faith, your broken faith! And he would expect that husband to drop his firearm and take no action. After the ruffian had carried out his operations to his own satisfaction, and this promiser, his house looted and his family murdered, was himself ready for the grave, I suppose the member for Rouville would conduct the victim there in admiration and would see to it that a monument was erected to his memory. I suppose he would inscribe upon that monument the words of the poet about a man who acted not dissimilarly: "Faith, unfaithful, made him falsely true."

I say again that I never made any promise. If it is said that I made such a promise, I am not questioning the statement of the gentleman who so understood my remarks. If I had made any such promise, I would have done a thing that I should not have done. If the circumstances be such as the Prime Minister says they are to-day on the other side of the water, and as I absolutely believe them to be; and if the reasons which I gave this afternoon prove that the only effective way of meeting these conditions is the adoption of this measure, then I say that had I made such a promise, my only course as a man of honour would have been to do that which my position here, the exigencies of the case and the needs of my country called upon me to do.

So much for pledges and promises. The member for Montcalm to-day gave great credit to the ex-Secretary of State (Hon. E. L. Patenaude) for his action in leaving this Government. To what did the member for Montcalm attribute that action? He said that the former Secretary of State would rather leave this Government than be a party to the breaking of these pledges, and he expressed the wish that other gentlemen had felt likewise. I should like the member for Montcalm to remember the expression by which he qualified the statement that he attributed to me. As I do not like to get beyond Parliamentary rules, all I ask him to do is to take it that I am making a similar statement with regard to the statement of his; that the ex-Secretary of State left this Government rather than break his pledges. Did the member for Montcalm read the letter of the ex-Secretary of State? Does he still persist in saying that the reason he gave why the ex-Secretary of State left the Government is correct? I will not try to qualify his action if he does so; the member for Montcalm would have just the word to use —but I shall not use it.

Mr. LAFORTUNE: I have not a word to withdraw.

Mr. DOHERTY: That is exactly what I said.

Mr. LAFORTUNE: I have my archbishop with me.

Mr. DOHERTY: I congratulate the hon. gentleman upon the company in which he says he finds himself, but I am not afraid that he will succeed in destroying the confidence of that gentleman in myself. The ex-Secretary of State did not leave this Government because he had made a pledge that he thought this Government was breaking. The member for Montcalm, who has waited so long to discover his innate admiration of the member for Hochelaga (Mr. Patenaude), certainly does not entertain a higher opinion of that gentleman than I do. It was a loss to the Government when Hon. Mr. Patenaude thought it his duty to withdraw from it, and it would be a great loss to the public life of Canada if he should permanently withdraw from it. I sincerely hope that wherever it may seem to him that the path of duty lies, he will continue to follow that path and to give his valuable service to our country. But the ex-Secretary of State knows precisely all the facts with which we have been dealing and I leave it to him whether there was any question of broken promise or broken pledge on his part or on mine. Moreover, I leave it to his letter of resignation to contradict the unfounded statement of the member for Montcalm that he resigned rather than break a pledge that was given and that reproach should be addressed to me because I had not done likewise. Hon. gentlemen who appreciate what honour means should be careful not to impugn a man's personal honour as mine has been impugned by the member for Rouville—I give him the credit that his language was more delicate than that of the member for Laval (Mr. Wilson) and the member for Montcalm. This subject is not as important, from the public point of view, as these hon. gentlemen seem to think it is, but it is of vital importance to me, because it touches my personal honour.

Let me advert for a moment to the use which the member for Laval did not think it beneath him to make of an answer given on behalf of the Government to a question put by the member for Russell (Mr. Murphy). I have not the slightest doubt that the member for Russell got an answer to the question that he intended to put. I know the member for Russell too well and have too high a respect for him to imagine that he would try, under the guise of a Parliamentary question, to pry into the private correspondence of a gentleman because he happened to be a member of the Government. The member for Russell asked whether there had been any correspondence between this Government, or any member of the Government, and any prelate of the province of Quebec. We would not have done to the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Murphy) the injustice to suppose that he was trying to ferret out private correspondence between members of this Governement and their friends. The hon. member for Russell is a gentleman, and I am quite sure he never meant to try to do anything of the kind. Such action would be beneath contempt. How it should be more justifiable to try to ferret out the correspondence between a gentleman, because he happens to be a member of the Government, and another gentleman, who happens to be a clergyman or a prelate or a bishop in the church to which that gentleman happens to belong, is something that I cannot understand. I want to be just, and I am only just to the hon. member for Russell when I say I am satisfied he had no such idea in mind, and equally am I satisfied that he never conceived of the use to which the hon. member for Laval (Mr. C. A. Wilson) would be willing to put the perfectly proper answer the hon. member got, that there was no official correspondence by the Government, and that the Government did not charge itself with investigating the private correspondence of its members. The hon. member for Russell never can have foreseen the use that that answer would be put to. The hon. member for Laval, the other evening, in the presence of the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux), who did not condemn his action—I am satisfied if he thinks about it, he will condemn it—proceeded in this House to find fault with this answer and, having satisfied himself from it that there was private correspondence, to draw this extraordinary conclusion: "there was private correspondence because the Government said there was no official correspondence—which was the only matter at issue—and moreover, it has been said that a minister made a promise to an archbishop; by this system of reasoning I have arrived at the conclusion that there was private correspondence between the minister and the archbishop; therefore, it is proved, as clear as day, that that minister made that particular promise to the archbishop." My hon. friend from Montcalm (Mr. Lafortune) smiles. He is an expert on proof, and I am satisfied that he is absolutely convinced that that is proven. The next time he wants to prove that I have announced my intention of setting fire to the Parliament buildings, it will be the simplest thing in the world for him to do so after this fashion; an hon. member will ask this Government: "Has there been any correspondence between any minister, say, and his wife with regard to the Parliament Buildings?" The Government will answer: "This Government has had no official correspondence with the lady, and it does not investigate correspondence between its members and their wives." There is, of course, nothing further to be said. It will be conclusively demonstrated to the hon. member for Montcalm and the hon. member for Laval, that I wrote to my wife a letter, in which I announced my intention of burning down the Parliament buildings. Was it worth while to try to make an utterly contemptible use of a fair answer to a fair question, for the purpose of arriving at that conclusive demonstration? So much for the pledges.

I wish to advert for a moment to the condition which, in our judgment, made it imperatively necessary to provide without delay an additional number of men. I desire to read to the House a paragraph from a letter which came under my notice to-day. I do not know the writer beyond that he is apparently an American in the Ambulance Service writing home from France. His letter describes so accurately a condition of affairs that this House has had intimated to it by the Prime Minister in terms as clear as it would be becoming for a man occupying his position to use, that I venture to read it here. The writer says, as descriptive of the conditions on the French front to-day and as indicating the need for men:—

> France has up to this time fought with a bravery unprecedented in the history of the world. Her men have sacrificed themselves with almost reckless abandon. Her losses have been tremendous. Now France is tired out, dead tired. Most of her young men have gone, and the older classes are being called out to fill their places; and this work is simply too much for men of advanced years. Then America enters the war. A new dawn appears to these old men. At last they can get back to their field, or go into some less strenuous back line work. At last there is a chance that some members of this wonderful nation will survive this war and continue this race which has stood for so much in art and literature. But what is America doing?

And then the writer goes on to criticise the action of America in sending ambulance corps which can be useful behind the lines and in not sending men to go into the front trenches. He goes on to say:—

> If America wishes to see France stagger and fall from loss of blood; if she wants to go into the future with the stigma that she moved too late to save France, let her continue to send automobilists to joy ride along the French front and consume French food and fuel. If she wants the name of a fighting nation, let her send shiploads of aviators and planes and follow these with a backbone of artillery. Also let her provide some means by which her sons in France now serving as ambulanciers or in other positions may get into some more warlike work and fight as good Americans should.

That is not addressed to us, but has it no message for us? After all, what is it more than the message that the great Maréchal Joffre, who, with very little English at his disposal, emphasized again and again to the soldiers in Montreal, as he passed them in review: "Send us more men; send us more men?" Did Maréchal Joffre know what was needed, or perchance does the hon. member for Montcalm (Mr. Lafortune) know better? That is the situation over there. It is only another man's expression of what we all knew, but it describes the situation very aptly, and, I have not the slightest doubt, very correctly. The Prime Minister, in terms fitting for him to use, has told this House of the crying need for men. Perhaps some of us have heard the story more in detail. Perhaps some of us have heard things that it might not be wise to give to the public. Perhaps some of us have a more keen sense of the critical nature of the present situation than the people of Canada, before the visit of the Prime Minister to England, had conceived. I am no pessimist; I have no desire to create unnecessary alarm; I have no desire to say anything that would create the impression that conditions were more desperate than they are.

But I do venture to say that to my mind—I give this, of course, for what it is worth as my own conviction—this war to-day is anybody's war. I do not say that I have no longer confident hope; I have, but that confident hope rests upon everybody who is in this war doing his utmost. We have been told: Oh, the United States has come into the war. That is given as a reason why we should let up. I have a great admiration for our friends of the United States. I have faith in their bravery, faith in their resources, faith that they will do their utmost. But when they have done their utmost they will be proud men if, by doing that utmost, they shall have placed themselves in a position to equal the great effort that France has made, but which, alas, she can make no longer, or at all events with the same effect. Is it consonant with the honour of Canada to say, as we have heard it said here: Oh, it is not our 100,000 men who are going to make the difference. But our 100,000 men are, in proportion to our population and means, what ten times that number would be to the people of the United States. If the people of the United States say Oh, it is not our 1,000,000 men who are going to make the difference, and if Great Britain lets up and says: Oh, it is not the more men that we may gather who are going to make the difference—if we and the United States and Great Britain say that, all the difference in the world will result. Surely we have pride enough to say: Having put our hand to the plough, we will not look back at this critical moment. Surely we have regard enough for our young men who have gone forth so willingly and so readily to say to them: So far as it depends upon us at home, your task will not be made harder than it need be.

Do hon. gentlemen realize what reinforcements mean? Do they realize that when reinforcements are lacking, double or treble stress is put on the man at the front? You are exposing him to double or treble danger; you are sending him again and again into the trenches to meet death. In addition to that, when he has done his double or treble duty, he gets but half or one-third the time for rest he would get if his comrades at home were doing their duty. When it is for this purpose that reinforcements are needed, are we going to sit back and say: Oh, well, let the Americans do it; let the Englishmen do it; let the Frenchmen in the present exhausted condition of France do it; we have no interest in our boys more than we have in any other men who are fighting in this war. I did not intend to go into any development of the reasons why this thing ought to be done, because that has already been treated of very much more eloquently than I could hope to do it, but there are some things a man cannot touch without being carried away.

Now to proceed to the suggested referendum, which is the method proposed for meeting the emergency, for remedying the condition of which I have spoken. Mr. Speaker, no man is a greater stickler for the people's rights than, I venture to say, I am. There is to me, as a representative of the people, only one thing more sacred than the people's rights, and that is the people's duty. To the individual man, his duty is or ought to be something much more sacred than his right. The public man ought to be more anxious about whether he is doing his duty as a public man than whether he is hewing just absolutely to the line what he has a right to do. I am anxious that the people's rights should be respected, but I am also anxious for the honour of my country that the people's duties should be done. It is all very well to talk of devotion to the people, and I suppose that there are occasions when that talk is useful for getting votes, but there comes a time—or all government is vain imagining—when it is the duty of the people's representatives and of those who have been entrusted with the government of the people, to see to it that the people do their duty. And, that is the position that confronts this Parliament tonight.

Let me eliminate for a moment the question which I shall deal with later on of whether there is any distinction between this Parliament and any other Parliament. Is it my right hon. friend's (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) conception of popular or democratic government that those whom the people elect and to whom they entrust the power of governing them, and with the power the duty of exercising it, shall never govern the people when the people do not want to do their duty. I am not saying that the people of Canada do not now want to do their duty, but the principle that underlies this referendum motion is that if the time ever comes when the people of Canada do not want to do their duty, those entrusted with the government shall throw up their hands and say: We will not govern, we will go out and say to the people—on the hypothesis that they do not want to do their duty—please will you be good enough to tell us whether we, your delegated authority to govern you, ought to make a law to compel you to do your duty.

When I studied mathematics long ago there was one form of argument described as the reductio ad absurdum. When you wanted to show that a proposition was absolutely indefensible you pointed out the absurdity of the consequences to which it would lead. It seems to me that the referendum proposal is intended to support an argument directed against democratic government to show its utter futility and utter uselessness by means of the reductio ad absurdum. If that is not reducing to the absurd the consequences of government by the people, then I have no comprehension of what the absurd means.

Let us understand each other about government by the people. Under our constitution we have government by the people in this sense: that it belongs absolutely to the people, to determine who shall govern them. But it is a novel proposition that government by the people necessarily involves enactment of legislation by the people themselves, and that is in practical effect what is suggested by this referendum. There may be circumstances when it is proper to do that. But now, when the whole question involved is not, mind you, whether the people ought to do a duty, but whether there ought to be a law enacted to compel them to do that duty, it is proposed that we should go out and ask the people, who do not want to be compelled, if they want to be compelled. Surely, if the people want to be compelled it is the clearest evidence that they do not need to be compelled; for if they do want to be compelled they will go out and do the duty without compulsion. So, when you ask the question, you must assume that they do not want to do the duty. Therefore, the proposal is that we should go out and say to them: Gentlemen, you do not want to go to the war; will you be good enough to tell us if you want us to make a law to compel you to go to the war you do not want to go to? What answer is expected, I do not know.

It may be said that it is the majority of the people who would determine that question; and I quite understand that a large part of the majority will not be liable or not unwilling to go to the war. Their votes will compel the liable but unwilling, and what I am suggesting is not true as an absolute proposition governing the whole of the people. But it remains true that in the majority, whichever way it votes—and certainly in the majority if you have a majority saying they do not want a law to compel those who do not want to go to the war to go—you will have the vote of every man who does not want to go to the war; you will have the vote of every man who, if any body ought to be compelled. is the man who ought to be compelled to go to the war. And you are told that this is a necessary consequence of democratic institutions. If I were called upon to make an attack upon government by the democracy, I do not think I could find a stronger argument than to point to that as one of its necessary consequences. We are asked to trust the people. Mr. Speaker, I trust the people; I trust the people far and beyond where many hon. gentlemen on the other side trust them. I trust them miles beyond where my hon. friend from Montcalm trusts them. He gave us a pathetic description of the efforts that would have to be made to enforce this law and of the ways that people would find to evade it. And I must pay him—I wonder if it is safe to call it the compliment—of saying that he gave us some of the most original law it has ever been my fortune to listen to. There are many things in which originality is a very good quality. I do not want to discuss at the moment how far originality in law is a good quality; but I give the hon. gentleman credit for producing some most original law. He has laboured to show how easy it is for the people of Canada—who, of course, according to him, do not want to obey the law—to evade the law. I trust the people more than he does. I trust the people that, after this law shall have been enacted, and when they understand and know just what it is and just how it operates, they will recognize it as the proper method of providing both that those who should not go to the war shall be exempt from pressure to go, and that those who should go shall come forward to do their duty. I have not the apprehension the hon. gentleman has expressed, for I trust the people. I trust to their mature judgment; I trust them when they shall have had time to reflect. But the suggestion is that we do not trust the people because we will not take their judgment at the first moment when a proposition of this kind is made to them, when they are unprepared for it, ill-informed or mis-informed upon it. Reproaches have been cast upon the Government in this matter, I am not concerned about that, because I think we have come to the day when the personal reproach that an individual may earn, and the question whether a particular Government is deserving of condemnation or the contrary, or whether a particular party has always been on right lines, or the contrary, are matters of absolutely no consequence. I am quite satisfied that the people of Canada are not in the remotest degree interested to-day in the past sins or past virtues of the existing Government or of the present party to which I have the honour to belong, nor in those of the party of hon. gentlemen opposite. Whether the people of Canada are for this measure or against it, there is one thing I am absolutely convinced of, and that is that they have not the slightest interest in the discussion of the merits of political parties at this moment.

I was about to say, when I was carried into this digression, that I am prepared to trust the people, to trust the sane judgment of the people; to trust the judgment of the people after they have had proper opportunities for information. But to-day we are dealing with a people upon whom this proposition has come unexpectedly, and they are not prepared for it. I think that members of Parliament should be guided by the opinions of the people, but by the opinions of the people arrived at and formed after opportunity for consideration, and expressed at the proper time and in the proper manner under the provisions of the constitution. The hon. member for Montcalm took us nearly all over the province of Quebec, and told us of meetings that he had attended that were against conscription, including one in my own constituency. He further warned us that it would not be safe for us to go there and say a word for conscription, because the Lachine canal is near. Well, let me tell the hon. member in turn that, when he wants to make the statement that I lied, it would not be wise for him to go back and make it in St. Anne's hall, even at a Liberal meeting, because the Lachine canal is very near.

Now, I was saying, I trust the people. I trust implicitly to their judgment when they have had opportunity for information and consideration. But I do not conceive the functions of a representative of the people to be to go around to meetings throughout the country addressing people who have not the necessary information, stirring them up to express an opinion in a certain sense, and then walk into this House and say: There is nothing more to be said; I am here to express the opinions of the people. The question what the function of a member of Parliament is under the British system is not a new question. I am not going into that question, but I would suggest to these hon. gentlemen who are so anxious about the opinion of the people that they should take a few minutes some day to read a famous speech of that great English statesman—I should rather say, that great Irishman whom Ireland gave to England to be one of her greatest statesmen—Edmund Burke. That will tell them what is the proper position of a representative of the people. Let me read a few lines. Burke was being reproached for not having followed the opinion of his electors—the subject is not material. He said to them:

> For, gentlemen, it is not your fond desires, nor mine, that can alter the nature of things; by contending against which, what have we got, or ever shall get, but defeat and shame? I did not obey your instructions. No; I conformed to the instructions of truth and nature, and maintained your interest, against your opinions, with a constancy that became me. A representative worthy of you ought to be a person of stability. I am to look, indeed, to your opinions; but to such opinions as you and I must have five years hence. I was not to look to the flash of the day.

We owe a duty to the people and that is not to look to the flash of the day, not to be governed by the opinions of people described by the hon. gentleman as being in a frame of mind where they throw one into the canal if he express any opinion other than what they may happen to entertain at the moment. Speaking for myself, and having respect for the people who were at these meetings, I can quite understand that at the first flash this proposal, ill-understood and worse explained, does not commend itself to their judgment but when it is brought to their attention and properly explained I am satisfied they will give it their approval. I am satisfied that if, by any mistake on the part of this Government and Parliament, we should decide to let this question be settled at this moment by a vote taken without further preparation, upon the submission of this sole question to the people when they are being appealed to in the most powerful way and by the most eloquent gentlemen to resist and reject this proposal, that if we should subject the honour of Canada to being soiled by the possibly unfortunate result of a vote taken under these circumstances by the people ill-informed and without proper explanation, these very people themselves, when they saw the result, would never forgive us for what we had done. They would tell us, in the words of Edmund Burke: You should not have been governed by the flash of the moment; you should have waited for our opinion one year, two years or three years hence when we shall be in a position to appreciate the possible results; perhaps even to know the actual results of the decision you are called upon to make.

Now, I feel that I owe the House and yourself, Mr. Speaker, an apology for the length at which I have allowed myself to be led into going in connection with this most important question. I do not know that I can flatter myself that what I have said can alter the views of any man but at least I feel that the best thought that I have been able to give to the most important question that I have ever had to consider has inspired me to say what I have said.

In conclusion, let me just say one word as to what has been called the constitutional lack of power of this Parliament to pass this Bill and the absence of a mandate on the part of its members. I wonder if hon. members remember what happened in January, 1916, and I wonder if their memory goes a little farther back to August, 1914. In August, 1914, nobody could question the mandate of this Parliament and nobody could speak of this Government as being moribund. I do not feel quite so shocked about that expression as the hon. member for Montcalm thought I ought to. The best of us, even my hon. friend from Montcalm himself, will come some day to be in a moribund condition and still he marvels that we do not rise in wrath at the very mention of it. I do not know what we are expected to do or to say when we are described as a moribund Government as we have been by the leader of the Opposition. Well, we have to stand that epithet. Could this Government be described as a moribund Government in 1914? Had this Parliament a mandate in 1914? What did this Parliament do in 1914? We had a three or four days' session. I think we all look back with pride and pleasure to those three or four days because in that three or four days' session we realized to the full the condition which the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) the other day recalled to us as having been described by an English poet in words put into the mouth of a Roman of old lamenting the disappearance of those days "when none were for a party and all were for the State." In those four or five days we realized that. I hope that we will still, notwithstanding the difference of opinion that exists between us as to this particular measure, be in that frame of mind. There could be no doubt about it at that time and what did this Parliament, then in the full enjoyment of its mandate, under the impulse of that common sentiment, realize? Was it wondering about the rights of the people, was it wondering whether it should have a referendum, was it anxious even about the rights of the people's representatives? Not a bit. This Parliament did at that time, and under the inspiration of the impulse that prevailed then, something that was absolutely unprecedented in the annals of Canadian Parliaments and, I am not quite sure whether one could not safely say, in the annals of any British Parliament. Parliament then handed over to this Government, that was not moribund then, absolutely its entire legislative powers in so far as matters pertaining to the war were concerned. Conditions were so critical that the people's representatives were willing to forego their control over legislation and to hand it over to the Government, a Government that had not been elected to deal with these matters in particular. Parliament then realized that what would be necessary would be prompt action and it thought it was worth while to sacrifice even the right of the people to make their own legislation through their own representatives in order to ensure that needed action would be taken at the proper moment and that there should be no delay. That is what Parliament did then, a live Parliament, a Parliament that had an unquestioned mandate. I am not going to claim now that the Government might do what it chose. I think it might have done what it believed to be right, but this Government, in carrying out its duty, has been truly conservative in the exercise of its powers. But, I have referred to their wide scope as indicating what this Parliament in the vigour of its life, when its mandate was undoubted and its motives of the highest, thought it proper to do on behalf of the people. It was absolutely like the action that the earliest democratic peoples realized, in very ancient times, to be the proper action in like conditions. We all know that when the State was in peril, when the enemy was at the gate, when civil commotion threatened, in the old Rome of the Republican days, the people, ever jealous of their rights, stood not upon them, and the Senate said to the consuls: Take care that nothing of evil befall the Commonwealth. Caveant consules ne quid detrimenti Republica capiat," and left to them the plenitude of power.

And in virtue of what Parliament did then, in the full vigour of its life and unquestioned mandate, I venture to say the Government might have proceeded upon the authority so conferred to enact the present measure. We have not sought to do so, nor would we dream of going that far. I refer to the legislation merely to show what this Parliament thought was the proper line of action in the day of its fullest vigour. In 1916 what did this Parliament do? Parliament voted that it was desirable that, though, under our written constitution our mandate expired in October last, the mandate of Parliament should be extended for another year, and to-day the hon. gentlemen who supported that motion, who felt that the good of the country imperatively demanded such action, now say one after the other, "Oh, we did something we had not any right to do; although we did it with our eyes open, we had no right to do it, and therefore we do not now represent the people."

I was amazed to hear members make speeches in this Chamber on the strength of the fact that they did not represent the people. I desire to say one word with reference to that proposition. It is quite true that, under our written constitution, this House was elected for a fixed period of five years. But the constitution of this country is susceptible of amendment, and the people may express their will tacitly, just as clearly as by their vote, and when, in 1916, this Parliament, composed of representatives about whose mandate there was no doubt, gentlemen who represented the entire country, unanimously said that the safety of the country required that there should be no election, but that the life of Parliament should be extended, and when the people of Canada from one end to the other ratified that decision, I say, Mr. Speaker, that we then modified the constitution in the most regular and normal British way, that is by what is done and accepted as being the needful thing to meet new and unprovided for conditions. It is true we have a written constitution, and it can legally be altered only by the Imperial Parliament. The Imperial Parliament sanctioned the Bill passed in 1916, and that rendered legal what had been decided upon by us. I can say that when the Parliament, under those conditions, and with the absolute ratification of the people—and I am satisfied that will not be disputed—passed the Bill extending the life of Parliament in January, 1916, a Parliament was constituted with all the powers that ever belonged to any Parliament in the Dominion of Canada. Our right to sit as a Parliament was questioned by the hon. gentleman from Montcalm (Mr. Lafortune) as being illegal. That is part of the original law that the hon. gentleman gave us this afternoon, but when it is said our existence is unconstitutional I can only say that while this Parliament is not here by the will of the people, expressed in the ordinary and usual form, it is here by the unmistakable assent of the people, who were convinced that the expression of their will in the usual form would be detrimental to the best interest of Canada. I, for one, have no doubt of the validity of my mandate, nor have I any doubt of your powers, Mr. Speaker, in this House. We can do anything and everything that a lawfully and constitutionally elected Parliament can do, and, therefore, I have no doubt of my right to sit here and perform my duties as a member of Parliament. I have already endeavoured to point out Canada's duty at the present time, which is quite clear. Here we have in our hands the mandate, and on our shoulders the responsibility, for seeing that Canada does her duty. Mr. Speaker, I for one—and I am satisfied the great majority of the members of this House will be with me—will not shirk this responsibility to-night upon the mere plea of undue anxiety about the rights of the people.

In conclusion, to go back to where I began, let me suggest that we all endeavour, in the decision to which we may come, and the action we may take in pursuance of that decision, to join together, with the realizing sense that there is but one question in reality before us, and that is: What is the duty of Canada to-night? What is her duty to herself, to her honour, to her Allies, to her voluntary soldiers who have died, and are dying and facing death to-night? Let us forget that there are different provinces. Let us forget all the reproaches one race may think it has to make against another. Let us forget all the petty quarrels which may have occurred between us, by reason of political divergence, or differences. Let us forget that there are any political parties. Let us forget that there are any Government or any Opposition. Let us remember just one thing alone; that there is come to us the great privilege, carrying with it the heavy burden of responsibility, of determining for Canada to-night the most important question that any Canadian Parliament has ever been called upon to determine, a question upon whose right decision, and upon the proper action following that decision depends the honour of our country, Canada.

M. THOMAS MacNUTT (Saltcoats): I wish to place on record my reason for polling the vote I intend to poll to-night. I am a believer in the referendum, as a general thing. If any large questions come before the House and before the country, for which there is no mandate by an election, I think the situation should be laid before the people, and that they should be consulted. But, Sir, I do not see how this present proposal can possibly be a fair referendum. The men who are most interested in the carrying out of this Bill are the soldiers at the front to-day. At the time the Soldiers' Vote Bill was passed, it was recognized that it was desirable to poll the soldiers' vote. Very strong opinions were expressed at that time that it would be impracticable. Other opinions from hon. gentlemen, for whose judgment I have great respect, were expressed to the contrary. One of those opinions I cannot pass by; I refer to the opinion of the Prime Minister, who was behind the Soldiers' Vote Bill, who believed it was practical at that time to take their vote, but he has been across the water in the meantime, and looked into the matter, and he has made a statement in this House with respect to it. I wish to quote a couple of sentences from his remarks:

> The men at the front will be not only practically, but actually, disfranchised if an election does take place in this country while they are in the trenches. That is my conviction.

Further, in connection with the Soldiers' Voting Act of 1915. he said:

> I am not disposed to think that the arrangements made in that Act or in any other Act that could be devised are such as to enable those men to vote, or at least any considerable number of them.

We must have in this country a great many men who are available for service at the front. Some of them are what we call "slackers"; others are opposed to Canada's participation in the war. These men would have the right to vote, but a great many of the men who have bravely gone overseas to defend British institutions and who are calling for reinforcements would be debarred from voting. If only 10,000 of them were debarred from voting, I would still not support a referendum, having regard to present conditions. The men who are fighting for us overseas are specially interested in this matter, and they are the men who should be first considered.

It has been contended that the voluntary system could even now be made successful. Well, the present Administration have had that matter in hand and it is likely that they will continue to have it in hand for some time. They declare that they cannot do much more along the line of voluntary recruiting. What are we going to do about it? It is all very well to make recriminations and to say that they should have done better or that under different conditions they would have done better. But, Sir, discussion of that kind can very well be left for a while; what we have to face now is the present situation. We require men at the front, are there any men in Canada available for that service? I believe that there are. The slogan at the beginning of the war was: the last man and the last dollar; it is nearly time that we tried to put that into effect. It was not anticipated that the war would be such as it turned out to be, but the country has to continue to perform its part, even if it takes the last man and the last dollar. At the same time, there are many men who are not available for service at the front. An authority has stated that out of the 100 per cent only 25 per cent of the energy required to win the war is represented by men who can be classed as combatants, the remainder being made up of those who take part in agriculture, transportation, the manufacture of munitions and so on. On the other hand, many men are employed to-day in non-essential industries—piano and automobile factories, and so on—who could be sent to the front and their places filled by others, including returned soldiers. Any one who visits a lacrosse or baseball match is struck by the number of athletic, able-bodied young men who play these games professionally for the amusement of the crowds, in order to make money. This is the kind of man that ought to be at the front. They do not seem to want to go, and it strikes me that they should be made go to defend the institutions of their country. Other men attend these games and gatherings—they are sometimes called rooters—many of whom could be sent forward. As a matter of fact, many men are available who could be well spared, and if they do not know their duty, it should be pointed out to them. I do not think, however, that a single man should be taken from the farms. I do not say that because I am a farmer, but I know that though we may manage to get the crop in, the outlook for saving it is not very bright. If many more men are taken from the farms, production will be made much less, and production is as essential as the sending of men to the front. Great judgment will have to be exercised in selecting the proper men to send forward.

I think that there should be another form of conscription, that which has been referred to as the conscription of wealth. There are many men in the country who have large incomes—professional men, promoters, commission men, men who have inherited large sums of money. The lives of these men are in no danger; they cannot go to the front; they should, therefore, be called upon to pay out some of their surplus money to assist in feeding and equipping the men at the front. How many men of this kind there are, I do not know. Other men have a considerable amount of capital invested in businesses that are not touched by the present taxation. Why should not a man who has $25,000 or less in a business pay his share of taxation as well as the man whose business is capitalized at $50,000? If he is allowed profits of 10 per cent, he will get $2,500 a year. If he makes only 10 per cent, he could be exempted from taxation, but he could well afford to pay into the treasury one-quarter of each additional 5 per cent earned, one-half of the next 5 per cent earned and three-quarters of any further profits earned. When a domestic loan is floated, most of these men are glad to invest their money in 5 per cent non-taxable bonds which will be a charge upon the whole country for a long time and which will be a charge even upon the men who are at the front. Why should we send to the front a young man who has only his life to give, and leave behind, out of danger, other men who have large incomes which are taxed not at all or comparatively lightly? These men should at least be called upon to pay a large proportion of the money necessary to equip and maintain the men at the front.

One of my reasons for speaking to-night was that of making a few remarks with regard to a matter that has not been brought up in this debate and which relates to the foreign-born citizens of Canada. We have an enormous country in the West that required people to work and develop it. Very properly, the Government invited settlers from all parts of the world, and many came from what are now enemy countries. These men are not at all to blame for the war; they settled in our country; many of them took up third-class lands that nobody else would take, and have made good.

From my experience with these people I can say that they are good and industrious settlers. I notice a smile on the face of an hon. gentleman opposite. These people are not all Liberals. In some parts of my district there are a number of foreign-born settlers, and in some of the polls in these districts there is generally a Conservative majority and in others a Liberal majority. I am not talking politics at the present time. These men are citizens of this country, and they have a perfect right to have their citizenship respected. They have, however, been looked upon as enemies. I do not know of any recruiting meetings having been held in those settlements, but I do know that a considerable number of foreign-born settlers and sons of foreign-born settlers have enlisted or have endeavoured to enlist, and many of them have been turned down because their country of origin was Austria or Germany. In that way an antagonistic feeling has been built up which should not have arisen. These people are not responsible for this war. Perhaps there were agitators and sedition-mongers amongst them, but they have been looked after, and I might say that they are not the only people amongst whom there are agitators. I am satisfied there is a field for recruiting which has not been worked. I am rather curious to know whether this Conscription Bill, if it passes, as no doubt it will, will be applied in the foreign-born settlements, as they are called. Although we cannot expect these people to be as enthusiastic as our British-born people are, they are not disloyal; in fact, many of them we may consider as very loyal indeed. To give an instance, an influential German-born citizen who came out here when very young told me not long ago that he had made an offer —I suppose to the Department of Militia— to raise a battalion amongst his own people if they were allowed to go and fight the Turks. That showed, of course, a perfectly natural feeling on his part. He said: "We do not care to volunteer to go to the front, and perhaps shoot our relatives there, but we are ready, if they send us, to go and take part in the fight against the Turks." I told him that a number of German officers were in command of the Turkish army. He said that did not matter, that they had no relations amongst the officers. This man had a younger brother wounded about three weeks ago fighting for the Allies. I could give a number of similar instances.

I do not think I am out of order in speaking along these lines. I want, if possible, to remove some of the false impressions that there are in regard to the foreign-born settlers in the West. In voting, as I intend to do, it may be that I shall render myself unpopular amongst some of my electors, but I am willing to take the risk. At the same time I believe in fair play and in stating what I know to be the truth in regard to these people or to any matters that may be under consideration. On frequent occasions I have been invited to and have attended Union School picnics, where, perhaps, thirty or forty children from each of fifteen, sixteen or eighteen schools for foreign-born settlers meet for an outing one day in the year. It would probably open the eyes of some of our friends in the East if they could attend some of those picnics.

They would find the children bright and well-dressed marching around, every one of them waving a Union Jack and singing patriotic songs, and I do not think you could tell very much difference between them and the children of British-born people. I noticed the other day in a local paper the description of a concert, which I shall take the liberty of reading, as it has a bearing upon this question:

On Monday, June 4, a patriotic school concert was held in Goodeve Town Hall, in aid of the Patriotic Fund. Not only did the children show a thorough mastery of the English language, but entered into the patriotic choruses, drills and recitations with an enthusiasm which showed that they are real young Canadians, heart and soul. Every child was of foreign-born parentage, Ruthenian, Polish, German and Austrian; yet these parents went to much expense and trouble to equip their children for the concert and to help it along in every way. Mr. Riley, the teacher, acted as chairman, and introduced the programme with a speech in which he paid a high tribute to the patriotic work which the foreign-born are doing in this district. "Give these children only a chance," he declared, "and before the present generation has passed they will bless British institutions, and produce men of whom Canada and the British Empire will be proud." He added that loyalty can never be driven into any human being with a sledge-hammer. It is a tender plant whose root is in the heart. It will blossom and bear fruit in the sunshine of sympathy and kindness, but persecution and insult will only wither it. The other items on the programme were: Choruses—"O, Canada," "The Land of the Maple," "Rule Britannia," "Britannia, the Pride of the Ocean," "Wake, Says the Spring-time"; recitations—"Britannia," with thirteen characters to represent various parts of the British Empire, and "Fair Canada," which the children printed letter by letter on a maple leaf; drills—the boys (12 in number) gave the British Empire drill and marched and executed turnings, etc., with the accuracy of veteran soldiers. The Flower drill, sixteen girls each dresed in pure white with a flower wreath, marched at first and then executed slow graceful movements to the accompaniment of the Flower Song. A supper and dance followed the concert. The total cleared from the concert was $80.

I know this settlement. The people came out very poor; the parents are very proud of the manner in which their children have got on, and they appreciate very highly the institutions of this country. I believe many of them are prepared to defend those institutions, if they are required to do so, or even if they are requested to do so. They have been discouraged from enlisting, and that is one of the reasons why recruiting has, to a certain extent, fallen down. It may not have made a large difference, but it has made some difference. Every man recruited is of assistance, and these people would prove good fighters; they would be fighting for something that they valued. I do not know that many of this class of people can be spared from the land, but under different circumstances many of them would have enlisted before. I repeat that if we are to produce—and we have to produce—we must interfere very little with the men, of whatever nationality they may be, who are working on the land. I do not think it is necessary for me to discuss that matter at greater length. I could give instance after instance to show that the extract I have read is only a sample of what occurs at nearly every point that I know of in the West where there are foreign-born settlers, or descendants of foreign-born settlers.

I intend to vote against the amendment to the amendment. With considerable reluctance I shall also vote against the amendment. I am reluctant because I have the honour to be a supporter of the right hon. leader of the Opposition, and it goes pretty hard, I can assure you, to vote differently from him, but he would be the last man to say we should not vote according to our convictions. I intend to vote for the second reading of the Bill, but I do not promise to vote for its third reading. I want to have some assurance that in conjunction with the conscription of man-power there will also be conscription of wealth. I believe that a partial assurance has already been given, but I hope that before the third reading the Government will definitely assure us that wealth will also be conscripted.

Mr. FRANCIS N. McCREA (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, I wish to take up a little of the time of the House in expressing my view on this measure. I have been debating in my own mind for the last two or three days whether I could square a silent vote with my conscience, and I have concluded that I cannot. If I could have done so I would much rather have said nothing, because I think on matters of this kind too much time is wasted in long discussions which do not amount to very much in the end, and which certainly do not change very many votes.

Almost invariably, when we on this side of the House criticise the actions or motives of the Government we are accused of disloyalty. I think that the men who make this charge cannot really mean what they say, because on inquiry we find that practically as many Liberals have gone to the front as Conservatives. For instance, the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Power) has three sons and two sons-in-law at the front. The hon. member for Bagot (Mr.

Marcile) has two sons at the front, and there are many others that I could mention. The only son I have of military age and who is physically fit is now in France. I might mention that he is not over in England with a commission, floating around London enjoying himself, and drawing officer's pay and separation allowance. He is a private. When he got through his college term in July of last year he enlisted as a gunner in the McGill Siege Battery. He told me he had made up his mind to go to the front, and I asked him whether he was going to try for a commission. He said: "No, I don't want a commission. If I go to France I want to do some of the fighting, There are already a number of men with commissions who found no openings when they reached England unless they stepped down in rank and went over to France as privates. Many of them did not want to do that, and consequently they are now in London drawing military pay and wearing military dress, but doing nothing. For my part I want to do some of the fighting." I therefore feel at liberty to speak on this measure without being accused of disloyalty or of being a traitor to my country.

The Prime Minister of this country recently visited England. He went over, I presume, to get information, to exchange suggestions, and ascertain what the conditions were. He comes back and abruptly tells us without any notice that it is necessary to have conscription in this country, as more men and more money are required. If it be true that the voluntary system has failed, that more men are needed and cannot be got except by conscription, we will have to have conscription. Personally, I am inclined to think that the voluntary system has not been fully tried out. I do not wish to be harsh in my criticism, but I feel it my duty to criticise where criticism is due. If in any statements I shall make to-night I shall seem a little harsh or even personal, my object is not to knock the Government, but simply to give honest straightforward criticism where I think it is due.

In any large enterprise, war or anything else, where millions of men and millions of money are engaged, there is something else also required. If any hon. member of this House were engaging in a great enterprise involving millions of men and millions of money the first thing he would do would be to organize. He would get together men in whom everybody had confidence, men of ability who were willing to devote their whole energies to carrying to a successful issue the enterprise with which they were entrusted, classifying and utilizing to the best advantage all the men and money at their disposal. Is it the opinion of this House and the opinion of the country that such a combination of men as I have described is in charge of the affairs of this country? The affairs of this country should be managed just as is the business of any large corporation. Let us see whether the men in charge of the affairs of this country are competent, whether they are men of large views and long experience and absolute honest intentions, with no graft or protection for friends, but open-handed justice to all. Where a large number of men are engaged in some enterprise no partiality or favouritism should be shown. If there is, the men who are favoured are all right, but the men who think they are not favoured do not feel so well about it. This proposition to conscript the manpower of the country without conscripting its resources and wealth is not in the right direction. It is not fair to ask a young man of twenty years of age to go to the front and offer his life as a sacrifice for the protection and good of the country while the other man, who is older and therefore has had more benefit from the country, if benefits there be, makes no sacrifice at all. It is said that the married man with a family should not go to the war, and I think that is right. Yet, there is another side to that question. The man who has a wife and family of young children is more interested in the good government of the country than the young man who has no dependents to think of. Old men like myself and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) cannot go; but we must be just to those who go, and just to those who stay at home.

The Minister of Finance and the Government, in my humble judgment, have failed in their duty, not through lack of judgment, but, I am inclined to think, through lack of courage. When the war broke out in 1914 the Government should have made provision, not only of men to send overseas, but of money to pay them. They should have adopted a fiscal system to raise at least fifty per cent of the necessary funds to maintain the army at the front, especially as this country is at present, and has been for a couple of years past, immensely prosperous. The time is coming at the end of this war—and, I think, has arrived now—when more money will be needed. The minister should have imposed more taxes—I do not mean piling it all on the manufacturers as he has done, but so levying the taxes that all should pay their equal proportion. Is there any reason why every man should not pay according to his means? That principle will have to be conformed to before this war is finished and the bills met. I was talking with a financial man here in Ottawa last week, one of the first financiers of this land. He estimates that when this war is over, though he does not pretend to know when that will be, our national debt may amount to four billions of dollars, taking both our borrowings and also our liabilities in providing for invalided soldiers after they return home. When the war broke out the minister should have adopted several systems of taxation. One is the form which he has adopted, the tax on business profits. He should also have an income tax. I think that, in addition, he should have gone to the municipalities and said to them: You shall levy taxes upon the taxable property of your municipalities at such-and-such a rate; collect it with your ordinary taxes and pay it over to the Government. The minister expects to raise through new taxes about $50,000,000 a year. If he had imposed the taxes he should have imposed, he would have raised $150,000,000. I want to tell the minister that the next time he goes to the country to raise a loan of $150,000,000 or so, it is not going to be so easy as it would have been had the war expenditure been met more by taxes and less by borrowings. I think the Government lacked courage; they have simply followed the line of least resistance, realizing that taxation is always unpopular. The fact remains that taxation must be resorted to, and that it cannot all be piled up on one section of the people. The system the Government have adopted is unjust and unbusinesslike. If you doubt it, read the financial papers of this country and see what they think about it. I am not complaining of the tax on business profits, provided that all are equally affected. And when I say that there should be an income tax, without boasting at all, I think I should be affected somewhat myself. I want to be, because we owe it to our country.

Then there is the cry that recruiting has failed, especially in Quebec. Let us see if there is not a reason why the young men do not enlist in as large numbers as we think they ought to. I maintain that the Government is to a large extent responsible for it. Early in the war, when the British Government wanted munitions and the people of this country were not equipped to supply them, and did not understand the methods of production, it was necessary to pay high prices, in order to get manufacturers started in this line. But the manufacturers did undertake this line of production, and soon they were flocking here to Ottawa, spending months of time, and begging for orders,—and could not get them unless they had political influence. The Government then, instead of fixing their price as they did at nearly twice what they ought to have paid, should have called upon the several manufacturers to say how many shells of certain sizes they could provide, and at what prices and what delivery, thus putting the whole matter up to competition. Had they done this, they would have got their shells for far less money than they have paid. I know one concern that declared a dividend of 400 per cent last year. When the Government imposed their business tax of 25 per cent on profits over a certain amount the manufacturer said: I am not going to worry myself or rustle around looking for help; I will simply pay my help more instead of giving it to the Government and I will get all the men I want. The result has been that men, not mechanics or tradesmen, but common labourers, have made as high as $12 and $15 a day. The farmer cannot get help to work his farm and the ordinary manufacturer cannot get help in his shop because he cannot pay these prices. The prices of all kinds of provisions have gone up as a result of the scarcity of labour. These men that are working in munition factories and earning $10, $12 and $15 a day are not very apt to enlist at $1.10 a day to go to the front. The man who gets $10 or $12 a day eats his meals in his own home and sleeps in his own bed. Can you expect him to drop that job, to enlist voluntarily at $1.10 a day and sleep amidst the rats and mud of the trenches? That is what the Government ask him to do. The Government are responsible for the lack of enlistment in having disturbed the whole system and price of labour. The farmer, and the ordinary manufacturer, are hampered by the want of help. But the Government say that a young man should be patriotic enough to leave his job at $10 or $12 a day and go to the front for $1.10 a day. If he does not do that he is not a patriot; he is a slacker. Let us see whether there are not other slackers. When the Minister of Finance floated his last loan, did he do what they did in the United States—go to the bankers and say: We want you to handle this loan free of charge and you will not get anything out of it? No, my information is that one of the biggest banking institutions in Canada was employed to float the last Government loan and that it received a very handsome commission for doing it. The Minister of Finance did not ask this big bank to work for nothing but he thinks this young man, working in a munition factory and earning $10 or $12 a day, is a slacker, that he is not a patriot, if he does not drop his job, go to the front at $1.10 a day and sleep in the trenches and sometime not sleep at all.

When this war broke out the Minister of Militia called to the service a gentleman from Toronto—I think one of the Ellis Brothers—to assist him in buying binoculars. Giving evidence before the Public Accounts Committee, this gentleman said he had done the work entirely for patriotic purposes, that nothing would have induced him to leave his shop and come down here to superintend the buying of binoculars but pure patriotism. But, when we got the evidence we found that he had received 10 per cent on everything he bought or that was bought. Not only that, but he allowed his friends to buy binoculars here, there and everywhere, some were bought for as low as $9.75, some for $24 and $25, but by the time these binoculars reached the Government they cost $57. That is patriotism. That is the kind of patriotism that this Government and their friends appear to think is all right. For my part I do not.

I was going to enumerate a lot of the sins of commission and omission of this Government, but I do not think it is necessary. My hon. friend from Kings, P.E.I. (Mr. Hughes) described all these matters last night; they are fresh in the memory of every one in this House, and if they read Hansard they will find an array of offences committed that I think would to some extent establish the fact that this Government has not handled the business of this country economically, wisely, honestly, free from all kinds of graft and crookedness, or in such a manner that the people would have confidence in it.

I said at the outset that this war is the nation's war, and that it must be won at whatever cost if possible. I also said that one of the essentials was men, another was money, but that the third and most important essential was judgment and good management. I do not think that any business men in this country would put the amount of money or the number of men that are called for in the carrying on of this war or in carrying on the affairs of this country into the hands of men who are scrapping amongst themselves, who have no respect for one another, and who have been accusing one another of being crooks and grafters. The situation reminds me of what Robert Burns said when two ministers fell out, were quarrelling over their congregations, and were blackguarding each other, the congregation clapped their hands and said: "Neither is lying." That also brings to my mind the words of one of those old Presbyterian ministers who were always supposed to be very solemn and very earnest. He was preaching to his congregation one day when a matter of great political importance was engaging the attention of his congregation and the public generally. He said, "An honest man is the noblest work of God, but, politically speaking, I do not think He has made one for the last fifty years." I think that applies to the situation to-day.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That takes in the last Administration.

Mr. McCREA: What is that?

Mr. NICKLE: That takes in the last Administration.

Mr. McCREA: The question of recruiting, in Quebec especially, has been pretty fully dealt with by other speakers, and, therefore, I do not propose to take up the time of the House by a reference to it. It has been stated here—and I think with reason—that no honest effort has been made in that province to recruit. It would look to me rather that it was the intention of the Government, or at least the idea of the men engaged in that part of the Government's business, that they would rather have a chance to say to the people of Quebec that they were slackers and were not doing their duty. I think it has been said in this House that Sir Wilfrid Laurier did not take the part in recruiting that he should have taken. I think the hon. gentleman from Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) said that Sir Wilfrid Laurier could go down to Quebec and come back with fifty or sixty members supporting him in this House. That may be so in politics. Sir Wilfrid is getting old. He is a statesman, and not a military man. When he goes down to Quebec and appeals to the people for their support, he appeals to them as their leader. He says, "Vote for me, follow me, and I will bring you to success." As a politician he says, "Come, vote for me; follow me, I will be your leader in the election, and in the House when the election is over." But he cannot go down to Quebec, appeal to the citizens, invite them to enlist and tell them that he will lead them, not only to the seaboard, but to the other side of the Atlantic, and lead them in battle. If the Government were anxious to have recruits from Quebec, they should have sent men of military training and knowledge to that province. They should select men who would be understood by the French Canadians, and in whom they would have confidence, who would have said to them, "Enlist, and come with me. I will lead you to the battlefront and will stay with you in the battle." Such an effort has not been made. Nobody knows better than I do that the French Canadians are a law-abiding, courageous people. I have lived among them, and most of my employees have been French Canadians. If the French Canadians have confidence in a man they will follow him a good deal more closely and place more reliance on him than most Englishmen would follow their leader. But the Government did not send men of military training to Quebec to recruit. They did not give Quebec a fair and honest trial. They commenced by calling them slackers. The war had hardly commenced before Ontario was hurling insult at them about being slackers, and not enlisting. Ontario appears to be very much interested in Quebec, and it spends a lot of time and energy abusing the people of Quebec for not recruiting. I think if they had spent part of the time in trying to do justice to the minority in Ontario, by granting them the right to teach their children in their own language, instead of calling them slackers, they would have accomplished more in the direction of recruiting. It appears to me that the first duty of the Government in times of peace—and very much more so in times of war—is to endeavour, first, to create good feeling and harmony amongst all classes. Has the Government of this country endeavoured to do that? Last year a simple resolution was proposed by an hon. gentleman on this side of the House, not to coerce Ontario, not to dictate to the people what they should do, but to ask them, in all fairness and kindness, under all the circumstances, if they would not be willing to enter into a conference and have a heart to heart talk on this question, and see if they could not come together and agree? Did the Government vote for that? What would you have expected of a Government that was trying, heart and soul, to create peace and harmony among the different elements of the Dominion, especially during war time, when we have one common enemy to fight? Would it not have been wisdom on the part of the Government, if they were bent on doing justice to everybody, to have said: Well, we will invite Ontario in; we have no right to dictate to them, but we have the privilege to ask them to consider the question. They might have done that, but they didn't do it. And why did they not do it? There was nothing in the resolution; it was simply asking them if they would condescend to do so and so, and they said: No. The leader of the Government, with everybody behind him following his lead—

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Why does the hon. gentleman single out Ontario and say nothing with reference to Manitoba, where more drastic legislation was passed in reference to the schools?

Mr. McCREA: The other provinces are not refusing the French Canadian minority the right to teach their language in the schools. Ontario is the only province which refuses.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Oh no.

Mr. McCREA: Ontario refuses to have the minority taught in their own language in the public schools, and that is the reason I am talking about Ontario. Another reason is that Ontario seems to be the only province that is specially interested in Quebec. You have only to take up the Ontario papers, the Sentinel for instance, to see what they have to say. I understand the Sentinel is a paper edited in the interests of the Orangemen of Ontario. That is the paper's business. I have no objection to that, and I have all respect for any particular branch or order of people that wishes to have a paper of its own, but I think any paper of the pretensions of the Orange Sentinel would do very much better to devote its attention to talking about the order's greatness, its members' ability and their qualities, if they have any, than to spend it talking about another race and creed, as the Sentinel is generally doing.

Mr. Speaker, we have had in this House, since the House met in January, continual complaints, and continual pleadings with this Government, to do something to arrange or control the cost of living, but the Government have turned a deaf ear until lately, when they could stand it no longer, they appointed a controller. I hope he will do good work. I think that matter should have been taken in hand a long time ago. Although times are prosperous and money is plentiful, and although with a great many men, times are better than they were five years ago, still I do not think there has been a harder time for men of moderate income, with large families to provide for, than during the last year. Still, the Government could not see any way of dealing with the matter. I should like to give the Minister of Finance a little advice, though I do not wish to criticise him unduly. He will make a great mistake if he allows this session to close without bringing down a proper and full measure of taxation which will make the burden of taxation bear equally upon all classes, rich and poor, great and small, according to their means. The time has come when we have to resort to greater taxation than we ever dreamed of, and it is better to resort to this taxation now, when times are good and when men's sympathies are in favour of patriotic movements and organizations. If it would be hard to enforce a fuller measure of taxation now, it will be doubly hard to do so later, after the close of the war, for instance, when times will be harder. The only thing that the minister could find it in his heart to deal with was the price of news print paper; that unfortunately for the manufacturer, he saw fit to place at about one cent a pound less than the cost of production. His reason for taking that action was that the public press was of such immense value in the way of the enlightenment, edification and instruction of the people that it should be specially favoured. Nobody has more respect than I have for a good, honest, truthful, upright paper that states the facts as they are. But the more one reads the public press—I refer more particularly to the Government organs—during the last six weeks or more, since the agitation for conscription was started, the less informed he was as to the real facts. That seems a rather strong assertion, but if any hon. gentleman doubts its truth, all he has to do is to compare what the papers have said about what was taking place in this House with what actually did take place. I have no desire to criticise the public press unfavourably. But I do say that the people look to the public press for information, for guidance, and for plain statements of facts. During the last six weeks the Government papers have come out with brave headlines to the effect that coalition was assured; that certain members on this side of the House had consented to join a coalition government; that the leader of the Opposition had resigned, and a whole mess of other stuff. It was to enable the newspapers to engage in this kind of education and to give out this kind of information the manufacturers were compelled to furnish paper at less than cost.

I think it would have been wise if leaders of thought in Ontario had been more friendly towards the French minority in that province and had granted to them what was their just right. As an English-speaking Protestant, I should be ashamed to have it said that my own countrymen deprived their fellow men, who have just as good a right to their language as I have, of anything which was their right. They were the pioneers in this country; they were the people who saved this country to the British flag at a time when there were few Englishmen, if any, here to defend the country. I agree that enlistment has not been as great in the province of Quebec as it has been in other provinces. But we must remember that the French Canadians in the province of Quebec have had absolutely no military training. In time of peace, they had no drill halls, no military organizations. War is entirely new to them. The fact that they have not enlisted in greater numbers is not due to their being cowards or to failure to appreciate their responsibilities. The thing is new to them, and it takes time to educate people in respect to anything that is new. They have not had that education; they have not had proper persuasion; they have not had a proper appeal from their own leaders in the matter of enlistment. We had men who were capable of leading them, but these men were not sent to Quebec to carry on recruiting campaigns. Even if such men had not been available, we could have got Frenchmen from France, military men, well-trained, having a wide knowledge of warfare, whom the French Canadian would at least have been able to understand. Imagine French Canadians being placed under English officers whom they did not understand! I am not a military man, but we have had regiments in Sherbrooke. I have watched them—not in time of war—when they were out for their annual drill. Some young Frenchmen enlisted in those English regiments, and when they went astray in their drill because they could not understand certain commands given them by their English-speaking officers, instead of speaking to them kindly, the officers would talk to them in a manner that I myself would not like to express. Is that the way to appeal to French Canadians? Is that the way to make military men of them? The hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Arthurs) the other day referred to the French Canadians. I think you, Mr. Speaker, were in the Chair and heard what that hon. gentleman said. Would you, if you were the father of one of those boys—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. McCREA:—be willing to have him go to the front?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. McCREA: I ask you, do you think the mother of any French Canadian boy would like to have her son go to the front under an officer who speaks of the French race so disrespectfully as the hon. member did the other night in this House?

In order to carry on our part in this war, we require men and money. But good management is just as necessary. Having regard to the turmoil and quarrelling amongst the members of the Cabinet, I ask whether we have had the good management that is essential to the proper carrying on of the war? I say: No. What this Government should do and what it will have to do before it obtains the confidence of the people is to go to the country and find out what the people desire. If the people approve this Government as it is now constituted, I for one will be only too pleased to support it in every possible way. But at the present time, this Government cannot be expected to have the confidence of the Liberals, and I do not believe it has the confidence of the Conservatives. Many leading men have told me that they have no confidence in this Government, and I believe that is the general feeling throughout the country. In any case, what is required is men, money and a powerful combination not of politicians, but of men of strong views, with courage to enforce their views and to go about the winning of this war as they should do, instead of squandering and wasting money like water as this Government has done so far in this war. There has been waste and extravagant expenditure of money in every direction. At this time you have to appeal to the people of this country for more money and to impose further taxes, and if you show them you are going to spend that money honestly, uprightly and fairly, you will have the confidence of the people, but you cannot obtain it in any other way. When the business affairs of the country are going along in a normal way people do not take very much notice, but when you touch their pockets and you call upon them to pay out their money by direct taxation, you cannot squander their money; you cannot fool the people; you must spend the money rightly and properly. That in my judgment, is what should be done. I am sorry to have to criticise, but I think the case demands criticism. This is a time when we need men and money, but we also need business-like management, and that it what we do not have at the present time.

Mr. DUNCAN C. ROSS (West Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, the measure now before this House has, as it should, aroused the intense interest of the people of this country, and I feel I would be failing in my duty to the Riding I have the honour to represent if I gave a silent vote on such an important question. I shall endeavour, as was suggested by the Prime Minister, to make my remarks as short as I can in conformity with my duty, and I shall also, I hope, maintain the high tone which has characterized this debate since its beginning.

In the first place I am in favour of the principle embodied in this Bill and of giving this Government or its successor, —preferably the latter—the power asked for in this Bill. My reasons amongst others for doing so are these: As I understand this measure, it is not conferring upon this Government, nor would it confer upon any other Government greater power to compel military service than it has under the existing Militia Act. As a matter of fact, this measure limits those powers in some respects, while in others it extends them in a more reasonable and more profitable way than is provided for in the Militia Act, in that this measure gives the Government power to mobilize the man-power of the country, not entirely for military purposes, but for military, commercial, industrial and agricultural purposes.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Will the hon. member be good enough to point out where in the Bill that appears? I can find no such provision.

Mr. ROSS: If my hon. friend from St. John will permit me to proceed with my remarks, if he requires any enlightenment —and I do not think he does—I shall endeavour to give it to him. In order to make my position clear to the hon. member for St. John and to the other members, it will be necessary for me to some extent to place before the House the provisions of the present Militia Act, as I understand them, and to contrast those provisions with the provisions submitted in this measure. As I understand it, the Militia Act, chap. 41 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, gives the Government of the day—whatever Government, Liberal or Conservative, it may be—power under certain circumstances to enroll every man in Canada and power also in case of an emergency war to enroll every man between the ages of eighteen and sixty for the purpose of defending Canada in or beyond Canada. What does that mean? It means that this Government, to-day or to-morrow, if this Bill were defeated, could enroll every man from eighteen to sixty years of age and compel him to fight in this struggle for the liberty and civilization of the world. It means that if the Government of the day thought that 200,000 men were required for that struggle, it could enroll them and compel them to fight. There are other provisions in the Militia Act which, to my mind, are quite insufficient to meet the situation to-day. The Militia Act is an anachronism in the situation that confronts this country and the whole world in this great world-war. There are practically no exceptions of any material kind specified in the Militia Act. There are a few exemptions such as ministers of the Crown, deputy ministers, telegraphers, men engaged in transportation, preachers, and, I think, priests, pilots, the only son of a widowed mother who is dependent on him for her support, judges and those who from conscientious religious belief do not believe in war. But throughout the whole Act there is nothing to say that the man who may be as useful in Canada as he would be at the front, and perhaps more so, may be exempted, so that the Militia Act is not suitable for enforcement in this country under present conditions. How does the measure under discussion limit the power of the Government? Under it the Government cannot send to the front men of eighteen years of age; they can send only men twenty years old and upwards; they can not send to the front men between forty-five and sixty years of age; they can send only men up to forty-five years of age. The Government are limited under this measure to enroll 100,000 men for service abroad. In all these respects the measure is placing strong and, I think, proper limitations upon the power of this Government or of any other Government.

There are other features of the Militia Act which do not appeal to me, to which, in my judgment, the present Bill is preferable.

How would the Militia Act be enforced? What would happen is this, and I leave it to the judgment of the House whether I am correct or not. The men are divided into four classes: Unmarried men and widowers without children from 18 to 30 years of age, and the same from 30 to 40 years of age; married men from 18 to 45, and men from 45 to 60. If this Government intended to enforce the Act, and it has power to do so to-morrow, what would happen? These men would be enrolled by proclamation. Taking a township in my own county as an illustration, this is what would happen in Caradoc, a good Scotch township, loyal to the core, if the first two classes were called. The names of the men would be put in some bag or box—that has been done in the past, at any rate—and a recruiting officer or soldier appointed by the Government would pick out names from the box until the required number of men from that township was drafted. We can easily see what might happen. The man who would be most useful on the farm might be sent to fight, and the man who would be most useful at the front might be left on the farm. Other things might creep in, as they have been known to creep in in the past. When the last draft took place, I was told by the son of a man who had been drafted himself that in one township in my county, by some skilful manipulation—I do not know how it was done—every man who was drafted to fight the battles of Canada at that time was a Grit. He told me how he thought it happened. He thought there were two sections in the box, one for Liberals and one for Conservatives, and in drawing out the names the officer in charge went to the section in which all the Liberal names were put, and consequently only Liberals were chosen to fight the battles of their country. I say it is unsafe to put that power in the hands of any Government. Governments are not more honest to-day probably than they were then, and the same thing might happen to-day. I am opposed to entrusting any Government with such power as that.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: You are doing worse in this Bill.

Mr. ROSS: I am not going to do worse if I can help it. I shall try and see that this Act is amended or clarified so that no injustice will be done to any man, whatever his creed, race or colour or political faith may be. I understand from what the Prime Minister said in the House that he is quite willing to listen to any suggestions along these lines.

I will tell you what might happen under the Militia Act. A man might have six sons and 100 acres of land. When the ballot was taken those six sons might all be chosen. This man's neighbour, with a farm of 300 acres might have only one son, and he might be chosen to fight the battles of his country. What would become of that man's farm, and what would become of production at this time when the need for production is so great? But if this Military Service Act is honestly administered, if there are thrown around it the proper safeguards which we upon this side of the House, at any rate, will insist upon, there is no reason why it should not work out infinitely better than the Act at present on our statute book. Although the Military Service Act is a separate statute I regard it entirely as an amendment to the Militia Act, because it states in one of its clauses that it shall be read in conjunction with the Militia Act. Consequently, everything in the Militia Act that is inconsistent with the terms of the present Act, is by that clause in effect repealed.

There are several things in this proposed Act which do not appeal to me, and they are basic principles to some extent; at any rate, they are basic principles at this time. In the first place the Bill applies to men of 20 years of age. I do not think that is fair; I do not think it is a right principle to follow. If a man of 18 or 20 years wishes to enlist, that is all very well; he is the keeper of his own liberty, if I might put it that way, and has the right to volunteer in the service of his country. But it is another matter when you compel a man of that age to go and fight the battles of his country. A man of 20 has not got the franchise, he has not the responsibilities or benefits of citizenship in that respect; he cannot say anything in regard to this Act. In view of that, I do not think it is fair that a man over 21 should by his vote cast upon him the responsibility of serving his country in a foreign land. I say in all earnestness to the Prime Minister that the Bill should be amended so as not to include men under 21 years of age. That seems to me a fair thing to do. It is the principle that has been adopted in the United States, and I think it should appeal to every hon. member of this House.

Mr. PROULX: Would the hon. member give the privilege of voting upon this measure to the man of 21?

Mr. ROSS: If the measure is submitted to the people, the hon. member's question is meaningless.

Mr. PROULX: Would the hon. member submit it to the people?

Mr. ROSS: That is for the House to determine. There is another thing in this Bill which does not suit me, and it goes to the very root of the principles we are considering on this second reading. We have been told by the Solicitor General that this Act is going to fall more lightly on the province of Quebec than on any other province. He said as a matter of fact that the Bill was designed and planned to do no injustice to Quebec. That is perfectly right; no injustice should be done to any province. As a reason why this Act would fall more lightly on the province of Quebec he intimated that the people of that province were largely engaged in farming and their men married very young. He commended the latter practice, and I think his commendation was quite right. I think if the other provinces would follow the example of Quebec in that regard we should have a better country. That is just an intimation of what should be in this Act. The Solicitor General may say that we may take his intimation in that respect. I do not want to go into ancient history, but members of this Government have in times past made intimations which never materialized in regard to other things.

The Solicitor General may say that the regulations made under the Act will provide that the farmers shall be exempt from combatant military service. I think that the less we have of regulations in this Act the less of directions under its terms, and the more of concrete principles embodied in the sections of the Act itself, the better the people will be satisfied. Administrative officials are very human, whether appointed by this Government or by any other. They are influenced by local considerations, they are influenced by their own ideas, and I contend that the Government and the Solicitor General, who is sponsor for the Bill, if sincere, should put a clause into the Act to provide that every man bona fide engaged, on the eleventh of June, 1917, in the production of food on the farms of Canada shall be exempt from combatant military service.

I make that suggestion after careful consideration. I am not trying to exempt the farmers from their duty in the battle line—they would not thank me if I did. The farmers of Middlesex county would not, at any rate, for they have given as many of their sons to this struggle as any other community, rural or urban. Only within the last few days two farm boys and one town boy from my county gave up their lives at Vimy Ridge that liberty might prevail in the world. I am not trying to shield my farmers from their duty—and, as I have said, they would not thank me if I did—but there are other considerations which impel me to make this suggestion. We are fighting two wars in this great struggle. One is on the battle line in Europe, a war of men. Our sons there are bleeding and dying for this country, and we need to give them all the support they require, and we intend to do it. The other battle is a battle of production. We are fighting that battle in Canada and throughout America, and unless we are just as sincere and as forceful in that fight as are the boys at the front in the fight they carry on we are going to fail in the struggle. I shall not go into the details of my reason for saying this, but I do not say it on my own initiative. We have the words of Mr. Balfour on this subject. He told us, when he came to Washington, that the supplying of foodstuffs is as important as the supplying of men, and that he was looking to this continent for the means to feed the Allies.

We have the word of Lloyd George to the same effect. We have the word of the President of the Board of Agriculutre of Great Britain, Mr. Prothero, who said a day or two ago that "the outcome of this war may ultimately hang on food production." These men are all witnesses to the fact that food production is one of the most important factors in the successful carrying on of the war. How do we find the situation in this country? How is it in my province of Ontario, or, to be more precise, how is it in the county of Middlesex? I am informed by a representative of one of the railway corporations, a concern which keeps track of the labour situation throughout the land, that to-day in the province of Ontario there is a greater shortage of labour by thirty per cent than in the western part of Canada. Why? The men who worked on the farms in Ontario before the war commenced were largely British born, and, all honour to them, when the call of duty came they went to the trenches to fight England's battles. Many of our own Canadian farm boys did the same. Others, persuaded by the larger remuneration of munition factories, went to those factories. The result is that to-day in my county the men of the farm are struggling as they never struggled in their lives before to put in their crops and get them off. There never was a time in the history of Ontario when there was such a shortage of farm labour. That is one reason why I say that, if we are to win this struggle, we must put an express exemption in this Bill that no man bona fide engaged in agricultural industry shall be sent to combatant military duty.

Mr. LALOR: Would the hon. gentleman apply that only to farmers' sons, or would he apply it to any man working on a farm?

Mr. ROSS: My idea would be to confine it to the men necessary to work the farm. For instance, I would not think it right, if there were six men working a hundred acres, to leave them all there. But that is a little aside from the point, because under the working out of this Bill as I think it should be worked out, the farm labour of the country would be mobilized by the Government; and if there were six men working a hundred acres the Government would have the power, not to take these men for combatant service, but rather to send those who could be spared to other parts of the country where farmers are needed to sow and reap the crop. I do not think that any farmer could object to that, and that it is fair. I think my suggestion most important, and I trust it will receive the sympathetic attention of the Prime Minister.

But this Bill, in my opinion, is to be found fault with, not so much for what it contains as for what it does not contain. I shall not repeat arguments so ably made by my hon. friend from Sherbrooke (Mr. McCrea) and my hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham), but I do say that this Government, when they are conscripting the young men of this country, should be honest with the people and provide for equality of sacrifice in this great struggle and, as these hon. members have urged, should take immediate steps to conscript the wealth of this land. It has been said that this is a very nebulous proposition, that it is hard to define what "the conscription of wealth" means. It did not seem hard to define it in Great Britain where men are paying thirty and forty per cent on their incomes. The United States did not find any insuperable difficulty in this matter, for though they have been in the war only three months, they have taken steps to carry the conscription of wealth into effect. It has been said also that such a provision could not be put into this Bill because it is not a cognate subject with the conscription of men, and also because you would have to get the consent of the Governor General, as it involves the imposition of taxes upon the people. It seems to me that that is a simple evasion of the point at issue. If the Government has the courage it should have, and is really desirous of providing for equality of service; if the Minister of Finance is as anxious to win the war as he says he is—and I am sure he is—and is anxious to distribute the burden of war in a way that shall be equitable to all the people he and the Government will take immediate steps to introduce a measure for the conscription of wealth.

It is not I alone who am asking this. All the people of this country cannot be wrong. The labour organizations who represent a great body of thinking people in this land, and who have a right to be heard, demand that this thing be done. The assemblies of all the churches in this country that have met recently say that as a condition precedent to the conscription of men, it is only fair that wealthy men should be obliged to pay their share of the winning of this war. It is a simple proposition and it is easy to define.

I think my hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) well defined what could be done in this regard. I think the people of Canada should sacrifice as much as the people of Great Britain for they have just as much at stake. I think they should sacrifice as much as the people of the United States for they have just as much at stake. The wealthy should be made to pay their share just as the poor man is made to give his son. We all know the situation in this country. The wealthy are not the people who have large families. The wealthy people who have sons in Toronto and other cities have done well in this matter, they have sent their sons voluntarily and gladly to fight our battles but that does not alter the fact that it is the artisan, the mechanics and the plain people who have large families and it is they who will have to fight this battle and it is through their suffering and agony that it will be won. I could take the Minister of Finance, if he would come with me, to Toronto and Montreal and I think I could find for him 500 or 1,000 men in each of these cities who have more money than they know what to do with and who have no boys at the front. It is only fair that they should be made to pay for the support of the wives, mothers and dependents of those boys who are protecting their property at the risk of their lives.

How could this be done? I would suggest a very heavy income tax. We all know that in the cities and towns of Ontario they have had a municipal income tax which has practically been a dead letter. For the purpose of winning this war every man in every town who has an income up to $3,000 should be exempt, but above that amount and up to $10,000, he should pay ten per cent to the Government of the country. From $10,000 to $20,000, he should pay twenty per cent and you could go up on a sliding scale. In every city a man might be exempt up to $5,000, between $5,000 and $10,000 he might pay ten per cent, between $10,000 and $20,000 twenty per cent and as the amount of the income increases the percentage should increase. I also contend that it is high time this Government took action in regard to the way the people of this land, particularly the poor, are being oppressed by profiteers who flourish almost under the protection of this Government. We are lagging; we are behind the times. We are behind what they have done in Great Britain and we are not doing our duty. Why in the world should the wife of a soldier fighting at the front pay more for her bacon, flour, potatoes, bread and everything else she uses in her household than a woman in Great Britain? In this great, rich producing country why should that be and why should this Government allow it? I would say that as a measure of the conscription of wealth in this country the Government should immediately take over and control all the meat-packing and pork-packing institutions, all the cold storage plants, all the munition factories and all the flour mills. They should be fair to these men. They should find out what their investment is, they should pay them a fair rate of interest in their investment and whatever is made out of these ventures should be used in the interest of Canada and of the Empire in this war. I have been told by a gentleman who came from Toronto that he saw in that city 200 cords of green bacon stored in cellars. The same gentleman saw in Toronto 100,000 hides that were being held in order that the shoe manufacturers could sell shoes at the exorbitant prices at which they are selling to the people of this land to-day. Fifty-five cents per pound of bacon! A man cannot buy a decent pair of shoes for himself for less than $8 or $9 or for his wife for less than $10 or $12. These are important matters that should be taken in hand by this Government. It has been done in England and surely this Government has as much ingenuity and force as the British Government. I have a clipping here containing some remarks made by Lloyd George only a few days ago. This is what he said:

The second condition which the country was entitled to ask from the Government, the Premier continued, was that it should not permit the burdens of the country to be increased by what was called profiteering, as distinguished from profit. Profiteering was unfair in peace; in war it was an outrage. This was why the Government had taken action to restrict profits and proposed to deal very drastically with unfair profiteering in food.

I contend that that is the ideal that the Government here should aspire to achieve. The plain people are not going to be content any longer with the mere promise of an income tax a year hence. They are not going to be content with the mere appointment of a food controller; they demand action, they are entitled to it and I hope they will get it. In so far as the Bill is concerned and the principles thereof, that is about all I have to say.

In regard to the referendum proposed by my honoured leader, I am of the opinion that wartime is not the best time to submit a question of this kind to the people. I am also of the opinion that it would be practically impossible to secure the votes of the soldiers on such a measure, and I am unable to support it on the second reading of this Bill. In my humble judgment, the soldiers are more entitled to express their views in regard to it than many who are at home. Some may say that the member for West Middlesex is deserting his leader and his party. But in the Liberal party a difference of opinion on a temporary policy is not a desertion. The question of voluntary or compulsory service has never been an issue in Canada dividing the leaders or the two great parties from each other. The matter has never before arisen and I pray God it may never have to arise again.

My honoured leader recognizes the principles of the party he has so nobly led in the interests of Canada and instead of trying to pursuade his followers to his view on this matter, he has said privately, and publicly in this House, that each of them should make up his own mind as he sees the right. I honour him the more for that and therefore more closely adhere to him as leader and as the exponent of the great permanent principles of Liberalism. His leadership along these lines has proven an enduring benefit and inspiration to this country, on account of the courage, sincerity and lofty patriotism it has always breathed. Recent references have been made to him and his countrymen by hon. members of this House. My leader has been designated as the "Lamb of Quebec" and it has been hinted that his policy in this case is to win elections and not to win the war.

[Mr. Ross.]

Mr. Speaker, I resent the designation and I repudiate the motives assigned to my honoured leader by the hon. member who made them. "The Lamb of Quebec"—The only application this designation has to my honoured leader is in the fact that, while for forty-five years he has been in the public service of this country, and the white light of publicity that beats upon greatness has been upon him, no one dared charge that his public and private life have not been as white as wool. "The Lamb of Quebec," rather Mr. Speaker, "The Lion of Quebec"—of Canada—and one of the great lions of the Empire. Was my honoured leader a lamb in 1896, when he fought his own people, in order that provincial rights might be established in Manitoba? Was he the lamb of Quebec when, at the Imperial Conference in England, he stood up and fought for Canadian autonomy in the face of the most strenuous opposition from Imperial and Colonial statesmen, whose judgments were dazzled by sentimental visions of false Imperialism which would not have stood the shock of this world war in the splendid manner the present union of affection has done? Was he the lamb of Quebec in 1911, when he had opposed to him all that conglomeration of wealthy, selfish, self-seeking interests and prejudices and in addition many of his compatriots on account of his loyalty to Britain, and stood up for a Canadian navy and for a fair deal for the people of Canada? No, Mr. Speaker, his attitude as a Canadian has ever been leonine and his conduct lion-hearted. Epigrams are not always arguments. Sarcasm is not always logic. If the hon. members I have mentioned truly desire to know the place my honoured leader holds in the history of this country, I would commend them to his life written by Sir John Willison, a man who has probably done more in the last ten years, except Bourassa and Lavergne, to rend this country asunder than any man in Canada, and for which dis-service he must have been knighted by the present Government, because he has rendered no service to Canada that I have been able to discover. Let them read that life. They should believe what its author says; the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) has been preaching its author's doctrine ever since I entered this House. And, if in times of peace there ever was in any country a greater romance—no, not a romance, but an epic than that of the struggle of my honoured leader and his Liberal friends for civil liberty in Quebec, and for unity and harmony in this great country, I have yet to read it.

Mr. Speaker, this is no time for politics and personalities. I might say, as the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) said of my leader, that the leader of the Government intended to use this Bill to win an election. There are clauses in this Bill which I regard as absolutely unnecessary and redundant, and which might lead one to that conclusion. I have heard that suggested, but I do not think it will assist in the discussion of the Bill to make such suggestions. I might find fault with the Prime Minister of this country because he promised in January, 1916, 500,000 Canadian boys to fight the battles of Britain, I may say, Mr. Speaker, that that rather flavoured of Czarism, that it might be all right in Russia, but in a free country, when Parliament was about to be assembled, it was not the proper thing to do, but that would not assist in the solution of the situation. I might go further along that line and say that the mal-administration of this Government has led to this situation, but I do not intend to do so.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The hon. gentleman came mighty close to saying it.

Mr. ROSS: I might say many other things. Members on the other side of the Chamber have said many bitter things, which I think were entirely uncalled for and unnecessary, and will not help the situation in the least degree. All the wrong in this matter does not come from the province of Quebec. Ontario is somewhat at fault also, but I do not know that it assists in any way to stir up these old bitternesses. For my part, I am quite ready to let the dead past bury its dead. This is no time for personalities or for politics. The nations are having the greatest struggle for liberty which has ever occurred in the world. In the past there have been struggles which inspired the poet, the bards, and the historians of almost every nation. They inspire us to-day. No man can read of the immortal heroism of the Greek people, when they were fighting against the domination and cruelty of Turkey, without having their heart's chords touched. No man can read of the heroic struggle of Poland against her inhuman adversary, or of the downfall of Warsaw and the death of Kosciusko, and the death of Polish freedom, without having his blood run more quickly through his veins. No Scotchman in Canada can read of Wallace or Bruce of Bannockburn, and the struggle of the Scotchmen for their liberties, without being proud of his country and countrymen. But the Canadian people are engaged in a much greater struggle. The struggle of the small countries for their liberties might be said to be the mere glimmer of a firefly as compared with the dazzling light of the noon day sun, in comparison with the great struggle the Canadian people are engaged in to-day. Scotland was a poor country. Her soil was poor. It was not timber nor agricultural land, but the people were fighting for what was dearer to them than their country or their lives. They were fighting for their liberty, and I say that their descendants in this country, and the descendants of all the British races, are not, at this stage of the war, going back on the heroic inclinations and the heroic traditions of their ancestors, and are not going to refuse to assist the Canadian boys who are at the front to-day, fighting the battles of civilization.

When I say I am in favour of the principles of this Bill, I mean it, but I do not think at this time it would be wise for this Government, nor would it be wise for any other Government, to immediately put this measure in force. I do not know what the Government is going to do. It will not tell us. I do not know why we have not been informed of their intention. The Parliamentary Secretary of the Militia Department told us the other night he thought it should be put in force immediately. I do not think the Prime Minister intended to put it in force immediately, because he made an offer of coalition to my honoured leader, and an election was to be held in regard to this measure, so that he could not have intended to put it into force immediately. I do not think the Government really know what they intend to do. The reading of the Bill would lead one to think they did not know themselves, because, if they intended to put it in force immediately, they would not provide that it should only go into effect by Order in Council. However, my opinion is that voluntary recruiting in this country has done wonderful things. I do not think it has fallen down. I do not think any country in the world, situated as we are, could have done better than the Canadian people have done. I think more good can be done yet under the voluntary system, and the men we require to reinforce our boys can yet be procured by that system.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Hear, hear.

Mr. ROSS: I agree with the member for West Lambton (Mr. Pardee) in that regard, and for my own part, although I approve of the principles of this Bill, I cannot too strongly impress on the Government the advisability of not putting it in force at the present time. I would suggest that all the members of this House get together, as true Canadians desirous of winning this war, and commence one of the grandest and most enthusiastic propagandas in favour of recruiting that could be undertaken, and I hope and believe that by that means we will be able to fill up the ranks.

I do that for two reasons. We have the honour of having volunteers, freemen, in France. I would like to see Canada retain that proud honour. I would like to have it said that while France, England, Germany, Italy, Serbia have conscripted men for military service, Canada has had the proud distinction of sending an army of voluntary freemen to fight in this great struggle. That is the first reason. The second is this: I think that that is the best way of maintaining in this great crisis harmony and peace among our people. Nothing is more desirable than that at the present time.

I have stated some of the reasons that impel me to vote for the second reading of this measure. There are others. The Prime Minister has returned from England, from the heart of this great war, having had conferences with the statesmen of the whole Empire. He has informed the House and the people of Canada that there is a pressing need for reinforcement of the Canadian forces at the front, that the need is, indeed, very pressing and that without reinforcements our Canadian soldiers will not receive from their fellow countrymen the support that they have the right to expect and obtain. Mr. Speaker, I am not bold enough to say that the Prime Minister is wrong; that is one reason why I support this measure.

Again, a message from a son of my own county, Sir Arthur Currie, an intimate friend of my own, has recently been conveyed to the Canadian people. Sir Arthur Currie is a man who sprang from the plain people of this land, from whom have come so many of our great men. He was born almost within sight of the birthplace of his great fellow countryman, Edward Blake. He is not one of those Canadians who have had knighthood thrust upon them on account of fictitious political services; he is one of those who have achieved greatness and who have deserved it. I know the Irish-Scotch stock from which he springs. I know his people. I know his integrity. I have faith in his judgment and his patriotism. I believe that no man in Canada is better able to tell us what the needs of the Canadian force at the front are to-day. He has made an appeal to the men of Canada and to the men of Middlesex, and I, as his neighbour and friend, and as one born in the same county, do say that the people of that county would condemn me, and properly so, if I did not listen to that appeal. He knows that Canada and Canada's sons are fighting, and have fought most nobly, the battles of liberty and of civilization. He knows the strength of the enemy; he knows their determination; he knows the needs of the hour, I base my decision largely upon the faith that I have in him and upon the faith that I believe every man in this country places in him. I would not, Mr. Speaker, be following the advice which his aged mother gave him when he left his home in Middlesex if I did not do as I am doing. Her advice to all her children, as I saw it reported in one of the daily papers, was "Be honest to yourself." In simple language, this proud mother quoted Shakespeare, who said:

> To thine own self be true;
> And it must follow, as the night the day,
> Thou canst not then be false to any man.

For this and other reasons, Mr. Speaker, I feel that I would not be true to myself, to my country, or to the cause for which the world is struggling, did I not by voting for this measure endeavour to send to the Canadians at the front such support as will enable them to gain victory for Canadian arms and liberty for the world.

For Canada these are fateful and critical times. On the momentous decisions of the hour hangs the fate, not of the Canadian battlefront only, but of our country in the days to come. It is a time for calm, reflective judgment, not for noisy agitation. Canada's leaders and Canada's people hold the future in their keeping. They have inherited proud traditions and priceless liberties. Sad, indeed, will be Canada's fate if, in this day of testing, her people fail. But Canada will not fail. Democracy has unsheathed the sword and will not turn back until its enemies are completely destroyed.

Mr. R. E. TRUAX (South Bruce): Mr. Speaker, this is one of the most important matters that has been considered by this House since Confederation. It affects the whole of the Canadian people, and for that reason will have to be very carefully considered.

When I was home about ten days ago, I was asked what had become of about 75,000 of the men who had enlisted in Canada. There are many rural mail delivery routes in Ontario; practically all the farmers take the daily papers and read them carefully. On January 22 the Prime Minister stated that we had enlisted up to that time 413,279 volunteers. He said that, in addition, 5,000 French reservists, 7,500 Russians and 5,000 Italians had gone overseas from Canada, making a total of 434,500. The Minister of Militia stated a couple of weeks ago in answer to a question that 312,503 men of all ranks had crossed the ocean and that 25,475 were drilling in Canada. According to those figures, 75,000 men who enlisted are missing, not accounted for. I think that the Government ought to give a fuller explanation of this matter than has already been given, because the people cannot understand the cause of the discrepancy.

A good deal has been said about voluntary enlistment. Since August 4, 1914, nearly 2,400 volunteers have left the county of Bruce for the front. About 800 of these went with the first and second contingents and the remainder trained with the 71st Battalion of Galt. On October 15, 1915, permission was given for the raising of a battalion in the county of Bruce. A commanding officer was selected and sent out by the Minister of Militia. He took charge of the work and carried it on actively; the citizens co-operated with him; public meetings were held in every town, village and hamlet throughout the county. In many township halls meetings were held in which the county judge took a very prominent part. The result was that after three months' work a battalion of 1,350 men was organized. In fact, the enlistment of the battalion was completed by the 1st of February. The Government gave no assistance to that work. The Minister of Militia did not visit the county. If a by-election had been taking place in the county, we would have had a visit from the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) and the Solicitor-General (Hon. Arthur Meighen); they usually pay the county a visit on such occasions. Not a dollar was given by the Government to assist the work of recruiting there, nor did any of the cabinet ministers come into the county to lend their aid.

The sources from which we may be enabled to get men for military service do not appear to me to be extraordinarily large. The following is a statement of the number of men, single, married, and widowed, of the various classes mentioned in the Military Service Bill, who were in Canada in 1911:

Class.	Age.	Number of men.
1 and 4	20-23	306,674
2 and 5	24-28	386,147
3 and 6	29-34	373,867
7 and 8	35-41	355,010
9 and 10	42-45	161,751
Total		1,584,449

In classes 1, 2, 4 and 5, ages 20 to 29, the proportion of single men to married men is: single men, 521,932; married men, 224,771. In classes 3, 6, 7, 8, 9 and 10, ages 30 to 45, the estimated number is 837,746, in the proportion of 5 married men to 2 single men. The male population of Canada of all ages over twenty-one years is 2,197,746, viz., British-born, 1,851,223; foreign-born, 346,523. Of the British-born population, 78 per cent is native Canadian and 22 per cent from Great Britain. Of the foreign-born population, only 39 per cent is naturalized.

In estimating the population now available for conscription, the following facts and figures must be borne in mind:—

1. Number already enlisted, 411,000.

2. Essential occupations cannot be drawn upon except to a limited extent.

(a) Agriculture—The rural population, which is mostly engaged in agriculture, is more than one-half of the total, 3,924,394 rural to 3,280,444 urban.

(b) Transportation—including railways, lakes, canals, teaming, cartage.

(c) Mining, lumbering and fisheries.

Nearly all those engaged in the above occupations are adult males. The Canada Year Book, 1915, gives the following figures: Total industrial workers, 2,723,634. In agriculture, 933,735; in transportation, 217,544; in mining, 62,767; in forestry, 42,914; in fishing, etc., 34,812. Total, 1,291,772, or nearly one-half of the total workers. To this must be added the male adult population necessarily working on munitions.

3. The daily rejections by the medical authorities prove that a very large percentage is physically unfit; too small in height, narrow chested, afflicted with bad eye-sight, or suffering from infirmities.

4. The French Canadian population is two-sevenths of the Canadian total, that is, 2,054,890. It is largely occupied in agriculture and lumbering, much more so than the population of Ontario, and the total number of French Canadians enlisted is only 14,000.

5. One-fourteenth part of Canada's population is of enemy origin: Germany, Austria-Hungary and Bulgaria, to the number of 528,298. Therefore, it will be seen that when conscription comes into force we shall not have a very large number of men to draw from.

As to recruiting in the county of Bruce, in one township of 2,800 people, 150 have voluntarily enlisted. I take this from the number of enlistments given weekly in a weekly paper published in the township. Six of these men have been killed at the front and one has died of wounds. If the same energy in recruiting had been displayed in other counties in Ontario, that province alone would have brought forth every volunteer the Premier has asked for, not to speak of the western provinces and the eastern provinces. I have nothing to say in reference to recruiting in Quebec. The people in that province are perfectly competent to take care of that matter.

We must be careful not to draw away all the help from the farmers. I notice this article in to-day's Citizen in regard to this matter:

> The Organization of Resources Committee is putting forth special effort to secure competent help to assist farmers in the Ottawa Valley district, who cannot get help locally, for haying and harvesting operations. The plan is to secure able-bodied men chiefly from the manufacturing centres, who by special arrangements with their employers, are permitted to go to the farmers' assistance for a period of three weeks. Two three-week periods are being arranged for, one to begin on July 16 and the other on August 6.
> Farmers desiring this special help should write at once to the office of the honourary secretary, Mr. L. H. Newman, Canadian Building, Ottawa. The suggested minimum wage for these men is the military wage of $1.10 per day, but the farmer is expected to pay for services rendered.

I believe that before the Bill is put into force, every effort should be made to secure voluntary enlistments, and the greatest effort that was ever put forth by the people of Canada should be in the interests of voluntary enlistment. I think the whole energies of the loyal British people of Canada should be put into force to encourage enlisting. In my opinion selected conscription should not be put in force until the volunteer enlisting has completely failed.

We are asking the farmer to produce. Great care must be taken not to rob the farmers of the help they will require to take off their hay and harvest. It looks at the present time as if Ontario would have a very large crop, and as a great number from the rural sections have already enlisted, it has left the farmers very short of help. We have been asking and urging them to increase food production and at the same time their help has been leaving them. The farmers have made a special effort this year to put in as large a crop as possible. This has been caused largely by the increased prices, and the great call for food production has stimulated them to a greater degree than anything else could. The three Prairie Provinces to the west of us are apparently going to have a fairly large crop. In former years they have drawn from Ontario ten to fifteen thousand of our young men to help in the harvest field. A certain number of these young men have gone West, and have stayed in those provinces until November to help with the threshing and fall ploughing. Some of them take up land and remain there. It must be kept in mind that the West has received in the last thirty years from the province of Ontario a very large immigration, which has steadily, year after year, drained the young men from the older part of Canada. Many of them have taken up land in the West and have become well-to-do farmers.

Many of the wood-working establishments in Ontario are very short of help, and if conscription is put into force, it no doubt will take many young men and farm labourers away from the farmers, and it will also take a large number of young men from the factories, which they can ill afford to spare.

The cost of living during the last two years has increased in many cases nearly fifty per cent. It is true that wages have advanced in a great many cases, but not in proportion to the increased cost of living. In many cases some lines of manufacturers could employ a third more men than they are doing now. The very best of our young men have enlisted and gone to the front. In many cases the best mechanics that we have in the province have gone, and this has left the manufacturers short of skilled help. It is true that the munition factories are paying very high wages, more than factories manufacturing other lines of goods can afford to pay, and so well they might, as I notice that twenty-two of these Canadian firms paid last year $5,297,279 in excess profit taxes. This great sum was only 25 per cent of their profits in excess of 7 per cent. This would show that each of these twenty-two firms, after paying the Government this large amount, had each of them nearly three-quarters of a million dollars of profit over and above their 7 per cent.

I have no objection to those firms making good fair profits, but I think the amount that they are making is exorbitant, and unfair to our soldier boys who are standing up in the firing line for $1.10 a day. I think it is unfair to pay munition workers $5 and $7 a day when we are asking the flower of Canada, the finest young men we have, to stand up in the firing line for $1.10 a day. The Government should increase the pay of our soldiers materially, say from $2.50 to $3 per day, and for this purpose they should conscript the wealth of this country as well as our man power.

I am in favour of the principle of conscription. I am not in favour of the present Bill. I shall vote for the referendum.

Mr. JAMES S. DOUGLAS (Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put before the House the reasons for the vote which I shall cast to-night on this Bill. The whole object of the present Bill is to enlist fighting men for the front, and the question arises—and it is a legitimate question—which is the better method of getting these men, whether by voluntary enlistment, or by the principle of conscription as embodied in this Bill? I have seen something of the methods employed in enlisting men in this country, particularly in western Canada, and I have had something to do with it. So far as the province from which I come is concerned, I am forced to the conclusion that we can raise no more men by voluntary enlistment. I do not know that the Government has conducted the voluntary system as it might have done. In fact, I am inclined to think a great many errors have been made. The system of enlisting men when the war first broke out was, in my judgment, absolutely unbusinesslike, and not carried out according to the plan which had been laid down by the Militia Department prior to the outbreak of war. It was the enthusiasm of the people that was entirely responsible for the splendid response which was made to the call to arms on the 4th of August, 1914.

One of the chief reasons why voluntary recruiting has fallen into disrepute in western Canada at least, has been the extreme partisanship which has been shown in the conduct of every phase of voluntary enlistment in that part of the country. I question very much if there is a province in the whole Dominion with the possible exception of British Columbia, which has responded so nobly and given so freely of her men as the province of Alberta. The city of Edmonton, from which I come, has sent over ten or eleven battalions to the front, and I know from my own experience that partisanship has entered into the appointment not only of senior officers but junior officers as well. In spite of this, however, enlistment has been keen. Men have given up their employment, no matter what it was, and have answered their country's call. I am not prepared to say that the Militia Department is entirely responsible for this partisanship. Unfortunately, under our system of government, party patronage is governed by the recommendations of local committees, and the minister who can resist appeals made to him on behalf of political friends must be a very strong minded man indeed. I do not think, in our province at least, that the Militia Department has shown the proper strength of mind in resisting political influence in appointments in connection with the tremendous war in which we are now engaged. If ever there was a time and occasion when partisanship should have been cast to the winds it was by the Militia Department during this war. I believe that if this Bill is properly administered we may escape from a certain amount of political partisanship.

Another reason why I think voluntary enlistment has failed in western Canada is because of the campaign in connection with National Service. I had the pleasure of hearing both the Prime Minister and the Director General in the city of Edmonton and the city of Calgary. I listened very attentively to what they said and I think I am within the mark when I say that neither of these gentlemen made one appeal for recruits. The whole appeal made in connection with this propaganda was the need for men registering so that the Government would know who were available if at some future date it should decide to call upon men for service other than going to the trenches. Maybe I did not interpret the speeches correctly, but I must say that was the impression received by almost every one with whom I conversed, as to the real reason for the National Service propaganda.

It may possibly be that voluntary enlistment can be revived, but in my judgment it would do a wrong to western Canada at least. We are a producing country and under voluntary enlistment our people have left the farms and productive labour and gone to the front. One of the reasons why I favour this Bill is that it will prevent men of patriotic spirit from enlisting who are now engaged in productive walks of life. If it will do that, it will do a good work. I have every hope that safeguards will be thrown around the administration of the Bill so as to prevent men engaged in the production of foodstuffs from going to the front at the present time. Authorities whom we cannot ignore claim that one of the great needs of the present war is the production of foodstuffs. They say that foodstuffs are almost as essential as men. In that country from the Manitoba boundary to the boundary of British Columbia, we have the greatest food-producing section of Canada, but owing to the splendid response to the call to arms made by the settlers in that country I am sorry to say that our productive area this year is going to be less than it has been for the preceding two years.

This is a regrettable circumstance, as I believe that the present year is the one in which production in this country should be greatest, and the one especially in which the Allies will depend upon us to feed the men at the front. An interview was recently published with Mr. Prothero, president of the Board of Agriculture of Great Britain, from which I shall quote briefly:

> The outcome of the war may ultimately hang on the quesiton of food supplies, and the American farmer is allotted the essential part to play in the great struggle for freedom. . . . From the grim spectacle of human carnage and from the feverish race of piling up munitions the farmer stands aloof. His task is to make hills, plains and valleys stand so thick with corn that they shall sing. Yet the man who drives a plough is helping as is the man who shoulders a rifle. . . . For this reason it is a welcome relief to us to know that the farmers of the United States are co-operating with the Allies, that they fully realize the essential part they play in this struggle for freedom, that they are bringing into their work the spirit of self-sacrifice and endurance, and that they are determined to put out the last ounce of their strength to win the war on the ploughlands of the United States. Here and there, God speed the plough.

Sir Thomas Lipton is an authority on the production of food. He sees the importance of this question, and he has recently stated:

> I know for a fact that there is no bluff in all this talk about the scarcity of food. We are up against it. America has come in just at the right moment for us, and no one can ever make me believe America will not be able to rise to the emergency.
>
> The situation here is much worse than English people realize. The storehouses throughout the country are being emptied of food, and we who are in the trade know they are not being supported by the stocks we used to keep.
> The public doesn't see this. Everything is being run bare. There is some idea here that we are not taking strong enough action to meet the crisis. That is not so. I know for a fact that the most drastic kind of machinery is being prepared to put the whole United Kingdom on rations, and you can take it from me that when the necessity arises the machinery will be ready.

There is a lesson for us in Canada in statements such as these made by reputable men who know the conditions in the Motherland intimately, and I think it is the duty of this Government to take strong measures in regard to this question of food supply. I join with my friend from West Middlesex (Mr. Ross) in saying that in my judgment very few farmers should be permitted to enlist. The production of food is so important, the number of men who have gone from the farms is so great, that it is an absolute necessity for the successful prosecution of the war on the part of Canada that the food-producing industries of this country should be very carefully safeguarded. We have seen an unprecedented rise in flour within the past year. I think the Government should face this situation for the coming year and, if necessary, commandeer every flour mill in the country, and should commandeer also packing houses, cold storage warehouses, canning factories, and all other concerns that supply food to the people and derive undue profit from the sale of the same. I know for a fact that men in western Canada—and all men are human when money enters into the question—men of small caiptal, are going about the country buying all the eggs and butter they can find, and storing them, in expectation of high prices. They look for a price of at least a dollar a dozen for eggs during the coming winter. In ordinary times I should have no fault to find with men doing this sort of thing, but under the circumstances of to-day I think it is the duty of the Government to see to it that profiteering of this kind is not permitted for the people suffer by it, and suffer very severely, and our effectiveness in the war is hindered by this means.

Let me briefly sum up my views on this question. I consider compulsory service the only fair means of the State receiving from its citizens that full measure of service to which it is entitled. By this I do not only refer to those of its young manhood who are called upon to risk their lives on the battle front. I believe that in a crisis such as now confronts us there is a service every man and woman is called upon to perform, and it is the duty of any Government to so organize its forces that this duty will be performed in an equitable manner. This should be the true meaning of compulsory service. I heartily approve of any plan of taxation which will reach the people who are deriving a certain measure of prosperity brought about by this war.

Every man who remains at home should be called upon to contribute something to aid his country in its hour of trial. I consider the farmers of this country are doing just as patriotic work in winning the war as the munition workers and in my judgment the Bill should specifically state that no man engaged in the production of foodstuffs shall be liable for military service. In my province too many of our producers have felt it their duty to go overseas, and to-day we are facing the very serious situation that our production this year is likely to be less than last year. This is a most alarming condition and every effort must be put forth on the part of every one to have this remedied, and I am firmly of the opinion that the great industry of agriculture should be exempt from the operations of this Bill.

Mr. J. E. MARCILE (Bagot) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, at this late hour of the night, I will not undertake to discuss the legal aspect of Bill No. 75, now before us; I am no lawyer, and as that phase of the Bill has been sufficiently debated, I shall not touch upon it; no more than on this Parliament's power to enact such legislation, as in my opinion, it has been sufficiently demonstrated that we have not the right, under the present conditions, to enact compulsory military service.

Mr. Speaker, although I have given my opinion, on the 10th of May last, upon recruiting and upon Canada's participation in the war, I believe it my duty not to let this conscription Bill, now before us, go by without making a few remarks, so that there may be no equivocation as to where I stand in the matter of compulsory service.

On August 4, 1914, England declared war against Germany, because the latter trampled under foot a solemn pledge, signed by herself, to respect the neutrality of Belgium. No honourable man there was but approved of the stand taken by the British Government.

Canada's Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) thought he should offer this country's support to the motherland, in the conflict then beginning. Parliament was convened and, on August 19, it was proposed that we should send over a contingent of 22,000 men. Every one thought this was generous and even more than generous. We approved, without a word of dissent, because we did believe that, under such circumstances, our duty was to help, within our means, to destroy Prussian militarism and to show England, and especially our friends here—those of Ontario, in particular—that we were always ready to fight for the pledged troth and, above all, for national honour. Unhesitatingly, we voted the money asked for, although it was quite a large amount. Instead of twenty-two thousand, thirty-three thousand men enlisted and went to the front. Since that date, Sir, nearly three hundred thousand more have left. Any one who, at the outbreak of hostilities, would have dared to mention such figures would not have been taken seriously. Moreover, we have in this country over one hundred thousand volunteers awaiting orders to leave and join those who are gone. Notwithstanding that incredible contribution in men, the Government is not satisfied; they are endeavouring to impose compulsory military service, although publicly and officially they have asserted that compulsion would never be resorted to in Canada.

Can there be any surprise, Sir, if the people protest loudly, and want the Government to live up to that pledge, since it is exactly what our sons are fighting for overseas, as has been so eloquently said by the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. McCrea).

My two sons—the only two I have—were so incensed at the Kaiser's treachery that they took up arms. Must one suppose that this disposition on the part of the Kaiser is a contagious disease? If so, complete isolation should have been resorted to; no Canadians should have been allowed to cross the Atlantic, and thus be exposed to contamination.

As one of the reasons for this Bill, we are told that the Prime Minister received a message from the boys at the front and in the hospitals asking for assistance. When the right hon. gentleman made that statement in the House, I could hardly refrain from rising and giving vent to my outraged feelings. They calling for assistance at the front when there are in England three millions and a half young men who have not yet deemed it proper to enlist! They are calling for assistance at the front, and over one million and a half men in restaurants, bar rooms and such places have not the mettle to answer the call of those who are fighting for them! They are calling for assistance at the front, and we have in England 126,000 of our boys awaiting the word to start for the firing line! Have they not been told that their brothers were crying for help? These men, at least, would have summoned enough courage to answer the call and jump into the trenches.

Allow me, Mr. Speaker, to tell you that I have my doubts as to the genuineness of this message and I cannot satisfy myself that the situation is as desparate as it has been represented. Can we suppose for one single moment, that the imperial authorities would be willing that such a great number of their own people should continue to live in peace and content while the soldiers from their colonies are dying for them? Is it possible that our parade officers who are in England since the beginning of the war, whom we are paying and maintaining to strutt about in the streets of London have not been apprised of the situation and prefer to came back here, rather than go to the assistance of their brothers in arms that are calling for help? Lastly, Mr. Speaker, is it possible that our own officers in Canada, who look so proud wearing the King's uniform, who never went further than London and some of them no further than Ottawa, and who are receiving fat salaries, will not feel themselves in honour bound to go and help the boys whom part of them accompanied as far as England, and whom all of them have encouraged to enlist?

Again, Mr. Speaker, I say that I do not admit that the situation is so desperate as it has been represented, because were it so I could not find words bitter enough to characterize the conduct of those who, having the opportunity refuse to go to the front.

We have contributed over 300,000 men, we have spent our money so lavishly that we will have to impose a tax on real estate to meet the interest on our loans; yet our imperialists are not satisfied.

Because our Prime Minister, without taking advice from any one, without taking into consideration the needs of the country, has been pleased to offer 500,000 men, are we bound to make good the offer? I, for one, say no.

If I had other sons wishing to enlist I should fasten them to their post as securely as the Minister of Inland Revenue (Sevigny) who intended organizing a regiment but did nothing of the kind.

For more than a year we heard a great deal about the immense strength and number of the British army. If it is as formidable as it is represented, it is high time that the fact be demonstrated. It is up to it to show its mettle and relieve the colonial forces which since the inception of the war have constantly been under fire and very often have been left alone to fight and win the battle.

Are we to think that our soldiers and those of the other colonies are the only ones brave enough to face the danger of a battle in close formation? For, since war began, whether in Flanders, France or elsewhere, all the victories reported have been won by the colonial troops. It is about time, Mr. Speaker, that those valiant boys take a rest, and that the five million men, enlisted in England, do their share.

I have listened most calmly to the lecture given, last week, by the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue and I sat wondering whether, really, he was speaking his own mind or if he was not expressing what he had been told to say. He complained of certain newspapers which criticised our participation in the war, and of certain orators of the province of Quebec who claim we owe nothing to England. Where did that idea originate? Who preached it from the hustings in the province of Quebec? Who did, if not the hon. minister himself and all his friends during the electoral campaign of Drummond-Arthabaska, in 1910, and throughout the electoral campaign in 1911? Is it at all surprising that those who fought side by side with the hon. minister, still remember those statements and keep on repeating them? The hon. member for North York (Mr. Armstrong) complained the other day that Tancrede Marsil, of Montreal, was advocating rebellion and stating that we owed nothing to England. Mr. Tancrede Marsil was once a political friend of the hon. member for North York; he had the administration of the patronage under the present Government, from 1911 until the election in Hochelaga, where he intended to run against the ex-Secretary of State (Mr. Patenaude). Up to that date, Mr. Marsil had been a devoted friend of the present Government and it was only because he opposed the hon. Secretary of State that they took away from him the patronage of Bagot county, where he had been a candidate in 1911.

The hon. Minister of Inland Revenue, the ex-Postmaster General, now Hon. Judge L. P. Pelletier, the ex-Minister of Inland Revenue, now Railway Commissioner, and others, have sown the wind throughout the province of Quebec in 1910-11; there is nothing surprising if, to-day, we reap the tempest. Indeed, all the elements bode an approaching storm, especially if the Government persist in spreading among the people discontent and scorn, by forcing upon the country compulsory service as is meant by the Bill now before us.

We are told that the object is to get from 10,000 to 12,000 men a month as long as the war lasts. Will the Government be able to get them? I do not think so, especially if Lord Northcliffe is to be believed when he says that the war is just beginning. The very thought drives one to despair and to fancy that the hour has probably come when the breakdown of conscription, foreseen by those who opposed it in 1867, must take place. What did our public men say at the time in reply to the advocates of Confederation? Let me quote some of their objections:

1. Confederation is the realization of the schemes generated, hatched, during a whole century, to subject Lower Canada to the domination and influence of an English majority.

5. Ambition, the quest of honours and of high positions will induce talented men to make sacrifices and concessions to pander to the English majority, in order to enjoy the advantages and the boon of power.

6. The French language, swamped in a parliament, composed of members three-fourths of whom will not understand it, must finally disappear.

7. The members from the English provinces, divided upon questions of interest, will unite every time a national or religious issue will arise.

8. Lower Canada, after having made Upper Canada's fortune, under the Union, will now largely contribute to the prosperity of three or four other provinces, whose influence will later become fatal to it, while it will lack the necessary resources to maintain its population and clear its lands.

10. In time of war, Lower Canada will be at the mercy of the Federal Government, who may force it to take up arms against its own will and affections.

Have not the events of the past fifty years given more than one reason to the opponents of Confederation?

Let us ponder over, one by one, those objections and who will say that the present period is not one of the darkest of our history; the very one foreseen by those who opposed the new regime?

I now quote from a newspaper which, commenting upon the present situation, entitles its editorial as follows:

What Will Follow From All That?

Where is the Canadian who, at present, does not ask himself what future has in store for our country? The sky is becoming darker and darker; the storm is on the point of bursting; from all parts are to be heard the roarings of a terrible thunder; but nothing seems to move our public men.

The Orange press wants to banish us from confederation; it would even drive us out of this land which is so much our own, since our fathers and our missionaries have carried upon all its borders, with their genius, the stamp of our race.

What will befall, do we ask? It is well to examine it; thus, perhaps, those whom the care of our national future still concerns may become interested in that survey, and, if they have the power, may do their best to save the grand work of our nationality.

Let the Government, if they have at heart the maintenance of order and harmony, in a united confederation, accept the amendment of my honourable leader, asking for a referendum to the people and, whatever the majority decide, the minority must submit to it in silence and will submit to it, I have no doubt. But, if the Government persist in their scheme, without considering the numerous and urgent appeals of the people that this question be submitted to them before its final adoption; they shall have, Mr. Speaker, to bear alone the responsibility of their act and of its consequences. Do they mean to save confederation? If we are Canadians, loyal subject of His Majesty having at heart the interests of our country first, and of the Empire next, the thought of the country will of itself be sufficient to save confederation. Thus recently spoke a newspaper, of which I want to quote the following extract:

If we really mean to save confederation, there is only one way to do it: keep intact Canadian autonomy.

And to safeguard autonomy, the Government must do its duty.

The measure now before Parliament is one of those which most endanger our nationality, because it amounts to a bold denial of national autonomy. Why then should not the Government and Parliament, who only exist in consequence of an Imperial mandate, appeal to the people who are, after all, the dispensers of power?

And when the people shall have decided this question, when it will have chosen new men, then should be taught what is really meant by the word "country"; thus only can confederation be saved.

The idea of country is defined by Bossuet in one of his finest works:

"Human society demands we should love the land wherein we live together; we consider it as a common mother and nurse; we cling to her, and that unites. It is what the Latins called charitas patri soli, the love of the native country; and they consider it as a bond among men. Men, indeed, feel bound by something strong, when they know that the same land that has produced and fed them, while living, will take them in its bosom, after death."

That is what high-minded men have thought. Why should not the Canadians, while remaining loyal subjects to His Majesty the King, George V, have also, their own national ideal; the love of their country, of Canada, above all others? For this country, celebrated in song as the richest, the greatest and the most beautiful of all the countries, for the preservation of its greatness, of its wealth and of its beauty, I am ready to lay down my life. Fearing for its future, I shall vote for the amendment of my hon. leader, that the military act now proposed be submitted to the people, for its approval or its disapproval, trusting in the wisdom of the popular verdict and ready to submit to it. It is as a Canadian loving his country, desirous of seeing peace and happiness reign over it, as these are indispensable conditions of a happy future for the nation, that I conclude these remarks by asking the hon. Prime Minister to take them into serious consideration and by declaring that I am against the principle of forcing others to do a thing which I would not want to do myself, that is to say, I am against any kind of compulsory service, and I shall vote accordingly.

Mr. EDMOND PROULX (Prescott): Mr. Speaker, I shall take the advice of the right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) and promise to be brief, but I cannot promise that I will take his advice any further in reference to this matter. Had the question not been so important I would have been satisfied to have given a silent voe, but the matter being of so much importance, and establishing a new principle in our traditions and policies, I consider that it is incumbent upon me to give the reasons for the vote that I am about to cast in a few minutes. When this war was declared in 1914 the Prime Minister made an offer to the Secretary of State for the Colonies, and the people of this country agreed to that offer. The response was very generous. Parliament was called, and did not object to the offer which had been made. It unanimously voted the money that was asked by the Government to enable the Government to send across one contingent and more if it was thought necessary. When the Prime Minister made the offer he did not intend to apply the Militia Act, which he said the other day could have been applied, but as my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) proved to this House the other day he made the offer to the British Government on the understanding that our soldiers would serve as British troops under the British Crown. The Prime Minister had grave doubts that the Militia Act would apply, or that the defence of Canada was at stake. If the defence of Canada was not at stake in 1914, how can it be said that it was at stake in 1917? Canada is not now more menaced than it was in 1914, and although Parliament may have power to pass this Bill, I am of the opinion, with my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, that Parliament has no right, has no mandate, to pass this measure. It has never been before the people. At the last general election in 1911 this Government came into power on the policy which was preached in the province of Quebec of no participation in the wars of Great Britain. You may say that this is not a war of Great Britain. I admit it is not. I am not one of those who say that we must not fight for Great Britain. This war was not declared by Great Britain. Great Britain was not prepared for war, and it is to the credit of Great Britain that she went into this war to protect Belgium and to honour her signature to the treaty which was made in 1839.

But that does not change the situation, and it does not prove that it is Canada's war. I maintain that Parliament has not the right to pass this law for sending Canadians to go across seas to take part in this war. There was no question in the session of 1914 that it was a free offer which the Government was making to the Government of Great Britain. It was an offer which similar to the one which was made in 1899 by the Government of that day at the time of the South African war. The only difference was that the number of troops and the expenditure were much larger. But Parliament was not asked to send these troops under the Militia Act. I am not going to read the despatches which were sent. Members of this House must remember them. They were read the other day by the leader of the Opposition. The first one was sent on the 1st August, 1914, and the second on the 5th August. The Government had five days to consider the matter and though they had five days to consider it they did not change their mind. They still had grave doubts as to whether our soldiers could be sent across as Canadian troops and they preferred to send them as Imperial troops. Parliament assented to the request of the Government and at subsequent sessions Parliament voted freely and unanimously the moneys which were asked by the Government to permit equipping and sending the troops overseas. The Prime Minister made a promise on the 1st January, 1916, without consulting Parliament. It is said that in Germany the Chancellor is the mouthpiece of the Kaiser and that he presents to the Reichstag the policies which the Kaiser wants him to present.

It seemed that at that time the ex-Minister of Militia was the Kaiser of Canada, and that the Prime Minister was the mouthpiece of the ex-Minister of Militia. It was also said at that time that the ex-Minister of Militia was anxious, and had the ambition, to send a large number of soldiers from this country to the front, and, in fact, wanted to send the last man, if it was necessary. In a country governed by a Parliament elected by the people I think that Parliament should have been consulted before the Prime Minister promised to send 500,000 men. Great Britain never asked us to send that number. In fact, I think Great Britain was surprised that we should send over 200,000 men. At that time Great Britain did not expect that we would send over 150,000 men, and if the Prime Minister made this offer without consulting Parliament he should not be surprised if some members in this House refused to give him power to procure the 500,000 men by a compulsory measure. The mandate of this Parliament expired in October, 1916.

Mr. MORPHY: Does the hon. gentleman intend to take his sessional indemnity this session?

Mr. PROULX: I cannot appreciate my hon. friend's question. I say that our mandate has expired, as far as the vote of the people is concerned. We are only here by our own consent, and before we make a new departure such as this Bill proposes I submit we should go back to the people, if not by referendum, at least by general election. My hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Descarries) went even further than my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, and said that this Parliament had not the power to pass this Act, that if this Bill became law it would be ultra vires of this Parliament. He may be right. I am not a constitutional lawyer, but I would prefer that the Bill be not made law before consulting the people, because, if this Parliament passed this measure, I believe the law would not be declared constitutional. I do not think the Governor General would refuse to sanction it, and even if the Bill were reserved for the consideration of the Imperial Parliament, I do not believe that body would veto it. If my hon. friend does not want to see this Bill become law, I think it would be safer for him to vote for the referendum, and if the referendum does not carry, to vote against the second reading, and not to adopt the principle of the measure. My right hon. friend the Prime Minister, said that it was never suggested to him while he was in England that we should adopt conscription, and he was, in fact, a little exercised because some people in this country suggested that he had been requested, while in England, to enact such a law. In introducing the Bill he said:

> Some people afflicted with a diseased imagination have asserted that I took my present course at the request or direction of the British Government. No more absolute falsehood was ever uttered by human lips. The subject was never discussed between myself and any member of the British Government; if there had been any such suggestion from them, I for one would not have tolerated it. The Government, Parliament and people of Canada are the only authorities that can deal with or determine questions such as those which are embodied in the Bill now presented to this House.

And this is confirmed by the dispatch which we saw in newspapers on the 21st June, coming from England, that the hon. Mr. Walter Long, Secretary for the Colonies, said that the Prime Minister had not spoken of the question at all when he was in England, and, in fact, the Secretary for the Colonies was surprised to see that the Prime Minister had asked the Canadian Parliament to adopt the law so soon.

What are the reasons of the Prime Minister in asking Parliament to pass this Bill? If I remember well, when my right hon. friend the Prime Minister landed in this country with his colleagues, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and the Minister of Public Works, in an interview with the reporters, the Minister of Public Works said that he did not think it would be necessary to have conscription in Canada, as it had been found necessary to adopt it in other countries. I presume my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works must have been in the confidence of my right hon. friend. He left this country in February to make the trip with him, stayed with him all the time he was in England, and returned to Canada with him. So that it would appear that my hon. friend the Prime Minister was not thinking of conscription when he landed in Canada. When did he think of conscription? Was it when he reached Ottawa, and ascertained that the ex-Minister of Militia intended to bring the matter before the House? If he had permitted the ex-Minister of Militia to bring the question before Parliament, he could not have avoided expressing his opinion, and taking a stand on the matter, and when he found that there was probably a large contingent behind him favouring conscription, he thought he might be obliged to adopt conscription, and all the credit would have gone to the ex-Minister of Militia. So that the ex-Minister of Militia would again have loomed very high in the public eye, and if my hon. friend had not listened to him, and adopted conscription, the ex-Minister of Militia might have divided the Conservative party and endangered the chances of the Government at the next general election. It was the intention of the Government to use this measure as the slogan to win the war. Some people in this country think that the slogan should be changed, and that it should be said that probably the Government is more anxious to win elections by adopting conscription than to win the war. We are told that conscription is adopted to fill the wastage. The Minister of Militia states that there are over 126,000 men in England, waiting to go across to France. That is probably more than would be required this year. Over 400,000 men were recruited in Canada. There are to-day over 300,000 men overseas, in France or in England, only 138,000 of them being in France—four divisions, and the auxiliary services. The period of offensive for this year is more than half over, and if we judge by the wastage that took place last year, perhaps not half the 126,000 men now in England will be wanted in France this year. I do not see, therefore, why there should be so much hurry in adopting this measure.

The member for South Bruce (Mr. Truax) asked a few moments ago for an explanation in regard to the 75,000 men who could not be accounted for. Are they in England? Will they go to the front, or will most of them come back to Canada without having gone to the front? It is said that about 7,000 officers left Canada for England, but never went to the front and will not go unless they go as privates. They cannot be forced to go as privates, as they left this country with commissions. The country, therefore, is spending money uselessly in sending overseas officers who stay in England for several years and come back without having gone to the front. Besides enjoying their pay, they take up precious space in the transports. When the people learn that so many men have commissions and do not fight, they do not like to enlist as privates and receive only a private's pay while bearing the brunt of the fight. The result is that recruiting is discouraged.

I do not want to vote for the principle of this Bill before it is submitted to the people by means of a referendum, as is suggested by the right hon. leader of the Opposition. The member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross) said that men of twenty should not be conscripted because they have not a vote; he suggested that the minimum age should be twenty-one years. But the Government would deny to those of twenty-one or over the right to express their view in regard to this Bill before it becomes law. Why should not those who are liable to be conscripted have a say in the matter? Should they not have the privilege of saying whether this Bill should become law? There are people in the country to-day who are clamouring for conscription, but when you speak of the conscription of wealth, they object. We have the example of the Montreal Board of Trade. That body some time ago adopted a resolution calling upon the Government to adopt a measure of compulsory military service, but when the member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) proposed that wealth be conscripted, they sent a deputation to the Finance Minister objecting to the conscription of wealth. The conscription of men is much more important than the conscription of wealth; therefore, if some men object to the conscription of wealth it is not surprising that the labour men object to the conscription of men. They are the people who will bear the brunt of the fight if this Bill becomes law—and they ask for a referendum. The member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Verville) who is supposed to know the opinion of the labour men of Canada, said the other night that at least 85 per cent of the men who belonged to labour unions were in favour of a referendum.

I shall not delay the House any further; I intend to vote for the amendment of the right hon. leader of the Opposition.

Mr. P. J. A. CARDIN (Richelieu): Mr. Speaker, the terrible war which is presently convulsing the countries of Europe seems to have caused quite a commotion in people's minds; and especially so in Canada. I cannot account in any other way for the origin of the extraordinary theories which we have heard enunciated by those who would impose on our country compulsory military service. The most ancient of these theories has been unearthed by the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen) the present Government's recognized sophist. His doctrine is that Canada's sacrifice in the present war, must extend to her last dollar and her last man. Another theory no less extraordinary, is that advanced by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) who has proclaimed that, as times go, we must suppress or ignore all the rules of logic and throw aside all the teachings of experience and the dictates of reason. Another of these hon. members who demand the imposition of a conscription law, would be ready, in order to attain that end, to rend every article of the constitution. Among these extraordinary theories also, we find the boastful and childish pretension that we have allies, and that we are playing in the present conflict a part equal in importance to that of the autonomous nations, such as France, England and Russia. Lastly, another claim which is devoid of common sense, would make of the present war our war, Canada's war.

And add to that, Mr. Speaker, all the other absurdities which we have heard, which we have read and which are all included in the exaggerated and irrational vocable: Win the war.

People talk of the crushing of Germany, of the Kaiser's downfall, with the unconstrained language of schoolboys enjoying their holidays. In all those theories we find the precepts of the most appalling anarchy combined with the teachings of the most complete and most absolute autocracy.

But, meanwhile, what becomes of the true Canadian sentiment? It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that it is forgotten. This perturbation in the Canadian mind would leave us quite unconcerned, if from the chaos of these incoherences had not sprung up the Military Service Bill. Offspring of excitation, prematurely ripened by the scorching breath of prejudices, this measure is apparently justified by the Government by two arguments, both absolutely worthless: First, our promise to those who have left, and secondly, the absolute necessity of filling the gaps and keeping up our effective forces.

Our promise? I have listened with great attention to the speeches which have been made since the opening of this debate, but I yet fail to find in any one of these speeches a satisfactory proof of such a promise. When the country decided to take part in the present war, it was understood that such participation would be absolutely voluntary, and that those who would enlist under Canada's colours, would do it freely and of their own volition, absolutely so.

The public men of the country, the right hon. Prime Minister himself, and after him the right hon. leader of the Opposition, have stated everywhere, not only in this House, but at all the public meetings that were held, that the enlistment was absolutely voluntary, and that never should we resort to compulsion.

Consequently, Mr. Speaker, the volunteers who have gone to fight overseas, have left, knowing that it was the Government's determination, supported by the Opposition, to always maintain volunteering and never to impose conscription. They were not put under any false impression; they went away fully aware of the Government's intentions, and no one can surely find in their voluntary enlisting, nor in the solicitations made to them, a promise to impose conscription.

But, is it said, we must keep up our effective forces. Where is the evidence that the Allies, and that England, in particular, need fifty or a hundred thousand men, who would have to be levied under such difficult circumstances as may arise from the enforcement of this compulsory military service? It has been established, beyond all doubt, by the Prime Minister himself, and by others who have folowed his lead, that England had never asked Canada to impose compulsory military service and, Mr. Speaker, we understand the wisdom of England in not requesting from our Premier the imposition of such a law, because it is evident to-day that England herself has not thrown into the struggle all her manhood nor has she seen fit to employ all the resources she can dispose of. In support of my statement, Mr. Speaker, allow me to quote from the speech of the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) who has seconded the amendment moved by the right hon. leader of the Opposition. This quotation, Mr. Speaker, bears out my assertion that Great Britian has not put into this war all the forces she can dispose of; probably, because she has not yet found it necessary. The extract is from an English paper, and forms part of a communication from a resident in England:

> "Tribunals all through the country continue to hand out exemptions to huntsmen, variety artists, store managers, clerks, luxury manufacturers, frankly declaring that their mission is "to protect local industry." One district alone granted 30,000 exemptions during the past fourteen weeks.
> "Even the Government joined the Freedom League. Only a few departments are not still to a large extent manned by eligibles with influence. In this 34th month of the war it is still the custom to hand a list of names to a branch of a department with orders to find places for them. A regiment is permitted to retain at home its football players and runners and boxers.
>
> "The great markets of London—Smithfield, Covent Garden, Billingsgate and the rest—have scarcely been touched, because their combing out was left to committees of themselves and they have been unable to agree."

When we have such an admission as that, made by a person living in England, it seems to me that we are perfectly right in denying any urgency for compulsion in Canada; and far less should we be charged with disloyalty because of our opposition to such a measure.

To further justify our position, we would only have to refer to the situation in Ireland where, according to reports there are 150,000 soliders employed in maintaining order and where it appears, there would be from 200,000 to 300,000 Irishmen who would be ready to enlist if they were granted Home Rule.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is another reason for Canadians not rushing headlong into compulsory military service. It is the entrance of the United States in the conflict. When the United States shall have done as much as Canada has done, it may then be time, perhaps, to impose conscription or to ask more of Canada than she has done up to date.

Our effective forces must be maintained, is it said. What are our effective forces, Mr. Speaker? The soldiers we have sent across have been incorporated at the Government's own request, into the British army; they belong to the British army; they are no longer Canadian soldiers, they are soldiers belonging to British regiments and forming part of the British army. And I assert it boldly, because I believe every member of this House should be allowed to plainly express his views and state the bare facts. If Canada is not presently able to fill the gaps which are being made in the regiments she has sent across, if for this purpose voluntary service proves inadequate, I say that England must take upon herself to fill those gaps before the Prime Minister can come and ask us to foist compulsory service on Canada.

But we are told, Mr. Speaker, that the soldiers are looking to us; that we must win the war, and that Germany must be crushed! Let us leave mere words aside, and stop making big drum politics and considering the people as an agglomeration of ninnies who will jump at theories of any sort.

Let us not, therefore, allow the fever of excitement and the heat of prejudices to take the place of collected reasoning. Let us give up this speculating upon the glory of those who have gone and also not lessen their sacrifices by intimating to-day that they enlisted because they feared that conscription would come or that their action was prompted by the belief that sooner or later they might be compelled to take up arms. They did go away freely, Mr Speaker; and that is why we do admire them and why our souls are so moved by the remembrance of their exploits. All those soldiers, who so generously went over, had it in their heart that they were going to fight for liberty and justice, and in my humble opinion, they must frown on those who to-day want to ostracize their own compatriots.

Mr. Speaker, I must confess that I nowise understand the position taken by certain members of this side of the House who support the Military Service Bill. I was just listening a few moments ago to one of these hon. members who was trying to justify his support of the Bill on the ground that it contained more exemptions than does the present Militia Act. In that case as well entitle this Bill, as did an hon. member who spoke before me, the Exemption Act, rather than calling it the Military Service Act. Moreover, the Government has been taken to task by Liberal supporters of the Bill for not having conducted voluntary enlistment as they should; for having given undue preference to their supporters in awarding positions, and one of them added, not long ago, that he thought he had found in this Bill, now before the House, certain signs that led him to believe its object was purely political.

If these gntlemen do entertain such opinions, I wonder how they can afterwards speak in favour of this Bill and pledge themselves to vote for its second reading; the more so, when they take the pains to add that it is dangerous to entrust the administration of such an important measure to a Government who have not the people's confidence. Is it at all surprising, Mr. Speaker, that the people are growing uneasy since the Bill has been introduced? The country is not accustomed to such coercive laws and our people are not prepared for a measure of compulsion. I think the general disquiet is well justified; the masses may well feel anxious, for, after all, they alone will have to bear the burden which this Bill seeks to impose on the country. Just to realize the instinctive force of self-preservation among all the elements that compose our population, one has only to consider, not the statements, but especially the actions of certain organized groups of financiers. How easily, how very disinterestedly did the Montreal Board of Trade, at one of its meetings, pass a resolution demanding compulsory military service and decide that it would be in the country's interest and that it had become necessary for the Government to enact such patriotic legislation. That is all very well. But let us now come to these gentlemen's actions. When it became known that the Government intended increasing the burden imposed upon wealth, and tax business and industrial profits on a larger scale than was the case last year, immediately these same gentlemen organized a delegation to come to Ottawa and beg the Government's favour. When these gentlemen, who are all of them exempt from military service, discuss the expediency of imposing conscription upon the people and of compelling the poor and the labourer to enlist and defend to a certain extent, the very wealth of these privileged classes, their patriotism runs high. But, when it comes to put out money to pay the expenses and the small wages of those who by this legislation will be coerced into active service, it is readily seen that their patriotism is only measured by the closeness of their fobs.

A great number of reasons, Mr. Speaker, have already been given against the passing of this Bill. I will not repeat them. But it might be added, I believe, that this Act shall be absolutely nugatory and ineffective and that, besides, it is antinational.

I say that this Act will be nugatory. Canada has, until now, made a splendid effort which has commanded from every nation of the world a deep admiration and has brought to her most deserved and cordial congratulations.

Canada's intervention in this war was surely proper. Why? When the declaration of war came as a clap of thunder in the serene sky of Europe, England was taken by surprise. Her fleet was ready to meet any foe on the seas; but her army was not in a fit condition to fight against a serious foe on land. She had not enough soldiers to effectually fill the part she had to play in this war. She needed the aid of her colonies; and every one of them rose up, ready to give the required co-operation. What has been the result of that intervention? It was secured for her an expeditionary army that contributed to the first victories over the Germans in the foreign land of France. Thanks to the intervention of the Canadians, the Australians and the inhabitants of all other colonies, England had the time to organize her forces; she had the time to prepare for the fray; she had the time to impose compulsory military service.

Now, when she is able to line up for battle several million men, it seems to me that our effort should abate; that we must think of the preservation of equilibrium in our economical conditions, and that we should not, without due consideration, spread misery and ruin throughout our territory.

Moreover, this compulsory military service law is useless, because England, who has adopted a similar one, has not applied it in all its strictness; it is applied with all possible discretion inspired by the most motherly feelings. A large number of people have been exempted from military service. Every one admits the fact, for it has been stated by an eminent personage in British politics that there are almost three million men in England, affected by this law, who have not yet been sent into active service. More than that, the compulsory military service law does not apply to Ireland. We are called disloyal because we object to compulsory military service in Canada. Are we not right, Mr. Speaker, after the splendid effort our country has made? If we are disloyal, I would ask what word we could use to qualify the action of Ireland who has quite a number of representatives in the British Parliament.

They now propose to enlist some 50,000 or 100,000 men. Is not that an insignificant number when the intended effort of the United States is taken into consideration? It seems to me that before a mere colony like Canada is compelled to destroy all her industrial, agricultural and commercial organization, before she is reduced to the point of sowing misery in her own territory, the autonomous countries, who will reap all the immediate benefits at the end of the war, should at least make as large sacrifices as this colony has already made. It is averred that when the United States shall have raised an army as large as that of Canada, in proportion to their respective populations, German militarism will have been annihilated, and Germany and her allies utterly defeated.

All our efforts should tend toward a more absolute necessity than enlisting men: agricultural production. In so doing, we would give a better and a more practical aid to the Allies' cause than by sending over a contingent of some fifty to a hundred thousand men, a mere drop of water in the ocean—if we consider the innumerable quantity of soliders now fighting on European soil and the still greater number of those who are preparing to join in the conflict.

Conscription is, moreover, an antinational measure, because it detracts from the merit and nobleness of Canada's effort. After enlisting more than 400,000 men in this country, with a population no more than seven million souls, they would make the world believe—and what is worse— impress upon the minds of the Canadians themselves the conviction that Canada has not done her duty. I say that no one has the right, excepting if he be an anti-patriot, to charge Canada with remissness in duty. By so doing, I repeat the value and nobleness of our sacrifices are set at naught. For my part, and I believe it is the same for all who truly love their country, and love it first and above all, I would prefer reading upon the tombstone of the Canadian soldier the word "volunteer" than the epitaph "conscript." Voluntary sacrifice compels emotion and enthusiasm, whilst the sentiment at the sacrifice of the conscript is only that of grief.

Besides, Mr. Speaker, conscription would unjustly put us on an equal footing with the autonomous countries who are presently at war; it would put us on a level with England, with France, with Russia, with Italy, with the United States. Equality as to obligations, but not equality as to rights, since war has been declared without our consent and will be settled without our co-operation. I will go further, Mr. Speaker, they are making much noise with these three words, "Win the War", which are nothing but wind.

What would become of all the theories built upon those words if the autonomous countries decided to settle the war by a compromise? What could we say? What could we answer; what explanation, what excuse could we give to those we would have enlisted after a campaign all of excitement and exaggeration?

This measure, Mr. Speaker, would moreover destroy the harmony now existing or which has existed among the races who inhabit this country. It would give a chance to the demagogues of both races to wave all over the country the incendiary torch of prejudices. And that has already begun, Mr. Speaker. By comparisons and figures, some are trying to prove the loyalty or the disloyalty of one or the other of the provinces of the Confederation. Since when have patriotism, love of one's country and self-sacrifice been a matter of figures? Since when can these questions be settled by ciphering and statistics?

Patriotism is a sentiment and sentiments have nothing in common with arithmetic.

They say: Quebec has not done enough. If we take into account the circumstances, if we consider the odious campaign which has been waged against the province of Quebec for several years past and the unfair treatment our compatriots have been submitted to in certain provinces, I say that the province of Quebec has done not only her duty, but even more than her duty. Had she listened to prejudices, had she allowed herself to be guided by sentiments, she would not have enlisted a single man. We have done our duty; and I consider, by reason of the position occupied by the province of Quebec, by reason of the mean consideration given to her citizens in the other sections of the country, that this province has done more than Ontario.

Mr. Speaker, the French Canadian's first thought is for Canada. The English Canadian's first thought, however, is for England. I do not want to reproach him with it; but it seems to me he has no right either, resting upon a false theory, to accuse us of being too strongly attached to our land and institutions and of preferring above all Canada, the land where our ancestors were born and died and on whose soil we intend to die ourselves.

We have no personal sympathies, might I say, across the ocean; we have no relatives, no friends in England; nor do we cherish the hope of going back there to end our days, as probably do some members of the Government.

We have no longer, either, nor have we had for many years past, any attachment to France. Those ties have been broken, and to-day the French Canadians of the province of Quebec are, before all else, Canadians. Mr. Speaker, the province of Quebec says aloud what she has in her mind, and in doing so, she even says and proclaims what the other provinces of the Confederation also have in their minds. Do you want a proof of it? It comes from the lips of one of those who have seen fit to abandon their party. What does he tell us? "If conscription were submitted to a referendum, for my part, I would ask that the vote be not taken by ballot, but openly." It is for the province of Ontario, that these hon. gentlemen demand the open vote. It is not for the province of Quebec, for they know what her opinion is; they know what she thinks; they know her convictions and these have been expressed by her mandatories; no one is uncertain as to her decision and can be mistaken as to the verdict she would deliver. It is for the province of Ontario they would have the old absolute system of the open vote, so they might intimidate the people and prevent them from freely expressing their opinion. These gentlemen who would impose conscription in order to send our soldiers to fight for liberty, so they say, on the soil of France, would prevent liberty from flourishing even in that very province of Ontario.

It was painful to hear from the lips of the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Arthurs) such base and despicable accusations as those we have had to endure. It seems to me that this gentleman who is a military man, who has been oversea and was a witness of the valour of the French Canadian soldiers, should be the last one to fling abuse in the face of the compatriots of those French Canadians who have covered themselves with glory. Having seen them in action, I do not understand how he can have the audacity, in this Parliament, to make such vile accusations against the citizens of my race. Mr. Speaker, I believe that the people of my province prefer, as I do myself, Colonel Arthurs, who voluntarily enlisted for service on the other side, to the hon. member for Parry Sound who would impose conscription by abusing the province of Quebec. And this hon. member, or rather Colonel Arthurs, deserves much more credit and consideration for the part he has taken in the victory of Vimy than he deserves for the mean work he is doing for the benefit of his party just to help it to win an electoral victory.

We are not the only ones to denounce conscription. It is true that in the province of Ontario a good number of the people's representatives have seen fit to break off with their party and have allied themselves with the Conservative party upon this question, but there are other provinces in the Dominion where the English language is that of the majority, and we have heard several members from those provinces strongly oppose conscription. There cannot be two ways about it. If the hon. members of the provinces of New Brunswick and of Nova Scotia, and some from the western provinces have the right to oppose this Conscription Bill without being disloyal, I now ask you why we should be charged with disloyalty when we preach the very same doctrine? Certain parties wonder at hearing us say that the enlistment of 500,000 men is an excessive number. I will not repeat the words which have been already quoted, those of an important personage in the British Empire, Lord Shaughnessy. When Lord Shaughnessy tells us that the promise of enlisting 500,000 men is of doubtful wisdom, I wonder how they can then turn around to the province of Quebec, to its representatives, and charge them with disloyalty when they make the very same statement. If Lord Shaughnessy remains loyal to England although indirectly opposing conscription, if he remains loyal when he says that the enlisting of 500,000 men is excessive, I do ask myself how we can be charged with disloyalty when we do nothing else but repeat what he has said. No, we are not disloyal. But such are those who intend to deprive the people of its liberties in order to maintain here the plague of autocracy which England wants to stem on the soil of Europe.

Mr. Speaker, laws are useful and efficient when they are consistent with the needs of the people, and the way to know the people's needs, is to consult them. You cannot do it by posing as an autocrat as did, this afternoon, the hon. Minister of Justice. It is not by assuming the power, the right of life and death over the citizens, but only by consulting the people, either by means of a referendum or through elections.

Those who oppose the referendum say : But the people must be guided. Some of the hon. members who have left the Liberal party have made such a statement. If there was a referendum, Mr. Speaker, what would prevent those hon. gentlemen from going down into their counties, attend public meetings and speak in favour of conscription.

Mr. Speaker, volunteering is an individual sacrifice. Every one is free to dispose of his life as he thinks proper and offer it for a cause he believes to be a good and a just one. But conscription is an obligation imposed by the State; then, it is the State that disposes of the life and blood of its citizens. I say that before adopting such a measure we must be well convinced that we have the right to do it, that we are acting according to the will of the people and in their best interest. It is a serious, a most serious question, replete with grave consequences which may be disastrous for the future of a country like ours. I say that this question must be decided in the light of reason and not in the fumy torches of fanaticism.

The Government does not seem to suspect the gravity of this question of compulsory service. One would think, in listening to these hon. gentlemen, that the lives of the citizens are of no account, of such mean value that they can be disposed of without any consideration and with the sole object of preparing an electoral programme.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that those who are to be drafted have the right to be consulted. It has been said and repeated in every tone, during this debate, that the most interested ones, those who should, above all, have their say in this matter, were the soldiers who have already crossed the sea. Allow me, Mr. Speaker, to take exception to this doctrine. The men who have already gone to the front have done so of their own free-will; they were not led there through coercive means; nobody forced them to enlist.

But when it comes to forcibly send over those who have already used their own judgment and have decided to stay at home, I believe that we cannot deny them the opportunity to express their opinion.

Some may find too severe what I am about to say; but it is my duty to speak and of my statement I take beforehand the full responsibility. I do not fear to express my opinion here. They refuse the referendum in apprehension of the result, because they dread the verdict of the majority of the people of this country, which might confirm the opinion already expressed by the province of Quebec. They want to be able to say throughout the country that the province of Quebec is the only one to oppose conscription; that the French Canadians only refuse their co-operation to the Empire. They wish to speculate upon this campaign of prejudices inaugurated a few years ago and which is being waged throughout the country against the province of Quebec.

It would be useless to insist. To point out such an object, means to submit it to the most severe judgment of the honest conscience of every true Canadian.

I deny the Prime Minister the right to wrap himself up in the mourning flag of our country in order to preach us the destructive creed of Imperialism and to attempt the Germanizing of our political morals.

Let us have no discussion, Mr. Speaker, upon the tomb which covers, united in the same glory, the ashes of our fellow-citizens, English and French, mowed down together by the war.

Their common tomb is a symbol of peace and harmony among the races. From this union of the races in death, let us draw a lesson of good understanding for those who survive. And upon this glorious tomb let us respectfully incline our thoughts to find therein teachings of tolerance and of liberty.

Mr. M. S. DELISLE (Portneuf) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, this House should not expect a very lengthy speech from me. I am a business man and I have less than others the practice and art of public speaking. However, I believe that I must protest, as a citizen of the province of Quebec, against an assertion made by the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Sévigny).

He has stated that he was keeping his place as a minister so that our province may continue to be represented in the cabinet, since it is entirely against conscription and that he is in favour of it; since it demands that the law be submitted to the electorate and that he refuses.

No, Mr. Speaker, in this cabinet, the hon. minister represents only himself, and his portfolio which he keeps in defiance of all his former pledges.

The hon. minister realizes it is so well, Mr. Speaker, that, in his speech upon the present Act, he has tried to make us believe that the electors of Dorchester had approved conscription since they had elected him on January 27, 1917. But he was called to order and to common sense by one of his friends who went through this Dorchester campaign, in his interest; I am referring to the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Achim).

I quote herewith the strong language used by the hon. member for Labelle in contradicting the minister's assertion. I find them at page 2972 of Hansard, French edition:

> Mr. Achim: My hon. friend puts an exceedingly delicate question to which I could with difficulty reply without hurting his present feelings and without taking explicit exception to the course he has chosen to adopt. Much would have I preferred it had my hon. friend not raised the issue, but since he has, I have no option but to tell him that in my opinion it would be better. Should ever a disruption occur in this country, Mr. Speaker, I say it will not take place between the province of Quebec and the remainder of Canada, but between the province of Ontario and the rest of the Dominion. Yes, Ontario, where the capitalists are attempting to crush the freedom of labour, Ontario whose manufacturers are attempting to restrain the freedom of trade, Ontario whose jingoes are trying to strangle freedom of conscience. I do say that if ever there is a disruption, that will be it, and the sooner the better perhaps.
> Mr. Speaker, I am grieved beyond expression to have to utter such words and I pray you to believe that before bringing myself to utter them, many doleful hours have I gone through; I feel that old bonds are being severed which I had hoped would be permanent. In brief, Mr. Speaker, I must declare that in this House I shall vote on this question with the Liberal party; that at the next elections I shall vote for the anti-conscriptionist candidate, that I resign as Conservative candidate in the county of Labelle and that in the province of Quebec I shall speak in favour of the Liberal party.

The minister of Inland Revenue labours under another delusion which I should like to dispel. He gives the result of the Dorchester election as a verdict in favour of compulsory service. And such is my hon. friend's appreciation of his constituents that he argues—I epitomize—"What is the good of a referendum? We held one in Dorchester and Dorchester has spoken the verdict of all the electors of Canada. When Augustus had imbibed, Poland was full. Quand August avait bu, la Pologne était ivre." The argument is more creditable to the electors of Dorchester than to the minister's powers of interpretation.

The part of his speech to which I refer is to be found at page 2747, unrevised Hansard, and reads as follows:

What does the vote given at this election mean from a constitutional point of view? Does it not mean that the war policy of the Government was approved, as it has been approved by the members for the past three years, and has not this policy of the Government been to make every sacrifice to carry the war to a successful end, as far as conscription if necessary?

I agree with the whole paragraph save the following words: "As far as conscription if necessary." To that statement I take the most strenuous objection, because those who did cast their votes for my hon. friend had in their minds not the statement made by the Prime Minister in his letter to workmen dated December 27, 1916, but the one he made long ago on the floor of this House, which was quoted by the right hon. leader of the Opposition and which may be found at page 2747 of revised Hansard:

My right hon. friend has alluded to conscription—to the idea in this country or elsewhere that there may be conscription in Canada. In speaking in the first two or three months of this war I made it clear to the people of Canada that we did not propose any conscription. I repeat that announcement to-day with emphasis.

If my hon. friend insinuates that the electors of Dorchester, by their vote, wished to approve of conscription, I must tell him that he would not be sitting on the Treasury benches if at the election he had so declared himself.

Thus does the hon. member for Labelle reduce to naught the hon. minister's pretentions, that his election was an approval of conscription. The hon. minister must be in quite a quandary to resort to such a shift, for during this election he more than once readily declared himself opposed to conscription.

Here is now what I find in La Patrie of January 22, 1917. If he ever did tell the truth, it was on that occasion, for he was speaking in the Sacred Temple, close to the parish priest, who actually presided, if you please. This was at Ste. Rose. That parish was destined to become famous during this election; indeed, it was there also that another minister displayed his leaning toward the Borden government's conscription when he advised the people to run away to the United States.

But, Mr. Speaker, let us return to the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue. I read in La Patrie, an organ of the Government:

The Rev. Father Tremblay's patriotic appeal to his parishioners.
A priest presides.

As there is no convenient hall in the village, Saturday's meeting was held in the vestry and the parish priest, Rev. Father Tremblay, not only had the kindness of permitting this invasion of his domain, but he even presided over the meeting, with a perfect ease, indeed, and no one would have thought that he was filling such a part for the first time.

The good parish priest also made a short speech: Gentlemen and voters, I will introduce to you the speakers who are your two representatives. It is not for me to commend them, it will be yours to do it for one or the other by the vote you will honestly and conscientiously give. Do seriously reflect upon the duty you are called upon to perform as citizens. Please carefully listen to your candidates with a view to gathering information and ideas for guidance on polling day. I need not ask you to observe due decorum, just remember that you are in the house of God. Mr. Sévigny admits that, in 1911, he was opposed to the Naval policy and against any participation of Canada in the wars of the Empire. He was then only thirty years old, he had no experience, but he believed in the principles he advocated, he was sincere and candid, not knowing the future more than any one else.

And, further on, Mr. Sévigny charges Mr. Cannon with taking undue advantage of the issuing of the National Service cards; he solemnly asserts that the census taken by the Commission has no relation whatever to the military service. That among the 400,000 soldiers whom Canada has to-day under arms, not one has been forced to enlist, neither shall any be conscripted in the future; there shall be no conscription, declared the new Minister.

Let us now take Evénement, the hon. minister's recognized mouthpiece, the newspaper which has made the most strenuous fight for the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue and we will see the various attitudes it shows him to have taken. I am reading Evénement of January 22, page 4, column No. 4, referring to that same Ste. Rose meeting:

The hon. Mr. Sévigny repeated the statements he had made on the opening of the campaign about the political errors he might have committed in the past. He also sincerely admitted he had trespassed in 1911 when he had declared himself against Canada's participating in the wars of the Empire, but he added that the terrifying events which are at the present time creating a general upheaval among the nations of the world fully justify him for having modified his views as to the war policy. He recalled the fact that the Liberal party has approved and still approves the war expenditure and that such expenditure would be continued if, one day or another, the Liberals should be returned into power in Ottawa.

Mr. Sévigny also spoke of the National Service question and repeated, once more, that we would not have any conscription.

The same paper reports another meeting held at Ste. Justine, and there, the hon.

minister outrivals his rival, Mr. Cannon, in his zeal to denounce conscription.

I read on column 3, page 4:

Mr. Sévigny stated that it was easy to find out who was responsible for the scandals unearthed by the Liberals. They are great in making charges, but they can prove nothing. As far as conscription was concerned, he stated he was as much opposed to that measure as Mr. Cannon and he added that the latter had consequently no right to raise any political agitation against him on that ground.

Mr. Sévigny was loudly acclaimed; as for Mr. Cannon, plaudits were rather weak in his favour and he was interrupted several times.

Again, at another meeting, at St. Odilon, the hon. minister protests against the very thought of such an iniquitous thing as conscription.

I will read once more from column 3, page 4—all about charges made—and you might find many more ad libitum:

As to the charges made by Mr. Cannon about broken pledges, Mr. Sévigny told Mr. Cannon he should be the last man to utter such reproaches. The man who would be entitled to do this, said Mr. Sévigny, is Mr. Ernest Roy, whom I defeated in 1911. As for you, you were not in the county of Dorchester, but you were busy fighting, in Charlevoix, Sir Rodolphe Forget, who crushed you. I do not mean by this that I deny my statements of 1911, for I do frankly admit that I did then make a mistake, but I deny you the right to come here and claim anything on behalf of a man who has not yet seen fit to fight by you. Mr. Sévigny then repeated his statements about the National Service, asserting that we would not have conscription and that this measure does not in any way imply conscription.

Now again, the Evénement of January 29—page 6, column 3—publishes another statement:

At the meeting held in the afternoon, at Sainte Aurélie, Hon. Mr. Sévigny did again reiterate his statement to the effect that there would be no conscription in the country. In most eloquent terms, the Minister of Inland Revenue pointed out the hateful results of a German victory. He made a generous appeal to all to unite in the struggle now kept on by the Allies for the triumph of right and justice.

But the climax of that campaign, Mr. Speaker, I find it in the Evénement of January 26, 1917, on the very eve of polling day. The paper speaks in the hon. minister's own name. It expresses itself as one that knows. It declares that the conscriptionist party is the Liberal party. That editorial is entitled:

A Bird in Hand is Worth Two in the Bush.

The voters of Dorchester are now perfectly informed: they know that they never shall have conscription under a Conservative Government; they do not know what they might have under a Liberal government.

[Mr. Delisle.]

The Conscription Party.

Lucien Cannon asks the electors of Dorchester to vote in his favour as against the new French Canadian Minister of Inland Revenue. And the arguments of Lucien Cannon, stripped of all the personal abuse which ornament his speeches worthy of a shameless politician, may be thus summarized:

Hon. Mr. Sévigny has changed his mind since 1911. He was then against the Laurier navy; he was even against any participation in the war; and he is now in favour of the National Service which, according to Lucien Cannon, must bring conscription with it. And Lucien Cannon states that he has the support of Sir Wilfrid Laurier to come and ask the electors of Dorchester to vote for him, as against the minister of a Government which is imposing too much upon the country and especially upon the French Canadians. On the other hand, Mr. Sévigny admits he has changed his mind since 1911 and of having followed the course of events which have also changed since that date. In 1911 it was the country's good interest to be pacifist; since 1914, it would be criminal to remain pacifist. Anyone who has heard that a horrible war has been declared in Europe must conscientiously realize that it would be criminal to remain a pacifist nowadays. Every great statesman, in France, in England, and everywhere else, has been forced, by the turn of events, to change policy since the outbreak of the war. The Hon. Mr. Sévigny represents the Borden Government's policy. This policy, that Government has drafted it and has even applied it. The whole country, Dorchester county, as well as the rest, is perfectly familiar with the Borden Government's policy, since the whole country has seen it applied for more than two years. If the Borden Government had meant conscription, it would already have been imposed. But they have declared they did not want it, that there is no use for it, and that they can sufficiently take a hand in the national defence without resorting to conscription.

Is Dorchester county just as sure of what would be the Liberal party's policy? Would it feel safer if the Liberal party were returned into power?

Lucien Cannon himself states in Ontario papers that he is in favour of our participation in the war. Sir Wilfrid Laurier's best lieutenants, as the Hon. Frank Oliver did state in the House of Commons, assert that the Borden Government has not done enough towards the war, that the Borden Government should impose conscription. All the Liberal newspapers cry for conscription; they promise to all the provinces of Canada that, should the Liberal party be returned to power, it would mean conscription. And Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the leader of the Liberal party, gives no denial to his lieutenants or to his organs who preach conscription—because Sir Wilfrid perfectly knows that his papers express the opinion of the majority of the Liberal party, and that is only with that conscription cry that the Liberal party has any chance of returning to power and to overthrow the Borden Government who have not done enough for England. Should the electors of Dorchester elect a Liberal representative and conscription come later on, they would have bad grace to complain that they have not been duly notified. They know what they have from the Conservative Government, they do not know what they could expect from a Liberal government. "A bird in hand is worth two in the bush." Thus speaketh the wisdom of nations.

After all this, the hon. Minister dares to pretend that he represents the province of Quebec, when he now votes for conscription. No, he does not represent it and, before long, he will have the opportunity to go and ask his friends, the Tories of Ontario, for a county, if he intends to sit again in this House, for if we are to believe that same paper, it seems that his good Tory friends have already offered him a dozen or so. I read from the same edition of the Evénement, January 22, 1917, another editorial entitled:

What Would Happen if Hon. Mr. Sévigny Were Defeated in Dorchester?

The hon. Mr. Sévigny would then be elected by acclamation in Ontario. What would happen if the hon. Mr. Sévigny were defeated in Dorchester?

The small Liberals go around claiming it would be irretrievable condemnation of the Borden Government; that this Government would be defeated and that the Governor would order general elections.

The real truth is not quite so dreadful.

In view of the bare possibility of defeat in Dorchester, three or four Ontario members have already tendered their resignation to Sir Robert Borden, in order to give the new French Canadian minister a county wherein he would be sure of being elected by acclamation.

The Ontarians have committed particular wrongs against the French Canadians; but we must, however, admit that they understand their civic duties otherwise than many of us.

If, then, hon. Mr. Sévigny were defeated in Dorchester, he would be elected by acclamation in some county of the province of Ontario. As Cartier, he would have to loyally put his talents and his influence at the service of his constituents, and instead of having a minister to represent and help them in the Dominion Parliament the electors of Dorchester would have a Cannon—on the Opposition benches. The Dominion Government would be less embarassed than the county of Dorchester.

And that is all.

Such was the case of Sir George Etienne Cartier who, on being appointed a minister, asked the electors of Montreal to ratify his ministerial mandate, and was defeated in Montreal. A Manitoba member gave him his seat and Cartier was elected in St. Boniface. Instead of exerting his talents and his ministerial influence in favour of the Montreal electors, Cartier loyally put them at the service of his constituents of St. Boniface. The Ottawa Government was not otherwise affected by the defection of the Montreal electors.

Well! let him get ready, Mr. Speaker, and fall in with his generous supporters. The province of Quebec cannot recognize in him the true representative of her views and feelings. She will prove it to him when he will run the gauntlet of an election even in Dorchester.

I cannot support this measure, because it is neither fair nor constitutional, and above all because my fellow-citizens are unanimously against it. When I consider the stand taken by the representative of the province of Quebec in the cabinet, who disregards the opinion and the feelings of his fellow-citizens, I cannot but protest both orally and by my vote.

Mr. EDMOND FORTIER (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, as I do not intend taking up uselessly the time of the House, I shall dispense with repeating what many members have with good reason done and said against the Bill No. 75 introduced by the hon. Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden). Therefore, without any dilly-dallying, I shall deal with the subject and consider a few of the outstanding features of this debate, which has been going on for two weeks already.

Representing a rural division, I cannot let this opportunity go by without letting this House and the country know the stand I believe it my duty to take upon this selective conscription Bill, as well as on the amendment proposed by the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). As for the amendment to the amendment, I consider it perfectly useless and I can immediately declare I shall vote against it.

When the extension of the parliamentary term was voted last year, not a single member of this House would have surmised that such a measure as conscription would be imposed upon the country. Since that extension has been granted, the leaders of both parties, as well as their friends, have declared that conscription would not be imposed. Volunteering alone was to be established for enlisting in His Majesty's imperial army, in order to assist the Allies and more especially the mother country and France, who are the principal powers having joined other countries to avenge outraged Belgium, to protect minorities and democracies, whilst safeguarding the rights of justice and liberty against Prussian barbarity, the vandalism of the Central powers of Europe and of their Balkan allies.

This war, Mr. Speaker, is not waged against any country in particular. It is rather against this Prussian militarism, this vandalism organized by Germany and her allies, in order to conquer and to subdue the world by means of this revolting prussianism of the Huns and assume world-wide supremacy. In order to reach their ends, the foe had to first strike at the most formidable powers, such as France, England and Russia, by overrunning smaller countries who are the martyrs of patriotism and whose heroism even exceeds all that man would have supposed in those little nations; I refer particularly to Belgium and to Serbia, to whom defence and protection had been promised. France and England, who had undertaken to protect those countries, in respecting their treaties, found themselves in honour bound to fulfil their engagements, whilst defending themselves against the foe of the democratic nations.

Mr. Speaker, our mother countries being at war, their colonies are equally at war, and every one of them should, in proportion to its financial circumstances and the total amount of its population, aid by all possible means the Entente Allies to win a final victory and to establish a permanent peace. Patriotically, Canada rose up to the expectations of the mother country and of our allies by contributing over 420,000 volunteers, armed and equipped by the country and placed in the imperial armies' service. Of course, voluntary enlistment was bound to subside after a while, and such falling off was accentuated by the quarrels which arose among the members of the cabinet who in so doing have stopped recruiting; and also by the unspeakable manner in which the French Canadians of the province of Quebec were treated by certain fanatics who are ever making it their study to insult the French people of this province.

It has been said and repeated, in this House, that we should sacrifice everything, even to our last man and our last dollar for the Allies' defence. I do not hesitate to state, Mr. Speaker, that, under the present circumstances, it would be rashness. All the democratic countries are as much interested as we are in aiding the Entente Allies in this great conflict which threatens liberty and justice and in securing a final and universal peace.

How many of those countries, Mr. Speaker, have done as much as Canada, both in men and in financial aid, since this war began and up to date? How many of those democratic countries have been as generous as we, when their interests were at stake just as much as our own? Who, among all those people, would be ready to shed their blood, give their last man and drain their finances—as some Canadian Imperialists would want Canada to do—to secure a victory which can be hoped for without doing so much, when those other countries shall have contributed their proportianl share? Why, Mr. Speaker, should Canada give her men and drain her finances for the benefit of the neutrals and of the patronage sappers, profiteering out of our generosity, in favour of our political mountebanks whose patriotism is limited by the manger and the fat jobs. I have no hesitation in stating, Mr. Speaker, that until now, Canada has done her full share, and more than her share. I do not hesitate to say that it is not necessary to establish this conscription which has been imposed upon the Prime Minister by certain financial vultures. In my opinion, the system of volunteering, if well organized, would suffice to contribute our quota of the necessary reserves. And were that system inadequate, we would only have to reduce the number of divisions which the Prime Minister has had the temerity to promise, on his own responsibility, without first submitting this rash pledge to the approval of the leading men of the country. To promise without previous consultation, for and on behalf of Canada, 500,000 men, or four full divisions with their reserve forces, without a mandate from the people. I say, Mr. Speaker, that only a wilfully blind man could have done such a thing. The conscription Bill, now before this House, would never have been needed, if the means taken to further voluntary recruiting had been rational and if certain classes of our fellow-citizens had not been wounded in their feelings by the aspersions lavished on their nationality, their patriotism and their loyalty to the British Crown, as well as on their mentality.

Under such circumstances, it was only natural that the province of Quebec should have contributed a smaller number of volunteers, and more than that, we see here in this very House, while discussing this measure, an individual arrogating to himself the title of the western lion,—attempting to compare the population of Quebec to a lamb, that faithful friend of John the Baptist, the patron saint of the French Canadians. Mr. Speaker, were I asked to give my preference to one of these quadrupeds, I would certainly grant it to the Quebec lamb rather than to the Imperialist bull from Red Deer, the representative of the region of the wild buffaloes of yore. When discussing this measure, our friends on the other side of the House rejoiced at the defection of certain Liberal members. To such, may I be allowed to say that Sir Wilfrid Laurier is, in this House, the personification of loyalty and of democracy, respecting in others the liberty of thought, of judgment and of speech. And that loyalty may advantageously compare with that of the Prime Minister who, one day, boasting of British fair play, was the first to apply the gag to the leader of the Opposition, just to prevent the discussion of one of the most important measures submitted to this House. On this side, Mr. Speaker,—I mean on the Liberal side—the leaders do not gag any one. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, true to that principle of freedom of action, has given all possible latitude to those of his partisans who think they should follow their mind and their conscience's dictates, as free men, and part from those who, conscientiously also, while relying upon the rights of the people whom we no longer represent here, believe they should differ from those who are opposed to submitting this most important question to the sovereign people of this country whom apparently it is the intention to gag.

When he submitted this conscription Bill for its first reading, the Prime Minister stated that we needed a greater number of men, because enlistment was ebbing; hence, the need for immediate conscription. Well, Mr. Speaker, if the Allies need more men, is it a necessity that Canada should contribute them, and that, in order to do so, selective conscription should be established in this country? I say: no. If the democratic countries, just as interested as the United States and Canada may be, do their duty as well as the latter has done heretofore, there is no need for conscription. When the United States, who are just entering this conflict, will have given the Allies their aid in the same proportion as Canada has done, they will necessarily have some six or eight million men up against the Huns; a sufficient number to settle them for good.

Under such circumstances, why should Canada have conscription when, with a good voluntary recruiting system, we might continue what we have been doing ever since war started, and thereby creating a feeling of admiration for Canada's generosity towards the Allies as well as towards the mother country.

For all the reasons I have just given, Mr. Speaker, I shall support by my vote the amendment proposed by the leader of the Opposition, and I shall oppose, also by my vote, the second reading of the Military Service Act of 1917, inasmuch as we do not any longer hold any mandate from the people who, alone, have the required authority during these most critical times for us, and who must be consulted. This consultation would restore peace in the country, put an end to the uneasiness now existing among the people of the Dominion and put a stop to that feeling of animosity which unfortunately, is growing from day to day between the English and French speaking Canadians. Before taking my seat, I appeal to the Prime Minister to withdraw this measure which would certainly be a source of trouble in the country, should it be enforced.

Mr. J. B. BOURASSA (Lévis): Mr. Speaker, it is past two o'clock and the cock will soon be crowing, consequently, I will be very short. A few days ago, the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Pardee), when speaking about conscription and as to the referendum, stated that this world was full of paradoxes. In our present circumstances, this is particularly true, but I think it might also be true to say that everywhere, among nations as well as among individuals, there are many points of similarity. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, in 1914, we have seen a man rise up before the nations of Europe. He had not consulted his people. He had not consulted his allies, but alone, standing by himself, he said to Europe: Liberty is no more, independence does not exist, the treaties mere scraps of paper, I shall set up a throne to autocracy, which I will build upon agonizing democracy and upon it I shall dominate the world. Again indeed, Mr. Speaker, we have also seen in our country another man rise who had not consulted the people, and we heard him say to Canada: I alone represent liberty; I alone represent independence, I alone represent right in the country—the constitution scraps of paper; thus imitating the overseas Kaiser. We can therefore say that we also have our own Kaiser here, in Canada.

I have asked myself, Mr. Speaker, what right the Prime Minister had, in the name of Canada, and without consulting the electors of Canada to promise to give 500,000 men. I have studied, Mr. Speaker, I have considered the question on all its sides, and I have not been able to understand the why and the wherefore, except, Mr. Speaker, that it would have been a dream. I wondered if we had not been struck by the magic wand of a mischievous fairy in the service of the Government, if we had not been thrown back for ages and centuries to that distant era when there were no subjects, when there were only serfs and a master who could dispose of their wealth, of their blood and of their flesh, to suit his fancy.

Now, must we accept this situation such as offered us? Who is asking for 500,000 men? Is it England? If I did correctly understand what has been said of late, never did England ask the Prime Minister to contribute 500,000 men; if I well understood what has been said in Franre and what has been printed in France, Canada will not need to contribute 500,000 men. And, besides, that balance of a total amount of 500,000 men which they ask us, what does that represent in the present conflict where we are fighting together, or against one another, some twenty millions of men; and if that total of 100,000 should have no influence upon the result, we would be forced to admit that this balance of the 500,000 men which, before two months, six months or a year are over, may perhaps be raised to two or three hundred thousand men, will be useless; that we are needlessly depriving Canada of these men.

There are, at present, so we are told, more than 100,000 of our men in England. For more than a year, these men have been over there; that is to say that, for over a year, the country has been deprived of their help, agriculture has been deprived of the aid of a great part of these 100,000 men, trade has likewise been deprived of the help of these 100,000 men, and, yet what can they have done for the Allies' cause? What good have they been to the Allies, since they have not yet been at the front? And those other 100,000 men they are asking us, when will they reach Europe? Before 100,000 men can be landed in Europe, it will take at least one year, and that also means that for one year our country will be deprived of the labour of these 100,000 men, and that means moreover that the Allies will not have the aid of these 100,000 men before another year. That would be, you must admit it, unfortunate, both for the farmers and for the manufacturers of our country. In short, we should not deprive farming of its necessary hands, nor our mills and factories of the labour essential to their activities. I might say the same thing as to our commercial firms and here, perhaps, it might not be out of order to inquire as to what would become of our important firms such as, for instance, the Ames, Holden & McCready Company, of Montreal; it is safe to say, as for the latter, in particular, they would no longer be able to realize, within a year, about 120 per cent, net profits.

This compulsory Military Service Act is put before the country and then they give, as a reason, that the province of Quebec has not done her duty. We should then infer that this conscription Act would have the province of Quebec as its object, and that, to quite an extent. Can these gentlemen yet wonder why the province of Quebec has not contributed just as many men as they would like to see on the fields of battle? Ever since the war began, or rather, as I should have said, ever since 1911, there has been lacking in the province of Quebec an essential element, I might even say an indispensable element for the success of recruiting; that element was the trust that this province should have had in her rulers. Deceived in 1911, deceived ever since, deceived by all and more especially by the Government leaders, Quebec has come down to the point of asking herself in whom she may trust. The Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) has declared before this House and before the country that there would be no question of conscription in Canada; during the session of 1916 he again asserted it explicitly. He may probably answer us that events have changed, that since 1916 circumstances have become so serious and the future so gloomy that he has been compelled to modify his opinion. But, Mr. Speaker, in the course of January last, could not the Government then realize the situation. Through the seconder of the Address in reply to the Governor General's speech (Mr. Descarries) did not the Government inform us that there would never be any conscription in this country, and after this declaration has any member of the Cabinet stated that the hon. member for Jacques Cartier had unwisely spoken or that he had not expressed the whole truth?

I would ask those hon. members who, ever since the war started have never ceased to abuse us, if they would have acted any other way than the province of Quebec has seen fit to do. No, Mr. Speaker, for some time there has passed over the province of Quebec a storm of abuse of every description; a storm of hysterical abuse and I do beg you to believe, Mr. Speaker, that I use the term "hysterical" to be decent and in order to not apply the true name to the sickness now affecting the men who attack us. That sickness, if I can judge of it by the way some of the members of the right are behaving, has become a chronic one. When some of those gentlemen speak of the province of Quebec and of the French Canadians, you can see hatred depicted upon their faces, and their eyes sparkle with joy at every abusive word uttered against us; and when I hear them vomit this abuse, I always imagine I hear the sounds uttered by a Hun pirate who, after having sunk the ship, cries and yells out to his gunners the order to sink the life boats also. They pretend that the province of Quebec, in particular, and Canada, generally, have not done enough for the war. Let us sum up the situation: Canada has contributed more that 400,000 men, she therefore had to deprive herself of that many. She has paid these soldiers' expenses, both at home and abroad, and considering our total enlistments in proportion to our numbers, as compared with the corresponding figures for the United States, France or England, we cannot come to any other conclusion than this one: That Canada has done her duty, not only as regards the number of enlisted men, but also as regards money contributions. Right here, Mr. Speaker, it may perhaps be appropriate to mention the fact that our Canadian soldiers draw $1.10 per day, whilst in France they only get 25 centimes; that means, therefore, that our army of 400,000 men represents, as far as expenses are concerned for pay only, 9,000,000 men.

Mr. Speaker, among other insults they were pleased to hurl against Quebec is this one: They call us "slackers". If I can understand well enough the meaning of this term, I believe it would be what we call in French "tirer de l'arrière." I have endeavoured to find in Quebec and, particularly, in the Quebec district, what they do call slackers. After lots of trouble, I must admit that I actually found only one of them. I remembered that, last year, the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Sévigny) had it widely advertised by papers in his pay that he was going to raise a regiment and lead it himself across the deep to slay as many Germans as possible. Did he even go midway? That is a thing I could not vouch for, but what I do positively know is that the regiment was never raised and that the hon. member for Dorchester, instead of being in the trenches, is now occuprying a seat in the cabinet.

Mr. Speaker, we find everywhere some points of resemblance, as I have already stated. The hon. member's conduct reminds me of the story of a certain King of France. History reports that this king was most terrible when he spoke of combats; he was ever ready to declare war against his neighbours but, as soon as he heard the clash of swords and the clearing of the decks, he became such a poltroon that he would literally swoon as soon as the word "battle" would be mentioned to him. If my memory serves me right, that king was Charles the Bald.

Was it fear that thus inspired the member for Dorchester? I don't believe it. He cannot have studied the theory of Safety First, but he must have rather believed that he would be giving a better proof of intense patriotism in immolating himself upon the altar of sacrifice for the salvation of the French Canadian nation.

Quebec has not made enough sacrifices, has not contributed her share in men, do they say? I might perhaps be allowed to read to this House the following extract of a letter from Captain William Chandor Innes, of Toronto; here is how he speaks of the province of Quebec's contribution.

This letter had been addressed to the Toronto Telegram where its publication was refused, but it came through anyway.

After the first contingent, twelve French Canadian battalions were authorized: the 22nd, the 41st, the 57th, the 150th, the 163rd, the 165th, the 167th, the 178th, the 189th, the 206th, the 230th and the 233rd. The larger part of those units were levied and sent for overseas service, and they have covered themselves with glory. You have only to glance over last year's list of dead and wounded, and you will see that the French Canadians are largely represented.

Besides these figures which amount to a total of 17,000, the province of Quebec has contributed three stationary hospitals and a field battery. With the number of French Canadians disseminated among the various English battalions, particularly in the Engineering and Forestry battalion (in which the French Canadians represent 90 per cent), I believe we may reach a total amount of 20,000 men from the province of Quebec.

The Laval University has, moreover, furnished an ambulance corps (one of the best in the Allies' service, according to despatches) and a dental corps; more than that, a large number of these students and graduates make themselves useful in various ways at the front. The Maritime Provinces have contributed a French Canadian battalion and the English battalions from that section of the country count over 3,000 French Canadians in their ranks the western provinces have in their local battalions more than 4,000 French Canadians.

You might allow me to say a few words about the recruiting in the province of Quebec, where I have resided several years. I know the French Canadian as a loyal subject in the full sense of the word, and it would be most unfair and erroneous to size him up after the Bourassa standard. Those unfortunate comparisons between Quebec and the other provinces as to recruiting, should never have been made.

He states that, since the first contingent was recruited, twelve Canadian battalions were authorized: the 22nd, the 41st, the 57th, the 150th, etc. Most of these units have been levied and sent away on overseas service where they have covered themselves with glory. You only have to glance over the list of last year's dead and wounded and you will see that the Canadians are largely represented.

Besides these figures which form a total of 17,000 men, the province of Quebec has contributed three stationary hospitals, one field battery, and many French Canadians disseminated among the various English battalions, especially in the Engineering and Forestry battalion. And, moreover, Laval University has furnished an Ambulance corps, one of the finest in the Allies' service—so say the despatches—and a corps of dental-surgeons.

I refrain, Mr. Speaker, from going through this list which makes us really understand what this impartial Englishman says of the province of Quebec.

On the other side, on your right, Mr. Speaker, there seems to be two parties who differ in their ways, but whose efforts have the same object. They want to weaken the country in order to reign. One of them tries to weaken the country by splitting it; it has set the English race against the French race. A gale of abuse coming from there has blown over the province of Quebec, a storm of hatred has fallen upon us. Those who compose it believe they are the greatest men of their race, greater than the British Empire, truer than history, mightier than right, more patriotic than the French and English struggling together shoulder to shoulder in the most terrible war the world has ever seen. They are blending their blood for the defence of a grand idea, for the triumph of a holy cause: Liberty. That should certainly be enough to force strong roots and wide branches to sprout from the tree of concord in the fertile soil watered by French blood and by English blood, and in its shade the Canadian nation could find a safe shelter.

The other party wants to weaken the people by impoverishing them. It shouts for poverty; it will soon shout for misery. It has given a free hand to speculation, to monopoly, to stock-jobbing, to such an extent that the old den of the Forty Thieves would be too small to shelter all the public embezzlers and squanderers. They have hoarded up fortunes. Gold is powerful, I know it, powerful for an individual, for a family, for a caste. However, open the history of nations, and you will have to admit that there still is a greater power, which has overthrown institutions which had braved storms for centuries. Beware! the people are patient, because they are strong. Beware! you have sown the wind; very soon, harvest time will be with you, and you will gather the storm. For my part, I deny myself the right to coercion. Following my leader's example, I recognize only one master in the country, it is the one who pays, it is the one who suffers, who prays, who supplies the blood and the flesh for cannon. It is him I want to consult and I will bend before his supreme will.

We are now threatened with civil war and I cannot see wherein the Allies could get any benefit from it. For my part, I ask the Government to well consider the scope of their Act; it is an extreme and destructive measure, which may give results far contrary to those expected. I recall what stand was taken in 1911 to impose an appeal on the people. It was then alleged that the Liberal government had not the right to modify our commercial relations with the United States without consulting the Canadian people. How much more important is the legislation now before us, since it actually amends our own constitution to quite an extent?

Mr. OVIDE BROUILLARD (Drummond-Arthabaska): Mr. Speaker, no doubt the Prime Minister of Canada does to-day realize to what extent the autocratic character of his measure is unseasonable. We are under the threat of a calamity which, from the Canadian point of view, shall be irreparable. Civil war is at our very doors. I regret, Mr. Speaker, that I should have to declare that the reasons put forward by the Premier do not have, as I can see them, the merit of sincerity. I have come to the point of asking myself what kind of sickness attacks the Government leader, every time he comes back to us from England. When he first returned, in 1913, he raised quite a storm in this country by telling us that England did not know what to do. The Empire was on the point of foundering if Canada did not immediately vote thirty-five million dollars in order to ensure the building of three dreadnoughts to increase the British naval forces. The people as well as the Parliament of this country were put under the impression that the voting of such a sum would meet the British government's objects and wishes. Well, since then the very facts have demonstrated that England had never asked us a single dollar. The Prime Minister's reputation must necessarily suffer from this, even to-day, a severe counter-blow, and he can have no fault to find if his hysterical imperlialism leaves us quite unconcerned.

This is not, however, the only time that the Premier has allowed his word to falter. Every one in this House remembers that when he introduced the Bill demanding the grant of thirty-five millions to England, the Prime Minister stated that if such legislation were not passed, he would immediately make an appeal to the people.

Well, that legislation did not pass and there has been no appeal to the people. That was four years ago—yes, four years have already passed and never since has the Prime Minister even dreamed of thinking that the first care of a man of honour is to redeem his pledged word—it would surely not be an act of temerity on my part, should I to-day assert that this appeal to the people is what the leader of the Cabinet apprehends the most. And, judging the present by the past, I have no hesitation in saying that the Prime Minister seems more anxious to remain in power than to redeem his pledged troth. The measure now before the House, a measure of exceptional importance, is submitted to us as being of imperious necessity. The only guarantee we have of that necessity, is the word of the Prime Minister. For my part, that is not sufficient, past experience justifies me in demanding something more substantial. I regret that I should be obliged to so express myself, but, in fine, it is no fault of mine if the leader of the Government has put himself in such a position that a reputable backer is now demanded in support of his word.

Admitting I am quite unable to discuss the Bill now before the House from the legal point of view, I will simply limit myself to state in a few words what I think of it from the national and economic standpoint, I have most heartily agreed to our full participation in the present conflict. And I am one of those who declare, without any hesitation, that our duty is to continue the effort so generously put forth up to date. It is most unfortunate, however, that the Government should have tolerated speculations which, in these critical times, have a criminal character.

The attitude taken by the American government since the United States have entered into the war, shows plainly to what extent our rulers have been careless, not to use a harsher expression. The blood imposition was already painful enough, without adding to it the scandals which have kept on increasing since the beginning of the war. Whatever be the case, our duty would have remained the same, and those who have tolerated the abominations we did witness, must bear their full share of responsibility before history.

I admit I am unable to see the opportunity of the measure now before this House. A few months ago, the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. Bennett) enthroned as head of the National Service, spent hundreds of thousands of dollars to draw American labour towards our western prairies. That step was a straight admission of the lack of hands to perform the required labour in this country. To-day it is perfectly admitted that this effort of the hon. member for Calgary was a lamentable failure. Since then, the American people have joined hands with the Allies, and no one ignores that we can expect nothing from the support our neighbours might have given us. The lack of farm labour is being daily more visible and it is to my personal knowledge that, in the province of Quebec, our farmers are seriously anxious to know how they may be able to gather in their wheat and their hay. The same anxiety exists in other provinces. Recruiting, although less active, is just the same taking away every month thousands of helpers from the farm fields. Every day we are being informed that the Allies are crying for munitions and still more munitions. How will we be able to feed our soldiers and supply them the means of defence if, through an improvident policy, we put ourselves in the impossibility of producing and of gathering in. It has been stated that Russia's attitude was one of the main reasons demanding a more strenuous effort on our part. That reason no longer exists, and the Russian victories are now becoming a subject of admiration for the civilized world.

The United States have now thrown themselves, body and soul, into the furnace. The millions of soldiers they will add to the Allied forces will soon give an overwhelming numerical superiority to the cause of the Allies. On the one hand, the Allies have a superabundance of soldiers; on the other, they need what we are in a position to furnish them: ammunition and bread.

Why should the Government be so obstinately bent upon placing us in the actual impossibility of doing that which would be the most useful to the common cause? Is it only to redeem that imprudent boast of contributing five hundred thousand men? It would be simply dispensing with the fulfilment of a national duty, just to justify an arrogant personal boast. It would be a crime of high treason against our own country. Is it, as some have stated, in order to better reach the province of Quebec? That would be most hateful and infamous; Quebec knows her duty, and she needs no one to dictate it to her.

I do repeat what I said in opening my remarks; we are threatened by Civil war—I do not see what the Allies could gain by it. I realize what their cause might lose through it. For my part, I beg the Government to duly reconsider the scope of their Act. It is an extreme measure and one evolved by extremists. Statesmen should know how to maintain fair equipoise, more so in a country like ours. Moderation only and a fair appeal to the best sentiments of the whole nation, will give the most desirable results.

I still remember that in 1911, the then Opposition forced an appeal to the people, alleging that the Liberal government had no right to modify our commercial intercourse with the United States, without first consulting the people. How much more important is the proposed legislation now submitted to us. The exchange of commercial commodities is like child's play compared to the blood sacrifice you wish to impose upon us.

These are, Mr. Speaker, some of the reasons which may expose the grounds upon which I have decided to vote against the Government's measure, and which will induce me to support the amendment offered by the right hon. leader of the Opposition.

Mr. SPEAKER: With respect to the amendment to the amendment, moved by the hon. member for Berthier (Mr. Barrette), a point of order was raised by the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Boivin) as to whether it could properly be received. To my mind, there is no question that the amendment to the amendment is in order, and can properly be entertained by the House.

The House divided on the amendment to the amendment (Mr. Barrette) for the six months' hoist, which was declared lost on the following division:

Lalor,

Pairs on Sir Wilfrid Laurier's Amendment for Referendum:

D. D. McKenzie,	Dugald Stewart,
W. Carroll,	H. B. Tremaine,
E. M. Macdonald,	J. Stanfield,
Wm. Pugsley,	J. J. Carrick.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I was paired with the hon. member for Thunder Bay and Rainy River (Mr. Carrick). Had I voted, I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. DUGALD STEWART: I was paired with the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie). Had I voted I would have voted against the amendment.

Mr. SPEAKER: The question is on the main motion.

Mr. ARTHUR B. COPP (Westmorland): I am sure that during the debate on this Bill, hon. members must have been impressed with the fact that all were of one mind with regard to the main question—the duty and the intention of Canada to assist in every way within her power to assist our allies in the great struggle in which we are engaged.

Mr. SPEAKER: I understand that the hon. member is speaking on the main motion?

Mr. COPP: Yes. It seems to me that the only line of cleavage between those who differ in this debate is on the question whether this Bill affords the best means of bringing our greatest force to the assistance of the Allies. This measure has given me a great deal of thought. I have approached it with an entirely open mind—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. COPP: —and have carefully followed the debate, that I might decide my course fairly, and as wisely as I could, in this matter.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must ask hon. members to maintain order.

Mr. COPP: During the past two weeks, I have given to hon. gentlemen discussing this measure, a respectful hearing; I ask of them the same. The discussion in this House has not followed political party lines, but each member has sought to understand the question and has voted as his conscience dictated. The main argument of those who support the Bill, as well as I have been able to understand it, is that the Prime Minister, having attended the Imperial Conference overseas during the recess, has come back imbued with the idea that our boys at the front must have reinforcements, and to get them we must introduce a conscription measure because voluntary enlistment, which had been taken up by the Government and endorsed by the leader of the Opposition, has fallen down. Some hon. members who usually do not support the Government have come to the same conclusion, but their reasoning is altogether different.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. COPP: I put myself on record here, I care not what hon. members may say, "hear, hear," or with what derision they may treat my statements—I put myself on record that I am firmly at one with other hon. members as to what Canada's duty is in this crisis; I believe that we should give every possible assistance to the Allies in this war both in men and money . But the question that arises in my mind is, whether, in order to send the necessary reinforcements to the front at this time, it is better to have coercion and compulsion in the form of this Military Service Bill, or whether it is better to follow the course declared for by the Prime Minister time and time again since the war broke out, and carry on voluntary enlistment. Hon. members who support this Bill tell us that voluntary enlistment has fallen down, and that we cannot raise the necessary reinforcements except by enacting this Military Service Bill and forcing men to go to the front. Yet when you follow the arguments you find that even those who declare that we must have this Military Service Bill because we need these reinforcements and need them now, invariably tell us that the Bill is not to be brought into effect except by Order in Council, as provided in the Bill itself. If this measure is left on the statute book and not brought into effect voluntary enlistment is killed. That means that we cannot get the men in any way. I say it would be far better to continue voluntary enlistment than place a coercive measure on the statute book which will not be effective, which will not even be enforced. I have just returned from a few days in my own constituency, and while there I received information of the most reliable kind that a member of the other Chamber, a strong supporter and appointee of this Government, was going through the length and breadth of the different counties of that province, absolutely assuring the people of those counties that this measure would not be brought into force. Now, if that statement is being made —and that it is being made I am assured by most reliable authority—and if the Government are not going to bring into effect the Military Service Bill, and bring it in at once, then, I say, the effect of passing it would be absolutely to put Canada out of this war. For voluntary enlistment is at a standstill, and if this Military Service Bill is to be made the law and yet not be brought into force, while you get no voluntary enlistment from any part of the country, you certainly cannot raise reinforcements under a law that is not in operation.

The Prime Minister on January 1, 1916, told the world that Canada would offer 500,000 men to assist the Allied Powers. No one found particular fault with that except that the statement was made by the right hon. gentleman on his own responsibility. In January of that year, when the House met, the right hon. gentleman made the statement that recruiting and voluntary enlistment were satisfactory, and that there would be no conscription and no compulsion. He reiterated that statement on different occasions, and last January he made the same statement at the opening of this House. The argument made by hon. gentlemen in supporting this measure is that the present pressing need at the present time of men influenced the Government in bringing down this Bill. It does seem rather singular that the number of men that the Prime Minister asks for in connection with this Bill coincides exactly with the number of men he said was required eighteen months ago. When the Prime Minister brought home the demand for more men two months ago, he had the same number of reinforcements in mind that he had eighteen months ago when he made the statement that Canada would supply 500,000 men.

I am in favour of voluntary enlistment. That has been followed up in the past. I have spent a good deal of time myself assisting in getting recruits in my own portion of New Brunswick, and I am glad to say that the effort in my province has been very successful, indeed. Much has been said in regard to other sections of Canada, but I want to pay a tribute to my Acadian friends in Westmorland, New Brunswick, particularly for the manner in which they have enlisted. Westmorland, according to population, I believe, has given its full proportion of troops of both races. I went on public platforms and on tours holding open air meetings and inducing as far as I could, the young men of my own county to rally to the flag and do their part. I did not say to them: You should go. I left it to their consciences to decide as to how the matter appealed to them. I appealed to the upright, honest, intelligent young men of my county to determine for themselves whether they were going to wait for this coercive measure or whether they were going to volunteer. If recruiting were carried on in a proper manner, and if the matter were taken hold of in an intelligent way, and free from any political bias, I believe the young men of Canada would respond to the call and would put themselves on record in such a way that Canada would not be in danger of being told in future years that coercion had to be adopted to get the 500,000 men that were promised to the Allied Powers. It is my opinion, based on the information I have, that a splendid class of men would respond if the call were properly made by a united country and united parties.

I did not rise for the purpose of detaining the House at any length. I am convinced that a better, an easier and a more reasonable way to get men to go to the front and fill the gaps in the ranks would be to continue thoroughly and systematically the volunteer recruiting campaign. Many arguments have been used during this debate. There is nothing new left to bring to the attention of the House. Many things have been said in regard to the conscription of man power, the conscription of wealth, the conscription of resources and the levying of a tax on those who are best able to stand it for the purpose of carrying on this war. I am with those who have put themselves on record as being in favour of the wealth of this country bearing a large part of the financial burden of this war instead of handing it down to posterity by long term loans. Some hon. gentlemen have spoken of the United States coming into this war and have expressed the belief that probably the United States would furnish more men and that the demand upon Canada would not be so great. I am not in sympathy with that view of the situation. I think Canada should send every man she can irrespective of what our neighbours to the south of us do. The more they send and the more Canada sends the nearer will be the ending of this great struggle. But, I do not see very much difference between the Americans going over to fill up the gaps in the Canadian lines than the Government going to the United States and getting money to pay our boys for fighting at the front. We get that assistance from them and we work hand in hand for the betterment of our soldiers and the betterment of the country generally. I have always had a very strong feeling that the financial arrangements in connection with the support given to the dependents of soldiers have not been upon a proper basis. I have always frowned upon the idea that the dependents of soldiers who have gone to the front to protect our homes, our property and our lives, should be forced to look to charity for a part of their support. Times without number the wives and dependents of soldiers at the front have come to my office, making inquiries of me as to the money coming to them from the Patriotic Fund, and when I would explain to them where they had to go to obtain it they absolutely resented the idea of going around from pillar to post and asking for a sum of money from the Patriotic Fund. I never thought it was a proper way of giving assistance, and it looked like seeking for charity. Now that the referendum has been defeated, and the Bill now before the House must soon become the law of the country, if we are going to conscript the young men of Canada to go and fight our battles by compulsion, we should, at least, sweep away any thought or idea that their dependents must look to charity for support. It was all very well—I would not say it was very well, but it was different—under the voluntary enlistment. Every man knew what was expected of him, what pay, separation allowance and Patriotic Fund allowance would be coming to him and his family. After having all this information and knowledge, he placed himself before the country as a recruit, to go forward in defence of his flag and Empire. This situation did not apply to him so strongly, to my mind, as it applies to the Government to-day, when they are passing the Military Service Bill, and going to force men to go to the front. When a man leaves his employment, throws up a good job, perhaps, and goes to the front, his dependents should not be forced to throw themselves upon charity for their support. The Government should provide funds for their support, before the man is forced to enlist. He should have definite assurance, not simply a statement from some one that the fund is doing wondrous things for the soldiers and dependents. If a man is sent to the front by force, the question of the support of his dependents should not be left to charity, or in the hands of any committee, or left topsy turvy, so that he would not know where the support of his wife, his widowed mother or family would come from. Therefore I move:

That all the words of the motion after the word "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:—

That the further consideration of this Bill be deferred until such adequate provision has been made for the dependents of soldiers enlisted for overseas as will remove the necessity of raising money by public subscription for their support.

Mr. SPEAKER: If I had reference solely to section 54 of the British North America Act and rule 77 of this House, and, perhaps, to rule 40, as to the question of notice, I would feel disposed to rule the proposed amendment out of order. But in view of decisions which have heretofore been given in this House upon questions of a similar character, I have some doubt in my mind as to whether I would be justified in making strict application of the rules. I made reference to the doubt in my mind for the reason that I do not wish my decision in this instance to be regarded as a precedent, leaving it open to me to go into the subject more fully when I have better opportunity.

Right Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I hope my hon. friend will not regard me as wanting in respect for him if I do not dwell at any great length upon the observations with which he has favoured the House at four o'clock in the morning. Indeed, I think we would all have been very grateful to him if he had made an endeavour to express himself a little more concisely. I was not able to follow his argument in every respect. During one portion of his remarks, it seemed to be his conclusion that if this Bill should pass we shall not be able to get any more men, and I also understood his conclusion to be, that if this Bill does not pass we shall not be able to get any more men.

Mr. COPP: I said we would not get any more men under the voluntary enlistment.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: That is the way my hon. friend's remarks impressed me.

[Mr. Copp.]

My hon. friend's amendment is obviously a purely dilatory motion.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Intended as such, and intended as nothing else; and I desire to say that the Government does not propose that any such dilatory amendment shall stand in the way of the second reading of this Bill. In order to relieve my hon. friend's mind, I may also assure him that the Bill will be put in force.

With respect to his observations as to the Patriotic Fund, let me make one or two very brief remarks. The gallant men who are fighting at the front for Canada to-day are as well provided for, in every respect, as any men who are now doing battle for the cause of civilization and humanity in the Allied armies. It is customary in all countries, not only in Canada but in Great Britain, in Australia, in every dominion in this Empire, and in the United States, to make provision for certain matters which are not usually dealt with by the Government of the country. A magnificent example was afforded to us only a few days ago when, in a single week's campaign the people of the United States, by voluntary contribution, laid aside $130,000,000 or thereabouts, for aid to their troops who were going to the front. We have done the same thing in this country, not only for our own men, but for the men of the Mother Country, the soldiers and the sailors who are fighting for the Empire. We raised, I do not know how many million dollars in Canada for the British Red Cross Fund. We raised pretty well up to a million dollars by voluntary contribution in this country for the sailors of the Empire who are maintaining their splendid vigil in the North Sea, and safeguarding the rights and the interests, not only of the Mother Country, but of the people of Canada, by their courage and sacrifice and by the toil and the hardship which they are enduring there. We have raised magnificent sums of money for the Canadian Red Cross Fund, for the War Contingent Association, for the Canadian Patriotic Fund.

There is no charity associated or connected with the Canadian Patriotic Fund. That Fund is an organization established for a national purpose by an Act of this Parliament to which my hon. friend himself gave his assent, which passed this House without question, and which has the endorsement and sanction of the people.

We have done many other things, Mr. Speaker. We have raised large sums of money for the relief of the people of devastated Belgium. We have aided the people of Serbia. In every possible way by voluntary contribution the people have done their full share, and I am thankful for it; it has been a blessing not only to those for whose benefit these sums were raised, but also to those who made the contributions.

When my hon. friend, therefore, at this hour attempts to delay indefinitely the passage of this Bill by a motion purely of a dilatory character, and intended as such, and seeks to bring the Canadian Patriotic Fund into discredit before the people of Canada and of the Empire, I say that I have no sympathy either with his motion or his motive, and without any hesitation whatever I declare to this House that the Government cannot accept it.

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Edmonton): Mr. Speaker, I am more than astonished to hear the Prime Minister——

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. OLIVER: I am more than astonished to hear the Prime Minister declare that a motion which affects the welfare and the interests of those who are dependent upon our soldiers who are fighting at the front——

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. OLIVER: —is a dilatory motion——

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. OLIVER: —and one that should not be considered by this House. I should like to take this opportunity, even at this late hour in the morning——

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. OLIVER: —of saying that if the Prime Minister cannot agree with the hon. gentleman (Mr. Copp) who has just spoken, neither can I agree with the Prime Minister.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. OLIVER: We have had experience in matters affecting the war and the support of those who are carrying on the war which leads some of us to the conclusion that some of the things that have been done in the past have not been well done, or, if they have been well done, should have been done better. In this the third year of the war, it is high time that we should see that the things which particularly concern those whom we honour so highly, those of whom we speak as our boys in the trenches—

An hon. MEMBER: And that you do not want to help.

Mr. OLIVER: That we do not want to help?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. OLIVER: That we do not want to help? The Prime Minister and the men behind him are using their authority and their majority in this House to prevent their being assisted.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. OLIVER: Mr. Speaker, it is not only the men who are prevented from being helped; it is their wives and their children—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. OLIVER—their mothers and their sisters, who are not to receive the attention of the House or of this Government, because it is four o'clock in the morning.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. OLIVER: The Prime Minister has told us that the dependents of our men are getting as good treatment as the dependents of the soldiers of any of the Allied nations—or did he say that their treatment was better? It does not concern me what treatment other countries give their men or the dependents of those men; I am not responsible for that. But 4 a.m. I am responsible as a member of this House for the treatment that this country gives our soldiers and their dependents, and that responsibility, with all due deference to my right hon. friend and those who sit behind him, I propose to discharge on this occasion.

Mr. EDWARDS: How about royalties on coal mines?

Mr. OLIVER: Did I hear my hon. friend make a remark with regard to riots in coal mines?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Royalties.

An hon. MEMBER: Or singing God Save the King.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must ask hon. members to bear in mind that this is a deliberate assembly.

Mr. OLIVER: In reply to the interjection made by my hon. friend, may I say that a Government which undertakes to settle disputes in coal mines by sending out a partisan supporter of the Government as representative of some of the men concerned is not taking proper means to settle those strikes.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I must ask the hon. member—

Mr. EDWARDS: I did not say "riots," I said "royalties."

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I must ask the hon. member to adhere more closely to the subject under discussion. His last remarks had no bearing upon the question before the House.

Mr. OLIVER: Certainly not; neither did the interruption.

Mr. SPEAKER: There was no possible opportunity of my preventing the interruption.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Warn the hon. gentleman against a repetition of it.

Mr. OLIVER: Let us understand what we are doing for our soldiers and for their dependents. We have been told how much we owe the soldiers. If we do owe the soldiers much, we do owe their dependents support at the cost of this country.

An hon. MEMBER: You owe the soldiers support, too.

Mr. SPEAKER: If an hon. gentleman wishes to address the House, he must do the House the courtesy of rising in his place.

An hon. MEMBER: They do not know what courtesy means.

Mr. OLIVER: What are we doing for the dependents of our soldiers? Are we providing for them a decent support at the cost of this country?

Mr. J. A. M. ARMSTRONG: How about God Save the King?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

An hon. MEMBER: Put him out.

Mr. OLIVER: I have here an announcement contained in the Bulletin of the Patriotic Fund of the date of February, 1916. It is headed, "A Message to the Canadian Soldier's Wife," and it says, in part:

> When the war broke out and our brave men came forward to enlist it was felt that there might be some, among those left behind, who would not be sufficiently provided for by the government grants. Men who could not enlist, but who desired to help, felt called upon to step into the breach, and are endeavouring to make good to the soldier's wife the difference between what the Government gives her, and the amount needed to enable her to live in decency and comfort.

That Sir is an indictment against the Government and the people of Canada by the Patriotic Fund in its official organ. For my part, I do not wish to be responsible for the condition that enables that indictment to be made, and at this time and on this occasion when, as my hon. friend from Westmorland (Mr. Copp) has said, we are going to put our hand upon the shoulders of our young men and compel them to serve us at the front, surely the same theory of conscription should apply to the money of the country sufficiently to provide for the dependents of those men so that they shall not have to rely upon the passing of the hat, the appeals to benevolence, to charity, to meet the needs of those whom they have left behind. Is that the stimulus to patriotism that we, the people of Canada, offer to our soldiers? Is it any wonder that voluntary enlistment in this country has decreased when we offer to our soldiers the proposal that we shall collect money as charity and dispense it as charity—

An hon. MEMBER: No such a thing.

Mr. OLIVER—to make up the difference between what the Government gives to the soldier's wife and the amount needed to enable her to live in decency and comfort. Do we or do we not owe to the soldier and to his wife the amount that will enable her to live in decency and comfort as a return in some measure for the service that the soldier renders to us? This document goes on to say:

> From time to time the management of the Patriotic Fund is urged to reduce the scale of payment. This we have hitherto been unwilling to do. Some revision has, it is true, been recently recommended whereby certain classes of families are dropped from the Fund.

What does that mean? It means that the families of the men who have enlisted in good faith to serve this country and who have left their families behind them, expecting that those families would receive certain support, have been dropped from the fund. The faith that was made with that soldier when he went to the front has been broken, and yet we wonder that other men do not come forward and enlist on the same terms. When life and honour are at stake, then there surely must be no breach of faith between the country and the soldiers. It is discreditable enough that we should proclaim to the world that we are either unable or unwilling to provide for the dependents of our soldiers so that they may live in decency and comfort, but we go further than that, we insult them with instructions and advice. Here is a sample:

When, on the first of April, the Government decided that assigned pay, to the extent of at least $15 per month should be compulsory and that every woman receiving separation allowance should, in addition, receive at least $15 per month of her husband's or son's pay, there were many that thought that the Patriotic fund should reduce its assistance accordingly. This course may even yet be adopted. It really depends upon the soldier's wife, as to whether it shall be or not.

They say to the soldier's wife:

If you make good use of your money, you lessen the likelihood of such a revision being made. A woman's first duty when, after being a while on the Patriotic fund she finds herself less pressed financially than she was before, is to pay her husband's just debts by means of the money that comes from him as assigned pay. When this has been done, she is justified in using this same monthly allowance to adequately furnish the home and to properly clothe herself and the children.

That is how Canada is treating her soldiers at the front and their dependents. I hope the Government and their supporters are proud of the position they have taken to-night, as voiced by the Prime Minister.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. OLIVER: I say, I hope they are proud.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. OLIVER: But I must say that if they are, I am very much ashamed of them.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member, when he says he is ashamed of the position taken by the Government on this question, is surely exceeding the rules of debate.

Mr. OLIVER: I certainly wish to apologize to the House and to the Government and to withdraw the remark. I have no wish to infringe on the rules of debate, but sometimes it is difficult not to express one's feelings. I notice in the Canadian Patriotic Fund Bulletin for September, 1916, the following:

The fund pays only in case of need. There are about 105,000 families drawing separation allowance, but of these only 60,000 are on the Fund. The average of payments to these 60,000 families is $192 a year. If the Government administered the Fund and paid $192 to every family, the cost over present system would be $8,640,000 yearly. And every dollar of this would go to people who are really not in need of it.

A soldier's wife may receive half of her husband's monthly pay, say $15; she receives $20 of a separation allowance, or a total of $35. She may or she may not receive from the Patriotic Fund an allowance which may amount to anywhere from five to twenty-five dollars. What is the position of this country, of this Parliament, of this Government, towards the soldier when it tells his wife that out of this immense sum, after she has provided for everything else, she may properly clothe herself and her children. At the present time the Labour Gazette gives the cost of food per family in this country at something over $11 per week.

I ask you how much this woman is going to have to clothe herself and her family out of $45 or $50 a month, when she has to pay that amount for the food they eat. The Finance Minister has told us in the House how the cost of living has increased of recent years. We have been compelled to vote money to increase the salaries of civil servants, and there is a demand for increased wages all over the country. The coal strike in the West is because of the increased cost of living. But our soldiers are getting the same allowance to-day that they got in 1914; the Patriotic Fund allowance has been cut down instead of being increased, and yet we are enthusiastic about what we have done for our soldiers! We have done, the Premier says, as well, or better, than the people of any other country. Well, I am one of the citizens of this country who say that we have not done what we should have done. Whatever may have been the case in the past, when we are undertaking to compel men to serve us at the front, that is the time when we must take steps to see that those who are dependent upon the soldiers at the front shall not be stinted, and shall not be dependent upon charity. That is the time to place the maintenance of dependents of our soldiers upon the substantial footing of the Dominion treasury, and at a rate that shall give a decent living to those dependents without the intervention of charity.

Sir HERBERT AMES: My hon. friend has been quoting from documents that are from one to two years old. He is absolutely incorrect when he says the Patriotic Fund has been cutting down the allowance to the soldier's wife. If he had not had this speech in pickle for a year or more he would have known that we have been increasing the rates steadily to correspond with the advance in the cost of living.

Mr. OLIVER: To correct the hon. member, I may say that part of what I read was from the Bulletin of September, 1916.

Mr. J. P. MOLLOY (Provencher): In rising to address the House, I want to assure the leader of the Government and every hon. member of this House that I am taking part in this discussion with no intention whatever of delaying the measure now before us. I am not here to oppose the Government because they think they are right, but I am here to oppose the Government and anybody else if I think that I am right, and if anything I may say in the few remarks I have to address to the House will help the Government to assist our soldiers, my time will be well spent. If we are to have compulsion in this country I take the ground that we are compelled to provide properly for the soldier wherever he may be.

The present Government is taking upon itself the most tremendous responsibility ever shouldered by any Administration of this Dominion. It is asking from Parliament permission to take the men of the country from their employment, their homes, and their families and to place them on the battle front. It is taking the responsibility of forcing men to make the greatest sacrifice men can make. From present indications the Government has no intention of attempting to equalize that sacrifice by forcing those who will not be affected, and whose wealth the men who go are protecting, to give of their means while other men give their lives. The question of the conscription of wealth, however, I do not intend to discuss here. But I say this, Mr. Speaker, and I say it with the greatest sincerity, that the Government which takes upon itself the tremendous responsibility of sending men to the front must see to it that the wives and children, and dependents of these men are left in such circumstances as not to add to the horrors of the trenches the anxiety which must come from the feeling that their dear ones are in want. That duty is plain, and cannot be evaded.

It is a notorious fact that separation allowances, and assigned pay, which at the beginning of this war may have been adequate to keep the dependents of soldiers from penury and want, are to-day absolutely inadequate, and must be supplemented by certain forms of what I choose to call charity. The pay of the soldier, and the amount of money he is able to leave his dependents is the same as it was when the war broke out. The separation allowance is the same. But the cost of living has more than doubled, thanks to the exploitation and manipulation of the prices of the necessities of life, permitted, and condoned by the present Administration since the war commenced. The soldier's wife has watched her meagre pittance dwindling day by day as the cost of the necessities of life has soared. She has been compelled to ration herself and her family as her husband at the front is rationed, but on a far less generous scale. She is often compelled to move from the neighbourhood in which she has resided beside her more fortunate neighbours whose husbands or sons have not gone, and to take up her residence in more humble quarters. Materially and socially she suffers.

Under the Government's present system of financing the war, by borrowing and letting wealth go free, the soldier who goes to the front will find when he returns, if he does return, that to the sacrifices and hardships which he has endured in the trenches will be added the hardship and burden of paying by taxation the interest on the debt incurred by the war. He has had to fight; he will have to pay. Probably he will not grumble. But for the present at least it is incumbent upon this Government and this country to see to it that while he is away his dependents are looked after.

I wish to bring before the House one particular case. In the town in which I live a platoon was raised last year. Every man, woman and child, even the little boys at school and on the street assisted in recruiting the men required. I myself materially assisted, and when I ask a man to enlist, and he does so, I feel that I have assumed a responsibility. These men left on the 2nd day of last November, and a short time afterwards they were in the trenches. Among the great many men who went from the county of Provencher with that platoon was the only son of a man who is now between 70 and 80 years of age. The boy's mother died many years ago. The boy's poor old father is a confirmed cripple and has no means whatever. He was officially notified on the 31st of March that his son had been seriously wounded. What do you think, Sir, that poor old man has been living on since his boy went away? He has been living on the assigned pay of his boy who went to fight your battle and mine many, many miles away from home. Getting on the train about the middle of last month, a man came to me and said that So-and-So had lost his left arm and his right eye. And the poor old father of that boy, that boy who has made such a sacrifice for the country, is left to live on $15 a month.

It is late in the morning, but it is not too late for this country and this Parliament to be told that there is at least one case of this kind. When the session opened in January last, I took up that case. I wrote a letter, as strong as I could write it, to the Assigned Pay and Separation Branch. I got a courteous reply, stating that no provision had been made for such cases. When I came back I took it up again. I called up Major Ingalls, a perfect gentleman, who treated me with all kindness. I stated the case over the telephone. He asked me to write him a letter and send it by special messenger. I said: "I will write the letter and carry it down myself." And I did. He went into the case as well as he could, calling in the gentleman who had charge of that department and discussing it with him. They told me there was no provision for a case of that kind. In discussing the matter, I found that there were only two fathers in this country who were drawing separation allowance. I say, it is not too late in the morning to discuss a matter of that kind, and to call attention to the case of this poor old cripple, who would starve to death if it were not for the charity of his neighbours in the district in which he lives, while this country stands by and, so far as Parliament is concerned, does nothing for him. I was advised to take up this case with the Patriotic Fund in Winnipeg, and I wrote to the secretary. I said, just as I have said here, that I would write a letter and carry it myself. I wish to thank the representatives of the Patriotic Fund in Winnipeg from my place here in Parliament for the way in which they treated me. I found there two gentlemen of the highest character who made inquiry into the matter, and the result was that that Patriotic Fund granted that poor old man $10 a month. That is not the way for this Government, or for the men who form a government in this free country, to treat the father of a boy who has offered his life in defence of the country and who, though living, has lost one arm and one eye and has had his face torn in pieces by shell fire.

I do not want to criticise the Government in these matters, I want to help them. Such contributions as were made in these cases are regulated according to the judgment of a committee who claim the privilege of digging into affairs of the families and dependents of our soldiers. This gives such aids all the features of charity —which is most objectionable to a proud people such as we have in Canada. Many instances are on record where the dependents of soldiers are too proud to admit that they are deriving their substance from the charity of the public, and as a result refuse to be helped in this way. Why should the element of public charity enter at all into the method of looking after dependents of our brave men who are prepared to give up their lives for such a cause as our country is fighting for? The Patriotic Fund, in my judgment, should be paid into the treasury of the country and all aids given should issue therefrom, rather than have it placed in the hands of a committee, the members of which, in many cases, are most objectionable to our soldiers and their dependents. Is it fair that a member of a Patriotic Fund Committee should have the right to go into the homes of our soldiers and demand an accounting of how moneys are being expended and what are the sources of revenue of such families?—a privilege which no one would dare exercise with the humblest citizen in our country. Remove this entirely by providing for the soldier's dependents out of the treasury of our country in generous manner worthy of the great sacrifice made not only by the boys but by the wives, sons and daughters, the fathers and mothers, who are giving up so much for the cause. The separation allowance given by the country should be increased, and should bear a direct proportion to the number depending for support on the soldier. This amount should be paid every month to the proper person, and such amount should not depend in any way on the amount assigned by the soldier. If we are undertaking to care for those dependent on our soldiers we should do so in such a way as to entirely remove from our gallant boys' minds any anxiety about their families comfort. Voluntary recruiting would receive such a stimulus from such a policy, as, in my judgment, would entirely remove the necessity for any such legislation as is before the House to-night.

When we look around us and see the wages enjoyed by our labouring men in munition factories and reflect on the fact that our soldiers who go forth to risk their lives to defend our country are only paid $1.10 a day and their families receive the munificient sum of $20 a month, is it any wonder that recruiting is not as lively as we would like? Is it not discouraging to the proud, warm-hearted young man to realize that if he goes forth to fight for his country, that his family may suffer from want or may be driven to the necessity of appealing to the generosity of a local Patriotic Fund Committee, the members of which, perhaps, are too small-souled to appreciate their wants, or perhaps instead of coming to their assistance will rather attempt to lecture them on domestic economy.

Dependents of soldiers should be properly provided for by the Government. First, because it puts the matter on the footing of a public duty. At present it is a system of private doles, which is humiliating to the recipients because it makes them objects of charity, where they should be pensioners of the Dominion treasury. The money paid to the dependents of soldiers fighting for the security of life and property in Canada must not be considered anything but a merited return for the services and the sacrifices the menfolk are making for the common weal. Second, the Patriotic Fund as at present administered is the subject of much complaint, on account of the inquisitorial nature of its proceedings.

I do not intend to go into the question of conscription. I have my opinion but I am going to set forth my opinion by my vote. But I might as well say that I believe that had there been a little more judgment and a little more care on the part of the Government in the many many instances that have come before them no doubt, and in which the claims made have been set aside, there would have been less of a feeling that the demands of justice had been left unfulfilled. There are many other reasons, I can tell the Government, why enlistments have dropped off in Manitoba, and there are other members of the House from that province who could back up what I say. And let me say to the Prime Minister, that he will find, when the men come back of whom he has spoken, that there is a strong belief that some of the public appointments he has made are not to the credit of the Government and were not made in the interests of the country.

The House divided on the amendment of Mr. Copp which was declared lost on the following division:

Pairs on motion for second reading of Military Service Bill:

D. D. McKenzie,	Dugald Stewart,

Wm. Pugsley,	J. J. Carrick.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

On the motion of Sir Robert Borden for the adjournment of the House:

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: What business shall we take up this afternoon?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: We will go into committee on this Bill.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 5.07 a.m. Friday.

Friday, July 6, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

PRIVILEGE—MR. LAFORTUNE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. D. A. LAFORTUNE (Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. I see in this morning's Ottawa Journal-Press:

Wild Talk from Lafortune.

Mr. D. A Lafortune, of Montcalm, declared that Canada owed nothing to England, and it was England who must defend the finest colony of the Empire. He added: "Never will we spend one cent for the Laurier navy before consulting the people."

I declare that I never used that language. I repeated yesterday what the late Mr. F. D. Monk had declared in this House and outside of it. I repeat, I never used that language, but the very man who used that language was a member of this Government. That is what I said. If the reporter of the Journal-Press is here I suppose he will be gentleman enough to make the correction and to report what I said correctly, adding that it was Mr. Monk, the late minister in this very same Cabinet, who used that language, and not the member for Montcalm.

MINERS' STRIKE IN THE YUKON.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Edmonton): Some days ago, when I read to the House certain telegrams from parties in the Yukon the right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) was good enough to say that he would make inquiries in regard to the matter and give the House the benefit of the information received at a later date. I would like to know if he has the information?

Mr. CROTHERS: The hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Thompson) received, yesterday, a message from the Administrator of the Yukon in these words:—

Am glad advise you that after repeated conferences between the Manager Yukon Gold Company, the striking employees and myself, an adjustment satisfactory both employer and employees has been reached and the men have practically all returned to work. The strikers were the four dollar per day men. They demanded an advance of one dollar but compromised for fifty cents.

Williams.

I forwarded to the Administrator of the Yukon a copy of the telegram which my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) read to the House a few days ago, and asked him to let me have his answer to the allegations contained in that message. I have not yet received any reply from him, but I probably will this afternoon. I am expecting at any moment to get his reply.

SECOND READING.

SUPPLY BILL.

Bill No. 108, for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service ending 31st March, 1918.—Sir Thomas White—read the second time, considered in committee, read the third time and passed.

MILITARY SERVICE ACT, 1917.

CONSIDERATION OF THE BILL IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE HOUSE.

House again in committee on Bill No. 75, respecting Military Service.—Sir Robert Borden, Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Before taking up the first clause, I would like to have the permission of the committee to refer for a moment to some observations made by my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes), in regard to slowing up on recruiting. My hon. friend, on the 19th June last, in the debate upon this measure, said this:—

The leader of the Government on more than one occasion—take the very day when Mr. McDougall was present, the leader of the Government asked me again if I could not let up on recruiting—

Sir SAM HUGHES: Is the right hon. gentleman referring to me?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Yes.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I have not heard one word yet. I would like to hear it.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I was referring to these observations of my hon. friend on the 19th June, 1917.

Sir Sam Hughes: The leader of the Government on more than one occasion—take the very day when Mr. McDougall was present, the leader of the Government asked me again if I could not let up on recruiting; and, moreover, the right hon. leader of the Government later on pointed out—if he wants the whole story I will be glad to give it—pointed out that there was a tremendous agitation in Toronto over the subject, that he had had various communications from Toronto, that the Finance Minister had told him there was a perfect storm brewing there, and that agitation was due to the fact that men could not be obtained as workers.

Further on, the hon. member for Pictou interposed as follows:

Mr. Macdonald: Speaking at Lindsay, Ontario, on April 28, regarding the conditions of which he spoke and the agitation, the hon. gentleman said:

"This unfortunately had an effect upon the Prime Minister. The result was that I was asked in March, 1916, not to press recruiting, and recruiting to-day has been dead in Canada for fighting purposes."

Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that the statement made by him in Lindsay is quite correct?

Sir Sam Hughes: I am quite surprised at the hon. gentleman asking any such question. That speech is issued by myself, and I am not in the habit of issuing statements that I do not endorse. I will prove it before I have finished.

I desire to take the strongest possible exception to the statement of my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Militia and Defence, so far as it referred to me, and to repeat what I said in this House, on the 29th day of January last. I shall quote and I now repeat that portion of my statement then made, which is relevant:

I desire to assure the House and the country that neither to the Ontario Recruiting Committee on the occasion mentioned nor to any other organization or individual on any other occasion, did I ever give any such intimation as that suggested, or anything that could be tortured into such an intimation.

In connection with the whole subject, I think it is desirable to point out that on the 17th of January, 1916, in the debate upon the address, I used this language:

I realize that 500,000 men is a large force for us to undertake in Canada; and I realize further that the national strength of Canada must be maintained, and that in proceeding with our effort to increase our forces in Canada we must have regard to the necessities of the agricultural and industrial interests of this country. Canada, in all the elements of her national life, must be kept strong, and we shall have regard to those considerations.

The subject was also alluded to during the present session, when on the 1st day of February, 1917, in reply to my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald), I spoke as follows:

The recruiting proceeded with a great deal of vigour and earnestness, and the fact that we succeeded in the first three and a half months of the past year in recruiting a hundred thousand men or more is an indication that the work was carried on with a good deal of vigour and with a great deal of success. The criticism has been made that proper regard to selection was not made. I discussed that question with the ex-Minister of Militia and Defence more than a year ago—I think in the autumn of 1915 for the first time. The course which my colleague took in that regard was that he did not think at that time that any more systematic method was necessary, and he said that it would be possible, through instructions given to his recruiting officers, to prevent unwise selection, selection which might result in the closing up of industries essential for the prosecution of the war, when recruits might have been obtained from other classes whose work and service were not so essential. I was informed by General Hughes that instructions had been given in various instances to adopt methods which would give some system to that purpose.

Mr. Oliver: About what time was that?

Sir Robert Borden: I think it was in the autumn of 1915 or early in 1916.

Sir Sam Hughes: Early in 1916.

And then, a little later on in the debate, my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Militia and Defence gave some illustrations of cases in which he had acted upon that principle, and he alluded again to his interview with Mr. McDougall, of the Dominion Iron and Steel Company.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Not to my interview, but to the right hon. the Prime Minister's interview. I was present.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Yes, and the hon. the Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers) was present also. I may say that I have received from Mr. McDougall, without any request on my part, a statement of his recollection of what took place at that interview. It corresponds with my own, and he most emphatically declares that there was not any suggestion on my part at that interview that recruiting should be slowed up, but merely that we should endeavour to prevent unwise selection. That is to say, instead of endeavouring to enlist men who presumably might be of more service to the country in the occupations in which they were then engaged than if they enlisted for service at the front, the activities of recruiting officers should be directed to those whose services at home were not valuable to the same extent to the country.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Has the Prime Minister the date of Mr. McDougall's interview with him?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I really do not remember the date. It may be in Mr. McDougall's letter. I shall send a copy of it to my hon. friend. It is not necessary that I should read it now.

Indeed, the course which I was endeavouring to carry out—and I think with the concurrence of my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes)—was based on precisely the same principle as the Bill which is now under discussion; that is to say, to endeavour to have each man give to the State the best service of which he was capable; not to send to the front men who were of more service to the State in the occupations in which they were engaged, but rather to direct recruiting among those who were not capable of performing service at home of the same value.

I should like to say that my attitude with regard to recruiting is very well set forth in a letter which I wrote to Colonel Mulloy of Kingston, who was President of the Eastern Ontario Recruiting Association. I give this letter because I repeated practically the same thing to another delegation on the 10th of May, 1916.

Ottawa, Ont.,
29th September, 1915.

Dear Professor Mulloy,—

I expressed in Toronto my appreciation of those who have given help in recruiting at various meetings throughout the country. For your personal and confidential information, I may say that the Chief of the General Staff reports that we are hardly able to keep pace with the organization and equipment of recruits now being enlisted in various parts of the country. That, however, is no reason why any effort should be relaxed, and we hope that all efforts hitherto made will be continued, as later on the needs may be greater than the response then forthcoming.

On Saturday, Monday and Tuesday I saw, in all, some twenty thousand men who have enlisted and who are in training for overseas service. Their physique, their spirit and their bearing were all that could be desired. Their training seems also to have proceeded very satisfactorily.

Faithfully yours,
(Sgd.) R. L. Borden.

On the 10th of the following May, (this letter was written in the September preceding) a delegation, I think of the National Service League of Canada, an organization which had devoted its efforts to assist and promote recruiting, came to see me in Ottawa, and I repeated to them substantially the view which I had expressed in the letter to Colonel Mulloy, and I have a statement from one gentleman present at that interview confirming my recollection of what took place at that time.

It would not, therefore, be possible that I could have directed my hon. friend in the previous March to slow up recruiting. Doubtless he made the statement in good faith; I am not imputing any blame to him in that respect.

With respect to certain correspondence which has been referred to by the ex-Minister of Militia and Defence, the letter dated June 9, 1916 and the reply to it were marked confidential. I wrote to my hon. friend saying that I did not think it proper to read my letter without reading his reply which was marked confidential; and asking if he would give me permission to read it. He was good enough to say at once that he had not the slightest objection to my reading his letter. The two letters are as follows:

Ottawa, Ont., June 9, 1916.
Confidential.

Dear General Hughes,

The question of raising new regiments was not only discussed in Council but in the House of Commons and general approval was given to the proposal that as far as possible units already authorized should be completed before authority was given for new regiments. There was special criticism of a policy by which half a dozen regiments are being recruited at the same time in one community.

It is remarkable that General Hodgins did not communicate to you the policy which I announced to the Militia Council early in May; and that on the other hand he gave me no intimation whatever that you were authorizing new regiments from time to time in ignorance of what I had declared.

The situation is so embarassing that I am passing an Order in Council to-day to remedy it for the future.

Yours faithfully,
(Sgd) R. L. Borden.

To which the ex-minister replied on June 27, 1916, as follows:

On C.P.R. train going west, June 27, 1916.
Confidential.

Re new Battalions.

Dear Sir Robert,

Yours of June 9th just came before me on my trip west. I am very much surprised at the letter and its contents.

I did not know of the discussion in Council or in the House of Commons, but you will permit me to differ entirely from the conclusions arrived at. I know of no one community where half a dozen different regiments are being recruited at the same time, but it appears certain that the gentlemen who have been doing the criticising have no conception of how recruiting should be carried on. It is absolutely necessary, in large centres, that two or three regiments should be going on at the same time, each appealing to a different community.

I have been pursuing the policy of recruiting which has been unsurpassed in history, without friction excepting from selfish agitators each looking at his own personal ends, rather than the needs of the Empire.

I do not know what your Order in Council may be like but I certainly think I was entitled to see a copy thereof before it was passed.

This, therefore, accounts for the great falling off in recruiting.

However, I will speak to you about the matter the first time I see you.

Faithfully,
(Sgd) Sam Hughes.

The Order in Council to which allusion is there made has already been laid upon the Table, but it may be desirable that I should read it to the committee. An Order in Council was passed on January 12, 1916, by which the total authorized military forces of Canada were increased to 500,000 men. The Order in Council of June 10, 1916 is as follows:

The Committee of the Privy Council have had before them a report by the Prime Minister, dated the 8th January, 1916, with respect to the steps which have been taken under the Order in Council (P.C. 36) approved 12th January, 1916, copy of which is attached, by which authority was granted for increasing the Canadian Expeditionary Forces to five hundred thousand officers and men, including those raised for garrison and guard duties in Canada.

The Prime Minister observes that it is expedient that the steps taken from time to time to raise the forces authorized by the said Order in Council, should be brought to the attention of the Advisers of Your Royal Highness in each instance and that this can most conveniently be accomplished by providing that such units as are to be raised in the future must first be authorized by Your Royal Highness in Council.

The Prime Minister therefore recommends that before any further units of the force, or any special units asked for by the war office shall be authorized, or authority given for raising the same, authority shall be obtained from Your Royal Highness in Council for that purpose.

The Committee concur in the foregoing and submit the same for approval.

In that connection I should mention that during part of April, the whole of May and June and the early part of July, 1916, I was administering the Department of Militia and Defence, under circumstances which are familiar to the Committee. I presided at meetings of the Militia Council during each of those months—on the 19th, 27th and 29th of April; the 8th, 16th and 19th of May, the 2nd of June and the 6th of July. I learned at one of those meetings—I cannot recall which one—that a number of battalions had been authorized by the then Minister of Militia and Defence while I was administering the Department. I am not attributing blame to my hon. friend in that respect; I have no doubt he may have considered that he was acting within his rights. I merely mention the fact to show what took place and to explain the reason for the passing of this Order in Council. In order that I may make that perfectly plain, I will quote a criticism made by the member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) on May 8, 1916. This criticism was in line with a number of communications which had come to me from different parts of the country complaining that in certain localities altogether too many battalions were being recruited at the same time. The member for Edmonton said:

I know there was recruiting for a regiment to be known as the Bantams of Vancouver, at Edmonton. They may have ceased their operations at Edmonton now. This fact demonstrates that no discrimination whatever is used in the securing of recruits, in the way of having regard to the requirements of civil life; that the department simply goes after recruits whenever and wherever it can get them, without regard to any other circumstance. And more than that, the fact that so many units are being recruited in the same place at the same time tends against the success of the work. There is instituted a spirit of competition between the different officers who are engaged in recruiting that does not tend to success. I admit that probably to have two battalions recruiting at the same time and in the same place may give a healthy measure of competition; but when more than two are recruited it certainly is injurious rather than beneficial.

To which I replied:

My hon. friend no doubt has in mind that these regiments are recruited, I suppose, from a considerable district around Edmonton. I remember one which went through not long ago whose members had come to a considerable extent from the Peace River country. There has been an endeavour in some cases at least, to my certain knowledge, to adjust the recruiting to the requirements of local conditions. I cannot recall that any representations ever came to my attention concerning Edmonton, but I do recall other cases; and in those cases an endeavour was made by the department to meet local conditions through the guidance of recruiting officers.

That is the policy to which I have already referred and which has been repeatedly referred to in the House during the last as well as during the present session.

During the period between April 6 and June 6, both inclusive, when I was administering the department, the ex-Minister of Militia authorized eleven new battalions in all. Through some misunderstanding I was not advised of the fact that these battalions were being authorized, and that explains completely the reason why the Order in Council of June 10 was passed—in order that we might have some check upon the authorization of battalions and in order that too great a number might not be recruited at one time in the same locality. I think that the extent to which the raising of battalions in the same locality was authorized is greater than the ex-Minister of Militia himself realized.

I have procured from the Adjutant-General a statement showing the number of battalions recruiting at any one time in various cities and towns in different parts of the country. It would appear that for a certain period about sixteen battalions were authorized to recruit in Toronto.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Will the Prime Minister give me the dates?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I will send to my hon. friend a copy of the statement which has been handed to me by an officer of the department.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I should have been pleased to have had it in advance, but that does not matter.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: There are several other illustrations of the same character, where half a dozen battalions or more were being recruited in one locality at the same time. The Order in Council of the 10th June, 1916, was designed merely for the purpose of having fuller consideration given to the number of battalions that should be recruited at one time in one place. I do not think there is anything further that I need to say on the subject at the moment. I will also send to my hon.

friend Mr. McDougall's letter to which I have already alluded, and with which I do not think it is necessary for me to trouble the House at present.

There is one other matter which I think I ought to communicate to the House, and it might be convenient to do so now.

Mr. KNOWLES: Will the Prime Minister kindly explain how he believes that the ex-Minister of Militia could have been acting bona fide in thinking he was within his rights in authorizing the raising of battalions, when the Prime Minister was administering the department?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am hardly in a position to be cross-examined by my hon. friend as to how I form my opinions. I have stated them and they are quite sincere.

Mr. KNOWLES: How could they be?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I have already, in speaking upon this Bill, explained to hon. gentlemen that the number of casualties during the past year has, in my judgment, indicated the imperative necessity of obtaining an adequate supply of reinforcements with the least possible delay. The figures, however, that I have already given to the House do not in one respect set forth the facts as they ought to be understood and realized.

Sir SAM HUGHES: The Prime Minister is proceding to another matter?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Yes.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Before the Prime Minister does so, may I have an opportunity of replying to his statements; the opportunity may not present itself again.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Certainly.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I think I can reply offhand to most of the statements that have been made. I will take up first the question of letting up on recruiting. I do not know whether or not the Prime Minister wishes to have it inferred that my statements are not borne out by the facts. I will state the facts. From time to time, we had gentlemen interested in various organizations coming to the department and complaining that our recruiting officers were taking away their employees. On every occasion I explained to them that I had no authority under the law, and that consequently I would not attempt to step over any authority under the law to prevent any man who wished to go to the front from doing so. One case came from a town in the West where a man engaged in the manufacture of blankets wanted us to let up upon recruiting in that locality. The manufacture of blankets may be very important in time of war, but it struck me that persons capable of running a blanket machine could be picked up at any street corner in a town, and I declined even to suggest to my recruiting officers that they should let up on recruiting so far as that class of work was concerned. Why should a blanket manufacturer be left at home and the farmer go? That is the position I took then. I distinctly drew the attention of the Prime Minister to the fact that I believed German gold was at the bottom of the agitation to prevent men going. Rumours of that nature were being whispered all around.

I do not know what Mr. McDougall's letter is about, but I will give the facts concerning him. I was called up to the Prime Minister's office, and I met there the Prime Minister with the Minister of Labour and Mr. McDougall. Mr. McDougall told us that we should not recruit in his locality because he wanted the men in the mines or industries—I do not know which.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Coal mines and iron and steel industries.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Mr. McDougall was afraid that if we continued recruiting in that locality, the mines or industries would have to be shut down. I had been in that locality some years before and had seen many splendid Scotch Canadians working in those industries. I had been there subsequently, and I found many enemy aliens, and at the time I asked the reason why the splendid Scotch Canadians had been taken away and these aliens brought in to fill their places. It was long before the war that this occurred. I brought that matter up before the Prime Minister, as he and the Minister of Labour will most likely remember. I asked why these Scotch Canadians had been scattered to the four winds of heaven, and why Mr. McDougall came to me to stop recruiting amongst men who had never before worked in those mines. I declined to interfere and stated that all I could do was to ask my recruiting officers not to concentrate their efforts too much on one locality, the complaint having been that we had been doing that. The request was that our efforts should be equally distributed over the whole district. The Prime Minister and the Minister of Labour will remember the ground I took, namely, that we had no authority to interfere with their employees any more than we had authority to interfere with farm hands who desired to go to the front. All that we agreed to do was not to let the recruiting officers concentrate on any one industry. This agitation continued, and there was a good deal of hysteria throughout the country, but I will pass over the details until the day when the Prime Minister used the expression "let up on recruiting." I have explained to him before and also to the House that I took the ground that the only time not to stop recruiting but to let up on our activities, would be between the winter and the spring campaigns. I will recall the incident to the memory of the Prime Minister. I asked who was talking this nonsense about recruiting. I knew that around the doors of the factories in Montreal and Toronto there were thousands of men clamouring for work, and I could find no scarcity of men whatever in any part of the country. I also told the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance, and I also told Council on more than one occasion, that there was no dearth of labour in the community. The Prime Minister, on another day, when he sent for me, the day on which I quietly ceased any new activity, distinctly told me that there was a tremendous agitation going on in Toronto and in other communities and that the people there were annoyed and feeling was running high that their men were being taken away and were going to the front whereas the enlistment was so slack in Quebec. The Finance Minister also on one occasion asked me if I did not think it proper that we should let up. He thought Canada had done her full share in sending men to help England. I pointed out that we were not helping England, but helping the Empire and the cause of human liberty. This conversation was not conducted in the presence of the Prime Minister, but witnesses can be had in large numbers in the city of Toronto to whom the Finance Minister made the same statement. He thought we had done so much more than was to be expected of us that we should let up. He thought there was going to be a dearth of labour. The cry would be heard in every part of the Dominion that the country would be held up for labour. I felt the whole thing was patched up and paid for by German gold in order to stop recruiting. On the occasion to which I refer, when I was speaking to the Prime Minister about recruiting, I pointed out to him—if my memory serves me correctly, and I think he will admit it has served me correctly in regard to the steel and other incidents—that we could not exempt the members of labour organizations without exempting farmers, street labourers and every other class of the community. In connection with this agitation a man named Murray—I thought at the time it was Mr. James Murray, but he told me afterwards that he had nothing whatever to do with it, and I subsequently found out that it was another gentleman by the name of Murray who had been active in some work in Toronto—had been making representations that these labour men were absolutely necessary to the industries of the country. I will not enter into what I believe, and indeed know, to be the causes of that agitation. When the Prime Minister not in the presence of McDougall asked me, not in an ordering way but in a kindly manner, about letting up on recruiting, I suggested that the only thing I could do would be to direct that the energies of our recruiting officers should not be centered too much on this particular work, and he said that that would be satisfactory to him. "If it is at all possible," he said—I remember his words distinctly—"I should like you to let up for the time being on recruiting as far as possible." I do not say that there is anything to apologize for particularly in that, because the Prime Minister was not connected with the motive behind the agitation, but I say frankly that this matter of letting up on recruiting was a perfect torment to me every day of my life. I did not stop recruiting, but simply entered into no new activities.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: On what date does my hon. friend understand me to have made that statement?

Sir SAM HUGHES: All the data I have on the subject show it was before I left for England, and I left for England in March. I also heard from another gentleman in Toronto that the Prime Minister told him that if he had his way he would not enlist another man. I spoke to J. M. Godfrey about it. I said, "What's all this talk about the Prime Minister having spoken to you about recruiting?" He said, "That is exactly what occurred," and he mentioned one leading member of the Opposition who is not now in his seat. I have had it from a dozen gentlemen in Toronto that Mr. Godfrey stated positively that the Prime Minister's statement was to the effect that if he had his way he would not recruit another man.

These were the influences that were surrounding the minister. Some of the officers of the department were inspired with the same idea that we had done our full duty. Let me say here that during the time I had the honour to be minister under the voluntary system in Canada we raised in proportion to our population a higher percentage of men of British birth of British descent than the British Government raised under both the voluntary and the compulsory system in Great Britain and Ireland. Therefore hon. gentlemen need not be so anxious to know why recruiting has fallen off. I could give other reasons why recruiting has fallen off, but it does not help the cause at all. Recruiting has been magnificent in Canada in spite of the drawbacks we have had to contend with. I do not know whether the Prime Minister read Mr. McDougall's letter.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I did not read it to the House. I sent it to my hon. friend but the leader of the Opposition has it at the present moment.

Sir SAM HUGHES: The leader of the Opposition is welcome to it. The facts are as I have stated. I put it up to Mr. McDougall in the presence of the Prime Minister that these places had been filled originally by Canadian boys of Highland descent, and subsequently by Germans and Austrians, and I asked him why he had made the change. He repudiated that he had anything at all to do with the change, and that was absolutely true. He was not the general manager. He is of Highland descent himself, and I am sure he would have been inclined to stick to his Canadian-born boys in preference to bringing in aliens and scattering to the four winds of heaven the lads who had been working in the mines. I may say that previous to this I had seen that McDougall was a likely fellow, that he was a man of courage and knew how to handle men, and I asked him if he would undertake the organization of a field battery in that locality. He said that he could not do it. But to show that my judgment of him was correct, McDougall came to me afterwards and asked me for authorization to raise a battery from these very men in the locality of Sydney.

As to the organization of new battalions and the Order in Council, I have done the House the honour of giving the figures quoted by my hon. friend from Edmonton the other day, and have shown that in the whole six or eight months only a limited number of battalions were raised in the Edmonton district, and that district runs from the Pacific to the Arctic ocean, and as far east as Lloydminster, but the battalions were centered in Edmonton because that was the only place where there was convenient housing. The number of battalions raised in that district was far from representing one battalion to every 40,000 population, even if the battalions were all raised at the same time, but they were not; they were spread over a period of from six to eight months from the time of authorization, although some were organized within three weeks of the issue of authorization.

My hon. friend has given me a list from the Adjutant General of the number of battalions authorized in Toronto. I find that in one day, on the 12th of December, 1915, we authorized five battalions, and two had been authorized only a month or so before; that made seven battalions for the city of Toronto and surrounding district authorized in the months of November and December, from a population of upwards of five hundred thousand souls. On the basis of this allotment of one battalion for about 40,000 population, I should have had twelve battalions going on at the same time in Toronto and its locality. In place of that, I had only five in one month and two in a previous month or so. So, taking the utmost that had later come from the city of Toronto, I was still five battalions short to put it in the same category as counties such as Peel, Victoria, Durham, Northumberland—all the country district where we were to raise, and did raise, one battalion to every 40,000 of the population. Waterloo, our German centre, raised two battalions with a nearly similar population. I do not say this to find fault, but to meet the argument which had been made before the country that we were raising too many battalions in one centre. That argument is perfect nonsense. After a battalion is authorized, you must choose your officers, arrange for your non-commissioned officers and for their training, and generally complete your organization. This can hardly be done in less than six months. The urban centres, such as Toronto, Edmonton, Hamilton and Montreal, ought to raise more regiments in proportion to their population than the outlying districts, because they are centres to which men from these districts had to go. For instance, upwards of 600 men from my own county volunteered in the First Division from Toronto alone. In this way, Toronto gets credit for results that should really be credited to the area around.

Reference is made to the Bantam battalions being recruited. We did authorize one Bantam regiment in the West and one in the East, and gave them authority to enlist the undersized men wherever they should find them, for no one community, not even Toronto, nor even the city of Edmonton—where they are all great men—could furnish bantams enough for a battalion.

The whole thing simmers down to bear out the statements which I have made. The Prime Minister did yield—he knows that he was agitated over the efforts made by these organizations and committees to stop recruiting so far as these special men were concerned. That is about the time he commenced to get the National Service idea going. They know that efforts were abroad to bring about a let-up on recruiting. I gave the instance before of my attempt to stop this general recruiting of skilled men. I said to Capt. Rosamond: "Why should you fool away your time as a second lieutenant or lieutenant? You should be in skilled employment where you would be worth more to the country." But it had to be left to each man himself, and I could not stop them. I have a letter from Captain Rosamond after the fourth time I tried to get him out, dated just two days before he met his death, refusing everytning else and saying that he had decided to stay with the boys. I do not blame the Prime Minister—did not blame him at the time. That is, I do blame him for listening to the whispering that went on. These fellows should have been thrown out—they learned to dodge me. He should not have listened to the whisperings of these men; he had my assurance that there was no dearth of men and nothing in this agitation; that thousands and tens of thousands of men were idle and begging for work and fitted for the jobs that these boys were leaving in order to go to the front.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I really must state in the most specific terms that I did not at any time direct my hon. friend (Sir Sam Hughes) or impress upon him, to slow up on recruiting; nor did I at any time, either in conversation with Mr. Godfrey or with any one else, use such an expression as has been alluded to. I have not the slightest idea that Mr. Godfrey will take the responsibility of saying that I ever said anything of the kind to him. I did not say anything of the kind to him. My hon. friend must be mistaken in saying that he did not engage actively in recruiting after March, because during the period from April 6 to June 6, when I was supposed to be administering the department, he authorized no less than eleven new battalions. That does not indicate that he had ceased his activity.

Sir SAM HUGHES: That is what I say—during the period between winter billetting and spring camp.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The hon. gentleman says that I made the request in March; but I say that between April 6 and June 6 he authorized—though I was administering the department—no less than eleven new battalions. I point that out as indicating that he could not have ceased his recruiting activity during that period. I do not wish to detain the House further on the point. I lay on the Table a memorandum of the regiments recruited.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Perhaps I may be permitted another word. In connection with the carrying out of the offer by the Prime Minister of 500,000 men, an offer concerning which I was not consulted on till afterwards, I pointed out to him on one occasion that I had planned to raise 400,000 men under my system of one battalion to 40,000 of population. I had most of these corps authorized and under way, and the men were coming in as they never came in under any system of local recruiting areas in the whole history of the world. In order to raise the extra men, I proposed to raise another regiment for every 80,000 to 100,000 of the population. Any one who figures it out will see that that would bring about 500,000 men. I do not see why there should be any effort made to bring this matter up here. What I do say is that there was a great deal of talk going on on the part of friends of the Government influenced by these agitators and others connected with the matter. So far as Mr. Godfrey is concerned, he did not make the statement to me, but I know gentlemen in Toronto whose word is unimpeachable to whom he did make the statement, as reported in the papers, and also that he notified prominent members of the Opposition. The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) is named as one with whom he had communicated.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Mr. Godfrey has personally discussed what took place on that occasion and he gave no such version of our conversation as the hon. gentleman has given—he gave an absolutely different version of it.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I am glad to hear it.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am ready to leave it to Mr. Godfrey's memory, so far as I am concerned.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: There is an issue of fact between the Prime Minister and one of his former colleagues, now no longer in the Government, as to which I will not offer a word, except upon the bearing which it has upon the present measure. This measure is based upon a statement in the preamble that voluntary recruiting has ceased. Now, whatever may have passed between the Prime Minister, and the former minister at the time referred to, certainly there was some communication, and, in consequence of that the former Minister of Militia let up on recruiting—did not press it. The Prime Minister says that at the time when the Minister of Militia was letting up on his efforts, he authorized no less than eleven new battalions. But, knowing the energy of the former Minister of Militia, the authorizing of eleven new battalions is not necessarily incompatible with his having relaxed his efforts in recruiting. There was evidently a misunderstanding between the Prime Minister and the Minister of Militia at that time. The ex-Minister of Militia states that the Prime Minister told him to let up on recruiting; the Prime Minister retorts that he did nothing of the kind, but that what he did was with a view to preventing overlapping in the formation of regiments.

It will be found to be beyond doubt that in consequence of the conversation which took place between him and the Prime Minister he let up in his efforts and did not pursue, with the same energy as he had done before, his policy of recruiting. We are told that this Bill is founded upon the fact that recruiting has practically ceased. If there has been such a misunderstanding as that between the Prime Minister and the Minister of Militia, it is no wonder that there should be some relaxation in recruiting. If there had been the same efforts as there were before perhaps we would not have had this Bill to-day. But it seems beyond dispute that this legislation, which is regrettable at the present time from many points of view, is partly brought about by the misunderstanding which took place in the ranks of the Government themselves. There was no unanimity, no unity of action. This is the reproach which we have made from this side of the House against hon. gentlemen opposite and at last there is confirmation of the information which we have received in that respect.

[Sir Robert Borden.]

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I began a moment ago to give the House certain information as to the enlistment of infantry, and as to casualties, during certain periods which are important in dealing with this measure. I shall read from a statement which has been prepared in the Department of Militia and Defence and I shall give it to the House upon the authority of the officers of that department. It is this:

Statistics Relating to the Infantry of the C. E. F.

1 (a). Infantry enlisted during twelve months ending May 31st, 1917: 42,523

(b). Infantry enlisted between 1st January, 1917, and 31st May, 1917: 13,353.

(c). Infantry enlisted during April and May, 1917: April, 1,794; May, 1,208.—3,002.

2 (a). Infantry casualties during twelve months ending 31st May, 1917:

Killed in action	12,171
Died of wounds	3,872
Died of sickness	421
Prisoners of war	1,115
Presumed dead	1,524
Missing	1,937
	21,040
Wounded	45,996
Total casualties	67,036

(b). Infantry casualties between 1st January, 1917, and 31st May, 1917:

Killed in action	5,894
Died of wounds	1,705
Died of sickness	281
Prisoners of war	135
Presumed dead	881
Missing	1,143
	10,039
Wounded	17,187
Total casualties	27,226

Thus it will be seen that during the twelve months ending 31st May, 1917, the infantry enlistments were 42,523 and the infantry casualties 67,036. During the five months beginning 1st January, 1917, and ending 31st May, 1917, the infantry enlistments were 13,353 and infantry casualties 27,226.

Mr. TURRIFF: Could the Prime Minister say what proportion of those wounded or slightly wounded would go back to the trenches?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I have not that information at the moment but my hon. friend will understand that it could only be given in an approximate way. It varies in different engagements. During the taking of Vimy Ridge the proportion of slightly wounded was larger than usual.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Is there not an approximate rate?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am afraid I could not give that to my right hon. friend. I will make inquiry, but it would have to be a very rough approximation because it varies a great deal according to the circumtances of different actions.

(c). Infantry casualties during April and May, 1917:

Killed in action		4,572
Died of wounds		1,386
Died of sickness		137
Prisoners of war		55
Presumed dead		603
Missing		750
		7,503
Wounded		13,861
Total casualties		21,364

The total casualties in the entire force during the same period amounted to about 24,000 but in the infantry alone they were 21,364, while the infantry enlisted during that time numbered not more than 3,002. The casualties exceeded the enlistment of infantry during that period by more than 18,000. The number of killed in action, prisoners of war and missing was a good deal more than double the actual number of men enlisted in the infantry during that period.

That hon. gentlemen may appreciate still more the condition with which we are confronted in the endeavour to maintain the Canadian Expeditionary Force at full strength, I remind them that I made my announcement on 18th May last that the policy of the Government would include compulsory service. It might be instructive that the hon. gentlemen should realize what our casualties have been while the subject has been under consideration during the intervening period. During those seven weeks the infantry casualties have been as follows:

(d) Infantry casualties between 18th May, 1917, and 4th July, 1917:

Killed in action		1,240
Died of wounds		420
Died of sickness		76
Prisoners of war		64
Presumed dead		—
Missing		369
		2,169
Wounded		4,529
Total casualties		6,698

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: May I suggest that while the figures give a great deal of detail they do not afford complete information. The object of my right hon. friend in contrasting the figures of enlistment with the casualties is to show that voluntary enlistment cannot keep up with the casualties. It will be necessary to give us some information as to how many of these casualties are of such a character that they are not permanent casualties, but of such nature that the men have been able to return to the front. We are aware that, fortunately, a good many of those wounded are not so seriously wounded that they cannot return to the front. A good many have received scratches only, and are able to take their places in the ranks again within a few days. I wish my right hon. friend would give us information as to the proportion of permanent disabilities, so that we may estimate how many we have still in the ranks upon whose services we can count.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I have already said that I shall endeavour to get that information, but I believe it can only be given in a very approximate way. I saw about 10,000 of these men at Hastings just before I left England. They were being trained and hardened. Men with mere scratches do not go to hospital. There are many who have been wounded, sometimes pretty severely, and who have returned to the front three, four or five times.

Sir SAM HUGHES: The percentage of those wounded who return to the front within a period of four or five months is about sixty-five. At first we returned only a small number, but we kept increasing it by the convalescent system until there are now sixty-five per cent who return within a very limited period.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: There must be some general ratio on which we could base our calculations.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I shall endeavour to get that information. But I should again like to emphasize the point that for April and May the total casualties were 21,364 in the infantry as against 3,002 men enlisted, and that those who were killed, died of wounds, are presumed dead, or are missing, numbered not less than 7,504, or two and one-half times the number of enlistments.

Mr. DEVLIN: Would the Prime Minister state whether the 100,000 men to be conscripted will be used as reinforcements or for the formation of new divisions?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The object is to keep the Canadian army corps at the front up to strength.

Mr. DEVLIN: That would be how many divisions? There are at present four, and a fifth is in course of formation.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The infantry of the fifth division will have to be used for reinforcements.

Mr. OLIVER: The information that the Prime Minister has given is very much to the point, but I would respectfully suggest that it would be of interest and might be of advantage if a similarly definite statement were made to cover all enlistments and all branches of the service. I notice that a general statement is made that we have recruited something over 400,000 men. At the same time we find that we have sent overseas something less than 240,000 men, and it is said that we have less than 20,000 men in Canada. That is to say, we have actually something like 350,000 or 360,000 men, while we claim to have recruited over 400,000 men. This is a matter of record and could easily be settled. I suggest that the minister, at a later date, bring down such figures covering the whole of our enlistments and military establishment as will give a clear idea of what men were enlisted and what men we have actually on service, and where they are serving.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: As to those matters, the Minister of Militia will give information.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: A question has been raised by the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver), and also by other hon. gentlemen, as to the discrepancy between the number of enlistments in Canada and the number of men who have gone overseas and the number of men who are still in Canada. There is a discrepancy. Up to the 31st of May, 1917, 64,552 of these men can be accounted for, which would leave 10,910 with respect to whom an investigation is being made. I am now quoting from a memorandum as to the 31st of May. I cannot get it to a later date owing to the difficulty of getting such figures compiled. In the first place, there are 5,345 who enlisted, but who were not likely to become efficient and who consequently were discharged. Those men were discharged under the King's regulations and orders, paragraph 322, after they had been in the service for three months. They were discharged for various reasons; some men are not fit to become soldiers owing to mental and other reasons. Up to that date some 33,887 men, after they had enlisted, were found to be medically unfit. They developed defects and diseases in active training; they could not stand the strain of active training.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Did these men pass the medical examination?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Yes. They were rejected for defects and diseases which developed in active training, which could not be detected by the medical authorities.

Mr. NESBITT: How long were they retained, on an average, before they were discharged?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Under the regulation to which I refer, in all probability they would be in the service about three months, perhaps more. The period would vary. Perhaps it would be more convienient if I read this table, so that it may appear in Hansard:

There are some absentees who are not on the records, and for whom we cannot account. For 13,081 absentees, however—in other words, deserters—there are records.

With regard to the 1,248 who were discharged by purchase, in the early stages of the war a man could, under some old regulation, purchase his discharge for $15. Later that amount was raised to $50 so that after enlisting and becoming an expense to the country a man could not secure his discharge by the payment of a merely nominal sum.

The 2,371 men who were undesirable included men discharged for misconduct.

I have not the details as to the 1,127 who were let out because of special requests of one kind or another. I suppose, however, that these special requests would be largely granted upon compassionate grounds.

It is difficult to know just why the men who come under the head of miscellaneous and not classified—the figures are 1,085 and 1,106—cannot be accounted for. It will be noted that the attestation papers of 1,725 were irregular, and for this reason that number of men were let out. The total shrinkage and wastage in Canada, therefore, of men who were reported as having enlisted amounts, according to these figures, to 64,552.

The figures of enlistment which are recorded and to which publicity is given come first from the commanding officers of the different battalions, who make returns to the Adjutant-General. Figures based upon these returns are then made public. There are 10,910 men for whom it is difficult to account. The officers of the department have investigated this very carefully; they have given a good deal of attention to the matter of finding an explanation for this disparity. They account for it roughly by the fact that some men have been counted twice; that some men have enlisted in more than one unit—have joined one unit and left it to join another—

Sir SAM HUGHES: In order to get to the front.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Yes, or for some other reason. Others have been transferred to other units. Considering the large number of enlistments since the war began, the number of those who cannot be accounted for is really very small indeed. As time goes on these figures are becoming more definite and more reliable. Difficulties of this sort will in time be overcome.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Is it open to a soldier to join a unit and, of his own motion, without the consent of his commanding officer, leave that unit and join another?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: No, of course it is not. But some of them do it; in fact, men leave the Royal Navy, I am sorry to say, and enlist in the Canadian army units on the Atlantic seaboard. That is, of course, contrary to the rules and regulations, but it is difficult to overcome.

Sir SAM HUGHES: In the early part of the war—even yet, for that matter—upon a unit leaving Canada men have been so anxious to get to the front that they have deserted, assumed new names and joined some other unit that was going to the front. Hundreds of them have done that.

Mr. TURRIFF: The minister said that about 1,700 men had not been properly attested. Was that the fault of the men themselves, or of the officers of the department?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The officers of the department do not attest the men; they are attested all over the country, in the villages, towns or cities where recruits are sought. In the filling out of such a complicated document, there are bound to be irregularities. The number of the irregularities, however, is very small compared with the total enlisment.

Mr. TURRIFF: Is the fact that the attestation paper has not been properly filled out sufficient ground for a man's discharge?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Sometimes, in addition to being irregular, the attestation papers were not sworn before a man competent to administer oaths. If men who were sworn irregularly claimed their discharge on that account, it could be granted to them. In that case they would not be soldiers; they would be in the same position as if they had not enlisted.

Mr. NESBITT: Do I understand that 64,000 and 10,000—I give the rough figures—indicate the difference between the men you can account for overseas and the total enlistment?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Yes. The total is 75,462, including 10,910 for whom it is difficult to account.

The following is a statement of enlistment in the Canadian Expeditionary Force up to May 31, 1917, together with the figures as to the number of men overseas, the number of men in Canada or about to embark, and discharges:

Mr. NESBITT: Has the minister anything to show how many of the 127,000 men in England are infantry?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The figures were laid on the table of the House in a very elaborate statement that was prepared and printed. The statements that are furnished to the department come out here every two or three weeks. One has come out since May 14, 1917, but as the statement dated May 14 is the one which is printed for the use of the House, we had better use it for the discussion of the Bill, because there are very few changes in the latest statement. This table shows 126,241 troops in England on the 14th May, 1917. The number of infantry in England at that time was 67,387, composed of category "A" (1) 6,499 men; category "A" (2) 15,073; category "A" (3) 3,941 men. The men in category "A" (1) are the men who are ready, technically and scientifically trained, to go at once into the trenches. Category "A" (2) and (3) comprise men who are not quite fit. In category "A" (4) there were under eighteen, 284 men, and over eighteen, 1,549. The balance of the total number of infantry is in three classes under category "B" in three classes under category "C" in categories "D" and "E" unclassified, and in hospitals where there are 14,219. The details of the categories were put on Hansard by the Prime Minister when he introduced this Bill, so that I need not take up the time of the House in explaining about them. In addition to the infantry to which I have referred, there are in the Fifth division, in reserve, 8,221 men in category "A" (1) who are ready for the trenches.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I understood from my hon. friend that the number of unfits, that is of men who, having been enlisted and passed as medically fit, had been subsequently rejected, totalled 33,000. Am I right in that? Were these men rejected in Canada?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Those unfit to whom I referred in the first part of my address were men who joined the forces in Canada and who, after they had been subjected to training and the severe tests required in connection with training, were found, for one reason, or another, medically unfit. Out of the total enlistments of 418-102 there were something like 33,000 who were found to be men who had to be let out because of being medically unfit.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: From statements made in the press and elsewhere an impression has been raised that a good many men who had crossed over to England had also been found to be unfit and were therefore rejected. The other day the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Arthurs) said that 12,000 men of the troops now in England ought to be sent back at once.

An hon. MEMBER: 12,900?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: 12,000 is the figure which impressed itself on my memory. Are these men also unfit and likely to be sent back because of unfitness?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: In reply to a communication on this subject, I have the following information from Sir George Perley:

With reference to categories B and C, last fall there were considerable numbers of these men here without very much to do, but we have been gradually absorbing them in useful work. All B men are fit for forestry, railway or labour Battalions and are being used for that purpose as fast as available. Many C men also fit for same work and C three men are being used under Medical Service, also Records Office and for working around camp, etc. Any surplus C three men not required here are being sent to Canada as fast as possible. Nineteen hundred have already gone and another nineteen hundred now selected for return as soon as ships available. We quite realize desirability returning to Canada for farming or industrial work all men who cannot be usefully employed here.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: There is no statement as to the reasons why those men cannot be usefully employed in England. I should imagine every available man can be usefully employed in forestry work, or in railway construction or in other ways.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Sir George Perley says that the greater number of them can be so employed, but a certain number are not fit for any of those occupations, or, if they are fit for some particular service, there are enough men already at work in that service, such as working around camps, in the Records office or in the medical service. All who cannot be employed in those services and who are not fit for active work of some kind are being returned to Canada as fast as possible.

Mr. TURRIFF: Can the minister explain the very high percentage of men who, after having been passed by the medical examiners in Canada, have been rejected in Canada, and also the high percentage of men who, after passing a special examination before going overseas, have, after their arrival in England, been found to be medically unfit, after they have been in the service for from one to two years and have caused a heavy expenditure to the country? There must be some terrible laxity or lack of professional knowledge on the part of the medical examiners. There must be something seriously wrong somewhere when such a large percentage of men who have undergone a special inspection before sailing for England are rejected as medically unfit when they get over on the other side.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I am afraid it will have to be largely attributed to the frailty and complicated machinery of the human frame. Recruits undergo a rigid examination. Undoubtedly mistakes have been made, but this same difficulty exists in the British army and all other armies. The soldiers of a citizen army who have not been accustomed to athletic exercise but have been doing sedentry work all their lives, when put under canvas and subjected to severe exercises are apt to develop weaknesses which otherwise would not show themselves. One of the diseases which has developed to a greater extent than we expected is tuberculosis, although the men had been examined by the most skilled physicians in this country and declared physically fit. The percentage of wastage from this cause is very high indeed. As the hon. member for Assiniboia says, the men are also subjected to different climatic conditions in England. As the Prime Minister pointed out when reading the despatch to the House, men who are not fit for the trenches nevertheless perform very important work in connection with the war. The sheet which has been distributed amongst hon. members gives a list of the different branches of the service in which men who cannot stand active service can be utilized on work which is almost as useful as the service performed by the fighting men at the front. A man has to be bodily perfect and an athlete in every sense of the word to stand the tremendous strain of trench warfare.

Sir SAM HUGHES: There is a good deal in what the hon. member for Assiniboia says in regard to the unevenness of the medical examinations. I will cite only one case. Colonel Ashton, who is now Brigadier General Ashton, determined that in one battalion there would not be a single man rejected as medically unfit. These were all hand-picked men, but when they were sent over from England to France half of them were returned as medically unfit. Some doctors have a faculty for finding little pinpricks in men, and rejecting them. One of the chief causes of rejection is flat feet, of which there are three degrees. A man with flat feet in the third degree is not fit for marching at all. Many of the men with the second degree walked hundreds of miles to Edmonton from the Peace River district carrying their packs all the way, yet they were rejected when they crossed the water although they could out-march any doctor in England. They had the second degree of flat feet, and under the regulations, which are very strict, they could not go to the front. The first degree is also objectionable from the medical standpoint, but it largely rests with the doctor making the examination.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: During my visit to England I made inquiries as to the numerous rejections for flat feet. The strictness of the practice dates back, I believe, to some incident in the career of the British army when men were unable to march as far as they should have done in a great emergency. A great many men who were rejected for flat feet in England worked in our lumber woods and used moccasins during part of the year. I told the military officers with whom I discussed this matter that I was confident these men were perfectly fit and would have an equal capacity for marching with any man that could be turned out against them, but the British authorities adhere to the rule very strictly. I do not know whether I made any impression on them, but I did my best to convince them that men who had been used to working in the lumber woods would be perfectly fit for work in the trenches. They thought, on the other hand, that as these men had been accustomed to wearing moccasins during part of the year they would give out when put to marching in heavy-soled boots on hard roads.

Mr. TURRIFF: I appreciate what has been said in regard to flat feet, but it seems to me that this is another case of War Office red tape. They should not be allowed to reject hundreds of our volunteers who have been passed as medically fit, and who can probably out march any other class of men. As the ex-minister has pointed out, many of these lumber jacks have walked hundreds of miles into Edmonton from the Peace River country and from the back settlements of Ontario to Toronto or some other centre, covering 30 or 40 miles a day. These men should be allowed to go to the front instead of being put in forestry or construction battalions, because they are as good men as Canada produces, whether their feet are up to the military standard or not.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I might point out that such men if they are not allowed to go to the front, are employed at work of the highest importance, such as that performed by the railway construction and forestry battalions.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: There has been a great deal of discussion about flat feet since the war began. There is no doubt that some men who are rejected for flat feet are otherwise just as fit as any soldier who goes to the front. Most of these rejections are in the case of men who have been used to working in the lumber woods and wearing moccasins or shoe packs, and walking on a soft surface. The moccasin, of course, has no arch to sustain the centre of the foot. If these men were allowed to wear moccasins at the front there would be very little difficulty, but I am informed that when they are put in heavy soled boots and marched on a hard road they frequently have to fall out, though in every other respect perfectly fit. I am quite satisfied it is not a question of red tape on the part of the British War Office. It is more a question of a foot that can stand marching on the hard roads of France and Belgium in a heavy soled boot.

Mr. MURPHY: I understood the inquiry of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) to refer to rejections generally. The Minister of Militia (Sir Edward Kemp) gave, according to my judgment and in the light of information submitted to a committee of which I happened to be a member, almost the correct answer, but not quite. He said that a large number of rejections were due to the frailty of the human frame.

If he had said they were due to the frailty of human nature, his answer would have been absolutely correct.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: That is a very frail thing.

Mr. MURPHY: As displayed by the medical examiners appointed by the Government, a very frail thing.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Nearly all Liberals.

Mr. MURPHY: The ex-Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes) was not present at the meetings of the Committee to which I have referred. My hon. friend from Montreal, St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames) was chairman of that committee, and I take this opportunity of paying a tribute to the industry, aptitude and thoroughness which he brought to bear upon its work. A great deal of very frank evidence on the subject of these rejections was submitted. Beyond doubt, the fault lay, in the first instance, for a considerable time, in the lack of proper medical examination. My recollection of the evidence is that the period at which that stopped and the method was improved, is thoroughly well defined; and I believe that if the minister would confer with the Chairman of the Committee he would get some information which would be informative and useful to this committee in considering the Bill. It would make discussion of some points unnecessary. And not only that, but it would be reassuring as showing that an improvement has been made.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: According to what my hon. friend Mr. Murphy says the difficulty would be more in laxity of acceptances than in sincerity of rejections.

Mr. MURPHY: Yes, the Minister of Militia went on, in explanation, to say that these men when subjected to physical training developed defects that could not have been detected. But no amount of physical training could develop, for instance, a glass eye.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Many went to the front who had one glass eye, and one of these men, to my knowledge, won the Distinguished Service Order. I was instrumental in getting one of these men to the front myself. I never could see any reason why a man with one glass eye should not go to the front, if he would assume responsibility and, in the case of the loss of that eye, would claim only for the loss of one eye and not for the loss of two. These men make good soldiers. Of the men of the First Division, who at St. Julien, won eternal renown and brought glory to Canada, there were fully twenty-five per cent who would have been rejected had they been subjected to the technical examination carried on at the present time.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The proportion of those accepted and afterwards rejected as medically unfit seems very high, but we have nothing before us to show that it is higher than in the case of other armies—and in every army there must be a certain proportion of this class; what that proportion is, I do not know. There is something peculiar in the statement made by the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Arthurs) to which I call attention. I refer to page 2769 of Hansard. The hon. gentleman said:

> There are in England about 12,900 men who should be returned to Canada Personally I do not believe that any man should be kept in England who is unfit to fight in France, or about to become unfit.

The necessary inference there is that these men are all unfit for active service. But I suppose that they are employed, as the Prime Minister has stated, in duties that are fit for them, and in that case I do not see why they should not remain where they are. But I gather from the statement I have just read that they are not fit for anything, and that that is the reason they should be returned to Canada. The hon. gentleman goes on:

> Every man in Class B now in England should be returned to Canada in order to provide the necessary labour required on our farms and in our factories.

I think that there is something in this that should be further explained. If a man is to be returned to work on the farm, or in the factory, in Canada, he must be physically fit. But, in that case, why should he be returned? Is it because it would have been preferable in the interest of the country that these men should never have been enlisted?

Mr. ARTHURS: I had reference to men who were then attached to different reserve units in England. When I was there I believed, as I believe now, that there was an excess of these men there, and that all were not usefully employed. They were unfit for service in France, according to the classification adopted by the authorities in England. The contention I made was that, if these men were not to be employed usefully in England they should not be left around the camps in England, but should be returned to be engaged in useful work in Canada. There are about 900, I think, according to the list furnished by the Minister of Militia, who are listed for return to Canada. These men are not necessarily medically unfit. Nor is their acceptance anything against the examination in Canada. In many cases they are men over age, who, on enlisting, perhaps gave their age at much less than it really was. But the winter conditions in England tell very rapidly on old men from this country. They develop rheumatism and other ailments which caused them to be classified as unfit for active service. These are the men to whom I referred.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I would point out to my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) that the statement made by Sir George Perley is not inconsistent with that made by the hon. member for Parry Sound. I would remind him that Category "B" includes those fit for service in France, but not fit for general service, that is, not fit for service in the trenches at the front. Class I includes those who may give service in garrison or provisional units. Class II includes those who are fit for service in labour and construction units, or for other outdoor employment. Class III includes those who are suitable for sedentary work only. Category "C" includes those who are fit for service in the United Kingdom only. Class I takes in those who are fit for service in garrison or provisional units. Class II includes those who are fit for service in labour and construction units, or for other outdoor employment. Class III includes those who are fit for sedentary work only.

Sir George Perley, replying to my inquiry based on the statement of the hon. member for Parry Sound, says:—

> Last fall there were considerable numbers of these men here without very much to do, but have been gradually absorbing them in useful work. All B men fit for forestry, railway or labour battalions and are being used for that purpose as fast as available. Many C men also fit for the same work and C III men are being used on the medical service, also Records Office and for working around camp, etc.

There is a great deal of work around the training camps in England, and these men are used for that service, not for service at the front. Then the message continues:—

> Any surplus C three men not required here are being sent to Canada as fast as possible; nineteen hundred have already gone and another 1900 now selected for return as soon as ships available. We quite realize desirability returning to Canada for farming or industrial work all men who cannot be usefully employed here.

Mr. ARTHURS: I might state that I inadvertently used schedule B for schedule C. The figures I gave were for schedule C.

Mr. NESBITT: A good many young men coming home wounded say that they could and properly should be used around camps and hospitals in place of men who are sent over there and who occupy those positions. It is stated by the Prime Minister that a good many men of class C are used for that purpose.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: In England?

Mr. NESBITT: In England. A good many young men who are convalescent, or practically cured, believe that the men who have been used there ought to be sent back and that these convalescents should be employed in that service. That statement has a great deal of sympathy amongst the people of the country. Whether it is true or not I am not saying, but I have heard what the Prime Minister has stated as to how many of these men are employed in that sort of service. I am telling the minister that these young men, who have been over there, who have done their part at the front and have been wounded, should have these positions kept open for them if they want them.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: They do obtain these positions. It is the intention and policy to employ men in different categories and occupations whenever they are suitable. Wounded men who are convalescents often can do a certain amount of work and there is no question but that the authorities on the other side are employing this class of men around hospitals. In Canada the soldiers who keep discipline in the military hospitals are all returned men. There is a unit known as the Military Hospitals Commission Command.

Mr. NESBITT: I do not mean in Canada.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: As far as Canada is concerned, when these men approach a state of convalescence and are fit for disciplinary duty we employ them in connection with hospitals and work of that sort. But we are going to do more than that. There are a large number of these men who are approaching a state of convalescence, who are very nearly well, who are now in the pay of the country but who have not received their discharge and may not receive it until the end of the war. Some of them may entirely recover and be fit for further military service. We are going to make use of these men in Canada because they are in the pay of the country and give them some occupation. We believe that they will recover even more rapidly if they have some occupation. We propose to put them in some of the camps in this country in order that they may carry on instruction in different directions. No better instructors could be got than those who have been at the front. They will be in much healthier surroundings in these camps than they would if they remained in the cities. That is the policy I mean to pursue in regard to returned soldiers. This can be done without incurring extra expense because they are in the pay of the country at any rate until they are discharged.

Mr. SINCLAIR: There was another statement made by the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Arthurs) that I would like to get some explanation about. He appeared to have found a regiment over there that was largely composed of officers and that had very few private soldiers. If that is so, it is an extraordinary state of affairs. This is the statement made by the hon. member:

> There is in England one reserve battalion composed entirely of French Canadians. I was in close touch with them for a week or two when I was in England, and I know that the battalion is largely composed of officers and N.C.O's., and there are very few privates in the battalions.

I understand that a full staff of officers in a battalion is 32 approximately.

Sir EDWARD KEMP. Thirty-one.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The larger number of the members of this battalion are officers and N.C.O.'s drawing, I presume, the pay of officers and N.C.O.'s. It is an extraordinary state of affairs if such is the case and I would like to know if there is any mistake about that statement and, if it is true, if this regiment of officers is still maintained in England. If it is true that there should be about 32 and that instead there is the largest part of a thousand, it is a matter that ought to be dealt with by the minister.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I am unable to answer the question which my hon. friend raises. I do not know of any condition existing whereby the non-commissioned officers who form the battalion draw the pay of officers while they are really privates in the ranks. This situation, however, has developed in England. There has been a surplus of officers in England. There have been a great many subalterns, lieutenants, captains and others who could not get to the front because there were more officers than were required and some of these men have reverted to the ranks. I do not know anything about this because the matter has never come to my attention. It may be that there may be a regiment, or part of a regiment in Great Britain in which there are a great many of these men who have reverted to the ranks for the purpose of getting to the front.

Mr. ARTHURS: The remark I made in connection with the 69th reserve battalion represents the facts just as I have stated them. The hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) is under a misapprehension as to the conditions. It is quite true that an ordinary battalion is composed of 1,000 men but these reserve battalions may have a greater or less number of men according to the circumstances. A reserve battalion is for the purpose of absorbing other reinforcements or units and it takes in the officers of the units which have been absorbed. There may very often be as many as a hundred officers or even more than a hundred officers in a reserve battalion until they have been sent to France or absorbed in some other way. The same applies to non-commissioned officers. Some battalions, on arrival in England, were broken up by order of the authorities and the non-commissioned officers immediately reverted to the ranks. That is not done in all cases. In the case which I mentioned the non-commissioned officers had not so reverted. They had not received any ordinary private for some time and the result was exactly as I have stated, that of the total number on the roll the greater number were officers and non-commissioned officers. There was a decided lack of privates in this battalion at that time. It was no reflection on the Government or military authorities that this should occur because conditions are such that sometimes a reserve battalion may absorb within a week or two, three or four other battalions and it takes over the officers of these battalions that it has absorbed.

Mr. SINCLAIR: How many men did compose this reserve battalion?

Mr. ARTHURS: I was not in command of the battalion and I cannot tell the exact number.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Do I understand that this case of the 69th Battalion is not an exceptional one?

Mr. ARTHURS: The point I made was that there was a lack of men going forward for the reserve battalions belonging to Quebec. These battalions in the reserves are set aside for certain sections. The fourth reserve battalion serves western Ontario outside of Toronto; the third reserve battalion supplies reinforcements for those battalions which are from the city itself. In the same way the 69th reserve was presumably for the purpose of reinforcing the 22nd at the front. My point was that it had lots of officers and non-commissioned officers to go forward but no privates. This was exceptional. As a rule there are close to 2,000 men in each battalion, and in the vast majority of cases they are privates.

Mr. TURRIFF: My hon. friend said there was no reflection on anybody in connection with having a regiment with hundreds of officers and non-commissioned officers and practically no men. It seems to me that there is a great reflection on somebody when that state of affairs can possibly exist. The Government knew that men were wanted to fill up battalions. Why did they, just for the sake of patronage, appoint dozens and scores of officers more than they could possibly use and send them across to the front? The statement made by the minister to-day shows that there were 9,000 extra officers in Great Britain. Could the minister give the number of officers serving with the forces in France and Belgium, somewhere about 136,000 all told, and in Great Britain, about 127,000 men?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Reference has been made to surplus officers in Great Britain and we have been asked why we appointed more officers than were necessary. That question has been threshed out in the House. There are 31 officers to a battalion of about 1,000 men. The policy adopted in Canada at the beginning of the war was to recruit by battalions. I do not believe that any other system would have produced as good results under the voluntary system. If we had placed a non-commissioned officer at each station and had him recruit batches of 200 or 250 men to be sent across the seas, we would not have attained anything like the same results. The system pursued under the battalion method was to select a man prominent in a locality and entrust to him the raising of a battalion. He selected as his officers to assist him in the raising of that battalion, other men of prominence, and the young men who were asked to enlist knew the officers of the battalion and consequently were more willing to join it. When our troops went to France, it was found that the casualties among the rank and file were greater in proportion than among the officers, and consequently in due course we had a surplus of officers in Great Britain, and to some extent a surplus in Canada, because it backed up, so to speak. If a battalion went overseas under strength, say with 600 men, it would have with it only a number of officers proportionate to the number of the rank and file. I shall endeavour to find for my hon. friend the information about the number of officers in England and France respectively.

Mr. ROSS: Is not the surplus of officers in Britain caused to some extent by battalions being sent over under strength with full complement of officers? We speak about the scarcity of recruits and the necessity of conscription, and that may exist, but is it not a fact that in the pay and record office in London there are 2,700 clerks? Are these women or soldiers, and if soldiers what kind of soldiers? Would it not be possible to comb that office out and send a battalion and a half or so over to France to do some fighting if they are soldiers? There are 2,700 people in that office to pay 270,000 men. That seems preposterous. On that calculation one man is looking after the pay and records of 100 soldiers. According to the evidence given before the Returned Soldiers Committee, in the Separation and Assigned Pay branch in Canada there are 638 clerks looking after 192,000 accounts. That is bad enough, but if the whole service in England is overburdened and encumbered with unnecessary assistants to the same extent as the pay and records office, surely some of these men could be used in France.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: My hon. friend seems to be under the impression that when half a battalion or part of battalion went overseas, the full complement of officers went with them. I thought I had made myself quite clear on that point. The rule has been very rigidly adhered to, and the consequence has been a great deal of disappointment on the part of officers who did their best to work their battalions up to full strength and who were told that they could not all go over. Sometimes in a half battalion there would be four, five or six officers in excess of the proper proportion. The rule has been that only a number of officers proportionate to the number of men comprising the rank and file may go over with the troops.

Mr. ROSS: Since when?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I do not know how far back the rule extends; it covers a considerable period; I have no doubt. Up to a certain date the battalions went over at full strength, but since I became minister, some battalions, owing to circumstances generally understood, have gone over at less than full strength. In those cases the number of officers has been reduced so as to make it proportionate with the number of men making up the rank and file. It has been a difficult matter to handle; sometimes strong representations are made, but it is left to the commanding officers to select the officers whom he wishes to take.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I have gathered from reading the accounts of the casualties that there were more casualties among officers than among men; that, speaking proportionately, more lieutenants than privates have been killed or wounded. If that is true, how does the minister account for the large accumulation of officers on the other side?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I thought I had explained that point clearly. There are 31 officers in a battalion. There has been an accumulation of officers in England, apparently because of the fact the casualties have been proportionately heavier amongst the rank and file than amongst the officers. Otherwise, that accumulation of officers would not have occurred. There is, I suppose, another reason: the policy adopted in the British and Canadian armies is to grant commissions on the field to competent men. Many a splendid fellow goes out from Canada who has not seen service in the trenches. It is a question whether it is advisable to put such a man over the head of a sergeant, for instance, or other non-commissioned officer, who has been in France for a year or two and has done splendid service.

Sir SAM HUGHES: The non-commissioned officers are brought back for training.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Certainly. To some extent—not altogether—that may account for the condition referred to.

The member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross) refers to the large number of persons who are employed in the pay and records office in England and in the assigned pay and separation allowance branch here. But the hon. gentleman must remember that it is not fair to compare the number of employees in the pay and records office in England with the number of employees in the assigned pay and separation allowance branch here. We have the records branch in Ottawa, which is separate from the assigned pay and separation allowance branch. We have about 600 clerks in the records office—many of them work nights as well as during the day—and 600 or 700 in the other offices.

Mr. ROSS: Twice too many in both.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I often hear assertions of that kind from my hon. friends opposite. I wish that these hon. gentlemen would take time to inform themselves by going round and seeing what is being done in these offices. If they did they would not come to any such conclusions as that which my hon. friend has apparently reached. There is a staff of faithful, honest workers in the department at Ottawa. At the heads of these staffs are competent, conscientious men. When I discuss with them matters connected with their different branches, I find that they are anxious to serve the public to the best of their ability. Many of these men were in the department before the war broke out and had to take charge of much wider work in the different branches. They have performed and are performing a splendid service. I do not believe that there is a surplus of employees; I do not think the member for West Middlesex is justified in saying that there is, nor do I think that he can produce evidence to prove his assertion. I should be glad to produce evidence that he is mistaken in that regard. There is a tremendous amount of work in looking after the details connected with the 400,000 men, sending out thousands of cheques every month, adjusting the accounts, and so on. Our men are scattered all over this continent; they are in England and in France. They move around from place to place, their addresses change. Unfortunately, some of them are killed; others are wounded. When the men are wounded they are transferred to a hospital in France. From there they may be transferred to a hospital in England, and they may be further transferred to Canada. All these movements involve a certain amount of work in the records office. Then, the families of some of these men have gone to England, and have forgotten to give their addresses. This sort of thing involves attention to a tremendous amount of detail. I am informed that the employees in the offices in England are mostly female employees; any men who are employed are unfit for other kinds of military service. According to this sheet to which reference has been made, there are 42 male employees in the Canadian Records Office. It is probable that more males are employed in the records office than that, but they are attached to other units in the service. I assure my hon. friend that no able-bodied men would be employed to do clerical work—unless his services were indispensable—if he was fit for more important military duties.

Mr. ROSS: I do not want to criticise the minister unduly; I know that his duties are very onerous and that the times are trying. But I am informed by officers returned from England that the condition of the Pay and Records Office there is an open scandal; that the employees are so numerous that they are simply falling over each other. I would be much obliged if the minister would furnish me with information as to the number of persons employed in the Pay and Records Office, their sex, and how many officers of the militia are employed, if any, who have seen active service. I should be glad if he would give me the general details in regard to the matter. If my criticism is unjust, I shall be only too glad to retract it.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: We will endeavour to get the information for my hon. friend. But I really think that hon. gentlemen should take care to be well informed before they cast aspersions upon men who are just as upright and have just as good a status in the community in which they have hitherto lived as any hon. gentleman in this committee. I did not see the Pay and Record Office this year. I know that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries visited the office and he told me that his visit indicated to him that the work was being carried on in a most satisfactory and systematic manner, and he was very much impressed with it. That was the impression I derived when I visited the Pay and Records Office in 1915. I do not think any hon. gentleman in this House has much conception of the quantity of work that is done there. How many thousand inquiries does my hon. friend imagine are made in that office every day in the year about the men, 300,000 or thereabouts, who are in the United Kingdom or in France? The complications which call for these inquiries are very considerable. Reference has been made to the hospitals. Wounded men are very often moved from one hospital to another, and the clerks in the Pay and Records office have to keep an exact account of when a man leaves a hospital and where he goes to. They have to keep an account of transfers from one battalion to another, from one service to another. There are thousands of details.

Sir SAM HUGHES: The estates of the dead.

Mr. ROSS: That is a separate department.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: No, that is in the Pay and Records Office, because I happened to sit at lunch alongside one of the officers in charge, who was a native of my province, and who told me of incidents that had to be dealt with there in connection with the administration of that department, and which I am sure would never occur to my hon. friend. He has to deal with the law of nearly every country in Europe.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Probate.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The next of kin of some poor man who has been killed may live in Switzerland, or Norway, or Russia, or Italy, or somewhere else. The officer has to make arrangements with the Governments of those countries for all the formalities in connection with the administration, so that the Government of Canada can get a good discharge. In just that one respect alone that has been brought to my attention by the hon. member of Victoria (Sir Sam Hughes), the work is enormous, and the legal complexities that this officer has to deal with are by no means inconsiderable. This gentleman was a lawyer who had gone overseas in the Expeditionary Force, and he had eventually been transferred to these duties, because they were important, and he was very well qualified to fulfil them. I must confess I should gravely doubt whether there is any room for the criticism which my hon. friend has put forward, but we will make some inquiries. It is most undesirable, I am sure my hon. friend will agree, that men who have been taken from the best communities in this country, men having as good a status and as good a reputation as any man in this House, should be subjected to undeserved aspersions, and I am not disposed to accept them unless some better evidence is brought to my attention. Colonel Ross is a man at the head of his profession.

Mr. ROSS: That is a good name.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It is a good name, and it deserves better treatment from my hon. friend from West Middlesex than to have aspersions cast upon it without sufficient evidence. Colonel Ross, so far as my information goes, is a man of the highest character. He is the best man that the then Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes) could find for the very important duties which are entrusted to him. He has gone over to England, and so far as I could observe, he has discharged those duties with the utmost fidelity, ability and energy. I hope my hon. friend will not take for granted all those rumours, some of which have come to my attention through the press. It is the easiest thing in the world to exaggerate rumours, and, of course, they acquire a considerable importance when they are quoted by a member of the House. I have no information that would lead me to suppose that they are correct.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I admit frankly that in 1915 the Pay and Records Office was all upside down. I then appointed a very prominent auditor who put things in proper shape. I later on appointed Colonel Ross to go over and take charge. Later on the Auditor General went over, expecting to find something wrong, but he reported that things were, to his surprise, in ship-shape order. The reason for the trouble to which my hon. friend refers is this. There is more or less truth about the mistakes being made because many of the clerks are soldiers who, after having served at the front and having been wounded, have returned to England and are employed in the Pay and Record Office to take the place of men who have become convalescent and fit for service again, and have gone to the front. These lads require two or three weeks training in order to learn the business. That is the condition that I found last year was the chief cause of the trouble, namely, these men making mistakes before they understood the routine of the work.

Mr. ROSS: I would not want the Prime Minister to think I was endeavouring to cast any aspersion on any persons, nor that I would make the statement that I have made on information I have personally. I must candidly say, however, that I have heard statements to the effect that I have described, made, not once nor twice, but many times, by officers of high standing in the Canadian Expeditionary Force of just as good character and just as reliable as even the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. I hope the statements are not true. If the matter is looked into, and if the Prime Minister will kindly furnish me the information for which I have asked with regard to the encumbering of that branch with an excessive number of employees, I would like to have it.

Sir SAM HUGHES: My hon. friend does not impute any dishonesty on the part of the employees?

Mr. ROSS: Not at all, but statements have been made to the effect that the department is over-manned.

Mr. OLIVER: I would like to bring to the attention of the House the information which I have here bearing on the subject that was under discussion a few minutes ago in regard to the number of unfit men in England and how they got there. Dr. Bruce's report, which has been laid upon the Table and which is a public document, begins with this statement:

> Many hundreds of soldiers obviously unfit for service overseas have been sent from Canada to England.

The report of Dr. Jones, who was in charge of the medical service, and on the discharge of whose duties Dr. Bruce reported, says:

> There is no question of doubt that a large number of men have been sent over from Canada who must have been medically unfit when they were enlisted. This has resulted in an unnecessary burden being thrown on the medical and other services in England that deal with the weeding out of these men and their disposal.

The report of the Babtie Commission which investigated Dr. Bruce's report deals with the same subject also in its first paragraph.

> The Board is agreed that large numbers of soldiers have come, and continue to come, from Canada who are unfit for service at the front.

Dr. Bruce's report is dated September 20, 1916; Surgeon-General Jones' report, September 28, 1916, and the Babtie report December 22, 1916. So the different authorities are absolutely agreed upon the existence of the condition, and they all agree that it is very far-reaching. I have an opinion here which I shall take the liberty of reading to the House as to how far-reaching this condition is. It alleges that:

> The number of soldiers arriving in England from Canada physically unfit for service at the front is steadily growing.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: What report is that?

Mr. OLIVER: This is not a report. It is information that I have at hand and is dated October 27, 1916. It goes on:

> In the case of twelve battalions recently arrived the number has reached the serious proportion of over 16 per cent. The medical examination of these men has shown that the great majority of them have for a long time been suffering from obvious physical disabilities and should never have been enlisted. These unfits by reason of their disabilities form an undue proportion of the patients in hospitals in England, and are thus placing a heavy strain on the medical service. They present a very serious question from the pensions point of view owing to the very great difficulty of establishing the facts as to whether the disabilities were the result of, or aggravated by military service. These men who are not suitable for active military service are nevertheless capable of productive work in Canada, and practically all of them were taken from productive work in Canada and enlisted in military service for which they are useless at enormous expense to the Government, so that not only has the value of their labour been lost to the country, but they have been a heavy charge during their period of service without giving any return.

The Babtie report not only agrees with the Bruce and the Jones reports as to the conditions existing, but gives the reasons why those conditions exist, and this is a matter which I think should be placed before the House and the country.

> The Board is satisfied that there have been large numbers of men passed who ought not to have been passed by the medical officers, but it was, perhaps inevitable under the circumstances of raising the Canadian Expeditionary Force that examinations could not be conducted with all the care necessary. This it believes to have been due partly to inexperience on the part of examining medical officers, partly to hurry, partly to carelessness, and lastly, in some instances, to the opinion of the examining medical officer being overridden or ignored by commanding officers. These defects in recruiting continue to exist, despite medical examinations by recruiting medical officers, by battalion medical officers on joining units, and before sailing for the United Kingdom.

To show the extent to which this improper passing of the medically unfit has taken place, I will cite an instance or two from the Bruce report, which I think the House will find somewhat startling. Dr. Bruce gives a number of pages of unfits where the cases are described by name, regimental number, and place of enlistment. The first one I will cite is:

> No. 602397, Pte. W. J. Clements of the 34th Battalion, age 80 years, 79 years when enlisted at Guelph, March 19, 1915. Disability, advanced hardening of the arteries, examined by Major Ratz, Guelph.

The other case is:

> Pte. R. Mick No. 297454, enlisted with 224th Battalion March 17, 1916, at Pembroke, Ont. He is 16 years of age, weighs 80 pounds only, undeveloped and weak muscles in the right hip and thigh. He was passed by a doctor at Pembroke and was again examined and passed by a military medical officer at Quebec. On both occasions he says he was stripped and passed as medically fit. He left Canada three weeks after enlistment and has been in a hospital in England most of the time since arriving, suffering from his legs.

I again draw attention to the Babtie report, which says:

The inefficent character of the medical examination in some instances is due to the opinion of the examining medical officer being overridden or ignored by commanding officers.

I think the evidence there is absolute that the commanding officer was exercising his authority not as a military man but as a man having political pull. We have in that fact a very great part of the reason why recruiting conditions in Canada are as they are. Certainly we have the evidence of the Babtie Commission that that is one large part of the reason why we are carrying on the military strength in England to-day thousands, if not tens of thousands, of men who are absolutely unfit for military service.

Sir SAM HUGHES: The 224th Battalion which my hon. friend mentioned is commanded, I believe, by one of the best Grits in the Dominion.

Mr. OLIVER: It makes no difference who commands it. The point is what he did.

Mr. HANNA: How would he get his political pull if he was a Grit?

Mr. OLIVER: I cannot answer that.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I think his name is Alec McDougall.

Mr. OLIVER: It makes no difference what his name is. In that particular case it might have been because the medical officer got his appointment by political pull, and was incompetent, or as the Babtie report says, "in a hurry or careless."

Sir SAM HUGHES: It might also be that he was one of the 80 per cent of Grit doctors appointed.

Mr. OLIVER: It makes no difference whether they were Grit doctors or Grit colonels. This Government is responsible, and the Minister of Militia is directly responsible, for the conduct of our military forces. That is the condition that exists and that has existed, and the Government and the Minister of Militia are responsible for it. And out of that condition grows—as it of necessity must grow—the dissatisfaction with the management of our military affairs, which, again, results in the depression of military enthusiasm that we find throughout the country at the present time.

Sir SAM HUGHES: That was my work last year in England—to get this medical business on as satisfactory a basis as I could.

Mr. OLIVER: I am not finding fault with the former minister's efforts to make things right. I say that study of the Bruce report shows that Dr. Bruce was most energetic, and, so far as a layman can judge from reading it, most efficient. What may have been the family troubles in the Government I am not prepared to say, but, apparently, Dr. Bruce's report was not allowed to come into effect. He was investigated, and the result of that investigation was the Babtie report, and Dr. Bruce is not in the service of the Dominion of Canada to-day.

Mr. BLAIN: The hon. gentleman (Mr. Oliver) is well acquainted with conditions in the Edmonton district. Does he know of cases of this political influence of which he speaks in that district?

Mr. OLIVER: I am not here to answer questions about the conditions in Edmonton.

Mr. BLAIN: But the hon. gentleman is making a charge that it was because of political influence that a large number of men got past the local medical officers. So, I ask if he knows anything about political pull having been used in his own district concerning which he is well informed. My information is that the medical officers generally did not belong to the political party of the Government, but rather to the other party.

Mr. OLIVER: I am not discussing matters in Edmonton. I brought up two instances, one in Guelph and the other in Pembroke. It was not necessary to refer to Edmonton; I think that perhaps the same conditions did not exist there. But, looking over the Bruce report I found such scandalous cases as those to which I have referred. I am not discussing the locality, but the fact as reported. I am not giving my opinion to the House, I am giving the statements made in the report of the Babtie Commission, which shows that certain conditions existed partly because of the inefficiency of the medical men, or, possibly, because of the decisions of the medical men, being overridden by the commanding officers. I say this is a condition for which the military administration of the Dominion must accept full responsibility. I bring it to the attention of the Minister of Militia on this occasion, and I hope we shall hear further from him with regard to it.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Before the committee rises, I have a suggestion to make. This Bill has been under discussion for two weeks. To-day's sitting has been quite argumentative, and yesterday's was exhausting. I understand that a great number of members are out of town. It seems to me therefore ,that we might well postpone further consideration of this Bill until Monday morning and, for the balance of the week, take up other business. I think that, on the whole, our progress will be just as great. And possibly the Prime Minister might consider the suggestion of an adjournment now.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Along similar lines, I was going to take the liberty of suggesting that members who have suggestions to make for changes in the Bill might make them in writing to the Minister of Militia, or to the Minister of Justice for their consideration, and so avoid taking up more time than is necessary with discussion in this committee. My object is to get on with the Bill with the least possible delay. Let us get through the Bill as soon as we can. If my suggestion were adopted, progress would be made with the Bill even though the consideration of it in this committee were not proceeded with until Monday.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Has my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) opposite anything to suggest?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I hope that the Prime Minister will be content to have the House adjourn now.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am quite prepared to go on this evening, and so far as I am concerned. I should be glad to do so. At the same time, I do not wish to insist upon my own view. To-day we have not touched any of the clauses of the Bill, the time having been occupied with general discussion—and I suppose that general discussion is necessary, though much of what has gone on this afternoon has not been relevant to the Bill. I am prepared to adjourn now. I should like to go on tomorrow, and especially to get through with clauses of the Bill that are not controversial. There must be some of a formal character which might be passed, and thus some progress would made. If we come to clauses which are controversial or as to which information is desired, they can be allowed to stand for the time being.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: There will be just a general consideration of the Bill to-morrow, I suppose?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I should prefer that those clauses that are not controversial should be passed, I should like to make some progress with the Bill which has been before the House every day for two weeks. With that understanding, I am willing that the House should adjourn.

Progress reported.

On motion of Sir Robert Borden, the House adjourned at 6.05 p.m.

Saturday, July 7, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

REPORT PRESENTED.

Progress Report Manitoba Hydrometric Survey for calendar year 1915.—Hon. Mr. Roche.

FIRST READING.

Bill No. 103, concerning the payment of salaries or wages of employees of railway companies.—Mr. Boys.

PRIVILEGE—MR. PUGSLEY.

On the Orders of the day:

Hon. WILLIAM PUGSLEY: Mr. Speaker, I wish to raise a question of privilege which arises out of some observations made by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden), on the 6th of June, in connection with a certain investigation of the affairs of the Central Railway Company of New Brunswick. These remarks were made upon a motion which was made by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers). The right hon. the Prime Minister alleged that I had made an infinitely stronger attack upon Mr. Justice Landry than the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) had, in a letter to the Prime Minister, made upon Mr. Justice Galt. The Prime Minister also made some remarks with regard to the course which he said had been taken to prevent proper inquiry at that time. My statement will take some little time and I have no desire to delay the House upon the discussion of the Military Service Bill; but I realize that if one delays too long he is not allowed to bring up a question of privilege. If it could be understood that there would be no prejudice from the delay, that my rights would stand as they are now, I should be willing to let the matter stand until the Military Service Bill is out of committee.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I think that is a very reasonable request, and it should certainly be granted.

MILITARY SERVICE ACT, 1917.

CONSIDERATION OF THE BILL IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE HOUSE.

House in committee on Bill No. 75, respecting Military Service.—Sir Robert Borden (Resumed from Friday, July 6.)

Mr. RAINVILLE in the Chair.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I beg the indulgence of the committee while I refer to a statement which was made in my absence from the House yesterday by the ex-Minister of Militia and Defence (Sir Sam Hughes). On page 3200 of Hansard he is reported as follows:

> The Finance Minister also on one occasion asked me if I did not think it proper that we should let up. He thought Canada had done her full share in sending men to help England. I pointed out that we were not helping England, but helping the Empire and the cause of human liberty. This conversation was not conducted in the presence of the Prime Minister, but witnesses can be had in large numbers in the city of Toronto to whom the Finance Minister made the same statement.

I am sorry I was not present yesterday afternoon in order that I might have given a prompt and emphatic denial to that statement. I desire to say that it is fiction pure and simple, that it is wholly and absolutely untrue in every particular, and without the slightest foundation in substance or in fact. I desire to say further that no such conversation ever took place or could have taken place, because the sentiments attributed to me are entirely incompatible with my known views with regard to the war, and my official conduct during its progress. During the fall of 1915 and the early part of 1916, it was brought to the attention of the Government—I should say to the attention of nearly all the members of the Government—that in certain districts in which recruiting had been brisk, vital industries such as coal mining, iron and steel, agriculture, and the munitions industry, were suffering by reason of the fact that the recruiting was not in any degree selective; that is to say, that skilled mechanics were being recruited, and that it was not possible to replace them because of the long training required to qualify a man in those trades. I received many communications upon the subject, both orally and by letter, and in order that this matter may not depend upon the statement of the ex-Minister of Militia upon the one hand and of myself upon the other, I desire to read a letter which I found this morning among my correspondence of the early part of 1916, which substantially sets forth the views I had at that time respecting recruiting. Before reading it I desire to say—although I do not think it is necessary that I should say it to this House—that I have always been in favour of this country putting forth the utmost of her effort in recruiting, in order that our military strength at the front should be as great as possible, that we might play our part with increasing vigour until this war was successfully concluded.

The letter which I shall read is as follows:

> Ottawa, February 19th, 1916.
>
> Dear Mr. Harmer,—
>
> I am obliged for yours of the 17th instant enclosing a copy of your letter to Mr. Flavelle, which I have read with much interest. The questions raised have been before us for some time but are exceedingly difficult of solution as you will, I am sure, realize. According to the British authorities the great need is for men and more men. If we discourage men in one or more callings from going to the front would it not tend to discourage recruiting generally? I am aware of the force of the arguments presented as I have canvassed them many times during the past few months. There is a point beyond which over-recruiting weakens the strength of a nation for a long drawn-out struggle. On the other hand, if an early and complete decision could be obtained it would appear better to sacrifice production to a certain extent and make the strongest possible effort in the field. I have great confidence in the situation adjusting itself with the exercise of reasonable discretion on the part of the Militia Department. You may depend upon it we shall do what we can here to keep the nation strong and at the same time put forth our best efforts in the field.
>
> Yours very truly,
>
> W. T. White.
>
> R. Harmer, Esq.,
> President, Sawyer-Massey Company, Limited,
> Hamilton, Ontario.

I had the view, during the concluding stages of voluntary recruiting, that the essential industries were being crippled to a certain extent by the enlisting of skilled mechanics, some of whom—I do not say all of whom—could have rendered better service, or as good service, in connection with the prosecution of the war, possibly, as if they had enlisted, although I am the first to say that I admire above all the man who enlists and goes forward to the front. Nevertheless in certain industries which are vital it is necessary, in my judgment, that a certain selection should be exercised; in other words I have always had the view that the proper course for a nation to pursue in time of war is to adopt selective compulsory military service, such as is provided for in this Bill?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Always?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My right hon. friend asks, "Always." I said the other day in this House that while I had realized that the voluntary enlistment system was unjust, in that it cast the burden of the war upon the most patriotic, at the same time, I had desired that we should not resort to compulsory service until the national need was clearly apparent, as it is at the present time, as I desired that we should maintain national unity in this country and the appearance of unity before the world. That is all, Mr. Chairman, that I desire to say upon the subject.

On section 1—Short Title: Definitions.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: This section does not require any comment, at all events so far as I am concerned, but I will observe to my right hon. friend that the Army Act is made a part of this Bill.

This section says:

"The Army Act" means the Army Act for the time being in force in the United Kingdom and all regulations and orders made under the authority thereof.

It would be not only convenient, but I should think indispensable, that we should have the Army Act before us. A copy of the Act has been placed upon the table of the House, I think, but nobody has seen it and nobody can form any opinion about it. If it is to be part of the law, it should certainly be produced for the convenience of members in discussing the measure.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It is only made part of this Act in so far as it is applicable and not inconsistent with the provisions of this Act.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Certainly, but the part that is applicable ought to be made public. There is one part of the Act which is part of the law which we are going to enact, and I think it should be printed with the Act itself. In the meantime we should have it.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I might say that the Army Act has for many years been applicable in this country, just in the same way; the Militia Act has made it applicable.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: But my right hon. friend will remember that the Militia Act was not resorted to, but this Act is to come into force and very lively too. If there are provisions in the Army Act applicable to this Act, it is only right that all should go together.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I quite agree with the right hon. leader of the Opposition that it is very desirable that we should have the Army Act before us. I think we ought also to have the regulations which were referred to by the Minister of Militia (Sir Edward Kemp) yesterday. He made a statement which surprised me very much—that under those regulations, if a man enlisted was able to pay $50 he would be able to purchase his discharge. I should like to see those regulations. We ought to have them. I understand there are certain provisions for the punishment of deserters. I believe the Army Act provides for the execution of a deserter. I am not sure and perhaps my hon. friend can tell me as to that. Looking at this Bill, I find there are different provisions, and one is that a deserter may be tried by court martial, and punished by imprisonment for a term not exceeding three years. The subsection reads:

On summary conviction to imprisonment for any term not exceeding three years.

It is important to determine whether that would over-ride the provisions of the Army Act, which provide for execution—a deserter is liable to be shot, under the provisions of the Army Act. I do not know whether this would over-ride the Army Act, but it is a matter to be considered quite carefully.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The King's Regulations and Orders for the Army for Canada, approved in Canada, are the regulations under which a man, heretofore, has been able to purchase his discharge for $15. More recently the amount was raised to $50. It is the intention that the provisions that deserters are punishable by imprisonment for three years shall over-ride the provisions of the Army Act which provide a much more drastic punishment. The law heretofore has made desertion punishable by the very extreme penalty mentioned by the hon. gentleman from St. John (Mr. Pugsley).

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Is it the intention that this regulation, which allows a conscript or a recruit to buy his discharge, shall be applicable under this Bill? Will the conscript be able to avoid conscription by paying $50 and getting a substitute?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: No.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Then the regulations are included, I understand, and under the regulations, as stated by the Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen), a recruit can purchase his discharge for $50. It was $15 when the war began, but it has now changed to $50. It is provided here that these regulations are part of the law. This means that under this regulation the conscript can purchase his discharge and hire a substitute for $50. Is that right?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Even to-day a man is not entitled as of right to purchase his discharge. There are certain conditions under which the purchase of a discharge may be allowed, which conditions provide for the payment of $50. Under this Bill he has no right whatever to enforce the purchase of his discharge for $50 or any other sum.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Under the regulation he cannot claim his discharge as of right on payment of $50. But he can apply for it, and his application can be granted or refused on conditions which are dependent, I suppose, on the will of the minister of the department. It would be the same under this Bill, I suppose?

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is no provision in this Act for it. It is a question whether the regulations and orders bearing upon such cases would be applicable under this law. A man is entitled to apply for discharge, but he would not be entitled to get it as of right. Until I am familiar with the conditions which apply to such a case and which have heretofore enabled a man to get his discharge, I cannot say whether it should be possible to grant such a discharge under this Act. I do not see that the matter is of any force.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: It is of great force.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is not a matter of right; it is entirely within the jurisdiction of the militia authorities.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: It is a very serious matter.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It would be serious if a man could purchase his discharge as of right; but he is not able to do so, and certainly will not be able to under this Act.

Mr. DEVLIN: What are the conditions under which he may purchase his discharge?

[Sir Wilfrid Laurier.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: I cannot name the conditions under which he has heretofore been able to purchase it. If those conditions were such as to enable the purchase under this Act they would not apply, because the regulations would prevent their applying. I myself do not know any reason why the same condition should not obtain in one case as in the other, because in neither case is it a matter of right.

Mr. DEVLIN: Can the Minister of Militia or any member of the Government not inform the House as to the conditions under which a man may purchase his discharge?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: These matters will come up for consideration when we take up the clause which adopts the Army Act. They do not properly come under the clause that we are now considering.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I think it would properly come up for consideration now, in view of the statement of the Minister of Militia yesterday that quite a number of those who had enlisted purchased their discharge for the sum of $50. We should be informed with regard to that. My own view is that the regulation that applies to those who have already enlisted ought to apply to those who may be taken under this Bill. I object most strongly to any kind of discrimination against those who are to be taken by force. The Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) some little time ago stated that members of the Civil Service were to be discriminated against; that those who had not enlisted were guilty of non-recognition of their duty and were to be paid on a different basis. In other words, they were to be treated as if they were members of a degraded conscript army. Perhaps that is a necessary result of having voluntary enlistment for two and a half years or more and then resorting to compulsory service. The Government ought to treat those who will go to the front under this law no less favourably than it has treated those who have already enlisted. I am surprised, therefore, that the Solicitor General should say that the regulation providing for discharge on the payment of $50 will not apply to those who are conscripted. The Solicitor General says that the obtaining of discharge upon payment of a certain sum is not a matter of right. If that is so, it is all the worse, because under previous regulations anybody who was permitted to have his discharge might be released from the service on the payment of $15. Many a poor boy might be able to raise $15—but the Government raised the fee to $50. I suppose the intention was to make it more difficult for a man to obtain discharge and to make those who desired to obtain their discharge feel the burden of the payment of $50. Whoever explains this matter to the committee ought to be able to state why the fee was raised from $15 to $50. It strikes me that this was a most extraordinary action on the part of the Government. However, under that provision a certain number of men who had enlisted were allowed to purchase their discharge. The committee ought to be made acquainted with those regulations and to have some information as to the conditions under which these men were allowed to buy their discharge and the general conditions which governed the actions of the Militia Department in that respect.

Mr. ROSS: There is a provision in the Militia Act which gives a man who is subject to its terms the right to buy a substitute. If the Militia Act is to read in conjunction with the present law and there is nothing in the present law which is inconsistent with that provision in the Militia Act, I assume that that provision will still remain the law of the land. The result will be that a man of wealth will be able, under the Militia Act, to buy his freedom from service to his country. It seems to me that that should not be permitted. I should like to know whether the Solicitor General interprets the law as I have pointed out.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If this clause of the Militia Act is not one of those which are specifically negatived in this Bill, it is because it does not apply under the Bill as it stands. At all events, it is the intention that it shall not apply.

Mr. DEVLIN: Would it not be just as well to insert in the Bill a clause to that effect, so that there would be no doubt about the matter?

Mr. MEIGHEN: My impression is that the section of the Militia Act which provides for this is one of those specifically negatived in this Bill.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: If the Militia Act is made part of this Bill and if the Militia Act provides that a conscript can buy his discharge, a man should certainly do so under this Bill.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think so, because the Militia Act is made part of the Bill only in so far as it is applicable and not inconsistent therewith. This Bill specifically says that a man in a certain class on a certain date becomes a member of the militia. It is utterly inconsistent with that provision to say that a man may make another instead of himself a member of the militia. I know that it was contemplated in the preparation of this Bill that that clause of the Militia Act should be specifically negatived. I understand now that it is not one of those specifically negatived; that is because such a clause is clearly inconsistent with this Act and could not apply.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I think it is not inconsistent, because under the Militia Act a man had to be drafted before he could purchase a substitute. So, under this Act, he would have to be enrolled, and the provisions of the Militia Act enabling him to purchase a substitute would clearly apply and be in no way inconsistent with this law.

Mr. ROSS: I cannot follow the Solicitor General's argument; I do not think it is logical. A man who comes under the provisions of this Act becomes enrolled under the Militia Act, and it is not inconsistent to say that under this Act after he has become conscripted he can buy himself off. There is no inconsistency at all.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: We are discussing the definition of certain expressions used in the Act. When we come to section 13, which deals with the application of the Militia Act, it may be proper to include this among the sections specifically negatived. It is not the intention of this Act that substitution by payment shall be allowed.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: This discussion arose out of an observation I made that we should have before us the Army Act and the regulations made under it, and at once we see the importance of my request. Under this measure the Army Act and the regulations made under it are intended to become part of the law of Canada, and therefore it is important that we should know the provisions of the Army Act and those regulations. On this point I find that section 81 of the British Army Act says:

> If a recruit within three months after the date of his attestation pays for the use of His Majesty a sum not exceeding £10, he shall be discharged with all convenient speed, unless he claims such discharge during a period when soldiers in army service who otherwise would be transferred to the reserves are required by a proclamation of His Majesty in pursuance of this Act to continue in army service—

This is made part of the Bill, and therefore we should have before us the Army Act and the regulations when we come to discuss section 13.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It is not made part of this Bill in the way in which my right hon. friend suggests; it is made part of this Bill in so far as it is applicable and not inconsistent with the provisions of the Bill.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Exactly, it is made part of the Bill in so far as recruiting is concerned. Suppose you make the levy, and men are recruited, the Army Act is quite germane to the subject. The recruit might say: Under the Army Act I can purchase my discharge; I do not want to serve; here is my money; free me. I do not see that there is any inconsistency.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: We will take that into consideration. I see by the Militia Act, as revised by my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and re-enacted in 1904, this provision:

The Army Act for the time being in force in the United Kingdom, the King's regulations, and all other laws applicable to His Majesty's troops in Canada and not inconsistent with this Act or the regulations made thereunder, shall have force and effect as if they had been enacted by the Parliament of Canada for the government of the militia.

That is section 74 of the Militia Act as it has been in force since 1904. I do not recall that my right hon. friend printed the Army Act at the time that Bill was under discussion. But I will take into consideration his request, as he is naturally more concerned about the matter now than he was then.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Exactly. I do not recall that we printed the Army Act then. I do not know that my right hon. friend asked that it be printed. But the circumstances in 1904 were different from those in 1917, because now we are passing a law which must be of immediate application, as my right hon. friend said it would be applied.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The British Military Service Act makes applicable their Army Act and does not specifically negative the provisions referred to by my right hon. friend. At the same time, no man can purchase his discharge under the British Military Service Act. But, coming to the point raised by my hon. friend from West Middlesex (Mr. Ross), if the section of the Militia Act to which he refers were to apply, it would clearly be inconsistent with this Act. Subsection 2 of section 27 of the Militia Act, says:

Any man balloted or notified for service may, at any time, be exempt until again required in his turn to serve, by furnishing an acceptable substitute, on or before the day fixed for his appearance.

The men here are not balloted or notified for service; a man could not release himself from his liability.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Is that an answer, that under this measure men are not ballotted?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, because the section I have quoted applies only to men balloted.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: By this Bill you do not ballot, but every man is made a conscript, or he has to prove that he is exempt.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How could a man come forward and say he is entitled to furnish a substitute under this Bill, because the Militia Act says that he may furnish a substitute? Under this measure he is not balloted.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Under the present law, on the payment of $50 the Government has granted discharges to men who have enlisted and sworn to serve the King. The Solicitor General says that that provision will not be applicable to those who are hereafter enlisted under the Military Service measure.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have not said that.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I understood the Solicitor General to argue that discharges would not be given.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I never said that at all.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Did not the Solicitor General say that because, under the Militia Act, men are balloted for and, by reason of being balloted for, they become liable to service, therefore the provision for hiring a substitute, or the provision in the regulations allowing a man to buy his discharge for $50, would not apply to a man who enlisted under the Military Service Act? If that is so, we would, as I said before, have one law for those who have enlisted voluntarily and another law for those who are conscripted. That would be very objectionable. If it is the intention not to allow the procuring of a substitute, or discharge on payment of a certain sum, there should be a section in the Bill clearly covering those matters.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I have already pointed out that that will come up under section 13, and, if it is not perfectly plain, it will be made so. The matter does not come under this section which deals with definitions.

Mr. DEVLIN: The Solicitor General distinctly said a few minutes ago that a man, not as a matter of right, but under certain conditions, could purchase his discharge. Now he says that he cannot do so because the law is changed and there is no ballot. Which statement is correct? Can a man purchase his discharge conditionally, or can he not?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: If my hon. friend will read the remarks in Hansard, he will understand the matter.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member is mixing the two cases up. What I referred to was the furnishing of a substitute. That applies only to balloted men.

Mr. TURRIFF: From the present discussion, it is not at all clear whether a man will have the right to purchase a discharge or not, or whether he will have the right to furnish a substitute or not. If the Bill does not make the matter clear, will the Solicitor General have the Bill amended so as to make it clear?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I have twice said that we would make that clear when we came to section 13, if it is not already clear.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: We will take it on trust till then.

Mr. DEVLIN: I would suggest that section 1 should stand in the meantime until we have considered section 13.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I really do not see any occasion for section 1 to stand; it deals with definitions.

Mr. DEVLIN: There is a great deal of doubt as to the meaning of the section, and as it is a defining section, it should be perfectly clear.

Mr. MARCIL: The Minister of Militia stated yesterday that in the early stages of the war 1,248 men had been discharged by purchase, at first for $15 and later for $50. He gave no reasons why these men were discharged after having enlisted, and the committee is entitled to some explanation on this point.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The Minister of Militia gave the only explanation that was possible, I think. I am informed that the reasons in each case were of a special character; such a case, for instance, as that of a man with a family who has had the misfortune to lose his wife—they were chiefly cases of a compassionate nature.

Mr. MARCIL: Would a man be permitted to purchase his discharge under this Act under similar conditions?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not think there should be any general provision of that nature, but we can discuss that under section 13.

Mr. OLIVER: Yesterday we were discussing the administration of the Militia Department. I do not know that the discussion was altogether in order, but it having been begun, I for one am prepared to continue it. At the same time I do not wish to interfere with the discussion of the clauses of the Bill. I observe that neither the Minister of Militia (Sir Edward Kemp) nor the Parliamentary Secretary of the Department (Mr. McCurdy) is present, so I presume the Government do not wish to have a discussion of the administration of the department at this moment.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I think it would hardly be well to have a discussion of that kind on a clause which deals purely with definitions, but there is probably some other clause in the Act on which my hon. friend could take this matter up. The Minister of Militia is unavoidably absent. He is, of course, much more familiar with the administration of his department than I am and I should like him to be present when my hon. friend takes the matter up.

Mr. OLIVER: I quite appreciate that. Personally, I did not think the discussion was in order yesterday.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I did not think so, either.

Mr. OLIVER: But it having been begun, I feel that we have the right to continue it, and if we drop the discussion now I should like it to be understood that we shall have an opportunity of resuming it at a later date on some other clause of the Bill.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I hope that can be arranged. I will speak to the Minister of Militia about it.

Mr. TURRIFF: I wish to discuss, on some clause of the Bill, the matter of sending parcels to prisoners of war in Germany, and the unsatisfactory handling of this business by the Red Cross so far as Canada is concerned. I do not wish to discuss this question now, unless it is quite convenient to the Government.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I think it would be better to discuss it on some other occasion. It would be proper to bring the matter up, for instance, on a motion to go into Committee of Supply, if that would suit my hon. friend.

Mr. TURRIFF: I should prefer the Minister of Militia to be present.

The CHAIRMAN: This discussion is quite irrelevant.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: We shall have an opportunity of discussing this matter when the Minister of Militia is here. If it relates to postal facilities I think it would be well for the Postmaster General also to be present. We will see that they are both present at some time that will be convenient to my hon. friend.

Mr. DEVLIN: I would suggest that this section stand until we have considered section 13. I cannot conscientiously vote for this section without understanding it. I do not understand it, and the Government does not understand it either.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: This section will have no effect until section 13 is carried. I should be very glad to accede to my hon. friend's request, but I can see no reason for it whatever.

On section 2—persons liable for service:

2. (1) Every male British subject who comes within one of the classes described in section three of this Act, and who,—

(a) is ordinarily resident in Canada; or

(b) has been at any time since the fourth day of August, 1914, resident in Canada, shall be liable to be called out as hereinafter provided on active service in the Canadian Expeditionary Force for the defence of Canada, either in or beyond Canada, unless he

(a) comes within the exception set out in the Schedule; or

(b) reaches the age of forty-five before the class or subclass to which he belongs, as described in section three is called out.

Such service shall be for the duration of the present war and of demobilization after the conclusion of the war.

(2) Nothing in this Act shall prevent any man from voluntarily enlisting in the Canadian Expeditionary Force, so long as voluntary enlistment in such force is authorized.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The section says: "so long as voluntary enlistment in such force is authorized." Does that mean that the Government intend to pass an order preventing voluntary enlistment?

[Mr. Turriff.]

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It is merely precautionary. There is no such proposal in contemplation at the present time.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Why not leave the words out then?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It was thought desirable to include these words from the standpoint of good drafting.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: What is the reason for the difference between the language of this section and the language of the Militia Act? This section says:—

Every male British subject who comes within one of the classes described in section three of this Act and who,—

(a) is ordinarily resident in Canada; or

(b) has been at any time since the fourth day of August, 1914, resident in Canada.

Section 10 of the Militia Act says:—

All the male inhabitants of Canada, at the age of eighteen years and upwards, and under sixty, not exempt or disqualified by law, and being British subjects, shall be liable to service in the militia.

I need not say that it is always better to have uniformity in drafting except where something different is intended. Is this a better drafting than the language of the Militia Act? What is the meaning of this: "(b) has been at any time since the fourth day of August, 1914, resident in Canada?"

Mr. MEIGHEN: There are two differences. In the Militia Act, the word "inhabitants" is used as against the term "ordinarily resident" in this Act. In the Militia Act only those who at the date of the putting into force of section 10 were inhabitants were included in its operation. Under this Act all who have been ordinarily resident since the outbreak of the war are included. The reasons are these: The term "ordinarily resident" has a well-established judicial meaning. It is the term used in the British Military Service Act and has been defined throughout the operation of the Act there. I think that is a sufficient reason for the use of the words. I do not know of any special judicial interpretation of the word "inhabitant." But the main difference is that this Act is made to cover those who have been ordinarily resident since the outbreak of the war. It is felt that the Act should apply to all who have been ordinarily resident in Canada since that time, for the reason that if it were otherwise worded it would distinctly permit to escape some who were said to have gone from Canada for the purpose of avoiding anticipated military service. It was not thought well that the Act should not at least apply to these persons, whatever means, if any, should be taken to enforce it as against them.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Why do you not use the word "domiciled?"

Mr. MEIGHEN: Again I repeat that the words "ordinarily resident" are in the British Act. I am satisfied they are in the New Zealand Act. They have been interpreted in many cases. Consequently we get the advantage of the interpretation in regard to exactly parallel cases in British countries. I quite agree that the word "domiciled" has a judicial meaning, but the term "ordinarily resident" has been found to be that used in such an Act as this.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I notice that every male British subject who comes within one of the classes described is liable to service. I understand that this would apply not only to born British subjects but to naturalized British subjects. Having regard to that circumstance, does not my hon. friend think an announcement should be made now of the policy of the Government in view of the statements made in this House, notably by the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. Bennett), that the Government intended to present to Parliament during the present session a new Franchise Bill by which even naturalized British subjects will be debarred from the exercise of the franchise?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: You would not believe it?

Mr. LEMIEUX: I cannot believe it, but it has been stated in this House by one of the most prominent members of the ministerial party and I think by one minister—if I mistake not the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) gave us a broad hint to that effect. In view of the fact that all British subjects, whether born British subjects, as nearly all of us are, or naturalized British subjects, are going to serve under this Bill, should the Government contemplate the passing of a law which will deprive those naturalized British subjects of their rights as citizens of this country?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I think my hon. friend's imagination has run away with him judging from his reference to what has been said in this House on that subject. I can only say in reply to his inquiry that the subject has not been under consideration.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: And will not be?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Has not been.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: And will not be?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I speak for the past, not for the future.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I do not wish to be rude to my right hon. friend the Prime Minister, but I heard distinctly—and if I had time I would lay my finger on it in Hansard—the hon. member for Calgary, in answer to a question which I interjected into the debate, declare that even French and Belgian reservists in Canada would be deprived of their votes by the new franchise law, and that all naturalized British subjects who belonged to countries where a military law could reach them from abroad should be disfranchised. So, my imagination is not at work at all, but my ears and my memory serve me well.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I would advise my hon. friend (Mr. Lemieux) not to rely too much on what the hon. member for Calgary says, because he said, in the presence of the Prime Minister, that there would be no conscription law.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not remember that.

Mr. LEMIEUX: And it is said that he said there would be civil war. Many things are said in these dog days.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I am satisfied with the explanation given by the Solicitor General (Mr Meighen) that these words "ordinarily resident" are taken from some authority.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Yes, from the Military Service Act of Great Britain.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: That is all right; the moment there is an interpretation for them I am quite satisfied, because when this Act is to be enforced we shall have a precedent. But, I come now to another consideration. Section 2 provides that every male British subject who comes within the class as described and who > —reaches the age of forty-five before the class or subclass to which he belongs, as described in section three, is called out,

—shall be liable to service. I do not know whether my right hon. friend has heard of this or not but it has been represented to me that the age of 45 ought to be reduced to 35. The old provision was 18 to 45, but my right hon. friend has altered the "18" to "20" and for good reasons. I have been told that for similar reasons you should limit the age to 35. In the olden time it was found by experience that men between the age of 18 and 4 p.m. 45 could bear the fatigue of military service, but the conditions of war have changed and everybody knows that the conditions of service to-day are far more severe than they were in the time of the wars of Napoleon. To-day a man is subjected to a far more severe strain in training, and especially in service, and I have been told—I give the information for what it is worth—that, while a man could serve up to 45 in the old days, under the present system of warfare the strain is more than he can endure. I submit the matter for the consideration of the Government. I should not be at all surprised if my right hon. friend has heard protests, as I have, against the limit being fixed at 45 instead of 35.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I acknowledge that there is a great deal of force in what my right hon. friend has said as to the capacity of a man above the age of 40 to endure the hardships of warfare as it is carried on at present. I agree that it is a perfectly open question as to whether we should go to the age of 45 in this measure. We thought it best to leave the Bill in this form for debate in the House. At one time I was rather inclined to think that we might adopt the very suggestion which my right hon. friend has made before we brought down the Bill; but there is no probability whatever, as I understand conditions in this country, of calling out the class of 45, or even 40, in order to provide the number of men authorized to be enlisted under this Bill; there would be sufficient men in the lower classes to provide the required number. There is, however, the consideration that there are certain purposes other than combatant services—because my right hon. friend has been speaking of combatant services—for which a great many men have been required and will be required in the future. It was that consideration that led us to leave the age as it is in the Bill. I quite agree as to the inadvisability of attempting to send men above 40 into the combatant service. In England the compulsory provision of the Act fixes the age at 41, but there is provision that men may be enlisted up to the age of 48 for voluntary service. There are, of course, exceptional cases. I remember one man from British Columbia who has been at the front for over a year, and who, I believe, was well up to 60 when he enlisted. He was a vonderfully well preserved man.

[Sir Wilfrid Laurier.]

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: He must have been.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: He had been an athlete and was wonderfully well preserved. They said that he had endured the hardship of trench warfare better than men half his age.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I hope my right hon. friend will reserve this clause.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I thought we might pass it with the understanding that if, upon the discussion of the next section where the question will definitely come up, we should reach the conclusion that an amendment should be made, we could return to this section.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: If it is understood that we can take it up subsequently, I have no objection, but I would impress on my right hon. friend the advisability of limiting the age to less than 45, or even 35. I have had correspondence impressing the advisability of reducing the age.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Has my right hon. friend taken into account the consideration I have mentioned?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Yes.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: That is, the use of men for service of a non-combatant nature—in the forestry corps, railway construction corps, labour corps, army service corps, medical service corps, and army transport. A man who is incapable of military service in the trenches may be able to perform one of these other services, as for example driving a motor, or performing work of a certain character in a lumber camp or in railway construction.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: What you want is fighting men. That is the raison d'être of this Bill. I understand that in these days the fighting man has to be trained as an athlete is trained; he is made to carry enormous weights and to march long distances, and unless he is in the prime of life and health he cannot stand it. This view has been strongly recommended to me, and I submit it for the consideration of the Government. I intend to press my views later on when we return to this section.

Mr. MORPHY: In subsection A of section 2 we find the words: Every male British subject who

(a) is ordinarily resident in Canada; or
(b) has been at any time since the fourth day of August, 1914, resident in Canada.

Has any provision been made to reach the several thousands of young men who left this country since the war broke out? That is to say, is there any arrangement with adjoining governments whereby co-operation may be had and that class be reached? It seems to me it would be unfair to the young men who are here if the Government did not take some measures to get after those who left Canada, and also to prevent the manhood of Canada from leaving now.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: An Order in Council passed under the War Measures Act has been in force for several weeks to prevent people leaving Canada except with the consent of the authorities. No definite arrangement has been made with the United States Government pending the passing of this Bill. The subject, however, has been discussed.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I notice that by the last paragraph it is enacted that such service shall be for the duration of the present war and of demobilization after the conclusion of the war. Has the Government any policy as to the mode of demobilization? I notice that in England Mr. Garvin, the well-known writer, has published a series of articles in the Observer with the object of calling the attention of the Government to the necessity of appointing a Minister of Reconstruction whose chief duties would be to look after the demobilization and the work resulting from demobilization. It may be premature to talk of demobilization now, but I mention it since my right hon. friend referred to it the other day in a way which I did not like, when he introduced his Bill. He really threatened those who are not in favour of conscription with the returned soldiers. I should like to know first if the soldiers are coming back to Canada with their arms, or if they will leave their arms in Europe when returning to Canada. To be serious, I shall read Mr. Garvin's views about demobilization. The article is as follows:

> Mr. Garvin urgently demands that consideration be given the problem of "making work" for the vast army of discharged soldiers. Daily needs make work, and this will continue while man fulfills his destiny on the planet. The returned men will continue consumers, will cease to destroy, and will become producers. In this connection Mr. Garvin seems to discern the economic paradox of want through too many able and willing hands ready to produce all things wanted—of destitution through overproduction. Many feel, clearly or dimly, the paradoxical fear that the turning of a great army from destruction to production will cause widespread want. Mr. Garvin's warning comes none too soon. Men in authority who think something should be done must be supplanted at once with men who know what must be done and have courage to do it. There is a ray of hope in the resumption of coal mining in Alberta. In other industries, too, the attitude of stupid helplessness must be ended. The needs of the men in the trenches have been supplied by the men and women at home. The return of these men to industries in which they supply their own wants can be made a calamity by governmental stupidity or a great relief by governmental capacity. Preparations for peace have certainly been delayed too long. Paralyzing timidity regarding the money of the profiteers and the votes of those whom they let work must be ended. A minister with a reconstruction policy is an immediate need.

The other day I was reading a little pamphlet on the establishment of labour bureaus in the various British commonwealths, and I was struck by the remarks of Mr. Layton, of the British Board of Trade. Speaking on the aftermath of the war, he said:—

> Clearly it is far easier to throw the industrial machine out of gear than to put it back in order again. Finally, history affords no precedent as to the immediate industrial aftermath of the war, but the destruction of wealth, the dislocation of markets, have been so general and on so large a scale that it is rash to assume on historical analogies, which are really inapplicable to the present situation, that trade will quickly be able to resume its normal conditions or that spending power in the form of either commerce or credit will at once be available for those who will have urgent need of material goods. Hence, the re-absorbtion of European armies together with the re-transference of those work-people who have been diverted to many occupations to produce guns and war equipment generally may be slow in process and will present our own, as well as European Governments with a problem in organization which will tax their utmost capacity.

Mr. Layton is speaking for the European countries, but, as we have an army which, in importance, is as much of an army as any of the European armies, the effect of their return to demobilization will be the same in Canada as in the warring countries. Has the Government taken any precautionary measures for the return of those soldiers? It is a well accepted fact that nearly all of our industries, from one end of the country to the other, are producing for war purposes only. As soon as peace is concluded and demobilization begins, concomitant with the return of our soldiers to the industries of this country, the vast army of workers in the war industries of Canada will be out of work. Then what will happen, with soldiers returning by the thousands and hundreds of thousands to resume work, simultaneously with men going out from establishment dedicated only to war industry? The reason I mention this is that I would like to have a declaration from the Government of their policy on this question. I think it is very important. No two men meet on the street to-day without speaking of the effect of demobilization on the Canadian industries and Canadian labour.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The question which my hon. friend has brought up has engaged the attention of the Government. More than that, it has engaged the attention of the Imperial War Conference. Some of the resolutions which have not yet been made public relate to the two questions which he has mentioned and which might be summed up as the demobilization of the soldiers from military activities, and their mobilization to civil life. So far as the military side of it is concerned, I am under the impression that the Minister of the Overseas Service has appointed a board to deal with it. Certain principles were laid down—I cannot refer to them at the moment—and were accepted by the Government of all the overseas dominions as embodying the right course to adopt with respect to demobilization; with respect to the activities of the troops during the period which may intervene after the conclusion of the war and before they can be transported to the country from which they came, and with respect to the places from and to which the should be conveyed, the manner of their conveyance, and the probable time that it should occupy. I hope hon. gentlemen of this House will realize that it is going to be a very great task to bring 300,000 men, with all their equipment, across the Atlantic. If a ship capable of conveying a thousand men could sail every week day for a year, it would just about accomplish the task, and the capacity of the railways of Canada to convey them to their several destinations must also be taken into account. They must not arrive so rapidly that they cannot be transported. Referring to the difficulty to which my hon. friend alludes, of converting this country from war conditions into peace conditions, that question has, of course, engaged the attention of the Government. There is a resolution already before the House with regard to land settlement, upon which we hope to make some progress as soon as this Bill is passed. Measures are also being taken for vocational training of men. Many other activities have been contemplated, which I need not allude to more particularly at present. I am not at all sure that, in the two or three years immediately after the conclusion of this war, the difficulty as to industrial occupation will be as great as my hon. friend has suggested. That subject was very fully gone into in the Imperial War Conference and in the Imperial War Cabinet, and the question arose as to whether or not the industrial capacity of the world would be capable, within the desired time, of making the restoration that will be necessary in Northern France and in Belgium. Those who have not had statistics placed before them, and have not given close attention to the subject, will probably fail to realize what an enormous task it will be to restore Belgium and the northern districts of France to the condition in which they were before the war. I believe the effort to bring that about will pretty fully occupy the industrial capacity of the Allied nations for two or three years after the war. It may be that, after all, the condition after the war will not be of the character my hon. friend suggests. I only desire to say, for the moment, that these matters have been under consideration. Referring to the particular portion of my hon. friend's remarks relating especially to demobilization, the subject has engaged the attention of the Government, and has engaged the attention of all the dominions of the British Empire, and I think arrangements are being made which will be found satisfactory.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Since the subject has been broached, I might call the attention of the right hon. gentleman to the fact that in 1915, before his death, Lord Kitchener and the War Office entered into an arrangement with the Board of Trade Labour Exchange Department for bringing the soldiers back to civil employment after peace is declared.

The following are the chief terms agreed upon:

Insurance policy against unemployment valid for a year.

Working furlough on full pay and allowance for four weeks during which separation allowance will continue to be paid.

Travelling warrants from place of disbandment home.

Money gratuities for services and awards on a scale to be fixed by Parliament.

Help in finding work.

The same applies to the men serving in the British navy. In the United States since the beginning of the war the Department of Labour have for the same purpose made arrangements for the establishing of labour bureaus and also in view of the large immigration which is expected from the warring countries when peace shall have been made. The Government have received on this question a petition which is signed by the most prominent persons and the most prominent associations in the country. The question is being discussed all over Canada to-day: what will become of our soldiers and the workers in the various industries in Canada which are engaged in manufacturing munitions and war supplies when demobilization takes place? I am glad to say that all creeds and denominations have taken hold of this matter. Last year I attended a meeting, presided over by the Lord Bishop of the Anglican church in Montreal, at which I represented the Roman Catholic Bishop of Montreal. This matter was discussed at that meeting and a petition was sent to the Government. I have here a copy of that petition, which I will read if my hon. friend thinks it is proper to do so under the clause that we are now considering.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: There are some phases of this subject to which the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers) have given special attention. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has suggested to me that he would like to say something on the subject when it is discussed, and perhaps my hon. friend would be good enough to let his remarks stand for the moment. We can find him a suitable opportunity of discussing it later.

Mr. MARCIL: Many more than 100,000 men will come under the provisions of this law. How will you select the required number?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: They are called out by classes.

Mr. MARCIL: Suppose there are more men in those classes than are required?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My hon. friend has, perhaps, not observed a provision in the Bill which is designed to meet that difficulty. If we called out two or three classes we might get more than the necessary number of men. There is a provision that in calling out the classes regard can be had to age, so as to prevent any possibility of securing a number in excess of that which is authorized by the Act.

Mr. LEMIEUX: If my right hon. friend will allow me, I wish to proceed with a few remarks that I have to make on the subject to which I have just referred. The Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Labour will, by reading the document that I am going to place on Hansard, be in a position to answer me later. At the meeting presided over by the Lord Bishop of the Anglican Church in Montreal, the important question of the effect of demobilization was discussed. As a result, the following petition was addressed to the Governor-General in Council:

Sir:—

The undersigned petitioners respectfully desire to lay before you and the members of the Government certain facts and reasons why it is desirable in the interests of the nation that a national system of labour bureaus be organized immediately.

According to the best authorities, the present devastating war will create in all belligerent countries, and even in neutral countries, new conditions for which there are no historical analogies that offer precedents for their solution, particularly in the readjustment of the commerical and industrial dislocation which will inevitably follow; the problems being national and interprovincial in character.

This Dominion of Canada, up to the summer of 1915, has been suffering from an increasingly acute period of unemployment, with consequent heavy congestion of the larger centres of population, which has been largely caused by the lack of a national organization for providing efficient machinery for distributing labour and immigration.

In addition to our present industrial and agricultural problems, conditions will beset Canada at the close of the war, that must be fully met if she is to take her proper place in the councils of the Empire; they are:

I wish to direct the attention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce especially to this:

1. Provision must be made for the employment of our soldiers on their return to civil life, who will number at least 200,000.

2. It is generally recognized there will be an influx of immigration when hostilities have ceased.

I must take exception to that statement. I do not see how immigration to Canada will be very large after the war. It will take some years to get the same influx that we had during the years preceding the war. (Reading):

3. The displacement of over 100,000 war equipment workers will accentuate the situation.

I think the number there should be greater than 100,000. I have heard it stated in this House that about 300,000 men were working in munition factories and other places where war supplies were being turned out. (Reading):

As an indication that to meet these new and complex problems our present machinery is lacking in completeness, we point out:

There are no standing records of the labour market, and no place to obtain them. The statistics sent out by the Labour Department are largely made up from volunteer reports from labour unions and charitable societies, and we have no reliable knowledge of the amount of casual labour and seasonal work, the amount of wage earning time, and of idleness and its effect upon the worker; practically nothing is known of the dovetailing of trades, or how workers, either agricultural or industrial, carry over the dull seasons.

There is no co-operation between the education authorities and the Labour Department for the intelligent direction of the technical and industrial training of children with the consequence that thousands of boys and girls are sent out annually into the unskilled market of this country.

While the Government gives a bonus for the securing of agricultural and domestic workers no provision is made for their settlement, with the result that our cities are crowded each winter with a large body of immigrant unemployed.

Canada presents the anomaly of the immigrant mechanic not being recognized by the authorities, and no reliable information as to conditions and openings is procurable by him, though the Dominion has in the utilization of her natural resources become a manufacturing country, and the industrial worker is as essential to her progress as the agricultural.

No successful attempt has yet been made for the distribution of our large foreign immigration which has concentrated in large communities, both in the town and country, to an extent that it is well nigh impossible to inculcate principles of Canadian citizenship, and unless this is remedied, assimilation of British standards is impossible.

To meet such conditions Government Labour Bureau systems have been established in Great Britain, New Zealand, Australia, the reports covering their administration and expansion indicate their great and growing usefulness in dealing with national problems.

It is believed by your memorialists that the cost of the system would be comparatively insignificant compared with the benefits realized from it by the workers, and the economic advantages gained by the whole nation.

Therefore we respectfully beg to suggest:

1. That legislation be enacted this session of Parliament providing for a permanent commission which will be responsible to Parliament to organize and administer a system of Labour Bureaus, the salient points to be:

(a) A commission or authority at Ottawa, with executive power over the whole Dominion.

(b) In the chief municipalities, a small local board representative of the city council, employers and labour, with power in the agricultural districts to co-opt a member of a Farmers' Association, with the agent of the central authority acting as secretary of the Board.

(c) A strict neutrality on the part of the Bureaus during strikes and lockouts.

(d) Co-operation with the educational authorities, for the better vocational and industrial training of children.

(e) Co-operation with all Government departments working towards the control and direction of labour and immigration, particularly the post office, in the franking of letters and the distribution of Bureaux literature.

(f) The officers appointed to carry out the system to be tested as to business efficiency and vocational fitness by a board of examiners.

(g) Where necessary separate waiting rooms shall be provided for men and women under proper supervision.

(h) Owing to the number of women engaged in industry, it is recommended that a woman be a member of the commission and local boards.

2. That your Government take such steps as they in their wisdom may deem expedient, in order that some immediate action be taken to ameliorate our present conditions and with greater efficiency and success meet the new conditions arising after the war.

This partly applies to immigration, it is true, but I wish to call the attention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce and of the Minister of Labour to the particular section of this petition which concerns the returned soldiers. This petition which was sent to His Royal Highness and to the Government is signed by Winnipeg Builders Exchange, Winnipeg Trades and Labour Council, Winnipeg Ministerial Association, Winnipeg District Board Sons of England, Boards of Trade for Timiskaming District, Fort William Board of Trade, Fort William Trades and Labour Council, Fort William City Council, Fort William Patriotic Fund, Port Arthur City Council, Port Arthur Board of Trade, Port Arthur Patriotic Fund, Port Arthur Trades and Labour Council, Guelph City Council, Guelph Trades and Labour Council, Hamilton Trades and Labour Council, Toronto Board of Control, Toronto Board of Trade, Toronto Builders' Exchange, Ottawa City Council, Ottawa Board of Trade, Ottawa Builders' Exchange, Montreal City Council, Montreal Board of Trade, Montreal Chambres de Commerce, Montreal Builders' Exchange, Toronto Social Service Council, and various similar associations in the western provinces. It is also endorsed by the Imperial Dominion Royal Commission which assembled at Vancouver in 1916. Several of the Prime Ministers of the different provinces have signed this petition, and it has also been endorsed by various public associations. I would like to know from the Government if any action is to be taken with a view to meet such a contingency. As we are speaking about demobilization, it is time for the Government to give us its policy. I notice with pleasure that my hon. friend stated that the question had been debated at the Imperial Conference, but unfortunately the discussion at the Imperial Conference relating to the question of returned soldiers is not made public. I hope it will be made public very soon, because public opinion is agitated at the present time as to what shall be done with the returned soldier and in regard to the dislo-cation of industry when the soldiers do return.

I am asked to put this question to the Government. Do the words "after the war and during demobilization" mean that conscription and recruiting will be continued, and will conscripts be liable to be called to the colours after the war and during demobilization?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It merely defines the term of service. The term of service includes the war and demobilization after the conclusion of the war. Until the men are discharged from service, they must be subject to discipline.

On section 3—divisions into classes:

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I will ask that this section stand for to-day in view of what my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) has said, but if there are any suggestions which any hon. member desires to put forward in regard to it, I shall be very glad to have them.

Mr. PUGSLEY: As this section should be generally discussed, my right hon. friend (Sir Robert Borden) should explain to the committee the reasons for making such a radical departure from the provisions of the Militia Act in providing for ten different classes. In the Militia Act, there are only four classes. First there is the distinction between unmarried men and married men, and there are only two classes of unmarried men and two classes of married men, so that, apart from the question of marriage there are only two classes. Section 15 of the Militia Act says:

> The male population liable to serve in the militia shall be divided into four classes:
> The first class shall comprise all those of the age of eighteen years and upwards, but under thirty years, who are unmarried or widowers without children;
>
> The second class shall comprise all those of the age of thirty years and upwards, but under forty-five years, who are unmarried or widowers without children;
>
> The third class shall comprise all those of the age of eighteen years and upwards, but under forty-five years, who are married or widowers with children;
> The fourth class shall comprise all those of the age of forty-five years and upwards, but under sixty years.

The Militia Act provides for only two classes of unmarried men, those from 18 to 30, and those from 30 to 45 years of age. This Bill creates ten classes, some of them married and some unmarried. The first class is from 20 to 24; the second from 24 to 28, and the third from 28 to 34. It seems to me that the committee should be apprised of the reasons for this very grave departure from the provisions of the Militia Act. I myself am unable to see why there should be a distinction between boys from 20 to 24 and young men from 24 to 28. There may be some very good reasons for it, but there would seem to be less justice in calling out first of all boys from 20 to 24 years of age, for they were mere boys when the war broke out and never had the opportunity of voting for members for this Parliament. But they are to be the first ones called out to serve the State, and just why they should be called upon to bear the first burden of military service I am unable to understand.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: In order to understand a little more distinctly what my hon. friend has in mind, perhaps he would state just what he would suggest.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I am merely asking for the reasons which have induced the Government to make this very wide departure from the Militia Act. My right hon. friend would not expect me to make a suggestion. It might be considered presumptuous for me to do so until I have heard the reasons which have induced the Government to make this change. Under this Bill the first burden of military defence will fall upon boys who are at school or college, young men attending high school or at work in banks, students in law offices, dental and medical colleges—young men who are just preparing for the work of life. I cannot see why they should be taken before young men between the ages of 24 and 35, who are in the vigor of manhood and likely to be stronger and to possess a more mature judgment. There may be some excellent reasons which have induced the Government to place the first burden of the defence of the State upon these boys of from 20 to 24 years of age, and if so, I am sure the committee will be very glad to hear those reasons, because in this Bill the Government are making a very grave departure from the provisions of the Militia Act.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The request which my hon. friend has preferred is a very reasonable one indeed; although I might be permitted to observe that he is more modest about offering suggestions than I have usually found him. This Bill is designed to the selective—selective as to age, physical fitness, the service that any individual may be required to give to the state. and selective in other respects. If we were to embrace in one class all the men, say, between the ages of 20 and 35, we should run into the difficulty of calling out a very much larger number of men than is contemplated by this Bill. We therefore thought it best to divide the men into ten classes. My right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) has suggested that some of these classes might be omitted. That is an arguable question as to which I have a perfectly open mind, and as to which I shall be glad to get the opinion of hon. members either now or at a later date. We thought it best that we should call out in the first instance those who had no family ties.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My right hon. friend says "those who have no family ties." Several of the following classes are for unmarried men. A young lad of twenty might have family ties, a mother, sisters, and so on, just as great as those of a married man of thirty with no children.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: When I said those who have no family ties, my hon. friend will understand me to mean that we were endeavouring to exclude those who had become settled in life through marriage, who had to support a wife and possibly children. We desired to call out the unmarried men first, and we made the first class from 20 to 24 years of age because there would probably be a greater proportion of unmarried men in that class than amongst the men of more mature years. My hon. friend speaks of young men of from 20 to 24 years of age as not having been capable of exercising the franchise. I am quite unable to appreciate the relevancy of that observation although possibly my hon. friend may make it clearer later on. He says that only a few years ago these young men were at school or college. Yes, and if you go a little further back still, 20 or 24 years ago they were infants in arms. But we are not dealing with conditions of 24 years ago, but with the conditions that confront us to-day.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I said that boys of from 20 to 24 are to-day very largely at schools or colleges, attending high school or the universities, preparing for the work of life; that is what I intended to say at all events.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: If my hon. friend's appreciation is correct in that regard there would possibly be some ground for his suggestion, but it comes to me as a very great surprise that the young men of this country from 20 to 25 years of age are chiefly at school, high school or college. I do not for one moment believe that any such condition obtains in this country.

Mr. PUGSLEY: In the province from which I come students at law cannot be admitted until they are twenty-one. I venture to say that you will find in New Brunswick scores of young men who are engaged in the study of law and who are not yet 21.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Whatever injustice this may inflict on that portion of the population of New Brunswick which is engaged in the study of law, and has not yet reached the age of 21, I think will be cheerfully borne. I do not imagine we shall have any protest from them. I have no other explanation of the mode of division than that which I have mentioned. It seems to me to be a perfectly reasonable, and I should think even convincing, reason for the course the Government has taken. But, as I said, the Government is open to suggestions. If my hon. friend has any better suggestion which will commend itself to our judgment we are prepared to consider it. Would it be worth while to place all those between 20 and 35 in one class, call them out at once, and, perhaps, get 300,000, or 400,000, or 500,000, when we really only want 100,000? We may get 100,000 men in the first class, or the first two classes; I do not know how it may turn out. It may only require two classes, or three classes—you cannot tell. It is for that reason that the classes have been so selected. I think the selection is a fair and reasonable one. But, I repeat, the Government are open to suggestions on this point.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Does my right hon. friend think that the fact of a young man being 25 or 30 years of age, not a widower, and therefore having no wife or children, should relieve him of equal military service with the young man between 20 and 24 who is exactly in the same condition? I can understand that there might be a reason given for calling unmarried men first, but if a man is unmarried I do not think my right hon. friend has given any reason for taking the young unmarried man between 20 and 24 and leaving the unmarried man between 24 and 28 unless it may be that my right hon. friend feels that as young men get a little older they get more responsibility and more influence than the young boys between 20 and 24. I can conceive of no other reason. It may be that by reason of their increased years they are more needed by the country than the young lads, but as far as family ties, next of kin and family relationships are concerned, the boy between 20 and 24 is likely to have these ties to an even greater degree than the boy between 24 and 28. Indeed, when a boy gets to be 28 or 30 years of age, in most cases, the family ties begin to be broken, because he gets out into the world. He ceases to remain in the old home, but in the case of the young boys of 20, 21 and 22 years of age, they, in most instances, are still at home, and therefore the break and the hardship caused by their separation from their mothers and sisters may be, and is likely to be, infinitely greater than is the break and the hardship which would result, so far as mothers and sisters are concerned, in the case of young men who have attained to a greater age. I regret that I am unable to see any reason for the distinction which has been made by the Government. I think the Solicitor General had better try to give us some stronger reason than has been afforded by the Prime Minister.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Perhaps I can give the same reason in another way, and, connecting the two questions of the hon. members for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) and St. John (Mr. Pugsley), answer them together. Inasmuch as only the enlistment of 100,000 men was contemplated by this Act, it became necessary to make such a division as would enable us in the working out of the Act to see that more than 100,000 were not obtained, and as far as possible not render necessary the release of any who were obtained, because in the releasing difficulties would arise. Consequently, divisions had to be made, and the best basis of division possible had to be resorted to. Now, inasmuch as divisions have to be made, we must have regard to the best principle that can be found upon which to make those divisions. We provide against over 100,000 being obtained by having different classes. It is not contemplated that the 100,000 will be obtained on the first call of those from 20 to 24. Possibly they may be, but it is not contemplated that they will be. But the machinery of the Act will be based upon that call, and a very good estimate can be obtained from the number received as to how many may be expected from class 2. After the call of class 1, if it appears likely that class 2 will provide more than 100,000, then class 2 may be divided into such subdivisions as will make it tolerably certain that practically the right number will be obtained. The necessity for the divisions is there, and the necessity for a considerable number of them is also there, because we want to be as certain as possible that the machinery will not be clogged. How should the division be made? We chose the line of marriage and the line of age as the two principles that were to obtain. Marriage is a domestic restraint, but it is not the only one. It is the most general one. You never could reach each and every individual case and make a law that would of itself, not left to the discretion of tribunals, work out absolute and exact justice to every man. But, broadly speaking, the line of marriage is the boldest line of domestic restraint. We take unmarried men between the ages of 20 and 35, and we make them liable to call first. Any within that age, of course, can plead any domestic restraint other than marriage which they are under and that binds them when they come before the tribunals—any obligation of any kind—and they may obtain exemption. However, if we took from 20 to 35 alone, it is by no means impossible that we should secure much more than 100,000. Consequently a division was necessary. The division of age then became the only available principle to follow, and we have thought that we certainly should not start at the top, at 35.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Why not?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will explain that to the hon. gentleman, but I will assume that he thinks we should start at 35.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Does not my hon. friend think that a man of 35 will make as good a soldier as a man of 20?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No. If my hon. friend will read the words of the head of the British army in France, he will find that that authority has stated that, generally speaking, the best-equipped man for the field is the man between 18 and 25. The air service perhaps requires the severest physical test of all, and from 18 to 25 is the limit within which men are accepted for that service. It requires physically a perfect man, not only from the mere point of view of health, but the point of view of nerve-strength, which is a fundamental requirement.

There is another reason, although I think that reason is forcible enough to bring any man's mind to the conviction that we ought to start at 20 to 24 instead of 30 to 35. As a man advances from 20 to 35, he becomes more and more fixed in the community, more and more an essential factor in production; not, of course, in every case, as many a man is more useful at 20 than another would be at 40 or 50, but, speaking generally, a man's usefulness to the community as a civilian increases between 20 and 35; and that affords another reason for first taking those from 20 to 24 instead of those from 30 to 35.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Do I understand the Solicitor General to mean that boys between 20 and 24 have not as much at stake in the country as men of 30 and that they should go to protect the men who have a larger stake in the country?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No. The hon. gentleman may have been anxious that I should say something like that—

Mr. PUGSLEY: Pretty near it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: —but I did not say anything of the sort; I said nothing close to it. I did not say that the country was more use to the man, but that the man was more use to the country; his powers of production become greater; he becomes more and more a fixture in the community, and more essential to the country.

Mr. PUGSLEY: But you exempt the essential man whether he is 25 or 35.

Mr. ROSS: I suggested the night before last that the age limit be raised from 20 to 21. The arguments advanced by the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) as to a man of 35, more especially apply to a man of 20. The nervous strain of this war in the trenches is greater than that of any war the world has known, and a man of 20 is not as well able to stand that strain as a man of 21. The man of 20 is not mature, he has not had the experience that a man of 21 has; and that there is something in this argument is shown by the fact that the Government, of its own motion, raised the limit from 18 to 20. If the limit is raised from 20 to 21 it does not prevent the boy of 20 enlisting, or the boy of 18 if he wishes to do so. The Government are going to present this to the country as one of their measures. The Franchise Act says that the boy of 20 shall not have a right to say whether he shall go or not go, but the man from 21 on has a right to coerce the boy of 20, who has no say at all. You are virtually striking a man whose hands are tied. I do not think the right should be given to any government to compel a boy of 20 to go and fight in Europe unless he is given the privileges and responsibilities of citizenship and the right to vote, whether he shall go or stay at home.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Prime Minister said that on the point raised by the right hon. leader of the Opposition whether the application of the Bill should be restricted to men under 35, he had an open mind, and was ready to hear any opinions of hon. gentlemen opposite. It is as well that this point should stay in the same position. I do not see that the franchise affects the point at all, because a man has not reached the age of 20 and consequently is not entitled to that one privilege of citizenship, the franchise, it cannot be argued that his country is not under those obligations to him of protection of life, of liberty and of property which entail on his part a corresponding obligation to his country. It is a fact that although a man does become a member of the forces at 20, he is not likely to reach the battle line until he is 21 or close to it. For three years this war has been going on. The young men of Canada have flocked to the colours from the age, not of 20, but of 15 up to the age of 45. I know of one young man, who I believe gave his wrong age and consequently, being large of stature, reached France before it was observed that his parents had the right to demand his return, who actually was killed in France at the age of 15.

Mr. ROSS: A volunteer.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Of course. Others have gone from the age of 16 on. A call has been out for three years for the young men of Canada to voluntarily enlist from the age of 18 to 45. That call has been responded to. Many a family has had sons enlist from 18 to 20, others next door have still sons at home between 18 and 20. It might reasonably be objected on the part of those who have felt it their duty to go, that it was scarcely fair, now that compulsory enlistment was coming in, that an age too far in advance of 18 should be fixed. I do not advance any one of these considerations as final; I simply say they have to do with the subject, and that it should stand in the same position as the suggestion of the right hon. leader of the Opposition as responded to by the right hon. the Prime Minister.

Mr. ROSS: In the United States they have, no doubt, watched the progress of the war and the experience of the nations engaged in it as we have in Canada, and they have fixed the age limit at 21. Can the minister advance any reason which would induce them to do that which would not equally apply to Canada?

Mr. MEIGHEN: They had not, up to the time of the going into force of their Act, enlisted any men. Consequently the proportion of their population that their Act calls for is very small compared with the proportion that this Act calls for, added to those who have already enlisted, of our population. We have had an appeal out all over Canada and the more virile, forward and patriotic class have gone forward, many at the ages of 18 to 21. In the United States that was not the case, so that no element of unfairness could possibly be argued there, where it could here. I do not say that it can be argued with final force, but it could be argued with some force that, inasmuch as we have already appealed to the parents of Canada to have their sons enlist at the ages from 18 to 45, now that we have applied compulsory enlistment, we should apply it to the same ages as the voluntary enlistment applied to before.

Mr. PARDEE: It appears to me that, in calling out men under this Act, the first class should be the unattached—that is men with no dependents. In the first six classes married men or widowers who have children are included. Class 7 is made up of those older but unattached. Why should not the first call be on men from 20 or 21 to 45 who are absolutely unencumbered, instead of taking the married men or widowers with children?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the hon. gentleman suggest to call them all at once, or by classes?

Mr. PARDEE: By classes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That all the unmarried should be called before the married?

Mr. PARDEE: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That has been considered, but we must have regard to the fact undoubtedly established, in this war above all other wars—I do not know whether it was ever established before or not—that men between 20 and 35 are much better fitted for the conflict than men over 35. It was felt the married men of that age should be taken before the unmarried over that age were called out. That was one consideration. While marriage is a general line of division, as to domestic responsibility and obligation, still by the time a man get to be 35, the line is not so clearly marked. Men of 35, still unmarried, have many more domestic obligations upon them as a rule, although they are unmarried, than young men below that age. I do not know that it would be too much to say that their domestic obligations are very much greater than the obligations of those who are below 35 and married. Those are the two reasons. The first one has the greater force.

Mr. PARDEE: It is a very great change from the Militia Act, and I can hardly agree with the Solicitor General when he says that a man of 35 ordinarily will have as many dependents as the younger man who is married. As a matter of fact, when you come down to the last analysis, it appears to me that the class of men who should primarily be drafted under this Act are those who have no dependents. If a man has reached the age of 35 and has not taken upon himself the full duties of citizenship, to my mind, he should be one of the first to go. Production of course is aimed at. It is quite true—I say it in all seriousness—if you are to take the married man of 25 before you take the unmarried man of 35, you are lessening the productiveness of your country in a most material way, because a man does not often marry after the age of 35. I want to impress this question on the committee, because my view is strong that before any draft is made on married men with children, or widowers with children, the first men that should be drafted are the unmarried, non-productive men without dependents, between the ages of 20 and 45. I think that is well worth the serious consideration of the committee. As I understand it, that is the present militia law, and it appears to me that in making such a radical change as this Bill makes, the Government is taking rather a large step, if the premises I have stated are correct.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What does the hon. gentleman think of the physical fitness of the men over 35?

Mr. PARDEE: I am quite willing to admit, with the Solicitor General, that it has been decided by experts that the men between 18 and 25 in this war are the best men. But you must take some other things into consideration. Even on the assumption that men between 18 and 25 make the best soldiers, yet there is no question that a man between 25 and 35, physically fit, cannot be beaten on earth. If a man between 20 and 35 presents himself, or even up to 40—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Over 35, it is a different matter.

Mr. PARDEE: Take it up to 35. If that man is physically fit, there is no reason why he should not go anywhere on earth.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We take him first.

Mr. PARDEE: No. Some classes of married men go before that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We take married men under 35 before we take unmarried men over 35.

Mr. PARDEE: Quite so, but I do not think you should.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Because 35 is the dividing line.

Mr. PARDEE: I am giving you my own view of the matter. Take a man up to 40 years of age, having no dependents and physically fit, in my opinion he should be taken before the man who has a wife and children, or a widower with children is taken.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My hon. friend's observations are entitled to every consideration. We want to get the best selection in the public interest. He will remember, however, that my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, urged very strongly some time ago, with a good deal of force, that under the very strenuous conditions of warfare which have to be undergone, men over 40 years of age, and possibly over 35, are found to be not capable of standing the strain for any considerable period. So that we take all unmarried men between the ages of 20 and 35 in the first three classes. I think we are agreed with my hon. friend up to that point. The question at issue is this; is it better that we should next take unmarried men from 35 to 45, or whether we should revert to married men within the ages of 20 to 35. Rightly or wrongly, we took the latter course, for the very reason which my hon. friend has urged this afternoon, that it is not safe to go beyond the age of 35 for combatant service. We thought that, having exhausted the first three classes, namely, the men between 20 and 35 unmarried, then in order to obtain those who are most fitted for this warfare, we should resort to married men between the same ages. I admit that there is good ground for argument on both sides. I should like to hear the opinion of members of the committee. Those are the grounds, however, upon which we made the classification set forth in the Bill.

Mr. GRAHAM: If the required number of men can be obtained from the unmarried classes, the expense of the war will be very materially reduced. When you select for military service a married man who has a family, you at once increase the expense, because separation allowances have to be paid, aid has to be given from the Patriotic Fund, and so on. If, therefore, the men can be obtained—I am not inclined to think that they can—without drawing upon those who have families, it will mean in the years to come as well as at the present time, considerable relief to the taxpayers. I am not sure that this selective method is better than the method of selection by lot which is provided by the Militia Act. The Solicitor General said that the somewhat large number of divisions was provided lest a greater number of men should be secured than were required. I think that men between the ages of 20 or 21 and 30 are physically fit, so far as age is concerned; I would suggest that men between those ages constitute the first class. I am not now arguing the merits of 20 or of 21 as a minimum age; I simply suggest that the maximum age for that class should be 30 years. If the maximum age of the first class were 30 and a greater number of men than were required was secured when that class was called out, I would suggest the adoption of the Lincoln system: obtain the required number through selection by lot. That would be an easy and fair way of getting over the difficulty which the Solicitor General seems to apprehend: the securing of too many men.

The remarks of the Solicitor General brought another point to my mind. Many boys 18, 19 and 20 years of age have returned to Canada from the trenches. I have in my mind a young man who went over when he was 17 and who returned recently wounded and gassed. Is this suggestion not worthy of consideration: that in making this new selection of men, the boy under 20 who has returned from the trenches under such conditions as I have mentioned, be not asked to return; that he be releaseed from duty? His place could be taken by another man secured under this proposed law. Perhaps not very many of them would desire to take advantage of such a provision; but it seems unjust that these boys, whom the Parliament of Canada declares to be too young to serve, and who, having served, have been wounded and sent home, should not be allowed to stay home if they so desire.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: There is a great deal of force in what my hon. friend has said; I shall take that suggestion into consideration.

Mr. PARDEE: I agree with the Prime Minister that the effectiveness of a man commences to deteriorate after he reaches the age of 35. As I understand it, however, this is a measure of selective conscription. Although it is designed primarily to obtain combatants, it is true that certain men employed in other branches of the service in France are just as important as the combatant men. Men from 35 to 45 years of age might well be employed as motor drivers or assigned to some arm of the service where they would be quite as useful as the combatants who, because of their age, are fit to go to the front and take up the harder work. I repeat that for economic and other reasons we ought to keep at home the men who have wives, children and dependents, and send to the front in some capacity—even to the extent of having them replace those who are in the capacity of non-combatants, but who are within the age of combatants—those men who have no dependents. I want to impress upon the committee my conviction that every man who has no dependents and who is between the ages of 18 or 20 and 45 should go in some capacity before the men who have wives, children, or other near dependents are called upon to serve.

Mr. MARCIL: I agree with what the member for West Lambton (Mr. Pardee) has said. In the committee which had to deal with the matter of returned soldiers, we had a great deal of evidence of the hardship suffered by the dependents whom some of our men left behind in Canada. I think that in every case where a man can be sent without leaving anybody behind him in Canada, he should be selected. In a note which I have recently received, a definition is requested of the exemption which is made with regard to the clergy. The member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) pointed out that those who study law are not admitted to the bar until they are 21. In the province of Quebec persons are not fully ordained to the priesthood until they reach the age of 25; the age used to be 21, but it has been raised to 25. The inquiry which I have received is whether a student in theology, wearing the cassock, or soutane, as we call it in French, denominated as ecclésiastique, who has received minor orders, but who does not receive the full orders of the priesthood until he reaches the age of 25, is included in the exempted class. Does he not become a clergyman in the full sense, within the meaning of this law, until he has received the full orders of the priesthood?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am not prepared to answer my hon. friend at the moment. I will take his query into consideration. My hon. friend from West Lambton (Mr. Pardee) might take this into consideration in connection with the argument which he has made. He suggests that we should leave classes 1, 2 and 3 as they are, and then, for classes 4 and 5, we should substitute those classes which are now numbered 7 and 9. If the classification were adopted, and classes 1, 2 and 3, did not produce the number of men sufficient to fulfil the infantry requirements, which are the chief need at the present time, then, as the Government has no discretion except to call out in the order enumerated in this section, we should be obliged to call next those who would not be suitable for combatant service. There is that objection which strikes me at the moment. As the section is to stand, however, we will take all the hon. member has said into consideration.

Mr. DEVLIN: Might I repeat the question which was put a few moments ago by the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil). The moment this Bill passes, all men who are called out under section 1 become conscripted unless exempted. If more than 100,000 men are conscripted, what is going to be the test as to the selection of 100,000 men? Will they be taken in proportion to the population of each province or by provinces, or what system will be followed?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: We really did not expect that contingency would occur under the provision contained in subsection 4 of this section:

> The Governor in Council may divide any class into subclasses, in which case the subclasses shall be called out in order of age beginning with the youngest.

We hope in that way to avoid any possibility of exceeding the number mentioned in the Bill, and it is our expectation, therefore, that the contingency to which my hon. friend alludes, will not occur.

Mr. MARCIL: When a man has been conscripted, can he choose for himself whether he will go into the infantry or into the artillery? Who is to decide where he is to go? The volunteer selected the service he desired.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This Bill would not be a compulsory service Bill if it gave a man, after he is taken on, the absolute choice as to the service he goes to. He has to go where he is placed, but in placing him, I have no doubt regard will be had to his own individual wishes, particularly to his own individual qualifications.

Mr. MARCIL: He has a right to ask that he may be placed in some particular service.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He has a right to ask, and his wishes will be considered, but he will not have a right to say finally where he will be placed.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Is any registration contemplated under the Bill to ascertain what men are over twenty years of age?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The necessity of registration is avoided by the provisions of the Bill. The objects of registration are served by the man reporting for duty on the day set forth in the proclamation.

Mr. ROSS: How is the Solicitor General going to get at the proportions each province or district or county is to supply? Is he going to take into consideration the heavy enlistments that have been made in many districts? There is nothing in the Bill that indicates what shall be done.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Bill is no respecter of persons or provinces. This is not a selective conscription by provinces at all. The Dominion is considered as a whole, and there is no special levy of so many from any province. The provisions of the Bill are such that every district will, under the Act, supply the available men of that district of the class called out; that is to say, the numbers already enlisted from any special district or province will only have to do with the number called for by this measure in this sense; if more have not gone, there will be in the district or province more to whom the provisions of the Act will apply. In so far as more men are available, more men will be called out.

Mr. ROSS: Might one imagine a situation in which all would come from one province, or all from seven provinces and none from the other two?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That would surpass my imagination because the hon. member will agree that in every province in Canada, and in every township and county, there are men who are most obviously of all entitled to go to the front who stay at home, just as obviously entitled as could possibly be the case in any other province. Consequently the law will undoubtedly be applied to such men in every province in the Dominion. The most extreme cases can be found everywhere.

Mr. MARCIL: Does the minister intend, in a rural constituency, to require the men called out to report at the county seat, or may they report within the confines of their own municipality or district? The distances to the county seats are, in most districts, very great and communication is not always easy.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member refers to reporting for duty?

Mr. MARCIL: Yes, when a man is called out.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He does not refer to applications for exemptions? Both, however, will be taken care of by regulations. No policy has been mapped out as to the best way in which reporting for duty may be done, but I presume regard will be had to the convenience of those reporting for duty.

On section 4—calling out by classes:

4. (1) The Governor in Council may from time to time by proclamation call out on active service as aforesaid for the defence of Canada, either in Canada or beyond Canada, any class or subclass of men described in section three and all men within the class or subclass so called out shall, from the date of such proclamation, be deemed to be soldiers enlisted in the military forces of Canada and subject to military law for the duration of the present war, and of demobilization thereafter, save as hereinafter provided.

(2) Men so called out shall report and shall be placed on active service in the Canadian Expeditionary Force as may be set out in such proclamation or in regulations, but until so placed on active service, shall be deemed to be on leave of absence without pay.

(3) Any man by or in respect of whom an application for exemption is made as hereinafter provided, shall, so long as such application or any appeal in connection therewith is pending and during the currency of any exemption granted him, be deemed to be on leave of absence without pay.

(4) Any man who is called out and who, without reasonable excuse, fails to report as aforesaid or to remain on active service where placed shall be guilty, according to the circumstances, of desertion, or of absenting himself without leave and shall be liable

(a) to be tried by court-martial and convicted and punished by imprisonment, for a term not exceeding three years, or

(b) on summary conviction to imprisonment for any term not exceeding three years.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I presume that the first subsection means that all men called out are soldiers, unless exemption is granted?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: What is the meaning of " leave of absence without pay " in the subsection 2?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It may take some time to determine in just what branch of active service a man should go. In the meantime it is not desirable that he should be kept from his ordinary vocation. He reports for duty, and until he is actually placed he is on leave of absence without pay. Again, in case he applies for exemption, it may be that his case is not decided upon in time, and until it is actually decided that he is a soldier and he is placed, he too is on leave of absence without pay. But he is a soldier all the same, and is liable to military discipline and liable to punishment if he deserts. It is not wise to put him on the paylist in the meantime, for the reason that he is not actually on service.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: That is, he remains at home?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. LEMIEUX: When a man of 21 is conscripted by law and appeals before a tribunal, and from that tribunal to the central appeal judge, I understand that by this section he is considered as a soldier without pay?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Has my hon. friend considered the length of time these processes of law should occupy before the courts? Are special rules of practice going to be framed to deal with these cases?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It was thought wise not to cover this by regulation for this reason. A member of the Supreme Court of Canada is to be made the central appeal judge, and he will have the final decision of all appeal cases. Consequently, it was thought wise that he himself should have the framing of regulations concerning appeals which will come ultimately to himself. The machinery is here in general, but no details are worked out as to time or otherwise, because the services of that Supreme Court judge will be utilized in working them out.

Mr. LEMIEUX: A case may be pending for days and weeks and months. A rich man could keep the judicial machinery in motion as long as he liked, unless some limit were fixed. The central appeal judge of whom my hon. friend speaks may for good reasons be silent for a long time before adjudicating on a special case. That does not seem to me to be fair or just. It just comes back to what my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) said very aptly the other day, that the Bill seems to favour the rich against the poor. The machinery of law may be put in motion by the rich man, and an appeal may be pending for weeks and months, and although under the law he will be a conscript he will be considered as a soldier on leave of absence and wil be able to stay at home. It seems to me that if my hon. friend is not willing for the central appeal judge to frame those regulations, the Department of Justice should frame rules which would put a definite limit upon the time a case shall occupy from its inception to its close. Otherwise, the rich man who is unwilling to enlist could keep the wheels of justice rolling and rolling for months and months.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the regulations were poorly framed, that might be the case. I did not hear the address of the hon. member for Pictou, but I say now with all the emphasis in my power that any one who can see in this Bill any attempt to favour the rich over the poor is labouring under a very dangerous hallucination. How could any one get an advantage over the other under this Bill that he could not get under any Bill that human ingenuity might frame? The provisions for appeal are simple: We do not even go to the extent of stating the terms and conditions of appeal, but leave them to be framed by the central appeal judge, who is to be a member of the Supreme Court of Canada, none of whose members, I might point out, were appointed by this Government. Consequently, unless one imagines that that central appeal judge is going to frame such regulations as will allow the rich man by the use of money to prolong his appeal indefinitely, one can never imagine that this Bill is intended to favour the rich.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I did not make that suggestion. I understood my hon. friend to suggest that the Supreme Court judge might not take upon himself the framing of these regulations.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not anticipate that. I do not think there is a member of the Supreme Court who would not be glad in this crisis to render any service in his power, and when it comes to framing rules of practice, that is clearly within his power; no one would be more capable of doing that. Let me say with all the finality in my power that it will undoubtedly be the design of those regulations so framed and to be approved by the Governor in Council, that no possible advantage shall be given the rich over the poor, and provision will be made for expeditious and easy practice in appeal such as will put every man on an absolute level, as far as regulations can. The regulations, as I said, will be formulated by the central appeal judge, who is to-day a member of the Supreme Court. I can only repeat that any one who sees in this Bill anything designed to favour the rich over the poor is under a very dangerous hallucination.

Mr. DEVLIN: Who will pay for the service of the subpoenas required by a person claiming exemption.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That will be a matter to be covered by regulations to be framed by the central appeal judge, who is a member of the Supreme Court of Canada. Inasmuch as very grave and heavy duties will be imposed on the central appeal judge, he is permitted, by a later clause, to name other judges at different points in Canada to perform the duties delegated to the central appeal judge. The great object, of course, is to ensure that it will be possible for the central appeal judge to efficiently execute the duties that are imposed upon him, but another object will be to enable him to see to it that such convenient methods of carrying out the appeals are made available as will enable the poor man to take an appeal as well as any one else. Regulations may be provided to meet all such conditions as to costs as they may at the time present themselves. It may be provided by the regulations, if deemed wise, that any one who is not in a position to pay his costs of service can have them paid for him. I do not say that will be done, but the Bill provides that if that is deemed wise by the central appeal judge it may be.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I have no doubt that the Government has no sinister design in this Bill. I am quite prepared to believe that my right hon. friend is filled with good intentions, but he knows there is a place which is said to be paved with good intentions, to which I might compare the Government with regard to this Bill but I shall not do so. I want to understand the meaning of this clause. The moment the proclamation issues calling out the men of a certain class, say between 20 and 25, they become soldiers, and they continue to be soldiers from that moment unless they are exempted from service. It will work out in this way: A man will have to report at a certain point, and then he will be obliged to present his reasons for exemption. If a father comes with his son and says: My son is exempt because he is not of age, he will be required to prove that before the tribunal. It may take some time; he may have the proof or he may not. In the province of Quebec it will not be very difficult, of course, because we have a very complete system of registration, but in other provinces it may not be so easy. Then there is an appeal from the decision, and from that appeal there is a second appeal. In the meantime, I presume, the father will be told: Take your boy home and keep him there until it is decided whether he is eligible or ineligible. I suppose it will work out in that way?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is it. I do not know that I can find any fault with my right hon. friend's understanding, except this: It is contemplated that the local tribunals will sit before the day for reporting; that is to say, the consideration of the application for exemption may be completed before the day for reporting, but if a case is not concluded on the day for reporting then the boy will be considered to be on leave of absence pending the decision upon his case.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Suppose he does not report at all, who prosecutes?

Mr. MEIGHEN: He has offended against the law of the land and he is liable to prosecution in the ordinary way.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Whose duty is it to prosecute?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is to be covered by the regulations also.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Ask the Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers); he says it is the duty of the provincial governments.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is to be covered by the regulations which will be drawn up under the general clause providing for regulations. Officers may be appointed for the purpose of prosecution.

Mr. DEVLIN: Could we possibly by Monday get a copy of those regulations so that we shall know what we are talking about?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, the regulations are not made. If my hon. friend will look at the Bill he will see that it provides for the framing of regulations. General principles are laid down and the machinery is provided, but the details are left to be worked out by regulation. This will be one of those regulations.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I see that section 10 provides that:

Any person aggrieved by the decision of a local tribunal, and any person authorized by the Minister of Militia and Defence, may appeal against any such decision.

Does that mean that the Crown may appeal from the decision of the tribunal, or that a person who has been before the tribunal and who has lost his case may get authority from the Minister of Militia and appeal from the decision?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Virtually; he will receive an authorization to enter an appeal against the decision of the tribunal in such cases as he may see fit.

Mr. LEMIEUX: As for the Crown?

Mr. MEIGHEN: As for the Militia Department.

Mr. KYTE: In reference to the return setting forth the number of those who have been exempted from service, as this matter will be discussed in connection with the consideration of clause 13, will the Prime Minister be able to get a list of those who have been so exempted, giving the names, ranks and residences?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not know whether that will be possible or not; I will make inquiry.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I would suggest that the committee rise and that we adjourn.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My right hon. friend thinks we had better adjourn?

Mr. LEMIEUX: Would the Parliamentary Secretary of the Department of Militia and Defence bring down some information which was asked of the Minister yesterday? I would like to get a statement of the number of Canadian officers who, having reached British headquarters, were told that they could not keep their commissions but that they would either have to return to Canada and not serve or accept inferior rank.

Mr. McCURDY: That information is not available in the Militia Department, and will have to be obtained from overseas. Overseas will be communicated with and the information got at as early a date as possible.

Mr. OLIVER: Would it be possible for the department at this date, or at some later date during the consideration of this Bill, to give the answer that it was unable to give some little time ago in reply to a question on the Order Paper? I asked how many men had gone overseas up to a certain date, how many were on the strength of the force in Canada and how many men had been returned from overseas to Canada as being physically or otherwise unfit. The first two questions were answered, but the third was not; that is as to the number of physically unfit men who have been returned to Canada from overseas. I should be glad if it would be possible to place that information before the House at some time during the consideration of this Bill.

Mr. McCURDY: Does my hon. friend mean to include in that list only those men who have served in France?

Mr. OLIVER: No. The question was as to the men who had not served in France, who have been returned from England as physically unfit.

Mr. McCURDY: I have no personal knowledge of the matter, but to the extent the information can be obtained, it will be submitted to the House.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Some men are returned as physically unfit, after having served in England. For instance, forestry corps are employed both in Great Britain and in France, and a distinction might have to be borne in mind in regard to these classes.

Progress reported.

CUSTOMS AND IMMIGRATION FORMS IN FRENCH AND ENGLISH.

On motion of Sir Robert Borden for the adjournment of the House.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I wish to call the attention of the right hon. the Prime Minister to a grievance which the exporters of Montreal have against the Department of Customs, and a grievance which the travellers between Canada and the United States have against the department of my genial friend, the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Roche). The French-speaking exporters on different occasions have applied at the customs house for blank forms in the French language, which forms are required in their business. Last year, or the year before, I called the attention of the Minister of Customs to the matter, and he promised me at the time that he would see that the forms were provided. They have not been provided, and the exporters of Montreal resent this condition very much. As to the other grievance, I placed a question on the Order Paper, asking if the hon. Minister of the Interior would see that the immigration agents on the several trains between Canada and the United States were provided with forms in French and English. Some forms in English were presented to French-speaking travellers and they could not fill the blanks. They are entitled to a form in the French language. It is very easy to provide the agent with those forms in the French language, and I hope that my hon. friend, who has always been very courteous and considerate in these matters, will see that they are provided in blank forms in French and English.

Mr. ROCHE: I authorized that to be done immediately after the hon. gentleman brought it to my attention, and the instructions were so issued, but I will see that it is done.

Mr. LEMIEUX: You will see that the instructions are carried out?

Mr. ROCHE: Yes.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Will the hon. Prime Minister see that the blank forms are supplied to the customs house in both languages for the convenience of the exporters?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I will bring it to the attention of the Minister of Customs.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 6.12 p.m.

Monday, July 9, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

SALARIES OF CIVIL SERVANTS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. C. A. GAUVREAU (Temiscouata): Last week the Minister of Finance stated that the Outside Service would be dealt with, as far as the salaries were concerned, in the Supplementary Estimates. I wish to ask the Minister of Marine and Fisheries if he has received any petitions from the lighthouse keepers, and if it is his intention to have the increase asked for dealt with in the Supplementary Estimates when they are brought down?

Mr. HAZEN: A number of petitions have been received, covering a period of some months past, from the lighthouse keepers in different parts of the country asking for an increase in their salaries. At the present time lighthouse keepers are divided into different classes, with fixed salaries for each class, starting at the minimum, and advancing by certain gradations up to the maximum. The request from these different classes is that the minimum be increased. The petitions have received consideration, but I cannot at the present time give any assurance to my hon. friend such as he asks for.

CUSTOMS AND IMMIGRATION FORMS IN FRENCH AND ENGLISH.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX: In justice to my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior, I call the attention of the House to the remarks I made on Saturday, with reference to blank forms to be given to travellers between Canada and the United States. I made an application to the minister that these forms be furnished travellers, as requested by them. I stated that some time ago I had applied to my hon. friend to provide these forms to travellers, and I find, from a letter which I received from the head of the Immigration Branch, that the statement of the hon. minister is confirmed, and, therefore, I am glad to say that my hon. friend acquiesced in the request at the time I made it.

PRIVATE BILLS.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill No. 93, to incorporate The Kenora and English River Railway Company.—Mr. Carrick.

Bill No. 101, respecting The Canada Preferred Insurance Company.—Mr. Stevens.

Bill No. 102, respecting The Western Canada Accident and Guarantee Insurance Company.—Mr. Bradbury.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by asterisks).

HOME DEFENCE RECRUITING OFFICERS.

Mr. EDWARDS:

1. What officer or officers are in charge of Home Defence recruiting at Kingston?
2. When was said officer or officers appointed, at what rate of pay, and how many recruits have been obtained?

Sir EDWARD KEMP:

Lieut. Col. W. Y. Mills, 29th March, 1917, pay of rank. Capts. F. K. Mahood, W. E. Swaine, and Lieut. Campian, 9th April, 1917, pay of rank. Major Knight and Lieut. J. E. Taylor, 14th May, 1917, pay of rank. Lieuts. J. C. Newlands, G. K. Mills, W. J. Barrett, 28th April, 1917, pay of rank.

The officers represent the headquarters of the battalion, also the officers of one double company.

It was intended that their services should be utilized in connection with recruiting not only for home defence but also for Canadian Expeditionary Force. It was deemed inadvisable to release them just now. Their services are being utilized in the meantime in connection with recruiting for Canadian Expeditionary Force through the British Mission in the United States.

This battalion will likely be utilized as a depot for overseas reinforcements.

The total recruits received for Canadian Expeditionary Force is not available, but for Canadian Defence Force, they were fifteen in number.

EXPEDITIONARY FORCES, ENLISTMENTS.

*Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. What is the number of recruits enlisted in the Expeditionary Forces up to date: (a) Rural recruits; (b) Urban recruits. (c) Unmarried men; and (d) Married men?

2. Will the minister give the statement of these figures by provinces?

Sir EDWARD KEMP:

1. The records have not been compiled in such a manner as to set forth the information asked.

2. Answered by No. 1.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN.

Mr. ARTHURS:

1. What number of men enlisted in, or transferred to each of the following Canadian Expeditionary Force Battalions, 22nd, 41st, 57th, 69th, 150th, 163rd, 167th, 178th, 189th, 206th, 230th, 233rd, and 258th?

2. What is the total number of non-commissioned officers and men sent overseas with or from the above battalions?

3. How many non-commissioned officers and men remain in Canada belonging to the above battalions?

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS.

Mr. Levi Thompson: For a return showing the names of all persons employed in connection with the Office of the Commissioner of Live Stock in the Province of Saskatchewan, showing the salaries and expenses paid them; and also showing the number of stallions and bulls placed in Saskatchewan when the said office was established.

MILITARY SERVICE ACT, 1917.

CONSIDERATION OF THE BILL IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE HOUSE.

House in Committee on Bill No. 75, respecting Military Service—Sir Robert Borden. (Resumed from Saturday, July 7. Mr. Rainville in the Chair.)

Sir SAM HUGHES: In the early part of the debate, there was a discussion as to the number of officers who had been engaged in recruiting in Quebec. I did not at that time delay the House with the names of those officers; in fact I did not know the names of all the gentlemen whom we had engaged in recruiting in that province; but I have here a list—it is not a complete list—of a number of very excellent officers who were in service at that time and who did yeoman work so far as they could.

In British Columbia we had as District Officer Commanding, Col. Roy, a French-Canadian who was in command in the English-speaking district. This officer found favour on every hand, no one finding fault with him. In Toronto we had General Lessard. There was another Roy, an officer of the Engineers, who did recruiting work in the early part of the war, and who went over with the 22nd Battalion, and who, as was mentioned here by the Prime Minister, gave up his life in trying to save some of his comrades from a bomb explosion in one of the trenches. There are two Col. Fages, both very excellent officers, each of whom has done his best in recruiting work. Then there is Col. Louis LeDuc, who is well known to us and who has become a Brigadier in the service. Col. Gaudette, who was in charge of the Dominion Arsenal for many years and who retired, again came to the front and did excellent recruiting work. He went over with the 22nd Battalion, but his health failed him. He now occupies a very high position in munitions work in England. Col. Papineau is a young lad who went over as a lieutenant in the Princess Patricia's and who was promoted to a colonelcy in the service. He is one of the finest officers to be found in the force. There is also a Captain Papineau who has done splendid work in recruiting and who has also served in the war. Col. Paquette of Quebec gave his time recruiting throughout the Quebec district. There are two or three Panets, only one of whom is in Quebec. Col. Labelle has done what he can. Col. Landry has done good work both in Quebec and at the front. Col. Ostel, of the 65th Battalion was unable, on account of his state of health, to go to the front, but he has been one of the best recruiting officers. He has enlisted many boys, all of whom have done very well. Col. Chauveau, of Quebec, and Col. Puize of Rimouski together raised one of the finest battalions that have gone to the front. They have done fine service in the way of recruiting for that battalion. Col. Puize is regarded as a very fine officer. Col. Dansereau, a Royal Military College graduate, did splendid service under Col. Currie at the battle of St. Julien. He was an old Montreal boy. Col. Gingras has been at the front and has done splendid work. He has been back to Canada for recruiting work and is recruiting in the United States at the present time. Col. Barre all know as one of the most fearless and successful officers at the front. Major Asselin, who declined to take command of a battalion on account of his not having previous military experience, is a most experienced recruiting officer. Col. Leprohon, who went over with the First Contingent, was wounded and came back. He went to the Northwest and raised another battalion, not quite to full strength, and it has gone overseas. Then there is a Col. De Salaberry, who, I understand, is a descendant of the famous De Salaberry who went over with the Princess Patricia's and returned to take the command of a battalion. He has gone back with his battalion. Col. Hector Verret has done yeoman service at the front and now commands a battalion there. Col. Readman, who was given an opportunity of raising a battalion, did his level best and succeeded in raising a certain number of men. Col. Blois, a man possibly a little over age, but a most enthusiastic gentleman, also went to the front and did his work to the satisfaction, at all events, of many of his officers over there. He has come back from the front and has done his best in recruiting. Col. Grothe has also done good work. Col. Tremblay, commander of the 22nd, is a most excellent officer and a splendid soldier. Col. Plante has also done good work. There are two Col. Scotts, who have been over and have come back again, who are engaged in recruiting work at the present time. Then there is Major Dubuc, and then last, but by no means least, the Laviolettes. I am speaking from recollection. I think there are two or three Laviolette boys, one of whom was severely wounded and is now, I am sorry to say, dying at Montreal, another who was wounded at the front, and a third boy who has done yeoman work. These soldiers have all done splendid work in the way of recruiting.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Col. Migneault.

Sir SAM HUGHES: He did splendid work in the Medical Service and also in the recruiting line. He helped to recruit the 22nd Battalion and another battalion, and he then went into the Medical Service. We have met the wishes of these people in every way, and so far as I am concerned, they have not found fault.

Mr. GAUVREAU: Did the hon. member mention Col. Puize?

Sir SAM HUGHES: Yes, Col. Puize raised one of the finest battalions ever raised in Canada.

Mr. GAUVREAU: When he reached England, he was told that he would not be allowed to lead his battalion. Later on he was asked if he wanted to go to the front and was informed that, if so, he would have to take the rank of lieutenant. He accepted the rank of lieutenant and went to the front.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What was done in the way of newspaper advertising for recruits?

Sir SAM HUGHES: I do not want to go into details or to criticise any particular plan of recruiting, but I am bound to say that those of us connected with the militia can feel on looking back that we are entitled to pat ourselves on the back, because our system was the best of all. I did not find platform recruiting very effective. Our officers with their recruiting committee reached every part of the Dominion, and had they been consulted they would have produced as fine a list—a voter's list, you may call it if you like—of eligible young men from the Atlantic to the Pacific as it was possible to compile. They had lists of the eligible young men in every district of the country, and there were very few of military age in Canada who did not have the opportunity of putting on the uniform if they chose to do so.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My own view is that any newspaper advertising that is done should be done irrespective altogether of party politics. It appears from a return that was brought down to the House recently that in the province of New Brunswick 300 per cent more money was paid to the St. John Standard, the organ of the Conservative party, than was paid to all the other newspapers of the province.

Sir SAM HUGHES: What was the amount?

Mr. PUGSLEY: $1,200 was spent on newspaper advertising in the province of New Brunswick, and of that amount $900 was paid to the St. John Standard—a paper which is only read by Conservatives; at all events, outside of Conservatives it has a very limited circulation. Papers like the St. John Telegraph, the Moncton Transcript, the Fredericton Mail and all the other papers of the province put together, Liberal and Conservative, received only $300 amongst them.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I thought the St. John Standard was a Liberal paper.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Perhaps that is why the mistake was made.

Sir SAM HUGHES: So far as the department is concerned, we never did any advertising at all. Advertisements would sometimes be inserted in papers by local officers, and if everything was found to be proper the account in some cases would subsequently be paid by the Government; but not one dollar's worth of advertising was done by the department for recruiting so far as I can recollect.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I am speaking of the return that was brought down the other day.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Referring to the question of recruiting in the province of Quebec, I have already stated on two occasions, notably the other day during the debate on this Bill, that the Asselin regiment was a success largely because the ex-Minister of Militia gave us the necessary backing. I am glad to bear testimony to his valuable aid in connection with the formation of that regiment. I think, however, one or two explanations are due in connection with the statement the ex-minister has just made. He mentioned as one of the chief recruiting officers Colonel Roy. My hon. friend must have had a momentary lapse of memory, because Colonel Roy was pensioned off when war was declared.

Sir SAM HUGHES: No, that was later.

Mr. LEMIEUX: It was shortly afterwards, then. For several years he had been District Commanding Officer at Montreal. He was later transferred to British Columbia. I do not object to that, except that I think much better results would have been obtained if he had remained in Montreal, because, as my hon. friend states, he was an excellent officer, a born soldier, and he understood the people of my province well. I also know Colonel Paquet, who is a son of the ex-postmaster of Quebec city, who was one of my officials when I was Postmaster General. He is a charming young fellow, very active, and very able, and he was most anxious to have his regiment go to the front. He raised two regiments, and what happened? I had it from his own lips that as soon as they had reached the required strength they were drafted to support units either at the front or on the point of leaving for the front.

Sir SAM HUGHES: They were drafted to the 22nd and the 41st.

Mr. LEMIEUX: As regards the 22nd, my hon. friend stated a moment ago that that regiment had been raised by Colonel Migneault. No doubt Colonel Migneault is entitled to much of the credit.

Sir SAM HUGHES: He assisted.

Mr. LEMIEUX: But in justice to the right hon. leader of the Opposition, and in justice to the memory of the late Postmaster General, Mr. Casgrain, I must say on behalf of my province that if the 22nd Regiment ever came into existence it is due to my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and the late Mr. Casgrain, who appealed to public opinion in the province of Quebec. Col. Migneault benefited by the work they did.

Sir SAM. HUGHES: I only wished to remove an impression in Ontario that we had altogether neglected recruiting in the province of Quebec. On the contrary, the hon. member for Rouville will bear me out that I appealed to him on more than one occasion, and he did his bit in connection with the Asselin regiment and the 22nd.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I might inform the committee that the Asselin regiment was raised in less than two months. We received all the necessary aid and backing from the department, and if the same aid and backing had been given in connection with recruiting in other parts of the province of Quebec many an Asselin regiment would have been raised. Major Asselin, it is only just to say, is an exceedingly brilliant French Canadian, one of the most popular men in the province of Quebec, and it is not surprising that he succeeded in surrounding himself with young officers of ability, some of whom had been recalled from the front to help in the formation of that regiment.

Sir SAM HUGHES: The hon. member must bear in mind that in every battalion area in the province of Quebec we did not have an Asselin or a Lemieux. I took the liberty the other day of suggesting that members wishing to make suggestions on the Bill should put them in concise form, and I should now like to present to the committee a few notes I have made.

On section 4—calling out by classes:

4. (1) The Governor in Council may from time to time by proclamation call out on active service as aforesaid for the defence of Canada, either in Canada or beyond Canada, any class or subclass of men described in section three and all men within the class or subclass so called out shall, from the date of such proclamation, be deemed to be soldiers enlisted in the Military Forces of Canada and subject to military law for the duration of the present war, and of demobilization thereafter, save as hereinafter provided.

(2) Men so called out shall report and shall be placed on active service in the Canadian Expeditionary Force as may be set out in such proclamation or in regulations, but until so placed on active service, shall be deemed to be on leave of absence without pay.

(3) Any man by or in respect of whom an application for exemption is made as hereinafter provided, shall, so long as such application or any appeal in connection therewith is pending and during the currency of any exemption granted him, be deemed to be on leave of absence without pay.

(4) Any man who is called out and who, without reasonable excuse, fails to report as aforesaid or to remain on active service where placed shall be guilty, according to the circumstances, of desertion, or of absenting himself without leave and shall be liable

(a) to be tried by court-martial and convicted and punished by imprisonment, for a term not exceeding three years, or

(b) on summary conviction to imprisonment for any term not exceeding three years.

I prefer the Militia Act as better, more elastic, more workable, less inclined to cause friction, and more inclined to produce good results, but the Government does not so consider it.

I, therefore, will not take one minute in discussing that aspect of the question, merely placing myself on record. I shall loyally support any and every proposition enacted in the Bill when finally completed; and shall, with the least delay, freely give my suggestions.

My preferences are more or less well known.

1. The tribunals are non-military, and are under the administration of the Justice Department. My suggestion would be to place them under military control, but let their composition be non-military.

2. A mere suggestion is, the area unit, instead of being provincial, should be military district.

3. There should be no special exemptions for "financiers" more than for farmers.

4. It would have been advisable to have had registration.

5. Clergy should not be exempt.

6. Section 11, subsection (e) is the only one to my mind that should be retained. Is there a man in Canada who may not be exempted under section 11 as it now stands?

7. Desertions. It might be well to provide for punishment under this, and other sections of the Bill, at the front.

8. But, believing the intention of the Government is to help enlistment, and feeling that it is not meant merely to inflame one section against another, I will give every support, consideration and assistance to the passage, and to the carrying out of the principles of the Bill. It should be law within a week. My one aim is to help, uphold, and upbuild the gallant fellows who are enduring so patiently and performing so nobly at the front.

I regret taking up the time of the House with another matter, important not in itself but in its bearing on the whole public situation, that is, the falling off in recruiting, the causes thereof, and the denials of certain statements made.

The situation from February, 1916, to the autumn of that year was unique. Men were enlisting up till February and March as they never did before in any land. The home locality plan worked well.

Then the Prime Minister, as well as the Minister of Militia, was daily, sometimes hourly, worried by a fictitious agitation—I use the term "fictitious;" it was a very nasty agitation. Suggestions, complaints, advice, appeals, demands, re recruiting were made.

Possibly more than any other, except the Finance Minister, the influence of Lord Shaughnessy was potent in this embarrassment. Both Lord Shaughnessy and Sir Thomas White complained of the number of battalions being raised in Montreal and Toronto respectively at the same time. In the Montreal area, with a total population of nearly a million, including the adjoining counties, there were being recruited three battalions. On our basis of 40,000 for a battalion of 1,000 there should have been at least twenty to twenty-one instead of three. In Toronto there were five, or including two formerly authorized but fully completed, only seven were under way, where, as compared with the country districts, there should have been twelve. From one or other of these two gentlemen the following fallacious arguments were also advanced:

"Industries would be ruined if so many men were enlisted;"

"Farmers could not put in their crops;"

"Munitions could not be made;"

"The war would be over by July or August, 1916;"

"Transports could not be had;"

"It would take a long time to get the troops to England, as only a certain number could be taken monthly."

Mr. LEMIEUX: By whom were those statements made?

Sir SAM HUGHES: By one or other of these gentlemen, and by others, of course. Every one had them in his mouth.

1. From first to last the tendency of the cry was not the upholding and strengthening of the boys at the front so much as the commercial idea at home. The Prime Minister certainly was worried, and be his recollection whatever it may of any particular conference, it is apparent from the results what was running through his mind. He was interviewed by Mr. Godfrey, of Toronto, who, later, spoke of it to the Chairman of the Toronto Recruiting Association, who, in turn, reported to his Association. The data may have been more or less expanded or contracted, but in general terms it appears that the Prime Minister entertained the idea early in the spring of 1916 of stopping recruiting, and that he felt inclined to stop it but for the fear that it could not be resurrected.

2. That large numbers were then already enrolled and in training in Canada.

3. That the demands and needs of labour must be regarded.

4. That transports were not available to carry all the troops, and, at the rate of moving them, there were men enough enrolled to keep the transports busy for many months.

5. It was hoped the war would be over by August, 1916.

Such were the impressions given as coming from Mr. Godfrey, through the chairman, to the members of the Toronto Recruiting Association. Whether Mr. Godfrey got them all from the Prime Minister or from some other source is not given to the public.

Further, I assert, that influences and statements were utilized to the effect that, as Minister of Militia, I was merely forming battalions and recruiting men who would never be used, and all for my own vainglory. I did not learn until later that jealousy, envy, and overweening ambition were actuating those working against the best interests of the great cause.

I leave it to the people of Canada and to the boys at the front to determine who has worked disinterestedly for the soldiers and the cause, and who for vainglory.

On Saturday last, I observe from Hansard, that Sir Thomas White denied he had ever used to me the words "Canada has already done her full duty to England in recruiting in this war." The Finance Minister on two occasions used the expresion to me; on one occasion he put it in the form of a question, prefacing it with the words "don't you think?" etc. On the second occasion he made the distinct statement. On another occasion, not to me, he went farther, and instead of using the identical words "full duty" the expression was "more than her full duty." On the second occasion, I assured him it was not for England but for Canada, for the Empire, and for human liberty that I was in the war. On Saturday last, the Finance Minister quoted a letter to a Toronto gentleman; I do not know whether it was written in 1917 or in 1916—both dates are somewhat mixed up in the report; but no matter when it was written, it bears on its face the imprint that the soldiers in the trenches are secondary to the commercial interests.

I need make no apology here, or elsewhere, regarding my loyalty to the business interests of Canada. When the hon. the Finance Minister had Canada on the verge of financial ruin, at the beginning of the war, my loyalty to their cause was then shown by my actions in establishing industries in Canada which resulted in placing her industries of every class on a sound financial basis; but I have never made any pretence of placing anything on a par with the soldiers in the trenches. They stand first in the heart of every honest Canadian. The Finance Minister's letter in every reference places them secondary.

Considerable interest is evidently manifesting itself on the general aspect of this case. From one of the most distinguished men high in the ranks of the Conservative party in Canada—I may say very high in the ranks of the Conservative party, and one who will be a good deal higher still—one concerning whose loyalty to the party or to the great cause is unquestioned, I have received a report of which the following is an extract:

> Let us look back to 1911, when the piteous, agonizing cry for help was heard from what is now historically known as the anxious, financial, and commercial group, who with the erstwhile protector of 'Nabob's vineyard' urged to the front on their behalf—and who with tearful voice apologizing for his desertion from his party—pleaded for the success of his new and untried love, so that the interests of his superiors could be saved and protected; and then we can understand all that has happened since.
> Not satisfied with the saving grace that the party at that time so unctuously threw around them they have ever since been using their advocate for their own personal gains; and this Government was never satisfactory to them until their interests have been made paramount.

Not even the exigencies of this horrible war were overlooked or unexploited; for, even here, their interests have been served; and some day he who could have been served—and there is none so blind as he who will not see—will see in all its hideousness a wreck which constant and never-ceasing intrigue has made. But he will have for his comfort, if comfort it can be, the sight of others who have been similarly betrayed; for slowly, but surely, Ephraim is returning to his idols and his recantation will soon be due.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, let me most positively assure this House and the country of the absolute truth of the statements which I have made.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Has the Prime Minister nothing to say in answer to the statement of my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Militia and Defence (Sir Sam Hughes)?

Sir SAM HUGHES: I am not making any statement with regard to the Prime Minister at all.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I asked if the Government has anything to say.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The statement is already made. I have nothing more to add. I am perfectly convinced in my own mind as to what the facts were. I have already stated them to the House, and I repeat them again.

On section 4:

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: We considered the first three paragraphs of this section the other day and, as far as I am concerned, I have nothing further to add; but, the fourth paragraph requires some explanation:

Any man who is called out and who, without reasonable excuse, fails to report as aforesaid or to remain on active service where placed shall be guilty, according to the circumstances, of desertion, or of absenting himself without leave and shall be liable

(a) to be tried by court martial and convicted and punished by imprisonment, for a term not exceeding three years, or

(b) on summary conviction to imprisonment for any term not exceeding three years.

By this section concurrent jurisdiction is given to have a court-martial or to take proceedings in an ordinary magistrate's court. Is that correct?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is correct, but I do not think the word "concurrent" is quite right; it is alternative jurisdiction.

[Sir Sam Hughes.]

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Why should there be two recourses instead of one? It seems to me that trial before a magistrate ought to be quite enough. A man is called and he immediately becomes a soldier. Then, he claims his exemption; it is either admitted or not, and if his claim is rejected and he does not report, he is liable to be taken before the court. Would it not be better to have him taken before a magistrate rather than to have a court-martial?

Mr. MEIGHEN: There are various circumstances and it is thought better to make the jurisdiction alternative for that reason. For example, if a man fails to leave his ordinary avocation and to report for duty, it would appear to me as much more convenient, and indeed more fitting, that his case should be tried before a magistrate. He has never physically come under military jurisdiction. On the other hand, a man might come within the military jurisdiction and fail to accept the assignment to such military duty as he might be allotted to. He has come physically under military jurisdiction and the more convenient method would be to prosecute him by court-martial. Subsection 4 provides for taking care of both contingencies and consequently alternative jurisdiction is established.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Very well; that is satisfactory. Who is to prosecute? If he is brought before a magistrate, as under the ordinary law, can anybody become an informer and prosecutor and lay a complaint against him?

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is a section later in the Bill under the head of "regulations," section 12:

(1) The Governor in Council may make regulations to secure the full, effective and expeditious operation and enforcement of this Act and in particular, but not to limit the generality of the foregoing, may

(a) define the duties of Registrars and fix their remuneration;

(b) authorize officers and tribunals to give directions not inconsistent with this Act;

(c) prescribe the conditions as to time or otherwise under which applications for certificates may be made, deferred applications received, appeals entered and heard and re-hearings had, and prescribe forms;

(d) prescribe for the keeping and transmission of records;

(e) appoint such peace officers or other officers and give them such powers and impose on them such duties as may be deemed necessary;

(f) make provision for expenses and the remuneration of officers;

(g) prescribe penalties for peace officers or other officers appointed under the authority of this Act, who are convicted or neglect or refusal to perform duty without reasonable excuse.

These regulations must be published forthwith in the Canada Gazette. It is the intention to provide officers for the purpose of carrying out the Act. They may be provincial officers, they may be municipal officers, or they may be neither, but full provision is contained in section 12 for taking care of prosecutions.

Mr. SINCLAIR: If a man is convicted and sentenced to the full term of three years, is it intended that he shall be confined in the county jail of the county in which the action is carried on? If so, it would seem to me to be a very improper place to imprison a man for such a long term. Most of the jails are insanitary, there is no way of giving the prisoner exercise, and no opportunity of putting him at work. Rather than put a man in jail for three years without an opportunity of getting fresh air, it would be better to put him against the wall at once and shoot him. There is another question in connection with this that I would like to submit to my hon. friend and that is the question of municipal expense. Will the board of the prisoner become a charge on the county where the trial is held? Under the present system of summary conviction, as you know, the expense falls on the county. It strikes me that there should be some provision by which the expenses would be borne by the Department of Militia and Defence in order that it should not fall on the county in a case where the prisoner is a military prisoner.

Mr. MEIGHEN: In the first place, I need only call my hon. friend's attention to the law of the land which prevents imprisonment in any county jail for two years or upwards. I think my hon. friend will recall that two years less one day is the limit of confinement in any other institution than a penitentiary. If the full term, of two years or upwards, were given, the confinement would necessarily not be in the county jail. As to the municipality, the county or other party bearing the expense, I would like to hear the reason of my hon friend for feeling that there should be any different law applied here for violations of this Act from what would be applied for violations of any Act. My hon. friend will recall that in almost innumerable statutes, and in a great many Orders in Council passed under the authority of statutes, there appears the very same clause as appears here. Offences are created, offences are punishable on summary conviction and the penalty is there stated. Under the law of the land the expense falls where it falls. It would appear to me that there can be no good reason advanced why it should not fall here as in innumerable other cases.

Mr. MARCIL: Is there any appeal?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The summary conviction provisions of the Criminal Code would apply where there is an appeal.

Mr. MARCIL: I am not familiar with the Code. If a man is condemned to three years' imprisonment, is there an appeal to a higher court?

Mr. MEIGHEN: There are the summary trial provisions of the Code, and there are the summary conviction provisions. My recollection is that there are cases under the summary conviction provisions in which there is an appeal.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: There is no appeal except in stated cases.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Whatever it is—I do not pretend to be able to give every portion of it to the House offhand, but I think there are cases in which appeals are allowed. The general law will apply.

Mr. LEMIEUX: This should be made very clear now.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is very clear right now, and it has been long established in the Criminal Code.

Mr. MARCIL: I think appeals should be allowed in these cases, because it is a very serious matter to take a man out of his ordinary occupation and put him in jail for three years without the right of appeal.

Mr. MEIGHEN: My hon. friend will remember that under the summary convictions clauses of the Code three years is by no means the maximum penalty that may fall on a man who comes under those provisions. I have known cases under summary conviction of much longer imprisonment than that. So, whatever reasons for appeal there may be here, there would be as strong reasons in other cases. Thus the general law applies. I do not see what more could be asked for.

Mr. MARCIL: Does the hon. gentleman mean that in these cases there will be no appeal?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not mean that at all.

Mr. LEMIEUX: We ought to know distinctly.

Mr. MARCIL: The people are deeply interested in this clause, and all possible information that could be given should now be forthcoming in order to clear up this misunderstanding. The people are not very familiar with this kind of legislation, and any information that could be given would be of great advantage. We should know whether or not there is any appeal in these cases.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I shall make a statement, later, on the subject of appeals under the summary convictions clauses. I am not clear at the present time.

Mr. CARVELL: I think you will find that there is an appeal under the summary convictions clauses of the Code, straight to the county court judge.

Mr. MARCIL: An appeal from a court martial?

Mr. CARVELL: No, from summary conviction.

Mr. MARCIL: But these men are sent to jail by court martial.

Mr. CARVELL: I do not know what would be done there, but on summary conviction there is an appeal to the county court judge, practically a re-trial.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: In case of a court martial, the judgment of the court is always subject to revision by the military authorities, and that is really an appeal; and so, if what my hon. friend (Mr. Carvell) says is right, there is always a re-trial.

Mr. MORPHY: Speaking, not on the details of the working out of the clause but on the clause itself, it strikes me that the punishment is too light. As I read subsection 4, it is dealing with two classes of cases, one where a man fails to report, and the other where he has been on active service and deserts. It seems to me that the punishment of three years in the latter case particularly, is utterly inadequate to the offence of desertion after being on active service. The punishment from all time for desertion has been much more severe, and I do not know why it should be reduced to three years in a critical time like this. If all is true that has been said about a certain class who have been denominated slackers, to send them to jail for three years would be like sending them to a picnic; they would rather welcome the safe incarceration in either a county jail or a penitentiary if they could be safe from going to war. My idea is to make the public understand that this law is a drastic measure, and so I think that this punishment should be ten years instead of three for the man who deserts and probably five for the man who fails to report. I feel that it is the sense of the loyal element of the country at large that whatever this Bill shall be it shall be drastic and intended to meet the case. Those who are unwilling to do their duty, or who fail to do it after undertaking it, should be met by a Bill that is drastic in every phase. This Bill should be held up to them now as something that will reach them and reach them hard. In that way many of them may come in before the terms of this Bill are passed into law.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I am not as anxious as the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Morphy) to have a drastic measure, but we ought to have a clear measure and to know exactly where we are. This very clause leads us into a good deal of confusion. By the first section of the Act, we have made the Army Act part of this Bill. The Army Act upon this point is far more severe than my hon. friend from Perth has suggested this Bill should be. Here is section 12 of the Army Act:

> Every person subject to military law who commits any of the following offences; that is to say,
>
> (a) Deserts or attempts to desert His Majesty's Service; or,
> (b) Persuades, endeavours to persuade, procures or attempts to procure any person subject to military law to desert from His Majesty's service, shall, on conviction by court-martial, if he committed such offence when on active service or under orders for active service, be liable to suffer death, or such less punishment as is in this Act mentioned.

If the Army Act is incorporated in this Bill, and it already is incorporated by the first section of this Bill, under the Army Act, a person charged with the offence of desertion is liable to suffer death. It must be remembered that under the chapter I have read the punishment of death is applicable when the man is called to active service. In former years the punishment for desertion was death in all cases, in peace time and in war time; but in later years it has been made applicable only during active service. Under the section we are now considering it is provided:

> The Governor in Council may from time to time by proclamation call out on active service—

The man who is called out under this Bill, if it becomes law, is held to be on active service, and therefore, if the Army Act is incorporated in this Bill, as it already is by the first section, the deserter is liable to the punishment of death. It is true that under this section he is liable only to imprisonment for three years. That is a provision of this Bill. But the Bill has already made the Army Act a part of the law which is to be, and I cannot see how we can escape the conclusion that desertion is punishable by death.

Mr. MORPHY: By section 13 it is clearly shown that this Act is by itself, although I believe there is a misprint in the word "therewith."

The Militia Act, the Army Act, and the King's Regulations and Orders for the Army shall so far as applicable and not inconsistent therewith—

I think that is a clerical error and means "not inconsistent herewith."

—apply to and form part of this Act.

That clearly takes the Army Act and the Militia Act and the King's Regulations and Orders out of this Act where they are inconsistent with its terms.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I do not say to the contrary, but at all events we should know where we are. Is the Army Act to apply or not to apply?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It seems to me very simple. The Army Act is to apply so far as applicable and where it is not inconsistent with this Act.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: That is so intended?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: In respect to these particular offences it would be inconsistent, and therefore this Act would prevail.

Mr. MARCIL: Would it not be advisable to include as a schedule to the Bill the clauses of the Army Act that do apply, because the people generally are not like members of this House or of the legal profession or of the military profession; they are not familiar with all these things. Would it not be well to add the clauses to the Army Act, so as to know exactly what applies and what does not apply, so that every man to whom this Bill may be sent will know exactly what he was up against?

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is no possibility of doing that. It could be done better by a provision in the clause. There is a certain application of the Army Act, but it must not be applied so as to conflict with this clause. For example, when a man is tried by court martial, the principles that govern such tribunals apply, and the Army Act applies; but when it comes to the penalty, this Act applies. The tribunal cannot go beyond the limit fixed by this Act. If one were to extract clauses, he could not extract the clauses that apply to court martial, because that is governed by the provisions of this Bill. On the question of an appeal under summary conviction, I would refer to section 749 and section 146 of the Criminal Code. Those sections are in pretty full terms and set out the provisions for the appeal. Later on, in section 761, are to be found the provisions for stating a case. It will, therefore, appear that such provision for appeal is made here as has been considered in the general run of criminal convictions.

Mr. NESBITT: I have read clause 12, which my hon. friend referred to, but it does not give much information. It says that the regulations are to be made by the Governor in Council. That is one thing I do not like. I think the regulations should be set forth in the Act, and made part of the statute. The advertisement or notice which shall be given of that proclamation depends entirely on the view of the Governor in Council. You are going to punish a man who is called out under subsection 4 of section 4, who without reasonable excuse fails to report. Many people in the country do not read the papers. Nobody reads the Canada Gazette. Members of Parliament are the only gentlemen who receive it, and they throw it in the waste-paper basket.

Mr. BOYCE: That might be a reasonable excuse.

Mr. NESBITT: It might be. That would depend entirely on the view of the magistrate. All magistrates are very mortal—some more so than others—and I would not like the community at large to be subject to the whim of the magistrate, or to be subject always to the whim of the county judge. Therefore, I think it should be distinctly stated in this Bill what the advertisement for the proclamation should be. All I want to do is to have the Bill in reasonable shape, so that the public will be protected from prosecution. I do not imagine the intention of the Government is to persecute in any way, but still the tribunals might.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Of course, if regulations were embodied in the Bill, then they would not be regulations. They would be sections of the Bill. Wherever regulations are referred to in any Act, they are to be afterwards promulgated by the authorities designated by the Act. That is the nature of regulations. As to publication, I may say that we embody as much in the Bill as can reasonably be done, and more than is done in England. In the Bill, we leave less to regulation than is done under the British Act. For example, under the British Act there is no division.

Mr. NESBITT: Pardon me, I do not care anything about the British Act. We are dealing with this country.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Perhaps other hon. gentlemen do.

Mr. NESBITT: I am not speaking for other hon. gentlemen.

Mr. MEIGHEN: In the British Act they leave these provisions to be afterwards worked out by regulation. Here we specify the division. As to publication, the reason it is put in the shape it is in Section 12 is that some notices and some regulations, which from time to time may be made necessary, will be of such very minor importance and such purely local consequence that it would be unwise to provide in the Bill that all of them should receive the same publicity, and that we should go to the same expense with regard to all. There may be regulations later on which will provide for the case of a tribunal whose head resides three or four miles from where hearings are held for the convenience of the public. It would not require the same publicity that other more general regulations would require. Consequently, it has to be left to the discretion of those who are most directly interested in the success of the Bill to see that such publicity is given as will bring the provisions of the Bill, and the provisions of the regulation, home to all to whom they should be brought home.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I suggest to the Solicitor General the desirability of providing a different tribunal for the case of a man who has actually been enrolled and gone into active service and becomes a deserter, from the tribunal which is to try the case of a young man who simply fails to report. That is along the line followed by the hon. gentleman from North Perth (Mr. Morphy), though, of course, he dealt more with the punishment. It seems to me very objectionable that a young man who is simply called out by the proclamation should be liable to be tried by court martial. If he is tried by court martial there is no appeal, and the question as to whether he had a reasonable excuse or not would be a question of fact in regard to which a young man should have the opportunity of appealing, if the decision was, in his opinion, contrary to the facts of the case. Therefore, I think that trial by court martial ought to be limited to the case of one who deserts after he has actually become attached to the army and engaged upon active service in Canada, of course, as well as abroad. A proclamation issues, we will say, calling upon young men between the ages of 20 and 23 to come forward and report. A young man may not come within that class. He may be, according to his own belief and the belief of his parents, 24 years of age. He may not be one who is liable to report under the first call. It would be a very great hardship if he should be brought before a court martial, tried and convicted as a deserter under this Act, when, according to his belief and the belief of his parents, he was not entitled to be called at all.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That would come under "reasonable excuse."

Mr. PUGSLEY: But the court martial may decide he was under 24 years of age, and that he had no reasonable excuse for not coming forward. It would be a very great hardship that he should be convicted and sentenced to three years in the penitentiary by court martial, without having any right of appeal. There is no provision whatever in the statute for appeal from the decision of the court martial. It seems to me cases of that kind should be tried before the magistrate under the proceedings by way of summary conviction, and if the young man were found guilty, and it was thought he was wrongly prosecuted, he would then have an opportunity of filing his bond and appealing to the judge of the county court, in the ordinary way in which appeals from summary convictions are taken. For that reason I would suggest to my hon. friend whether the proceedings by court martial ought not to be limited to cases of desertion, after a man has actually become a part of the expeditionary force, and whether cases of mere neglect to report should not be tried under the Summary Convictions Act, in which case all the remedy ordinarily provided by law in case of summary conviction would be open to him.

Mr. MEIGHEN: My hon. friend is not quite correct when he says there is no appeal in the case of court martials.

Mr. PUGSLEY: There is none by this measure. Where is that provision to be found?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Similarly, there is none in the case of summary convictions. But the Code is still in effect and makes adequate provision. There is also provision in the King's Regulations and the Army Act for a reconsideration of the sentence of a court martial. I am not very familiar with military procedure, but I understand—indeed, if I caught rightly the words of the leader of the Opposition, he stated the nature of the appeal in cases of court martial.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The sentence is subject to revision by the military authorities.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is a revision of the judgment of a court martial. That judgment always comes before the competent military authorities including the Minister of Militia, so that it is not correct to say there is no appeal in that case. On the main point raised by my hon. friend as to the wisdom of making a distinction in the tribunal in the case of a man who fails to report and in the case of a man who having reported and having come under the jurisdiction of the military authorities, then deserts, I have made a note and will give an answer later on.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Will the section stand in the meantime?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR: The evidence taken before a court martial is all taken down in writing. This evidence, with the finding of the court martial, is sent, before the finding is promulgated or goes into effect, to the officer who appointed the court martial, and the finding has to be reviewed and confirmed by him before it has any effect.

Mr. LEMIEUX: By him alone?

Mr. TAYLOR: Yes. Afterwards it is sent down to the Judge Advocate General at Ottawa, General Smith. That is a very long process, and unless the sentence is for a long period, any revision he made would not be effective. In the case of a long sentence, the Judge Advocate General is again charged with the duty of interfering if the sentence of the court martial does not appear to be in accord with the evidence presented. How far is it intended that this measure shall follow these soldiers? I presume it is not intended that there shall be one law for soldiers already enlisted or who enlist voluntarily, and another for soldiers coming in under this measure.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The point directly raised by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Taylor was in my mind when the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Morphy) was speaking and may be reserved for consideration with the matter already reserved at the suggestion of the hon. member for St. John.

Mr. GLASS: In reference to clauses (a) and (b), is it intended that the penalty imposed in one part of the country for an offence shall differ from that imposed in another part of the country for the same offence? There seems to be some ambiguity in this respect. One court, for instance, might impose a sentence of twelve months, while another might impose a sentence of two years or three years. The sentence imposed in one province might differ from that imposed in another. The offence of desertion is desertion wherever it is committed. If a deserter is tried by court martial, the military authorities provide what penalty there shall be, but if say, in Ontario, a man fails to respond to the appeal of his country, he may have the maximum penalty of three years imposed. Some judge, however, in Manitoba or any other province might take a more lenient view of a similar case and might impose a smaller penalty. There should be no room for variation in the penalty imposed for that offence.

Mr. MEIGHEN: My hon. friend will see at a glance that it would not be possible to fix a hard and fast punishment for every case of desertion. A limit must be fixed and the decision left to the tribunal according to the circumstances. What may be a crime in one case may not be a crime of the same extent in another. There may be desertion and desertion, but very different degrees depending upon the circumstances of each case, just as in every case of the commission of an offence.

Mr. GLASS: I was not speaking so much with reference to the matter of desertion; I was speaking with reference to the man who does not respond to the call of duty.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is desertion.

Mr. GLASS: Then the men who will not respond to that call must, no matter where they may be, be treated in the same way. It might be possible for a magistrate, or whoever tries the case, to impose a nominal penalty—

Mr. MORPHY: Three days instead of three years.

Mr. GLASS: —of three days, or thirty days or sixty days instead of three years. The offence of not responding to the call should make a man liable to a fine consistent with the seriousness of the offence. I am not a lawyer, but there seems to be a wide margin for making a farce of the whole matter if a minimum penalty is not imposed for an offence of that kind.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The offence, like every other offence, may from an abnormity go down in degree of guilt and infamy until it is nearly nothing at all. For instance, if a man is a deserter, he may have such an excuse that the judge might feel is not a reasonable excuse within the meaning of the law, but is very close to a reasonable excuse. That man might come before the judge, and, while failing to convince him that his excuse is reasonable, might say: I am ready to submit myself right now; I would have done so before had I understood things. Would my hon. friend have the judge say to the man: Although you may be ready to become a soldier, I am bound to send you to jail for three years? I think what is in my hon. friend's mind is this, that a man having served his time would have expiated his offence and therefore not be liable again. He would be liable still. Were he sent to jail for three days, he would have to report for duty immediately he was released. If he failed to do so, he would be again guilty of the offence.

Mr. GLASS: Supposing you found in any particular district the officer trying the case not in sympathy with the principle of conscription or of military service, he might make a farce of the whole matter by giving offenders only a few days' imprisonment. There should be a minimum penalty.

Mr. NESBITT: The military authorities would soon get rid of such an officer.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The hon. member (Mr. Glass) does not recall the fact that the difficulty to which he alludes is experienced in the general administration of the criminal law. There are comparisons made all the time in this country and in other countries between the sentence one judge may impose for a particular offence and the sentence another judge may impose for a like offence. You cannot regulate these matters in advance, if you are going to leave the degree of punishment to the judgment of the tribunal. Perhaps the hon. gentleman has not appreciated the observation made by the Solicitor General, that the imposition of punishment under this section does not relieve the man from his obligation to military service. He is still liable to it, although he may have received and undergone a sentence.

Mr. MORPHY: Is that made quite clear in the Act, and where is it to be found?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It is to be found in the fact that there is nothing in the Act against it. The man is made liable to military service. If he commits a certain offence he is to receive a certain punishment, within limits, but the imposition of that punishment does not relieve him from service to which he is liable under the provisions of the Act. It leaves his status in respect to the Act exactly as it was before.

Mr. MORPHY: I wish to support as strongly as I can the suggestion of the hon. member for Middlesex. If the Act is to be really effective the clause should make an offender liable to a punishment of not less than three years and not more than ten or six years, as the case may be; that would be making it definite. The hon. member for Guysborough made a suggestion as to the expenses of incarceration of prisoners convicted under this Act. Personally, I do not see why a sentence of imprisonment with hard labour should not be imposed on any one found guilty under the Act. If the clause stands as it is, I think the salutary effects of this enactment will be frittered away. As the clause stands, a magistrate strongly opposed to imprisonment for this sort of offence—and they are to be found in all provinces—might let his personal feelings come into play and disregard the interests of the country. He might say with a smile to the man brought before him charged with an offence: "You are guilty. Three days in the common jail." Or he might sentence him to jail for only 2 hours. Surely, the Government cannot afford to allow an Act with such a clause to go on the statute-book. To my mind it would bring the Act into absolute contempt in many portions of the Dominion.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Would my hon. friend suggest that the Government be directly represented at the court?

Mr. MEIGHEN: My hon. friend is referring to the tribunal. My hon. friend from North Perth had reference to the magistrate who tries the case.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I do not think he is paying much of a compliment to the judiciary of this country when he suggests that a judge would make light of this Bill. However, I should not object to seconding my hon. friend's amendment if he would also bring war grafters under this drastic law.

Mr. MORPHY: I am informed that a session or so ago amendments were made to the Criminal Code dealing with that very class.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Have they been dealt with?

Mr. MORPHY: I have not heard of there being anything serious.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Some hon. members have said the grafters should be shot.

Mr. BOYCE. I am in agreement with my hon. friend from North Perth, especially, in view of the statement that an hon. member of this House makes in this morning's newspaper, that rather than obey the provisions of this Act, 20,000 or 25,000 people would go to jail. That is certainly a serious statement to the public, coming from a member of this House. It makes one feel that we should be very certain with regard to the provisions in this Bill for punishment of any one disobeying the law in any part of Canada, irrespective of any province. Suppose that the threat of the hon. member—and his statement was made in public—were carried out and that 20,000 or 25,000 prosecutions had to take place, and that the magistrate who heard the cases saw fit to impose a penalty of only 24 hours, those men would be getting off pretty lightly.

I am also inclined to support my hon. friend's general suggestion that the provisions of the Bill with regard to punishment do not go far enough. This is a very important measure, certainly the most vital measure that could be placed before this House and the country. It calls on every man, and the punishment for an offence should be so drastic that any one wilfully disobeying the law should practically be made an outlaw. I would suggest—I will offer no amendment now, as I understand the clause is to stand—that any man who has been convicted should be deprived for a period of three years after his imprisonment of the rights of citizenship, of his right to vote, for instance, at either a provincial, municipal, or Dominion election because of his contumacious conduct in disobeying the law of his country which calls him out for active service.

Mr. MEIGHEN: As to the necessity for a minimum sentence I would ask hon. members very seriously to consider the purpose of the Bill. Its purpose is to make soldiers, not jail-birds. If a minimum term is to be fixed and the contingency that my hon. friend from Algoma suggests actually takes place, then the Bill will succeed in making jail-birds of these men, but it would be impossible under the Bill to make soldiers of them. We should bear in mind that immediately a man is apprehended for having deserted, by not reporting for duty, from that moment he is in the custody of the law, and whatever punishment he receives we have already made him an outlaw to the extent that he has disobeyed the law of the land. But as soon as he has served his term, be it only 24 hours, he is under the Army Act in that he has deserted, and under the provisions of the Army Act he may be apprehended and brought before a tribunal and the law enforced; that is, he may be made a soldier; he becomes a soldier after becoming an outlaw. Keeping in mind what we have in view, and not the mere question of punishment, it seems to me that the Bill in that regard is as it ought to be. As to the necessity of a higher maximum of punishment that can be taken into account with the other suggestions made by the hon. member for Perth and the hon. member for New Westminster.

Mr. TAYLOR: The answer of the Solicitor General has a bearing, of course, on the answer to the question I asked a short time ago as to how far this Bill follows the soldier. To my mind this Bill should not follow the soldier beyond his attestation. If we attempt to make it apply to him longer than that, I think we shall only be inviting trouble. We cannot have two classes of soldiers. We cannot have one law applying to men already in the army, and another law applying to those who are brought in under this Bill. If the Bill makes it quite clear that its purpose is to provide a force which is to be delivered over to the military authorities I think our trouble will be at an end. I would not for a moment group our citizen soldiers with the grafters to whom the hon. member for Rouville has referred.

I think it would be most unfortunate to stigmatize a man as a criminal because he has committed a purely military offence, such as failing to report. When I had the honour of commanding a battalion in the Canadian Expeditionary Force, I had to do with a great many offences against the military law. There was hardly a day a commanding officer's court was not held. In very few of those cases was there any vicious intent, and I found that the law of kindness was much more effective than the law of repression, with respect to those soldiers; and if you showed human sympathy with a soldier, and treated lightly an offence which was not repeated and recurring offence, explained to him his liability to punishment and the desirability that he should maintain the dignity of his own institution, you got along indeed very well with him.

I should be sorry to see any minimum punishment established under this Bill, as I think in a great many cases the purpose of the Bill would be served by apprehending the citizen and making him fully conversant with the liability to which he was subjected under the law.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I would suggest to my hon. friend the Solicitor General that it might be well to have some method by which a prisoner can be pardoned, provided that after sentence he should be willing to obey the law and become a soldier. It strikes me that it would be well to have a provision of that kind, because no doubt there will be many cases of that nature, where men without very much intention of doing wrong fail to appear, and might be convicted and sentenced, and after spending a few days in jail might make up their minds that perhaps it would be better to join the boys in the fight, and be willing to go. I would suggest that some person should have authority in cases of that kind to pardon a prisoner and admit him into the forces.

In regard to the suggestion made by my hon. friend from North Perth (Mr. Morphy) that a light sentence might be imposed upon an offender by a friendly magistrate, which would, in a way, make the Act a farce, I would ask would he not be liable for another sentence? Suppose a call comes to John Smith to turn out on a certain day, and he declines to go. His case is brought before a magistrate, and he is sentenced to, say, a week's imprisonment. He serves his sentence, and is discharged. Is he liable to be called on again, or does that settle the matter as far as he is concerned? Is he not liable for a second prosecution later on? I would like to know from the Solicitor General what the situation would be in a case of that kind.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He is liable in case of any future desertion. I would apprehend, however, that inasmuch as he is in the custody of the law he would be physically under the military authorities, and it would be much more difficult for him to desert thereafter.

Mr. NESBITT: Would he not be liable to be tried by a court-martial, if the magistrate was too lenient?

Mr. MEIGHEN: He could not be tried by court-martial for the same offence, no matter how leniently the magistrate may have dealt with him.

Mr. NESBITT: I mean, could he not be tried by court-martial the next time?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes. In case a man repents and changes his mind after he has been convicted before the magistrate and sentenced, the full power of pardon rests with His Excellency, and may be exercised. An Order in Council is now in effect covering convictions or desertions, which provides that the convicting magistrate or judge may, of his own motion, release a prisoner if the prisoner is ready to take up again his military duties. That is to say, it has devolved upon the judge himself to provide more definitely for the pardon and release of men guilty of desertion, or guilty of absenting themselves without leave, which, of course, is another offence. In case of a conviction by court-martial, there is full power to pardon, not in His Excellency the Governor General, but, I think, in the commanding officer. In any event, the members of the House who have more knowledge of military matters may explain that it will be quite within the power of superior authority to release prisoners convicted by court-martial.

Mr. LEMIEUX: As the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) has allowed members of the committee to ramble in the discussion of the Bill, I would suggest we take up the question of the exemption of the clergy. I would not mention the point if my hon. friend the member for Victoria (Sir Sam Hughes) had not raised it in his speech this afternoon.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I think my hon. friend had better let the matter stand. It will come up in its proper place. If we begin jumping from one section of the Act to another, we will never get through.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I have no objection. I have some remarks to make on the subject, because my hon. friend from Victoria stated he was against any exemption in favour of the clergy. However, the question will come up later on.

Section stands.

On section 5:

5. (1) There shall be established in the manner hereinafter set out, the following tribunals:
(a) Local tribunals;
(b) Appeal tribunals;
(c) A central appeal judge.
(2) Any tribunal may hear evidence on oath or otherwise as it may deem expedient, and for the performance of its duties shall have all the powers vested in a Commissioner under Part I of the Inquiries Act.
(3) The Governor in Council may, upon the recommendation of the Central Appeal Judge, make regulations with respect to the establishment, constitution, functions and procedure of the said tribunals and such regulations may contain provisions for securing uniformity in the application of this Act.
(4) In so far as provision is not otherwise made, the procedure of the tribunal shall be such as is determined by the tribunal.
(5) No member of any tribunal shall be responsible at law for anything done by him in good faith in the performance of his duties under this Act, and no action shall be taken against any member of a local tribunal or an appeal tribunal in respect of the performance or non-performance of his duties under this Act, except with the written consent of the Central Appeal Judge.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Might I call the attention of my right hon. friend (Sir Robert Borden) to subsections 1 and 2 of this section. Does this wording mean that the appeal tribunals may also take evidence? I should imagine the intention is that only the local tribunal takes evidence. Or, is the court of appeal to take evidence also, upon the evidence already taken?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It was thought wise to give the appeal tribunal power to take evidence if it saw fit.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: For what reason? It would simply be a re-trial.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We want the very simplest procedure possible before the local tribunals; and we want as few lawyers as possible, the idea being that the great bulk of the cases will be disposed of by the local tribunals. It might be that under such conditions as that a man might not adduce before the local tribunals evidence that he later could adduce. We do not want to debar the court of appeal judge from taking that evidence if he sees fit.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The appeal will not be an appeal in the ordinary sense of the word, but the appeal court gives to the prisoner a re-trial before a judge.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, much in the way of an appeal from a magistrate under a summary conviction.

Mr. LEMIEUX: How many members of the appeal court will there be?

Mr. MEIGHEN: One.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Paragraph 2 says:

Any tribunal may hear evidence on oath or otherwise as it may deem expedient, and for the performance of its duties, shall have all the powers vested in a Commissioner under part one of the Inquiries Act.

You establish a court, but a commissioner is not a court. Why this drafting? Why not say that the court shall have the power of a court of record?

Mr. MEIGHEN: A reference to the Inquiries Act will show that if the tribunal has the powers of that Act, it requires no more powers. I do not think it should be empowered further than a commissioner under the Inquiries Act. A general provision that it should have all the powers of a court of record would be more than would be necessary. It has hardly that status. It is more a board of inquiry than a court of record.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: It is a board of inquiry, but it has power to give judgment. It is a board of inquiry for the purpose of exempting a man.

Mr. MORPHY: Paragraph 2 of section 5 says:

Any tribunal may hear evidence on oath or otherwise as it may deem expedient.

Why "otherwise?" It seems to me that this tends towards looseness of administration in the working of the tribunal. I think it should be confined to evidence upon oath or to a statutory declaration having penalties attached to the violation or breaking of the oath.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It might be evidence of affirmation.

Mr. MEIGHEN: My own idea was that it would be better that the tribunal should not be restrained in that regard. For instance, the cases might come very rapidly, there might be practically no question about a man's liability or about his right to exemption, and it seemed to me that it would be better to leave it to the tribunal. If the tribunal thought the matter was sufficiently important, or the question sufficiently doubtful, to have an investigation, they could swear a man, but it might not be necessary to swear every man who wanted to make a statement before them.

Mr. MORPHY: What prompted me to make that remark was a story I heard about a certain regiment in a certain district where seven prospective recruits went before a medical board for examination. The officer who told me the story said that they were the finest looking body of men he had ever seen, apparently physically fit, all single, not one with a dependent, and every one was rejected.

Mr. MEIGHEN: A case like that would be taken care of by the presence of an official of the Department of Militia and Defence who could appeal immediately. I do not see that it will be taken care of any better by compelling swearing to the evidence.

Mr. MORPHY: My answer to that is that laxity in procedure would be bound to come from the lack of sanctity of the oath. If you establish the solemnity of the tribunal, you will get a better tribunal for investigating statements than by any other method or arrangement.

Mr. NESBITT: It will be left with the tribunal to make their own rules and regulations, and they can take evidence under oath if they want to. I agree with the Solicitor General.

Mr. KYTE: Is it intended that parties appearing before this tribunal shall be permitted to do so by counsel?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The question of practice and procedure is left entirely to the regulations and to that class of the regulations which are framed initially by the central appeal judge. He will deal with the matter of procedure entirely, and it will be left ultimately to his decision as to what provision, if any, shall be made for counsel.

Mr. KYTE: I asked that question because subsection 2 says that:

> Any tribunal may hear evidence on oath or otherwise as it may deem expedient, and for the performance of its duties shall have all the powers vested in a Commissioner under part one of the Inquiries Act.

I recall that a few years ago when a commissioner was appointed under the Inquiries Act to investigate partisanship, he held that he could not permit parties accused of partisanship to appear by counsel and in many instances they suffered to a very considerable extent on that account. It should not be left to the decision of a tribunal but it should be specifically stated in the Act or in the regulations.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is the way it will be.

Mr. DEVLIN: Is it intended in the province of Quebec that a judge of the circuit court shall sit as a court of appeal over a judge of the Superior Court?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not see how that would be possible under the Act.

Mr. DEVLIN: It is possible in this way. The local tribunal shall consist, in the province of Quebec, first, of a member appointed by the joint resolution of the two Houses, and secondly of a judge of the Superior Court.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What tribunal?

Mr. DEVLIN: The local tribunal.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, no. We are at section 5. We will discuss that when we come to section 6, but I do not think that is the case.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Referring now to paragraph 3 of section 5 I find the following provision:

> The Governor in Council may, upon the recommendation of the Central Appeal Judge make regulations with respect to the establishment, constitution, functions and procedure of the said tribunals and such regulations may contain provisions for securing uniformity in the application of this Act.

That word " uniformity " is a very broad and elastic term. I do not understand how it can be defined. What is contemplated by that?

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is a similar provision in the British Military Service Act. The intention is this: A very wide discretion is left to the tribunal under a succeeding section as to exemptions. It is desired that the interpretation and application of those provisions shall be as nearly as possible uniform, and it was thought that the central appeal judge might draft such regulations as would look to the securing of the uniform application of these provisions throughout Canada. The very same provision exists in the English Act.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I asked that question because I thought that if there was a similar provision elsewhere we might know what it means and what regulations have been made. If there is a similar provision in the British Act, regulalations ought to have been made under it. What are they? I concede at once that it is desirable that there should be uniformity in the application of those clauses and that if possible the regulations should be made to secure that uniformity but unless there are precedents to which you can point, I am at a loss to imagine what regulations you could make which would be applicable to all cases beyond the commonsense, prudence and fairness of the judges themselves. If you have any direction to give them, I should like to know if possible, what it is.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think I should be going beyond my rights here if I attempted to indicate what might be regulations; but I can easily imagine regulations that would look to uniformity. For instance it might be provided that the same rule in respect of the presence of counsel should prevail in Manitoba as in Nova Scotia, or that there should be uniformity in the application of the subsection relating to health and physical defects. It has been found necessary in other countries, and we have provided, that where a man is physically and manifestly unfit for military service he need not go through the nonsensical formality of going up for medical inspection. For instance, if a man had no legs the board could exempt him at once without his going before a medical officer.

Section agreed to on division.

On section 6, subsection 1:

The minister may from time to time by proclamation or otherwise establish local tribunals at such places as he deems necessary and give each an appropriate designation.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Will the regulations referred to in subsection 3 be published in the official Gazette a sufficient time before the law becomes effective to permit the public to become familiar with the regulations?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It would be the duty of the Government to see that the people of the country had notice of those regulations.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Why is the word "otherwise" used, "proclamation or otherwise"? Is there any better way of making it known than by proclamation?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not know that there is, but we thought that we would leave it to the discretion of the minister.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I am afraid if he attempted to do it otherwise than by proclamation it would not be the best means of making it public.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: That relates to the form of publication. There would probably be publication in the press and notices posted up.

Mr. MURPHY: Is this the subsection to which the ex-Minister of Militia and Defence (Sir Sam Hughes) referred this afternoon when he said that military districts would be designated rather than geographical districts?

Sir SAM HUGHES: Some place in the Act I found it spoke of a provincial jurisdiction; I think section 7.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I can quite understand the point raised by the ex-Minister of Militia. Indeed, it was very frequently in our minds when these sections of the Bill were under review. The difficulty is that when it comes to the appointment of the Appeal Tribunal that is left to the Chief Justices of the provinces, and if it were done by military districts we should be under the necessity of having the Chief Justice of one province appoint the tribunal from another province.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Where will these tribunals be established? By counties? Where will they meet? It is important to know where the men will report themselves.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The tribunals will not necessarily be established by counties. They will be appointed and the places where they are to meet will be set out. There may be two or three tribunals in one county, one in another, and some counties may have none. The point at which the tribunal is first established will be selected so as to suit the convenience of the population. A tribunal may subsequently sit in another county, and its jurisdiction is ample all over the province. Any person may appear before a tribunal wherever he is; but he must abide by whatever tribunal he selects.

5 p.m.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Who determines the action of these movable tribunals?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Minister of Justice. The intention is that if a tribunal finds it can do its work better in any other place it can wire for authority to move, and, having that authority, it may move to another place.

Mr. PARDEE: One tribunal might do the work for a whole province?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It might do the work for a very large area. Later on there is provision for the consolidation of tribunals, if it is found that they are not all required.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: What I had in mind was the convenience of those called. There may be in one township fifty young men, in another seventy-five, and in another one hundred, and so on. The object of the Government will be, no doubt, to cause the least inconvenience possible to young men and bring the tribunal as near to them as possible.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Yes, that is the idea. That is why so much discretion was left to the minister, in order that he might study the requirements of population in the different parts of the country, and arrange the tribunals accordingly.

Subsection agreed to.

On subsection 3.—Local tribunals.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Judging from the remark just made by the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen) I understand that a man may select his own tribunal. Suppose, for instance, a resident in Ottawa is conscripted, and wishes to appear before one of the tribunals, would he be allowed to present his case before the tribunal, say in the city of London, or the tribunals in Toronto?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is that not an anomaly?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think, as a matter of legal right, under this Bill, he would be enabled to go to London, and apply to the tribunal there, but the restraining circumstance is that he would have a lot more difficulty in presenting his evidence, and convincing the tribunal, than he would if he applied to a tribunal close at hand. But what was sought to be avoided was the raising of questions of jurisdiction. If geographical limitations were placed on the jurisdiction of the tribunal, the question of the domicile of every applicant would come up, and interminable questions of jurisdiction would arise. Those are avoided by allowing the young man to choose any tribunal he desires within his own province.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: There is no provision made as to how many members will compose the Board of Selection?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: No, there is not, and I would be glad to have suggestions from hon. members. We had difficulty in framing the section, and we desired to have it present not only the appearance, but the reality of perfect fairness to every one. Therefore, we arrived at the conclusion that a board of selection, established by joint resolution of the Senate and House of Commons, would be the best body. If any other course is considered preferable by the committee, I should be very glad indeed to consider it. We have the idea in our minds that we might have a board consisting of two members from each province —18 in all.

Mr. NESBITT: Would that be two members from each province from the Commons, or from both Houses?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: They will not necessarily be selected from the House of Commons. If they should be selected from the Parliament, of course it would be appropriate to nominate some members of the Upper House.

Mr. CARVELL: I have been thinking a great deal about this clause—a little more than any other clause of the Bill—and my right hon. friend must admit at once that a committee composed of, say, eighteen gentlemen from all over Canada would be a very unwieldy thing. There would be a very great deal of difficulty in getting them together, and I am afraid that many influences might be exerted upon them, and I would like to suggest, although I do not offer it as an amendment—that possibly there might be a smaller board appointed for each province in Canada, and see if that board, knowing the local conditions better than the larger board, could not work out a fairer method of choosing the members of these tribunals than could the general board that would be appointed under the suggestion of the hon. Premier. I simply throw out the suggestion. I think probably every member in the House has given this matter consideration. I know the people of the country have done so. I have received more letters along this line, and I have heard more criticism and discussion from people that I met and talked to on this phase of it, than on any other. I think this suggestion might be worked out fairly well.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I have had the same experience as the hon. gentleman from Carleton (Mr. Carvell). I expected that perhaps the Government had a plan of their own, but if the only plan they have at the present time is the one suggested, of having two members from each province, I am afraid it would be an unwieldy body and the observations of my hon. friend from Carleton (Mr. Carvell) appear to be unanswerable. Since the Government themselves are open to conviction upon this question, and ready to receive suggestions, perhaps the best thing to do is to reserve the subsection, and at the next sitting of the House hon. gentlemen can express their views on the question.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am not so sure that it would not work out all right as it stands. As a matter of fact, it would probably work out in this way: The members from each province would examine the situation in that province and arrive at a conclusion. Then the board would meet and make their appointments without a great deal of difficulty, because the gentlemen nominated by the members from each province would most probably be accepted by their colleagues from the other provinces. Therefore, the matter would work out much in the way my hon. friend from Carleton suggested, except that the appointment would be made by the whole board of eighteen, instead of by the local provincial board for each province. I shall be very glad to accept my hon. friend's suggestion and let the section stand.

Mr. CARVELL: One of the difficulties would be that you could not find any two men in one province who are fairly familiar with every section of the province. My idea is that if you could have a board consisting of four or five members for each province, you would have a more representative board than one consisting of two members.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: That is well worth considering. I had it in my mind that I would ask my right hon. friend to name one man, and I would name another, and appoint the board in that way.

Section stands.

On subclause 1, of section 3:

1. In those provinces in which there are county courts or district courts, the county court judge or district court judge, or, if more than one, the senior judge for the county or district in which the local tribunal is established, or when the place at which a local tribunal is to be established is not within the territorial limits of any county court or district court, then by such judge as may be determined by the minister.

The judge making the appointment may appoint himself or any other judge having jurisdiction in the county or district.

For the purposes of this section, "county court judge" or "district court judge" includes any deputy judge authorised by law to act for the time being for any such judge, and also includes any acting judge so authorised.

In the province of Quebec:—

(a) In the judicial districts of Montreal and Quebec, any judge of the Superior Court of the province of Quebec who is authorized by the Chief Justice of the said court or authorized by the judge appointed to perform the duties of Chief Justice in the judicial district.

(b) In the other judicial districts the judge of the Superior Court of the province of Quebec assigned to the judicial district within which the local tribunal is established.

Mr. DEVLIN: According to part 2 of this section relating to the province of Quebec, a judge of the superior court shall appoint one of the members of the local tribunal. Is that member of the local tribunal to be appointed by that judge to be a judge of the same court?

Mr. DOHERTY: Not necessarily. It is not contemplated that he would necessarily appoint a judge.

Mr. DEVLIN: He may appoint any one?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes.

Mr. DEVLIN: So that the provision that applies to all the other provinces will not apply to Quebec.

Mr. DOHERTY: It is just the same as in the other provinces. There is no obligation in the other provinces for the judge to appoint a judge. There is a provision that he may appoint himself or any other judge, but as I understand the matter, he is not limited to appointing a judge. The matter is permissive as regards the other judges.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Is that limited only to provinces other than Quebec? A judge in Quebec could not appoint himself.

Mr. DOHERTY: It is not provided that he might appoint himself, because I do not think it was contemplated that we would ask judges of the superior court to undertake the work of sitting on the tribunals. In the other provinces the county court or district judges are to do the work, and it was thought it might be quite proper that a county court judge should be appointed to do that work, but it did not occur to myself, nor, I believe, to the gentlemen drafting the Bill, that there was any need of our setting the judges of the superior court to do that work, because it is to be noticed that the appellate tribunal is to consist of a judge of the superior court, and it would be, from some points of view, undesirable that you should first have a judge of the superior court sitting on the local tribunal, and then an appeal from that judge of the superior court acting with another member of the tribunal, to another judge of the superior court.

Mr. LEMIEUX: If I understand the Minister of Justice aright, the Chief Justice of the Quebec district will make the appointments there and Assistant Chief Justice Archibald of Montreal, will make the appointments in the district of Montreal.

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes.

Mr. LEMIEUX: And in each of the districts of the superior court in Quebec, the judge of that district will make the appointments.

Mr. DOHERTY: With this exception, that in the districts of Montreal and Quebec, I do not think the intention is that necessarily the Chief Justice shall appoint, but he will designate one of his judges to make the appointments.

Mr. DEVLIN: The judge of the superior court may appoint himself or any other judge of the superior court or any body else.

Mr. DOHERTY: That is not expressly so provided, and the inference might, from the provision, being expressly made for the county court judges in the other provinces, be that the superior court judge would not be expected to appoint himself or another judge of the superior court. I pointed out a moment ago a reason why it should seem desirable that he should not do so. From that local tribunal composed of the nominee of the judge and the nominee of the board of selection, there is an appeal to a judge of the superior court. The reason why we have to make a difference with regard to Quebec is, as the hon. gentleman knows, that in that province we have no county court judges; we have only superior court judges.

Mr. DEVLIN: We have judges of the circuit court.

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes, but only in the city of Montreal.

Mr. DEVLIN: It might be well to make a distinction there.

Mr. DOHERTY: If the hon. member thinks it desirable to make a distinct provision for Montreal, that question might be considered, but it seems to us that we should make a system of general application throughout the province. The judge of the superior court designated to make the appointments in the district of Montreal might, very properly, if he thought fit, appoint one of the judges of the circuit court.

Mr. LEMIEUX: They are too busy.

Mr. DOHERTY: The hon. member suggests that our judges of the circuit court in Montreal have just about as much as they can do with their ordinary judicial work.

Mr. DEVLIN: Does it not appear ridiculous to the minister that if a judge of the superior court is going to sit upon the local tribunal, yet afterwards under section 7, the Chief Justice may appoint, in the city of Montreal, a judge of the circuit court in appeal over the judge of the superior court?

Mr. DOHERTY: I did point out the fact that the appellate tribunal was to consist of a judge of the superior court as a reason why you should not put a judge of the superior court on the local tribunal. I think that the words "any court" probably ought to be altered. There may be something in the suggestion of the hon. member, and perhaps the matter ought to be made clear. I had not observed that; I had in mind, as working the thing out in Quebec, that we have, save in the exception mentioned, only the superior court, and there the judge would be a judge of the superior court. I think in that province the intention was that it would be a judge of the high court or the superior court that should sit on the tribunal. While I would not like to admit that the matter appears to be ridiculous as it stands at present, probably when we come to it, it might be well to amend the provision as regards that province.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: In the subsection with regard to the provinces other than Quebec, the county court judge may appoint himself to be a judge. This is a very proper suggestion, because if there is in any place a man who would sit on these tribunals that man is the judge who administers justice generally. If we have not the same provision with regard to Quebec we shall be excluding the very men who are best fitted to sit on these tribunals. Subsection (b) of section II says:

> In other judicial districts the judge of the Superior Court of the province of Quebec assigned to the judicial district within which the local tribunal is established.

If there is a man who ought to be a member of this court it is the judge in charge of the administration of justice generally. If he is not allowed to appoint himself we shall be excluding the very best men we have.

Mr. DOHERTY: As I pointed out, the judge of the judicial district will in all probability be the appellate tribunal, and if he appoints himself to the local tribunal that will make it impossible for him to sit on the appellate tribunal. If he appoints himself to the local tribunal we should have a tribunal composed of one judge of the superior court and another gentleman named by the Board of Selection. They will sit and pronounce a decision, and that decision will be subject to an appeal to one judge of the superior court, and that one judge may reverse the decision of the district judge, assuming him to have a seat upon the local tribunal. What was in mind was that the judges of the superior cuort were to constitute the appellate tribunal. That presents no obstacle in the way of a county court judge appointing himself to the local tribunal, but it certainly is, I think, a serious obstacle to the judge of the superior court appointing himself to that tribunal, because in that case he would sit subject to an appeal such as I have indicated. There is no question that a judge of the superior court would be an excellent man to sit on a local tribunal, but on the other hand the general scheme does not contemplate the local tribunal being composed exclusively of judges. It does seem to me that we can repose in the judge of the district court just the same confidence to make a good selection as we would repose in him himself if he were acting on the local tribunal, and that leaves his services available for the appellate tribunal.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Is it intended that one member of each local tribunal shall be a judge, or may the judge appoint whom he likes?

Mr. DOHERTY: They can go outside the bench altogether.

Mr. LEMIEUX: When a judge has selected the members of a tribunal, are they compelled to act?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, subsection 5 of section 6 provides for that. In order that there may be no misapprehension, I may say that to my mind section 7 was intended to read exactly as it is. The provision enabling the Chief Justice to appoint appeal judges was made as wide as it is for the reason that in some provinces, particularly in the West and in outlying districts of other provinces, the registrar might have very few appeals, and it would be very much more convenient to enable the county court judge residing in the district to hear the appeals than to send a King's Bench or supreme court or superior court judge from the capital of the province to hear those appeals. It was thought there would be no conflict of jurisdiction and no question of priority, at all events outside of the province of Quebec. A county court judge, even if he chooses to sit on one of the local tribunals, can only sit on one, and there would likely be several tribunals in his county. But, even if he sits on the local tribunal, we can trust the Chief Justice of the province not to appoint that particular judge to sit in appeal, and it is likely that no county court judge would sit in appeal over cases he had heard. I was not so familiar with the courts of the province of Quebec, and consequently no provision was made there enabling the superior court judges to appoint themselves. I remember that the point was raised, just as the Minister of Justice has raised it this afternoon, that the superior court judges would be those selected to sit in appeal, and the intention was that in each case they should make their own selection for the local tribunals and not appoint themselves.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Will tribunals be composed of laymen entirely, or of military men as well?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Civilian tribunals purely.

Mr. MARCIL: Is there anything in the Bill preventing the appointment of a military man?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is not forbidden. The county court judge could select a military man as his representative, but it appears to me very unlikely that he would do so or that the board of selection would choose a military man.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I was under the impression that one member of the local tribunal was to be a judge, and the other member appointed by the board of selection.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: One member is appointed by a judge.

Mr. PUGSLEY: But apparently that is not the intention. I suppose that no judge would be appointed on the local tribunal?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: He might or might not be. The local tribunals will have to be numerous, for the convenience of the population, and for that reason it would be impracticable to have them composed of judges or even to have one member of each tribunal a judge.

Mr. PUGSLEY: There may be good reasons for not having judges on the local tribunals but I was under the impression, and I think the public was too, that one member of each tribunal would be a judge. With regard to Quebec, a judge may appoint himself or another judge, but in all probability he would not appoint himself or another judge when he could appoint a layman. So I look forward to having these local tribunals composed of people other than judges. There is nothing whatever in the Bill, so far as I can see, preventing a military man from being a member of a local tribunal, and I do not see what warrant the Solicitor General has for saying that a county court judge would not appoint a military man. The Bill does not prohibit it.

Mr. NESBITT: I do not see why military men should be debarred. It does not matter whether they are military men or not so long as they are not partisans; that is the main thing.

Mr. CARVELL: Has the minister considered the advisability of providing that there shall be a judge on each tribunal? It occurred to me, when I first read this section, that the county court judge would appoint either himself or another judge. That is perhaps a strained construction, and the Solicitor General says that that is not the intention. Have the Government considered the advisability of providing that one member of these tribunals shall be a judge?

Mr. NESBITT: That could not be done if there was only one judge in the county.

Mr. CARVELL: I realize that difficulty, but I should like to see the tribunals composed of men in whom the public have absolute confidence, and against whom there would be no suspicion whatever. In the great majority of cases, I am sure, the men appointed by the county court judge would be the very best selection he could make, but sometimes the county court judge might have great difficulty in finding men of the proper standing in the community who were willing to act.

I have looked over my own constituency, and I have wondered where in the world I could find a man who would be willing to accept that responsibility. I am afraid we will have some difficulty. Of course, I realize it would be imposing a very great burden upon county court judges, because in our province one judge has charge of three or four counties, and he would have some difficulty in moving around all over the country. In any event, I wish the Government would consider that phase of it.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: Does that refer to the local tribunals?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: It seems to me there would be difficulty in working it out in the West. In all southern Manitoba from Saskatchewan to Winnipeg there is one county judge only. In the constituency of Souris there is no judge.

Mr. CARVELL: In all probability the territory would be too large to have it work satisfactorily.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Is it the intention that there should be one local tribunal for each county? Clause 1 of section 6 says the minister may, from time to time, by proclamation or otherwise, establish local tribunals at such places as he deems necessary. I would like to know if it is the policy of the Government to appoint one local tribunal for each county, or if it is proposed to establish more than one, where the county is large? If more than one were appointed it would avoid inconvenience.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It would be impossible to define exactly how many would be appointed to so many miles, but I have not in mind at the present moment any county where one tribunal would be sufficient. The county most familiar to me, of course, is Portage la Prairie, and I know it would be utterly impossible for one tribunal to take care of that county. Men would have to travel seventy miles to reach the tribunal. Such a thing would be absurd in a well-populated county. Consequently, it might be fair to state that there will likely be a local tribunal appointed in every substantial village, unless it happens to be very near some larger place. The aim is to meet the convenience of the people, and to avoid, as much as possible, imposing expense and loss of time upon them.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Might I suggest to my hon. friend that, as it will be rather difficult to find the proper man to act on those tribunals—and I do not suppose there will be any great enthusiasm to go on the boards—that the selection of the judges be made from the justices of the peace of the county. These gentlemen have a fair knowledge of the law, and enjoy the confidence of the community. They are perfectly acquainted with the districts in which they live, and it seems to me they are the men best fitted to come in contact with the public and to give the Act a fair trial.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have no doubt at all the justices of the peace will be called upon. They have a great deal of experience in the matter of hearing evidence. At the same time, I think it would be very unwise to confine the selection to them.

I might take this opportunity of saying that since the outbreak of the war members of the Government, and members of Parliament as well, I have no doubt, have been in receipt of very many communications from prominent citizens all over Canada offering their services free. Those gentlemen are actuated by patriotic motives, and nothing else. They are anxious to do something in the war. I am in hopes that from the best of that class of people we will be able to get the men who will carry out the work of those local tribunals, and carry it out well. To all those who have made such offers, and their number is thousands, I extend an invitation now to make it known that, if chosen by the authorities, their services will be available for this work. If they do, we will obtain very excellent results indeed, and I hope there will be no shirkers from the duty of performing the work of the local tribunals any more than there will be shirkers from those who should enlist for the war itself.

Mr. GRAHAM: I would not make the fact that a man was a magistrate a disqualification, but I would not like to make it a supreme qualification either.

Mr. NESBITT: Well, I should think not.

Mr. GRAHAM: These men must have other things to recommend them besides being accustomed to taking evidence. They would have to be fairly good students of human nature, men with very level heads, men who are unswerving in their views and who are absolutely fair.

I would like to ask the Solicitor General if he has had any communication from the Motherland as to the success of their tribunals, or the satisfaction they are giving in their methods of operation. The reason I ask this: two gentlemen who have been in England told me within the last ten days that the work there in this respect was very unsatisfactory. I would not state the particulars, but they assured me that if the same method was followed here, and the same lack of wisdom, I would say, in the performance of those duties, the whole thing would be quite unsatisfactory.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We have various reports as to the working of the tribunals in England. What my hon. friend says is something similar to the reports we have received; subject to this modifying fact, while at first their local tribunals were unsatisfactory mainly because they seemed to think that in certain districts it was their duty to accept everybody, or to reject everybody, still they profited by their experience. They have had no less than five Service Acts introduced in the British House, three of which are now law. Each of these Acts took advantage of the experience they had gained under the preceding one. Now, we think we have taken advantage of all their Acts and all the experience they have had under them. One of the difficulties they had was that their tribunals were too large. We have profited by their experience in this connection. They also realized that the fullest opportunity for appeal had to be given to the military authorities. We think we have covered that also. Then, again, they have not a full control of their procedure as they moved along. We are in a position to enable the tribunal to have full control of their procedure, and there is a provision in our very first Act for uniform procedure. Consequently, if they have met with very many difficulties, we have no reason to believe we will meet with the same.

Mr. MARCIL: How many exemptions were there in England?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I cannot tell, but I know that while the number of exemptions was very great, they proceeded to recomb them and they kept recalling men over and over again until now they have succeeded pretty well in securing all that are available.

Mr. SINCLAIR: With reference to what my hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) has said, I have been looking over the British Hansard on this question and I have discovered there were some severe criticisms made in regard to the local tribunals in Great Britain. I find in one case that Sir Roland Adkins, M.P., speaking in the British House of Commons on May 15, 1916, said that in one case the appeal tribunal reversed no less than 16 out of 18 decisions of the local tribunal, and in every case they treated the original applicants more generously than the local court had treated them. There was a certain amount of dissatisfaction with, and some severe criticism in the House of Commons of, the decisions given by local tribunals. They bore rather hard on certain applicants who appeared before them.

Mr. McCRANEY: I wish to endorse what my hon. friend from Carleton, N.B., (Mr. Carvell) has said as to the desirability, if possible, of appointing a judge on the local tribunal. There must be authority connected with the carrying on of the work of these tribunals and such authority will be given by the presence of a judge where it would not otherwise be found. It will give a finality to the proceedings which will tend greatly to lessen the number of appeals.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) is wrong in the belief that judges will not themselves act. I know that there are cases where perhaps they could not even act on one tribunal but it is hoped that wherever a judge himself is able to act, or wherever the judge junior to him is able to act, such judge will be appointed on the tribunal most important in the county. I do not know of any reason to apprehend that if judges had the time they would decline to perform this public service.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What I meant was that where it was not in any way obligatory upon a judge to act, but where the power of appointment is simply vested in the judge, it is not likely that he will assume the duties himself. No judge would like to appoint himself where he was simply given power to make an appointment and, if the opinion of the Government is that it is desirable they should act, the Bill should provide that they should act in all cases were it is feasible to do so and the feasibility or otherwise should be determined by the Governor in Council. Unless you throw upon the judge the duty of acting he is not at all likely to appoint himself and I am not quite sure that he is likely either to appoint some other judge.

Mr. KYTE: I would like to add a word to what has been said by my hon. friend from St. John. I should think it would be extremely doubtful if, from a feeling of delicacy, a judge would like to name himself as a member of this tribunal unless the obligation fell upon him by virtue of this Act. I cannot conceive that in the province from which I come there could be any difficulty whatever in the judges of the county courts finding sufficient time to discharge any duties imposed upon them in connection with this legislation. The jurisdiction of the county court judge in the district in which I live extends over three counties, he holds court in different localities in that district, and I am quite sure that he could find it convenient to hold sittings of the tribunal in various sections of his district for the accommodation of persons who desire to come before him without putting them to too much inconvenience in the matter of travel. If there is no insurmountable reason why the Solicitor General should not change the wording of the section so as to make it perfectly clear that the judge of the county court shall be a member of the tribunal, it is very desirable that such provision should be made. With reference to what has been stated by my hon. friend from Saskatoon (Mr. McCraney), the decision of a tribunal presided over by a county court judge would have very much greater weight than a tribunal presided over by a layman, and, as he points out, it would result in the lessening of a number of appeals which would otherwise be taken from the local tribunal.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I am sure that I voice the sentiment of my own province when I say that, if it is possible to get them, judges are the fit and proper persons to preside over such tribunals.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: There are not enough.

Mr. LEMIEUX: When I suggested a moment ago justices of the peace, I detected a smile on my hon. friend's face. But we have judges of the superior court of Quebec, judges of the circuit court, and district magistrates. For the counties of Gaspé and Bonaventure we have a judge of the superior court, and we have in the Magdalen Islands, in Bonaventure and Gaspé, two district magistrates. They have a civil jurisdiction extending to $100, and they have quite a wide jurisdiction in criminal matters. Perhaps my hon. friend the Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen) could see to it that their services could be availed of. I really believe you will have difficulty in finding people who will accept the duty of applying this law, which means compulsion after all. Although the Solicitor General stated that thousands of people had offered their services, I would point out that it was not for such service as this; it is for such service as every true and loyal citizen would be ready to give to his country at this time—the Red Cross, hospital work, the Patriotic Fund, but when you come to a law of compulsion, that is quite a different matter. Suppose the appointee of the judge refuses to act. I understand that these officers are to secure their appointments from the Minister of Justice. The Government and myself are agreed that the application of this law should be fair and above board. You want to allay all suspicion in the public mind. Although I have the utmost confidence in my hon. friend's fairness and unbiased mind in such matters, he will be bitterly criticised upon the appointments he will make. Liberals will say: Our political opponents have been appointed, we have to appear before them and we will not receive justice. On the other hand, a judge has the respect of the whole people whether he was appointed by a Tory or a Grit Government. I would like my hon. friend to take my suggestions into consideration.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Is that statement of universal application with reference to judges?

Mr. LEMIEUX: I have argued cases before my hon. friend (Mr. Doherty) when he was a judge of the superior court, and I have the most gratifying recollection of his high character as a judge.

Mr. DOHERTY: Did you always win your cases?

Mr. LEMIEUX: Of course as a politician my hon. friend may be quite a different man.

Mr. DOHERTY: I have not yet got the habits of a politician.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I am afraid my hon. friend has fallen from grace. I think my hon. friend might well consider the suggestions which are being made.

Mr. MACDONELL: This is a very important provision of the Bill. It is essential, not only that justice should be done, but that the people should be satisfied that justice has been done. We all know that the courts in all parts of Canada command the respect of the people unimpaired. The county judge is naturally the man in a district to whom the people look for justice and fair dealing. In Ontario we have one or two county judges in each county, so that there is ample provisional machinery to which these matters could be referred.

Mr. GRAHAM: And they have ample time, most of them.

Mr. MACDONELL: There is no doubt about that. I think the Minister of Justice has nearly one hundred county court judges under his authority in Ontario. It would seem highly desirable that the county court judge in a district should be definitely named as one member of the tribunal. The people would respect his findings, feeling that they were unbiased and that if he made errors they would be made unintentionally. Owing to the great diversity in population between the different counties, it must be difficult to lay down any general practice. In the county of York, including Toronto, there are perhaps 700,000 people, so that quite a number of tribunals would be required there; other counties have not more than 20,000 inhabitants. There is provision for these perambulatory tribunals, and the county court judge could move about and hold courts in different centres in his district.

Mr. GRAHAM: He now holds division courts all over the county.

Mr. MACDONELL: If the Government could see their way clear to make the county court judge one member of the tribunal, to appoint him definitely, I am sure it would work out not only with justice but to the satisfaction of the people.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess.

The committee resumed at eight o'clock, Mr. Rainville in the chair.

Mr. CARVELL: I understand that subclauses 1 and 2 of clause 6 have been carried.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Subclauses 1 and 2 have been carried. All of subclause 3 of clause 6 stands.

Mr. MARCIL: Referring to subclause 2 of clause 6, I did not understand whether an answer had been given to the suggestion that district magistrates in the province of Quebec might be employed. They are appointed by the provincial government, and their powers are extensive in civil and municipal matters. They correspond, in some respects, to the county court judges in the other provinces.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They may be named for local tribunals. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) that the selection should not be confined to them, but they may be named.

Mr. GRAHAM: I suppose I might say, in the presence of lawyers, that the successful operation of the law depends fully as much on the methods adopted in its enforcement, and the men employed in using those methods, as on the words of the statute. A good law may have very poor results, if enforced by men who do not appreciate the conditions under which the law was made, and realize the full intent of it. Sometimes the letter of the law is more successful in the breach than in the observance, if the breach is not too large. There never was a law placed on the statute books of this country to which this observation is as applicable as to the present one. In reference to the form of the tribunals, it strikes me that there is a great deal in the remarks of the hon. member for South Toronto (Mr. Macdonell), as to the county court judges, particularly in the province of Ontario. We have, in a great many of our counties, a senior and a junior judge. Two judges were appointed originally where the business was too heavy, or supposed to be too heavy for one, but of recent years, while the business has decreased very much, the number of judges has not decreased. We have some appointments of recent date of a second judge in counties where there is not sufficient work for one. I realize that that is largely in the hands of the provincial rather than the Dominion authorities, the appointment of the judge being by the latter, and the necessity for his appointment being decreed by the former. In Ontario the senior and junior judges are in sufficient number, and with insufficient work, to my mind, to enable them to carry on their duties under this statute without imposing any hardship upon them, and so long as we are under a party form of Government, and men have their likes and dislikes politically, very strong in every locality, it will be difficult to select men whom the public will think are giving the greatest satisfaction. I would not say the men themselves would not be doing their best, but they might as well make a mistake as to have the public think they are making a mistake. If the statute provided that these judges should do the work, I think no serious objection could be taken. I do not know what the condition is in other provinces, but speaking of Ontario, knowing the various counties, and feeling confident that none of the judges has too much work, I am heartily in accord with what the hon. member for South Toronto says. I think that the Government should take that into consideration fully, and I will be disappointed if they do not arrive at the conclusion that these judges ought to do the work.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I thoroughly agree with the wisdom of having the judges do the work. If they have the time to act on, at least, one of the tribunals in the county, I think it is to the interest of all concerned, and very much in the interest of the enforcement of the Act, that they should be nominated. But there are two points in connection with that phase of it. I do not see any other way of wording the section, because, if we make it compulsory on the judge, there are cases where he cannot comply and do justice to his work. I know of such cases. Furthermore, it would not seem wise, because you would only get him on one tribunal, and there would be other tribunals in some counties on which he could not act. Then there is this further consideration: there is nothing in the Bill to prevent the Board of Selection naming a judge. If the members of the board know that a judge could be spared, and a judge had not named himself or the junior judge, it would be within their competence to name him. In that way, we would have a tribunal that would judge each case on its merits.

Mr. GRAHAM: This man is selected by a body who are not judges, and not named by statute. If he is named by statute, there could be no semblance of partisanship. There will be all kinds of suggestions made to the body that has the selection from all quarters as to who the men ought to be. I am subject to correction about the other provinces, but I am speaking advisedly about Ontario.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Did the hon. gentleman understand me when I stated that the board of selection could select a judge themselves, as a member of the tribunals?

Mr. GRAHAM: They could, but they need not. It is open to that criticism, and, above all things, with the feelings in the country, we must avoid every loophole, or opportunity for criticism, or suggestion that these tribunals might not be properly selected. I may be wrong about this suggestion, but the Minister of Justice will know; I believe it will be proper, in Ontario at all events, for the Bill to provide, after consultation with the Provincial Government of course, that one of the judges in each county where there are two judges should be assigned to this work. Let this be his work for the time being, and let him be relieved of the other work; there might be some provision made whereby he could attend to some other work when he was not busy on this, but let him make this his primary business. I believe it would not interfere with the administration of justice, throughout Ontario at least, and it would relieve the selection from all semblance of criticism, because, in placing that provision in the statute, you would not be selecting any particular judge; you would be selecting a judge in every county in the province. I would go that far in my view, that it ought to be done by statute, and that it should be made the duty of one of the judges in each county where there are two.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the hon. member think it would be worth while to put in that compulsory clause, just for the sake of the counties where there are two judges? It would seem an anomalous thing to insist on it where there are two judges, and leave it optional where there is only one.

Mr. GRAHAM: I did not go that far. The Government might make it obligatory on all the judges so far as possible. Where there are two judges, I would suggest that one judge be nominated for the board of selection.

Mr. CARVELL: What is true of Ontario is also true of the Maritime Provinces. In those provinces we have no senior and junior judges, but each judge has from two to four or five counties to look after, and every hon. member from the Maritime Provinces will admit that those gentlemen have hardly enough to do to keep them—

Mr. GRAHAM: Warm.

Mr. CARVELL: —in working order. In the Maritime Provinces there is hardly an instance where a county court judge could not find plenty of time to do this work. That brings us back to what has been stated by many hon. members, namely, that the very fact that a judge is appointed to this position makes the appointment acceptable to the great majority of the people. It does not matter whether he was a Liberal or a Conservative before he went on to the bench, the fact that he is a judge makes the people feel that his decisions will be based upon the actual facts. As I read this Bill, the appeals really do not amount to very much after all. When I first read the Bill and from the way in which the newspapers took it up, I imagined that there was going to be an enormous number of appeals, but the appeal tribunal, as I find from section 7, refers practically only to the case where the two members of the local tribunal fail to agree. If the two members of the local tribunal agree, their decision is almost final, with the exception possibly that a man might go on from there to the central appeal judge, and I do not see how he can. We shall discuss that matter, I suppose, when we come to it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That comes in section 10.

Mr. CARVELL: I have read sections 7 and 10, and they amount to this, that the decision of the local tribunal is, for all practical purposes, final. I think, therefore, there cannot be too much attention paid to these tribunals to make sure that they shall be composed of gentlemen in whose decisions every person will have absolute confidence.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This section, of course, stands, so I will not further discuss the matter of having judges act on local tribunals. That subject we shall consider along with the section when we come into committee again. I do not understand my hon. friend from Carleton (Mr. Carvell) in regard to appeals. There is the freest possible appeal from the local tribunal to the appeal tribunal. Any person at all who goes before a local tribunal may, if he is dissatisfied with the finding of that tribunal, go to the appeal tribunal. All he has to do is to send his notice of appeal to the registrar, and then the registrar allocates the appeal. If the person is quite satisfied, but the representative of the military authorities is not, the latter may freely appeal. Those are two classes of appeals. The third class is where the tribunal itself fails to agree and states the facts for the decision of the appeal tribunal. All those classes of appeal come before the appeal tribunal, so that the importance is not so great as if there were not an appeal tribunal composed of no one but a judge. We have a final judicial determination of every case where there is dispute, no matter whether we have laymen on the first local tribunal or not.

Mr. NESBITT: If a judge is inclined to be fair, would not his fair-mindedness guide him to a certain extent in appointing his tribunal?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think a judge who travels a county is in the best position of any person to name a proper man.

Mr. NESBITT: What I meant to say was: If he was fair in his decisions, would not he then think it incumbent upon him to be fair in his appointments?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, yes.

On section 6, subsections 4 and 5—Appointments by minister if local tribunals not formed, and filling of vacancies—penalty for not acting:

(4) (a) The names and addresses of all persons appointed on a local tribunal shall, as may be provided by regulations, be communicated to the minister.

(b) The minister may by telegraph or otherwise appoint one or both members, as the case may be, of any local tribunal, if he has not received, within such period before the tribunal is to sit as may be fixed by regulation, the names and addresses of members duly appointed.

(c) A vacancy occurring shall be filled by the authority who appointed the member vacating, and if not so filled or if communication of same as aforesaid has not been received by the minister within such period as may be fixed by regulation, the minister may fill such vacancy.

(5) Any person duly appointed a member of a local tribunal shall, unless relieved in writing by the authority appointing him, perform his duties as such member, and any person who without reasonable excuse fails so to do shall be guilty of an offence and liable on summary conviction to a penalty not exceeding five hundred dollars.

Mr. MARCIL: What is the remuneration of those appointed to serve on these tribunals, or is there any remuneration?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The men are appointed until their work is done. As for remuneration, it is not contemplated to give them any. It is believed, in that way, a better class of men will be secured.

Mr. MARCIL: Their work will be done when 100,000 men have been raised?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. MARCIL: Will the minister explain what is to be construed legally as "reasonable excuse?" Suppose a man had a conscientious objection; suppose he was convinced that it was not the duty of his country to send men abroad to fight, would that be considered a "reasonable excuse?" A man who does not believe in capital punishment may be relieved from serving on a jury trying a murder case.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would not like to circumscribe, or to attempt to circumscribe, a judge in the discharge of his duty. The matter will be for each judge to decide; but I may say that if I were judge, I would not consider such a plea a reasonable excuse.

Mr. GRAHAM: The word "regulation" is mentioned in section 6 several times.

[Mr. Nesbitt.]

Does not that make it clear to the Government that the enforcement of this measure depends almost as largely on the regulations as on the Act itself, and that therefore, we ought to have the regulations? Under present conditions, we are not in a position to know what this measure means. The Government provides a regulation for a certain thing. It depends upon what that regulation is, what we ought to do with this section.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It was not intended that anything substantial, that is, in the way of principle, should be left for regulation, but the reason this is left for regulation is this. The success of the working out of the measure is to depend in some important degree on the central appeal judge. The matter of how many days should be allowed between the date of the sitting of the tribunals and the date of the appointment is a mere detail. That, and many other details that must be fixed, will be all set out in the proclamation. It may be two days, three days, or four days; something of that kind is what I have in mind myself. But that is a mere detail which would be worked out along with the other details by the person who is himself the final authority—who is, as it were, the apex of the pyramid on whom rests to a great extent the duty of making the Act work successfully. It seems to me a good principle to leave the fixting of these details to him.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend practically says that each judge will decide what constitutes a legitimate excuse.

Mr. MEIGHEN: A judge acting in his judicial capacity, and not under this Bill at all.

Mr. GRAHAM: Unless there be some statute on which a judge can base his decision will there be uniformity of decision? A judge in one county may decide that such and such a thing is a sufficient excuse, and a judge in the neighbouring county may decide that it is not. There may be many excuses from the men who do not want to go to the front.

There is another point. It surely is as obligatory for the men who ought to serve on these boards to do so, as it is for the eligible men to go to the front, but you are letting them off with the payment of a fine, and sending the other chap to jail. I would make the penalty just as severe for the man who would not act on a board as for the man who would not go to the front when called up. In the one case the man is defending his life, and in the other he is simply defending his case.

Mr. MEIGHEN: At all events, I will go so far as to say that we will reserve consideration of sub-clause 5. I did think that a penalty of a $500 fine was somewhat appropriate for failure to act in such a case as this. Still, we are at a crisis, and this is a national duty which these men are called upon to perform, and, speaking for myself, I am disposed to agree with the hon. member (Mr. Graham).

Mr. GRAHAM: He could buy himself off.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But he becomes a breaker of the law; he is guilty of an offence.

Mr. GRAHAM: But he can settle with money.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Serious consideration will be given to that suggestion. With regard to my hon. friend's other suggestion as to uniformity of decision on the part of the judges sitting in their ordinary capacity, as to what would constitute a reasonable excuse, there is no doubt much in what the hon. member has said; but there is no more difficulty in getting uniformity of decision here than there is in any other case. In all applications of law under the criminal code, and in applications of law with regard to offences committed under other statutes, a reasonable excuse will release a man from his liability, and it is for the judge to say what, under all the circumstances, constitutes a reasonable excuse.

Mr. GRAHAM: In those cases precedents have been established, but there are none here.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is very true; precedents have been established, and I think in the main they would be applicable to this case.

Mr. LEMIEUX: For instance, the jurors.

Mr. MEIGHEN: For example, the reasonable excuse that constitutes ground for failure to act as juryman would be of very reasonable excuse in this case.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Would my hon. friend give a concrete case of what constitutes a reasonable excuse? I cited the case of a juror who might be summoned to act on the panel during the whole term of the criminal assize. I acted for the Crown many years ago, and I know the court used to accept illness in the family of the juror as a reasonable excuse. Does my hon. friend contemplate any class of excuse other than what is known as a reasonable excuse in the administration of justice?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think the suggestion of the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) is quite to the point. A reasonable excuse in this case would be such as would apply in the case of a juror for failure to perform that public service.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Except that the fine is a little higher.

Mr. MEIGHEN: And it may go higher still. The class of excuses would be about the same, and I think the decisions on the point would be very applicable.

On subsection 6—local tribunal to decide on exemptions:

(6) Each local tribunal shall hear and decide applications for certificates of exemption made to such tribunal as provided in section eleven.

Mr. NESBITT: Would the minister take into consideration the expediency of putting in the Bill some of the regulations that are mentioned so very frequently? I dislike seeing everything left open.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I can assure my hon. friend that, so far as I was concerned, I did my best to leave as little as possible to regulation. I am afraid that if we placed in the Bill the fixed period that must intervene between the date of the sitting of a tribunal and the receipt of the name of the nominee we might run into great difficulties in the working out of the Act. These matters are best regulated as we get down to practice and see what the necessities of the case impose. They can also be best attended to when all the other details as to time and so forth are considered together. It might be that the time we fixed might not be workable, and that it should be lengthened or shortened, but if we should fix it in the Bill it would be laid down hard and fast and the Bill might be made unworkable. It is only a detail anyway; there is no difference in principle whether it is one day or five.

Mr. PARDEE: Does it not appear to the Solicitor General that certain rules and regulations ought to be laid down covering specific cases? Each tribunal might make rules of its own. If that were so there might be different rules with different tribunals in the same province. I cannot help thinking that in a section of this kind there ought to be something which is absolutely specific and absolutely directory, so that each tribunal may work according to the same ruling.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the hon. member will look at subsection 3 of section 5 he will see the following:

> The Governor in Council may, upon the recommendation of the central appeal judge, make regulations with respect to the establishment, constitution, functions and procedure of the said tribunals, and such regulations may contain provisions for securing uniformity in the application of this Act.

Mr. PARDEE: Let me ask the Solicitor General to look at clause 4:

> In so far as provision is not otherwise made the procedure of the tribunal shall be such as is determined by the tribunal.

So that, again you leave it, not mandatory or directory, as it should be, but in the hands of the tribunal. There may be one tribunal for a whole province. The Solicitor General said he would make them cover as much territory as possible, which is quite right. On the other hand, there may be two or three tribunals in the province, and each tribunal may have an entirely different set of rules or regulations to work by.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think there is any possibility of a central appeal judge, who has so much at stake in the matter, on his own responsibility, not providing rules and regulations to cover everything he thinks of any importance. But, in the event of something not being covered, it is better that the tribunal be able to decide its own procedure. It is only procedure the tribunal can decide.

Mr. PARDEE: I am not arguing so much on that point. As the Solicitor General says I can quite understand that if something is left out something may be added. The only thing I am arguing is that different men may have different sets of rules or regulations for different tribunals. Would they be absolutely uniform?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes. That is the object of section 3.

Mr. PARDEE: But, reading that in conjunction with section 4, does it not take you back to the same point?

Mr. PUGSLEY: It seems to me we are in a large measure allowing the judge of the central appeal court, or the central appeal judge, to legislate in respect of matters in regard to which this Parliament ought to legislate. It is proposed to give to the central appeal judge the power to make regulations with respect to the establishment, constitution, functions, and procedure of the said tribunals, and such regulations may contain provisions for securing uniformity in the application of this Act. That is giving very wide powers to the central appeal judge. He may make regulations covering the establishment, constitution, and functions of those tribunals. It seems to me that is a power which ought to be exercised by this Parliament, and ought not to be left to any single individual.

Something has been said by the Solicitor General with regard to the rules and regulations under the Judicature Acts. If I remember rightly those regulations are enacted by statute. I know that is the case in New Brunswick, where the regulations in the Judicature Act are enacted by the provincial legislature and form a part of the law. It has not been left to a single judge to make rules and regulations of so vital a character as are these regulations which may be made by the central appeal judge.

I quite agree with my hon. friend from West Lambton (Mr. Pardee) that this Bill ought to cover a great deal of the ground which it is proposed to leave to the central appeal judge. The objection is this is accentuated by some of the provisions in the section now under consideration.

Mr. MEIGHEN: With all deference to the hon. member (Mr. Pugsley) I do not think he agrees with the hon. member (Mr. Pardee) at all. He does not bring forward the same point as was brought forward by the hon. member for West Lambton.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I thought he did; practically the same principle.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member for West Lambton fears the regulations may not be so general and uniform so as to avoid lack of uniformity of procedure in the tribunals. The hon. member for St. John fears that the regulations not being made directly by Parliament might not be what they should be. I do not want to plead precedent. I only plead on the merits, but the Militia Act of this country is full of just such provisions, in fact it is more replete with them than is this Military Service Act. I can read them here by the dozen, where the Governor in Council may make regulations for carrying the Act into effect, for the organization, discipline, efficiency and good government generally of the militia and for anything requiring to be done generally.

Mr. GRAHAM: That would be done on the recommendation of the minister in charge of the militia. It would be really a militia regulation.

Mr. MEIGHEN: In this case, in addition to the responsibility of the members of the Government, we have the initial responsibility of the member of the Supreme Court of Canada who himself is the judicial head of this whole structure, so that Parliament is not asked to leave entirely to the Governor in Council the framing of regulations so important as those. Parliament is asked only to trust to the Governor in Council to bring in such regulations as may be framed by the member of the Supreme Court of Canada.

Mr. PARDEE: Clause 8 says:

> The Governor in Council may appoint one of the judges of the Supreme Court of Canada to be the Central Appeal Judge.

That is merely permissible.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Act would be meaningless, unless the Governor in Council acted.

Mr. PARDEE: But, it is merely permissible.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Does not the minister draw the distinction between the regulations of the Militia Act and the regulations under this Act? This Act is constituting a court, or constituting tribunals all over the country, which are to determine questions of the most vital importance in connection with the enforcement of the provisions for military service. It seems to me it is entirely contrary to good practice and good legislation to allow any judge to provide regulations so far-reaching as these —regulations as to the establishment and as to the constitution of those tribunals, and as to the functions which those tribunals are to perform. There are features which Parliament ought to determine for itself. Parliament should determine what are to be the functions of these tribunals, yet we, the representatives of the people, are entrusting to one man the determination as to what the functions of those tribunals shall be. It seems to me it is entirely contrary to what should prevail, in respect of a measure of this importance.

The regulations in the Militia Act are of the most simple character. There is provision in the statute as to balloting for those who are to be compelled to serve. There is provision as to who shall be exempt. There is no provision for the creation of courts to decide as to who shall serve and who shall not serve.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I think my hon. friend must be guilty of not having read the Militia Act very carefully. The power conferred upon the Governor in Council by the Militia Act is infinitely greater than that proposed to be conferred by this Bill. The idea of naming a judge was to remove the exercise of power from the Government and thus to avoid any suspicion of partisanship and to restrict the Government to such regulations in the respect mentioned as would be recommended by the central appeal judge. It could not be said that the Government were enacting regulations on their own initiative, but solely on the recommendation of an absolutely independent and impartial authority. Look at section 144 of the Militia Act and see the power that is conferred by that section:

> The Governor in Council may make regulations for carrying this Act into effect, for the organization, discipline, efficiency and good government generally of the militia, and for anything requiring to be done in connection with the military defence of Canada.

You cannot imagine anything wider than the powers that are vested in the Governor in Council under this section. Anything that is proposed in this Bill is infinitely short of that and moreover we have restricted the power of the Government in so far as this particular matter is concerned by requiring that the Governor in Council shall act only upon the recommendation of an independent judge, a man of whose impartiality and good faith there could not be the slightest possible suspicion.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Do I understand that the recommendation of the central appeal judge will be accepted by the Government as recommended? Do they reserve to themselves the power of supervision?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: We do reserve the power of supervision but it comes to us as a recommendation from the judge and we cannot pass it unless he has recommended it.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The judge makes the recommendation and that recommendation may be accepted or not accepted by the Government. The regulations may be amended. I do not know how it is in the other provinces but in Quebec the rules of practice made by the judges are not subject to revision; they are a law unto themselves. If the central appeal judge were empowered to make rules that were binding, that could not be revised, then, I could understand the argument of my right hon. friend; but that is not the Bill. The Bill says that the judge can make recommendations to the Governor in Council but the Bill does not say that he must accept those regulations.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Does my right hon. friend think it will be better to vest the power in the judge alone?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Certainly; in so far as politics are eliminated, there is no reason why the judge should not have the power. I cannot see why the rules should not be made by the judge rather than by action of the Governor in Council.

Mr. CARVELL: The difficulty is that the Governor in Council is not bound to take the suggestions of the central appeal judge except in one case, and that is only in fixing the conditions of the appeal from the appeal tribunal to the central appeal judge. There are many other cases in which the Governor in Council may make rules and regulations without reference to the judge.

Mr. MEIGHEN: See paragraph 3 of section 5.

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, that does give him further power:

> The Governor in Council may, upon the recommendation of the Central Appeal Judge, make regulations with respect to the establishment, constitution, functions and procedure of the said tribunals and such regulations may contain provisions for securing uniformity in the application of this Act.

Then, by section 10, the Governor in Council may make regulations on the recommendation of the central appeal judge as to the method of appeal.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think there are other paragraphs.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I did not attempt to claim that it was only upon the recommendation of the central appeal judge that the Governor in Council may make regulations. I was speaking of the matter immediately under discussion.

Mr. CARVELL: Then, there are many cases in which the Governor in Council may make regulations entirely without reference to the central appeal judge?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Yes.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Reverting to paragraph (b) of section 6:

> The minister may by telegraph or otherwise appoint one or both members, as the case may be, of any local tribunal.

[Sir Wilfrid Laurier.]

Would it not be better for the minister, before making the appointment, to get the advice of that board?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Of the central appeal judge?

Mr. LEMIEUX: No, the board.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There would not be any board until the appointments were made.

Mr. NESBITT: The board appointed by the House.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The board. I wish to ask my hon. friend, before the clause is carried, if he will further consider the question of appointing judges of the high or low courts to these local tribunals?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is reserved.

Mr. MARCIL: I do not see any provision in this Bill for the use of the French and English languages in these local tribunals. Is there any provision of that kind?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That would follow as a matter of course. Subclause 2 of section 12 provides for the publication of all regulations and proclamations. It would seem that there possibly could not be any doubt about that because the object is to have them read.

Mr. MARCIL: I mean the procedure before the court. I saw a newspaper paragraph last year stating that the Manitoba judges had denied the use of French in the courts of that province. I would like to have it made certain in this case that French could be used. Of course, it is an official language in federal courts such as the Supreme and Exchequer Courts.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is no question that the language can be used before these tribunals.

Mr. MARCIL: I want to make sure that it can be.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know why it should be stated because it would seem to be clearly permissible without stating it. In the first place the tribunal can take evidence in any way it desires. Certainly, the tribunal, where there is a French population, ought to be able to use French because otherwise they could not do their work.

Mr. MARCIL: I think there should be no hesitation about making it plain that French can be used before these tribunals.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is no hesitation.

Mr. MARCIL: Then why not put it in?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It can be covered later on by regulations if there is any reason why it should be. It is the object of the tribunals to get the evidence and they could not get it otherwise.

Mr. MARCIL: Would it not be possible to put in two lines and say that the proceedings under this Act may be conducted either in French or English?

Mr. MEIGHEN: In any of the courts of Canada a man can only give evidence in the language he speaks. Evidence may be given in other languages besides French and English.

Mr. DOHERTY: I think section 133 of the British North America Act makes it quite clear. These certainly are tribunals or courts of Canada and in this section it is said that:

> Either the English or the French language may be used by any person in the debates of the House of the Parliament of Canada and of the House of the Legislature of Quebec; and both those languages shall be used in the respective Records and Journals of those Houses; and either of those languages may be used by any person or in any pleading or process in or issuing from any court of Canada established under this Act, and in or from all or any of the courts of Quebec.

We are establishing a court for the application of a Dominion Act, and I think that would very clearly apply.

Mr. MARCIL: These local tribunals may not be as well versed in the law as is the minister.

Mr. DOHERTY: It will require the same knowledge of the law to understand it in the British North America Act as in this Act. It would be a matter of knowing that under the law they had to do it, and there ought not to be any great difficulty in conveying that information to them.

Mr. GRAHAM: It should be made clear that any one wishing to be heard in French before this tribunal should be enabled to do so.

Mr. MORPHY: That would be under section 133 of the British North America Act. If these courts are federal courts they will come under the exact wording of section 133, and therefore the use of the French language must follow as a matter of course.

Mr. SINCLAIR: In the United States they have provided that military officers shall be disqualified from acting on the local tribunals. The theory is that they sometimes have so much zeal in regard to military affairs that they may not take an unbiased view of the cases before them.

Subsection agreed to.

On section 7.

> 7. The Chief Justice of the court of last resort in each province, or in case of his absence, or failure to act, then, a judge of that court designated by the minister, shall establish for such province a sufficient number of Appeal Tribunals, and shall assign to each such tribunal one judge of any court of such province, and shall distribute among such tribunals all appeals from, and cases stated under subsection two of section ten, by local tribunals of which the registrar has notice and such appeal tribunals shall severally hear and decide the same.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am in favour of the coordination of all the strength of the nation to win this war, and I would not have any clause in this Bill saying that even a Chief Justice could fail to act, even if he did not want to. If he was in good health I would see that he was not absent, and if he was present I would see that he acted. We are passing a compulsory measure, compulsory for the men who have to risk their lives, and I would not leave it optional to any man, even as high as a Chief Justice, to say whether he would act or not. I would make it part of his duty and make it compulsory for him to act.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Section 7 is a very vague statement. Are these appeals to be established by the Chief Justices and not by this Parliament? Are the tribunals to be composed of one, two, or three men? The Solicitor General this afternoon intimated that he supposed these appeal tribunals could really hold new trials, that they were not simply courts of appeal. From reading the Bill, I understand that the court of appeal was to revise the decision of the local tribunal. I do not object to the view of the Solicitor General that new witnesses could be heard. But it seems to me that this section should define clearly the character, composition, and jurisdiction of the court.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It defines its jurisdiction and its composition. It does not say how many tribunals shall be established in any province. It says that the Chief Justice shall assign to each tribunal one judge of any court, and shall distribute among such tribunals all appeals, etc. That establishes the jurisdiction and the power. The only thing that is not definitely fixed is the number of tribunals, and that could not be fixed until we knew the number of appeals. We assign to each tribunal one judge of any court; the number of members of the tribunal is fixed, and the jurisdiction and powers are fixed. As soon as the registrar gets all of the appeals collected and the data for the appeals, he allocates those appeals geographically for the province, 9 p.m. and then the Chief Justice of the province, who will have all of that information, will assign a judge of any court to try these appeals. The judge so appointed can not only try appeals in the strict sense of the word, but can also hear new evidence. It would be unwise to prevent him from hearing new evidence for the reason, among others, that it may not be found necessary to take down all of the evidence verbatim at summary trials.

As to the point raised by the hon. gentleman from Renfrew, I have absolute confidence that there is no possibility of any chief justice in Canada failing to perform his duty, unless some disability prevents his acting. It is impossible to conceive of the chief justice of a province of Canada failing to perform his duty, and it is a duty of the same character as those he is performing weekly in the discharge of the duties of his office. In the province of Manitoba, the number of sittings of assize is fixed by the judges themselves, according to public necessity. The same character of duty is assigned to the chief justice here. I cannot conceive that any one would fail to discharge his duty. If I thought that were possible I see no reason why provision should not be made for it.

Mr. GRAHAM: I do not want to say anything about the members of the Bench, because I have the greatest respect for them, but there are times when they consider their convenience is almost superior to the convenience of the public. I have seen this feature in cases in which I have been interested. The fishing might be particularly good at a certain time of the year when this Act ought to be put into operation, and they might delegate this work to some person else as an ordinary duty, so as not to interfere with other arrangements. I am not saying it disparagingly, but if there is a loophole left for that, we might have the chief justice doing the work of some other judge, who might do this work just as well. My viewpoint is that this, being a compulsory measure, should not be left to the option of any judge, whether he is chief justice or not. The law should say that he should act, and that it was part of his duty to act. It is a time for sacrifice for all of us, and, as the Solicitor General says, the chief justice would not shrink from the duty, except under some circumstances, where he might think the duties to be performed would be performed just as well if relegated to some other member of the bench. I should say that the chief justice ought to act. Some of our chief justices have been very pronounced in saying that a conscription measure ought to be passed, to make men go to the front. I would make it apply to all these men in favour of conscription.

Mr. DOHERTY: It is imperative.

Mr. GRAHAM: Except in cases of "failure to act."

Mr. DOHERTY: This does not say that failure to act is the end of his responsibility. He will be responsible for not having done his duty, but suppose there is a failure to act, though he will have the responsibility of having failed to obey the statute, we must find some remedy for the consequence of his failure. We might go on punishing, but we could not get any appeal tribunal, unless we enabled somebody else to act in the meantime. This is just as much an obligation as any other which rests upon a chief justice in any other capacity, and he is liable for whatever consequences would be entailed by his failure to perform any other official duty. The purpose of this provision is not to deal with him from that point of view, and give him an option, but it is to provide for the case where he fails to act, and he may fail to act for very many legitimate reasons. This does not necessarily imply refusal to act. It is failure to act. The chief justice may be ill, and quite unable to act for other reasons, and the purpose is not to give him permission to do as he sees fit, but to provide for what would happen if for any reason he fails to act. It is not in contemplation to give him any liberty in the matter.

Mr. GRAHAM: Nothing happens, if he does not act under this statute, and something will happen to every person else named, in case of failure to perform duties. It looks to the ordinary laymen as if you were affording an invitation to the chief justice, because he is the chief justice, not to perform his duty. I am not saying he will not, but you say, in the terms of this Act, "or failure to act." If he fails to act no provision is made for any penalty. I am not saying that there should be. If the meaning suggested by the Minister of Justice is the one intended by this provision, I should say the clause should read "failure to act through illness," or something of that kind. I would not relieve him from acting, in order that he might go fishing.

Mr. DOHERTY: That is all that can be said of any of the judges or chief justices. Of course, in case of failure of a judge to perform his duty he may be impeached. In addition to that, there is a provision in the Criminal Code under which a man who refuses to perform an obligation imposed upon him by statute is liable to be prosecuted before the courts, if necessary.

Mr. GRAHAM: But he will not be.

Mr. DOHERTY: If we inserted such a provision here, would it be more likely that he would be?

Mr. GRAHAM: In regard to the other tribunals, if a man fails to act, unless for some good reason, he can be fined a sum not exceeding $500, and the Solicitor General is considering the advisability of making the penalty more severe. But with respect to the chief justice we hesitate to say anything, except that we provide a remedy if he does not act. He is relieved, and the minister appoints another judge to take his place. I cannot get away from the fact—and I think none of us can—that this is not the ordinary Criminal Code or Judicature Act, or whatever you wish to call it; it is a compulsory measure.

Mr. MORPHY: Conscription of men.

Mr. GRAHAM: Every man who is asked to perform any duty under this Act ought to be compelled to perform that duty. I would make no distinction between the case of the chief justice and men assigned to any other tribunal. I would make it read "in case of failure to act from illness," or something of that kind, but not broader than that. The ordinary person reading the Act will say, "Well, when it came to the chief justice, they did not apply the rule to him that they have to all other men supposed to be engaged in this great struggle." Nobody ought to be excused, according to my judgment.

Mr. DOHERTY: There is a difference between the members of the ordinary tribunals under this Act and the chief justice. The obligation on the others would only be created by this statute. That office is created and the obligation is created to accept it, and then you make a penalty for this new state of affairs that never existed before, but your chief justice is an officer bound to perform all the duties imposed upon him in his quality of chief justice, and liable to certain consequences for failure. You are imposing an additional duty on him, and all the consequences of failure to perform any duty attaches to him.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: You would impeach him?

Mr. DOHERTY: I would not say what we would do.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: With reference to the provision about the court of appeal. I understand the court of appeal is to be composed of only one judge, to be appointed by the chief justice.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: And he is to have jurisdiction to try the case?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. LEMIEUX: One feature which might defeat the object of the Bill is the multiplicity of appeals. We have first, if I understand well, the local tribunal, then the appeal tribunal, then the central judge. I stated the other day, repeating what my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) said in his address to the House, that there was, in that multiplicity of appeals, a chance for a rich man who wished to escape as much as possible the obligation, which the poor man had not. I do not raise the issue for the pleasure of raising it, or to create a prejudice in the minds of the public.

But I say that unless it is made very clear that the deposit which is ordinarily required for the lodging of an appeal will not be exacted in either case and that the cost of those proceedings will be reduced to a minimum, there will exist that prejudice in the minds of the people. If the Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General would make those two points very clear the people would be impressed with the idea that rich and poor alike can, if they have a just case, not only appear before the local tribunal, but go to the appeal court and the Central Appeal Judge. There is a subsection in the Bill which enacts that the regulation for the setting in motion of those appeals will be prepared by the Governor in Council.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will be approved by the Governor in Council.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Clause (b) of subsection 3 of section 10 says:

> The Governor in Council, on the recommendation of the Central Appeal Judge, may make regulations governing the right to and fixing the conditions of appeal from an appeal tribunal to the Central Appeal Judge, provided any person authorized by the Minister of Militia and Defence may as of right enter and prosecute such appeal.

Before this Bill is passed the Governor in Council, that is to say, the Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General, ought to provide the tribunals referred to in that clause, so that the public may know that there will be no undue favouritism on behalf of a certain class of the community as against another, so that the people of this country, rich and poor alike, will be on a footing of equality. The Minister of Justice, who has had long experience as a judge, knows that it is very easy to create an injustice by exacting from a poor litigant a large deposit to bring his case to appeal. In Montreal, where my hon. friend has practised law, and where he has administered law for so many years, there are classical cases of rank injustice where the litigants had not the means to go to the appeal court. I do not suppose the cost will be high, but we live in a time when the cost of living is high, and when the people have not too much ready money. This is not an ordinary piece of legislation.

The usual administration of justice has to look after only a few litigants, but here you have the whole nation which is liable to be called out, brought, so to speak, automatically before those courts. In the name of common sense and justice, I appeal to the Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General to frame, before this Bill is passed, regulations which will show clearly to the people that there will be no high cost for the setting of the machinery in motion, and that the deposit to lodge the appeal will be practically nil.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I can set my hon. friend's mind at rest on both points immediately before any regulations are made. There will be no deposit at all required for appeals, and such regulations as provide days, times, procedure, etc., will be such as to reduce to the very minimum, if not entirely to eliminate, the necessity of costs. The object of the regulations will be to make the appeal just as acceptable and just as applicable to the poor as to the rich.

Mr. MARCIL: Will the appellant have to forward his case and the evidence to Ottawa, or will he have to go there himself?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The first appeal is to the appeal judge, and the appellant can take new evidence to that judge or he can give his evidence over again. There are no strict rules as to that, and that judge will be almost as convenient to him as the local tribunal. It is hoped, at least, that there will be no necessity of a man going very far to an appeal judge. No fewer appeal tribunals could possibly be established than three. He who objects to three tribunals has not thought the matter out or does not weigh his words at all. It is hoped that the first court of appeal will weed out the number of appeals to a relatively small number. It is inconceivable that any one central tribunal at one time could hear all the appeals that will be made inasmuch as there is the utmost freedom of appeals. One court would never get through all the work. Consequently, there has to be an intermediary court, and no one could suggest anything else that would properly handle the appeals and at the same time that would be practicable in its working. There are two appeals in England and two in New Zealand.

Mr. LEMIEUX: How many are there in the United States?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know. The regulations on this point have not yet been received. The appeals could not be simpler than they are here, and all that is left to the regulations is as to the right to appeal and the conditions of appeal. We had not in mind financial conditions, but simply the rules to be followed which will be of a very general and simple character to enable each appeal to be prosecuted with the least possible expense and to be disposed of as expeditiously as possible.

Mr. ROSS: Does not section 7 lay itself open to this criticism? It says:

> The Chief Justice of the court of last resort in each province . . . shall assign to each such tribunal one judge of any court of such province.

That might be a county court judge. Might not this situation arise? The local tribunal might consist of a county court judge and a layman, who would give their decision in regard to a man's exemption. There would be an appeal from their decision. Under section 7, might not the Chief Justice appoint a county court judge of another county to hear an appeal from a judge of the court of the same jurisdiction and a layman? That would be a rather ridiculous situation. Should not there be in the section something to state that in case of an appeal from a local tribunal consisting of a county court judge and a layman, the appeal should be to a judge of a higher court? There is no provision except that the Chief Justice shall distribute the appeals. A county court judge of Oxford county might set aside the decision made by a county court judge of Middlesex and a layman. We do not think the Oxford county court judges are more capable than those of Middlesex.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member (Mr. Ross) has the same understanding of the section as I have. I know of no way to avert the possibility, if you call it a possibility, of that occurring, except by eliminating the county court judge as a judge of appeal.

You cannot eliminate him unless you are ready to impose very great inconvenience on judges of the higher courts. In the province of Manitoba the judges of the higher courts all reside in the city of Winnipeg, and similar conditions obtain in the other provinces. There may be half a dozen appeals to be heard at the town of Swan River, 400 or 500 miles from the city of Winnipeg. It is surely not wisdom to compel the Chief Justice to send a judge of the Court of King's Bench 400 or 500 miles to hear half a dozen appeals. Consequently we are allowing him to appoint a resident county court judge in the district to hear the appeals. It may be that a county court judge in that district has already passed upon those very cases, in which event the situation that presents itself to the mind of the hon. member for Middlesex would doubtless present itself to the mind of the Chief Justice, and he might be called upon to send a judge of the King's Bench to hear the cases, and he would likely do so.

Mr. ROSS: Why not say in the Act that he shall do that?

Mr. MEIGHEN: If we had provided in the Bill that wherever a county court judge sits, even if on only one case, a judge of the King's Bench must be sent to review it, we should be imposing very great inconvenience for very small cause. It seems to me that the way in which the Chief Justice will naturally get over the difficulty will be by assigning these cases to be tried by a judge in a near-by place. He knows the amenities of the Bench; he understands the feelings of judges as to being tried by their equals, and he, of all men, can be trusted to have regard to those considerations in the disposition of judges in courts of appeal. I do not think such cases are likely to arise at all, although they are possible under a strict reading of the Bill, I do not think in the first place that the Act need be worked to avoid that condition, because I think the judge will avoid it, and in the second place, I do not see how we could very well word the Bill so as to avoid it.

Mr. NESBITT: Did I understand the Solicitor General to say that the appeal court will consist of only one judge?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. NESBITT: That would be an argument against appointing judges on the local tribunal. It would be much cheaper to appoint a county court judge to hear the appeals.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is an argument, I think, against compelling judges to act on the local tribunal.

Mr. GRAHAM: I cannot understand why the Solicitor General does not even want to inconvenience a judge of the King's Bench. This Act is to compel men to risk their lives, but the Solicitor General will not use compulsion on a chief justice. He hesitates even to compel a county court judge, and he does not want to inconvenience—that is the word he used—a member of the King's Bench. I would not look at it in that light. I would make this a compulsory measure, and if it was necessary I would send a member of the higher courts anywhere, however much it inconvenienced him. I would make this measure compulsory on every person it affects.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is not regard for the judges so much as regard for the public that governs. Judges are fairly busy, or are supposed to be. In the province of Saskatchewan, for instance, they are not merely busy but actually congested for reasons that I need not expatiate upon here. Litigation is very much in arrears; there has been a congestion there for two years. It is not in the public interest that for an insufficient cause one of these judges should be compelled to lose days and perhaps weeks doing something that could very conviently be done by a county court judge on the spot. The judges are, of course, compelled to act when they are needed, but we are not compelling the chief justice of a province to appoint one judge instead of another, when the other might be much more convenient to the locality; that is all. The compulsion is on the chief justice just as it is on every one else, and the compulsion is on the appeal judge when he is appointed by the chief justice. The penalty lies in the law as it stands to-day, and a judge who refuses to act is liable to a much more severe penalty than any one is liable to who is nominated and fails to act on a local tribunal. The penalty of $500 is very small compared with what a judge of the court is liable to if he fails to do his duty according to the statute.

Mr. NESBITT: You would force the appeal judge to go to the district to hear these cases, and not make the applicants go to him?

Mr. MEIGHEN: He would go wherever he was sent. The appointment will be fixed conveniently to the residence of the appellants.

Mr. NESBITT: You will see that that is carried out?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, yes.

Mr. ROSS: I cannot follow the argument of the Solicitor General. He is considering the convenience of the public entirely, he says, but his whole argument tends to convince me that he is serving the convenience of the judges. The judges in this country are paid well in proportion to the amount of work they have to do, and I do not think they are overworked. They may do their duties well; I am not saying anything about that, but here we are dealing with the liberty of the subject, the thing most dear to all men. The Solicitor General should provide in the Bill that in case a county court judge is a member of a local tribunal, appeals from that tribunal shall be heard either by two county court judges or by a Superior Court judge, no matter how much it inconveniences them. This is a very important measure; we are at war; we are calling out men and sending them to fight and die in foreign lands, and at a time like this the convenience of a chief justice or two county court judges should not be considered. The Solicitor General must admit that we have a great many more county court judges in the province of Ontario than are necessary to do the work. I think other provinces are in the same position. I repeat that if the Solicitor General is unwilling to inconvenience a Superior Court judge, the appeals should be heard by two county court judges.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The suggestion of having two judges looks to me as possibly being practical. I will see if it can be arranged for.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. J. A. DESCARRIES (Jacques-Cartier) (translation): Mr. Chairman, I wish to make a point clearer which, in my opinion, is of the greatest importance: I refer to the appeal taken to the appeal tribunal and then to the central appeal judge from the judgment which will be given by the first tribunal. In the province of Quebec, when an appeal is taken from a lower court to a higher court, I do not know that new witnesses have to be heard. Now I think it is the desire of this honourable House that in such appeals new evidence should be heard. Therefore, if it is not specifically stated in this Act that new evidence may be heard, the presiding appeal judge will practically make rules of practice under which it would no longer be possible to adduce new witnesses.

Hon. Mr. DOHERTY (translation): My answer to the hon. gentleman is that it is not the general rule, on an appeal, to hear new evidence. In criminal matters, the judge who sits in appeal over a case, holds a new trial and the appeals will be conducted in that manner. It will be within the power of the judge to frame regulations as to appeals under this legislation. The matter will be left to the initiative of the central appeal judge and the regulations concerning that tribunal shall emanate from the Governor General in Council.

Mr. DESCARRIES (translation): Should this not be put in the Act? When the law is sanctioned and enforced and difficulties arise, it will be too late to provide a remedy, whereas such difficulties could easily be obviated now. Why do you not say in this legislation that, in those appeals to the first appeal judge or to the central appeal judge, the appellant will have the right of producing new evidence?

Hon. Mr. DOHERTY (translation): I do not see any objection to that, but neither do I see the necessity for it, as that point is governed by the regulations which are to be made by the Governor in Council on the recommendation of the central appeal judge, and it seems to me that the hon. gentleman could accept our assurance that those regulations will provide for such cases as he refers to; the more so as it would not be practicable to apply to such appeals, under that Act, rules of procedure applying to civil cases, in which a record is made and prepared before the judge of the lower court. The fact must not be lost sight of that proceedings before tribunals of first resort are summary proceedings, and I have but little doubt that were it left to the decision of the appeal judge,—seeing the great similarity of the proceedings with the proceedings in appeals in criminal matters —the judge would decide that it is absolutely necessary for him to hear new evidence, as no docket is prepared in writing which could be handed over to him. It seems to me that the hon. gentleman could accept the assurance that this will be made absolutely clear by the regulations and that he will have in those regulations which most control the procedure, exactly what he desires.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER (translation): My hon. friend was not here this afternoon, when this matter came under review, and if he looks at section 5, he will find that not only the appeal tribunal has the right to hear the evidence, but the three tribunals.

Here is the English version:

5. (1) There shall be established in the manner hereinafter set out the following tribunals:—

(a) Local Tribunals;
(b) Appeal Tribunals;
(c) A Central Appeal Judge.

(2) Any tribunal may hear evidence on oath or otherwise as it may deem expedient, and for the performance of its duties shall have all the powers vested in a Commissioner under Part I of the Inquiries Act.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I would like to leave with the Solicitor General for later consideration the suggestion of empowering appeal tribunals to appoint counsel to represent appellants, these counsels to be paid, of course, by the Government. I make this suggestion largely for the purpose of eliminating any excessive costs, or any costs at all, on the part of appellants.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Why would my hon. friend limit it to appellants? After a case had been decided by a local tribunal, or by the appeal tribunal, the Minister of Militia might carry it to the central court of appeal at Ottawa, and put the subject to any amount of expense in defending the judgment he has obtained. I think there is a great deal to be said in favour of the suggestion of my hon. friend, but I would not limit to appellants. In every case I would give the subject the right to counsel. Of course, this comes up a little more prominently in section 10, which contains a most extraordinary provision, giving to the Minister of Militia the right to appeal. He may carry a case from the local tribunal up to the central appeal judge. He has the right to appeal, as a matter of course, and he need not give any bond or furnish any security for costs. If the subject has obtained a judgment in the lower court, the minister may practically ruin a poor man, carrying him from court to court without any possible redress.

I think the suggestion of my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) is a very excellent one. If there is a provision for the benefit of the subject, whether he is an appellant or a respondent—

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Of course, I mean that.

Mr. McKENZIE: I would like to get some information from the Solicitor General as to when this right of appeal begins, and what the appeal is from. It is not very clear from what the first appeal is taken. As I understand subsection 2 of section 4, after a certain proclamation is promulgated everybody in a certain class becomes subject to military law. There is no selection in the body of men called out by that proclamation. There may be hundreds among them who will not pass the medical examination, but they are subject to military law the moment they are called out. Of necessity, there must be some of them who will not find it necessary to appeal, because the medical examiner will turn them down. There must be a certain stage in their condition when they do not know whether the medical examiner will reject them or not. Are they supposed to appeal then to this central tribunal, before the doctor passes judgment upon them, or are they to wait until they are declared medically unfit? I have not been able to understand that very clearly. Perhaps the Solicitor General will make it definite as to when the right to appeal begins in the case of a man who is called out under the proclamation

Mr. MEIGHEN: The right to appeal begins immediately the decision of the local tribunal is obtained.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Whether exemption has been granted, or refused?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Whether exemption has been granted or refused. As to medical examinations, the local tribunal may itself grant exemption on the ground of ill health, or infirmity, under subsection E of clause 11. The regulations governing when the local tribunal may do so will be fixed, and the cases contemplated are cases of manifest infirmity or ill health. If the applicant comes before the tribunal and is refused exemption, or if he does not apply for exemption, upon the day fixed in the proclamation he must report, and from then on he is subject to military discipline. Immediately on reporting he goes before the medical examiner, in the usual way, and if he is found unfit for service that ends it. His duties, under that call, have been answered. He may obtain from the local tribunal a conditional exemption, conditional as to time or otherwise, or as to re-examination locally or otherwise. That is the way all those medical difficulties are taken care of.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Clause 7 stands. We do not ask that the clause shall be passed.

Section 7 allowed to stand.

On section 8—Central Appeal Judge.

The Governor in Council may appoint one of the judges of the Supreme Court of Canada to be the Central Appeal Judge.

Mr. CARVELL: Would it not be just as well if the word "may" were changed to "shall?"

Mr. MEIGHEN: Just as well .

Mr. CARVELL: I would like to see it that way, although I presume there would be no change and that a judge of the Supreme Court would be appointed.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It means the same thing, but there is no objection to changing it to "shall." I move that the word "may" be changed to "shall." The rule is that where power is conferred upon executive authority, and presumed to be in the public interest, the word "may" is obligatory.

Motion agreed to.

On section 9—Registrars:

A Registrar for each province may be appointed by the Governor in Council.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Might it not be desirable to have the right to appoint more than one registrar in some of the larger provinces such as British Columbia or Ontario?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think there is need for more than one registrar in a province, and I do not think it is advisable, having regard to uniformity. We want to have every man who appeals send his appeal to the same registrar in each province. The duties would be much heavier in some provinces than in others, but there is provision later on for the appointment of any other officers necessary.

Mr. MARCIL: Have you provided for clerks for these local tribunals?

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is covered by the "regulations" clause, 12, and it is provided that they may be appointed on the recommendation of the central appeal judge. It is intended to have a representative of the Militia Department and it may be possible that he would act as clerk.

Mr. MARCIL: Who supervises the expenses of the court?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Minister of Justice.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The suggestion to change the word "may" to "shall" in section 8 was acted upon very quickly, but I would suggest to the Prime Minister whether it is ever customary in a statute to use the word "shall" with respect to the Governor in Council or the representative of His Majesty. The word "shall" is entirely inconsistent with all the other sections in which the word "may" is used.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: That is true.

Mr. PUGSLEY: In section 4 it is said:

The Governor in Council may from time to time by proclamation—

Mr. CARVELL: This is different. They may never issue a proclamation.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I have never known the word "shall" to be used in that connection. It may be all right but I do not think it is customary.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I think probably my hon. friend (Mr. Pugsley) is right. It is in effect what I suggest to my hon. friend from Carleton, but we will let it stand for the present and perhaps we can consider it again.

Section 8 allowed to stand.

Mr. MARCIL: Regarding the appointment of a registrar in the province of Quebec, there are two important and well defined judicial districts in that province, those of Montreal and Quebec. The chief justice of the Montreal district visits the Quebec district and the chief justice of the Quebec district visits the Montreal district. Perhaps two registrars will be necessary in that province, one at Quebec and one at Montreal.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I suppose it would be possible to appoint a deputy to the registrar for one of these districts if it should be found necessary.

Mr. McKENZIE: What are the duties of these registrars?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The principal duties of these registrars are to receive and to allocate appeals geographically throughout the province in order that the chief justice may appoint judges to try those appeals with convenience.

On section 10—Appeals:

10. (1) Any person aggrieved by the decision of a local tribunal, and any person authorized by the Minister of Militia and Defence, may appeal against any such decision.

(2) If the two members of a local tribunal cannot agree as to any decision to be made by them, they shall forthwith state in writing the case to be decided and cause the statement to be sent to the Registrar for the province in which the tribunal is established.

(3.) (a) Subject to the provisions of paragraph (b) of this subsection there shall be an appeal from any appeal tribunal to the Central Appeal Judge.

(b) The Governor in Council, on the recommendation of the Central Appeal Judge may make regulations governing the right to and fixing the conditions of appeal from an appeal tribunal to the Central Appeal Judge, provided any person authorized by the Minister of Militia and Defence may as of right enter and prosecute such appeal.

(4) The Central Appeal Judge shall be the tribunal of last resort, and the Governor in Council may, on his recommendation, appoint one or more other judges of any superior court to assist the said Central Appeal Judge in the discharge of his duties, and define their powers.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The first subsection gives to the Minister of Militia the right of appeal. It does seem to me that when a man has applied for exemption on the ground of sickness, infirmity or any of the other grounds which are set forth in the statute, if the Minister of Militia desires to appeal from the decision in the case, it should only be upon terms prescribed by the appeal tribunal. It is hardly right that the Minister of Militia, having authority to employ counsel and having the money of the country behind him, should put the subject, who might be very poor—perhaps utterly unable to employ counsel, and who might be affected very grievously by the cost of the proceedings that he would have to take to defend the judgment which he has obtained from the local tribunal—to the trouble and expense of defending a proceeding of this kind. It would be unfair that as a matter of right the Minister of Militia, without any conditions, any obligation as to cost if he fails, should have the right to enter an appeal. This right is still more objectionable when we come to paragraph (b) because (b) provides that the central appeal judge may make regulations governing the right of the subject to appeal. The Solicitor General stated that it was only intended to fix the conditions of appeal, but it is his duty to make regulations limiting the right of appeal as well as fixing the conditions. It is his duty to —make regulations governing the right to and fixing the conditions of appeal from an appeal tribunal to the central appeal judge, provided any person authorized by the Minister of Milita and Defence may as of right enter and prosecute such appeal.

Why should there be a greater privilege extended to the Minister of Militia to carry the appeals from one court to another than is extended to the subjects who have obtained judgments in the first instance from the local tribunal? It does seem to me that it ought to be entirely the other way. The subject ought to have the right of appeal but if the Minister of Militia is not satisfied with the judgment of the local tribunal he ought to be compelled to enter into a certain obligation; at all events, to save the subject harmless of the costs incurred by reason of his being compelled to go from court to court until finally the Minister of Militia might carry him before a judge of the Supreme Court in Ottawa and might involve a young man in expense and hardship that would be almost ruinous to him.

Mr. MEIGHEN: On this subclause 1 which we are at present discussing, the right of appeal is a free right of appeal on the part of both from the local tribunal. There is no restraint. But, under subclause (c) of section 12 it is provided that:

The Governor in Council may make regulation.. .. .. under which application for certificates may be made, deferred applications received, appeals entered and heard and rehearings had.

That is to say, conditions might be fixed, not conditions that would become a restraint, not conditions that could not be filled by either the individual applicant or the Militia Department. There might be conditions that could be easily complied with. It was felt that the central appeal judge might well make such regulations as would, in some way, limit appeals from that appeal tribunal to the central appeal judge. But it would be impossible to limit the appeals from the Militia Department, because in no other way could we secure that uniformity of application throughout the Dominion that is so desirable. My hon. friend says there should be even a freer right of appeal from that tribunal to the central appeal judge on the part of the individual than on the part of the department. At the opening of the discussion this afternoon, my hon. friend from Renfrew (Mr. Graham) made some reference to our taking advantage of the experience of Great Britain in this regard. It is the experience in Great Britain that we have had regard to here. The experience there of the permission to appeal equally on the part of both to the central tribunal in London proved very disadvantageous in the obtaining of the necessary men under the Act. It caused great delay in many cases. So we have deemed it wise to enable the central appeal judge to make such regulations as, while they are quite fair and will cover all necessary and proper cases, will not allow an unrestricted right of appeal to every one, which would practically suggest and would perhaps break the whole machinery. There is no hardship involved. Every man has the right to appeal to the judge of a court of his own province, and he must be aggrieved by a judge of that court before he can complain.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The Solicitor General states that the regulations governing appeals are to be made by the central appeal judge.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Governing the right to appeal from the appeal tribunal.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That would be so if it depended entirely upon section 10. But by subsection (c) of section 12, the Governor in Council is allowed to make regulations. The two provisions seem to be inconsistent.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is contemplated in section 12 is the entering of appeals, meaning the initiation of the appeal in the first place. It may be well to consider, when we are dealing with section 12, whether that should not also be among the regulations to be first initiated and recommended by the central appeal judge.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The Solicitor General says that it is desirable to discourage appeals.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not quite.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Well the experience in England has been that appeals have caused delay.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is from the appeal judges.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It seems to me that unless we know the nature of the conditions of appeal that would be fixed by the Governor in Council, we can hardly tell whether it is going to remedy the evil or not. It may be that the condition of giving a bond as security for costs would operate very advantageously to the wealthy man, who could easily furnish 10 p.m. his bond or security for costs, and very disadvantageously to the poor boy who wished to carry his case to appeal. We have no intimation what those conditions are to be. The Solicitor General has not answered the argument that the Minister of Militia should have no more right to carry the subject from court to court without any obligation to give security for costs, or making any provision for giving the subject the advantage of counsel, than the subject would have to carry his appeal from court to court. Take the case of a young man who has made application for exemption. He gets a judgment from the local tribunal in his favour. The Minister of Militia, without giving any security, without any condition whatever being fixed, may appeal from that judgment to the appeal tribunal. If he gets a judgment from the appeal tribunal overturning the judgment of the local tribunal, then you are making provision under which the Governor in Council, upon the recommendation of the central appeal judge, can prevent that young man from appealing to have the judgment of the local tribunal restored. You are going to take away from him that right, while on the other hand, after the subject has got judgment of two courts in his favour, you allow the Minister of Militia to carry him off to the central appeal court without providing any security for costs, and without any conditions in respect to the appeal. It seems to me that is imposing an unreasonable hardship upon the subject. If there are to be any conditions attached to the appeal, those conditions ought to apply equally to the Minister of Militia and to the subject; indeed, I think they ought to apply much more strictly to the minister than to the subject.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There would be no object in having security for costs put up by the Minister of Militia.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Make him liable for costs.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is quite within the power of the central appeal judge to provide by regulation that in appropriate cases, looking to the means of the applicant, compensation can be granted to any one who, in his judgment, is unnecessarily brought before the central appeal judge.

It is quite within his power, under clause (b), subsection 3, section 10. I think that is quite adequate. At all events, the experience of Great Britain shows that unless the right of appeal is given the Militia Department to the central appeal judge, this measure will be in great danger of failing of its primary object.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I submit there is no fairness at all in that clause. There are two parties to the suit, the conscript and the Minister of Militia. Each has the right of appeal. If the minister is given the right of appeal he should be on a parity with the conscript, and should be subject to all the rules. If the minister is exempt from furnishing bonds, or giving security of any kind, the conscript should not be placed in a worse position. The rule should apply to both; there should be no exception. An appeal is given from the local tribunal to the appeal tribunal and the party has simply to say: "I appeal." When you come to an appeal from the appeal tribunal to the central judge, conditions are imposed upon the conscript, but not upon the Militia Department. I do not know what the conditions will be. It is provided in subsection 3 of section 10 that regulations can be made limiting the right to appeal. One condition may be the furnishing of a bond or making a deposit, or there may be a limit of time. But the conditions, whatever they are, will have to be performed by the conscript, whereas the Minister of Militia will be free from all those formalities, and can simply walk into court and say: "I appeal." That is not fair at all. They should be on an absolute parity in both cases, and I do not see how my hon. friend can justify the greater restriction upon one than upon the other.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman is not quite correct in saying that there can be no conditions placed upon the Minister of Militia in reference to an appeal.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The section says so.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: How do you construe the regulations?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The regulations may provide conditions, but they must not be such as to prevent the absolute right of appeal.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Paragraph (b) of subsection 3 of section 10 reads:

> The Governor in Council, on the recommendation of the Central Appeal Judge may make regulations governing the right to and fixing the conditions of appeal from an appeal tribunal to the Central Appeal Judge, provided any person authorized by the Minister of Militia and Defence may as of right enter and prosecute such appeal.

That gives the Minister of Militia the right to enter and prosecute an appeal, without conditions.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I can only give my interpretation. I cannot say it is worth any more than the interpretation of any one else. My interpretation is that conditions may be imposed in reference to carrying on an appeal. Those conditions may even be applicable to the Militia Department, but there must not be such conditions that will put it in the power of any one to prevent the Militia Department prosecuting the appeal. They may compel the Militia Department to fulfil certain conditions, or they may compel them to provide for the witness fees of the other side, but they cannot prevent them from prosecuting the appeal, whereas these regulations may provide a condition, applicable to the individual, that he shall be prevented from prosecuting an appeal, except with the consent of the appeal judge. Such a condition, under this clause, could not be applicable to the Militia Department. Condition might be made which should be performed by the Department of Militia, but not a condition which would prevent the Minister of Militia, in any case, going to the Central Appeal Judge. They cannot do anything that puts it in the power of any one to prevent him appealing, but any other condition would be quite a fitting obligation.

Mr. PUGSLEY: They can take away the right of the public to appeal?

Mr. MEIGHEN: They can.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is putting him in a difficult position.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not contend they are in the same position, and I only say, in defence of that, that if we are to have regard to the working out of the British Act at all, and if we are sincere in our desire to get these men, the working out of the British Act has shown that it will not do to have the parties on a parity with regard to appeals to the final court—that there must be as much freedom of appeal on the part of the Militia Department as there was in Great Britain, which will enable them to go to the final court, thus assuring the uniformity of application everywhere, and securing the men. I do not contend that they are on a parity, but I say it is necessary that the free right of appeal should exist on the one hand, and I do not think it is necessary on the other.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: That is where we disagree. I do not know what the regulations may be, but I imagine that perhaps it might not be contemplated that the right of appeal from the appeal judge should exist as a matter of right. That is the party may be compelled to present a petition to a judge, making a prima facie case, giving some reasons why the appeal should be allowed. I can conceive of such regulations being made, but no further than that. In the case of the conscript, when he comes into court, they say to him, "You want to appeal? On what ground?" He may say, "I want to have a new witness," and he may be allowed to appeal upon certain conditions. But, on the other hand, the Minister of Justice walks in, without giving any reason at all, and says to the court, "I appeal this case, I have no reason to give;" —simply "I appeal." Notwithstanding what my hon. friend may say as to the necessity and advisability of administering this Act so as to get recruits, it is repulsive to one's sense of justice that one side should have more privileges than the other. All classes should be on a parity, and if one side has to fulfil conditions in order that he may be allowed to appeal, the other side should be placed in the same position. It seems to me, as the provision stands, it is against the rules of fairness, equity and justice.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The two are not on a parity, in the first place. The country is acting for everybody. The individual is acting for himself; and, in the next place, conditions might be imposed which would compensate the individual for the harassment of an unnecessary appeal, such as the provision that the conscript's expenses should be paid by the Crown. You could not, on the other hand, impose similar conditions on the public, because it would be immediately said, "You are making it possible for the rich man to appeal to the central judge, but you are making it impossible for the poor man." In a word, it is impossible to impose the same conditions on the individual as you may impose on the Militia Department. Consequently, as the conditions cannot be the same, the rights cannot be the same, because the individual is acting purely for himself. On the other hand, the Militia Department is acting for the whole country, and they do not start out on a parity.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: They do not start on a parity because the Minister of Militia has the whole Government behind him. It shows how necessary it is to protect the conscript. I am sorry I cannot convince my hon. friend. The argument is a strong one, and I shall have to press it again.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My right hon. friend will see that great difficulty might arise by reason of different views being entertained by different appeal judges in different parts of the country, and I think he will agree that it would be desirable to have some regulating authority by which uniformity of decision would be secured. That is the only purpose of this provision. So far as all these appeals are concerned, and indeed so far as the procedure before the tribunal of first instance is concerned, I hope the matter will so work out that there will not be all the formality of procedure that obtains in the disposition of civil trials in the courts. I would hope that the proceedings in the first instance and the appeals as well may be of the informal character that we see, for example, before the Board of Railway Commissioners. It is said that on one occasion some years ago a former chairman of the board saw certain men who had arrived to advocate the rights of some community in the country, and who had no lawyer with them. He said to them: "Come forward, gentlemen, and state your case. This is a catch-as-catch-can court.' These tribunals and appeal courts ought not to be impeded with legal quibbles or legal procedure. I hope they will be carried on in a very different manner. It would not be my disposition to surround any of these proceedings with strict legal formalities. I hope every man who may have a reasonable right of appeal will get his appeal and have it heard as quickly and expeditiously, and with as little technical procedure, as possible.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I have no objection to that. On the contrary, I am quite disposed to agree with my right hon. friend that these appeals should be as simple as possible, devoid of formality, going direct to the question to be decided and dispensing with law if possible. But in the Bill as it stands, the first appeal is without any formality at all; it is of the character represented by my right hon. friend. The conscript walks in before the judge and says:

"I appeal." He may say to the judge: "I have a witness whom I had not at a former trial, and I want to have him heard." But when you come to the second appeal, here is the condition which I read in the Bill:

> The Governor in Council, on the recommendation of the Central Appeal Judge, may make regulations governing the right to and fixing the conditions of appeal.

The very fact that the judge may make regulations governing the right of appeal nullifies the object my right hon. friend has just stated. At once there must be formalities. The judge makes regulations to limit the conscript's right to have his appeal. What are those regulations? I wish we knew them, but they are left to the judge. They may be of one character or of another character, but whatever they may be, I submit as a matter of equity, justice and fairness, that the rules which are imposed upon the conscript for the exercise of his right should also be imposed upon the Minister of Militia, and vice versa; otherwise, there is no equity in the matter at all.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Subsection 2 of section 10 provides for a stated case in the event of a disagrement between the two members of the local tribunal. Is that subsection complete in drafting, or is there some other section in the Bill, which I do not know of at the moment, which deals further with this matter?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Yes, section 7 says that the cases so stated shall be heard.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That is complete, yes.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Subsection 2 of section 10 provides that if there is a disagreement between the two members of the local tribunal, they shall state a case which they shall transmit to the registrar of the province in which the case arises. It is the duty of the registrar to turn that over to the appeal court, but there is no provision made for transmitting the evidence taken by the local tribunal along with the stated case. The evidence should go forward with the stated case, so that the court of appeal would have an opportunity of seeing what evidence was taken before the local tribunal in order to arrive at a decision.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: In stated cases, you do not require evidence.

Mr. MEIGHEN: A stated case would embrace such a summary of the evidence as would make the appeal intelligible to the appeal tribunal. We could not impose upon the local tribunal the necessity of including all the evidence in a stated case, because that would involve the necessity of all the evidence in every case being taken down in writing.

Mr. SINCLAIR: But nothing is said about the evidence going forward?

Mr. MEIGHEN: A stated case cannot be anything other than a statement of the evidence in the case, a short statement, signed by the two members of the tribunal of the facts as brought out in the evidence.

Mr. CARVELL: According to clause (b) of subsection 3, the central appeal judge makes regulations, and there is nothing in the clause as to who shall pay costs or what bonds shall be given, and so on; but the Minister of Militia has the absolute right in any case to appeal, and, of course, he has the whole consolidated revenue fund of Canada behind him, so that on his part there is no question of money. Has the minister ever considered the advisability of providing that if a man be in indigent circumstances and not able to defend the appeal, he may be alloted counsel or have his expenses paid? If the first appeal is decided in favour of the conscript, then as the laws stands, he is right. The Crown, with all of its power and money behind it says: We will not stand by this decision and we are going to appeal from it. It may be absolutely impossible for the poor man to follow that appeal and protect what may be his legal right, because up to that time we have to consider that he is right, as the court which this Bill creates says that he is right. While my hon friend may say: We shall leave it to the central appeal judge by regulation to say what the conditions shall be, it seems to me there ought to be in the Bill some direction to state the lines along which these regulations shall be framed, and that some protection should be thrown around the conscript by which, if he is not able himself to defend the appeal, the country should stand by him and see that he receives a fair trial on appeal.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: We want, of course, to give every man full opportunity to assert his rights; but on the other hand, it is not a desirable thing to have inserted in this Bill any such provision as would encourage frivolous appeals merely for the purpose of taking up time and preventing a man, if he is really liable for military service, from entering upon his duties as a soldier.

Mr. CARVELL: I am not objecting to the central appeal judge having the right to make the regulations governing the right of appeal, because that is where your frivolous objection comes in. But assuming that the Crown exercises the right of appeal, and the man has received a decision in his favour before the first tribunal, unless some means is provided he will be unable to follow up that appeal. He might have a perfectly just case, but, having no means to defend himself, the case would go against him.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I had that very case in contemplation, namely, an appeal by the Militia Department from the decision of the appeal tribunal. I can conceive that there would be cases where the central appeal judge would decide that equity demanded compensation to the individual who was brought before the central appeal judge or some other judge named by him.

Mr. CARVELL: Are you referring to the taxation of costs to the conscript after the appeal is heard?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is what I referred to.

Mr. CARVELL: I was referring to what might happen before the appeal was heard. If a conscript has no means he would never be able to get before the central appeal judge.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I was just proceeding to that. There might be a case where, owing to the capricious action of the official of the department, a man who was appealing a case might be put to an expense that he should not have been put to. That might very well be covered by regulation. I do not see how it could be covered by the Bill, because a great deal would have to be left to the central appeal judge himself. There might be cases where the individual might not be able to get to the central appeal judge or some other judge named by him, but those cases would likely be very few, because the central appeal judge has power to name some judge in British Columbia, Nova Scotia, and so on, to do the work for him, and consequently the expense could not be so great. It would appear to me best to leave to the central appeal judge the framing of the regulations under which indigent cases, so to call them, might be provided for. If we inserted in the Act a provision that a certain sum shall be lodged in the event of an appeal by the Militia Department we should be putting a very high premium on appeals beyond the tribunals. We want to discourage such appeals as much as possible. I do not see why the central appeal judge could not be trusted to work out some regulations for payment for the service of subpœnas and such other necessary costs as he might feel ought to be provided for, on the production of evidence of inability to pay on the part of the applicant.

Mr. CARVELL: I do not think my hon. friend is following me. I am not pleading for the applicant, but for the man who has received a decision in his favour from the tribunal, and against which decision the Crown has appealed. If this man has no means he is unable to carry on the case. My hon. friend does not live in a part of the country where they have a divorce court, and so he does not know what real justice is, but down in the Maritime Provinces we have a divorce court and the wife has a right to demand that the husband who is suing for divorce shall pay her costs day by day, or the case cannot go on. I think that might be done in this case where the Crown is appealing against the decision from a court below.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: That is not done in divorce cases alone. Sometimes an appeal is granted, by special leave, to the Privy Council upon condition that the appellant in any case shall pay the costs of the respondent. There might be regulations which would restrict the Minister of Militia in that way, and it may be very desirable that there should be such regulations to cover some cases; that is to say, if a case is decided against the Department of Militia by the tribunal, and it is desirable for the purpose of securing uniformity of decision in all the provinces that there shall be an appeal against that decision, it might be possible to provide that in any event the Minister of Militia shall pay the costs of that appeal.

Mr. CARVELL: That is what I am contending for.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It does not seem possible to provide for that in this Bill. It had better be left to regulation.

Mr. CARVELL: I do not care whether it is done by Bill or regulation, so long as I am assured that it will be done. But if it is not in the Bill it is possible that the central appeal judge might not consider it necessary to put it in the regulations, and in that case, although we all have the best intentions, the poor man would be without redress.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That clearly should be done by regulation. The appeal judge would consider the wisdom of such a course and what the costs should be.

Mr. McKENZIE: Do I understand that a man will be allowed to appeal from the decision of any army doctor? A doctor might pronounce him physically fit, but the man himself, guided by his own feelings or the advice of some other doctor, might declare that he was physically unfit. Could he appeal?

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is no appeal from the opinion of the army doctor as to physical fitness. The man would be in just the same position after the decision of the army doctor as he would be in to-day.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I have listened to the discussion and am unable to come to any conclusion whether or not the Government intends to give to the conscript the right of appeal to the Central Appeal Judge. I should have thought that the real object of having this appeal judge was to enable the Minister of Militia to get uniformity of decision throughout Canada. The Solicitor General has rather admitted that the regulations may take away the right of appeal altogether from the subject.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Except in certain cases.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Would those cases be appeals on question of fact or on questions of law? Reading the whole section one must be struck by the anomaly of it. Section 3 (a) says:

> Subject to the provisions of paragraph (b) of this subsection there shall be an appeal from any appeal tribunal to the Central Appeal Judge.

That clearly limits the right of appeal. It does not give what one would think was being given to the subject, namely, the right of appeal. Section 3 (b) says:

> The Governor in Council, on the recommendation of the Central Appeal Judge, may make regulations governing the right . . . . of appeal.

Under that, it seems to me that the judge can make such regulations as will actually deprive the subject of the right of appeal, either on a question of fact or on a question of law. It goes on:

> —provided any person authorized by the Minister of Militia and Defence may as of right enter and prosecute such appeal.

The effect of that is the regulations may absolutely deprive the subject of the right of appeal to the central judge. The Minister of Militia has an absolute right of appeal, which cannot be taken away from him under those regulations. I only wish to repeat what I said before, in the hope that some weight may be given to the suggestion. It is only adding to what has been said by my right hon. friend who sits on my left (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) that if a conscript has had a judgment of the local appeal tribunal in his favour, he ought not to be carried to the central appeal judge by the Minister of Militia, without some provision being made to reimburse him for his costs, in case the judgment appealed from should be sustained. My hon. friend says the desire is to discourage appeals, but, as has already been pointed out, it is not the case of the conscript appealing, but of the Minister of Militia not being satisfied with what might have been the judgment of two tribunals in favour of the subject and he still wants to carry the case to a higher court where the conscript may be absolutely unable to meet him by reason of his poverty—and where on account of the case being undefended, the Minister of Militia may get a judgment reversing the judgments of the inferior courts. This is contrary to the principles of natural justice, and should not be permitted. If the subject has a judgment of either one or two of these courts—appointed in the very careful way in which the Prime Minister says the tribunal is to be appointed—I say it is grossly unfair that the Minister of Militia should be permitted, as of right, to carry the case to a higher court without making any provision which would enable the poor boy—who possibly, is absolutely without means—to meet him in this higher court. There should be either an equal condition of affairs as between the subject and the Minister of Militia, or there should be, in the case of the minister appealing from the judgment of one or two of the inferior courts, some provision which would do justice to the conscript in the way of guarding him against the loss which he must necessarily sustain.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not disagree altogether with the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) that there will be cases of unfairness if entirely unrestrained by any condition the Minister of Militia were to have the free right of appeal against the judgment of the two courts below, but there is nothing in the Bill which says that he must have such right of appeal unrestrained. All I argue is that the central appeal judge can better frame the provisions which seem fair in his judgment—the conditions that must be lived up to by the Minister of Militia—before he allows an appeal of the Minister of Militia from the judgment of the lower courts.

Mr. CARVELL: According to subsection (b) the right of the minister to appeal is without condition.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The central appeal judge may make regulations governing the conditions upon which that right may be exercised. He cannot prevent the Minister of Militia from exercising it, but he can hedge it around with conditions which the minister must fulfil, such as, for instance, a provision for witness fees.

Mr. CARVELL: Or, depositing a sum of money for the costs?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Exactly. So that he is quite at liberty to protect the subject against embarrassment, so far as money can protect him.

Mr. CARVELL: Then, why not say so?

Mr. MEIGHEN: If my hon. friend can frame a clause which will take care of cases of that kind, I will be quite open to receive it.

Mr. CARVELL: I have it framed already.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I never claimed that exactly the same right of appeal rests on the one side as on the other. The Militia Department represents the whole people of Canada, and the individual represents himself. It is not a principle of law that the same right of appeal rests on both sides. Rights are presumed, and rights are granted under the common law of the land, in favour of the Crown, which the individual does not enjoy.

Mr. PUGSLEY: In what case? Will the minister give an instance?

Mr. MEIGHEN: In the collection of debts claimed by the Crown, the Crown has a right which the individual does not enjoy.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is very different.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Crown has the rights in this country and in Great Britain which the individual does not enjoy at all; and why? Because it is in the public interest. The Crown represents the people, whereas the individual represents himself. In a trial between two individuals there must be an absolute parity, but it cannot be in the interests of the State that in a contest between the State and the individual there should be a parity in all things. I contend those very principles should be embodied here.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: There was a time when the Crown had more rights than it has to-day.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Very true. It might be that, under this, regulations may be adopted whereby the consent of the appeal judge must be secured before an individual can take a case to the court of appeal. It might be, that consent would be called for where it was a question of law, but not of necessity, where it was a question of fact. Such restraints would be fair, reasonable and right, but you could not get uniformity if the same restraint were applied to the Militia Department.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The reason given by my hon. friend is that it is essential to have uniformity. That is not the reason at all.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is not the only one.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: It is the principal reason, as I have understood.

Mr. CARVELL: My hon. friend the Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen) wished to know how we could provide for what we are seeking. It seems to me that I would like to make this proposal.

Paragraph 3 (a) says:

> Subject to the provisions of paragraph (b) of this subjection there shall be an appeal from any appeal tribunal to the Central Appeal Judge.

I would suggest that at the end of that clause you put these words:

> Provided that if such appeal is prosecuted by the Minister of Militia the latter shall be required to deposit with the court such sum as the judge may direct to pay the costs of the respondent to such appeal.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That would not meet the very case that the hon. member has in mind. Where would the respondent get his money in the meantime to carry on his fight?

Mr. CARVELL: He knows that the Government is putting up the money and he will probably find some enterprising barrister who will help him.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will he not be just as well off if the regulations provide that if the cost of the appeal is harassing he will be recompensed?

Mr. CARVELL: If the minister will say that the regulations will contain that provision I am satisfied.

Mr. McKENZIE: If his right depends on his being successful, I do not know that there will be very much protection for him.

Mr. PUGSLEY: If he wins there is no provision by which he will get his costs. He may win in every court but the statute gives him no costs. I cannot see where, under the statute, the central appeal judge can make regulations which will give him his costs.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is the intention.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Then there should be an express provision to that effect. It does seem that the minister is carrying it too far when he says that the spirit of the statute is in the interest of the public and against the subject. Every statute passed for the protection of the subject is said to be in the interest of the public. Every criminal law is, and we know that the criminal law is always administered with the most tender regard for the subject. The subject is at an enormous disadvantage as against the Crown.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why then is the subject not given the same rights to challenge before the jury as the Crown is giving to stand aside jurors?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Because under the law of Canada there must be a unanimous verdict of the jury of twelve before a prisoner can be found guilty. That is an enormous advantage. That advantage has been taken away from the prisoner in many countries, amongst others in the United States, because in some of the states nine jurors can find a prisoner guilty. In this country there must be a unanimous verdict.

Mr. DOHERTY: The verdict has to be unanimous here either for conviction or acquittal.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is absurd; if the jury do not find a unanimous verdict against the prisoner they are discharged after a reasonable time and the man goes free.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What about a disagreement? They might bring in a disagreement. It is just as fair for one as the other. But as to the right of challenge, the advantage is given to the Crown in every trial.

Mr. PUGSLEY: No.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It has the right to stand aside jurors.

Mr. PUGSLEY: In a capital case, a case of murder, the prisoner can challenge twelve jurymen and the Crown can only challenge three. Is that not so, Mr. Minister?

Mr. DOHERTY: I do not think those figures are correct.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Crown can stand aside a hundred if it likes.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The Crown simply stands aside so many until the panel has been gone over, but when the clerk begins again to call the panel the Crown has a limited right of challenge. I think it has only one-third or one-fourth the right of the prisoner.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The right of the Crown to stand aside jurors is practically an unlimited right in Manitoba and other provices and it gives an enormous advantage to the Crown. That principle pervades our civil as well as our criminal law. How could it be contended that the two stand on a parity before the court?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Any man who has had anything to do with the administration of the criminal law will recognize that the law is always tender and merciful to the accused. He is deemed to be innocent until proved guilty. He is given the right to challenge twenty jurors while the Crown has only the right to challenge three. There must be a unanimous verdict of guilty before the prisoner can be found guilty and condemned to punishment. The Crown has a most tender regard for the rights of the subject and the reason is that the subject is at an enormous disadvantage. In this case, here is the Minister of Militia with all the power and authority of the Crown, and with all the money of the treasury at his back, with power to employ counsel and to call witnesses from all over the country, while the subject, the conscript, who may be without money, notwithstanding that he may have got judgment in two courts, may be dragged to Ottawa, before the central appeal judge without any provision for the payment of his witness or counsel, or even his travelling expenses. That is placing the subject at an enormous disadvantage and it is contrary to the spirit which hitherto has animated Parliament in connection with any Bill that I have ever known to be passed.

Mr. CARVELL: I did not intend, as was suggested by my hon. friend from Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie), that this sum of money would only go to the respondent in case he won. The amendment was drafted very hurriedly but my intention was to so draft the clause that this would be a sum of money set aside to pay his costs, win or lose. If he loses the Crown gets his body. It is only to put an indigent person in a position to defend himself.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It applies to every case whether he is rich or poor.

Mr. CARVELL: Certainly. I take the ground that if the Crown appeals a second time and the respondent has the decision below, the Crown should pay the costs of the appeal.

Mr. J. A. DESCARRIES (translation): Mr. Chairman, I approve the suggestion made by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean). Since the Minister of Militia who, in the main, is the Government, is not obliged to make a deposit in order to proceed with his appeal, it seems to me there is no reason to compel the appellant, who believes himself wronged by conscription, to make a deposit as a security for his appeal costs. Otherwise, it would be debarring from their right to appeal a large number of people who might think they had been wronged by the local tribunal's decision. There will certainly be appellants among those who will be in the first class and there will also be in that class young men twenty years old. Now, I wish to point out that, in the province of Quebec, a youth of twenty is a minor, that consequently, he has no rights, or responsibilities, in order to obtain money. He cannot legally contract a bond or a security in order to make a cash deposit to allow him to appeal. I will go further and say that the greater part of these young men are absolutely resourceless. Then, do I ask, how could these young men appeal when they feel they are wronged, if they are deprived of all means to do so?

Would there not be some way of protecting these young people, who are at the start of life, who have no earthly possessions and not even the legal capacity to contract, would there not be some means of giving them at least the right of appeal of course without any expensive procedure, of paying only their witness costs, in fine, that they be only liable for those things which they would absolutely be obliged to do for themselves? I make this suggestion in order to protect this most interesting class of young men, the first youth of the country who are to be called upon to fight for the protection of our rights. Therefore, at least, let those who would believe they are injured by conscription have a chance to appeal to the highest tribunal and to do so in a practical manner, that is to say, let us afford them the means of doing it without compelling them to fill certain conditions which they are unable to fulfil.

Hon. Mr. DOHERTY: I may say, in reply to the hon. gentleman that it has already been stated that there is no intention whatever to exact deposits as conditions for appealing. In the next place, the terms to be laid down must be couched in the form of regulations which will be prepared by or at the suggestion of the court itself (Central Appeal judge). I believe we may depend upon the court and that they will not attempt to lay down conditions which the appellants would be unable to comply with. If we can trust the court as regards the settlement of the main issue, it seems to me we should be thoroughly satisfied that they would not impose conditions which the appellants could not possibly meet.

At all events, hon. members have suggested the imposing of conditions upon the Minister of Militia, as to the costs and expense, but there is in the Act nothing to suggest that pecuniary conditions would be imposed upon the appellants.

Mr. DESCARRIES: I have perfect confidence in the decision to be rendered by the tribunals as to the merits of the appeal, but as to the conditions we do not know what they may be. It is perfectly possible that the appeal judges impose as a preliminary condition of such an appeal, a deposit, a security of some sort, or such other conditions which would be so burdensome that those parties of whom I was just speaking, those twenty year old minors, would not be able to meet them, it would be like shutting the door upon them. It seems to me that Parliament, that the members have the right to know whether the conditions to be imposed by the judges and ratified by the Governor General in Council, shall be burdensome to such parties or shall give them the opportunity to appeal.

Mr. McKENZIE: This Parliament and all parliaments have been in the habit of enacting substantive law by the Act itself and not leaving it to regulations to be dealt with in regulations. In subsection (b) of section 3 the Solicitor General is departing from the ordinary rule and leaving the enacting of substantive law to regulation.

The right of appeal is substantive law. How we shall get to the court of appeal, etc., is a matter of regulation, but the right of appeal is substantive and should be enacted by this Parliament. While I am very anxious that everyone should have all proper rights of appeal, my criticism of this Act is that it provides for too many courts, and none of them strong. It would be better to have a court of first resort stronger than any courts I have heard mentioned yet, and let that be the end of it. The matters that go to that court are covered by subsections (a) (b) and (c) of section 11. The county court judge and another man sitting with him will not be a strong court to deal with the subjects that must necessarily come under those sub-sections, and it would be better to have a strong court of first instance composed of men capable of dealing with this broad subject. I would say, let that strong court deal with it once for all, and do not let us have this irritating condition of going from one weak court to another. I am not reflecting in any way upon the capacity of judges; but these are not matters of law; they are matters of the common utilities of the country, and a judge is no better able to deal with them than anybody else. If the plan I have suggested were adopted, there would be less irritation, less trouble and a better administration of justice.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Reverting to the question of challenge, I find that a person charged with an offence punishable with death is entitled to challenge peremptorily twenty jurors and the Crown only four, not three as I said.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I quite agree that in regard to challenge more liberty is given to the accused, because the right of telling jurors to stand aside is practically unlimited on the part of the Crown, and is a very powerful weapon. It must be remembered that those provisions are modified by provincial legislation, at least on the point of standing aside.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The right to stand aside continues only until the panel is exhausted. The provincial legislature in the constitution of the court may increase the number of jurors; perhaps that is what my hon. friend refers to, as that increases the number who may be stood aside. But that is only until the panel is exhausted, whereas the prisoner's right is to challenge peremptorily, and, in addition, he can challenge for cause.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I understood from the Minister of Justice that the appellant would not be obliged to make a deposit in order to make his appeal good. Am I right?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not the individual.
