House of Commons Debates

OFFICIAL REPORT

Friday, June 8, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

FIRST READING OF SENATE BILLS.

Bill No. 70, for the relief of Colin Darrach Poole.—Mr. Clarke (Essex).

Bill No. 71, for the relief of Thomas Edwin Jory.—Mr. Nickle.

Bill No. 72, for the relief of Florence Evaline Snyder Lockwood.—Mr. Kay.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill No. 47, to facilitate certain financial arrangements between the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and The Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and for other purposes.—Sir Thomas White.

Bill No. 57, to amend The Business Profits War Tax Act, 1916.—Sir Thomas White.

Bill No. 69, to repeal the Ocean Telegraph Act.—Mr. Hazen.

Bill No. 67, to amend the Customs Act.—Mr. Reid.

CHINESE IMMIGRATION BILL.

On motion of Hon. W. J. ROCHE (Minister of the Interior), Bill No. 42, to amend the Chinese Immigration Act, was read the second time, and the House went into Committee on the Bill, Mr. Blain in the Chair.

On Section 1, Clergymen and students to be exempt from tax.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Has the Minister of the Interior received from the government of the province of British Columbia protest against this Bill?

Mr. ROCHE: No, there have been no protests.

Mr. LEMIEUX: There has been no correspondence?

Mr. ROCHE: Not that I am aware of.

Mr. MACDONALD: Can the minister tell us the language of the original statute in reference to this matter?

Mr. ROCHE: I have not the statute before me.

Mr. MACDONALD: Has the minister received from the coal mine proprietors of British Columbia, or any other employers of labour in British Columbia, any request for permission to bring in oriental labour?

Mr. ROCHE: Yes, there have been several requests made on behalf of certain employers of labour, in British Columbia, in the central provinces, and I think in the eastern provinces, asking that Chinese labour should be brought in, but the Government has not seen its way clear to adopt a policy of that kind under existing circumstances.

Mr. MACDONALD: What do these people say?

Mr. ROCHE: Some of the requests were to the effect that we should bring them in practically under an arrangement by which a guarantee was to be given that after the war was over they should be returned to their own country, but we did not think it was wise at the present time to adopt such a policy.

Mr. MACDONALD: Have there been many requests of that nature?

Mr. ROCHE: Not very many, possibly four or five, and certainly not in excess of half a dozen.

Mr. PUGSLEY: By whom were these requests made, and for what purpose?

Mr. ROCHE: There may have been some request made from the miners, I am not certain as to that. There was a deputation here about a week ago, consisting of members of the Board of Trade of Vancouver, who made a suggestion of that nature. Then one or two parties sent communications to the department; I cannot recollect their names, but I think some of this correspondence emanated from those who are not employers of labour, and not particularly interested, but making a suggestion that it would be wise to adopt such a policy in view of the scarcity of labour.

Mr. KNOWLES: Will the minister tell us the provisions of the present legislation, and what changes are made by this measure? I understood students were admitted free heretofore?

Mr. ROCHE: No. I explained the matter when the Bill was read the first time. At present students are admitted into Canada by paying a head tax of $500, but upon producing proof of having attended an educational institute recognized in Canada, they are refunded the head tax when leaving the country.

Considerable objection to the payment of the head tax has been made on behalf of Chinese students entering Canada. Chinese students are allowed free entry into the United States for the purpose of attending educational institutions. Many of these students, having had the benefit of the educational institutions of the United States, become missioneries for that country in the commercial world. At the earnest request made by quite a number of persons in Canada during the last few years, we have decided to include Chinese students in the class exempted from the head tax. In the existing Act, clergymen are not specifically included in the class exempted; this, I believe, was an oversight, because clergymen's families have been admitted free of head tax. We are now, therefore, specifically mentioning clergymen, as well as students, as exempt. Our practice in the past has been to collect a head tax upon the entry of Chinese students into Canada, the amount of the tax being refunded upon the production of satisfactory evidence of attendance at Canadian educational institutions.

Mr. KNOWLES: Does the department now admit the sons of resident Chinese without the payment of head tax?

Mr. ROCHE: Yes.

Mr. KNOWLES: I understand that sons of Chinese restaurant keepers have to pay the head tax, while sons of Chinese merchants are admitted free.

Mr. ROCHE: If they come in for any purpose other than that of attending educational institutions, the head tax is imposed.

Mr. KNOWLES: I believe that a distinction is drawn between the sons of restaurant keepers and the sons of merchants.

Mr. ROCHE: The Act provides:

[Mr. Roche.]

Every person of Chinese origin, irrespective of allegiance, shall pay into the consolidated revenue fund of Canada, on entering Canada, at the port or place of entry, a tax of five hundred dollars, except the following persons, who shall be exempt from such payment, that is to say:

(a) The members of the diplomatic corps, or other government representatives, their suites and their servants, and consuls and consular agents;

(b) The children born in Canada of parents of Chinese origin and who have left Canada for educational or other purposes, on substantiating their identity to the satisfaction of the controller at the port or place where they seek to enter on their return;

(c) Merchants, their wives and children, the wives and children of clergymen—

It will be observed that the Act does not mention clergymen, and that is why I am making provision for that in the present Act. The section continues:

—tourists, men of science and students, who shall substantiate their status to the satisfaction of the controller, subject to the approval of the minister, or who are bearers of certificates of identity, or other similar documents issued by the Government or by a recognized official or representative of the Government whose subjects they are, specifying their occupation and their object in coming into Canada.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Would the provisions relating to clergymen include those Chinese clergymen who teach the religion of Confucius?

Mr. ROCHE: I am not confident as to that. I should think that it includes all recognized clergymen.

Mr. OLIVER: The purpose of the existing Act is to keep out of Canada people of Chinese origin. I have not heard the minister give any good reason why the proposed amendment with regard to Chinese students should be made. Such a suggestion was made when the original Bill was before the House, but it was then considered, in view of the difficulty which would probably arise in enforcing the Act according to its intent, that it was better not to leave such a loophole. Accordingly it was provided that Chinese persons who desired to avail themselves of the advantages of education in Canada should comply with the law respecting the admission of Chinese, and that, upon satisfactory proof of their having availed themselves of those advantages, their money would be returned. While under present circumstances this question is not as pressing as it was when the original Act was passed, I submit that this is not the time to make alterations in the letter, spirit or principle of the Act without good and sufficient cause, which, I submit, in this case has not been shown. As to the admission of clergymen, the member for Rouville asked a simple and appropriate question which the minister was not in a position to answer. I submit that the minister should not bring forward legislation in regard to which he is not able to give clear and direct information, especially in a matter so important as this.

Mr. ROCHE: I understand that all clergymen are admitted under the existing Act.

Mr. OLIVER: The question was asked if the priests of the sect of Confucius would, under this provision, be admitted into Canada without the payment of head tax.

Mr. ROCHE: That particular point has not been brought to my attention. I assume that the word "clergyman" covers all clergymen.

Mr. OLIVER: Then the committee is to understand that priests of the sect of Confucius are entitled to free entry into Canada?

Mr. ROCHE: I have no information to the contrary.

Mr. OLIVER: The minister should not bring forward this Bill unless he is in a position to answer a very obvious question which has an important bearing upon the sufficiency and efficiency of the proposed legislation.

Mr. ROCHE: I am not sure that the matter is of such vital importance, but if the hon. member considers that the passage of the whole Bill depends upon that point, I am quite willing to allow the Bill to stand until we get the information. I can supply the information before the third reading of the Bill.

Mr. KNOWLES: It is not a question as to the passing of the Bill: we are in committee now, and this is the time for the furnishing of such details. A great deal depends on what proportion of the Chinese population comes under the heading of priests. For all we know, half the laundrymen and cooks in China may be priests. It is important that we know, therefore, what is the numerical extent of this class of the Chinese people to whom we are opening our doors without requiring from them the payment of head tax. The words "Confucian clergyman" should be defined before we say that every person of that class should be admitted free.

Mr. ROCHE: Under the existing Act the families of clergymen are admitted and in practice clergymen have been admitted, but owing to the fact, as I have pointed out, that in the exempting clause the word "clergymen" is not used, but only the words "clergyman's family," it has been decided to insert the word "clergyman" so that there will be no danger of any broader meaning being attached to the term than there is in practice under the existing Act. That point, therefore, need not delay the passage of this Bill through the committee stage.

Mr. KNOWLES: So far as we know, Chinese clergymen may indulge in celibacy just as the Roman Catholic priests, and it might be better to have some further information with regard to these gentlemen.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I think the minister is wrong in saying that this will not give a wider opportunity of admitting Chinamen. At the present time, if a clergyman comes into Canada, he pays the head tax of $500, but after he is here, his family can be admitted free. It is now proposed to broaden this provision so as to allow the clergymen to come in free. That is quite a serious departure from the provisions of the present Bill.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Is my hon. friend afraid of being proselytized by these clergymen?

Mr. PUGSLEY: For many years, the Minister of Trade and Commerce has been persistent in the laudable effort of sending missionaries to China. Now I suppose he is anxious to bring Chinese missionaries to Canada. Is that the reason for this change? I think some stronger reason should be given than has yet been given by the minister for making this change as to:

> Students coming to Canada for the purpose of securing a higher education in any Canadian college or university or other educational institution approved by the minister.

Is that not going to create a good deal of trouble and dissatisfaction? When do students cease to be exempt? Is it when they attend common schools? Supposing a student absents himself from school or college in order to engage in mercantile work, saying, that when he gets a little older and makes some money he will return to college will he cease to be exempt? Many hardship might arise. Just at the present moment I am not prepared to say whether it is desirable to admit students without the payment of head tax. The present law is good; the payment of the head tax is exacted, but after a student has engaged in his studies and has received proper certificates, that head tax is refunded, I suppose, when he is prepared to return to China. The idea is to admit students for the purpose of receiving a higher education; they are not to settle in this country, but are to return to China. I am afraid there would be a good deal of trouble working out paragraph 7 in reference to students.

Mr. ROCHE: In the working out of this legislation, I do not think there will be any more trouble than in working out the existing Act. We are simply allowing the students who come in under the existing Act to come in without paying the head tax. We are not broadening the meaning attached to the word "student." The interpretation placed upon that word will be exactly the interpretation placed upon it in the operation of the existing Act. One reason why I thought it was right to introduce this change was because of the large number of requests I have been receiving for several years past to have students admitted free. Those requests have come from members of the hon. gentleman's party as well as from hon. members on this side; they have come from leagues that have been established in Canada, and I have received requests and petitions from different public bodies in Canada. At the present time I do not remember a single protest from any public body or any private individual that we should not enact such a law, and I think I can call to my aid the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald), who, at an earlier part of the session, strongly urged some action of this nature to be taken, and I assured him that it was my intention to introduce legislation of this character. He instanced the case of a Chinese student who had to pay a head tax, and I told him that in order to correct such instances in the future, it was my intention to bring in legislation at this session. Although this Bill has been on the Order Paper for quite a long time, no protests have been made against it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Under paragraph 7 when would a student, or a person coming to Canada for the purpose of being a student, be liable to paying the head tax, and under what circumstances? This paragraph does not say that he shall actually continue in seeking an education. It says:

> Students coming to Canada for the purpose of securing a higher education.

[Mr. Pugsley.]

A student might come to Canada intending to enter college two or three years after his arrival. There is no provision that he must actually begin his studies within a reasonable time.

Mr. ROCHE: The situation in that respect is exactly as it is at the present time.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The difference is this, that at present he pays his head tax at the start, and after that he must have pursued his studies regularly in order to obtain a refund. Under this legislation, you let him into the country free, and the question is: How are you going to get him out again, or how are you going to make him pay the head tax if he ceases to be a student? You exempt him if he comes into Canada for the purpose of securing a higher education.

Mr. ROCHE: If the hon. gentleman will read section 2, subsection 7 (a), he will see that the person ceasing to belong to one of the exempt classes is liable to the head tax. The subsection reads:

> Any person admitted as exempt from the tax and who ceases to belong to one of the exempt classes shall be required to pay into the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada the tax of $500.

Mr. PUGSLEY: A young man would not cease to be exempt as long as he had the intention of becoming a student.

Mr. ROCHE: If he goes into a trade or occupation, a person engaging in which is liable to the imposition of the head tax, then he becomes liable to that head tax, and under subsection 7 (a):

> If the person refuses or fails to pay the tax, he shall be deported, at his own expense if able to pay, and if not, at the expense of His Majesty.

Therefore, any of these men coming in under the existing Act for the purpose of attending an educational institution of Canada that is recognized by the department shall not be called upon to pay the head tax. In that respect he is in exactly the same position as he is in under the present Act, with the exception of paying the head tax, and should he cease to be in one of the exempt classes, for instance, should he engage in laundry business, or anything of that nature, he would become liable to the head tax.

Mr. KNOWLES: Is there any machinery for keeping track of these Chinese students?

Mr. ROCHE: There is no trouble in keeping track of them. We have our immigration officials.

Mr. KNOWLES: The minister is optimistic.

Mr. MARCIL: Are these people required to report to the department as to their residence and the institutions they attend?

Mr. ROCHE: Certainly.

Mr. MARCIL: Do they report to the department periodically?

Mr. ROCHE: We have a record of what institutions they attend.

Mr. MACDONALD: The minister mentioned my having brought up a matter with regard to this legislation at an earlier stage in the session. The minister will recall the case that I brought to his attention at that time, namely the case of a young man who was the son of Mr. Corsbie, who had originally been born in China, but who had been educated in Canada and had gone to Trinidad. This gentleman was a British subject; his son had come to Canada for the purpose of getting an education, and his case was not that of a Chinese person in the sense in which the term is used in this legislation. When this Bill came up a few minutes ago I asked the minister if he had the statute before him, so that we might know exactly what was the legislation on this subject. Confusion and difficulty arose in the case of this young man, who was a British subject, and the circumstances of his treatment were unfortunate. Complaint was made by many clergymen interested in the matter, and the case attracted special attention by reason of the fact that the father of the young man was a commissioner to the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in Canada. I mentioned at the time that it would be well for the Government to deal with this question. I would like to know what the minister says on the point raised by the hon. member for St. John.

Mr. ROCHE: The case to which the hon. member refers was that of a young man who was subject to the head tax under the statute which I read a few moments ago. The statute applies to "every person of Chinese origin," and as this young man was of Chinese origin he was properly subjected to the head tax.

Mr. PUGSLEY: As I recollect the case, while the young man had been a resident of China he was a native of Trinidad and a British subject, both his father and mother being British subjects, but it happened that his grandfather on one side, was a Chinaman. For this reason the absurd contention was made by the department that he was "of Chinese origin." It would be as reasonable to say that a Canadian one of whose grandfathers was born in Ireland was of Irish origin.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: What is the meaning of "origin"?

Mr. PUGSLEY: It depends on how far you go back.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Would it be the same as "descent"?

Mr. PUGSLEY: No, clearly not. This young man was a British subject and born in a British country, and therefore was of British origin. If the boy's father and mother had been Chinese it might be said that he was of Chinese origin. But this section does not profess to deal with the special case of one who may have had a Chinese ancestor, yet it opens the door wide to young men from China to come into Canada without paying the head tax by saying that they are coming to this country for the purpose of securing a higher education. Under any fair or reasonable interpretation of this section, a boy from China coming to Canada, attending a common school and then afterwards getting employment on a farm or in a shop in order to earn money to put him through college would be complying with this law. He would have the intention of entering a university—he comes to Canada "for the purpose of securing a higher education." There may be great trouble and dissatisfaction unless you surround this provision with safeguards. The person concerned should satisfy some official as to his position, or otherwise we may have a great deal of trouble. I think it better, on the whole, to leave the section as it is.

Mr. ROCHE: The hon. gentleman seems to be conjuring up imaginary difficulties that, up to the present, have not been met with. The existing Act has no safeguard as to the time within which one affected by this section shall attend college. The only safeguard is the head tax of $500. Under the operation of the Act, the party concerned would be expected to enter college within a reasonable time—almost immediately upon coming to Canada; otherwise, he would not be allowed to remain in Canada unless by payment of the head tax. The effect of this change is only to waive the head tax under certain conditions, and I do not anticipate any trouble.

Mr. KNOWLES: The difference between the existing condition of affairs and what the minister proposes is so great that it looks as if he were opening the gates very wide. He says that at present there is no safeguard other than that which will exist in the future. There is the safeguard of the $400 having been deposited. At present, the onus of proof is on the alleged student, but under the change proposed by the minister the department will have to make the case against the man who enters with an expectation which he does not fulfill. This affects more particularly the province of British Columbia. I see in his place an hon. member who has made rather a specialty of "A White British Columbia." I would ask my hon. friend from Victoria (Mr. Barnard) whether this legislation is such as will be considered desirable by those who wish to perpetuate a white British Columbia. He has, no doubt, full information as to the local circumstances and as to what is desired by the people of his province.

Mr. BARNARD: So far as I understand the situation, I do not think this matter has been very much considered in British Columbia. Certainly, there has been no protest against it that I have heard of. I do not think the proposed change will do much harm, but, on the other hand, I do not think it will do much good—it is rather innocuous.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The hon. member (Mr. Barnard) is taking a very safe line. I can remember the day when he was more outspoken. I am glad to see him here, and also to see the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Taylor), though both are silent to-day. When the present leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfred Laurier) was at the head of the Government, he increased the head tax from $100 to $500 in response to the sentiment created in British Columbia against oriental immigration. Some months or years afterwards the whole of the Conservative party in that province declared for a policy of exclusion of oriental immigration. I remember that my hon. and genial friend from Victoria was elected on the strength of a certain telegram, which afterwards proved to be a forgery, and he was too much of a gentleman to have benefited by that telegram. But it is a well known fact that the whole of the Conservative party in British Columbia was apparently deadly opposed to oriental immigration.

If in those days any one had made the loophole that is being made to-day in the law, we would have heard my hon. friend from Victoria (Mr. Barnard) and my hon. friend from New Westminster (Mr. Taylor) blaming the Government for their action. This is the second time that a question like this has come up in this House within a few days. I regret not to see the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Stevens) in his seat. He was very outspoken about the question of Japanese immigration. I remember that in the House he censured me because I had negotiated an arrangement, or a treaty, with the Japanese Government concerning a restricted number of immigrants to Canada. Yet, a few years afterwards, the treaty was renewed and it was renewed with a feather in the cap of the Japanese Consul at Ottawa. I forget the terms of the letters which were exchanged between the right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) and the Japanese Consul, but it is a fact that the Japanese Consul got the better of the Prime Minister and got better terms than the Japanese Government had obtained before that time.

The other day we were told by the Prime Minister that the question of Hindu immigration was a live one at the Imperial Conference, and that some way or other, Hindu immigration would become the problem of to-morrow as between the various portions of the Empire. What does that mean? It means that if we do not look after our own business primarily and chiefly, we are going to have very serious problems introduced into our national life. I do not blame the right hon. gentleman for having taken part in the proceedings of the Imperial Conference but as a result of that conference, and as a result of the presence of Hindu representatives, Canada, before many months, surely before many years, will have to face a policy of oriental immigration from India. I would like to know where the party of a white British Columbia will be then. We do not hear from the representatives of British Columbia and I think I voice the sentiments of British Columbia to-day when I protest against any loophole being put in the restrictions which have been embalmed in the statute-book. Nobody complains to-day of the restrictions which were imposed upon the Japanese labour immigration, although we were taunted and taken to task by hon. gentlemen opposite, when we brought that agreement from Japan. It was a wise arrangement, it was a good one; yet we were blamed by the hon. member for Victoria, the hon. member for New Westminster and the gentlemen who today represent the province of British Columbia. They were elected on a platform of an exclusive white British Columbia and yet to-day they stand for the policy which is being initiated by the present Government. They stand for Hindu immigration in the near future. They stand for a more liberal treaty with Japan and for a more liberal interpretation of the statute which restricts Chinese immigration. I now speak for British Columbia and I ask hon. gentlemen to stand by their policy and principles of a few years ago.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR (New Westminster): I have great pleasure in answering the challenge of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lemieux). The Conservative party of British Columbia stand to-day where they have always stood on the subject of Oriental immigration. As to the remarks of the hon. gentleman about the lack of discussion the other day on the subject of the participation in the Imperial Conference of our Indian fellow-subjects, one would think that the reason for that would appeal to the hon. gentleman, the same as the reason for abstention from harsh discussion of Japanese ambitions might also appeal to the hon. gentleman and some of his friends. It seems to me that it would be well that we should try to cement our alliance with the friends of the Empire and secure from some of these Allies the assistance in fighting the battles of the Empire, which is refused to us in other quarters where we have a right to expect it. So far as I am concerned, I welcome the presence of our Indian soldiers on the fields of Flanders and of France. I welcome the presence of the Japanese fleet on the Pacific ocean to supply the deficiencies which the lack of a naval policy on the part of the hon. gentleman and his colleagues produced on the Pacific ocean.

Mr. OLIVER: Oh, no.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What about those submarines?

Mr. TAYLOR: I ask the hon. gentleman: What about those submarines?

Mr. PUGSLEY: They were bought under the Canadian Naval Act.

Mr. TAYLOR: Is there any other meaning to the hon. gentleman's question?

Mr. PUGSLEY: They were bought under the Canadian Naval Act.

Mr. TAYLOR: Is that all there is to the question?

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is all.

Mr. TAYLOR: I will very willingly discuss the submarines with the hon. gentleman.

Mr. KNOWLES: You may know something about them that we do not.

Mr. TAYLOR: If hon. gentlemen are finished, although I do not blame them for being a little bit uneasy at what they have invited, I would like to tell them the difference between the condition of affairs with respect to the Chinese Exclusion Act at the time they were in power and the present. We found that when hon. gentlemen were in power the exemptions under the Act were made the instruments, not of keeping Chinese out of Canada, but of bringing them into Canada under the pretence of a right of exemption when they had no such right, upon paying a toll of $100 secretly instead of the $500 to be paid openly, four-fifths of which $100 went, as shown by the evidence before the commissioner, to the campaign fund of the Liberal party. We have confidence that under the present Administration the use of the Chinese exemption clause to provide funds for party purposes has become a thing of the past. I know of no reason why Chinese who desire to be educated in the universities of Canada should not have the privilege of being educated in those institutions, and it is because of my belief that that is the honest intention of this amendment, and not that it is opening the door to the surreptitious entry of Chinese for the benefit of some grafters in British Columbia that I am content to accept the Bill.

Whenever I find that this exemption is being used as the exemptions were used during the regime of hon. gentlemen opposite, then they may depend upon it that I shall be quite as vigorous in calling attention to it as I ever was in calling attention to the abuse of Chinese or other oriental immigration. In the meantime, the Chinese, like the Japanese and Hindoos, are very valuable Allies of the British cause, the Canadian cause. They are, in very large numbers, coming forward for the purpose of serving as labourers in France, and the Chinese Government is showing every disposition to assist in every possible way the cause of the Allies in contributing of the labour of their country. It does seem to me that with respect to the Chinese in a smaller degree as with respect to the Japanese and Hindoos in a larger degree, all those people are entitled during these times of the stress of war to a little more consideration than we owed to them in times of peace.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I have been expecting some hon. gentleman opposite to rise in his place and express the fact that he was terribly shocked and horror stricken at the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Taylor), at this time of stress introducing petty, party politics.

The hon. gentleman speaks of graft and makes charges against the Liberal party—and the hon. gentleman is a colonel too, and one of the political colonels of whom we in this Parliament are so proud.

Mr. TAYLOR: I rise to a question of privilege. The hon. gentleman says, in what I would not call a sneering manner, because it is not parliamentary to use that term, but I cannot find the proper word to express it—but the hon. gentleman challenges my being a member of His Majesty's army. I wish to know if that is the position of the loyal Opposition in this House, that it has become a crime to become a member of His Majesty's army?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I would not suggest that for a single moment. What I rose especially to do was to express my profound astonishment that gentlemen on the other side of the House had not risen in their places and protested against the hon. gentleman introducing petty, party politics during this time when the attention of Parliament should be directed to greater issues. If gentlemen on this side were to follow that hon. gentleman, we might get into a discussion which would be exceedingly unpleasant and exceedingly out of place. I should think that a member of this House, and particularly one who wears His Majesty's uniform, should be rather above that sort of thing at the present time.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I wish to understand my hon. friend's position. My understanding of what he said was this, that he rose to express his profound astonishment that no one on this side protested against my hon. friend from New Westminster introducing petty, party politics.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Yes.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend from New Westminster was on his feet for the first time in making the remarks to which we have just listened. He had not sat down before the hon. gentleman (Mr. Pugsley), instead of allowing anybody on this side to make a protest, got up to draw a red herring across the trail.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) knows well enough that if he, as acting leader of the House, had risen and asked his hon. friend to refrain from the unseemly conduct in which he was indulging, it would have at once produced a proper result. My hon. friend from New Westminster says that the Japanese are giving great aid in this war, that the people of China are also giving aid to the Allies, that our Indian fellow subjects are giving great aid to the Empire. That is all true, but they are giving it under the present law which contains restrictions against which there has been no very strong complaint so far, and what I think is that the minister should leave the law with regard to China just as it is. If, by reason of the present condition of affairs, the door is opened wider and young men from China are induced to come in, and then if it is thought they are not as steadily pursuing their studies as assiduously as it might be expected, they are deported from this country, it will provoke ill feeling which would be of very great disadvantage in the future. We ought not to go too far. A few years ago, a great many people were coming from China and from Japan and from India, and a great deal of feeling was created particularly among people who said that British Columbia should be kept as a country of white people.

Mr. BURNHAM: Would the hon. gentleman object to their entrance into this country if they really did come as bona fide students?

Mr. PUGSLEY: The present law does not inflict any special hardship. It provides that Chinese youths coming to Canada for the purpose of obtaining an education, attending a university or other educational institution approved by the minister, after their studies have been concluded can make an application and get back a refund of the $500 head tax which they paid on entering the country. No strong complaint has been raised against that.

Mr. ROCHE: Yes, there has.

Mr. PUGSLEY: And it is well not to open the door too widely. If you do, there is likely to result very considerable dissatisfaction in the future.

Mr. ROCHE: Can my hon. friend tell the House whether the United States has been injured or benefited by the free entry of Chinese students to attend the educational institutions of the United States?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I am not prepared to speak as to that. I do know that along the Pacific coast of the United States there has been a great deal of dissatisfaction by reason of oriental immigration, so much so that the Legislature of California has passed laws which have provoked very great irritation and have caused the greatest possible friction between the Legislature and the people of California and the Government and Congress of the United States. I know that much, but what has caused it I do not know beyond the fact that it has been felt that there has been too much oriental immigration into the western coast states of the United States of America. Just a word with regard to the remark of my hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) as to the criticism which was levelled at the late Government when a rather liberal arrangement, but at the same time a fair arrangement, was made between the Government of Canada and the Imperial Government of Japan. This Government was very bitterly criticised by Conservative members from British Columbia by reason of that arrangement. The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Taylor) speaks of what has happened to-day, that Japanese cruisers have helped to protect the Pacific coast. Well, that shows how foresighted was my right hon. friend who was then the leader of the Government (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), because I well remember that in this House, when he was seeking to defend the action of the Government in making this arrangement with the Japanese Government, he said that the time might come when the ships of Japan would be riding side by side with the ships of Canada in defence of the cities and coasts of British Columbia.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Who said that?

Mr. PUGSLEY: My right hon. friend the present leader of the Opposition and then the leader of the Liberal Government (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). He was laughed at by hon. gentlemen opposite when he made that prophecy. That prophecy came true, because there is no doubt that a Japanese cruiser was in the Pacific ocean prepared to co-operate with the ships of Great Britain and the smaller ships of Canada which were available, and this probably prevented an attack being made upon the coast cities. The important question, after all, is whether we shall broaden and extend the opportunities for oriental immigration into Canada. I do not think we ought to do so, but I think, by this paragraph, the minister is opening a very wide door, which is likely to lead to extreme dissatisfaction in the future

Mr. BURNHAM: I do not intend to be captious or facetious, but I would like to know if that is protection or free trade?

Mr. PUGSLEY: The hon. gentleman can judge for himself.

Mr. BURNHAM: I judge for myself, but I was not quite sure.

Mr. OLIVER: Would the Minister of the Interior say what the policy of the United States is in regard to Chinese immigration?

Mr. ROCHE: The United States have no head tax, but they prohibit entirely the entry of Chinese labour. In the case of students and others they have an exemption, but it is somewhat wider than our exemption, and those who go to their country for the purpose of getting educational instruction are allowed to enter free of tax. They are not prohibited from entering the country, as the Chinese labourers are. The hon. gentleman has stated that the present Act has been working smoothly and harmoniously, and that there has been no objection to it. It is just because of the numerous objections that I have introduced this legislation. The requests have been quite numerous, and have been coming in for the last few years, and, indeed, had I been able to have done this by Order in Council, I should have felt like doing it a couple of years ago. The universities have asked for it. They point out that the universities in the United States have a great advantage over the universities in Canada because the Chinese students are admitted into the United States free of tax, whereas they are not admitted into Canada, to any extent, on account of the imposition of the head tax. It is a hardship to impose the head tax on students coming into the country. Many young men have not the $500 to spare and require all the money they have for their educational course. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Pugsley) says it is no hardship at all to impose the head tax, because it will be refunded, but it is a hardship because these immigrants have not the money to spare. Furthermore, the educated class of Chinese rather resent the idea of imposing a head tax on their sons, who come here for educational purposes.

If they were admitted free of tax there would be additional advantages to Canada by reason of trade and commerce. I have come in contact with missionaries and clergymen from Canada who have visited China and have associated with the people, and they say that the United States derives a great advantage by reason of the fact that Chinese students are admitted into United States universities without the restrictions imposed by us, and that by reason of this, trade between the United States and China is encouraged. Each young man going back to China from the United States is possessed of far more knowledge about that country than he would were students not admitted to the United States universities free of tax. I wish again to emphasize the fact that it is on account of the numerous requests year after year for this legislation that I have introduced this Bill. If the hon. gentlemen opposite take a decided stand and decide to hold up the passage of this Bill on the ground that it enlarges the scope of immigration from China, I say that that is not a valid ground, and I doubt if the leader of the Opposition would take a stand similar to that taken by the hon. gentleman from St. John. If the leader of the Opposition expressed his views this afternoon, I do not think they would harmonize with the views of the hon. member from St. John. I do not imagine that he is at all opposed to allowing Chinese students to enter Canada for the purpose of attending an educational institution.

Mr. PUGSLEY: We are not opposing this as a party matter. Each member is speaking for himself. I do not profess to speak for any of my hon. friends. Each member has a right to express his views in criticising any measure which comes before the House.

Mr. OLIVER: It will be obvious that there is a great difference between the law of the United States and the law of Canada in regard to Chinese immigration, and when the minister draws the parallel, it is not a fair one. Those who are in favour of the exclusion of the Chinese from Canada would be very glad to accept the law of the United States, if it were applied to Canada. But that is not the situation. The United States absolutely excludes the Chinese of the working class, and allows the entry of those who are seeking education. We do not exclude the working classes. We simply impose a head tax upon them, but we make special provision in regard to those who desire an education. If the hon. minister desires to introduce the United States system into Canada I will be glad to support the proposition to absolutely exclude the Chinese labourer, and simply allow the entry of the Chinaman who desires to secure an education. But to take that part of the United States law which leaves practically an open door to the entrance of Chinese, and add that to our more liberal policy in regard to Chinese immigration, is entirely objectionable, from my point of view.

Mr. ROCHE: Does the hon. gentleman know what the United States immigration authorities claim?

Mr. OLIVER: I do not know. I asked the minister what the law was and he told me.

Mr. ROCHE: They say that Canada gets the head tax and the United States gets the Chinese immigrant.

Mr. OLIVER: That is a different story. We are discussing the statute as it is, and as it is proposed to frame it, and having had something to do with the statute as it stands, I may be pardoned for intruding upon the House to the extent I am doing. Having had some responsibility for the present statute, and for the administration under that statute, with due regard to the compliments of my hon. friend from Westminster, I wish to say that, for my own part I desire in this House to promote the idea of a white Canada, and the exclusion, so far as it is reasonably possible, of those races, who, by a policy of peaceful penetration permitted to be carried on, would change the condition of this Canada of ours, from being a white Canada to being a Canada of some other character, and I will have to ask the minister and the House to bear with me while I express my opposition to any legislation calculated to facilitate that change of condition. It is quite clear that this proposed amendment is deliberately intended to let down the bars, and, in so far as that is its purpose, it is objectionable. The minister has said that he has had protests against the law as it stands, and that these protests are the foundation of the amendment he proposes to make. With regard to the instance which he mentioned with reference to the clergy spoken of by the hon. member for Pictou, I may say that in my judgment there is no foundation whatever for a change in the law in any such instance. There is no possibility of a law regarding immigration being placed on the statute book that can be administered according to rule and line. The officers of the department must administer that law according to its spirit and intent, using the letter where that is necessary to enforce the spirit and intent. But to apply the letter of the law in such a case as was mentioned by the member for Pictou and by the minister is to disregard the responsibilities of administration.

Mr. ROCHE: Such action was taken on the advice of the Justice Department.

Mr. OLIVER: When the Justice Department is asked to do so, it states, of course, the interpretation of the law. But my hon. friend must know that, in many cases, common sense and public policy demand that the law shall be administered according to its import rather than according to its letter. There is no evidence, therefore, either of the necessity or of the desirability of any change in the law. The proposed change rests, then, simply upon the desire or intention of the minister to let down the bars with regard to Chinese immigration to the extent provided in this section. To that I am compelled to offer my most strenuous opposition. It is suggested that because we are in a state of war, and because we have the assistance of certain allies, we are debarred from dealing with our own affairs according to our own requirements and the dictates of our own interest. But let it be thoroughly understood that that is not the purpose for which our soldiers are fighting in this war. The soldiers of Canada are fighting in this war so that Canada shall be mistress in her own house.

As to the amendment respecting clergymen, the existing Act was framed with regard to the fact that white men had gone to China as missionaries, and had there married women of that country. These men, being required in the course of their duties to come back to Canada, found themselves faced with the necessity of paying head tax upon their families. It was to provide for such cases that the law was made as it is. It did not contemplate the admission into Canada of clergymen of the Chinese race, whatever might be their religion. It contemplated simply the free admission of families of Chinese origin which were the families of white clergymen whose duties called them back to Canada. It is not desirable that any amendment to the law should go further than that, especially in view of the fact that the minister is not able to explain how far-reaching this section is. I wish to go on record, therefore, as protesting with all the strength of which I am capable against the proposals contained in the first section of the Bill.

Fisheries—Building fishways and clearing rivers, $30,000.

Mr. HAZEN: When I was in committee before with my estimates I told the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) that when my estimates came up again I would give him a statement of the number of appointments made in the Department of Marine and Fisheries under section 21 of the Civil Service Act. This is the statement:—

Captain Louis Arthur Demers, wreck commissioner, aged 55, was appointed on the 2nd of May, 1916, at a salary of $3,300 per annum. His present salary is $3,400 per annum. He entered the outside service of the department on the 11th of October, 1904, after having served some twelve years with fishery cruisers; he was transferred to the inside service on 1st September, 1908, and appointed wreck commissioner on the 1st August, 1910. He resigned to become harbour master at Montreal on the 1st June, 1912. When Captain Lindsay, his successor as wreck commissioner, was placed in charge of the Montreal and Quebec pilotage the office of wreck commissioner became vacant, and in view of Captain Demers' special qualifications for the position he was reappointed thereto.

Mr. Thomas Robert Ferguson, chairman of the Board of Steamship Inspection, entered the outside service of the department in May, 1889. On the superannuation of Chairman Edward Adams, the officer who, by length of service, efficiency and technical qualifications, was entitled to succeed him, was Mr. Ferguson, who was at that time inspector of Government steamships at Quebec, and the department so recommended. Mr. Ferguson is 51 years of age. The date of his appointment as chairman of the board is 8th May, 1913; salary on appointment, $2,800 per annum; present salary, $3,200 per annum.

Mr. George Herbert Flood, aged 56, was appointed purchasing and contract agent 1st December, 1915, at a salary of $3,300 per annum. His present salary is $3,500 per annum. Prior to his appointment as purchasing and contract agent Mr. Flood had been the agent of the department at St. John, N.B., since November, 1909. On the resignation of Mr. Cecil Doutre as purchasing and contract agent, the department considered Mr. Flood's experience as agent at St. John, and also as a former business man, specially fitted him for the vacant position, and, after the issue of a certificate of qualification by the Civil Service Commission, the department recommended him for the position of purchasing and contract agent.

Mr. Hope Vere Anderson, aged 27, was transferred from the Department of Mines to the Department of Marine by Order in Council on the 5th September, 1913; salary on appointment $1,600 per annum, present salary $1,750. The services of a mechanical engineer were required in the chief engineer's branch of the department, and the Civil Service Commissioners recommended Mr. Anderson for the position; he was accordingly appointed.

Mr. Arnt Christian Andrésen, aged 32, was appointed by Order in Council of the 18th May, 1914, to the chief engineer's branch of the department at a salary of $1,200 per annum; he now receives $1,250 per annum. He is at present in a Canadian Battalion on overseas service in France.

[Mr. Hazen.]

His appointment was recommended by the Civil Service Commissioners in response to an application for a clerk with the special qualifications above mentioned.

Mr. Joseph Henry Vaughan, aged 39, has been in the service of the department since June, 1908. His salary on appointment to his present position was $1,600 per annum. He has not yet received any increase. On the superannuation of Mr. M. D. Kelly, a clerk in the office of the purchasing and contract branch, the department requested the Civil Service Commissioners to advertise the vacancy. Having regard to the special qualifications required for the duties of the position, they recommended Mr. Vaughan, and his appointment was authorized by Order in Council.

Those are the only appointments in the Marine and Fisheries Department made under section 21 since I became minister of that department. I have not here a list of the appointments in the Department of Naval service, but when the Naval Service Estimates are up, I will make a statement to the House covering those appointments.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I have a very strong complaint from Mr. Kendall at Port Alberni, B.C. Section 5 of the special Fishery Regulations for British Columbia provides that:

> The Chief Inspector of Fisheries for the province is hereby empowered to cancel a fishery license forthwith for a violation of the regulations or conditions of the license by the licensee or by his representative who may be operating under such license for him.

That is a very drastic provision; it places the licensee entirely in the hands of the Chief Inspector of Fisheries for the province. I am informed that there is no such provision in the Nova Scotia Fishery Regulations. I recognize that the chief inspector should have pretty large powers, but there ought to be some provision whereby proceedings might be stayed so that an appeal could be taken to the deputy minister at Ottawa. I am told that the chief inspector in British Columbia in the district in which Mr. Kendall's operations are carried on seems to have a spite against that gentleman and is acting very arbitrarily, and Mr. Kendall complains very bitterly. The most I can do is to ask the minister to look into the matter, and also if he does not think there should be some provision for staying proceedings so that an appeal may be made, if it is thought desirable to make one. Otherwise, an inspector who might be so disposed, might ruin a licensee.

Mr. HAZEN: This case has been before me off and on for a number of years, it has been reported on not only by Mr. Cunningham, our chief fishery officer in British Columbia, who is an old and experienced official, but by our fishery officers here. I shall be glad to show the hon. member the whole correspondence, and perhaps he will then be satisfied that it was impossible to take any other action than has been taken by the department.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Will the minister show the papers to Senator Bostock who is familiar with this matter?

Mr. HAZEN: I have asked Mr. Found to make a note of the matter, and I shall be glad to send the file of papers to Senator Bostock so that he may look into it himself.

Mr. KYTE: Has there been any increase in the number of fishery officers in Nova Scotia during the last year?

Mr. HAZEN: No.

Mr. KYTE: Has the minister the list of fishery guardians for the county of Richmond, N.S?

Mr. HAZEN: The number in the county of Richmond is twenty-six, but I have not their names here.

Mr. KYTE: That is a very large increase—

Mr. HAZEN: It is the same number as last year.

Mr. KYTE: Perhaps—but a very considerable increase over the number of a few years ago. I would like a list of them. The department have been good enough to furnish me with a list in the past.

Mr. HAZEN: Certainly. I have asked Mr. Found to have a list prepared and sent to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. SINCLAIR: And may I have a similar list for the counties of Guysborough and Antigonish?

Mr. HAZEN: Yes.

Mr. COPP: Who compose the Advisory Board?

Mr. HAZEN: There are four members from Nova Scotia, Mr. Hemon; Mr. Short, of Digby; Captain W. C. Smith, of Lunenburg; and Mr. King, who was appointed on the recommendation of the Halifax Board of Trade. From New Brunswick, there are Mr. F. E. B. Young, of Caraquet; Mr. Carson, of Kent County; and Mr. John Jackson, of St. John. There is also a gentleman from the Gulf District, Mr. Arsenault; and from Prince Edward Island, Mr. Longworth, of Charlottetown.

Mr. COPP: Do they meet here?

Mr. HAZEN: Yes, together with the officials of the department. Once they met in Nova Scotia, and once in Prince Edward Island. These gentlemen act without pay; all they receive is their actual expenses.

Mr. McKENZIE: What are their functions?

Mr. HAZEN: They are purely advisory. They meet with the deputy minister, the Commissioner of Fisheries, and other officials, and discuss such matters as close seasons, fish hatcheries and other subjects relating to the fisheries, and make recommendations. The Bill which I introduced yesterday, and which was read the second time to-day and referred to the Committee on Marine and Fisheries, was prepared largely as a result of their deliberations with the officials of the department.

Mr. A. W. CHISHOLM: Does not the minister realize that he has left a very large part of Nova Scotia unrepresented on the Advisory Board, in that there is no representative from Cape Breton? I regard the functions of this board as very important. It is the medium through which the fishermen can place their case before the Government. I notice that three of the Nova Scotia members of the board are from the western portion of the province, while Cape Breton, which is surrounded by the most important fishing waters of Canada, has no member on the board. I think that is a mistake, and I have called the attention of the minister to it more than once. I regret that he has not seen fit to appoint a representative from that portion of the country.

Mr. HAZEN: We have requests from time to time to appoint on the board representatives from different sections. For instance, there is no member of the board representing the county of Charlotte, N.B., though its fisheries are very important, including extensive sardine weirs and important lobster and other fisheries. There was a representative from this section for the original board, but at his death the place was filled by the appointment of Mr. Jackson of St. John. There are other important fishing centres which are not represented on the board. We do not wish to make the board so large as to be unwieldy. My experience is that you get better work from a committee if it is of reasonable size. From Nova Scotia, originally, we had only three members. Strong representations were made that, as Halifax was really the centre of the fishing trade of the Maritime Provinces, a very much larger fish trade being done there than anywhere else it was desirable that there should be a representative on the board from Halifax who understood the fishing trade generally. So Mr. King, who was recommended by the Halifax board of trade, was appointed. I appreciate what the hon. member (Mr. Chisholm) says, but at the same time I think the different interests are fairly represented by those on the board. I am sure that they will see that no injustice is done to Cape Breton, and that they deal with fishery questions from the standpoint of general interest rather than from the standpoint of locality. When the hon. gentleman made his suggestion, I said I would consider it, and so I have, and have had considerable doubt about it; but I think it better not to have the committee too large.

Mr. KYTE: What the minister (Mr. Hazen) says, concerning the county of Charlotte, applies to the locality referred to by the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Chisholm). As the minister knows, a very large proportion of the population of Cape Breton are engaged in the fisheries. With respect to the provisions for the open and closed season for lobsters, the island of Cape Breton is to a large extent a separate district. Great difficulties have been met with by the officers of the department in their efforts to work out a scheme of open seasons for the province of Nova Scotia suitable to the conditions and exigencies of all sections. In the spring, the fishermen of Cape Breton are handicapped by the presence of large quantities of drift ice on the coast. In some seasons the ice remains until a very late date, and the consequence is that the lobster fisheries are very much hampered as compared with other places in Nova Scotia. From time to time the fishermen of the island of Cape Breton have made special representations in favour of an extension of the open season to compensate them for the time of which they can not fish on account of the drift ice. The conditions in Cape Breton would thus seem to call for special attention on the part of the advisory board. Antigonish and Guysborough also have large fishing interests. It does seem to me that there should be at least one member of the board from Cape Breton and eastern Nova Scotia. The suggestion made by the hon. member for Inverness is eminently reasonable. If there was any way by which the minister could eliminate one of the present members of the Advisory Board and substitute for him a representative particularly of the island of Cape Breton, I think it would be in the public interest to do so.

Inasmuch as the minister has intimated that the members of the board do not receive any salary, and are only paid their actual expenses, it is not a position that is so remunerative that any gentleman would be loath to part with. That would make it much easier for the minister to make some change in the personnel of the board, in order that it might more directly represent the island of Cape Breton and Nova Scotia.

Mr. HAZEN: The appointments are yearly. There is a certain element of fairness in saying that the members of the board should be changed from time to time. We get fresh ideas and fresh blood and there is much force in my hon. friend's contention. What he says about Cape Breton Island and eastern Nova Scotia is very true. The season there is later and that condition was recognized when the season in which lobsters may be caught was fixed at a later time in Cape Breton than in any other part of Nova Scotia.

Mr. KYTE: That is quite true but the presence of ice on the coast makes changes necessary from time to time.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Has the Advisory Board given any advice to the minister on the urgent questions that are before him at the present time in regard to the fisheries? Members are receiving letters regarding the great scarcity of salt in order to preserve fish in the districts where they are not doing a fresh fish business. Another question is that of the extension of the lobster season. At this season of the year members of parliament are apt to receive a good many requests of that kind and it would be interesting to know if these matters are being dealt with by the Advisory Board and if they are giving the minister advice in regard to them.

Mr. HAZEN: By the 15th of this month we will have advice from the members of the board, and also from our officers all over the country, in regard to the desirability of making an extension if the lobster season. As the hon. gentleman knows,

I have been very loath to extend the season and I have declined to do so from year to year.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Never.

Mr. HAZEN: I do not think that during the last three years there has been a single exception. But this year there seems to be a very persistent attempt made to secure an extension. The request comes not only from the districts which are affected but from members of the House and I have a letter from the hon. member for Guysboro pointing out reasons why he thinks there should be an extension in certain parts of Nova Scotia. I have had representations made to me by the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Loggie) who has been a persistent advocate of not extending the season. But owing to the fact that conditions are of a most unusual character he says that for the first time he thinks that possibly it would be in the public interest that an extension should be made. We have sometimes found that when conditions have been unfavourable at the commencement of the lobster season and fish have not been caught for a considerable time after the season opened the conditions have been so favourable during the latter part of the season that the catch has been just as good as in normal years. In view of the very strong representations that have been made to the department we have asked our fishery officers in the different districts all over the country to carefully observe and note what the catch and conditions are and to make reports to us which we will receive by the fifteenth of this month so that we will be in a position to come to an intelligent conclusion in regard to the matter. I dislike extending the seasons. They were made for the purpose of preserving the fish and preventing the destruction of the fisheries and it seems to me to be almost better, taking one year with another, that there should be no extension, because, while the catch might be smaller one year, perhaps as a result of the enforcement of the regulations and the preventing of the taking of a large number of lobsters, an increased catch is the result and the fishing is better in the future. However, there are other considerations which will have to be taken into account. The fishermen go to considerable expense to get their gear and supply themselves with boats and lobster traps. Some of them make it their principal source of livelihood and if they are not allowed to pursue their calling, and they get a smaller quantity of fish, it makes the conditions very difficult for them and that is especially the case this year when there is such a demand for food products. We have taken steps to get preliminary information to enable us to come to a wise and sound conclusion in regard to the matter.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Could the minister tell me what the dates are when the season closes on the different sections of the coast?

Mr. HAZEN: It closes in different districts at different times. In the district in which the hon. member for Northumberland is interested, it closes on June 25, and in the district in which my hon. friend from Guysborough is interested, it closes on June 20. I think it is five days earlier in that part of Nova Scotia than it is along the gulf of St. Lawrence and the Northumberland Straits. It opens earlier and closes earlier in the districts on the south shore of Nova Scotia, on the bay of Fundy and in the counties of St. John and Charlotte. These dates, of course, were fixed in consequence of the reports of commissions. There have been from time to time lobster commissions. There was one about 1897, or 1898, and in 1912 there was another to consider altered conditions. The close seasons were fixed very largely on the reports of these commissions which have been made after taking evidence and getting the views of the men who are interested in the lobster fishery on different parts of the coast of the Maritime Provinces.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I want to point out the importance of arriving at a decision as early as possible, because, if it is left until the 15th of the present month and the season closes on the 20th, there will scarcely be time enough for the fishermen to get the news on the coast. It takes several days to have them notified in regard to an extension, and if an extension is going to be made, a decision should be arrived at as soon as possible, and the fishermen given notice at least a week ahead so as to permit them to make their plans as to the date at which they will take up their traps. With reference to the district in which I am particularly interested, from Halifax Harbour to Point Michaud, I would ask the minister to instruct the officers to telegraph the information so that the fishermen will have sufficient notice.

Mr. HAZEN: My hon. friend's point is well taken, and we will wire if it has not already been done. When I was speaking about getting these reports on the 15th I had mostly reference to the district where the season closes on the 25th. The commissioner tells me that we will have the report from the district in which my hon. friend is particularly interested by the 10th or 12th, and as there is very nearly a week before the close season, we will be prepared to make an announcement as to whether we shall make an extension or not.

Mr. TURGEON: Has the minister given any attention to the remarks I made the other day?

Mr. HAZEN: In regard to fishing in October?

Mr. TURGEON: Yes.

Mr. HAZEN: I have not been able to give much attention to that question since my hon. friend made the suggestion, although it has been made before. I intend to give attention to it and to get a report on the subject. But I think the best opinion of our fishery officers is that such a course, if it were adopted, would result in the destruction of the lobsters and cause great injury to the fishery in the future. I will get all the information I can on the subject.

Mr. TURGEON: I hope the minister will, because I am not of opinion that fishing in the fall would be more disastrous to the lobster industry than in the spring. I believe that this opinion will be supported by the fishermen on the coast. I see that the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Loggie) has been coming to my way of thinking during the past year or two, and that alone says something.

Mr. HAZEN: It is hard not to come your way.

Mr. MARCIL: This question would not be complete if I did not put in a word for the coast of Quebec. The season is very late there always, starting from the mouth of the Restigouche river, they cannot place lobster traps until the end of May. So the early part of the season is lost, and they have to stop fishing when they have only properly started to work. This spring the season is much later than usual. The spring is fully a month later in Quebec, and so I hope the minister will consider that district when he is considering these points in the Maritime Provinces.

Mr. HAZEN: The district to which my hon. friend refers, I presume, is up at the head of the Baie de Chaleur.

Mr. MARCIL: The whole coast of Quebec.

[Mr. Hazen.]

Mr. HAZEN: There is not a very large catch. The season is late and the result is that the fishermen do not have a very long time in which to catch lobsters. But the information we have is that if you extend the season there beyond the present date the lobsters are getting in a condition when they are not fit to catch. If you catch them then you destroy them without getting very much in food value in return.

Mr. MARCIL: Why not give a season in the fall, as has been suggested by the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Turgeon)? This is an unusual year, food supplies are very scarce, and a trial might be made this year to see the effect of a fall fishing season.

Mr. LOGGIE: How does the minister square his statement that lobsters would not be in good condition after the 25th of June with the fact that in another district he starts the season on the 24th of May and allows it to run until the 10th of August? Does he mean that the lobsters canned in that district are not suitable for food?

Mr. HAZEN: I can only see that it is a bad season, but under the conditions in that district if you did not let them fish at that season you could not let them fish at all. The whole subject is a most difficult one and it is hard to get fishermen to agree among themselves upon it. It is just the same with the lobster hatcheries, some of which were established before I came into office. We had been hoping that the lobster hatcheries would increase the supply of lobsters, but, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Copp) the other evening, Professor Knight, after carrying out experiments in connection with the lobster industry, is of opinion that the lobster hatcheries are not only not assisting in increasing the number of lobsters but are a detriment, because you take the female lobster and take the berries from it to send to the hatchery and then the female lobster is sent to the cannery. He has a theory that you could replenish the lobster fishing much more quickly by passing a regulation to the effect that if any female lobsters in the berry stage are caught they should at once be returned to the sea so that the increase would come about in the natural way. Dr. Knight is carrying on a very extensive inquiry in regard to this matter, and among the other subjects he has to consider is the question raised by the hon. member for Gloucester as to whether it would not be better to prohibit entirely the catching of lobsters during the months of June, July and August, and allow fishing to take place at a later date. That is absolutely contrary to the views that have prevailed among fishery experts and officers in the past.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Where is Dr. Knight making his observations?

Mr. HAZEN: Dr. Knight is a professor at Queen's college, Kingston. He has been making observations at the biological station at St. Andrews, New Brunswick, at Digby, where lobsters are impounded for observation, and at points along the Nova Scotia coast and Northumberland straits. Last year he was on the Digby coast.

Mr. SINCLAIR: It should not be difficult for scientific men to be certain whether or not the lobster hatcheries are doing good work. We all know what they do. The berries are put in the jars in the hatchery and after they are hatched the little lobster is syphoned out into the sea about three miles from the coast, and we know nothing more about it. The theory we used to get from the scientists was that the little lobster drifted on the surface of the water for several days until his claws formed, and then he sank to the bottom and grew up to be a lobster. That is what we were told. I do not see that there can be any great trouble in ascertaining whether that is true or not It could be done by actual experiment. It should not be difficult to follow these fry up after they are placed in the water and to ascertain from day to day whether they are still floating on the surface, or are living, or what becomes of them. It is only by actual contact with the lobster hatcheries and fisheries that the scientists can obtain proper knowledge. I think that the scientists should go to the hatchery and stay there and see how these fry get along whether they really do grow up or not. This is a matter of very great importance, as we are spending a great deal of money in the hatching of lobsters, and if there are no results, it is better to know it. We were always of the opinion that, on the coast of Pictou county, with which district my hon. friend from Pictou is more familiar than I, that the hatchery at Caribou was doing good work. There was no part of Nova Scotia, so far as I know, where the catch of lobster was kept up better than on the northern shore served by the hatchery at Cariboo. It was one of the earliest hatcheries on the coast of Nova Scotia, and we always had the idea that in that region the supply was being maintained. I think the hon. gentleman from Pictou will agree with me in that statement. There is no reason why there should not be similar results in other places. If the minister has a really good officer to investigate, I trust he will ascertain for certain whether the lobster fry that we put in at the sea lives, grows up and keeps the fisheries going, as we expected them to do, when we spent all this money in establishing these hatcheries.

Mr. MACDONALD: Last summer I met Professor Knight, the gentleman who was conducting the investigation in my county, where there has been a hatchery for a number of years. I was very much impressed with his anxiety to make the investigations as effective as possible. He succeeded in interesting the fishermen of the county in the problem as to how the industry could be served to a greater degree than any man I have seen representing the department in connection with that problem in the past. At various meetings held in the district he explained the process of observation which he was carrying on, that he had been at Digby, or somewhere in that vicinity, where there had been a pond, and he was comparing the results in both places, and, in addition to watching the development of the lobster in the hatcheries, he was experimenting with the production of lobsters in an artificial pond, which he built in the vicinity. One could not help being impressed with the capacity of Dr. Knight. I think he is carrying on good work. He has very strong views in reference to certain matters in connection with lobster propagation and development, which, no doubt, he communicated to the department, and the balance of his judgment, as I understand, was against the continuance of the hatcheries, and rather in favour of the establishment of ponds. I think, as between the two conditions under which he experimented side by side at Caribou, that better results were obtained in one than the other. That is my recollection, but I am not speaking from definite data in the matter. The idea of a fall season was urged by a great many of the fishermen in my district. I do not pretend to speak with any particular knowledge, but this view has been entertained by the fishermen in my county.

Mr. LOGGIE: I do not think it would be in the interests of the fishermen to do away with the spring fishing, and substitute the autumn fishing for it. The district referred to by the hon. gentleman from Bonaventure, I thought, was unfairly treated by the shortening of the time. The committee who had charge of it took a certain number of days off the district, and added a recommendation that the season for the district in question should be further cut, a certain number of days after the first or second year. I think the district was unfairly treated in the circumstances, this year we have only some three or four weeks' fishing and our product will be short, and it is possible the minister may be willing, under the present circumstances, to consider that, but to my mind the season in the district should extend to the end of June instead of the 25th. Then the same number of days would be taken off as has been taken off in the other districts. Regarding the hatcheries, I suppose hon. gentlemen know that fish devour one another. On one occasion I was at a hatchery near Shippigan, and these little lobsters, about the size of mosquitoes, were coming out of the shell, and the small fish that had been pumped up from the channel were devouring these little lobsters. There is a general impression that these lobsters are emptied, as it were, into the sea, and remain on the surface, and are devoured by other fish. I am quite sure that, at certain seasons of the year, other fish, say mackerel or herring, do school very largely on the surface of the water, and, of course, they are cannibals, if I may so express myself, and they devour one another, and I am under the impression that large numbers of those little lobsters thus cast upon the sea are devoured by other fish. I have heard as a suggested remedy that the department should place these lobsters in shallow water in the seaweed. If they put them down at low water, the tide would rise and cover them, and in that way they would be on the bottom. I mention that, because there are not many fish in the bays in the summer season. Some smelts and tommy cod frequent them but not to any great extent. I have heard it suggested that much better results would be obtained if these lobsters were deposited in shallow water, in the eel grass, so that they could get to the bottom, and have time to grow and take care of themselves up to a certain time. I do not pretend to have a deep scientific knowledge along these lines, and I do not know whether that is practical or not, but I do believe it would be wise to do away with the spring fishing season, because pilfering would go on after the close season, as it goes on after the 25th of June. The season in that district is five days too short to be fair with the other districts. If we take up our traps on the 25th June, and keep them on shore until the lobster has shed its shell, got the new shell, and got into a hardy condition so that it moves around, as it does in the course of a few weeks, perhaps it would not be unfair to let the fishermen have, say two or three weeks in the month of September: give them the month of September, or whatever time the department find the lobster is in a wholesome condition for food, and then let everybody, small and large, try to obey the law, and avoid this charge that is so rampant, that he law is not recognized, which is quite true. There is no question whatever about the infringement of the law. Parties will get a few cans, put these lobsters in the cans at their homes, and market them. The quality is not what it ought to be, but nevertheless the lobsters are put on the market, and they find a ready sale, especially if the supply is short. I had a telegram from home yesterday saying that at present fishing is good. In a telegram that I received to-day it was suggested that an offer which had been received for the purchase of goods should be declined, because of the probability of the supply being short. I think that for this year the minister ought to extend until July 5 the fishing season which closes on June 25. We used to have until July 10, but subsequently ten days were taken off the time. When ten days is taken off the fishing season in one district, not more should be taken off in another. I think that in the interests of all concerned, the minister ought to give these matters consideration.

Mr. KYTE: The fishermen are suffering serious handicaps in respect of the cost of the necessary supplies, the cost of living and the general scarcity of food. I think, therefore, that we would not be asking too much if we requested that the close season should be entirely abolished for the present year. In the part of Nova Scotia which I represent, the fishermen are not getting as much for their catch this year as formerly, the canneries stating that the transportation of lobsters is restricted by reason of the shortage of merchant shipping. Under present war conditions, it is only fair that the fishermen should be relieved to some extent from the difficulties under which they are working, and much would be accomplished in this direction by allowing them a full season's fishing of lobsters until the fall.

Mr. HAZEN: I am afraid that if we allowed the lobster fishing to go on without provision for a close season, the result would be prejudicial to lobster fishing in future years. To be honest with my hon. friend, I do not think that his suggestion can be complied with.

Mr. KYTE: In what respect would it have a bad effect?

Mr. HAZEN: For one thing, it would reduce the market price. The quantity of lobsters obtained would be so great that they would be a drug on the market. I do not think that it is in anybody's interest that my hon. friend's suggestion should be carried out.

Mr. COPP: One of the fishery overseers in my county, Mr. Prescott, died about a year ago. Who was appointed in his place?

Mr. HAZEN: My recollection is that, as about 18 miles intervened between the different points which had to be especially watched by the guardian, the district was considered too large. Accordingly, the district was divided and one guardian appointed for each district, the salary being divided between them. I do not recollect the names; I shall be glad to send them to my hon. friend later.

Mr. COPP: Mr. Prescott's salary was only $100, and the dividing of the district would result in the men getting $50 each, which is a very small salary. My impression is that the chief duty of an officer of this kind is to see that no refuse from the mills gets into the fishing streams. It is a fact that the sawmills dump sawdust and other refuse into the streams which flow into fishing waters. This is not prevented by a visit from the fishery officer or by the writing of a letter. If in the opinion of my hon. friend's officials, the dumping of refuse into these waters is detrimental to fishing interests, I would suggest that he pay the officers who attend to that matter a sufficient salary and clothe them with sufficient power to enable them to prevent the practice, which has not been prevented up to the present time.

Mr. KYTE: I am surprised to observe the difference in the salaries paid to various fishery officers in Nova Scotia. For instance, Mr. Aylmer, of Meteghan, gets a salary of $500, in addition to travelling allowance. Mr. Burke, of Albert Bridge, gets $155. Mr. J. M. Campbell, of Halifax, gets only $15. I see in the Auditor General's Report the name of another officer whose salary is $500, and another who receives as small an amount as $60.

Mr. HAZEN: The man who gets $500 is allowed $150 for horse hire, but he gets no mileage, as some other inspectors do. His hotel bills also are paid.

Mr. KYTE: His travelling allowance is larger than a good many others, and he receives also a salary of $500.

Mr. HAZEN: Perhaps he has a larger district.

Mr. KYTE: Edward Chute gets $500, in addition to travel and outlay, $278.91. J. A. Donovan, of Ingonish, receives the princely salary of $60, but he has the consolation of having drawn $389.32 for travel and outlay, making altogether $449.32. It seems to me that the system is antiquated, and that the salaries ought to be revised. The fact that a man draws a salary of $60 a year and receives an amount by way of travel and outlay of $389.32, indicates either that he is not getting a sufficient salary, or that he is drawing too much for travel and outlay, having regard to the work that he is doing. A few years ago all fishery officers throughout Nova Scotia were getting practically the same salary. In the last few years, however, I find that the salaries of some of these officials have advanced in a very marked degree. I do not understand that that is altogether because of any special difference in the character of the work they are doing. If the work of Mr. Donovan, for instance, of Ingonish, is such that the necessary travel and outlay should amount to $389.32, then he is entitled to a salary of more than $60 per year. The whole thing appears to be wrong; there ought to be a scale of salaries prevailing throughout Nova Scotia for all officers of that particular class. I cannot see why one fishery overseer should receive a salary of $500 and travelling expenses of $248.58, whereas another gentleman occupying the same position and doing the same work receives a salary of only $60. I do not know whether this inequality is due to influence that certain officers may have with the department as against others, but it is almost scandalous to have it appear in the public records of this country that men occupying the same positions and discharging the same duties should be compensated so unfairly and with such a great inequality.

Mr. HAZEN: I am not disposed to differ very much from my hon. friend. There is need for a very great reorganization in connection with the salaries paid to these fishery officers. We have been able to effect that reorganization up to the present time in the western part of Nova Scotia, where we have fewer officers than we have in other parts of that province, with the result that we give them larger territory to look after and greater recompense for their services. The same question will have to be grappled with in the other parts of Nova Scotia, but at the present time and in the past there has been such a large number of offices that the officers have been receiving small salaries. It would be better to have fewer officers and to give them larger salaries. I hope, if we live long enough, we shall have a reorganization throughout the whole province. Some of these officers are paid small amounts such as $20 or $25, and in this day and generation you cannot expect any service of value for remuneration of that sort.

Mr. COPP: I see by the Auditor General's Report that Mr. Robert Prescott, an overseer at Baie Verte, in New Brunswick, is receiving a salary of $150, with travelling expenses of $718.29.

Mr. McKENZIE: The $150 is put at the wrong end.

Mr. COPP: I understand that the area is a large one, and as Mr. Prescott lives inland at some distance from the shore where the factories are, he receives so much per mile for travelling expenses. I am making only the same criticism as my hon. friend from Richmond (Mr. Kyte). From the Auditor General's Report I find that the expenditure in connection with the fishery overseers in the province of New Brunswick amounts to $7,195.69, but under the heading of special guardians there is an expenditure for wages and disbursements up to March 31, 1916, of $34,429.81. There are no items or explanations with regard to this, and I would like to know what it means.

Mr. HAZEN: That is all published in the official report, and I will get the information for my hon. friend.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is there any scale of disbursements? Is so much allowed for every mile travelled? Is any provision made for horse hire, or anything like that? I regret that the geographical knowledge of the minister is so limited that he does not know where Ingonish is, and I doubt the right of any gentleman to be in the Government who does not know where that great place is situated. I know the inspector there, and I would like to know where he travels abroad so extensively, because he seems to be provided so amply with funds. Perhaps when these estimates come up again the minister will be able to tell me the number of miles this officer travels, where he goes and the extent of his district. If his district is Ingonish alone that is a magnificent spot in the summer time on the beautiful shores of the Atlantic, and a man ought to be willing to travel around there for nothing, as it is such a lovely spot.

Mr. HAZEN: You think he ought to be able to live on the sea breezes?

Mr. McKENZIE: I would like to know what Mr. Donovan is doing for his country for the money he is receiving.

Mr. HAZEN: I shall be very glad to get all the details for my hon. friend. As regards the question asked by the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Copp), Mr. Prescott is one of the regular fishery overseers and, like all the rest, where he owns a horse himself, he is allowed ten cents a mile for the distance he travels on business connected with his position. With regard to salaries and disbursements of fishery officers, if my hon. friend will look at page 363 of the Fisheries Branch of the Department of Naval Service, he will see the way in which the different items are made up. If, after looking at that, he desires further information, we shall be glad to furnish it.

Mr. OLIVER: I wish to draw the attention of the minister to a matter of hardship that is taking place under the administration of the department in connection with the fisheries at Lac la Biche, north of Edmonton. The minister is, of course, aware that in northern Alberta there are a number of important lakes which furnish white fish in large quantities, and that since the recent construction of railroads, those fish are available for the world market. The question of fishing in this lake has become a commercial matter and means the investment of considerable capital. Since the railroad was constructed to Lac la Biche, there was commercial fishing for export last year. This commercial fishing is done in this way. Certain companies establish the necessary plants of houses, ice-storing, box-making and so on, and either they provide small boats and rig-outs for actual fishermen, or fishermen come in and supply their own and sell their fish to these commercial establishments which box, cool and ship the fish to the market. The buildings must be erected; the ice must be put up in the winter time, and every preparation made in advance of the actual fishing season. During the season the company depends on the fishing operations for the realization on the capital invested.

The spring fishing season opened on 5th May this year. On the day before, after all preparations had been made, all licenses issued, buildings erected, boats and nets provided, and everything else made ready, the Department of Fisheries at Ottawa wired restricting the total catch from the lake to 240,000 pounds for the season. Already the department had issued licenses for commercial fishing in the lake to the number of 125, which was 55 more than last year. By the issue of these licenses they have attracted to the lake poor men—these fishermen are generally poor—and have been the means of causing them to spend their time and invest in boats and other fishing gear, and, by issuing one-third more licenses this year than last, have led everyone to suppose that there would be no limit on the fishing; and then a wire is sent out the day before the season opens telling the licensees that they are limited to a quantity which, if divided equally among them, would not give any of them a summer's earnings.

Now, we are quite agreeable that the department should decide that not more than so many pounds of fish shall be taken out of the lake during the season, if they make the decision upon information and knowledge. But when they make that decision, they should not issue an unlimited number of fishing licenses, thereby inducing the investment of time and money in an enterprise that, by reason of the restriction of the department itself, cannot possibly result in advantage to the parties concerned. It may be that the Government think it does not make any difference, that it does not concern them; that they are protecting the fish and it does not matter about the people. In my judgment, it matters a great deal more about the people than about the fish. The Government has no right to deal with the people, even if they are poor people, in that way. They should exercise reasonable judgment in issuing licenses for fishing in any lake in which they intend to restrict the catch. Last year, there was no restriction on the catch, and all the fishing companies were allowed to catch as much as they could. People had no reason to believe that there would be any restriction this year, until after every investment had been made, and every preparation completed. If I speak strongly on this matter, it is because what took place in this case this year took place in the case of Lesser Slave lake last year. In the previous season, there was unrestricted fishing in that lake, and when the next season came, after licenses had been issued, a restriction was announced. It was an unjustifiable hardship, both upon the people who are investing their money as fish exporters and upon the unfortunate fishermen who gather there. I have not heard from Lesser Slave lake this year, and I do not know the conditions there, but I do know that last year there was an unjustifiable hardship. Representations were made to the department on the subject last year, and I am astonished to know that exactly the same course has been followed in the case of Lac la Biche this year. I cannot imagine that the minister could have had knowledge of the facts in time or it would not have occurred. I may say that the equipment of the individual fishermen costs $60 or $70, exclusive of boats, licenses, and incidentals, and the total catch allowed, if divided equally among the licenses, will not afford a return for the investment made and the time employed.

Mr. HAZEN: This matter was brought to my attention on several occasions last year. Lac la Biche, which is not a very large lake, was, until the last few years, so far removed from settlement that there was very little desire to fish in it. But, in consequence of the opening up of communication by the building of railways in that district and by other means, the fishing attracts many people who previously could not take advantage of it. Last year, 33 people applied for and obtained licenses to fish in the lake. As a result, we received petitions from the locality pointing out that as the lake was not a large one, if fishing were allowed without restriction as to the quantity taken, the result would be that in a short time no fish would be left in the lake, and the people in the vicinity would not have the advantage of living in the neighbourhood of water in which fish could be caught. We communicated with our inspector on the subject. The inspector visited the lake and reported that in his opinion it was not safe to allow more than 234,000 pounds of fish to be taken out each year during the summer fishing. The same representations were made to us this year by settlers in the neighbourhood who are interested in the fishing. At the same time representations were made on behalf of the fishing companies and others, that they should be allowed to fish without restrictions, and their statements as to the capacity of the lake and its resources in fish were different from those made by the fisheries officers. At that time 150 licenses had been applied for and taken out.

Mr. OLIVER: The minister now is dealing with Lesser Slave lake.

Mr. HAZEN: No, my present remarks are confined entirely to Lac la Biche. Professor Prince has been at Lesser Slave lake and he also inquired about the condition at Lac la Biche. He reported that in his judgment 400,000 pounds of fish could be taken out without destroying the usefulness of the lake as a fishing lake, and his report was concurred in by the fishery officers of the district. We therefore placed a limit of 400,000 pounds, and that is the limit to-day. The point was raised—and I understand that to a certain extent that is the complaint of the hon. member for Edmonton—that if only a limited quantity of fish were allowed to be taken from the lake the department should issue only a limited number of licenses.

Mr. OLIVER: Commercial licenses.

Mr. HAZEN: Yes. But I ask the hon. gentleman, how are you going to draw the line? If people, bona fide engaged in the fishing business, make application for licenses, are you going to say to some: "You shall not have licenses," and to others "You shall have licenses."? My hon. friend will see how very difficult it would be for the department to give a privilege, or a preference, to some people who are no more bona fide engaged in the fishing business than others who are applicants for licenses. Therefore, we have thought it better to grant licenses to all who are bona fide engaged in the fishing business and to limit the catch than to attempt to discriminate between the people who make application. That is the rule that prevails with regard to the lobster canneries; a close season is provided, regulations are made and the people, under those conditions, apply for the licenses and get them, taking their chance on getting a satisfactory catch. The department fixed 400,000 pounds as the quantity that could be safely taken from the lake during the summer season without depleting it. Having fixed that limit, its policy is to grant licenses to people who want them and as soon as the inspectors find that that quantity has been taken from the lake, the fishing is stopped. That is a fairer course than would be that which has been suggested of giving licenses to the first half dozen who apply, and saying to the others: "As you did not apply in time you cannot have a license."

Mr. OLIVER: I quite agree as to the propriety of restricting the amount of fish which may be taken out of any of these lakes in accordance with the best information the department has. My information is that the limit is 240,000 pounds on Lac la Biche for the summer fishing.

Mr. HAZEN: The first report we had from our officers was that 240,000 pounds was the amount that we could safely allow to be taken out, but subsequent reports have led us to the conclusion that 400,000 pounds might be taken out in a season without injury and 400,000 is the amount now fixed.

Mr. OLIVER: There are two seasons for fishing?

Mr. HAZEN: Just the summer season.

Mr. OLIVER: For this season the amount is 400,000 and not 240,000 pounds?

Mr. HAZEN: 400,000 pounds.

Mr. OLIVER: That is perfectly satisfactory. I do not wish to unduly press the department about restricting the amount of fish that may be taken from the lake and I appreciate that there may be some difficulties in adjusting the issuing of licenses. The department might take the view that it has information before it as to whether people could make a living out of fishing or not. If they choose to put it that way, that is a matter for their consideration, but what I desire to emphasize is that if they are going to restrict the amount that may be taken, and if they are not going to restrict the number of licenses to be issued, the public should have notice before they apply, that the licenses are issued subject to a restriction upon the taking of fish. With regard to Lac La Biche, my information is that licenses were issued without restriction and that preparation was made, both by the fishermen and the fish companies, for taking an unrestricted amount of fish, but that on the 4th day of May, just before the fishing opened, they were notified not that 400,000 pounds, but that only 240,000 pounds, might be taken. I am sure that the minister must appreciate the unfortunate position that resulted from that lack of notice. The people who had obtained licenses had no means of protecting themselves. If they had had information when they applied for licenses that the limit had to be placed on the amount of fish to be taken they could have used their own judgment with regard to the matter. My information is that the people were given to understand, by reason of the action during the previous year, that they had an unrestricted right to take fish as there was no restriction on the number of licenses and it was not until every preparation was made that they were notified of this limitation and then apparently they were notified as to an amount below the mark that has finally been conceded by the department. They were notified that the amount was 240,000 pounds which was a very severe blow to their expectations. These expectations were justified in view of the policy of the department with regard to lac la Biche last year. If a change was going to be made they should have had due notice. They did not have notice. That is exactly what occurred with regard to Slave lake a year ago. I am consuming the time of the House now for the purpose of impressing upon the minister the absolute injustice of withholding this notice until such a late date, and whatever decision the department arrives at as to the amount of fish that may be taken ought to be made known from year to year before the licenses are issued, if the department does not see fit to restrict the number of licenses.

Mr. HAZEN: I recognize my hon. friend's desire to put this before the committee properly. I am informed that when the application for licenses were made a limit had not been fixed, but that before they were issued the limit had been fixed and that the department had no knowledge of the applications until a few days before the limitation was adopted. That is the information I get from the Superintendent of Fisheries. However, a limit has been adopted now and in future years it will be known what the limit is. If a change takes place, if it is found that the taking out of 400,000 pounds is more than the lake can stand, we will endeavour to see that notice is given so that people, before they take out their licenses will know what the limit is.

Mr. OLIVER: There are other lakes that will come in and I am anxious that the minister should be aware of the hardship that might occur in such cases so that he will take the proper measures in the future.

Mr. KYTE: I intended to make some remarks on this item and perhaps, Mr. chairman, you would call it six o'clock.

Mr. HAZEN: The item is No. 249.

Mr. KYTE: I was under a misapprehension as to the item; I thought we were discussing No. 248, and I have some observations to make on that item.

Mr. HAZEN: Well, we will wait at eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

Fisheries—Legal and incidental expenses, $4,000.

Mr. KYTE: Since the House rose at six o'clock, I have been making some further investigations as to the differences in salaries of fishery overseers in the province of Nova Scotia, and these investigations confirm me in the belief that the increases that have been accorded to certain fishery overseers must have more relation to the activities of certain hon. members in this House who have the ear of the minister, than to the circumstances in which these overseers are situated or the amount of work they do. Take the salary of William Aymar, of Meteghan, in the constituency of Digby, who receives $500 a year; while Sylvester Boudrot, of Petit de Grat, in the constituency of Richmond, has to be content with a salary of $100. Edward Chute, of Canada Creek, in the county of Annapolis, enjoys $500; while M. J. Coady, of Southwest Margaree, in the constituency represented by my hon. friend from Inverness, has a salary of $60 only. Mr. J. G. D'Entremont, of Middle West Pubnico, fishery officer in Digby county, enjoys $800, while J. A. Donovan, of Ingonish, in the constituency of Cape Breton North and Victoria, has to be content with $60. Mr. J. A. Evans, of Chester, in the constituency of Lunenburg, enjoys $700; while N. Ferguson, of Port Moren, South Cape Breton, receives only $55. W. E. Fraser, of Liverpool, in the county of Queens, enjoys $750; while Ed. Hall, Main-a-Dieu, South Cape Breton, has a salary of only $55. D. L. McDonald, Bailey's Brook, in the county of Pictou, is paid for his services $75; Walter Purdy, Deep Brook, $700; J. J. Ross, North East Margaree, $60; C. F. Rathbun, Hortonville, $400 (that is in King's County, Nova Scotia, I think); T. Sullivan, Little Bras d'Or, $55; George Walls, Shelburne, $750; E. J. Thibeau, Thibeauville, in the county of Richmond, $100; R. Sutherland, River John, $150.

Hon. members of this committee will observe that in every case the fishery officers enjoying large salaries happen to reside in the counties of Nova Scotia represented by Conservative members, whereas in nearly every case the fishery overseers who must be content with a smaller salary happen to be discharging their duties in the counties of Nova Scotia represented by Liberal members.

Mr. DUGALD STEWART: What is the salary of the fishery officer in the county of Yarmouth?

Mr. KYTE: Mr. D'Entremont gets a salary of $800.

Mr. DUGALD STEWART: The hon. gentleman said he was in the county of Digby?

Mr. KYTE: It should be Yarmouth.

Mr. DUGALD STEWART: Represented by a Liberal?

Mr. KYTE: Unfortunately not represented at the present time, but it was represented by a Liberal. I scarcely imagine that the fishery officers who are residing in the counties represented by Conservatives have any more important duties to perform than the fishery officers in other parts of Nova Scotia. It is well known that Guysborough, Richmond, Inverness, Cape Breton are fishing counties, having a large portion of the population engaged in the fishing industry. The duties of inspectors in these counties are as important and the districts quite as large and as difficult to get over as in the other counties. I am not going to say at the present time that any of these gentlemen who enjoy the larger salaries are paid too much for their services, but if they are not paid too much, then the other fishery overseers whose names I have mentioned are not receiving a sufficient salary. I am aware that before the late Government went out of office the Fisheries Department and the then Minister of Marine and Fisheries had in contemplation the readjustment of the salaries of the officers I have mentioned. Nothing effective was done in that direction, and I regret very much that during the past five years the present minister has been unable to devise some plan whereby a more equitable adjustment of the salaries could be made and the grounds of complaint—and there are substantial grounds of complaint made by the fishery officers who are paid small salaries —removed. The salaries of fishery officers in the county of Richmond are: Mr. S. Boudrot, Petit de Grat, $100; Mr. Anthony Sampson, L'Ardoise, $125; Mr. Thibeau, $100. Probably a larger portion of the population of Richmond is engaged in fishing than in any other county in Nova Scotia. The work that is expected of the fishery officers of the county of Richmond, whose names I have just mentioned, is quite as important and exacting as the work that pertains to the offices of gentlemen occupying similar positions throughout Nova Scotia. If those who are enjoying a salary of $600, $700 or $800 are not paid too much for their services, then certainly the officers in my county are not paid sufficient salary. The discrepancy is entirely too great. I have to congratulate my hon. friends representing Lunenberg, Shelburn, Queens, Digby and Annapolis upon their ability to impress upon the Minister of Marine and Fisheries the necessity for securing larger salaries for the men discharging those duties in their respective constituencies. I find no fault with them whatever. I regret that the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries has not been able, during the five years that he has been head of the department, to readjust the salaries so that the other fishery officers, whose names I have mentioned, would enjoy a salary adequate to the services which they perform. I am very glad to hear from the minister that the Government is contemplating a readjustment of the scale of salaries, and I trust he will find himself able, during the present session of Parliament, to give some increase to the fishery officers to whom I have referred, who are in receipt of small salaries. No possible defence can be made that will adequately explain the discrepancies in the salaries which I have quoted to this committee, and if a more equitable adjustment of the salaries were made, I am sure it would give satisfaction to all those who are interested in the fishing industry.

Mr. HAZEN: As I stated this afternoon, I am disposed very largely to agree with what my hon. friend says, and I have no hesitation in saying that there should be a reorganization and a readjustment of these salaries in a very considerable portion of Nova Scotia. We have been able to get that organization effected at the present time in the western counties of Nova Scotia. The result is that the number of fishery officers has been very greatly reduced in the western counties, and those who remain are given larger districts, and paid better salaries than previously. In Annapolis county there is one fishery officer, in Digby county, two, Kings county, two; Lunenburg county, two; Queen county, two; Shelburne, two; and Yarmouth, one. Those gentlemen are all receiving salaries that are fairly reasonable. They are not too large, and in addition to their salaries, instead of being allowed a mileage rate for the number of miles they travel in making their tours of inspection, they are allowed $150 for horse hire, where they keep horses themselves. Coming down to the other end of Nova Scotia, in which my hon. friend is specially interested, I find there are in Cape Breton, eight fishery officers, and these fishery officers receive small salaries, running from $55 to $155, but in addition to that they are allowed ten cents a mile travelling allowance going from one place to another. Henry A. King, Little Bras d'Or, Edward Hall, Main-à-dieu, Angus McLean, Clarks Roads, Cape Breton; J. M. Gillis, Grand Mira, Allan McDonald, Gabarus Lake; Murdoch McLean, Leitches' Creek, Norman Ferguson, Port Morien; William Burke, Mira Ferry. In Inverness county there are six fishery officers; in Victoria county, seven.

Mr. KYTE: Will the hon. minister give me the names?

Mr. HAZEN: J. T. Donovan, Ingonish; Angus M. McDonald, Plaster, North Shore; J. M. Campbell, care of Marine Agent, Halifax; Allan McAulay, Big Baddeck; William Hellen, Cape North; Daniel J. Grant, Boulardarie East; A. F. McKenzie, Middle River.

Mr. McKENZIE: The name of the officer at Middle River is McDonald, not McKenzie.

Mr. HAZEN: The name is given here as A. J. McKenzie. While the salaries in Cape Breton are lower, many more fishery officers are employed there than in the western part of Nova Scotia, where we have effected a reorganization. I believe it is much better to have a few officers adequately paid and allowed a fixed amount of $150 for horse hire than to have a large number of officers who are paid small salaries and who receive a travelling allowance of 10 cents a mile. I hope to be able to effect a reorganization in Cape Breton and other parts of Nova Scotia in line with the reorganization which has been worked out during the last few years in the western part of Nova Scotia. There would not be much difference between the amount paid the officers in the island of Cape Breton by way of salaries, expenses and charges for mileage and the amount paid the officers in western Nova Scotia.

Mr. SINCLAIR: How many officers are there in the county of Lunenburg?

Mr. HAZEN: Two, Austin J. Evans and L. J. Hebb. Mr. Evans has enlisted for overseas service. His salary, $700, is paid, less $1.10 a day, the amount of his pay from the Militia Department.

Mr. SINCLAIR: How much do the two officers in Guysborough receive?

Mr. HAZEN: $200 each.

Mr. SINCLAIR: In Lunenburg the two officers receive $1,450, against $400 received by the officers in Guysborough.

Mr. HAZEN: The fishery officers in Guysborough receive a travelling allowance of 10 cents a mile, which would amount to a considerably larger sum than the amount paid the fishery officers in Lunenburg for horse hire.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The travel and outlay of Mr. Hebb last year was $309.50, and that of Mr. Evans was $247.20.

Mr. HAZEN: Under the reorganization effected in western Nova Scotia, the fishery officers are allowed $150 for the keep of their horses. In Cape Breton and the other counties the officers get a mileage allowance of 10 cents a mile.

Mr. KYTE: The travelling expenses of the fishery officers in the island of Cape Breton who are receiving salaries of from $50 to $100 are no greater than those of the fishery officers in western Nova Scotia who receive salaries as high as $500 and $700. Mr. Aymer, of Meteghan, whose salary is $500, received $248.58 for travel and outlay, whereas Mr. Thibeau of Richmond county, who gets a salary of $100, expended for travel and outlay only $212.21. Edward Chute, of Canada Creek, whose salary is $500, expended for travel and outlay $278.91, while Anthony Sampson, of L'Ardoise, whose salary is $125, expended for travel and outlay $239.45. The minister must be mistaken when he says that the fishery officers of Cape Breton are getting more for travel and outlay than the fishery officers of western Nova Scotia.

Mr. HAZEN: In the county of Cape Breton, where there are eight officers, the travelling allowances are about equal to those of the two officers in any one of the counties in western Nova Scotia. I do not think that the services in the former case are as effective, because if a man gets a fair salary he devotes his attention largely to the duties of the position, but he gets only a trifling salary of from $50 to $150 he regards the work as a kind of side-line and does not give it the attention that he otherwise would. I think it would be far better to reduce the number of officers in Cape Breton and pay adequate salaries to those who do perform the duties, as we do in western Nova Scotia. I do not say that the condition of affairs in Cape Breton is satisfactory; there must be a reorganization there as well.

Mr. KYTE: The county of Cape Breton has a much larger area and a much longer coast line than any of the counties in western Nova Scotia. It necessarily follows that more officers are required there. But the gross amount paid to the eight officers in the county of Cape Breton by way of salaries is very much less than the amount paid the two officers in the county of Digby. The same applies to all the counties in the island of Cape Breton. The total amount paid for salaries and allowances of officers in the county of Cape Breton is less than that paid the smaller number of officers in any of the counties in western Nova Scotia. Either the officers in western Nova Scotia are too well paid, or those in eastern Nova Scotia are not sufficiently paid.

Mr. COPP: The hon. member for Digby the other day made a proper statement of the present business methods of the Fisheries Department. This afternoon I cited a case where a fishery overseer or warden in New Brunswick, whose salary is $150 a year, received last year for travel and outlay, $718.20. The minister accounted for the amount of the travel and outlay by the fact that the overseers are given a travelling allowance of 10 cents a mile. The fishery overseer to whom I referred has certain duties in connection with the lobster fisheries, the open season for the district affected being from May 24 or 25 to August 10. I am not finding fault with this man or the amount that he is paid, but I contend that it is unbusinesslike to allow a man to be his own judge in the matter of the amount of travelling that he does, for which he receives 10 cents a mile.

I contend that Mr. Morrison, the inspector of the district which comprises five counties, who is paid a salary of $2,000 a year and who has received six or seven hundred dollars for travelling expenses, should organize those counties on a business basis, finding out what would be a reasonable remuneration for the overseers and paying them that amount. This is a matter of vital importance to the people. The same thing is true throughout the whole of New Brunswick, and I presume that the same thing exists in other provinces where fishery regulations require to be enforced. I find in the same county, within twenty miles of where Fishery Overseer Prescott lives, another overseer, Mr. Vinneau, of Barachois, who has a salary of $140 a year, and whose travel and outlay amounted to $1,008.54. Such a charge for travel and outlay is absolutely unjustifiable. I know the man and the district he has to work in. This matter should not be left in its present condition, because it is not conducive to good business or an honest expenditure of public money. I understood the minister to say that he had made a change in some portions of Nova Scotia, and I hope he will do the same in New Brunswick. I am not offering any criticism as to the amounts these men are paid; they should be paid a reasonable remuneration for their work, but they should be paid in such a way that the chief inspector will have a check on this expenditure, so that he can see that they are not paid for what they do not do or for any expenses not connected with their district. I find another man in Barachois in exactly the same district, with a salary of $140 and travelling expenses of $549. This man must have practically the same area to look after. When I was at home a few days ago, a gentleman from Prince Edward Island happened to call at my office, and he asked me to bring a certain matter to the attention of the hon. member for Kings (Mr. J. J. Hughes), who I see is not in his seat. This gentleman told me that fishermen on that island started fishing for smelts without licenses for the reason that the officers had no licenses to grant them. They did not fish before the season opened, but they fished before they received licenses; they went on fishing without licenses, and they were fined for doing so. I do not say that my information is correct, but if it be so, it only goes to prove that the business of the department is not being looked after as it should be. The hon. member for Digby (Mr. Jameson) said the other day that the department was getting into a rut and that it was time it got out of it. I do not criticise the minister for finding the rut because the department was in that state when he took office, but there is no excuse for the minister, after five years, not getting out of that rut and placing his department on a business-like basis.

Mr. HAZEN: My hon. friend is quite correct in saying that the system which he is condemning so forcibly to-night—and I do not say without some justification—is the same system that I found in force when I came into office, and which has been in force since Confederation; but if he says that I should have got that system out of the rut in five years, I would like to know what my hon. friend has to say about his own party who were in power for fifteen years and never got that system out of the rut. I have got it out of the rut so far as western Nova Scotia is concerned, where we have made a reorganization that is working satisfactorily. We have a reorganization effected in all the western provinces and in British Columbia, and we hope to effect a reorganization along similar lines in other parts of Nova Scotia, in New Brunswick, in Prince Edward Island, and in a section of Quebec. With regard to Prince Edward Island it is claimed that the habit has been for the fishermen to go on fishing and take out their licenses in the middle of the fishing season or after the season is over. That is a very bad and improper system, and notices were issued by the department—with the desire to get out of the rut that the hon. member refers to—that these licenses would have to be taken out before the season commenced, and these notices were distributed throughout the district where the fishing takes place. In view of that, if fishermen are allowed to continue fishing without taking out licenses, and if no attention is paid to such notices, how is one ever going to get business methods introduced or get out of the rut? In consequence of fishermen having disregarded those instructions, and having violated the law, they were in some cases brought before the Court, and where offences were proved against them, they were fined. I have been informed that the old habit had prevailed so long that people did not think we were in earnest when we said we intended to have a better system, and in view of that, that perhaps it would be a proper act this year, when we were for the first time enforcing the conditions, to have the fines refunded, and this matter is being considered by the department. My hon. friend, however, will see how unwise it would be to allow that system to continue, instead of to put it on more businesslike lines as he himself is advocating in this House to-night. It is represented to me that the statement made by my hon. friend that these licenses could not be procured is not the case. The licenses were there.

Mr. COPP: My information was that these men could not obtain their licenses in time for the opening of the season. As my hon. friend says, they had been in the habit of starting fishing without a license, and they fished for two or three days, not with any idea of evading or infringing upon the law or regulations with regard to the fishing of smelts, but because of the licenses not being procurable. They got the licenses two or three days later on, but informations were laid against them, and fines were imposed of $5 or $10 apiece and costs.

Mr. HAZEN: It was nothing of the kind; the amount they were fined was the amount of the license fee they would have had to pay in any case. Of course, there would be a certain small amount of costs.

Mr. BOULAY (Rimouski) (Translation): Mr. Chairman, since the committee is now considering the salaries of certain employees of the Marine Department, I shall take upon myself to offer a few remarks as to the electoral district of Rimouski-Matane. I have just heard my hon. friends on the other side of the House intimating that in their own constituencies the employees of the department are not as well paid as others in different parts of Nova Scotia, owing to political considerations. I shall point out to the hon. Minister of Marine that in the county of Rimouski, although we are represented by a Conservative member, there are also public servants who are poorly paid, the more so during the present emergency brought on by the high cost of living. For instance, there is at Matane a lighthouse keeper who only gets $400 a year. He is not one of my political friend, but I think that in all fairness his salary is not high enough. A salary of $400 is hardly sufficient to support a family at the present juncture, and that man has to attend to the lighthouse day and night. Beside the salary I have just mentioned he gets $50 a year as telegraph operator, forming a total amount of $450. Now, I will point out to the hon minister that there is in the county of Rimouski another man who is not by any means a Government employee, Mr. McWilliams, who gets $500 either from the Marine Department or the Public Works Department. It is a bonus which has been granted to him by the former Administration. That man is a telegraph operator and reports each vessel the same as the operator at Matane. He gets $500 from the Government merely for reporting vessels, while the other who attends to the lighthouse day in and day out and who moreover acts as telegraph operator gets only $450.

It seems to me that this is a case of discrimination and that it would be an act of justice on the part of the Marine Department to adjust the salary of the operator at Matane. I shall go further and ask that the operator at Father Point be dispensed with.

Hon. Mr. LEMIEUX (Rouville): Has not Mr. McWilliam been dismissed?

Mr. BOULAY: He has been dismissed as lighthouse keeper.

Hon. Mr. LEMIEUX: What was his salary as lighthouse keeper?

Mr. BOULAY: He gets $1,400 I think. In the course of May last I put the following question on the Order Paper:

Q. Has J. McWilliams, G.N.W. telegraph agent at Father Point, any position in the Government telegraph service? If so, what are his duties?

A. The Government telegraph has no wires on the south shore of the St. Lawrence. The work in connection with the shipping and signal service, which is mainly on that side of the river, is performed on the lines of the G.N.W. Telegraph Company, and the Government, to secure efficient service, makes an allowance towards the maintenance of the Father Point telegraph station, which is the most important one on the river. This allowance is $500 a year and has been paid since 1902 to the company's agent, Mr. J. McWilliams.

I am going to continue in English, so that my hon. friend (Mr. Hazen) can understand better. There is another matter about the county of Rimouski to which, while I am on my feet, I desire to call the attention of the minister, and that is the rate allowed for the pay of the board of the pilots. That rate is only twenty-five cents a meal, the same rate that has been allowed for many years past. But for the last two years at any rate, that rate is much too low. The poor hotel-keepers ought not to be called upon to board these men at less than they pay for their provisions, even if they get nothing for their trouble. I think the Government should look into this matter and do justice not only to the public but also to the hotel-keepers.

Mr. CURRIE: Does the Government employ the pilots?

Mr. BOULAY: There is an agreement between the Government and the Pilot Board that the boards of the pilots while at Father Point shall be paid by the Government.

Mr. CURRIE: They draw large sums of money from private corporations do they not? They serve steamer lines and get so much a day, and the Government implement it by a grant of so much for each meal.

Mr. BOULAY: As I understand it, the arrangement was made some years ago between the Government and the Pilot Board. The question of their salaries did not enter into it, but, owing to special circumstances, the Government agreed to allow them 25 cents a meal for their board. With the present prices of food, unless this rate is increased, the situation will be intolerable.

Mr. HAZEN: I understood the hon. member (Mr. Boulay), in the first place, to complain of the salaries paid to guardians on the river at Matane. That is a matter he would have to bring to the attention of the Government of the province of Quebec, because the guardians who protect the river at Matane are appointed by the provincial government and paid by them, or under arrangement with the local government, by the lessees of the river. Regarding the matter at Father Point, to which he refers, this, of course, affects the Marine Department. The Estimates of that department were passed the other evening. I am sorry that the hon. gentleman did not bring this matter forward then, because the Deputy Minister of Marine was present, and more definite information could have been given than I am able to give at this time. I understand that an arrangement was made by which Mr. McWilliams, telegraph operator, is paid $400 a year for supplying certain information of value to the signal service and for information of the boats going up and down the river of value to the agents of those boats. I understand the hon. gentleman to complain, that the amount paid to Mr. McWilliams is in excess of the amount paid to an officer elsewhere. I will look into the matter to see if there is any discrepancy and whether the allowance made to the operator at the other point should be brought up to that paid to Mr. McWilliams. The hon. gentleman also referred to the allowance made for board of the pilots. My attention was called to this matter for the first time few days ago. It was represented to me that years ago an agreement was made that the pilots that go to Father Point, and wait there to take vessels up the St. Lawrence from the sea, were allowed 25 cents a meal. It was represented that, in view of the high cost of living, this rate was not sufficient, and that it ought to be increased to 40 cents a meal. I instructed the officials to look up the file and get the facts, so that I could look into the matter and see just what the liability of Parliament was. As soon as I get the facts I shall be prepared to deal with the case.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I have listened to the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Boulay) with some regret. I thought he had forgotten his recent quarrels with Mr. McWilliams. I regret that Mr. McWilliams was dismissed as lighthouse keeper some years ago, but, of course, the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) had to yield to the pressure which was put upon him. I do not know whether it may have been Mr. McWilliams' sins of omission or commission, but let it be said that the Shipping Federation has stood by Mr. McWilliams from the very beginning. He is a man of great ability and one who thoroughly knows his business. He has fortunately been kept as the telegraph operator. It is admitted amongst those who know him in the province, and particularly amongst the business men, that he is one of the ablest operators in Canada. It is really a pity that Mr. McWilliams was dismissed and that he lost such a good income as the one he had when he was lighthouse keeper. He is highly respected by the business community. He was one of the few English-speaking employees of the Government in the whole district of Quebec. I repeat that it is a pity that such a man was dismissed from office but fortunately the minister did not yield to the pressure put upon him to dismiss him as telegraph operator. If my hon. friend from Rimouski will accept the opinion of such men as Lord Shaughnessy, or the president of the Shipping Federation in Montreal, he will know that Mr. McWilliams is one of the safest, one of the ablest, men they had in the service. I think my hon. friend ought now to insist that Mr. McWilliams be restored to his former position. I know that he had some petty quarrels with him but after all a man is a man and in times like the present we ought to forget these old feuds. I regret exceedingly that Mr. McWilliams' salary has been curtailed to the extent that it has and my hon. friend should do an act of justice, be a man, and have him restored to his former position.

Mr. BOULAY (Translation): I am rather surprised that the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) should attempt to vindicate the worst case of political partisanship extant in the county of Rimouski and Matane. If ever public officer was rightfully dismissed, Mr. McWilliams is the man. He was for a period of thirty-six years in the service of the Government and he acknowledged to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries that he had been an active political worker against the Conservative party during that period. I believe the Liberal party would not have been slow in dismissing him had he worked against them.

Hon. Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure) (Translation): A fault confessed is half pardoned.

Mr. BOULAY (Translation): The Liberal party has never been very much in the habit of pardoning, and I do not think he would have been pardoned under such conditions.

Hon. Mr. LEMIEUX (Translation): It is never too late to reform.

Mr. BOULAY (Translation): I may say to the hon.member for Rouville that should he wish to vindicate political partisanship, he might surely select a better case; Mr. McWilliams' case is the worst to be found not only in the county of Rimouski, but throughout the province of Quebec.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Will the hon. gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. BOULAY (Translation): Please speak French.

The Hon. Mr. LEMIEUX (Translation): Will the hon. gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. BOULAY (Translation): Certainly.

Hon. Mr. LEMIEUX (Translation): Apart from politics, is it not a fact that Mr. McWilliams was a first rate man, perfectly well posted and known as such to the shippers?

Mr. BOULAY (Translation): I cannot say anything as to his qualifications and his standing with the shippers; all I know is that Mr. McWilliams apparently performed his work fairly well, though he ignored the regulations of the Department of Marine and Fisheries in reference to political partisanship. To my knowledge he even went so far as to start a riot against a Conservative candidate in 1904. As to his qualifications, the hon. member for Rouville has just stated that he was a first rate man and that he should never have been dismissed. To that, I may reply, that his successor is vastly superior to him, as he knows a great deal more about machinery. When that newly appointed man reached the lighthouse after Mr. McWilliams' departure, he found the signalling apparatus utterly out of order. I noticed the fact myself when I went to Father Point.

I have no hesitation in saying that as a telegraph operator he was perfectly qualified, but I do not see why he should receive $500 for that work, while Mr. Banville, of Matane, who is quite as capable, is allowed only $50 for the same work.

Hon. Mr. LEMIEUX (Translation): Is not the station at Father Point of greater importance than that at Matane?

Mr. BOULAY (Translation): The Father Point station receives and sends out more telegrams than the one at Matane, but most of these telegrams are sent out by travellers on board the vessels, and the agent is paid a commission on them, over and above the salary he gets from the Government. As regards the signalling of ships, the Father Point operator has no more to do than the one at Matane.

In justice to Mr. Banville who, by the way, is not a political friend of mine, I think the Department of Marine and Fisheries should grant him an increase such as to enable him to live comfortably; and that increase will be well merited, while Mr McWilliams gets $500 which he does not earn, though it was granted to him by the previous Administration.

I happen to know something of the inner story of those representations made by the shipping federation in favour of Mr. McWilliams; and the hon. member for Rouville is also well posted in that regard. He knows that Mr. McWilliams speaks both languages perfectly, and is universally known, besides being an expert at self-advertising.

Hon. Mr. LEMIEUX: (Translation) Is he not an honest man?

Mr. BOULAY (Translation): He managed to ingratiate himself with the Shipping Federation and many of the shippers, and obtained from them letters of approval when dismissal was staring him in the face; he even succeeded in inducing our respected bishop of Rimouski to write on his behalf. That is some evidence of the wiliness of that gentleman, but not proof of any superiority of his over the man who has been appointed in his stead. I, for one, knowing both men personally, I may say, without prejudice, that the newly appointed man is greatly superior to his predecessor.

Mr. LOGGIE: I wish to ask the minister if he considers $120 a fair salary for a man who travels 10,000 miles, as I see in one case in the Auditor General's Report?

Mr. HAZEN: He gets ten cents a mile for travelling.

Mr. LOGGIE: He gets $1,008 for travelling expenses. Is $120 a reasonable remuneration for a man who will give sufficient time to travel with a horse and waggon from Sydney to Vancouver and back again?

Mr. HAZEN: That includes ten cents a mile for the distance he travels, and in addition to that his living expenses while he is travelling, the baiting of his horse, etc. That method of payment was adopted many years ago, and has been continued. I do not say it is a desirable system, but it has long been in existence. I have no doubt that when that plan was first adopted the idea in mind was that the payment of the ten cents a mile would be an inducement to the man appointed to keep moving, and so to cover the greatest possible distance in his district, which would tend to make his inspection more useful.

Mr. LOGGIE: This seems an unreasonable proportion. In the same district another man received $509 for travelling expenses, which would mean another 5,000 miles. So in that district, which I know to some extent, these two men seem to have travelled 15,000 miles, and between them they received in salary $260.

Mr. SINCLAIR: What duties are performed by Mr. Ward Fisher?

Mr. HAZEN: He is the assistant in the department to Mr. Founds, the Superintendent of Fisheries.

Mr. McKENZIE: And where does he travel?

Mr. HAZEN: He does not do very much travelling nowadays, but he has been sent on several trips to investigate matters that have arisen in the Maritime Provinces. He was sent down to look into certain breaches of the legislation that were alleged in Prince Edward Island and to report on them.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I see his travelling expenses for the year were $438. How many trips did he make to the Maritime Provinces?

Mr. HAZEN: Whatever expenses there are charged are subject to be audited by the accountant of the department.

Mr. SINCLAIR: What is his salary?

Mr. HAZEN: $2,100.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Would the minister kindly give me the regulations as to the minimum size of lobsters in the Maritime Provinces? I am anxious to have them placed on Hansard.

Mr. HAZEN: We shall allow one item to stand and I shall place on record the regulations showing the size limit, close seasons, etc.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Some time ago a dealer in St. John showed me samples of lobsters that were allowed to be caught in Nova Scotia. They were about three or four inches in length. It seemed a sin to destroy these very small lobsters, long before they were capable of reproduction. Several years ago I asked a question in regard to a condition which was being inserted in licenses for catching fish in the waters of Charlotte county. These regulations were inserted by the minister before the provincial election of 1912.

Mr. HAZEN: After that, I think.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The minister provided by regulation that fishermen should be obliged to give the Canadian canners the preference; even although an American buyer might be alongside his boat, if a Canadian canner made an equal offer to the fisherman he would be obliged to give the preference to the Canadian. There was quite a rumpus about it in Charlotte, and just before the provincial election my hon. friend suspend the order.

Mr. HAZEN: That clause was put in at the time on the recommendation of Mr. Calder, who for a good many years past has been inspector in the counties of Charlotte and St. John. A large sum was being invested in a sardine factory at St. Annes and it was Mr. Calder's view, which was confirmed by the department, that it was desirable with a view of getting fish from our waters manufactured in Canada, that some preference should be given in order that this factory might be able to get plenty of material to manufacture the sardines. Unfortunately, however, the factory did not prove a financial success. It hardly got under way before it got into difficulties, and the result was that, after reconsideration of the matter, that clause was taken out of the license.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Its operation was suspended before the factory ceased operations; it was suspended just prior to the provincial elections of 1912.

Mr. HAZEN: I do not remember the date.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I wonder that it would not impress itself on the minister.

Mr. HAZEN: I do not think there was anything that, in the language of the Minister of Finance, would synchronize.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Oh, they synchronized, because there was a great deal of dissatisfaction among the men and an order went out from the department suspending the operation of this regulation until further orders. I was curious as to what happened afterwards.

Mr. HAZEN: It has never been restored.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I am sorry that the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Hartt) is not present, but he will have an opportunity of seeing my remarks in Hansard. My hon. friend will find among the correspondence in his department and in a return which he brought down upon my motion, a letter from the deputy minister asking Mr. Hartt's opinion upon this regulation, whether it would be advisable to put it into force, showing that the opinion of the member was being taken; and the minister will also find in that correspondence a letter of a very extraordinary character from Mr. Hartt, the member for Charlotte, in which the hon. member approves of its being done, but recommends that new licenses be issued and that this restriction be printed instead of being written in so that it would not attract the special attention of the fisherman getting a license. That is a curious letter to come from an hon. member. I ask if my hon. friend's attention was ever called to it and if he ever took any steps with regard to the matter.

Mr. HAZEN: My attention was never called to it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The hon. minister would not approve of that extraordinary position. I trust he will, at a later date, refer to the letter, and ask the hon. member from Charlotte to explain to the House, if he can, why he should have written such a letter. If it meant anything at all it was intended to deceive—perhaps not to deceive, but to shut the eyes of people—

Mr. HAZEN: When was it sent?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Either two or three sessions ago. That evidently was written with a knowledge on the part of the hon. gentleman that the regulation would be likely to provoke hostility among the fishermen, and the department was advised to have new licenses issued with this restriction in print, so that it would not attract the attention of the fishermen, as it would if it were written in the license. I intended last session to bring it to the attention of my hon. friend and the hon. gentleman from Charlotte.

Mr. McKENZIE: Referring to Ward Fisher, I find his name figuring in the Auditor General's Report, as a fishery inspector. Is that the same Ward Fisher, of Shelburne?

Mr. HAZEN: He was inspector in Nova Scotia before he was brought to the department here.

Mr. McKENZIE: How did he get transferred from the position of inspector to the hon. minister's department? Did he go through the hands of the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. HAZEN: Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE: Passed his examination?

Mr. HAZEN: Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE: How old was he when he passed the examination?

Mr. HAZEN: Forty-three.

[Mr. Pugsley.]

Mr. McKENZIE: Is there an age limit in the Civil Service?

Mr. SINCLAIR: Yes, thirty-five.

Mr. HAZEN: He came in as an expert.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Under section 21.

Mr. McKENZIE: I understand he is a God-fearing man, who knows theology well. Is that the extent of his expert knowledge?

Mr. HAZEN: I have always considered it an admirable thing to have a thorough knowledge of Holy Writ, and a man who is a good fisher of men should also become a good official in the Fisheries Department.

Mr. McKENZIE: There is authority for saying that those who preach the gospel should live by the gospel, and that the servant is worthy of his hire, and I suppose he made a failure of preaching and thought he was fit for the department of my hon. friend.

Mr. HAZEN: That would not be a natural conclusion.

Mr. MARCIL: Merely an inference.

Mr. McKENZIE: That is the same man?

Mr. HAZEN: Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE: And he came in under section 21?

Mr. HAZEN: Yes. My recollection is that we asked the Civil Service Commission for an officer. They advertised for applicants; he was an applicant and the commission stated that he possessed the necessary qualifications and gave him the certificate.

Mr. McKENZIE: I understand that when you appoint a man under section 21 it is largely a matter for the minister, apart from the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. HAZEN: Oh, no.

Mr. McKENZIE: If he passes as an expert, he does not require to pass an examination.

Mr. HAZEN: They have to endorse him. They consider whether he has the technical knowledge requisite; they endorse him and he passes through the Civil Service examination, as many others do.

Mr. McKENZIE: Section 21 of the Civil Service Act reads:

If the deputy head reports that the knowledge and ability requisite for the position are wholly or in part professional, technical or otherwise peculiar, the Governor in Council, upon the recommendation of the head of the department based on the report in writing of the deputy head, may appoint a person to the position without competitive examination and without reference to the age limit, provided the said person obtains from the Commission a certificate, to be given with or without examination, as is determined by the regulations of the Commission, that he possesses the requisite knowledge and ability and is duly qualified as to health, character and habits.

What was the technical knowledge which was required in the department, and which this man possessed?

Mr. HAZEN: That was the knowledge which would be obtained by practical experience in connection with fishery work. Mr. Fisher had that practical knowledge through his experience as inspector in Nova Scotia. To appoint a man who had no knowledge of fisheries to assist the Fisheries Commission would be an absurdity. We wanted a capable man and applied to the Civil Service Commission for him. They advertised for such a man and there were a number of applicants. The view of the Civil Service Commission was that Mr. Fisher possessed the qualifications necessary for the position to a greater degree than any of the other applicants, and, therefore, on the report of the deputy minister, Mr. Desbarats, being made, as required by the Act the appointment was made.

Mr. McKENZIE: Can the minister tell us how long it was between the time this man gave up his calling as a preacher and the time he qualified as an expert in fisheries?

Mr. HAZEN: I have not that knowledge.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am told that he distinguished himself, not so much as a preacher, but as a politician, and as a political preacher and ward heeler, he brought himself conspicuously to the notice of the Conservative party, and that that was his recommendation and he required very little else. His expert knowledge of fisheries, which he gained perhaps in a year as inspector, was very slight indeed, perhaps they rubbed him over a codfish and he smelt of fish, and that is about all the knowledge that he possessed. I find in the Auditor General's Report a name which attracts my attention, W. E. Fraser, of Liverpool, Nova Scotia. It is the wandering official of my hon. friend's department that I met down at Cape Smoky in the county of Victoria, in the midwinter of 1912, in the midst of a local election?

Mr. HAZEN: I do not know, I am sure.

Mr. McKENZIE: I asked this question before, and the hon. minister told me yes, this was the same man, and I am curious to know whether, in his travelling expenses, he has been dividing and adding so much each year to make up for what it cost him to go down to Cape Smoky.

Mr. HAZEN: I do not know if he was our officer then.

Mr. McKENZIE: I think it is strong evidence that he was the officer of the department both before and after that.

Mr. SINCLAIR: What did he do at Smoky?

Mr. McKENZIE: He told them that he had been sent there as a special officer of the Militia Department. I assume that he was the expert whom the Minister of Marine lent to the Department of Militia to go down there and talk about the $100 that each man was to get as his share of the Fenian Raid bounty. He made a specialty during that campaign of telling the old men on that shore that he had the authority and the money to pay them a share of the Fenian Raid bounty, the only condition being their signing a declaration that they would vote for the candidate of the Tory party. That was sworn to in the Supreme Court at Baddeck by one man to whom he offered the money. I have brought this matter to the attention of the minister on previous occasions, but he still thinks the gentleman in question to be a very deserving official. I should not be surprised if his salary should be raised as compensation for the excellent service which he rendered.

I should like to get some idea from the minister as to the duties of the fishery overseers. I find that Mr. Hellen, of the district of Cape North, whose salary is $120, gets a travelling allowance of $262.49. Cape North is a very small district, and unless the overseer is busy all the time, I do not think he could earn that much money. As the member for Westmorland has said, these men should be paid on a more businesslike basis. Ingonish is also a comparatively small district. The overseer, Mr. Donovan, receives a salary of $60, but he travels quite a distance to earn it, for his allowance for travel and outlay last year was $389.32. Mr. McDonald, of Plaster, North Shore, gets a salary of $60, and last year his travel and outlay was $187.51. I think I was in error in saying that the officer for Middle River was Mr. McDonald. The member for Inverness informs me that Mr. McDonald has been replaced by a Mr.

McKenzie. I should like to know whether Mr. McDonald resigned or was dismissed; I know that he is still living in the district and that he was appointed by this Government. Another man whose district is near the others that I have mentioned gets a salary of $60 and received $220.92 last year for travelling expenses. These districts are all quite small. It is possible that the fishery officers have much travelling to do; if they are earning the money, it is all right, but if they are not, they should not be getting it. How is this mileage made up? Is there any check on it?

Mr. HAZEN: Formerly there were two fishery officers did the work now performed by Mr. Hellen, but the districts were amalgamated, and given to Mr. Hellen. The other inspectors received $60 each; he receives $120. The officers are allowed 10 cents a mile for their actual travelling expenses in addition to whatever expenses they may incur by way of board and the keeping of their horses. They are under the direction of the inspector for the district, by whom their accounts are checked before they are sent forward for payment. The fishery officer himself certifies to the correctness of the account before it goes to the inspector. The inspector goes over it, and if he thinks an improper charge is made, he cuts it down. It is then passed on to the accountant of the department. That is the system that has prevailed for a great many years.

Mr. McKENZIE: What travelling had to be done in Ingonish last year?

Mr. HAZEN: I shall be very glad, if the hon. gentleman is interested, to produce the accounts of the inspector showing the returns made from month to month, so that the hon. gentleman may examine them for himself.

Mr. McKENZIE: Are these inspectors expected to look after the lobster factories only?

Mr. HAZEN: They are appointed in connection with all fisheries.

Mr. McKENZIE: What other fisheries would they have to attend to in a district like Ingonish?

Mr. HAZEN: A lot of trap fishing is done about Ingonish under license.

Mr. McKENZIE: What has the inspector to do after the licenses have been issued?

Mr. HAZEN: From month to month he has to make returns of the fish that are caught. It is his duty to see that no illegal fishing takes place.

Mr. McKENZIE: That would not require any travelling as far as Ingonish is concerned, because all the fishermen land at the same place.

Mr. HAZEN: I cannot speak of my own knowledge about that.

Mr. SINCLAIR: In regard to the men in western Nova Scotia who get $150 for the expense of keeping a horse, as well as certain travelling expenses, I may point out that the salary of Mr. W. E. Fraser is $750 and that his travelling expenses last year were $665.78. Deducting $150 for the keeping of his horse, there remains $515.78, or about $1.50 a day, for expenses not including his salary and the keep of his horse.

Mr. HAZEN: That would be for his board, such railway fare as he might have to incur, and everything of that sort.

Mr. SINCLAIR: He is not supposed to use his own horse except when it would suit him to do so.

Mr. HAZEN: He is supposed to use it in places where it is more suitable to use a horse than the railway. In some places it would be cheaper to use the railway.

Mr. SINCLAIR: As we know something about this man's career, and as we would like to have the details, at the same time as the minister furnishes the details for my hon. friend (Mr. McKenzie), would he give us the information in regard to Mr. W. E. Fraser?

Mr. BOULAY: I would like to have an explanation from the minister in regard to the lighthouse keeper at Matane. I understood the minister to say that he was an officer of the Quebec Government.

Mr. HAZEN: My hon. friend was, of course, speaking in a language with which I am not very familiar, but I understood him to complain about the salary paid to the guardian on the Matane river.

Mr. BOULAY: No, the lighthouse keeper. The man of whom I was speaking was Mr. Banville, the lighthouse keeper at Matane.

Mr. HAZEN: I misunderstood my hon. friend.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The man is a good Liberal.

Mr. HAZEN: What does my hon. friend say about him?

Mr. BOULAY: His salary is only $400 a year, and he has to attend to that lighthouse during the summer season night and day. He receives far too small a salary for the work he is doing in comparison with the salaries paid to other lighthouse keepers.

Mr. HAZEN: The lighthouses are divided into classes, and each man is paid the salary of the class in which his lighthouse is placed. That class depends upon the importance and character of the light, the work that is to be performed and the qualifications necessary. In lights of a very high order, you need a man of much higher technical knowledge and skill than you do in a case where the light is not in the same class. This gentleman is getting the salary of the class in which his light is placed. It may be that there is an improper classification; that he ought to be in a higher class. I will have inquiry made into the matter, but I think inquiry will show that the light is properly classified, and that the man is receiving the salary for that class, no matter in what part of the country he is situated.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Some days ago I received a letter from a citizen of Matane complaining about the department having changed the range lights. I think white lights were replaced by red lights, much to the disadvantage of the mariners. I am informed that the entrance at the mouth of the river Matane is very difficult, and that the old lights, which were provided by the department, were quite acceptable and much better for the mariners. Letters have been sent to the department inquiring why the change was made, and no one has been able to give a reason.

Mr. HAZEN: I answered that question in this House the other day. Letters came from people in the neighbourhood of the Matane who were interested; the question was referred to the department by the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Boulay). In the ordinary course of routine the matter was referred to the Lighthouse Board for investigation and report, and having investigated the matter, the Lighthouse Board recommended a change which has been carried into effect. Since the change has been made some complaints have been made by people who think it would be better to return to the old system. My hon. friend spoke as though a red light was a better light than a white light. A white light is seen better at a distance than a red light, and the mariners prefer a white light. There are places where for certain reasons you cannot put a white light, and you have to put a red light.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I quite agree with the minister that a white light is much better than a red light, but I am making no complaint personally. I have received correspondence upon the subject, and if the Lighthouse Board has passed judgment in the matter I have nothing more to say, but as fresh complaints have been made I would be glad if my hon. friend would ask the board to look into the matter again and see if the complaints are warranted.

Mr. BOULAY: I know all the particulars. When the red lights were put in, we believed they would be a great improvement to navigation. Recently I was speaking to some sailors that frequent the port of Matane, and they told me that they would not, on any consideration, have those lights removed. Those two range lights have been put in to improve the navigation of the harbour. Before they were put in there was a white light at one end of the wharves. I understand that this white light has been removed, and Doctor Bouillon, for one, wants it replaced. I never requested that this white light be taken away, but I insisted strongly upon the two red range lights being put on, and all the sailors think that it is a great improvement.

Mr. MARCIL: I would not like this interesting discussion on fishery inspectors to close without having a word with the minister, because he told the committee some time ago that this reorganization had also been extended to a part of Quebec.

Mr. HAZEN: My hon. friend misunderstood me. I said that a reorganization had been made effective in western Nova Scotia and that we hoped soon to get it extended to other places.

Mr. MARCIL: I wish to point out that the officers in Quebec are not so well treated as those in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. I find that Mr. Bouillon received for travel and outlay $5.88. I know him very well; he is connected with a large fishing firm down there. I do not know what he could have done for $5.88. I pass on to Mr. William Henry of Bonaventure East, who received for travel and outlay $64.40, and Mr. James Poirier of Shigawake, who received for travel and outlay $87.20. Does this comprise salary as well as travel and outlay?

Mr. HAZEN: Mr. Bouillon has practically no travelling to do at all. He is employed for the purpose of sending us statistics of fisheries in his immediate district.

Mr. MARCIL: I would like to know whether these men are paid a fixed salary.

Mr. HAZEN: I fancy that the cases referred to are those of men employed in connection with the fishing bounties who are appointed according to the number of bounty claims that they take.

Mr. McKENZIE: I understand that the hon. minister will furnish me with a copy of the recommendations to council on the appointment of Mr. Ward Fisher, and the Order in Council.

Mr. HAZEN: I shall lay them on the Table.

Mr. KYTE: With regard to the bounty claim work, is that done by the fishery officer?

Mr. HAZEN: In nearly all districts.

Mr. KYTE: I think it has been taken away from Mr. Boudreault, the fishery officer at Petit de Grat.

Mr. HAZEN: I think there were complaints as to the manner in which Mr. Boudreau discharged the duty, and it was thought undesirable to place the work in his hands again, and my recollection is that he has ceased to be an officer of the department. I believe that his successor also is named Boudreau.

Mr. MARCIL: Has an appointment been made in the case of Mr. Jos. Riendeau of the Montreal district, who died?

Mr. HAZEN: No appointment has been made.

Mr. MARCIL: Who does the work formerly done by the late Commander Wakeham?

Mr. HAZEN: Dr. Bernier.

Mr. MARCIL: I see here the name of Captain Chalifour of L'Islet who was paid $300 as an inspector. What is that for?

Mr. HAZEN: Captain Chalifour in addition to his other duties, acted as inspector after the death of Commander Wakeham, and before the appointment of Dr. Bernier.

Mr. MARCIL: Does his salary remain what it was at his appointment?

[Mr. Marcil.]

Mr. HAZEN: It has not been increased.

Oyster culture, $6,000.

Mr. KYTE: Will the minister say what is being done in this service?

Mr. HAZEN: My hon. friend will find a full report of the work done last year at page 300 of the Fisheries Report.

Mr. MACDONALD: An oyster bed was established at Cariboo in my county. What has been the result?

Mr. HAZEN: I understand that an experimental bed was planted there, under the direction of Mr. Kemp, six or seven years ago. My attention has not been called to it. Some years ago, as my hon. friend will remember, the provincial government, under agreement with the Dominion Government, took control over the barren bottoms, some of which are now leased to private parties for the planting of oyster beds. I fancy that the bed to which the hon. gentleman refers passed to the provincial government at the same time.

Mr. COPP: Has the Dominion Government supervision of the oyster beds recently planted along the shores of New Brunswick?

Mr. HAZEN: No.

Mr. COPP: They are managed by private companies?

Mr. HAZEN: Yes, under lease from the government of New Brunswick. There was a question of jurisdiction as to these barren bottoms, and five years ago we made an arrangement by which we gave over to the provinces authority to deal with them. It is under arrangement with the provincial government that these are now taken over and cultivated by private companies.

Mr. MACDONALD: Then, what has the Dominion Government to do with oyster culture now?

Mr. HAZEN: We control the public beds.

Mr. MACDONALD: How do you distinguish the public beds from the others? The particular place to which I refer is in a public harbour.

Mr. HAZEN: The public beds are those in which the oysters grown naturally, and which are resorted to by the fishermen to rake oysters; private beds are those where the oysters are planted on barren bottoms under arrangement with the government of the province. The oysters in these latter beds cannot be taken by parties other than those who own the rights, but access to the public beds in Price Edward Island, New Brunswick or Nova Scotia is open to those who have licenses from the Dominion Government to rake oysters. These public beds are being looked after and kept in order, and as far as possible improved, by Mr. Kemp, the advisor of the department in regard to oysters.

Mr. MACDONALD: By permission of the minister and the committee, I desire to call attention to another matter, as I was not here the other night when, perhaps, it might more properly have been brought up. I have a letter from a gentleman in Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island, who is interested in an account for food material supplied to Mr. Byrnes, steward of the Minto, on 24th November, 1913. The amount of the account is $74.91, and the food supplies were procured to serve the passengers on the D.G.S. Minto. He was an official of the department, and it is stated in the correspondence that he gave bonds to the department that all these accounts would be paid. It is said that the bondsmen were John Messerny and Maurice Blake, of Charlottetown. I do not know what became of Mr. Burns, but he did not pay all the accounts, and they are still owing. The department said to those who supplied these goods: "You will have to go and collect the accounts yourselves." Subsequently, it appears that they said that they had so much money in their hands and they were making a pro rata division. These are the facts as they have been presented to me. It is hardly fair to people who supply goods to the Government steamers, in the belief that they are being supplied to the Government, and, therefore, that they have the Government to look to for payment should be told afterwards that the persons who purchased these goods, and who had all the ear-marks of purchasing for the Government, was purchasing for his own account, and when it turned out that he was financially embarrassed the Government would not see that the accounts were paid where the goods were actually furnished. I have read the correspondence and I think I am fairly stating the case. I would not ask the minister to give me an answer to-night, but if he has another item relating to marine matters I would like him to get the facts and let me know why it is that the parties who supplied goods to Government steamers are not able to get their money.

Mr. HAZEN: I think my hon. friend has stated the facts of the case correctly. This man, however, was not an official of the Government. The Government made a contract with him to supply food to the officers and crew on board this Government boat. For a great many years a system prevailed by which the Government appointed a steward on a Government boat and the steward purchased for it, charging the accounts to the Government. It was found that that system resulted in a great deal of extravagance and a number of years ago a different system was entered into under which the Government made a contract with the steward who undertook to supply, according to a bill of fare that had been laid down, the officers and men at so much a meal. The Government, every year now, gives notice in the newspapers in the localities that the boat will visit that the Government will not be responsible for the bills contracted by this steward. In the first year or two of this new system these notices were not given and it was represented to us on a number of occasions that stewards got credit through representing that they were acting on behalf of the Government, and that they went away, or disappeared, or did not pay their bills and the people came and claimed these bills from the Government. I remember that when the first of these items was claimed, and before public notice was given in the newspapers, I got authority by an estimate in Parliament to pay to these people seventy-five per cent of their claims, it being felt that was a fair amount to pay and that they would have to forego any profit that they would have made. We then undertook to get bonds for these stewards. We found it impossible to get any guarantee company to guarantee them. However, they gave individual bonds. Mr. Burns gave the bond of two gentlemen resident in Charlottetown and when we demanded payment of the bills left unpaid there was objection made. Then we placed the matter in the hands of the Department of Justice and I understand that an arrangement has been come to by which the amount has been paid and it was distributed pro rata among the creditors of the steward. That is my recollection of the circumstances but I will endeavour to look into the case and see whether my recollection is absolutely correct or not. I have no doubt that in some cases people may have been deceived and may have thought that this Government was at the back of these people and was responsible. But in none of the cases where they claimed that, we found on investigation that the charges on the books were not to the Government or to the ship but to the individual and the evidence was very clear that they knew that the individual was simply a contractor of the Government and was himself responsible and that the Government was not responsible. I have stated the facts as I remember them but we have a marine item standing and I will give them more accurately to my hon. friend.

Mr. MACDONALD: As to the Justice Department, the gentleman who writes me says that Mr. Macdonald, who was the agent of the Department of Justice, told him that after he had issued the papers he received a wire from Ottawa instructing him to discontinue the proceedings. Then he states that this spring the agent of the department offered fifty cents on the dollar to certain creditors and that quite a number of creditors were in favour of agreeing to the settlement rather than waiting. In the case of J. P. Crockett & Co. of Charlottetown, they had a bill of $450 and attached certain moneys of the Government and were paid in full. Messrs. Drake & Co. also should be paid in full.

Mr. HAZEN: I will be very glad to look into it.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I see in the Auditor General's Report that this item, No. 253, covers the services of Dr. Hjort who was employed, I understand, by the department for some months in 1915. I was very glad to know that the minister was able to secure the services of Dr. Hjort as he is one of the most eminent men in Europe on questions relating to the fisheries. I believe he has been deputy minister of fisheries in Norway and he has written some scientific works which are greatly valued by fishing interests. Incidentally, there is no country in Europe that has done more to give practical information to the fishermen than Norway. I find in the Canadian Fisherman a very interesting item in this connection which I would like to read to the minister:

Fishing By Telephone.

A strange way of discovering the whereabouts of fish is practised in some parts of Norway, and the method was discovered by a clever Norwegian. A microphone, which is an instrument that will transmit the slightest sound, is lowered into the water from a fishing-boat and a wire from the microphone is attached to a telephone fixed in the boat. The operator takes the receiver of the telephone and places it to his ear, ready to signal to the fishermen when he hears the least sound beneath the waters, and the fishing-boat is then immediately steered in the direction whence the sounds come. The result is—a splendid haul.

As cod, herrings, and mackerel swim in enormous schools, their passage through the water causes a rushing sound which is clearly heard by the fishermen, who immediately steer in the required direction and let down their nets.

Has the minister heard of this very interesting invention and has he made any experiments, and with what results?

Mr. HAZEN: I never heard of it until my attention was called a short time ago to the article which has just been read. It is certainly a most interesting subject.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Will the minister take some interest in the question?

Mr. HAZEN: I will ask my fishery officers to look into the matter.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Have the services of Dr. Hjort been dispensed with?

Mr. HAZEN: He is no longer with us, he would not stay any longer.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Has he made his final report?

Mr. HAZEN: Yes, and the report is, I think, in the printer's hands now, and will soon be ready for distribution.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is the minister doing anything for cold storage for bait this year?

Mr. HAZEN: Nothing more than in previous years. We are following on the same lines, but we have no new projects.

Fisheries—To provide for the reduction of dogfish by means of experimental works or otherwise, $60,000.

Mr. McKENZIE: What does the minister propose to do with this dogfish since he has adopted him into the family and christened him with a new name?

Mr. HAZEN: I fancy it will be a few years before we can convert all the dogfish into food. We will continue the operation of the reduction plants.

Mr. TURGEON: What about the dogfish reduction works at Shippegan? Last year the minister advertised it for sale.

Mr. HAZEN: It was sold by public tender to the highest bidder and handed over to him.

Mr. TURGEON: On the condition that it be operated?

Mr. HAZEN: No, it is to be discontinued.

Mr. KYTE: Has the dogfish reduction plant at Canso been able to take care of all dogfish offered each season?

Mr. HAZEN: Yes, and it could have taken care of many more.

Mr. KYTE: What is the price now paid for dogfish?

Mr. HAZEN: It is $4 a ton.

Mr. A. W. CHISHOLM: The minister says that the plant at Canso was able to take care of all dogfish available. How far along the coast does the minister go for the dogfish?

Mr. HAZEN: It is brought in to us by the fishermen and we collect it at different places. We go across as far as Arichat and down along the coast. The works took in last year 1,092 tons, 1,680 pounds. From that was produced 134½ tons of fish scrap and 8,876 gallons of oil. The Clark's harbour plant took in of raw material 164 tons, 774 pounds and produced from that of offal 111 tons and livers 228¾ buckets. These works produced 34 tons, 450 pounds of fish scrap and 693½ gallons of dogfish oil and 131½ gallons of cod oil.

Mr. A. W. CHISHOLM: My information is that the department sent a boat down the coast of Inverness as far as Port Hood to gather dogfish twice during the whole season. It must be apparent to the minister that he cannot expect to get much dogfish by taking two trips in three months. It is difficult to keep any quantity of fish for two or three weeks in the hot season, particularly fish of this kind without a proper cold storage protection.

Mr. HAZEN: My understanding is that they keep in touch from the factory with the buyer down in that locality and when there is enough accumulated to make it worth while they send down a boat to get it. Some seasons two trips are made, and some seasons more.

Mr. A. W. CHISHOLM: The fact is that there is no inducement offered to the fishermen there to catch any quantity of the fish. When the minister says that the plant at Canso is capable of taking care of all fish available, I think he is not quite correct in his statement or acquainted with the industry. The capacity of the plant at Canso is 50 tons a day. If it is a good thing to continue this industry, my idea is that it should be extended a little. If there is any justification for keeping it going there is three times the justification for establishing plants along the coast of Inverness county where there is abundance of fish available. To say that a plant with a capacity of 50 tons a day would take care of all fish caught along the coast of Inverness is an extreme exaggeration saying the least. There are thousands of tons of fish available if reasonable prices are paid and proper means of transportation facilities provided.

Mr. HAZEN: Perhaps I did not use a very fortunate word. I meant to say that we were able to take care of all the dogfish offered that was available to us during this year. I do not mean to say that it could take care of all the dogfish that could possibly be got together. I perhaps used a word that conveyed a wrong meaning.

Mr. A. W. CHISHOLM: If the minister had a system of collecting these dogfish—

Mr. McKENZIE: Grayfish, since yesterday.

Mr. HAZEN: The Act has not passed yet.

Mr. A. W. CHISHOLM: I think the change is a good one. I think if the minister proposes to continue the operation of the plant at Canso, it would be necessary for him to send boats along the coast of Inverness to gather fish and also along the shores of Richmond county. I have made that suggestion to the minister several times. I would suggest that he establish a plant along the coast of Inverness county for two reasons: From the standpoint of the fishermen it would be really a great relief. I had the promise of the late Government that this would be done in the winter of 1911 had the change come in the fall of that year and my hon. friend took charge of the Department. Our fishermen suffer for about two and one-half months from the ravages of these fish. It is impossible for them to carry on their fishing from the time the dogfish strike the shores of Inverness until they leave. We cannot keep our nets in the water, nor can we fish with lines. That is the in-shore fishermen from the straits of Canso to Cape North. It would be an important thing for them during the period when they cannot fish, to catch these dogfish and get a market for them. There is an abundance to keep two or three plants going, and there are plenty of fishermen along the shores who, in the season when they are doing nothing on account of the destruction of their gear by these fish, could devote their energies to catching them. I am also approaching this question from the angle of the farmer. We are told that the products of the dogfish plants is very valuable just now; that fertilizer is very scarce and difficult to get. This is proving to be a first-class article as a fertilizer, and if these plants were multiplied there would be no difficulty in getting a market for the product. In fact the farmers through that country are looking for fertilizer, and have found great difficulty this year and last year in getting it.

The minister might look into this matter, and find what it costs to put up a plant, and, if a plant can be erected fairly economically, I think it would be a first class idea to start the plant somewhere else. I am not selfish enough to say that it should be along the coast of Inverness. The reason I mentioned Inverness was because we are suffering from dogfish, and we need the fertilizer and another reason why I now renew my application for a reduction plant in my county is that I had made arrangements with the Laurier Government to have such a plant built in my county and it would have been built in 1912 had the election of 1911 not taken place a year and a half before the usual time. The demand was not then as great as now from the standpoint of more farm production, as the country had a liberal supply of fertilizer. I desire to emphasize as strongly as possible the necessity of establishing these plants all along the shore. I refer to the counties of Inverness, Victoria and Richmond. The minister last year gave us the reason why he could not see his way clear to establish any more of these plants. He said it was because the plant at Canso cost a great deal. I am of the opinion—and my opinion is based on information I have been gathering from time to time—that these plants can be erected for a much smaller figure than the amount paid for the Canso plant, and I may point out that, when this Canso plant was erected, the proposition was in the experimental stage, and, since then, a great deal of information has been gathered with regard to the construction of the plant, and it is generally supposed by those who know something about it that a plant can be erected for much less any place along the coast. I claim, on that account, that the minister could very well appropriate an amount sufficient to erect a couple of those plants, and, in doing this, he would be rendering great assistance to the fishermen and farmers along the coast. I have addressed a few observations of this kind to the minister on several occasions. I do not think my efforts have produced very great results, but I believe in persisting, and I think the cause a sufficiently good one to warrant me in continuing my efforts, and probably in the end the minister will see that there is a great necessity for these plants. I hope he will take the matter into consideration and give it a little more thought than evidently he has given it in the past, and I will expect better results. If there is any great reason why this should not be done, I would like to hear it. So far, I have heard no good reason.

Mr. HAZEN: I do not want the hon. gentleman to think for a moment that I do not pay respect to suggestions made by him or by any other member, because I do, but I am sorry I cannot hold out much hope to my hon. friend that there will be any increase in the number of these factories. The policy of building these factories was inaugurated in 1904, when Mr. Prefontaine was Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and the expectation then was that the operation of these factories would prove so successful that private individuals would be glad to follow the example of the Government, and establish factories at different points for the purpose of manufacturing fertilizers, to be sold to the farmers throughout the country. This has not occurred. It may be that individuals could manage these plants perhaps more economically than governments are able to do, but the result of the enterprise and of what has taken place—and it was regarded largely in the light of an experiment at the time—has not been such as to justify any private individuals placing their money in enterprises of this sort, from the standpoint of a commercial undertaking, although it was stated to the House in 1904, I believe, that it was expected that that would be the case. The fertilizer produced is of a very valuable character, and very useful to the farmer, but it is found very difficult to get a sufficient supply of fish to keep the factory working to its capacity; in fact, the factory in my own province has been shut down altogether, the results have been so absolutely unsatisfactory. The result at Clarke's Harbour and Canso were more satisfactory, but at the same time every year there is a considerable deficit, and the number of dogfish procured would not have any appreciable effect upon the great number of dogfish that frequent the Atlantic all the way from Florida up almost to the waters of the arctic region. In the United States, although the establishment of factories of this sort has been advocated time and again, the authorities have always refused to establish them, and have taken the ground that it would be impossible to exterminate the dogfish by any means of that sort. All they are doing in the United States to-day is to encourage, as far as they are able, the manufacture of the fish for food under the name of grayfish, which is the name applied to them there. I assure my hon. friend that I realize that he is making these suggestions in the best of good faith. Any suggestion of that sort is always considered by myself and the officials of the department, but at the present time we do not feel justified in acting upon my hon. friend's recommendation.

Mr. KYTE: I am inclined to think this work has not been carried on with that degree of vigour with which it should be carried on, and, if it were, I think probably better results would have been obtained. I suppose one of the largest fishing communities in Nova Scotia is situated in my county, at L'Ardoise, along the southern shore of the coast. There are probably 1,500 people engaged in the industry there. They are net fishermen, and they suffer grievously from the depredations of the dogfish. I have never heard of a case where the steamer from the reduction plant came to L'Ardoise to gather dogfish. It is possible she comes, but if so, her trips are very irregular. I know the fishermen in that district complain very bitterly that they are not getting the opportunity for furnishing dogfish to the reduction plant at Canso that they would like. Another point is that probably the fishermen are not paid sufficiently for the work of catching those dogfish for the reduction plant. If the plant is not getting a sufficient quantity each year to make its operation profitable, perhaps if they were able to handle a larger supply each year the profits would, in the aggregate, amount to considerably more than at the present time. I should like, for my part, as I said, to see the work carried on with more vigour, and in a way to reach the fishing districts in southern Cape Breton better than in the past. I know that there are large quantities of dogfish to be had there, but the fishermen do not sell them to the plant. I do not know just why it is, but such is the fact.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Will the minister please state the names of the officers employed in the Canso reduction work and the salaries paid to them?

Mr. HAZEN: The officer in charge is Charles Lhonnes, I think.

Mr. SINCLAIR: What is the salary being paid to him?

Mr. HAZEN: I will get that information.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Is Mr. White now in the employ at the Canso plant?

Mr. HAZEN: When the work is going on he is employed as bookkeeper.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I do not see his name in the list of employees in the Auditor General's Report. I know he formerly was in the employ.

Mr. HAZEN: As a matter of fact, while they are manufacturing, he gets $50 a month.

Mr. SINCLAIR: His name does not appear in this blue book at all.

Mr. HAZEN: He must be there somewhere.

Mr. A. W. CHISHOLM: Who was the buyer of dogfish whom you had at Port Hood?

Mr. HAZEN: The officer in charge of the factory goes along the coast each year and makes the necessary arrangements. I do not know who was the buyer at Port Hood, though I assume that the information is in the department.

Mr. A. W. CHISHOLM: When the fishermen go out in the morning looking for codfish or mackerel or any other fish, often the first difficulty they meet is a shoal of dogfish. They then have to give up fishing, and if they had any fixed market or any regular visits from the Government boat they would obtain large quantities of dogfish and thus help to supply the plant at Canso with material for its work. If the Government boat could go down the coast more regularly, say once a week, there is no doubt that she would be well supplied with dogfish provided a reasonable price were paid for them.

Mr. HAZEN: I am told that the boat goes as often as there is sufficient fish to justify a trip. On some occasions when the boat has made the trip, it has not obtained enough fish to pay for the coal used. If we could be sure of getting twenty tons a day, we should be very glad to send the boat along the coast every day. I shall be glad to ask the officers of my department if any scheme can be devised by which more of these fish can be got, along the lines suggested by the member for Inverness.

Mr. CHISHOLM: Could not the minister have this boat sent along the coast of Inverness as far as Cheticamp? If he should do that, I assure him that he would get at least a boatload every third day at this season provided reasonable prices were paid.

Mr. HAZEN: How far is Cheticamp from Port Hood?

Mr. A. W. CHISHOLM: About forty miles.

Mr. HAZEN: It is 100 miles from the factory to Port Hood. To go to Cheticamp would involve an additional forty miles, making the trip a long and expensive one.

Mr. A. W. CHISHOLM: I realize that, but the Government have established the plant at Canso for the purpose of carrying on the industry, and if they hope to make it successful they must make sacrifices. I think it is a small sacrifice to send that boat along the coast twice a week and I surely believe that if the Government had the interests of fishermen at heart they would not hesitate one moment to come to their aid to this extent. The Government spends immense sums of money aiding other industries which are not half as important as the fishing industry, but when I suggest that the boat should go 40 miles further north I am told this is expensive. Poor encouragement indeed for our fishermen.

Mr. HAZEN: I am told that if the boat were sent to Cheticamp, by the time it got back to the works the dogfish would not be fit to be manufactured into fertilizer.

Mr. A. W. CHISHOLM: I think I know as much about dogfish as the officials from whom my hon. friend gets his information. Dogfish can lie on the shore for two or three days without getting in very bad state. If the minister would establish some system under which the fishermen would be assured of a market for their fish, I am confident that they would take the trouble of covering the fish on the wharves so that the rays of the sun would not get at them. Certainly, if the boat makes only two trips a season, practically no results can be accomplished, but could not the Government furnish cold sheds for keeping these fish at each port?

Mr. HAZEN: In order to carry out my hon. friend's idea, we should have to have three boats, as we should have to go in three different directions from the factory. However, I will have the matter looked into. If my hon. friend will write to us giving us his ideas—because he is familiar with the whole locality—we might be aided in arriving at a decision.

Mr. A. W. CHISHOLM: I shall be glad to do that. But I have brought this matter to the attention of the minister on previous occasions; I should not like it to go out to my constituency that this is the first time I have made these representations.

Mr. HAZEN: The hon. gentleman has already brought the matter up in the House; there is no doubt about that.

Mr. A. W. CHISHOLM: It is true that the boat would have to go in three different directions. But under ordinary conditions, the boat, leaving Canso in the morning, should be able to go down to Cheticamp and get back the next day. At least they can make one trip a week to all the places and call at all the ports where dogfish could be fished.

Mr. HAZEN: I am prepared to say now that I will do that this year, if we can get any guarantee that the fish will be there for us. We do not want to send the boat over that long route, at the expense which is necessarily involved, to get only a few tons of fish. If we had a guarantee that we should get at least twenty tons of fish each trip, I should not hesitate to do at once what my hon. friend asks.

Mr. A. W. CHISHOLM: All I expect of the officials is that they make the fishermen acquainted with the fact that the boat is going there and that the Government is anxious to buy the fish and pay a proper price for them. If the do that, I will do what I can to see that the fishermen are made acquainted with the way in which they can sell their fish. If the minister takes this step, I will admit that he has done all that one can reasonably expect in this regard without a reduction plant on our shore.

Mr. KYTE: The district of L'Ardoise, one of the largest fishing communities in eastern Nova Scotia, is only twelve miles from Canso. But I never heard of officials of the department or any persons connected with the reduction plant at Canso going to L'Ardoise and giving information as to what the Government are prepared to do in the matter of handling these fish. The difficulty that the minister suggested with regard to reaching the district of Cheticamp, which is forty miles from Canso, would not apply to the district in Richmond county that I have mentioned.

Mr. HAZEN: The Superintendent of Fisheries informs me that before the factory opened last fall, Mr. Lhonnes went to that district, saw the people there, told them that the Government were willing to buy whatever fish they could get, and urged on them the desirability of catching the fish.

He offered to send the boat across every day if they would furnish a certain amount of dogfish, but there was no response.

Mr. KYTE: L'Ardoise is an unprotected harbour and no fishing operations are carried on in the fall. The boats are hauled up in September, but in the months of May, June, July and August, fishing operations are carried on. If the Government would supply tanks in various places in which the dogfish might be placed, in order that they should not be exposed to the sun, the fish would last much longer and the necessity of making more frequent trips would not be imperative. The piling of dogfish on a wharf under the hot sun is apt to reduce them to a very undesirable condition.

Mr. HAZEN: My information is that the dogfish are found in largest quantities in the month of September. My hon. friend from Inverness (Mr. Chisholm) shakes his head, but that is my information. At one time, when they attempted to operate these factories during June, July and August, the loss was simply tremendous, because it was found impossible to get any supply of dogfish. If that be the case—and my information comes from my official here—then no good point would be served by trying to have a factory running during the summer months.

Mr. A. W. CHISHOLM: It is quite possible that a few dogfish may be found in July, although I have never heard of that being the case. August and September are the months when you have dogfish in shoals, in thousands of tons.

Mr. OLIVER: Would the minister lay on the Table at a convenient time Professor Prince's report with regard to those lakes to which I referred?

Mr. HAZEN: Yes.

Mr. OLIVER: I still think the minister was in error in regard to the statement he made to the House, and in order to have the facts, I would be glad if he would lay the report on the Table.

Mr. HAZEN: I may be in error. I know that Professor Prince was instructed to inquire into conditions both at Lesser Slave lake and at Lac la Biche, and he reported with regard to both lakes. I will have the papers to which the hon. member refers laid on the table of the House.

Mr. OLIVER: What is the limit of catch for the winter fishing season at Lac la Biche?

Mr. HAZEN: 400,000 pounds.

Mr. OLIVER: What is the limit of catch at Lesser Slave lake for this summer season and for the winter season?

Mr. HAZEN: In the summer season it is 500,000 pounds of whitefish, although the fishermen can take the other coarser fish with that.

Mr. OLIVER: Jackfish is not included?

Mr. HAZEN: No.

Mr. OLIVER: There are whitefish, pickerel and jackfish in Lac la Biche. Does the 400,000 pounds limit apply to whitefish or does it include pickerel and jackfish?

Mr. HAZEN: It includes all fish in Lac la Biche.

Mr. OLIVER: But in Lesser Slave lake it includes only whitefish?

Mr. HAZEN: Yes.

Mr. OLIVER: Pickerel are not considered?

Mr. HAZEN: Nothing but whitefish.

Mr. OLIVER: The fishermen can catch as many pickerel and jackfish as they like?

Mr. HAZEN: Yes.

Mr. OLIVER: What is the catch for Lesser Slave lake for the coming winter? I am anxious to have these facts so that these people will have notice before hand.

Mr. HAZEN: 760,000 pounds.

Mr. OLIVER: Is there any limit to the fishing on White Whale or Wabamun lake?

Mr. HAZEN: I do not think so.

Mr. OLIVER: Or Pigeon lake?

Mr. HAZEN: I do not think so. Those lakes have never come under my notice.

Mr. OLIVER: I do not wish to object to the principle of establishing a limit of catch because that must be within the judgment of the experts of the department, but I may point out that in the case of Wabamun and Pigeon lakes, which are both located about fifty miles from Edmonton, those lakes to my knowledge, have been fished continuously for twenty years, both commercially and for other purposes.

Mr. HAZEN: Probably it would have been better if a limit had been placed on them years ago.

Mr. OLIVER: No, the fish are quite plentiful yet.

Mr. HAZEN: Are those lakes as large as Lac la Biche?

Mr. OLIVER: No, none of them is as large as Lac la Biche. One of them is immediately adjoining the railroad track.

Mr. HAZEN: My attention has never been drawn to the matter before, but I will consider whether a limit should be imposed.

Mr. OLIVER: I am not suggesting that there should be a limit; I am simply pointing out the facts. Two lakes, Lake Winnifred and Lake Christina were opened last winter. Are they to be subject to a limit?

Mr. HAZEN: My attention has never been drawn to them. Where are they?

Mr. OLIVER: On the Great Waterways railroad, north of Lac la Biche. Is there any limit to the catch on Calling lake?

Mr. HAZEN: No, the only lakes I am aware of on which there is a limit are Lac la Biche and Lesser Slave lake.

To pay customs officers for services in connection with issuing modus vivendi licenses.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Will the minister state what his policy is with regard to these modus vivendi licenses?

Mr. HAZEN: This matter is now the subject of negotiation with the United States Government. There is no harm in saying that I trust a conference will be entered into, by which arrangements will be made that will be satisfactory to the United States, and that at the same time will remove the disabilities under which our fishing vessels are placed at the present time in taking their catch into the United States and in clearing again from United States ports for the fishing grounds, and that the conference will also include the question of the prohibition of the well-smacks the Americans are sending over now, and which lie right outside the three mile limit in the close season and capture our lobsters, that is, lobsters that we are helping to preserve, although they are not ours legally, and taking them back to the United States.

Mr. SINCLAIR: You will not permit them to come within the three mile limit?

Mr. HAZEN: That is not what I say. At the present moment they are coming over, and when we have our close season, they are lying outside the three mile limit, catching the lobsters there and putting them into those wells that they have in their smacks and taking them to the United States. We want to prevent that. That is one of the subjects in which we think there ought to be a quid pro quo. There are matters on the Atlantic and on the Pacific in which both our fishermen and the United States fishermen are interested, and negotiations are being conducted now with a view to get such settlement of all those outstanding difficulties as will be satisfactory to the people of both countries.

Mr. KYTE: Will those negotiations include a change in the license fee charged?

Mr. HAZEN: That is one of the matters in view.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Does it include the admission of American vessels that are propelled by steam?

Mr. HAZEN: Yes. At the present time the modus vivendi applies only to vessels propelled by sail. The contention on the part of the United States is that it should apply to vessels propelled by steam or by gasolene. The argument always advanced in the Parliament of Canada was that this concession was given at a time when vessels were not propelled by steam, and that the modus vivendi applied only to fishing vessels propelled by sail.

There are a number of these outstanding difficulties. The United States would like to have the modus vivendi license reduced from $1.50 a ton to a merely nominal rate, and they would like to have the right for their vessels to come into our ports for the purposes mentioned, whether those vessels are propelled by sail or otherwise. On the other hand, while our fish are admitted free into the United States, we labour under the disadvantage that our fishermen, who take their catch direct to an American port, after selling their catch, cannot clear again for the fishing banks. There is a good deal to be said on both sides. We are endeavouring to have an arrangement come to which will be fair to both, by which the disabilities will be removed as regards our Canadian fishermen, and at the same time we are willing to give advantages in the directions suggested to American fishermen. I hope that this will prove the psychological moment for the arrangement of these matters.

Mr. SINCLAIR: It would be very satisfactory if the minister could bring about a settlement. A great deal of interest is taken in these matters by the people along the coast. For several years back I have held the view that it would be better to admit vessels propelled by gasolene or steam to the same privileges as are given to sailing vessels. They purchase bait and supplies from our fishermen and dealers; they are good customers and pay well for what they get. If we permit them to tranship their catch on our railways to the United States it will give traffic to our railways. In every way I think it would be an advantage to have the matter dealt with. I am glad the minister also bears in mind the question of our vessels clearing from American ports. Our fishermen arrive at Boston, the great distributing point, with a cargo of fish, and after selling their catch they wish to clear again for the banks. But, as I understand it, under the present law, they must clear for a Canadian port and call at that port before they clear for the banks. I trust the minister will stick to this point until he carries it, for there is no reason that I can see why it should not be conceded by the United States. There are other questions, no so important, perhaps, which it would be wise not to mix up with these others, and so delay a settlement.

Mr. KYTE: Have American vessels free access to the ports of British Columbia?

Mr. HAZEN: If they ship their catch over Canadian railways in bond to the United States.

Mr. KYTE: That is where the ports of British Columbia have the advantage over the ports of Nova Scotia.

Mr. HAZEN: What was done in British Columbia was really a concession to the United States, but the effect of it has been to help Prince Rupert very materially.

Fisheries patrol service, $190,000.

Mr. McKENZIE: Would the minister tell us something about the patrol service in connection with naval matters.

Mr. HAZEN: Perhaps the hon. gentleman (Mr. McKenzie) will allow that discussion to wait until the Naval Estimates are before the Committee.

Mr. McKENZIE: Yes. And then the minister will be prepared, I suppose, to give us the names of the different craft, the owners, and so on.

Mr. HAZEN: I would be prepared to give such information as it is desirable should be given. I am doubtful as to the advisability of making public many of these facts. I should not have the slightest objection, if my hon. friend would come to my department, to giving him privately full information with regard to all the boats we have charted for patrol in connection with the Naval Service, the amounts we are paying, and all details of that sort.

Mr. McKENZIE: I intend to bring some facts to the notice of the minister, rather in the way of criticism. There are many of these boats, and some of them may be of service. I am as careful as any member could be that no information should be given in this House that can be made of advantage to the enemy; but, many of these boats are of no good to the enemy or anybody else,—like a chip in porridge, they are neither good nor harm, except that they draw money from the public treasury, and draw it because they are owned by partisans and wire-pullers—

Mr. HAZEN: No.

Mr. McKENZIE: And when it is discovered that they belong to a Liberal, they are dropped.

Mr. HAZEN: That is not the case. If the hon. gentleman will come to my department—

Mr. McKENZIE: I can give him the name of one man, Mr. William Scott of North Sydney, who had two or three boats in the service, but when it was discovered that he was not an orthodox Tory he and his boats were thrown on the shore.

Mr. HAZEN: That is news to me and I think that investigation would show that it is not correct. However, this is a matter to be discussed when the Naval Estimates come up.

To provide for a fishery exhibit at the Canadian National Exhibition at Toronto, $10,000.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Is the minister continuing that exhibit?

Mr. HAZEN: Yes, and the restaurant. It has been a very great success in other years.

Mr. KYTE: The next two items, Nos. 259 and 260, I desire to discuss, I would suggest that they be allowed to stand.

Mr. HAZEN: Then, when we pass 261, in compliance with the request of my hon. friend we will let the items to which he has referred stand until some other occasion.

Progress reported.

LABOUR STRIKES IN WESTERN COAL MINES.

On the motion of Hon. Mr. Hazen for the adjournment of the House·

Mr. GEORGE E. McCRANEY (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, I would like to read to the Government a telegram that I am in receipt of this evening from Saskatoon in regard to the coal situation. I think this telegram should be in the possession of the House. It is as follows:

Saskatoon, Sask., June 8, 1917.

Geo. E. McCraney, M.P.,
Ottawa, Ont.

Resolution of special meeting of Saskatoon Board of Trade held 8th June, 1917:

Whereas, it has been brought to the attention of this board that the coal mines from which western provinces draw their supplies of coal are in general raising only a small proportion of their normal operating capacity at this season owing to the labor situation;

And whereas, in the interest of railway transportation, power production on farms and in cities, it is essential that the raising of a winter's supply of coal should be proceeded with at once before the small reserve stock in the country is further depleted.

Therefore, resolved, that this board urges upon the Government of Canada the necessity for taking drastic action at the earliest possible moment to secure the resumption of operations at western coal mines and to settle the differences between the operators and workmen and that copies of this resolution be sent by telegraph to the Premier, Sir Robert Borden, and to the member for Saskatoon county, at Ottawa, and the resolution sent to western boards of trade for their consideration.

(Signed) W. P. Kirkpatrick, President.

I hope the Government will take this telegram into consideration in dealing with the matter.

Mr. HAZEN: I understand that a similar telegram has been sent to the Prime Minister?

Mr. McCRANEY: Yes.

Motion agreed to and House adjourned at 11 p.m.

Monday, June 11, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

REPORTS AND PAPERS.

Copy of Order in Council with reference to regulations governing the payment of separation allowances to the Royal Canadian Navy.—Hon. J. D. Hazen.

THE MILITARY SERVICE ACT, 1917.

BILL INTRODUCED BY THE PRIME MINISTER.

Right Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 75, respecting military service.

[Mr. Hazen.]

He said: Mr. Speaker, as the Bill which I am presenting to the House has created a good deal of public interest, I shall, by your leave, make a somewhat fuller explanation of its provisions and of the circumstances out of which it has arisen than would ordinarily be the case on such a motion.

Let me first ask the attention of the House to the events of nearly three years ago. It is unnecessary at this juncture to enter into any prolonged examination of the causes of this war or of the purposes for which it was undertaken. Beyond question it was the aim and intention of Germany to assassinate Belgium's rights and liberties; to crush France; to make eventual peace with Russia; to have our Empire stand aside, so that it might afterwards meet the fate of France and of Belgium in order that Germany might dominate the world. For this purpose Germany made a most intense and careful preparation during nearly half a century, and she proceeded to carry out her purpose by methods so barbarous and revolting that humanity stood aghast.

As to Canada's determination, there was never one moment's doubt. Our nation was united in a common purpose. Men of all parties expressed a most resolute and vehement determination to carry the war to victory and to an abiding peace. It was realized by all that the future of civilization and democracy was at stake.

Within six weeks after the war broke out, 33,000 men, fully armed, well trained, and thoroughly equipped, were ready to depart from our shores. Our authorized forces were increased by 30,000 men on the 7th day of November, 1914; they were increased to 150,000 in all on the 8th day of July, 1915, and to 250,000 on the 30th day of October, 1915.

In 1915 and also in 1916, many delegations from all parts of the country came to Ottawa and waited upon the Government for the purpose of urging compulsory military service. They emphasized with very great force the disadvantages of a voluntary system and the need of more men. I realized then and I explained to them possible difficulties, some of which I communicated privately to the leading members of these various delegations.

On the first day of January, 1916, I issued a message to the Canadian people in which I announced that Canada's authorized forces would be increased to 500,000 men. In that message I used these words:

By the greatness of the need our future efforts must be measured.

The necessary Order in Council was passed on January 12, 1916, and it was laid on the table of the House. No criticism was made in Parliament of the action which the Government thus took; no motion was moved against the Government's action, and the necessary Parliamentary appropriations were voted unanimously. In many parts of the country my message was construed as a pledge. It was not issued as a pledge; it was the authorization of a further increase in the Canadian Expeditionary Force; but it has been deemed to be a pledge made on behalf of the Government and the people of this country, and I am content so to regard it.

There was a splendid response to that appeal; in three and one-half months more than a hundred thousand men enlisted. The need as it then appeared seemed to be served. But later on it became apparent that the struggle would exceed all anticipations. A second division had gone to the front; then a third went, and finally a fourth. The need of reinforcements became greater, while the recruiting during the summer and autumn of 1916 became less. In the autumn of 1916, I made a tour of six provinces of this Dominion in aid of National Service. I was accompanied by the Director General of National Service, and the duty of service was emphasized to vast audiences whose response was inspiring.

After my return a delegation of representatives of organized labour waited upon me, their mission being one of inquiry with regard to the National Service cards, and they demanded from me a pledge that under no circumstances would compulsory military service be enforced in this country. I gave them a reply on the spot, and I followed that up by a letter which was published in the press and which bears the date of December 27, 1916. That letter contains the following passage:

> You have asked for an assurance that under no circumstances will conscription be undertaken or carried out. As I stated to you at our interview, I must decline to give any such assurance. I hope that conscription may not be necessary, but if it should prove the only effective method to preserve the existence of the State and of the institutions and liberties which we enjoy, I should consider it necessary and I should not hesitate to act accordingly.

Early in February, 1917, I left for England, and in March last I saw at the front a Canadian Army Corps of four divisions, instead of the one division which I had seen in July, 1915. Our forces in France at that time numbered about 130,000 men, including all arms of the service. It is manifest to every one that four divisions require four times as many recruits as one, and at the present time the recruiting is not adequate to the need, as I shall show later on.

There are only two alternatives—to let our forces dwindle from four divisions to three, from three to two, and perhaps from two to one, or, to bring aid by other means than an appeal for voluntary service. That is the problem which confronts Canada today.

Let me say a word about the general conditions of the war. Hon. gentlemen, of course, will understand that I may not speak too freely. The effort of the Empire has been wonderful; the effort of our own Dominion has been notable. But no effort is sufficient unless it assures victory, liberty, security and peace. I am in a position to assure the House and the country that the need of reinforcements is urgent, insistent and imperative. The effort of Russia is paralyzed for the present—no one knows for how long. The effort of the United States is only beginning. It is Germany's hope to win the war before the power of the United States can become effective; more than that, it is her confident belief; for otherwise she never would have risked war with that great power, or staked everything on the submarine campaign and her ability to hold her lines East and West while her undersea boats should starve Britain into submission.

The crying need is for physically fit and thoroughly trained troops, chiefly infantry. The methods by which this war is carried on are perhaps more thorough, and the system by which men are provided and trained for the front and for the various arms of the service is probably more intricate and complex than any of us understand who have not looked carefully into such matters. I have before me a form of return which is used for the purpose of showing the classification, or categorization as it is called, of the Canadian Expeditionary Force. I find at the top: Category "A" with four classes; category "B" with three classes; category "C" with three classes; category "D" with three classes, and category "E."

Category "A" includes all men fit for general service. Class I, includes all men actually fit in all respects for despatch to France. Class II includes men who will be fit for Class I as soon as they are trained. Class III includes casualties who should be fit for Class I as soon as they are hardened and trained. Class IV includes men under nineteen who should be fit for Class I as soon as they reach that age.

Category "B" includes those fit for service in France but not fit for general service, that is, not fit for service in the trenches at the front. Class I includes those who may give service in garrison or provisional units. Class II includes those who are fit for service in labour and construction units or for other outdoor employment. Class III includes those who are suitable for sedentary work only.

Category "C" includes those who are fit for service in the United Kingdom only. Class I takes in those who are fit for service in garrison or provisional units. Class II includes those who are fit for service in labour and construction units or for other outdoor employment. Class III includes those who are fit for sedentary work only.

Category "D" takes in all those who are temporarily unfit for service in categories "A" "B" or "C," but are likely to become fit within six months. Meanwhile they include those who are assigned to Class I, command depots. Class II is not applicable to the Canadian Expeditionary Force in England. Class III includes those who are awaiting dental or medical treatment.

Category "E" includes only those who are awaiting their discharge and are not fit for any service.

I should explain to the House that this is the system of classification, and these are the categories used by the War Office in dealing with like matters in the British medical treatment.

Let us look for a moment at another classification. I have given the classification by fitness, and I now come to the classification by service. I look at the side of this form and I see at least 24 divisions with perhaps 15 to 20 subdivisions, indicating the extended and comprehensive nature of the services and the great variety of purposes for which men are required in the organization of a modern army.

Hon. gentlemen will thus realize that a very thorough system is required, not only in reference to the fitness of the men for any service whatever, but also in respect of the various services to which they may be allotted in case of their fitness for any. Now I come for a moment, in view of that, to some statistics. I want hon. gentlemen in this House and the country to realize that the most important need at the front to-day, both in our force and in other forces, is for men of Category "A" Class I; that is, infantry who are able to go into the trenches, who are physically fit and thoroughly trained. From the classification which I have already read, hon. gentlemen will understand that only a moderate proportion of enlisted troops can be brought within that category and class. I should further emphasize this consideration; that in the enlistments which have taken place during the past year, and which I shall recount in a moment, a very considerable number of men have taken service in Railway Construction and Forestry battalions. These battalions serve a most useful and important purpose, but the number of men available for combatant service in Category "A" is necessarily cut down by enlistment in Railway Construction and Forestry units. The total enlistment during the year ending May 31, 1917, was 85,306. Of course, only a portion of these men were fit for Category "A", and as I have already pointed out, a considerable number enlisted for Railway Construction and Forestry service. During the same year our casualties amounted to 75,492. Our total casualties since the war began amount to 99,639. During April and May we enlisted 11,790 men and during these same two months our casualties were 23,939. During the next seven months we need enforcements to the number of at least 70,000 in order to keep four divisions in the field, and to keep five divisions in the field we need 84,000 men, in both cases principally infantry. Continued offensive operations, such as those of April and May, might increase this number, and if the offensive continues it is not too much to say that we must expect this.

What is the conclusion I have drawn from all this? It is, as I have said before, that reinforcements must be obtained or the divisions must dwindle; there is no alternative. The reinforcements now available will last for only a few months, the precise number of which, for military reasons, I am not at liberty to state. We all are proud that Canada has played a splendid and notable part in this war. The achievements of her troops have placed her in the very forefront of the nations, and the question before the House and the country to-day is this: Is Canada content to relax her efforts in the most critical period of a war which concerns her heritage, her status, and her liberty? I am confident that the answer of the House and the country will be the same, namely that Canada cannot and must not relax her effort.

It seems to me there is something more than this to be taken into account. Is there not, as I have already said in this House, an appeal from the men at the front? They have answered the call, they have given glorious service, they have put aside all material considerations; duty alone has been their ideal. Unconscious of every thing other than the supreme task before them, I know from my personal experience that they cannot realize the thought that their country which so summoned them to her service will be content to desert and humiliate them. I bring from that splendid manhood of Canada at the front an earnest and thrilling message that we shall stand beside them in the stress and welter of this struggle, and bring them such support that the effort and sacrifice which have been consecrated to this supreme task shall not be in vain. When Canada called them to the colours her honour was pledged to this, and I shall do my best to see that the pledge is fulfilled. I never will be responsible for its violation.

Returning on May 14th, I announced on May 18th that the need must be met by applying a principle which, for forty-nine years, has been on the statute book of Canada. I repeat that: There is no principle of compulsion in the Bill which I have presented to this House, except the principle that has remained on the statute book of Canada for forty-nine years. Some people afflicted with a diseased imagination have asserted that I took my present course at the request or dictation of the British Government. No more absolute falsehood was ever uttered by human lips. The subject was never discussed between myself and any member of the British Government; if there had been any such suggestion from them I for one would not have tolerated it. The Government, Parliament and people of Canada are the only authorities that can deal with or determine questions such as those which are embodied in the Bill now presented to this House.

The principle of compulsory service in this Dominion was first enacted in 1868, under a government in which Sir George Etienne Cartier was Minister of Militia and Defence. It was re-enacted with a slight change in form, but no change in meaning, in 1904, by the Government of my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). In order that there may be no question about this, it is appropriate that I should give a short review of what took place in 1868 and should also deal with the amendment made in 1904.

By the Militia Act of 1868, introduced by Sir George Etienne Cartier, it was enacted—(section 4)—as follows:

> 4. The militia shall consist of all the male inhabitants of Canada, of the age of eighteen years and upwards, and under sixty—not exempted or disqualified by law, and being British subjects by birth or naturalization; but Her Majesty may require all the male inhabitants of the Dominion, capable of bearing arms, to serve in case of a Levée en Masse.

By section 5 it was provided that the male population so liable to serve in the militia, should be divided into four classes. This enactment is still in the statute book.

Section 16, subsection 3, provides that:

The enrolment shall be held to be an embodiment of all the militiamen enrolled, and shall render them liable to serve under the provisions of this Act, unless exempt by law.

Section 61 enacted as follows:

Her Majesty may call out the militia, or any part thereof, for actual service, either within or without the Dominion, at any time, whenever it appears advisable so to do by reason of war, invasion, or insurrection, or danger of any of them; and the militiamen, when so called out for actual service, shall continue to serve for at least one year from the date of their being called out for actual service, if required so to do, or for any longer period which Her Majesty may appoint.

This Bill gave rise to discussion in Parliament, as was natural. On the 12th May, 1868, on a motion to go into committee on the Bill, Mr. Dorion moved, in amendment, seconded by Mr. Mackenzie:

What it be an instruction to the committee to consider the following resolution: "That in the opinion of this House the volunteer system is of proved efficiency, and specially adapted to the spirit and circumstances of the people, and is capable of supplying a more efficient and available force than that proposed to be substituted by this Bill; and it is therefore desirable to amend the same so as to make provision—

1. For the proper maintenance and encouragement of the volunteer organization;

2. For the drilling of the officers of the ordinary militia;

3. That the ordinary militia shall not be actually called out by conscription, save in case of necessity."

On division, this amendment was rejected by a vote of 100 to 41.

It must be apparent, therefore, that the whole question of compulsory service was taken into consideration by the founders of Confederation in almost the first session of this Parliament, and that then it was decided, once for all, that for the defence of this country, and whether within or out of Canada, the people of this country should be subject to compulsory military service. And this has remained the law of the country from the day it was enacted in 1868, and it is the law of the land to-day.

Now, let us look for a moment at the provisions of the Militia Act, which was passed in its present form in 1904, and which is now known as chapter 41 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906. I will quote section 10 and also section 69 of that Act:

10. All the male inhabitants of Canada of the age of eighteen years and upwards, and under sixty, not exempt or disqualified by law, and being British subjects, shall be liable to service in the Militia; provided that the Governor General may require all the male inhabitants of Canada, capable of bearing arms, to serve in the case of a levée en masse.

69. The Governor in Council may place the militia, or any part thereof, on active service anywhere in Canada, and also beyond Canada, for the defence thereof, at any time when it appears advisable so to do by reason of emergency.

Hon. members will observe that there is a slight difference in the provisions of section 69 from the corresponding section of the Act of 1868, that is, section 61. There was some debate in 1904 upon that change, and to this I will come a little later. Meantime, I desire to point out that this enactment is based upon the principle, which is as old as the principle of self-government, that while the state owes to its citizens certain duties, the citizen also owes corresponding duties to the state. To the citizen the state assures protection and security of his person and property, the enforcement of law and orderly government. To the state, each citizen owes a duty of service, and the highest duty of all is the obligation to assist in defending the rights, the institutions and the liberties of his country. I desire to express my profound conviction that there never has been, and there never will be, an occasion when that duty could be more manifest, more urgent, or more imperative than at the present time.

It may be asked: Why is this law necessary if such provision already exists in the Militia Act? The answer is very simple. We have sent 326,000 men overseas in the Canadian Expeditionary Force besides those who have gone to serve in the Allied Armies. The Militia Act provides that the selection shall be by ballot and in no other way. The Government is convinced that such a method of selection would be unwise, and even disastrous, under present conditions and having regard to the number of men required. We propose not to change or enlarge the compulsory principle, but merely to provide that selection shall not be made by ballot, that is, by blind chance. We are convinced that the selection should be based upon an intelligent consideration of the country's needs and conditions. We must take into account the necessities of agriculture, of commerce, and of industry. Those who in their present occupations are rendering better service to the state than by enrolment in the Canadian Expeditionary Force must not be selected for military service. There is need for men at the front; there is also need for men at home. The nation's activities essential for winning the war must be maintained. Thus, the only new feature proposed is in the method of selection. The compulsory clauses in this Bill are precisely of the same character, and based upon the same principles, as those which have been in force in this country since 1868.

It is further asked why the new method of selection could not have been accomplished by an amendment to the Militia Act. We considered that very carefully. It would have been necessary to amend, perhaps, a dozen or a score of clauses, so many at least that the legislation would have been less effective, less clear and more confused. The same course has been taken in Great Britain and in New Zealand.

The provisions of the Bill have been very carefully considered. We desire that they shall be most attentively studied. I do not doubt that on some matters there may be room for argument and suggestion. We are prepared to listen most carefully to all suggestions, provided they are reasonable and do not affect the efficiency of the measure.

The first provision to which I ask the attention of the House is section 13, subsection 4, of the Bill, which provides that the reinforcements to be raised under this Bill shall not exceed 100,000 men, between the ages of 20 and 45. The number of men in Canada between these ages, by the census of 1911, and other information of a like character, in respect to the possibility of raising 50,000 or 100,000 men, will be communicated to the House on the second reading. I hope that the information can be presented to the House in a form which will carry conviction. It is certainly apparent to me, from the information which I have already obtained, that there ought to be no difficulty in providing reinforcements of at least 100,000 men, and probably a number even in excess of that. Before proceeding with the explanation of section 1, perhaps I should give to the House the recital, or preamble, on which the Bill is based. It is as follows:—

Whereas by section ten of the Militia Act, chapter forty-one of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, it is enacted as follows:—

"All the male inhabitants of Canada, of the age of eighteen years and upwards, and under sixty, not exempt or disqualified by law, and being British subjects, shall be liable to service in the Militia; Provided that the Governor General may require all the male inhabitants of Canada, capable of bearing arms, to serve in the case of a levée en masse."

And whereas by section sixty-nine of the said Act it is further enacted as follows:—

"The Governor in Council may place the Militia, or any part thereof, on active service anywhere in Canada, and also beyond Canada, for the defence thereof, at any time when it appears advisable so to do by reason of emergency."

And whereas by the said Act it is further enacted that, if at any time enough men do not volunteer to complete the quota required, the men so liable to serve shall be drafted by ballot;

And whereas to maintain and support the Canadian Expeditionary Force now engaged in active service overseas for the defence and security of Canada, the preservation of the Empire and of human liberty, it is necessary to provide reinforcements for such Expeditionary Force;

And whereas enough men do not volunteer to provide such reinforcements;

And whereas, by reason of the large number of men who have already left agricultural and industrial pursuits in Canada to join such Expeditionary Force as volunteers, and of the necessity of sustaining under such conditions the productivity of the Dominion, it is expedient to secure the men still required, not by ballot as provided in the Militia Act, but by selective draft.

That is the preamble, or recital, upon which the Bill is based. The only important part of section 1 to which I need call attention is that which provides that the Act will be under the administration of the Minister of Justice. It will be under his administration for the reason that there are to be inquiries as to selection and as to exemption or otherwise, and it is not desirable that these inquiries should be conducted by the department which is to take charge of the men when they are once enrolled. These matters are rather of a judicial character until the question of exemption or liability is finally determined. Therefore, the administration of the Act is placed under the Department of Justice.

Section 2 deals with the application of the Bill. No change of any importance is made. The section provides that:—

(1) Every male British subject who comes within one of the classes described in section three of this Act, and who,—

(a) is ordinarily resident in Canada; or

(b) has been at any time since the fourth day of August, 1914, resident in Canada, shall be liable to be called out as hereinafter provided on active service in the Canadian Expeditionary Force for the defence of Canada, either in or beyond Canada, unless he

(a) Comes within the exceptions set out in the Schedule; or

(b) reaches the age of forty-five before the class or subclass to which he belongs, as described in section three is called out.

Such service shall be for the duration of the present war and of demobilization after the conclusion of the war.

(2) Nothing in this Act shall prevent any man from voluntarily enlisting in the Canadian Expeditionary Force, so long as voluntary enlistment in such Force is authorized.

Section 3 deals with the various classes into which men between the ages of 20 and 45, both inclusive, are divided. It is as follows:—

3. (1) The men who are liable to be called out shall consist of ten classes described as follows:—

Class 1.—Those who have attained the age of twenty years and were born not earlier than the year 1894 and are unmarried, or are widowers but have no child.

Class 2.—Those who were born in the years 1889 to 1893, both inclusive, and are unmarried, or are widowers but have no child.

Class 3.—Those who were born in the years 1883 to 1888, both inclusive, and are unmarried, or are widowers but have no child.

Class 4.—Those who have attained the age of twenty years and were born not earlier than the year 1894 and are married, or are widowers who have a child or children.

Class 5.—Those who were born in the years 1889 to 1893, both inclusive, and are married, or are widowers who have a child or children.

Class 6.—Those who were born in the years 1883 to 1888, both inclusive, and are married, or are widowers who have a child or children.

Class 7.—Those who were born in the years 1876 to 1882, both inclusive, and are unmarried, or are widowers who have no child.

Class 8.—Those who were born in the years 1876 to 1882, both inclusive, and are married, or are widowers who have a child or children.

Class 9.—Those who were born in the years 1872 to 1875, both inclusive, and are unmarried, or are widowers who have no child.

Class 10.—Those who were born in the years 1872 to 1875, both inclusive, and are married, or are widowers who have a child or children.

(2) For the purposes of this section, any man married after the eleventh day of June, 1917, shall be deemed to be unmarried.

(3) Any class, except Class 1, shall include men who are tranferred thereto from another class as hereinafter provided, and men who have come within Class 1 since the previous class was called out.

(4) The order in which the classes are described in this section shall be the order in which they may be called out on active service, provided the Governor in Council may divide any class into subclasses, in which case the subclasses shall be called out in order of age, beginning with the youngest.

For example, if it appeared to the Government that the calling out of Classes 1, 2 and 3 might yield a larger number of men than the forces authorized by this Act, it would be possible for the Government to divide Class 3 into sub-classes, so that the number to be called out should not exceed the number authorized by the Act.

I now proceed to the next section:

4. (1) The Governor in Council may from time to time by proclamation call out on active service as aforesaid for the defence of Canada, either in Canada or beyond Canada, any class or subclass of men described in section three and all men within the class or subclass so called out shall, from the date of such proclamation, be deemed to be soldiers enlisted in the Military Forces of Canada and subject to military law for the duration of the present war, and of demobilization thereafter, save as hereinafter provided.

(2) Men so called out shall report and shall be placed on active service in the Canadian Expeditionary Force as may be set out in such proclamation or in regulations, but until so placed on active service, shall be deemed to be on leave of absence without pay.

(3) Any man by or in respect of whom an application for exemption is made as hereinafter provided, shall, so long as such application or any appeal in connection therewith is pending and during the currency of any exemption granted him, be deemed to be on leave of absence without pay.

(4) Any man who is called out and who, without reasonable excuse, fails to report as aforesaid or to remain on active service where placed shall be guilty, according to the circumstances, of desertion, or of absenting himself without leave and shall be liable

(a) To be tried by court-martial and convicted and punished by imprisonment, for a term not exceeding three years, or

(b) on summary conviction to imprisonment for any term not exceeding three years.

Section 5 reads as follows:

(5) (1) There shall be established in the manner hereafter set out, the following tribunals:—

(a) Local Tribunals;

(b) Appeal Tribunals;

(c) A Central Appeal Judge.

(2) Any tribunal may hear evidence on oath or otherwise as it may deem expedient, and for the performance of its duties shall have all the powers vested in a Commissioner under Part 1 of the Inquiries Act.

(3) The Governor in Council may, upon the recommendation of the Central Appeal Judge, make regulations with respect to the establishment, constitution, functions and procedure of the said tribunals and such regulations may contain provisions for securing uniformity in the application of this Act.

(4) In so far as provision is not otherwise made, the procedure of the Tribunal shall be such as is determined by the Tribunal.

(5) No member of any tribunal shall be responsible at law for anything done by him in good faith in the performance of his duties under this Act, and no action shall be taken against any member of a local tribunal or an appeal tribunal in respect of the performance or non-performance of his duties under this Act, except with the written consent of the Central Appeal Judge.

The next section deals with the Local Tribunals which are to be established.

6. (1) The Minister may from time to time by proclamation or otherwise establish local tribunals at such places as he deems necessary and give each an appropriate designation.

Now, as to the constitution of these local tribunals, of whom shall they consist? That question raised a great deal of difficulty, because it was the desire of the Government to adopt a method which would be absolutely above suspicion. We desired to make it clear that the personnel of the Board was to be selected fairly and independently. Therefore we provided as follows:

(3) Each local tribunal shall consist of two members. One member shall be appointed by a Board of Selection to be established by joint resolution of the Senate and House of Commons; the other member shall be appointed by the following authority:—

1. In those provinces in which there are county courts or district courts, the county court judge or district court judge or, if more than one, the senior judge for the county or district in which the local tribunal is established, or when the place at which a local tribunal is to be established is not within the territorial limits of any county court or district court, then by such judge as may be determined by the Minister.

The county court judge or district judge is to make the appointment. If there is no such judge within the area for which the tribunal is to be established, then one of the members of the tribunal is to be appointed by such county court judge as the minister shall designate for the purpose.

Then there are special provisions for Quebec which read as follows:

II. In the province of Quebec:—

(a) In the judicial districts of Montreal and Quebec, any judge of the Superior Court of the province of Quebec who is authorized by the Chief Justice of the said Court or authorized by the judge appointed to perform the duties of Chief Justice in the judicial district.

(b) In the other judicial districts the judge of the Superior Court of the province of Quebec assigned to the judicial district within which the local tribunal is established.

III. In the Yukon Territory:—

The judge of the Territorial Court or the person appointed under the provisions of the Yukon Act to act in place of such judge; and

IV. In the Northwest Territories:—

The Commissioner of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police.

It has been our purpose, therefore, to establish tribunals which shall be constituted by an authority independent of the Government, by persons appointed under the direct authority of Parliament, and by county court judges or district court judges. In Quebec it will be by judges of the Superior Court, and in the Yukon and Northwest Territories by authorities outside of the Government itself.

It is further provided in the same section:

(4) (a) The names and addresses of all persons appointed on a local tribunal shall, as may be provided by regulations, be communicated to the minister.

(b) The minister may by telegraph or otherwise appoint one or both members, as the case may be, of any local tribunal, if he has not received, within such period before the tribunal is to sit as may be fixed by regulation, the names and addresses of members duly appointed.

(c) A vacancy occurring shall be filled by the authority who appointed the member vacating, and if not so filled or if communication of same as aforesaid has not been received by the minister within such period as may be fixed by regulation, the minister may fill such vacancy.

If the authorities, who are empowered by this Act to make the appointment of the local tribunal, do not make such appointments, or do not communicate them to the minister, then when the time comes for the work of the tribunals to begin, the minister may make the appointment.

There is also a provision that no person shall, without reasonable excuse, refuse to act when appointed to one of these tribunals. If he refuses to act, he is guilty of an offence, and is liable on summary conviction to a penalty not exceeding $500.

With reference to the appeal tribunals, the provisions are very simple, and the section reads as follows:

7. The Chief Justice of the court of last resort in each province, or in case of his absence, or failure to act, then a judge of that court designated by the minister, shall establish for such province a sufficient number of appeal tribunals, and shall assign to each such tribunal, one judge of any court of such province, and shall distribute among such tribunals all appeals from and cases stated under subsection 2 of section 10, by local tribunals of which the Registrar has notice, and such appeal tribunals shall severally hear and decide the same.

As to the final tribunal, the Governor in Council may appoint one of the judges of the Supreme Court of Canada to be the Central Appeal Judge.

The scheme is to establish Local Tribunals selected by an authority outside of the Government; of these there will be many in each military district. The Appeal Tribunals will be selected by an authority outside of the Government, but a judicial authority, a member of one of the higher courts in each province, and finally there will be a Central Appeal Judge, who will be the final court of appeal, and who will be selected from the judges of the Supreme Court of Canada.

It has been the purpose of the Government to make these provisions absolutely fair. If any suggestion is made to the Government from the House by which the provisions can be made fairer or more effective, the Government will be glad to listen to such suggestion when the Bill is in committee.

I come, then, to section 10, which deals with appeals; it provides for an appeal from the local tribunal to the appeal tribunal, and from the appeal tribunal to the central tribunal. These appeals are to be carried out under regulations to be made on the recommendation of the Central Appeal Judge.

It is also provided by section 10 that the Governor in Council may, on the recommendation of the Central Appeal Judge, appoint one or more other judges of any superior court to assist the Central Appeal Judge in the discharge of his duties, and may define their powers. It was thought that there might be more work for the Central Appeal Judge than he could properly attend to, and therefore, this provision was made.

I come now to a very important section, that which concerns exemption. I do not think it is necessary that I should read the whole section; the Bill will shortly be before the members of the House. I shall, however, explain its provisions. It is section 11, and it provides:

(1) At any time before a date to be fixed in the proclamation mentioned in section four, an application may be made, by or in respect of any man in the class or subclass called out by such proclamation, to a local tribunal established in the province in which such man ordinarily resides, for a certificate of exemption on any of the following grounds:—

(a) That it is expedient in the national interest that the man should, instead of being employed in military service, be engaged in other work in which he is habitually engaged;

That provision, if I remember correctly, is taken from the British Act. It was inserted in that Act at the instance of representatives of organized labour, who were afraid that otherwise there would be power under the Act to affect prejudicially their interests in certain respects. The list of exemptions continues as follows:

(b) That it is expedient in the national interest that the man should, instead of being employed in military service, be engaged in other work in which he wishes to be engaged and for which he has special qualifications;

That is almost identical in its terms with the corresponding section in the British Act. (Reading):

(c) That it is expedient in the national interest that, instead of being employed in military service, he should continue to be educated or trained for any work for which he is then being educated or trained;

(d) That serious hardship would ensue, if the man were placed on active service, owing to his exceptional financial or business obligations or domestic position;

(e) Ill health or infirmity;

(f) That he conscientiously objects to the undertaking of combatant service and is prohibited from so doing by the tenets and articles of faith, in effect at the date of the passing of this Act, of any organized religious denomination existing and well recognized in Canada at such date, and to which he in good faith belongs;

The Bill goes on to provide that if any of the grounds of the application for exemption are established, a certificate of exemption shall be granted to the applicant. It is further provided that a certificate may be conditional as to time or otherwise and, if granted solely on conscientious grounds, it shall state that exemption is from combatant service only.

Another provision which I consider very important and appropriate is taken from the British Act, and was regarded in Great Britain as essential in the interests of labour. It is as follows:

No certificate shall be conditional upon a person to whom it is granted continuing in or entering into employment under any specified employer or in any specified place or establishment.

It was feared in Great Britain that certificates might be granted upon conditions respecting employment which would place employees more or less at the mercy of employers. There was, therefore, in the British Act a direct provision, which we have adopted in this Bill, that no such condition should be inserted in any certificate of exemption.

Another provision in this section makes it an offence to make any false statement or representation before a tribunal or to alter or tamper with a certificate. It is provided also that where a certificate is lost, destroyed or defaced, the tribunal may grant another certificate upon the payment of a small fee.

Section 12 provides that the Governor in Council may make regulations for certain purposes therein mentioned.

Section 13 contains general provisions making applicable the Militia Act, the Army Act and the King's Regulations and Orders for the army in so far as they are applicable and not inconsistent with this Act. This section also empowers the Minister of Militia and Defence to transfer to the Naval Service any man who has reported for duty under the provisions of this Act.

Sections 14 and 15 are not important; I need not refer to them at the moment. Subsection 1 of section 16 is as follows:

This Act shall come into force on such day, after the passing thereof, as the Governor in Council may fix by proclamation.

The only portion of the Act to which I have not directed attention, is the schedule, which sets forth the exceptions. It is as follows:

Exceptions.

1. Men who hold a certificate granted under this Act and in force, other than a certificate of exemption from combatant service only.
2. Members of His Majesty's regular or reserve, or auxiliary forces, as defined by the Army Act.
3. Members of the military forces raised by the Governments of any of His Majesty's other dominions or by the Government of India.
4. Men serving in the Royal Navy or in the Royal Marines, or in the Naval Service of Canada, and members of the Canadian Expeditionary Force.
5. Men who have since August 4, 1914 served in the military or naval forces of Great Britain or her allies in any theatre of actual war and have been honourably discharged therefrom.
6. Clergy, including members of any recognized order of an exclusively religious character, and ministers of all religious denominations existing in Canada at the date of the passing of this Act.
7. Those persons exempted from military service by Order in Council of August 13, 1873, and by Order in Council of December 6, 1898.

This last provision relates to certain communities of Mennonites and Doukhobors, who came into Canada on the faith of the Orders in Council which I have mentioned. Under these Orders in Council, the settlers referred to were not to be called upon to perform military service. It is absolutely clear that the faith of a country thus pledged must be kept; therefore this exception is introduced into the Bill.

I have endeavoured to give to the House as clearly and as succinctly as possible the main features of this Bill. There are one or two words that I should like to add before I sit down. The measure is not intended as provocative or punitive; it is put forward in good faith as the only means of insuring national safety in a great peril. It has been stated in the press that Canadians should not be called upon to fight beyond the limits of our territory. But ever since 1868 the law has recognized the obligation of Canadians to fight beyond the limits of our territory, and it recognizes that obligation to-day. I quote again section 69 of the Militia Act:

> The Governor in Council may place the militia, or any part thereof, on active service anywhere in Canada, and also beyond Canada, for the defence thereof, at any time when it appears advisable so to do by reason of emergency.

It is declared in section 2 of the Militia Act that "emergency" means war, invasion, riot, or insurrection, real or apprehended. Two conditions, therefore, are necessary to the placing of the militia or any part thereof on active service beyond Canada. First, the men must be sent by reason of an emergency; secondly, they must be sent beyond Canada for the defence thereof. Let us consider whether or not those conditions are fulfilled by the present circumstances.

Will any hon. gentleman present deny that there is an emergency within the meaning of the statute? In the midst of the most terrific struggle ever known to history no one will seriously doubt the answer. There is more than an emergency; there is a cataclysm. The greatest of the nations that were once neutral—that great nation to the South of us—has at last been obliged to take up arms to defend its rights, to prevent the domination of militarism, the destruction of liberty and the enslavement of the world. Therefore, I take it for granted that there is no argument open as to the existence of an emergency. Not only is it an emergency; it is the greatest emergency, the greatest peril ever known, the greatest, I believe, that will ever be known in the history of this Dominion.

If it is conceded that there is an emergency, are we not fighting in France and Flanders for the defence of Canada? There are but few members of the House who, in speaking of the war, have not affirmed that truth. Let us look for a moment at Great Britain. We do not know what forces she has in France at the present moment, but we do know, from the returns already made public, that her armies have sustained very nearly a million casualties on the soil of France and Belgium. Is Great Britain fighting in France and in Belgium for the defence of her own territory? Yes, she is fighting to free the soil of France and Belgium from the unhallowed footsteps of the enemy, but she is no less truly fighting in defence of her own territory. I do not suppose that any one, looking at the circumstances as they have developed since the 4th day of August, 1914, could doubt that for one moment. What about Canada? When the Canadians on the 22nd day of April 1915, barred the path of the German to Calais, I say that they barred his path also to Halifax, Quebec, St. John and Montreal. From the North Sea to the borders of Switzerland there is a line nearly 500 miles in length, which is being pressed back towards the German frontier. Along that 500 mile line there is a strip of territory of varying width over which this devastating struggle has swayed to and fro. It was once a glorious country with smiling fields, happy villages and prosperous towns. To-day it is the abomination of desolation, a mass of shell-churned mud with no trace of road or street, house, habitation or village. Even the fruit trees have been cut down and the wells destroyed. The Hun has spared nothing. Thousands of its inhabitants, especially girls and young women, have been led away by the Germans into a captivity worse than death. Its churches have been destroyed and even its graveyards desecrated. Imagine such scenes in this country of Canada, along a battle line extending from Quebec to Toronto. Where is Canada's first line of defence against such horrors and barbarities? It is in the North Sea, where the Empire's Navy holds back Germany's power, and in the trenches where the Canadians with the other Allied armies are slowly but surely freeing the soil of France and of Belgium from the insulting tread of the invader. If that is not our first line of defence, where is it? Who then will say that the Canadian Expeditionary Force is not fighting for the defence of Canada? Who will affirm that it is performing a less distinctively national service than the force employed in garrison and outpost duty within our territory? And yet, no one for a moment can deny that the force we have called out for garrison and outpost duty in Canada is acting in the defence of Canada. Is the service that is being performed by the force overseas of a different character? I say not, in my judgment, and in this matter, I, and no one else, am responsible for the judgment to which I must come. Some one speaks of the distance. What security is there in mere distance, considering modern means of communication or attack, not only on the sea, but through the air and under the sea? If this war continues for two more years, who shall say that we may not see German aircraft in Canada? Let us not forget that German submarines crossed the Atlantic nearly a year ago.

In the debate of 1904, upon the Militia Act, as it is now constituted, some exception was taken to the change made at that time in the Act as originally passed by Sir George Etienne Cartier. It was agreed on both sides of the House that, whether the change was desirable or not so far as form was concerned, it made no change in substance. After very careful consideration I agreed to that. The Minister of Militia of the day, Sir Frederick Borden, the Minister of Justice of the day, Sir Charles Fitzpatrick, now Chief Justice of Canada, the Minister of Finance of the day, Hon. W. S. Fielding, all agreed that if there was a change in form, there was no change in meaning or in substance. At column 6374 of Hansard, of 1904, Sir Charles Fitzpatrick said in response to a suggestion that the Governor in Council ought not to have the power to send the militia to any part of the Empire for the defence of Canada

> We have had that power for a long time.

Later on in the debate he said:

> Here is the position that is taken now, that we give to the Governor in Council authority to employ the troops of Canada either within or without Canada for the defence of Canada. Then we make provision that Parliament should be summoned fifteen days after a declaration of war, and that the troops may be called out, so that Parliament shall decide then what use is to made of the troops whether within or without Canada, and what we are to do with them.

Further on he said:

> The Governor in Council may send the militia of Canada out of Canada at any time when deemed necessary for the defence of Canada. If, in the opinion of the Governor in Council, it should be necessary, because of a war going on in India, to send our militia out there for the defence of Canada, they may, in the exercise of their discretion, do it, because they are the sole judges of what is necessary to be done in defence of Canada. But we do not think it advisable that that power should be absolutely and unrestrictedly in the hands of the Governor in Council. We think it advisable that the period during which they may exercise that power should be restricted and that Parliament should be called together and be consulted at the earliest opportunity. Parliament must be summoned in fifteen days and then the whole matter will be in the hands of the people's representatives.

I could quote many other passages along the same line, but I will only allude to one of them. The then member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) said in the same debate:

> I admit that an emergency might arise when the Government should have the power to call out the militia immediately.
> I do not dispute that; but suppose an occasion should arise on which Canada would be called upon to organize its militia and send a large portion of it outside of Canada, when in the judgment of a large number of the people and Parliament of Canada it would be to the disadvantage of the country to have so large a number of troops sent out, Parliament should be the final judge of that question, and the Government should call Parliament to deal with the matter.

So it will be apparent to hon. members of the House that there was no question raised at all as to the power to send the militia outside of Canada for the defence of this country. It was conceded that the Government of the country must in the first instance be the absolute and uncontrolled judge of whether that necessity had arisen, and the only point raised was whether or not, in case that power were exercised Parliament should be summoned to deal with the question, and within what time. The power to send our citizens enrolled in the militia outside Canada for the defence thereof, was fully conceded in the debate, and the construction placed upon the measure at that time was as I have already indicated.

I repeat that this measure merely accepts and acts on a principle which has been embodied in our law for almost half a century, and which recognizes an equal obligation on all citizens for the defence of their country. There is an equal obligation but, under present conditions there cannot be an equal sacrifice. No sacrifice made hereafter can be as great as that of those who have already gone to the front, some of whom have fallen, and many of whom have already been in the trenches for two years.

It has been said of this Bill that it will induce disunion, discord, and strife, and that it will paralyze the nation's effort. I trust that this prophecy may prove unfounded. Why should strife be induced by the application of a principle which was adopted at the very inception of Confederation?

All citizens are entitled to equal protection of the laws, and upon them is imposed an equal obligation. There can be no national unity unless this principle is accepted. I cannot bring myself to believe that any class or community will expect to assert for itself the right or the power to defy the law, and to set up for itself different standards from those which are applied to the people as a whole.

It was my strong desire to bring about a union of all parties for the purpose of preventing any such disunion or strife as is apprehended. That effort was an absolutely sincere one, and I do not regret that it was made, although the delay which it occasioned may have given opportunity for increased agitation and for excitement arising from misunderstanding. I went so far as to agree that this Bill should not become effective until after a general election, in the hope that by this means all apprehension would be allayed, and that there might be a united effort to fulfil the great national purpose of winning this war. What may be necessary or expedient in that regard, I am yet willing to consider, for ever since this war began I have had one constant aim and it was this: to throw the full power and effort of Canada into the scale of right, liberty and justice for the winning of this war, and to maintain the unity of the Canadian people in that effort.

But I cannot shrink, and I will not shrink, from the determination to support and sustain the Canadian troops now at the front. It is said that the consequences of this measure are to be dreaded. Why they should be dreaded I cannot understand, for it introduces no new principle. I should rather be concerned as to what may ensue if this Bill is not passed. The legislation of 1868 and 1904 was not mere stage play; it was a serious measure with a serious purpose. The conditions which it calls for have surely been fulfilled. God speed the day when the gallant men who are protecting and defending us will return to the land they love so well. Only those who have seen them at the front can realize how much they do love this dear land of Canada. If we do not pass this measure, if we do not provide reinforcements, if we do not keep our plighted faith, with what countenance shall we meet them on their return? They have seen their friends and comrades discoloured and gasping from poison gas at Ypres. They have known what it means to have regiments decimated, to see comrades and brothers struck down. They have held on grimly in the trenches in the Ypres salient and elsewhere against overwhelming numbers and under the devastating power of the enemy's artillery when we lacked guns and munitions. They have climbed the heights of the Vimy Ridge and driven the Germans far beyond it. They have answered the call of service and duty, they have fought and died that Canada might live and that the horrors and desolation of war might never be known within our borders. They went forth splendid in their youth and confidence. They will come back silent, grim, determined men, who not once or twice but fifty times have gone over the parapet to seek their rendezvous with death. If what are left of 400,000 such men come back to Canada with fierce resentment, and even rage in their hearts, conscious that they have been deserted and betrayed, how shall we meet them when they ask the reason? I am not so much concerned for the day when this Bill becomes law, as for the day when these men return if it is rejected. It is easy to sow the wind of clamour against the imposition of equal duty and obligation upon all Canadians for the preservation of their country; but those who make that sowing may reap such a whirlwind as they do not dream of to-day.

I hope that this measure will be received by the House and by the country in the spirit in which it is offered. It is presented from a sense of duty and with no desire or intention of interfering with the legitimate rights of any of the citizens of this country. It is inspired by the sincere belief that in truth we are fighting a battle which involves the destiny of Canada and of the whole world, by the strong conviction that the protection of our country, its citizens, their liberties and their heritage, depends upon the success of our efforts.

I trust that the debate will be characterized by a sense of the grave responsibilities which thus devolve upon this Parliament and upon the people. I hope that it will be conducted with fairness and moderation, with no angry word or taunt, so that those who come after may know that the men of this day and generation representing the Canadian people in their Parliament, were animated by ideals and inspired by motives far above the paltry and insignificant considerations of lesser days. I hope that this measure will be so received that those who are holding the trenches beyond the seas, fighting for our security and our liberty, may realize that their trust in us is not in vain. This afternoon there are 125,000 Canadians pressing back the invaders in France and Belgium. Let us prove ourselves worthy to call them comrades. Some may have made the supreme sacrifice for Canada even as we speak. Let us summon in thought these brave comrades, firm of heart and strong of purpose, those who have fought, yes and those who shall fight no more, let us summon them in the spirit to our deliberations, let us speak and determine as if they were in our midst.

Right hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Mr. Speaker, as the rules of the House do not permit at this stage a full discussion of the principle which is involved in this Bill, I shall have to content myself with simply making one observation. My right hon. friend has expressed the hope that this debate shall be characterized by frankness and moderation. I can assure him that on this side of the House his wish in that respect will be fully gratified. Whatever we may say as to the measure now before the House we shall say as befits members of the House of Commons and as free British citizens, and if we have to differ, we shall differ more in sorrow than in anger. I appreciate what my right hon. friend has said that the duties that devolve upon him are of great magnitude. Perhaps he will allow me to say that the duties that devolve upon me are as important in one way as are his own; and perhaps he will allow me to tell him that the position which I hold, and which I may have to defend, may be perhaps involved in more difficulties than those which he has to meet. I say no further to-day. I have only one request to make. My right hon. friend refers to matters which he is to lay before the House. He states that before the second reading of the Bill, when discussion will really commence, he will place on the Table the statistics of which he has spoken, but which he did not give, of the number of available men between the ages of twenty and forty-five. I hope he will give that statement to the House in ample time, before we take up the second reading of the Bill.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I shall endeavour to do it at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD (Pictou): Would my right hon. friend (Sir Robert Borden) be good enough to say, if he can at this stage, whether it will be the policy of the Government to provide, by amendment of this Bill or otherwise, for registration of the people by statute similar to that passed in the United States?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The provision to which I have alluded is the only provision the Government has in contemplation at present.

Mr. MACDONALD: May I ask if there will be a statutory definition of the words "national interest" used in section 11 of the Bill, or whether the interpretation of the meaning will be left to the different local boards?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: There is provision that regulations may be made for the purpose of securing uniformity in the application of the Act; but the point has only been taken into consideration in that way.

Mr. MACDONALD: And there will be no statutory definition?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It is not in contemplation at the moment. I shall be glad to hear the suggestions of my hon. friend (Mr. Macdonald) or of any other hon. member as to that. At present we have not in contemplation a statutory definition, but we have provided that regulations may be made for the purpose of securing uniformity in the application of the Act. There is a similar provision in the British Act.

Mr. PUGSLEY: In the statistics to be given, showing the number of men available between the ages of twenty and forty-five, is it intended to give the numbers in different classes, or only the total?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Some of the information we shall give to the House may relate to each of the different classes, but other information that we may be able to furnish possibly will not be so detailed but may embrace two, three or four classes. We will do the best we can in every case.

Mr. MURPHY: In connection with the information the hon. gentleman is to lay on the Table, showing how many men are available between twenty and forty-five, will the Prime Minister be good enough to include a statement of the number of these men who have actually enlisted?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: We will endeavour to do so.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: By your leave, Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask one more question. Through the courtesy of my right hon. friend (Sir Robert Borden) I received a copy of the Bill which he has just introduced. But, as between this copy and the Bill which has just been distributed, I find some discrepancies. For instance, in the schedule; in the Bill given me by my right hon. friend there are eight sections, but in the Bill which has been distributed there are only seven. I call the attention of my right hon. friend to this, so that we may have before us a correct copy of the Bill.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It may be that I have sent to my right hon. friend a previous print.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: But I am not quite sure which is the correct one.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: In the schedule to the Bill there are seven sections.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: So, the last one I have is the correct one. All right.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first time.

SIR JULIAN BYNG.

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir SAM HUGHES: I observe by the press of the country that a despatch has been issued stating that Sir Julian Byng has ceased to be in command of the Canadian troops at the front. I desire to ask if this is true, and, if so, whether one of our Canadian officers is going to succeed him.

Sir EDWARD KEMP (Minister of Militia): I also read the despatch in the morning paper. I expect to have an explanation to-morrow or next day. I have made inquiries, but have not received information up to the present.

PURCHASE OF CHEESE BY THE BRITISH GOVERNMENT.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. E. W. NESBITT (North Oxford): I desire to ask a question of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Burrell). Has the hon. gentleman had any protest from the central and western parts of Ontario with reference to the order of the commission for the purchase of cheese, that this cheese is to be weighed and inspected at Montreal, and not in the warehouse in the West? I have received several protests, which, the writers say, they have sent also to the minister. I should like to know if he has received these protests and what he purposes doing about the matter.

Hon. MARTIN BURRELL (Minister of Agriculture): This matter has been drawn to my attention. I would remind my hon. friend (Mr. Nesbitt) that the inspection which formerly took place at western points was really an inspection between the buyer and the seller, but in the present case the British representatives on the commission are buying the cheese f.o.b. Montreal. I have had one or two representations on the lines referred to, and I have turned them over to the commissioners who have offices in Montreal, and who, I am certain, will give to these matters the fullest, fairest consideration, with a view to devising the best regulations and methods for the interests both of the purchaser and of the shipper.

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY (Russell): The Minister of Agriculture last week was kind enough to give information in answer to an inquiry based on information furnished by some constituents of mine whom the hon. gentlemen himself represented as among the most important cheese manufacturers in Canada. I am in receipt of a further letter asking for information. It is pointed out that the price fixed for the cheese, as my hon. friend, I think, stated to the House, last week, is 24¾ cents f.o.b. ship, Montreal. My correspondents allege that there must be taken from that price 1¾ cents for manufacturing, and a further small fractional sum paid to the wholesaler, and that being deducted would make the net price to the Canadian manufacturer something less than 20 cents. My correspondents point out that the price in Liverpool and in England is 32 cents, and they want to know why the discrepancy between the price in Canada and the price in England.

Mr. BURRELL: I think my hon. friend must be mistaken as to his figures.

Mr. MURPHY (Russell): That is what is stated in this letter.

Mr. BURRELL: The last quotation of the Brockville Cheese Board, I think, was 20¾. I think it will be found that, speaking generally, considering freight, the difference would be about three-quarters of a cent between that and the price f.o.b., Montreal. However, I cannot give my hon. friend any answer on that particular subject, as it is entirely a matter for the British authorities to deal with. They decided what kind of a price they would authorize their representatives to pay. Mr. McGowan has taken the matter up with the most absolute fairness. There is probably no market for any cheese coming from the outside, because the British authorities have commandeered the whole thing. Our only hope —at least representations have been made to that effect—is that the price that is given will not be lessened, and, if possible, it will be bettered. However, it is not a question that we have any control over at all.

Mr. MORPHY (North Perth): Might I ask my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture whether or not he consulted the Western Ontario Cheese Association or kindred associations before he put that legislation in force?

Mr. BURRELL: There is no legislation at all.

Mr. MORPHY (North Perth): There is an Order in Council.

Mr. BURRELL: There is not even an Order in Council.

Mr. MORPHY (North Perth): Well, you have taken action.

Mr. BURRELL: The Government have had the matter under consideration and have appointed, in addition to the British commissioner, Mr. Ruddick, of the Department of Agriculture, and Mr. Alexander, of Montreal, an old member of the cheese trade there, with the idea of seeing that the regulations are carried out, these gentlemen acting in an advisory capacity.

Mr. NESBITT: Are the same regulations in force on the other side of the line as to price as those which are in force on this side and is it absolutely necessary that the cheese men should abide by all the conditions laid down by this Cheese Commission without any remedy? Have they got to comply with them whether they want to or not and are the prices the same on the other side of the line?

Mr. BURRELL: When my hon. friend (Mr. Nesbitt) asks me if they have got to do this and got to do that, I can assure him that under this particular measure there is no compulsion at all. Nobody is obliged to sell cheese to the commission in any shape or form; it is purely voluntary. The British authorities decided that they could offer so much and if people want to sell their cheese they can. If they do not want to sell their cheese they do not have to. Is the price which is being paid on the other side of the line—I presume my hon. friend means the United States—I cannot tell my hon. friend as to that although I should think that, judging from the action lately taken by the British Government, whatever the local prices may be in the two countries, the export price, I should think, would be the same.

Mr. NESBITT: When I asked that—

Mr. SPEAKER: I hope the hon. member will conclude his question because it may lead to a debate on this subject, which would not be in order.

Mr. NESBITT: I quite appreciate that, but I wanted to find out if they would have to sell.

RESOLUTION OF THE MONTREAL TRADES AND LABOUR COUNCIL.

On the Orders of the Day.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) asked me some time ago in regard to a resolution from the Trades and Labour Council of Montreal adopted on or about May 17. My hon. friend the Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers), on the 6th June stated that it had not been received by the Government. It was received by myself and I acknowledged it on the 22nd May, 1917. My hon. friend the Minister of Labour was not aware, that the resolution had been received, and I overlooked the fact.

RUMOURED RESIGNATION FROM THE CABINET OF THE HON. MR. PATENAUDE.

On the Orders of the Day.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Might I ask my right hon. friend the Prime Minister if the rumour which reached us this morning is correct, that the hon. the Secretary of State (Mr. Patenaude) had tendered his resignation and whether it has been accepted?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I will make a statement to-morrow.

TELEGRAM FROM THE YUKON RE PRICE ADVANCES.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Edmonton): I desire to offer a further contribution to the Parliamentary literature on the subject of the high cost of living. I have a wire which is as follows:

Dawson, Yukon, June 9, 1917.

Frank Oliver, M.P.,
Ottawa.

May twenty-fourth Dawson flour advanced from seven to eleven dollars at one jump; bread almost doubled in price. This advance is on old stock bought at last summer's prices; no new stock received. Women's protective league wrote urgent letter to administrator Williams requesting immediate action. He states there will be no written answer to our letter. We then held open meeting to discuss high prices. Yukon councillors publicly invited but not one councillor attended. Miners came in from Creeks to meeting which was largely representative of working people. Result of meeting night letter two hundred fifty words to Premier Borden sent June first; no answer yet. Administrator Williams endeavours to justify extortionate increase. Outside of official and commercial circles general dissatisfaction and indignation freely expressed. Situation becoming serious. Please see Borden; telegraph and act. We trust you implicitly. Answer prepaid.

(Sgd) Geraldine McD. L. Sharpe,
Secretary Women's Protective League.
Marie Fotheringham,
Secretary Yukon Progressive League.

Mr. SPEAKER: I had assumed that it was the purpose of the hon. gentleman to ask a question of the Government. In not having done so, he has taken a liberty with the rules.

Mr. OLIVER: Of course, the question is contained in the telegram and I hope my right hon. friend the Prime Minister will give the answer desired by these two women's leagues in the Yukon.

Mr. SPEAKER: We are passing through unusual times and I have endeavoured not to be too rigid in the enforcement of the rules of order, but I must appeal to hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House to regard this indulgence in a much more careful manner than has recently been the case.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am afraid my hon. friend (Mr. Oliver) has not fulfilled his trust because I cannot recall that he has seen me on the subject. However, the telegram there alluded to was transferred by me to my hon. friend the Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers) who has just informed me that he sent a reply to Mrs. Sharpe. Since then I have not had the matter brought before me until my hon. friend mentioned it to-day. My hon. friend the Minister of Labour will make a statement on the action which he took.

Hon. T. W. CROTHERS (Minister of Labour): The telegram referred to by the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) was received at the Prime Minister's office and referred to me. After consultation with the hon. member for the Yukon (Mr. Thompson) I replied to Mrs. Sharpe and I also wrote—it was not a matter that we could telegraph very well—to the company referred to concerning the prices. I sent a copy of this telegram and asked them what they had to say about it. There has not been time yet to receive a reply from him. As soon as I have an answer I shall show it to my hon. friend and take such action as is considered proper.

EMBARGO ON PENNSYLVANIA COAL.

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure): Has the Minister of Labour anything to state regarding the message I gave him about an embargo on Pennyslvania coal coming into Canada? Is he in a position to give me any information in the matter?

Hon. T. W. CROTHERS (Minister of Labour): I think it was on Thursday evening that the hon. gentleman from Bonaventure showed me a letter stating that Pennsylvania had placed an embargo on coal. I took it up with the Board of Railway Commissioners, and this morning I received a letter in reply to say that the Pennsylvania Railway, through Mr. Rogers, general superintendent at Buffalo, had advised that embargo number 1437 had been cancelled on May 31. I take it that that number refers to the embargo the gentleman who communicated with my hon friend complained of. So that it appears the embargo was removed on the 31st May.

LABOUR STRIKES IN WESTERN COAL MINES.

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Edmonton): I notice by the papers that the coal strike, which formerly was confined to Southern Alberta, has extended to Northern Alberta, as a result the bituminous mines on the railway lines west of Edmonton are tied up. Has the minister any information on that point, and has he taken any action which may be disclosed to the House?

Mr. CROTHERS: In reply to my hon. friend from Edmonton, I may say that Mr. Green, a member of this House, reached Calgary, I think a week ago this morning. He has been in communication with the operators and the representatives of the mines since that time. I have not received any particulars as to the progress he has made, I sent him a message on Saturday asking for particulars, and requesting him to state the present situation, and the prospect. I expected a wire from him, but it has not arrived. If I receive any information I shall communicate it to my hon. friend.

Mr. OLIVER: There is a very wide difference in locality between the two areas. Hitherto they have not been under the same co-operation in union matters. I should be very glad if the minister would get information relating specially to the mines in Northern Alberta, in which I am more particularly interested, as they took no part in the strike until the last few days, showing they are not under the same jurisdiction as the other mines, and are animated by different motives.

Mr. CROTHERS: If my hon. friend would give me the names of the mines to which he refers, I could perhaps answer his inquiry.

Mr. OLIVER: Jasper Park Collieries at Pocahontas, and Brulé Lake Mines, on Brulé Lake on the Canadian Northern, the Pacific Pass Mine and the Mountain Park Mine. These four would be the principal ones.

Mr. CROTHERS: I have received no information concerning a strike at any of these points. When did the hon. member learn it?

Mr. OLIVER: I saw it in the press on Saturday.

Mr. CROTHERS: I have no information, but I will inquire.

[Mr. Crothers.]

The House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Rainville in the chair.

GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS—ANNUAL STATEMENT BY THE MINISTER.

Railways and Canals—chargeable to capital —Canadian Government Railways, contruction and betterments, $6,500,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It is usual for the minister, in bringing down his Estimates, to make a general statement in regard to the Government railways.

Hon. FRANK COCHRANE (Minister of Railways and Canals): We are now operating as the Canadian Government Railways System 4,063 miles of railroad. Briefly, the results of operating these railways show that we will have a surplus of $1,074,334 on the Intercolonial, and that we will sustain a deficit of $1,890,371 on the Transcontinental Railway for the recent fiscal year.

Mileage.

Intercolonial, 1,562; Transcontinental, 2,009; Prince Edward Island, 275; International, 112; St. John Valley, 105. Total, 4,063.

Earnings.

The earnings on the Intercolonial during the four winter months were abnormally low, on account of the fact that our operations were directly mainly to the handling of war supplies to Halifax and St. John, and as these ports take the same freight rate as Portland, the Intercolonial's proportion of the through freight rate for its 836 mile haul to Halifax, or 740 mile haul to St. John, as against the Grand Trunk's 297 mile haul to Portland, or the Canadian Pacific's 481 mile haul to St. John, gives an earning as low as $2.20 per ton on hay, oats, flour, etc., which is less than 50 per cent of the actual cost of its transportation. We have also had to move for war purposes large quantities of other low class war freight, and, in order to do this, had to embargo many ordinary lines of shipment which paid higher rates. In this way we were called upon to sustain losses upon operations during these months which, under ordinary conditions, would have shown surpluses.

Intercolonial Railway.

The figures that I am using are subject to slight modification, but on the Intercolonial during the recent fiscal year we earned $16,805,723.64 and spent $15,731,389.

giving us a surplus of $1,137,713, which will be absorbed by our equipment renewal account. Our surplus last year was $1,517,295.

Operating expenses during the year have increased greatly, due to the enhanced cost of coal, increase in wages, increase in cost of material and supplies. On the Intercolonial, operating expenses were unduly heavy during the recent winter, because of extreme weather conditions and the congestion of traffic in Montreal terminals.

Transcontinental Railway.

On the Transcontinental railway we earned $5,916,550, as compared with $3,758,387 last year, and the operating expenses were $7,883,177, as compared with $4,410,528 for the eleven months of the previous year.

The large deficit on the Transcontinental railway is due to the comparatively small amount of traffic offering for that railway and to the fact that we have been obliged to establish trains not at present warranted by the business offering. In addition, we are maintaining the road to the standard of other transcontinental railways, so that we may offer the same safety and comfort in travel as is offered by other transcontinental lines.

Government Railways System.

The operating expenses of the entire Government Railways system for the twelve months were $24,645,433 as against $17,797,061 for the previous year. The earnings for the year were $23,465,565 as compared with $18,373,143 for the previous year. The deficit, therefore, on the combined operations for the year amounts to $1,179,867.

Coal Troubles.

I have already mentioned the reasons given by the management for the great increase in the cost of operation. The item of coal alone was most serious. We contracted for an ample supply, but during the winter the coal miners in eastern Canada claimed to be unable to make delivery, although we offered them more money. Rather than commandeer the output consigned over our lines for commercial and industrial purposes, we had to import large quantities at an increased cost of $486,240.

Extreme Weather Conditions.

Weather conditions last winter in Quebec and Northern New Brunswick were the most severe in many years. Heavy storms and zero weather prevailed almost continuously from January 20 to February 19, and there were also some bad storms in March. Snow-fighting gangs and snowplough trains had to be continuously employed during this period. Our snow-fighting expense during January and February between Montreal and Moncton was $169,288, as compared with $64,757 last year.

The cost of operation was adversely affected also by heavy weather and consequent delays, and on account of Grand Trunk congestion at Montreal. This led to a most unfortunate situation as, under the 99-year joint terminal agreement entered into by the late Government in 1898, we are dependent upon the Grand Trunk for terminal accommodation at that point. This inability of the Grand Trunk to accept business from us resulted in the setting out at one period of about 3,000 west-bound cars, blocking numerous passing tracks, resulting in delay to more than 700 cars of steel urgently required for munitions, and necessitating marshalling westbound trains on our line, work ordinarily done by switch engines in Montreal yards. Overtime in freight service increased $38,000. These conditions at Montreal obliged us to return 49 locomotives and vans, without loads, from Halifax to Montreal in order to maintain our overseas movement. It will be seen, therefore, that conditions were quite abnormal.

Curtailed Passenger Service.

In common with the other great railway systems in Canada, and after conference with the Chairman of the Dominion Railway Board, we decided, in view of the coal situation and urgent overseas movement, to curtail the Intercolonial passenger service, and several local trains and one of our through express trains were taken off during the winter. This also tended to reduce our revenue, and the curtailed service led to considerable inconvenience; but, with the advent of spring and the opening of navigation and the general easing up of conditions, the passenger service heretofore enjoyed on the Intercolonial railway has been resumed.

Nearly Six Million Passengers Carried Without Fatal Accident.

The total number of passengers carried over the system during the calendar year, January to December, 1916, inclusive, was 5,673,796. Included in this number were militia and naval passengers totalling 277,155, carried in 443 special trains. Although we carried nearly six million passengers during the year, there were few accidents and no passengers were killed although 22 suffered injuries.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The minister speaks of there being no loss of life. My information is that in one week last winter there were twenty train wrecks, twenty locomotives being thrown off the track. Does the minister make any reference to that?

Mr. COCHRANE: I do not.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The minister makes reference only to loss of life, not to train wrecks.

Mr. COCHRANE: The hon. member would like to gain a political point; that is his idea.

Troop Trains Well Handled.

As regards the handling of troop trains, my advice is that, while the schedules of these trains were slow, the movements were uniformly good, and that at no time was it necessary to delay a ship at Halifax waiting for troops. In the majority of cases the delay has been the other way, and it has been necessary to hold troops in trains at Halifax for considerable periods before they could embark. The largest single movement was 25 trains.

Halifax Terminals Speeded Up.

To assist in handling the overseas shipment of stores and timber, special efforts were made to complete three berths and two immense temporary sheds at the new Ocean Terminals, Halifax. This was a big undertaking but was satisfactorily completed by November 15. When the war broke out our yards could accommodate 1,844 cars in and around Halifax; we are now able to handle 3,748 cars, which is a striking indication of our overseas development at that point.

The grading from Point Pleasant to Fairview has been practically completed. The substructure of the subway at Fairview has been completed and a temporary steel span erected. Two concrete highway arches, one at Mumford road and one at Quinpool road, have been completed, and the foundations finished for Chebucto and Byers roads and Prince Arthur street.

Work Well in Hand.

The filling behind the bulkhead passenger landing quay wall and north of basin No. 1 is about 60 per cent completed, but very little more can be done until the quay walls are finished. The foundation of the quay walls for the bulkhead passenger landing quay, north quay wall, basin No. 1 and quay walls pier No. 1 are practically finished. The dredging for the first unit is about 90 per cent completed; the breakwater wholly so. The new outlet for the city sewer is finished to the head of basin No. 1.

Line Improvements.

Eighty miles of main line track on the Intercolonial have been relaid with 85-pound rails, as well as 10 miles of the New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island railway branch line, which will make the connection between the Intercolonial and the new Prince Edward Island car ferry.

One million one hundred thousand tie renewals have been made on Government railways. One hundred and seventy miles of track have been re-ballasted. Eight passing sidings were extended, two new ones built, as well as fourteen business sidings and fifty-two private sidings. The following terminal yards were enlarged to the total extent of 3,061 cars capacity: Chaudiere Junction, 580 cars, St. Rosalie Junction, 230 cars, Moncton, 369 cars, Truro, 282 cars; Rockingham, 1,600 cars.

This work alone cost us about a quarter of a million dollars, but without it we could not have begun to handle this last winter's business, when the steel shipments from the Maritime Provinces, westbound, were very heavy, and quite as important, from the standpoint of munitions, as the eastbound traffic. These greatly enlarged terminals and extended passing sidings really saved the day from the traffic standpoint.

A million bushel concrete grain elevator is being erected by contract at Transcona, and a 500,000 bushel grain elevator with conveyers at St. John, both of which are to be completed for the grain business this year.

The steamship Northumberland was purchased from the Charlottetown Steamship Navigation Company for use between Prince Edward Island and the mainland.

The work of beautifying the station grounds was continued during the year, and some 33 new lawns and flower beds constructed.

In addition to repairs to a large number of structures, 22 steel railway bridges were erected and 6 overhead bridges replaced with steel spans.

Increased Engine Capacity.

Sixty modern freight engines, of the Mikado and Santa Fe type, were contracted for, the former having a haulage capacity of 265 per cent and the latter of 320 per cent, as compared with 220 per cent, which was the capacity of the largest locomotives previously in the service.

Slow Delivery of Freight Cars.

We ordered 1,000 fifty-ton box cars in the spring of 1916 from two large car manufacturers in eastern Canada, delivery to be completed by October 1, 1916, and January 1, 1917, so as to assist in the winter overseas freight movement; but the contractors failed to make delivery, causing much disappointment and delay, and adversely affecting overseas business. Delivery of one order of 500 was only completed on April 15 last, and in the other case only 167 of the 500 had been delivered up to April 17.

Busy Shops.

The immense demand for transportation facilities created unusual demands for locomotives and cars. By employing an increased number of car repair men our "bad order" freight cars were reduced from 1,410 to 400 during the year. We have repaired over 12,000 freight cars during the year, converted 225 to pulp cars and vans, and built 50 new flats, applied metal draft arms to 500 and safety appliances to 700. We made heavy repairs to 218 passenger cars during the year and completed the building of 4 baggage cars and 2 postal cars with steel underframes, all completely built in the Moncton shops, and also remodelled and overhauled 79 sleeping, dining and parlour cars. We looked closely after repairs to foreign equipment, and have a balance in our favour for the year of about $90,000.

Providing Military and Hospital Trains.

We have been very busy in the Passenger Car Department during the winter endeavouring to provide passenger car equipment for military purposes, which embraced transportation on both the Intercolonial and the Transcontinental. We converted 10 sleeping cars into military hospital cars. Eight of these were repaired and painted and converted into hospital cars in 14 days. The foremen and mechanics worked in relays at high pressure, day and night, Sundays and holidays, on these cars with gratifying results, and all hands were commended and thanked for the performance of such difficult and unusual work in such a short time. In addition to these 10 hospital cars we have assigned for hospital movement seven standard sleepers, and equipped 13 tourist and six old style sleepers which we use as tourist cars, making a total of 26 cars in hospital service. The 10 Red Cross cars aggregate 105 cots, 10 sections, 99 uppers and 5 drawing rooms. The tourist cars have a carrying capacity of 971, making total carrying capacity available for 1,200 persons.

Prince Edward Island Car Ferry and Terminals.

The car ferry steamer has been in service during the winter, between Pictou and Prince Edward Island ports, as an ice-breaking steamer, and has demonstrated her capacity for dealing with any ice conditions which may arise. At Cape Tormentine the landing pier and the bridges for transferring cars between pier and steamer deck are completed, some adjustment of machinery in the power house, and the installation of electric light plant, being all that is required to render this terminal available for service. Additional stone is yet to be added to the breakwater, and the capping stone placed, but the structure in its present condition affords good protection to the steamer berth and turning basin.

At Carleton Point progress during the season suffered through shortage of labour and the occurrence of violent storms.

The railway connection between the ferry landing and the existing lines of the Prince Edward Island railway has been completed, together with the terminal yard and buildings at Carleton Point. Some additional facilities for handling freight at this point will be added as business develops. About a week's dredging is required to clean up some high spots to give a workable turning basin for the steamer, although considerable dredging will be required to enlarge the basin to specifications. This, however, can be done during the summer. Taken altogether, the landing at Carleton Point is now usable except for the lack of a spring fender. The work on this is well forward and the placing of the fender should be completed about the middle of June, and the work in all respects completed this season.

The total estimated cost of the work is $2,910,000, of which we have expended to date $2,600,000.

Hudson Bay Railway and Terminals.

During the past year the rail has been brought up to Mile 332, which is the crossing of the Nelson river at Kettle rapids. The work was behind schedule, partly owing to a labour shortage and partly to the destruction by fire of the contractor's track-laying outfit thus preventing the construction of the substructure of this bridge before the rise of water which here accompanies ice formation. The substructure of this bridge will be completed on the south side of the Nelson river on May 21, and preparations for start on north side will follow immediately. The steel work of the superstructure is en route to this site. Of the ninety-two miles of grade between this bridge and Port Nelson, work remains to be done at isolated points to an aggregate amount of eleven miles of light grading. Some train filling remains to be done on the portion of the line now built, and much of it has only received a first lift of ballast. It is contemplated that track will be laid into Port Nelson this year and the ballasting of the line brought into fair shape to within a few miles of that terminus.

At Port Nelson a somewhat restricted programme has been followed owing to the effect of war conditions upon labour, materials and ocean tonnage. The bridge structure connecting the deepwater wharves with the mainland was completed, and 1,600 lineal feet of the cribwork of the island placed, built up and filled. The hydraulic dredge worked throughout the season in the channel. The clam shell dredges were employed in dredging stone and gravel from the river bottom for crib filling. During the present season it is hoped that a considerable portion of the island, including the site for the elevator, will be enclosed, and several sections of the deep water dock face cribs placed in position.

The total estimated cost of this work is $26,000,000. We have expended to date $18,175,000, of which $12,565,000 has been in connection with the railway and $5,610,000 in connection with the terminal work at Port Nelson.

Welland Ship Canal.

The estimated cost of this work is fifty million dollars. We have expended to date about thirteen million dollars. As we could not get a return upon our investment for some years, we did not consider the continuance of construction justifiable under our immediate and pressing financial burdens, and orders have been issued suspending operations

Of the nine main sections into which the work have been divided by the engineers, four are now under contract, the estimated value of each of these and the amount expended thereon being:

Section No. 1, estimated value, $3,488,000; expended to date, $2,238,000. Section No. 2, estimated value, $5,377,000; expended to date, $3,111,000. Section No. 3, estimated value, $9,540,000; expended to date, $3,234,000. Section No. 5, estimated value, $1,946,000; expended to date, $1,251,000.

The balance of the expenditures made on account of this work have been for purchase of land, cement and other materials furnished by the department, bridge superstructures procured under separate contracts, operation of construction railway, and miscellaneous. The work is in such condition that no damage is anticipated to occur during the period of suspended operations, and when conditions permit the resumption of the work none of the expenditure which has been made will have been lost.

Trent Canal.

Work upon the Ontario-Rice Lake Division is now drawing to a close. Sections Nos. 1, 5 and 7 are fully completed, and the remaining sections advanced to such a degree that we were able to take our lock gate lifter through the division and hang all the lock gates. The work remaining to be done is for the most part cleaning up the dredging, and this will be completed this season. The Grand Trunk Railway Company have assured us that they will proceed this season with the work involved in raising their low level bridge at Campbellford, so that navigation between lake Ontario and lake Couchiching may be confidently expected on the opening of the season of 1918.

On the Severn division work has proceeded upon the upper two sections which were under contract at the outbreak of the war. Section No. 1, to connect the upper river with Georgian bay, has not yet been placed under contract. The estimated values of the several main contracts and the amount expended to date upon each is as follows:—

Ontario—Rice Lake Division.

Section No. 1, estimated value, $1,105,569; completed. Section No. 2, estimated value, $750,000; expended to date, $721,000. Section No. 3, estimated value, $295,300; expended to date, $229,510. Section No. 4, estimated value, $1,265,000; expended to date, $1,226,000. Section No. 5, estimated value, $634,972; completed. Section No. 6, estimated value, $542,500; expended to date, $510,667. Section No. 7, estimated value, $460,029; completed.

Severn Division.

Port Severn section, estimated value, $160,000; expended to date, $152,900. Section

No. 2, estimated value, $712,000; expended to date, $247,300. Section No. 3, estimated value, $900,000; expended to date, $465,500.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Can the hon. minister (Mr. Cochrane) give us information as to the number of bushels of wheat shipped over the Canadian Government railways during the past year, more particularly over the Transcontinental railway from Winnipeg?

Mr. COCHRANE: I have not that information, but I will get it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Last session, the Minister of Customs (Mr. Reid) who was acting Minister of Railways in the absence of my hon. friend (Mr. Cochrane) gave me the assurance, in answer to a question, that by June or July of that year a regular fast passenger service would be established between the cities of St. John and Halifax and Winnipeg. Yet, all we have to-day from New Brunswick is a service which almost meets the description given by a man in the Southern States of the railway facilities in his own section,—the train went down the line one week and next week tried to get back, making a tri-weekly service. I would ask the Minister of Railways why the promise made to us has not been carried out.

Mr. REID: As the hon. member mentioned my name, perhaps I may be allowed a word. If I remember well, the question was asked by the hon. member when there would be a service through between the eastern provinces and Winnipeg on the Transcontinental, and I said that we expected that it would be established in June. That service would be from St. John and Halifax to Winnipeg, via Quebec and the Transcontinental. I think it was carried out about that time.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Not at all; the service to-day is what it was before the question was asked and the assurance was given. If there is any change at all, the service is worse than it was then.

Mr. CARVELL: The minister does not imagine that there is any service through from Moncton, say, to Levis? There is a sort of a freight train, or mixed, that leaves Moncton and goes as far as Edmundston, then tries to get back the next day—sometimes succeeds, but mostly doesn't. Then there is another sort of train that leaves Edmundston for Lévis, I presume, the following day. But surely the minister does not pretend that we have anything like a through service.

Mr. REID: As I recollect it, the question put to me was when passengers would be able to travel through from the lower provinces to Winnipeg, on the Government system. You can come through from Halifax to Levis on the Intercolonial. I never expected that there would be a through service on the Transcontinental alone. But passengers can get through over the Government railway system.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The hon. minister could not have meant that; he has forgotten the position. We had the mixed service twice a week—

Mr. CARVELL: Three times.

Mr. PUGSLEY: We had the tri-weekly, or semi-weekly service from Moncton to Levis at that time. I called his attention to that, and said that the object of the Transcontinental was to afford a comfortable through service for passengers between Halifax and St. John and Winnipeg, and the minister gave me assurance that a fast Pullman service would be established. He spoke of a Pullman service. But we have no different service from what we had when he gave the promise. You can leave Moncton and go to Edmundston, stay there over night, then, next morning, you can go on some distance further and stay over night again, making progress at the rate of about fourteen miles an hour—just about the same service that we had before. But what the minister promised was that in June or July there would be the same sort of service as on the Canadian Pacific between St. John and the West. The minister is absolutely mistaken if he says that he simply meant that we should be able to get through in some way from Moncton.

Mr. REID: I suppose that Hansard will show what I said, but as I recollect the discussion the point was as to when passengers could leave Halifax or St. John and go over the Government railway system to Winnipeg, because at that time they were going over the Government railway system to Montreal, then over the Grand Trunk and then connect with the Transcontinental again at Cochrane. I stated that about the middle of June a passenger service would be established between Quebec and Cochrane, so that passengers could go through from Halifax and St. John to Levis, cross at Quebec, and so to Winnipeg over the Transcontinental system. That is what I had in mind. Surely the hon. member would not think that when we were running two through passenger trains a day between Halifax and Levis on the Government system we were going to run another train over the Transcontinental between Moncton and Levis, with practically no passengers.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What did the minister mean when he gave the assurance that there would be an improved service? At the time that the minister made the statement, and before, passengers were able, though with these delays, through the mixed service, freight and passenger, to go from Moncton to Winnipeg entirely over the Government system. That was in effect at that time. But the minister assured us that we would have this new service. If all that the minister intended was that we were simply to have the service that we have to-day, then he must have spoken in ignorance of the conditions existing at that time. The minister says that it would be useless to establish a passenger train service since we have one on the Intercolonial.

Mr. REID: I mean through passenger trains.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The Transcontinental railway was built for the purpose of making a transcontinental road between the Atlantic and the Pacific, it is a splendid line, passing through the best country and the people of the Maritime Provinces and the West have a right, within a reasonable time, to a proper service. You cannot build up the country and you cannot encourage travel unless you give the people proper accommodation. From the very day that the Canadian Pacific was open through to St. John they had a regular passenger service and they have developed that traffic. To-day they are doing a very large passenger business. That is what I understood from the minister was intended and I am very sorry indeed because he led us, in the lower provinces, to believe that we were going to have the transcontinental railway developed and a real transcontinental service, both passenger and freight, established.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I would like to call the attention of the hon. the Minister of Railways and Canals to the station at Levis. Levis is possibly the most important point between Montreal and New Brunswick. The station was destroyed by fire two or three years ago and the Government have erected a station which is simply a shack and which is very unworthy of the administration of the Intercolonial. Of course, I understand that during war time the Government is not disposed to spend any considerable amount of money or as much as they would spend for a station at a place of the importance of Levis. At the same time, from my own personal experience, from what I have heard from passengers and from what the press in and around Quebec is saying about the matter, it seems to me that the department should, if it cannot this year undertake to provide a permanent station worthy of the place, make improvements to the present emergency station. The premises are unsanitary. I have been there in winter. I have seen hundreds of passengers packed into a very close room, filled with smoke, women with children in their arms and no seats in the cold days in winter when trains are usually late. I would ask my hon. friend, if he does not intend to build a permanent station now—and I understand why he cannot undertake large expenditures at the present time—to make improvements to the present temporary quarters so as to accommodate the public fairly well. The station could easily be enlarged so as to give the public a chance to move about especially in the winter. I am simply echoing public opinion in this matter. I have heard many passengers speak about it, I have read what the press has said about this station at Levis and I have had personal experience of its unsanitary condition. If the minister were to spend $5,000 he could give the public temporary accommodation which would be suitable until he builds his permanent station.

Mr. COCHRANE: We have in the Estimates $127,000 for a new station at Levis. If we do not go on with the new station I will see that the place is made sanitary and that proper accommodation is provided before winter.

Mr. CARVELL: I wish the minister to bring after dinner whatever information he may have regarding the reports, and expenditures, on the pedestals of the Salmon river viaduct in New Brunswick. I want to discuss that subject with him and I, of course, want him to have the information here unless he has it at hand at the present time.

Mr. COCHRANE: I will try and get it for my hon. friend; if not this evening, I will have it before my Estimates are finished.

Mr. CARVELL: Even if he does not have it, I would like to give him some information which has been placed in my hands and he can see whether it is correct or not and make whatever answer he wishes regarding it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: While the Minister of Customs is here I want to refresh his memory by calling his attention to just what he said about the matter of a transcontinental service. He will find it at page 3042 of Hansard, April 19, 1916:

Mr. Pugsley: I think you told them on one occasion, if I remember aright, that if they thought Mr. Pugsley had not made large enough provision for harbour improvements to come to you as Minister of Customs—

That was referring to St. John—

Mr. REID: I remember that.

Mr. PUGSLEY: This may bring my hon. friend back to it.

Mr. Reid: The hon. member will remember that since that statement was made, we have been trying to economize.

Mr. Pugsley: Things have tightened up pretty considerably.

Mr. Reid: We expect to be running a through train service from Halifax and St. John to Winnipeg on or about the first day of June.

Mr. Pugsley: Of this year?

Mr. Reid: Yes, that is what I meant. We expect to run a through passenger service, with Pullman cars attached.

Mr. REID: That is all right; I did not say that we were going to run them over the Intercolonial from Moncton to Levis. We have been for the last fifty years running through Pullmans between Halifax, Moncton and Levis over the Intercolonial.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is what the minister meant? Then he goes further:

Mr. Pugsley: Will that be a daily or a tri-weekly service?

Mr. Reid: We will, at least, run a service that will be satisfactory. We have ordered cars and we are trying to get more power as soon as possible, and I think that what we have done so far and the arrangements we have made for a through service ought to be satisfactory to the House and to the country.

The minister is speaking of the Transcontinental. I never dreamt he meant to simply continue the service we had over the Intercolonial railway, from St. John to Halifax.

Mr. REID: If I remember rightly, there was a through service between Quebec and Cochrane.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Yes.

Mr. REID: And the intention was that the through passengers could come from Halifax, St. John, and Moncton to Levis on the through Government passenger service, and at Quebec they could take the train through to Winnipeg, and travel the whole distance on the Government railway lines, and that statement which has just been read corroborates what I have stated.

Mr. PUGSLEY: They had all that before them last year. The minister will tell you that.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What service is there this summer from Montreal to Rivière Quelle and from Rivière Ouelle to Murray Bay? I was assured the other day, —and I think correctly—that the steamer service would be continued. Is there a Pullman between Montreal and Rivière Ouelle, such as last year, and on what days will the Pullman be attached to the train for Rivière Ouelle?

Mr. COCHRANE: I think the service will be the same as it has been for the last two years.

Mr. LEMIEUX: As the season is beginning, will the hon. gentleman consider a suggestion with reference to the days when this Pullman will be most acceptable to tourists? Of course, I am speaking, not only for the Canadian tourists, but for all the Americans who spend the summer at Murray Bay. A large number of American tourists, including former President Taft, were very much annoyed at the changes made last year in the Pullman service. I think, with a little good will in the department, everything could run smoothly. If the Pullman car, instead of returning to Montreal on Sunday morning, were to return Monday evening, it would be more convenient for tourists. If my hon. friend will accept some suggestions, I will send them to him.

Mr. COCHRANE: Certainly.

Mr. KYTE: I would like to get some information as to the amount of money spent for betterments on the Intercolonial railway, from Point Tupper to Sydney during the past year.

Mr. COCHRANE: I will obtain that information for the hon. gentleman.

Mr. CARVELL: Would the minister bring down what correspondence he may have, between parties interested and Mr. Gordon Grant and himself, as to the pedestal of the Salmon River viaduct?

Mr. COCHRANE: I will bring what I can; I do not know that I have it.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess.

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. OLIVER: I wish to make some inquiries in regard to traffic on the Transcontinental between Winnipeg and Quebec. When were the rails connected between Quebec and Winnipeg?

Mr. COCHRANE: I will have to get that information; I do not remember.

Mr. OLIVER: What were the rates on grain last winter over the Transcontinental between Winnipeg and Quebec?

Mr. COCHRANE: The same as the year before. The information is in Hansard of last year.

Mr. OLIVER: What were those rates?

Mr. COCHRANE: Six cents a bushel from Armstrong to Quebec.

Mr. OLIVER: What was the approximate amount of grain transported between Winnipeg and Quebec last winter?

Mr. COCHRANE: I do not remember that; I will have to get the information.

Mr. OLIVER: Was the amount considerable?

Mr. COCHRANE: I am not sure.

Mr. OLIVER: Was it equal to the amount transported in the previous year?

Mr. COCHRANE: I do not think it was as great.

Mr. OLIVER: Has the department in contemplation such arrangements as will induce a larger proportion of western wheat to take the Transcontinental route during the coming season?

Mr. COCHRANE: That is pretty hard to say. Wheat is routed by the man sending it. We named a very low rate last year, largely because the elevators were full at Fort William, excepting some on the Canadian Pacific railway, which barred wheat shipped by the Transcontinental. For that reason we established a low rate from Armstrong to the Montreal and Quebec elevators.

Mr. OLIVER: The Transcontinental Railway has been completed for a number of years under the administration of this Government, and we should now know whether it is possible to secure the advantage of the transportation of the western crop over that road. There is no doubt that the excessive manipulation of grain prices during the past spring was a direct result of the failure of the grain to go forward to the Atlantic seaboard during the winter. The grain was held either in the interior elevators or at Fort William, and became the subject of price manipulation, to the very great detriment of the public. The results of this manipulation were felt particularly by the eastern public who, being in larger numbers, naturally consume more flour than the western public, although both suffered. If there is to be no relief from that condition; if grain is not to go forward all the year round as was intended when the Transcontinental was built, the country will continue to be subject to such dangers of price manipulation as prevailed last winter. Is it contrary to Government policy that the road should be used in that way, or is it a question of impossibility?

Mr. COCHRANE: The Government is not opposed to the shipment of grain or anything else over the Transcontinental. At the close of navigation, shippers object to sending the grain over the Transcontinental to Quebec because of the difficulties in the way of further shipment. Portland, New York and Boston are more easily reached from Montreal than St. John and Halifax from Quebec. We should be very glad to take charge of shipments of grain, particularly in the winter, when very little traffic is moving. Local traffic on the Transcontinental is limited, and will be limited for some time. We shall be glad to get shipments of anything in order to keep the trains moving.

Mr. OLIVER: The minister will appreciate the query that is in the minds of the people of the West in this connection if he makes a comparison between the present summer rate from Port Arthur across the lake—which, I am credibly informed, is seven cents a bushel—

Mr. COCHRANE: That is to Montreal.

Mr. OLIVER: I understand not. I am informed that the rate is applicable from Port Arthur to Buffalo or Midland. To that is added the rail rate from Midland to Montreal or from Buffalo to New York. When we compare that summer rate by lake and rail with the all-rail rate that the department put in the winter before last, and which prevailed again last winter, we reach the inevitable conclusion that there is something wrong somewhere. It may be admitted that grain can be carried by lake cheaper than by rail, but it must be admitted also that if the lake rate, which can be taken advantage of only during a few months in the year, is higher than the rail rate, which can be taken advantage of during the whole year, the railroad should be carrying that grain. If it is not, then the blame is upon those who have charge of the railroad's business. The business is there; the rates are such as to admit of the business being handled. If the business is not handled, the responsibility rests upon the management of the railway.

Mr. COCHRANE: The statement made by my hon. friend is not true in any sense of the word.

Mr. OLIVER: I do not wish to get into a discussion with my hon. friend—

Mr. COCHRANE: I do not wish such a statement as the hon. gentleman has made to go to the country unchallenged.

Mr. OLIVER: I have to ask you, Mr. Chairman, to rule that my hon. friend is out of order in declaring that a statement made by me is not true.

Mr. COCHRANE: It is not true. We can only take what grain is given us by the Grand Trunk Pacific.

Mr. OLIVER: I ask for your ruling, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN: It is against the rules of the House to say that a statement made by another member is not true.

Mr. OLIVER: I do not wish to get into a heated controversy, but, with all due respect to the minister, I cannot submit to a statement such as he has made without its becoming the means of arousing a controversy. He will understand, therefore, why I called the attention of the Chairman to his language. The matter to which I refer is of the gravest importance to the people of Canada, particularly to the people of the West.

I am within my rights and my duties in this House in calling attention to the facts as they exist. If I have not stated those facts correctly I shall be glad to be corrected, but the statements I have made are according to the information I have. It is a fact that the rate on the Transcontinental from Armstrong to Quebec is six cents a bushel, and it is a fact that the rate from Fort William to Midland is seven cents a bushel; that is to say, it is costing more to haul the grain in the summer time from Fort William to the seaboard than it cost all last winter to haul grain over the rails of the Transcontinental. Now, was that because there was not rolling stock for that railway? Was it because there were not such terminal facilities on the Atlantic coast as there should have been? Was it because it was contrary to the policy of the Government to use that railway? I ask these questions. The country is entitled to an answer.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item be carried?

Mr. OLIVER: If the minister does not think these questions are worthy of answer I shall have to make what further remarks I desire to make in this connection without the courtesy of his consideration. The facts being as I have stated them, this Government will have to stand charged with the responsibility of having taken over a great national public work, and, after having completed that work, of having deliberately and of intent, neglected, or failed, to use it for the purpose for which it was intended, which purpose it was absolutely calculated to serve; and doing so to the detriment of Canada, both east and west. I desire to bring these facts to the attention of the House and of the country for the purpose of emphasizing the point that, so far as this Government, at any rate, is concerned, Government administration of railways is not a success. If this is the result of administration by this Government of the Transcontinental railway between Quebec and Winnipeg it certainly would be suicidal for this country to place the administration of more railways in their hands. We can only regret that circumstances are such as to have placed that stretch of railway in their hands at this time, when, above all other times, it could have been used to the good of the country instead of being allowed to lie idle. Of last year's crop, the returns show that over 150,000,000 bushels found their outlet to the Atlantic seaboard by way of the United States. The carriage of those 150,000,000 bushels belonged to Canada. The Transcontinental railway was built by Canada for the purpose of carrying that wheat. The loss of the carriage of that grain was a loss to the revenues of Canada as well as to the revenues of the railway administration. It is necessary that these facts should be known in order that, when we are told that Canada is overbuilt with railroads, it should be thoroughly understood that Canada has business for her railroads, and that this Government, having control over this railroad, refused to take business over it.

Mr. COCHRANE: What grain or other commodity did we refuse to handle on the Transcontinental?

Mr. OLIVER: I shall have to explain my statement as it will be understood by every one who cares to listen. No person would suppose that if I took a load of wheat to the management of the Transcontinental and asked them to ship it I would be refused the privilege of shipping it; but if the Transcontinental does not fit itself with rolling-stock or terminal facilities, or does not take care of business when it comes, that in effect is refusal of business, and that is certainly what has taken place.

Mr. CARVELL: If my hon. friend (Mr. Oliver) cannot get an answer from the minister, I will bring to the minister's attention another matter in connection with the Transcontinental, and I hope he will be able to give me some information in regard to it. I refer to some repairs done to and reports made upon the Salmon river viaduct in New Brunswick. This viaduct was completed about 1909 or 1910. It is, I understand, the highest and longest viaduct on the system, and I think, the highest viaduct in Canada east of the Rocky mountains. It is about three-quarters of a mile long and about 200 feet high in the centre. There are fifty or sixty pedestals on which the feet of the different portions of the steel work rest, and to my personal knowledge, when that work was under construction, a great deal of care and attention was paid to it to see that everything was properly constructed. I remember in this House, some time before the election in 1911, when all the questions as to the kind of material that was to go into that viaduct were discussed. We were told that the contractors brought material at first some 125 miles; then they found material nearer that the engineers claimed, after it had been tested out at Ottawa, would be satisfactory, and the engineers used all their skill and ability to make that viaduct a permanent structure. All went well until 1915, when some men commenced to dig holes around the side of some of the pedestals. These pedestals are only three or four feet thick at the top and shaped like an obelisk, and they would not be more than three or four feet out of the ground, the greater part of them being under ground. The contractors had to dig down until they came to a solid foundation. When these men commenced to dig a few holes around the sides of the pedestals, people wondered what they were doing. At first it was thought they were digging for the purpose of doing damage. It may be interesting to the minister to know that a gentleman who, in the beginning worked on the construction of those pedestals and who was then working as a fireman in a sawmill nearby, wrote to me wondering if the Germans were attempting to blow up the pedestals of this bridge. It turned out, however, that they were not Germans, but simply employees of the minister who were digging these holes for the purpose of making an examination.

On the 29th of December, 1915, a report was made by Mr. Duff, the substance of which was as follows: The pedestals under that viaduct cost $110,973, while they should have cost only $83,259. In other words, the contractors, practically with the connivance of the engineers, are reported to have stolen $27,714 from the country by not putting in the pedestals the amount of concrete which they said they did. If you can imagine, Sir, a more serious charge against bona fide contractors and engineers, from the district engineer down to the resident engineer, than that I should like to know what it is. In order that the minister may appreciate the full significance of this report, I will put it in another way. They claim that $27,000 worth of concrete had been paid for, not a yard of which had been put in the pedestals, that representing 1,960 cubic yards at 11 cents a yard. They also claim that included in that figure there was a small amount of excessive excavation. The engineers and contractors, when this came to their attention, naturally took drastic steps to have the matter straightened out. The minister will remember that I went to him myself some time in the month of April or May, just after he had returned from the south, in 1916. I told him that I had letters from the engineers and contractors, in which they not only requested, but demanded, that these pedestals be uncovered and offered, if the Government would not uncover them, to uncover them themselves at their own expense if the Government would allow them to do so, so that they could show to the minister and the world that this report was unfounded, false, and malicious. I do not blame the minister at all for the character of the investigation which must have been made by his officials, because I do not think he knew anything about it. It was done, I presume, under the instructions of the then manager of the Government railways, who seems to have had a mania for finding fault with the Transcontinental, in the hope of showing that it was a great piece of corruption from beginning to end. I do not know what has led to the retirement of that gentleman.

Mr. COCHRANE: $5,000 more salary.

Mr. CARVELL: While I think the Liberal party has lost its greatest asset in his retirement, still it is a good thing for Canada that he has gone. If the amount had been five cents, that is about his size, and I think he would have taken it. However, I am not here to discuss that. From the time the Minister of Railways put that man in charge of the Government Railways he has done nothing but make trouble, and whenever he could make a report or give information detrimental to the Transcontinental it gave him the greatest delight.

I want to show something of the character of the report which the minister received and acted upon. I have only got fragments of the story, but such as they are I gladly give them to him, and I hope at some future date the minister will be able to furnish the committee with the remainder of the data. Away back as early as the 12th of October 1915, Mr. Duff submitted a report to Mr. Gutelius showing the character of the work which they found under these pedestals. The pedestals, I might explain, are in pairs and are designated No. 1 right, No. 1 left, No. 2 right, No. 2 left, and so on. The bridge sheets show that there should have been 99.16 cubic yards in No. 4 right, whereas as a matter of fact there were only 57 cubic yards, or a difference of 42.16 cubic yards.—An actual steal of about 40 to 50 per cent. If these contractors and engineers put in only 57 instead of 99 cubic yards in a pedestal supporting a bridge 200 feet high, and then charged for 99 cubic yards and made the public believe they had put in that amount, those men were criminals, and if the minister believed the report he should have had them prosecuted. There is not a man in this House but will agree with me that these men were criminals if, in a bridge of the magnitude I have indicated, over which the traffic of this great transcontinental system was to be carried, they put only 57 cubic yards in the pedestals that required 99 cubic yards.

With respect to No. 13 right, the plan as shown on the bridge sheets calls for 129.49 cubic yards, and the engineers reported that only 89.7 cubic yards were put in, or a difference of 39.79. There again, if these facts are true, every man who had anything to do with the work should have been prosecuted and sent to the penitentiary for as long a term as possible.

Mr. MORPHY: Does the hon. gentleman assert that there was this shortage?

Mr. CARVELL: I say it did not occur. I assert that the statements in the report are absolutely false. If the shortage did occur, I say that the minister should have prosecuted these men, but I repeat that it did not occur. I shall be able to give some of the facts, and I hope the minister will furnish the Committee with the rest, for he has the whole of them.

There was an individual report on each pedestal. Some of them were shown to be all right; in others the concrete was claimed to be soft, in others very soft. In some cases it is claimed that a pier that was supposed to have at the base 10 feet, let us say, of solid concrete, had only one foot; in other words, instead of having ten feet of solid concrete from the hard pan up, in order to make a good foundation for the great sturcture, only one foot of concrete was put in, and the remainder was sand. When these facts were investigated further, we found that these reports were all false. I have blue prints here of all the pedestals, nearly 100 of them. There is a plan of each pedestal as it was supposed to have been constructed, and a plan marked over the original showing how the pedestal was constructed according to this report, indicating that there was a shortage of about 30 to 40 per cent, and consequently a steal to that extent.

The contractors for the work were as responsible a firm of contractors as ever did business in Canada, Messrs. Powers & Brewer. These gentlemen began doing business on the Canadian Pacific, they have done business in Nova Scotia, and they are doing business to-day in New Brunswick, and they bear as honorable a name as any contractors in the Dominion. The district engineer was Mr. C. O. Foss who has been connected with railway work in Canada all his lifetime. The divisional engineer was Mr. Balloch. Both of these gentlemen have the highest reputation in their profession. I am not able to say who the resident engineers were. As soon as this report became known, of course a protest went up. The first protest was made by the contractor, and I want to read to the minister a letter sent by these contractors to the chief engineer of the Transcontinental railway:

March 15th, 1917.

Gordon Grant, Esq.,
Chief Engineer, Transcontinental Railway Commission,
Ottawa.

Dear Sir,

We have received from Mr. Longley copy of Mr. Duff's report on the Little Salmon River pedestals, and the bridge sheets of same showing concrete as returned and also as Mr. Duff claims it was actually constructed.

The charges of over return are absolutely false, and this statement can be easily proven by properly uncovering his most glaring misrepresentations, pedestals 2 R. and L.

We think you should demand that the Government make an independent examination, in justice to all the engineers who were in any way connected with the work, and more particularly ourselves as contractors.

We would be glad to have you advise us if they will do this, and if so, when, so that we may be present and see the pedestals uncovered.

Yours very truly,
Powers & Brewer, per H. H. Brewer.

It would take too much time to go through all the correspondence so I will only briefly refer to some of the letters that passed. The contractors demanded that these pedestals, No. 2 right and No. 2 left, be taken, because they were near the bank and it was easy to get at them and they were willing to make these a test of the whole thing. They were willing to try any of them at all, but they chose these for the reason I have already given and because they were reported as being among the most vicious of all. No. 2 left was the one concerning which it was said that, after you got to the base of the shaft and came to the pedestal, where there should have been twelve feet of concrete there was only one foot of concrete. I say again that any firm of contractors, or any engineers that would put in one foot of concrete where there should be twelve, are criminals of the blackest character. It is no wonder that these men protested and demanded that the work should be uncovered, that it might show for itself. I have the correspondence regarding No. 2 pedestal, and I will refer briefly to that correspondence.

First I will call attention to a letter from Mr. Duff to Mr. Gordon Grant, stating that they were starting in to repair the substructure, and that if anybody wanted to be present he could attend. Then there is a letter from Mr. Gordon Grant to Messrs. Powers & Brewer which I will read in full:

Ottawa, June 8th, 1916.

Messrs. Powers and Brewer,
Contractors, 107 Prince William Street,
St. John, N.B.

Re Little Salmon River.

Dear Sirs,

For your information I enclose herewith copy of letter I have received from W. A. Duff, I.C.R. Engineer of Bridges, which speaks for itself. I am sending you this in case you should want to visit the bridge while it is under repair, and you can see for yourself whether or not the representations made by Mr. Duff are correct.

You may notify Mr. Foss, in case he should be sufficiently interested in the matter, to also visit the bridge.

[Mr. Carvell.]

The remainder of the letter merely refers to the fact that the minister had been away and was then busy. Then followed a letter from Messrs. Powers & Brewer to Mr. Gordon Grant, dated 16th June, 1916, acknowledging Mr. Grant's letter and proceeding:

We note from Mr. Duff's report of December 29th, 1915, that he intends to entirely rebuild pedestals 10 R. and 11 R., but the repairs to others will only be to first footing.

If Mr. Duff will advise us when excavation for 10 R. and 11 R. we would like to be present. We would also like to have Mr. Duff uncover the foundations of 2 R. or L. and 15 R. or L. at the same time.

No. 15 right was one of the bad ones according to the first report, and 13 right was another very bad one. Then there was a telegram dated 17th July, 1916, from Mr. Brewer to Mr. Duff:

Have had no reply to our letter of June 16th to Gordon Grant, copy of which we presume has been forwarded to you. I plan on being at Salmon River Thursday, twentieth, and would like to see pedestal two uncovered. Please wire reply.

H. H. Brewer.

On 18th July, the following answer was sent to Mr. Brewer:

Your wire of seventeenth to hand. Mr. Duff is away at present, will not be back until Thursday.

Regarding the uncovering of pedestals 2 and 15 at Little Salmon River, Mr. Duff is making arrangements to have these pedestals uncovered right away.

He will write and let you know when they are ready for inspection.

This was followed by a letter from Messrs. Power & Brewer to Mr. Gordon Grant, dated 19th June:

Yours of 16th instant enclosing copy of Mr. Duff's letter of June 13th received.

Would it not be possible for you to arrange with Mr. Duff to have the excavating around pedestals No. 2 done at once?

Then there is the following letter from Mr. Duff to Messrs. Powers & Brewer:

Moncton, N.B., August 11th, 1916.

Messrs. Powers and Brewer,
Contractors,
107 Prince William Street,
St. John, N.B.
Little Salmon River Viaduct.

Gentlemen:

Referring to your letter of June 19th to Mr. Gordon Grant and my letter to Mr. H. H. Brewer of the 11th July.

We have now excavated to the bottom of foundation of pedestal 2 R, and I will be obliged if you will make arrangements to visit the site of the bridge for the purpose of inspecting this at an early date, as it will not do for us to leave the foundation uncovered very long.

I am sorry that we have been unable to uncover pedestal No. 15 R or L. as yet on account of water conditions. Will you please advise me when you will visit the site of the bridge, as I would like to be there at the same time if possible.

Yours truly,
W. A. Duff.

This, it will be seen, is a notification that they have excavated to the bottom of pedestal No. 2 right. If they had done so, there could not be very much difficulty in finding out who was right and who was wrong. Mr. Brewer sends back a letter dated 15th August, 1916, addressed to Mr. Duff:

Yours of 11th instant received. We have had No. 2 pedestal examined by Mr. M. J. Powers of Grand Falls, and he advises us that in his opinion your excavation does not reach the bottom of the pedestal but only to a set of walling timbers inside the sheet piling.

He advises that it would not be of any use for me to go up until he is satisfied that the excavation has been carried to bottom of footing course. Will you please have this done, and I would then be pleased to meet you there.

Then, on August 22, there is another letter to Mr. Duff from Messrs. Powers & Brewer, as follows:

Please advise if you are arranging for further excavation of No. 2 pedestal as asked for in our letter of 15th instant.

We are anxious to have the letter cleared up as soon as possible.

Mr. Duff answers on 26th August:

We are arranging for further excavation of pedestal No. 2 and will advise you as soon as I get definite information with regard to same.

It will be noted that three weeks before this they had reported to the engineer that they had uncovered No. 2 pedestal. The contractor sent a man there who saw that they had not uncovered it at all. And on the 26th August they say: "We are arranging for further excavation," and "will advise you." And they did. On the 22nd September they wrote again:

Referring to your letter of the 22nd of August, and mine of the 26th of August.

We have excavated as far down as pedestal No. 2 as it is safe for us to do—

They did not go to the bottom, but they excavated as far as it was safe to do.

—and we have drilled an inch and a half hole through the footing course, and find it to be eight feet thick.

Will you please advise me if you wish to examine this pedestal any further, as we wish to fill in the excavation within a short time?

Then, to follow the history of that one transaction, Mr. Duff did not hesitate to report to the minister and to the country that responsible engineers and contractors had built a pedestal one foot thick when it should have been 11 or 12 feet thick under a bridge of the magnitude of that which I have described, or to say that he had dug down and uncovered one side of every pedestal in the whole bridge. If you want confirmation of that, you will find it in the report in which they say they dug down one side to the bottom, and assuming that this pedestal was square they figured out the contents. Here is a case where they reported one foot of concrete. But the contractor said: "You are wrong." He even said worse than that. They were sent back and they dug again, and they went down a little way and they said: "We were to the bottom." The contractor sent a man down to look at it, and he said: "You are not at the bottom." They said: "We will dig a little further," and they went on and dug eight feet, and still they did not go to the bottom. Then they would not dig any more, and they tried to drill, but they admitted that they never got to the bottom. They admit eight feet of solid concrete in their report instead of only one foot. I would like to know what the minister has to say of engineers who are making reports of that class, and thereby attempting to blast the reputation of honourable men who are trying to earn an honest living. I have given the facts regarding this No. 2 pedestal. They said that it was not necessary to go to the bottom to show that it was proper work, but Mr. C. O. Foss, the district engineer, followed these men to the very end. The contractors did not propose to be put in a false light by these men if they could help it. However, I do not believe that it was Mr. Duff; I believe the real man behind him was Mr. Gutelius. They reached the point, in the month of October, I think, when Duff had to say that he would not dig any further. Finally he named a day when he would be present to go over the work with Messrs. Powers and Brewer. He said that it would be some day next week. Mr. Brewer, who was the man having charge of the work, remained in St. John a whole week, but never was called upon, and finally was notified by Duff that he had to go away and could not meet him, but that he would send one of his assistants. Duff did not dare to go on the work with Powers and Brewer, and therefore sent his subordinate. The subordinate went there.

Mr. COPP: Do the papers give the name of the subordinate?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, Mr. Leightner, representing Duff, and the representatives of the contracting firm appeared on the ground. I have in my possession, and I want to read, a letter addressed by C. O. Foss, district engineer, to Gordon Grant, dated the 7th November, 1916, which purports to give the result of that interview. If this be true, and the minister will know whether it is or not, it reveals a condition of affairs for which the minister ought to make a public apology to these contractors and to the engineers connected with the matter. It is as follows:

Nov. 7th, 1916.

Gordon Grant, Esq.,
Chief Engineer, N.T.R.
Little Salmon River Viaduct.

Dear Sir:—

Since your communication of the 8th of June I have tried, in conjunction with Messrs. Powers and Brewer, to get something definite from Mr. Duff either confirming or disproving his charges of last year. As you know we asked to have the foundations of pedestals Nos. 2 and 15 uncovered as two of the most glaring examples he had reported of work that was not done. On August 11th he wrote me that he had excavated down to the bottom of foundation of pedestal No. 2R and notified me that if I wanted to inspect it I must do so at an early date as he would not leave the excavation open very long.

On the same date he wrote Powers and Brewer to the same effect and added in the letter to them that he had not been able to excavate down to the bottom of the foundation of No. 15 owing to water conditions. This was not surprising to us as we knew that it would be absolutely impossible to excavate to the bottom of either of these pedestals without the use of a powerful pump, though from his report of last year he apparently had no trouble from water conditions then. On the day we received the letters from Duff, Mr. Powers' brother, who lives at Grand Falls and was watching the work, reported that they had not reached the bottom of No. 2R, and Mr. Brewer so notified Mr. Duff. Some time later, on September 22nd, he wrote Brewer that they had excavated as far down on pedestal No. 2R as it was safe for them to do and had drilled an inch and a half hole through the footing course and found it 8 feet thick.

Following this there was considerable more correspondence which culminated in an agreement by Mr. Brewer to meet Mr. Duff on the site upon the receipt of a wire; finally Duff wrote and wired that his assistant Mr. Leightner would meet him or his representative on Tuesday, October 31st, and as Mr. Brewer had already made an engagement in Montreal for that date he had to send his accountant and Powers whom I have mentioned before. As a result of that meeting we have the following admissions.

This is the point. I am reading now from a statement by Mr. Foss to the chief engineer, and the minister will know whether that statement is correct or not.

In the case of No. 2R as I have already stated he admits that he has drilled through a footing 8 feet thick instead of one foot as reported last year. In the case of No. 10R they removed it altogether and admit that it was 13-6 deep, being nearly 2 feet more than they found last year. No. 15R they admit is 14-7 to bottom, which is nearly 5 feet more than they found last year. No. 4R they found nearly 5 feet more than last year, and at No. 13R about 4 feet more. They state that Mr. Leightner is prepared to admit that the report of last year is not correct. Of course this is quite superfluous as the figures given prove that. I am quite satisfied that if they will send another investigating party there who is anxious to get the truth they will find the balance which they claim is still lacking as shown by our bridge sheets. Mr. Brewer and self intend to interview Mr. Brown soon with a view to learning his attitude with regard to the matter of last year's charges in the light of the information obtained this summer. If you put the figures I have given you on your sheets you will see at a glance how the matter stands under their present claim. I trust you will bring the matter to the attention of the minister in order that he may understand that by their own present findings we are relieved of the great part of the charges made last year.

All the answer there is to that is a simple acknowledgement by Mr. Grant stating that he had forwarded a copy of the letter to the minister, and as it was forwarded to the minister, no doubt he caused an investigation to be made, and he will be able to tell us whether the admission of Mr. Leightner is correct or not. I am sorry that my voice is in such a condition that I will not be able to follow this up very much further. I do not intend to weary the committee by going into the details at any greater extent. I have shown the minister two things. First, his engineers reported to him that they had made an actual investigation of every one of those pedestals, when they did not. There is no getting away from that. These men never measured those pedestals, and I doubt very much if they ever measured any single pedestal out of the whole hundred. That is a pretty strong statement. In the first place, there could not be very many of them measured without very extensive pumping arrangements, because that is in a great valley, and when those pedestals were put down, they had to pump water continuously, and the cost was much more excessive than they imagined it would be, on account of the difficulty in keeping the water out of the cofferdam. They never could have measured down to the bottom of any of them, and we have now the admission of four or five of these people that what they did make was all wrong, in Nos. 2, 4, 10 and 13; because, in this case, they dug down and found they were all wrong. They blasted out concrete which was as solid as anything could possibly be in this world, unless it were steel. I will bring samples and show them to the minister. I have a sample of rock blasted out of one of the pedestals, where the concrete was so solid and firm that the blasting broke the rock, instead of breaking the concrete, and I think the minister received samples of the same kind, where they blew these pedestals out with dynamite, in order to put in new ones. I do not know how many men they have employed there, but they must have squandered at least $60,000 or $70,000 in carrying on this unnecessary work, and for what purpose I cannot imagine. I know it was used as a political machine. I know that scores of men were employed upon it, for the purpose of getting their votes at the next provincial election, and they did not get the votes, if that is any satisfaction to the minister. I know thousands of dollars were thrown into the pockets of Mr. White, who ran a general store at Grand Falls, and who was then representing the county in the local legislature, but he is not representing it now. I know it was the greatest piece of political jugglery that has taken place in New Brunswick in my day. There was probably $50,000 or $60,000 of public money absolutely wasted in tearing out concrete piers, which would have been there a thousand years hence, if left alone, and they replaced them with concrete piers, no better than the former ones.

Mr. COPP: What year was this done?

Mr. CARVELL: Last year, when the provincial elections were coming on, and I suppose they expected a Dominion election as well. This is one of the greatest scandals, considering the amount of money involved, that has ever taken place in that country. It is a by-word among the people for miles and miles around. I have letters, which I suppose I should not refer to, from engineers on the American side of the boundary line, who heard about this business and came over, not one but many, to see what kind of butchery the Government was carrying on. I have received correspondence from these engineers stating their opinions about it. And yet the minister squandered all this money, and has nothing to show for it, excepting, I suppose, he will say he knows now what the bottoms are. The bottoms were there all right, but the $60,000 or $70,000 is gone. We can forgive him if he will publicly apologize to the men who have been slandered by his general manager and the officials of his department. That will atone to some extent for the wrong done by this piece of political jobbery.

Mr. COCHRANE: The hon. gentleman from Carleton told me this afternoon that he intended to bring this matter before the committee. I told him that I had not all the papers here, and I wanted him to postpone it, but he said he would rather not. In reference to his charges against Mr. Gutelius he is absolutely unfair, because what first brought it to the general manager's notice was the resident engineer, Mr. R. A. Black, reporting to the superintendent, Mr. H. B. Fleming, on an examination made by him of the substructure of the Salmon river viaduct on the National Transcontinental east of Grand Falls station, and finds there is a rise of ten inches in the first span going into the bridge. This is due to a settlement of the abutment and the girders should be jacked up to place, and the bridge seat raised to the proper level either with concrete or capstones, also that many of the pedestals are in a bad and dangerous shape, on account of defective concrete having been used, etc.

I have a short report of what was done, as follows:

During the past summer repairs to the substructure of this bridge were carried out under the supervision of Mr. James Finley, and twenty pedestals in all were repaired, these being 3R, 3L, 4R, 4L, 5R, 5L, 6L, 7R, 7L, 8R, 8L, 9R, 9L, 10R, 10L, 11R, 12R, 15L, 19L and 25L. The details of the repairs which were done to these pedestals are given in report dated the 10th of November, from Mr. Finley to me, covering the work done during the past summer, copy of which report I attach hereto.

You will note in Mr. Finley's report that he recommends that the following pedestals should be repaired next year:—11L, 13L, 14L, 28R, 28L, 34L, 37L, 39L and 43R.

During the present summer the actual size of the following six pedestals were determined:—2R, 4R, 2L, 10R, 13R and 15R. Pedestals 2R, 4R, 4L and 13R were measured in the presence of Messrs. Powers and Tilley of the firm of Powers and Brewer, Finley, Oulton, Bridge and Building Master Turner and Assistant Engineer G. C. Leightner. It was necessary to entirely remove pedestal 10R, and pedestal 15R was excavated to the bottom of the foundation under Mr. Finley and the depth of the foundation thus determined. The measurements of these pedestals show that there is one hundred and forty-two yards less concrete in them than is shown on original bridge sheets.

I would like to call your attention particularly to the quality of the concrete taken out of the pedestals which were repaired this year, as shown in Mr. Finley's report.

The repairs which were undertaken this year under the supervision of Mr. Finley bear out fully the information given in my report of December 28, 1915, to you, as to the quality of the concrete and the necessity for making the repairs. When the concrete was taken out of the pedestals, the quality of same was found, if anything, to be worse than indicated in my report to you and some idea of the quality of the original concrete put in these pedestals may be obtained from looking at photographs attached to Mr. Finley's report of pedestals 11R and 12R.

On October 1 sent Mr. G. C. Leightner, Assistant Engineer, to this bridge to meet Messrs. Joe Powers and Tilley of the firm of Powers and Brewer, and he examined the foundation of pedestals 2R, 4R, 4L and 13R in their presence and also in the presence of Messrs. Finley, Oulton and Bridge and Building Master Turner. Mr. Lightner reported to me in connection with pedestal 2R as follows:

"A rod was thrust into the hole which Mr. Finley had bored through the footing and depth measured as a little over eight feet. A rod was then driven some three feet further and then pulled out and the last three feet of the rod were found to be covered with mud. Mr. Tilley was satisfied to accept the thickness of eight feet which Mr. Finley had reported, but Mr. Powers, however, was still sceptical and asked to have another hole drilled in the footing so that he could watch the drilling. Mr. Finley offered to do this for him if he, Mr. Powers, would pay the expense of drilling providing Mr. Finley's finding of eight feet was confirmed. This offer was not accepted. Mr. Powers gave his ground for belief in this pedestal extending deeper, that the man who inspected the work on this pedestal was on his first job of inspection and, he said, would therefore be most careful to have the work done in accordance with the plans."

In connection with pedestal 4R, Mr. Lightner reports:

"Giving them—the contractors—the benefit of every doubt, we concluded the measurement to be 13′ 11″ from the top of the pedestal to the pedestal to the top of the bottom footing and 16′ 7″ from the top of the pedestal to the bottom of the bottom footing. The bridge sheet shows these two dimensions as 13.7′ and 17.7′, or 1.1′ deeper than we found."

With regard to pedestal 4L, he reports:

"The total depth is 2′ 4″ less than shown on the bridge sheet."

With regard to pedestal 13R, Mr, Lightner reports the total height to be 2′ 6″ less than shown on the bridge sheet.

Mr. Leightner's report says: "Got very little satisfaction from either Mr. Powers or Mr. Tilley as to the quality of the concrete which had been removed. They both seemed to think that the concrete when first put in, although the gravel might not have been as good as possible, was of good quality, and that their workmanship had been as good as ordinary, and that the present condition of the pedestals was due to deterioration which might happen to concrete any place. They cited several examples of work in Nova Scotia, which I understood they had built and were now having to rebuild. As to the quality of the gravel which was used, Mr. Powers was inclined to blame the engineers in charge; that is, he stated that the engineers in charge inspected and passed all material used, and if unsatisfactory got into the work, it was not the contractors' fault.

My opinion from the appearance of the broken concrete which had been removed from the pedestals is that in general the concrete was poorly mixed, not properly tamped in the forms, contained insufficient cement and somewhat dirty aggregate and altogether too large a quantity of plums, some of them not judicially placed."

I have some photographs here, and I leave it to any man who examines them to say whether the concrete is good. Several of the photographs show that the concrete could be picked out without blasting or anything of that kind. Some portions of the cement are good, but others are not. In a bridge of that size, bad concrete is apt to crumble out; the work can hardly be said to be proper if there is a bad mixture of cement. If Mr. Powers wants to be prosecuted in the matter, I think that we can put up a case that will hang him.

Mr. CARVELL: You had better go to work and do it, then.

Mr. COCHRANE: I shall be very glad to get a full report and present it later.

Mr. OLIVER: On a previous occasion the attention of the minister was directed to the so-called embargo which was put upon the shipment of grain from the prairie west during last fall and winter. I offer no apology for mentioning the matter again and asking the minister whether there is, under the authority with which he is vested, any remedy for that condition; because when a shipment of grain is refused, a serious loss is suffered by the owner who desires to ship it.

Mr. COCHRANE: Where was the embargo placed?

Mr. OLIVER: On all lines in Alberta from the Canadian Pacific Railway main line north as far as the Saskatchewan river. Notices were issued from time to time by the railway companies that they would not take grain for shipment to Fort William or to Minneapolis—though they would take grain for shipment to the interior elevators. There is no doubt that the railway companies did this under the authority of the Railway Commission. I want to know, on behalf of the people interested, if there is any authority higher than the Railway Commission. Have the people of western Canada any remedy in this matter, which, affecting, as it does, the shipment of their produce, is to them a matter, if not of actual, at any rate of profitable, existence?

Mr. COCHRANE: This is the first time that the putting on of an embargo by the railways has been drawn to my attention. I will inquire into the matter. I will try to get the information for my hon. friend from the Railway Commission.

Mr. OLIVER: My hon. friend surely remembers our discussing the matter in the House on a previous occasion.

Mr. COCHRANE: When?

Mr. OLIVER: On the occasion, I think, of the Budget debate.

Mr. COCHRANE: I was not present then.

Mr. OLIVER: I know that there was an exchange between my hon. friend and myself on that subject on a previous occasion during this session. However, let it be noted that this is a matter in which the people are deeply interested. They want to know if the railway companies are being supported in their refusal to act as common carriers and to take freight to such destination as is indicated by the shipper. My information is that in a certain case a man had 17,000 bushels of threshed oats lying in his field contiguous to the Canadian Pacific main line a little east of Calgary, and the shipment of that grain to Fort William or Minneapolis was refused him by the railway company. That was one instance. It is a general case I desire to make my statement on, and I desire to get the best attention in regard to it.

Mr. COCHRANE: I will get the information.

Mr. OLIVER: The minister said a few minutes ago that the Government had never refused to accept shipments over the Transcontinental. These three railroad systems in the Prairie West are naturally the feeders to the Transcontinental; it is over those lines or some of them, at any rate, that the business must come that the Transcontinental shall handle, and when those railway companies refuse to take grain for shipment to Winnipeg or Fort William, of course, that business is not there for the Transcontinental to handle. If the minister, will pardon me for saying so, it seems a strange administration of a great railway system in the hands of the Government of our country, when such a condition can exist without the knowledge of the head of that administration.

In regard to the removal of rails on the Grand Trunk Pacific west of Edmonton, in what manner are the interests of the coal mines on either side of Jasper and Brulé lakes being protected?

Mr. COCHRANE: The matter of the three transcontinental railways west of Winnipeg bringing goods to the Transcontinental for shipment does not require very much explanation, because two of them run right through to the Atlantic, and we have to depend on what the Grand Trunk Pacific brings to the Transcontinental.

So far as the removal of rails is concerned, my engineer returned on Saturday, on which day I unfortunately had to be away, I hope to-morrow to be able to ask my hon. friend to change his question into an order for return, and I will endeavour to lay on the Table to-morrow full particulars in reference to that matter.

Mr. OLIVER: In regard to the lifting of rails on the Transcontinental between Winnipeg and Quebec, the House is entitled to a definite statement as to what rails have been lifted and as to how far the lifting of those rails might effect the successful operation of the railway.

Mr COCHRANE: The first 300 miles of rails have been lifted and are now either gone overseas or waiting for shipment. I will lay on the Table a plan showing where those rails have been lifted.

Mr. OLIVER: How many tons of those rails are now piled on the dock at Three Rivers?

Mr. COCHRANE: I do not know. I will try to find out.

Mr. GERMAN: Two weeks ago the minister stated in answer to a question of mine that the Government's policy in regard to the railway situation in Canada would be announced very shortly. Will the policy of the Government regarding the railway situation in Canada, consequent on the two reports of the Royal Commissioners, be announced within the next few days?

Mr. COCHRANE: The Government is not ready yet to make its announcement, and I cannot say just when it will be.

Mr. GERMAN: That answer is as indefinite as Government answers to questions of that kind usually are. I do not know that I can blame the minister any more than any of his predecessors in regard to such answers, because that is the kind that is usually given. The railway situation in Canada, notwithstanding the great war that is going on, is the most serious proposition that Canada has to face. The war is undoubtedly a serious matter, but the present railway situation in Canada will, in the near future, tax the ability and energy of the best men that Canada can produce. The Government have appointed a Royal Commission consisting of three notable men of experience in railway matters, and those men have agreed that the Canadian Northern and the Grand Trunk Pacific are bankrupt, and that if the Grand Trunk Railway Company is compelled to carry out its obligation entered into with the Government in regard to the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Transcontinental, the Grand Trunk Railway Company will also become bankrupt. That being the situation, the Government should, in the interest of the country, immediately announce a policy on this very momentous and important question. I presume that the Government will do in this matter what it has hitherto done in regard to other matters of a similar kind, and what probably other governments have done in matters of equal importance, and that is, leave the question until the dying days of the session, and then bring in the most important legislation which will be before Parliament during this session, to be disposed of in four or five of the closing days of Parliament. I, for one, wish to protest most energetically against such a situation. No further money should be voted in reference to the railway management in this country until the Government shall have announced its railway policy, because the matter is too important. I have no criticism to make against the Minister of Railways and Canals, so far as my knowledge of the situation is concerned, he is as good a Minister of Railways as we have ever had, and perhaps that is not damning him with very great praise. But the existing railway situation in Canada is too important to be trifled with or to be postponed until the closing days of the session, and I wish to give the minister warning now that he will hear from me about this matter in other sessions in this committee until we have an announcement of what policy the Government purpose pursuing in regard to this very serious and important situation.

Mr. COCHRANE: I agree with my hon. friend that the railway situation is very serious, and it deserves and will receive the consideration of the Government; but to say that it is the greatest problem before the Government is not true; the war is the greatest problem, and that we will attend to first. The Bill introduced to-day is the most important legislation ever introduced in this country, and until that is disposed of we cannot expect to deal with much more legislation.

Mr. OLIVER: Will an opportunity be given, when the minister's estimates are up again, to discuss the information he is to lay on the Table to-morrow?

Mr. COCHRANE: Oh, yes.

Mr. KYTE: What amounts were spent last year for betterments on that section of the Intercolonial between Point Tupper and Sydney?

Mr. COCHRANE: I made a note of the hon. gentleman's remarks before dinner and wired to Moncton for the information. As soon as I receive it I shall be glad to communicate it.

Mr. MACDONALD: Is the minister proceeding with the construction of a viaduct at Trenton, in the county of Pictou, to avoid the railroad tracks in connection with the steel company?

Mr. COCHRANE: I think there is an item in the Estimates for that. I will let my hon. friend know later on.

Mr. MACDONALD: What is the situation with regard to the coal supply for the Intercolonial? Have arrangements been made for the coming year, and contracts been let?

Mr. COCHRANE: We have bought all the coal we need for the Intercolonial and the eastern part of the Transcontinental, except about 75,000 tons. At the head of the lakes we have about that amount for the Transcontinental in the West.

Mr. MACDONALD: Where was this coal purchased?

Mr. COCHRANE: Some from American coal companies, and some from Montreal. We have also two boats carrying coal from Sydney to Levis, to supply that port and points down to Riviere du Loup.

Mr. MACDONALD: What coal companies are supplying this coal for the Transcontinental and the Intercolonial?

Mr. COCHRANE: I cannot give that information to-night, but I will get it for my hon. friend.

Mr. MACDONALD: Has the question of the Acadia Company been settled yet?

Mr. COCHRANE: For 25,000 tons.

Mr. MACDONALD: At what price?

Mr. COCHRANE: $4.25.

Mr. MACDONALD: 25,000 tons have been ordered at $4.25?

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes.

Mr. MACDONALD: Has that amount been accepted?

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes.

Mr. MACDONALD: I think the minister told me before that the amount at issue was something like 75,000 tons.

Mr. COCHRANE: No, we have only purchased 25,000 tons from them.

Mr. MACDONALD: What is the amount of coal purchased from the American companies for the Intercolonial?

Mr. COCHRANE: I have not the figures, but will get them for my hon. friend.

Mr. MACDONALD: The minister cannot expect to get his Estimates through unless he supplies us with the usual information; it is not the practice of Parliament.

Mr. COCHRANE: If the hon. gentleman will tell me what information he wants, I shall be glad to get it for him. It would take a Philadelphia lawyer to carry all this information in one's head.

Mr. MACDONALD: The minister cannot assume that attitude with me; it may do with some people, but not with me. Every other minister, when his estimates are up, is prepared to give the Committee this ordinary information.

Mr. COCHRANE: I told my hon. friend I would get the information for him as soon as possible.

Mr. MACDONALD: That means we shall never get it. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries, when his estimates were before the House two or three days ago, did not adopt the attitude of my hon. friend, but had his officials here and was ready and anxious to give all the information that was asked for; there was no delay. The minister knows that my questions are reasonable.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Blain): Carried.

Mr. MACDONALD: What do you mean, Sir, by calling Carried in the midst of this discussion?

The ACTING CHAIRMAN: I have done nothing to call forth such a remark from my hon. friend.

Mr. COCHRANE: I have told the hon. gentleman that I am getting the information, and I think almost any other hon. member would have accepted my word. I do not make statements that I do not carry out.

Mr. MACDONALD: I was pointing out that it is the practice with ministers at the head of great spending departments such as this, to come prepared with information on most ordinary questions that are likely to crop up. In regard to the questions asked by myself and by my colleagues, the minister has given us no information at all.

Mr. COCHRANE: We are not on the item of coal, anyway.

Mr. MACDONALD: There is no item for coal.

Mr. COCHRANE: It comes under operating expenses, and that is not under discussion now.

Mr. MACDONALD: I have asked the minister whether he proposes to construct the viaduct at Trenton in the county of Pictou, and if so, is it to be done by contract or day labour? I should also like a full statement of what coal he has purchased for the Intercolonial, from whom, and at what price. If the minister says he will give me that information at an early date I have no more to say, except that he should be prepared to furnish the committee with information of this kind when his Estimates are up.

Mr. KYTE: I was somewhat disappointed at being unable to get the information I asked for with regard to the expenditure for betterments on the Intercolonial. The item before the committee is for construction and betterments on the Canadian Government railways, $6,500,000. It is well known that for the past two or three years the Department of Railways and Canals has been spending a very considerable amount of money on the Intercolonial railway between Point Tupper and Sydney for straightening curves, reducing grades, putting in concrete culverts and approaches. I congratulate the minister on these expenditures, which are very important to that section of the road, but I am bound to say with all deference that I did hope to be able to get the information I asked for this evening. I am not finding fault with the minister, but inasmuch as there is a great deal of information pertaining to this particular item to which the committee is entitled, I should be glad if the minister would allow the item to stand for the present.

Mr. GERMAN: I was to inquire further of the minister regarding the report of the Royal Commission on the railway situation. I think the House should have this information at a very early date. The report of Sir Henry Drayton and Mr. Acworth states that the Grand Trunk Railway Company claim to be, and in the opinion of both these gentlemen are, relieved from legal liability in connection with the operation of the Transcontinental portion of the system under the terms of the agreement. Has the minister had any opinion from the Department of Justice, or, if not, will he secure an opinion from that department, to inform the House whether or not this company is relieved from legal obligation to operate the portion of the railway built by the Government from Winnipeg to Moncton? For, if they are legally relieved from this obligation, it can only be by reason of the fact that the contract entered into between the Government and the Grand Trunk Company has been violated by the Government; no violation of that contract by the Grand Trunk Railway Company or by the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, could relieve the Grand Trunk Company from this liability. This House and the country ought to know whether the company has been relieved from its legal obligation. This is an exceedingly serious matter, far too serious to be passed over without full information and thorough investigation.

Mr. COCHRANE: All I can say is that there has been no violation on the part of the Government. The Grand Trunk refused to operate the road when it was finished, therefore, there was nothing left but for the Government to operate it. The whole subject will have to be taken up when the railway question is brought before the House for discussion.

Mr. McKENZIE: I fully sympathize with what has been brought to the attention of the minister by the hon. member for Welland. This and other large questions will have to be dealt with when the matter comes before the House. But there are some matters of a local character relating to my own constituency, which I desire to call to the attention of the minister. These may appear small matters, but this is the only railway operated in the part of the country from which I come, and the minister is the one representative of the owners of that railway before whom we can bring any difficulties or grievances, and so we must bring to his attention small matters as well as great ones. By correspondence, I have already brought to the notice of the minister the fact that there is a good deal of faultfinding in the county of Cape Breton and the county of Victoria, by reason of the fact that the people are refused proper railway crossings. It was in 1887, I think, that the right-of-way for this railway in the island of Cape Breton was obtained. That is a good many years ago, and at that time the farming population of Cape Breton and the products of the farms there were not as important as they are to-day, nor was there such a call for farming as there is at present. In those days, it was quite common to have a farm of two or three hundred acres, and for each farm there would be one crossing. But in many cases it has happened that one or two sons have taken fifty or a hundred acres of the old farm and have started farming on their own account. Yet the Department of Railways, as I understand it, refuses to give more crossings. It is not very much encouragement for a young man to remain on the land and carry on the agricultural production that we consider to-day so very necessary to find that he is refused a farm crossing, in fact that may make the difference between the young man starting a farm or not starting it. I have in mind a case where the railway not only cuts a young man's farm in two, but runs between him and the post road, and so in order to reach the road he must go over to his father's farm and get out by way of the old crossing. There should be more sympathy between the railway management and the farmers in these matters. I have understood that the reason crossings were not granted was that the railway officials did not want to establish a precedent. But there should be no feeling of that kind on their part. To accommodate the farmers in these matters means to develop the country. Even if a farm crossing should cost $100—and few of these crossings, I think, would cost more—the expenditure would be a good one and one with which, I am sure, the members of this House would not find fault. I trust that a more generous policy in this matter will be adopted by the department and that the officers on the line, the track-masters and superintendents, will not regard the farmer who asks for a crossing as a man who is trying to make trouble. It is a matter of general complaint against the hon. minister's officers that they are not in sympathy with those in whose way difficulties are placed, or to whom damage is caused by the railway. So long as the Government runs this road it must expect the same kind of trouble that other railways have. It is more difficult to get at a Government-owned railway by means of the courts, and for that very reason it should be made more easy to approach the officials of the department and get matters of this kind settled.

At our end of the line, at Sydney, North Sydney and Sydney Mines, there is great reason to complain because of the irregularity of the trains. This irregularity has continued for nine months or a year past. Trains due at nine o'clock in the morning frequently do not arrive until four o'clock in the afternoon, though they come only from Halifax, a distance of 250 miles. Some say that the irregularity of the trains is due to bad coal, some that it is due to bad engines, while others say that the track is to blame. Wherever the difficulty lies, at least it will be easy for the minister to find out the facts as to the irregularity we complain about, if any record is kept of the time when the trains leave Halifax and when they arrive at Sydney. Several letters have been sent to me and business people, and those who travel over this road have asked me to bring this matter to the attention of the minister and see if something can be done for a betterment in this regard.

I would like to also mention to the minister that between our town and Sydney we had very poor accommodation last year. We have a local service when there is ice in the harbour. In the summer we have no local service and there is no necessity for it. We have only one local train a day between Florence, Sydney Mines, North Sydney and Sydney. Last year the first train we could get from North Sydney to Sydney was at two o'clock in the afternoon. To do business, or to attend court in Sydney, we must be there at ten in the morning. The minister will tell me that we should get there on the express in the morning and the fast train coming in at night. But the train is often late and you can never tell when it is coming in. If you have any important business in Sydney you have to leave the night before on the evening express so that you may be sure of being there. In other years we had the train leaving at nine in the morning and that took people from Florence, Sydney Mines and North Sydney to Sydney. But this year instead of the nine o'clock train, we have to depend on the incoming express which, nine times out of ten, is late and there is a feeling on the part of the business people that it cannot be depended upon. I hope that the minister will instruct his officers to have a proper local service next winter because we cannot be left to depend upon the service we had last year.

Mr. COCHRANE: In reference to my hon. friend's complaint about crossings, we have endeavoured to do as other railways do, but as we propose putting the Government railways under the Railway Commission, these matters will be settled by them if they are not being attended to as it is thought they should be by the minister. With reference to the local train, I have made a note of it and we will discuss it with our officers before winter comes and see what can be done.

Mr. LOGGIE: I am glad to hear the minister say that the trunk lines of the Government railways are going to be put under the Railway Commission. Is it the intention to have provincially chartered branch lines also placed under the Railway Commission? Will the Railway Commission give a through rate on freight arising on a branch line constructed under a provincial charter a number of years ago and connecting with the trunk line?

I would like to call the minister's attention to the condition of the Caraquet railway, an enterprise that is very much retarded because of the lack of equipment and proper roadbed. It is proposed in some cases to increase the rate 50 per cent in order to make up the earnings. Lack of equipment, especially of facilities for dealing with snowstorms during the winter, is one of the difficulties with which the road has to contend. I hope, however, now that the trunk line of the Government railways is to be under the Railway Commission, that it will have some control over the branch lines that are feeders to the trunk line. It is a matter of great importance to the communities that are served by these branch lines that have been constructed under provincial charters. I would ask the minister to make a note of this, and see what can be done at the earliest opportunity. I would urge the minister, in the public interest, to make an effort to come to some terms with the bondholders of the Caraquet railway, and take over the management of that piece of road. The road has good earning power but the rails are light, the roadbed is in a bad condition, and during the stormy portion of the season they can do nothing but battle with the storm. Perishable freight is left where it arises, and a great loss occurs to the commercial interests of that part of the country. We talk about production, we are urging production, but how can production be overtaken if there are no facilities for moving the products to the market? This is a portion of the country that has not the transportation facilities that it requires for the carriage of its products.

I would also like to ask the minister if any progress is being made with regard to the construction of a bridge from Chelmsford to Millertown? The minister said that he would take the matter up with the local Government, and that he hoped that the local Government would make some move in that direction. He intimated that the Railway Department could perhaps find the iron work of the bridge. It is the imperative duty of the Government to provide communication from the Chelmsford side of the river. The minister took the rails up for 26 miles along that part of the river, the residents of that section have no railway facilities whatever, and they have no means of crossing the river to the railway that is operated on the other side. I believed the minister was in earnest when he told us that arrangements would be made with the local Government with a view to having that bridge constructed. The survey was made, and I have no doubt the report of the survey is in the department. I am not prepared to say that it was finally made, but I know that some location was made in view of the possibility of the bridge being constructed either by the Federal or the Provincial Government. The minister will recall that a few years ago there was a contract entered into for the construction of a Y at Derby Junction. For some reason, which I have never been able to understand, the contract was cancelled, and the Y was not constructed. When representatives of my town called upon the manager, he said that if it was found to be unsatisfactory he would endeavour to have the Y constructed. The matter has remained in that position. The local train runs from Loggieville to Derby Junction and stops there, and it cannot turn because there is no "Y" there, and it must back into Chatham. I should like to know why the "Y" was not constructed at Derby Junction. I hope the minister will take that into consideration.

Mr. COCHRANE: It is impossible to bring these branch lines, constructed under provincial charter, under the Railray Board, unless they are declared to be works for the general advantage of Canada. It would be strong handed work for the Government to place them under the Railway Board. The "Y" cannot be proceeded with, because we cannot get rails.

Mr. LOGGIE: That is a good reason.

[Mr. Loggie.]

Mr. COCHRANE: We have taken up a good many branches, in order to procure rails. We have succeeded in placing a contract for 10,000 tons of rails with the Dominion Iron and Steel Company. I think the hon. gentleman is mistaken in reference to that bridge. I do not think I made the promise he refers to. The promise may have been made in my absence by someone else.

Mr. LOGGIE: I am glad the hon. gentleman has given the reason why the "Y" was not constructed, and I am pleased to have his promise that when the rails are available it will be constructed.

Mr. COCHRANE: I did not make the promise.

Mr LOGGIE: Better make it at once.

Mr. COCHRANE: I do not make promises

Mr. MACDONALD: I do not know whether the minister gave us the details of the items contained in the $6,500,000 for construction and betterment. If the details have been given, and it appears on Hansard, it will be to the advantage of the House to know it, but as the information is not given in detail in the vote, as is generally done, this Committee is not in a position to give the matter full consideration. I think the minister should let the vote on construction and betterment stand till the former Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) is present. He is attending a public function in Brockville, and was not able to come. He asked me to mention this matter in his absence, and ask to have it stand. Perhaps the minister will grant that courtesy. The Committee should have the details before passing the item.

Mr. COCHRANE: I can give the hon. gentleman the details.

Roadbed and track	$ 333,000
Bridges	364,200
Buildings	571,000
Miscellaneous	$4,158,000

Mr. NESBITT: That would make up more than the amount.

Mr. COCHRANE; No, it only makes $5,042,000. Then the next items:

Prince Edward Island, roadbed and track	$ 7,600
Bridges	900
Miscellaneous	2,200
New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island Railway, Buildings	14,500
Roardbed and track	64,000
Bridges	55,600
Miscellaneous	4,000

Mr. COPP: What buildings would that be applied to?

Mr. COCHRANE: I have not the details.

Cape Tourmentine terminal facilities, standard 40,000 gallon tank and supply	$ 6,000
Four stall frame engine house	8,000
Coaling plant and shed	500
Total	$14,500

Mr. MACDONALD: The first one you gave us was roadbed on the Intercolonial Railway. This is capital expenditure. Is it new construction?

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes.

Mr. MACDONALD: Where is the money to be expended?

Mr. COCHRANE: Chaudiére junction yard extension; to settle land claims, ballasting charges, $15,000; St. Germain extend passing siding, $3,000.

Survey and inspection.
To prepare record plans and profiles, and spiral and recenter curves, etc.	$ 20,000
Total roadbed and track	333,000
National Transcontinental Railway buildings	118,900
Roadbed and track	151,100
Bridges	74,000
Miscellaneous	22,700
Winnipeg elevator	425,000
Lake Superior Branch, G.T.P., buildings	3,800
Roadbed and track	15,400
Bridges	87,700
Miscellaneous	20,000

Mr. MACDONALD: I would like to ascertain from the minister, speaking of what has been hitherto known as the Intercolonial, whether the amount which he mentioned for roadbed covers any new construction in any part of the road, or whether it involves a shortening of the road.

Mr. COCHRANE: For business and private sidings, there is $43,100; for Chaudiere Junction yard extension, to settle land claims and ballasting, $15,000.

Mr. MACDONALD: I understood the hon. gentleman to read an item something like $500,000 for roadbed. Did that include the construction of any new piece of roadway?

Mr. COCHRANE: The item was $335,000.

Mr. MACDONALD: What is contained in the item of miscellaneous, $4,000,000?

Mr. COCHRANE: Halifax, team delivery yard at deep water, $50,000. New Glasgow, paving South street, $6,500. Moncton shops: machinery, $35,000; stores, shop elevator, $1,200; air compressor, $16,500. Scotia No. 1, bridge for life boats, $3,500. To provide safety appliances on rolling stock as per requirement of Board of Railway Commissioners of Canada and Interstate Commerce Commission of United States on interchange of equipment, $17,300. Halifax ocean terminals, $3,500,000. Total new work, miscellaneous, $3,630,000, less amount of revote not required for Sunny Brae branch, $477,000 and Levis improvements, $127,000. Total, $3,026,000.

Mr. COPP: On whose report or advice was the track removed from the main line of railway at the wharf at Sackville?

Mr. COCHRANE: The track was taken up because we wanted the rails. We do not propose to abandon it; we shall replace it as soon as we can get rails.

Mr. COPP: In discussing the removal of rails from the Transcontinental the other day, the minister intimated that only a certain kind of rail would serve the purpose for which rails were required on the other side. The piece of track to which I refer is not more than half a mile long. Some years ago a large wharf was built at Sackville at a cost of about $40,000, and, as it was not connected with the main line of railway, it could not be used. Subsequently the Government, at considerable expense, repaired an old wharf to which there was access by rail. For two years, during the construction of the car ferry terminals at Cape Tormentine, it has been impossible to use the pier at Cape Tormentine for the shipment of lumber and other commodities, and the Sackville wharf has been used for that purpose. Last March the rails connecting with the wharf were taken up, and business men who had built warehouses on the wharf and stored in them large quantities of fertilizer and other goods were subjected to great loss and inconvenience. It is unfortunate that the only means of shipping in that section of the country should have been suddenly taken away. I agree that when rails are required we should give as many as we can. But I understood from the discussion the other day that in the case of the removal of rails in other localities, care was taken that there should be no serious interference with business arrangements and that proper accommodation should be given in some other way. In this case it is not possible to make other satisfactory arrangements under which the business people of the locality affected may use the wharf. I think, therefore, that the minister was ill-advised in taking up that short piece of track, thereby occasioning great loss to the shippers and to the people generally of that locality.

Mr. BOULAY: Some six years ago the Department of Railways decided to build two subways at St. Fabien, in the county of Rimouski, one at the east and one at the west end of the station. Although the subway proposed to be built at the east end of the station was the one most necessary, the one at the west was built, while the construction of the other was postponed. The siding at the station completely blocks the public crossing, and people travelling to the village have often been detained in winter from thirty to forty-five minutes being unable to cross the track. These delays occasion great annoyance and inconvenience. I understand that for many years provision had been made in the Estimates for completing the construction of both subways, but up to the present time the one at the east has not been built. I would ask the Minister of Railways to look into this matter and to do the best he can to make this improvement as soon as possible. In view of the nature of the crossings and the need for improved facilities, this subway is one of the most urgently required improvements on the Intercolonial railway. Upon approaching the track, the farmers have to climb a heavy hill. At the top the ground is level for a distance of about twenty-five or thirty feet, and sometimes ten or fifteen teams collect on that small piece of ground. There is a downhill slope on the other side of the track, and the whole crossing is very dangerous. If the minister will examine the plans and reports that have been made on the subject, he will realize the truth of what I am saying and appreciate the benefit that the construction of this improvement would be to the public in that locality.

Mr. COCHRANE: I shall be very glad to have the matter looked into, and if the situation is as the hon. member says it is, there is no question that there ought to be a crossing at that point, and we will see what can be done.

Mr. MACDONALD: This item in the Estimates this year is in a peculiar situation. There does not appear to be any vote upon income for the Intercolonial, and the only item which relates to the Canadian Government railways is contained in this one on page 52 of the Estimates:

Construction and betterments, Dartmouth to Deans, branch line, and to provide car ferry—construction terminals, etc.

[Mr. Copp.]

I would gather from what the minister said with regard to construction and betterments that he included a large expenditure for bridges and roadbed on the Prince Edward Island railway. Do I understand that notwithstanding the fact that this is war time, the minister purposes making this very large capital expenditure in Prince Edward Island for the purpose of changing the gauge of the railway?

Mr. COCHRANE: No.

Mr. MACDONALD: What then is the minister intending to do with all this money?

Mr. COCHRANE: I read out what we were doing.

Mr. MACDONALD: It is on account of what the minister stated in a general way —so many hundred thousand dollars for roadbed and so many for bridges—that I asked the question. Those items I would have thought would naturally have come out of income and not be charged to capital unless they involved a change of gauge.

Mr. COCHRANE: There is only $900 for bridges in Prince Edward Island.

Mr. MACDONALD: Am I to understand that the changing of the gauge of the Prince Edward Island railway for the purpose of utilising the car ferry is not to be made now?

Mr. COCHRANE: Not this year.

Mr. MACDONALD: I impressed upon the minister twice this session the necessity of securing an increased quantity of rolling-stock for the purpose of ensuring the transportation of coal. The coal situation in Canada is very serious. By reason of the fact that the vessels engaged in the transportation of coal from Nova Scotia to the St. Lawrence river having been commandeered, and that at the present moment it is problematical whether arrangements can be made for transporting the coal at Nova Scotia ports, the question is very grave as to whether the people of Quebec who depended on Nova Scotia in the past for their coal supplies will be able to obtain any this year. We were absolutely dependent on the Intercolonial railway for the distribution of coal throughout the Maritime Provinces, with the exception of one or two ports. I am advised that conditions in regard to the supply of what are known as coal cars are very bad. A few days ago the minister told me that about a year ago there had been given to a car company in my constituency an order for some coal cars which order had not been filled. I have made some inquiries into the matter, and I am advised that the order to which the minister refers was given more than a year ago, and that it had been filled.

Mr. COCHRANE: I do not think I said coal cars; I was speaking about box cars.

Mr. MACDONALD: I was directing the minister's attention then, and I am directing it now to the necessity for the reasons I have indicated, of getting some new coal cars on the Intercolonial. I hope the minister is buying cars liberally for this reason: that last year whatever occurred between the Canadian Pacific and the Intercolonial, the Canadian Pacific would not take freight for transport and delivery to the Intercolonial; in fact complaints came from as far as Newfoundland to that effect. The other day I received a telegram from a friend of mine in business in Newfoundland asking me to see whether some means could not be found for the shipment of some goods which he had ordered in the West, and which of necessity had to go over the Intercolonial to North Sydney to reach Newfoundland, because there is no communication by sea from Montreal. On account of the fact of which the minister is well aware and which I am told is true, that there was some difficulty in regard to the interchange of cars, freight conditions in the Maritime Provinces last winter were such that business men were put to the greatest possible inconvenience. The reason given locally by the railway officials was that cars could not be secured. If that be so, and taking into consideration the fact that extra demands were made upon the railway by reason of the shipment of war supplies, that only accentuates the argument in favour of the minister ordering at once a large number of cars. Over a year ago when the Minister of Customs was putting through the Railway Estimates I urged him to place an order for a supply of cars, and I understand that later on an order was given, but it was given very late in the season, I think, in July.

Mr. COCHRANE: In May.

Mr. MACDONALD: We were discussing the matter only about this time last year, and the order was placed after that.

Mr. COCHRANE: Parliament had prorogued long before this time last year.

Mr. MACDONALD: Parliament prorogued in the early part of June last year.

Some hon. MEMBERS: In May.

Mr. MACDONALD: Well, it was in May, just before prorogation that we were discussing the matter. I understood that what the minister referred to was coal cars and not box cars. I would urge him to take steps to ensure that an ample supply of coal cars be obtained for the Intercolonial, and that a supply of box cars is ordered now so that we shall get them within a reasonable time. If we do not order them now, we shall never get them, because there is no telling when the war will stop. It is imperative that the minister should have these cars.

Mr. COCHRANE: I must have misunderstood the hon. member or he must have misunderstood me. It was box cars that the Eastern Car Company had not delivered on the order given more than a year ago. They sent in a quotation to-day for a number of box cars which they said they would not deliver before March of next year. Therefore, the hon. member can see how hard it is for us to get cars.

Mr. MACDONALD: The longer you put the matter off the longer the delay.

Mr. COCHRANE: We are not putting it off, we have given that company an order for a thousand cars which must be filled before the end of the year; we have given an order for another thousand to the Canada Car Company, and we are asking for tenders for 5,000 more. We have scoured the United States for second-hand coal cars in order to help out the situation in the Maritime Provinces; we have secured some, but not as many as we expected. It is almost impossible to get them.

Mr. McKENZIE: I wish to bring to the notice of the minister the necessity for some improvements at the end of the Intercolonial in connection with my county. The station in my town is absolutely inadequate for the traffic there. It is a small station-house with only one small compartment for all kinds of passengers. The minister knows that it is the place where we land passengers for Newfoundland, and he will find, if there is any record kept, that the number of passengers leaving the train at North Sydney is perhaps as large as in any other place with the exception possibly of the city of Halifax.

There are no conveniences at the North Sydney station at all; the accommodation is altogether inadequate for the traffic, and I trust that some steps will soon be taken to give to North Sydney station accommodation commensurate with its needs. As one of the public, I am sure I may say to the minister that no person in Canada expects the Government Railways to be behind the private companies in providing accommodation at stations where the agent whether man or woman, has to stay at night. There is a railway station at a place called McKinnon's Harbour which is not fit for a man to live in. This station is in a magnificent farming centre, but I suppose the amount of traffic there is not very large. The agent, however, has to stay there summer and winter, and the accommodation is practically no better than what you would get if you turned a packing case upside down. I should be glad if the minister would provide this agent with accommodation worthy of the railway and of the country. A little farther along the line there is a place called Christmas Island, which is quite a traffic centre. Five or six country merchants get their goods at this station, and I am sure the traffic pays well, but there is no accommodation for the goods left at the station and consequently they have to be left on the side of the road with nobody to look after them. Those are three matters that I wish particularly to bring to the attention of the minister because the need is very great, namely, better accommodation for the traffic at North Sydney and Christmas Island, and reasonable accommodation for the agent who is obliged to live at McKinnon's Harbour. I hope the minister will look into these matters and provide for the accommodation in his estimates next year.

Mr. OLIVER: When did the Government become possessed of the International Railway, and at what price?

Mr. COCHRANE: It is a branch line from Campbellford to Leonard's Junction, 113 miles long, and was purchased three years ago for about $2,700,000.

Mr. OLIVER: Was the purchase made before the war?

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes, we should not have bought it after the war.

Mr. OLIVER: I think I read in the newspapers that it was acquired by the Government in January last.

Mr. COCHRANE: No, that was a mistake.

Mr. GERMAN: Who was the road bought from?

[Mr McKenzie.]

Mr. COCHRANE: From a man named Thomas Malcolm, who had some bond company, I think, associated with him.

Mr. OLIVER: The Government seems to have plenty of money for railroads in every place except the Northwest. Railroads already existing in New Brunswick and railroads partially existent in Quebec are being bought, but the Northwest seems to be getting no attention from the Government at all. I heard the minister say a few minutes ago that it would be a very serious matter to declare a certain provincially-chartered branch line in New Brunswick to be for the general advantage of Canada, thereby bringing it under the Railway Commission. The Government has no hesitation in doing that in the province of Alberta, but they do not seem to be taking any measures for the completion of the road. The plea made by the Minister of Finance, when I brought up this matter the other evening, was lack of money, but I notice there is an abundance of money to buy roads in New Brunswick and Quebec.

Mr. LOGGIE: Have any steps been taken to take over the Caraquet railway?

Mr. COCHRANE: There is not much to take over.

Mr. LOGGIE: I think the minister's answer is the strongest reason why something should be done in the public interest. If the road was operated as it ought to be the country would be helped. The road does a good business and should be fairly remunerative. I do not suppose, however, that it would pay the interest on the investment necessary, and that is the reason why the present bondholders do not put the road in proper shape to give satisfactory service in stormy weather. The minister says there is not much to take over, but what there is of it should be taken over in the interests of that section of the country.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I should like to say a word or two on the subject of branch lines because it brings prominently before the House the question whether public men are to keep faith with the people of the country, or whether no further attention is to be given to their pledged words. In the latter case we have a condition of affairs that is not calculated to retain the respect and confidence of the people. I think there have been only two branch lines taken over in the lower provinces. The International railway is a very valuable road, occupying a very important strategic position, and if it were owned by a private company a very large traffic would no doubt be taken away from the Intercolonial.

I think the minister was well advised in carrying out what had been approved of by his predecessor. It has also taken over the New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island road. These are the only two. As the minister knows, for years there has been an agitation in this House and throughout the country, in favour of taking over branch lines and operating them as part of the Intercolonial system. As far back as the early fall of 1911, when the general elections campaign was in progress, the hon. member for Kings and Albert (Mr. Fowler), who is not at present with us as his duties have taken him overseas, was running in a constituency where an intense interest was taken in this question. The people for years had been demanding better accommodation, especially in the county of Gloucester in regard to the Caraquet railway to which my hon. friend has referred. The hon. member for Kings and Albert was exceedingly desirous to give the people to understand that if the Conservative party were returned to power the branch lines would be taken over and made part of the Intercolonial railway. He wired to the leader of the Opposition of that time, the present Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) asking for a telegram clearly defining the policy of the Conservative party on this subject. He received a reply which he deemed entirely satisfactory and which, unfortunately, the people to whom he was appealing also regarded as entirely satisfactory. The words of that telegram from the present Prime Minister I do not recall, but the effect of it was that it had always been the policy of the Conservative party to take over the branch lines of the Intercolonial railway. It gave Colonel Fowler clearly to understand that if the Conservatives were honoured with the confidence of the people this policy would be carried into effect. Six years have passed since then, and nothing whatever has yet been done in regard to taking over the railways in that constituency. There are three of them of great importance, the Albert railway, the Elgin and Havelock, and the St. Martins railway. The minister will remember that quite a number of years ago the House unanimously passed a resolution in favour of taking over the branch lines and making them part of the Intercolonial, and it has been a great disappointment that nothing whatever has been done in the matter. There are not very many of them and they would be valuable feeders to the Intercolonial, and they would be of infinitely more importance if they were taken over and put into good order so as to operate winter and summer and so that the people could rely upon a continuous and satisfactory service. This ought to appeal to the minister because of the pledged word of the Prime minister which this Government has utterly failed to carry out, greatly to the disappointment of the people. They relied upon the promise, and they are extremely disappointed that it has not been kept. Redress should come from some quarter, though I do not know where it can come from. I feel that if there were a change of government the obligation which this Parliament has taken upon itself in this matter would be fully met. The people despair of getting justice in this matter from this Government, but I think they rely with some confidence upon the pledge if this Parliament being kept, for not only has the Government pledge been given but Parliament also is committed to this policy.

Mr. COCHRANE; I do not know of any time since I became minister when Parliament committed itself to it. Parliament passed a Branch Lines Act, but that does not commit it to the purchasing of all the railways down there. Some of them, as I said once before, instead of being feeders are milkers. There is not any of them but has to be rebuilt, and you could almost build new railways for the same money that it would cost to repair them.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What does the hon. minister mean by "milkers"? Does he mean that they are like cows that give good milk? It would seem that the Intercolonial takes the milk out of these branches.

Mr. COCHRANE: I do not think so. We do not interfere with their rates.

Mr. PUGSLEY: You take it out of the passengers.

Mr. COCHRANE: Nothing of the kind. This is not a question to bring up in war time, when our expenditure in the war is a million a day.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What about the Highways Bill?

Mr. COCHRANE: The Highways Bill is proposed for good reason. If the war should cease, we have to have a lot of work for our returned soldiers.

An hon. MEMBER: Breaking stone.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. GERMAN: What about the Quebec and Saguenay which was taken over a long time after the war began?

Mr. COCHRANE: It was agreed to be purchased before the war.

Mr. GERMAN: What about paying the Quebec and Saguenay bond-holders a million and a half which, it is said, they are not entitled to?

Mr. COCHRANE: We have not paid them.

Mr. GERMAN: You have a Bill to pay them.

Mr. CARVELL: I wish to call attention to another matter of the branch lines down home, even if it be war time. It is all very well for the minister to talk about "war time" and say that he cannot build roads now; but he could provide $3,000,000 to spend around the North Pole on what they call the Hudson Bay railway.

Mr. COCHRANE: Your friend beside you (Mr. Oliver) will defend that.

Mr. CARVELL: That does not change the latitude of this work, nor does it change the fact that the minister is spending these millions on it.

Mr. COCHRANE: Both parties were committed to it before I came in.

Mr. CARVELL: So they were committed to the branch lines. It is no trouble to the minister to go back on the express policy of both parties with regard to the branch lines, but he must go on building the road from Le Pas to Hudson bay. Both parties may have been committed to that project, but, so far as I am concerned, I am not guilty.

Mr. COCHRANE: The contract was let before I came in.

Mr. CARVELL: That may be, but I am not guilty. There was another agreement made with regard to a road down in my part of the country, which agreement was not lived up to; and I think the time has come when this Government should look into it very seriously and do something to make good the loss occasioned to the province of New Brunswick. When these hon. gentlemen opposite came into power in 1911, they found legislation on the statute book providing for the operation of the so-called Valley railway. Providing it was built under certain terms and conditions, they were to take it over from the province and operate it, paying forty per cent of the gross earnings. The first thing they did was to change the law in 1912, so that they were able to build the road with seven-degree curves and unfavourable grades. Instead of building the road up to the standard set, they built it much below that standard. There was also legislation under which this road was to be built from a point on the Transcontinental at or near Grand Falls to St. John.

It was to be the outlet for all western transcontinental business coming to the port of St. John. One of the first official acts of this Government was to drop the subsidy on the upper end of the road and make it impossible to make that connection. But, acting on the strength of the promise made by this Parliament before this Government came into power, the Government of New Brunswick of that day entered into the construction of this road and have spent somewhere about $7,000,000—I am not sure as to the exact amount, but a very large amount. They have got the road built from a very bright little town in my constituency called Centreville, extending southwards and in a few months it will be completed to a point on the Canadian Pacific from which they can get connection with St. John. But it is only a local road, and as a result it has only local traffic. They are only able to run one mixed train one way each day, because that enables them to take care of all the traffic that arises. I submit to the House that the expenditure of this money by the Government of New Brunswick was never justified except upon the theory, and upon the agreement, that it was to become a part of the Transcontinental railway. If this Government had carried out the contract which Parliament had made with the people of New Brunswick, if they had not degraded the road, or allowed their friends in New Brunswick to degrade it, if they had not cancelled the subsidy, if they had built the bridge across the St. John river at Andover and made it possible to get connection with the Transcontinental railway, the province of New Brunswick would have received sufficient from its 40 per cent of the earnings of the road to have fairly paid the interest on the bonds. I find from the Budget speech made in the Legislature of New Brunswick at Fredericton last week that they have figured a deficit of a quarter of a million dollars this coming year in interest over and above their share of the earnings of the road. A quarter of a million dollars is an enormous amount to be taken out of the ordinary revenues of a small province like New Brunswick. It has reached a point when there must be direct taxation upon the people of that province to take care of the interest, all because this Government have not carried out the pledge that was made to the people of New Brunswick by virtue of the legislation which they found in existence when they came into power. It is true that they have taken over the operation of the road on an agreement that practically means that 40 per cent goes to the province. But unless they carry out the trade that was made by Parliament in its spirit as well as in its letter and build that road through to the Transcontinental railway, or assist to carry it through by renewing the subsidy which they cut off, unless they stand by the trade in such a way as to enable it to be made a through line, it is the duty of the Government to take over the road, take over the bonds, pay them and relieve the province of New Brunswick of the enormous drain that they have upon their public revenue. I do not see, in view of the action of the present Government, anything to do but to assume the payment of these bonds, and, of course, take over the road and run it as a part of the Intercolonial.

I am bringing this matter to the minister's attention in the greatest sincerity. I am pointing out how he and his friends have created the condition that exists today. I am not blaming the minister personally at all but I am blaming his Government and their friends for the very unfortunate condition in which we find ourselves to-night. Unless he will in some way get this road through to the Transcontinental and put it where it will get through business, I see nothing in the world to do but take the road over, assume the bonds and run it as a part of the Intercolonial. I hope the minister will give this very serious consideration and I can assure him that no matter what Government is in power in Canada, or what Government is in power in New Brunswick, this is a question which must be faced. I think this is the first time that it has been brought to the attention of this House but it will come up again because the condition is such that it is simply intolerable, all due to the fact that the Government have not carried out the pledge made to the province and which has forced upon the province an expenditure of $7,000,000 or $8,000,000.

Mr. COCHRANE: I do not see how the hon. gentleman can say that we have not carried out our promise. The Bill was put through and we have lived up to it. We agreed to give a subsidy and we have done so.

Mr. CARVELL: You have absolutely repealed the subsidy from Andover.

Mr. COCHRANE: No, it lapsed; it was not repealed.

Mr. CARVELL: It was not renewed.

Mr. COCHRANE: I know it was not renewed because they have not been able to build the road. We are now living up to our agreement and paying them 40 per cent of the earnings. We have not built the bridge across the river at Andover but—

Mr. CARVELL: You will not carry out your agreement.

Mr. COCHRANE: It is impracticable to build it.

Mr. CARVELL: Then you refuse to carry out the agreement of Parliament.

Mr. COCHRANE: I know, but there is common sense in all things and there are things that the Government should do and things they should not do. You know as well as I do that there would not be any traffic over that bridge which would cost I do not know how much—

Mr. CARVELL: It would not cost more than a quarter of a million dollars.

Mr. COCHRANE: A quarter of a million your granny; you could not touch that for a quarter of a million.

Mr. CARVELL: My hon. friend is talking about something that he does not know anything about.

Mr. COCHRANE: I know the best engineers in the country think that.

Mr. CARVELL: My hon. friend has never seen the location of the bridge.

Mr. COCHRANE: It would not make any difference if I had; I am not giving my own opinion.

Mr. CARVELL: The minister is not speaking on the reports of any engineers.

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes, I am. The chief engineer of the old Government appointed for the building of the Quebec bridge made a report in which he said that it would cost $3,000,000.

Mr. CARVELL: I knew my hon. friend did not know what he was talking about. He is not talking about the bridge I am talking about.

Mr. COCHRANE: You are talking about the bridge across the St. John river?

Mr. CARVELL: Certainly—at Andover.

Mr. COCHRANE: Oh, well.

Mr. CARVELL: I knew my hon. friend was not listening to me.

Mr. COCHRANE: It is the bridge across the river to go to St. John that I am talking about.

Mr. CARVELL: I am not talking about that at all. The original proposition was to construct three bridges of which one is at St. John and one at Andover. The bridge at Andover would not cost more than a quarter of a million and I think it might not cost more than $200,000. It would be necessary to make connection with the Transcontinental near Grand Falls. It is an altogether different bridge from the one the minister is talking about?

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes.

Mr. CARVELL: I am not finding any fault in regard to that matter because the Government are making connections with St. John, although I do not think it was the best arrangement to make. They are making connection by Westfield and using a portion of the tracks of the Canadian Pacific. But I do find fault that in the other case they have stopped simply in the country and that they have refused to renew the subsidy from Andover to Grand Falls although they renewed the subsidy from Andover South. In spite of the fact that the department agreed to build that road and have the money all voted for building the road across the St. John river at Andover, the minister has refused. That is why I say he has refused to carry out the trade made between this Parliament and the people of New Brunswick. If he will not carry out this trade upon which we have invested $7,000,000 on a line which is not productive, it is the duty of the minister to take over the bonds, pay the interest, take over the road, operate the line himself and not compel the people of New Brunswick to pay a quarter of a million dollars interest which we would not have been called upon to pay if we had not had the promise of this Parliament and if we had not acted upon that promise.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Mr. Chairman, I am very glad that my hon. friend from Carleton (Mr. Carvell) has called the attention of the minister to this matter. It is certainly one of very great importance. I am able to corroborate all that has been said because I was a member of the Government which arranged for the original subsidy all the way from Grand Falls to St. John.

Delegations came from New Brunswick, representing the Provincial Government, boards of trade, and other important interests, and the whole idea was based upon connection with the Transcontinental railway at Grand Falls. If it had not been for that, I should not have asked my colleagues nor the people representing New Brunswick, to engage in the enterprise at all. It was only by reason of the road being part of the National Transcontinental railway that the matter could be justified. A subsidy was granted originally on the road from Grand Falls to St. John. The hon. gentleman from Carleton has said very truly that different connection has been made from Gagetown to St. John from that which was originally contemplated. Perhaps that may work out fairly well, but certainly not so well as if the original project had been carried out. It leaves the upper end simply terminating in a prosperous village, but having no connection with the Transcontinental system. The minister is entirely in error when he says the company failed to complete the road, and that the subsidy from Andover to Grand Falls lapsed. The company had the road under construction when this Parliament was asked by the minister to repeal that portion of the subsidy which applied to the section from Andover to Grand Falls. There was no failure on the part of the company. The subsidy had not lapsed, and if the minister will refer to the statute he will find a new subsidy from Andover to Grand Falls was substituted for the one from St. John to Grand Falls, and none of us could understand why it was left out. There must have been some Ethiopian in the woodpile, and just what it was I do not know.

Mr. CARVELL: We all protested.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Yes. And the late Premier Flemming went up to Grand Falls, and told us that it was going to be built, notwithstanding the fact that the minister himself had induced Parliament to alter the statute by repealing the provision for a subsidy from Grand Falls to St. John and substituting a subsidy from Andover to St. John.

Mr. OLIVER: I want to place before the committee the position in regard to certain railways in the West, to which I made allusion a few minutes ago. I noticed the minister's remark that a time of war was not a time to consider the building of railways. In the instance I wish to mention, I think I can prove to him that the time of war is the time these roads should be completed, because this is the time when we desire to increase production, and people are settling in these districts depending upon the completion of these railroads for the increase of production.

Mr. COCHRANE: To what roads do you refer?

Mr. OLIVER: Canadian Northern, the line northwesterly from Edmonton and the line northeasterly from Edmonton. Those districts are occupied by a large number of people who have been retarded in the development of their land by reason of the lack of railway communication, but when the road was graded from Edmonton to White Court, in 1913, it was universally taken for granted that the establishment of railway facilities was only a matter of another year. The people who were already in the country were encouraged, and other people went into the country and established themselves there, and the operations of those people have been at a standstill ever since, on account of the road not being completed. The grade is there for over fifty miles from the present terminus, at the crossing of the Pembina river, to White Court, and the grading is going out of repair. It was almost completed ready for the rails, and very expensive work had been done on it. Large cuttings and large trestle works have been put in. The St. Paul de Métis road is directed towards a settlement, some of the settlers in which are 120 miles from the road to-day. Those settlers went into that large tract of country a number of years ago. The district is fertile and attractive. The people are enterprising, but it is impossible for those people to increase their production at such a distance from the railroad. These railroads were chartered originally by the provincial government. They are built under provincial government charter, and aid was given the Canadian Northern Railway Company by provincial government guarantee. The bonds guaranteed by the provincial government were sold by the railway company to cover one hundred miles on the St. Paul de Métis branch, and about the same on the White Court branch, and construction was begun on the St. Paul de Métis branch, The grade was completed on the White Court branch for a distance of 130 miles from Edmonton. Later on steel was laid on the White Court branch for 70 miles from Edmonton, and no steel was laid for some years on the St. Paul de Metis branch, but recently the grade on the St. Paul de Métis branch was completed for 100 miles, and it is understood 50 miles of steel is now being laid, leaving 50 miles yet to be covered by the steel. When the $45,000,000 guarantee was given to the Canadian Northern, security was taken by this Government on the Canadian Northern western branch lines, and the money raised on the bonds guaranteed by the provincial government appeared in the statement of the assets of the Canadian Northern as security to this Government for the guarantee of $45,000,000. The conditions of the guarantee were that these properties were mortgaged to this Government by second mortgage. The provincial government, which gave the guarantee held a first mortgage on the properties. The second mortgage held by the Dominion Government acted as a bar to the railway company raising any more money, because the money could not be raised in the face of the mortgage to the Dominion Government, and their enterprise has been stalled in that condition ever since, and for that reason this Government, in order to protect its second mortgage, paid the interest on the bond guaranteed by the provincial government and sold by the company. If the interest were not paid, the road would become the property of the provincial government under their first mortgage. In that way, the Dominion Government becomes responsible for the construction of these roads, and still the roads are not completed and have no earning power. I have brought the matter to the attention of the House during previous sessions, and have urged that, under the circumstances, the Government having made itself responsible for the interest on the bonds, they should complete the railway so that it may be able to earn the bond interest. If these roads were completed to White Court in one case, and 100 miles toward St. Paul de Métis in the other case, it would add enormously to the productiveness of that part of the country, in which population is already established, but is unable to increase its production because of lack of railway facilities. Money employed to secure the completion of these railroads would not be money diverted from the purpose of winning the war; it would rather be money well spent for the purpose of increasiing the production that is necessary to win the war. My hon. friend's Government has money with which to buy and to bonus railroads in other parts of Canada. If it was necessary to put up money to the extent of the ordinary aid given to a railway company in order to complete these roads, no precedent would be broken. It would be doing no more for the people in the part of the country affected than is done for people in every other part of the country. I urge upon the minister the desirability of the Government's taking steps to put these railroads in a position to earn interest on their bonds and to secure largely increased production at the hands of people who are settled along those lines and who are discouraged by the disappointment that they have suffered through the non-completion of the roads, the construction of which was their inducement to occupy the lands.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: We have heard a good deal to-night about what the Government are doing in other provinces; about their building and bonusing railways in other parts of Canada. That phrase "other parts of Canada" has been referred to so often that I do not think that it should pass unchallenged. Only a few years ago hon. gentlemen who are now advocating the Government's doing something for their respective provinces strenuously objected to the payment of the usual subsidy to a railroad in Ontario which the Provincial Government itself undertook to build and pay for. The members for Edmonton and St. John were members of that Government. Year after year the Provincial Government made application for the subsidy. We remember the strenuous opposition that was made when this Government took steps in the matter; how the Bill was finally passed and then rejected by the Senate; how it was passed again the next year and approved by the Senate by only a narrow majority. I do not like to hear so much about "other parts of Canada."

Mr. PUGSLEY: I think that the province of Ontario applied for the Dominion subsidy after the road was built. The road was under construction long before application for subsidy was made to this Government.

[Mr. Oliver.]

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I am quite positive that time and again application was made to the Government in power at that time for the subsidy, and that it was as often refused.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Does my hon. friend say that application was made by the Ross Government?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Yes.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I do not think so.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The late Hon. Sir George Ross himself is on record to that effect. The member for St. John says that the Government ought to take over and operate certain roads in the eastern provinces. We all remember the position taken by hon. gentlemen opposite last year when the province of Ontario objected to the renewing of a charter to an outside company, in view of the fact that the province itself was willing to build without asking this Government for a dollar. Yet hon. gentlemen in this committee and elsewhere strenuously opposed the attitude of the Ontario Government. The Government desire to be consistent; they desire to deal with all provinces alike. They cannot single out New Brunswick and extend to that province concessions which are not extended to other provinces. I think the time has passed when arguments of that nature should be made in the House.

Mr. CARVELL: What does the hon. gentleman say about the Quebec and Saguenay railway?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Year after year, discussing the branch lines in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, hon. gentlemen told us the same story. In the case to which I refer, they were opposed to the granting of the usual Government subsidy of $6,400 a mile, although the Ontario Government were themselves building the road. No company would build it, because of the view that the undertaking would not be profitable. That shows the difference in the conditions existing in the several provinces.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I would suggest that we let this item stand—the late Minister of Railways is absent; he would, perhaps, like to speak on this item—and pass items 104, 105, and 106. The minister has made good progress in the way of getting the ideas of the members—which is almost as good as getting votes through, because discussion must take place.

Mr. COCHRANE: I accept my hon. friend's suggestion.

Mr. McKENZIE: The member for Richmond might later desire to say something on item 106. There will be no objection to that?

Mr. COCHRANE: No.

RESIGNATION FROM THE CABINET OF HON. MR. PATENAUDE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Mr. Speaker, I desire to state, in the absence of the Prime Minister, that Mr. Patenaude has tendered his resignation, and that the correspondence in reference thereto will be laid on the table of the House as soon as the assent of the Governor General has been obtained.

APPOINTMENT OF FUEL CONTROLLER.

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I desire to lay on the table of the House an Order in Council passed on the 8th of June, 1917, constituting a controller of fuel for the Dominion of Canada.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Who is the controller?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Mr. C. A. Magrath. The order in Council is as follows:

The Committee of the Privy Cuncil have had before them a report dated 8th June, 1917, from the Minister of Trade and Commerce, submitting the following observations on the coal situation in Canada:—

Last winter very considerable difficulty and hardship were experienced owing to shortage of supplies and congestion of transport, resulting in increased prices to consumers, serious temporary curtailment of production in factories, and much discomfort and privation in the homes of the poorer classes in towns and cities. These causes bid fair to continue and with increasing force during the present season, and are added to by the scarcity of labour for the mines, the increasing difficulties in transport and the added demand for coal in both the United States and Canada owing to the ever increasing exigencies of the war.

At the present moment the outlook for the coming season gives cause for grave anxiety and calls for prompt and efficient action if subsequent shortage and its consequent privations are to be avoided. The Quebec district, which formerly drew for its needs for railways and factories some 2,000,000 tons of bituminous coal from Nova Scotia mines, cannot estimate on more than 200,000 tons from that source. Nearly all the prospective output of these mines will be required for local needs, bunkering purposes and the use of the Intercolonial Railway. This transfers the supply of this deficiency to the United States mines, whilst in Middle Canada the demands have to be met, if at all, by drawing upon United States sources.

Here two difficulties are encountered. First, the high price and shortage of supply in the United States mines, caused by extraordinary demands and reduced output owing to scarcity of labour. The entrance of the United States into the war and the vast preparations necessary for the equipment of sea and land forces and the growing needs of the Allies call for vastly increased output of coal and added restraint of export for other than war purposes. In the second place transport by land and water is daily becoming more inadequate compared to the increasing volume of freights to be moved, and freight costs are continually increasing.

In the western prairie provinces the supply has been diminished by strikes in some of the mines and in respect to those working the output is restricted by the tendency to neglect putting in orders during the summer season, and consequent failure to haul coal to consuming centres during the slack and favourable season.

The minister represents that it seems, therefore, to be necessary that a competent fuel controller should be appointed:

1. To examine into the coal situation of eastern and middle Canada from the Atlantic coast to the Rockies.

(a) As to the probable demands for consumption therein for the coming season.

(b) As to the output of Canadian coal that can be relied upon towards meeting those demands and what, if any, measures can be adopted to increase this output.

(c) As to the sources outside of Canada from which the deficiency can be provided, and the possibility of obtaining the necessary amount.

(d) As to the possibility of providing sufficient transport for the carriage of both Canadian and foreign coal from the points of production to distributing points.

(e) As to the possibility of early and continuous co-operation between producers, carriers and consumers, with a view to economizing and facilitating the needed supply.

2. That in the course of and in connection with such investigation, he be authorized to confer with and co-ordinate the different interests with a view to ensure so far as possible a sufficient supply of coal for Canadian requirements during the approaching autumn and winter seasons and from time to time to report and recommend to the Government ways and means for effecting the same.

The minister recommends that Charles A. Magrath be appointed Fuel Controller and be charged with carrying out the purposes outlined in the foregoing memorandum, and that all expenses incurred by him for clerical assistance and travelling and living expenses in connection therewith constitute a charge upon and be paid from the War Appropriation Funds.

The committee concur in the foregoing and submit the same for approval.

(Sgd.) Rodolphe Boudreau,
Clerk of the Privy Council.

APPOINTMENT OF BOARD OF GRAIN SUPERVISORS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I also desire to lay on the table of the House two Orders in Council of the 11th June, 1917, constituting the Board of Grain Commissioners for Canada. I just desire to say in reference to these Orders in Council that the Government has passed them after consultation and consideration, first, in the interest of Canadian producers of wheat and consumers of flour made therefrom, to regulate and control in an intelligent and reasonable way the price at which wheat shall be sold, and the methods of dealing therein, and the transportation thereof; secondly, to assure for Great Britain and the Allies the total exportable surplus of Canadian wheat and flour at a time of great exigency, from a source which geographically and in regard to the safety and facility for transport, is most available of all overseas countries; thirdly, to act in conjunction and to co-operate with the authorities of the United States who, for similar reasons, are arranging for a like arrangement and control in that country.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: In view of the importance of these Orders in Council, may I suggest that they should be printed forthwith or appear in Hansard or the Votes and Proceedings?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I have no objection to their appearing in Hansard.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: We shall take them as read and put them on Hansard.

Mr. SPEAKER: In view of the importance of these Orders in Council, I can see no objection, with the unanimous consent of the House, to their being considered as read and being placed upon Hansard.

[Sir George Foster.]

Mr. KNOWLES: Will these gentlemen receive remuneration?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The Orders in Council will give my hon. friend that information, but I may say that this is an entirely honorary board.

Mr. MACDONALD: Are any gentlemen from the Maritime Provinces included in the list?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: No. The Orders in Council are as follows:

AT THE GOVERNMENT HOUSE AT OTTAWA.

Monday the 11th day of June, 1917.

Present:

His Excellency the Governor General in Council.

Whereas, by reason of war conditions, it is considered necessary to provide means whereby the grain of Canada in excess of domestic requirements may be made available for purchase by or on behalf of His Majesty's Government of the United Kingdom and of the Allied Powers, and that the distribution of domestic requirements be controlled in such manner and under such conditions as will prevent to the utmost possible extent any undue inflation or depreciation of values by speculation, by the hoarding grain supplies, or by any other means;

Therefor His Excellency the Governor General in Council, under and by virtue of the provisions of the War Measures Act, 1911, is pleased to make the following regulations and the same are hereby made and enacted accordingly:—

1. The Governor General in Council may appoint a Board to be designated "The Board of Grain Supervisors of Canada" hereinafter called the Board. Such Board shall be honorary and shall consist of not more than twelve (12) members.

2. The Members of the Board shall be paid travelling and living expenses while actually engaged in the duties of the Board but otherwise shall receive no renumeration.

3. The Board shall make such inquiries and investigations as from time to time it deems necessary to ascertain what supplies of grain are now available or will be available. The Board shall ascertain the location and ownership of such grain and what transportation and elevator facilities are available in connection therewith, as well as all conditions connected with the marketing and the market price of the same. For the purpose of any inquiry or investigation held by the Board, the Board and the several members thereof shall have all the power of a commissioner acting under part 1 of the Enquiries Act.

4. The Board shall have power from time to time to fix the price at which grain stored in any elevator may be purchased, and the conditions as to price, destination or otherwise under which grain may be removed from such elevator and may also prescribe what grain shall be sold to millers or milling firms in Canada or elsewhere (hereinafter called "Millers") and what grain shall be sent to the United Kingdom and the Allied powers and it shall be the duty of the Board to issue such orders and take such action as it deems necessary to facilitate at all times the transportation and delivery of grain in excess of domestic requirements to the United Kingdom and the Allied powers.

(a) Any price so fixed shall be subject to the approval of the Chairman of the Board.

(b) The Board may from time to time appoint an executive committee of not less than three of its members of whom the Chairman shall be one and may assign to such executive committee any duties or powers within the competence of the Board.

5. The Board shall have power to receive offers for the purchase of grain from millers and from the Wheat Export Company Limited, or from any other person or body corporate, hereinafter referred to as "Overseas Purchasers" representing or acting for the Government of the United Kingdom or for any of the Allied nations or for any combination of the same, and from time to time to fix the prices at which such grain shall be sold.

6. The Board shall have power to take possession of and sell and deliver to millers or to overseas purchasers at the prices so fixed grain stored in any elevator, and to account and pay over to the owners thereof the proceeds of such sales after deducting all expenses connected with the taking possession, sale and delivery.

7. The Board shall, as far as possible, and having regard to position and the cost of transportation, fix a uniform price throughout Canada for grain of the same kind quality and grade.

8. Notwithstanding anything in the Grain Act or in the Railway Act, the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada shall have power to order any railway company to provide cars and other transportation facilities for handling grain and to transport as directed, grain taken possession of or owned by the Board.

9. Every person shall truthfully and promptly answer any inquiry made by the Board or by any person duly authorized on its behalf about any matter within its powers or duties, whether such inquiry is made verbally, in writing, by telegraph, or in any other way.

10. In this order "Elevator" means and includes any terminal, country, private, public and hospital elevator, and any elevator licensed by the Board of Grain Commissioners for Canada.

11. The Board, with the approval of the Governor in Council, may make any regulations it deems necessary for the purpose of fully and effectively carrying out the objects and provisions of these regulations, and in particular, but without limiting the generality of the foregoing, may make regulations.

(a) For appointing representatives in different places in Canada for the purpose, from time to time, of making known in such localities the prices for grain fixed and other regulations or directions made by the Board, and for reporting to the Board any violations or any order issued by the Board or any regulations made hereunder, and generally for assisting the Board in the effective discharge of its duties;

(b) To authorise the engaging of clerks, employees and asistants and the paying of their salaries;

(c) Creating offences and providing penalties in respect of violations of any order made by the Board or of any regulation made hereunder.

(Signed) Rodolphe Boudreau.

Clerk of the Privy Council.

PRIVATE JOHN TITUS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. McCOIG: I would like to draw the attention of the Minister of Militia to a message I have received from the Secretary-Treasurer of the Chatham Branch of the Canadian Patriotic Fund. This is the message:

Private John Titus,—

Mr. SPEAKER: Does the hon. member purpose asking a question?

Mr. McCOIG: I just want to call the attention of the Minister of Militia to this letter:

Private John Titus, No. 491181, 33rd Battalion, present address, 217 King Street East, Chatham, Ontario, has not received any money since March 20, is still in khaki, a wounded soldier. I wired Ottawa June 1, also have written them, can get no reply as to why this man does not receive his allowance.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I respectfully submit to the hon. member that this is a matter which more properly could be submitted by letter, or by a question placed on the Order Paper.

YUKON FLOUR PRICES.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. OLIVER: May I ask the Minister of Labour, to whom was referred the condition in regard to the prices of flour in the Yukon, if he has any information to offer the House on that subject?

Mr. CROTHERS: That has not been referred to any one. I simply wrote the company that takes in most of the supplies to Dawson—I have just forgotten their name—for an answer to the telegram, the substance of which is the same as my hon. friend had yesterday.

Mr. OLIVER: Might I suggest to the minister that it takes possibly a week or two weeks for a letter to reach Dawson, and I anticipate that the reason for the sending of the telegram was because of urgency.

Mr. CROTHERS: The place of business of this company is San Francisco, not quite so far away as the Yukon.

LABOUR STRIKES IN WESTERN COAL MINES.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. FRANK OLIVER: Has the Minister of Labour any information with regard to coal strikes in the bituminous mines west of Edmonton?

Hon. T. W. CROTHERS (Minister of Labour): The Prime Minister received a telegram to-day from one of the companies operating at Jasper Park, stating that the men had ceased work.

Mr. OLIVER: Might I trespass so far on the rules as to ask the minister to give information to the House at a definite time as to the causes for the men leaving work, the prospects for resumption, and whether the strike includes domestic coal mines or is confined to steam coal mines.

Mr. CROTHERS: The telegram did not mention domestic or steam coal mines, but set forth that the men had struck over the question of wages, and would accept whatever arrangement was made in District 18.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT AMENDMENT.

On motion of Sir Thomas White, the House went into Committee on Bill No. 68, to amend the Civil Service Act.

On section 2—persons placed in third class under 1908 Act who had passed qualifying examination, etc., eligible for promotion to second class:

Mr. MURPHY: Might I ask if a distinction is drawn between those who have passed the examination and those who have not?

[Mr. Oliver.]

Sir THOMAS WHITE: This section applies to those who had prior to the coming into force of the Civil Service Act of 1908 passed the qualifying examination, or have been appointed under sections 37 or 40 of the Civil Service Act, chapter sixteen of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906: that is to say, this section applies to those who have passed the qualifying examination or have been appointed on account of technical skill or special training under the provisions of sections 37 and 40 of the former Civil Service Act.

Mr. MURPHY: Under the present section are those who did not pass such an examination wholly ineligible, or is machinery provided whereby they may become eligible for promotion?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The only way in which they could become eligible is by qualifying under the present Civil Service Act of 1908, or by being specially mentioned in the Estimates. In this Act we deal only with those who have passed the qualifying examination, or were otherwise qualified under the legislation in effect before the Civil Service Act of 1908 came into force.

Mr. MARCIL: Is any provision made for the comparatively large number of officials who were not required to be qualified before the coming into force of the Act?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend will observe that this section refers not only to those who have passed the qualifying examination, but also to those appointed under sections 37 and 40 of the Civil Service Act, by reason of technical knowledge or some special skill which they possessed.

Mr. MARCIL: I have received a number of communications the substance of which I might give for the benefit of the minister. One of the officials suggests that the annual increase of from $50 to $100 might also apply to those employees who have been at the maximum of subdivision B of the Second Division for not less than three years. This amendment would not in any way interfere with the existing minimum and maximum salaries of the Second Division, but would have the effect of promoting these employees into subdivision A of the Second Division.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: We gave that matter very special consideration and came to the conclusion that as we were giving special advantages to the Third Division by increasing the maximum to $1,300, that would be sufficient to meet the case. For instance, any one in the Third Division who has attained the maximum of $1,200 may now go up to $1,300. If he merited it, he would receive the annual statutory increase until that figure was reached. Then, if he passed the Civil Service examination, he would be eligible for appointment to the Second Division.

Mr. MARCIL: Those who complain are those who have reached the maximum of $1,600 and have been at that figure for some years. Nothing is done for them, and they ask that they should be promoted to subdivision A of the Second Division. Some men have been at the maximum of $1,600 for four or five years, while the cost of living has been going up all the time.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think my hon. friend must be talking about the Second Division.

Mr. MARCIL: Yes, the man who is getting $1,600.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: He would have to wait until he was promoted. He is eligible for promotion to Subdivision A without passing an examination. It is a question for the departmental head to consider in each case. The civil servant is not debarred from advancement by inability to take the examination, because when he advances to the Second Division no further examinations are necessary.

Mr. MARCIL: Sir George Murray in his report recommended that the Third Division should be divided into three subdivisions, but no effect is given to that recommendation. I thought it my duty to bring these matters to the attention of the minister. I am probably better known to some of the officials than are many other members, and I suppose that is why I have been asked to make these representations on their behalf. These people find that they have remained without promotion for seven or eight years, and that, notwithstanding the increased cost of living, nothing whatever has been done for them. Though they have reached the maximum of their class, and may have been at that point for four or five years or more, they get an increase of only $100, and, unless promoted by departmental action, they get nothing more.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: This legislation is merely to exempt an official from taking the examination. It has nothing to do with giving him promotion. Whether he is promoted or not would depend upon his ability, and upon his chief recognizing that ability. We are dealing, in this section, only with those who qualified for the service prior to 1908, but have not qualified for promotion under the existing legislation.

Mr. MARCIL: I am sure that the hon. minister does not wish to do injustice to any civil servant, but there have been cases in which civil servants have been recommended for promotion by the chief of the branch, and that recommendation has been set aside by higher authority. There is another point to which I might call attention while I am on the subject. Under the law a civil servant, after he has been a certain number of years in the service, may be superannuated. But, as to the time when he shall be superannuated he is not given a hearing, nor has he any appeal. One of the oldest employees of the House of Commons, one who, when I was Speaker, was one of the ablest of the staff, learned on the street one day, after forty years of service, that he had been superannuated, though his fellow-members of the staff knew that he was just as competent for his duties then as he had been at any time before. I understand that under the rules of the Indian Civil Service, a civil servant who is superannuated has the right to appeal. A provision of that kind, if introduced into our law, would, apply no matter which party happened to be in power. I think that a man who has been a long time in the service should have a protection of that kind. The minister should consider whether this would not be a fair amendment to make.

Section agreed to.

On section 3:

3. Sections twenty-nine and thirty and subsection one of section thirty-two of the said Act are repealed, and the following are substituted therefor:—

"29. In the second division the minimum and maximum salaries shall be as follows:

In subdivision A, $1,600 to $2,100;

In subdivision B, $1,000 to $1,600.

"30. In the third division the minimum and maximum salaries shall be as follows:

In subdivision A, $1,000 to $1,300;

In subdivision B, $600 to $1,000.

"32. (1) The minimum and maximum salaries for the positions of messenger, porter, sorter and packer, and for such other positions in the lower grades as are determined by the Governor in Council, shall be $600 and $1,000 respectively, and, unless the official record to be kept as hereinafter provided shows him to be undeserving thereof, there may be given to every person holding such a position an annual increase of fifty dollars until the maximum is reached."

Mr. BOULAY: I would urge the minister to consider paying higher salaries to those civil servants who are in the Third Division.

If salaries from $1,600 to $2,100 are paid to those in the Second Division on the ground that the amount is needed for the support of their families, I do not see why the man who belongs to the Third Division, and who may have the same family responsibilities, should be paid so little. In view of the high cost of living, I do not see why those in Subdivision A of the Third Division should not be paid from $1,000 to $1,500, and those in Subdivision B from $600 to $1,200, with an increase of $100 a year in either case. I am told that those in the Third Division sometimes have qualifications equal with those in the Second Division, and are even doing work of equal importance. If there are any men who need increases in order to support their families certainly they must be those who now are lowest in the Civil Service. A salary of $600, or $700, or $800 for a man—I do not say for a woman, because I am against high salaries for women, though there are many in this House who disagree with me on that point, but I still believe that the salaries paid to women should not increase beyond a certain amount—any such salary for a man with a family to support is certainly not enough. I think the minister should be willing to increase the salaries to the figures I have stated, and I believe that such an amendment of the Bill should appeal to the sense of fairness of honourable members of this House.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The hon. gentleman (Mr. Boulay) will observe that we are fixing the minimum and maximum of the grades. There is nothing to prevent a promotion from Subdivision B to Subdivision A, provided the necessary recommendation is made and agreed to by the minister and the Government. Sir George Murray recommended that the Third Division should be divided into three subdivisions. But here there are only two. In all offices it is customary to have the junior clerks and those who do the less skilled work paid at a less figure than those who are trained and who do more expert work. That is the reason for the subdivision of the division into A and B, with the differences in scale as shown in the Bill.

It is to be pointed out that we get in the service every year a number of untrained, or practically untrained, young women, or maybe young men, who are not really worth more than $500 or $600 a year to begin with. If they went into a financial or commercial office outside of the Civil Service, they would not receive more than that amount to start with, in fact, in financial offices, they start young clerks at a less amount than $600 per annum. Nevertheless, on account of the conditions which have prevailed, especially since the outbreak of the war, we have thought that we should give an increase especially in the lower grades of the service, that is to say, in the third division, and we have raised the minimum from $500 to $600 in that division and also in respect to messengers, packers and sorters. But, we have gone farther than that. We have provided that every one in these two classes may be granted an increase for the present fiscal year of $100; that is to say a messenger or clerk in the Third Division who is now getting $500 a year would be advanced to $600 a year, which is the minimum in each of the classes now, and in addition he would receive this year $100, if worthy of it, and the statutory increase as well. In some cases there will be an advance from $500 for the fiscal year to $750, which is a very substantial increase, being fifty per cent over the amount at present paid. I am inclined to think that the measure deals fairly and justly with the situation which my hon. friend has in view, namely, the high cost of living and its bearing upon the salaries especially of the lower grades up to $1,000. We were more interested in these than in those above $1,000 because the pinch comes in respect to the lower grades. On the whole, I am hopeful that this will meet the conditions that exist to-day fairly satisfactorily.

Mr. BOULAY: Why not put it up to $1,200? I see no reason why, because every member of this House knows that under conditions which are prevailing to-day, it is impossible for a man to support a family on less than $1,000 a year.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Does my hon. friend suggest that instead of the minimum of $600 we should fix the minimum at $1,000.

Mr. BOULAY: No, it would be all right to start at $600 but you should increase it by $100 a year and the increase should be made statutory and not subject to the recommendation of the deputy minister or the chief of a branch because sometimes the poor fellows may not get it at all. Then, as it is now, they would only increase at the rate of $50 a year. If they had the expectation of being able to go to $1,200, it would encourage them to stay in the service and perform their duties faithfully. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance said that those in the Third Division were not as highly qualified as those in the Second Division. If I am not mistaken men require to be well qualified before they are admitted to the Third Division. I see by an examination paper set for admission to the third division that some very hard questions are put and it requires considerable ability to pass the examination for admission to this division. Those who are admitted are pretty well qualified to do any kind of work in the department. It may be that, with regard to some kinds of work, they may require a certain amount of practice and instruction before they become proficient, but on the whole they must have more than ordinary qualifications to secure admission to this division. I think it would be nothing but fair to hold out to them the hope that they might go to $1,200 by increases of $100 yearly without reference to the recommendation of the deputy head or head of the branch. If they are subjected to this condition there may be half of them left aside each year, if the chief of the branch does not want them increased but they will have to support their families and live just the same as those who have been fortunate enough to secure an increase in their salaries.

Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend from Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) has stated very clearly the case for the lower grades in the Inside Service and I can only second his remarks. As regards the salaries of $500 or $600 paid to messengers in the Inside Service, I would appeal to my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) to seriously consider the position of these men. I have received a batch of letters from mostly all the messengers in Ottawa and I believe they present a fair case. Really, with the cost of living as it is in Ottawa to-day, a man having a family of two or three children cannot possibly face the conditions of life. I have here some figures which were published in one of the papers of this city as to the increase in the cost of living showing how the family budget has soared within the past four years. This statement is based on statistics collected by the Department of Labour and it is based on the average prices in about sixty cities in Canada. In April, 1914, the family budget was $7.51 per week while in April of this year it had risen to $10.77 and with the addition of coal, wood, lighting and rent, the total reached $17.34 per week. The price of commodities has soared to that figure. Everybody in this House knows that. Therefore, as His Majesty's Government must be carried on, the Government, without being unduly generous, should at least be fairly liberal. I am not one of those who say that because a man is in the Civil Service, having chosen to enter it, he should receive privileged treatment. But, as you are carrying on His Majesty's Government, it is only natural to expect that you will deal fairly and generously with the employees of the Government. With reference to this question of the salaries in the Inside Service, I appeal on behalf of the man who is at the foot of the ladder; I am not speaking for those in the higher grades; they can well take care of themselves. Some years ago my hon. friend the Minister of Finance introduced, or promised to introduce, a Bill to deal with the Civil Service and I told him that he should not confine himself to the Inside Service but that he should have some regard to the Outside Service. The host of Government employees who have congregated in the city of Ottawa and who are employed in the large public buildings should not alone be considered. You have in every city, town and hamlet of the Dominion faithful employees of His Majesty's Government. I must give due credit to the hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Reid) for, in his recent interview with representatives of labour, promising to deal generously with the employees of his department in the Outside Service and I think he has dealt with them quite generously and liberally. I also approve of his action in promising that he would give preference to returned soldiers.

I take the Post Office Department because I am more familiar with that department than with any other. The misfortune of the Post Office Department since 1911 has been that its principal officer, the Postmaster General, has been so often changed that the poor sorters and the poor railway mail clerks have been completely forgotten. Let us hope that in the near future there will be more permanency in that department, and that its employees will be looked after in a proper way. I again appeal to my hon. friend, and I say to him that he should not confine his efforts to deal fairly with the Civil Service to the Inside Service only, but should extend those efforts to the Outside Civil Service.

Let me read the petition which undoubtedly was sent to other members of the House by the railway mail clerks who have been clamouring for the last five or six years for an increase of salary. This memorial was sent to my hon. friend the ex-

Secretary of State, the Hon. Mr. Patenaude. It was addressed to him as Postmaster General, as he was simply locum tenens in the Post Office Department. It is dated April 25 and is as follows:

"Hon. E. L. Patenaude,
Postmaster General, Ottawa.

Honourable Sir,—

At your request, we are here representative of the Railway Mail Clerks operating railway postal routes east of Sudbury, nine divisions, totalling approximately eight hundred clerks, to lay before you our claims to have the Provisional Allowance, an allowance long enjoyed by our western brethren, extended to the clerks of the eastern divisions.

The necessity of immediate assistance is indeed pressing, owing to the fact that living conditions have increased so much in the past few years, so much that we who are of fixed salaries find them inadequate to support us in comfort, indeed if present conditions continue living will fast become burdensome. All wage-earners in commercial life have had their salaries adjusted from time to time to meet these conditions. In proof I will quote you a few necessities taken from the February issue of the Labour Gazette, published by the Department of Labour for the provinces of Eastern Canada. Food stuffs have increased since 1910 51 per cent., light and fuel 21 per cent., clothing 80 per cent., hotels and restaurants 75 per cent.

We feel that in asking for the Provisional Allowance we are not asking for an increase in salary. The clerks of the western divisions have enjoyed this allowance for over thirty years, owing to the excess cost of living over the east. Conditions have changed in the past few years, until at the present time living conditions are on a parity throughout the Dominion.

We feel that we are now $300 behind our brother clerks of the Post Office staff. In 1914 a Bill passed the Commons and Senate raising the Post Office Clerks' annual increment from $50 to $100, after $800 had been reached. A similar Bill unanimously passed the Commons granting Railway Mail Clerks the same consideration. This Bill, unfortunately for us, was rejected by the Senate owing to its being connected with legislation of a contentious nature. The same standard of education is required to enter either branch of the service and it is beyond our powers to imagine why we, who labour longer and under more trying circumstances, are expected to perform our daily duties for so much less remuneration.

In view of these several facts we respectfully ask that the Provisional Allowance of $15 per month be extended to the Railway Mail Clerks who are not at the present time enjoying this consideration; that Bill No. 147 of May 4th, 1914, to amend the Post Office Act be re-introduced and that it be made retroactive; namely that the annual increase to Railway Mail Clerks be $100 instead of $50, and that the maximum salary be made $1,600. This last clause to be added to the Bill in order that all clerks be benefited.

We have the honour to be, Sir,
Your obedient servants,
The Committee."

This is the case as presented by the railway mail clerks. They ask, first, that the provisional allowance which is granted to the railway clerks in the western divisions be made applicable also to the eastern divisions, and I think that they are absolutely justified in this request. Second, they ask that the Bill giving them a better emolument, which was introduced in 1914, and which was withdrawn because it was connected with something of a contentious nature to which the Senate objected, be re-enacted, with a further suggestion that a clause be added giving a maximum salary of $1,600. The railway mail clerks of Canada perform a most valuable and a most dangerous duty, and as a result of the danger connected with their constant travels from one end of the country to the other during the cold weather of winter, their health is more often impaired than that of the every day officer in any department. The medical men in the House will bear me out in the statement that they are obliged to carry insurance policies, which, of course, everybody should have.

Mr. EDWARDS: At a higher premium.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Of course, yes. For those considerations, I plead with the Minister of Finance to kindly consider the case of the railway mail clerks. Not only the railway mail clerks, but the clerks in the Post Office, the sorters, the letter carriers and the postmasters in the country, are deserving of further consideration. The additional work which is imposed on the mail carriers on account of the extension of rural mail delivery system should also be taken into consideration. I know that this means an additional expenditure, and I generally plead for a reduction in expenditure; but there is a noble expenditure, there is a necessary expenditure, it is expenditure which affects His Majesty's servants. I again ask my hon. friend to enlarge the scope of his Bill and not to restrict it to the Civil Service at Ottawa.

It is a mistake to think that the whole Civil Service is centered here in Ottawa. The Civil Service extends from one end of the country to the other, and I daresay that the outside civil servant in the distant hamlet, or vilage of Canada, is obliged to know more and has to take more responsibility than the man in Ottawa who has at his disposal the advice, the experience, the wisdom of his superior officers. In view of the higher cost of living—let me repeat those figures, they are startling, but they are not less true. Foodstuffs have increased since 1910 by 51 per cent; light and fuel, 21 per cent; clothing, 80 per cent; hotels and restaurants, 75 per cent, surely the Government ought to take into consideration these facts and figures, and act accordingly.

Mr. EDWARDS: I am pleased indeed to express my concurrence in the sentiments uttered by the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux). There is no doubt that at the present time the high cost of living should in fairness be taken into consideration fixing the salaries of those in the Civil Service.

While the farmer has been paying more since the war started for many of the things which are absolutely necessary to the carrying on of his business, he is getting more for his produce. The wage-earner and the labourer have plenty of work at higher wages than formerly. The persons who get no relief are those who receive fixed salaries. Food costs them more than it did before, and they have no other means of providing for their needs than the fixed salary. Consideration should be given to that class of the community. Ottawa is not the only place where foodstuffs are higher than they were before the war, nor is it the only place where men and women are engaged in the Civil Service. I should be the last to say that no consideration should be given to the civil servants in Ottawa. But, applying my remarks to both sides of the House, I think that the reason why more consideration has been and is being given to the Inside Service at Ottawa than to civil servants outside is because several thousand of them in Ottawa have votes and exercise their franchise when elections come on. On the other hand, in a given constituency elsewhere in the Dominion, practically only a few persons who exercise the franchise are engaged in the Civil Service. In all fairness, more consideration should be given to men in the Civil Service, outside of Ottawa.

My hon. friend has referred to the couriers and the country postmasters. Since the inauguration of parcel post, the work of the country postmaster has enormously increased, while his remuneration has not increased proportionately. The burden bears still more heavily upon the couriers, who sign contracts for four years. Four years ago there was no parcel post system. Many of those who had been carrying mail had made a considerable amount of money by carrying parcels at 5, 10 and 15 cents each. In this way they added to their salaries; and no doubt they took that into consideration when they made their tender. Then the system of parcel post was inaugurated, and the couriers are now obliged to carry a much larger number of parcels without any added remuneration. In many cases they have been obliged to use a heavier or larger rig than they formerly used, perhaps using two horses instead of one, thus adding to the expense of carrying on their work without the compensation of increased remuneration. This is absolutely unfair. I brought the matter to the attention of Hon. Mr. Pelletier when he was Postmaster General, and he agreed that prevailing conditions were unfair to the couriers and to the country postmasters. The late Hon. Mr. Casgrain also agreed with me in that respect. Nothing, however, has been done in the matter.

I think that more consideration should be given to the railway mail clerks also; I thoroughly agree with what the member for Rouville has said in that regard. The duties of these officials require them 4 p.m. to work during long hours. Their occupation is considered by the insurance companies to be more or less dangerous, and if they take out insurance they have to pay an extra premium because of the extra risk. These men are not getting the consideration from this Government that they should receive in the matter of their salaries.

The hon. gentleman to my right (Mr. Boulay) has made some remarks with regard to the clerks in the Third Division. Any third class clerk has the right to fit himself for a position in the Second Division. I do not agree with all that my hon. friend has said in regard to these clerks. Opportunities for the advancement of young men and women in our country are plentiful; they need not enter the Civil Service unless they wish. It is in the interest of Canada that men and women who enter the service should take pains thoroughly to qualify themselves for the duties which they are called upon to perform in that service. I am glad that a number of university graduates are entering the service; I would like to see more of them in it. Persons who enter the Third Division should be sufficiently ambitious to fit themselves for the examination of the Second Division and qualify for a higher salary. For this reason I have no fault to find with the salaries set forth in the Bill which apply to this class of the service.

Let me again ask the Government to take into consideration the salaries paid to civil servants outside of Ottawa, and to the claims of the couriers on rural mail routes and of the country postmasters.

Mr. J. A. M. ARMSTRONG: As one who was unfortunate enough to spend three or four years in the outside Civil Service, I wish to associate myself with the hon. gentlemen who have preceded me in asking that the Government give favourable consideration to any requests in the matter of remuneration made by members of the outside Civil Service. I do not say a word against increases in the inside service; I am quite sure that they are well merited, and if I made any suggestion at all it would be that the increases should be greater.

I should like to say a word or two on behalf of the railway mail clerks and of the railway mail service generally. Railway mail clerks carry on a very hazardous work, taking their lives in their hands every day. Their pay is not at all commensurate with the work that they perform. They have to have the knowledge of a postmaster; they have to rely entirely upon themselves, having, as the member for Rouville has pointed out, no superior officer from whom they may obtain direction or assistance. I am not in agreement with certain action taken by a former Postmaster General in connection with the qualifications of railway mail clerks. Under the old order of things, a man had to pass a qualifying examination before receiving his permanent appointment. Hon. Mr. Pelletier changed that, and provided that by passing the preliminary examination a man could be permanently appointed to the railway mail service. He would then get his increases up to $1,000, where he would stop until he passed the qualifying examination. I cannot understand by what process of reasoning one can come to the conclusion that after a man has spent so many years of his life in learning work of that kind, he should stop at the thousand dollar stage until he has learned again many of the things that he forgot after he left the public school.

The hon. member for Frontenac also mentioned the mail carriers, and I would like to say a word or two in their behalf. The whole system of paying mail carriers is wrong, and I would not permit contracts of that kind to be let on tender at all, because there are many cases where a man could be saved from his own foolishness in tendering too low. In any constituency in Canada where the Government throws open a small mail contract for local competition, for some reason or another, many people think that a dollar secured from the Government is worth five dollars from any one else, and they will tender far below a reasonable rate. After they receive a contract, the trouble for the member starts; he is immediately deluged with petitions and requests for more remuneration, but unfortunately the law of the land does not permit the Government to give them that. The mail service of Canada should be standardized and so much per mile allowed according to the nature of the country to be travelled—I am speaking now of land travel per mile—so that every man would know, when he started, how much he was going to receive. In that way he would not be subjected to unreasonable competition by some one who might wish to put in a tender for work about which he knows nothing.

I also wish to say a word on behalf of a branch of the Railway Mail Service, known as the transfer class. I do not know whether this matter has been brought to the attention of the minister or not, but there is a class of men working in the transfer business at salaries that are a disgrace to this country. Any one going to Toronto between six and eleven o'clock at night will find officers of the Post Office Department hauling heavy trucks of mail from one train to another, working like slaves, for a salary of $2 a day. No man can possibly live on such a wage, and it is the duty of the Government, as a matter of ordinary humanity, apart altogether from the question of common sense, to see that that branch receive a reasonable wage.

Mr. MARCIL: On several occasions deputations of mail carriers in Montreal have waited on me at my residence and have laid before me their grievances and copies of petitions sent to the minister in charge of that department pleading for an increase in salary. The case of the mail carriers, of the hardships they are suffering and of the faithful service they give, are well known to every hon. member. In this instance the petition which I received was similar to the one which was forwarded by their confrères in the city of Toronto with whom they were working in harmony. I promised these men I would say a word in their favour, and I have done so now.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: This is not the only action which the Government is taking or purposes taking with reference to the Civil Service. I explained the other day that this was an amendment to the Civil Service Act which relates to the Inside Service at Ottawa, which, for some reason, comes so far as salaries are concerned under the supervision of my department. Take the case of contracts referred to by the hon. members for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) and for North York (Mr. J. A. M. Armstrong). Those can be dealt with without any change in the existing legislation if, in the estimation of the minister, it is proper for them to be dealt with, and most of the cases which have been drawn to our attention this afternoon in connection with the Outside Service can be dealt with without any change in existing legislation. When the Bill was before the House recently I stated that in the Supplementary Estimates provision would be made for whatever increases were regarded as necessary by the ministers of the several departments in connection with the Outside Service. I drew to the attention of the House that to-day, without any further legislation the Minister of Customs, to take one case, can and does frequently recommend to the Treasury Board an increase of fifty dollars or $100 per year in the case of officials in his department outside of the city of Ottawa, that is to say, in the Outside Service. It is similarly proper for the Postmaster General to provide in his Estimates a lump sum which would be available for the purpose of granting certain increases in his department in the Outside Service. Similarly with regard to the Outside Service of the Department of Inland Revenue, and also with regard to the Outside Service of the Department of the Interior or the Department of Public Works. All that this legislation does is to amend the Civil Service Act relating to the Inside Service. As I say, it is not the only action which the Government has taken, is taking or purposes taking with respect to the Service as a whole. The reason why I am not attempting to deal with all those is because legislation is not necessary for the most part, and because they are under the jurisdiction of other ministers. Many of the observations which have been made this afternoon, and which, of course, are quite relevant to the discussion of this Bill—I find no fault in that regard—might be made more usefully when the Estimates of the ministers in question are under consideration in this House. Then the ministers who are immediately connected will have the views of the members and can take in their Supplementary Estimates such action as may be necessary to meet the situation drawn to their attention.

Mr. LALOR: Although, as the Minister of Finance has stated, that probably another time than the present would be more opportune for discussing this matter, I cannot allow this opportunity to pass without mentioning one class of civil servants with whom I am particularly well acquainted. I refer to the officers of the border at Fort Erie, Bridgeburg, and Niagara Falls. The salaries that those men are receiving are a disgrace. The immigration officers on the trains, a splendid class of fellows, who put in long hours, intelligent civil servants and good citizens, are working on a salary of $800 to $850 a year and maintaining their families at the places I have mentioned, where the cost of living is probably higher than in any other part of Canada. I think in the Immigration Department the salary of $800 or $850 a year is permanent without any increase, and these men with the present high cost of living and high rent are having a hard task in trying to maintain their families, and they should receive more money. I am glad the Minister of Customs is in his seat, and I trust he may remember the officers of his department at the boundary line. I believe there is a general feeling on both sides of the House that these civil servants should receive higher salaries than they are receiving at the present time. We hear talk of coalition in Canada at this time. This is a case on which we should have coalition; we should all agree that there be no criticism in future as to increased expenditure for salaries in the departments, and that we should give these men higher salaries in order that they may live in comfort.

Mr. VERVILLE: Every one admits that it is necessary that salaries should be increased because the cost of living is increasing. It matters very little how much you give a man to live on; the question is how much he can buy with that money. The Minister of Finance should take steps to check the present increase in the cost of living, and then perhaps the salaries he may give some of the officials will be worth while. Otherwise, in two or three months from now those increases that he may grant will make no difference to the recipients, because the rise in prices will be greater than the increase in salary. The remedy, I believe, lies in preventing an increase in the cost of living, and I would ask the minister to look at that end of the line as well as increasing the salaries. He should certainly take into account the high cost of living when providing for the salary increases.

Mr. DEVLIN: There is considerable anxiety on the part of a number of employees of the Inside Service relative to subsection 30. It will not benefit, for instance, those who have not passed any qualifying examination, and it appears there are quite a number of employees in this class. Perhaps the minister would make a statement clearing the matter up.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I stated some time ago in reply to my hon. friend from Bonaventure that the maximum of the Third Division has been increased by $100. Any employee in that class, if thought worthy of an increase, can go up to $1,300 by annual increases of $50.

Mr. DEVLIN: Even if he has not passed any qualifying examination?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes, provided he is in that division. In this Act we are not exempting from qualification those who had not passed a qualifying examination previous to the Act of 1908, or were not otherwise qualified under the legislation of that day. We have thought it proper, however, to exempt from the necessity of taking an academic examination those who were qualified under the Civil Service Act of 1908. We did not feel warranted in going further than that. If there are any in the Third Division who were in that division prior to the coming into force of the present Act, and who have not passed the qualifying examination or were not otherwise qualified under the legislation of that day, the only way in which they can qualify for promotion to the Second Division is by taking the examination provided for under the existing Civil Service Act, or by being specially named in the Estimates. I could imagine a situation—I have no particular case in view—in which it might be impossible for some excellent clerk to pass the examination qualifying him for the Second Division, and where it might be proper for the minister to name him in the Estimates; in other words, to place him in the Second Division by naming him. In that case clerk would not have to pass an academic examination. Objections might perhaps be urged to that course. I have no particular case in mind, but it seems to me there might possibly be cases in which this might fairly be done.

Mr. DEVLIN: I have no doubt the minister is aware that a number of returned soldiers are greatly concerned as to the exact position they would occupy in the service if they were taken into it. Would a returned soldier who had previously been in the Civil Service, and who had been on active service at the front for two years, be put at the minimum of his class?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Speaking from memory, I think he would be subject to the present Civil Service Act; there may be an Order in Council relating to the matter, but I do not recall it at the present time. Of course, it would be open to the minister to name such an official at a certain salary, but I do not see how the soldier could be exempt from the provisions of the Civil Service Act relating to entrance to the service, unless he was specially named. If the returned soldier were qualified to enter the Second Division he could enter it, of course; but if he was not qualified I should say that he would start at the minimum provided by the existing legislation. I am not quite positive about that, because some Orders in Council have been passed relating to returned soldiers, but that is my opinion offhand.

Mr. DEVLIN: There is a feeling among the returned soldiers that the men who have been on active service at the front for two years should be allowed the yearly increase given to the men at home. For instance, if a soldier had spent two years at the front and in the ordinary course of events would have received a yearly increase of $50, he should be on the same footing with those who have remained at home and should be given an increase of $100.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: I am in sympathy with practically everything that has been said in connection with this Bill. As I understand it, though there may be members of the Outside Service in the city of Ottawa, the bulk of the Outside Service are outside of this city.

Mr. LEMIEUX: There are outside civil servants in the city of Ottawa; for instance, officers in the Post Office and the Customs Departments.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: Yes, but when speaking of the Outside Service we are thinking more of those outside the city of Ottawa. It was of these employees that the hon. member for Frontenac was speaking, when he said, whether rightly or wrongly, that not so many votes were affected. Personally, I think the Outside Service outside the city of Ottawa should receive a little more attention than the Outside or Inside Service in the city of Ottawa. I have been going around the different departments for a good many years, and what I am going to say does not apply merely to this Government, because I was a member of the House for a long time during the late Administration. There is no doubt in my mind that the Inside Service at Ottawa is over-manned. There are undoubtedly men and women clerks in the different departments at Ottawa who are overworked and have to return to the office in the evening; they are not being paid the salary they should receive. I have always taken the ground that any man who works, whether he be labourer or clerk, should receive good wages; that has been a principle with me in my own business. But I do think that this matter of getting into the different departments in the city of Ottawa is overdone. There are boys and girls here who are in the service rather for recreation and to have a little pocket money—and in saying that I think I know exactly what I am talking about. Now, I want it clearly understood that I am not including in my remarks any one who is necessary to the efficiency of the service, but it is a very nice thing to be in the service and get your pay every month. I am confident that if there were a weeding out of those who watch for five o'clock to come, there would be quite a reduction in the Inside Service here.

Now, I wish to refer to the Minister of Customs (Mr. Reid). He is a good fellow. In my constituency I have about six or seven customs officers. We have to have them. They get $800 a year. Nearly every one of them has no other source of income and is expected to live on that $800. It is impossible; it cannot be done. Yet I have been very unsuccessful in my applications to the Minister of Customs to have the salaries of these men increased. They should be increased. It may be said that in some cases these officers are not necessary. That may be true in some towns; but when there are only six customs officers in a constituency as large as mine, I do not think the service can be said to be overmanned. These men have been paid $800 a year as long as I have known anything about it, and there has been no change in spite of the increased cost of living.

Now, I wish to say a word about the carriers of the rural mail. In Ontario and Quebec, and also I presume, in the Maritime Provinces, rural mail has been a success. I am a great advocate of the rural mail system. What we are trying to do as representatives of the people is to make the country a place in which people will wish to dwell. We have been talking for many years about "back to the farm," and I am a great believer in that doctrine; the farm is a good place, and it is our duty to make the farm as attractive as possible. There are several things that have aided very much in making country life more attractive. One is the telephone, and another is the rural mail. People to-day, especially in these stirring times, are intensely interested in getting a daily paper and in getting the mail. But what has been my experience in trying to establish rural mail routes? I have established very few. Why? The farmers are quite willing to supply the boxes—that is a matter of about $4 each and it is about all they are asked to supply. Then comes the question of carrying the mail, and when it comes to that I find myself up against the real thing. I cannot get men to take that position—and that is remarkable enough, when you think of it; you can't get men to take a Government job.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Even with tenders?

Mr. SCHAFFNER: With tenders, or without tenders. I do not know the exact figure, but there is a certain percentage given to the carriers in the western provinces in addition to what is paid in the provinces that are more thickly settled. But I cannot get men to carry the mail throughout the country; and that is why there are in my constituency so few rural mail routes. Some one suggested to-day what I thought was a good idea, that this should not be by tender, but that a proper scale should be fixed. In eastern Canada your dwellings are more along certain lines and are close together, but where, as in my constituency, you have men living on a half-section or a quarter-section, the rural mail delivery is more difficult.

So, there are two classes of men in my constituency to whom the Government is not paying living wages to-day; one class is made up of the customs officers, and the other of the man carrying the rural mail. I do not know whether this is the right time under the rules for this discussion, but it is a good time for me to get in my kick about these people. I want the Government to take these men into consideration and give them what they deserve.

Mr. FRIPP: My attention has been called to what appears to be an injustice under this measure to a certain class in the Third Division. The committee is aware that the object of the legislation is to improve the situation of those in the lower grades, and to give them a living wage. When the Bill was under consideration the other day, I was under the impression, and I think the committee was also, that the majority in the Third Division would be benefited by section 3. But the benefits of that section are confined entirely to those who have passed the qualifying examination before 1908. I am astonished to find that there are 450 men in the Third Division who were not called upon to pass the qualifying examination, and who will be outside the scope of this Bill. They have been in their several departments for nine years or more, and are just as well qualified for departmental work as those who have passed the qualifying examination. It seems to me we ought to make all the men in the Third Division who are certified to by the deputy minister eligible for advancement to the Second Division, and not confine it to those who had passed the qualifying examination. Otherwise these men, many of whom are married, will be left without any redress under the provisions of the Bill. There is a further class in the Third Division to which I wish to refer. Under section 4 of the Bill any person in receipt of a salary of less than $1,000 may be given an increase of $100 in order to bring him up to $1,000. I am told that there are 392 men in the Third Division who will not benefit by this provision, because they are receiving between $1,000 and $1,200. It does seem to me that less than $1,200 a year for these men, ninety per cent of whom are married, is absolutely inadequate for their livelihood under present conditions. I would like to have this section include men who are in receipt of salaries up to $1,200, thus giving them the additional $100 from 1st April last. These are two objections to the Bill brought to my notice which I think are worthy of being brought to the attention of the committee before the Bill is passed.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: I have no desire that any civil servant in Ottawa should receive less than a living wage. I have had reason to ascertain the exact number in the service of the Crown in Ottawa, and I find that that number is nearly 12,000, and the aggregate annual pay nearly $12,000,000. I have no hesitation in saying that the service here could be reduced by ten per cent and be much more efficient that it is now. This saving of a million and a half a year to this country, which is now paid to those who render no efficeint service to the state, would produce results, I think, that are very much to be desired.

There are not only too many civil servants in the employ of the Crown in Ottawa but there are too many inefficient civil servants in the employ of the Crown. There are too many efficient civil servants in the employ of the Crown outside of Ottawa who are being insufficiently paid. In the city in which I live, and I am not accustomed to taking that as an example, but it illustrates the conditions that prevail in western Canada; I found last year a graduate of Queen's University, a woman who had graduated in Arts with honours who was in the service of the Crown receiving the magnificent sum of $55 per month in one of the public departments. There are many men and women in western Canada receiving $50, $55, $60 or $70 per month. I had a letter to-day from a letter carrier who, with his wife and family, is endeavouring to keep the wolf from the door on the magnificent sum of $65 a month. I had another communication yesterday morning from a soldier who has returned from the present war wounded and who is now in the service of the Crown receiving $75 per month and supporting himself, his wife and family. On every occasion on which I bring these matters to the attention of the responsible ministers, they always point out that we are in the midst of a war, that the Minister of Finance, who is very much burdened with the necessity of providing money to carry on this war, cannot provide money to meet the demands—the reasonable demands—of the servants of the Crown. If you can find money to increase the pay of the 12,000 civil servants in the city of Ottawa—all of whom will not receive increases of pay—but if you can find money to pay them a living wage, then I submit that the people who are out in the country living under circumstances much more difficult, where it is more expensive, must be heard and their case must be dealt with. This is what I submit to my hon. friend the Minister of Finance. If he can find money for those who are included in this measure, I submit that he can find money for the servants employed in the Department of the Interior. If he can find more money to be paid to the members of the Inside Service who are being dealt with here, he can find money to pay the servants in the Department of Customs and the Post Office Department throughout the country and the money can be found by taking the Civil Service in this city, putting it upon an efficient basis, which means that it can be cut down ten per cent, thereby increasing its efficiency and proficiency, and the money thus saved can be used to pay a living wage to those who are working for $50 and $55 per month. That is my opinion and it sets forth what I believe to be the duty of the Government at this moment. I know of nothing that is so much calculated to bring the Government into disrepute, to make for bitterness and strife, to create a feeling of animosity against constituted authority and the creation of those socialistic tendencies that are manifesting themselves in the state in an alarming manner, than the absolutely inadequate salaries that are being paid to the servants of the Crown outside of this city. I say that after a careful study of the situation and what I have learned in relation to Calgary applies with equal force to other places. I see my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) in his place now. I was in Edmonton not long since and a number of gentlemen connected with the service of the letter carriers and mail clerks spoke to me and asked me if I would lend my influence, such as it was, in support of my hon. friend from Edomonton in an effort to increase the pay of these men. That is the position as I understood it.

Further, it is my view that in the West we have a peculiar grievance in relation to the pay of the members of the Civil Service. The cost of living, according to the statement which my hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) read, has increased fifty per cent over what it was a few years ago. In the West there is an increase of more than that, and no man with a wife and family in these times can pay rent, pay for the cost of food, educate his children and decently clothe them on $55 a month. He cannot do it; it is impossible to do it, and I do ask my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, who has brought in this Bill that affects only the Civil Service in Ottawa, to remember those less fortunate servants of the Crown who are serving in the capacity of clerks in the custom house, mail sorters or letter carriers, or servants of the Crown in great departments like the Department of the Interior, or in outside work, as some of them are, carrying the mails in country districts, and in country post offices. I would further remind him that after all a living wage for every man and woman who serves the State is, in the judgment of those who have formed an opinion from a careful investigation of the subject, one of the surest and best indications of a really advanced state. There can be no decent civilization in the state if men and women are struggling to keep body and soul together, not knowing where the next day's meal is coming from while thinking for the whole people at only $50 or $60 a month. It is impossible. Think of that young lady who gave four years of her life to acquiring an academic education and taking honours at Queen's University working in the Department of the Interior at Calgary for $55 a month. Under these circumstances what inducement is there for anybody to get an education in the State? It is perfectly absurd.

Another essential is I think that men and women should be treated on an equality in relation to the pay they get, having regard to the service they render. A difficulty that is often met with is that the pay is based on the number of years of service without any regard whatever to efficiency. I find that a man, having worked twelve years in the service, gets a salary that is based upon annual increases, while the man who is giving twice as much service to the State is getting only $600 or $700. There must be payment of salaries on the basis of real merit and work. What commercial institution keeps a man in its employ and pays him a salary because he has been so many years in its service without regard to his work or to what he is worth to that institution? Nobody does that. Would my hon. friend the Minister of Finance when he was manager of the National Trust Company, keep a clerk in his employ, pay him $1,000 a year and increase his pay annually by $50 or $100 altogether regardless of his efficiency while another man who had come into the service and who was of equal ability would only get $700 or $800? I cannot believe that he would. Then, it should not be done in Ottawa any more than in any other place. My hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) quite properly pointed out the reason why. It is important, even in times of war, that we should take stock of the situation, and taking stock of the situation the Minister of Finance and his colleagues should discuss the whole matter, make an adequate survey of the situation and determine the number of men and women that might be dropped from the service because they are inefficient. That is suggestion number one. If he determines how he can cut down the number of people who are working for the Crown because of inefficiency, he can then determine to what extent he can increase.

the salaries of those who remain having regard to their efficiency and the work they are doing.

I want to tell this House something that was done in this country during the last six months. In a great department in the public service men and women were working together. They were all being paid the same amount—$60 per month. The head of the department said: "I am not satisfied that these people are all worth the same money; therefore, I propose to establish a merit system and I will fix, first of all, what I regard as the minimum amount of work and then I will provide that at the end of the month for an increase in the salaries of my employees based upon the measure of work they have done during the month and the accuracy with which they have done it. Well, the result was that two or three of the employees are still getting the minimum pay but the most of them stimulated by the desire to increase their pay, have shown such proficiency that they are now getting as much as $10 per month more than they were getting at the start. Why cannot that be done in the public service? How do railways deal with their men? They do not pay two men the same salary because they may be working at a particular job. They deal with them on the basis of merit, and I do this afternoon ask the Minister of Finance and his colleagues once more to remember the men and women who live outside of Ottawa and who find themselves dependent upon the salary or wage that the father earns, a wage which is wholly inadequate at this time to keep body and soul together and to clothe the children so that they may attend school in town, village, hamlet or remote country. This state even in war can do nothing better to show that, after all, our every day civilization is in keeping with that for which our men are striving overseas, than by seeing that those who serve the state in a civil capacity are paid a reasonable wage for the work they render to the State, and which, in its way, although not as important, is just as essential as the military service given by our men overseas.

Mr. NICKLE: I desire to add my plea to that of the hon. member for Calgary and the other hon. gentlemen who have spoken in reference to the inadequate pay given to the civil servants outside of the city of Ottawa. I am not given to discussing these questions from the point of view purely of my own riding, but there have been for years very large classes of civil servants in my riding, employees of the Penitentiary, the Customs, the Inland Revenue, and the Post Office Departments. I would direct the attention of the Minister of Finance to the fact that by an Order in Council passed some little time ago it was represented that the Government was desirous that returned soldiers should be given a preference when making appointments to vacancies that may occur in the Civil Service. Two weeks ago when I was home, a temporary employee waited on me and told me that he was receiving the munificent sum of $2 a day to maintain himself, his wife and child. With tears in his eyes he told me that he could not keep body and soul together. In the Kingston penitentiary the guards or keepers get, I think, $900 a year. My good friend from Calgary (Mr. R. B. Bennett) has drawn attention to the fact that members of the Outside Service in the West cannot exist on the remuneration they are receiving. I would direct his attention to the fact that the men receive $100 a year more than in the East for similar service in the penitentiaries branch on the ground that it costs more to live in the West than in the East. But if my good friend will study the statistics showing what it costs to live in Ontario to-day as compared with the West, he will find that the cost of living in most of the cities in Ontario has increased more rapidly than it has in the West, so that to-day in Ontario living costs quite as much as, if not more than, in the West. These men connected with the penitentiaries have positions of great responsibility and trust. We expect them to be honest; we desire them to keep from trafficking with the convicts. But how can you expect adequate service from men who are not being paid sufficient to keep body and soul together? I know that some of these men are going behind in their family housekeeping expenses at the rate of from $5 to $15 a month, without taking into account what it costs to clothe their families and to pay medical expenses. What is true as to the officials of the penitentaries is equally true as to the officials in the other departments of Government. I urge upon the Government, and particularly upon the Minister of Finance, that if they can find money to increase the remuneration of those in the Inside Service in Ottawa they should also remember those in the Service outside of Ottawa who are equally entitled to consideration. If returned soldiers who may be appointed to these positions are to obtain adequate remuneration, the minister must find some way to meet the situation, or the public service will be neglected and people will have to find a fresh outlet in civil life for their activities.

Mr. BOULAY: I have listened carefully to the remarks that have been made, and I do not want to annoy the Minister of Finance by my remarks.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Go ahead, I am glad to hear you.

Mr. BOULAY: Of course this may not be exactly the right time to talk about the Outside Service because later there may be some provision, as the minister explained, for that class of employees. I concur in the remarks of those who have spoken in favour of that class. It is certain that they are not paid salaries commensurate with the present high cost of living. I wish particularly to insist upon better treatment of those who are in the lower grades of the Inside Service, particularly the Third Division, subdivision B. I am not of the opinion of my hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) when he says it is very easy for a man of that class to qualify and pass from the Third Division to the Second Division after a certain number of years. I have been all my life a very good scholar, and I think he has been also, yet he would be in great trouble to pass an examination of that kind, and I also——

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Hear, hear.

Mr. BOULAY: —and go into the Second Class of the Civil Service. When a man has been in the Third Class of the Civil Service and is over thirty years of age, he is in no position to go to work and pursue a new course of study to fit himself for the qualifying examination. So if a man is to spend all his life in Subdivision B of the Third Class I feel that the Government should see its way clear to give him a sufficient wage to enable him to support himself and his family. I know men in Ottawa, married men, who are getting $650 a year, and surely they cannot make both ends meet. Some of them tell me that every year they have to borrow. I know these men personally. I know that they do not spend one cent needlessly or extravagantly; there is no waste in their households; nothing is spent in liquor, and yet when they come to the end of the year they are obliged to borrow money. These men are the class whom we must carefully look after. I do not want to say anything against the high-class people who are paid high salaries, they are paid enough; they look out for themselves. But I think that the Government and the Minister of Finance should raise the maximum salary in Subdivision B of the Third Class to $1,200 and give an increase of $100 a year without obliging men to go before the Governor in Council to get it, sometimes to see it refused in case it does not suit the deputy head or the chief of the branch to recommend the increase. These men are worth something or they are worth nothing. If they are no good let us drop them from the service right from the start; but those who are good should be well paid.

Mr. CHABOT: I think that the Bill to amend the Civil Service Act now being considered in committee is a fairly generous one. I think that the Minister of Finance is entitled to a great deal of credit for the time and care he has taken with it, especially at this time, when his parliamentary and his national duties must be both numerous and onerous. Speaking for the Civil Service of Ottawa, I think I can say without much exaggeration that it is composed of men and women who are equal to the tasks which they have to perform. They are both energetic and conscientious, and willing to do their duty to the best of their ability. I will admit that there may be cases of inefficiency, but on the whole the Civil Service of Canada, and particularly of Ottawa, is one of which this country has no reason to feel ashamed. I desire to say that what is especially gratifying to me in this Act is the fact that the academic examination prescribed under the Act of 1908 as to qualifying one for promotion from the Third to the Second Division has been done away with, because I always looked upon that examination as a hardship and a cruel measure. I would ask the minister if it would not be possible to repeal in subsection 2 of section 26 the following:—

And who had theretofore passed the qualifying examination.

I think that many men, without passing the qualifying examination, have fitted themselves, by their experience and the acquirement of efficiency in their work, for promotion from the Third to the Second Division. Is it possible to make the statutory increase in the lower grades $100 instead of $50? A man receiving a salary of $600 has to wait eight years before he reaches his maximum. He is, therefore, badly handicapped, especially if the cost of living continues to increase. Is it the intention of the minister to grant the regular statutory increases to men in the service who have gone to the front? I think that when those men come back they should receive any increases which they would have received had they remained in Canada and performed their duties as civil servants. The least we can do for them is not to let them suffer under any discrimination because they have gone to the front to perform the most patriotic work that a Canadian can be engaged in during this crisis in our history.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Those who are on service overseas will receive the statutory increases which they would have received had they remained here. In other words, they will find themselves when they return in at least as good a position as they would have occupied had they remained here and got the advance from year to year. As to whether all those in the Third Division could be rendered eligible for promotion upon the certificate of the deputy, I think not; for the reason that it would practically destroy the basis of the present Civil Service Act. The present Act is based on what is known as the merit system; it provides for examination as qualification for promotion from the Third to the Second Division. The amendment provided in section 2 is designed to remove what was clearly an injustice to those who had passed the qualifying examination under the legislation which existed prior to the coming into effect of the Civil Service Act of 1908. But those who were legislated into that division by the Civil Service Act of 1908 or came in since, came in with their eyes open and subject to all the conditions imposed by that Act, among which was the passing of an examination to qualify for entry into the Second Division. I do not believe it would be wise to destroy the basis of the legislation of 1908. If that legislation is unsound, it should be repealed, but we should not create an anomalous situation by allowing those who passed no examination either before or since the passing of the Act to be eligible for promotion to the Second Division. By this legislation we are giving decided advantages to those at present in the Third Division, and to messengers, sorters and packers. We had it in mind that those receiving less than $1,000 were especially in need of assistance at this time. To those receiving less than $1,000 we are giving a bonus of $100. In addition, the minimum of each of the classes is advanced from $500 to $600, so that a messenger, sorter or packer or a member of the Third Division who is now receiving $500 will be advanced to $600, and will receive, in addition, a bonus of $100, together with the annual statutory increase of $50. That is to say, a messenger who is receiving $500 will receive for this year $750, an increase of 50 per cent. Moreover, we have provided for an increase in the maximum from $1,200 to $1,300. Those who have reached the former maximum of $1,200 and cannot qualify for promotion to the Second Division, can go on to $1,300, whereas under existing legislation they are stopped at $1,200. We think we have met the situation fairly so far as the Third Division is concerned. In order to do this, a very considerable expenditure is involved. When this matter was under consideration the other day the member for St. John asked for a statement as to the cost of the increases authorized by this legislation. I had a statement prepared to meet his request. I find that the total annual increase in expenditure will be, in round figures, $290,000. That is a very substantial annual increase in respect of the Inside Service at Ottawa. It is not too much, but, at the same time, it is substantial. As I said the other day, we must bear in mind the public outside and the salaries which they obtain. In the Third Division a number of young women and young men, some of them not specially trained, many of them stenographers, obtain larger salaries than are paid outside. I made it my business in connection with this Bill to make inquiries of some of the leading law firms in Toronto as to the salaries paid to stenographers and clerks. I found, of course, considerable difference in the salaries paid, but I am able to say as a result of my inquiry that the salaries paid stenographers in the Civil Service at Ottawa are equal to if not greater than those paid to stenographers in law offices in the city of Toronto, many of whom work much longer hours than those in the Civil Service. While we desire to be fair to the Civil Service, we must at the same time bear in mind our duty to the general public. I believe that the public are prepared to pay the members of the Civil Service proper salaries, especially those in the lower grades; but I do not believe that they are prepared to pay them larger salaries than are paid to persons possessing similar qualifications who are engaged outside the Civil Service and who work as hard as, if not harder than, those in the Civil Service.

5 p.m.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The minister was good enough to lay on the Table the Order in Council to which I have referred relating to the Civil Service. It is dated May 29, 1917, and is as follows:

> The Committee of the Privy Council, on the recommendation of the Right Hon. the Prime Minister, advise that all Orders in Council passed since the outbreak of the war relating to Civil Service pay to civil servants who have already enlisted do have no effect and be void in the case of those members of the Civil Service who join the military forces of Canada either by voluntary enlistment or otherwise from and after the date hereof.

Can the minister inform the committee why a discrimination is made against those who voluntarily enlist after May 29?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think that the reason is obvious. Prior to the date in question, the Prime Minister had announced a measure of compulsory military service. It is to be pointed out that the members of the Civil Service who are liable to military service under that measure have had all this time to enlist, and if they have not enlisted, nor offered to enlist, there would seem to be no good ground why they should be paid their full Civil Service pay if that civil pay exceeds their military pay, as distinct from those outside who will be compelled under the Compulsory Service law to serve at the rate of pay provided for in the military forces. I think I can say as to those members of the Service, who are eligible for military service and who offered to enlist prior to the announcement of the Prime Minister, that the Government would be prepared to deal with them by special Orders in Council, so that they might be put in the position of those who actually enlisted before the declaration of the Prime Minister. I think that would be only fair, because I know of some cases in the Civil Service where officials have desired to enlist, but for some ground of public interest, principally because the service they were rendering was of such a character that their services could not well be dispensed with in the public interest, they have been prevented from enlisting. I do not believe there are many of those cases; but I believe there are some, and I know the Government would be prepared to deal with them on the same basis as those who have enlisted and actually gone forward. But as to those who, during all these three years, being eligible for military service, have not come forward and enlisted, it would seem to me to discriminate in their favour as against the outside public if now, being compelled to enlist, they were given the pay which they have as civil servants and which might be fifty per cent in excess of or twice as great as the pay of those who are not members of the Civil Service and who enlist under the provisions of this measure.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I have noticed in the United States that one of the great objects which those administering the law for selective conscription have in view, is to induce those who are drafted to believe that they are not in any way treated as inferior to those who may volunteer. I think that should be the object of the Government in this country. It ought not to be said to any member of the Civil Service that he is degraded in any way or that, simply because he was taken, if this law passes, under a selective conscription, he occupies an inferior position to that which he would have occupied if he had enlisted voluntarily. If this legislation should pass, the Government should strive in every way to make the young men understand that there is no distinction as between the two classes, and that they are not to be treated as inferior to those who have already gone to the front. But this Order in Council is not limited to those who are taken under selective conscription; it is extended to those who may voluntarily enlist subsequent to the 29th of May. It might well be argued that the intention of the Government was to discourage voluntary enlistment prior to the coming into force of the legislation relating to conscription. What the Government is doing in this regard is on a par with what they did with reference to Col. Blondin and General Lessard. Those gentlemen went down to the province of Quebec—very late, I admit. General Lessard is a man who one would have supposed would have been sent very early into that province; he is the man to whom my hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) two years ago recommended should be employed by the Government to go into the province of Quebec, but quite recently he did go to Quebec with the Postmaster General, and the Postmaster General has stated publicly that voluntary enlistment has succeeded very well, and that if the same methods had been pursued earlier in the war, the young men of Quebec would have rallied en masse to the colours. But instead of waiting for word from General Lessard and Col. Blondin, immediately upon the return of the Prime Minister conscription was announced, and those gentlemen immediately stopped recruiting, because apparently Col. Blondin understood that it was not the desire of the Government that voluntary enlistment should proceed any further.

Whatever may be the fate of the Conscription Bill, the Government should not have stopped for one single moment in the direction of voluntary enlistment. Every encouragement should be given to our young men in all the provinces, including the young men in the Civil Service, voluntarily to enlist, and there are many people in this country who believe that, if the proper encouragement had been given to all our young men to enlist and proper methods been pursued they would have enlisted in very large numbers, and that possibly compulsory service might not have been necessary at all. I for one am very sorry to see the Government, immediately upon the return of the Prime Minister, bring into force this discriminatory Order in Council under which it is proposed to treat the young men in the Civil Service who may enlist subsequent to the 29th of May in a very much less favourable manner than they have treated those who have enlisted prior to that date. The unfortunate result is that men in the Civil Service will be divided into three different classes. We shall have one class of enlisted civil servants who receive both their civil pay and their military pay; we shall have another class who will receive their military pay and the difference between their military and their civil pay, and then we shall have a third class who will receive only their military pay. Another discriminatory result follows. Those Orders in Council which have been passed previously provide that their positions will be available for the enlisted civil servants when they return from the front. That provision has been wiped away by this Order in Council. Throughout the country we find that employers of labour have offered to retain their positions for their young men who enlist; many of the largest business houses and many of the banks have done the same thing. They do not discriminate; we find no obstacle in the path of enlistment dating from the announcement of this conscription measure; but today as previously during the years since the war has begun, these employers are prepared to treat their young men in the same generous and liberal manner. But this Government says to the young men in its employ who may offer to enlist after the 29th of May: You will be treated in a very much less favourable manner than those who have volunteered before; not only will your pay be reduced, but when you return after you have served your country, possibly maimed and wounded, you will find your positions filled by young men who have not volunteered for the front, and you will be obliged to seek occupations amongst strangers. I say that is not fair; it is not wise, it is not in the public interest, it is not giving proper encouragement to the young men of the Civil Service who still continue to volunteer for the defence of the flag.

[Mr. Pugsley.]

Mr. LEMIEUX: I concur with the remarks which have been made by my hon. friend from St. John, but I rise more for the purpose of directing the minister's attention to a special case. I regret that the Postmaster General is not in his seat, because he might have been able to give me the information which I sought in vain when his estimates were before the House just prior to the adjournment for the Prime Minister's visit to England. The Postmaster General, or in his absence the Minister of Customs, had an item passed by the House creating a new Assistant Deputy Postmaster General. Some years ago, when I was in charge of the department, I appointed a young man who had been secretary to Sir William Mulock. He was one of the best officials that the Post Office Department ever had, but as very often happens with the best men in the Civil Service, he accepted a position outside at a better salary, where the intelligence he displayed in the performance of his duties was better recognized. Then I appointed in his stead a young man who had been my private secretary. He was then Captain Verret, one of the best officers in the Canadian Militia, and a member of the Governor General's Foot Guards. At the opening of hostilities he enlisted with an Ottawa regiment, and immediately went overseas and into the trenches. He has been there since the beginning of the war, has been promoted from captain to major, and only the other day I was proud indeed to read in the papers that he had received from the hand of His Majesty the insignia of the Distinguished Service Order. Major Verret is now at the front and there is nobody here to look after his interest in the department. He was certainly a very good official, highly respected and very popular both in the East and in the West, always accessible, and very genial with all the members of the House of Commons who had occasion to do business with the department. Suddenly, in the third year of the war, after exposing his life on several occasions he is much surprised to learn that another Assistant Deputy Postmaster General has been appointed. I do not say that he has been appointed in Major Verret's stead, but I cannot see why another Assistant Deputy Postmaster General should have been appointed during Major Verret's absence. I do not begrudge Mr. Fowler his appointment. I happen to know him. He is a very good official, although he has not had the long experience of Major Verret. I have told him personally: "I know you are an excellent officer. You are spoken of very highly by the public, but I object to Major Verret being treated in such a high-handed way in his absence, after he has served his King and country on the battlefield for over two years." I have been unable to get an explanation why another Assistant Deputy Postmaster General was appointed; it may have been that he was needed, and if so, I have no objection to the appointment of Mr. Fowler, none whatever. But what I should like to know is this, and I happen to know that the question is agitating the mind of Major Verret on the battlefield. I dare say that everything possible will be done to promote those men in the Civil Service who return from active service at the front; I think everybody will agree that that is their due. But what I am particularly anxious to know is whether Major Verret, on his return, will be promoted in the department if a vacancy occurs, or will the appointment of another Assistant Deputy Postmaster General have spoilt his chances of promotion? Mr. Fowler is a very able officer, but so is Major Verret, and he has been at the front since the beginning of the war. Should a vacancy occur in his absence, or when he returns, will the Government give him credit for the service he has rendered to the state and promote him? I sincerely regret that the Postmaster General is not in his seat. I did not raise this question when his estimates were before the House just before the two months' adjournment, because I did not want to embarrass the Minister of Customs, who had charge of the Post Office Estimates, but now the Minister of Finance is here, perhaps he will give me the assurance that the absence of Major Verret will not prejudice his chances of promotion should a vacancy occur.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am sorry I have no information with respect to this matter. I have a rather faint recollection that my hon. friend raised this question some months ago, but as it did not concern my own department, it made no impression upon my mind. I recall, however, that I did make some inquiry about it, rather casually, and I think I was informed that the appointment my hon. friend refers to was not in the stead of Major Verret. Further than that, I can make no statement, but I would suggest that my hon. friend raise the question where it might more properly be raised—although it was quite proper for him to raise it now—namely, when the Estimates of the Postmaster General are again under consideration.

Mr. LEMIEUX: May we expect the Postmaster General to return to the House? There is a rumour that he is coming back, but has not yet taken his seat because he is occupied elsewhere. If the hon. Minister of Finance can give me assurance on this point, I will be content.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The Postmaster General is on military duty, but when his Estimates are under consideration, either he or an acting minister will be present. The hon. gentleman can raise his question then.

Mr. BOULAY: In answer to my remarks in favour of an increase of pay to those in the Third Division, the hon. Minister of Finance stated that there were a great many stenographers in that class who are paid more highly than similar workers are paid in commercial offices. Would it not be possible to make provision in the Bill for a special scale for the stenographers? I understand that the work of the stenographers is not so hard as the clerical work generally, and it is a kind of work that is done usually by girls who have no one to look after but themselves, and who consequently do not need as large salaries as the heads of families do. If the only objection is that which the minister has stated, I think a special class should be made for the stenographers, and they should be removed from the third class entirely.

Bill reported.

SUPPLY.

On motion of Sir Thomas White the House resumed in Committee of Supply, Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

Arts and Agriculture—Towards the encouragement of cold storage warehouses for the better preservation and handling of perishable food products, $50,000.

Mr. NESBITT: There is a good deal of discussion nowadays about the cold storage houses. It is alleged that they buy up food products and carry them unnecessarily, thereby unduly increasing prices. There was a time a few years ago when, I think, it was absolutely necessary for the Government to encourage the system of cold storage, but now it has become a large business. To what class of cold storage concerns does this vote go?

Mr. BURRELL: This item was held over at the instance, I think, of the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) after we had quite a discussion on the whole cold storage question, and pending information as to the point the Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers) had reached in the inquiry which he is now carrying on. I took the matter up with the Minister of Labour and learned that he had collected most of the information and expects soon to be able to lay a full report on the Table. In view of the fact that until that report is laid on the Table, the Department of Agriculture will make no new regulations, on the subject, I thought probably there would be no objection on the part of my hon. friend to the passing of this item. I cannot do any more in the matter. In answer to my hon. friend from North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) I may say that subsidies will be given as hitherto. Only one subsidy will be given in a district, and on certain condition. The plans and specifications must be accepted by the department; ample space must be afforded for public cold storage; and the rates must be under control of the department. On these conditions thirty per cent of the cost of construction is given in payments spread over five years. We have not been giving many subsidies and have rather intended not to give more during the war. Besides, as a matter of fact, the country has been pretty well covered and the accommodation of the public in regard to cold storage provided for. Formerly this vote was $200,000, and now it is down to $50,000.

Mr. NESBITT: I suppose the minister takes care not to encourage the establishment of cold storage houses where they are not needed for the public?

Mr. BURRELL: Yes. And besides we do not give the subsidy to any body without assurance that ample room for public cold storage will be provided.

Mr. NESBITT: That is, space where the public can store goods on paying certain rates? Somebody suggested the other night that the charge for cold storage was very high. I think it was said that eggs were charged for at the rate of 12 cents a dozen. Did the minister look into that? I thought the statement absurd but I did not have the knowledge to refute it.

Mr. BURRELL: I am sorry I cannot give my hon. friend the exact figure but it cannot be that. It may vary a little in different localities. As a matter of fact, our officers look over these rates very carefully and if there is the slightest complaint on the part of the public, or if the rate charged seems to be exorbitant, we have the power to reduce the rate, and we have exercised it. I think you will find that the rates are those generally accepted by the trade.

Mr. NESBITT: You would not have the power of reducing the rate charged by a private cold storage?

Mr. BURRELL: If it is a cold storage to which we give a subsidy.

Mr. McMILLAN: Is it the intention of the Government to have the duty removed from oleomargarine coming into Canada?

Mr. BURRELL: It is not a question of duty, but there is a provision on the statute book prohibiting the manufacture or importation of oleomargarine. The Government has had this question under consideration, we have had a very voluminous correspondence but I am afraid I cannot give my hon. friend any satisfaction.

Mr. MARCIL: The statement has been published that this question is such a controversial one that the Government intend to submit it to the judgment of the House. May I ask the minister if that is the intention?

Mr. BURRELL: Quite naturally, anything that is brought up in the way of legislation is submitted to the judgment of the House. This subject like a great many others, would probably be elucidated by being aired. There has not been, as far as my knowledge goes, anything like a controversial discussion about the matter recently. There was during the winter. I could not give my hon. friend any satisfaction as to what the Government may or may not do.

Mr. McMILLAN: I think this is a question that requires serious consideration at this time because we know that people in towns and cities are in a very serious condition. Labouring men and poor people are finding it very difficult to get along because of the high cost of living. I live in a dairy country and ninety per cent of the people I represent are farmers who depend upon dairying entirely. I would have been quite prepared to have supported any measure brought down by this Government to allow the importation of oleomargarine during the continuance of the war that poor people might at least have oleomargarine to put upon their bread instead of being obliged to eat it dry. But the price which has been fixed for cheese in this country has been disappointing to myself and to most of the farmers. If the Government had arranged to have a larger price fixed for cheese, say about 25 cents, we could have afforded to have advocated the admission of oleomargarine for the benefit of the labouring people and anybody else who chose to eat it. But I believe it would not be fair on account of the low price of 21¾ cents fixed for cheese to be sold to the British Commission. That price only means between 19 and 20 cents a pound to the farmers. In considering the price of farm products we must take into account the high cost of everything that the farmer is obliged to use. A self-binder that he used to buy for $130 now costs $165, and many other articles, including cream separators, wagons, and implements generally, have gone up from 10 to 25 per cent, as well as the feed that he has to buy for his cattle. Last year our cheese averaged 19 cents a pound, and it will be about the same this year. On account of the high cost of everything that the farmer has to buy I think the Government should have arranged a higher price for his cheese. He should get three or four cents a pound more for it. If the Government had secured such a price we could have allowed the poor people in the towns and cities to have used oleomargarine.

Mr. NESBITT: I have had some more resolutions from a number of dairymen's associations in Southwestern Ontario in reference to the inspection of cheese at Montreal. They want inspectors appointed for the district west of Toronto, which is a very large and important cheese-making district. I do not want to weary the minister with something that he cannot control, but I think that he might possibly have some control over this question and arrange this matter satisfactorily to the dairymen of southwestern Ontario. I understood from the buyer that they were paying more for cheese on the other side than they are on this side. He was buying in Illinois and Wisconsin and he told me he was paying more to the cheese factory there than he was paying on this side.

Mr. BURRELL: For export?

Mr. NESBITT: Yes, because he talked to me about being able to get vessels in New York when he could not get them in Montreal.

Mr. BURRELL: I have already directed the attention of the commission to this subject which my hon. friend has brought before me. I have had one or two letters along the same line. Obviously, although my hon. friend may be pretty nearly right in saying that I could bring this to the attention of the commission, it is not desirable for me to be butting in in the way of trying to control their operations. I am very glad to bring anything of this kind to the attention of the commission, and I am quite positive that they will do their best to solve all these questions in such a manner as to eliminate all possible friction that can be eliminated. I would like to say to my hon. friend from Glengarry (Mr. McMillan) that if he could know all that is taking place, which he cannot, because necessarily there are confidential communications to a certain extent between the British authorities and myself, I am sure that he would agree that everything possible, in so far as this Government is concerned, has been done in this cheese business to try and get the fullest attention paid to the interests of the producers of this country. But, it is not a question of what we have done. We could not say to the British authorities: You must pay so-and-so for the cheese you get in this country. All we could say to them was that we wanted them to give the fullest consideration to those points which my hon. friend has raised. One contention of the hon. gentleman I quite admit, namely, that the cost of production to the farmers has gone up, and that conditions are not what they were. We have pointed out in the strongest way to the British authorities that if they are desirous of securing the export of the surplus cheese in Canada for the use of the army and the population of Great Britain, it is necessary for them to remember that they must give such a price as would induce the people to manufacture cheese and not turn the raw material in other directions. We pressed that on them strongly and persistently. With regard to the other point that the hon. gentleman raises, this also was remembered, and I think it is most desirable that a state of things should not exist—I do not think it will exist—under which the American exporter will be able to pay a larger price for cheese than they are paying in Canada and export at a larger figure to the Old Country than the figure at which they are buying through the commission. I have already brought that point to the attention of the British Commission, and I shall be very glad to emphasize it further.

Mr. NESBITT: My information is not gossip, you know; it is absolutely direct.

Mr. BURRELL: No. Of course, my hon. friend knows that the local conditions will always vary. It does not follow that because local prices in the United States may be higher than here, the export prices are higher. The export price usually has been the same, because the cheese from the United States has formed only one per cent of the exportable cheese of this continent. It is a bagatelle compared with our own cheese. The price of our cheese has been the ruling factor in the export trade, and I think it will be in this case also. I know that the shipping question has been a very difficult and acute one. I understand from the British authorities that they have not been making any discrimination. It is quite possible that now and then when a boat sailing from New York missed a load of munitions, or something of that kind, they filled up with cheese, but I do not believe they make a practice of taking cheese from American ports and not from Canadian ports. We have taken every conceivable step to get the fullest justice done to the producers of this country, while at the same time giving the British authorities all the cheese we could.

Mr. McMILLAN: Does my hon. friend expect that the price fixed by the British Board of Trade will remain the same throughout the season, 21¾ cents f.o.b., Montreal?

Mr. BURRELL: It is not a matter over which I have any control or in reference to which I could make any positive statement. I can only say that I understand the British Commission had instructions to buy for a fortnight, but apparently the price was left open. I earnestly appealed to them to fix a price as high as possible, and it would be very desirable not to lower that price. If the conditions warrant it, as they may later on towards the fall, the price might be increased, but, so far as we are concerned, we will do all we can to see that the price is not lowered.

Mr. STEELE: My understanding is that no cheese manufacturers in this country are compelled to sell their cheese through this channel.

[Mr. Burrell]

Mr. NESBITT: Who else would they sell it to?

Mr. STEELE: I do not see why a cheese dealer should go to the United States and pay a higher price for cheese there and ship via New York if he could buy in this country at a greater advantage to himself.

Mr. NESBITT: They could not bring it in here.

Mr. STEELE: They could ship Canadian cheese through New York just as easily as they could American. So I think the instances which the hon. member for North Oxford gives have been special and exceptional cases. I think it would be well for our cheese manufacturers to fully appreciate the difficulties of the situation and not pay too much attention to a campaign which seems to be put up in Ontario to discourage farmers and get them dissatisfied with what has been done by the British Government through its commission. They are being told that they will have to wait a long time for their pay. As I understand, there will be no great delay, the cheese will be paid for on presentation of warehouse receipts. They are told that hooping with steel hoops will cost much more. I understand that will be paid for by the commission, and not taken out of the producers. In fact, it is simply transferring the British market from the Old Country to Montreal, and the producers of cheese in this country will be delivering their cheese to the British Government at Montreal instead of to the dealers in England and Scotland. I am sure that the farmers and dairymen will be very well satisfied with the regulations when they understand them. As to the price, prices are never high enough for some people, and it is a question whether 21¾ cents is high enough; but so far as the regulations are concerned, I do not think there is any reason why the farmers and producers should feel dissatisfied.

Mr. NESBITT: The friend of whom I spoke is a cheese buyer not only in Canada but in the United States. He has a firm in the United States as well as in Canada, and is a very large buyer. He knows exactly what he can do without my hon. friend (Mr. Steele) telling him anything. He has been in the business a number of years, and is just as anxious to pay a price to the Canadian as to the American cheese makers. As a matter of fact, for some reason, he could pay a higher price to the American than to the Canadian producer, and he could get space for all the cheese he wanted to ship through New York and could not possibly get any space from Canada at that time, and that was only a week ago last Monday night. My friend absolutely knows his business, there is no possible question about that. There is no discussion up with us as to delay in getting paid for cheese. There is a little longer delay because it has to be delivered at Montreal whereas the ordinary cheese buyer on our markets pays for the cheese the day it is delivered, inspects it at the factory and pays for it when it is delivered. It is quite possible that the minister can secure some arrangement under which the cheese will be inspected in the West. If that is done, from what I have heard, it will do away largely with any complaint with reference to the British Government taking over this cheese. As to the price, I have not the slightest hesitation in thinking that if they do not get the cheese at the price they will pay more for it. They will pay the price to get it, that stands to common sense. However, 21½ cents, or 19 cents to the factory, is a pretty fair price at this time of the year. It is more than the price at this time last year. Therefore, I do not think the producers are suffering in that way. If the farmers will not send the milk to the cheese factories, then the British Commission will have to pay a price that will induce them to send it to the cheese factories, that is all there is to that.

Mr. OLIVER: We are on the item in regard to cold storage. The minister suggested that this item should pass, but that later on the Minister of Labour would lay on the Table certain information. I do not know of what value the minister suggested this information would be in connection with this discussion. It is obvious that the question of the handling of the food products of the country through the cold storage warehouses is a matter of most pressing and enormous interest, and it struck me when the statements were being made by the Minister of Labour as to the methods of collecting information, that those methods were entirely inadequate, and liable to be entirely misleading in their results. The subject is one which is entirely beyond the mere consideration of an item in the Estimates of the Minister of Agriculture. It is a national question, and I take the liberty of asking the minister what opportunity we shall have of dealing with these reports when the Minister of Labour lays them on the Table.

Mr. BURRELL: There will be an opportunity of discussing them later in the session upon going into Committee of Supply. I quite admit that the question is far-reaching and that it is not tied down to the passing of this item, to which I am sure hon. gentlemen do not object, because its purpose is to fulfil contracts that have already been entered into. Under the Order in Council which was passed, the Minister of Labour had ample powers of inquiry. I do not know the details, but I understand that a very full investigation has been made, power having been secured to examine witnesses under oath and to take compulsory steps if the answers or statements made were unsatisfactory. I believe that they have very full information as to prices, amounts, qualities and every condition relating to the storage of food products. What I meant was that under the Act which we passed some time ago we shall be in a much better position to frame our regulations after we shall have obtained and analysed the information secured in this way by the Minister of Labour. I think that there would be an apportunity of discussing the whole question.

Mr. OLIVER: My hon. friend has suggested that the question could be taken up on going into Committee of Supply, or on some other occasion after the report shall have been laid upon the Table. While that does offer an opportunity for a certain amount of discussion, it does not give such an opportunity for an interchange of views in regard to the matters dealt with in the report as is afforded by a discussion ir committee of an item of the Estimates. I do not wish to delay the minister's Estimates, but I am anxious that we should have the fullest opportunity for discussion and consideration of this report when it is laid upon the Table. Unless it is a matter of urgency, I would respectfully ask the minister to allow this item to stand until the report is produced and we shall have had some opportunity of considering it with a view to discussing the question, in the light of the report, with the freedom that pertains to discussions in committee.

Mr. BURRELL: Of course, I do not know when the report will come down, but I have no desire to press the item. If it is the wish of the hon. member that I should do so, I have no hesitation in letting the item stand.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess.

The committee resumed at eight o'clock, Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

Mr. MACDONALD: Have any definite arrangements been made by this Government with the Imperial Government and the Government of the United States with reference to the proportion of the aid which Canada is expected to give to Great Britain and the Allies in connection with food supplies of various kinds? In the Imperial House of Commons statements have been made by under-secretaries in answer to questions as to the reliance of Great Britain and the Allies on the continent of North America for food supplies, and I understand that some arrangements have been arrived at by the United States as regards quantities and other details. Has anything been done by the Canadian Government, and if so, along what lines.

Mr. BURRELL: I do not think there have been any special arrangements. The matter has been discussed from time to time. I do not think anything clear-cut has yet been evolved in the United States, because the Government are waiting for powers to deal with these matters. They are asking for rather strong powers and making their general arrangements, and when they secure those powers, it is anticipated that, as far as feasible, we shall work in co-operation with them. I do not think that I can say anything more definite than that at the present time.

Mr. MACDONALD: I am rather in the dark as to matters that may impinge upon the realm of diplomacy, but the necessity of furnishing to Great Britain and the Allies supplies, not merely of wheat and flour, but of other kinds of food, is apparent. From time to time, some of the home authorities have declared that the assurance of food supplies is essential above everything else. The statement has been made in the Imperial House of Commons as to understandings having been arrived at with the executive of the United States, and that executive have submitted to Congress a Bill asking for certain definite powers in reference to it, no doubt on the basis of some general understanding. Has the Canadian Government arrived at any such understanding?

Mr. BURRELL: Except in a general way; there is nothing that I would be able to tell my hon. friend of a definite character at the present time.

[Mr. Burrell.]

Arts and Agriculture—Exhibitions, $50,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Some months ago I called to the attention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who is always kind and genial, a project of reciprocal exhibitions between France and Canada. About two years ago, the French Government sent to America a commission composed of business men and some members of the House of Representatives. That commission was headed by Mr. D'Amours, deputy of the Department of Landes, France. Mr. D'Amours, I believe, was the vice-president of the commission on trade in the French Parliament. That commission visited all the business centres in the United States and then came to Canada. I was present in Montreal at various gatherings which were convened for the purpose of explaining the object of that commission. The French Government had in view the development of better trade relations between the outside world and France. As the president of the commission, Mr. D'Amours, truly said: We do not wish to be surprised by peace as we have been surprised by war. He published broadcast in the United States and in Canada what statistics he had in his possession as to the trade of France previous to the war with Germany, which trade could be transferred to America, and notably to Canada. He gave a list of different articles which could be bought in Canada as cheaply as in Germany. Let me give one instance. He stated, much to the surprise of the merchants, manufacturers and business men who were present, that all of the asbestos bought by the French manufacturers or by the French Government—and it represents a very large quantity—had been imported from Germany, while Germany imported nearly all the asbestos from Canada. He said: "Our commission merchants were in Berlin whilst they should have been in Canada." After the visit of the commission, a delegation of business men was invited to visit France and to tour the principal industrial centres. That delegation was composed of the members of the Boards of Trade of Montreal, Quebec, and Toronto. The president of the delegation, was, I think, Mr. Woods, president of the Toronto Board of Trade. That delegation went into all parts of France. Senator Beaubien, who has taken a very lively interest in this matter, accompanied the delegation at his own expense, and on his return he published a very exhaustive report of what the delegation had seen on the other side. The correspondence is in the hands of the Minister of Trade and Commerce and it is made clear that we can very materially increase our trade with France. What struck me in discussing this item of exhibitions is this:

Senator Beaubien and Mr. Woods were approached while they were in France by officials of the French Government and by representatives of the boards of trade of the larger cities, such as Lyon, Bordeaux, Havre, Rouen, and Marseilles, and a plan was evolved for a train exhibition of the products of both countries. If the Canadian Government could arrange with our traders and manufacturers for an exhibition of our staple products and samples of our industrial work the French Government agreed to equip a train to display the goods, running, let us say, between Havre and Marseilles, and to pay all the expenses. Trains of this sort have been formerly used in Canada, giving our people an opportunity to become acquainted with the natural and industrial products of the country. The French Government, on the other hand, agreed that if the Canadian Government would equip a similar train to run through our provinces from ocean to ocean, they would arrange with their manufacturers for a similar display of French products and manufactured goods. It was hoped that by this plan the trade of both countries would be fostered and greatly encouraged. I do not know whether the Minister of Trade and Commerce has consulted with the Minister of Agriculture about this matter, or whether he has come to any decision, but in view of the conditions that will arise in the post-bellum days I think it would be in the interest of both countries if this excellent idea were carried out. We have at the present time a very important and very large trade with France, and there is no reason why it should not be developed and maintained, especially in view of the revelations that were made by the French Commission when they visited this country, and which showed such glaringly foolish transactions as the purchase of asbestos in Berlin by French consumers when it could have been easily procured in Canada, which produces such large quantities.

The minister has been successful in the last two exhibitions in which Canada participated, and I think if he would give some thought to this project of the French Government and of the French Chambers of Commerce he would render a great service to the business men of this country. It may be that when the Estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce are up I shall enlarge upon this subject, because I have copies of some very interesting and illuminating correspondence between business men in France and Senator Beaubien and Mr. Woods. Our duty at the present moment is certainly to do as much as we can to win the war, but we must not lose sight of what is to happen after the war, and one of the chief duties of the Government, it seems to me, is to prepare to capture trade during the period immediately following the war. We will need wider markets, and what better foreign market is there than that of France? I think if an exhibition train of this sort could be equipped and put into commission it would render a very great service to the business men of this country.

Mr. BURRELL: I have a very fair recollection of what transpired in the negotiations to which my hon. friend has alluded, in which, though my department was not directly concerned I took a very sympathetic interest. I cannot say just how far the negotiations went or whether the matter was definitely dropped or not. I know, however, that it was taken up in some detail, and that some of the circumstances are as my hon. friend has described. The matter was discussed at some length, I believe, by the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, because it would naturally be done largely under their auspices, or at all events the merchandise would be collected for the train by their machinery, and that would involve a great deal of preparation. I stated that if the project came to any definite conclusion my department should be glad to help in any way in connection with our own exhibition work, although it was entirely out of our line to deal with a train of this sort. I rather think the project was dropped, whether by mutual agreement or not I do not know, on account of the terrific pressure of the war, which made it inadvisable to go on with the scheme. That is my understanding, but no doubt the Minister of Trade and Commerce will be able to give my hon. friend a fuller explanation.

Mr. BOULAY (translation): Mr. Chairman, I take the opportunity afforded me by the discussion of the item now before the House to call the attention of the Minister of Agriculture to an anomaly in the administration of his department. I have no doubt but that the grievance is one of long standing, but, after all, that is no reason why the question should not be brought to the notice of the minister.

The Department of Agriculture is one of the most important in the Civil Service, and it seems to me that it would be proper to appoint to the higher offices men who speak both official languages. This is not the first time that I broach the subject; I even recommended for appointment as veterinary surgeon in that department a thoroughly competent man from the province of Quebec, but the minister sidetracked my proposal, though admitting the undoubted importance of having officials conversant with both languages.

In a letter dated 14th May last, he said:

> In regard to the other letter, dated 24th April, I have noted carefully what you say. It would, of course, be a pleasant combination of qualities if an officer not only had the highest technical knowledge, but also a free command of languages, but thorough competence is, of course, essential in the discharge of duties of a technical and important character. Nor, I fear, would it be possible to appoint him to any important position under the Veterinary Director General. I may say that Dr. Telmosse, many years ago, failed to pass the necessary examination at the Veterinary college in Chicago, to which a number of Canadians were sent for this purpose.

In that paragraph, the minister recognizes the importance of having officers with a free command of both languages; he even hints that it is essential and of this I have evidence in the county of Rimouski. Some four or five months ago an officer of the department came into the county. He was quite well qualified for his duties, but the people of the province of Quebec, who do not understand English, could derive no benefit from his extensive information; yet his salary is provided by the people of the province of Quebec just as much as by the people of the other provinces. He came to attend a farmers' convention, but could not address those present.

I fail to see why the Department of Agriculture could not find men having the necessary technical knowledge and likewise familiar with both languages. From the statement of the minister one would infer that nobody could be found in the province of Quebec with the proper qualifications for positions of that nature. Judging from the list of the high salaried officers in the Department of Agriculture, it would appear that the French-Canadians are systematically excluded; out of nineteen employees, there is only one French name; to make sure, I had better read the list:

G. F. O'Hallaron, Deputy Minister	$6,000 00
Lt.-Col. Jarvis, Asst. Dep. Minister	3,600 00
F. Montizambert, Director General of Public Health	5,000 00
F. Torrance, General Veterinary Superintendent	5,000 00
J. A. Ruddick, Dairy Commissioner	4,000 00
G. H. Clark, Seed Commissioner	$3,650 00
P. E. Ritchie, Registrar of Trade Marks	3,600 00
P. K. Doherty, Canadian Commissioner of International Institute of Agric.	3,400 00
J. H. Grisdale Director of Exper. Farm	3,300 00
John Bright, Live-stock Commissioner.	3,300 00
W. J. Lynch, Chief of Patent Office	3,200 00
F. P. Shutt, Assistant Director of Exp. Farms	3,200 00
W. T. Macoun, Dominion Horticulturist	3,100 00
D. Johnson, Fruit Commissioner	3,100 00
George Hilton, Chief Veter. Inspector	3,000 00
C. G. Hewitt, Dominion Entomologist.	3,000 00
C. E. Saunders, Dominion Cerealist	2,800 00
Felix Charlan, Chief of the Tobacco branch	2,800 00
Herbert Arkell, Assistant Live-Stock Commissioner	2,800 00

Therefore only one French-Canadian of nineteen employees, while the French element in the Dominion, according to the census of 1911, aggregates, I think, 28 or 30 per cent of the whole population; the proportion would likely be greater to-day. It does occur to me that the French-Canadians should be represented in the Department of Agriculture in proportion to their number. Then there is the further necessity that the higher officials of that department ought to be able to impart the information they possess to the farmers of Quebec as they do in the other provinces, so that there might be no discrimination.

This latter consideration alone should have been sufficient to induce, not only the present incumbent but previous ministers—because I believe the grievance is of long standing—to remedy the situation. It would be nothing but justice toward the French-Canadian people and a benefit to the farmers. We need the technical knowledge of those experts, whose salaries we pay not for the sole advantage of the English-speaking communities but for that of the French-Canadian farmers as well.

Since conditions have not improved, I deem it my duty to draw the attention of the minister to that matter, as I have done in this House for some years; my object in discussing the matter publicly to-night is to bring it to the notice of the minister, that he may take the first opportunity of remedying that grievance and granting us the fair treatment to which we are entitled and which would work to the benefit of agriculture. It is in the Gulf district especially, where the climate is not as favourable as might be to the success of farming operations that it is essential that the people be instructed in the best method of tillage. But how can those officials give the information to men whose language they do not understand?

I think I have said enough to convince the minister that for all those reasons we are entitled to fair treatment and, if he has not caught my meaning, I am quite willing to repeat briefly in English what I have just said in French.

Mr. BURRELL: Had my hon. friend (Mr. Boulay), who speaks English very well, addressed the committee in that language, he would have made himself more intelligble to me, and I should have been able to follow him with greater clearness, because I am not, I regret to say, so well acquainted with the French language as I might be. I understood him, however, to make a general argument to the effect that all the higher officials of the departments should be able to speak the two languages. He enumerates quite a number of our officers, but of those he named a considerable number speak French very fluently. Dr. Montizambert, for instance, would be able to follow my hon. friend no matter how long he might speak French, and he would be able to reply to him with absolute clearness in that language. Mr. Doherty, Mr. Grisdale, Mr. Lynch, Mr. Charlan, also, are very familiar with the French language. In fact, Dr. Grisdale, who occupies the very important position of Director of Experimental Farms—I understood my hon. friend to say that agriculture was not receiving the attention it should receive from the Federal Government, in that officers who do not understand French are sent out to address the public—could go before an audience of French-Canadians and address them in their own language with absolute facility. So, I cannot altogether plead guilty to the hon. gentleman's accusation. Perhaps he had better tackle some other minister.

Mr. BOULAY: But we do not see those who talk French.

Mr. BURRELL: That may be because they are there when the hon. gentleman is not at home, but officers who speak French visit his section of the country with fair frequency. It is true that we have not so many technical officers in the service as we should like to have who understand French thoroughly; but I would point out that in this country the most highly- trained agricultural students are, unfortunately, not graduated from the colleges in which French is the language.

This Government has probably done more to strengthen the agricultural colleges of Quebec than all preceding Governments. The hon. gentleman may or may not know that for the last four years, under the Agricultural Instruction Act, we have given $20,000 to Ste. Anne de la Pocatière, and also to Oka College, for the express purpose of strengthening the staffs and equipment of those French Canadian colleges, in agriculture, in order that they may turn out more highly equipped students, whom we would gladly employ. But I am bound to say, and without prejudice in the matter, that no one who knows thoroughly the science and practice of agriculture would say that either of the institutions I have mentioned could turn out half as many practically trained students in agriculture as an institution like the college at Guelph. In our work we must have men who not only have a practical knowledge of agriculture, but who also understand the scientific basis of their calling; and for this class of men we have to look almost entirely to such institutions, and largely to the institution at Guelph. With the work we have been doing for the last four years we hope in future to have a larger choice of men. We hope to continue that work for some years to come, if we stay in power; and even if, to the misfortune of the country, we do not stay in power, the succeeding Government, whatever it may be, I am sure, will not upset the work done under the authority of the Agricultural Instruction Act.

That work will still go on. When that work comes to fruition and when these educational institutions are sufficiently strengthened that they will turn out a large number of young men who will not only understand the French and English languages but who will be thoroughly equipped in scientific agriculture, if I am in charge of this department, I will be only too glad to secure the services of such men. But, in the meantime, I must frankly say I have great difficulty in getting hold of men who thoroughly understand both the French and English language. I do not know that this has any special reference to the item under discussion which is our exhibition work. In connection with this work, I might say that we have not very much of a staff but we have no less than three men who are on the permanent staff who are French-Canadians and who also have a thorough acquaintance with the English language. As to the work of the commissioner, I confess Col. Hutcheson does not understand French, or to a very slight extent, but, although I did not appoint him, and although he was appointed by the late Government, I am bound to say that if you were to search from one end of Canada to the other, I do not think you could conceivably find a man who could take Mr.

Hutcheson's place in connection with exhibition work. He has been in the service for sixteen or seventeen years. Not only by his marvellous natural capacity for exhibition work, but also by his long experience in international exhibitions, he has achieved an almost unrivalled supremacy in connection with big international exhibitions. To such an extent is this the case that when I was in San Francisco two years ago at the dedication of our building there—the most magnificent building that some of us had ever seen—I was given a luncheon by the president and directors of the Panama-Pacific Exposition at which Col. Hutcheson was present. If my hon. friend had heard the terms in which these gentlemen spoke of the extraordinary ability and efficiency of Col. Hutcheson as commissioner, I think he would have been more than satisfied that it would be almost impossible to get any man in this country who would be equally capable in that class of work. I am glad to bear this testimony to Col. Hutcheson to-night because he is a man who is no longer young, he is 71 or 72 years of age, he has been quite ill lately and I regret very much to say that in the position in which he is placed he is not eligible for superannuation as he would have been were he in the Inside Service. The department and the country owe him a great deal for the extraordinarily efficacious work that he has been doing in the last three years and for the great success which he has had at San Francisco and San Diego where our exhibition elicited the unstinted admiration of the people of the United States. If it had not been for the war that exhibition would have attracted very much more attention but, as it is it would have attracted very much more attention and would have done a work for Canada that perhaps in point of usefulness, could not have been excelled.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I hold no brief to defend the Government, but on this occasion I must say that what the hon. gentleman has just stated is true from beginning to end. As regards exhibitions, Colonel Hutcheson is certainly the best officer that Canada has ever had. He has organized our exhibitions abroad. Colonel Hutcheson is known in every country in the world—in Japan, where he organized the Osaka exhibition; in Italy, where he organized the Milan exhibition; in Belgium, where he organized the Brussels exhibition; in England and in the United States. Colonel Hutcheson has, in fact, had an influence in advertising Canada that no man can imitate. As regards the question of the dual language, there is associated with him a gentleman named Mr. Hains; he has an English name but he is as French as the hon. member for Rimouski or myself.

Mr. BURRELL: Mr. Girardot.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Yes, a French-Canadian from Essex county.

Mr. BURRELL: Mr. Turcotte.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Yes, Mr. Turcotte. I have met them all at two or three exhibitions in Europe. No blame can be laid at the door of the Minister of Agriculture. I have written to the minister very often in French, and he has answered me in French. As regards the last officials mentioned by the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Boulay), Mr. Montizambert, Mr. Charlan and Mr. Grisdale, they all speak French very fluently.

Mr. BOULAY: Where are these Frenchmen—we never meet them.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Have you ever spoken with Mr. Grisdale?

Mr. BOULAY: Yes, he certainly speaks French.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I know many named Ross in Rimouski, and they do not speak English.

Mr. BOULAY: If they speak French, how is it that we see nothing but English names on the list?

Mr. LEMIEUX: I know many Scotch people, who, despite their names, do not speak English. These points are really not worthy of my hon. friend. I am thankful to the Minister of Agriculture for the publication of the Gazette Agricole, a French publication which is spread broadcast in our province, and which contains most useful information for our farmers. This is a precedent. This paper has been published for the first time under the direction of my hon. friend, and so, if the minister does his duty towards my fellow-countrymen in Quebec, and if he is spreading intelligent agricultural knowledge among them, it is not fair to come and say: "Why ignore the French?" At the experimental farm, where our habitants from Quebec come in contact with the department, we have a French secretary. He was appointed by Mr. Fisher. In addition, there are many French officials in the department. It is not at the door of the Minister of Agriculture that a complaint of this kind should be laid.

Mr. BOULAY (translation): I am rather taken aback by the statement of the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) that there are many officials in the Department of Agriculture who speak French fluently Time and again, I personally called at the offices of Mr. John Bright, but could not get myself understood except by an humble stenographer. Out of a dozen employees that I found therein, not one knew any French. I think that in a service as improtant as that presided over by Mr. John Bright, there should be some officers with a knowledge of French. Let the hon. member for Rouville make any denial he cares, the fact remains, unaccountable for me, that of the gentlemen mentioned as having a good command of French, all but one bear French names.

I wrote to the department and recommended to different positions certain French-Canadians who bear French names and in every instance the reply came that the applicants were not qualified. Judging by the answers given to questions which I placed on the Order Paper, I find that only from French-Canadians are those qualifications required. I will quote some of those questions and the answers:

Q. Was the late John Bright, Live Stock Commissioner, a graduate of a Canadian university?—A. No.

Q. If so, what was his degree, the name of the university and in what year?—A. Answer under 1.

Here is another regarding Dr. Torrance:

Q. Is Mr. Frederick Torrance, Director General Veterinary of Canada, a graduate of a Canadian university?—A. A graduate of McGill University, with the following degrees: B.A. in 1878, D.Sc.V. in 1890.

That is twenty-seven years ago, and solely from McGill University. I think the gentleman I recommended to the minister was a graduate of Laval University. I should consider the degrees conferred by a French institution in no way inferior to those conferred by an English university; but the gentleman for whose appointment I applied was turned down, because, I was told, he had failed to pass the examination of the Chicago Veterinary College. I don't see that Dr. Torrance was required to take that last examination. His degrees, obtained as far back as 1878 and 1890, were found quite sufficient. Veterinary science, as any other science, is improving from day to day, and I think that diplomas conferred by Laval University at a recent date must have as much value, to say the least, as those obtained at McGill University in 1878 and 1890.

I say this with some feeling, because, after all, here are the French-Canadians being systematically debarred from appointment in the Department of Agriculture under the pretense that the applicants of that nationality have failed at some examination of the Chicago Veterinary College.

I know whereof I speak. Take the case of Mr. Fixter, one of the officials. He is a splendid gentleman, quite qualified I am sure. I met him in the county of Rimouski where he came to lecture. He knows his work well, but he has no knowledge of French whatever. So he had to take about with him men who certainly have not his experience, and the farmers of my county, being unable to understand his lectures, derive no benefit from his learned disquisitions.

Mr. MORPHY (North Perth): I understand that new regulations have been promulgated by the department presided over by the hon. the Minister of Agriculture, and from information I have received, it would appear that these rules will entirely disrupt a lifelong practice in regard to the manufacture, boxing and curing of cheese in Western Ontario, and I believe also in Eastern Ontario. In the county that I have the honour to represent we have a very large number of cheese factories. In one township of that county alone there are nine factories within the confines of the township and four on the border or, in other words, Elma, a township of 67,000 acres, contains within it nine factories, with four on the border, serving the patrons of these 67,000 acres, or a factory to every 5,000 acres, which is probably one of the most densely covered cheese manufacturing districts in the country. The practice of the farmers there has been to manufacture and cure their cheese and box and ship them f.o.b. at the nearest station, where they have been paid their money. My correspondent points out that the new regulations promulgated or approved by the minister involve, among other things, the question of price, the present establishment being 21¾ cents per pound. The gentleman who writes to me points out that he met the commission in Montreal a few days ago and was furnished with a copy of the rules, and while I am not a practical expert on cheese, I adopt the objections that he raises, so that the hon. minister may, if he feels inclined to do so, consider them, and if there is an injustice, remedy it. He says that the rules are entirely unfair to Western Ontario cheese manufacturers and that they put the factory men at a great disadvantage; and more especially is it a disadvantage to the dairyman himself, the man who makes the cheese. And that man who makes the cheese is not an individual unit; he is there by thousands, engaged in an industry which is of moment to-day when the question of food products is a live issue. We are all asking the farmers of the country to produce and produce and produce again; that is the cry that has gone forth. So I submit that under these circumstances the Government should be inclined to facilitate production and make the pathway of the real producer easy. My correspondent claims that the rules are entirely framed for the benefit of Montreal produce dealers and against the best interests of the farmers who produce the cheese. That is rather an alarming statement, in these days when we are asking the farmers of the country to do their best. He says that under the new rules cheese has to be inspected, weighed, coopered, and such like in Montreal. For fifty years cheese has been inspected, weighed, coopered, and manufactured at home in the factories of the farmers I represent, and what justification the minister can have for disrupting the policy of a lifetime, changing the whole current of trade, making the farmer send his cheese to Montreal, there to be prepared for export when he has been in the habit of doing it at home, I should like the minister to tell me.

Mr. EDWARDS: How much cheese from Western Ontario goes to Montreal?

Mr. MORPHY: I cannot give the figures, but from the complaint made here by this man, who is an expert in the business, it seems to be alarming to him. I cannot answer that question, but I know that in one section alone in my county in an ordinary year there is about three-quarters of a million dollars worth of cheese produced; that is an average crop produced and sold in one district, so that it is a very big industry.

Mr. EDWARDS: It might be sold out of one township, but my information is that for a number of years comparatively little cheese from west of Peterborough has gone out of this country by way of Montreal.

Mr. MORPHY: The hon. gentleman may be right or he may be wrong.

Mr. WEBSTER: He is right.

Mr. MORPHY: When a cheese expert like my hon. friend from Brockville says he is right, I am satisfied he is right; but whether he is right or wrong makes no difference in my case. The practice of the past may change to-morrow. Conditions are upside down, topsy turvy, and when a man of the reputation of Thomas Ballentyne, of Stratford, recognized as one of the big men of the cheese industry in Canada, one of the expert men, one of the largest exporters, writes me that the conditions are alarming, it is my duty, representing that county, to place the facts before the minister. He says that cheese will be inspected in Montreal. For a lifetime it has been inspected at the factory at home. Does the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) say that that is not true?

Mr. EDWARDS: Yes.

Mr. MORPHY: Why?

Mr. EDWARDS: Because it is not in accordance with the facts.

Mr. MORPHY: It is an easy thing to say that. The hon. gentleman will probably put my correspondent and me right when he speaks to the question. In the meantime, I accept the facts as stated by a gentleman such as the gentleman who has written to me, who says:

> The rules that have been promulgated will necessitate all our farmers having to wait until this grading at Montreal is done, which would mean considerable time.

This would cause a disrupted condition among the farmers of the county.

He says further that they > Suggested to the Commission that one man look after the inspection in Western Ontario. And in this event—

And I ask the minister to pay particular attention to this—> —the cheese could all be shipped to our different warehouses at Stratford, Ingersoll, Woodstock and London, and the grading done there.

So that the factory men would then be paid in the course of a very few days for the shipment of their cheese. He says that possibly this matter has been submitted to the Minister of Agriculture, but he has no assurance as to what the minister is going to do about it. He says that the matter should be rectified, as it means that the farmers of Ontario will suffer the disadvantage of a considerably lower price than those of eastern Ontario. I notice that the member for Frontenac and the member for Brockville, both from eastern Ontario, for some reason seem to be perfectly satisfied, whereas western Ontario seems to be very much dissatisfied. Is it because the eastern Ontario cheese is shipped green?

Mr. WEBSTER: No, it is because the western men are hard to please.

Mr. MORPHY: Is it because western cheese is shipped in perfect condition, free from shrinkage? Is it because it is of a very much finer quality than that produced in eastern Ontario? This letter proceeds to say:—

> It means that our western farmers will have to suffer considerably less prices than Eastern Ontario, because it may be necessary for our western dealers to open up warehouses in Montreal.

If these rules and regulations compel the western dealers to open warehouses in Montreal—indeed, they would, in fact, be forced to do so—thereby causing the farmers of western Ontario additional expense, the mere mention of the fact should cause the minister to look into it and see that this is prevented.

The writer says, also, that one of the results will be the double handling of the cheese. Any one who knows anything about the handling of products in large quantities, having regard to the cost of transportation, knows that it costs money. Double handling simply doubles the cost, and the result is a great drawback to all concerned and a tendency towards the lessening of production. The farmers will be driven out of the cheese business if the minister does not make such regulations as will encourage rather than discourage the making of cheese. The writer says that the double handling of the cheese would be necessary because they would have to be sent to the warehouses to make up carload lots of 500 boxes. In other words, the cheese would have to be centered in these places, which would be distributing points. The cheese would have to be brought there instead of being put on the car at the nearest station to our factory, and then sent to a central warehouse so as to make up a carload lot. From there the cheese would be rehandled and shipped to Montreal. Mr. Ballantyne points out that the matter was taken up by the Western Ontario Dairymen's Association at Woodstock on June 6, and that the dairymen are up in arms about it—rebellious, indignant. He says that the matter will come up in my county this week, at Listowel, which is the biggest cheese board in western Ontario. I think, that I am within my rights and privileges when I ask the minister to look into this matter. May I ask the minister—I asked the question yesterday, but did not get an answer—whether he consulted the Association of Dairymen of Western Ontario before these rules were framed and promulgated? Did he consult the farmers who make the cheese? Where did he get his information? Did he rely upon some big interests in the city of Montreal, entirely ignoring the farmers of western Ontario? I do not say that is so, but there is a suspicion that that was done. Either that occurred, or the rights of the man on the farm were overlooked—the man who raises the milk that produces the cheese which is the subject of this discussion. I ask on his behalf that the minister give this matter careful and intelligent consideration, in the hope that the people of western Ontario will get that justice to which the honourable nature of their calling entitles them.

9 p.m.

Mr. BURRELL. The department has framed no new regulations upsetting the channels of trade, or anything of that kind. I could not for a moment, as Minister of Agriculture, undertake to control or supervise the work of the commission or suggest or dictate to the cheese commissioner. It would involve endless difficulty and dispute, and would have no satisfactory results.

Mr. MORPHY: Who is responsible for the creation of this board?

Mr. BURRELL: It is true that we, with the British Government are, in a sense, responsible. From the fact that between the British Government and ourselves a commission was appointed to secure surplus Canadian cheese and to arrange the matter in a satisfactory way, it does not follow that I am in a position to control the commission. It is obvious that I could not do so. As a matter of fact, if the British Government had adopted the plan of sending men out to buy such cheese as they could transport across the ocean, very much worse conditions might have arisen. We asked them not to eliminate the ordinary machinery of the cheese trade, pointing out that this machinery is complicated and adapted to the conditions connected with the manufacture and sale of cheese in Canada, and that to deal with the matter through another system would have a tendency to upset things. This cheese board, therefore, is communicating with all the interests concerned. We have nothing to say about the price. The British Government decided what price they could afford to pay. We understood that they did not expect to pay more than 19 cents, which was the price they paid New Zealand. We made such arguments in the matter as my hon. friend himself would probably make, and they finally adopted the price of 21¾ cents. The commission is making such arrangements, by the adoption of regulations or machinery, or whatever you like to call it, as will secure that cheese f.o.b. Montreal, in grades that are practically known to the trade, in order that the British Government, while getting it in the simplest and easiest way, will do no injustice to any part of the community. There is, of course, no obligation to sell; there is no compulsion in any shape or form. I shall be very glad indeed to have my hon. friend's remarks as they appear in Hansard sent to the Cheese Commission, with the request that they give his remarks their particular attention and do what they can to obviate any difficulty and to prevent any friction of this kind.

Mr. WEBSTER: I think that the friend of the member for North Perth (Mr. Morphy) in Stratford is taking the position of the spoiled boy. Mr. Ballantyne has been an exporter of cheese from the western part of Ontario. To-day he finds that it is impossible to get a quotation for contract rates across the ocean to Liverpool. I think the Commission is right in the way that it decided to do business. Any man who has been in the trade as long as Mr. Ballantyne has is quite capable of inspecting cheese; the same may be said of any man in his employ. Speaking generally, one may say that no poor cheese is being manufactured to-day in Canada, because the man who makes poor cheese is driven out of business. We in Canada profess to make the best cheese in the world and I am proud of our reputation in that respect. If Mr. Ballantyne is dissatisfied with the report that he gets from the inspector at Montreal, all he has to do is to go there and look after his own interests, just as I do and just as many other men do. I am satisfied with the work of the man who inspects this cheese each week. I try to be in Montreal each week during the operations of the cheese trade and I am satisfied that the cheese is properly inspected. That has been the situation in regard to cheese inspection during the past two years.

Mr. STEELE: Should a cheese buyer in Western Onario buy his cheese as first grade and ship it as first grade, is there any likelihood that there will be any change in it when it reaches Montreal?

Mr. WEBSTER: None at all. The only possible trouble that could arise would be if he shipped it in a very high temperature in an exposed car. If he put it into a refrigerator car at Stratford, it would be in good condition when it reached Montreal.

Mr. STEELE: There is practically no change in policy?

Mr. WEBSTER: No. Mr. Ballantyne has been able to do away with the difficulty of coopering. All the cheese that went to the British army was formerly taken out of the cheese box and put into a square case bound with two iron bands.

Mr. MORPHY: All that can be done at Montreal.

Mr. WEBSTER: It can be done more easily at Stratford. There are two iron bands now put around the cheese box.

Mr. MORPHY: Our cheese is not so strong as to require that.

Mr. WEBSTER: The hon. gentleman speaks of all the storage facilities of this country. The situation is simply this: No other city in America has as great storage facilities as has the city of Montreal. In that city you can have goods stored at any temperature from fifty degrees down, and that is why the commission is going to take advantage of those storage facilities. In regard to the weights, why should not the commission in Montreal get sixteen ounces to the pound just as any other dealer receives? That is the situation. These questions have all to be considered by the commission, and I must compliment the Minister of Agriculture on the businesslike manner in which the commission has handled this very great industry.

Mr. GLASS: I have received to-day two communications from cheese organizations in my district in western Ontario, but the only objection raised is as to the need of inspection being confined to Montreal. I presume that it is the general custom to collect the cheese at centres to which suitable side shipments are made to make up carloads, and I would like the minister, if the matter is worthy of his consideration, to bring to the attention of the commission the fact that certain objections are raised in western Ontario, and to see if any means can be found to facilitate the inspection of cheese at central points of shipment. That would give satisfaction to the cheese manufacturers in my district.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: I wish to get some information from the minister in regard to a matter that does not properly come under this item. I think it would properly fall under item 45.

Mr. BURRELL: I do not know what my hon. friend is going to speak about, but if he can confine his remarks to an item that comes up it would be desirable, because we are wandering all around this item. At the present moment we are discussing an item on exhibitions.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: My remarks would more properly fall under an item that has already been passed, but when the item was brought up I was absent through no fault of my own, but on account of illness, and I shall be obliged if the minister will give me the information. Some years ago the farmers in Prince Edward Island were greatly troubled in regard to a disease called powdery scab that was alleged to be amongst our potatoes, but during the past two years we have heard very little about it, and during the last year we have heard nothing about it. Has the disease disappeared, or partially disappeared, or is there any danger of its coming back? If it has disappeared it is important for the farmers to know that. Are any steps being taken to prevent its recurrence?

Mr. BURRELL: I cannot tell my hon. friend if that disease has disappeared, and I very much doubt that. We did entertain very great apprehensions as to the ravages of powdery scab, and in the Botanical Division of our plant pathologists are still working on it. Fortunately, it did not prove as serious as was anticipated, and I think that by better methods of cultivation and by a better selection of seeds, we are having it eliminated. I will call my officer's attention to the matter and give my hon. friend information in regard to it.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: It was stated at a conference that met at Washington that this disease was very widespread in the Maritime Provinces and particularly Prince Edward Island. If it has disappeared, I think it would be the duty of the department or the minister to bring that fact to the attention of the proper authorities in the United States, and to take whatever steps may be deemed advisable to have the embargo that was imposed against our potatoes removed.

Mr. BURRELL: My hon. friend is under a misapprehension. I took that matter up personally with the authorities at Washington and went into it very thoroughly. We had that embargo lifted some time ago, adopted a position which would allow any of our potatoes to come in as long as they had not more than a certain percentage—I have forgotten the exact percentage—of disease, including powdery scab and other diseases of less importance. Therefore, there has been practically free importation of potatoes into that country for some time past. We advise the United States authorities from time to time of conditions in this country.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: As I understand the matter, potatoes have to be inspected at the point of shipment?

Mr. BURRELL: No, at point of entry into the United States.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: The minister understands that no person in Canada could undertake the risk of shipping potatoes to the United States with a possibility of having them rejected, because the expense of bringing them back to Canada would mean the loss of the shipment. The regulation is of no practical value.

Mr. BURRELL: Oh, yes.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: Unless we could secure a regulation to have our potatoes inspected at point of shipment, or unless the American authorities would be willing to accept a certificate from Canadian officers, it would be impossible to carry on the trade.

Mr. BURRELL: Is my hon. friend aware of any rejections having occurred in the East?

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: No person could undertake to ship potatoes under those regulations.

Mr. BURRELL: Probably there have been half a million or a million bushels of potatoes shipped into the United States this year; in fact, there has been a complaint that too many potatoes have been shipped out of this country into the United States. The United States are not going to give up the power of examining goods that come into their country, but they are carrying out that regulation in a broad way. Unless the potatoes are in such a badly diseased condition as not to be a credit to Canada to be shipped out of the country, there is no trouble at all, and with the exception of a very few shipments which should not have been made to any market, there has been practically no trouble, and out of the enormous quantity of potatoes that have been sent out this last year from the East, so far as I know, there has not been a single rejection.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: The minister may be correct in regard to shipments from New Brunswick, but I know that no shipments have been made from Prince Edward Island except when the potatoes have been purchased by citizens of the United States who have come to the province to buy them. The risk otherwise would be too great.

Mr. BURRELL: As excellent potatoes are grown in Prince Edward Island, there should be no difficulty.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: Unfortunately the United States people got the information that our potatoes were diseased, and that has been a great hindrance to the trade.

Mr. BURRELL: We will do all we can to alleviate the trouble.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: The difficulty arose through information being given to the American people which was not in accordance with the facts.

Mr. OLIVER: What exhibition work is going on at the present time and what is in prospect?

Mr. BURRELL: We have practically closed up our exhibition work. The Panama-Pacific International Exposition at San Francisco closed a year ago last January. San Diego was holding an exhibition at the same time called the Panama-California Exposition, and they were exceedingly anxious for us to exhibit there. Delegations, including the president, came down here twice from San Diego, but we decided that we could not exhibit in both places. As the war was on and there would be no travel in Europe, but a great deal through Southern California, they decided to keep the San Diego Exposition going for another year. They had a large guarantee from the city of Los Angeles to help them financially, and they finally made such an exceedingly generous offer that I felt we would be justified in accepting it. They gave us the finest building in San Diego, paid for the transportation of the whole exhibit from San Francisco to San Diego, and gave us free light, free water, and guards for the exhibition as well. Under these conditions we moved the exhibit to San Diego, where it has been seen probably by three or four million visitors. The exhibition was kept going until last March when, as there were no other big international exhibitions in sight, although we did have a proposition to go to Washington and to another place which would have involved very heavy expense, we came to the conclusion to pack up the exhibit and store it at Ottawa.

Mr. OLIVER: What is to be the expenditure under this vote?

Mr. BURRELL: It is for the payment of the staff and the transfer of the exhibit to Ottawa. It is a very large exhibit, and will cost a considerable amount to pack up and transport.

Mr. OLIVER: I think there has been an annual grant for a Dominion Exhibition?

Mr. BURRELL: That is a separate item for a Dominion exhibition in the big centres of each province. It was Nova Scotia's turn this year, but as their buildings had been taken over for military purposes, and on account of the dislocation caused by the war, they decided not to hold the exhibition, and we are not asking for a vote this year.

Mr. OLIVER: The exhibition staff will be disbanded?

Mr. BURRELL: Yes.

For renewing and improving Canadian exhibition at Imperial Institute, London, and assisting in the maintenance thereof, $5,000.

Mr. MACDONALD: Will the minister tell us what this is about?

Mr. BURRELL: I have not seen the exhibit for a long time, so I cannot tell my hon. friend much about it. I think each Dominion contributes so much to keep the exhibit going.

Mr. MACDONALD: The Imperial Institute has been criticised in the English press and declared to be of no value whatever. Every now and then some body of men on the other side of the water develop some fad, get an organization going, and come on the overseas dominion for grants to run some exhibition that is of no interest to the general public. It may be a club or an exhibit of this kind. Unless there is some real merit in this Institute, I do not see why we should spend this money, especially in war time.

Mr. BURRELL: I am not disposed to dispute very much what my hon. friend says; I am not enthusiastically defending this Institute. It is to some extent a matter of sentiment, and we have been asked to keep up our share of the maintenance expenses.

Mr. MACDONALD: Who runs it, what is it about, and what is its genesis?

Mr. BURRELL: I think it was started towards the end of the reign of Queen Victoria, with the idea of exhibiting some of the natural resources and products of the great dominions beyond the sea. Lord Strathcona was very keenly interested in the Institute, I believe.

Mr. MACDONALD: I remember when I was on the other side some years ago, I could not find out anything about this place. I think the minister will find that it is run by a coterie of some gentlemen with a fad of their own, to which they wish the dominions to contribute. I saw a very strong criticism of the institute in an English newspaper last winter, which pointed out that it was of very little use.

Mr. BURRELL: I shall be glad to make further inquiries about it.

Health of animals, $570,000.

Mr. McCOIG: A year ago when a similar vote was under consideration by the House I drew the attention of the Acting Minister of Agriculture to the fact that the different stock dealers and abattoir companies were extorting from the purchasers of all hogs a commission of one-half of one per cent for inspection. The impression went out that this was the Government inspection fee. The acting Minister of last year gave me the assurance that the department would look into the matter and see that this unfair practice was stopped. I have here a statement of Dunn and Levack, a live stock firm in Toronto, for stock sold to Mr. Ferguson, of the township of Raleigh, and at the bottom it says, "Inspection on hogs one-half of 1 per cent." This practice is followed by the stock merchants of the country, as well as by the abattoir companies. A statement I have here shows that the number of hogs purchased and sold in Canada for the year ending March 31, 1916, was 2,363,693, which at the average price of hogs for the year, would amount to about $59,000,000. The number of hogs condemned was 6,582, which, at the average price of $25, would represent a value of $164,000. One-half of one per cent on the value of the hogs purchased in that year would amount to $290,000. This is the amount collected by the abbatoirs. So there was a clear gain to these different concerns of over $125,000. This amount the abattoirs and commission purchasing houses have extracted from the pockets of the farmers. And, even though we should admit their right to take the whole of the $164,000, they clearly have no right whatever to this extra sum. Feeling that the department is anxious to have this matter rectified, I would suggest to the minister that it would be only fair to take it up with these different concerns. If they are going to continue to rob the public as in the past, it might be advisable for the department to take over the hogs that are condemned at a price and compel the abattoirs to cease altogether this unfair charge. I should be glad if the minister would give this his most serious attention and, if possible, find some means to stop the unfair practice that is going on.

Mr. BURRELL: This matter has come to our attention once or twice before, but I shall be glad to take it up again. It is easy for these concerns, of course, to make up the statement in the form my hon. friend has mentioned, but it has a misleading effect so far as the owner of the hogs is concerned, because it leads him to think that they are transferring to him a charge that they have to pay to us. But that is not the case, because we do not charge them for inspection, for that service is maintained at the public expense. What they do, of course, is to try to recoup themselves for the amount of condemnations for which they receive no compensation. And in the practical working out of the system, it is extremely difficult to identify the hogs. But these concerns have no business to put it in a misleading way, nor have they the right to make a charge under a misleading heading in order to cover their losses.

Mr. McCOIG: Would it be possible, if they continue making this charge against the producer, to provide for it in some way in these Estimates? It seems most unjust that the abbatoirs should reap a harvest in this unfair manner. If there is any way by which the department could compel these companies to cease this way of operating, I feel satisfied it would meet with the hearty approval of the producers throughout the country.

Mr. NESBITT: Was there much animal disease in the country last year—much cholera among hogs or glanders among horses? Or what were the principal troubles?

Mr. BURRELL: The situation as to the disease among our herds is very much better than it has ever been before in the history of the country. In glanders, whereas in 1913-14 the sum of $34,000 was paid for compensation for animals slaughtered, this has gradually worked down until last year we paid only $20,709. Hog cholera, which four years ago cost us $61,000, and the following year $190,000, we have cut down to the lowest point in the country's experience

—$27,000, involving the destruction of 4,400 animals. Dourine, with which we had great trouble in the West—hon. members from Alberta will know about it—cost us at one time $48,000, later $32,000; and now it is down to only $3,900 for the killing of 32 animals. This means that the disease is practically under control. Altogether, so far as all these scheduled diseases go, the country never was in a better condition than at present.

Mr. NESBITT: I congratulate the minister and his department on that happy condition. I understood—I do not now recall the source of my information—that the minister had circularized the country to the effect that he was paying some compensation for the slaughter of cattle affected with tuberculosis.

Mr. BURRELL: Two or three years ago we took up the question of bovine tuberculosis, in the hope of reducing it, if not eradicating it completely. It is a very difficult subject, as the hon. member (Mr. Nesbitt) knows. We passed regulations by which we could take up with any of the municipalities, which number over 5,000, the question of trying to eliminate tuberculosis in the herds that supply the dairies of the cities. We took it up in this way, because we thought the first step to be taken should be to protect the people in the cities who—especially the children—are rather helpless in regard to contaminated and infected milk. But the only city that went into this work thoroughly was the city of Saskatoon. The authorities of that city took advantage of our regulations. These regulations provide that the city must have a sanitary inspector of the dairies, to compel conformity with the conditions we have laid down as to the space to be allowed for each animal, the light, ventilation, and so on. Then we would, from time to time, subject the cattle to the tuberculin test and destroy reactors or separate them, giving their owners certain compensation. The difficulty was that the compensation was not quite enough. We found that it would be more helpful towards the desired end if we increased the amount of compensation so that men owning infected cattle would not be so much afraid to come in and take advantage of our inspection. Also, we made provision in reference to the herds that were not entirely free from tuberculosis, that the milk might be sold so long as it was pasteurized, as pasteurizing eliminates the possibility of transmitting the tuberculosis from the bovine to the human form. Under these regulations, passed a couple of months ago, we expected to have a number of municipalities take up the work in conjunction with the department and regulate the business as in Saskatoon, where they have brought the whole thing down to less than two per cent.

Mr. NESBITT: What amount is allowed for each animal now?

Mr. BURRELL: We allow $40. Before that we allowed one-third of the maximum valuation, which is $60. Afterwards we raised it to two-thirds, and, as the owner has the salvage, he may realize the full amount.

Mr. GLASS: It is unfortunate in the interest of the public health that municipalities did not more generally avail themselves of the assistance which the Government afforded towards eradicating tuberculosis among the herds in their several districts. What method has been adopted of acquainting the municipalities which are eligible for assistance under this Act of the changed conditions? I think it has been evident in the past that while the Government has attempted to lend assistance, that assistance has not been attractive enough to encourage the municipalities to take any interest in it, largely by reason of the inadequate compensation. The conditions having been changed during the past month or two, I would think it very important, if the municipalities are to avail themselves of the assistance offered by the Government, that they should be properly acquainted with the conditions.

Mr. BURRELL: Not only were the regulations published in the Gazette, but we also circularized the medical health officers of all the municipalities.

Mr. NESBITT: In addition to the municipalities, do the department take it up with individual farmers? Will they pay compensation to an individual farmer if he takes that means of ridding his herd of tuberculosis?

Mr. BURRELL: That is a very big undertaking to start at the present time. The best we can do at the present time is to deal with the municipalities. If we started with individuals it would become a tremendous task. That would be the most practical step in the education looking to the eradication of bovine tuberculosis in Canada, but no country in the world has adopted it. If we were to make it compulsory for the province of Ontario alone we would get into enormous difficulties.

Mr. NESBITT: My suggestion was not that you should make it compulsory, but suppose you let is be known to individual farmers that you would pay an indemnity of, say, $40 for each animal slaughtered, the farmer would report cases themselves. I understand that the department still supplies tuberculin to individual farmers who send for it?

Mr. BURRELL: Yes.

Mr. NESBITT: In that case the farmer might take it up himself if he knew he would be compensated for the cattle he would have to slaughter. I do not mean that the department should use compulsion. But, as you know, a great many cattle that are affected with tuberculosis are sold for what are called canners and cutters. I do not know that that is a very nice thing to make bully beef out of, but still there are a great many cattle of that class picked up by drovers and sold to the canning factory.

Mr. BURRELL: Of course, the tuberculous cattle that my hon. friend is referring to would be condemned in the abattoir although they would not be if they were sold to the ordinary butcher. The provinces and municipalities cannot disassociate themselves from responsibility in this matter because they have power, with ourselves to deal with the question locally. We supply tuberculin to test animals to any farmer who wants to find out if he has tuberculous cattle. It is quite true that we have not paid compensation for the reason that if we started that we do not know where it would end. In British Columbia the Provincial Government took it up as a domestic question and they passed an Act providing for the inspection, slaughter and compensation of animals. It is open to any province, or any district, to do it, but it would be a task of tremendous magnitude to go as far as my hon. friend suggests. We have already taken one step forward and I do not say that we will not take another.

Mr. NESBITT: There must be some way of getting around the inspection. My hon. friend says that cattle affected with tuberculosis would be condemned at the abattoir?

Mr. BURRELL: Yes.

Mr. NESBITT: As a matter of fact, the cattle are shipped to the abattoir.

Mr. BURRELL: They are condemned.

Mr. NESBITT: The drover is like the rest of us; he would not continue to buy cattle liable to be condemned, and which would entail loss. The drovers do buy such cattle and they ship them to the abattoir.

Mr. BURRELL: The percentage of cattle condemned is of course not so large as the case of hogs.

Mr. NESBITT: Only the parts affected are condemned?

Mr. BURRELL: Yes.

Mr. NESBITT: Part of the beast might pass inspection and the part that is affected would be condemned?

Mr. BURRELL: Yes.

Mr. McCOIG: Has the serum treatment been used by the officers of the department as a preventitive against hog cholera, if so, has it proved satisfactory, and can the minister give the committee an idea of how many hogs have been treated during the past year and what saving was made?

Mr. BURRELL: It has been very satisfactory. The saving to the department would probably be about $35,000 last year as a result of applying the serum treatment to contact hogs. In a district in which hog cholera has broken out we condemn those affected with the disease, treat the contacts and if necessary they are slaughtered on the premises.

Mr. EDWARDS: Have steps been taken to prevent the feeding of garbage to hogs unless the garbage has been treated?

Mr. BURRELL: Yes, I would say to my hon. friend that in the last two years the majority of the outbreaks of hog cholera have been directly traceable to the feeding of uncooked garbage. In the United States, where they inoculate altogether and do not slaughter as we do, it has been found that a hog may be immune and yet he may be absolutely a carrier of disease. If uncooked garbage containing the germs of the disease are fed to hogs it will transmit hog cholera and in the majority of cases we have found it directly traceable to the feeding of uncooked garbage. Last year we framed regulations providing that no man should feed uncooked garbage, or if he did, he would run the risk of having no compensation at all. That has had its effect. We have gone a little further and now we have instituted a system of licenses so that no man can feed any garbage of this kind unless he is licensed and the officers of the department see that that man is properly equipped with cooking apparatus so that he will be able to cook all the garbage.

Mr. NESBITT: Does the minister's department look after it in Ontario?

Mr. BURRELL: Everywhere.

Mr. NESBITT: We need not depend on the Ontario Government?

Mr. BURRELL: No, we do it everywhere throughout the country.

Mr. NESBITT: I know some people who feed garbage without any cooking.

Mr. BURRELL: We do not make it operative against the farmer on his own premises but it is applied to the garbage that is collected from hotels and places of that kind.

Mr. MACDONALD: Has anything been arranged with regard to the removal of the embargo on cattle shipments to England, of which the Prime Minister spoke a short time ago?

Mr. BURRELL: We have no official information. The Prime Minister took it up with the authorities in England and had very satisfactory assurances. All I know is what I saw in the press a while ago, that they did for the first time admit that there was no disease in Canada that warranted them in continuing the embargo on the ground of disease. They admitted that frankly. But my recollection of the press item was that it was not a practical question at this time because it would be hardly possible to import any cattle from Canada inasmuch as they were trying to keep down their herds in Great Britain on account of the demand for cereals of all kinds for human consumption.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Do they admit that the disease never did exist in Canada? I have read in the life of Sir Charles Tupper that on one occasion he went to Liverpool and proved in the presence of experts that there was no such thing as pleuro-pneumonia in our cattle.

Mr. BURRELL: I think they admit it now.

Mr. GLASS: What steps are taken to enforce the regulations with respect to this important matter of the feeding of uncooked garbage? The regulations are good if they are properly enforced, and I presume that some method has been adopted to meet that need.

[Mr. Burrell.]

Mr. BURRELL: As a matter of fact, we have been too short-handed to carry out, in as comprehensive a way as we should like, the inspection of this garbage feeding. We are doing the best we can, keeping a very close watch and prosecuting in some cases and much has been accomplished. I have now under consideration the strengthening of that service by the employment of men who are not veterinaries to do educational work.

Mr. NESBITT: Does the minister operate through the local veterinary surgeons, or has he his own inspectors?

Mr. BURRELL: Our own inspectors.

For the administration and enforcement of the Meat and Canned Foods Act, $325,000.

Mr. NESBITT: There is an increase in that vote.

Mr. BURRELL: The increase is due to the normal expansion of the packing business in Canada. The business steadily increased last year and, as my hon. friend knows, directly a packing establishment is able to carry on interprovincial or export trade, its operations must be conducted under the inspection of our department. The increase in that work practically accounts for the whole increase in the item.

Mr. NESBITT: You keep the officers in the packing establishments without expense to the packers?

Mr. BURRELL: Yes.

Publications Branch, $30,000.

Mr. NESBITT: I would suggest to the Minister that he take steps to give wider distribution to the publications of his department, particularly those showing the results of successful experiments and of good business practice, in regard to stock raising, and other branches of farming.

Mr. BURRELL: The Publications Branch as it stands at present is a connecting link between the Department of Agriculture and the public. By its operations the agricultural community and all interested are provided with the annual and other reports of the several branches, as well as with the pamphlet booklets, circulars, leaflets, and similar publications issued under the auspices of the department. During the past few years, the system of distribution has been improved and the volume of circulation much increased. A little time ago each branch of the Agricultural Department issued its own publications and paid for them—ran its own show, as it were. These have all been consolidated now under a special branch, the Publications Branch. Until the present system was organized in 1912 each branch distributed its own publications. The lists were small and much of the addressing was done by hand. These lists, involving French and division lists numbering twenty-seven, included about 150,000 English and French names. The lists have been since that consolidated, reclassified and developed until upwards of 306,000 people are receiving our bulletins, and are directly reached by the information afforded by investigation, research and study at the experimental farms and the livestock, dairy and other branches. The classifications now include subdivisions so arranged that the applicants are sent publications on the subjects desired and only these.

There is no use in sending them to any one who will destroy them or not put them to good use. Under a system of combinations, it is arranged that when a publication, such as Seasonable Hints, including information on several branches of agriculture, is sent to all the mailing lists, one copy only is addressed to one person. The lists are maintained on metal stencils from which envelopes are addressed by machinery that handles from 20,000 to 25,000 addresses per day. Great progress has been made in reaching the farmers of the country. Application cards showing the subjects embraced by the several mailing lists are sent to the farmers on rural routes and made available to visitors at fairs and exhibitions. These cards are mailed also to those who apply for publications and who are not already on the lists. From these sources many applications are received and classified as required. The following table indicates the growth of the lists and shows the number of publications mailed during each of the five past fiscal years:

	No. on Lists.	No. of Publications.	No. Mailed.
1913..	168,292	48	1,450,000
1914..	178,000	59	1,069,433
1915..	202,000	46	1,806,454
1916..	240,000	66	3,091,345
1917..	306,200	62	3,206,718
Total in five years..			10,624,040

That will give the hon. gentlemen an idea of how we are trying to push this work. It is not all easy, but we are getting on very much faster than a great many people realize. In addition to the publications that are sent out as I have stated special publications are sent to those who ask for them.

For the development of the live stock industry, $700,000.

Mr. NESBITT: What steps is the minister taking towards the development of the live stock industry?

Mr. BURRELL: Development is taking place along a great many lines. For instance, two years ago we inaugurated a plan of giving assistance to fairs. The live stock interests were exceedingly anxious that the Government should supply a large amount of money for the establishment of a large central live stock show, along the lines of that held from time to time in Chicago. They came to us with a proposal that would involve an expenditure of $250,000 or more. We looked into the matter carefully, and I told the various delegations that before we would undertake to do anything it would be necessary that the live stock interests throughout the country should be harmonized. That is, they should agree upon a method and upon a place where the proposed fair should be held. The further they went the more difficult it became to reconcile the different interests concerned. Having regard to our geographical conditions, naturally it was difficult for them to agree upon a central place for the holding of the exhibition. Finally it seemed that the whole project would break down, and as we were convinced that it was desirable to assist the development of the live stock industry, we laid down a plan under which any exhibition that had given a prize list of $5,000 for the utility classes of live stock in a previous year should get a grant of $2,500 to assist that feature of the fair. We agreed to give half the amount of their prize list in the previous year, limiting the amount to $5,000. Speaking off-hand, about twenty or thirty fairs throughout the country took advantage of this provision, which has been operating during the last three years, and still continues. Owing to the war conditions, and, in some cases, to the buildings being taken up by the military authorities, some of the fairs have found it difficult to continue their work. We are trying, however, to encourage it; we do not think that it should be dropped. This year we are reducing the amount which must have been given in prizes on a previous year, with a view to giving more assistance to the winter and spring shows, which are confined to the exhibition of the utility classes of live-stock. Probably we shall reduce the amount to $2,500, so that any livestock fair, which, in a previous year, gave prizes amounting to $2,500 will receive another $2,500 to assist that feature of their show. This applies to those shows which have no other attraction than that of livestock, and which do not strongly attract those members of the public who are not interested in livestock.

Mr. NESBITT: It is rumoured that the department sometimes sends stock to various localities to encourage the breeding of better animals, and that sometimes this stock is not used for breeding purposes. I heard the other day about somebody who was ploughing with a bull that my hon. friend sent out. Has the minister ever heard of anything of that kind being done? Is there much buying of sires for localities and giving them to those localities free?

Mr. BURRELL: Without dealing with this special case mentioned by my hon. friend of a bull ploughing—although that is very good work in these days—we did establish about three or four years ago—and it was work in which Mr. John Bright was very much interested—the practice, for improving the herds of Canada, of the department purchasing pure bred sires, and then when associations were formed to undertake the maintenance and care of the animals, we would lend them to them under certain regulations which were promulgated by the department and assented to by the associations. Under that policy which has been under way for about three years—this is the fourth year—we have distributed throughout Canada more than 3,000 animals, that is, bulls, stallions, rams and boars. There were about 1,200 bulls altogether. A great number of these have gone to outlying points of the community or to backward portions of the various provinces where the herds have been of a very poor class, where inbreeding has been practised, where scrub bulls have been running around at large and all that sort of thing, so that the livestock industry of those particular sections, instead of being built up on sound, progressive lines, has been the reverse. If I had time, I do not think I would have difficulty in showing that this work has been immensely appreciated throughout the country, and that it has done an immense amount of good. The hon. member can quite understand that, in the distribution throughout all parts of the country of 3,000 animals, during a period of three or four years, in certain parts of the country where the people are not intelligent there is some difficulty in having the regulations lived up to. It is true that in the province of Quebec, to which the hon. member probably alludes, in the case of one or two associations we did have a little trouble where the people were particularly ignorant and did not appear to understand the regulations. These associations, for instance, bind themselves to provide a caretaker who should look after the animal and keep it in proper condition, and they are to pay him for his services. A few of the associations forgot to do this; the caretaker would have the animal, and, as it was not being paid for by any body, he would become careless and would not pay any attention to it at all. In that way we did have some difficulties, but we are getting them all cleared up, and the percentage of them is so infinitesimal in proportion to the number of animals sent out throughout the country that it is hardly worth while considering.

Mr. NESBITT: You send the animals out under certain regulations?

Mr. BURRELL: Yes.

Mr. NESBITT: Is the department concerned with some horse breeding association from which we frequently receive circulars?

Mr. BURRELL: No.

Mr. NESBITT: It was supposed that the King had recently sent a horse out to some association either here or in Montreal.

Mr. BURRELL: I think my hon. friend is probably alluding to the National Bureau of Breeding in Montreal. Some years ago we did assist that bureau very considerably, and my hon. friend and some other hon. members may remember a strong discussion that took place in this House about three years ago in which our action and the work of the bureau came in for a good deal of criticism. The year after that we ceased giving assistance to the bureau, and we instituted a different system, partly by establishing this policy I have referred to in the purchase and distribution of stallions, and partly by assisting the horse breeding associations or clubs which we are now keeping up and developing on much stronger lines. If any association of farmers who are interested in the horse question club together and form an association under certain rules, and want to secure the services, for instance, of a first-class horse of any particular breed, and the man who owns it may say: Well, it is not to my interest to keep a horse of this kind here because you people will not pay enough for service, then we come to their assistance and pay up to 40 per cent. The services of the department in that way are being taken advantage of to a very great extent. Last year about fifty associations availed themselves of our assistance, and we thought that was a better way of putting the matter on general grounds than of assisting a particular bureau.

Mr. GLASS: Has the minister before him the distribution of those horse associations by provinces?

Mr. BURRELL: I cannot give my hon. friend that information by provinces, because we have it only by the different breeds. I will get the information for him.

Mr. NESBITT: Does the minister ever send out thoroughbred stallions to those associations.

Mr. BURRELL: We do not lay down any regulations as to particular breeds; we give the associations the opportunity of taking what breed they want. Only two thoroughbred associations have availed thmselves of the 40 per cent offer in regard to assistance.

Mr. NESBITT: Would the minister send me the regulations governing those horse breeding associations, and also the regulations governing the fairs?

Mr. BURRELL: I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. COPP: What class of associations are they—agricultural associations?

Mr. BURRELL: No, they are formed for this special purpose.

Mr. COPP: Who is responsible for the forming of them—the farmers themselves or the department?

Mr. BURRELL: They can form associations themselves. This is the outline of the scheme:

The farmers of any district, wishing to work for the betterment of horse breeding by encouraging the use of sound, individually excellent, pure bred sires, may form a Breeders' Club for the purpose of hiring a pure bred stallion to travel their districts for the benefit of the members. This club, by organizing under and adopting the constitution and by-laws, and conforming to the various rules and regulations governing this grant, may participate in the Federal assistance given to such clubs as hereinafter set forth:

1. The club shall guarantee the stallion owner a definite number of mares at a certain service fee per mare, said mares to be in good breeding condition, and not affected with any contagious or infectious disease.

2. All stallions named by clubs for the purpose of securing Government assistance must be submitted to an examination by an authorized veterinary surgeon.

3. The secretary of the club shall forward to the Live Stock Branch, with the regular application, a list of its members, also a copy of the memorandum of agreement signed by both parties interested. This agreement shall not become binding until approved by the Live Stock Commissioner.

4. The minimum service shall be not less than twelve dollars.

5. All service fees shall be collected by the club.

6. Payment of service fees shall be made as follows: One-third of the service fee for each guaranteed mare shall be paid by the club to the stallion owner at the end of the service season.

7. The remaining two-thirds of each service fee shall be paid when the mare proves to be in foal. That is to say, the remaining two-thirds shall be paid for only such mares as prove to be in foal.

8. At the end of the service season the stallion owner shall furnish the Live Stock Branch with a sworn statement setting forth the number of mares bred to his horse and the name of the owner of each.

9. The Live Stock Branch shall pay the club an amount equal to 40 per cent of the total amount paid at the close of the service season on the full number of guaranteed mares, on receipt of the stallion owner's statement and of a properly audited and sworn statement signed and declared by the president and secretary.

10. The Live Stock Branch shall pay the club a second grant equal to 40 per cent of the amount paid to the stallion owner on the total number of mares that prove to be in foal, that is 40 per cent of two-thirds the service fee paid for each mare that proves to be in foal, on receipt of a properly audited and sworn statement signed and declared by the president and secretary of the club.

Mr. ROBB: Is it the policy of the department to pay the same contribution towards racing or trotting stock as for general purpose horses?

Mr. BURRELL: We make no distinction between breeds. There was a suggestion at one time that we should contribute more for thoroughbreds with the idea of encouraging the raising of remounts, but we have got it down now to a basis of 40 per cent for all breeds, and it remains for the associations to specify the particular breed they want.

Mr. COPP: If an association in an outlying district wants a thoroughbred sire, have they to send for it or is the horse shipped to them?

Mr. BURRELL: I do not want my hon. friend to confuse the two things. In the first place we are ourselves buying and distributing pure bred stallions, and associations are formed to maintain and take care of them. But this is another form of assistance, by which people who form clubs can get any individual animal they desire, we assisting by paying 40 per cent of the service fee.

Mr. OLIVER: I do not wish to discourage the minister in his efforts to improve the live stock of this country, but there have been brought to my attention certain conditions bearing on the one principle of assistance that he mentioned which I think it is only right I should bring before the minister. When the Government undertakes to supply thoroughbred sires, either cattle or horses, they to a large extent debar local enterprise. It may be said that it is not a matter of concern to the Government whether local enterprise is encouraged or discouraged, but when the Government undertakes to meet the needs of the country in this way, it is absolutely necessary that the stock so furnished should be of a satisfactory character. It is not a benefit to the country for the Government to provide sires of anything but the highest class. By providing sires that are not of a high quality, they at one and the same time deter home enterprise and fail to build up the stock of the country in the way that is desired. I am sorry to say that my information is that in too many cases sires of inferior breed, both cattle and horses, have been sent into different parts of the West. I do not wish to make an allegation, but I think it is only right that I should repeat to the minister what has been said to me, that in the judgment of the parties who made the statement the purchase of these inferior animals was, in a large measure, a matter of straight graft, that the breeders of the inferior stock were getting an undue advantage at the hands of the Government, and that the localities in which these inferior animals were distributed were not receiving the benefit that was in contemplation by the Government in the instigation and carrying forward of this policy.

The second system of assistance that the minister has described to the House is, of course, directly in the line of encouragement of local enterprise—an enterprise, I would say, of a high class. Wherever that arrangement can be made I think it would be more beneficial, both directly and indirectly, than for the Government itself to send in the stock. I thought it was only right I should acquaint the minister with the statements that were made to me. I have no personal knowledge of the matter, but I can assure him that the statements were made to me by men whose opinion I could not very well gainsay, and I think it would be well for him to make very careful inquiry in future transactions of this kind, both on account of the direct and indirect effect, namely, the failure to produce the class of stock desired, and the discouragement of local enterprise.

Mr. BURRELL: I am very glad to hear any suggestions from my hon. friend. I am quite sure he understands that I am cordially in sympathy with what he states to be the objects of this work. He suggests that we might be barring out local enterprise. When we established this policy it was laid down as a fundamental principle that we should not attempt to do this work in any district where we should be competing with private owners of animals. In any district where private owners had animals available for that part of the country we did not think it was our function to send in an animal of the same type. This scheme of assistance was primarily designed to supply those districts that had great difficulty in getting pure bred sires, and were using scrub stock. Of course, it is not possible, in distributing 3,000 animals, to get satisfaction in every individual case, the human equation being what it is in buying and selling and arranging matters of this kind. I have no doubt that mistakes have been made, but I do not think there have been many. I am quite sure I could give abundant evidence as to the general satisfactory character of the work that has been accomplished. I should be very glad, indeed, if my hon. friend and any other hon. member would bring to my attention any such opinion as he has touched upon tonight, for I think the best service that can be done to any department is to point out any weaknesses that may exist, in order that the minister may strengthen them. I have no idea at all of encouraging mistakes, or graft, or anything of that kind. I shall be only too glad to have cases of this kind brought to my attention, in order that I may have them traced up and see that they do not occur again.

Mr. OLIVER: It was with that view that I brought the matter to the minister's attention. Not that I wish to interfere or bring any charges, but merely that he should be on his guard against such an occurrence. I would not have it understood that I have made these remarks to discourage local enterprise or to lead in any way to the support of local enterprise against the action of the department. I was merely making a general statement that the action of the department must necessarily have the effect of deterring, not preventing, local enterprise.

Mr. NESBITT: Now that my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) has mentioned it, I would remind the minister that there is always a certain amount of gossip to the effect that the department buys sires of various kinds that are not up to standard, because of political favouritism, paying big prices for them, and sends them out in different sections of the country. I do not know anything of that kind personally, so I am not making any accusation by any means; but I join with the hon. member for Edmonton in warning the minister that that would be a bad thing for the department.

Mr. BURRELL: I frankly admit it, a very bad thing.

Mr. NESBITT: I quite believe that the minister himself would not encourage anything of that kind. As to the other system of encouraging the grouping of farmers to buy really high-class horses for a neighbourhood, I think that is an excellent idea. But, so far as heavy-draught horses are concerned, in our section we do not need any encouragement of that kind, for we have as good as any the world produces in all classes of heavy horses. In former years, in our section of the country, when race horses were more generally bred there, we had a better class of saddle horses than at present. That is why I put my question with reference to the thoroughbred. I am sorry to see the thoroughbred to a great extent passing out in many sections of the country. The thoroughbred crossed with a sound mare, not too heavy a mare, produced, to my knowledge and experience, some excellent saddle horses; and it is a pity they are going out. But, I suppose, the gasolene thoroughbred does away with them to a great extent.

Mr. McCREA: The department has a representative at Sherbrooke buying thoroughbred horses for the Government. Is it the intention of the Government to continue that system of buying horses?

Mr. BURRELL: We are largely dropping out of that phase of the work, for the reason I have mentioned—that we are giving more attention to encouraging farmers' associations in the use of good horses.

Mr. McCREA: I have been asked by some of our people for information which I could not give. I have heard rumours—I do not know whether they are true or not—that a large number of horses have been bought, many of them of inferior quality, and distributed to the farmers on certain conditions, but that the farmers did not find them profitable and consequently returned them. If my information is correct, a large number of these horses were collected and last fall sent to a lumber camp to be used all winter, and were returned in no very good condition this spring. I see by the Auditor General's report that Mr. C. N. Lester has drawn from $1,200 to $1,500 for the keep of horses. If the Government are spending money for horses for breeding purposes, they should buy proper horses, and they should see to it that those horses are not used for purposes other than that for which they were bought. A horse that has passed the winter in a lumber camp, where they try to get out of him all the labour they can, does not come out exactly fit for service in the spring. Can the minister tell us whether Mr. Lester has been collecting these horses and taking care of them, and, if so, what does the Government propose to do with it.

Mr. BURRELL: From personal knowledge, I know nothing about the matter. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McCrea) can understand that a very large number of animals are bought throughout the country. It will occur in the case of some associations that the animals will not be well taken care of—that occurs even in the case of private ownership, and these associations do not always live up to the spirit of their obligations. In such cases, and where the animals are in bad condition, we gather them together and have them taken care of, and, in some cases, sell them. I do not know as to the facts of the case to which he has referred, but I shall be glad to look into it and get for him such information as I can. I can only assure him that nothing of the kind to which he refers has been encouraged by the department, nor do we want to see anything but the best returns for the money spent.

Mr. CROMWELL: A good deal has been said about the Government's policy of distributing thoroughbred livestock throughout the country. I do not think that anything has been done by any Department of Agriculture that has so stimulated the livestock industry as this policy adopted by the present minister. In our section the farmers have received a great benefit, and in the outlying districts particularly the livestock has been greatly improved. If you were to go through districts to-day which you had known five years ago, you would see a great improvement in the quality of the livestock. There is no doubt that in some cases, as my hon. friend from Sherbrooke (Mr. McCrea) well knows, the condition of horses or other animals may be such that they will need to be taken in, so to say, for repair. I would assume that that is the reason why these horses were with Mr. C. N. Lester. With so many horses distributed to all sections of the country, there has to be some place to take these horses when they are not in a condition for breeding purposes. I would assume that that was the reason why Mr. C. N. Lester's stable was used for that purpose. We have four horses in Compton and they have all proved to be splendid successes. They are doing a great deal of good and not interfering with any private enterprises, as was suggested by the hon. member for Edmonton. They have been placed in districts where there were no other good sires of particular breeding available. Consequently as I say, they have done a great deal of good. The same would apply to other pure bred sires, bulls, rams and boars. As far as the county I represent is concerned, they have derived a great deal of benefit from this particular policy and I would favour an extension of that policy until it would attain the result of placing pure bred animals in every district in this country. The western part of Canada needs it just as much as eastern Canada. Farmers, particularly in the newer districts, may not be able to go out and buy pure bred sires, or, if they are able, they may neglect to do so. If they neglect it, a policy like this is bound to encourage the greatest industry that the country has—the livestock industry.

Mr. McCREA: Mr. Chairman, I am not disposed to criticise anything that the Department of Agriculture can do for the benefit of the farming community. I am something of a farmer myself and I know a little about livestock. If the Government is going to buy pure bred stock, it should be of the very best quality. No other kind is worth anything either to the individual or to the Government. The next thing necessary is to take care of it. If it is true that these horses were sent across the line to a lumber camp, that is not proper care to fit them for the purpose for which they were bought. I am interested as a member of this House in seeing that the country gets the best results that can be got from the money spent and I wanted to draw the attention of the minister to the information that had been placed in my possession that these horses have not been properly taken care of, and that they are consequently not fit for service. This is the time of year when they should be doing some good if it is going to be done, instead of being kept herded up in Lester's barn. It is up to the Government to see that they are not put to uses that would unfit them for the purpose for which they were bought. I am not saying that it is a fact that they have been but that is my information and I have been asked to ascertain from the minister whether it is true or not.

Mr. BURRELL: I will be glad to get the information and send it to my hon. friend.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: There is no question but that if you are going to carry on farming successfully the live stock industry must be regarded as the very foundation upon which you must largely depend. It is a great compliment to the minister and his department that so little criticism has been heard with regard to the distribution of male animals. At the time when they branched out upon this policy, I thought they were liable to get into no end of trouble because of the difficulties that confronted them and because of the fact that advantage might possibly be taken of the department notwithstanding that they might exercise every safeguard. I think the fact that even under these circumstances no definite charge of mismanagement has been made is a great compliment to the department. The hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) and the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. McCrea) have stated that they have heard of certain things having taken place but they are not sure of their information. If something of that kind has occurred I should think that somebody would have seen fit to make the case so strong that these hon. gentlemen would be able to assure the committee that these grievances did actually exist. They both say that they have heard of these things but they cannot vouch for them. I would not be surprised if in many instances irregularities had crept in, when you realize that thousands of animals have been placed throughout the country.

Exception has been taken in regard to the quality of the stock that has been distributed by the department. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat says that it should be of the very highest standard and other hon. members have argued along the same lines. When the best animals of a breed are selling for five or ten times the sum that you have fixed as the limit of the price that you can pay you cannot expect to get the choicest animals. In outlying districts, outside of the settled portions of the older provinces, people of limited means anxious to get a good, serviceable animal, even if it is not of the very highest standard, but one which their means will enable them to use, will be glad to avail themselves of this policy which has been adopted by the department.

With regard to the exception that was taken by the hon. member for Edmonton that this policy bars out local enterprise, I must say that I hardly agree with him. I do not believe that where these animals are to be had with any degree of convenience there will be any competition. As far as the county I represent is concerned, I do not know of one single male animal that has been placed in the county while this Act has been in force and consequently there is no bar to local enterprise. But I do know of many people in the newer districts who are anxious that the Government should supply them with these animals. In regard to the matter that was brought up by the hon. member for Sherbrooke, about these horses that are placed with this man, Lester, he is not absolutely certain of it, but taking it for granted that what he says is the case, it is quite possible that something of the kind may have happened. There is a possibility of people unloading on the department animals that are not good stock getters, and I do not know but that possibly you will find that some of these animals have been placed in a lumber camp. They could not be put in a better place, if properly taken care of, and you will find that next season you will have a very different result from that which you would have had if these horses had been kept in idleness and had been hampered. I have not the slightest doubt that there will be instances of that kind where horses will be unloaded on the department by some dealer who is not honest and fair in his dealings. I have known many of the most experienced horsemen in our province to be taken in time and time again in this respect, and if that is the case I can easily conceive of instances where the department would be deceived also. I admit that for the very best class of animals this does possibly not meet the situation, but it is owing to the low prices that are fixed. When private breeders are willing to pay from $5,000 to $10,000 apiece, and the department will pay only $150, it is useless to expect to get the very best animals. The very fact that no charges of any very serious nature have been brought against the department is a great compliment to the men who have had this work in hand. They must have exercised very careful supervision over that work or there would have been great dissatisfaction.

Mr. NESBITT: Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that the department is limited to $150 for a sire?

Mr. BURRELL: I think my hon. friend was referring to bulls. We raised that to $200. It is $600 for stallions.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I think it was $150 some time ago. I know that in Edmonton a bull was sold for either $8,000 or $10,000, so that hon. members will see the wide disparity in prices.

Mr. OLIVER: I want to go as far as the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) in accepting the administration of the Minister of Agriculture as being conducted in the very best faith, so far as he is concerned. I cannot conceive any reasonable minister desiring to do anything but what is best for the country, that being for his own credit and the credit of his department. My remarks were not intended as a charge against the department or founded on a supposition of maladministration of any kind; I was raising a point of policy as to whether the department should in its effort to improve the stock be willing to pay higher prices and thereby get a higher quality of animal. I made my argument for the purpose of impressing on the department the desirability of putting in only the superior animals. The public concern is in getting a good animal. I thought it was fair that the department should consider that there was not only the direct effect in the quality of the stock coming from the animal brought in, and the indirect effect of naturally deterring local private enterprise. I hope my remarks will not be construed as being in any way a reflection on the department, but that they will be taken as a fair suggestion that, in pursuance of the policy, the standard of the animal should be raised rather than lowered, and that care should be used to see that the standard is kept up, whatever price is paid.

Mr. BURRELL: I quite appreciate the spirit of my hon. friend's remarks, and I am largely in accord with what he says. He will understand that there is danger in giving anything like a free hand to officials of the department to go out and buy animals. My hon. friend knows the influences that would be brought to bear, and with the best intentions, they might make blunders for which we would receive great criticism if we went to either extreme. I should also say that in the purchase of bulls, although we are limited to $200, while you cannot get the very fine points in an animal for which a dealer might give a big figure, the animals which we purchase are examined carefully both by veterinary surgeons and Mr. Hamer, who has a thorough knowledge of the subject, and on the whole we would get a strong, sound, useful type of animal of the particular breed. When we consider that many of these animals go to districts where they depend on scrub bulls, the improvement is so great that great good will be done.

Mr. NESBITT: What is the maximum amount that the minister pays for boars and rams?

Mr. BURRELL: I think the maximum for boars is $40, and for rams, $35.

Mr. NESBITT: Surely you cannot get a good ram for $35?

Mr. BURRELL: That was the price last year. It may be necessary to increase it.

Mr. NESBITT: I am afraid the price is altogether too low. We will not condemn the minister if he raises it.

Mr. OLIVER: Has any of this registered stock—cattle, horses or hogs—been sent to the outlying districts of the constituency which I represent? There is the Grande Prairie settlement, the Spirit river settlement and the Peace River settlement. I know that something has been done in this respect in the Grande Prairie settlement, but I am not sure as to the others. Then there is the High Prairie settlement, on the Edmonton, Dunvegan and British Columbia railway; a much smaller, but a very excellent settlement. I do not know whether anything has been sent there or not.

Mr. BURRELL: I suppose it would be expensive to get them in there.

Mr. OLIVER: There is railroad communication, High Prairie is on the way to Grande Prairie Then there is the Falher settlement, on the same railway, and the Swan River settlement. I should be glad to know what has been done in the matter of sending pure bred stock into these settlements.

[Mr. Burrell.]

Mr. BURRELL: I shall be glad to send my hon. friend the information.

Mr. OLIVER: There is also the settlement of Fort Vermilion, which is about 300 miles down the Peace river from the terminus of the railroad at Peace River town. The importance of the settlement may be judged by the fact that this spring several carloads of wheat were brought by steamer via the Peace river from this Vermilion settlement and shipped over the railroad to Winnipeg. This settlement, therefore, may fairly claim the attention of the department, if it has not already done so. With direct rail and steam communication, it is possible to reach it now as it was not in previous years.

Mr. MACDONALD: What are, briefly, the rules of the department in regard to the distribution of these animals?

Mr. BURRELL: I will send my hon. friend copies of the pamphlets which contain the general rules and directions. These animals are sent, for instance, to new settlements and to districts which are isolated or are a long distance from privately owned sires, making it difficult to obtain them. The people form an association among themselves under general rules laid down, and we engage to send them any sire of any particular breed that the majority may want. They must undertake to maintain it and keep it in proper shape.

Mr. MACDONALD: To what extent is that system applied in Nova Scotia?

Mr. BURRELL: Between 200 and 300 pure bred rams have been distributed in that province during the last four years; nearly 20 pure bred boars, and 43 pure bred bulls.

Mr. MACDONALD: I had in mind a case where animals were sent to a district which was not isolated.

Mr. BURRELL: At first they were sent only to districts which were absolutely isolated, but it was found advisable to send them to other districts where they were badly needed, provided they did not interfere with privately owned sires.

Mr. GRAHAM: There may be considerable discussion on the next item, along the line of what is being done for greater production. I would suggest that this item pass, and that the next two be left for another sitting.

Mr. BURRELL: All right.

Progress reported.

CENSUS OF MALE POPULATION OF CANADA BETWEEN THE AGES OF 20 AND 45.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I desire to lay on the Table 50 copies of a Census of the male population of Canada between the ages of 20 and 45.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Might I suggest that several copies of this be printed?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: There is no objection to that, but I would point out that 50 copies have already been laid on the Table.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: There have been a good many requests by mail for copies of this census.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The Minister of Militia informs me that a large number of copies in the form of those already laid on the Table will be supplied.

FORM FOR PRESENTING PETITIONS.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) yesterday expressed a desire that I should make a statement with respect to the precise form in which petitions should be drawn, his request having particular reference to a number of documents purporting to be petitions which have recently been handed in.

While it does not seem to me essential that petitioners should use exact or uniform words, it would appear that the practice has invariably been to require substantial adherence to a form which has long been recognized.

Bourinot, 4th Edition, at page 234, lays down the rule and provides the precedent which should be followed, the first requisite being that every petition should commence with the superscription "To the Honourable The House of Commons in Parliament Assembled." Thus properly addressed and the subject-matter of the petition being in order, it would still be irregular to receive such a document without a prayer. The practice in the British House of Commons would appear to be substantially the same. May, 11th Edition, at page 525, says: "Without a prayer, a document will not be taken as a petition; and a paper, assuming the style of a declaration, an address of thanks, or a remonstrance only, without a proper form of prayer, will not be received."

I have examined a number of the documents referred to by the hon. member. They are not addressed to the House either in form or in substance. The reference, if to anybody, would appear to be to the Council of the City of Montreal. They contain no prayer. It would appear, therefore, that these documents are not in form and cannot be received.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The word "prayer" has two meanings, but I suppose in this case it means a request.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Not the religious meaning.

THE MILITARY SERVICE ACT, 1917.

ANNOUNCEMENT AS TO SECOND READING OF BILL.

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister): I should like to say to my right hon. friend that I propose to go on with the Military Service Bill to-morrow unless he has some objection, which, of course, I should be glad to consider.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: To-morrow will be too early for our side of the House. I was going to speak to my right hon. friend to-day about fixing a date for the second reading.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: If my right hon. friend objects, we will not take up the Bill to-morrow, but I hope when he discusses the matter with me, the second reading will be fixed at the earliest practicable date.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Hear, hear.

OVERSEAS EXPEDITIONARY FORCES.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. MACDONALD: Will the Prime Minister be good enough to furnish the House with a statement showing the number of enlisted men who are now in France, the number in Great Britain, and the number in Canada. I mean those who are effective.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am not quite sure whether it would be proper to do that, having regard to certain military considerations. I will consult the Adjutant General of the Staff and I shall give any information that may be permitted.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill No. 42, to amend the Chinese Immigration Act, Mr. Roche.

Bill No. 68, to amend the Civil Service Act, Sir Thomas White.

SUPPLY.

On motion of Sir Robert Borden, the House resumed in Committee of Supply, Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

Mail subsidies and steamship subventions.—Steam service between Canadian Atlantic ports and Australia and New Zealand, $140,000.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: This is in the hands of the same company as before, the New Zealand Shipping Company.

Mr. CARROLL: Are these contracts being carried out at present?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Some of them are not being carried out to the full. The difficulty of getting vessels is very great and requisitions are frequent. Therefore, sometimes a month is intermitted. We simply pay at the rate provided for each voyage which is completed under the conditions fixed.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: From what port do they sail, and to what ports in Australia and New Zealand?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: From Montreal and St. John once monthly, and they have the right to touch at three or four ports in Australia before going on to New Zealand.

Ocean and mail service between Canada and Great Britain, $1,000,000.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Is there any change in this service?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: This service is carried on as last year by the Canadian Pacific Ocean Services. They cannot give what was contracted for when we entered into the arrangement for the renewed and strengthened service. Such vessels as are approved of, and as can be kept on the route under the changes constantly going on owing to requisition are used. The vessels which have carried on the service during last year and which are relied upon at present chiefly are the Missinabie, the Pretorian, the Grampian, the Metagami, the Scandinavian, the Scotian and the Corsican. These vessels run in speed from 14 to 15 knots. The service is conducted on a different plane from that originally designed. It is known only at the last moment that such and such a ship will sail, and the Post Office has to pick it up, generally getting sufficient notice to enable it to forward the mails. Last year the service was performed entirely by boats of the Canadian Pacific Ocean Services, that is, by the old Allan and Canadian Pacific boats. This year, owing to the confused conditions and to the fact that two other lines have come back into the Canadian trade with good boats—the White Star Line and the Cunard—we pay so much a trip and take the best vessels of these three lines that offer. The White Star Company have two, the Megantic and the Canada which are very good vessels. The Cunard Company have one or two good vessels and the Canadian Pacific Ocean Services the other vessels. We pay exactly the same rate as we paid last year but on the trip or half trip basis.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Have you, on the whole, the same quantity of tonnage as before?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Not the same amount of tonnage as before the war but a good amount. This year we expect to get two mails each week.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The ports are the same?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes.

Mr. CARROLL: Has the delivery of the mail been fairly good?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes.

Steam service between Canada and Cuba, $25,000.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Was that service performed last year?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: No, nor was it performed the year before but it has been allowed to stand because if it becomes possible to continue it, it is a good service for the Maritime Provinces.

Steam service or services between Canada and Newfoundland, $70,000.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: This is the same service as last year and at the same rate.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The same company?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The same company.

Mr. McKENZIE: That is a broad statement—between Newfoundland and Canada? Where is that service?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The contract for service is from Sydney to Port aux Basques, but the same company sails additional boats from Louisburg to St. John direct. They did so last year and they intend to do so this year. We have contracted for a daily service between Sydney and Port aux Basques connecting with the railway to St. John.

Mr. McKENZIE: This company do not appear to be able to perform the service between North Sydney and Port aux Basques. We excuse them because of the difficulty they have had in getting ships but I suggested to the minister that before they start a new service from Louisburg to St. Johns the department should insist upon them performing the first service. There is a railway line between Port aux Basques and St. Johns and if there is a good line maintained between Port aux Basques and the end of the Intercolonial railway at North Sydney there will be a good service. Before they start a new service, which is rather an unnecessary one, from Louisburg to St. John, because I do not know what particular trade they are going to get, they should improve the present service. Last year and the year before, it was not unusual to see 100, 75, or 50 cars standing on the wharf, waiting for transportation and the excuse was that they had no boats. I call this to the attention of the minister and I would suggest that he should insist upon the company doing as much as possible to supply a fairly good service between Port aux Basques and North Sydney before they try to get boats for what would appear to be an unnecessary service.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That is entirely within the option of the company. We have no orders to give in that respect. Our contract for service is between Port aux Basques and Sydney. The vessels are not diverted from that route to the service between Placentia and Louisburg. The company have other vessels for that service. I mentioned it to show that the same company, which was performing the service between Sydney and Port aux Basques, were making occasional trips between Louisburg and Placentia. Originally the boats were excellent ones but were both taken off the route a year and a half or two years ago. One was taken by the Allies for work in northern Russia and I think the other was sold to the same power with the consent of the Government as they seemed to be needed by Russia. The vessels which were on a year ago and which are on now had a bigger cargo carrying capacity than the original boats. Freights are going and they go every day. Mails are being carried and they are being carried every day. The quality, appearance and passenger accommodation of these boats are not quite so good as those of the boats that were previously on. For this diminution in character a reasonable deduction is made from the amount of the subsidy.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am not suggesting that the minister should make any deductions because I believe it is very difficult for the company to get boats and the service is a very good one and is affording great facilities for trade between Newfoundland and Canada via North Sydney. The minister says the service is from Sydney. It is not from Sydney and if it is so on the books of the minister's department it is a mistake. The service is from North Sydney.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It is from Greater Sydney.

Mr. McKENZIE: Yes, the commercial metropolis of Eastern Canada.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Quite so.

Mr. McKENZIE: We must aim to get other facilities in connection with this trade as well as supplying the boats, or encouraging the company to supply boats. There are several other things in connection with the trade that the ministers who perhaps should look after them, are neglecting. The building of a wharf possibly belongs to the department of Public Works and taking it over and looking after it is possibly the duty of the Department of Marine and Fisheries, but to afford facilities for trade, it would seem to come under the direction of the Department of Trade and Commerce. If these other ministers should try to get clear of their responsibilities in this matter we must look to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. At North Sydney, where connection is made by steamboat between Canada and Newfoundland and where the Intercolonial ends, the wharf is absolutely inadequate for the business which has to be handled there. The buildings on this wharf come right to the edge on one side, so that there is berthing accommodation for only one steamer. A steamer lies there every day so that there is no room for fishing vessels to transfer their cargoes to the railway cars at this wharf, and they are obliged to go to a private wharf and have the fish trucked to a railway car. Then complaint is made that the railway arrangements are such that only one car can be handled at a time. We have a magnificent harbour, and it would be very easy to extend the wharf so as to give sufficient berthing accommodation for all vessels. I brought this matter to the attention of the acting Minister of Railways last year, but nothing has been done. I know it is useless to bring it to the attention of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries as he simply collects wharfage on wharves that have been completed. I therefore urge the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster), whose duty it is to see that facilities are provided for our people to carry on trade and commerce, to urge his colleagues to provide sufficient money to make proper acommodation for the carrying on of business by our people.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I noticed the other day a newspaper statement that a large increase had been made in the subsidy for this steam service to Newfoundland.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The information is not correct.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What was the subsidy paid that company five years ago compared with that paid to-day?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The subsidy is as stated here. The vote is $70,000. Five years ago, that is 1912, we paid $31,874. In 1915 it was $48,000, and this year about the same.

Mr. LEMIEUX: So that the statement is correct?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: In speaking of an increase, I thought it meant a modern increase, not one of ancient years. One very important difference is that formerly this company was paid in addition $30,000 as a postal subsidy. That is not now paid, and it is now a daily service.

Mr. CARROLL: Is this service to Louisburg something new, or the occasional trips to that port during the winter months?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I think this is winter's months trips.

Steam service between Canada and the West Indies or South America, or both, $340,666.66.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Has the minister any figures to give us as to the treaty with the West Indies? Has there been an increase in our trade as a result of the treaty?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes, I think I may say there has been a very satisfactory increase. In 1912, the value of cargoes of Canadian origin going over this line was $2,325,000. In 1914, it was $2,618,000. In 1915, it was $3,507,000, and last year, in 1916, it was $4,698,000. Thus, comparing 1912 and 1916, the value of Canadian cargoes has a little more than doubled. Of course, you have to take into account that prices have risen in that time, but still it shows a very gratifying increase. Then there is some little carriage of goods of United States origin.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is there a large increase in imports?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The chief increase is in exports. But last year, and partly the year before, there was a very large increase in imports owing to the very large amount of sugar brought in for the refineries.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What are the chief imports?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The chief articles imported are the tropical products, sugar, coffee, cocoanut, Trinidad asphalt, oranges and bananas.

Mr. LEMIEUX: And our exports?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Our exports run over the whole gamut of our natural products, such as fish, canned salmon, canned goods, flour, oats, vegetables, groceries, cheese, pease, live-stock, sulphate of ammonia, tea, fertilizer, lumber, laths, cordage, and a great many other articles.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Has my hon. friend any figures in regard to potatoes?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I have not them here. I can get a statement in regard to them.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I understand the minister to say that the value of the goods imported during the last three or four years has doubled.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The exports have about doubled.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I suppose we may also assume that the freight collected by the steamers has doubled. I think, as a matter of fact, it has more than doubled. It would appear to an outsider, if my surmise is true, that the subsidy in this case might be reduced, because if they were able, in 1912, to carry on a successful business and pay dividends on half the trade they should be able now, as they are getting more than twice as much money, to carry on business with a less subsidy. My idea is that these subsidies are given for the purpose of building up a trade. Once the trade is built up, so that it becomes self-sustaining, we should not continue paying the same amount of subsidy. We should have a system by which the subsidy would be reduced and applied somewhere else.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I have had a long experience in connection with the running of the service between Canadian ports and the West Indies. When I was in the ministry many, many years ago, we began this service, and I think I can safely say that no West Indian service which has ever been run between Canada and the West Indies has been a paying proposition. My hon. friend knows, probably better than I, the extreme difficulties of a West Indian service to be found in the character of their ports, only one or two of them allowing vessels to get up to dock. They have a system of lighterage everywhere, and long distances between the ports. and an itinerary which takes about six weeks to make, and, in addition to all these things, we have a not over-abundant passenger list, which is, of course, the paying part in such a service. I think I can say, without any doubt, that the line which is now carrying on the service is the best that we ever had, and the service is entirely satisfactory from the point of view of what is attainable and what is advisable between our country and the West Indies. Some parties advocate a faster service, a 15, 17 or 18 knot service, mainly for passengers. Others advocate cargo boats alone. These boats in use now are a cross between the cargo boat and the passenger boat. They have excellent passenger accommodation and good cargo accommodation, and the two combine very well on these steamers, I think that very general satisfaction has been given by the work which is done with them. In reference to the reduction of the subsidy, we keep as close a tab as possible upon the rates, and no rates are raised without the authority of the department, and an investigation is always made before any advance is allowed. The expenses of steamships, as my hon. friend knows, have very greatly increased, and last year and the year before—particularly last year—the expenses were very heavily increased. There has been a very great increase in the price of coal, and on these long voyages a tremendous amount of coal is used. The size of the coal bill for these vessels is astonishing. I have tried to keep in touch with the Halifax and St. John Boards of Trade in reference to the control and regulation of the rates which have been paid, and we have always arrived, I think, at a satisfactory conclusion, after discussion, in regard to freight rates. When one thinks of what would happen if these vessels were taken off, it makes one prize the service more. We have a pretty severe struggle to keep those vessels on the route, and within the last three or four weeks they came very close to being requisitioned, owing to the necessities of the Mother Country, but we have been able to keep them on. If they were taken off at this particular juncture, it would practically cut off connections between Canada and the West Indies.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I am quite aware that the business is abnormal just now, and that it is very difficult to find vessels to do any kind of work. I am glad to know that the minister is keeping track of the rates, and endeavouring to control them in some way, but if the minister has the information at hand, it would be interesting to the committee to hear about the rates on some special articles, as they existed in 1912 and as they exist to-day, so that we may have some idea of the increase that has taken place.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I have not the figures with me, but will be very glad to secure them. My hon. friend will see, all things considered, that there has not been the increase that he might fear on the staple articles. The rates on flour and staple goods have been kept down very well. The rates on sugar, molasses, and one or two other articles, have been increased, but they have been able to bear the increase.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Perhaps you can furnish us with that information. I know the rates on the tramp steamers from the West Indies on molasses and sugar have increased very much, and I should like to know how they compare with the rates on the steamers to which we are paying subsidies.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That is a difficult question to answer, because the tramp steamer takes whatever she can get. If somebody wants a cargo moved, and the tramp steamer is able to move it, if it is a case of necessity, almost any rate will be given. We can compare the rates on our steamers with the rates on the steamers from New York. In no case do our rates exceed—and in most cases they are lower—than the rates from New York.

Mr. MARCIL: During the last year or two I have heard earnest appeals from Canadians who visit the West Indies at various times and who take an interest in trade matters, who feel that the time is now opportune to bring about reciprocity between Canada and the West Indies, as a result of the war. Has anything been done of an official character? Is the minister in a position to know if any feeling has been manifested in regard to this matter among our fellow citizens in Canada?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That is a kind of rapproachement.

Mr. MARCIL: That is the suggestion I have read under the signature of very able correspondents in the Montreal press. Mr. Macaulay, of Montreal, thought it would be an opportune time, and I wanted to inquire if any move had been made in that regard, or if the matter is still the subject of academic discussion.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Mr. Macaulay has written some very excellent articles, and is a very firm believer in a closer connection than a commercial connection with the West Indian islands. I have my own thoughts about that, but I have not put them before the public, because I think it is a great deal better that the West Indian islands should come to us rather than that Canada should take the position of seeking to influence sentiment in the West Indies. This much I know, that there is a growing friendly sentiment between the two countries induced by intercommunication, and a very excellent influence in that direction has been the extension of the banking facilities of Canada to the West Indian islands, and the increase of trade and personal communication. The extension of the banks to the West Indies has been a cogent argument and a plain proof of how much export trade depends upon banking facilities which emanate from Canada as an exporting country. The lesson that has been learned from what is going on in the West Indies is a very excellent one for our exporters. I have my own opinion that in the extension of trade which is to come after this, one of the potent influences for that extension will be the influence of inter-related banking facilities. There are, of course, questions that have to be taken into consideration when any union between the West Indies and Canada is considered. Those will not be insuperable, maybe, when the proper time comes for discussing such matters.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I am glad that my hon. friend from Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) has brought this question to the notice of the committee. For several years past I have read very able articles by Mr. Macaulay, of the Sun Life Assurance Company, who has long been the chief exponent of the idea of union between the West Indies and Canada. No doubt the West Indies, since the construction of the Panama canal, have become of great strategic value to the British Empire. The United States have lately acquired one of the Danish islands, which shows that they have an eye open to the business that will necessarily accrue in the future as a result of the construction of the Panama canal. There have been objections raised to the scheme of bringing the West India islands into our Confederation. Some years ago, in my official capacity, I attended a conference in London, that question was discussed in my presence by two of the then members of the Campbell-Bannerman Government. One of them said en passant: "The United States Government have their colour problem; do you think that the Dominion of Canada would absorb the West Indies with the colour question looming up so seriously in the neighbouring republic?" My object in rising when I heard my hon. friend (Mr. Marcil) inquiring about the proposed union of the West Indies with Canada, was to speak of that other union scheme which I think is much more feasible and much more practical and urgent. I refer to the union of Newfoundland with Canada. I am travelling perhaps far afield from the item under discussion, but my remarks will not be lengthy. I understand that for the last four or five years the objection in Newfoundland against the idea of union with Canada has lost some of its force. We all know that the late Archbishop Howley had succeeded in influencing public opinion very largely in favour of the idea of an ultimate union between Newfoundland and Canada. Since then—and I wish to draw the attention of the minister particularly to this point—I understand that overtures have been made to Canada, and that there has been a voluminous correspondence on the subject between the present Prime Minister of Newfoundland and the Prime Minister of Canada. The facts were made public not long ago in the Montreal papers as a result of litigation between the owner of a certain paper and one of its former editors. There it was alleged that negotiations had recently taken place between the Government of Canada and the Government of Newfoundland, and that the question of union between the ancient colony and the Dominion had been seriously entertained. What truth is there in those allegations or rumours, and has a scheme of union between Newfoundland and Canada been contemplated by the Government?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I think my hon. friend has, in his excursion, travelled so far away from the item under discussion that he has rather confused my tabula. I am now intent entirely on commercial ocean services, and my attention is given so completely to that, that I beg my hon. friend not to switch me off this afternoon. One remark that I made with reference to the West Indian matter to my hon. friend from Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil), I will repeat to my hon. friend, and follow it up with the simple saying that so far as Canada is concerned, with reference to Newfoundland, our latch-string is always on the outside and a light is always burning in the window.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Some time ago I brought to the attention of the House the fact that salt was extremely scarce for carrying on the fisheries in the Maritime Provinces. The fishermen have responded to the appeal for greater production. We have a prolific fishery and active fishermen, but it is impossible to carry on the business successfully without an ample supply of salt, and owing to the scarcity of tonnage the shortage of salt is becoming alarming. I understand that the department has taken up this question, and I should like to know whether the minister has succeeded in getting tonnage for carrying salt to Halifax and other ports in the Maritime Provinces.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My department has been dealing with this question for about four or five months, and the result is simply this. Great difficulty is met by the fishermen themselves in getting charters for salt, but that is their matter; if they can find a tramp or some other vessel it is for them to make their own arrangements. The fishermen had recourse to the department, and conceived the idea of transports of His Majesty bringing salt in ballast from overseas to Dominion ports. The assent of the Admiralty was cheerfully given, but of course these transports are primarily for war purposes, and if salt is to be taken it must be within each reach of the route of the vessel. If that is the case, the transport will always take the salt if it can be loaded without undue delay. This has been done in the case of Newfoundland ports and others. The salt, I suppose, comes mainly from the Mediterranean, and it is vessels whose route is contiguous to Mediterranean ports that can advantageously bring this salt across. A reasonable freight is charged, in reference to which some dickering has taken place by the fishermen; that is a matter for adjustment. At present any who require salt brought across in these transports had better get into communication, through their agents, with the Admiralty in London, because it is impossible to fix transport sailings on this side and conduct the operations with any degree of certainty or despatch.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Have the rates been fixed by the Admiralty?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes.

Mr. SINCLAIR: What are the rates?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I have not got the rates. I know there has been some comment on the fact that Newfoundland has been receiving cargoes of salt while other places could not get salt. The explanation was that the Newfoundland people paid the price, thereby avoiding delay.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I saw a letter from a Halifax firm stating that some people—I do not know whether it was the Admiralty or private shipowners—were asking 40 shillings a ton for carrying the salt. That is considered an extortionate rate, and I was anxious to know whether the minister had a rate which he could make public, so that dealers might have some idea of what they would have to pay.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I suppose the rate would vary somewhat with the port from which the cargo was taken.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: The minister said that some dickering had taken place between the fishermen and some other parties. Who were the other parties?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The Admiralty.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: There must be some mistake, because the fishermen themselves do not import salt.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I meant the large companies who are importing the salt.

Steam service between Canada and South Africa, $146,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Has there been any increase in the trade between the two countries during the past year?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes and no. The war has so confused things that it is pretty difficult to say whether the trade has increased or not. Mr. Egan, our agent there, in his last report speaks very hopefully, and points to an increase in the main lines of trade between South Africa and Canada. South Africa has been undergoing somewhat of a revolution. Owing to the necessities of the war she is beginning to raise what formerly she largely imported, and is finding out that she can save importations in many lines. It is not a detriment to trade in the long run, because the more she produces the more she is able to buy from outside; it tends to increase trade rather than otherwise. The Elder-Dempster line carries on this service very satisfactorily, and has kept the rates remarkably even all through the war.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Have regular trips been made?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes, I do not think more than one or two trips have been missed. The line has suffered, if you call it suffering, just as the Royal Mail Steamship Line has suffered, through having a large percentage of their vessels diverted to war purposes.

Steam service between Halifax, St. John's, Newfoundland, and Liverpool, $20,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Is this service now being carried on?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes, with the occasional omission of a trip.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Is the contract from year to year or for a number of years?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: From year to year.

Mr. McKENZIE: I think that by a slight diversion in the route this service could be made of much greater usefulness than it is at present. I would not ask that the steamers call at Sydney, but they might call at Louisburg. Many passengers from Liverpool or St. Johns, Newfoundland, would land at Louisburg, or would take passage at Louisburg going the other way.

Mr. CARROLL: I would urge the attention of the minister to what has been said by my hon. friend (Mr. McKenzie). A considerable volume of trade could be developed if these steamers were to call at other ports, which, besides those in their present route, Louisburg has been mentioned, is an excellent harbour and open the year around. It has splendid facilities for bunker coal, which can be got cheaper there than at any other place in the Maritime Provinces. In the island of Cape Breton we have been developing in recent years quite a commercial centre, with our large coal fields and our great industrial concerns, such as steel works. I think the Department of Trade and Commerce, in making future steamship subsidy contracts, should bear this in mind. It has always been a matter of surprise to me that these boats did not call at Louisburg, if nowhere else. I do not know whether this is a Canadian Pacific Railway line or not.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: A Furness-Withy line.

Mr. CARROLL: I suppose that nothing can be done for the present season, but the matter could be considered in future contracts. The change proposed will develop a trade between Newfoundland and Cape Breton, and also between the motherland and Cape Breton, which we have not at present.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Of course, any detour which would lengthen the time of the voyage detracts by that much from the transport effectiveness of the service. This is the first time, so far as I recollect, that this matter has been brought to my attention. Nothing can be done this season, but when the service is being arranged for again the point will be borne in mind.

Mr. CARROLL: There would be very little detour to Louisburg.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: But longer to Sydney.

Mr. McKENZIE: It is for that reason I have suggested Louisburg. Another advantage is in the coaling. At present they coal on this side at Halifax, taking coal the product of the mines in Cape Breton, which has been hauled to Halifax. There are coaling facilities at Louisburg which are so good that many ships bunker there at all seasons of the year. We have thousands of people from Great Britain, miners, who come from Scotland or England, and who go home in large numbers every year, and return again. Nothing seems to deter them from making this voyage. The fact that it is going to cost them a large sum of money does not seem to matter. They go from Sydney to New York and take the boat there. It would be a great advantage to these people, and would be the logical thing so far as the Government is concerned if they could be furnished with transportation from their own door to the Old Country.

Winter steam service between St. John, Dublin and Belfast, $7,500.

Mr. SINCLAIR: How many trips do they make?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: In 1916 they made six trips only. The usual run of trips has been from four to nine.

Mr. SINCLAIR: They are freight vessels?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes, and carried last year upwards of over a million dollars of cargo.

Winter steam service between St. John, Halifax and London, $15,000.

Mr. CARROLL: Are the sailings of these boats so arranged that they do not all leave about the same time?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Does the minister keep any control over freight rates which are charged?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The department has control over the rates of every subsidized steamship line.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Does it exercise that control?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What are the rates on ordinary merchandise and lumber?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I cannot tell my hon. friend, but I will get him the information.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The reason I speak of it is that freight rates on the Atlantic route are said to have risen to enormous proportions. I would think that as the rates are so high, and as the steamships are paying extremely handsome profits, it would be much better to take a portion of these subsidies and endeavour to encourage the coastal service between the Maritime Provinces and ports of the United States, particularly those which are capable of furnishing anthracite coal to the consumers of the Maritime Provinces. Apart altogether from the question of building ships, I suggest to my hon. friend the possibility of securing a freight steamship service, or even a service by sailing vessels, between ports in the Maritime Provinces and those of the United States which are close to the coal supply. It seems to me a most extraordinary, a most deplorable, thing that the cost of anthracite coal in St. John has reached the enormous price of $15 per ton. People are looking almost with despair to what will take place during the coming winter. It is almost impossible to get coal. Dealers decline to enter into contracts because of the impossibility of securing transportation by water. It would almost seem to me that if the Government can not build ships for the export service, it would be worth while considering whether they might not take away a portion of the subsidies paid to some of the Atlantic steamship lines which are making enormous profits in order to encourage the establishment of a coastal steamship service for the purpose of relieving the coal situation. It is a matter of very great importance and I invite the attention of the minister to it. These are times when departures must be made from the rules which govern under normal conditions. In normal times there was an abundance of vessel accommodation available. To-day there are scarcely any available for the coastal service.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes, that is very true but the other remark my hon. friend made is equally true that there is a deplorable scarcity of transport tonnage. I do not know at the present time where a single vessel can be got for a subsidy to run on these coasts. We have tried from below New York to Maine and New Brunswick. We have endeavoured to get hold of vessels and it has been impossible to do so. At the present time it is absolutely impossible because no vessels are allowed to go out. They are required on the southern waters. The colliery owners of Sydney are not taking coal to the St. Lawrence district simply because their own vessels are requisitioned and are being used for the war and they find it absolutely impossible to substitute other vessels for those which are requisitioned. Coal is being banked there at this time because of the impossibility of getting tonnage to carry it. That is the result of the war and the circumstances will not, in so far as I can see, be mitigated during this season. I think transport will be more and more difficult to get during this season. At the end of this season, and during next season, there will be a very considerable contribution of new tonnage which will gradually come in. But little of that will come in until the latter part of this season. The year 1918 will, I think, see a pretty large addition. The addition, is so far as freight carriage is concerned, will be measured by the overplus of the new compared with the destruction of the old.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The difficulty is that the new vessels which are being built are being built largely for the Imperial Government under contract with the Imperial Munitions Board. They will be used upon the Atlantic but that will not help out the local situation. My hon. friend admits that the situation is very grave indeed. Why would it not be a good thing for the Government to engage in the building of a hundred small wooden vessels in the Maritime Provinces and in Quebec and put them on the trade routes? Let the Government control these boats and keep down the transportation rates by means of them. These small vessels, of 250 or 400 or 500 tons, could be built very quickly in the Maritime Provinces. I have scores of letters from people who say that shipyards are available, timber could be got, and men put to work. But it is said the Imperial Government does not believe in these smaller vessels, and have limited the size to 2,500 tons. All the better, let the Imperial Government go on through the Imperial Munitions Board building the larger vessels, but let the Dominion Government engage in the building of smaller vessels which apparently there will be no danger of the Imperial Government commandeering. Then they will be available for encouraging local trade. The situation, as the minister has said, is grave. I say its gravity cannot be magnified; it is very grave indeed. I believe that unless some relief is given coal will actually run to $20 a ton. See what a burden it is upon the people, upon the families of the soldiers who have gone to the front to fight the battles of the Empire. How serious will be the burden upon them and upon all classes of the community! The Government can give relief if it wants to and if it will take hold of the question in a reasonable and proper manner, as it ought to have begun to do two years ago. The Government ought to have anticipated the very condition that exists to-day. The war may run on for two or three years longer; that is the opinion of men in England and in the United States who ought to know; and are we simply to lie down and to do nothing except to deplore the situation and express the opinion that it will grow worse as the months and years go by? Surely, instead of talking about it, something practical ought to be done. If the Government took hold of the situation in a practical way, so far as the coal transportation in Canada is concerned, I believe that very satisfactory results could be obtained within a year. It is very late, I admit, but it is not too late. In view of the conditions to which our people must look forward in the near future, I say it will be nothing less than a crime if this Government does not take measures in the emergency which has arisen in respect to transportation between ports in Canada, and between ports in the United States and in Canada.

Mr. KNOWLES: There is a principle involved in what my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley) has said that is more important and wider even than the geographical country of which he is speaking. I think it is an important principle which he enunciated, that these unfortunate conditions should, so far as possible, be foreseen and anticipated. It is only thus that you will provide against them in the most economic way. If the Government simply, in an easy-going way, drag along and say, We can get along this week and this month, and all through the summer without coal in the Maritime Provinces and on the prairies, it may have quite an easy existence in the interim, but the condition of affairs when the crisis really comes upon the different parts of the country will be a great deal more grave even than if it were anticipated and provided for as far as possible. We know that the Government has many pressing matters calling for its attention which are affairs of the moment, but it is just as important that they should sit down in an intelligent way and look into the future and endeavour to solve the problems of the future by preparedness, as to think about the things that are urgent for the moment. The whole story of good legislation is the anticipation of the future and providing against its troubles. The trouble we have to-day owing to the shortage of men for overseas service might have been anticipated and prepared for, and we might have avoided the crisis that stares our nation in the face at the moment, if the Government had looked intelligently into the future and had foreseen, as they could have foreseen, what now is clear to every person. They might have foreseen it long ago.

I remember that three years ago this Government had as part of its duty the providing of seed for the western farmers. They had all winter to provide the seed, but nothing at all was done. They waited until spring came, and then they had to pay, not quite double, but nearly double what they would have had to pay if the seed had been purchased when the price was more reasonable. I think the Government then went out and bought seed at $1.50 a bushel which the homesteaders had to pay. They paid that for the very same wheat that they could have purchased some months before for less than $1 a bushel.

We have a condition of affairs in the western provinces which is more grave and vital than the condition to which my hon. friend has referred. On the prairies we have a class of people who have no other source of fuel than coal. We have been accustomed to get enormous quantities of Pennsylvania coal, and we have also received coal from the western collieries, particularly those at Lethbridge and Drumheller. As I said, the Pennsylvania coal is to be cut off this year, and we will not have it next year at all. The best judges of the coal situation tell us that practically no Pennsylvania coal will be brought into the prairie provinces next year, and we all know that we cannot have coal in the winter from the western coal mines unless coal is mined during the spring and summer. The Government seem to be handling this question in the same easy-going manner. We have asked time and time again what has been done and what is being done in the way of anticipating what will be a crisis in this nation when there is a failure of coal supplies from the United States and the western mines to provide fuel to keep our people warm on the prairies. The matter has not yet become one of life and death, but the fact that the crisis is somewhat removed in time does not detract one iota from its certainty. So surely as time is marching on, so surely will that real, physical condition of affairs come upon us, and that grave crisis present itself when the summer is past and the months for consuming coal are really with us. We have been at the Minister of Labour for weeks and weeks to know what he is doing. We do not know whether the minister realizes the gravity of the situation or not. We very much doubt if, for a moment, he realizes its gravity in such a way as a statesman should, and I think that the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) is doing absolutely the right thing in impressing upon the Government that it is their duty to anticipate problems and crises of this kind. The only economic way, the only statesmanlike way, of providing against these problems and crises, is to look at them in ample time and make some provision in the way of preparedness before the crisis is really upon us. I say this with a great deal of seriousness. The condition of affairs in our western country is one that no man can contemplate without the utmost seriousness. We have had the Pennsylvania supply cut off; and in our own western coal districts, between the Minister of Labour and the operators and the Coal Miners'

Union, there is nothing but chaos; they are doing everything but producing coal. The minister is digging up excuses by the ton, but no coal is being dug. Under these circumstances, the Government is not discharging its great duty to the people, that is to do something to prevent this very grave and vital crisis from facing us. I have known winters in the West when the Northwest Mounted Police have been scouring the prairies—we do not like to mention these things in this House—going to this shack and that shack, this district and that district, and finding men who had suffered death because they had not fuel to keep themselves warm.

I speak for the homesteaders, the women and the little children on those prairies. The Minister of Labour should not merely say: "For the present there is no crisis, no one is cold; we will cross the bridge when we come to it," but I think he should, as the hon. member from St. John advocated, anticipate the future, and say that these precious days and months shall not slip by, but that something shall be done under the circumstances, so that this impending crisis may be averted. I speak of this as a national affair. You cannot encourage people to continue living on those prairies in the West if you do nothing to avert a crisis such as is threatened. We want the people to stay there, develop the country and produce wealth on the unimproved prairie land. Therefore, the Government must discharge its duties and make living possible in that country. I urge the minister and the Government to anticipate these matters and address themselves to it, and not remain idle day after day, and say they do not know of the conditions. Apparently they have done nothing, and I think that they should, after thoughtful consideration, come to this Chamber and say they are going to do something. They cannot do much by commission. We have had commissions until we are tired of them. A commission was appointed a year and a half ago to deal with the resources of Canada. They were going to knit everything together in a beautiful web, everything would work economically, and each industry would minister to the resources of the other industries. They held a few meetings, and we heard no more of them for some months. I am not hopeful of commissions. I say nothing about the appointment of Mr. Magrath. The hour has not come to discuss his fitness; my mind is open; I have not decided one way or the other on that, but we cannot conclude that the responsibility is shelved, and the Government's duty fulfilled simply because Mr. Magrath has been appointed. The House and the country should be informed as to what is being done to avert the grave condition of affairs which is threatened, and the matter is not far removed from the subject under discussion. The minister might tell us whether the appointment of Mr. Magrath is all that he purposes doing, or whether he is still going to devise something which will have practical results in saving us from the grave conditions which threaten us through shortage of fuel in the West.

Mr. CROTHERS: I have no desire to withhold anything from the committee which I think, in the public interest, should be divulged. My hon. friend from Moosejaw probably appreciates the difficulty that we had to overcome in the southeasterly part of British Columbia, and the southwesterly part of Alberta. This is not the only difficulty that has existed out there. There were serious strikes in 1903, 1906, and 1907, and a more serious one in 1909, extending over five months. Another, still more serious, occurred in 1911, extending over eight months. I have no desire to find any fault with my predecessor. I have no doubt he did everything he could to avert these labour disturbances in that district. We have been exceptionally successful since the autumn of 1911, till a few months ago, and had no difficulties in that district. We first made an agreement in October 1911 for some three years and four months, which continued until March, 1915, when another agreement was entered into, to continue for two years from that date. That agreement worked satisfactorily till July last. At that time the workers declared that they would not adhere to the provisions of the agreement any longer, although it would not expire till the 31st March of this year. They then demanded a war bonus of ten per cent increase over and above the provisions of the agreement of 1915. The operators, in substance, conceded that demand. It was not a flat increase of ten per cent all round, but it ran from 7½ to 12 per cent, or from five to twelve and a half per cent, and the miners, under that arrangement and a subsequent one, continued to work. The last agreement, as the former one, provided that thirty days before its expiration, the two bodies should get together, and endeavour to negotiate an agreement, so that there would be no cessation of work when that agreement expired. They came together in March and negotiated for seven weeks, and finally reached an agreement satisfactory to the representatives of the men and the operators, but, under the constitution of the United Mine Workers of America, no such agreement could be effective until a vote of the men themselves was taken. That vote was taken about May 5, and the men rejected the agreement that their representatives had negotiated, and quit work. We have been making every effort to secure a resumption of work in those mines. I have not gone into the details of what was done. I do not think it would be in the public interest to do so now. We are just as anxious about it as the hon. gentleman from Moosejaw is, and we are giving it very close attention. I have no doubt that whatever means may be necessary to accomplish the object, those mines will resume operation in a very short time. The Government prefer the owners should operate these mines under an amicable arrangement with the miners. If that cannot be done, other means will be adopted to operate the mines. I do not think it is necessary for me to give details of what is being done at the present time, but I will assure the committee that work will be resumed just as soon as possible, and I expect it will be within a very short time.

Mr. KNOWLES: I expect to go to my riding in the very near future. Inasmuch as I should be informed of what has happened here, the first thing the people will ask me will be: "Did not the Minister of Labour, a number of weeks ago, say that, if the operators and the miners did not co-operate, the Government would see that the mines were operated?" or words to that effect. I will have to answer that the minister did use words to that effect a few weeks ago. They will ask: "What would the natural meaning of the words of the minister be, as understood by an impartial listener; would it not mean that matters would be remedied in much less time than has really elapsed?" We worry about the matter of time, because it is tremendously important to us, as the minister will appreciate. I accept his statement now. There is not much trouble to-day but the time will come when it will be, not only a matter of comfort but of saving human life, and they will say: "Did not the minister give you to understand that, if the mine owners and others did not co-operate, he would do something, and was not the impression that the minister gave that that promise or statement would be carried into effect without the lapse of time which has already occurred without considering the delay which may take place in the future."

Mr. CROTHERS: I will take my hon. friend further into my confidence and give him the information which I had at that time. The president of the Mine Workers of America, which is an international labour organization, having its headquarters at Indianapolis, sent me a message stating that he had sent to the president of the organization in district 18 a telegram the substance of which is as follows: I have instructed the men to return to work immediately on conditions obtaining on the 31st of March last, and as soon as we get through with the convention I am attending here in Minneapolis, I will either go myself or send representatives to the district to endeavour to reach an agreement satisfactory to both parties. When I stated in the House that I expected the men to return to work within forty-eight hours, I had that telegram in my possession, and I believed the local officers would at once carry out the instructions given by the president of the organization. Within a few days the representatives of the men sent me a message giving me a copy of one which they said they had sent to the president of the organization telling him that they were going to manage the matter for themselves and that he should not interfere. That was rather a peculiar stand for the men to take. Mr. White, however, the president of the International organization, took the matter up with the local officers at each mine throughout the whole district, which is a very large one, and he endeavoured through them to have the men return to work at once. That endeavour appears to have failed also. I received a message yesterday stating that I would have some definite information to-day, but I have not received anything yet. We are keeping close watch on the matter, and I can only assure my hon. friend that we are not losing sight of the importance of having coal for the farmers, for transportation purposes, and for the purpose of keeping smelters at work in order that manufacturers of munitions in the different factories throughout the country may continue operations. I believe that very soon work will be resumed in those mines.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Both the Minister of Labour and the hon. member for Moosejaw are good friends of mine, and I am glad to see them occasionally, but they have come into my house and turned me out. I have let them have a period for cavorting around and honours, I think, are now about equal, so that I suggest that we go back to the work before the committee.

Mr. McKENZIE: Items Nos. 154 and 158 appear to refer to competing lines which go over the same route, except that one service goes to Liverpool and the other to London. In these times of stress and strain and scarcity of money, surely one line of steamers could do the whole work.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The hon. member is confounding St. John with St. Johns.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That is only the difference of a letter.

Mr. McKENZIE: I may be making a mistake, but the service is all on the same track.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Any highroad throughout the country has many people travelling on the same track.

Mr. McKENZIE: Some economy should find its way into this department, and if the work performed by two lines of steamers can be done by one, that should be brought to the attention of the minister.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That is true, but both lines are busy.

Steam service between St. John, Halifax and London, $25,000.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Although the vessels run between the same ports, they run on different times, and the two lines are doing simply what one line with double the accommodation would do.

Mr. MACDONALD: Has there been any change in the subsidy for the service between Canada and Newfoundland?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: No.

Mr. MACDONALD: I understood that some exception was taken by the department to the service rendered by the steamships Kyle and Meagle which took the place of the steamships Bruce and Linnwood. As the boats now on the line are 5 p.m. rendering service that is not so luxurious but that seems to be satisfactory in war time, that service deserves every possible encouragement. If the minister had accepted my recommendation in regard to the service between Pictou and the Magdalen Islands, he would have had much better conditions there than exist now. In view of the transportation situation by sea, I hope there will be no disposition on the part of the department to make any conditions which will interfere with the existing service between Canada and Newfoundland, which appears to be quite satisfactory. There is strong competition between Canada and the United States for the trade of Newfoundland. The Red Cross steamers have been running from Boston to St. John's, Newfoundland, and securing a great deal of traffic. The other route via North Sydney is the only method by which Canada can trade with Newfoundland since the withdrawal of the steamers from Montreal, so that route should receive every possible consideration and encouragement. I heard incidentally there was some question about the subsidy of last year.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: There was a question about the subsidy because the steamship company worked without a contract and would not come for a contract. They furnished me with no rates, and I did not purpose to pay a subsidy until the steamship came under contract and performed a satisfactory service. In subsidized steamship services where the vessels are not so well equipped and of smaller tonnage than those which are in the contract, a reasonable adjustment is made for that deterioration. A slight adjustment was made in this case, and the matter for the last year has been settled and a contract entered into for the ensuing year.

Mr. MACDONALD: What is the difference

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: About $5,000.

Steamship service between Canada and Australia or New Zealand or both, on Pacific ocean, $180,509.

Mr. NESBITT: Is there any service now between St. John's and New Zealand?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes.

Mr. NESBITT: Is there a service now between Canada and Australia on the Atlantic ocean?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes, but the service is interrupted through vessels being requisitioned, although I do not think there have been more than one or two lapses during the year.

Mr. NESBITT: We ship monthly to Australia and New Zealand, and all last winter we had to ship from New York.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The vessels were overcrowded and were not able to take all the freight offering.

Steam service between Canada, China and Japan, $253,333.34.

Mr. MACDONALD: Is this the Canadian Pacific Railway service?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes. The Empress of Asia and the Empress of Russia are the two newest boats. There is also the Empress of Japan and the Monteagle.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is the trade satisfactory between Japan and Canada?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It is about the same as usual.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Have you exported more wheat to Japan?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Not very much.

Mr. LEMIEUX: How do you account for that?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Japan is very prosperous now and rice crops abundant.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I thought our export of wheat to Japan would have increased since the exhibition at Osaka fifteen years ago. I remember at the time I visited Japan, bakeries were established at the different centres in order to get the people accustomed to bread. I was told that the best quality of rice was nearly all exported. Has no effort been made by the minister to increase our wheat exports to Japan?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I cannot say that any great advance has been made in the substitution of wheat and flour for the food of the generality of the people of Japan, though amongst certain classes there flour is being used more and more every day. They use a softer wheat than we do, and our exports have not increased very much.

Mr. LEMIEUX: When I was in Japan I was told that the reason why soft wheat was used was because the freight rates between Canada and Japan were too high. The freight rates from Seattle and Oregon ports were lower than from Vancouver and Victoria.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: All the cargo vessels running now between the United States and Japan are Japanese boats. They can be operated very cheaply, and vessel owners in the United States have been unable to compete with them.

Mr. MACDONALD: Has there been any exportation of wheat to any great degree from Pacific ports?

[Sir George Foster.]

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: No. The Panama canal from which a great deal was expected, and still is expected, has not developed the through trade that was expected, owing to some difficulties in the canal itself, but more particularly owing to the war.

Mr. MACDONALD: There have been statements that wheat passing through the Panama canal would be in danger of fermentation. British Columbia looked forward hopefully to the development of trade on the opening of the canal. Some time ago I saw a very large elevator there which had been built for the handling of wheat, but had been very little used. Has the department considered the possibility of fermentation of wheat passing through the tropics?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The department, of course, has no experience with wheat passing through the canal, but we do not expect any difficulty such as my hon. friend suggests. Wheat from Argentina moves through equatorial areas and reaches Britain in good shape. My own opinion is that there would be no difficulty in this respect, but the question will not be settled, I suppose, until the cargoes go through.

Mr. MACDONALD: I am glad to hear that the minister is of that opinion; it is my own view. There should be no danger of fermentation, as wheat from the Argentine and other countries passes through the same zone and arrives in Britain in good condition.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: There is always this to be taken into account: Wheat raised in different countries, and even in different parts of the same country, varies greatly in the degree of moisture it contains. That has been exemplified in our own Northwest. About three years ago, taking up the question of the future transportation of wheat with a view to the lines which that transportation would permanently follow, I established in Winnipeg a laboratory in charge of Dr. Birchard, where experiments have been, and still are, carried on, to ascertain the moisture contents, at different seasons, of the wheat grown in different parts of the Northwest and the keeping qualities of the wheat under transit conditions. Records of these experiments are carefully kept, and so we are building up a basis for general conclusions in regard to such matters as the use of the Panama canal for the transport of our wheat. As the temperature conditions will be about the same—certainly no worse—for the Panama canal transit for our wheat and the present transit for Argentine wheat, I venture the opinion that there will be no difficulty on that account.

Steam service between Victoria and San Francisco, $3,000.

Mr. MACDONALD: What service is this?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: This is one of the perpetual commemorations of confederation with British Columbia. We have to keep a service between San Francisco and British Columbia. Formerly that service was run at a cost of $25,000. This is not a service you would subsidize if you were choosing to subsidize services, and so it has been cut down to $3,000, which is the smallest amount that, with proper dignity, can preserve the memory of a great event.

Mr. MACDONALD: Is it an American line?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: R. P. Rithet & Co. This is a service we cannot get rid of except with the consent of British Columbia. I made a proposition to them to use the money for the British Columbia coast trade, but they thought it should not be changed.

Steam service from the opening to the closing of navigation in 1917, between Gaspé Basin and Dalhousie or Campbellton.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I notice that the good service we had in the old days on that coast has disappeared. Last year the hon. minister presented to that coast a steamer called the Elaine. She was a very poor boat; I think if I should call her a tub no fault could be found with the description. Moreover, instead of plying at the dates which would be reasonably expected, she only started the service on the 6th of August.

The service is required during the whole year and more especially in the spring and fall. I simply call the attention of the vigilant minister to the very poor service performed by the unfortunate Elaine, and I would expect that he would stir up the owners of the vessel to at least give the people on the coast a chance of getting their provisions and sending their produce to market.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The reason the vessel went on at such a late period was that the old vessel disappeared and we came very close to having no vessel at all. In the end we got this one but she did not get on the route until late. Of course, she was not paid for work she did not do. That route is one of the disappointments of our coast traffic. It is one of the finest scenic routes probably that we have in Canada in its way, running along the coast of the Baie de Chaleur for its whole distance. This used to be the only method of transit and it was well patronized. Then the railway came in and it is there now. The railway itself is not the most modern bit of machinery you could devise.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The first section but not the last.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I have never been over it myself, I have never risked my life which is somewhat precious, but I have heard some tall stories in the past of private cars which tried to get over the route. We are keeping up that route and I do not like to tell the committee how small is the amount of freight which is carried.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The season was short.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The minister is torn between conflicting emotions; one is his disinclination to abandon that route on account of its scenic beauties and the other is his sense of duty to the country with reference to paying out money for subsidizing that route. However, the old vessel is going on this year in good time and I hope she will do better than she did last year.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The minister is quite right in saying that this is one of the most beautiful sections in Canada. When the old Admiral was plying between Dalhousie and Gaspé we had, during the summer months, quite a number of American and Canadian tourists visiting the coast. Later on the people of the coast formed a syndicate, got the contract from the Government and built a boat that suited the business of the coast. The name of that boat was the Lady Eileen, but unfortunately the boat was lost in a storm somewhere near Newport Islands. Another boat was obtained but it was an old boat which had been in service around the Islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon. It was a very poor substitute. So it has gone from good to bad and from bad to worse. I understand the difficulties of the minister. As he explained, during the war we cannot expect to get boats, they are not to be had, but I hope that after the war the hon. gentleman will see that the service is restored to its former conditions. As regards the railway, no doubt the construction of that road has affected the trade which formerly gave the service the bulk of its profits. But a boat is needed all the same. The first section of the railway from Paspebiac to New Carlisle was built under the hon. gentleman's regime and I agree with him when he says that there are tall stories about that bit of the railway. As regards the section from New Carlisle to Gaspé, it is in excellent condition but of course, in order to reach Gaspé, you must pass over the bad section of the road. During the last two years the company has made an effort to give the public a fairly good service. If the hon. gentleman will risk his private car next summer—

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It was not my car.

Mr. LEMIEUX: —he will certainly find no difficulty in reaching Gaspé where the people will be glad to meet him provided he does not talk politics.

Steam service between Halifax, Canso and Guysboro, $5,000.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Has that service been performed?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes, a weekly service by the Halifax-Canso Steamship Company.

Steam service between Halifax and Newfoundland via Cape Breton ports, $10,000.

Mr. McKENZIE: Who performs that service?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: J. A. Farquhar and Company.

Mr. McKENZIE: Are there two boats now? There used to be the Seal and the Sable.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Just the Seal is on the route.

Mr. McKENZIE: At what ports in Cape Breton does she call?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Halifax, Sydney, North Sydney, Marble Mountain, Baddeck, Ingonish, Neil's Harbour, White Point and St. Paul's Island, and at Channel, Codroy, Sandy Point, Bay of Islands and Bonne Bay, Newfoundland; thence on the return voyage to Halifax, calling at Bay of Islands, Sandy Point, Codroy, Channel, St. Paul's Island, White Point, Neil's Harbour, Ingonish, North Sydney and Sydney.

Mr. SINCLAIR: These local services on the coast of Nova Scotia that connect with the railway might be improved by making them more frequent. The service between Guysborough, Canso and Halifax carries large quantities of fish to be shipped by the Intercolonial to Montreal and western points. In this way it has become a good feeder to the Intercolonial railway.

The same is true of the Canso service, running between Guysborough and Queensport to Mulgrave, and also from Canso to Mulgrave. I pointed out to the Minister of Marine and Fishries the other day that that service, which has been carried on for a number of years, has been a very profitable source of traffic to the Intercolonial. When the service was started in 1896 the amount received by the Intercolonial for traffic at Mulgrave was $6,460. Twenty years afterwards, in 1916, the amount received by the Intercolonial there was $90-435.04. This will show the minister that this has been a splendid investment for the Government. They have been paying out some $10,000 and receiving traffic amounting to $90,000. This kind of traffic could be very much developed if facilities were afforded. The Intercolonial railway has had no enterprise during any part of its history in dealing with this question of collecting freight along the coast. The steamship lines that have been established for that purpose have been founded by private capital and assistance has been given to them by other departments of the Government, but the Intercolonial itself has not taken the matter up and has shown a lack of enterprise in collecting traffic in that way.

The trouble with the service between Canso and Guysborough and Canso and Halifax is that the boat can call at only a few points in a distance of over one hundred miles. Much local traffic could be collected there if facilities were afforded. I refer to this in order that the minister may take it up with the Minister of Railways, and possibly work out some policy that will give the fishing interests of the Maritime Provinces an opportunity of reaching the Intercolonial and thus of developing their business.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I quite understand that.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Will you do anything?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: After the war.

Steam service between Halifax and Spry Bay and ports in Cape Breton, $4,000.

Mr. KYTE: This is the service carried on by the owners of the steamer Margaret. For many years that service was subsidized between Halifax and Spry bay, the subsidy being $2,500. This $1,500 additional, I suppose, is to subsidize the service between Spry bay and Cape Breton.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It runs as far as L'Ardoise. The ports of call are Halifax, Jeddore, Owl's Head, Tangier, Pope's Harbour, Ship Harbour, Sheet Harbour, Sober Island, Spry Bay, St. Peter's, Arichat, West Arichat, Poulamond and L'Ardoise.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Port Felix is not included?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: No, I do not see it.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The boat passes about one hundred miles of coast there without making a call. I understood she did call at one port in Guysborough, Port Felix. I trust it has not been overlooked.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I will inquire about that.

Steam service between Halifax, South Cape Breton and Bras d'Or Lake ports, $6,000.

Mr. CARROLL: What are the ports of call?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: This boat makes two round trips from Halifax to Gabarous, Louisburg, Main-à-dieu, Port Morien, Glace Bay, Sydney, North Sydney, and one trip from Halifax to Gabarous, Louisburg, Main-à-dieu, Port Morien, Glace Bay, Sydney, North Sydney, Baddeck, Grand Narrows, Iona and St. Peter's.

Mr. CARROLL: Who is the contractor?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The Halifax and Glace Bay Steamship Company.

Mr. CARROLL: Was the service performed last year to Glace Bay?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes.

Mr. CARROLL: I was given to understand by a citizen of Glace Bay that she did not call at Glace Bay last year.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Glace Bay is mentioned in her round. I will inquire about that.

Steam service between Halifax and West coast Cape Breton, calling at way ports, $4,000.

Mr. A. W. CHISHOLM: Where does that boat call?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Halifax, Port Mulgrave, Port Hastings, Port Hood, Mabou, Grand Etang, Cheticamp, and Eastern Harbour calling once every two weeks at Havre au Bouche and Margaree, and calling at Inverness whenever there is a reasonable quantity of freight or number of passengers to be landed or embarked, weather permitting.

Mr. A. W. CHISHOLM: Margaree is one of the most important points on the whole route, and why the boat should be permitted to pass Margaree and call at the other points is something I cannot understand. If the minister looks over the returns he will find there is more freight taken at Margaree than any other point, excepting, probably, Cheticamp. Its port serves a large and prosperous section of country, with a population of 8,000 souls. It is a glaring injustice and insult to the people of this section that the option of calling at the port only once in two weeks should be given to the boat authorities. Are the men who constitute this company of more importance in the eyes of the Government than 8,000 free citizens? Does the Government prefer meeting the wishes of the steamship company than the urgent needs of the people of Margaree and surrounding country? I wrote the minister with regard to this matter. Margaree is also an important fishing station, and I should like to call the attention of the Government to the pressing need of regular boat service in view of the fact that we depend on this for all our supplies and for shipping our fish and farm produce. I also wish to impress on the minister the great need of making Margaree Island a place of call. This is an important fishing station with stormy rough coast. I would not ask them to call except when there is a necessity, but there should be some way for them to know when there was a necessity—when there was something to ship or when people desired to go aboard of the boat.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I will look into the matter and give my hon. friend the information he desires.

Steam service between Halifax and Sherbrooke, $2,000.

Mr. SINCLAIR: What are the ports of call in that service?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Halifax, Port Dufferin, Moser River, Ecum Secum, Marie Joseph, Liscombe, Sonora and Sherbrooke.

Mr. MACDONALD: What is the name of the boat?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The "Dufferin."

Mr. MACDONALD: And the contractor?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: J. W. Murdock is the contractor.

Steam service from the opening to the closing of navigation in 1917 between the mainland and Magdalen Islands, $18,000.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: The minister is aware that this is a very poor and unsatisfactory service. The directors and managers of the steamer employed in this service openly discriminate, in their own favour, against other people doing business. The fact of the matter is that while the "Lady Sybil" was on this service, the "Amelia" was also employed at the work she is doing to-day, namely, carrying goods for her owners, the difference being that she is now being paid a subsidy by the Government. I had occasion to call the attention of the department to a glaring instance of discrimination, which took place last fall, of which I have personal knowledge. Some parties in the Magdalen islands in the fishing business—and I suppose rivals to some extent in business with the owners of this ship—bought some boat plank from the firm with which I am associated. When we were shipping this plank, the captain told us he had no room and could not take it. The owner's boat builder happened to be present, and he offered to buy the plank. Under the circumstances we were delighted to sell it, and immediately space was found for it on the steamer, and because, in doing my duty, as a member of Parliament, I drew the attention of the department to this fact and to other facts of which I was aware, these people refused to pay for the plank, and the consequence will be a lawsuit.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: You should not have complained till you got your money?

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: But, as a public man, I had a duty to discharge.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Duty is imperative.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What is the name of the owner of the vessel?

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: William Leslie & Co. are large owners, and Robert Leslie & Co. are part owners. Dr. Starrat is the manager representing the firm of Robert Leslie & Co. I know that parties in the Magdalen islands cannot import goods unless they have the good will of these people. They are penalized, and they have no certainty that their goods will be carried. It is an intolerable state of affairs.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What is the name of the boat?

[Sir George Foster.]

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: The "Amelia." Last year a lumber-laden steamer was wrecked in the gulf of St. Lawrence. This boat went to the rescue, but it was after tugs powerful enough to take the disabled steamer to Halifax had arrived; the "Amelia" was doing very little work, and her services could have been dispensed with. I am informed that the manager, Dr. Starrat, was remonstrated with for having the steamer off the route for such a length of time, and he stated that he did not care whether he received the subsidy or not, because he expected his share of the salvage would be larger than the subsidy the Government would pay. The service was interrupted for a considerable time in that way, without any necessity whatever. I called the attention of the department to this last year, and I thought possibly some reduction would be made in the subsidy, on account of the very inefficient service, and on account, particularly, of the discrimination against the ordinary business man, but no penalty was enforced, and they were not obliged to make any refund. Conditions this year are worse. The company appear now to realise that they can do just what they like, and yet this large subsidy is being paid. This condition of affairs is intolerable. When the contract with the Lady Sybil expired, Mr. William McLure, the owner of the ship, was willing to enter into a new contract with the department for a number of years, but the department refused to renew the contract for more than one year. If that be the case, it was poor business judgment on the part of the department because ships were becoming scarcer every year and it would be an advantage for the department to enter into a contract for some years. Mr. McLure, knowing that he could not get a contract for more than one year, received and accepted a good offer for his ship, and the result is the inefficient service we have to-day. Surely the department is not powerless; surely this company will not be allowed to do just as they please; surely the department will not pay them $18,000 a year of the public money for practically carrying their own goods and discriminating against those of nearly everyone else. It would be almost a good thing to abolish this service, because the public are receiving no good whatever, and the company feel their position so strong that any one who calls attention to this matter is likely to be penalized. Surely the minister can do something to mitigate this crying injustice.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Last year I informed the minister that the Amelia was quite inadequate to the service and was a dangerous boat to travel on. The same boat is still on the service, and I have received from my former electors in the Magdalen islands many protests against the service. There is no space in the boat available for passengers and the boat is very filthy. The Lady Sybil was built especially for the service; she was run for a year or two by the Leslie company, and then that company thought it more advantageous to put that boat elsewhere and to put on the Amelia. Finally the Lady Sybil was sold to Mr. McLure, and she gave a most excellent service to the Magdalen islands. It would be a pity if the inhabitants of those islands, who are isolated for such a long period of the year, should suffer through the action of the department. The minister should look into the matter again and see that those people receive a better service.

At six o'clock, the committee took recess.

After Recess.

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: If I could have lived up to the difficult task set for me this afternoon by the hon. member for Moosejaw, and known five years ago what was going to happen to-day, I might have made different dispositions, but that was a pretty difficult thing to do. We are in our present condition mainly for the reason that the really good boat we had, and which had been on the service for five or six years, left us. I tried to get the loan of a boat from the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, but it was impossible for him to accommodate me, and in the end the Amelia was the only boat available and I had to take her. I do not think we could have done without this service to the Magdalen Islands. The boat made 52 round trips last year and in addition to the mail carried 1,714 passengers as compared with 633 in 1915, and 6,600 tons of freight as compared with 8,400 in 1915. She was paid therefor $14,000, there being a reduction on account of services not performed. The same condition of affairs prevails this year; there is no other boat available.

With reference to what the hon. member for Prince Edward Island said, this is the first I have heard of the difficulties which occurred last year, and I shall certainly look into the matter. A steamboat owner who is paid to perform a public service certainly should not discriminate in favour of his own business or between two persons whose freight he carries, and I should be loath to think that that had been done. But as the hon. member has brought the matter to my attention I will make inquiries, and if the information is different from what he says I will inform him and the committee.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Would the minister instruct his inspector to see that the boat is kept in a sanitary condition? From the complaints I received last fall from a clergyman on the Islands it certainly looks as if the inspector had failed in his duties. How many times a year does the inspector look over these subsidized boats?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: He visits them all once during the season; that is the utmost he can do.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I know it is difficult to get a suitable boat for this service, but I wish the minister would make a special point of seeing that this boat is kept in a clean and sanitary condition.

Mr. MACDONALD: Had the minister followed my advice about this service two or three years ago we would not be in the position we are in to-day. The minister will recall that I urged the desirability of giving such a subsidy as would secure the services of the Lady Sybil. The eastern portion of Prince Edward Island and the Magdalen Islands may be an isolated place, but they are inhabited by the very best Canadian citizens, and it is very important that a good service should be given them. If the Lady Sybil had been engaged all this trouble would have been avoided. There is no question about the unfitness of the Amelia for carrying passengers and performing the service generally in a proper way. I have not personal knowledge of the conditions mentioned by my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island, but I have heard rumours of complaints along the line indicated, and I think the minister should look into the matter.

Steam service between Pelee Island and the mainland, $8,000.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: This was a new boat last year.

Mr. GRAHAM: What is the port of call on the mainland.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The boat runs between Kingsville, Leamington and Pelee

Island. It is the only means of communication they have.

Steam service between Petit de Grat and Intercolonial railway terminus at Mulgrave, $7,000.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: William G. Leslie is the contractor, and the name of the boat is the Magdalen.

Mr. KYTE: Has any complaint reached the minister regarding the inefficiency of the service last year and the length of time the boat was laid off for repairs?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I do not know just how long she was laid off, but it is an all-year service and the boat is allowed one month for repairs, either January or February, I think. She must have some chance to repair.

Steam service on the Petitcodiac river between Moncton and way ports, and a port or ports on the west coast of Cumberland county, $2,500.

Mr. MACDONALD: How long has that service been subsidized?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: According to the record before me, the subsidy began in 1907.

Mr. CARROLL: I have on several previous occasions brought to the attention of the minister a matter of importance to the county I have the honour to represent, South Cape Breton, the establishment of a steamer service on the Moira river. Year after year, petitions and other communications have been sent to the minister regarding a service on that river. On each occasion when I have brought the matter to the minister's attention he has told me that it is not the policy of the Government to subsidize steamers on inland waters. But when the Estimates come down I find such subsidies included.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Survivals of the unfittest.

Mr. CARROLL: If it is not the policy of the Government to do that sort of thing, these subsidies should not be allowed to survive. Moreover, at this particular stage in the history of the country I do not press the matter as I certainly did press it in 1911, 1912, and 1913. But I am going to press it—

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: After the war is over.

Mr. CARROLL: Yes, after the war is over.

[Sir George Foster.]

Steam service between Pictou and Montague, calling at Murray Harbour and Georgetown, $6,000.

Mr. MACDONALD: Would the minister give the figures showing the trade on that route?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: According to my record the service began in 1907. The passengers carried in 1907 numbered 1,320 and in 1916, 1,455. The freight in 1907 was 2,464 tons, and in 1916, it was 5,468 tons. Livestock and mail make up the rest of the traffic.

Mr. MACDONALD: In view of the proposed car-ferry communication between Prince Edward Island and the mainland, what is proposed as to the existing route between Pictou and Charlottetown, Pointe du Chene and Summerside?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The Prince Edward service is to be carried on by the Intercolonial railway. I have not exact information on that subject. I understand from the report of the Minister of Railways (Mr. Cochrane) and from his statements in the House, that everything is now fitted for running and that the improvements contemplated will be made before the season of navigation is over, so that this new route will be in use through the winter season. As to the concentration of the service at that point, and as to what is taking place on the old route, I am not able to give my hon. friend the information. There will be some dislocation and it may be some hardship to localities, until the trade accommodates itself to the new route. But, on the whole, the balance of advantage ought to be with the new and improved ferry route.

Mr. MACDONALD: Do I understand the minister to say that during the present summer it is expected that the Department of Railways will manage communication with Prince Edward Island by the ferry between Cape Tormentine and Cape Traverse?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That is what I understood.

Mr. MACDONALD: And the route from Summerside to Pointe du Chene, and Pictou to Charlottetown, will be done away with? Is that the hon. gentleman's impression?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes, but I may be wrong.

Mr. MACDONALD: I hope the hon. gentleman is wrong. Some department of the Government own boats which are still fitted for service on the present route. And, as the Prince Edward Island railway is not of standard gauge, to concentrate traffic at one point by means of a car ferry seems an outrageous proposition.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: These boats may be running; I am not sure. All I know is that the railway is looking after the service.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: The Minister of Trade and Commerce is much more familiar with the geography of that portion of the country than is the Minister of Railways.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes, I know the geography.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: I can tell the hon. minister that it is the opinion of people in close touch with the business that goes on between Prince Edward Island and the mainland, men whose opinions are worth something, that the car ferry, run under present conditions, that is with a narrow guage railway on Prince Edward Island, will never take care of all the traffic. Besides that, a large portion of the Island traffic is with eastern Nova Scotia and Newfoundland. To carry produce from the eastern end of Prince Edward Island by car ferry to the eastern portion of Nova Scotia is much the same in principle, though not quite in degree, as to go from Ottawa to Liverpool by way of Vancouver and Montreal. If the minister can use his influence with the Minister of Railways to allow the boats to run at least this summer between Pictou and Charlottetown and Pointe du Chene and Summerside, until the car ferry is tested, I think that would be only reasonable.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I shall be glad to see my colleague on that subject.

Mr. MACDONALD: The Minister of Railways is a very difficult man to get anything out of. It is very difficult to find out what he is doing. He is not like the Minister of Trade and Commerce who, I am bound to say, is genial and willing to give information.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Don't draw comparisons, please.

Mr. MACDONALD: I hope the hon. gentleman will not be offended seeing that the comparison is favourable to him. I am going to appeal to him as an old Maritime Province man——

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That is where you hit me on a tender point.

Mr. MACDONALD: —to have some consideration for the situation. I do not think there is much good in our talking to the Minister of Railways. Whatever virtue there may be in the car ferry, it is only in being able to send a loaded car direct to its destination either from Prince Edward Island to the mainland or vice versa. Pending these conditions, however far in the future they may be, to divert the present boats from the route which they now cover, and concentrate all the traffic at an out-of-the-way point, compelling all the travel and all the business to seek that one route, is an unwise and unnecessary thing, and ought not to be permitted. I bespeak from the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) that he will see the Minister of Railways and urge him to permit trade and travel to continue their present course until new conditions are provided. The people of Prince Edward Island who, at one time were supposed to take some interest in the car ferry, have come to the conclusion that it will mean such a serious dislocation of their business conditions that the result will not justify the expenditure. Such a change, under the conditions which I have described, would create the greatest possible dissatisfaction in the Maritime Provinces. I am not speaking any too strongly upon this subject in pressing the matter upon the minister I bespeak his attention to the matter involving as it does the internal trade of the three Maritime Provinces. No service that the minister is providing for in his Estimates in our part of the country can compare in importance with the service to which I am referring. If the interprovincial connection between the three provinces be dislocated it will create nothing but the greatest dissatisfaction and it should not be thought of for one moment. I trust the minister will use his powerful influence to see that conditions remain as they are and that the boats which are now employed are kept in their regular positions until we can see what the future will bring forth.

Schooner service between Pictou, New Glasgow, Antigonish county ports and Mulgrave, $1,000.

Mr. A. W. CHISHOLM: What is the size of that schooner?

Mr. KYTE: What class of vessel is subsidized by this item?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: She is a schooner with auxiliary power which was put on that serivce for the accommodation of the people of that coast as the harbours are so shallow that a large vessel cannot get in. She gives not a very extensive but a very good service.

Mr. KYTE: What quantity of freight and what number of passengers did she carry last year?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: She made 26 trips, carried 253 tons of freight and received her subsidy.

Steam service from the opening to the closing of navigation in 1917, between Pictou, Mulgrave and Cheticamp, $7,500.

Mr. A. W. CHISHOLM: Has the department control over freight rates charged by these boats?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes, all rates have to be submitted and no changes are made unless they are approved by the department. For a series of years the rates charged by these coast services were kept at about par. They received their subsidies and the rates were the same each year. There may have been some few changes but very few indeed. But, during the past two years there has been an almost universal pressure for some increase in the rates because coal and other costs have increased and it has been a choice between advancing the subsidies and giving a reasonable advance in the rates. The department has taken up each case, and, as well as it could, has come to its decision as to what is a reasonable advance. In some cases applications have been granted, in other cases they have not been and in still other cases the demands have been scaled down. Under present circumstances costs are higher and they have a fair claim for some increase. If there is to be an increase, we do our part by paying the subsidy and asking those who carry on the trade to take their portion of the added cost if there be any through the added rate. It is not an easy thing to do but we have to do it.

Mr. A. W. CHISHOLM: I quite appreciate that. Is there any schedule in the department that one could get to show what freight rates these concerns are charging? A man in my own county, who gets considerable freight over this boat, might like to know what is regarded by the department as a reasonable charge. Could the department furnish anything in that line?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: There is a schedule for each one of the services and we have in the department the rates that are charged every year by every one of these subsidized boats.

[Sir George Foster.]

Mr. A. W. CHISHOLM: Could I get a copy of that?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes.

Mr. A. W. CHISHOLM: I am in possession of a letter from an importer of hay and he tells me that the boat plying between Mulgrave and a northern port of Inverness county, Margaree, charge $3 a ton for pressed hay. That is certainly an exorbitant charge because I know that boats plying on other coasts in Cape Breton charge 65 per cent less than that.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: For a similar distance?

Mr. A. W. CHISHOLM: Yes. There have been complaints against the exorbitant charges that are being made by this boat. I do not know whether these charges are regarded by the department as being fair or not and therefore I would like to get that schedule. It seems to me most unjust and unfair to burden our people with exorbitant charges in view of the very fat subsidy enjoyed by this boat. $7,500 a season the two subsidies receive by the boats which ply between Pictou and Inverness and Mulgrave and Inverness. There is another matter which I referred to last year and that is the lightering costs from steamboats at Margaree Harbour. This harbour has been scandalously neglected for the last five years. Formerly steamboats could get in and out but it is only under favourable conditions that fishing boats can get in and out now. It is only by boat that goods can be landed down there. Importers of goods are at least entitled to some consideration in the matter of lightering goods. The Government could very well insist on the steamship company landing the goods at Margaree at their own expense. I would respectfully ask the hon. minister to look up the files in his department and he will see there that I got this arrangement made in 1911. Why was this discontinued? The importer to whom I have referred had to pay 85 cents a ton for getting that hay off the boat to the wharf. Some arrangements should be made by which the people would not be called upon to pay this extra charge in addition to the extraordinary increase in the freight rates, particularly in view of the large subsidy received. I again bring this matter to the attention of the minister. I have brought it to his attention twice already, but it seems the desire of the steamship company is paramount in the thoughts of the Government. This company have absolutely no justification in asking the minister to permit them to increase their freight.

The country are paying them a subsidy larger than was ever thought of in the past.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I have made a note of it.

Mr. A. W. CHISHOLM: I have never heard anybody say that there were any good results from my former efforts.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: We will see what happens this time.

Mr. MACDONALD: I did not catch the name of the steamer performing that service.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It is the Kinburn, owned by Roderick McDougall.

Mr. MACDONALD: Would it not be as well to have her go through direct from Pictou to Mulgrave? I am told that it now parallels the Intercolonial and any person going from Pictou to Mulgrave gets there more quickly by railroad.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: There are quite a number of routes on which the vessel parallels the railway. The trouble is that when the vessel is put on the people all want the railway and when the railway is there they want both the railway and the vessel.

Mr. McKENZIE: It is quite possible that the boat was running before the Intercolonial from Mulgrave to New Glasgow was built, and they wanted it kept on.

Mr. MACDONALD: The natural route would be direct from Pictou to Cheticamp.

Mr. A. W. CHISHOLM: Since this discussion has come up, I may say that this boat has no right to go to Pictou at all if the minister had continued the service we enjoyed before he took charge, viz., the service of two boats, one from Pictou to the Inverness coast, and a second from Mulgrave to the ports of the coast. It was originally the custom to carry the trade from Port Mulgrave to the Inverness ports, making two regular trips a week. There was another boat from Pictou touching Port Hood, Margaree, Mahen, Grand Etang and Cheticamp, but for some reason the subsidy was taken from the Pictou-Margaree-Cheticamp route and added to the subsidy given to the boat from Mulgrave to Port Hood, Mahen, Margaree, Grand Etang and Cheticamp and Pleasant Bay. The result is that we do not get as good service from Mulgrave on the Intercolonial to ports in Inverness as we did before, owing to the delay caused by the boat going to Pictou. It is impossible for one to properly give the two services. I repeat that this boat has no right to go to Pictou at all, but attend to the Mulgrave-Inverness ports. Another if smaller boat should be on the Pictou route as was there before my hon. friend took charge. The steamboat is the only service we have. We have no railway service and surely we should be expecting improvement in this service rather than retrogression, as is now taking place.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It is hard to be the arbiter between two such conflicting interests.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Would the minister mention the ports of call?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: One round trip every fortnight between Pictou and Mulgrave, calling both ways at Arisaig, Georgeville, Cape George, Morristown, Malignant Cove, Livingstone Cove, Ballantyne Cove, and Cribbin's Point, making twelve round trips during the season; and two round trips each week between Mulgrave and Cheticamp, calling both ways at Port Hastings, Port Hawkesbury, Port Hood, Port Hood Island, Margaree, Margaree Harbour, Grand Etang and Eastern Harbour, making fifty-five trips during the season; and calling once each week at Pleasant Bay, and whenever passengers and freight are offered and whenever required by the minister, at Henry Island, Madou Mouth, Inverness, Red Cape and Port Bain, as well as at whatever port or ports, place or places en route the minister may direct.

Mr. KYTE: The first half dozen names are those at which the schooner calls, and the reason given by the minister for subsidizing the schooner is that the water is very shallow in these harbours. This would look like duplication.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The schooner calls at a number of ports that are not visited by the steamer.

Mr. LEMIEUX: As I have to leave the House in a few moments I would ask permission to make a few remarks to the committee upon Franco-Canadian trade relations. I am aware that Canada and France have a steamer service which was subsidized by Canada to the extent of $200,000. Will the minister tell the committee the names of the steamers which are performing the service at the present time, and if, generally speaking, they have given satisfaction to the public? I wish to call attention to the fact that the Department of Trade and Commerce, over which my hon. friend presides, should stimulate the manufacturers of Canada to endeavour to get their share of trade in the vast demand that will be made on the various manufacturers of America in the near future, in the reconstruction period into which France is now entering. I have in my hand documents which show that about 729 communes—that is, small villages and towns—have been invaded by the Germans. About 200 of them have been relieved since the great drives have been inaugurated by the Allied armies, and, according to the opinion expressed by a member of the French Chamber of Commerce, it is expected that, in a short time, the other communes will also be relieved, and the people of France will then realize that over 50,000 habitations have been actually destroyed. Apart from the sympathy which this country has in connection with the terrible disaster which the passage of the Huns in those regions caused, there is a practical view to take of the situation, when all sympathies have been given. France will have to reconstruct those hamlets, towns and communes, and she will have to draw on the foreign countries for the raw material. Last year I read to the House a circular which the Chamber of Commerce of Boston and the Board of Trade of New York had jointly published broadcast in the United States, inviting all the manufacturers to look after the enormous trade which this reconstruction period in France would involve. I told my hon. friend at the time that attention should be paid to that practical side of the question, and I should like to know if anything has been done by his department in that connection. As we have a direct service between Canada and France, it seems to me that it could not be better utilized than by asking each of the manufacturers to encourage that service by the shipping of their goods to France, for the reconstruction of these communes. The trade between Canada and France, I am happy to say, has greatly increased of late years. I find that in 1912 the trade was $14,000,000 in round figures. In 1913, $18,000,000; in 1914, there was an increase of $200,000, making a total of $18,200,000. In 1915 that trade had increased to $22,847,000, and in 1916 to $41,799,951, and I have seen figures which show that up to February, 1917, our trade reached the high water mark of something like $63,000,000, or $65,000,000 for the eleven months of the current fiscal year. This means that France is an excellent client of Canada, and that we should not maintain that trade for war purposes only, but that we should try to capture that market for the years of reconstruction, which will come very shortly. Eight or ten years ago a committee of very distinguished Frenchmen was formed. One of the most prominent members of that committee was Monsieur Gabriel Hanotaux, former Minister of Foreign Affairs in France. He and Monsieur Ribot, the President of the Council in France, were the fathers of the alliance between Russia and France. This committee, viewing with alarm the strides made by the Germans on the various foreign markets, and the attention paid by the German traders to North and South American trade, formed an association called France-Amérique. It comprised all the prominent friends of the United States, Canada, Argentina, Brazil, and some other of the southern republics. They have their head office in Paris. They publish a monthly magazine called France-Amérique, and this review of very high order is devoted chiefly to the promotion of good fellowship between the Allied nations, and also to the development of better trade relations with these nations. This committee sent a delegation to Canada a few years ago, which visited Montreal and Quebec, after having visited the United States. On its return to Paris the committee published a little book which I hold in my hand, about the possibilities of trade between France and Canada. The contents of that book are most interesting. I ask my hon. friend to communicate with this committee in Paris, through the Commissioner for Canada in France, Monsieur Philippe Roy, and through the French Consul General in Montreal, Monsieur Bonin, who has worked so conscientiously and so unsparingly since he has been in Montreal for the enlargement of trade relations between France and Canada. Through the Comité France-Amérique the minister will find the natural channel his department requires abroad for making known in France the resources of Canada, and at the same time he will get, through the review published by that comité, an advertisement of the greatest advantage.

On two occasions I have spoken of the project launched a year ago by a committee of French and Canadian business men for the equipment of exhibition trains, one touring the principal cities of France with the staple products of Canada, and the other touring our country from ocean to ocean with the staple products of France.

A voluminous correspondence has been exchanged between Senator Beaubien and the minister on this subject, and the minister encouraged the movement as far as it lay in his power to do so. I have the correspondence before me. I have here the answer the minister made to Senator Beaubien, and although the project for the time being fell through because of the dire necessities of war, I hope that at the earliest opportunity, this project will receive the attention of the minister. The manufacturers of Toronto and Montreal have manifested a deep interest in it. Our four railway systems, the Intercolonial, thanks to the good-will of the Minister of Railways and Canals, the Grand Trunk, the 9 p.m. Canadian Pacific and the Canadian Northern have agreed to give the trains free access over their systems. I have here the letters which have been sent to Senator Beaubien on the subject, and the following firms are willing to favour the scheme: The Desbarats Printing Company, Limited, Montreal; The Phoenix Bridge and Iron Works, Ltd., Montreal. This company understand that in the reconstruction period in France our structural steel will be sorely required by the communes which have been so heavily devastated. Then there is the Roland Paper Company, Limited, Montreal. France is already a large consumer of Canadian pulp, and we must encourage that trade as much as possible. I know a firm, the Chicoutimi Pulp and Paper Company, which had some large contracts with the publishers of Le Petit Parisien, a paper which has a circulation of about a million a day. That journal is supplied with its paper by a Canadian firm. This is one instance; I could name others: The Canada Linseed Oil Mills Co., Montreal, Laurentide Company, Limited, Montreal, J. & T. Bell, Limited, Montreal, The Steel Company of Canada, Limited, Montreal, S. H. Ewing and Sons, coffees, spices, corks, wholesale teas and general commission merchants, Montreal, The William Rutherford and Sons Co., Ltd., Montreal, Cluett, Peabody and Company, Inc., Montreal, Charles E. Frost & Company, Pharmaceutical Chemists, Montreal, The Montreal Cottons, Ltd., Valleyfield, B. J. Coghlin Company, Ltd., railway supplies, etc., Montreal.

The various boards of trade in Canada and in France have also given their support to that project. I quite agree with the minister that at present we must abandon the idea of having an exhibition on wheels, but I hope the project will not be shelved in the files of the department. We must, by all means, maintain the trade between France and Canada at the figure, namely, $60,000,000, which it has reached. It would be regrettable, indeed, if, with a treaty between France and Canada and with a steamer service between Havre and Montreal we should revert to the days when we hardly did any business with that magnificent country, the pride of the world. This war has awakened the sympathies and also the commercial activities of our people, and in the years we shall have in France one of our foremost commercial Allies.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I have listened with interest to the statement of my hon. friend. We have no subsidized service running now between Canada and France, nor have we had one since the first year of the war. Conditions make it impossible for boats to be put on that service. There was a statutory provision under which we paid a subsidy to the boats of the Allan line before the war commenced.

The statement that my hon. friend has made with reference to the closer acquaintanceship between France and England is very apt, and we look for results from it. We do not look upon it as an acquaintanceship generated for war purposes only, and to continue only during the war. We believe that as they become better acquainted with us and with our resources, and as we become better acquainted with them and with the particular wants to which we may cater, the foundation for an expansion of trade will be laid on a better basis than ever before. But after all, a department, ever so wide awake a department as that of Trade and Commerce, cannot go beyond a certain point. The merchants themselves, the producers and the business men, must take advantage of their opportunities and push the interchange and exchange of articles between the two countries. A very instructive letter appeared in the Bulletin a week ago from our commissioner in Paris, which I would advise my hon. friend to read if he has not already done so, as I think it struck the nail right on the head. In a word it amounted to this: there is plenty of trade in France for the future if Canadian business men will look after it, but it will not take to itself wings and fly over here; it needs the nurture and care and enterprise and activity of the men who are interested on this side of the world. The United States has awakened to great activity in thought, and in planning to cater to the wants of the reconstruction period, but in so far as France is concerned, the letter goes on to say that the people of the United States have not made much more progress than we have, and for the same reason—they have not banded themselves together to look after the possibilities of the future.

The $50,000,000 to $60,000,000 trade that my hon. friend has spoken of is of course only a war trade, and we shall only be laying up disappointment for ourselves if we expect that figure to be kept up after the war. It will sag, but afterwards it will rise again if we look after the opportunities which I am sure are open to us. France will need the natural resources that we can supply, and as her Ally we shall be given a sentimental advantage in France. At the present time negotiations are proceeding for the supply of a large amount of lumber from Canada for reconstruction purposes after the war. Correspondence is taking place with my own department, and I hope it will come to much, but it will not do so unless producers on this side take advantage of their opportunities. It is true that the producers of Canada for the last three years, and at no time more than now, have had their hands and hearts full in doing what was necessary to be done for the war, and it has been difficult—I acknowledge the difficulty—to switch them from the absolutely necessary work of the war and turn their thoughts and activities to planning for conditions after the war, but they are thinking more about it than ever before. No one knows, however, when the war will end, and no one knows what conditions will be when the war does end, and it is practically impossible for them to lay definite plans until the conditions that will prevail are more definitely known than at the present time. It is a case largely of watching and waiting, not simply waiting, but planning in thought, if not in actual outlay and equipment, for the seeming possibilities of trade after the war.

The project of an exhibition on wheels is a lively and up-to-date project; it is a good project, but at the present time it is absolutely impossible of achievement because of transport conditions in France, and transport conditions here would not favour it. The project has to go into the category of those things that are not out of sight simply because they are not being carried out. Here, again, we shall have to watch and wait for the proper opportunity.

Mr. LEMIEUX: In connection with the reconstruction period in France, it was suggested to the minister, I think, that a number of ready-built houses, such as in my younger days we used to see in Ottawa, should be exhibited in Paris. Has anything been done along that line?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The matter was brought to my attention, and I took it up with the department and had the woodworkers plan certain houses. After these plans were made it was thought better—and under my advice it was done—to send the plans to Paris to have them thoroughly looked into and viséd, as it were, by governmental authority, acting either directly or through a committee. That was done, and we received modified plans from them for two or three different styles of what we would call shacks, to be used temporarily until more permanent buildings could be erected. In every case their plan called for a more elaborate and more costly building than we had planned. Our buildings would cost from $75 to $100, but with the improvements, coverings and the like of that, suggested by the French authorities, they would cost considerably more. However, a number of houses were constructed and I got transport for them free of charge to Paris, where they were on exhibition in the Champs Elysées. I myself saw them when I was over there last summer. They had the name of Canada on them, and served to show not only our plan of construction for temporary buildings of this kind, but our materials as well, and they were seen by a great many people. But the war has gone on much longer than anybody thought it would, and although we know now what they want and though the plans are in the hands of the woodworkers of Canada, not much is being done at present. They, too, I suppose, are awaiting the proper time. What works directly against them is the absolute impossibility of getting transport for goods.

Mr. CURRIE: I think that the question of our trade with France is one of the most important subjects to be discussed in this House. The ideas that prevail in Canada as to what will be required in France after the war is over are largely erroneous. For instance, it is expected by many that immediately after the war we are going to be called upon to send large shipments of lumber and ready-made houses to France. Having lived in the war zone, I have some idea of what the requirements there are likely to be; also, I am conversant with the building trade. The building material used in France is almost entirely brick. When a farmer wants brick to build a house he simply goes into his fields, builds a kiln, and makes his brick. The lumber used for the roof consists of limbs from the trees in the fields, usually elm. The timbers for the building are the same. The flooring and roof is tile, which the farmer makes out of clay, as he does his brick. Consequently, the wood products that we shall need to send to France will be doors, window sash and some flooring. For doors and window sash we are likely to find a ready sale. We should get patterns from France in order that we may be in a position to supply what they will require. Then there is hardware.

Mr. LEMIEUX: And structural steel—

Mr. CURRIE: Yes, I wish to deal with all these matters. I had these things under observation when I was there, and I think that after the war there will be a large market for builders' hardware such as locks, hinges, and other things, usually of a cheap kind. In France, most of these articles that have been destroyed by the Germans were made by the local blacksmiths, and we ought to be able to supply the French people with a cheaper line of articles suitable for their building purposes. As to structural material, it is to be assumed that after the war France will have recovered her iron and steel works, and will be able to supply for her own use large quantities of rails and of structural material. But many bridges of the old regime, stone bridges, will be replaced with bridges of steel, and a great deal of structural material will be used in France in that way after the war. Figures show that already a large trade has sprung up between Canada and France, and it is not altogether a war trade. Many articles of iron and steel manufactured in Canada are shipped to France, as well as certain textiles and articles of wood. The concern that has taken charge of this trade in France is the Hudson's Bay Company. That company has something like forty or fifty ships carrying goods from the United States and Canada to France. So far that company has given a preference to Canadian goods. But the United States is lending large sums of money to France, and I notice that these loans are made on condition that the purchases to be made with the money shall be confined to the United States. I have not observed that the Canadian Government is lending money and in this way promoting the purchase of goods here for France. France had already borrowed large sums in the United States, but without any string on the money, with the result that she was able to place large orders in Canada. I know this because I know of one concern which had an order of half a million dollars from France, not of a war character, but, as I may say, of a semi-war character. But we have reached the highest point in that trade. There does not seem to be any arrangement made for the exchange, the money, to continue the purchase of these goods in Canada from now on, and those who have been manufacturing goods for France and have been looking forward to a continuance of the trade will find this business falling off within the next two or three months. The purchasing, I understand, is taken out of the hands of the parties who had it and is given to the Imperial Munitions Board, which has now virtually come under the rule of Washington, and the purchases for France must be confined to American goods. Therefore, I do not think that Canada need look for more than eight or ten millions of dollars' worth of business with France next year unless something is done. This is to be regretted. I would strongly urge upon the Government the necessity of looking thoroughly into this French trade question. It is not altogether a matter of shells and munitions. It is a valuable trade and can be continued after the war if the necessary credits and exchange are provided. Therefore, those in Canada who are manufacturing for France—and I know a number of them—need not, I think, look forward to more business after the next two or three months when their present contracts expire, because they are faced with the fact that purchases made for France from now on must be made in the United States, because the money is being provided by the United States. I wonder whether the Minister of Trade and Commerce has taken this matter into consideration. If not, I would urge him to look into it to see if some arrangement cannot be made so that the French Government may participate in the credit here with the British Government, so that this trade, which is important, may continue not only now but after the war.

Mr. LOGGIE: The minister referred to the fact that the subsidy is not used by the Allan Line. I am sure he will recall the fact that boats of the Allan Line that loaded at Montreal did not load their full cargo for Havre but after discharging at Havre, went on to London and did not stop long at Havre because of the congestion and the difficulty of unloading cargo. Has any effort been made to procure the service in a different way? For instance, if a monthly steamer were to start from Halifax and go via New York, or Portland, or both, having in view a full cargo for Havre, would not that meet an existing demand? I am informed that several steamers loaded partly with Canadian military stores, and also carrying commercial goods to some extent, went from Portland. But these sailings were known to very few of the mercantile people. I can understand the reason for that, as these vessels were carrying military stores. But I think that in the interests of the commercial world it would be worth while for the department to find out if it would not be practicable to have two or three sailings start from Halifax calling at Portland and New York, and then to Havre with a full cargo. I am quite sure that there was not the slightest difficulty in procuring full cargoes because I know that goods were held up in New York for months last year and practically all the goods that were forwarded from the Maritime Provinces to France went by New York.

Mr. CURRIE: Does the hon. gentleman not know that there was a ship sailing for France each day nearly all last summer?

Mr. LEMIEUX: Were they of the French line?

Mr. CURRIE: I do not know what the name of the company was that was operating the ships, but they sent out a ship every day from Montreal last summer.

Mr. LOGGIE: I know that there are ships in the employ of the Government sailing from Montreal to Havre, but these ships will not carry commercial goods.

Mr. CURRIE: They did.

Mr. LOGGIE: Then I am wrongly advised. I would like to know to whom to apply, as I am interested in applications for tonnage.

Mr. CURRIE: Why not apply to the parties who have these boats in charge? Nearly all of these ships are chartered by the Hudson's Bay Company, and if the hon. gentleman would apply for tonnage I am satisfied that they would let him have it.

Mr. LOGGIE: I will be very glad to do so, and I shall certainly use the information which my hon. friend has given me.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: If it is correct.

Mr. LOGGIE: Yes, if it is correct. I fancy that we will find that it has a little flaw in it when we come down to the business end of it. But we look to the minister to keep up communication between Canada and France. The minister suggested that it was not possible after war was declared. I know his difficulties. I know there was a ship on the sea bound for Havre at the time war was declared, and that the cargo was discharged at London and held a long time there before it was sent across the channel. The sailings to France were discontinued. If the minister will have his ships fully loaded when they set out for Havre it will help to solve the trouble. The difficulty with the Allan line boats is that they have not been loaded for Havre but for London, and they have taken some cargo for Havre. They do not want to lose time by calling at Havre. If the steamers had been fully loaded there would not have been that difficulty. I hope the minister will find some boats that will enable us to have a sailing once or twice a month during the summer with a full cargo for Havre. They have the right to call at one port after they leave Halifax, to call at New York and then to sail for France. I am not sure whether they have a right to call at Portland. If the minister will look into it I will be very much obliged.

Mr. MACDONALD: The statement made by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) to the effect that under existing conditions the whole control of purchases for war needs in France is to be vested in our American friends is a statement of very great import. I see no reason why there should not be a conference between our Government and the French and British Governments in regard to this whole question of purchases of this character. We see French and English commissions coming to the United States, we see conferences in regard to financial matters and arrangements being made for providing food supplies of all kinds. You find a British minister stating in the Imperial House of Commons that they are relying on the United States for their food supply. Why should they not be relying on this country for their food supply in regard to production, and why should not France, as far as our industries may permit, have arrangements made so that Canada might take some part in the rebuilding of France just the same as under existing circumstances we are told the United States are to do? I hope the minister will be able to give us some assurance that a condition of that kind is not being permitted to exist and, if it does exist, steps should be taken to remedy it immediately.

Mr. LOGGIE: Has the minister anything to suggest as a way out of the difficulty which we meet in sending goods to France while the war is going on? I am sure that when the war is over the matter will be adjusted but in the meantime something might be done by the Government.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I think care ought to be taken before statements are made or criticisms are offered that the sources of information are correct. At this time there is a multiplicity of statements made as to what is going to be done and what is being done. There is a multitude of projects sent in from various sources to the two Houses of Congress in the shape of bills but no man on earth knows what the shape of the matter will be when it gets out of Congress. I do not bestow very much time or attention upon Bills that are merely introduced into committees of the two Houses of Congress, and which are waiting for discussion and ultimate action. It is a peculiar thing that in all that has been going on since the second day of April, and in all the preparation that has been made in order to put powers into the hands of the administration of the United States, up to the present moment only three important Bills have really become law. One is the Loan Bill, another the Bill for selective conscription and the third is the one which has been passed just a day or so ago and which is known as the Espionage Bill. The name, however, does not give very much of an indication of what the Bill is. The essence of the Bill is to confer a power upon the administrative authorities to control exports from the United States, and in that way to put into their hands a power of blockade which is the most effective which can be established with reference to the Central Powers in Europe.

Mr. GRAHAM: The powers with regard to censorship which were originally in the Bill were stricken out?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The proposition which was made was changed in the first Bill and then the section of the first Bill which was passed was too wide to suit Congress and the extreme espionage provisions of the Bill were stricken out. But there are considerable powers of supervision, or of espionage as it is called, still remaining in the Bill. My hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) says that he has noticed that in the British House of Parliament statements are made that Britain looks to the United States for their food supply. Statements are also made by the leader in that House that Great Britain and the Allies look to Canada as well as to the United States for their supplies. I should not like the impression to go out, and I am sure that my hon. friend would not, that the British people were saying in their Parliament that they looked to the United States for their supplies and left Canada out.

Mr. MACDONALD: I was speaking about understandings, following my hon. friend from Simcoe.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: There is this to be remembered: when we want to do anything here in war time we have a more speedy way of doing it. Under the War Measures Act, almost any power can be taken and can be exercised by the Government for war purposes and under war pressure. An Order in Council gives the power, and you go on and exercise it. In the United States there is no such thing as an Order in Council or a War Measures Act. When a state of war was declared in the United States, the President and the secretaries of the different departments had no more power in these respects and could get no more power than any outsider, and they cannot get that power until it is conferred in every separate instance and in every separate line by Acts of Congress. It is these Acts of Congress for which the Administration is waiting and has been waiting, in order to organize the several departments of work. Take the matter of food regulation and food supplies. That bill is still before Congress. It is being debated, it has not yet been passed. It has been before Congress for ten or fourteen days. It is expected that it will be passed in a few days. When it is in so far as powers are given, then the Administration will be able to use those powers. The French mission and the British mission visited Washington and conferences were had with the United States Administration. Lines of effort and co-operation were discussed and principles were laid down and in course of time agreed to, and they will be adhered to; but up to the present time, in most particulars, the Administration has not received the powers that are necessary to enable them to act. Co-operation between Canada and the United States, thorough co-operation between the Allies and their commissions, and the United States, is what is being aimed at and is what I believe will be carried out.

With reference to the purchase of supplies for the Allies, Canada's resources, I am quite sure, will be called upon for everything that she can possibly supply. I do not know that there is a staple food product that Canada can make or produce this year, after she has served her own people, and has a surplus, that will not be exigently required by the Allies, and every ounce of exportable wheat and flour made therefrom is required and will be asked for by the Allied powers through their buying commission. So that we are not being left out in the cold in any possible way. Neither do I know, I have no authority for saying —if I were asked I would say exactly the opposite—that all the money which is loaned to Great Britain or to France or to the other Allies must be expended in the United States of America. There is this fact to be considered, that Britain's advance contracts made in the United States were tremendously large, and I believe that almost every cent of the loans so far made to Great Britain has gone to pay for advances that were already made in that country. To that extent, if the purchases were in the United States and the debt was owed for them in the United States, those moneys would go, of course, to clear off that indebtedness. But I have yet to learn that there is any absolute string that is placed upon the expenditure of the money. Naturally most of it will be expended in the United States of America by the Allies who desire to obtain supplies.

With reference to transit from this country to France, there are not, as I have said, any subsidized services—there have not been since the war. Havre became, almost immediately after the outbreak of war, a port so congested that it was almost impossible for a merchant vessel to get any service there, and even up to the present time it is a great British seaport, and supplies and munitions and equipments for war flood and congest it. The Hudson Bay Company has been, and still is, the agent of France, to a large extent, in buying in this country, but the Hudson Bay Company with its ships, either owned or chartered—and there are a good many of them —has been buying for the French Government, and it is the articles that the French Government needs that have the first place, if I am not wrongly informed, almost the total claim upon these vessels. I have had man after man and company after company ask my good offices to get commercial freight on the Hudson Bay Company's vessels, but I have not succeeded in doing so because the claims of the French Government were paramount and they had to be. In one case I did get a consignment put upon one of those boats, but it was because the French Government saw that that particular consignment was almost absolutely necessary for French agriculturists, and so they made some room on one of the vessels in order that that shipment might go forward.

Two countries like Canada and the United States, with their basic products almost the same, taking food into consideration, must act in conjunction with each other; a border line of three thousand miles, with producers and farmers on each side, has to be looked at in these matters. The consumers in the United States have just as large stomachs and just as big appetites as consumers in Canada, and it is certain that, in all the regulation of prices that may take place, the vast mass of consumers in the United States will be considered as being a very vital factor. On the other hand, production is just as necessary for the United States at this hour as it is for Canada, and if anything it is a little more necessary. Production must be looked at in the fixing of prices as well as consumption, and you must strike a happy medium which give price enough to attract productive enterprise and yet prices not unreasonable, under all the circumstances, for the consumer.

It is absolute folly for any one of us to imagine that we can appoint a food controller, and that he can go into the market in Montreal, Toronto, or anywhere else and fix prices at his arbitrary discretion, without having regard to supply and demand and the conditions that are world-wide today. If we try to bolster ourselves up with such a remedy we shall be trusting to a quack remedy, and shall only meet with disappointment. In this world there are forces which no mayor of a city, and no man seated on a nail keg and talking to his fellows of the enormous prices that are demanded, is going to have very much influence on. The results are being motived by world causes, and these are as the deep currents of the sea. Storage and speculation are but scum and froth upon the surface, not to be allowed if they can be kept off, to be sedulously looked into, restrained and restricted; but to-day we are called upon to pay high prices because of the basic conditions of the times in which we live, supervening upon three years of the most disastrous and widely destructive war that history has ever recorded.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The minister has scarcely answered the question put to him in respect of possible sales of goods by Canada to France. If I understood the question aright, it was whether in the event of Canada selling goods to France the Government had in contemplation any means of financing international transactions. The member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) emphasized the desirability of trade between France and Canada, but the weakness of his argument was that he suggested no way by which France could pay Canada for goods purchased. The truth is that if tomorrow Canada sold to France $200,000,000 of structural steel there is no way by which France could pay for it, except by Canada, or some one on her behalf, making a loan to France, and paying for the commercial transaction with the proceeds of the loan. The United States is selling to France and England tremendous supplies of goods, but everybody knows that this is only possible because the United States is willing to lend, and is lending, to these countries the money with which to pay for these goods. While it is very desirable that we take advantage of the possible trade open to us in France, for instance, during the reconstruction days which are soon to come, still the wishing of it does not bring the trade. The person suggesting the proposition should propose some way of financing the transaction. It is a matter, I think, to which the Government should give some consideration. It is very desirable that we should have a share of the European trade which will be coming to this side of the Atlantic after the cessation of the war. Our factories will then have ceased their work upon munitions and war contracts, and it would be very disastrous if our largest industries were closed down for the want of orders. If we can bring to this country contracts from the European countries amounting to some hundreds of millions of dollars in order to keep our factories open and our labour market busy, that certainly is desirable, and I think, if possible, the Government should assist our industries to make these sales abroad. I do not know at the moment just how it could be done, because Canada perhaps could hardly afford to borrow money at the present time for such purposes, but she might do so temporarily, and she might dispose, in the United States or elsewhere, of these securities which France, or other purchasing countries, would gladly give to the Canadian Government. In that way, Canadian exporters might be paid for orders which came to this side of the water from the European countries. If the minister is desirous of developing this class of trade with European countries after the war, it seems to me that he must consider the question of assisting our manufacturers in arranging the financial transactions which are incident to such commercial exchange of goods. If this cannot be done, there is not much use keeping the elaborate machine going in the Department of Trade and Commerce. It may be educative, but it can bring no trade to the country. My impression is that I have seen in the press, on several occasions, the statement that the minister has had many interviews with Canadians relative to the export of their products to the Aliied countries now and after the cessation of war. I would like to inquire from him if that matter was ever placed before the manufacturers by the minister, or did they place it before him for consideration?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I do not know that I can answer all my hon. friend's questions. When this war is over, and the exhausting processes of the war have had their effects, I do not know what will happen with regard to the purchase of new and necessary material for the reconstruction of the damaged and ravaged countries that have passed through the war. We know the course of events at the present time. The Allies, in so far as their resources and credit went, financed themselves as long as they could. They then very largely had recourse to Great Britain, and Great Britain financed them, and is helping to finance them to-day, and, on the whole, has financed them to a most tremendous extent, as my hon. friend knows. Now, the great nation which has lately gone into the war, with her resources undiminished by the ravages of war, has all the advantages which have come from business resulting from the war, and is looked to, to give credit, and she is giving credit. No one likes to say that France or Great Britain or Italy is exhausted. Those countries are not exhausted, but they have gone through a tremendous process of exhaustion during the three years of the war, and financially they are in a very tense state of strain. What will happen after the United States has given its loans to the aid of the Allies to the extent that it can, and after the war has been finished and after the reconstruction takes place and new material has to be secured, is a problem most difficult of solution. One thing of two and, maybe, two things will take place, first that, instead of reconstruction going ahead at a bounding pace after the war ceases, it may have, by sheer necessity, to go ahead at a very moderate rate, and people will probably have to live for many years in less comfort and with fewer appliances and equipments than they had before; secondly, that the actual necessities in some way or another must be had, and the Government and financial institutions will have to come to the rescue in so far as these necessaries must be bought. Take Canada at the present time, and to turn to the question of my hon. friend (Mr. A. K. Maclean): is there any way by which Canada can finance the producing interests of the country, manufacturers, for instance, in order to enable them to finance Allied countries which are not able to meet the payments at present? My hon. friend has to take into account that money markets are pretty well closed to Canada at the present time. She cannot make loans in Great Britain; on the contrary she has advanced many millions of dollars to finance orders that Great Britain has placed in this country, but there is a limit to Canada's capability for doing that for what is sold to Great Britain or to France, because Canada has to take up and to take that burden almost entirely upon her own shoulders from this time on, however long or short the war may be. That makes it difficult for the Government to arrange financial strength in order to protect large sales to be made to Allied countries and payments to be made to manufacturers without their having to wait a long time for them. The banks do their share in that respect, and they must be relied upon with their combinations to bear a large share of the burden. It depends on how far the banks can go along that line.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It would be well to have some experts study the matter so as to anticipate the future.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend can rest assured that these matters have been and are being studied. It is easy to study them; it is much more difficult to find a solution.

Mr. CURRIE: The vital point that I raised has not been answered; that is to say, that orders that are placed now upon this money that is being borrowed by France in the United States, must be placed in the United States. I know for a fact that many orders in this country for France and Great Britain are being held up on that account. Of all the business that we have done with Great Britain and France in respect to the war—and according to our returns we have turned out millions of dollars worth of munitions—fully two-thirds of the money went to the United States for the raw material. Fully two-thirds of the steel and copper that has been sold to the Allies by Canada, has come from the United States, and Canada's money has paid for that. Therefore, when the United States trade papers all announce distinctly that every dollar of this loan that the Allies are getting from the United States, must be spent in the United States, that is an unfriendly act, and this Government should take steps to ascertain whether it is true, because we are just as much entitled to some business from that money as is the United States. It should be a free loan.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It is the money of the United States.

Mr. CURRIE: The United States lends that money on the understanding that it must be spent in the United States and not in Canada, nor in the Argentine Republic.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It was borrowed on that condition.

Mr. CURRIE: That is the case, and that is an unfriendly condition to insert in a loan of that description. Millions of dollars have been sent to Canada by the British Government for investment in various things, and large sums of that were immediately sent to the United States for investment in munitions without anybody in Canada having an opportunity of tendering on the articles desired. Over a year ago the British Ordnance Department sent over $50,000,000 with the late General Donaldson to establish gun works in Canada. That money, instead of being spent for ordnance works in Canada, was switched by the late Shell Committee down to the United States, and the money was spent in building guns and gun works in that country. We have done everything possible to assist in financing the war, and the time has come when, apparently from the statements made, we must finance any orders that come here from the Allies ourselves. France has no loan in this country, and consequently this trade with France will cease for lack of money unless some steps are taken for an interchange of trade. The great foreign trade of France is in toilet articles, silks, curtains, laces, gloves, pocket handkerchiefs and articles of that description. She is still manufacturing these goods. But France is not increasing her exchange of products with us. All those toilet articles for Canada are now being bought in Japan, and the silks are being bought in Japan or in the United States. As a supporter of the Government, I say that the Government of the day should take cognizance of these things, and see that vessels do not return from France in ballast filled with mud. It would be better if they were filled with dry goods, because in that way we would be able to exchange trade with France and secure war orders. I trust the minister will consider this matter, which is a very serious one to the manufacturers of Canada, who are finding it hard to carry on business owing to heavy taxes and high prices. $54 of the $80 which the manufacturers were getting for steel castings for shells was going to the United States for pig iron, although we had pig iron plants standing idle in Canada. I do not wish to criticise the Imperial Munitions Board, but the Government should have kept some control over that business.

The country should carry on its business in a reasonable way, and exchange commodities with other countries even though we are a protectionist country, and the Government should take steps to see that tonnage is given to our merchants. If our business men want to send dried fish to France, why should not they be given the opportunity of doing so, just as Argentina is able to send beef over there? These are matters that should be more closely attended to. I do not say that the Minister of Trade and Commerce is to blame. The question of foreign trade has been discussed by the United States, and the principal reason why the United States came into the war, outside of sympathy, was because they wanted to participate in the foreign trade of the Allies after the war. A great convention of all the manufacturers of the United States was held about two months ago, at which papers were read by all the leading manufacturers, one of the most important being by Mr. Farrell, president of the United States Steel Corporation. He went into the whole question of the foreign trade of the country. Any one who reads the debates of Congress will see that all the Bills brought forward by the Government of the United States are based on the action taken by that convention of manufacturers. I have not heard of the manufacturers of Canada being called together to discuss these matters, and I think the Government should show a little more ginger in this matter. We are getting tired of drifting and watching and waiting. The policy of watching and waiting in business never gets one anywhere; it always ends in bringing in the sheriff. We want an aggressive policy in regard to the trade of this country and no man is better able to carry out such a policy than the minister, and I can assure him that in any action he takes along this line he will have not only the House but all the manufacturing and producing interests of the country behind him.

Mr. McKENZIE: We have had a very great deal of theory and cloud navigation for the last hour or so, and perhaps we had better come down to earth again.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Perhaps we had better come back to the Estimates.

Mr. McKENZIE: I do not want the line to be drawn the moment I have something to say. The minister was the worst sinner of all. He went careering all over the country, and I must ask him to permit me to do a little careering. The hon. member for Simcoe has brought out a point which is rather against the minister. In his judgment the minister is a man full of capacity and ability, but he will not do anything. Now, there is some excuse for a man not doing anything who has no ability, but no excuse at all for a man at the head of a department who has, as the hon. member says, both ability and capacity. I was very glad to read the Order in Council that the minister laid on the Table yesterday; that was a practical step. The Order in Council says that Mr. Magrath is to be fuel controller. That has a very restricted meaning. By fuel we usually understand fire wood, or what is used for domestic purposes, but the Order in Council is much more comprehensive in its scope. It deals with power of every kind that is produced from steam or coal, as well as with domestic fuel. I notice that some months ago the minister called before him the coal managers of the different parts of Canada, particularly of the Maritime Provinces, and he has the advantage of the knowledge he gained in that way. I come from a very large coal centre and know something about coal mining, and about what a mine may ordinarily be supposed to produce. A manager may say that such an amount is the full capacity of his mine, but if you can show him where he is going to make money he will produce more. If the minister would give the coal companies of Canada, and of Nova Scotia particularly, a fixed price for every pound of coal they produce up to their utmost capacity the mines of Nova Scotia would be producing four million instead of three million tons a year, and so on throughout the country. The Government would be taking no risk, because every pound of coal they bought they could readily dispose of. But the great thing is to hold out to the coal companies an inducement to produce an article for which there is the greatest possible demand, and for which there will be the greatest possible necessity. Rather than find fault with the minister for this appointment, I think the task he has imposed on Mr. Magrath is too much for any one man; he has more than he can accomplish. The fuel controller should not ask the coal managers, how much coal have you in your bank? How much did you produce yesterday, and how much will you produce tomorrow? He should be empowered by the minister to say to them, "Produce as much as you like. We will give you a fixed price for every pound you produce." The minister should adopt a policy similar to that followed by the Government at the inception of the munitions industry, when the manufacturers were told to produce as much as they liked, and would be given a fixed price for a certain number of years which would cover the cost of their plant and allow a very substantial profit besides. The minister need not be afraid that he will have coal on his hands because he will be taking gold out of the ground. I again want to impress upon him the necessity of holding out inducements to the large coal companies to produce to their utmost capacity. In the Order in Council it is stated that only 200,000 tons of coal could be got in Nova Scotia to meet the demands of Montreal and other places. That is mere folly. It is ridiculous to mention such a figure as 200,000 tons in connection with the tremendous coal mines in the Island of Cape Breton and Pictou, particularly in the Island of Cape Breton. I can assure the minister that if he will hold out such an inducement of this kind, the coal companies will have no difficulty in providing all the coal he wants.

Mr. LOGGIE: Referring to item 183, at what points does the steamer call?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: At Chatham, Lower Newcastle, Loggieville, Oak Point, Church Point, Escuminac, Neguac, and Mills Point Wharf on Mondays, Wednesdays and Fridays, and at Chatham, Lower Newcastle, Loggieville, Oak Point, Baie-du-Vin, Church Point and Neguac on Tuesdays, Thursdays and Saturdays.

[Mr. McKenzie.]

Steam service between Rivière du Loup, Tadoussac and other north shore ports, $6,000.

Winter steam service between Rivière du Loup, Tadoussac and other St. Lawrence ports, $8,000.

Winter steam service between St. Catherines Bay and Tadoussac, $3,500.

Mr. GAUVREAU: It has always been hard for me to understand why the Minister of Trade and Commerce was so quick to listen to politicians when he entered into that last contract for winter and summer navigation between Rivière du Loup, Tadoussac, and North shore. Perhaps he is not aware that the Trans-St. Laurent Navigation Company, of Fraserville, was really the pioneer of winter navigation, on the lower St. Lawrence. If he comes to Rivière du Loup, where he will be well received, he will find that a little boat called the Mahone has done a really great service on the St. Lawrence, especially in its winter trips made to Seven islands for the relief of the people there. I thought at the time that, in view of what this company had done, it would be better treated by the department and by the minister. But, unfortunately, politics carried weight, even in so serious a matter as this. In 1912, Mr. Berube was elected to the local legislature for Temiscouata, and he happens to be a Conservative. Being unfriendly to the management of the company, he started at once to oppose it. Then there was the hon. member for Chicoutimi and Saguenay (Mr. Girard) a Conservative member on the North shore. With these two warring against it, it is no wonder that the poor company was killed. The contract with that company was cancelled and a contract was made with the Quebec and Levis Ferry Boat Company. At the time I warned the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) that the boat they proposed to use, which had been built principally for the ferry crossing between Quebec and Levis, could never stand the strain of the trip between Rivière du Loup and Tadoussac and the North shore. I never thought that this would be so quickly proven. But in the winter of 1915, the boat went on a rock on Red Island at the mouth of the Saguenay river. She was a total loss, and if there were no lives lost it is due to the fact that this little boat, the Mahone, went to the rescue and rendered good service. The contractors then sent out the Queen, and two months afterwards she was sunk in St. Catherines Bay, on the north shore. This is what happened to the company that stepped into the place of the Trans-St. Laurent Navigation Company, of Fraserville. I think the minister realizes that if there is a place below Quebec where we need steamer communication it is between Tadoussac and Rivière du Loup. I believe the amount appropriated is sufficient for ordinary circumstances—these three services represent a total of $17,500. But since these two boats disappeared we have been without means of crossing. Tenders were called for, and I believe that the Trans-St. Laurent Navigation Company sent in tenders. But, if I am well informed, their tender was higher than the amount placed in the Estimates. This, no doubt, accounted for the refusal of the minister to give the contract. At present we have no service at all. I hope that the minister will try to arrange that, even if a larger sum is necessary, the tender of the Trans-St. Laurent Navigation Company shall be accepted and their boat may be placed on the line.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: How long did they have the contract?

Mr. GAUVREAU: For many years, up to 1914 I think. Perhaps the minister may say that the boat is too small, or that she has been condemned. That may be true so far as the winter traffic is concerned. But he will see by the report of the commissioner who was sent down there that the boat could have been allowed to make trips in the winter, carrying freight only and no passengers. If I am well informed there is a man who wishes to place a gasoline launch on this route between Rivière du Loup and Tadoussac. I do not know what kind of a boat it is, nor what is its capacity, but I am told that this man, Mr. Lajoie, of Chicoutimi, is recommended by the hon. member for Chicoutimi and Saguenay. Well, even a small boat would be better than none, and I hope that the minister will find a way to give us a service between Rivière du Loup and Tadoussac, first in the summer, and then in the winter time.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I am not thoroughly clear in my own mind with regard to the steps that have been taken in this matter, but my impression is that the vessel that was there was condemned and consequently we were unable to employ her. We require a certificated vessel. Then came the difficulty of getting another vessel.

Mr. GAUVREAU: The boat was not condemned as a freighter, but it was condemned under the pretext that it was not safe for passengers. You can employ a boat as a freighter without allowing passengers to go on board.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes, but we subsidize for both freight and passengers, and as it was impossible for them to carry passengers because of the condemnation, we did not feel that we could subsidize the boat. There has always been the difficulty of the exceedingly small amount of freight to be carried. Take, for instance, the route between Rivière du Loup, Tadoussac and St. Lawrence ports, for which there was $8,000 subsidy. The number of trips made in 1916 was 29, and the amount of freight carried was 42 tons. That was about one and a half tons per trip. It is a very small amount, of tons per trip. It is very small amount of pay for it. You could buy that tonnage over and over again for $8,000, and if the boat could not carry passengers it seemed too much to pay. We asked for tenders, but the tenders were still higher, and in some cases it became impossible to get a boat. I will look into it and read the remarks that my hon. friend has made.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: The minister says that he could not subsidize a boat condemned as far as the passenger service is concerned. I am informed that the steamer Amelia, plying between the mainland and the Magdalen islands, was condemned last fall as a passenger steamer.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: No, she has a certificate and always has had. She would not be allowed to run without a certificate.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: Would the minister go back to item No. 191:

Steam service between Prince Edward Island and Cape Breton and Newfoundland, $16,500.

How often will the trips be made, and at what ports in Prince Edward Island will the boats call?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I think it is the same as last year:

Regular sailings every fortnight between Summerside, P.E.I., and St. Johns, Nfld., calling each way at Charlottetown, P.E.I., at Sydney, N.S., and, if so required by the minister, calling on outward voyages only at Souris, P.E.I., and North Sydney, N.S.

Mr. MACDONALD: What is the name of the boat?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The Sable Island.

Mr. McKENZIE: I have had complaints from my town about that boat because when going to Sydney she passes our port and does not call. If she had to go farther to call there might be some excuse for it, but in going in and coming out she has to pass North Sydney and if she brings freight for North Sydney she leaves it at Sydney and it has to be reshipped to North Sydney. Some arrangement should be made by which this boat would regularly call at North Sydney.

Progress reported.

On the motion of Sir George Foster for the adjournment of the House:

Mr. GRAHAM: What business will be taken up to-morrow?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I do not know what arrangement has been made by the Prime Minister and the leader of the Opposition as to the Military Service Bill.

Mr. GRAHAM: I think it is not coming up until next week.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Not to-morrow?

Mr. GRAHAM: Not to-morrow.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I suppose we might as well go on with Estimates to-morrow. I shall go on with my Estimates and some other ministers will be ready, the Minister of Agriculture probably.

CONDUCT OF THE WAR.

PROPOSED MOTION BY HON. GEO. P. GRAHAM.

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM: I wish to notify the Government that at an appropriate time I will move the following or a similar resolution:

That in the opinion of this House it is desirable that steps should be taken forthwith by the Government to provide that accumulated wealth should contribute immediately and effectively to the cost of the war, and that all agricultural, industrial, transportation and natural resources of Canada should be organized forthwith so as to ensure the greatest possible assistance to the Empire in the war and to reduce the cost of living to the Canadian people.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Will that opportune time probably be to-morrow?

Mr. GRAHAM: No.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.35 p.m. Wednesday.

Thursday, June 14, 1917.

4. How far is said ballast pit from the main line of the Intercolonial Railway?
5. What engineers or other officials examined the material in said ballast pit and recommended the purchase of same?
6. What was the total cost of constructing line from main line to said pit?
7. How much material has been taken from said pit?
8. What is the estimated quantity remaining in said pit?
9. Has said ballast pit been abandoned?
10. If so, why?
11. Where was the material used that was taken from said pit?

Mr. COCHRANE:

1. The property was expropriated—final plans and descriptions filed in the registry office, August 16, 1916; price paid, $1,497.96.
2. Total, 74.898 acres. From David I. Blackburn, 52.218 acres; from Mrs. Mary A. Wood, 22.68 acres.

3. Cost of right of way to date, $958.60. The claim of Mrs. Mary Hunter for one small parcel of land has not been settled.

4. 3.58 miles.

5. It was tested under the supervision of the roadmaster and resident engineer. Samples of material from test pits were submitted to and examined by division engineer, general superintendent, chief engineer and general manager. The roadmaster brought the pit to the attention of railway officials, and all the officers concerned recommended purchase.

6. $38,061.01.

7. 28,000 cubic yards.

8. Approximately 1,700,000 cubic yards.

9. No. The rails were taken up temporarily to lay in sidings, to release National Transcontinental railway rails for shipment to France.

10. Answered by No. 9.

11. On the Halifax Oceans Terminals railway, main line and yard tracks, and on the spur leading from the main line to the pit.

BAY STATE FISH COMPANY.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN:

1. Is the Bay State Fish Company permitted to land fish fares at Digby, N.S., to the Maritime Fish Corporation without payment of customs duties?

2. If customs duties are paid, are the same remitted?

Mr. HAZEN:

1 and 2. No. This company is given no exceptional privileges in Canadian ports.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY—GRAND NARROWS BRIDGE.

Mr. COPP:

1. What is the height of the stone piers in the Grand Narrows bridge on the Intercolonial Railway?

2. How far are said piers below high water mark and how far above low water mark?

3. How long since the said stone piers were built?

Mr. COCHRANE:

1. The only information the department has in this regard is from the as-built plans of the Cape Breton railway, which is as follows:—

Top of pier to bottom: Pier (from west end).	Of Crib Under Pier.
No. 1	74′ 6″
" 2	77′ 10″
" 3	81′ 8″
" 4	80′ 8″
" 5	72′ 10″
" 6	71′ 4″
" 7	35′ 0″

2. This question is not clear, but from the records the relationship of average high water level to top of piers is as follows:—

Top of Pier.	Above High Water Level.
No. 1	5′ 3″
" 2	5′ 3″
" 3	5′ 3″
" 4	5′ 3″
" 5	5′ 0″
" 6	5′ 3″ (High part.)
" 6	4′ 0″ (Low part.)
" 7	0′ 3″

The department has no record of the distance from the tops of piers to low water level, but according to tide tables of 1917 the range between high water level and low water level in the Bras d'Or lakes is about one foot.

3. According to the as-constructed plans of the Cape Breton railway, these piers were completed in 1890.

GOVERNMENT LANDS AT DIGBY.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN:

Who is the holder of the lease of Government lands at Digby whereon troops of the Canadian Expeditionary Forces were located in 1915 and 1916, and what rental was paid for the same?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Mr. G. E. Torrie. Mr. Torrie was allowed a rebate of $10 on the rental for the year 1916, on account of the occupation of the ground by troops. The rent is $20 per annum.

PROHIBITION OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. KYTE: I have received a number of petitions and memorials from churches and temperance organizations asking that legislation be introduced at the present session to provide for Dominion-wide prohibition. Is it the intention of the Government to introduce such legislation during the present session?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I have already explained that the subject is under consideration of the Minister of Justice as to certain legislation. Any further announcement that may be necessary will be made in due course.

THE MILITARY SERVICE ACT, 1917.

SUGGESTION AS TO VOTE ON SECOND READING.

Mr. W. E. KNOWLES (Moosejaw): I desire to make a suggestion with regard to the so-called Conscription Bill, the second reading of which, I understand, is to be moved early next week. It is almost certain that the debate will occuy at least a week, that is, there is little possibility of reaching a division next week. I am sure there are many members who would like to visit their ridings and speak to some of their electors on the point. I know I would. If the Prime Minister could see his way clear to have an understanding on the part of the House that a vote would not be permitted within a week from the day the second reading is proposed, I do not think it would do any harm. Of course, it is almost certain that the debate will take that long, but at the same time one does not like to take the chance of absenting himself when a vote of such importance is in prospect. The right hon. gentleman may not wish to answer at once, but I would suggest that he should take the matter into consideration, and tell us later if such an arrangement as I propose could be made.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Of course, as I stated yesterday, I would like to proceed with the measure at the earliest possible moment. On the other hand, I desire to meet as far as reasonable the wishes of hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House. I will take what my hon. friend has said into consideration.

LAKE OF THE WOODS WATER LEVEL.

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I see it stated in the press that the International Joint Commission have made a very important report fixing the level of the waters of the Lake of the Woods. If this report has been made can it be laid on the Table?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: If any such report has been made it has not yet come to my attention. As soon as the matter comes before me I will give it consideration, and will inform my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) or will lay the report on the Table.

HON. ROBERT ROGERS.

SITTING OF ROYAL COMMISSION.

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: It is reported that the Commission appointed to make an investigation in the case of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) is sitting in Montreal?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I understand that it is sitting.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Are the sessions private or public?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I have no official information on the subject. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) if he were here, could probably give more information on this subject than I can give. I have heard nothing about the matter at all since the Order in Council was passed, except that I understood incidentally from other information that the Commission had the evidence before them and were looking over it.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I will renew my question to-morrow.

REMOVAL OF RAILS FOR USE IN FRANCE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. OLIVER: The Minister of Railways (Mr. Cochrane) has laid on the Table a report, with blue print, regarding the lifting of rails on the Grand Trunk west of Edmonton. When I spoke on this subject some days ago, I think the hon. gentleman said that he would lay on the Table a similar report in regard to the lifting of rails on the Transcontinental.

Mr. COCHRANE: I have not got that ready, but expect to have it to-morrow or Monday at latest.

STRIKE OF BRANTFORD MOULDERS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. NESBITT: Is the Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers) aware that a strike of moulders in Brantford has been on for some days? And has he taken any action in the matter?

Mr. CROTHERS: I heard some days ago that the moulders in Brantford were on strike. The difference between the moulders and the employers arose as to the length of the working day, the question being as to an eight-hour or a ten-hour day. I am not aware whether the matter has been adjusted yet or not.

Mr. NESBITT: Does the hon. minister know that one of his officials had gone to Brantford, or had been spoken to by men in Brantford, and that these men were told by him that the Department of Labour had nothing to do with that kind of matter?

Mr. CROTHERS: I have not heard anything of the sort. No official of my department, so far as I am aware, went to Brantford.

LABOUR STRIKE IN WESTERN COAL MINES.

Mr. OLIVER: I think the Minister of Labour said yesterday that he would probably have some definite information today in regard to the labour strike in the Alberta coal mines.

Mr. CROTHERS: I have received a message from that district, which contains no definite information, but merely states that the prospects for adjustment are brighter.

SUPPLY.

The House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

Steam service between St. John and ports in Cumberland Basin, $3,000.

Mr. MACDONALD: Yesterday the Minister of Finance made a statement in regard to the land service, which appears on page 2394 of Hansard, as follows:

A slight adjustment was made in this case, and the matter for the last year has been settled, and a contract entered into for the ensuing year.

And he is reported to have said "about $45,000." I understood him to say $5,000.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: $5,000 is the right amount.

Mr. BOULAY: An item was voted last night for the service between Quebec and Gaspé basin. Will the minister give us the ports of call in the counties of Rimouski and Matane, where the company is bound to make calls, acording to the terms of the contract with the Dominion Government.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The ports of call are Matane, Cape Chatte, Ste. Anne des Monts, Mont Louis, Grande Vallée, Chlorydomes, Fox River, Griffin Cove, L'Anse à Louise, Grande Gréve, Douglastown, Gaspé Basin, and, at the contractor's option, to extend the route as far as Paspebiac, calling both way at Malbay, Percé, Cape Cove, Grand River, Newport, and Port Daniel; and at the following places once each round trip, either on the up or down voyage, viz., Ste. Félicité, Mechins, Martin River, Claude River, St. Antoine, Magdalen, Petite Vallée, pointe Frigate, pointe Secher, Grand Etang, Anse à Valeau, Pte. Jaune, Little Fox River, Cape Rosier, as well as such other port or ports, place or places, en route, as the minister may from time to time direct. I think these are the same as last year.

Mr. BOULAY: I understand, they do not stop at Matane or Ste. Félicité, and very seldom at Mechins. They should stop at Matane and Ste. Félicité, because there is no railroad at those points. I do not think the company is fulfilling the conditions on which they received their subsidy, and I ask that the minister, before renewing the subsidy another year, should compel them to fulfil their obligation. I should like to know, also, if the Government has control over the freight rates on those steamers, because we had complaints from the people along the coast that they charge very high rates, which complaints, I think, are well founded. The subsidy is granted to those companies to enable them to carry freight at a moderate rate, to points where there is no railroad service. If the Government has control of the rates, they can redress the grievance.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Every steamship company which is subsidized is under contract to perform certain services; otherwise they are subject to a reduction of the amount paid them. Generally, we hear from places which are not touched at and we take the matter up. If there be any reason why steamers have not called at these places the steamship company is given an opportunity to explain. The weather might not permit of their calling, or there might be some other reason. The freight rates are controlled. The company must file its schedule of rates, and is obliged to follow that schedule, and rates cannot be increased without the permission of the department. The subsidy is given for the encouragement of the service, and is not simply to take the place of freight rates, which have to be paid in any event. During the last two years costs and charges have gone up, as my hon. friend knows, so that, in most of these cases, demands have been made for a certain rise in the rates of freight. The demand was taken up by the officers of the department, and reported upon; the department fixes what it considers to be a fair rate, and refuses to sanction any rate that is considered unfair. In some cases a partial increase is granted.

Mr. MARCIL: Between Gaspe bay and Paspebiac the service is optional with the company?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes.

Mr. MARCIL: Could not the minister make it more binding on the company in this respect in view of the very poor service on that coast? I have received a petition from Anse aux Gascons, thirty miles east of Paspebiac, asking that the boat call there. I forwarded the petition on to the proprietor of the boat in Montreal, but have had no answer yet. If an arrangement could be made by the department to give better service on that part of the coast it would be greatly appreciated.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That port is beyond Gaspé?

Mr. MARCIL: Between Gaspé and Paspebiac.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: We have another service between Campbellton and Dalhousie and we pay them for the service to Gaspé. We do not wish to pay a double subsidy on the portion of the coast between Gaspé and Paspebiac, but if the company wishes to go beyond Gaspé to Paspebiac we do not put any bar in their way, so long as they perform the service between Quebec and Gaspé for which we pay them.

Mr. MARCIL: The minister understands why they should go to Paspebiac. They may have through freight from Montreal and Paspebiac, and that being the chief station of the largest firm in the district, anything the minister could do in improving the service would be of benefit.

Mr. COPP: Referring to the services between St. John and ports on the Cumberland basin, what boat is engaged in the service and what trips does she make?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It is the same steamer that has been on for some years, the Harbinger, run by the Harbinger Steamship Company. The ports of call are St. John, Albert, Riverside, Harvey, Joggins Mines, Minudie, Rivière Hébert, and a call is required at Amherst Point wharf when there is freight offering for that port.

Mr. KYTE: How frequent are the trips?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The contract is for a trip once a week.

Mr. COPP: Last evening an item was passed providing for the service on the Petitcodiac river. I saw an item to the effect that this boat would not be in service this year.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I think I was told in the department the other day that there was a doubt as to whether this boat would go on or not. I will inquire.

Steam service between Sydney and Bay St. Lawrence, calling at way ports, $6,000.

Mr. McKENZIE: This is a very important service. While we may criticise a good many of these services, this is one that I wish to bring in the most serious way to the notice of the minister. He has received petitions, I know, from that part of the country asking for a better service. I am not complaining of the present service, but it is impossible for one boat to satisfactorily perform that service.

The route covers a distance of nearly 120 miles from Sydney along the coast of Cape Breton and Victoria counties, extending as far back as a place called Meat Cove at the extreme northern part of the island of Cape Breton. The ports along this part of the coast are good fishing places—Bay St. Lawrence, Meat Cove, White Point Dingwall, Neil's Harbour, North Ingonish, South Ingonish, Breton, Cove, Barrachois Plaster, North Shore, English Town, Jersey Cove, Murray, South Gut, North Sydney and Sydney. As was brought out in the discussion the other day with regard to the fishing business, it is necessary that fishermen should be enabled to get their products to the markets. One boat cannot do justice to the business done at the places which I have mentioned. The present boat was specially built for this route, and the company would probably secure another boat if they received some encouragement in the way of subsidy. I voice the sentiments of the people along the northern part of Nova Scotia when I ask that they be given better accommodation than they are now receiving. Representations along these lines have been made to the minister by friends of his own party. I mention these facts not in any spirit of carping criticism, but in the hope that the minister will give the matter consideration, in view of the fact that it is absolutely necessary that this part of the province should have better accommodation.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend knows the difficulty of getting either more money or more ships. However, there is always hope for the future.

Steam service from Sydney, N.S. around the east coast of Cape Breton to Hastings and return to Sydney via the Bras d'Or Lakes, $5,500.

Mr. CARROLL: Will the minister tell the committee what amount of traffic was carried in this service last year, the number of trips made and the number of passengers carried?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Thirty-four round trips were made, 1,045 tons of freight were carried, and 35 passengers.

Mr. McKENZIE: At what points is the vessel supposed to touch?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Sydney, North Sydney, Port Morien, Main-a-dieu, Louisburg, Gabarus, L,Ardoise, Petit de Grat, Arichat, West Arichat, Mulgrave, Hawkesbury. On the return: Grandique, Poulamond, St. Peters, Johnston's Harbour, Irish Cove, Big Pond, North Side East Bay, South Side East Bay, Castle Bay, Grand Narrows and North Sydney.

Mr. KYTE: I wish to call the attention of the minister to a matter concerning which representations have been made to his department from time to time, that of the necessity for a steamship service at the port of Fourchu on the south coast line of Cape Breton. Fourchu is one of the most important and prosperous fishing communities on that coast, but it has no communication with any of the ports of Nova Scotia. It has no railway accommodation, the nearest railway being about 25 miles distant. Up to a few years ago a sailing vessel carried to Fourchu purchases made by the merchants at various ports in Nova Scotia and carried away the products of the fisheries, but this service has not been in operation during the last three or four years. It is desirable that the steamship company enjoying the subsidy which is under consideration should be requested to call at the port of Fourchu.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: What steamship is that?

Mr. KYTE: The Weymouth. Some years ago a considerable sum of money was spent by the Department of Public Works for the purpose of dredging out a bar across the mouth of the harbour at Fourchu. Owing to the removal of that bar there is now a considerable depth of water in the channel. Some years ago the Government made provision for the construction of a public wharf at that port. The public conveniences, therefore, required at such a port as Fourchu are fairly well provided, with the exception of the most important of all, a steamship service. If the depth of water should be found inadequate to enable the steamers to approach the Government wharf, a small expenditure for dredging would provide the necessary depth of water. I am not exaggerating the importance of Fourchu when I say that it is one of the most important fishing communities in the island of Cape Breton and that the individual catch is larger than that of any other fishermen in the island of Cape Breton.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The hon. gentlemen thinks that the service might be performed by the Weymouth?

Mr. KYTE: Yes.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I will look into it.

Expenses in connection with the supervision of subsidised steamship services, $3,000.

Mr. MARCIL: The member for Rouville and the minister made certain statements yesterday regarding the Gaspé-Campbellton service which were warranted by the facts, but in justice to the Quebec and Oriental Railway Company, operating between Matapedia and New Carlisle, I think that I should set forth certain facts showing that, under the circumstances, they are doing the best that can be done to operate that railway.

If that were not so, the people of that part of the country would be very much worse off than they really are, because, besides the steamer service, which is not altogether what it should be, the people have nothing but the railway. I want the minister to become familiar with the position the railway occupies. These are the facts to which I wish to direct his attention: For the six months ending December 31, 1916, the Quebec Oriental railway spent on special repairs and renewals of way and structures $18,064.41, or roughly $3,000 per month. They also spent $5,000 additional on ordinary maintenance more than for the corresponding period in 1915, making a total additional expenditure on this account of over $23,000. That the line is being considerably improved is amply demonstrated by the fact that they are handling without delay an increased volume of traffic including many heavy 60 ton cars of coal. They are doing a better business at present than at any time in the history of the line, and if it had not been for the inflated prices of material and the scarcity and cost of certain classes of labour, caused by the war, they would be making considerable profit, which would have enabled them for the current year to carry out repairs on a more extensive scale than they are doing. There is one fact that should be mentioned, namely, in the operation of a daily service on the line during the winter under very adverse conditions along a coast line exposed to storms. They have managed to operate the 200 miles of railway from Matapedia to Gaspé during the whole winter without a single day's interruption, carrying the mails and proving a great advantage to the people, despite the severe weather. This has cost a good deal of money, and full credit should be given to the company for what they did. The general manager of the railway who has given me these facts says that other lines similarly situated had to resort to a tri-weekly or bi-weekly service in the winter. It is only fair to the company that I should make these facts known. The minister was a member of the Government when this railway was chartered, and it was proposed to be a branch of the Intercolonial. It fell into the hands of a private company and has had a very precarious existence since. The people hope that, after the war, this railway will be merged into the Intercolonial and will become one of the best features of that system, giving access to a splendid territory for fisheries and lumber. The line is fairly well operated from Matapedia to Paspebiac, and is in splendid condition from Paspebiac to Gaspé.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I am glad to know the company are improving it.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: After recess yesterday, when I was not present, the minister stated that this was the first time that complaints had been made to him in regard to the service between the mainland and the Magdalen islands. During the earlier part of this session, I consulted the deputy minister in regard to all the details of the service, and I thought the minister had been informed. The minister stated yesterday that he found it hard to believe that any company receiving a public subsidy would act in such a manner, and I do not find any fault with his remarks, because it is hard to believe that a company would act in the way I have described. The minister said that he would look into the matter. If he does, he will find that every statement I have made is absolutely correct. I received from clergymen and reputable business men in the Magdalen islands numerous complaints to the effect that the management of the company was discriminating in their own favour and against every one else. The manager, Dr. Starrat, would hardly give a courteous or civil answer to any one doing business. The firm with which I am associated, a few years ago, had a fairly large business with several people in the Magdalen islands, but that business has been completely wiped out because those people know there is no use in giving orders for goods to companies which are not in favour with the owners of this steamer service, for the reason that the goods will not be transported, or they will be delayed so long in transit that the importers will give up hope of receiving them altogether. The conditions are simply intolerable, and I hope, if the minister looks into the matter during this session, he will give me an opportunity of proving my statements.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I will certainly look into the matter. Of course, with the multiplicity of work, it is impossible for the minister to have knowledge of all the details. What I said last night namely, that the matter had not been brought to my attention was true.

Trade commissioners and commercial agents, including expenses in connection with negotiation of treaties or in extension of commercial relations; miscellaneous advertising and printing, or other expenditure connected with the extension of Canadian trade, $160,000.

Mr. GRAHAM: The minister might give us some inkling of what was accomplished at the various international trade conferences of the Allies.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: This vote is for the trade commissioners. Of course, they have nothing to do with international negotiations.

Mr. GRAHAM: I know that, but I thought I might ask on this item for a statement from the minister regarding the trade conference of the Allies, one at least of which he attended.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I intend on one item of the Estimates to make a general statement with reference to the work of the department, and I think it would be better to embody the information that my hon. friend asks for in that statement. It will cover a good many points, for there are many matters that I think should be placed before the House. For instance, there is the Dominions Royal Commission, which has finished its work and published its final report, copies of which, together with the evidence, I intend to have printed for the use of members. The report is a voluminous one, but to those members of the House who take an interest in Dominion-wide trade, the report and the statistical volumes which accompany it are documents of very great importance. In my general statement I shall also refer to the work of the Advisory Council on Industrial and Scientific Research, and to the work of our trade commissioners in the different countries. I shall also make a short statement in reference to the Economic Conference, which is what I think my hon. friend refers to. I will give notice beforehand of the item on which I shall make this general statement.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Have any new trade agencies been opened since last year?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I do not know whether the two Russian agencies were opened last year or not, but at least preparations were then being made for them. One has now been opened at Petrograd, in the East, and another at Omsk, in the West. Mr. Just, our agent at Petrograd, is one of our best trade commissioners. Mr. Wilgress has been appointed to Omsk. He is a graduate of McGill University, where he had a distinguished career, and was highly recommended on economics and other subjects. Mr. Wilgress has passed through the course of training which all our new trade commissioners undergo in our offices in Canada for a year or a year and a half.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Where in Omsk?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: In Siberia; it is the central point in Western Russia. We have also opened a branch at Milan, in Italy, and recently sent there one of our sub-commissioners, a graduate of Toronto University, who had undergone a course of training in this country for over a year and a half. Not much, perhaps, can be done during the period of the war either in Russia or Italy, but it is very important that these men should be at their seat of future work before peace comes, so that they may make themselves thoroughly acquainted with local conditions. I have made a point lately of insisting on these trade commissioners understanding the language of the country where they are going to work; that applies to our commissioners in Russia and Italy. The young man who has gone to Milan studied Italian while he was here, and had a fair colloquial knowledge of the language before he left, and probably will be able to perfect himself in the language before peace comes. There is also a sub-commissioner being trained in our offices who is destined, if everything goes well, to take up this work in Japan; he is studying Japanese. His father was living in Japan at the time of his birth; the young man has passed a few years of his childhood there, and has something of the Japanese atmosphere. It is a great advantage for a man to be able to enter into conversation with business men in the language of their country. It makes communication easier, and enables the commissioner to get at their habits of thought better than if everything had to be done through an interpreter.

Mr. GRAHAM: I think it is a good idea to have these commissioners trained in the language of the country to which they are sent, although it might be considered an intrusion on bi-lingualism. I get the bulletins regularly, and read them very carefully. They contain a lot of useful information for the public, particularly for the manufacturers and business men interested. I have made a point during the past few years of having these bulletins reproduced in the newspapers, in order that they may reach as many people as possible. I have met several of these trade commissioners, and I believe they are doing a good work. Of course, their viewpoint will have to change, and their methods also, on account of the war. I suppose that the war will disarrange a lot of business, and it will rearrange a lot of business also, some to our advantage and some to our disadvantage. It ought to be impressed upon our manufacturers that it will be necessary for them to be ready to grapple with conditions that may exist after the war. A great many of our industries, small as well as large, have been devoting almost their entire attention to the manufacture of munitions, at the request of the Munitions Board. Consequently, they have allowed their staple trade to slip away from them—and, of course, the demand for their staples has decreased. But when the war is over—and we hope it will be over very soon—these manufacturers ought to be in a position, not only to look after the staple trade they had before, but also to secure trade that they have never had up to this time. The trade commissioners, I assume, are and will be very useful in this connection in keeping the department informed as to the new conditions and the requirements of markets which our manufacturers can reach. It is absolutely necessary not only that this information should be given to the department, but that it should be made known to the industrial centres and captains of industry all over the Dominion. I presume that this is done. If I have a word of advice to the minister, it would be to increase efficiency in this respect and to see to it that all such information is placed before the manufacturers. The majority of the trade commissioners with whom I have discussed affairs, are hopeful of a constantly increasing trade—of course, war has unhinged business for the present. But they have found this difficulty, that our manufacturers have not been ready to adapt their output to the requirements of the market. In Australia, let us suppose, the people are in the habit of purchasing certain patterns of goods in certain lines, these goods being made elsewhere than in Canada. Some years ago, at any rate, our trade commissioners found it difficult to induce the Canadian manufacturers to change the style of their output to meet the demand of the market in such a case. If our industries are to meet the new situation and to secure trade that they have not yet had our producers must accommodate themselves even to the whims of their customers. I have found that in some countries—and I suppose the minister is aware of this condition—goods of Canadian manufacture are used but those who use them are not aware where they are produced. For one order, I suppose it does not make much difference so long as the manufacturer sells the goods; but for future trade and the development of our industries I think the trade commissioners do good work by keeping as nearly as possible a straight line between the Canadian manufacturer and the foreign consumer. I found, in travelling in Europe, that Canadian goods were becoming better known as such than in former years, largely, I suppose, through the work of the trade commissioners. People there were beginning to learn that these goods were from Canada and were not the product of the distributors from whom they were bought. I approve of this vote for the trade commissioners and would not object to putting on more steam in this service, if it were shown to be desirable. We do not know what is ahead of us; we can conjecture, but we do not know. It may seem discouraging at this time to put on more steam; but we do not know how soon the circumstances may change, and we ought to be ready to take advantage of conditions, whatever they may be, so as to regain any trade we may have lost, to retain what we have, and to secure the trade that will develop under the new conditions. The remarks I wish to make on the other points I reserve until the minister (Sir George Foster) has made his statement.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The remarks of the hon. member (Mr. Graham) are very pertinent to the subject in hand and to the circumstances of the time. In the present dearth of ships and all the confusion resulting from a state of war, it may seem of little use to have trade commissioners in some of the countries in which our commissioners now carry on their work. But I find that there is a very fruitful field to which I am directing their attention and to which they are giving a large part of their time. In other countries, as in our own, great changes are taking place. It is gratifying to know that our manufacturers, large and small, are more and more getting the idea that more things can be made in Canada, and made profitably, and marketed outside of the country as well as within our own borders. There are numerous new industries springing up in Canada to make things which we have not made before. The pressure and discipline of war work have given an impetus to the making of things along new lines. The organization of plant, the extreme nicety of the work that is to be done, has been a drilling and disciplining of our mechanics and our employers as well, and has taught them that they need not despair of being able to produce alongside the manufacturers of any other country. When the workman has a piece of work which he has to get down to the thousandth part of an inch, or perhaps the two-thousandth part of an inch, the completing of that work is an invaluable training.

There are two things that it is of great importance for the manufacturers and artisans of the country to realize: One is that time is always of the essence of the contract, that when a contract is made it should be filled on time; and the other is the necessity of accuracy of make. Many people think: Oh, if this will do the job, no matter whether it is accurately fashioned or not, it will serve. It is an invaluable training and an invaluable aid to our workmen to have instilled into their minds every day the idea of accuracy and of finish, of making an article absolutely according to specification. In this respect changes are taking place in our own country and in other countries, and an important part of the work of our trade commissioners to-day is to watch and follow up these changes and to bring information of them to our own people, with warnings and advice as to changes and means of taking advantage of them. I would not have my hon. friend forget that in addition to our trade commissioners appointed from Canada we also have, under a system recently adopted, the benefit of the services of the Intelligence Department and the Commercial Department of the British embassies in all countries where it is of advantage to us to secure information of this kind. It has been peculiarly satisfactory to see the hearty and enthusiastic way in which these branches of the British Embassies in different parts of the world have taken up this work with regard to Canada. They have given the most valuable information, and have given it with a freedom and a fullness that are all that could be desired. Thus we must always add a plus to our Canadian trade commissioners when we think of the extension of foreign trade—we must add to our own service the Intelligence Department and the Commercial Department of each British Embassy.

Trade Commissioners, bounties on lead and crude petroleum, to cover expenses in administration of the Act, $5,000.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: This is the usual vote. Under the provisions of the Lead Bounties Act no bounties are now being paid on this product as the price of lead is far above the figure at which bounties are to be paid. There is, however, some expense of administration, I think about $500. The other part of the vote is for the supervision of the petroleum bounties, which work still goes on and is confined chiefly to Ontario, under the provisions of the Act.

Mr. OLIVER: The minister will, perhaps, recall representations that were made to him in regard to a bounty on oil produced in Alberta. In the interview that I had with the minister, he explained why a bounty is paid on oil produced in Ontario, but not on oil produced in Alberta. It would be desirable for the minister to explain to the committee the reasons for that distinction, because I feel that, however sound the explanation may be as justifying a method of administration, the policy under which different courses are followed in relation to the two provinces is not susceptible of the same measure of justification. I shall compare the conditions surrounding the production of oil in Ontario and in Alberta. I do not desire to discuss the question of oil bounties on its merits; I am discussing merely the right of the production of one part of the country to share in the same considerations as the production of another part of the country. The idea of the bounty was, I assume, to put the producer of oil in Canada on an equality in supplying the home market with his competitor in the United States, who may be supposed to have some advantages in the matter of cheap production. The production of oil in Alberta, on behalf of which the claim for bounty is made, occurs under circumstances and conditions stupendously more expensive than in Ontario, and if there is any warrant or justification for the payment of a bounty upon oil produced in Ontario, that justification is tremendously stronger in the case of oil produced in Alberta. I understand that in Ontario oil is produced from wells of a depth of less than a thousand feet. In Alberta the wells are three thousand feet deep and cost about three times as much to bore. In addition to that, owing to the broken nature of the formation in which the oil is found, at the foot of the Rocky mountains, there is much greater uncertainty as to striking oil in any particular location, and the rock through which the well must be drilled is of a very difficult character. In the locality southwest of Calgary, where oil is produced, there is no such certainty of striking oil in any given spot as I understand there is in the oil fields in Ontario.

There is, on the contrary, the very greatest uncertainty, so that the production of oil in this locality involves vastly greater expenditure and greater risk of no return, and, therefore, I maintain that, where oil is struck, it is entitled to share on an equality with the oil produced in Ontario, and that, if the law as it stands does not provide for that equality of treatment, it is for Parliament to amend the law so as to give equality of treatment to the production in the two different parts of the country. All the more so because in Alberta the production is in an experimental stage, whereas in Ontario it has been demonstrated for a period of thirty or forty years. I do not wish to make any special plea, or any plea at all, for the Alberta production except for equality of treatment under equal conditions. The fact that the conditions are so greatly to the disadvantage of Alberta substantially strengthens their claim on the ground of justice and desirability of further promoting the exploitation of the possibilities of oil production in that country. It is, as no doubt the minister will be good enough to explain, a mere matter of difference in the quality of the oil produced. It is true the quality of the oil produced in Alberta is higher than that produced in Ontario, but the fact that the law excludes from bounty that quality which is produced in Alberta is merely an incident, and was not, I submit, any part of the original intent of the law. It simply occurs by reason of the phrasing of the provision, and not by reason of any intent to cut out the enterprise of any section of the country from sharing in the same consideration as that which the produtcion of Ontario shares.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The Act under which bounties are paid on crude petroleum was passed in 1910, under the regime of my hon. friends who now sit opposite, and I suppose it really was an adjustment as between duties and bounties, that when the duty on imported oil was lowered, the bounty was given as a recompense to the producer of oil in Canada. I do not think the bounty was put on to stimulate the search for oil, and to develop the industry in Ontario, but rather to offset this reduced protection. If the intention is to carry out a policy designed to stimulate the production of oil, there is no reason why the bounty should be limited to any locality. If, however, the legislation was designed to recompense the producer in Canada for the loss of a protection in the matter of duty on import, and, if at the time the Act was passed, all of our production of oil was in a certain section, there is a basis upon which the present Act rests, which does not necessarily call for equality, as between different sections of Canada. Representations have been made to the departmeent on several occasions upon the subject, and at my last interview with some gentlemen connected with the development in Alberta, I asked them to send me as complete and accurate returns as possible of the wells which were being developed, and of those which were producing, and, generally, information which would enable us to deal with the whole subject. I think it is perfectly fair that, in the case of another development in another part of the Dominion, a difference in specific gravity should not be the determining factor in the payment of a bounty. Some other and better principle should be adopted.

Mr. DOUGLAS: Will the minister give me the information as to bounties paid on zinc at the present time?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That is by a special Act passed last year. I am not administering that provision, and have not the information with me, but I shall be pleased to obtain the information.

Mr. MACDONALD: Do I understand the zinc bounties are now in force?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: There was an arrangement which was made to stimulate the production of zinc, I think, in British Columbia, and that is a special arrangement. I think there was an enactment passed last year or the year before which carries that out. From my general knowledge, all I can say is that that operation has been very successful, and that the foundation of an industry has been laid, which is developing, and which promises to be permanent, and the price at which the spelter is now provided, under that arrangement, is very much lower than the price for which it could be obtained from other sources.

[Sir George Foster.]

Mr. DOUGLAS: I have information in connection with the zinc industry which would lead me to believe that, if the bounty on zinc were continued after the war, a very large plant might be established for concentrating, under the retort process, in the province of Alberta, at the gas fields which are being developed in that province at the present time. The statement has been made that the price of spelter is so high that a bounty is not required to stimulate the industry, but that, after the war, with the large number of smelters established in the United States to take advantage of the demand for zinc at the present time, the competition will be so keen that, unless some stimulus is given to the zinc industry in Canada, the Canadian industry may suffer very materially, and that if a guarantee could be given that the industry would receive some protection for a number of years after the war, a large retort smelter might be established in the province of Alberta, but that, unless such guarantee be given, the large expenditure which would be necessary would cause promoters to be very chary about going into it. The writer of this letter informs me that, at the present moment, he has a large operating company in the United States, ready at any time to build a plant, provided the Dominion Government will give some assurance that, after 1918, which I believe is the time at which the zinc bounty ceases, under the enactment which the hon. minister refers to the guarantee will be continued for two or three years, it would be possible to have an industry of this kind established. The claim is made that, on account of the excessive rate of freight, it is absolutely essential that a very cheap fuel should be used in the smelting operation, and that gas appears to be the only fuel employed that would make it a profitable industry. Without a guarantee from the Government that a bounty would be enjoyed for a number of years after the war, the advisability of establishing a large industry of this kind would be very doubtful.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I imagine that my hon. friend has reference to the bounty upon lead ores. Zinc and lead are intimately connected in many of the British Columbia mines, because zinc is recoverable from the lead ores. There is no general bounty on zinc of itself. The Act under which the bounty is paid upon lead ores will come to an end on June 30, 1918. What I was speaking about was the special arrangement made for the refining of zinc and the manufacture of spelter at the Canadian Pacific works at Trail. The bounty was given there for a special purpose—largely for a war purpose—the idea being that it was necessary to make a special arrangement in order to get practical results and to get them speedily. Although a certain bounty was given, the consideration was a minimum price for the product to the manufacture of which the bounty was applied. That product has been utilized in the munition work of Canada. The matter does not come under my department; I am merely giving my impression with regard to it.

Mr. MACDONALD: Are the zinc bounties not administered by my hon. friend's department?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: No; I think they are under the Militia Department. The lead bounties are under my department.

Mr. MACDONALD: Does the legislation not provide for a bounty on zinc?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: No. Where the two are combined, I suppose the bounty is upon lead-bearing ores.

Mr. MACDONALD: I assume that any one producing merchantable zinc from lead bearing ores would be entitled to receive the bounty. The answer the hon. minister has given to the member for Strathcona would, I assume, apply also to an inquiry which I received the other day from a gentleman in Toronto who is interested in zinc bounties in Nova Scotia. I understand that special arrangements have been made by the Department of Militia with a concern in British Columbia for production at their smelter, and that unless some new legislation is introduced or the bounty extended, the aid now given to the production from lead-bearing ores will expires next year.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes.

Mr. MACDONALD: What smelters in Canada handle lead-bearing ores?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I think they are all in British Columbia.

Mr. MACDONALD: Has the minister considered the desirability and importance of doing anything in the way of extending trade with South America? When the manufacturing nations which are now embroiled in the war shall have set their houses in order, they will proceed to deal with their own trade arrangements on the same basis as before the war. On this continent no effort has been made—not even by United States until very recently—for reaching the tremendous trade of South America. We have not attempted to extend our steam communication on the Atlantic coast south of British Guiana. The great industrial countries of Brazil and the Argentine Republic have maintained their trade conditions, largely on account of their exports to Great Britain and other nations across the Atlantic. After their entry into the war, United States put forth special efforts to capture South American trade. As we are capable of sending our products south from Vancouver on one side of the Dominion, and from the Maritime Provinces on the other, special efforts ought now to be exerted with a view to extending our trade with South America, and, if possible, creating conditions under which after the war we shall have the advantage of the people on the other side of the ocean. However we may be associated in sympathy and sentiment with them, I am quite sure that the Allied nations will, after the war, strain every nerve, without the slightest regard to Canada, with a view to extending their trade. There is no reason why we should not anticipate that. The peaceful war of trade will go on, and if the fates decree that the older continent shall suffer the penalty of being the actual theatre of war, those nations which are more fortunate in that respect should take advantage of existing conditions. I do not criticise the minister for maintaining trade agencies on the other side of the ocean, although they must of necessity mark time until the war is over. But I think the people would support any effort made by the minister—and would consider any money devoted to that end as being well invested—to extend our trade with South America and the West Indies.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: One great difficulty I have always found with regard to trade with South America is the lack of direct communication. You are always at a disadvantage where your trade has to filter through a foreign port, and it tends to get into the hands of a commission business in the foreign port through which the trade filters. Before the war I had taken up especially the possibility of steamship communication between South America and Canada, and had carried on negotiations to a certain extent. Had the war not broken out, I believe they would have been successful, but on the outbreak of war negotiations ceased, and during war time it has been absolutely impossible to have anything like a steamship service between Canada and South America. The war completely disorganized the finances of South American countries for a long time; in fact they have not yet recovered. The system of carrying on trade with South American countries involves a good deal of difficulty and long credits. The United States or any other country that undertakes to do a large export business with South America must have banking arrangements; they are as important as steamship communication. Last night I spoke of the extension of our Canadian banks to the West Indies, and the effect of that on our trade has been very marked. The German policy was to push their banks ahead of their trade, and their banks were their commercial travellers, so to speak. We need in Canada some adaptation of banking facilities which will project that auxiliary to Canadian export trade which is needed everywhere, especially in South America. The necessity for banking facilities of that description is being brought home strongly to the British people to-day, and the result of their cogitations in the matter has been the formation of a very large and influential corporation, which is not assisted financially by Government, but with which the Government is sympathetic. This corporation is given an opportunity of acting in conjunction with the Government in the different countries in which it may establish itself, and to that extent is given the sympathy and the active backing of the Government. It is called a trade corporation, but according to the articles of incorporation, it might just as well be called a banking corporation, because banking is the foundation of the trade and is intermixed with it as a factor or agent. I think a similar organization should be formed in Canada, so that along with the efforts of middlemen, producers and carriers, there would be this most important agent of banking and financial assistance. This matter is now being canvassed by business men throughout the country, and I hope that before the reorganization period we shall make some progress. South America has not been neglected. One of the best and most experienced trade commissioners that we had, Mr. Poussette, was our trade commissioner at Buenos Aires. The year before the war started he made a tour of all the different states of South America, and made a very thorough examination into trade conditions and possibilities. His reports which are excellent, have been distributed everywhere, and they are being studied by our Canadian people. The war intervened, and the work was not brought to the point to which it otherwise would have attained. After Mr. Poussette had finished that tour and published his report, I had him brought to Canada through which he made a tour, and he met the producers and manufacturers face to face and canvassed with them. A year and a half ago Mr. Poussette felt the call of the war and left his post, and he is now engaged in military work in England or at the front. In his place we have a Mr. Webb, a very excellent man who understands the language of the Argentine Republic. Our men occasionally go to South America, and whenever they go they speak very highly about the commissioner there, of the assistance he gives to them and of the reputation he seems to have with the commercial people there. This field is therefore not by any means neglected, and when the war is over I hope we shall be able to get steamship service to South America, and with an organization of the kind I have described, and the co-ordination of trade, here is a great field in South America for certain branches of Canadian products. The people there do not manufacture largely; the countries are rich in possibilities; the better class of the people not only are rich, but indulge their propensities, and are good, generous, heavy traders.

Mr. MACDONALD: I am glad the minister agrees with me as to the wisdom and advantage of looking to South America for trade development, and I quite appreciate the difficulties to be encountered. One of the difficulties would be removed if it were possible, by the Government taking certain exceptional powers with our Canadian banks or in some other way, to provide for an extension of banking facilities in South America. Our brethren in Great Britain, while the war is on, appreciate the necessity of maintaining their trade connection, and by the corporation which has been formed and of which the minister has spoken, they are preparing for the maintenance of the trade which has always existed between the Atlantic states of South America and Great Britain. We ought not to be behind, and I would urge upon the Government the duty of taking up this financial problem and endeavouring to do what is being done in Great Britain.

With regard to the question of shipping, I am sorry the minister is talking about waiting until after the war. I have grown weary of urging on the Government the duty of providing for a Canadian Mercantile marine. If we wait until after the war, we shall have the greatest difficulty in getting ships for our needs, because the ships of Great Britain, France and our other Allies will be used in maintaining their own trade. Here is this great continent to the south of us with marvellous possibilities. The possibilities of trade are quite as great on the western coast as on the east. The minister has outlined the difficulties; those are the only difficulties, and I would sincerely urge upon the Government the bounden necessity and duty of providing for the conditions I have described. Unless we provide a market on this continent for our natural resources and manufactured products I believe that the expenditure of money for trade expansion in these older countries will not produce any considerable results. The whole world requires our grain and our farm products, and will continue to require them for a great number of years. It will not be necessary to have commissioners to look after that trade; the trade will be there, and it will simply be a question of getting the products to the market. The competition that will arise as soon as the war is over will prevent to a very great degree any expansion of our trade with these older countries. But this great continent to the south of us is the Mecca to which the eyes of the business men of this country should turn. We should bend every possible energy in that direction, by the immediate construction of ships, by the creation of banking facilities, and of trade routes both on the Atlantic and the Pacific, because the people of the United States are our natural buyers, and have a great many commodities to exchange for ours.

Salaries and contingencies under the Inspection and Sale Act, $3,000.

Mr. OLIVER: A few days ago I brought to the attention of the minister a communication which I received from a point in my constituency, in which the secretary of the local branch of the United Farmers of Alberta complained that they were unable to place any orders for binder twine either with the Grain Growers' Grain Company or the T. Eaton Company. The correspondence they had received was to the effect that binder twine was scarce because it had not been possible to secure transportation of the raw material from the seaboard to the point of manufacture. The minister was good enough to send me a memorandum on the subject which, I am sorry to say, bore out the statement made by my correspondent. It would be a very serious condition if there was to be a shortage of binder twine, and I should be glad if the minister would tell us what the situation is.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The general situation has, I think, improved. It has been very difficult, if not impossible, to import the raw material for the binder twine. Hitherto we have received a good deal of binder twine from the United States, but there has lately been some difficulty in having orders placed and filled. I think most of the manufacturers of binder twine in Canada are filling orders. The International Harvester Company, of Hamilton, in a communication in the month of May which I sent to my hon. friend, do not anticipate any shortage of binder twine; I think they provide more than 50 per cent of the output in Canada. Since that time we have had no complaints. We presume that the orders are being filled. A pretty large order for binder twine was placed in the United States by British people, but the twine was not exported from lack of transport. We allowed this to be brought into this country, although it did not comply with the conditions of the Act, as regards tagging and we guarded against its being sold under our own Marking Act by giving it a special tag. By Order in Council 300 or 400 tons of this twine was allowed to come in to help make up the shortage.

5 p.m.

Mr. OLIVER: Has it been distributed?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes. Since the middle of May we have had no further representations in the matter. Of course, my department simply lends its good offices towards facilitating the supply.

Mr. NESBITT: The only thing wrong with the twine was its short length?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes.

Mr. OLIVER: My correspondent stated that the raw material for binder twine was being held up at ocean ports.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The trouble arose at Seattle. Supplies came in there, but a railway embargo consequent upon the congestion of freight and the lack of cars prevented its quick transport to the factory. I have made inquiries to find where the trouble was but have not yet received definite information. My impression is that the embargo was put on in the United States rather than on our side, and also that the embargo militated against the reception of that material in the binder twine factories in the United States, and the lack of supply of raw material caused a lack of output.

Mr. OLIVER: Is there a probability of that embargo being lifted?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I think it has been lifted. These embargoes are matters which each railway manages for itself, and, of course, we have no jurisdiction over them. Such embargoes are of limited length and are designed to facilitate the movement of some special goods, or to prevent congestion. With our own railways we communicate with them and ask them to facilitate the transport in urgent cases, and this they always try to do.

Mr. OLIVER: Seattle is a common point for our railways, as it is for the railways of the United States. I hope the minister will take measures to find out if the material is still there—

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My impression is that the embargo has been lifted.

Mr. OLIVER: —and if it is still there I think some suggestion should be made to the railways to bring it forward. For, while we may not have an over-abundant crop, yet it is early in the season, and we may have a crop so large as to call for a large quantity of binder twine, and in that case it would be a calamity if the raw material were not brought forward so that it could be worked up.

Salaries and contingencies, under the Cullers Act, including an amount of $1,800 for superannuated cullers, $8,500.

Mr. MACDONALD: What does that mean?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It is the remnant of an old service in Quebec, which is constantly diminishing and, in the course of a few years, will pass away. A large part of the amount is for the superannuation of the officers.

To provide for the construction, acquisition, leasing or expropriation of terminal elevators, (revote), $810,000.

Mr. NESBITT: None of this was used last year?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It would not be quite right to say that none of it was used, but very little comparatively. The chief item under this vote was to provide for an elevator to be erected at Hudson Bay. It was not gone on with last year, and is not being gone on with this year, further than to complete the foundation.

Mr. NESBITT: Better do without the foundation; just let the thing stop.

[Sir George Foster.]

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The foundation of the elevator is part of the dock which is being built. It is, of course, economical and wise to prepare this foundation while the work of construction is going on.

Mr. OLIVER: What is the capacity of the proposed elevator?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: About 1,300,000 or 1,400,000 bushels, divided between warehouse and storage, the large part storage. The other expenditures were for the completion of other elevators in such matters as trackage, additional machinery for cleaning, and other items which are counted part of the expenditures on the original construction. We have now five of these elevators, which in cost and capacity are as follows—giving round numbers:

Place.	Capital Cost.	Capacity, Bus.
Port Arthur..	$1,407,000	3,250,000
Saskatoon..	1,129,000	3,500,000
Moosejaw..	1,314,000	3,500,000
Calgary..	872,000	2,500,000
Vancouver	752,000	1,250,000

Mr. NESBITT: I quite agree that, if the Government is going to build an elevator at Hudson Bay, the minister is very wise in preparing the foundation in connection with the construction of the dock, but I appeal to him to do without both the dock and the elevator.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Talk to your neighbour on the left (Mr. Oliver) and find out what he says.

Mr. NESBITT: We will never want it, and it will only be a waste of money like the rest of this enterprise. I appeal to him, as he generally shows common sense in these matters, to stop the expenditure for this year at any rate.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I am going this far, that I am spending nothing on the elevator this year except what is necessary for the foundation.

Mr. OLIVER: Would the minister give us information as to the present and prospective use of the elevator at Vancouver?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I have left over a vote for the operation of the grain system, and when that is taken up I will be prepared to give the hon. gentleman full information on this point. Generally I may say at this time that the elevator at Vancouver is finished and thoroughly equipped, and waiting for business. Very little business is offering, of course. The elevator was built in prospect of the transfer of grain from the western part of the plains to the Old Country by way of the Panama canal. But the war has stopped all that. If I had had the preternatural wisdom which seems to be predicated as necessary to a minister of the Crown, had I known five years ago just what would happen in the five years then coming, the Vancouver elevator probably would have been postponed for some time. But I did not know it; we went ahead, and we have that structure ready and waiting.

Mr. OLIVER: No person will find fault with the minister or with the Government for the building of the elevator at Vancouver, although things have turned out unfortunately for the enterprise. I understand that last evening the minister made a statement with reference to the feasibility of shipping grain in bulk through the tropics, a question which will have a very important bearing upon the success of this Vancouver elevator under normal conditions. I would suggest to the minister that, as the climate on the coast is very moist and the moisture is very penetrating, the elevator there should be equipped with the necessary means to ensure the absolute dryness of any grain going out from it for shipment.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It must be remembered that the elevator at Vancouver is a transfer elevator, not a storage elevator. The elevators out of which the grain will go, at Calgary or Moosejaw, are equipped with driers, and the probabilities are that the grain will leave them in good condition. The suggestion of my hon. friend is a good one, and I shall ascertain if the elevator there is equipped with a drier. The installation of a drier is a simple matter.

Mr. KNOWLES: Has the minister yet given consideration to my proposed Bill in connection with the employees of these Government elevators, providing that they should be put on the same footing as employees of ordinary commercial elevators?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The Bill is now before the legal advisors of the department.

Mr. KNOWLES: Is the minister's heart sympathetic towards the employees in this regard?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Always towards the employees, but as to the method I should not like to say.

Mr. KNOWLES: Do these elevators make a profit for the Government?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes, a good profit.

Mr. KNOWLES: Including interest on the capital?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I should not like to say that. The elevators have been in operation for three or four years, that at Port Arthur a little longer, and the profits now total about $600,000.

Mr. KNOWLES: I presume that the report of the Grain Commission will give a statement of the balance of grain left on hand after the season's operations. When will that report be out?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It is now in the printer's hands, giving the figures for the last crop year.

Mr. KNOWLES: Is the surplus left on hand every year substantial, and if so why is it so large?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Unfortunately it is not always on the right side.

Mr. OLIVER: In connection with the interior storage elevators, my hon. friend asked if they had made a profit. They were not built for profit. But owing to the combination system between the Grain Commission and the railway companies, these interior storage elevators should make a profit. They are in the same happy position as the Emperor of Japan when he started a newspaper and issued an order that every subject who did not subscribe would have his head cut off. His paper was, of course, a tremendous financial success. So with these interior storage elevators. The railroads from time to time put an embargo on grain, will not accept grain for any place except the interior storage elevators. If under these circumstances, they cannot produce a profit, they must be very badly conceived or badly managed.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I think that story must be no better founded than the story of the Emperor of Japan. Is it an historical fact that the Emperor of Japan did that?

Mr. OLIVER: I cannot vouch for that, but I will vouch for the statement that last winter the railway companies did put an embargo on the carriage of grain elsewhere than to these interior storage elevators.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I think there is a very good reason for it in some cases.

Mr. MACDONALD: Is the minister going to spend any money constructing elevators other than the Hudson Bay elevator?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: No.

Mr. MACDONALD: Does he intend to spend all of the $800,000 on that elevator?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I do not expect to spend very much of it—probably not a dollar this year.

Mr. MACDONALD: I hope the minister will persevere along that well-intentioned line, although I do not see why we should vote this money in war time.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I am not going strong on elevators during war time.

Mr. MACDONALD: Why do you take the money?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: We do not know what might happen, but it is perfectly safe.

Mr. MACDONALD: The minister thinks we can trust him. We will be very canny.

Census and statistics, $100,000.

Mr. OLIVER: In what position are the returns of the census taken last summer, for the three western provinces?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Not altogether completed but very nearly so. The schedules of the population have been published and are all complete, with the exception of the returns for Saskatchewan, which are now undergoing some revision.

Mr. OLIVER: Are the returns from Manitoba and Alberta printed yet?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes. The acreage report of principal field crops of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta in 1906, 1911 and 1916 is complete. The preliminary bulletin of cities and towns of 1,500 and over has been published. The bulletin of Manitoba has been prepared, giving the population, male and female, and the number of dwellings and families by electoral districts, cities, towns, and incorporated villages, for the last four census years, 1916, 1911, 1906 and 1901, and the principal agricultural statistics of the province, giving area and production for 1915, and the number of animals on farms in 1916 have been published. The bulletin of Alberta, giving the population by electoral districts, cities, towns and incorporated villages for the last four census years, has been published. We have, in course of preparation, the classification of the population in the three provinces, according to origins, religions, nationality, education and occupation; the number of animals purchased and sold alive during 1915, animals slaughtered on farms, dairy products and egg products, fruit and orchard crops and forest production on farms, 1915. This return will soon be ready. Then the postal census of manufactures, 1915, has been published in a bulletin issued December 30, 1916, and the volume is now in press, showing the final results of investigation.

Mr. OLIVER: Was this census as complete as the decennial census?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Not as complete because it did not take in the same range of subjects.

Mr. MACDONALD: Have the expenses of the 1911 census been paid?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Not all.

Mr. MACDONALD: Is there any work yet to be done?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: No.

Mr. MACDONALD: Under whose authority is the census taken every five years in certain provinces?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Under the authority of the Act. The subsidies are adjusted for the provinces every five years, and we have to get a census of the population, and we add to it essential information, which is much to be desired.

Mr. OLIVER: What was the length of time occupied in the taking of this census? Its accuracy depends somewhat on the length of time over which the work was spread.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The actual census was taken as of June 1st.

Mr. OLIVER: How long a period was occupied in collecting information?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I think about four weeks in the work on the ground.

Mr. KNOWLES: Is it against the rules for persons to make a duplicate list, and hand it to a political organization?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I never heard of it being done.

Mr. KNOWLES: Is it against the rules, or is it being done?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: No enumerator, or person connected with the taking of the census, has any right—in fact he is absolutely forbidden—to give any information to any person, except the department. His oath requires him to obey instructions.

Mr. KNOWLES: It would be a violation of the oath if the enumerator were to make a carbon copy and hand it to a political organization?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: He is bound by his oath to give no information, except according to his instructions.

Mr. KNOWLES: Would such an act as I refer to be a violation of his oath?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I would like to look into the matter. My impression is that it would be absolutely against the instructions.

Mr. MACDONALD: What does the minister say in answer to that question?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: When it is proved to have been done, I will give an answer.

Canada Year Book, $13,500.

Mr. OLIVER: The Canada Year Book is a very complete statistical statement, in regard to very many interesting subjects, but I have never seen one that was printed within the year. I do not think I have seen one published within two years of its date. The information contained is not available until, approximately, two years after the information had been collected. Is there a possibility of bringing that useful book approximately up to date?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It is very difficult to bring it closely to date, for several reasons. Delays in the printing have, sometimes, prevented early publication. We have tried to have the book issued as soon as possible after the compiling of the information. It is somewhat difficult, however, to have it issued immediately upon the conclusion of the year to which it relates. That is so with all year books. I am glad that my hon. friend believes it to be a good book. The information that I get from those who receive it, in other countries as well as in Canada, is that it takes a high place amongst the various year books that are published. Of course, a year book is designed not so much to give current information as to illustrate sources of information; to give actual information that is current at a certain time, and to put it in permanent form. We did make an improvement last year in the way of getting the book out earlier; whatever can be done this year will be done.

Mr. OLIVER: Admitting that the book is a matter of record, I think there is no doubt that the longer its publication is delayed the less its value becomes. I know of somewhat similar publications that are quite up to date. For instance, that standard work, the Canadian Almanac, which contains a great deal of information, is brought almost absolutely up to date. There is, no doubt, a difference in the character of the two publications, but what has been done by the Canadian Almanac in that regard shows what is possible. If the minister appreciates the immediate value of the Year Book, I am sure that he can, by giving attention to the matter, make such arrangements as will bring it out within a very few months of the year to which it relates. As to the printing, surely that is not a matter of delay. There is a magnificent printing establishment across the canal, and there are 10,000 capable and well-equipped printing offices throughout the country, all anxious to do the work at fair prices, a large proportion of them entitled to such patronage as the Government is able to give them.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I did take a personal interest in the year-book, because it is a child of my fancy. I have done my best to improve it and to bring it out in better time. I am now discussing with my officers the advisability of combining two years' information in the next year's publication, bringing it up to date, and keeping it up to date ever afterwards. This may have a little to recommend it in the way of economy, besides putting us in a position to do more prompt work.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: How many copies are printed?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: 9,000 in English, 2,000 in French.

Mr. MACDONALD: Who is the editor?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Mr. Godfrey.

Mr. MACDONALD: How long has he been connected with it?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: He was formerly with the Agriculture Department, but when Census and Statistics came to my department, he came with them. He is a very efficient officer. He is also editor of the Monthly Statistics Bulletin.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: How many copies of the Year-book are distributed outside of Canada?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I have not a list with me. We send them to libraries and we exchange, pretty generally and quite generously, with other Governments.

Dominions Royal Commission, $10,000.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: This is to provide for Canada's share of the expense of printing and for looking after what little odd things may yet remain. The Dominions Royal Commission has finished its work and made its final report. Later I shall ask the House to listen to an explanation as to what its work has been.

Mr. MACDONALD: When will the minister make that statement?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: When we take up the item that is left, with regard to grain.

Mr. MACDONALD: When the minister was putting through his Estimates last winter, he made a similar assurance with regard to grain; but during the whole session we heard nothing more about grain. I think that the minister should before this have made a statement as to the work of the Dominions Royal Commission. The minister's services in that connection carried him all over the world. The report of the Commission is contained in a large number of volumes which it is difficult for members of the House to study in detail. The statement that only the minister could give with regard to the work that the Commission has accomplished would have been of very great benefit to members of the House in considering many of the problems that came before them. I hope that the minister will not do as he did last year; I hope that he will come back to us in regard to this matter.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I will not leave you this year.

Mr. MACDONALD: When will my hon. friend make the statement? He ought to fix a time. Why not to-morrow?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I do not think I can do it to-morrow. I will do it at no very distant date, and I will give the House information as to the time. It struck me that the better time to give an exposition of the work of the Dominions Royal Commission would be when the report of that body had been laid upon the Table, so that I could impress upon the minds of such facile members as my hon. friend the lesson that I wanted to teach, and so that I could point him to the document itself.

Mr. MACDONALD: A good many of those documents are around now—I have seen half a dozen of them—and we have been waiting for my hon. friend to tell us something about the work of the Commission. We read in the English papers what the commissioners there have said about it; but although my right hon. friend in the Budget debate and on other occasions discussed the trade conditions of the country, he has not yet given the House and the country the benefit of his experience as to that commission. We are always glad to facilitate the passage of the minister's Estimates, but last year, although we were told we would have an account of the commandeering of grain the session came to an end and we never heard anything about it. I hope the minister is not going to treat in the same way this wonderful Royal Commission on which he worked so hard. Perhaps hon. gentlemen on his side voted wrongly on tariff matters and other things of that kind because my hon. friend did not give us the benefit of his wonderful experiences. I beg my hon. friend not to postpone his statement too long. We all know we are going into a contentious debate next week. The House is in a congenial mood to-day, and if the members heard that the minister was to speak on the subject of the Royal Commission to-morrow, we would have a large audience.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I do not think I can give my statement to-morrow, but I will not keep my hon. friend away long from that fountain of inspiration.

Mr. KNOWLES: No minister can instruct and entertain this House so ably and successfully as the Minister of Trade and Commerce, both because of his natural endowments and because of the travels which, as a matter of strict duty, have fallen to his lot during former years. The minister has covered the greater part of the globe in the performance of his duties, and we, who stay at home, would be delighted to have an account of the interesting things he has seen and heard during his travels. He has travelled not altogether in his personal capacity, but as the representative of the Government and Parliament of Canada. Last year after he had taken part in the Paris Conference, on his return to Canada he toured this country and gave the people the advantage of his very interesting addresses. He came very near my own city, giving the people of Regina an account of his travels. In this House, we discuss matters that are hum-drum and matters that are grave, and next week we shall enter upon a debate that will be extremely serious. I think, therefore, it would be informing and refreshing if we could have from the minister at a very early date an account of all the sight-seeings he must have had.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I certainly cannot withstand that appeal; I will make my statement at the earliest possible opportunity.

Gold and Silver Marking Act, $4,000.

Mr. OLIVER: In some of the papers I have seen complaints in regard to the working out of this Act. Have any such complaints come to the attention of the minister?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: No, the Act is working very well. It is under the supervision of Mr. W. J. Ryan, a very faithful and competent officer.

Mr. KNOWLES: Is there any officer in the West?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: No.

Mr. KNOWLES: The trouble seems to be in the West where travelling pedlars sell their goods, and the legitimate dealers, in order to have the Act invoked, must take steps through Ottawa, and that takes up so much time that the purpose of the Act is rendered ineffective. It would be better if some officer were established at Winnipeg to whom legitimate dealers in the western towns might apply.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Representations to that effect have been made, but the Act seems to be working pretty successfully as it is.

Mr. OLIVER: In the instance I mentioned the complaint was that in actual operation the Act had worked in favour of articles not of sterling character.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That complaint was fairly well founded at first, but an amendment made to the Act two years ago remedied that.

West India cable, $38,933.33.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: This is the yearly subsidy that we pay, Great Britain paying an equal amount, and the people of the West Indian islands paying £10,000 a year. It resulted from the arrangement we made, which has as its effect the cheapening of cable rates between Great Britain and the West Indies and Canada and the West Indies.

Mr. MACDONALD: Is the cable state-owned or privately owned?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The cable is owned by a company. There were two or three companies originally, one owning a cable from Halifax to Bermuda and one amongst the islands themselves. We got these companies together in London and put them under certain conditions which they have fulfilled, and as they fulfilled those conditions and made the reductions, a certain subsidy was paid. The full subsidy is paid for four years. If after that period the profits are large, a portion of them come back until the subsidies which have been paid are paid off. There have been very considerable reductions in the rates.

Mr. MACDONALD: The time for re-payment has not yet arrived.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: There is one year more to run.

Mr. OLIVER: What is the southern terminus of this cable?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The cable runs through all the islands.

Mr. OLIVER: Does it go to Guiana?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It runs from Halifax to Bermuda by the Halifax-Bermuda Cable Company; thence to Jamaica by the Direct West Indies Company; thence to the several islands and British Guiana by the West Indies and Panama Company.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: What is the total amount to be paid next year?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: $38,000 is the amount of the subsidy.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: I understood there is only one more year to run.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: After that it was supposed that the company's lines would be more profitable, under the new arrangement and with the betterment of the cables, and all profits over and above a certain amount were to be shared equally and the moiety to be paid back to Great Britain and Canada.

Supervision Lake and Ocean Freight Rates, $6,000.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: There has been no appointment and no expenditure under this item up to the present time. Things have been so absolutely confused during the last three years that I have made no appointment.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess.

The Committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Indians—British Columbia, $166,050.

Mr. GRAHAM: Difficulty seems to have existed for some time with regard to the Indians of British Columbia. A deputation of the Indians waited on the Government about a week ago, and I am not sure that they did not go so far as to carry their case to the foot of the Throne, at least they sent a delegation to the Mother Country. Can the minister tell us what steps have been taken to settle the difficulty, and what is the position of the matter at the present time?

Hon. W. J. ROCHE (Superintendent General of Indian Affairs): The question involved is really that of the title to Indian lands in British Columbia. There has been a dispute for many years between the British Columbia Government and the Indians as to the Indian title; in fact, I understand, some of the Indians go so far as to claim the whole of the land of British Columbia—that is, they say that their title has never been extinguished. It was because of these difficulties that my predecessor in the Superintendent Generalship appointed a commission to investigate the reserves in British Columbia. In 1913, an Order in Council was passed providing that if the Indians would abide by the decision of an impartial tribunal as to reserves, the full question of the Indian title would be submitted to the Privy Council, through the ordinary course. This impartial tribunal was to ascertain, with regard to each band of Indians in the province, whether the area of its reserve was large enough for the band or not. In case the reserve was found to be too small, the British Columbia Government promised to increase its area by the addition of provincial lands; and if the reserve was found to be larger than necessary for the band, the area was to be cut down accordingly. For many years the Indians have been trying to get an appeal to the Privy Council, but the British Columbia Government did not approve of having the case submitted in that way. Neither our predecessors in Government nor ourselves were able, for a time, to bring the British Columbia Government to agree to submit the case. We pledged ourselves, if the terms of the Order in Council were carried out, to have a reference to the Privy Council, and the British Columbia Government consented to the same. The findings in regard to the reserves have been made, and are to be approved by the British Columbia Government and the Dominion Government. Of course, Mr. O'Meara, counsel for some of the Indians, takes the position that these findings should be submitted to the Indians for their consideration before they are submitted to either Government. I think that is a fair statement of the dispute with the Indans whom Mr. O'Meara is representing. There are many Indians in British Columbia who are willing to adhere to the terms of the Order in Council and to abide by the findings of the commission, and to have the appeal as to the title of the land carried through the ordinary course.

Mr. GRAHAM: Is it very near a settlement?

Mr. ROCHE: Not so far as the Privy Council is concerned.

M. BOULAY (Rimouski) (texte): Monsieur le Président, je voudrais avoir de l'honorable ministre de l'Intérieur, certaines informations au sujet du personnel des employés supérieurs de son département. J'ai fait une liste des noms des principaux officiers qui reçoivent un salaire de $2,400 à $6,000 par année et dans cette liste, qui comprend vingt-sept noms, je ne relève que les noms de trois Canadiens français.

Je désirerais savoir de l'honorable ministre si, lorsqu'il a pris la charge de son département, cet état de choses existait.

Comme il ne semble y avoir personne pour me répondre en français, je répéterai mes observations en anglais.

I will now repeat in English the effect of my remarks. I would like to have from the minister certain information. I find from a list I have made up of the superior officers of his department, that out of twenty-seven officers who receive high salaries—from $2,400 to $6,000—there are only three bearing French-Canadian names. I would like to know if that condition existed when he took charge of the department, or whether it is a condition that he has made since taking charge. I made some remarks on the same line when the Estimates of the Department of Agriculture were before the committee, showing that out of nineteen highly-paid officers in that department, only one bore a French-Canadian name. The hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) took it upon himself to say that this was a fair proportion for us. It is a real disgrace that a member from the province of Quebec, representing a French county, should come here and say, in the face of such evidence as that, that we have our share of the public positions. This state of affairs should not be, in view of the number of French-Canadians in this country, for it indicates the belief that we have not French-Canadians qualified to occupy good positions in the Civil Service.

It is not because I covet those positions for my fellow-countrymen, not at all; but it seems to be a discrimination that should not exist, and a knowledge of that discrimination amongst our countrymen predisposes them to anger, and puts them into such a spirit that sometimes they are more than mad, and with reason. Hereafter, when inquiry is made why the French-Canadians of the province of Quebec are not always pleased with what is done, we may find the explanation of their attitude by looking a little more sharply into the way in which they are used and have been used. I do not blame this Administration more than its predecessors, because I think that if we have lost ground we lost more ground during the previous Administration than during this one. In fact, when the Laurier Government came into power in 1896, we had four deputy ministers in different departments of the Government at Ottawa, and when we came into power in 1911 we found only one. That shows that the Government preceding this is largely guilty of the conditions that we found when we came into power, and that may be the reason why the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) the other day so strongly defended the Minister of Agriculture, saying that he was giving us almost real fair play. I do not want to insist any longer on this question.

Mr. MACDONALD: Are you not given fair play?

Mr. BOULAY: I am getting fair play in saying what I say because nobody can say it is not true; I have the figures here before me; they are taken from the Auditor General's report, and cannot be contradicted. Every one in this House has a right to state the facts and I have stated them in order to show that I am right when I claim and when we claim that we do not receive entire justice, as we should. I should like to know from the minister if this condition existed in his department when he took charge of it.

Mr. ROCHE: Of course, we do not make appointments to the Inside Service; they have to come through the Civil Service Commission. Those positions are open to French Canadians just as to English-speaking persons, and if they do not come up and pass the examinations the Government cannot be blamed for their not doing so. In the Indian Department there has been no change, and certainly there has been no intended discrimination against any nationality. As a matter of fact, there are only six more employees in the Indian Department, both Inside and Outside Service, than in 1911. There is no more relative disproportion to-day in the Inside Service of the Indian Department than when this Government came into power.

Mr. OLIVER: I desire to bring to the attention of the minister certain allegations which have been forwarded to me for the purpose of being brought to his attention, in relation to the Okanagan Indian reserve. I presume that these matters have some relation to the commission which was under discussion a few minutes ago. At any rate, my information is that certain complaints were made by the Indians in December, 1916, and were forwarded by them to the commissioner, J. A. J. McKenna, but up to the present time my information is that no satisfactory action has been taken in regard to these many matters. The complaints as set out are very long. They include:

1. That Chief Baptiste Logan was deposed without cause. 2. That no complaint or charge was ever brought to the attention of the band against him. 3. That Inspector Cumminskie's sole reason for opposition to the chief was that Baptiste had opposed the illegal deal for the surrender of the Long Lake Indian Reserve, Inspector Cumminskie having been one of the interested parties to this deal. 4. That the election of Pierre Michell, conducted by Inspector Cumminskie and Agent Smith, from Kamloops, was a strictly unlawful election in which every right of the band was set aside, and by right of authority a disreputable chief was thrust on the band. 5. That reports sent to the department by the officials who engineered this election were deliberately false reports. 6. That Pierre Michell (the chief who was elected in the place of Logan) did not secure a majority vote. 7. That he was not elected by acclamation as reported by Inspector Cumminskie or the agent from Kamloops, if he made a report on the proceedings.

Another complaint is:

1. That members of the band have been unjustly deprived of their rights to election for the position of chief without just cause. 2. That members of the band have been forcibly expelled from public business meetings of the band without just cause, by order of Inspector Megraw.

Another complaint is:

1. That the matter of the Henderson lease was and is a criminal invasion of all the rights of the band. 2. That Alexander Henderson's agreement was criminal and illegal. 3. That Inspector Megraw's conduct in connection with this matter was directly in variance with his duties as Inspector of Agencies and directly opposed to the will and best interests of the band.

Another complaint is:

That Inspector Megraw exceeded his authority in forcing the man Henderson's presence on the reserve under the provision of a strictly illegal agreement between a Nichola Indian, a non-member of the band, and a white man.

Another complaint is:

1. Inspector Megraw's reports regarding the incompetence of Chief Gaston, immediately following the chief's refusal to countenance the fraudulent lease to Henderson, calls for the strictest investigation. 2. That Inspector Megraw has acted in an underhand manner with the chief; has animated his personal spleen against chief. That no charge has been brought against the chief at any meeting. 3. That Inspector desires the removal of the chief solely on personal grounds and to secure the election of a chief amenable to officials. 4. That inspector has encouraged and favoured men on the reserve known to be openly hostile to the chief.

Another complaint is:

That railway rights of way have been granted through various reserves of the band and the band kept in ignorance of these transactions.

That band funds from the proceeds of right-of-way of these railways have been unlawfully distributed to non-members of the Okanagan band, to the amount of several thousand dollars.

The sixth charge is:

That officials have permitted for years the fencing of large areas of our reserve for range purposes, said ranges being exploited for individual profit.

The seventh charge is:

1. That promiscuous cutting of timber has been permitted. 2. That individual half-breeds have been granted permission to remove hundreds of thousands of feet, for personal profit. 3. That no adequate return has been made. 4. That a complete return of all timbers sold, and money paid, amounts to whom paid, for the past five years, shall be procured on commission to band.

The eighth charge is:

1. That for years against the repeated protests of the band, undesirable characters, American half-breeds, American Indians, Indians from local reserves, have been permitted to intrude upon our reserve. 2. That no action has ever been taken on the many complaints made that they have received every comfort and consideration from officials. 3. That the intruding element has almost exclusive control of all our business. 4. That they openly boast of our helplessness to have them removed. 5. That they openly defy the authority of the chief. 6. That Inspector Megraw and J. R. Brown are fully aware of the criminal characters. 7. That Inspector Megraw has approved of threatened criminal violence expressed by this element. 8. That 90 per cent of all troubles on reserve is caused by this intruding element, trespassing on our reserve. 9. That the band demands a thorough investigation, and the expulsion of all undesirable characters from our reserve. All reports regarding any claim of half-breeds having been approved as members of the band, with dates of such, if any.

The ninth charge is:

That inspector and agent persist in continual employment of Isaac Harris, charged as false interpreter. Cummiskie's principal agent in attempt of sale and illegal surrender of Long Lake Reserve. That favours are granted this man at expense of band, knowing that the band holds this man guilty of the most serious crimes. That a special grant for competition was made for his benefit, and his employment is detrimental to the band's interest. That Inspector Megraw has persistently employed men as special policemen, whom he knew to be openly hostile to the chief and the Okanagan Indians.

The tenth charge is:

1. That Inspector Cummiskie allowed encroachment on our reserve at Priest's valley, surveying portions of reserve to adjoining property. 2. That reserve at Swan Lake has been encroached on by adjoining owners.

The eleventh charge is:

1. That the local officials have overlooked the procuring of young girls for immoral purposes. 2. That Pierre Michel procured the young daughter of Lena Helleen for the use of Alexander. 3. That nothing was done in the matter beyond Inspector Megraw informing Alexander he should be in jail.

The twelfth charge is:

That Alexander, a Nichola Indian, unlawfully secured and was paid $2,700 of the Okanagan band funds which was squandered by Alexander in automobiles and young girls.

The thirteenth charge is:

1. That Inspector Megraw has had cognizance of open threats to personal violence and murder of our present secretary, Mr. J. H. Christie, by one Frank Godfpresen, an American intruder on the reserve with criminal record. 2. That when Inspector Megraw's attention was called to this matter he fully approved of the crime.

The fourteenth charge is:

Mrs. Josephine Edwards, of Coyote Creek, Indian Reserve charged that Jimmy Logan, an Indian on Head of the Lake Reserve, stole two horses from the open range on the reserve, the property of the complainant. That Inspector Megraw refused to allow Agent Brown to investigate. That he refused to assist her to secure the horses; that he protected Logan for this theft.

The fifteenth charge is:

That Mary Nicholas of Head of Lake Indian Reserve charges Johnny Ophheimer, an American half-breed and professional gambler, with the abduction of her daughter from her husband, Patrick Johny, of Enderby. That he took her to the States for two years, that he returned here two years ago and lives openly on reserve with my daughter as his wife. That he threatens to take my girl away and I will never see her again, if I make any trouble for him.

The sixteenth charge is:

That since the retirement of Mr. McKay, as Indian agent, who was held in the highest regard by every Indian on our reserve, and whose memory we all respect, we have received no consideration, instruction or assistance in any manner whatsoever, from any official in connection with the Indian Department.

These charges were formulated at a meeting at Black Town, on December 23, 1916. In the same action complaint was made that certain payments were made, as follows:

Moneys paid to Hermoin Gregoire, $752.50; moneys paid to Joseph Jimy, $703.19, both men are intruders on reserve Shuswap Indians; to Alexander Chilahista, $2,763.50, a Necklo Indian (all non-members of the Okanagan Band. Information at hand regarding Duck Lake Reserve, Mrs. Christina McDougal, to whom $570 was paid, is a white woman by marriage, no right on reserve. The distribution of the 50 per cent of the sum of $2,043.90 is not credited by the band—have no knowledge of this. On this distribution by agent, they wish the questions asked for information, the individuals' names and amounts paid.

They ask for information in regard to this distribution, and wish to know the amounts paid, and the individuals to whom they were paid. I am simply placing before the minister the statement which has been forwarded to me.

Mr. ROCHE: By whom is it signed?

Mr. OLIVER: A gentleman who signs as secretary of the Indian meeting, J. H. Christie. The allegations are of a serious character, and were made long ago, and apparently they have not been acted upon by the department; and the only thing for me to do is to place them before the minister in the most public manner, in order that there shall be a show-down and a conclusion of this affair, and that these charges shall be absolutely proven or disproven. If disproven, the parties to such terrible accusations should be punished. If they are proven, it will indicate a terrible condition of affairs in the administration in my hon. friend's department. It is certainly desirable that no condition should exist which would in any way justify such statements as I have felt compelled to place before the House.

Mr. ROCHE: Unfortunately, I have been given to understand that there are at least two factions among the Indians, and this man Christie, who prefers these charges, is not an angel. If my information about him is correct, he is a most unreliable individual, and no credence can be placed upon any charges he sends to any member of this House. In fact, he has written a number of very impertinent communications, threatening that if we did not take action he would have the matter aired on the floor of Parliament. Some of the charges which he has forwarded here are, on their face, so absurd that their falsehood is patent to anybody. A number of these charges have been brought to the attention of the department before, and others have never been placed before the department. It is true they were referred to Mr. McKenna for investigation, but about that time Mr. McKenna was superannuated, which stopped the investigation. He is not now an official of the department. Inspector Brown is not an appointee of this Government. If any such conditions as have been mentioned prevailed under his agency, I admit that it would be most discreditable. No agent should be allowed to hold his agency if he permitted that condition of affairs to exist. But I have too much confidence in Mr. Brown's uprightness and in his ability as an Indian agent to believe that he would allow these things to happen without bringing them to the attention of the department. There have been certain abuses on that reserve. Our Chief Inspector for the province, Mr. Ditchburn, is there for the purpose, among other things, of investigating charges that were referred to the department. Mr. Ditchburn is a good inspector who has had long experience and he has full authority to investigate the conditions in this reserve. I should be pleased to place in his hands any charges that he is not in possession of, in order that he may investigate them. But I fancy that a great many of these apparently serious charges will, when investigated, be shown to be figments of the imagination, if not of Mr. Christie, at least of some others on that reserve.

Mr. OLIVER: I shall be very glad if it turns out that these charges are unfounded. But I have to make the reflection on my friend's administration that these charges were made in the fall of 1916, and the minister should surely be informed by this time as to what foundation there was for them. As to Mr. Brown, if he was appointed by the previous Government and if this condition prevails upon the reserve, undoubtedly he should cease to be in the employ of the department—he could not cease soon enough to please me. It will be noticed that the complaints seem to be directed rather against his superior Mr.

Megraw. I do not know who Mr. Megraw is, but the blame seems to be laid upon him. I hope that Mr. Ditchburn has authority not only to inspect, but also to adjust these matters, to prevent trespass upon the reserve, and to decide who is entitled to be a member of the band and to share in the benefits of that membership. This is a matter that should be settled on the ground by a man of sufficient judgment and responsibility. These very serious assertions, if there is any foundation for them, constitute a grave scandal against the Indian Department, and the minister did not do himself or the country justice in not taking more prompt means to clear them up. I do not know Mr. Christie; he may be good or he may be bad, that is not the question. The question is, do these things exist or do they not? The welfare of the Indians and the good faith and good name of Canada are in my hon. friend's hands. I hope that he will not treat the matter lightly simply because Mr. Christie may be, in some degree, an undesirable person. I hope that he will recognize the importance of the proper discharge of the country's responsibilities to its wards, through the medium of his department.

Mr. ROCHE: There will be a thorough investigation and our inspector will have power to remedy anything that is wrong.

Mr. OLIVER: I may as well place before the department some other matters contained in this correspondence which relates to other reserves. There is a charge in regard to the West Bank reserve. I am not aware of what reserve that is, or whether it is part of the Okanagan reserve. The first charge is:

> That one Galfeately has with the apparent approval of our agent, Mr. Brown, and Inspector Megraw, diverted, taken from our reserve, by flume, all the water which we have used for the purpose of irrigation on the reserve from Cedar Creek. That flume was built over and part in the ditch, constructed by us 45 odd years since.

The second charge is:

> That white men's fences have been allowed to encroach upon the reserve at West Bank. That similar encroachment has been permitted on upper reserve. Repeated requests to agent to have fences removed. Nothing done to date.

The removal of a number of men from the Okanagan reserve is requested. They are referred to as Indians from the United States and local British Columbia half-breeds and Indians, their names being as follows:

[Mr. Oliver.]

Frank Godfresson, Jimmy Marchell, Willie Ashton, Louise Brasere, Frank Marchand, Pere Louie, Alex Sen, Johny Martins, Narcisse Baptist, Luke, Pere Like, John Ophenheirmer, Joe Parker, Ernest Brewer, Bono, Alexander, Alex Edward, Billy Brewer, Billy Lixard, Francois Gregoir, Paul Nelson, Basil Smithins, Isaac Harris, Jimmy Logan, Scottie, Louie Chacko, Pere Michell, Billie Swallwall.

These are claimed to be intruders in the Okanagan reserve. There is also a complaint here of irregularities in the surrender or expropriation of the Trout Creek experimental farms, in respect of the method of valuation and the amount paid. It is asserted that the matter was not placed fairly before the band and that Inspector Megraw threatened the displeasure of the Government upon those opposing the surrender. With regard to the railway right of way, they want to know the area, the valuation, the amount paid and to whom it was paid. There is also a query in regard to water deflected from Snake Creek and a complaint of trespass on and deflection of all water from the reserve adjoining the townsite. This complaint is signed by Mitchell Jack and Cosmos Sam. The Indians of the Salmon River reserve also complain that there has never been any effort on the reserve to prevent crimes and to secure order. They claim that the impracticability of meeting the agent at Enderby has not been considered by the officials of the department; that the Chief maintains an American Indian on the reserve and that they desire his removal as an undesirable trouble-maker. They complain that moneys for furnishing church or for sale of logs is not accounted for; that Enderby men receive permission to cut their timber; that their timber is not conserved; that a resident of Enderby has by permission fenced a great portion of remaining timber on reserve and claims personal ownership. The Indians at Salmon River Indian Reserve signing this complaint are: William Nonish, Jim Haskit, Jimmy Felix, George Potice, Andrew Morris , François Thom, Alex Nahaskit, Mc Phillips, Dan Phillips, Dennis Jim, Harry Bill, Billie Felix, Andrew George. I am aware of the impossibility of satisfying all the varying demands and aspirations of the Indians on the different reserves, but apparently in connection with the latter matters that I have mentioned, there is a question of encroachment of outsiders upon the reserves and of intruders in the ranks. These are matters of administration and claim the careful consideration of the department.

Mr. OLIVER: Is any capital expenditure included in this item?

Mr. ROCHE: No.

Mr. OLIVER: This is simply to carry on the schools for another year?

Total appropriation, 1917-1918		$734,115

In the year 1910 a new arrangement was entered into by this Government with the various denominations which have charge of these schools. The schools were divided into three classes. A certain standard as to accommodation, equipment, etc., was decided on at a conference between the Government and the different denominations, and the denominational schools which complied with this standard received the highest per capita grant. Then there were departmental schools on which the department had stood the original outlay and which were to be brought up to this standard. Then there were the class 2 churcn schools, somewhat inferior in character and quality, which did not draw as large a per capita allowance as the other two classes. This has increased the grant for education considerably by materially increasing the per capita grant, and by raising the standard of the schools and giving more room, better equipment, and more sanitary methods. Any schools that are under that system are most creditable indeed. The pupils are attending the schools in increasing numbers. We have put a check on capital expenditure during war time, and are simply keeping the schools in repair, although we have been strongly pressed to make capital expenditures by denominational schools at various points where they are really in want of better accommodation.

Mr. OLIVER: I am in sympathy with the minister in his decision not to invest in any capital expenditure during war time. The Anglican bishop of Athabaska, however, has brought to my attention the fact that the increased cost of the necessaries of life is pressing very heavily upon the resources of the church having charge of the schools in his diocese. I understand that he has applied to the department for some recognition of the more difficult conditions. Has any such application been made, and if so, has any recognition been granted?

Mr. ROCHE: Requests of that description have come from that bishop and from several other bishops. They say that the present high cost of living is such that the existing per capita grant is not sufficient to prevent them from going behind. In some instances we have been asked to make up the deficit. We have not done so as yet, and we have not promised just at present to increase the grant.

A delegation of representatives of almost all the schools was to have interviewed the department some time ago about this matter, but they did not turn up according to programme. So far we have not passed favourably on any requests for increased assistance.

Mr. OLIVER: I do not know that I would suggest to the minister either the assumption of deficits or any very large increase in the grants, but it is a fact that in the north country especially, where the cost of living is at a maximum and transportation very expensive in proportion to the amount of actual supplies consumed, the present conditions bear very heavily upon the schools, and I would respectfully suggest that temporary assistance in the way of a grant be given to them to meet the increased cost of the actual food consumed. It could be a special grant during this period of stress.

Mr. ROCHE: Per capita?

Mr. OLIVER: It would, of course, be per capita. I think the department would not be doing substantial injustice to the country at large if it specially recognized the schools in that part of the country where the difficulties of carrying on the work are so great. If the minister saw fit to consider this suggestion favourably in respect of the schools in the Anglican and Roman Catholic dioceses of Athabasca and Mackenzie, assistance would have to be given as soon as possible because supplies for the winter are now going forward. The other schools which are accessible by rail could be dealt with at any time, but the schools in the more remote outposts of civilization, where the work is particularly arduous and expensive, have to make their arrangements very far in advance, and it would really be deplorable if, the department having decided to assist them, the assistance came too late to benefit the schools this year.

Mr. ROCHE: I will consider my hon. friend's suggestion.

Mr. KYTE: Has a teacher been engaged for the Indian school at Salmon River in the place of Ernest McNeil, who resigned a few months ago?

Mr. ROCHE: Yes, Miss Maud E. Brennan. I think she is there now.

Mr. McKENZIE: What is the curriculum at these Indian schools? What standard of education are the pupils supposed to reach?

Mr. ROCHE: I understand that the Indian schools are conducted on much the same lines as the public schools of the province. The teachers have to be qualified under the provincial laws, and it is sometimes rather difficult to get them for isolated places, but we do the very best we can. The same subjects are taught as in the public schools, and the same text books are used. The schools are inspected by the public school inspectors, and the pupils are supposed to come up to the standard required by the provincial educational authorities.

9 p.m.

Mr. McKENZIE: Have the pupils any aptitude for arithmetic, reading and writing? How long do they continue their studies, and what are the results obtained in these schools? I do not for a moment suggest that we should drop them, but I wish to know whether the Indians appreciate the educational advantages placed at their disposal. There are small Indian schools in my part of the country, but they are not up to the high school standard. Is it the same in other provinces? Do any of the pupils take up teaching themselves?

Mr. ROCHE: It varies with the different provinces. I believe the Indian schools in Ontario have been very successful, the pupils attending school about as long as the pupils at the public schools, and sometimes competing with the white children in the entrance examinations for the high schools. I do not think the Indian schools in Nova Scotia have been quite as successful, but on the whole we cannot complain very much about the results. In the Maritime Provinces the attendance has not been so good as in some of the other provinces.

Mr. MARCIL: What about the Indian schools in Quebec? Are their studies confined to one language?

Mr. ROCHE: In the province of Quebec there are twenty-eight day schools. There are 609 boys on the roll, and 647 girls, total 1,256. The average attendance is 802. There are no boarding or industrial schools in that province. In the French districts the Indians are taught in French, and in the essentially English districts in English.

Mr. MARCIL: To what districts does the minister refer as English districts?

Mr. ROCHE: Such as Caughnawaga and Oka.

Mr. MARCIL: What about the schools in Bonaventure county?

Mr. ROCHE: I have not that information before me.

Mr. MARCIL: Will the minister give me information on that point later?

Mr. ROCHE: Yes.

Mr. OLIVER: What is the position of the school at Hay River on Great Slave lake?

Mr. ROCHE: They have put up a new school quite recently at their own expense. There are 25 pupils, and they get the usual per capita grant of $125, and have drawn, on that account, $3,125.

Mr. MARCIL: Is there any special reason why there should not be industrial schools in the East as well as in the West?

Mr. ROCHE: I do not know of any reason.

Mr. MARCIL: Industrial education is coming to be recognized as a necessity.

Mr. ROCHE: They have not sent in requests for these schools.

Mr. MARCIL: Does not the minister think that the department should take the lead in this matter, the Indians being the wards of the Government? If the Indians made a success of the industrial life as a result of proper training of the young in their schools, it would be a great credit to the departmeent.

Mr. ROCHE: Perhaps the Indians are getting more civilized——

Mr. MARCIL: But civilization goes hand in hand with industrial efficiency. The trained man is more useful to society than the untrained. I think this matter is well worthy of consideration.

Mr. OLIVER: Is there an industrial school at Fort Simpson carried on by the Roman Catholic church?

Mr. ROCHE: No.

Mr. OLIVER: Then, Fort Providence is the furthest north school?

Mr. ROCHE: There are schools at Hay River, Fort Resolution, and Fort Providence.

Mr. OLIVER: Nothing below Fort Providence?

Mr. ROCHE: No.

Mr. OLIVER: What is the standing of the Fort Providence school?

Mr. ROCHE: There are sixty-five pupils, and they get the usual grant.

Mr. OLIVER: There is a school at Fort Resolution?

Mr. ROCHE: Yes—sixty pupils.

Mr. OLIVER: And there is a day school at Fort Smith?

Mr. ROCHE: Yes. The day schools do not get a per capita grant, but this school is given a grant of $500.

Mr. OLIVER: Are there both Protestant and Roman Catholic schools at Fort Vermilion?

Mr. ROCHE: At Fort Vermilion there is a day school with twenty pupils. It is a Roman Catholic school.

Mr. OLIVER: There is no boarding school there and no school carried on by the Anglicans?

Mr. ROCHE: No.

Mr. OLIVER: And at Wabiskaw?

Mr. ROCHE: There is a Roman Catholic school with 25 pupils and a Church of England school as well. Both are boarding schools.

Mr. OLIVER: And at Lesser Slave Lake and Grouard?

Mr. ROCHE: There is a day school and a boarding school of Roman Catholics, the latter with 25 pupils; and an Anglican school as well.

Mr. OLIVER: And at Fort Chipewyan?

Mr. ROCHE: There is a Roman Catholic boarding school.

Mr. OLIVER: No Anglican school there?

Mr. ROCHE: No.

Mr. OLIVER: There was formerly an Anglican day school there.

Mr. ROCHE: I do not think there is any day school at Fort Chipewyan.

Mr. MARCIL: Are there any Indian schools in the Ungava district in the province of Quebec?

Mr. ROCHE: No.

Mr. MARCIL: Are there no Indians there?

Mr. ROCHE: There are scattered nomadic tribes, but no treaty Indians.

Mr. MARCIL: Are they not under the charge of the department?

Mr. ROCHE: We have to care for them sometimes—give them provisions, and so on.

Mr. OLIVER: Is there an Indian boarding school in operation in the Yukon?

Mr. ROCHE: Yes, there is a Church of England boarding school at Carcross with 35 pupils.

Dr. NESBITT: Do they attempt to teach agriculture in the various Indian schools in addition to the ordinary English education?

Mr. ROCHE: At some of the schools, yes. In several of these places they have farms attached to the schools and teach them agriculture.

Mr. MACDONALD: How many Indians are there in the Yukon?

Mr. ROCHE: 1,528.

Mr. McKENZIE: In connection with industrial education the teacher in the Indian district of Eskasoni, I understand, has made application for assistance in building a barn. He has a small barn some 15 feet by 20 feet, but is anxious to have a larger one, as by working the land he is enabled to eke out his small salary.

Mr. ROCHE: The matter has been brought to our attention and is now being considered.

Indians generally. Advances to Indians surrendering their lands under provisions of section 89 of the Indian Act, which will afterwards be repaid from the avails of the land $25,000.

Mr. OLIVER: Are there any surrenders in progress or in prospect?

Mr. ROCHE: We have been trying quite recently to get a surrender of a portion of the Blood Reserve which, as my hon. friend knows is a very fine agricultural district, and at least a preliminary meeting has been held, so that there is a chance of a surrender being secured.

Indians generaly to prevent the spread of tuberculosis, $10,000.

Mr. NESBITT: Has the minister any statistics to show whether tuberculosis is increasing or decreasing among the Indian tribes of Canada?

Mr. ROCHE: I cannot say it is on the increase but, as the hon. member knows, it has been very prevalent. We have been trying to educate them to better sanitary conditions and have endeavoured, by a system of education, to get them to take better care of themselves. I cannot say that so far the diseases has diminished to any great extent, but it certainly has not increased.

Mr. NESBITT: The minister sends a doctor among the tribes, treating the Indians for various diseases, and would it not be well to have some one spend some time among them educating them to improve their living conditions and so check the spread of tuberculosis among them? I think that at the present rate it will ultimately destroy them in most places.

Mr. ROCHE: We are doing all we can to educate them along sanitary lines.

General.—Surveys, Ontario, Quebec and Maritime provinces, $3,000.

Mr. MACDONALD: What is the purpose of that general item for surveys?

Mr. ROCHE: It is generally to subdivide surveys into farm lots.

General.—Relief to destitute Indians in remote districts, $60,000.

Mr. OLIVER: What is the method of distribution of relief to destitute Indians in the country north of Edmonton?

Mr. ROCHE: The department sends in supplies to the various posts. In some instances the Hudson's Bay Company supplies goods on request of an Indian agent or a missionary, and in some cases the mounted police are utilized for the purpose of distribution.

Mr. OLIVER: There are rival trading posts and trading companies. Does the department recognize the existence of these rival traders, or does it deal with only one trading firm?

Mr. ROCHE: They divide up the order. Sometimes it goes to the Hudson's Bay Company and sometimes to Revillon Freres.

They do not go to one firm only for supplies, each firm gets its share.

Mr. OLIVER: Is it divided up in this way, that at one post the Hudson's Bay Company and at another some other trader?

Mr. ROCHE: Not always, no.

Mr. OLIVER: The facts are that, in the north country the Indians trade just as people in other parts of the country trade, some with one firm and some with another. If there are two rival traders at a certain point, some Indians will trade with one and some with another. It is not usual for the Indians to trade promiscuously. They have their ideas in that regard, and, generally, an Indian family will trade with one firm or with the other, and it is recognized that there is that division of the trade. If one of these trading firms is given a monopoly of the distribution of the Government supplies in that locality, they have a huge advantage over their rivals, and, while I suppose the Government is not bound to take cognizance of that condition of affairs, I take the liberty of pointing it out. Of course, I speak only of those who are unquestionably responsible, but if there is any desire to act fairly as between the rival traders, I think it would be fair to make some arrangement whereby each of those rival traders would be responsible for some part of the distribution; otherwise it would be hardly just. Trade rivalry is just as keen as in the far north country as it is in the east, perhaps a little keener. I do not know how far the Government is cognizant of that condition and recognizes it.

Mr. ROCHE: We recognize where the Indian trades, and allow him to purchase from the firm he has been accustomed to deal with.

Mr. MACDONALD: The Micmacs, in my county, live near the mouth of the harbour, and, although, at one time, they went from their summer homes to various camps in the winter, they have now abandoned their old habits in many ways, and live in one settlement contiguous to the mouth of the harbour. There is a large tract of land reserved there. I should like the minister to state whether this land is held in the same manner as the western lands which belong to the Indians, or whether it is Dominion Government property, on which the Indians are living, and whether the Government are able to deal with it the same as with other property.

Mr. ROCHE: Those reserves are held in the same manner as reserves are held in other parts of the Dominion, namely, in trust, and before we can sell the lands, we have to obtain a surrender.

Mr. MACDONALD: We have not a regular band and chief—just an isolated group of Indians who happen to be living at this particular point. The Government has purchased land in the vicinity of the coal piers where the Indians reside, and the Indians have completely deserted all their old habits and have been engaged largely as freight handlers. Where the Government purchase lands which the Indians are permitted to use, is the purchase made out of a trust fund belonging to the band, or how does the Government make the purchase? Some reservations in the West have been set aside for the benefit of the Indians, but I do not think that is the case in this particular instance.

Mr. ROCHE: Some reserves in Nova Scotia have been purchased by Parliamentary appropriation.

Mr. MACDONALD: Will the minister take a note of this particular case, and I will take occasion to communicate with my correspondent later on, with regard to the changed conditions.

Mr. OLIVER: What is the rule of the minister's department in regard to interference by agents in politics, or is there any rule?

Mr. ROCHE: There is no different rule in the Indian Department from any other department. The hon. gentleman is aware of the rule laid down by Parliament that officials of the Government, whether they are Indian agents or others, in the employ or on the pay list, are not to engage actively in politics. No different rule is applied to Indian agents than to other officials. Of course, there may be some agents who regard their agency work as a side line, drawing very little salary from the Government, and I presume they consider themselves free citizens, but our agents who devote their whole time to the work of the agency are expected simply to perform their duties as agents.

Mr. OLIVER: I am somewhat surprised to hear the minister say that there is a rule that there shall be no interference, and that the rule which applies in other departments, applies to this department, because, in the elections held recently in Alberta, one of the homestead inspectors, Ambrose Grey, was a candidate, and ranch inspector George Cloakley, was candidate in another constituency. It is true that Mr. Grey had resigned a few days before the election. Mr. Cloakey resigned, but I am not sure whether it was before nomination. They held their positions so close to nomination day that they certainly must have been using their positions for the purpose of advantaging themselves in the political contest which took place on the 7th June. It is true they were both defeated by rather large majorities, but certainly it was a very plain instance of officials of the Department of the Interior using their position, while under salary, to advantage themselves, at any rate, they hoped to advantage themselves politically, and, if I am not too far out of order, I may say that another appointee of the Government, Dan Minchen, timber inspector in the Grande Prairie country, is now official candidate of the Conservative party in the constituency of Peace River at the deferred election to be held shortly. Here are three instances in which officers of the Land Department have certainly been taking a very active part in provincial politics. Evidently the rule that my hon. friend says applies to all the departments does not apply to the Indian Department as, apparently, it does to the Department of the Interior.

Mr. ROCHE: There has been no rule in the past that would prevent a Government official from accepting nomination at the hands of a political party, as long as he resigned his Government position. If it was wrong for these gentlemen to have accepted nominations, it is to be noted that they resigned their positions in all cases. To my knowledge, no person occupied a Government position and was at the same time a candidate for election. But, if that is wrong, it is a practice that has been in existence for many years. While the member for Edmonton was Minister of the Interior, two homestead inspectors were candidates in elections in my former constituency, one of whom ran against myself and the other against Mr. Glen Campbell. One of these gentlemen occupied his position right up to the time of nomination, but I did not hear any adverse criticism from any hon. gentlemen opposite. If the gentlemen to whom reference has been made are doing wrong, certainly the same thing was done under the administration of the late Government, and without any protest from hon. gentlemen opposite.

[Mr. Oliver.]

Mr. OLIVER: It may be just as well to say that one of the gentlemen to whom I refer, who had been a homestead inspector, resigned to become a candidate in the provincial election, was defeated, and was promptly reappointed by my hon. friend as soon as the election was over. After having used his position during the intervening period of over four years for the purpose of political canvassing, he again becomes a candidate and is again defeated—and I suppose, will again be reappointed. I submit that such a case is simply a scandal. If my hon. friend thinks that what took place in former years will justify what is taking place now. I can only say that I do not think the public will accept it as justification. Certainly I do not intend to abate my criticism of an action that is absolutely unjustifiable, simply because of previous acts on the part of anybody else. Two wrongs do not make a right. I do not admit it, as a matter of fact, but admitting for the sake of argument that wrong was committed on a previous occasion, I still say that that does not cure the evil, which is that public money is being used for the purpose of maintaining in the field a band of active political agents and canvassers, who, after having suffered defeat at the polls, may be reappointed to their positions, as they, no doubt, expect to be reappointed.

Mr. KNOWLES: I should think that there is a distinction between the case mentioned by the minister and the case referred to by the member for Edmonton. In this case evidently the political aspirant in Alberta was acting in conjunction with the minister. The minister was probably aware of the purpose of the man's resignation, but he does not say that he will not continue to play the game by reappointing that man. Unless the minister assures us that he is not going to reappoint him he will have to stand convicted of acting in harmony with this manipulator and of being a confederate —I say it not offensively—with him in what we consider to be very improper procedure. The case in question, therefore, is very different from the case the minister has mentioned.

Mr. ROCHE: Can you answer for the case that I quoted.

Mr. KNOWLES: I would have to be convinced that in the other case the then Minister of the Interior had knowledge as to the reason for the resignation before I would consider the cases analogous. Anyway, if any minister has an understanding with an employee that the employee may resign the day before nomination, and that if at the election seven days afterwards he is defeated, the minister will re-appoint him, that minister is not using good judgment and should be criticised. If the minister says that he disapproves of that procedure, then we shall know where he stands in the matter. It is of no use to say that such and such a thing was done previously. If I understand the minister aright, his statement is that he has full knowledge of all the circumstances connected with these cases which the member for Edmonton—to our surprise, but not to the surprise of the minister—has brought to the attention of the committee. The minister is well informed in the matter, explains the circumstances and attempts to justify them, and, so far as we know, proposes to re-appoint these men. I think that the minister should be in a position to tell us that he had not knowledge that the men were resigning for the purpose in question, that he was not co-operating with them, and that he will not under any circumstances re-appoint them to their positions.

Mr. ROCHE: The hon. gentleman has recently taken a very virtuous turn. I did not know anything about these gentlemen having accepted nominations until their resignations came in, except in one instance. When in that case it was brought to my attention that one of my homestead inspectors had accepted a nomination and had not sent in his resignation. I wired him to send it in. I had no knowledge whatever of these candidates being in the field until their resignations came to the department. As to whether these gentlemen intend to apply for reappointment, I know nothing whatever. They may not have any such intention, but when the application comes in, that will be the time for me to say what I shall do. But it is strange that in a parallel case which occurred under the Administration of hon. gentlemen opposite, where a homestead inspector who remained in the field canvassing up to the date of nomination, resigned his position, suffered defeat and was promptly reappointed to his position, no fault was found by hon. gentlemen on the other side. I am not saying that it was so very wrong. At any rate, the hon. gentleman has not pointed out any gross abuse that has arisen out of the candidature of any of these men who resigned their positions, who have been defeated, and concerning whose future intentions I know nothing whatever.

Mr. KNOWLES: The minister says that I have suddenly become virtuous; he is quite unwarranted in making that assertion. The minister has given us information which he withheld in the first instance, and for which I now give him credit. He did not tell us that he disapproved of a homestead inspector being a candidate and at the same time retaining his position. The member for Edmonton raised that question, but the minister did not say what he was afterwards good enough to tell me—that as soon as he learned that one of the men had been nominated by a political party and had not resigned, he wired him for his resignation. It was in the absence of that information that I made the remark that I did. I have no apology to make for doing so, but in fairness to the minister I say frankly that that eliminates the first part of my criticism. The minister cannot be said to be co-operating with these men at any stage of the game if he had no knowledge as to the purpose of their resignations. But I do say that the minister should assure us that he will not co-operate in the matter by reappointing these men. It is a brazen thing that a man should become a political candidate, remain in the public employ as long as he possibly can, and then be reappointed when he is defeated. I say that this should not happen, I care not what any other minister ever did. Other ministers stand on their own reputations and their own records. To reappoint men under such circumstances as these would certainly be against public policy. But the Lands Department is administered so viciously and violently along partisan lines that it is scarcely worth our while going into the many things that we might have occasion to refer to.

In the by-election that occurred in Moosejaw county when the Hon. J. A. Sheppard was appealing to that riding after he had resigned his seat because his name was connected with some of the disclosures in the Saskatchewan commission, that district was alive with his employees; in fact, in some of the small villages you could not get a bed at night, because of the number of men pretending to be collecting for seed grain and relief in those places, but really collecting votes. If you put a question on the Order Paper, you do not get an answer and you become discouraged. I should like to have the diaries of those seed grain and relief collectors who were in that county during that election. I could take the minister to a small place called Spring Valley and other stations on the Canadian Northern railway between Avonlea and Gravelbourg where there were four or five of his collectors frightening the people out of their lives by stating that if they voted against the Conservative candidate everything would be taken away from them and their liens collected, and promising them everything in their favour if they would vote for the Conservative candidate. If their diaries contain a true account of their doings, the minister will find that my statements are correct. Do those collectors keep diaries of what they do?

Mr. ROCHE: The hon. gentleman is speaking of men working in connection with the seed grain accounts?

Mr. KNOWLES: And relief.

Mr. ROCHE: When did this by-election take place?

Mr. KNOWLES: Last fall.

Mr. ROCHE: Just at the time the collectors were out on the road?

Mr. KNOWLES: Yes.

Mr. ROCHE: And because a collector showed his nose in a constituency where there was a by-election, the hon. gentleman jumps on the department for allowing a homestead inspector to go into that county during a by-election to collect seed grain accounts.

Mr. KNOWLES: What a statesmanlike answer to what I have said.

Mr. ROCHE: The system that we had adopted a year ago last winter by means of which we were to collect through the elevator companies was not a success, and therefore last summer we opened an office in Moosejaw and established a chief inspector of land agencies there who engaged a staff, largely utilizing the existing staff of homestead inspectors, in order to keep down expense. These men were alloted certain districts, and before there was any thought of a by-election in Moosejaw, they were instructed to collect seed grain personally from the farmers who had got seed grain relief and had failed to pay within the time promised, and no doubt these men were doing certain collections in Moosejaw county, because there was a very large amount put out in Moosejaw during 1915. I am not in a position to say whether those men kept diaries that they sent into the department as to what they did from day to day; in fact I would not be surprised if they did not keep diaries, although in their ordinary work as homestead inspectors they do keep diaries. I will make inquiries in regard to that.

Mr. KNOWLES: The minister has surely misunderstood what I said. I told him what I thought about the men who had camped in Moosejaw county in order to intimidate the farmers, and the minister says that the Government has lent so much money there and tries to put me in the position of saying that the money should not be collected. I did not say that at all. The money is lent and is repayable and will be repaid. I did not object to any one representing the Government putting his nose into the Moosejaw district; I objected to these men interfering in the by-election. I was speaking about the introduction of petty politics under the guise of those men doing their work in their capacity of collectors. I am not criticising the system of collection at present; I may have something to say about that at the proper time. It is necessary to collect that money, and the minister is making a defence out of the fact that the money should be collected. My point was that the men who should have been busy collecting that money in the proper way were all centralized at one pivotal point, namely, the Moosejaw county seat, whence they could intimidate the farmers of the district into voting for the Conservative candidate.

Mr. DOHERTY: We will take up the Post Office Estimates.

Mr. MACDONALD: As the Post Office Estimates have not been brought up before, the minister cannot take them up on a Thursday. Where is the regular Postmaster General? I understand he is in Ottawa, and if so, why should he not be here?

Mr. DOHERTY: The Postmaster General is at present on active military service. I am the acting Postmaster General, and I do not know that the hon. member is in order to question my right to introduce these Estimates.

Mr. MACDONALD: It is not in order to take up any Estimates on Thursdays or Fridays unless they have been begun on a Monday, Tuesday or Wednesday.

Mr. DOHERTY: The Estimates of the Post Office Department have been taken up and, as regards the Inside Service, have been passed, so that I am quite within the rule. I am only proceeding to continue to deal with Estimates already begun.

Mr. GRAHAM: It was distinctly understood that, when the Estimates were allowed to be taken up, it was not to be held that they had been taken up under the rule. Before the long adjournment we allowed certain Estimates to go through on the understanding that no minister would claim that his Estimates had been taken up under the rule.

Mr. DOHERTY: My information from the deputy minister is not that merely one-fourth of the Estimates which were passed, as I understand it, under the arrangement, have been passed, but that the entirety of the Estimates for the Inside Service of the Department have already been passed. If what the hon. member says is correct, I, of course, do not want to break any understanding that has been arrived at, but my information is that with the exception of this one Estimate, the Post Office Estimates have all been passed.

Mr. MACDONALD: If the minister will look at Hansard of February 1 at page 353, he will find that the statement of my hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) is verified. The report reads:

Supply—Interim Vote.

The House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Rainville in the chair.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier: We will not go into any particular estimates, but we will give you what you want; we will give you a quarter of the total amount in these estimates.

Sir George Foster: They are just the same as the usual estimates.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier: Yes.

Sir George Foster: We have usually put through the vote for civil government.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier: I have no objection to your putting through the estimates that you want to put through, but you know there is a rule that on Thursday and Friday the Speaker leaves the chair without any motion, and the House can only take up such Supply as is to be taken into consideration. If we were to pass all the estimates to-day, when we begin after the adjournment we could not take up any of the estimates upon any day, and therefore we cannot consent to that. But if it is understood that the rule will not apply, then we will pass the estimates.

Sir George Foster: I think that can easily be understood on both sides of the House.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier: All right; go on.

Mr. DOHERTY: If that is all that was done, I do not claim that these Estimates were begun, but my information—and I have sent to make quite sure—is that all the Post Office Estimates for the Inside Service have already been passed, and that there remains but the Outside Service. If that be correct, it means that these Estimates have been proceeded with otherwise than under that arrangement. Of course, if any information is shown to be mistaken, I do not want to insist upon going on with these Estimates.

Mr. GRAHAM: If no Post Office Estimates have been put through since the two months' adjournment the minister would not be in order in going on with these Estimates, and my recollection is that no Post Office Estimates have been put through since the adjournment. Certain Estimates were put through before the adjournment to enable the Prime Minister to go to England, on the distinct understanding that no advantage would be taken of that technical violation of the rule.

Mr. DOHERTY: All I can say is that the officer tells me he understands that the whole of the Inside Service Estimates were put through one evening by the Minister of Finance. I cannot undertake myself to say positively whether that was so or not, and if objection is taken I suppose I shall have to yield to it.

Mr. GRAHAM: The members of the House have certain rights in regard to moving resolutions on going into Committee of Supply, and we shall be deprived of one opportunity of moving a resolution on the motion to go into Supply if the minister goes on with these Estimates to-night. The whole object of the new rule was to give members an opportunity to move a resolution on the motion for Supply. My recollection is that the Post Office Estimates have not been before the committee, technically speaking, and consequently they cannot be taken automatically on a Thursday or Friday.

Mr. DOHERTY: In the Votes and Proceedings of the 20th of April it appears that Post Office Estimates were passed as follows: Salaries $842,820, Contingencies $125,000. That seems to confirm what the officer told me. I am not invoking the fact that before the two months' adjournment one-quarter of the Estimates were passed.

10 p.m.

Mr. GRAHAM: The estimates the minister has quoted were for civil government.

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes, but not on the occasion to which my hon. friend has referred.

Mr. MACDONALD: The 20th of April was on a Friday.

Mr. DOHERTY: The question is, have these Estimates been taken up? I understand that if they were taken up we have a right to go on, and they must have been taken up because on that day the committee consented to go on with them.

Mr. MACDONALD: On the motion of Sir Thomas White for Committee of Supply on April 20, Sir Wilfrid Laurier said:

I do not object to the House going into Committee of Supply. I understand that we are to take up the Civil Government Estimates, but this will not interfere with rule 17 (c) which requires that the Estimates of any department shall be first taken up on a day other than Friday.

Mr. GRAHAM: That was the very day. It has been admitted, I think, by both sides of the House that civil government form one Estimate and the regular Estimates another, for the purpose of this rule in regard to going into Supply. The taking up of Civil Government Estimates does not mean, technically speaking, that we are going into Supply on the General Estimates. I think the Prime Minister and the leader of the Opposition have agreed as to that on several occasions.

Mr. DOHERTY: If there is any objection to our proceeding with these Estimates to-night I have no desire to go on with them. I have no desire to violate any understanding.

Mr. GRAHAM: It is a little more than an understanding. The leader of the Opposition called attention to the rule on that occasion.

Mr. DOHERTY: Well, then, I have no desire to break any rule. Unless, however, there is some objection other than the formal one I shall be glad to go on.

Mr. GRAHAM: The objection I have is this: Members of Parliament not on this side alone, but on the other side also, were protected by the new rule in their privilege of presenting a resolution on going into Supply. If we go on with these Estimates we shall be depriving ourselves of one opportunity of making such a resolution, and we have not many opportunities left.

Mr. DOHERTY: If the hon. member does not see his way to withdraw his objection I shall have to acquiesce.

Mr. MARCIL: In justice to the Postmaster General, would the minister inform the House as to his exact position at the present time? Those who read the Montreal papers have seen that the Postmaster General offered his resignation to the Prime Minister, but it was not accepted. Then the Hon. Mr. Blondin undertook, with General Lessard, to raise a regiment in Quebec, and met with substantial success all through the province. When conscription was adopted by the Cabinet we were told that Hon. Mr. Blondin would discontinue his recruiting efforts. The papers now announce that he is coming back to Ottawa to take over his former department and to be Acting Secretary of State. I think it is in the public interest, and only doing justice to the Postmaster General that the House should know exactly what is his position.

Mr. DOHERTY: I do not know that I should be in order in answering my hon. friend. If I am not entitled to proceed with my Estimates there is nothing before the committee. If it is not in order for me to answer questions, I do not see how it is in order for hon. gentlemen to ask me questions. However, I have no objection to stating that the Hon. Mr. Blondin is still on service, and the fact of my being here as Acting Postmaster General indicates that the newspaper report that he had returned to resume his duties as Postmaster General is incorrect.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Doherty, the House adjourned at 10.15 p.m.

[Mr. Doherty.]

Friday, June 15, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

PROCEEDINGS OF IMPERIAL WAR CONFERENCE, 1917.

PAPERS IN CONNECTION WITH THE CONFERENCE PRESENTED.

Right Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister): I beg to lay upon the table of the House a despatch from the Right Hon. the Secretary of State for the Colonies to His Excellency the Governor General, transmitting copies of a parliamentary paper containing extracts from the minutes of the proceedings of the Imperial War Conference, 1917, and papers laid before the conference. If my right hon. friend has no objection, I would move:

That rule 74 be suspended in order that the documents so laid upon the table of the House be printed forthwith for the information of the members.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I have no objection.

Motion agreed to.

IMPERIAL WAR CABINET.

STATEMENT BY BRITISH PRIME MINISTER.

Right Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN: With the consent of the House, it might be appropriate for me to read in this connection the announcement in the House of Commons of the United Kingdom by the Prime Minister with respect to the holding of an Imperial War Cabinet during the present year, and the proposal that it should be held annually in future. That announcement would not be readily available unless it is placed in Hansard, and as the announcement is of some importance, I think it might be well to record it in that way. The report reads:

Mr. McKenna: May I ask the Prime Minister whether he has any statement to make in regard to the Imperial War Cabinet?

The Prime Minister (Mr. Lloyd George): I think that I ought to report to the House a very important decision that was arrived at as a sequel to the recent meetings of the Imperial War Cabinet. It is desirable that Parliament should be officially and formally acquainted with an event that will constitute a memorable landmark in the Constitutional History of the British Empire. The House will remember that in December last His Majesty's Government invited the Prime Ministers or leading statesmen of the Overseas Dominions and of India to attend the sittings both of the Cabinet and of an Imperial War Conference to be held in this country. It is to the former body which assembled in March, and held fourteen sittings before separating, that I desire to refer. The British Cabinet became for the time being an Imperial War Cabinet. While it was in session, its overseas members had access to all the information which was at the disposal of His Majesty's Government, and occupied a status of absolute equality with that of the members of the British War Cabinet. It had prolonged discussions on all the most vital aspects of Imperial policy, and came to important decisions in regard to them—decisions which will enable us to prosecute the war with increased unity and vigour, and which will be of the greatest value when it comes to the negotiations of peace. I should like to add on behalf of the Government that the fresh minds and new points of view which our colleagues from over the seas have brought to bear upon the problems with which we have been so long engrossed, has been an immense help to us all. So far as we are concerned we can say with confidence that the experiment has been a complete success.

The conclusions of the Imperial War Cabinet are of necessity secret, but there is one aspect of them which we feel ought to be communicated to the House without delay. The Imperial War Cabinet was unanimous that the new procedure had been of such service, not only to all its members, but to the Empire, that it ought not to be allowed to fall into desuetude. Accordingly, at the last session, I proposed formally on behalf of the British Government that meetings of an Imperial Cabinet should be held annually or at any intermediate time when matters of urgent Imperial concern require to be settled, and that the Imperial Cabinet should consist of the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom and such of his colleagues as deal specially with Imperial affairs; of the Prime Minister of each of the Dominions or some specially accredited alternate possessed of equal authority; and of a representative of the Indian people to be appointed by the Government of India. This proposal met with the cordial approval of the overseas representatives and we hope that the holding of an annual Imperial Cabinet to discuss foreign affairs and other aspects of Imperial policy, will become an accepted convention of the British Constitution.

I ought to add that the institution in its present form is extremely elastic. It grew not by design, but out of the necessities of the war. The essence of it is that the responsible heads of the Governments of the Empire with those ministers who are specially entrusted with the conduct of Imperial policy should meet together at regular intervals to confer about foreign policy and matters connected therewith, and come to decisions in regard to them, which, subject to the control of their own Parliaments, they will then severally execute. By this means they will be able to obtain full information about all aspects of Imperial affairs and to determine by consultation together the policy of the Empire in its most vital aspects, without infringing in any degree the autonomy which its parts at present enjoy. To what constitutional developments this may lead we did not attempt to settle. The whole question of perfecting the mechanism for continuous consultation about Imperial and foreign affairs between the autonomous nations of an Imperial Commonwealth will be reserved for the consideration of that special conference which will be summoned as soon as possible after the war to readjust the constitutional relations of the Empire. We felt, however, that the experiment of constituting an Imperial Cabinet, in which India was represented, had been so fruitful in better understanding and in unity of purpose and action that it ought to be perpetuated and we believe that this proposal will commend itself to the judgment of all the nations of the Empire.

Mr. DEVLIN: Was there any discussion as to what would be the best form to be adopted in prosecuting the war for a concerted action on the part of the different Dominions beyond the seas?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The institution of the Imperial Cabinet itself was entered upon with the view that the consultation thus brought about would result in greater unity of purpose and in more effective cooperation.

Mr. DEVLIN: Was any decision reached by the members of that Committee or Cabinet as to what concerted action should be taken by the Dominions beyond the seas?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: No special consideration beyond what I have already explained on another occasion was given to any matter of that kind. The deliberations were of a general character with regard to the conduct of the war and the task that had to be accomplished, and the best means of fulfilling that task.

CANADIAN EXPEDITIONARY FORCE.

CANADIAN TROOPS IN FRANCE, ENGLAND AND CANADA.

Hon. A. E. KEMP (Minister of Militia): The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) asked the number of Canadian troops in England, the number in France and the number in Canada. The answer is as follows:

1. On the 4th June, 1917, there were 136,400 troops (all ranks) in France; there were also 747 in the Near East, and 130 at St. Lucia.

2. On the 4th June, 1917, there were 108,736 troops (all ranks) in England—not counting those in hospitals and convalescent homes, but counting those on passage from Canada to England.

Of the foregoing total, however, only 26,000 men were immediately available for reinforcing purposes.

3. On the 1st June, 1917, there were 17,353 C.E.F. troops (all ranks) in Canada.

I have a document illustrating the manner in which troops are classified in England, dated 14th May, 1917. I shall lay about sixty copies of it on the table of the House for the use of members.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Would it be possible to have this statement giving the clasification of Canadian troops inserted in Hansard as part of the hon. gentleman's remarks this afternoon? These sheets are destructible, while if this were placed on Hansard it would be available for all time.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: There is no objection to that. With the consent of the House, it will be embodied in Hansard.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I presume the Speaker will direct accordingly.

Mr. SPEAKER: If it would meet the wishes of the House, I think it would be preferable if the motion were made to have this statement printed as a separate return. I think the custom of placing documents on Hansard should be curtailed as much as possible. I do not press the point, but simply make the suggestion.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I am quite agreeable.

Mr. SPEAKER: With the consent of the House, Mr. Maclean of Halifax moves, seconded by Mr. Guthrie, that Rule 74 be suspended, and that this statement be printed forthwith.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY: In connection with a statement of the Prime Minister a few days ago in which he mentioned the number of Canadian casualties I think about 100,000, I do not recall that the right hon. gentleman stated how many of these may have returned to the trenches as efficient fighting men.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: No, I did not.

Mr. MURPHY: Can such a statement as that be prepared?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I could not say, but I shall ask the Minister of Militia to give his attention to it. Some of them undoubtedly have returned.

Mr. MURPHY: I submit that that information is necessary before we enter upon the discussion of the right hon. gentleman's Conscription Bill. I would ask the minister to bring down a statement showing the number of men struck off the strength as being medically unfit, either in Canada or in England, all of whom, I understand, may possibly have been rated as casualties at one time or another. That information I understand is necessary in order to apprehend the numbers of men in different classes.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not understand that persons struck off in that way are included in the casualties I mentioned.

Mr. MURPHY: Not as mentioned by the right hon. gentleman, but I understand that any man who, by reason of illness or some other cause, is considered medically unfit and as so is regarded as imparing the fighting strength of the force, is rated as a casualty, although he may return very soon to the ranks.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I will get the information, so far as possible.

DAYLIGHT SAVING BILL.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 82 to provide for the time in Canada being in advance of the solar mean time during the summer months.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Would my right hon. friend explain?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The explanation is simple: the purpose of the Bill is to have the clock advanced one hour and thus gain an hour of daylight during specified times in the season.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Within what months?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: By proclamation of the Governor in Council. We cannot predate the Bill in respect of time which is passed, but September is the time which is contemplated in the autumn.

Mr. MACDONALD: The subject is one of some interest ,and the minister's explanation has not been very full.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I shall give a full explanation of it on the motion for the next reading of the Bill.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Is the Bill to apply to the year 1917 or the year 1918?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The Bill is for 1917.

SCIENTIFIC AND INDUSTRIAL RESEARCH COUNCIL.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 83, relating to the Honorary Advisory Council for Scientific and Industrial Research.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Will the minister kindly explain?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: This Bill provides in statutory form for the constitution and powers and duties of the Advisory Council, which now rests upon Order in Council. It follows entirely the Order in Council which has already been brought down.

WESTERN COAL MINERS STRIKE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. W. E. KNOWLES (Moosejaw): What can the Minister of Labour tell us with regard to the progress being made in settling the western coal miners' strike? I observe an item in the press this morning to the effect that the hon. member for Kootenay (Mr. Green) will return unsuccessful. What has the minister to report about the mission of that hon. member?

Mr. CROTHERS: I received a message from Calgary this morning stimulating the hope that an agreement may be very soon concluded.

IMMIGRATION OFFICERS AT WINDSOR.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. HUGH GUTHRIE (South Wellington): Has the Minister of the Interior heard of any difficulty at the frontier at Windsor, Ontario, in regard to immigration? Information comes to me that the mayor of Windsor has lodged a complaint in regard to the action of J. G. Gardner, special immigration officer, who is charged with using violent and abusive language, and with doing real injury to Canada by his harsh administration of the law, which has the effect of driving American residents at Windsor back to Detroit, and is calculated to injure the Canadian summer resorts in that locality. On account of the action of Mr. Gardner, conditions are not very pleasant at Windsor.

Hon. W. J. ROCHE: A telegram has been received from Dr. Walker, president of the Chamber of Commerce at Windsor, not complaining of Mr. Gardner especially, but of the too drastic action of some outside officials who were sent to Windsor. Owing to the rush backward and forward between Windsor and Detroit, we have had to send some additional officers to control the exit from Canada, and we employed a few returned soldiers, and complaint has been made in regard to the conduct of these soldiers. We have instructed our inspector to proceed to Windsor immediately to investigate.

THE MILITARY SERVICE ACT, 1917.

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The hon. leader of the Opposition has requested that we should not move the second reading of the Military Service Bill this week, and I assented to the request. It has been suggested that we should let the second reading stand till Tuesday next, but, with every desire to meet the hon. gentleman's convenience as far as possible, I think it would be better to proceed with the Bill on Monday, if possible. I purpose, therefore, to take it up as the first order of business on Monday.

HON. ROBERT ROGERS.

THE SITTINGS OF THE ROYAL COMMISSION.

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I inquired yesterday with regard to the proceedings of the McLeod-Tellier Commission. I read a statement in the press that the commission was sitting in Montreal. Is that correct?

Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice): Yes, I believe the commission has commenced its work in Montreal.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Are the sittings public or private?

Mr. DOHERTY: The right hon. gentleman will, perhaps, recollect that, under the commission, the first duty imposed on the commissioners was to examine the reports and the evidence, with a view to determining whether there was evidence to justify the observations in the report with regard to the Hon. Mr. Rogers. That operation, of course, involves an examination of the reports and a study of the record, and I understand the commissioners are occupied in that work at the present time. In the nature of things, that work could not be done in public.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Is it the intention that the further sittings of the commission shall be conducted in public or in private, and will counsel be allowed to appear before the commission?

Mr. DOHERTY: I would assume that if, upon the question which comes first in order, as to whether there is evidence to justify the report, the commissioners should be of opinion that the assistance of counsel will be useful, they might, either on their own motion, or on the application of anybody who desires to be represented, permit the appearance of counsel. I am not aware that they have yet come to deal with that question. If I were called upon to express my opinion, I should think it would be a proper thing that a hearing of that kind should be held in public. If the commission should find it necessary to proceed with the additional inquiry which they are empowered to make, in the event of their reaching the conclusion that there is evidence to support the report—with regard to which they might think it necessary to hear further evidence for the purpose of determining its truth or otherwise—I should think, though I am not speaking on their behalf, or giving their view, because I have had no communication with them, that it would be a proper thing that such an inquiry should be held in public.

STEAMSHIP SERVICE BETWEEN RIVIERE-DU-LOUP AND THE NORTH SHORE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. JOS. GIRARD (Chicoutimi-Saguenay) (translation): Mr. Speaker, before taking up the Orders of the Day, I desire to give a few personal explanations on some remarks that were made in this House on the 13th of June, and in which my name was mentioned, in connection with an item of $6,000 for a steamboat service between Rivière-du-Loup, Tadoussac, etc. In the course of his remarks on that occasion, the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Gauvreau) used the following words:

> But, unfortunately, politics carried weight even in so serious a matter as this. In 1912, Mr. Bérubé was elected to the Local Legislature for Temiscouata and he happens to be a Conservative. Being unfriendly to the management of the company, he started at once to oppose it. Then, there was the hon. member for Chicoutimi and Saguenay (Mr. Girard), a Conservative member on the North Shore. With these two warring against it, it is no wonder that the poor company was killed. The contract with that company was cancelled, and a contract was made with the Quebec and Levis Ferry Boat Company.

I wish to state to the House that my hon. friend's reference to me is utterly groundless and contrary to the facts.

The hon. member for Temiscouata is aware that at the request of the Trans-St. Lawrence Company I went to the cost of a trip to Fraserville in order to meet the officers of the company at the house of Dr. Perrot himself, who was, I surmise, president of the company, with a view to discussing the means of forestalling what did happen later on, the condemning of the boat by the Government officials. The meeting prepared a statement which I forwarded myself to the minister strongly urging its favourable consideration, I really did all I could to get the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) to comply with their request, but he could not see his way to do it because it would entail an expenditure much greater than the appropriation. Some time later the Government officers pronounced the boat unfit for service naturally without my being advised or having any control over the matter. The company refused to put on another boat, and the Minister of Trade found that he could make arrangements with the company previously referred to, The Quebec and Levis Ferry Boat Company, who took over the contract which the Trans-St. Lawrence Company could not carry out. An accident happened, true, but the new company put another boat on the line until the expiry of the contract. I think it only fair to state that the accident referred to could have happened to the Mahone, which had less power.

The member for Temiscouata further stated that the second boat was wrecked in St. Catherine's bay, I fail to see where he got that information, as no such thing ever took place.

Later on, the Government called for tenders for that service; tenders were put in but all for a larger amount than the appropriation.

Mr. SPEAKER: I regret to have to interrupt the hon. member, but in making a personal explanation he should adhere as closely as possible to the statement complained of.

Mr. GIRARD: I am just about finishing, Mr. Speaker.

The minister always refused to consider any increase of the subsidy because at the present time the Government does not wish to incur new expenditure. Jointly with the Government I tried in every possible way to meet the needs of that district, of both the counties of Temiscouata and Saguenay, but up to date, we have been unable to find a man or a company who cared to take up the contract for the amount of the subsidy.

Such are the facts, and I wish to deny most emphatically the imputation against me of the hon. member for Temiscouata, namely that party politics are responsible for the failure of the company.

I, for one, and my constituency, are above such petty tactics; as to what is the rule with him, I have no idea and leave him to settle the matter with his own electors.

SUPPLY.

The House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

Legislation—House of Commons, salaries, etc., $449,412.50.

Mr. SPEAKER: There is a reduction of $4,387.50 under the heading of salaries. This is largely accounted for by the fact that there is no Clerk of Routine and Records, the work of that office being performed by the former assistant, who still holds the rank of Assistant Clerk of Routine and Records. So far as I can ascertain, the work of the office is being satisfactorily performed by the present staff, and unless some good reason arises for an additional appointment, this saving may be continued indefinitely. Further, according to the Civil Service regulation, the salary of the Assistant Clerk begins at a certain figure and increases by increments of $100 a year. His salary, therefore, is not as large as was the salary of the Assistant Clerk whom he succeeded. These two items account largely, if not entirely, for the reduction.

Mr. OLIVER: The reduction in this vote is a temptation to us to appoint a permanent Speaker. A reduction of this amount in the expenses of the House at the hands of our Speaker is, in my view, a strong recommendation for the continuance of that gentleman in office.

Mr. MARCIL: Could the Speaker give us an explanation of the circumstances under which the Chief French Translator, Mr. Laframboise, was superannuated?

Mr. SPEAKER: That was done before I took office, and I am not familiar with the circumstances. If the hon. member wishes me to do so, I shall make careful inquiry and advise him later.

Mr. MARCIL: I understand that Mr. Laframboise is still in splendid health, quite capable of doing his work, and probably as efficient as ever. Can the Speaker tell us who replaced him, and what changes were made in the office?

Mr. SPEAKER: Mr. Desaulniers, next in rank, was promoted to the position formerly occupied by Mr. Laframboise. I must make further inquiry before I can give my hon. friend a satisfactory answer.

Legislation—General, $346,600.

Mr. SPEAKER: There are two increases here, one of $6,000 and another of $2,000. They arise solely on account of the increased cost of paper and of printing, larger sums being required to do slightly less work and to furnish less supplies than in former years. Further, the stock was considerably depleted by the fire.

Mr. OLIVER: Would it not be possible for the Speaker to appeal to the Minister of Finance for a restriction on the high price of paper, so that this estimate might show the same good tendency towards reduction as the previous one?

Mr. SPEAKER: These items come from the office of the Secretary of State. My information is that the Speaker has never been responsible in any degree for their amount. To be perfectly candid, I never saw these items until they appeared in the Estimates.

Mr. OLIVER: It might be a good idea to suggest that this vote be placed under the control of the Speaker in the future.

Mr. SPEAKER: The work under this vote is done by the Printing Bureau, which, as the hon. member knows, has always been under the Secretary of State; and which accounts for this item appearing in the Estimates as coming from that branch of the Government. It is somewhat of an anomaly, I must admit, that work for which the Speaker is not responsible should appear in the Estimates in this way.

Mr. OLIVER: In this and the preceding item the Speaker has been able to effect a substantial reduction, but as soon as we pass to an item not under his control the cost increases. It almost looks as if the Department of Public Printing and Stationery were trying to put one over the House of Commons and the Speaker, and I would respectfully suggest that in the future this item be placed under the control of his Honour, so that he may deal with the department from an independent standpoint and secure the same measure of economy and efficiency he has brought about in other departments under his control. There is no reason why the House of Commons should allow the Department of Public Printing and Stationery to take advantage of circumstances.

Mr. SPEAKER: I shall send a marked copy of Hansard containing my hon. friend's remarks to the chairman of the special committee which has now under consideration means whereby a saving in the expenses of Parliament may be effected.

Mr. OLIVER: Hear, hear.

Post Office—Outside service—Salaries and allowances, $8,447,264.25.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The Prime Minister spoke to me yesterday with reference to this department, and I thought there would be no objection to going on with the Estimates, provided the right were reserved to us of making a motion on going into Supply on a Thursday or Friday, but as most hon. gentlemen on this side of the House who are particularly interested in these Estimates are absent, not knowing they were to come up, I wish the Government would go on with some other Estimates.

Mr. DOHERTY: The Minister of Inland Revenue is ready to go on.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I have no objection, providing that we can claim one Thursday or Friday on which to make a motion on going into Committee of Supply.

Civil Government, Department of Inland Revenue—Salaries, $180,412.50; contingencies, $22,000.

Mr. DEVLIN: Does this cover increases in wages for any of the employees of the department?

Hon. ALBERT SEVIGNY (Minister of Inland Revenue): Yes.

Mr. DEVLIN: What classes of employees will receive increases?

Mr. SEVIGNY: All classes receive the statutory increase.

Mr. MARCIL: Do the statutory increases account for the whole of the increase of $7,162.50 in the vote for salaries?

Mr. SEVIGNY: No, we have three or four new appointments.

Mr. MACDONALD: There are five, according to the Estimates.

[Mr. Oliver.]

Mr. SEVIGNY: Yes.

Mr. MACDONALD: Who are they?

Mr. SEVIGNY: Three stenographers, one analyst, and one clerk.

Mr. MACDONALD: Here we have an increase of over $7,200, in war time, when we ought to economize. I understand that the consumption of liquor, the inland revenue taxes upon which are collected by the department, has greatly decreased. What, then, justifies this increased expenditure?

Mr. SEVIGNY: In the Inland Revenue Department we economize as much as possible, but one result of the war is to increase our necessary expenditure. Laws have been passed by Parliament for the collection of special revenue, and to administer these laws we must have more employees

Mr. MACDONALD: What laws?

Mr. SEVIGNY: I refer especially to the War Revenues Act of 1914; and it is for the administration of that law that more employees are required.

Mr. MACDONALD: In what way?

Mr. SEVIGNY: Three stenographers, one analyst, and one clerk.

Mr. MACDONALD: What has the analyst to do with the War Revenues Act?

Mr. SEVIGNY: The analyst, I understand, has nothing to do with the War Revenues Act.

Mr. MARCIL: Whom does the analyst replace?

Mr. SEVIGNY: Mr. Kitto, who has been in the department for the last four years, and who is to be promoted.

Mr. MARCIL: The work of the department must have been considerably curtailed by reason of the wave of prohibition which has passed over the country and the laws to restrict the liquor traffic that have been passed in seven out of the nine provinces. Does not that make possible a decrease in the number of employees of the department?

Mr. SEVIGNY: I think the department will have to reduce its outside employees in many of the provinces.

Mr. MARCIL: And will there be no reduction in the Inside Service?

Mr. SEVIGNY: Yes, in some cases.

Mr. MARCIL: Could the minister state in what cases?

Mr. SEVIGNY: We have dispensed with the services of seven or eight men in Ontario alone, so far.

Mr. MARCIL: What about Quebec?

Mr. SEVIGNY: In Quebec, we still have the liquor traffic, and it is not possible to dispense with employees there.

Mr. MARCIL: As a matter of fact, have not the employees been increased last year and the year before.

Mr. SEVIGNY: Yes, in Montreal. The district of Montreal under my department is the largest in Canada. In that district we collect over $10,000,000 a year, which is more than we collect in all the other districts of Canada combined. We have been compelled to increase the number of our employees in the district of Montreal.

Mr. MARCIL: Could the minister give us the names of the new appointments? Or I would ask that later if he would prefer it.

Mr. SEVIGNY: I would prefer that. Meantime I will get the names from the department.

Mr. MACDONALD: I would suggest that the minister should stick to the item before us, which is the vote for the Inside Service for his department. In his Excise Branch, he has added two employees with an additional charge for salaries of $2,588 a year. In his Laboratory Branch, he has three new employees with an addition of $3,750. Then under the head of contingencies, he has an increase of $1,900 for printing and stationery, and $100 for clerical assistance. I would like the minister to take up each of these branches and explain who has been added to the staff, and why. He tells us generally that the increase is on account of the War Revenues Act. That, I suppose, means the collection of stamps. But that does not seem to me any particular reason for adding to the number of the Inside Service. Every minister except the hon. gentleman himself has decreased his Estimates, while he has made an increase of nearly $10,000.

Mr. SEVIGNY: As to the increase of $100 for clerical service, I am told by my deputy minister that that is only to make a round figure.

Mr. MACDONALD: Why did you not make it "three hundred," it would look just as pretty?

Mr. SEVIGNY: I admit that, but that would be more than sufficient for our requirements.

Mr. MACDONALD: What about the $6,000 for printing and stationery?

Mr. SEVIGNY: In some of the departments the expenditure has been reduced, but the Customs Department and my department, since the war broke out, have been called upon to supply a large amount of money to the Government, and our revenues have increased to a large extent. In my department, as in every other business, when affairs are prosperous and we are making money, we have to spend more money. We require more stationery on account of the new laws which have been passed and the new revenues which we have to collect.

Mr. MACDONALD: The Customs Department is not asking any more for printing than they did last year, and it is making more money than your department.

Mr. SEVIGNY: I suppose the Customs Department had everything it wanted before. The other item, $12,000, is the same as it was last year.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: I saw in a newspaper the other day that Mr. Raoul Renault of Quebec had been appointed an accountant in the Department of Inland Revenue. Is that true?

Mr. SEVIGNY: No, Mr. Raoul Renault was recommended for the position, and the Civil Service Commission refused to give him a certificate.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Did the minister recommend Mr. Renault himself?

Mr. SEVIGNY: I thought that Mr. Renault was perfectly qualified for the position, and I made the recommendation, but the Civil Service Commission refused to accept him.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: I suppose the recommendation made by the minister of Mr. Renault does not mean that he endorses Mr. Renault's ideas as expressed in his newspaper in Quebec with regard to recruiting and other matters relating to the war?

Mr. SEVIGNY: I do not know Mr. Renault's opinions on the war. I know that on many occasions he has condemned some papers of our province for the expressions of opinion on the war, and from what I can gather, Mr. Renault is willing to support every measure submitted by the Government to aid the Allies in this war.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Did the minister read Mr. Renault's paper, Le Franc Parleur, last year?

Mr. SEVIGNY: No.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: I know that Mr. Renault, especially with regard to the recruiting of the 171st Regiment, under the command of Sir William Price, had very violent articles against that officer, and strongly advised people not to enlist, at least in that regiment.

Mr. SEVIGNY: I am not surprised at that because Mr. Renault and Sir William Price are not very good friends; in fact, they are the reverse; but if any attacks were made by Mr. Renault upon Sir William Price, I do not think the Minister of Inland Revenue is responsible for that. Sir William Price is a good friend of mine; he has my admiration, and when he was raising his regiment, I endeavoured to assist him. Now, my hon. friend can put any more question about Mr. Renault, but that gentleman is not appointed, and the Civil Service Commission having refused to give him a certificate, he will not be appointed.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Blain): Shall the item be carried?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Blain): Section 5 of rule 13 states that:

> Speeches in Committee of the Whole must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration.

I do not consider that these statements come under that rule.

Mr. OLIVER: Are we not discussing an item relating to salaries of the department of which the minister is head?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Blain): Yes.

Mr. OLIVER: And is not this discussion relating to the merits of appointments to that department?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Blain): The item before the committee is "Department of Inland Revenue, salaries, $180,412.50, and contingencies, $22,000." Speeches in Committee of the Whole must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration. I do not think that a discussion on statements in regard to Mr. Renault's opinion on the war published in his newspaper would come within the rule. I understand the minister to say that the gentleman spoken of is not in the employ of the Government.

Mr. MACDONALD: The minister said that he recommended Mr. Renault.

Mr. OLIVER: Inasmuch as this is an item covering salaries in the Department of Inland Revenue, the appointment of men to serve in that department is necessarily pertinent to the discussion of the appropriation. In regard to the gentleman under discussion, I understand from the minister that he considered him a suitable person for employment in the department, and that, as a matter of fact, he did appoint him, but that his appointment was not confirmed by the Civil Service Commission. The point taken by my hon. friend from Kamouraska, as I understood it, and certainly the point that I would wish to take, was that a gentleman, who is the editor of a newspaper and who uses that paper during this time of war for discouraging efforts towards the winning of the war, is not a suitable person to be recommended by the minister for a salaried position under this Government, and we take exception to the minister's recommendation of that gentleman for that position.

Mr. SEVIGNY: Mr. Renault was not appointed by me; he was recommended by me. It is true that a certain paper, Le Franc Parleur, was published in the city of Quebec.

Mr. OLIVER: What is the translation of that name?

Mr. MARCIL: The Plain Speaker.

Mr. SEVIGNY: In my judgment, it was certainly regrettable to have in that paper, especially during this crisis, certain articles, and to put an end to that, I thought it would be a good thing to close the paper.

Mr. MACDONALD: To give him a good job.

Mr. SEVIGNY: Not necessarily a good job, but at the same time it would be in the public interest if papers like Le Franc Parleur or La Liberté at Montreal or some other papers were closed at the present time and if such papers——

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Are you going to give him a job too?

Mr. SEVIGNY: No, if I give him a job it will be in jail.

Mr. KNOWLES: Perhaps he is not yet thirty years of age, he may be a young man.

Mr. SEVIGNY: Perhaps. Mr. Renault was mentioned for a position in my department, not a new position, but that of accountant, which is vacant, and I can assure my hon. friend that I made that recommendation especially for one reason. I owed nothing to Mr. Renault, but I thought that it would be a good thing if such a paper could be put out of existence in this crisis.

Mr. MACDONALD: Hear, hear, instead of putting him in jail——

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Make Bourassa a deputy minister.

Mr. OLIVER: I should like to draw the minister's attention to the fact that there are other means of dealing with newspapers which make improper references at this particular time. I have in mind a newspaper at Sault Ste. Marie which was suppressed by the authorities because of the character of its utterances, although I have no knowledge of the nature of those utterances. It is certainly a somewhat remarkable fact that at Sault Ste. Marie a newspaper is suppressed because of its utterances, and in the favoured locality that my hon. friend has the honour to represent, in a general if not in a particular way, such utterances are suppressed by appointment to a Government position, or by recommendation for a Government position, at, I presume, a fair salary. That appears to me to be such a wide difference of treatment between parallel instances that it surely cannot be allowed to pass without unfavourable comment at the hands of this Parliament.

Mr. SEVIGNY: First, perhaps, it would be better to know what the utterances of the paper in Quebec were. Perhaps there was some animosity between Mr. Renault and Sir William Price, but, as I said at first, I think that Mr. Renault, since the beginning of this war, has always been well disposed to do everything possible to help the Allies, and I do not think that paper, La Franc Parleur, ever criticised our participation in this war. Perhaps some articles in that paper were not in the public interest, especially in the city of Quebec. I do not know if they were written by Mr. Renault or by some other man.

Mr. COPP: He would be responsible for them if they were in his paper.

Mr. KNOWLES: Along what lines did the articles proceed?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Blain): I am going to ask the committee to assist the Chair in keeping somewhere near the subject before the committee. I am sure hon. gentlemen will do that.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The committee, of course, desire to keep within the rules, and we will not refuse to abide by the ultimate decision of the Chair; but the ruling should at least be fair. We are simply discussing what is the policy of the department.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Blain): Does my hon. friend say that the ruling is not fair?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No, I do not say it is not fair. We are now discussing the policy of the department in respect to the appointment of officials. The minister has declared, in a fair manner, that it is his policy to bring into the service persons engaged in newspaper work who might possibly be charged with writing seditious articles. Apparently it is the minister's policy that it is in the interest of the country to withdraw these dangerous men from their profession and put them into the public service. If a man is engaged in a dangerous propaganda in these days, in newspaper work, it is a question of policy, a fair question of argument for the committee to decide whether the policy of the department is right or wrong, and whether such men should be introduced into the public service. The salaries of the department are being voted, and surely it is a fair thing for us on this side to say that the minister has enunciated a very improper policy. Some men would argue, and with fairness I think, that if a man is engaged in writing seditious articles in the press he should be prosecuted or should be put in jail. The minister says: I will take them into the service and let them become servants of the King. I submit that that is a fair mattter for discussion, and I say that the policy of the minister is wrong. I was going to ask the minister if he had any understanding with Mr. Renault that, if he came into the service of the Crown, he would abstain from writing questionable or seditious articles. Did the minister discuss it with the commission?

Mr. SEVIGNY: I wish to say this: I do not think it is fair for the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) to say that Mr. Renault, to the knowledge of the Minister of Inland Revenue, was writing seditious articles. That is not true. If seditious articles were written by Mr. Renault, it is not to my knowledge.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I will withdraw the word "seditious;" perhaps that is not correct. But the minister himself expressed the view that he was engaged in writing articles of some nature that were objectionable to him, and he deemed it advisable to withdraw him from that sphere of activity and put him into the public service. The articles were apparently with reference to recruiting. I withdraw the word "seditious," but that does not detract from the position I take.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Blain): I am going to ask the committee to decide whether or not they think this discussion is on the item before the Chair, and if there is any hon. gentleman who wants to appeal from the Chair's decision, he has a perfect right to do so. But I propose to stop this kind of discussion.

Mr. OLIVER: Then I would desire to make the appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Perhaps you will bear with me while I say in justice to Mr. Renault that while I believe he would be a qualified officer so far as aptitude and abilities are concerned, I really think that his opinions at the present time, and the opinions he has avowed for the last two years, are not of a nature to recommend him to my hon. friend the Minister of Inland Revenue since his conversion from Nationalist principles.

Mr. McKENZIE: It would be well for the committee to understand just what this ruling is. I do not understand the Chair to make any particular decision, but to leave it open to himself to decide when a discussion is germane to the point. I would think it a dangerous ruling to say that we are not permitted to discuss the policy of appointments.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Blain): I will leave it to the fair play of the members in the House, to say whether they propose to discuss under this item, newspaper articles on the war.

Mr. MACDONALD: We were not discussing newspaper articles.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Blain): Order. Or whether we shall discuss matters dealing with the war.

Mr. MACDONALD: Will the chairman state what his ruling is?

The CHAIRMAN: My ruling was given and it is not for the hon. gentleman from Pictou to say.

Mr. MACDONALD: Yes it is.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Blain): I am in the Chair. I call "Order," and the hon. gentleman can appeal to the Speaker. I have given my decision, and I will leave it to the House to say whether a discussion of this kind, dealing with newspaper articles or the expressions of the editor in regard to the war, comes within the item before the Chair. If my hon. friend wishes to appeal from my decision, he has the right.

Mr. OLIVER: I am not familiar with the rules of the House, but I desire to appeal, and take a vote of the committee. I was under the impression that an appeal must be taken without discussion. If there is opportunity for discussion, I wish to place before the committee, as shortly as possible, my view of the subject.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Blain): The appeal is to the Speaker, and not to the chairman.

Mr. SEVIGNY: I have no objection to give all explanations required from me as to this recommendation.

Mr. KNOWLES: But the chairman will not let you do so.

Mr. MARCIL: The minister admits he recommended this gentleman for appointment. I think, in doing so, he was helping a good cause, namely recruiting, by putting an end to a certain campaign in Quebec more or less injurious to recruiting.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Blain): I understood all that.

Mr. MARCIL: The question the committee is discussing is whether the minister was wise in recommending such a gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Blain): I have already decided that the statement of the minister, and the other statements in answer, are out of order, and I appeal to the good sense of the committee to say whether they think this kind of discussion should continue.

Mr. MACDONALD: We are appealing.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Blain): I am quite willing you should appeal.

Mr. KNOWLES: How is the newspaper article mixed up with it?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. KNOWLES: Would the Chairman explain in what way the newspaper becomes part of this point of order?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Blain): A statement was made by my hon. friend from Kamouraska (Mr. Lapointe) that a certain newspaper article expressed an opinion of a man who made application to the minister for a position, and the point in the hon. gentleman's statement was his expression in regard to the war, whether it was for the war or against the war, and I ruled that that kind of discussion was out of order.

Mr. MACDONALD: That is not the point.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Blain): I know that is not my hon. friend's idea, but I am giving my decision. If the hon. gentleman from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) wishes to appeal from my ruling, he can do so.

Mr. OLIVER: I desire to appeal from the ruling of the Chair, and I ask the privilege of stating my view of the subject

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Blain): The hon. gentleman can state it to the Speaker.

Mr. OLIVER: I move that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Blain): All those in favour of the motion say, Aye.

Mr. OLIVER: I am not familiar with the rules. I understood an appeal from the Chairman's ruling went automatically to the House.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Blain): There is a motion before the committee.

Mr. OLIVER: I move that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Blain): Is it the pleasure of hon. gentlemen that the committee rise and report to the Speaker?

Mr. MARCIL: According to the procedure, when an hon. member appeals from the Chairman's decision, it is the duty of the Chairman to report to the Speaker.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Blain): I am not very familiar with the rule myself. I will report to the Speaker.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I ask the Chairman to read the report he proposes to make to the Speaker because we may not be agreed on the statement.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Blain): My report to the Speaker reads as follows:

On the debate on the resolution No. 14, which reads as follows:

That a sum not exceeding $202,412.50 be granted to His Majesty for civil government.

Department of Inland Revenue—Salaries, $180,412.50; contingencies, $22,000.

Mr. Lapointe (Kamouraska) referred to certain articles published in Le Franc Parleur, a newspaper published in Quebec, and the Chairman ruled him out of order under Rule 13, paragraph 5. Mr. Oliver appeals to the House from this decision.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: It seems to me that that is hardly a sufficient reference. I was not in the House, but I understand that the minister was questioned as to his recommendation of the appointment of a certain Mr. Renault.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Blain): I do not wish to be discourteous to the right hon. leader of the Opposition, but I hardly have opportunity of discussing the matter with him. I made this ruling much against my will, but we must maintain order in the committee.

Mr. OLIVER: I am not able to agree that the statement presented by the Chairman is a correct one. The subject of discussion was the proposed appointment of a gentleman to earn part of the salary being voted, and his fitness for the position as shown by articles published in a newspaper which he edited.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Blain): On that point I did not rule my hon. friend out of order. When he reached the point where he stated that the article expressed an opinion on the war I then ruled him out of order. I did not rule the hon. member out of order on the question of his discussing the fitness of the man for the position; on the contrary, I decided that that was perfectly in order.

Mr. OLIVER: Our point was that this man, in his newspaper, used language that was not in the public interest, and that that was the reason given by the minister for recommending his appointment. We considered that that was an objection to his appointment, not a recommendation, and we were arguing accordingly.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Blain): I ruled that all out of order, the minister's statement as well as my hon. friend's.

Mr. SEVIGNY: I took the precaution to say that I did not know what articles were published by Mr. Renault in Le Franc Parleur. If reprehensible articles were written by Mr. Renault, I have no knowledge of them. I said only this: That there were some difficulties between Mr. Renault and Sir William Price. Sir William Price is not the people of Canada, nor is he to decide whether or not we are to participate in this war. If there is a difference between Sir William Price and Mr. Renault, that does not mean that Mr. Renault has written seditious articles against our participation in the war.

Mr. MACDONALD: You prevent him from writing any more by giving him this job.

Mr. OLIVER: If I may refresh the minister's memory, the discussion was in this form: Sir William Price was raising a regiment, and the criticism offered by this man in his paper against the raising of a regiment by Sir William Price was the cause of his being recommended for the position—on the understanding that he should not publish such articles. Surely my hon. friend does not wish the committee to understand that he used the public service as a means of preventing discussion among his friends. He surely gave us to understand that he recommended the appointment because it was in the public interest that such discussion should be suppressed.

Mr. SEVIGNY: Mr. Renault was recommended to me by the best business men of Quebec city, who told me that he was a very good accountant. Besides, I know personally that Mr. Renault has good qualifications as an accountant. An accountant is required in my department; the position is still vacant. I have recommended Mr. Renault, because he is perfectly qualified for the position. If some articles were written by Mr Renault in Le Franc Parleur, I do not know of them. I know that there is in Quebec a weekly newspaper called Le Franc Parleur. I do not know who is the owner, but I can say this: If such a paper—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Blain): Is it the pleasure of the committee that I report this ruling to the Speaker?

An hon. MEMBER: Not in that form.

Mr. Speaker having again taken the Chair, the Chairman reported as follows:

In the debate in committee on resolution No. 14, which reads as follows: "Resolved that a sum not exceeding $202,412.50 be granted to His Majesty for civil government, Department of Inland Revenue; salaries, $180,412.50; contingencies, $22,000;" Mr. Ernest Lapointe referred to certain articles published in Le Franc Parleur, a newspaper published in Quebec, and the Chairman ruled him out of order under Rule 13, paragraph 5. Mr. Oliver appeals to the House from this decision.

Mr. McKENZIE: What is the decision of the Chairman?

Mr. SPEAKER: I must accept the report which comes to me from the Chairman of the Committee.

[Mr. Sévigny.]

Mr. KNOWLES: I want to ask a question.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The rule is clear that the question must be determined by the House without discussion.

Mr. KNOWLES: I simply wanted to ask a question.

The House divided on the question: Shall the ruling of the Chairman be confirmed? And the same was confirmed on the following division:

The House again in Committee of Supply, Mr. Blain in the Chair.

Department of Inland Revenue—Salaries, $180,412.50.

Mr. MARCIL: As a matter of procedure I should like to know whether, if the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole is in the House, he should not occupy the Chair.

Mr. Rainville takes the Chair.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Has anybody been appointed as accountant yet?

Mr. SEVIGNY: Not yet.

Mr. MACDONALD: I understand that the chief qualification of Mr. Renault, beyond being an accountant, was that the minister desired to remove him from the political arena where he was writing letters for the purpose of discouraging enlistment in the regiment of Sir William Price. If that is the policy of the Government—to recommend for positions under the Government, people who write articles seeking to discourage voluntary recruiting and aiding Great Britain in the war—it is a policy that deserves the condemnation of the people of this country. If the ministers of the Crown are thus putting a premium on the conduct of men who are asking the people of the province of Quebec not to enlist, it readily explains the state of recruiting in that province. This method of dealing with people who make seditious speeches or write seditious articles in the province of Quebec will put this Government in a very peculiar position before the people of this country.

Mr. SEVIGNY: Mr. Renault was recommended to the position because he was an accountant of long experience. He is about 50 years old.

Mr. MACDONALD: I think most of his time he has been editing a newspaper.

Mr. SEVIGNY: No. During the last few months Mr. Renault has been writing certain articles in a weekly newspaper in Quebec.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Does my hon. friend say he has been editor of that paper for only the last two months?

Mr. SEVIGNY: The last few months.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: He has been publishing that newspaper for at least three years.

Mr. SEVIGNY: I do not know about that. I recommended him because in my judgment he was very well qualified for the position of accountant.

Mr. MACDONALD: Who recommended him to you?

Mr. SEVIGNY: Mr. J. Gignac, one of the largest lumbermen in the city of Quebec, J. B. Letellier and J. M. Fortier.

Mr. GERMAN: Is it true that this man has been writing articles in the press against recruiting in the province of Quebec?

Mr. SEVIGNY: No.

Mr. MACDONALD: You said so yourself just now.

Mr. SEVIGNY: I said just the contrary. I said that since the war broke out I understood that Mr. Renault had approved of Canada's participation in the war to the fullest possible extent.

Mr. MACDONALD: I cannot permit the minister to change his statement. He said that this man had written articles in this newspaper with the object of discouraging enlistment in the regiment of Sir William Price.

Mr. SEVIGNY: I did not say that. I said there was a quarrel between Sir William Price and Mr. Renault, that Mr. Renault had said some things about Sir William Price that perhaps were not over nice, and that Sir William Price may have reciprocated.

Mr. MACDONALD: The minister certainly stated that this man had written articles urging men not to enlist in Sir William Price's regiment.

Mr. SEVIGNY: I have never seen any of these letters in Le Franc Parleur.

Mr. MACDONALD: Now you are dodging.

Mr. SEVIGNY: I do not know that Mr. Renault ever advised anybody not to enlist in that regiment.

Mr. MACDONALD: You said so just now.

Mr. SEVIGNY: I did not. My hon. friend suggested that I recommended Mr. Renault because recruiting was not very active in the province of Quebec.

Mr. MACDONALD: Did not the minister say he thought it well to give Mr. Renault this position, to prevent him writing further articles in that newspaper?

Mr. SEVIGNY: If the appointment of Mr. Renault had that effect, I think it would be a good thing. If recruiting has not been satisfactory in the province of Quebec it may be because of certain appeals which have been made, not by Mr. Renault, but by other people—for instance, the Liberal candidate in Dorchester at the recent election.

Mr. GERMAN: Did Mr. Renault own or control the newspaper in which these appeals were made?

Mr. SEVIGNY: I do not know.

Mr. KNOWLES: The minister suggested that the discouraging recruiting figures in the province of Quebec are due to certain statements made by the Liberal candidate in Dorchester.

Mr. SEVIGNY: Yes, Mr. Cannon.

Mr. KNOWLES: Did not the minister himself state in that campaign that when he was only 30, he had made anti-British appeals which he afterwards regretted? He has nothing on Mr. Cannon on that score.

Mr. SEVIGNY: Since the war broke out I have done the best I could to secure Canada's participation in this war, and I intend to do so in the future. I hope my example will be followed by many hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. KNOWLES: I do not think the time will ever come when hon. gentlemen on this side of the House will sit at the feet of the minister, learning how to aid the Empire. Does not the minister think that the appeals he made five years ago against aiding Great Britain may still be having their effect, and possibly furnish an explanation for the failure of recruiting in Quebec?

Mr. SEVIGNY: In 1910 I was very strongly opposed to the naval policy of the Liberal party, but I have never at any time made any appeals against Great Britain.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: In justice to Mr. Cannon, who is a friend of mine, I must protest against the hon. member for Moosejaw comparing his utterances in the recent election with those of the Minister of Inland Revenue in 1911. During the Drummond-Arthabaska election the present Minister of Inland Revenue said, "The Bill refers to the navy of His Majesty. Who is His Majesty? We have no Majesty in Canada." Mr. Cannon never said anything like that in Dorchester or anywhere else. He was one of the men who fought against the Minister of Inland Revenue and against the Postmaster General and the Nationalists in 1911.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I am afraid that the ruling which has just been confirmed by so large a majority is in danger of being toppled over if this discussion continues. Do not hon. gentlemen think that we have had enough of this and that we had better go on with salaries?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Rainville): I would ask the committee to confine itself strictly to the item under discussion.

Mr. MARCIL: How far can we go in a discussion of a recommendation for an appointment of this kind? What are the rights of the committee?

[Mr. Knowles.]

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend (Mr. Marcil) has been Speaker of the House and he ought not to put queries such as that. He knows very well.

Mr. OLIVER: It is only fair to say that the ruling which has been given, and which has been supported by a majority of the House, disarranges all former ideas as to what the Rules of the House mean.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: If it is a matter of disarranging some of the talk that goes on upon the Estimates, do not we know in our hearts that it is a good disarrangement? Why not get on with the Estimates?

Mr. BLAIN: The remarks of the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver), I think, call for a statement to be made by somebody. The decision of the Chair, sustained by a vote of the House, was, briefly, on the question whether a reference to the opinion of an editor on the war published in a newspaper was relevant to a discussion of the estimates of the Department of Inland Revenue.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACDONALD: Nobody knows better than the gentleman (Mr. Blain), who has just spoken, that the way in which he put the question to the House was not the way in which the question was raised.

Mr. BLAIN: I put the question exactly as it was, and my hon. friend (Mr. Macdonald) knows it just as well as any other member of the House.

Mr. CHAIRMAN (Mr. Rainville): I wish the committee would keep to the Rules.

Mr. McKENZIE: Before the Chairman ruled I put the question straight, whether it was open to us to discuss the policy of appointments by the minister, and the answer was that that was open to us. I take this to include the character and record of the men selected for appointment. I understood the Acting Chairman to say that we were within our rights in calling attention to these matters. But he objected to a certain newspaper article being mentioned, and the House sustained him in his ruling—I will not say whether I think that was right or wrong. The principle was admitted by the Acting Chairman (Mr. Blain), and I presume will be admitted by you, Mr. Chairman, that we have the right to discuss the policy of any minister as to the kind of people that he will call to the Civil Service of this country. And that is what we are doing. I was startled by the announcement, made by the minister, that he thought it was necessary to put an end to the articles appearing in a newspaper in Quebec which were detrimental to the best interests of recruiting and to the winning of the war, and the way he took to stop them was to bring the author of them into the Civil Service and into the heart of his department. That was to me startling—that any man whose conduct was such as to make him a danger to the country, a firebrand, had to be given the King's money and the King's appointment in order to take him out of the way. That is what started the discussion here to-day. But we need hardly be surprised that the minister followed that course, for he is a product of that line of action himself; he owes his position in the Cabinet to just such reasoning. When the right hon. gentleman (Sir George Foster), who leads the House, gave out the slogan in 1910, "Anything to beat Laurier," he announced a policy the chickens of which are coming home to roost. It would be a strange thing indeed if we are not permitted in this House to call the attention of the minister to the fact that he is giving the reward of iniquity to the man he is calling to be an officer of Government. If this man, who was threatening sedition, did not come into the Service, it was not because the minister did not try to bring him in. He went as far as he could, but a commission, whose members, perhaps, knew more than the minister, turned him down. The fact that this man is not to-day receiving a reward for his flagitious conduct is not the fault of the minister; he was willing that such a man should come into his department, and possess the secrets of that department, to spread them abroad, perhaps, against the interests of recruiting and to neutralize the efforts put forth to win the war. I hope we shall not hear again of efforts of that kind by the Minister of Inland Revenue, or any other minister.

Mr. SEVIGNY: The hon. member (Mr. McKenzie) has referred to what took place in 1910 and 1911. In 1911, I was elected in the county of Dorchester. Two years after I came to this House I was asked by the Prime Minister to vote a contribution of $35,000,000 to help the British Navy and increase the strength of the British Empire. At that time the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Sevigny), the French-Canadian, the "bad Nationalist," as he had been called by certain members of this House, voted for this contribution of $35,000,000 to help the British Empire, but the records show that there were members of this House sitting on the other side who refused to vote for that contribution. I repeat what I said a few minutes ago, that since the war broke out I have done everything possible to help recruiting and to promote the participation of Canada in the war; and it is my intention to do the same in the future. If the hon. member for North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) turns his attention to current events in the province of Quebec, he will see that the press of his own party in that province is doing worse than was done in 1910 and 1911. The excuse that might be pleaded for the people of 1910 and 1911 was that we were not at war; nobody knew what was coming. Nobody knew what was coming, but at the present time every one knows what is going on and that we are in the greatest crisis of our history; and yet all the French press of the Liberal party in Quebec is repeating exactly—

Mr. KNOWLES: It is out of order to refer to the press.

Mr. SEVIGNY: —the same things which are published every day by Mr. Tancrede Marsil and Mr. Bourassa.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: The minister is certainly not representing the facts as they are when he dares to say in this House of Commons that the Liberal press of the province of Quebec is to-day using the same line of abuse that he used in 1910 and 1911.

Mr. SEVIGNY: The Liberal press is using it.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: I challenge my hon. friend to show any newspaper representing Liberal opinion in the province of Quebec which has ever published, either before the war started or during the war, such statements as I have mentioned a few minutes ago to have been uttered by the hon. gentleman and his friends in that province. The reverse is the case. The Liberal press, from the outbreak of hostilities, has always advocated the participation of Canada in the war. The doctrine that the Liberal press is preaching to-day in Quebec is the same doctrine as that on which we went to the people in 1911, and upon which we asked the people of Quebec to return to this Parliament members supporting the right hon. gentleman who, in that province as throughout the rest of Canada, advocated the participation of Canada in the wars of the Empire in time of danger, and the taking of the necessary steps for giving adequate defence to Canada at any time.

Mr. EDWARDS: What about the Liberal clubs?

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: The minister is speaking to-day of those who are using violent words in Quebec. Who are they? They are those who were going on the platforms with the minister in 1910 and 1911.

Mr. SEVIGNY: All Liberals.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend speaks of Mr. Tancrede Marsil. He was the Conservative Nationalist candidate in the county of Bagot in the election of 1911, and he said there what he is saying to-day in the city of Montreal. Who is using those violent words to-day of which my hon. friend is complaining? Mr. Lavergne.

Mr. SEVIGNY: A good Liberal.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Mr. Lavergne was my hon. friend's friend in 1910 and 1911.

Mr. SEVIGNY: He is your friend now.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: He was your leader. He is not my leader. I have a leader of whom I am proud; I supported him in 1911; I have followed him in opposition, and to-day I am proud to follow him in the stand he has taken since the beginning of the war. I did not want, Sir, to be responsible for the little storm that has occurred in the House to-day, I assure you, but unfortunately the very innocent remarks I made gave rise to this debate. I simply asked whether Mr. Renault had been appointed to the Department of Inland Revenue, because I saw that statement in the press the other day, and my hon. friend said that Mr. Renault had not been appointed; that he had been recommended by the Minister of Inland Revenue, but that the appointment was refused by the Civil Service Commission on account of Mr. Renault's age. I did not say anything against Mr. Renault's qualification, but I thought it rather strange that Mr. Renault, whose opinions, which are absolutely on the side of nationalism, and which have been of that nature since he started publishing his newspaper, are well known in Quebec, should have been selected by the minister for such an important position in his department. I did not say that Mr. Renault had been seditious; it is the minister who has insinuated and hinted that to this House by saying that Mr. Renault's paper has been publishing articles that were an obstacle to recruiting in Quebec, and that it was in order to stop that, that the minister recommended his appointment to a position in the department. I think the minister is responsible for what has happened in this committee this afternoon.

Mr. SEVIGNY: I understand why these attacks are made by the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. E. Lapointe). I stated a few minutes ago that the Liberal party in the province of Quebec are much worse than the Nationalists of 1910 and 1911 were; that in 1910 and 1911 no one knew what was coming, but that to-day every one knows that we are in a crisis of our history.

Mr. McKENZIE: Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. The attitude of the Liberal party in the province of Quebec has nothing to do with the item before the Chair.

Mr. SEVIGNY: That is true—

Mr. McKENZIE: I ask for a ruling on that point. We have already been requested to adhere to the item under discussion.

The CHAIRMAN: The point of order is well taken.

Mr. KNOWLES: May I ask the minister a question with regard to what he stated before he sat down? When he stated that the Liberal party in the province of Quebec—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. KNOWLES: —was more disloyal than the Nationalists in 1911, did he mean all the Liberal party or how much of it?

The CHAIRMAN: Order. That is absolutely out of order.

Mr. SEVIGNY: I am willing to answer the question.

Mr. KNOWLES: The whole Liberal party?

Mr. SEVIGNY: The Liberal party of the province of Quebec, and I can prove my statement in two minutes from the newspaper I have in my hand.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. This is out of order.

Mr. MACDONALD: Is the minister going to prove that some one else was more disloyal than he was in 1910?

Mr. KNOWLES: That is what he said.

Mr. MARCIL: I would like to know why Mr. Renault was recommended by the minister. I have here Le Franc Parleur, and I could read an extract from it to show that Mr. Renault did not oppose recruiting in Quebec at all. What Mr. Renault opposed in Quebec was the way in which the Militia Department treated the French Canadian regiments in the district of Quebec. He said that Sir William Price had been given preferential treatment, and that with all the support of the department he had been able, after two years' efforts, to recruit only 550 men in the whole district, and that the French Canadian regiments commanded by Col. Readman and Col. Piuze had not been given fair treatment and still had done better than Sir William Price had done. He stated that both these regiments had been disbanded, and that the soldiers who had enlisted in them had been drafted under false pretenses after a formal promise had been given that they would go to the front under French Canadian officers in French Canadian regiments, preserving their own identity. In this edition of his newspaper of the 9th of June, Mr. Renault objects to the recruiting methods of the Militia Department in the district of Quebec, and not to recruiting per se. In justice to this newspaper man—I belong to the craft—I thought I would make his statement plain. If the minister wishes to aid recruiting in Quebec, he should read what Mr. Renault says and apply his methods, so far as recruiting is concerned, to the Militia Department.

Mr. MACDONALD: If the Board of Civil Service Commissioners should report Mr. Renault as qualified for the position, will the minister still appoint him?

Mr. SEVIGNY: I do not see what is the purpose of that question. I have given my answer that Mr. Renault was not the accountant of my department, that he was not appointed, and the matter is ended there.

Mr. KYTE: Was the minister aware when he made the recommendation that according to the regulations of the Civil Service no person over thirty-five years of age could be admitted into the service of his department?

Mr. SEVIGNY: Yes, I was aware of that, but in certain cases, as my hon. friend probably knows, when it is a technical position, this rule does not apply.

Mr. KYTE: Does the minister think that the service of an accountant comes within the meaning of section 21 providing for the appointment of experts?

Mr. SEVIGNY: Yes, it is considered as such by the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. KYTE: Then why did not the Civil Service Commission accept the appointment?

Mr. SEVIGNY: If I remember aright, they declared that Mr. Renault had not had enough experience to take the position.

Mr. KYTE: Then he was not an expert in the opinion of the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. SEVIGNY: He was not well enough qualified for the position.

Mr. KYTE: Then the minister admits that he tried to impose upon the department an expert who was not an expert.

Mr. SEVIGNY: The minister is not an accountant himself; but Mr. Renault was recommended to the minister by the best business men of the city of Quebec who told the minister that Mr. Renault was a very, very good accountant. The Civil Service Commission have declared that Mr. Renault had not enough experience in departmental affairs.

Mr. MARCIL: What has become of the appointment, who got the office?

Mr. SEVIGNY: It is still vacant.

Mr. MARCIL: No appointment was made from Ottawa of Mr. Laverdure?

Mr. SEVIGNY: No.

Mr. KNOWLES: Even if the committee is not divided on this vote, I wish to place myself on record against passing this item. I do this for two reasons. In the first place, I am against voting money to the minister to be expended under a policy such as has been laid down. Humble member as a person may be, every one of us stands on an equal footing when he comes to register his vote, and I wish to be no party to voting money to be placed in the hands of this minister if he is going to alienate the people's money for reasons and on policies and principles such as he has laid down. He is the judge, and he is responsible. I will not say an unkind word about him, but I say that for my part I disapprove of money being voted under these circumstances. He told us clearly and plainly that the reason he recommended this gentleman was that he was writing certain articles which he thought were against our country's interest.

Mr. SEVIGNY: That is not fair.

Mr. KNOWLES: I heard the minister say—

Mr. SEVIGNY: That is not fair, and you know it.

Mr. KNOWLES: The minister can say it is not fair. I am saying what I understood him to say, and we will have to be judged by Hansard when it is issued. He certainly stated that he himself desired to appoint this gentleman that there might as a result be a cessation of certain articles of some kind, which articles he gave us to understand were objectionable to every one who wished the best interests of this country. I wish to place myself on record as disapproving of voting to a minister the people's money, to be used for such a purpose as that. If other people in this country are to be told that all they have to do in this country in order to get a fat Government job is to make a nuisance or a national peril of themselves, we will be a laughing stock in expending the people's money, and that is what we are as a Parliament and as a committee when we adopt the system by giving the minister the vote he asks. I am absolutely against giving the minister the money to be spent, when he declares that to be his policy. He has endeavoured to justify it by abuse of other people in the province of Quebec; far, far more than one-half the people in the province of Quebec have to-day had thrown at them from this Government the insult of being called disloyal in everything but in name. Absolutely, more than one-half of the people of Quebec. He says that the people of the province of Quebec who belong to the Liberal party were more disloyal than he himself was in 1911, and I say that is an insult to the great majority of his compatriots in the province of Quebec. I give that as my second reason for opposing this vote. I say that instead of being a reason to induce me to accept this vote it is a stronger reason for my not doing so. I wish to place myself on record as against voting any money to this hon. gentleman, not in a personal way to him, but I say that any minister of the Crown, speaking for himself and, for the time being, speaking for the Government, who says of his fellow British subjects in the province of Quebec that they are disloyal and that they desire to be opposed to Great Britain, our Mother Country, in this war —that he is a member of the Government whose influence makes towards disunity and discord and faction in the Dominion of Canada to-day, when above all else we need unity. And therefore I say that I not only oppose giving this vote to the minister but I am opposed to joining, or co-operating, or concurring in any vote to this minister, so long as he throws this insult out, because so long as he is minister administering a department he is a standing offender against the people of that province. It was a very unfortunate remark. I think that it was the most terrible remark I have heard a minister make about other citizens of Canada since I have been in the House, saying what he has said about the people of Canada in a day when we require harmony among ourselves, when we need all the unity we can have, because in unity there is strength. So, whether there is to be a division on this item or not, I place myself on Hansard as disassociating myself from this vote, disapproving of this vote, and of any vote wherein the hon. gentleman will have any part in the expenditure of the money.

Mr. SEVIGNY: I know my province better than the member who has just spoken.

Mr. KNOWLES: Surely you do.

Mr. SEVIGNY: I know my people, too, and I tell him that the great majority of my people are as loyal to the British Empire and as anxious to help the Allies in this war as he himself or anybody in his riding.

Mr. KNOWLES: You did not say that a minute ago.

Mr. SEVIGNY: That is what I say, and I repeat it. I say that the Liberal press in Quebec, and I say the Liberal organization of the province of Quebec are playing politics only, politics first—and the press will prove it. I take up this paper, Le Soleil, the strongest Liberal paper, the organ of the Liberal party in the province of Quebec. It is the organ of the Liberal party in the province of Quebec, as the Globe is the Liberal organ of the Liberal party in Ontario, or the Winnipeg Free Press the organ of the Liberal party in Manitoba.

Mr. MARCIL: The Globe does not always speak for the Liberal party, nor does the Winnipeg Free Press, nor does Le Soleil. I represent a riding in that district, and Le Soleil never spoke for me, and I challenge the hon. gentleman to find a word from me in my career that will support the contention he has laid before you.

Mr. SEVIGNY: Does the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) say that Le Soleil is not the organ of the Liberal party?

Mr. MARCIL: I am not responsible for what Le Soleil says. It does not represent my views in any respect.

Mr. SEVIGNY: Does—

Mr. MARCIL: What the minister said was that the Liberal party in Quebec was more disloyal than he had been. I do not know what Le Soleil says.

Mr. SEVIGNY: I hold in my hand the file of Le Soleil. At the top of the editorial page I find the words " Organ of the Liberal Party." And it is true. It is the organ of the Liberal party. What do you see in the Winnipeg Free Press, in the Toronto Globe? Those papers are recommending as strongly as possible to their party a support of conscription. Here is Le Soleil, of Quebec, which says last night:—

The French Canadian Conservatives only can save the country; their vote can kill conscription.

Here is an appeal in bold-faced letters made by Le Soleil of Quebec. And if you take Le Canada, another organ of the Liberal party in Quebec, you will see the same things repeated every day. And now take all of those meetings that we have in the province of Quebec—

Mr. KNOWLES: Before the minister puts that away—

Mr. SEVIGNY: I have the floor, and it is my intention to defend myself.

Mr. OLIVER: I ask for a decision on the ruling made by the House a short time ago.

Mr. SEVIGNY: I have been attacked, and I am simply defending myself. The great majority of the population of my province is as loyal as the majority of the people of any other province in this country, but the trouble comes from certain people whom we have in Quebec at the present time. The Liberal press, Le Canada of Montreal, Le Soleil of Quebec, Le Devoir and La Liberte of Montreal, have caused the trouble. Hon. gentlemen opposite will probably say they are my friends.

Mr. KNOWLES: Sure—carried.

Mr. SEVIGNY: You will see in Le Devoir, Bourassa's paper, very strong attacks against the Minister of Inland Revenue, and you will see words of praise for Sir Wilfrid Laurier. I am told—I do not know whether I am right or not—that these words of praise in Le Devoir have only appeared since Sunday last. There was a meeting recently in Montreal between Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Mr. Bourassa.

Mr. KNOWLES: Who told you?

Mr. MACDONALD: It is absolutely untrue.

Mr. SEVIGNY: That is what I am told. The hon. member from Pictou says it is not correct.

Mr. KYTE: Sir Wilfrid Laurier was not in Montreal last Sunday, he was in Ottawa.

Mr. SEVIGNY: I said they had an interview in Ottawa.

Some hon. MEMBERS: The hon. minister said Montreal.

Mr. SEVIGNY: I am told it was in Ottawa.

Mr. KNOWLES: Who told the hon. gentleman?

Mr. EDWARDS: The statement which the hon. gentleman from Moosejaw was so anxious to make, on which he dwelt so eloquently and forcibly, was that the hon. minister had committed the crime of saying that the Liberal party in Quebec was more disloyal than he was. In order to make any point of that statement, the hon. member from Moosejaw would have to accuse the hon. minister with being disloyal in 1911, because, if the hon. minister was not disloyal then there is nothing in the statement that the Liberal party was more disloyal than he. But he abandons all that argument, and goes into an harangue about the accusation against Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

Mr. KNOWLES: Oration, if you please.

Mr. EDWARDS: If the hon. gentleman from Moosejaw and the members on the other side of the House want to invite comparison of the records of the party on this side of the House and the party opposite, they will get that record straight from the shoulder, and we will begin dealing with the records by referring to the leader of the Opposition, Sir Wilfrid Laurier. When members refer to the operations of men like Bourassa and Lavergne and others in Quebec, who have been preaching treason, let them look back on the record of their own leader, and they will find the counterpart for these treasonable utterances in the words uttered time and again by Sir Wilfrid Laurier. It does not lie in the mouth of the hon. gentleman from Kamouraska (Mr. Lapointe) to read a lecture to any person in this House. The hon. gentleman took an active part in Dorchester, bringing forward a candidate who was preaching treason on the platform, backed up by him and his leader. If these gentlemen desire to go into the records of their party, they will get all the record they want and more.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: I should have been surprised if a debate took place in the House, in which the province of Quebec was in the limelight, without my hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) taking a part. He is always on hand when something is said about Quebec, especially if it is derogatory to that province.

Mr. EDWARDS: What did I say against Quebec?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Neither the hon. gentleman nor anybody else would ever frighten me, or the people of my province, either in this House or outside of it, and the sooner he takes that for granted the better. The hon. Minister of Inland Revenue quoted one Liberal newspaper (Le Soleil) as backing up what he said about the Liberal party in the province. He said, "Here is Le Soleil, the organ of the Liberal party, and here is what that paper says." Have hon. gentlemen found anything very extraordinary in the utterances of Le Soleil? He said the Manitoba Free Press was preaching for unity in the country, and Le Soleil and Le Canada were against conscription. Does my hon. friend take the position that any man in this country who is not in favour of conscription is not loyal? Does he say that the Liberals of Quebec are disloyal because they are opposed to conscription? I am opposed to conscription.

Mr. SEVIGNY: Order.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend before indicting the Liberal party of Quebec, and charging Sir Wilfrid and the province with disloyalty, should have something else on which to base his statements than newspaper articles stating that the people were opposed to conscription.

Mr. KNOWLES: Does the hon. minister say that, because a newspaper or individual opposes conscription therefore they are disloyal?

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Is the hon. Secretary of State, who is opposed to conscription and has resigned his portfolio, disloyal?

Mr. MARCIL: We might get back to business, and find out what the minister is going to do about this appointment. Who is filling the office in the meantime?

Mr. SEVIGNY: Mr. Lemay.

Mr. MARCIL: Is he recommended by the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. SEVIGNY: He was in the department. He is an accountant, and the intention of the Civil Service Commission is to recommend him within six months.

Mr. KYTE: How long has Mr. Lemay been assistant accountant?

Mr. SEVIGNY: He came into the department two years ago.

Mr. KYTE: Does the minister think it would be a good thing to adopt the principle of promotion in his department?

Mr. SEVIGNY: Yes, and that is what will be done in this case.

Mr. KNOWLES: The question has not yet been answered. Does the minister mean to say that opposition to conscription means disloyalty? That is a fair question.

The CHAIRMAN: That is absolutely irrelevant.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am bound to bow to your ruling, but I wish to state my position.

The CHAIRMAN: The Minister of Inland Revenue has been given a latitude to defend himself, because he felt he was accused, but all the discussion up to that point was absolutely out of order.

Mr. MACDONALD: He gave the reasons why he made this appointment.

Mr. BOIVIN: The Chairman has just stated that the Minister of Inland Revenue, having been attacked, was given a great deal of latitude by the Chair in order to defend himself, which I think is quite proper, under the rules of the House. But in defending himself, should he be permitted to attack the whole province and brand that province which he represents as disloyal?

Mr. SEVIGNY: I never did that.

Mr. BOIVIN: He said the Liberal press of Quebec were preaching disloyalty, because Le Soleil said the Liberal press was against conscription. He has been asked a fair question, whether a man opposed to conscription is necessarily disloyal, and that has been ruled out of order. The general discussion which took place this afternoon must have been in order, or you, Mr. Chairman, would not have permitted it. The question which has been put to the minister, therefore, must be in order. It is only fair to the province of Quebec that the minister should let us know whether or not he really thinks that that province is disloyal because it opposes conscription.

Mr. KNOWLES: Will the minister answer the question?

Mr. SEVIGNY: If the question were put in a fair way, I should be very glad to answer it.

Mr. KNOWLES: Will the minister suggest a fair way?

Mr. SEVIGNY: I have just said that the great majority of the people of my province are perfectly loyal.

Mr. KNOWLES: The minister said that the Liberal party was disloyal.

Mr. SEVIGNY: I said the Liberal press.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Because it is opposed to conscription.

Mr. SEVIGNY: I did not say because it is opposed to conscription. I say that the Liberal press is trying to make trouble in the province of Quebec. I have not all the newspapers with me, but here is one which was published last night—LeSoleil, of Quebec—which makes an appeal to the French Conservative members on this side of the House, saying they should kill conscription.

Mr. KNOWLES: Is that disloyal?

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. SEVIGNY: I never said that Quebec was disloyal.

Mr. BOIVIN: Is the statement in the press disloyal which the minister has just mentioned?

Mr. SEVIGNY: Yes, it is.

The CHAIRMAN: I wish members of the committee to take note that this whole discussion is out of order and against the rules.

Mr. KYTE: Will the minister explain why he did not recommend Mr. Lemay for promotion to the position of accountant?

Mr. SEVIGNY: When I came into the department I was told that the position was vacant. I did not know at the time that Mr. Lemay was mentioned for promotion.

Mr. KYTE: Who informed the minister that the position was vacant?

Mr. SEVIGNY: I do not remember.

Mr. KYTE: Was the position vacant when the minister came into the department?

Mr. SEVIGNY: Yes.

Mr. COPP: What caused the vacancy?

Mr. SEVIGNY: The death of Mr. Vallin.

Mr. KYTE: Did the minister ask his deputy, before he recommended Mr. Renault, what was the practice of the department with respect to promotions?

Mr. SEVIGNY: When I came to the department in March or April last I said to Mr. Vincent, the deputy minister, that I had recommended Mr. Renault for the position of accountant in my department. If I remember rightly, Mr. Vincent mentioned to me the name of Mr. Lemay.

Mr. KYTE: In what connection?

Mr. SEVIGNY: For the position in question; but before I spoke to Mr. Vincent I had already recommended Mr. Renault.

Mr. MARCIL: Does the minister take any stock in promotions in his department?

Mr. SEVIGNY: Yes.

Mr. MARCIL: Did he think of recommending any deserving official in his department instead of hunting up this poor, foresaken journalist in Quebec?

Mr. SEVIGNY: It was for—

Mr. MARCIL: Political reasons?

Mr. SEVIGNY: The vacancy was mentioned to me before I had a conversation on the subject with the deputy minister. As I have said, Mr. Renault was recommended to me by good business men in Quebec city. I told them that if Mr. Renault was qualified to fill the position I would recommend his appointment.

Mr. MARCIL: Surely the minister does not take it for granted that he can run his department upon the recommendation of the good citizens of Quebec?

Mr. SEVIGNY: I do not.

Mr. MARCIL: I can quite understand that the deputy minister would favour the appointment of an outsider, because he himself came into the department in the first instance to occupy the position which he now holds. I assume that the minister wishes to help the civil servants; if he does, he should consider the advisability of promoting deserving officials rather than taking men from outside for political reasons simply because they are recommended by so-and-so.

Mr. SEVIGNY: It is my intention to promote employees wherever possible.

Mr. MARCIL: I understand that the minister has quite recently appointed to positions in his department three men from outside the service. I should be obliged if the minister would give us at eight o'clock a list of appointments made to the Inside Service in his department either by him or by his immediate predecessor, noting especially those brought in from the outside.

Mr. KYTE: Who first suggested Mr. Renault to the minister as a competent person to fill the position of accountant?

Mr. SEVIGNY: I do not remember.

Mr. COPP: What salary attaches to the office?

Mr. SEVIGNY: $2,800.

Mr. BOIVIN: I should like the minister to make clear to the committee the reason why Mr. Renault was not appointed. Aside from any other consideration, the minister recommended Mr. Renault's appointment upon the assumption that he was a good accountant. I understand also that owing to the position being a technical one, the age limit was not considered by the Commissioners. Mr. Renault, therefore, was turned down either because he was incompetent, or because he wrote seditious articles. Why was he turned down?

Mr. SEVIGNY: When he was turned down there was no mention at all of articles published in newspapers. The reason, if I remember correctly, was that he was not well qualified for departmental business.

Mr. BOIVIN: Which means that the minister recommended the appointment of a person who was not competent to fill the position.

Mr. CURRIE: A certain position is vacant and the minister recommends the appointment of a man who is believed by leading men in Quebec city to be competent to fill the position. The person recommended goes before the Civil Service Commission, who, coming to the conclusion that he is not as well qualified as the duties of the position require, refuse to sanction the appointment. That is all there is to it—with the exception of the attempts of hon. gentlemen opposite to make a good deal of capital out of it.

Mr. COPP: It was stated during the progress of the Estimates of the other ministers that, wherever possible, it was the policy of the Government to appoint returned soldiers to all vacant positions. This recommendation of the minister was made within the last month or two, since he took charge of the Department of Inland Revenue. Since that time there must have been available a large number of returned soldiers who are professional men, or men of ability and education, and who could perform the duties pertaining to such positions as the one in question. May I inquire, therefore, if the minister is following up the announced policy of the Government in the matter of appointing returned soldiers? Did he make inquiries with a view to finding out whether a returned soldier could be obtained to fill this important position, to which is attached a salary of $2,800?

At six o'clock the House resumed, and then took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

SUPPLY.

House resumed in Committee of Supply, Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

Mr. MACDONALD: The Minister of Inland Revenue, before dinner, made the statement, based on a rumour, that an interview had taken place between Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Mr. Bourassa at Montreal, or at Ottawa. I am authorized by Sir Wilfrid Laurier to say that the statement is untrue and incorrect; neither at Ottawa, nor at Montreal, nor anywhere else, was there such an interview.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

Mr. OLIVER: The minister having made the statement—no doubt in good faith—which is now proven to be erroneous, I think he might, in deference to the committee, withdraw that statement.

Mr. SEVIGNY: I was told that Sir Wilfrid Laurier had met Mr. Bourassa in Ottawa on Sunday last. I did not say that it had been proven that Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Mr. Bourassa had met. I accept the statement of my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald).

Mr. KNOWLES: The hon. minister will remember that he stated that the tone of a newspaper which he named had changed very much on account of the interview which he alleged had taken place. Thus, he not only gave that which was rumoured, but he gave evidence as to the truthfulness of the rumour. I think that he ought to withdraw his insinuations that there was some connection between the attitude of the paper and an alleged interview with Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

Mr. SEVIGNY: I have nothing to do with Le Devoir; I am not responsible for the articles published in that paper.

Mr. KNOWLES: Will not the minister withdraw his statement that the alleged change in Le Devoir was due to an interview with Sir Wilfrid Laurier?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The minister has accepted the denial made by the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald), and having done that, I think he has done all that is necessary. I suggest that is quite a sufficient withdrawal.

Mr. MACDONALD: I am authorized by Sir Wilfrid Laurier to make the statement I have made. I ask the minister to withdraw his statement absolutely, and to state frankly in the House that he made it on no other basis than that of rumour.

Mr. SEVIGNY: I have been told that an interview took place between Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Mr. Bourassa last Sunday. I do not know whether or not it is true that an interview did take place, but now I accept the statement made by the hon. member for Pictou, and I suppose it is not true that an interview took place.

Mr. MACDONALD: Does the minister withdraw his statement based on that rumour?

Mr. SEVIGNY: It is impossible for me to say that there is no rumour to that effect.

Mr. MACDONALD: Does the minister withdraw his statement made on the foundation of that rumour?

Mr. SEVIGNY: If Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the leader of the Opposition, says that no such interview took place, I am ready to accept his statement, as I am bound to do so.

Excise—$1,300,318.75.

Mr. KYTE: Some weeks ago the Minister of Customs intimated to the House that it was his policy to fill all vacancies in the Outside Service of his department by appointing returned soldiers. Is that the policy of the Minister of Inland Revenue?

Mr. SEVIGNY: Yes, it is the policy of my department as much as possible to give positions to returned soldiers. I am informed by my deputy that we have appointed about twelve returned soldiers.

Mr. KYTE: Where were the appointments made?

Mr. SEVIGNY: I expect to have some particulars about that in a few minutes.

Mr. KYTE: I desire to call the attention of the minister to a vacancy in his department in the town of Arichat in the county which I represent. Captain Laurence Gerrior, preventive officer at that point, died some years ago. The position is still vacant owing, I understand, to the difficulty experienced by the controller of patronage in that constituency in making a selection from the numerous applicants for the position. Will the minister fill that office by the appointment of a returned soldier?

Mr. SEVIGNY: I am told by my deputy that we have no vacancy in my department at Arichat.

Mr. KYTE: Are preventive officers at Arichat in the department of the minister?

Mr. SEVIGNY: No, in the Department of Customs.

Mr. KYTE: Have there been any complaints of infractions of the law with reference to the use of war stamps on patent medicines?

Mr. SEVIGNY: Yes, we have many complaints.

Mr. KYTE: Have there been any prosecutions for those infractions?

Mr. SEVIGNY: Yes, a great number.

Mr. KYTE: Will the minister furnish the committee with a list of the prosecutions and the amount of fine collected in each case?

Mr. SEVIGNY: Yes, I am willing to furnish a list. I expect to have it in about twenty minutes or half an hour.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: What is the cause of the increase of $54,000 in the item preventive service salaries?

Mr. SEVIGNY: I am informed by the officers of my department that last year an error was made by the accountant of the department in making an estimate of $101,000, and that we have had, on account of that error, to make an expenditure from the War Fund. It is to meet the exigencies of the service that we ask for $155,000 this year.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Why from the War Fund? Was the work in connection with war expenditures in any way?

Mr. SEVIGNY: It was on account of the application of the preventive service to the War Revenues Act?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That would only refer to stamps?

Mr. SEVIGNY: Yes.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: What was the amount of the item in 1915-16?

Mr. SEVIGNY: I will give the information to my hon. friend later on.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Can the minister explain why the estimate of last year was $50,000 below the corresponding item of the preceding year?

Mr. SEVIGNY: We have been obliged to appoint a certain number of additional officers to see to the execution of the War Measures Act in my department.

Mr. MACDONALD: Did the minister get an Order in Council for these appointments, or was there a Governor General's warrant to pay the officials? What authority had the minister to take money not voted by Parliament unless he had a Governor General's warrant?

Mr. SEVIGNY: The war fund was at the disposal of the department for all expenses required on account of the war.

Mr. MACDONALD: Who gave authority to the department to take any money at all, to divert money that ought to have gone into the treasury without the consent of council? Was there a Governor General's warrant or an Order in Council, or did the deputy minister and the minister simply take the money?

Mr. SEVIGNY: I am told that everything was done in the regular way.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: There is no doubt about it, the war fund appropriation is distributed by Order in Council, and if, in my department for instance, there should be a piece of service that is directly connected with the conduct of the war or which is imposed by the war, I could go to Council, represent the case, get an Order in Council and pay for that service out of the war fund appropriation. I imagine that this is the same thing.

Mr. OLIVER: There does not seem to be any parity between the two cases.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I think so.

Mr. OLIVER: I judge that in this case, according to the minister's explanation, he simply was short $50,000 in his estimates. There was no question of war fund or anything else, and he took the money out of the war fund.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: He did not take the money out of the war fund. The money did not come out of the war fund except through an Order in Council. No minister has the right to use it by himself or through his department. Such an expenditure must be authorized by Order in Council, and must be for war purposes, and I imagine that this arose from the administration of the war tax on drugs, etc.

Mr. OLIVER: I am not as familiar with the matter as the ministers, but this item is preventive service, salaries, and the minister explained the increase of $54,000 as between last year's Estimates and this year's Estimates by stating that last year's estimate was too low simply because of an error in making the estimate too small; and when asked how he met the requirements of the department, he said he took money out of the war fund. I must say that if it is the habit of the Government to take money by Order in Council out of the war fund to carry on the ordinary business of the department—

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Not the ordinary business.

Mr. OLIVER: —that is hardly as we understand proper administration. This is not war service. Salaries for the preventive service of the Inland Revenue Department do not come under war service; that item is the ordinary administration of the department, as I would understand it, and the money that we vote for war purposes has no right in the world to be used even by the Government to make up a deficiency which occurs as my hon. friend has said this did.

Mr. SEVIGNY: When it was realized in the department that we were short of money to pay those employees, the accountant of the department laid the question before the Auditor General, and I am told that he was authorized by the Auditor General to take the necessary amount from the war fund. At the time, those officials were employed to see to the proper execution of the special War Revenue Act.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That would not be a proper expenditure from the war loan.

Mr. SEVIGNY: They were looking after the administration of the War Revenue Act and we had not enough money to pay them; so the accountant of my department was authorized to pay those employees with the money of the war fund.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: This explanation, if correct, is very irregular, and it is only proper that Parliament should express an adverse opinion upon doing public business in that way unless the whole matter is susceptible of some different explanation. I do not think it would be fair to pay out of the war fund anything in connection with the collection of revenues. The Inland Revenue Department has to do only with the collection of revenues from excise duties on tobacco and liquor, and the war stamp tax. There was an ample vote for the collection of the war stamp tax, so that if this advance from the war fund, so-called, was on account of preventive service, it really was not properly a war expenditure. It is not fair that expenses should be met in this manner from the war account. Perhaps the minister is wrong, perhaps it was not paid out in that way at all. Is he sure of that? It may have been paid by a Governor General's warrant out of consolidated fund account.

Mr. SEVIGNY: I am told that we have prosecuted about 400 persons since the application of the special War Revenue Act all over the country.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: What for?

Mr. SEVIGNY: Not affixing the seal.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That is included in the next item. $125,000 was voted for that.

Mr. SEVIGNY: We took the money out of that vote last year to pay for the preventive service, because we had not enough money.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That is not what the hon. gentleman said.

Mr. SEVIGNY: That is the war fund.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No, no.

Mr. OLIVER: What did my hon. friend do to meet the deficiency in the vote, created thereby?

Mr. SEVIGNY: This item of $125,000 reads as follows:

> To provide for stamps, stationery, salaries, travelling expenses, in connection with war tax.

This service was performed by our preventive service officer, and when we saw that we had not enough money to pay the amount, the accountant of my department met the Auditor-General, and the accountant was authorized to pay the money out of this item of $125,000.

Mr. McKENZIE: Do I understand you to say the Auditor General has authority to order a payment of that kind? I always understood the functions of the Auditor General were, particularly, to see that moneys were paid out according to the authority of Parliament. I may be wrong, but I never understood that he had any authority off his own bat to say that moneys could be appropriated in a certain direction, and paid out, without consulting the Government or Parliament.

Mr. SEVIGNY: I do not say the Auditor General had authority to do it, but he could tell us whether it was right or wrong to make certain payments.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The minister surely knows whether he has authority to spend the money, when he goes to the Auditor General. I understood he had to point out to the Auditor General that he was spending the money under a certain rule, or authority of Parliament, or Governor General's warrant. I suppose, if the minister were foggy about these things, he should go to the fountain head of all knowledge in finance matters, the Departmeent of Finance, and find out what he should do, and that the Finance Minister would tell him the proper steps to take, in order to obtain money for payments of this kind. I appreciate the fact that the minister is quite new in the office, and he is giving evidence of being very new. I think he should be excused for not knowing everything about the department, but he should be expected to know something about it, and I think, in the case of an extraordinary expenditure of this kind, he should be on pretty solid ground before coming to Parliament and asking to have the payment sanctioned. I understood the procedure to be that the minister would apply to the Department of Finance for money, and the Department of Finance, would either procure it through Parliament, in an Estimate, or take the necessary steps by Governor General's warrant to procure the money. He seems to have struck out in a new course of his own, and relies upon the Auditor General. I question the authority of the Auditor General to give him any money, without its first being voted by Parliament.

Mr. MURPHY: Do I understand from my hon. friend that the Auditor General authorized the payment of this sum out of the war vote?

Mr. SEVIGNY: He was consulted, and said that was the correct procedure.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That cannot be right, because according to a statement made by the Prime Minister in introducing the War Loan Bill, it appeared that in the Department of Inland Revenue up to the 20th of January of this year only $522.50 had been expended out of that fund; so that, I think, it is hardly likely the minister got the money from that source. I suppose there is some explanation of this matter.

[Mr. McKenzie.]

Mr. SEVIGNY: The work was done by our preventive officers, and we had to pay them their salaries. When we realized that we had not enough money in the item of preventive service to pay their salaries for the work they were doing, by the War Tax Measure we were authorized to pay their salaries out of the item of $125,000.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The hon. minister should have said that long ago.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That is not the war vote.

Mr. MACDONALD: It is perfectly evident that my hon. friend cannot expect this committee to vote this item, No. 327, on the information which he has presented to us. I suggest that this item stand until the minister is prepared to give an intelligent explanation. We are only groping in the dark. He said his accountant had made a mistake, and therefore there had to be certain juggling with funds, and he cannot tell us where the funds came from, whether from the war fund which he speaks of, in the sense we understand it, or whether from the receipts of certain war stamps in his office which were diverted. It is, therefore, impossible to pass the item now.

Mr. SEVIGNY: Perhaps there is some misunderstanding in reference to the words "war fund," which I used. This item in the Estimates to provide for stamps, stationery, salaries, travelling expenses, etc., in connection with war tax, is called the war fund in my department.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Was the deficit in the item for preventive service paid out of the surplus in the item of $25,000? There was evidently an under expenditure in that item.

Mr. OLIVER: I think the suggestion made by the hon. gentleman from Pictou should be adopted. It is, after all, a very serious matter and it is desirable there should be no misunderstanding in regard to it. Unfortunately the minister's explanation has led to a great deal of discussion and questioning, which certainly does not tend to satisfy the public mind in regard to the administration of these funds. We do not wish to put the minister in a bad position, but we are desirous that he should place himself right in regard to this expenditure.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: We can pass the other items under that head.

Mr. OLIVER: We can discuss the other items now and possibly when we reach them later they will not require further discussion. I suggest that the item "Preventive service, salaries, $155,000," should stand until we have a fuller explanation.

Mr. MURPHY: Some of the items are interlocked with the others.

Mr. OLIVER: The items of $150,000 and $125,000 might stand for the present, and we can proceed with the discussion of the remaining items, so as to save time later on.

Mr. BOIVIN: How much of that $125,000 vote was expended last year?

Mr. SEVIGNY: We have spent $32,000 for stamps and $35,000 for salaries, a total of $67,000. We were authorized to use a portion of the balance remaining unspent to cover the deficit on the other item.

Mr. BOIVIN: How much of that balance was taken to cover the deficit?

Mr. SEVIGNY: I will give the information on the items of preventive service and war stamps.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: If the minister expended only $67,000 last year out of that vote of $125,000 he should not ask for a vote of $125,000 this year unless there is a probability of that amount being required.

Mr. MURPHY: I suggest that the minister bring down the details suggested by the member for Halifax as to why he is asking for $125,000 when the department did not spend anything like that amount under this head last year. I suggest, also, that he bring down any correspondence with the Auditor General on the subject of taking the money from one vote and applying it to another.

Mr. KNOWLES: There is no reason why the department should be blamed because an estimate proves insufficient. It very often follows that votes prove insufficient; otherwise the estimates would be of no use. But if the amount voted proves to be more than sufficient it is quite at variance with the principle upon which we vote particular amounts to divert the money to other purposes. We ear-mark the money for a particular purpose, and if there is a surplus in one vote it is absolutely foreign to the making up of a deficit in another. The fact that about $50,000 was left over in one vote shows that we were called upon to vote a much larger sum than was necessary, but certainly a surplus in one vote should not be used to make up a deficit in another.

9 p.m.

The minister has beclouded the matter somewhat by his statement that the difficulty was initiated by an error on the part of his accountant. That is something that ought to be cleared up. If it was an error on the part of his accountant, the error should have been rectified in the proper way by Governor General's warrant. Is that not the only way? I think we ought to hear from some of the experienced members of the Government on that question. The Finance Minister is with us; perhaps he will tell us.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: As I have not been occupying myself with the discussion, I must plead that I am not familiar with this particular item. I understand, however, that generally you are discussing the payment out of funds. So far as the general funds are concerned, moneys are paid out by the departments under the supervision of the Auditor General. It is quite impossible for any error to occur; the money must be voted, and only the amount that is voted can be used. All the money that is paid out under the votes is paid out under proper safeguards.

Mr. KNOWLES: And is to be used for the specific purpose for which it was voted.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes. If it chances that a particular expenditure does come under two headings or may be embraced within each, the Estimates would authorize the payment out for that necessary expenditure, provided there was sufficient money. I should think, however, that cases of that kind very seldom occur. Question has been raised as to the payment out of money voted under the War Appropriation Act. No money can be voted under that Act unless upon the express authority of the Governor in Council. In other words, if a department finds it necessary to make an expenditure which is properly payable out of the war vote, the minister gets an Order in Council which authorizes the payment from that vote. Needless to say it must be for purposes immediately connected with the war.

With regard to Governor General's warrants, it sometimes occurs, but not frequently, that there are no funds for some necessary service that must be performed. In cases of that kind of extreme urgency, a Governor General's warrant may issue for the amount in question. I am sure it is common knowledge amongst members of the House that payment of moneys in connection with all departments is surrounded by every safeguard that experience has found necessary, in order that there may be no misappropriation of funds.

Mr. MURPHY: Which minister has charge of the war appropriation vote?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That is for purposes connected with the war. The ordinary departments, apart from the Department of Militia and Defence and the Department of Marine and Fisheries, have almost no war expenditure at all.

Mr. MARCIL: What are Mr. Magnan's duties?

Mr. SEVIGNY: He was superintendent of the Patent Medicines Branch, but has resigned. No successor has been appointed yet.

Mr. MARCIL: Would the minister consider appointing a returned soldier to the vacancy?

Mr. SEVIGNY: A doctor is required for the position. If my hon. friend will give me the name of a returned soldier who is a good doctor and well qualified for this position I shall be only too pleased to appoint him.

Mr. KYTE: How many of these men were appointed under the provisions of Section 21?

Mr. SEVIGNY: Messrs. Westman, Magnan, Morissette, Kinsman, Brot, Rowat, Breton, Grattan, Gunton and Lye. Mr. Lye is a returned soldier, Mr. Kinsman an electrician, and Mr. Morissette a translator.

Mr. KYTE: Does the minister put a translator and an electrician in the category of experts?

Mr. SEVIGNY: These men were considered technical officers by the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. MURPHY: They did not use to be so considered.

[Sir Thomas White.]

Mr. KYTE: How many persons have been appointed to the Department of Inland Revenue during last year, and what are their salaries?

Mr. SEVIGNY: The list of employees appointed since October 1, 1915, is as follows:

Salary.	Remarks.
$2,100	Transferred to Secretary State.
1,300
3,300	Resigned.

Mr. SEVIGNY: They did not have to pass the Civil Service examination.

Mr. MURPHY: Most of them could not.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: The minister states that Mr. Danis, his private secretary, has resigned. Is he still in the employ of the department.

Mr. SEVIGNY: Yes, as preventive officer at Qu'Appelle, Saskatchewan. He also acts as food inspector for that province. His salary is $1,800.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Was he a resident of Saskatchewan?

Mr. SEVIGNY: Yes.

Mr. MACDONALD: I notice that a very curious practice has crept in this year in passing the items of one or two departments. Some of these votes are made up of a number of items, each of which should be considered separately, and until each has been so considered and approved the vote should not be passed. Am I to understand that when the Chairman of the Committee calls "Carried" the whole vote passes?

The CHAIRMAN: In every case I have read each item separately, and asked the Committee to express themselves on it.

Mr. MACDONALD: I am not complaining about you, Mr. Chairman. We are considering Resolution 327; the whole vote cannot pass so long as these one or two items remain outstanding.

Mr. OLIVER: The whole item stands because no part of it can finally pass without the whole of it passing, but for the sake of convenience and to advance discussion separate items do not pass, of course, until we pass from one item to another. The the whole vote is passed Weights and measures, gas and electric light inspection, $393,950. Salaries of officers, inspectors and assistant inspectors of weights and measures, $155,250.

Mr. MURPHY: What accounts for the increase of $10,000?

Mr. SEVIGNY: This is for the regular statutory increases. Besides, we were short of money last year, and this is to make sure that we shall have enough this year.

Mr. MACDONALD: How much were you short last year?

Mr. SEVIGNY: About $10,000.

Mr. MACDONALD: You have statutory increases again this year, and with these and with a shortage of $10,000 you will need $20,000.

Mr. SEVIGNY: We expect that with $10,000 we can give the statutory increases. And we will have to ask for more money in the Supplementary Estimates—about $5,000.

Mr. MURPHY: The civil servants paid under this item are members of the Outside Service and no increase is provided by statute for them. So this item cannot apply to them.

Mr. SEVIGNY: Every day I am in receipt of letters from good employees, who complain—and I think they are right in complaining—because their salaries are too low. It is true, there is no statutory increase allowed to the Outside Service, but in many cases we have done the best we could to give increases of salaries when we thought it was fair to do so. And it is our intention to do the same for many of the Outside Service this year.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Will the minister make the increase general, or will it be a selective increase?

Mr. SEVIGNY: If I have enough money it is my intention to give an increase to all the employees of the Outside Service. But if I have not enough money I shall have to make a choice of the best employees.

Mr. KYTE: This vote includes::—

Provisional allowance, not more than $150 each to officers in Manitoba and provinces west thereof, whose salaries do not exceed $2,500 per annum. (Weights and Measures).

Why is not this made applicable to officers in the other provinces?

Mr. SEVIGNY: Such an allowance is not confined to my department, but applies to the Post Office and Customs Departments also. It is considered that the cost of living is higher in the West than in the East. But, in my judgment, the cost of living at present is as high in the East as in the West.

Mr. KYTE: Whatever reason there may have been in former times for this discrimination, I am sure there is none at present. In the Maritime Provinces the cost of living has gone up twice as much as in any part of Canada. As the minister is making special provision for the officers in the Western provinces I think it only fair that similar provision should be made for those in the East.

Mr. SEVIGNY: I am glad to hear the hon. gentleman talk that way, and I hope that when my Supplementary Estimates are before the committee he will be willing to give me enough money to give increases to all the employees of my department throughout the Dominion.

Mr. NESBITT: Deserving and undeserving?

Mr. SEVIGNY: They are all deserving; otherwise we would not keep them.

Mr. McKENZIE: In considering the merits of a member of the Inside Service, the minister has the advice of his deputy minister and of the head of the branch. But how does he get information as to the merits of officers in the Outside Service? I am afraid that in the Inland Revenue Department we shall see what we have seen in other departments—a certain class of the public servants are found to be most deserving, and others, for some reason, not so deserving. Up to 1911 the money was distributed equally, but since then, and now, only a certain class can get it. I urge upon the minister that when he gives increases he should try to get some positive information about the officer concerned, so that there may be no unfair discrimination —that the rain, as it were may fall on the just and the unjust. I hope especially that those who are receiving small salaries will be among those given increases, and that in dealing with this matter the minister will beware of the leaven of politics.

Mr. SEVIGNY: When I receive a request for an increase of salary, I place it before my deputy minister, and if I decide to give an increase it is because it is recommended by the officers of the department. I can assure the hon. gentleman, Mr. McKenzie, that many of the employees who were in the department before 1911 have received some increases, when we have enough money to give them. This has been true under Mr. Blondin and Mr. Patenaude, and it is true under my own administration of the department.

Mr. McKENZIE: I heard on very good authority that for the fifteen years that the Liberals were in power we had in some departments Tory heads who had a free hand, and who were giving preference to their Tory friends during those fifteen years. When the change came, matters became worse; we had not only a Tory deputy head but a Tory head, so that it was a case of bringing in seven worse devils than there were before, and the class of civil servants to whom I have referred are getting it going and coming. If any deputy head or head of a department thinks he is doing these things under a bushel, I want the minister to know that we know about these things, and I hope that this manner of dealing with officials will not find place nor part in his department.

Mr. MACDONALD: The minister has not told us the exact meaning of the two extra amounts he is asking for under this item. The minister is more extravagant in his department than any other minister. He is asking for an increase of $142,442.50 in excise, of $26,000 in weights and measures, and of $10,000 in adulteration of food. The weights and measures business of the country is surely not of such a pressing character in war time, when men have to be conscripted to win the war, that the minister should ask the people to be taxed this extra amount of $26,000. The same is true with regard to the adulteration of food item. Why should there be an increase of $36,000 in these two branches? The minister is asking for $10,000 for increases of salaries of officers, inspectors and assistant inspectors of weights and measures. He told us a few minutes ago that they were all statutory increases.

Mr. SEVIGNY: I made a mistake. I thought that was the Inside Service. There are no statutory increases for the Outside Service.

Mr. MACDONALD: Will the minister give us the names of those whose salaries are to be increased?

Mr. SEVIGNY: Generally speaking, we desire to give an increase to every one of our officials of the Outside Service, and I hope we shall have enough money for that.

Mr. MACDONALD: Are you going to appoint any new officers?

Mr. SEVIGNY: That is not the intention of the department.

Mr. MACDONALD: Have you appointed any new officers within the last six months?

Mr. SEVIGNY: Not in the weights and measures branch. Perhaps we have appointed a few men, but the appointments have been to fill vacancies.

Mr. MACDONALD: I am speaking of additional appointments, not to fill vacancies.

Mr. SEVIGNY: During the last six months we have appointed, throughout the whole country, five or six men.

Mr. MACDONALD: To new positions.

Mr. SEVIGNY: Yes.

Mr. MACDONALD: Who are they?

Mr. SEVIGNY: I will get the names for my hon. friend.

Mr. MACDONALD: Why should there be an increase of $15,000 in rent, fuel, travelling expenses, etc. for weights and measures?

Mr. SEVIGNY: We were given $65,000 last year by Parliament, but we were short by $15,000, and it is to cover that deficit that we are asking for $15,000 more this year.

Mr. MACDONALD: I am at a loss to understand why in a department such as this of weights and measures where everything runs along in a groove absolutely certain and definite, that does not involve any eruptions of any kind in the service, the minister should require such an increased expenditure as $15,000 that could not be foreseen. I am at a loss to understand why his predecessor spent so much more money than was voted. We have received no explanation from the minister. The minister may be paying the penalty for the sins of his predecessor who has passed on to some other department. I can understand that in a department where flexible conditions exist, where unusual and unexpected demands may be made, a minister may be called upon to meet expenditures which, I presume, would have to pass the gauntlet of an Order in Council, and in such a case he might come with the explanation that the present minister has given. Either the minister's predecessor must have been a spendthrift, or the minister must have been. If the minister is going to spend $15,000 more, he should tell us what he is going to do with the money.

Mr. SEVIGNY: When the amount of $65,000 was submitted to the minister, we thought that such an amount would be sufficient to meet all the requirements, but I understand that the department, as everybody else, has suffered on account of the high cost of everything. This item is for rent, fuel, travelling expenses, postage, stationery, etc., for weights and measures, including amount for purchase of standards of the metric system, salaries and other expenses of inspection. Last year we spent $80,000.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Where did you get the money?

Mr. SEVIGNY: I am told that on the 6th of February of this year a vote was passed by this House, number 386, for rent, fuel, travelling expenses, postage, stationery, for weights and measures, including an amount for the purchase of standards of the metric system, salaries and other expenses, further amount required, $20,000. We required that amount to pay our officials, and we came before Parliament and were given the money.

Mr. OLIVER: As the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) has already said, this is a department of service which has not been the subject of expansion for any special reason during the past several years. It is obvious that the predecessor of my hon. friend, for whose action he must answer to the House, simply went on and spent $15,000 that he had no authority to spend, that this House had not authorized him to spend.

Mr. SEVIGNY: We did not spend it until it was voted in the Supplementary Estimates.

Mr. OLIVER: The service was incurred before any Supplementary Estimates were voted. There has been no change of conditions that warranted such an expansion of expenditure; it was simply $15,000 of extravagant expenditure on the part of my hon. friend's predecessor in office. Last year Parliament was asked for a certain vote on the representation that that amount would be sufficient to carry this service through the year, and the department incurred this additional expenditure of $15,000. It is for the minister to show the committee, not only where he spent this money, but why he spent this money. It is quite true that the over expenditure made by the department was provided for by Parliament, as the minister has said, by the passing of the extra Supplementary Estimate this year. But the committee are now asked to assent to the Main Estimates for the coming year, and this is the time and place when the Government ought to be prepared to state to the country, through the committee why an increase of expenditure has been made. Such explanations are not generally asked for or made on the occasion of what are called the extra Supplementary Estimates. Why was that expenditure made? Was it a provident, economical and necessary expenditure, or a wasteful, extravagant and unnecessary expenditure? The country is entitled to that information.

Mr. SEVIGNY: The greater expenditure was necessary on account of the increase in the service. The industry of the country, generally speaking, was never so prosperous as since the outbreak of the war, and owing to this great increase and development of industry in Canada, the weights and measures service has greatly increased. It is only on account of that increase that this additional amount has been required; there was no extravagant or useless expenditure.

Mr. OLIVER: The minister makes a broad, general statement that an increase in the cost of administration of the weights and measures naturally follows the expansion of industry. I am at one with the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) in the belief that it does not necessarily so follow. The provision for the inspection of weights and measures is made, and there would have to be a very large expansion of industry indeed to require a large further expenditure by the department in that connection.

That is, unless this minister acts on the principle that money is free just now, and that the Inland Revenue Department should spend money liberally, as other departments of the Government have done; and possibly the other departments have not been as severely criticised for it as they should have been. The lines of expenditure in the Inland Revenue Department are laid down very closely, and there is not the same occasion for expansion as in other departments. A general statement is not information. We should have a detailed statement as to what appointments it is necessary to make, whether they were made and what they cost the country, because it appears to me that there has been a sufficient staff of weights and measures inspectors and officials of this department generally, as well as other departments of the government, appointed since 1911, to take care of any expansion of any industry which has taken place, or that we may hope to take place for a long time to come. In other words, the staff has been kept at full strength, and has been increased, although the business has admittedly gone down. That being the case, a general statement on the part of my hon. friend is not an explanation, and he should be prepared to give us the actual details as to how the increase took place.

Mr. SEVIGNY: I will not be able tonight to give my hon. friend all the details of that increase, but we have had that increase because it was required. I will have prepared in my department a detailed statement of all the increases that were required, and I hope that will be satisfactory to my hon. friend.

Mr. OLIVER: This large increase of $15,000 expenditure for this service apparently took place in the fiscal year ending 30th March, 1917. Will the minister be good enough to prepare the detailed statement as to the increase, and why it was necessary?

Mr. SEVIGNY: Yes.

Mr. MACDONALD: The item will stand in order to get information.

Mr. KYTE: Has the hon. minister the information he promised in regard to prosecutions for infraction of the War Stamp Act?

Mr. SEVIGNY: We prosecuted about 400 persons for infraction of the Act all over the country. At first we were very lenient and our officers conducted a campaign of education, but since the war broke out we have instituted 400 prosecutions.

Mr. KYTE: Does the department prosecute all persons against whom complaints are made?

Mr. SEVIGNY: Yes, through our officers.

Mr. KYTE: Will the hon. gentleman have a list prepared of the complaints received in regard to parties who have violated the provisions of the Act, and a list of prosecutions?

Mr. SEVIGNY: Yes.

Mr. OLIVER: I presume this is called preventive or detective work. Under what system is the work performed and paid for? Is it by salaried officials permanently appointed by the department, or by men temporarily appointed, who work on commission, receiving a portion of the fine?

Mr. SEVIGNY: We have employees who receive an annual salary, and in each case the official is entitled to half the fine, in addition to their salaries.

Mr. OLIVER: In addition to salary and travelling expenses?

Mr. SEVIGNY: Yes.

Mr. OLIVER: Are these permanent or temporary employees?

Mr. SEVIGNY: Most of them are permanent.

Mr. OLIVER: About what is the average salary paid?

Mr. SEVIGNY: $900 now. The officers say it is not enough, and desire an increase.

Mr. OLIVER: There was some complaint made in the House a little while ago by the member for West Kent (Mr. McCoig) in regard to the administration of this part of the Inland Revenue service. He complained of the character of the service rendered. I think that it is objectionable to pay for service of this character by giving a percentage of the fine. No doubt many unjustifiable cases occur under that system. Some of these cases were mentioned by the hon. gentleman from West Kent, which certainly reflected very seriously on the administration of the department. It is generally accepted that the principle of paying the informer a part of the fine is not a good one, and is not to the credit of those in authority who administer the law in that way. It would be very much better to employ more highly salaried officials, who would be men of higher standing and character, who would administer this part of the work of the department in a much more effective, and creditable manner.

Mr. SEVIGNY: The experience of the department is that the present system is the most effective.

Mr. OLIVER: How many such appointees are there in the service of the department?

Mr. SEVIGNY: Over a hundred, all over the country.

Mr. OLIVER: I think the member for West Kent, in speaking of this matter, suggested that there were occasions, within his knowledge, in which the detective was the instigator of the offence. What is the policy of the department in that connection? Does the department consider it legitimate for the detective to instigate the offence, or, in any degree, to become a party to it?

Mr. SEVIGNY: We have never credited that statement, and I certainly would not tolerate such conduct. If the hon. gentleman has complaints to make against the officials who are doing that work, I would be very glad to receive them.

Mr. MURPHY: The member for West Kent made certain complaints.

Mr. SEVIGNY: It would be better if he would give the names. When did he make the complaints?

Mr. MURPHY: Last week, I think; it is in Hansard.

Mr. OLIVER: He was discussing the possible regulation of cold storage and he instanced certain cases of hardship that had occurred under the administration of the Inland Revenue Department. It is not the policy of the department, then, to encourage this method of enforcing the regulations. How far would the department go in the way of discouraging such methods? Would they be willing to dispense with the services of a detective who had been a party to such a transaction?

Mr. SEVIGNY. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER: That is definite.

Mr. SEVIGNY: Yes.

Adulteration of food and the administration of the Act respecting fertilizers, fraudulent marking and commercial feeding stuffs, $50,000.

Mr. OLIVER: What is the work of the department in this connection?

Mr. SEVIGNY: Samples of food are collected by our officers throughout the country and sent to Ottawa, Halifax, Vancouver and Winnipeg for analysis. If they are adulterated, prosecutions are taken against the persons offering such foods for sale.

Mr. OLIVER: There is an increase of $10,000 in this vote. Is this a case of the expansion of industry?

Mr. SEVIGNY: Yes, the service is increasing very much. Last year we were voted $40,000, but we did not have enough money.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It is evident that the minister's Estimates are not properly prepared, and for this somebody in the department is censurable. For instance, why should $125,000 have been asked for last year for excise when $67,000 was enough to cover the expenditure for the year? This year the same amount is required. Some man in the department is responsible for this. Either the minister is not properly instructed, or he has not given enough attention to the preparation of his Estimates. Or, perhaps, the officers of his department do not properly prepare him for asking the committee to pass his Estimates.

Mr. SEVIGNY: In the case of the item of $125,000, in 1916 the amount asked for was $175,000, and last year it was reduced to $125,000.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: More ought to come off.

Mr. SEVIGNY: We shall probably have to buy machines to emboss cheques; the matter is under consideration. We are required by the Banking Association to do that work, and it is practically decided that we shall have to buy the necessary machines.

Mr. MACDONALD: I am disposed to be generous with my hon. friend, because I know that he has not been long in office. But apparently his predecessor has overspent the money that was voted by Parliament. My hon. friend tells us that he wants $10,000 more under this 10 p.m. item, and so on—and this in respect of a department the operations of which are limited. What is the explanation of this $10,000 increase?

Mr. SEVIGNY: I shall be only too glad to give this information to the committee with the other information that I intend to bring down.

Mr. OLIVER: The main point is, why was this over-expenditure made, and what, if any, justification was there for it?

Mr. SEVIGNY: I will have a statement prepared in my department.

Mr. OLIVER: In the three divisions of my hon. friend's department there are increases over and above the vote of Parliament and beyond what the minister says has been the increased expenditure. As the matter stands it simply means that my hon. friend's predecessor in office did not pay any regard to the vote of Parliament, but simply spent as much money as he desired and then asked Parliament to pay the bill. I submit that that is not a reasonable or proper way to administer the affairs of the country, and if the minister could show that his predecessor did not conduct the affairs of the department in that way it would be very much to his credit. But according to the explanation of the minister the situation is as I have described, and it looks as if the minister having conducted the affairs of his department in that manner for a certain period, stepped out and allowed the mantle to fall on the shoulders of my hon. friend.

Mr. SEVIGNY: I think it would be more satisfactory for the committee to have a statement of the expenditure made on all these items. I have no hesitation in saying that my predecessor was very careful in the administration of his department, and it is my intention to be the same. Mistakes may have inadvertently been made in the preparation of the Estimates, and we are now asking Parliament for the necessary money. Instructions have been given to practise economy throughout the whole department, and it is certainly my intention to follow that practice particularly during the war.

Mr. MURPHY: The instructions cannot have been properly given because the conditions which hon. gentlemen have brought to the attention of the committee have evidently prevailed in the department for some time. At the beginning of the session supplementary Estimates were brought down to make up the deficiencies in the three branches of my hon. friend's department, Weights and Measures, Excise, and Adulteration of Food. Already this session $95,000 have been passed in that way, showing that these shortages in the Estimates at all events, have continued for some time. I am pointing that out to my hon. friend that he may bear it in mind when he is preparing the statement he is to make to the committee.

Mr. SEVIGNY: A mistake was made in the preparation of the Estimates last year, and as we do not wish to repeat the mistake this year. We are asking for an increased amount.

Mr. MURPHY: My hon. friend has not shown the committee that what he is asking for will be sufficient.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Without any facts before me I must say that it looks as if the officers of the department had not prepared the Estimates properly, and as if the department was badly administered. Does the minister know whether these officers know what Estimates mean? Perhaps they have the idea that they can spend as much money as they like, and then ask Parliament for money to liquidate the over-payment.

Mr. SEVIGNY: After the explanation given by the Minister of Finance a few minutes ago, I think my hon. friend will appreciate that it is not an easy matter for the officers to spend as much as they like. I have been in the department only five months.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: We are not criticising the minister.

Mr. SEVIGNY: I have some very well qualified officials, and am perfectly satisfied with their services.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: You should have been a little better posted.

Mr. SEVIGNY: I admit that. I shall be ready to give the committee all the information they desire when the Estimates are up again.

Mr. McKENZIE: In Volume I of the Auditor General's Report for last year, in certain correspondence running from pages 537 to 543 between the Auditor General and the Inland Revenue Department, the Auditor General charges that quite a number of servants are being maintained by the department contrary to law. Perhaps when the minister's Estimates are up again he will explain why these assistants are kept on without having passed the proper examination.

Mr. SEVIGNY: I will make a note of it.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I know the minister has the horse races to-morrow on his mind, and I would suggest that the committee rise.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I was entirely innocent of horse racing until my hon. friend put the notion in my mind. I have no objection to the committee rising.

Progress reported.

On the motion of Sir George Foster, the House adjourned at 10.15 p.m.

Monday, June 18, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

CANADIAN EXPEDITIONARY FORCE.—CASUALTIES.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Murphy) asked a question on Friday last in regard to casualties. The answer to his question is as follows:

"Casualty" is the conventional term applied to the following categories: Killed in action, died of wounds, died of sickness, presumed dead, wounded (gassed and suffering from shell shock), missing, prisoners of war. The term does not apply to unwounded men in hospitals and convalescent homes.

For the whole period of the war, up to the 5th June, 1917, the number of casualties reported to Militia Headquarters came to 99,639.

That total includes 68,629 in the "wounded" category. This does not mean that 68,629 men have been wounded. Men wounded on more than one occasion are counted twice, or oftener.

Of the total sick and wounded, some have died, and some are still under treatment overseas. On the 4th June, 1917, there were 23,265 patients C.E.F. in hospitals and convalescent homes in the United Kingdom.

As to the remainder: Some have recovered and returned to duty in England or France, but the number of them actually serving in the trenches has not been reported; according to latest returns, upwards of 1,500 medically unfit for further service, have taken their discharge in the United Kingdom, and more than 12,600 invalids have been evacuated to Canada.

MILITARY SERVICE ACT, 1917.

THE SECOND READING OF THE BILL MOVED.

Right Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister) moved the second reading of Bill No. 75, Military Service Act, 1917.

He said: Mr. Speaker, on the introduction of this Bill I gave a pretty full explanation of its provisions, and of the reasons and considerations upon which it is based, so that in now moving the second reading it will not be necessary for me to detain the House at any length.

[Sir Thomas White.]

According to the usage of Parliament, it is upon the motion which I am now presenting to the House that the principle of the Bill is to be discussed. I emphasize what I said upon the introduction of the Bill, that no new principle is invoked by the measure which is now presented for the consideration of the House. It is based upon precisely the same principle as that which was embodied in the Bill introduced in 1868 by Sir George Etienne Cartier and passed in the same year. The principle embodied in Sir George Etienne Cartier's Bill was renewed and affirmed when the Militia Act was re-enacted in 1904. The chief difference between the measure which has been presented to the House and the Militia Act is this: in the Militia Act the selection of men for military service in case of emergency is effected by the instrumentality of the ballot—in other words, of blind chance. We do not think that such a method could for one moment be justified under the conditions which now confront the country. Consequently, we have brought before the House a measure embodying the principle of compulsory service which was established in 1868 and which has ever since remained in force. But we have changed the method of selection from one of blind chance to one of intelligent selection, based upon a consideration of the need and of the present condition of the country. We have endeavoured to frame the Bill so that the tribunals which are to make that selection shall be absolutely beyond suspicion. If suggestions can be made to us from either side of the House the adoption of which would seem to surround the Bill with better safeguards, while not detracting from its efficiency, we shall be only too glad to consider them.

I wish to call the attention of hon. gentlemen to the statistics which have been placed before the House and which have been compiled by Mr. R. H. Coats, head of the the Department of Census and Statistics, who is a very capable and careful official. In this statement Mr. Coats points out, under note 1, that under the heading "single" are included "widowed" and "divorced"; those whose conjugal condition was unknown are included under "married". In 1911 the total number of widowed and divorced males between the ages of 20 and 45 was approximately 17,000, and of the "unknown" between the same age periods, approximately 14,000.

In note 2, he points out that the heading "foreign-born" includes all persons not born within the British Empire, whether naturalized or not. Of the total of 286,062 foreign-born in 1911, it is estimated that about 115,000 were naturalized.

In note 3, he points out that the figures of the table are those of the census of 1911. It is estimated that the increase since 1911 in the male population of Canada of ages 20 to 45 lies between 300,000 and 400,000. As approximately this number has already been recruited, the figures of 1911, it is thought, reflect rather closely present conditions in the Dominion as a whole, though changes have doubtless occurred in individual provinces.

I now come to the statistics which Mr. Coats has presented. Upon the principle which he has adopted, he estimates that between the ages of 20 and 45, both inclusive, there are in Canada 760,453 unmarried men and 823,096 married men, a total of 1,583,549.

He makes the following further estimates as to the number of married and single men of various ages at present in Canada. Between the ages of 20 and 24, both inclusive, 319,610 single men and 66,247 married men, a total between those ages of 385,857 Between the ages of 25 and 29, both inclusive, 205,125 single men and 165,369 married men, a total between those ages of 370,494. Between the ages of 30 and 34, both inclusive, 112,011 single men and 198,328 married men, a total between those ages of 310,339. Thus the total number of men, both married and unmarried, between the ages of 20 and 34, both inclusive, is 1,066,690, according to his estimate.

I come to another aspect of these statistics. He estimates, as I have already pointed out, that there are, between the ages of 20 and 24, both inclusive, 319,610 single men in Canada. The number of single men between the ages of 25 and 29, both inclusive, is estimated at 205,125 and, between the ages of 30 and 34, both inclusive, 112,011, making the total number of single men between the ages of 20 and 34, both inclusive, 636,746.

Taking the married men as distinguished from the single men, he estimates the number of married men in Canada between the ages of 20 and 24, both inclusive, as 66,247; between the ages of 25 and 29, both inclusive, 165,369, and between the ages of 30 and 34, both inclusive, 198,328, making the total number of married men between the ages of 20 and 34, both inclusive, 429,944. I need not remind the House that from this number there must be deducted those who would not be fit for military service when their condition was disclosed upon medical examination. My recollection is that of those who have volunteered in Canada for active service overseas, about 25 per cent have been rejected upon the first examination. A certain smaller percentage—I do not know just what it would be, but possibly 10 per cent— would also have to be deducted, representing those discharged as unfit for service after having been taken on. Then all the considerations have to be taken into account which are enumerated both in the exceptions embodied in the schedule to the Act and in the principles upon which exemptions are to be carried out. I went pretty fully into these matters on the first reading of the Bill, and it does not seem to be necessary to repeat now what I then said.

I will therefore conclude by commending to the House this measure, which has been prepared with great care and with an earnest desire to do justice to all classes of the people, I trust that it may be received in the spirit in which it has been prepared and presented. I do very earnestly hope that the opinion of the House with regard to it may be expressed as speedily as possible in order that whatever aid and support this country is capable of giving to the gallant men who are fighting to-day our battle and the battle of humanity shall be given with the least possible delay.

Right Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Mr. Speaker, a week ago the Prime Minister in his concluding remarks on introducing this Bill expressed the hope that the measure would be discussed with fairness and moderation and without any bitter words or taunts. I can assure him that so far as we on this side of the House are concerned it will be our endeavour, even though we do not agree with the Bill, to facilitate it and to find out the truth about it, and we shall do that in such a spirit as to represent the views of all those who in this matter have nothing at heart but the interest of our country as God gives them to see it.

Indeed, I will go so far in this direction as not even to challenge the ominous words, amounting almost to a threat, which the Prime Minister used when he said that he was less concerned with the day when this Bill should pass, than with the day when our soldiers might return and find this Bill not passed. Sir, let me with moderation take absolute issue with my right hon. friend upon this point. The Canadian soldiers are citizens of Canada. They have left their avocations to do battle for a cause which they deem, and rightly deem, the cause of freedom. I would be loath to believe that when they return they will forget the principle to which they have dedicated their lives, whatever may be the fate reserved for this Bill by a still free people.

In approaching the discussion of this Bill with moderation and fairness we shall not depart from the path that every one of us in this Chamber has followed, and especially during the last three years. I appeal, Sir, to the sense of justice of all members of this House, whether, from the day that Canada entered the fiery furnace which has been raging now with unabated fury for nearly three years, we on this side of the House, His Majesty's loyal Opposition, have never uttered one word of dissent from any measure which has been presented by the Government for the prosecution of the war. To every such measure we have given our assent without hesitation, having always before us the preservation of harmony between all classes and races in this country, —harmony which is so essential to the task we have in hand. If to-day this harmony no longer exists, the fault is not with this side of the House.

To-day the Government bring down a measure to substitute for voluntary service, compulsory service—compulsory service, which the Government from the day the war broke out up to the 18th of April this year have said they never would resort to. But they have cast aside their oft-repeated assurances, and I rise to ask, with my humble voice, that we should pause and see whether or not this new measure will not be more detrimental than helpful to the cause which we all have at heart. Up to this date we on this side of the House, although sometimes sorely tried by the laches of the Government in the discharge of the momentous duties entrusted to their care, have never criticised except where criticism was unavoidable, and in such criticism we have always endeavoured to keep our divisions to ourselves, to uphold the prestige of England, and to show to the world, as far as we could, that all the races of this vast Empire were bound together in this tremendous struggle for freedom.

But I am sorry to say that the course which the Government is taking to-day is not in accordance with those principles of free government which we understand to be at the very foundation of the British constitution. If I rise to-day to oppose this Bill it is rather a sadness to me than otherwise, for my views have not changed upon the objects to be attained in this war. My heart is where it ever has been from the day that war broke out; I have not changed at all, and if any there be who think I am not consistent in taking the position I now take all I have to say is: Hear me; hear me for my cause.

The Prime Minister, in introducing this Bill a few days ago, said he was not deviating in any way from the law of the land. On that I again take absolute issue with him. The law of the land, which antedates Confederation, not by many years, but by many generations, and which was reintroduced very shortly after Confederation, emphatically declares that no man in Canada shall be subjected to compulsory military service except to repel invasion or for the defence of Canada. The law of the land goes so far as to give to the Government power to raise for the defence of Canada men not merely between the ages of 18 and 45, but between the ages of 18 and 60.

The law of the land gives power to the Government to repel invasion—that is what I understand by "the defence of Canada" —by summoning not only the class of men between 18 and 60, but by summoning everybody, old men of 70 and 80, and children of any age. They may summon everybody when the enemy is at the frontier, in order to preserve intact the soil of this our land. That is the way I understand the existing law. And in this the law of this land is not singular, for such has been the law of civilized nations everywhere. It was the law of France when Canada was in possession of France; it was the law of England when Canada came into possession of England. In France that law remained unaltered until 1798 when compulsion was introduced for the first time; it remained the law of England until last year. If ever there was a principle which was embedded in the very soil of Britain, it was that the King could demand no service of his people except for the protection of their land and the repelling of invasion. It is well known that the King of England could not for any other purpose claim the service of any of his subjects. The English people were always afraid of permanent armies; the English people again and again have fought against their kings, to vindicate the principle that large permanent armies be not established in Great Britain.

Now, the Prime Minister says that he is introducing no new principle, that he could have sent abroad the 400,000 men who have been sent, under the authority of the existing Act. Sir, I take issue with my right hon. friend on that, I say he had not any such power; I say that he could not under the Act as it is, send anybody across the ocean to serve in the war. He said the other day, and he has just repeated it, that the first line of our defence to-day is in Flanders and France. I claim against him that there never was any danger of invasion of Canada on the part of Germany. If I have taken the position I have hitherto taken it is not because I feared an invasion of Canada by Germany. Nobody could say consistently that at this time, or at any time within the three years of the war, Canada was for one instant in danger of invasion. If I have taken the position I have taken, if I have been, as I was and as I am, in favour of our participation in the war, it was not because I feared invasion but because I believed that the victory of Germany would mean for Canada, as for the rest of the world, envelopment in the black shroud of German hegemony with its insolence, cruelties, and barbarities.

In support of this contention of mine that this Government could not, under the Militia Act, send the forces that they did, I will contrast with the Government of to-day the Government of 1914. The Government then did not pretend that they were using the Militia Act in sending Canadian forces across the sea; they did not send them under that Act at all. Here is a despatch of His Royal Highness the Governor General, sent by the Prime Minister which is an absolute refutation of the doctrine which has just been asserted by him. This was sent by the Governor General to the Secretary of State for the colonies, and dated August 1, 1914:

Ottawa, August 1, 1914.

In view of the impending danger of war involving the Empire my Advisers are anxiously considering the most effective means of rendering every possible aid and they welcome any suggestions and advice which Imperial naval and military authorities may deem it expedient to offer. They are confident that a considerable force would be available for service abroad. A question has been mooted respecting the status of any Canadian force serving abroad as under section 69 of Canadian Militia Act the active militia can only be placed on actual service beyond Canada for the defence thereof.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: If it was "for the defence thereof" what was the necessity of stating that there was doubt as to the status of these troops?

It has been suggested that regiments might enlist as Imperial troops for stated periods, Canadian Government undertaking to make all necessary financial provision for their equipment, pay and maintenance.

Thus, at the very beginning of the war, it was recognized that the words "for the defence thereof" could not apply to this case; that the troops could not be sent under the Militia Act, and that they should be sent as Imperial troops and as serving voluntarily in the war. That is conclusive.

Sir SAM HUGHES: What is the date of that despatch?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: First of August, 1914. Then there is an Order in Council, passed on August 6, as follows:

The Committee of the Privy Council have had before them a report, dated 6th August, 1914, from the Minister of Militia and Defence, representing,—in view of the state of war now existing between the United Kingdom, and the Dominions, Colonies, and Dependencies of the British Empire on the one side, and Germany on the other side, creating a menace to the well-being and integrity of the Empire, and having regard to the duty of the Dominion of Canada as one of those Dominions to provide for its own defence and to assist in maintaining the integrity and honour of the Empire, that it is desirable to mobilize Militia units of the various arms of the service of such effective strength as may from time to time be determined by Your Royal Highness in Council, such units to be composed of officers' and men who are willing to volunteer for Overseas service under the British Crown.

And so this was for voluntary service alone. Nor is that all. There was this despatch sent by the Governor General on 5th of August:

My Government being desirous of putting beyond doubt status of Canadian volunteers requests that His Majesty may be pleased to issue an order bringing these volunteers under sections 175 and 176 of the Army Act.

Thus, being in doubt of the power of the Government to send troops under the Militia Act, they asked that the Government of Great Britain should issue an order to enlist them for the British Army. And so we have reason to believe that the Militia Act, as we have understood it, never applied to this case.

But I go further. It does not matter whether the position taken by the Government to-day is taken under one statute or under another. It does not matter whether the Bill that is proposed is an amendment of the Militia Act or is a new law, as I contend; the fact is that to-day the Government are bringing in a compulsory service Act, though they declared in this Parliament, from the day war was declared until the 18th of April last, that compulsory service they never would resort to.

What, then, is the condition, Mr. Speaker? It is a new condition altogether. I shall be told, of course, that the people have the right to change the laws, and that if conscription has not been the law of the land up to the present day, the people have the right to change the law so that henceforth conscription shall be the law of the land. To this I have certainly no objection to offer, with this I completely agree, as every man must agree. It is the people who must change the law, and all I ask is that the people have opportunity if they so wish to themselves change the law and not this Parliament, which, I claim, has not the right. Let the people speak and I have no objection and no complaint to make. Let the people speak and express their will. With that I shall be satisfied; I ask no more.

But, Sir, that is not all. I said at the commencement of my remarks, and I repeat it, that, according to the well understood principles of the British Constitution, this Parliament has no right to pass this law. The Prime Minister has no right to ask Parliament to pass this law according to its own declaration made once, and more than once, on the floor of this House. On the 1st of January, 1916, my right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) issued a message to the Canadian people that he would offer to contribute from Canada 500,000 men. My hon. friend referred to this in the opening sentences of his observations the other day, and he said that to this declaration no exception was taken, that with regard to it no observation was made, and that the credits for such a force were voted. He took that as a pledge. He had not intended it as a pledge, he said, but the Canadian people had so interpreted it. Here are his words, and I had better quote them in order that there may be no ambiguity:

> No criticism was made in Parliament of the action which the Government thus took; no motion was moved against the Government's action, and the necessary Parliamentary appropriations were voted unanimously. In many parts of the country my message was construed as a pledge. It was not issued as a pledge; it was the authorization of a further increase in the Canadian Expeditionary Forces; but it has been deemed to have been a pledge made on behalf of the Government and the people of this country, and I am content so to regard it.

Upon this point I have again to take issue with my right hon. friend. I say that the words which he pronounced upon an occasion subsequent to his offer, that is to say in the debate on the address of that year, constituted on his part a pledge that these 500,000 men would not be raised except by voluntary service and not by compulsion. I take issue, I say, with my right hon. friend, and it is for the House to decide when he says that we voted the appropriations and that we made no observations. On the contrary, we did make some observations. I wanted to know from him what it meant, whether this was to be done by obligatory or by voluntary service and in the debate on the Address I spoke in this way:

4 p.m.

> My right hon. friend the Prime Minister has the first day of this year issued a statement that he was prepared to offer 500,000 men. I shall not to-day discuss whether or not the premature statement of my right hon. friend was exactly on the lines of parliamentary government. I put aside all these questions on such a day as this. I understand that we shall have a statement made upon the offer of 500,000 men, which it seems to me is a large contract, but, again, upon this I pass no judgment. I shall be prepared, and my friends around me will be prepared to listen to, and to discuss in the spirit in which all such propositions should be discussed, the proposition which the Government deems essential to carry on the fight in which we are engaged. But let me say—and I believe that upon this we should have an expression of opinion—that we must repel at once the impression which has been sought to be created that this offer is a preliminary step to conscription. There is to be no conscription in Canada. Sir, there has been an attempt made for many years to frighten the people with the spectre of conscription. There are some men in this House, as you know who in the elections of 1911 stated that the enactment of the naval law was a prelude to conscription. There are men in the province of Quebec who have been asserting that the moment conscription was adopted in Great Britain, conscription would be adopted or proposed in Canada. The naval law has been for six years on the statute book. It is still there; it has not been repealed, as many members in this House were pledged to repeal it. It is there, and there is yet no conscription. Conscription has come in England, but conscription is not to come in Canada. So far as conscription in England is concerned, it would be in bad taste, nay, it would be impertinent for us to attempt to pass any remarks, either of approval or of disapproval with regard to it. For my own part I am free to say that I expected that Great Britain would be able to carry on this stupendous war under her old system of voluntary enlistment. The British Government have thought otherwise; they have thought that the magnitude, the stupendous magnitude of the war we have to face, compelled them to resort to conscription, and the step taken by the government seems to meet with the approval of the great majority of the English people. But, Sir, the conditions are not the same in Canada as in Great Britain. The reasons why there can be no conscription in Canada are obvious.

Then I pass on to the conclusion:

That there is some foundation for it I believe, but I do not think the movement has assumed such proportions as are here indicated. At all events, there is enough to show that it is important that we should have at once from my right hon. friend the Prime Minister an authoritative statement upon this point.

That is, I asked for an authoritative statement from the Prime Minister as to whether or not there was to be compulsion or no compulsion. My right hon. friend, thus challenged, answered, and here is the manner in which he answered when I asked him whether or not this offer of 500,000 men meant conscription or no conscription:

My right hon. friend has alluded to conscription—to the idea in this country or elsewhere that there may be conscription in Canada. In speaking in the first two or three months of this war I made it clear to the people of Canada that we did not propose any conscription. I repeat that announcement to-day with emphasis.

Could anything be clearer than that this was not a step towards conscription, but that it was intended that the 500,000 men should be raised simply by voluntary enlistment?

But, that is not all. Time went on and a great number of men were enlisted. In the debate on the Address of this very year, in the month of January last, this subject was referred to and this is the manner in which my right hon. friend spoke of the result of his attempts to obtain 500,000 men:

With regard to recruiting, the response has been good—

Sir SAM HUGHES: What date?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: In January, 1917; I have not the exact date, but it was during the debate on the Address.

With regard to recruiting, the response has been good from all the provinces of Canada. It has been splendid. It may be that at first the Maritime Provinces and the province of Quebec were a little slower than some of the other provinces of Canada, but I know from information which has reached me recently that the enlistment in those provinces is now all that could be desired, and is thoroughly responsive to the call which has been made. It is appropriate that I should here pay a tribute to those Canadians of French origin who are fighting in France for the Fatherland of their ancestors. Among them are many who have distinguished themselves. At the moment I recall the names of Papineau, Barré, Dansereau and Roy. No greater, no more heroic deed has been or could be performed in this war than that of Major Roy, who died in the endeavour to save his men from danger. His name, for that gallant deed, ought ever to be blazoned in the memory of all Canadians.

These words were spoken not more than six months ago, in the first days of this session, in the debate on the Address, and you will find that, certainly by these words of the Prime Minister, it was not his intention to resort to compulsion. Nay, he was quite satisfied with the progress in recruiting that had been made in all the provinces. Yet, that is not all. Time went on and the Government seem to have been changing their opinion.

Rumours were commencing to be heard to the effect that, after all, there would be conscription. Then another view prevailed, and it was not to have military service but to call for 50,000 men for home defence. And on the 16th of March last an Order in Council was passed authorizing the Minister of Militia:

To raise 50,000 men for home defence, excluding troops already called out under Order in Council dated August 6, 1914, and that it forms part of the force of 500,000 men to which reference is made in Order in Council dated January 12, 1916. It is understood that the conditions of enlistment applying to the above-mentioned partial mobilization of the active militia apply only to service in Canada for home defence.

Service for home defence? Against whom were these men called upon to defend Canada? Who was threatening Canada in the month of March, 1917, so that she required 50,000 men to look after her defence? Where was the enemy? Sir, that was not the real intent of this Order in Council; it was a pretense. The real intent is to be found in the numerous paragraphs which appeared at that time in the ministerial press to the effect that these men were to be trained and that after they had been trained they would probably enlist voluntarily for overseas services. Sir, this Order in Council was certainly passed with great levity. Who could have expected that the Government would find men ready to enlist for home defence, that is to say, to kick their heels in the streets of the cities, without having anything to do and no enemy to fight against? Who could have expected that any man would come forward and proclaim himself a coward, that he would not enlist to go and fight, but that he would enlist for home defence only when there was no danger. This Order in Council was repealed almost as soon as it was passed—I do not know whether it was actually repealed, but if it was not repealed it was at all events not acted upon, and it is still dormant in the dust of the pigeon holes of the Militia Department. But, now, after all this, suddenly, without any preparation, without a word of advice, all of a sudden the Government, on the 18th of April last, come forward and say that they are going to introduce compulsory military service!

That is not all; there is something more. In the speech from the Throne in 1916, there was a statement that an extension of the term of Parliament was to be asked. Parliament was to expire in the month of October of that year, and the statement was put in the mouth of the Governor General that an extension of the term of Parliament for one year more would be asked. In due time the resolution came up for the acceptance of Parliament. When it first came up, shortly after the debate on the Address, we had still in our ears the pledge of the Prime Minister that there would be no conscription whatever, and that the 500,000 men would be enlisted on the voluntary principle. And having that pledge in our ears we granted voluntarily an extension of the life of Parliament until the month of October of this year. Would any one believe that if the Government had told us at that time that they contemplated introducing the new, radical, principle of conscription, Parliament would have been extended? If that statement had been made, if Parliament had been led to believe that there was to be conscription, that compulsory service was to be proposed, would Parliament not have said: Let the Constitution take its course, and let the people at once deal with the question. That would have been the attitude of Parliament.

Sir, in the face of all those pledges made by the Government to Parliament, and through Parliament to the people, I say that Parliament has not the right to pass the law which it is now asked to pass. It has the power to pass it I know, this moribund Parliament may have this might, but it has not the right, and might and right are two different things, as we know. Right against might is the very principle for which we are fighting in this war. I ask my right hon. friend if he is doing fairly by the people of Canada when he asks this moribund Parliament to enact such a law. Yes, it is not only a moribund Parliament, it is a rump—it is nothing but a rump Parliament at the present time. There are twenty seats vacant of the members elected in 1911. There are twenty-two more seats to be filled which must be filled by the new provinces of the West whose population justifies this addtional number being added to their representation. So that you have vacancies of over forty members out of two hundred and twenty members, almost twenty-five per cent of the whole membership of this House. And yet, you are asking that this Parliament should take on itself to pass such a law as this For my part I say, and I place myself in the judgment of the country, and of this Parliament also, that when the Government asks this moribund Parliament to pass such a law it is an abuse of the authority which has been placed in them by the people of Canada. But I shall be asked, perhaps: can you not do what has been done in the United States? In the United States they have just passed a law establishing conscription, and is our constitution inferior to the American constitution? Inferior? Our constitution on this point is superior to the American constitution. Our constitution is elastic; the American constitution is drastic and rigid, it cannot be extended. But, Sir, under our constitution it is a principle now admitted that if any new question comes up during the régime of a Parliament—a question which would vastly change the whole condition of things in the country—then under such circumstances it is preferable to have a dissolution, and to have the people pass on it. Then we may be told, perhaps: But what is now asked of the Canadian Parliament was also asked of the British Parliament, and it is hardly one year ago since the British Parliament itself passed the law of conscription in the two kingdoms; Ireland being excluded. Sir, again there is a vast difference. It is true that the term of the British Parliament has been extended. It is true that that law has been passed. But it is true also that it was passed after long preparation; it was not brought on of a sudden. Another fact is that the British Parliament through by-elections was complete and has been complete at all times throughout the war. Every seat as it has become vacant has been filled, and by this means the British House of Commons has been kept in touch with the people. But here we have not had a by-election for two years except elections in cases when newly appointed Ministers of the Crown were compelled to seek re-election. Outside of these there has not been an election; Parliament has not been in touch with the country for two years and more, and it seems to me that this is an additional reason why we should not proceed with this Bill.

But, Sir, there is more than this. Let us put aside this aspect of the question altogether and let us come down to the merits of the question now placed before this House. Hitherto I have discussed the power of this Parliament to pass the law.

I do not dispute that Parliament has the power, but again I dispute its right to exercise the compulsion which it is sought to impose to-day.

My right hon. friend made a passing allusion to the fact that he had asked me to go into a coalition with him in order to pass a conscription law, and the correspondence which passed between us has been placed before Parliament. I stated then that I could not agree to go into a coalition Government.

I suggested to him that if my humble advice in regard to this law would be useful I should have been called in sooner, so as to be able to discuss the principle itself. It seemed to me, in the fitness of things, that that would have been the proper course in the interest of the country—that the services of the Opposition, such as they might be, should have been called in for the purpose of initiating such a new policy. The first thing to be done, in my belief, was to consult the Opposition in regard to that policy, but I was called upon to be an adjunct, an appendix, to endorse a law which had been already framed, and to go into a Government one-half of which would have had to go out, if I had come in. I submitted my objection to my right hon. friend. He told me, however, that he thought it preferable that the Bill should be prepared before submitting it to me. When I stated my position to my right hon. friend he said he thought differently, and I knew that he thought differently. He knows now that I thought differently also, and it is for the country to judge who thought wisely upon that occasion.

Coming to the merits of this proposition: Should we, or should we not, have compulsion. That brings me to the very basis of the whole question. Conscription is a new word in the language of Britain. It was in existence in France 100 years before it came up for discussion in England, but when it was discussed in England it was thoroughly discussed. The war broke out in August, 1914, and in January, 1915, the matter was brought up by Lord Middleton in the House of Lords and was fully considered. It was brought up again in the House of Commons, and again later on, in October, 1915, the Derby system of enlistment was introduced, and that system was supposed to lead to conscription, and conscription was passed. But even when the measure was made law it was not endorsed by everybody. Sir John Simon, one of the luminaries of the Bar, then Attorney General, resigned his seat, and, when it came to the final division, some forty of the Liberal members went with him in to the Opposition lobby. All this shows that the country was prepared for conscription when it was brought up. It was not dashed at them without preparation. It was not introduced, as it has been in Canada, without any preparation of the people by educating them to an understanding of it. The one thing which I suggested to my hon. friend and to his Government—the one thing of all in which I think he failed—was the fact that there was a public opinion in the country which had to be reconciled upon this matter, and that any such legislation as this is always sure to bring forward a very sincere opposition. This is exactly what has happened, as we see to-day, because, after all, everybody in this House is aware that at the moment I am speaking there is a deep cleavage amongst the Canadian people. I ask my hon. friends opposite are we entitled to vote on this question now? Under this system no doubt a few more recruits will be obtained, but they are encouraging a line of cleavage which is already too far advanced. When I speak of cleavage I do not mean cleavage between province and province, but cleavage among classes of the same origin, and the same language, all over Canada, because everybody knows that if there is an accentuated opposition in one province, to which I shall refer later, there is in all the provinces of the Dominion at the present moment, amongst the working classes, an opposition to this measure which is not wavering, but which is becoming stronger every day. We all know that resolution after resolution is being passed by organized labour and associations, not only in one province, but in all the provinces of the Dominion, from British Columbia, on the Pacific to the provinces washed by the Atlantic. It is asked why the labouring classes should be opposed to conscription. It has been asked if they were less patriotic than the other classes of the community. No, they are not less patriotic. They have as much at heart the success of our cause as have any other, but it must be remembered that there are no classes of the community upon which the sacrifices, which are involved in war, fall so heavily as upon the labouring classes. This is the reason why I shall ask the Parliament of Canada to take some further step, to which I will allude in a moment, before such a measure is enacted. I repeat what I said a moment ago, that the sacrifices and hardships of the war fall most heavily upon the working classes. The wealthy young man who goes to war is a hero. He goes to war and sacrifices his life at a time, perhaps, when life has the greatest attractions. In this he is not on a different footing from his poor neighbour, who sacrifices his life, and to whom life is just as dear as to the man who happens to be wealthy. If he loses his limbs, or is crippled in any way, the wealthy man comes to a home in which he will find every comfort, but the poor man has to go to a home where he cannot have comforts, since because of his physical infirmity, he can no longer earn his living. It is no wonder that among these classes there should be opposition to the scheme, not because they are less patriotic, but because they feel that if they are to be conscripted, and called upon to pay that tribute with the rest of the community, at least certain things should be done which would somewhat equalize matters. And what do they ask? They ask that if they are to be called upon to give their blood, the wealthy class should, at least, give their wealth in support of the cause.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: They have asked something more. They have asked that this Parliament should not pass this law until it has had the advantage of being thoroughly debated before the people, and that the people should have an opportunity to express their opinion upon it? Is that an unreasonable or unjust demand? No Sir, it is neither unjust nor unreasonable, but it is denied. I ask now: is it too late to ask the Government to yield to the petitions which have been received from all the working classes, praying that the people shall be consulted? No, it is not too late, and in the name of union and good-will, I personally present the plea of these classes at the bar of this House, and I ask that the people be consulted.

But there are objections stated to this course, and what is urged by those who object? They say: "No, this cannot be granted, because recruiting must proceed at once, and the gaps must be filled immediately." So be it. I do not deny that, but I ask, which is the course most conducive to success in the war compulsion with irritation and bitterness and a sense of intolerance and injustice, or, consultation, with consequent union and universal satisfaction all round?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

[Sir Wilfrid Laurier.]

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: This is the cause for which I constitute myself the humble apostle before the Canadian Parliament at this moment. But there is another class which has been strongly opposed to conscription, I refer to the French Canadian portion of our population. This is a tender subject, and I desire to approach it with all moderation, as I belong to that race.

It has often been wondered why the people of Quebec have not volunteered in larger numbers. It has been asked: Has their blood degenerated? It is sufficient to say that those French Canadians who have enlisted have given answer to that question upon the battlefields of France and Flanders, where they have performed their duty in such manner as to win the applause of all their comrades in arms, and of all the Canadian people.

The fact that the men of Quebec have not enlisted in larger numbers does not mean that they have degenerated. Conditions prevail in the province of Quebec which do not exist elsewhere. According to the figures of enlistment which were brought down a few days ago, the English-speaking portion of the community contributed 280,000 men; of these about 125,000 were Canadian-born; the remainder were English-born. The number of French Canadians enlisted was given as 14,000. I have given a good deal of attention to this subject. I followed the enlistment movement very closely as it proceeded. A friend of mine who is competent in statistics, and who followed matters closely for me, tells me that he thinks the figure of 14,000 is inaccurate, and that the number of Canadians speaking the French language who enlisted is about 20,000. The figure may or may not be correct; I shall not dispute them. Even at 20,000, it is very small compared with that which represents the enlistment of English-speaking Canadians. If the enlistment of French Canadians does not compare favourably with the enlistment of their compatriots speaking the English language, it is to be noted that the disparity between the enlistment of men who are Canadian-born and men who are British-born is also somewhat marked. What can be the cause of this disparity? The English-born are at the top of the list, the Canadian-born speaking the English language come next, and the Canadian-born of French origin are at the bottom of the list. It is suggested that enlistment has proceeded negatively in proportion to the length of time that the men have been in the country. The French-Canadians, who have been longer in the country than any other class of the community, have contributed fewer than the others. The native English-speaking Canadians, who have been in the country not so long as the French Canadians, but longer than the British-born, have contributed the next lowest number of men, while the British-born, who have been in the country only a short time, have contributed the most. At all events, the French Canadians have had no relations with France since 1760. I am sure that not one man in the province of Quebec has any relatives natives of France, unless it be as a result of recent marriage. I think it may be truthfully said on the other hand that there is not an English-speaking family in Canada which cannot claim relatives in Great Britain. Immigration has been constant from the British Isles, and the connection between the British settler and his motherland has been maintained. This is not the case as between the French Canadian and old France.

But there is another circumstance to which attention should be given. The French inhabitants were disarmed shortly after the long struggle between England and France for the possession of the northern part of the continent—a struggle which was carried on over this portion of the continent from Cape Breton to the Ohio river. They were disarmed shortly after the last contest in this great struggle between Montcalm and Wolfe, which resulted in the defeat of Montcalm, a defeat which the Chevalier de Levis could not retrieve. The disarming was not done brutally, offensively, or after the German manner; yet it was done. As soon as the struggle between France and England ceased, rumblings of discontent were heard, in the British colonies, and the British Parliament not unnaturally thought that it would not be prudent to leave arms in the hands of His Majesty's new subjects. I hold in my hand a proclamation issued by General Amherst, who was at that time commander of the British forces on this continent. In this proclamation, which was issued about three weeks after the surrender of Chevalier de Levis at Montreal, the disarmament of all Canadian subjects was ordered. It is in French, but I will translate it:

> Let it be known that we have constituted and established Monsieur Gage, Brigadier of the armies of the King, to be Governor of the city of Montreal and of its dependencies; and that we have also appointed Monsieur Burton, Colonel of His Majesty's troops, to be Governor of Three Rivers and of its dependencies. All the inhabitants under the government of Three Rivers who have not yet surrendered their arms must deliver them at such places as shall be designated by Monsieur Burton.

There is another paragraph to the effect that officers shall be permitted to retain their arms and that arms may be possessed also by those who hold special permission.

Sir SAM HUGHES: That was before the treaty of peace was signed.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: That was before the treaty of 1763, immediately after the capitulation to General Amherst of the French troops in Montreal under Chevalier de Levis. From that date to this there has been a total abandonment of military organization among the French people of Quebec. Any military organization that has existed has been on paper only; it was never actually established in the province. The Act passed in 1863 to create regiments all over the country remained a dead letter in the province of Quebec. A few regiments were established in the cities, but in the rural parts of the community the Act was a dead letter.

Such was the condition of public opinion on these matters, or rather the absence of public opinion—until 1910 when the Naval Bill was introduced in this House. Everybody remembers that the Naval Bill was fought with great bitterness by the Nationalists in the province of Quebec. The Nationalists had been organized by Mr. Bourassa in 1903, the first article of their platform being: no participation by Canada in Imperial wars outside her own territory. This was the doctrine preached by Mr. Bourassa and his friends from 1903 up to the date I have just mentioned. In 1910, when the Navy Bill was introduced, this doctrine was preached by the Nationalists with new vigour and with new bitterness. It was first put to the test in the election in Drummond-Arthabaska. Everybody is aware that the doctrine of "no participation in war" won Drummond and Arthabaska for the Conservative party at that time. Then came the election of 1911, in which there was a close alliance between the Conservative party of that day and the Nationalists in the province of Quebec. On the issue which I have mentioned this election was fought—in the province of Quebec, at all events—and the result is well known. Well, Sir, whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he reap. The Conservatives obtained a victory. In the province of Quebec the Liberals went into the contest with 50 seats on their side, fifteen being held by their opponents.

We came back with 37 and the Conservatives with 27, and almost every man of those 27 was elected on the platform and the promise that Canada should never participate in the wars of Great Britain. The polling figures are still more significant. The Liberal vote polled in that election was 164,281, and the Conservative 159,299; so the people were divided pretty equally. In view of these figures, and the fact that those 27 were elected upon the platform of no participation by Canada in the wars of Great Britain, is it surprising that there has been so little enlistment in Quebec? When the Government wanted the people of Quebec to enlist they could appeal to only one-half of the province and not to the other half.

But that is not all. I have another reproach to address to the Government of the day. They never took any steps and never did anything conducive to enlistment in the province of Quebec. If Quebec had been properly appealed to, for my part I believe the people would have responded on an equal footing with the other provinces.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Were any different steps taken in the province of Quebec from any other province?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Oh, yes.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Not at all.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I will say this. The selections that were made were very unhappy indeed. After all, men are composed of flesh and blood, and if my hon. friend had put at the head of recruiting in Quebec a man of their flesh and blood the results would have been different. The French people of Quebec are no better than any other class of people in this country; they are no worse either. They have their passions and their prejudices; I do not deny that they have their prejudices. In a matter of this kind it is wise to appeal not to the passions but to the good feelings and the pride of men. I repeat that if my hon. friend had taken any share in that respect the results would have been different. To the testimony of the ex-Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes) I will oppose the words of a member of the present Government, one of his own colleagues. I cannot give him a better answer than this: Mr. Blondin took off his coat—

Sir SAM HUGHES: Pardon me, Colonel Blondin.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I stand corrected. There are so many colonels in this country that I had forgotten this one. I am blesssed with a pretty good memory, but there is a limit even to counting, and I do not know whether the ex-minister himself knows how many honorary colonels he has appointed. But let that pass. Colonel Blondin says in his letter:

> Short as it was, it was enough to show that if Quebec had been well organized from the French Canadian point of view at the beginning of the war, and if the organization had been immediately placed under the direction of a man like General Lessard, and an appeal made to all French Canadians to enlist in French Canadian units and preserve their identity, Quebec would have replied en masse.

Those are the words of Colonel Blondin. Though I do not often agree with him, in military matters or in anything else, I feel satisfied that on this occasion he spoke absolutely correctly and conclusively. Shall I give my hon. friend one instance where a mistake was made? Mr. Asselin, with Mr. Bourassa, was one of the organizers of the Nationalist movement. He was a man of considerable authority, and was one of those who said that under no circumstances should Canada ever fight for Great Britain. But to his eternal glory Mr. Asselin came to the front in 1915 and offered his services to the then Minister of Militia. I am proud to say that the minister accepted his services; he even offered to make him a colonel, but Mr. Asselin had no desire to become a colonel; he accepted a minor rank, as he said he had no military experience, and he helped to raise a regiment. That regiment should have been sent to the front immediately it was raised, but instead it was sent to Bermuda, and when eventually it was sent from Bermuda to England it was broken up and the men scattered in different units. If Major Asselin's regiment had gone to the front intact, it would have made a reputation for the French Canadians, because if there is one man of courage it is Major Asselin. If his services had been utilized in recruiting, or the services of Captain Papineau, Colonel Barré, or the other men mentioned by the Prime Minister at the beginning of the session as having distinguished themselves in the war, the results would have been very different.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Every gentleman my right hon. friend has named tried to recruit and failed.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Captain Papineau never was asked to recruit.

Sir SAM HUGHES: He was hooted off the platform in Montreal not so very long ago. Papineau came home and failed as regards recruiting, if my recollection serves me right.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: There are Papineaus and Papineaus. Captain Talbot Papineau, who by the way is a great grandson of Papineau the agitator, and a second cousin of Mr. Bourassa, has never to my knowledge returned to this country since he went to the front, but it is not too late even now, I hope. I say that when my right hon. friend had in his possession such a letter as that from his colleague, Colonel Blondin, he was not justified in changing from the policy of voluntary recruiting to compulsory service before making another attempt with the voluntary system.

There is another man who should have been sent to Quebec immediately war broke out, and that is General Lessard. He is a French Canadian, at least partly so, and a good soldier. He was brought up in Quebec, served in South Africa, and has a splendid military record. According to Colonel Blondin, if General Lessard had been sent to Quebec immediately on the declaration of war, the results would have been very different.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Might I interpose to correct an impression which might be created by my right hon. friend's remarks? I did ask General Lessard about a year ago, in June, 1916, to take charge of recruiting in the province of Quebec. Further than that, I would ask my right hon. friend to remember that General Lessard has been recently engaged there in recruiting with Colonel Blondin, and I regret to say with not very great success.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Perhaps my right hon. friend would permit me to say—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Sir SAM HUGHES: If the right hon. gentleman does not wish to get it now, he will get it later.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The objection did not come from me. Go on.

Sir SAM HUGHES: During the very first year of the war General Lessard was asked to go to Quebec. He stated that he had no influence in Quebec, that he detested the place, and that they detested him. Moreover, I spoke to leading French Canadian gentlemen, and they advised me not to send him there, as he had no influence in the province; I think that statement has been borne out by the results of his campaign with Colonel Blondin.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: As to the controversies between the ex-Minister of Militia and General Lessard, I have nothing to say, as I know nothing about them. I have simply stated what Colonel Blondin says, and I repeat it:

> Short as it was, it was enough to show that if Quebec had been well organized from the French Canadian point of view at the beginning of the war, and if the organization had been immediately placed under the direction of a man like General Lessard, and an appeal made to all French Canadians to enlist in French Canadian units and preserve their identity, Quebec would have replied en masse.

I repeat that, in my humble judgment, when the Prime Minister had in his possession such a letter as that, coming from his own colleague, he had no justification for substituting compulsory service for voluntary service.

This is not a case of the province of Quebec alone; it applies to all the provinces of the Dominion. We have before us one of the most complicated questions that has ever come before Parliament at any time. There is no doubt at all in regard to it there are deep differences of opinion in the country, and deep differences of opinion in this House. There are here to-day men with whom I have worked in political association for thirty years, who are in favour of conscription; and men there are on the other side supporting the Government who are opposed to conscription. When you have such a state of affairs you see how deep are the differences on this question. Can you say that it is wise, that it is good policy, that it is conductive to harmony, in the face of such a condition, to force upon the people compulsory service? It seems to me that the Government would have been better advised if, instead of proposing compulsory service, they had maintained the unity of all the elements that compose our population. There is no use in blinking the facts; the facts are as I have stated. Let us face the situation courageously, and face it so as to have harmony amongst ourselves, and so that we may bring the greatest strength to the support of our troops at the front as well as to the cause of the Empire in the war in which we are engaged. We live under British institutions. We are a democratic country. Problems we have, problems we have always had and shall always have. The solution of our present problem is to appeal to our people, to appeal to them to lay aside passion and prejudice and ask them to make a sacrifice of something that they hold dear upon the altar of our common country.

Before I depart from this subject, may I be permitted to refer for a moment to a speech delivered a few days ago in the city of London by General Smuts of South Africa. The Prime Minister, I am sure, will be the first to admit, having met General Smuts, having been with him in the Imperial Conference, that for the time being he was the lion of London. It was natural that whenever he appeared in London or elsewhere in Britain, every one should recall the fact that fifteen years before South Africa was at war with Britain, and that he himself had been one of the foremost generals opposing Britain in the war. To-day he comes to Great Britain to represent his country, now part of the British Empire, and endowed with the blessings of British liberty. Here is a spectacle which is not seen every day—which has never been seen, perhaps, anywhere except in England itself. What a spectacle it is; what a lesson; what a triumph for British institutions. The Romans used to make slaves of defeated nations; it was their custom to chain the most illustrious of their captives to the chariot wheels of their victorious generals. Britain makes freemen of her defeated enemies, and places the most illustrious of them at the head of the procession in every triumphal march. This could not be anywhere but in England.

These facts are known to everybody, but I may be permitted to refer to the lesson they have for this country. In 1901 Mr. Bourassa, then member for Labelle, brought in a resolution to condemn the course we had taken in the South African war. I had to reply for the Government, and I said that in my estimation Britain's cause in the war was absolutely just and that under the circumstances she could not avoid war. I reminded the House that President Kruger had invited British immigrants to settle in South Africa under the promise and pledge that they should be treated as citizens of the republic. I told how British immigrants came in large numbers, had opened mines, had founded cities, had added greatly to the wealth of the country and contributed heavily to its treasury. I told them that the pledges made by President Kruger had been violated; that instead of being made citizens of the republic these immigrants were made outlanders; that the period of probation had been extended from one year to five years, from five, to ten, to fourteen years, making it absolutely impossible for them to become citizens of the republic; yet they were heavily taxed, and yet deprived of power to present their case in Parliament. I reminded the House of the telegrams, the audacious telegrams sent by President Kruger, calling upon the English to get out of South Africa. I said that these Dutch had appealed to the arbitratment of war, that they had lost and must take the consequences. And I added:

> I pledge my reputation and my name as a British subject, that if they have lost their independence they have not lost their freedom. There is but one future for South Africa, and that future is a grand confederation on the pattern of the Canadian confederation. It is a federation in which Cape Colony and Natal, and the Orange Free State, and the Transvaal, and Rhodesia, shall be united together under a federal constitution, under the British flag, and under the sovereignty of England.

The prophecy to which I pledged my word and reputation has been more than verified. The Transvaal was conquered. But in 1906 Britain gave them a charter of freedom as complete as we have in this country, as complete as they have in Great Britain. Of that new country, that British country, General Botha became the Prime Minister, and it was a colleague of General Botha, General Smuts, who was in England to represent his country at the Imperial Conference. I come now to the words which were spoken by General Smuts at a banquet given him a few days ago in England by the two Houses of Parliament. I wish I could quote his whole speech, but I shall give only a few sentences.

> All the Empires we have known in the past, and that exist to-day, are founded on the idea of assimilation, of trying to force human material into one mould. . . . . You don't want to standardize the nations of the British Empire; you want to develop them towards a greater nationality. These communities, whether they are the offspring of a Mother Country, or territories, like my own, which have been annexed after the vicissitudes of war, must not be moulded in any one pattern. . . That is the fundamental fact we have to bear in mind—that the British Commonwealth of Nations does not stand for standardization or conventionalization, but for the fuller, richer and more various life of all the nations comprised in it.

If there is any place where these words should be remembered, it is in this country of Canada.

If they mean anything they mean that we should always remember that all human flesh cannot be put in the same mould, they mean that if the British Empire is to live, as I hope it will, it must be in accordance with the idea of unity in diversity, and diversity towards unity. If these words of wisdom uttered by General Smuts were to be remembered throughout Canada, whether it be Ontario, or Quebec, or any of the other provinces, the bickerings and suspicions which too often prevail between race and race would be forgotten and there would be that growth in the commonwealth of British nations of which General Smuts has spoken. That is the idea which I want to impress upon this Parliament and this country. We are of diverse races, but we are all British subjects; we want to remain British subjects, and to preserve the unity of all the races that compose the British Empire. But if we are to attain that end we must respect one another. There is the prejudice which I have spoken of. The French people have not enlisted as they should have. That I admit, and nobody regrets it more than I. But in British countries there is only one way, and the sovereign way, of meeting all these differences. It is to appeal to the country and to appeal to the whole country, not to one section, but to all sections, and when the country has pronounced then the question is settled and all must submit to the law.

What I propose is that we should have a referendum and a consultation of the people upon this question. I have taken the referendum, not that I have been very favourable towards it, but I find that the idea of the referendum has made enormous progress in Canada, and that it has been adopted by the political associations in the western provinces as a method of political action. If we are to have peace, if there is to be unity, we must meet the wishes of the labouring classes, who have asked for this privilege. When the consultation with the people has been had, when the verdict has been pronounced, I pledge my word, my reputation, that to the verdict, such as it is, every man will submit, and I claim to speak at least so far as is concerned the province from which I come. Is that an unfair situation, is that an unfair appeal? Can anybody say that it is not in accordance with true democratic principles? This I leave to the consideration of those whom I see before me.

But in presenting this motion I do not intend—and I beg to make myself perfectly clear upon that—to bind any man of those who sit behind and around me and with whom I share the honour of representing Liberalism in this House. If there is ever to be a time when every man should think for himself, decide for himself and act for himself it is the present. This moment is too solemn, the issue is too great, the questions involved in the measure are of too far-reaching importance to have them decided by any other voice than the voice of each man's individual conscience. I am very firm in the belief, I am unshaken in it, that when the voice of every man has been heard, the aggregate will be the true voice, the right voice, and the right solution. At all events, it will have this effect, that it will be the final arbiter and it will put an end to the agitation which is now going on; it will bring about harmony, now much disturbed, and it will be a vindication of that spirit of democracy which we hope and believe must be the future social inspiration of the world. I beg to move, therefore, seconded by Mr. Oliver:—

That all the words of the question after the word "that" be struck out and the following be substituted therefor:—

"The further consideration of this Bill be deferred until the principle thereof has, by means of a referendum, been submitted to and approved of by the electors of Canada."

Before I sit down let me at once answer an objection which has been made. It has been stated that this referendum should not be taken because the soldiers could not vote. Soldiers could not vote? What does it mean? Soldiers are electors and if they are electors they have the right to vote and must vote. But, it has been stated that they cannot vote because they are at the war. What nonsense is that, I want to know. Why could they not vote because they are at the war? To tell us that they cannot vote because they are at the war is to tell me something I do not understand. We know that there may be difficulties in the way. We pointed that out two years ago when we discussed the Bill providing for soldiers' voting, but we obviated those difficulties and before the Bill was passed we asked the Government that it should be submitted to the War Office to ascertain whether there was any objection to it. The War Office responded that they had no objection to it. The Bill was sanctioned. Then, it was said that it would take a long time to take the votes of the soldiers, that the boxes could not be sent without delay. The boxes have been in England for two years; they were sent immediately after the Bill had been sanctioned, at a time when it was supposed and stated, that the people were clamouring for an election in tones louder than thunder. So, the boxes are there, the thing can be done, and, Mr. Speaker, if there is a referendum at all, every class, every interest, the soldiers included, should be given an opportunity of casting their votes so that we shall have the true verdict of the people. Again, I repeat that when the verdict of the people has been given, there can be no further question, and everybody will have to submit to the law. And again I repeat the pledge I gave a moment ago on behalf of my own province that every man, even although he is to-day opposed to the law, shall do service as well as any man of any other race.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, nothing could be more moderate or milder, than the tone in which my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) has taken part in the discussion this afternoon. I might say with equal truth that nothing could be much more indefinite than his argument and his conclusions. The most of his speech was taken up in threading old and long-used paths.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: They are the best sometimes.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I had an idea that progress meant rather the blocking out of new paths. One would not have gathered from my right hon. friend's speech from beginning to end that a titanic struggle such as the world has never seen before is going on at this very hour on the plains of France or that 400,000 Canadians,
5 p.m. cheered by my right hon. friend, bidden God-speed by him as they paraded on Parliament Hill in this city on their way overseas were now fighting in the trenches and expecting as they have reason to expect help from their fellow Canadians, and support up to the final moment of triumph.

In all these long days of praise and admiration of the heroism of the sons of Canada, British-born and Canadian-born as well, there was no intimation from my right hon. friend that when in time of deadly peril their call for help came from the blood stained trenches he would wait to take a referendum to determine whether the sorely needed help should be forthcoming.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It seems to me that my right hon. friend is scarcely living in the atmosphere of to-day, but that he has transferred himself into historic times, and that his strong penchant for historic recollections and reminiscences has led him to pay too little heed to the strenuous issues, the tremendously grave conditions, that face us at this moment. I am not going to follow closely all the arguments he has made. I will, however, touch lightly upon a few. His first was the constitutional or legal argument, which I am scarcely in a position to debate, because I have had no special legal training. But I have a knowledge of English and I think I know what English means. I read the section of the Militia Act to which my right hon. friend alluded:

> Her Majesty may call out the militia or any part thereof for actual service either within or without the Dominion—

That does not mean that the militia are to be called either within or without the Dominion, but that the militia are to be called out for service either within or without the Dominion. Surely that is a plain English statement.

> —whenever it appears advisable so to do by reason of war, invasion, or insurrection, or danger of any of them.

I think that is a clear English statement

> And the militia men when so called out for actual service shall continue to serve, etc.—

There is the language itself, a common-sense interpretation conveys a clear meaning. I am supported also by legal opinion, the highest legal opinion that the Government has to guide it. Our Department of Justice—as it was constituted in 1904 in my right hon. friend's time, as, with its experience and knowledge and traditions, it is constituted to-day, both in 1904 and to-day—gave it and gives it as its opinion that the Militia Act under that wording did give authority that Canadian soldiers could be sent out of the country when the circumstances that are detailed there arose. My right hon. friend is a lawyer. There are other legal men in this House, but I think that Sir Charles Fitzpatrick, who was Minister of Justice in 1904, and who gave that opinion, and the Minister of Justice of to-day (Mr. Doherty), and his able deputy, who gives the same opinion now, will be acknowledged by my right hon. friend to have come close to the real legal interpretation of this clause.

My right hon. friend is more optimistic and less fearful with reference to this great war and the perils which surround us on account of it than I could wish to be or than I would dare to be. He never has believed, he says, that there was danger of an invasion of Canada by the German power. He never believed that there was danger of invasion. But what is the purpose of a Militia Act? What is the purpose of a military force or an aggregation of military forces if it is not primarily and absolutely to defend the country, to keep it intact from a possible or an actual enemy, wherever that enemy may be, and at any time that that enemy may threaten or wage war against the nation which is concerned? And common sense teaches me that if armies are for the defence of a country, their efforts should be applied at that point where there is emergency or danger, and where their efficiency would be greatest. So if there be menace (and my right hon. friend would not deny that there is to-day menace) we should surely do our utmost to meet it at the most effective point. A much more numerous people than ours, the nation to the south of us, with one hundred million and more of a population, with tremendous resources in men and material for the defence of their country, have, after nearly three years of patient consideration of all the conditions and the perils involved, come to the conclusion that it is wise for them (a great nation of one hundred and ten million inhabitants) not to wait until this struggle of to-day is decided, and chance the issue, but, to preserve and defend their country, its liberty and its ideals, by sending an army and a navy to the seat of war, and to participate with the other Allies in the defence of their country and of the liberties of nations, and of humanity. The people of the United States are not led away by simple hysteria, they are too strong to be frightened at imaginary perils or threatenings. That great nation, desirous of maintaining peace; democratic to the very centre, with all its races, and kindreds, and creeds, and denominations, after a three yers' contemplation of the whole question at issue, comes to the conclusion that to best safeguard itself, its liberties and its rights, it must send its army across the seas, and meet the enemy at the most advantageous point. If that is true of the United States, which might well have remained neutral, and, with its tremendous strength, defied any outcome of the war in favour of the central nations; if that country has come to a conclusion to participate in the distant conflict, how could we avoid coming to a like conclusion, as we did at the commencement of the war? We are a part of an Empire which is at war—an Empire which, taken altogether, is most dreaded and hated by the German power. As an integral part of that great Empire, how could we come to any other conclusion than that our best point of defence was on the far distant lines, where the vantage ground was held and could be held, and where the hordes of devastation could be kept far from our own home land?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It strikes me that common sense teaches us that if there is emergency, peril, or danger of an invasion, and if the integrity of the country is threatened, the place to do our fitting part in the contest is at the point where the ultimate decision is at last to be made. My right hon. friend would not let the militia stir hand or foot until the Hun was victorious in Europe, and Asia, and had made himself the predominant power, and then, with his navy and army, landed on the shores of the St. Lawrence. Then my hon. friend would admit that the Miliia Act should be called into force.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Therefore, it appears to me that neither according to legal interpretation, nor in a common sense point of view, is there anything to be said in favour of the proposition of my right hon. friend. If that Militia Act was framed for anything, it was framed for the defence of Canada. The framers of that Act saw beyond the conditions of that day, and placed within its sections the provision that the militia could be used in or out of Canada, on any invasion or any threat of an invasion, and, therefore, it was made wide enough to include the action which Canada has taken. And, in these three years of war, my right hon. friend has seen that action and he has not protested against it. He has only felt, it seems, that, at this particular moment of crisis, it is his duty now to question the Act, and its powers, and to present a new and dilatory solution of the difficulty.

My right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition took up the pledge said to have been given by my right hon. friend the leader of the Government, and, at this late day, he challenges the course Parliament and the Government have taken in respect to the pledge of 500,000 men. It is within the fair knowledge of all in Parliament, and out of Parliament, that this war has been one of the most unexpected developments that the world has ever seen. No man skilled in strategy and military experience, no nation or empire, however far back its warlike prowess and warlike traditions might extend, and no nation or leaders of a nation anywhere, but have been absolutely surprised at the new and fresh developments which have taken place in this war. There is no need in an intelligent body like this to labour that argument for a single moment. Everybody has been surprised, and everybody has had to make change of methods and of ideas. Was there a nation more deeply embedded constitutionally, in experience, in traditions of the theory of the defence of Empire, even to strong and widely distributed offensive operations, by virtue of enlistment, and voluntary enlistment at that—than the Mother Empire of which we form a part? When that war commenced there were few men in Britain, statesmen or soldiers, who did not believe the contest could be fought and victory won on the old voluntary principle of the enlistment of British people for the defence of their country. War was commenced with that thoroughly embedded in their minds, and embedded in the practices and methods by which they sought to carry on the war. But experience is the mightiest teacher of all, and before necessity the most stubborn of inherited beliefs must give way, and the time came when Great Britain's statesmen, military men, business men, and working people as well, came to the conclusion that, if Britain was to be saved and the war was to be won, something other than voluntary enlistment must be appealed to, and applied, and it has been appealed to and it has been applied, and millions and millions of men from those little islands in the North sea have cheerfully submitted to compulsion, changed their beliefs and their methods, and did so because it was necessary for the defence of their country, and the victorious outcome of the war.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: And in Canada as well we had known nothing of compulsory enlistment. Ours had been the militia system, which is a voluntary system. We started in the beginning of this war with all our fervour, zeal, and devotion to principle, on the line of voluntary enlistment. We thought that would suffice, and if the war had lasted no longer than it was generally supposed at its commencement that it would last, voluntary enlistment would have carried us over the war, and would have brought us to victory. But it did not so pan out. The war did not end in six, twelve, twenty-four, nor thirty-four months. It is still continuing, and the principle of voluntary enlistment, if it was ever thoroughly tested in a country with confidence that it would do the work was so tested in Canada, and it has failed. It did not meet the continued stress of the war and the continued call for men. At the commencement of the war we adopted the voluntary system, in the belief that that system would be sufficient. We proceeded upon that line of action; we expected to continue it; we expected by it to gain the victory and to achieve the result for which we were striving. Proceeding upon that line of action, we sent forward 300,000 or 400,000 of the citizens of Canada. They marched towards the trenches; they went with our plaudits, our good will and our prayers. Not one of them left these shores with the least doubt in his heart that the people of Canada would stand behind the work to which he was devoting himself. My right hon. friend makes much of suggested cleavages, of possible dissensions, and of adherence to constitutional principles. But is there not an implied contract in the great deed of consecration of 400,000 of our men, who, putting their lives in the balance, went out with our plaudits—to do what? Flash a temporary spark of heroism into the atmosphere of the world, which would reflect credit upon Canada? No! This they were willing to do; this, indeed, they did. But they went forth to win a great world and Empire fight. That is what they went forth to do; that was our contract with them. Shall we make it good, so that as they fall something effective shall be done to guarantee that their heroic sacrifice shall not have been in vain and that the purpose for which they went forward shall be accomplished? That is my way of looking at it; is that not an eminently practical, a moral, and a fair way of looking at it? At this moment the men at the front look back and listen for the footsteps of comrades marching to the front to help them and to take on the work when their arm fails. Is there not in that all the sanctity of a contract which we must fulfil? And ought not that implied contract to count against little differences and little dissensions that may be caused here if we take the only step that will bring victory and that will achieve the results for the attainment of which we passed on all this precious and priceless material of manhood as of full weight and put it into the balance?

So, after nearly three years of trial, voluntary enlistment fell down, but not until it had been fully tried. In no country in the world was there a better class of men and women than those who throughout the major part of Canada traversed every settlement, every town and every hamlet, and, by all kinds of appeal and encouragement, called for volunteers. There was the finest co-operation amongst the civilians of Canada, and it told mightily in the enlistments that took place. But the inevitable happened, and at last there came the dreary months when fresh enlistments were scarcely more than sufficient to make up the wastage among those troops in Canada who had enlisted for overseas service, but who were gradually subjected to weeding out. That went on from week to week and from month to month until those earnest souls who had in countless numbers spent their energies, their time and their money in attempting to bring about enlistment, came to us in one great body and said: we can do no more; we can go no further. Was that the experience in Canada, or was it not? It is open to us to answer that question for ourselves.

Then, Sir, still wishing to make full trial of the principle of voluntary enlistment, we designed a force of 50,000 men for home defence. It was honestly designed, I may tell my right hon. friend—although he casts some disparagement upon its motive. My right hon. friend must remember that some 50,000 men who had enlisted for overseas were kept here in Canada for purposes of guard and for home duty. The enlistment of 50,000 men for home defence would have liberated those 50,000 men who had been kept here for purposes of home defence. There was common sense; there was possibility of aid, in that arrangement. It was tried honestly and to the uttermost, and, for one cause or another, it absolutely failed.

Then the Prime Minister spent some weeks in England. He was at the very centre of the forces; he saw the very inner core of the conditions; he became acquainted with the precise nature of the situation at the front and with the matters reviewed in the councils of war in Great Britain and France. As Prime Minister he has, from the time war broke out, uttered no backward word; taken no retrogressive step. He has in season and out of season pressed the issues of this great conflict upon the people of Canada and unselfishly devoted his time and his energy to the great duty of carrying on the war. He came back from the front convinced that the necessities of the case, the peril of the occasion, made it absolutely necessary that our men should be sustained. Adding that conviction to the knowledge gained when he came home, he arrived at the conclusion —and we arrived at the same conclusion— that more would have to be done than could be done by relying upon voluntary enlistment.

And this measure is the explanation and the interpretation of the conclusions to which he and we arrived, and it is now before the House and the country. Because the Prime Minister, working along the lines which I have briefly indicated, wished to avoid compulsion or selective conscription, whichever you may call it as long as possible, and desired to work on the old voluntary lines, whilst they seemed possible of success, is it to be urged that he failed in duty if, in order not to injure to the least possible degree the fulness of the work that might be accomplished under the voluntary system, he had uttered no discouraging word? But at last he had to come to the conclusion that if the war was to be won he must pass over from the ground of voluntary enlistment and ask for a reasonable and intelligent application of the principle of selective service, and he is now here with that conclusion, forced upon him by the necessities of the case and the experience of three years of war.

My right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, when we face such conditions as that, chops logic and talks of the Constitution. Logic is good in its place and constitutions are most excellent, but neither logic nor the Constitution is superior to the people, and they cannot be allowed to be a bar to the people's necessary defence and ultimate salvation. Constitutions are methods through which government of the people is carried on by themselves, in an orderly and methodical way. But the good of the people, the happiness of the people, the salvation of the people, are the basic things which are to be sought after, and just at this very moment it seems to me that in Canada, in the Empire, and throughout the world, we have a situation surrounded with conditions altogether unusual in the history of the world, and which demand action of the real strong red-blooded type for the support of the men we have sent to the front, and for the salvation of the country for which they have gone. My right hon. friend may talk about the Constitution and urge his points in a logical way, but that does not satisfy me. If necessity is upon us, we must act.

I will put this case to my right hon. friend. Suppose that what he hinted at as not being possible, actually did take place and that to-morrow morning the German army convoyed by the German fleet menaced the shores of Canada and was about to land on the banks of the St. Lawrence. In such a case would my right hon. friend come down to this or any other Parliament and say, our men have not enlisted—the enemy is upon us but "You cannot constitutionally act unless you first have a referenum." Then he would propose a referendum, let the German fleet put into our harbours, and the peril march through our country. Nothing must be done to violate the constitutional principle that you must not act in any emergency unless you first submit a referendum to the people. Is that a forced comparison? I think not, because to many minds, and certainly to my own, it makes very little difference if we do not win this war whether the Hun to-day is three thousand miles away from Canada or only half a mile beyond our coasts. In either case if the Hun wins the ultimate result would be the same. So the peril and insistence of the time would temper my reverence and respect for what would be the proper procedure in normal times.

Compulsion or not; that is the issue, says my right hon. friend. Where does he stand on that? My right hon. friend is one of the most humble and obedient of public servants. It being demonstrated that voluntary enlistment will not save the issue, he will not to-day say to the people that the issue must be saved no matter what happens, that if it cannot be saved by voluntary enlistment and can be saved by selective conscription, he is for the saving of the country and is willing to advise and abide by selective conscription. If he would only do that, he would be giving a lead to the people. But this is the position he takes: "I will not declare myself definitely one way or the other; I am in principle opposed to conscription, but I think the best and the bravest way is to let every man, woman, and child in this country say what they want and I will accept their verdict." Suppose their verdict is asked as to selective conscription. Where does my right hon. friend stand then? While the referendum is on, his thirty years' experience, his high position in his province and in this country go out in the vanguard of that referendum, pleading that the vote be "No" instead of "Yes." Already through the province of Quebec noisy crowds have been hushed by the speaker's asseveration from the platform "Keep quiet, Laurier has this in hand. He will never let you be conscripted; just keep quiet; you are safe in his hands." While the referendum was being discussed and voted upon in this country every opponent of the 'war to a finish' would be quoting my right hon. friend, and saying that it was under his leadership that he was acting, and that we needed no conscription and should vote "No" on the referendum.

I prefer that this House of Commons—not fresh from the people, but yet from the people—I prefer that they, having knowledge which others in large degree cannot have, should give the people of this country a lead in this great matter. Because Canada is a democratic country, do we who have representative positions grow so spineless that we are unwilling to do anything from our superior position of light, and knowledge, to give the people a lead as to what in perilous times we think it best for them to do? The question is before this House; and that question will be decided in this Parliament, and it will be decided in this Parliament on a vote of its present membership. Having had three years of experience in this most wonderful and fateful period of Canadian and Imperial history, it is for us to give the guiding word. I would not be willing to go to the people with a blank sheet under these conditions, and without giving first my lead in the representative position I hold. A referendum will not be made with the consent of this Government on this important question and in this time of national peril. What we propose is to do, in the light of the experience and knowledge that we have, our plain duty, and let the people pass their verdict as they choose now, or in history. At least, we will stand as not having been afraid.

My right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) deplores cleavage that may result in dissension if compulsion is brought in and selective conscription is made the law and enforced. There will be, undoubtedly, dissension. But I fail to read the people of this country aright, French or English, workingmen or employers, if dissension follows action which the necessities of the case demand and that is done which it is absolutely right should be done. Though there may be dissent expressed, and though there may be some dissension, the people of this country are a law-abiding people, and a discerning people, and they will hold to right ideals in this war and the necessity of pursuing them to the end, and will cheerfully obey that which is proposed as the best and only solution of our present problem.

My right hon. friend tries to gather the workingmen under his arm, and proclaims himself the apostle of labor. Well, his hands are as white as mine, yet he and I are of the working classes, and have been all our lives. There is a toil of the hands and there is a toil of the brain, and there is travail of the heart as well. Some say only those are workingmen who work in one line, and that others are not workingmen. I think the definition of workingmen, of labour men, may well be widened to include by far the greater number of the people of this country. I take leave—and I say it with all proper respect, yet with all due frankness — to doubt if organized or unorganized labour in this country is not true to the purposes of this war for which they have given so much of their blood. They tell me that thirty thousand from the ranks of organized labour in Canada have gone to the front ready to make the supreme sacrifice —and many of them have made that sacrifice. I have some regard for the voice of these men when others say that organized labour is a unit against conscription. There is no finer page in the history of labour than that which has been written —wonderful in its terms and wonderful in its glorious results—by the action of the workingmen of Great Britain in this stupendous struggle. The workingmen of Great Britain, four millions of them, have stood by the Government; they have followed the Government from the path of voluntary enlistement into the path of compulsion; they have followed it in acceptance of regulations which led their organizations to drop all their distinctive rules and customs in order that production might be speeded up, in order that the men at the front might have the tools with which to save Britain and win the war. And to-day I say—I do not dilate upon it but I say—that the co-operation of the working classes in Great Britain in service both military and civil has been one of the most wonderful achievements of the many wonderful achievements in all the three years of this great contest.

Then I look to the United States of America. Are there no workingmen there? Are there no organizations of labour there? There are great organizations, and at their head is Gompers; and to-day, Gompers is in Washington and is in close and sympathetic action with the Government of the United States in its preparation for, and its conduct of, the warfare upon which it has entered. Surely our labouring men are not made of different stuff, I know they are not. I know that their ideals and principles are more than simply selfish, a fact which they have demonstrated in the short space of this war in having sent 30,000 of their men to the war for those principles and those ideals. Their comrades of labour in this country will not desert them now, I feel certain.

My right hon. friend has said that there will be considerable dissension and cleavage in the province of Quebec. He has discussed that matter frankly. We should all of us discuss it honestly and frankly. Members of Parliament just at this particular time have, to my mind, an imperious obligation to be frank and honest with each other and with the country. I am not a Frenchman and I have no French blood in my veins, but there is not an atom of prejudice in me against French blood and the French race. There is admiration for their splendid qualities, literary and artistic, in the line of progress and enlightenment, and in the line of warfare and deeds of prowess as well. Where is the part of the wide world in which the French flag has not been led to victory at one time or the other and in which there have not been deeds of prowess and splendid heroism which have contributed to the imperishable fame of the French nation and the French people? You cannot tell me that because the French nation is composed largely of peasants, these peasants are not brave. Who has held the long lines at Verdun?—the French peasant transmuted from his thrifty, lovable home-keeping atmosphere into an actor in a very hell of war where he has held on with tenacity, a heroism, that puts most peoples and nations to the blush. It is inherent in the French blood that they are brave and that they listen to, and act sympathetically with, great ideals and great principles. My right hon. friend has called for and received from me and all others a meed of praise for those French Canadians of our own country who have made themselves illustrious on the fields of France and Belgium this year, at Courcelette and elsewhere. The only regret with us is that there are not more of them, and we do not say that—God forbid—as a taunt or a sneer. We say it in the interest of enduring peace and unity in this Dominion of Canada. Frenchmen and Englishmen have been thrown together on this northern half of the continent. They have fought each other in war, they have rivalled each other in peace; they have proved doughty assailants in war and they have proved strong and firm friends in peace. These men live in this country and we live in this country and the Dominion belongs to us both. Pity it is, pity it will ever remain, if because of this fight for freedom and high ideals and for the liberty and defence of our common country, we do not march more closely side by side with each other so that in the future we may walk more closely side by side when the war is over and the victory won, the country safe, and we are left to our long generations and centuries of mutual toil for progress and advancement in this country. No one hates dissension on this line more than I do. No one could wish more deeply than I do that we saw more eye to eye in this particular matter.

But, the French Canadian is a law-abiding citizen and if he is convinced that this war, to be won, must be won by throwing men into the contest more and more than we have; if the Parliament of Canada comes to that conclusion, and the people that is behind it arrives at that conclusion towards this measure, no one can convince me that the French Canadian will not walk side by side with his fellows in obedience to the law and in perfect unanimity therewith.

I have to speak now with complete frankness and without any other thought than to come to the right and the truth of the matter, and I put a question to my right hon. friend. In all these three years of the war, the French-Canadian has had less opportunity for learning the rights of this great cause and of this great contest, whether from his occupation and his rural habits of thought he is less in the sphere of information and of knowledge. I have just one thing to say, and it is that I believe that things would not be as they are to-day if my right hon. friend and his able, loyal and enthusiastic French followers had done something more than they have done to enlighten the masses of the people in Quebec with reference to the paramount issues of this war. The words gripped my heart and made me optimistic when my right hon. friend said on one occasion: "No danger from Germany, none, her policy is to be a friend of this country, but if she ever does show her teeth, if she ever does come in opposition to this country with her fleet or her army, then I will go down into the province of Quebec, and I will stump that province from one end to the other in order to rouse the people to the defence of the country." For three years this sanguinary war has been going on. I do not want to attempt to admonish or teach other people their duty; I simply state frankly that I deplore the fact that further means of educating the French people on the vital, paramount issues of this war, have not been put in operation in Quebec by its representative men. Whether it is the fault of Sir Sam Hughes, of Sir Edward Kemp, the English people or the French leaders themselves it is deplorable that more has not been done in that direction. If more had been done in that direction, we have the authority that was quoted this afternoon by my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) that the French people would have risen en masse in favour of this war.

Now, putting all these things together, I come to the end of my remarks with one final reference to the referendum. It may be the practice of democracy. It has been occasionally the practice of statesmen in Canada, when subjects difficult of solution arose, that they did not wish to give a lead upon, to refer these subjects by referendum to the people, and do nothing thereafter, but the referendum moved on the second reading of this Bill, at this particular time in the crisis which is upon us is, to my mind, a miserable dilatory motion, and nothing else.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: With our men in the very front trenches, for members of Parliament and of the Government to down tools in the face of the trenches and enter upon a two or three months' excursion throughout the Dominion of Canada on the idle wind of a referendum, which would settle nothing, but would set us back four months or more, would be little short of criminal. We still would have to make laws, assume responsibilities and carry on in the best interests of Canada, referendum or no referendum. I can see some merit in an appeal to the country on a settled policy, either from this Government or from a coalition government such as was offered to my hon. friend a few days ago. I can see some finality to that, but to a referendum, none. It is a dilatory motion, pure and simple. It can result in nothing, but months of turmoil and bitterness at home and delay and confusion and loss abroad whilst the Hun wears down our sons and kinsmen at the front who call to us in vain for help. But I am not very much afraid on that score, because my faith is constant that this House and Parliament will not give its assent to such a method of avoiding our responsibilities and shelving, for months the war and the most important question that the war has imposed upon us.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Edmonton): Mr. Speaker, I was struck, as I am sure the House was intended to be struck, by the suggestion in the first sentences of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster), that the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) did not know there was a war in progress. This Bill was brought before the House on its second reading, by the Prime Minister of Canada, without reference to its provisions, to its scope, to its possibilities; a Bill that, if it means anything, means the taking of son from mother, of husband from wife, of father from children, from one end of this Dominion to the other—and it is not worthy a word of explanation by the Prime Minister of Canada when he brings it before the House for its second reading. Does the Government of Canada know the meaning and effect of this measure that it is bringing before the House? Does it know that Canada is at war? We are in a world crisis, the greatest crisis in history. Canada is a participant in that crisis, and the first lieutenant of the Prime Minister, in addressing the Parliament of Canada, through all his rounded periods, through all his well-turned sentences, preserved an air of detachment as though the Government of Canada of which he is a member had no responsibility for the direction of Canada's affairs in this war. We are dealing with a measure for the conscription of men, of one hundred thousand men, to take part in this war, and this measure of conscription is passed over as lightly as though it meant nothing. If it is adopted, it must be adopted, because voluntary enlistment in this country has broken down in Canada. And why has voluntary enlistment broken down? Who is responsible for the breaking down of voluntary enlistment?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Hear, hear.

Mr. OLIVER: Who is the Government of Canada, responsible for the direction of its affairs? If we are to-day faced with the necessity of this measure, a measure terrible in its character and in its consequences, my hon. friend and his colleagues would do well to take a few minutes of the time of the House and of the country to explain why that measure is necessary, because under their administration voluntary enlistment has broken down.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Hear, hear.

Mr. OLIVER: My right hon. friend (Sir George Foster) spoke in eloquent terms, in moving terms, of the responsibilities resting on the people of this country, responsibilities to the men who have gone to carry our name with honour at the battlefront. He said, we were to support them, to see that the sacrifices they made were not in vain; their sacrifice was to be recognized by others and still others and still others of our citizens, so that the honour of Canada would still and always be maintained, not by conscription, but by voluntary service, a service that would do honour to Canada and do credit to the Empire. I say the question is up to the members of the Government to-day to tell this country why it is now, at this stage, necessary to resort to this measure of conscription. The country that has sent 350,000 men to the battle front in voluntary service, is that country lacking in enthusiasm for the cause of the Allies? Surely the country that sends 350,000 can send a few more, could send a few more, would send a few more, if the enthusiasm that has been exhibited in the past had received proper direction and encouragement at the hands of this Government, of which my hon. friend is such an eloquent member. Is there no responsibility resting upon him and upon them? If that river of men has ceased to flow, what strange thing has occurred in Canada that, at the end of April, 1917, this river was still flowing, there was no question that it would continue to flow, and in June, 1917, there is no further flow of voluntary enlistment to be expected, if the honour of Canada is to be maintained it must be maintained by compulsory and not by voluntary service? The honour of the people of Canada in their support of the Allies in this war is discredited by my hon. friend in his remarks to-day, as by the measure that is before the House in whose support those remarks were made. There is some responsibility somewhere in this country of Canada, and it rests upon the Government of Canada, in regard to the direction of our affairs. Has there been honest endeavour, has there been persistent and honest endeavour, to maintain the honour of Canada by voluntary enlistment during the three years that have passed? I do not wish to delay the House seriously, but that is a point that should be settled, and I am fortunate in being able to produce the reports of Hansard to show what direction the efforts of the Government took. Sir Sam Hughes, speaking on January 30, 1917, said:

But here another hindrance stepped in. I do not know whether it was in the interest of munition workers or not.

I think he meant munition "makers". He continued:

But I stand here to say that I look on all this talk of munition workers as piffle, compared with the need of men at the front, piffle of the worst kind—this kind of piffle of considering men getting $7 a day in munition works as compared with a man in the trenches, running the risk of being blown to pieces. It is piffle, and the commonest sort of piffle.

An order in council was passed forbidding the Department of Militia from authorizing a battalion here, there or elsewhere, and it is said that the reason was that too many battalions were being raised in Toronto, Winnipeg, Montreal and other large cities.

Continuing, he said:

The point is that they said: Here, you must not have so many regiments recruiting in Toronto or so many recruiting in Montreal.

Sir Robert Borden: I think what my hon. friend says might be misunderstood. There was not an order in council passed saying that no further battalions should be recruited, but that no further battalions should be recruited without an order in council.

Sir Sam Hughes: The object being to prevent two or three being raised in Toronto or Montreal, for instance.

Sir Robert Borden: Too many being raised in one place.

On the same date, Sir Sam Hughes said:

In other words, three months were lost, not in organizing the battalions, but in getting the power to organize them. I am not criticising, only there seems to be a desire to play to the gallery in connection with these munition workers. There was a drop in recruiting at all events. I have heard all sorts of stories, but I have never asked my officers. When I came back my officers made certain statements; they had been directed to go slow in recruiting, but I never asked; I do not know whether it is true or not.

However, seeing the falling off, seeing the need of straining every nerve we could strain at the front, when I came back I set to work to try and get the pulse of the boys. I have always been in favour of universal service, training the boys. I did not deem conscription necessary, and it was not. I could have raised 500,000 men by voluntary enlistment. I could have raised 600,000 by voluntary enlistment without any trouble, I believe. That is only a statement; but I believe I could have done it. However, this order in council stopping the authorization of regiments was passed, and the talk came on from every hand I presume paid for by German agents—against taking men from munition works.

Speaking on February 1, Sir Robert Borden said:

The fact that we succeeded in the first three and a half months of the past year in recruiting a hundred thousand men or more is an indication that the work was carried on with a good deal of vigour and with a great deal of success. The criticism has been made that proper regard to selection was not made. I discussed that question with the ex-Minister of Militia and Defence more than a year ago—I think in the autumn of 1915 for the first time. The course which my colleague took in that regard was that he did not think at that time that any more systematic method was necessary, and he said that it would be possible, through instructions given to his recruiting officers, to prevent unwise selection, selection which might result in the closing up of industries essential for the prosecution of the war, when recruits might have been obtained from other classes whose work and service were not so essential. I was informed by General Hughes that instructions had been given in various instances to adopt methods which would give some system to that purpose.

Mr. Oliver: About what time was that?

Sir Robert Borden: I think it was in the autumn of 1915 or early in 1916.

Sir Sam Hughes: Early in 1916.

Sir Robert Borden: Early in 1916, I think, and afterwards it was thought better that the purpose could be carried out in connection with other objects in a more comprehensive way by the proposals for National Service, and that is the explanation of the course which was taken.

So that we have it on the authority of the ex-Minister of Militia that so early as the fall of 1915 or early in 1916 a deliberate policy of retarding of recruiting was entered upon as between the Prime Minister and the Minister of Militia. At whose instigation? At the demand of the fathers, mothers, brothers, sisters or children of the men who were volunteering to go to the front to carry the flag of Britain and uphold the honour of Canada? No; at the instigation of the munition makers, the munition profiteers who are fattening upon the blood of their country and who, through the Prime Minister and the Minister of Trade and Commerce, denied to their employees the privilege of going to the front to fight the battles of the Empire and uphold the honour of Canada.

On February 1, Sir Sam Hughes said, as reported on page 373 of Hansard:

Take one special instance in which I was asked to take definite steps along this line was when the Prime Minister brought up the matter of the Sydney mines. The Prime Minister will remember that I rubbed the delegation up a little about their treatment of these fellows in days gone by. However, I did ask some of the recruiting officers not to take specialists or men expert in certain lines if they could possibly get along without them, or, at any rate, not to bring much pressure to bear upon them.

I heard the Minister of Trade and Commerce say in this House that he himself refused to allow his private secretary to volunteer because he considered that he would be of more advantage to the country acting as his private secretary than he would be as a soldier in the trenches. I heard the Minister of Customs make practically the same statement.

Mr. REID: What statement—that I would not let my private secretary go?

Mr. OLIVER: Yes.

Mr. REID: No statement of that kind was made by me.

Mr. OLIVER: Then it will have to remain as a question between my hon. friend and myself. I will take the opportunity of looking up Hansard.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

An hon. MEMBER: Take it back.

Mr. OLIVER: I beg the hon. minister's pardon. I certainly withdraw, in deference to his statement. But it is very clear in my mind that such a statement was made by the minister in regard to some official in his department.

Mr. REID: I would like the hon. member to show me any such statement as he refers to. I have no recollection of ever making such a statement.

Mr. OLIVER: I will take the opportunity of doing so; I have not Hansard under my hand at the moment. If I am not able to produce the statement, I certainly will tender the hon. gentleman every apology.

As to the position taken by a member of the Government on the floor of this House —and the idea was carried through the whole of the Government service, as far as the Government could reach—that there was not as great necessity for the services of able-bodied men at the front as there was in other places, I ask that member of the Government why my son or another man's son should go in the place of his secretary? Our sons are just as good to us as my hon. friend's private secretary was to him.

Having reached the point where the munitions makers of Canada have the sanction of the Premier and of the Minister of Militia in preventing the recruiting of their employees or near-employees, it does not come with good grace from the Minister of Trade and Commerce, eloquent though he may be, to declare on the floor of Parliament that Canada is not able to make good any promise she has made in the matter of voluntary enlistment. Let those who first made the promise and who later stood in the way of its fulfilment take the responsibility.

My hon. friend suggested that the leader of the Opposition by his proposal of a referendum was standing in the way of efficient and timely prosecution of the war on the part of Canada; I think that was the impression he desired to convey. The leader of the Opposition is the leader of the Opposition. It is his business to bring to the attention of the country such direction of its affairs as appears to be best in his judgment. It is the business of the Government to direct those affairs, and if it is true, and it is true, that voluntary enlistment has shown a decrease since the middle of last year, I ask my hon. friend what he and his colleagues have been doing between then and now to protect the interests of this country should there be a German invasion? It was known in June of last year that there was no prospect under the conditions then prevailing of the promise of the Prime Minister being fulfilled, that the rate of enlistment was such that there was no likelihood of the complement of the 500,000 men being raised within any reasonable time. What was the course of the Government under those circumstances? There was plenty of time between then and now to have taken a referendum, plenty of time for the Germans to have invaded and over-run Canada. They appointed my good friend from Calgary as Director of National Service, and sent postal cards presumably to everybody in the Dominion. That was their idea of how to deal with the question when the Hun was at the gates. They got some of those postal cards back, and the Director of National Service is still the Director of National Service. But there is no Service, individual or national, so far as any one can judge. This Government spent its time month after month, and month after month practically walking around in a circle, deluding its friends who were in favour of more drastic action into the belief that National Service meant conscription and at the same time giving Dorchester and other places in that neighbourhood clearly to understand that National Service did not mean conscription.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What member of this Government ever said that National Service did mean conscription?

Mr. OLIVER: I won't bother answering my hon. friend's interruption just now, but if National Service did not mean conscription, if there was no intention to make it the foundation of conscription measures, will the hon. gentleman tell me what on earth it was introduced for?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Read the Order in Council.

Mr. OLIVER: I have answered my hon. friend's question. Will he answer mine?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman told me he would not answer my question. I, however, will answer his. The terms of the Order in Council speak for themselves.

Mr. OLIVER: Then the terms of the Order in Council are no more than sounding brass and a tinkling cymbal. There have been no results either from the Order in Council or from the efforts of my hon. friend the Director of National Service.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: The Calgary trumpet.

Mr. OLIVER: If the conditions are in any degree as my hon. friend declared them to be, what answer has this Government to make to the fact that for one whole year they knew of those conditions and did nothing to remedy them? They did worse than nothing. When the announcement of National Service was made the effect was necessarily to injure still further voluntary enlistment. When it was announced that the Government was going to take upon itself the responsibility of deciding whether this or that man should go to the front and this or that man into a munitions factory, the responsibility of choosing between the man who was to get $1.10 a day with the privilege of getting shot, and the man who would earn $5 a day in a munitions factory and live in comfort, what young man, unless he was inspired by enthusiasm in more than the ordinary degree, would not naturally say, "The Government is taking the responsibility off my shoulders. It is no longer for me but for the Government to decide whether I shall go to the front or into a munitions factory." I ask you, Sir, whether that was a stimulus to recruiting? When that announcement had gone abroad and recruiting still further fell off, the Government did nothing more. They simply sent out their cards, got some of them back, talked one way in one end of the country and another way in the other end; but they did nothing.

The climax of it all was the proposal to enlist 50,000 men for home defence. Fifty thousand men to be taken out of productive industry at a time when it was believed that productive industry required all the help that it could get; taken out of productive industry, but not sent to the firing line. How many months did the Government spend on that project, and what was its result? Does the Minister of Trade and Commerce think that the Government is justified before this country in spending the time between June of last year and June of this year in talking one thing and doing a different thing; in talking action, but pursuing inaction? Is that his way of winning the war? And to-day, when there is placed before this House a suggestion that the power of Parliament is exhausted, that we hold no authority from the people of Canada, and that when we are imposing upon the people of Canada a measure, which, however necessary, however patriotic it may be, is still a most burdensome measure, we should ask the authority of the people to impose that measure; we are told that this suggestion is most unpatriotic because it would mean delay. It is right for the Government to delay, to walk up and down, to go round and round, for twelve long months; but it is absolutely unpatriotic for the leader of an Opposition to suggest that the people of Canada shall rule—because it might mean a delay of three months.

Now let me touch on the references made by the hon. gentleman to the province of Quebec. The province of Quebec has not sent as many men to the front, in proportion to population, as other provinces have. That is to be regretted. My right hon. friend thinks that the blame for the inaction of the province of Quebec—assuming that there has been inaction—rests upon whom? Upon the Government of the country? Oh, no; the blame rests upon the leader of the Opposition, the man from whom the majority of the people of Canada took the responsibility of office in 1911, the man who has held no responsibility of office since that time. He, we are told, is the man to blame, if blame there is, for the state of affairs in the province of Quebec, while the Government has no responsibility in the matter. In my humble judgment, a government constituted as this Government is, whose members from the province of Quebec were elected as being opposed, not to conscription merely, but to military or naval service on behalf of the Empire—a Government with these men in its councils, supported by their colleagues from Quebec, who represent within a fraction of half the people of that province and number within ten of half its representation in this House, must carry the responsibility for failure to recruit in the province of Quebec, and any lack of military enthusiasm in that province must fairly rest upon the shoulders of this Government, whose members are opposed, not only to conscription, but absolutely to military service.

The question before the House is serious; it is serious beyond measure. Surely, if there is danger of division in this country, as the Minister of Trade and Commerce said there was; although he brushed it aside lightly, it was a small thing—if there is a possibility that one of the provinces of this Dominion is likely to be opposed to the policy which is about to be undertaken; and if it is the fact—and the right hon. gentleman said it was the fact—that the leader of the Opposition is responsible for public opinion in the province of Quebec, would it not be reasonable, would it not be common sense for the Prime Minister and his colleagues to take the recommendation of the leader of the Opposition?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. OLIVER: If the facts are as the Minister of Trade and Commerce says they are—I do not say these are the facts; he says it—that is a reason why the proposal of the leader of the Opposition should be accepted by this Government in the interest of the wellbeing of the country, in the interest of its unity and therefore of its strength.

In speaking on this question I have dealt with it from the standpoint of voluntary enlistment and of the failure of voluntary enlistment in this country, and of the necessity, if necessity there is, for the introduction of this conscription measure. I think it only right to place before the House certain facts in regard to the measure of voluntary enlistment that is going on in Canada to-day, voluntary enlistment that is going on not because of the efforts of our Government but in spite of the efforts of our Government. I have here the latest issue of of the sheet called The Canadian Patriotic Fund, and I find a statement showing that the total enlistments in Canada for the Canadian Expeditionary Force for the month of January, 1917, were 7,721; for February, 7,644; for March, 6,648; for April, 5,420, a total of 27,433; or for one year, if continued at the same rate, 72,299. I note that a despatch from Kingston says that "456 recruits signed up in the Third Military District during the last two weeks." I say, in spite of this Government, and not because of it.

I desire to draw the attention of the House to an item which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen of a day or two ago to the effect that the enlistments in the city of Ottawa had fallen to a certain figure and the reason was because the enlistment office for the artillery service had been closed up. They had refused, during two weeks of the period to accept any recruits for the artillery service. It appears to me that when we have the evidence of the number of recruits during the preceding period, and when we have the evidence that this Government refused to accept recruits for any branch of the service here in this capital city of Ottawa, the Government has no right to say that voluntary enlistment is a failure in Canada or that people of Canada are lacking in their enthusiasm in support of this war.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Did my hon. friend say that we had refused to accept artillery recruits?

Mr. OLIVER: Yes.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: That is so, but it was at the instance of the British Government who say that they have more artillery recruits in England than they need at present.

Mr. OLIVER: I notice that the British Government comes in conveniently when my hon. friends desire to escape from a difficult situation, but it appears to me that if the casualties at the front are as they are reported to be, and there is no doubt they are, this Government would not be placing the British Government at any disadvantage if they accepted all the artillery recruits that offered and gave them the training that is necessary for efficiency in the artillery service. I am still compelled to believe that the closing up of the recruiting office in Ottawa, and the refusal of artillery recruits, was rather in the line of emphasizing the necessity of this Military Service Bill than of satisfying the demands of the British Government.

No one is more disappointed than I am that the Government should have felt it necessary at this stage of the proceedings to say to the country that their policy of voluntary enlistment had broken down. There is, after all, something of inspiration in the idea of a man who volunteers, of men who, of their own good-will have left house and home, farm and land, wife, children and friends and have taken upon themselves, for their own credit and for the honour of their country, the responsibility and sacrifice of the war. There is something insipiring in that, something to be proud of and Canada has reason to be proud that so many of her citizens have taken that position and have done her that measure of honour. It is a matter of the deepest regret to me as one citizen of this country, and as a member of this Parliament, that we are not going forward in the same line and to the same result.

While I say that, I also take the position, which I have taken in this House in times past—and I think I was the only member in the House to take it—that universal compulsory service was the only logical service under such conditions as prevail in the world at the present time. I believe that universal military service is the logical and efficient method of bringing to bear the full strength of our country under present circumstances and conditions. Given a proper measure of universal military service, and there is equality in the distribution of the burden, an equality that does not exist in the case of voluntary service. While voluntary service has tremendous advantages in many ways, it has the disadvantage that the willing horse carries the whole load. It is only fair that every horse should carry his share of the load. It is only on the principle of equality of service—of absolute equality of service—that the compulsory principle will be recognized or accepted. It is the only principle that is fair. If there is not equality of service under the compulsory principle, then, instead of it being a democratic method of meeting a great emergency, it becomes an instrumeent of tyranny and unfairness in every particular.

The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) used the words "selective conscription", and the Prime Minister explained that he was not able to adopt the Militia Act now on the statute-book because it did not contain the selective principle, and the selective principle must be provided for by special legislation. In the adoption of this selective principle there is vast room for anything but fairness in the administration of the Compulsory Service Bill. In that provision for selective conscription, it appears to me, there rests the greatest reason for objecting to the measure as it appears before the House. I have said in this House before, and I say again, that the great necessity to win this war is able-bodied men on the firing line, and any provision or measure before the House that takes the view that equal service can be rendered by an able-bodied man in any other capacity, takes a view that I for one cannot agree with. And when I see a measure brought before the House as this measure is and advocated as this is, I am compelled to say that I do not look upon it as such a conscription measure as I would be willing to support.

To deal with a certain provision of the Bill; It is provided, as the Prime Minister has told us, that there shall be a Board of selection, a Board of appeal, which amounts to a Board of selection, and this Board of appeal shall be absolutely independent—that is to say it will be absolutely irresponsible, absolutely irresponsible. In other words, that Board will express the sentiment of the men who compose it, who again will express the sentiment of the people amongst whom they live, And it is provided that this Board shall grant a certificate of exemption on the ground:

> That it is expedient in the national interest that the man should, instead of being employed in military service, be engaged in other work in which he is habitually engaged.

That is to say, this irresponsible Board has all the authority of this Parliament to say: this man shall go and this man shall stay. There is neither let nor hindrance, there is neither direction nor suggestion, and this Parliament is asked to support that measure and call it a measure of conscription. It is a measure of conscription, but not a measure of conscription as I would feel able to support.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The hon. member is objecting to this method. Does he prefer the method established in the Militia Act, of selection by ballot, or how does he suggest the selection should be made?

Mr. OLIVER: I would suggest that this Bill that is brought before the House should tell us how the selection is going to be made.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Well, it does.

Mr. OLIVER: I beg pardon, it does not. It says that two irresponsible appointees—

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Irresponsible!

Mr. OLIVER: Irresponsible, not responsible to any one—shall say that Smith shall go and Jones shall stay, without any reason whatever, except their own sweet will.

Mr. MEIGHEN: To whom should they be responsible?

Mr. OLIVER: I am not drafting the Bill. I am saying that this Bill says this and that, this is the provision of the Bill that this Government has brought down, and asks this House to vote for. Now, I am a conscriptionist; I believe in universal military service; but I believe in universal military service on a fair basis, and I do not believe in a Bill that makes provision that Brown shall go and Smith shall stay and does not suggest, even in the remotest degree, why Brown should go and Smith should stay.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I really did say, in introducing the Bill and again to-day, that we would be very glad to have suggestions which would improve the Bill. If my hon. friend is so strongly opposed to the provision which we have suggested, would he be good enough to give us the benefit of his suggestion as to what the provision should be?

Mr. OLIVER: Really I do not appreciate that as being my function.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. OLIVER: That is the business of the Government of this country. They have brought down a Bill, they are challenging public opinion upon it; they have a right to do so. My business in this House is to show how and where this measure falls short of being in the best interests of the country, if in my judgment it does so fall short. Having done that, I have discharged my responsibility.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Oh.

Mr. OLIVER: And I again point out that this Government has brought forward a measure here, under the pretense that it is a measure that shall be a fair measure of conscription, and it is a measure that does not contain within its four corners the first element of fairness in the matter of conscription.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: What would be fair?

Mr. OLIVER: I am saying to the Prime Minister that that is his business.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh,

9 p.m. oh.

Mr. OLIVER: It is the business of the Prime Minister to bring in a measure that will be fair, and let me suggest to the Prime Minister and his friends that this is a responsibility resting upon their shoulders just as the administration of Canada's affairs in this war have rested on their shoulders, and I think they are under a great mistake if they think that that responsibility is one that can be treated with levity.

Mr. BURNHAM: If the hon. gentleman does not feel that he owes any duty to this Government, does he not owe a duty to the country to make suggestions?

Mr. OLIVER: I do.

Mr. BURNHAM: Why not make them?

Mr. OLIVER: I am discharging my duty to the country according to my best judgment. Let me show how this provision will work out. In the part of the country where I live, where we have sent more men to the war in proportion to population than have been sent from any other part of the Dominion of Canada, where the men on homesteads, on the side lines, on the back streets, have gone in their thousands, and every day brings out its toll of casualties, carrying death and wounds into every side line and into almost every house and cottage—we know something of war in that part of the country, and when you talk of conscription we want to know what it means. We have been led to believe that a conscription measure would be fair to the country, and as we have done our duty, in a measure, so it would compel the people in other parts of the country to do their duty.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. OLIVER: Now, that is the kind of conscription measure I want to see, but that is not the kind of conscription measure my hon. friend has brought down, because when a board is appointed in the city of Edmonton, where the people have gone to the war and where the sentiment is in favour of maintaining our position in the firing line, and a man is called up and he appeals, the board will naturally say: Well, your neighbours have gone and you must go. That is what we would expect of a conscription measure in that part of the country. That is to say, in our part of the country those who have not gone would be compelled to go. But shift that position down into the good province of Ontario, in some of its localities, or into the neighbouring province of Quebec, or possibly into the Maritime Provinces; you will find localities in all of those provinces where the people have not very enthusiastically volunteered for active service overseas, where the sentiment of the people is not favourable to such military service, and you have your tribunal there, just as you have it in Alberta, and a young man appeals from the call and goes before this its authority under this provision to permit the man to remain they would be chased out of the country. The result would be that, we at Edmonton, who have sent of our best, and who have sent so many of them, will have to send still more, and those who have sent none will still send none, under this provision as it stands. This provision bears the closest possible relationship, in sentiment and idea, to those National Service cards, which were drawn up for an express purpose, and worded so that the man who believed in conscription was told "This is the beginning of conscription" and the man who did not believe in conscription was told that it certainly did not mean conscription, and we have the evidence of the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Sevigny) on that point. We have a Bill that, to the people of Alberta, means conscription, but to the people of other parts of the country means just as much conscription as they want, and just the way they want it. That is not the kind of measure I would call a conscription Bill, and is not the kind of provision that I think is required to meet the Hun at the gate. It is not the way to do honour to this country and credit to the Government which brought it forward. I do not know, but it may be that this Bill has some resemblance to some Bill in England, or some measure passed in the United States. I can only say that we are legislating for Canada according to the conditions of Canada, and legislation that may be absolutely adapted to the conditions in England is not necessarily adapted to the conditions in Canada. Legislation which is adapted to the United States may not be adapted to our country. In case this legislation should be modelled on the English Bill, let me give the House some information as to how the English Bill is administered, and ask their opinions as to how they would be pleased to have similar administration in Canada. I read in the Toronto Saturday Night of June 16th, an article from England written by an English correspondent, Lacey Amy: He speaks of the conditions in England, and particularly of the conditions surrounding the enforcement of the conscription measure there. He says:

> Tribunals all through the country continue to hand out exemptions to huntsmen, variety artists, store managers, clerks, luxury manufacturers, frankly declaring that their mission is "to protect local industry". One district alone granted 30,000 exemptions during the past fourteen weeks.
> Even the Government joined the Freedom League. Only a few departments are not still to a large extent manned by eligibles with influence. In this 34th month of the war it is still the custom to hand a list of names to a branch of a department with orders to find places for them. A regiment is permitted to retain at home its football players and runners and boxers. The great markets of London—Smithfield, Covent Garden, Billingsgate and the rest—have scarcely been touched, because their combing out was left to committees of themselves and they have been unable to agree.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, if that is the way they like to have it in England, it is not the way we like to have it here, and if this measure is modelled on the terms of the British measure, and if these are the results of the British measure, I say this is not a conscription Bill, according to my judgment, and is not entitled to my support.

There is this further feature of the volunteer system: that if a man volunteers, he does so for reasons of his own. He takes his chance. He accepts what he gets in the way of treatment, or casualties, or whatever it may be, and we who stand here, legislating for Canada in some measure, can carry the responsability lightly. But if we, by legislation, reach out our hand, take that man forcibly from his business and his family, bring him under military control, and send him into the firing line, it is for us to see in every step taken that every safeguard is afforded, and every justice meted out to him. In looking back over the part taken by Canada in this war since August, 1914, I regret to say that I cannot see in the administration of our affairs, that spirit of fair play and of consideration for what is right and just that I would require to see in a government in whose hands I would entrust a measure of conscription of men.

I will not delay the House on the point, but I have here a clipping from the Montreal Star, a special cable from London, England, May 29th, by their correspondent, F. A. Mackenzie. Mr. Mackenzie has been at the front, and he states as follows:—

> My visit to the base more than ever convinced me that we are suffering both at the London and French bases from over-systematization, which maintains thousands of unnecessary clerks, docking, indexing, the precise writing systems. The fault is not with the officers who are administering. I strongly urge the Dominion Government to have the system rigorously simplified in order to prevent the present staffs being overwhelmed by red tape and routine.
>
> The dissolution of certain old battalions doing excellent service has been necessary.
> The divisional staffs asked me to try and remove the impression prevailing in some parts of Canada that the battalions were broken up because inefficient and unsatisfactory. Among them are several considered among the pick of the army. The necessity which compels the disintegrating of the veteran battalions with brilliant records and splendid esprit is considered deplorable. One dissolved battalion held a funeral service and the men erected a tombstone "To commemorate the last resting place of the 48th Battalion, raised by patriotism February, 1915, destroyed by politics May, 1917."

Further on he concludes:

The armies are heartily sick of politics, believing the politicians a curse to the service in their intrigues, forcing a number of unsuitable men into posts.

Such a record does not seem to me to warrant us in placing in the hands of this Government the power of life and death, of honour or dishonour, over our people by the tens of thousands.

This Government that comes to us with this conscription measure, and assumes to itself that, because it proposes conscription, therefore it wants to win the war, when because of its course, of its action and of its inaction in carrying forward Canada's effort to win the war, conscription has to be resorted to. In this as in every other case I am in favour of prompt and effective action. If a Government holding a mandate from the people believed in its wisdom that it was necessary to introduce a measure of conscription, it would be its duty to introduce such a measure, and to enforce it, if it could enforce it. But that is not the position; this Parliament holds no authority from the people. It was elected in September, 1911, for a period of five years; to-day it sits here, self-elected, but confirmed in position by the authority of the Imperial Parliament. It is competent for the Government to dissolve Parliament and appeal to the country, but in the Governor General's address at the opening of the House it was announced that such was not the intention of the Government; that a further extension of the life of Parliament was to be arranged. On the Order Paper to-day is a notice that the Government purposes introducing a resolution for the extension of the life of Parliament. We of the Opposition cannot command the Government. We know that we hold no mandate from the people; that our authority, so far as the people are concerned, was exhausted in October last. We see that the Government proposes still further to extend the life of Parliament; that it does not intend to go to the people for authority. Under those circumstances, the only way in which the authority of the people can be secured is by the adoption of the amendment offered by the leader of the Opposition.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman says that he is is favour of conscription, but that he would not entrust it to this Government. Will he say whether he would entrust conscription to the leader of the Opposition?

Mr. OLIVER: If the leader of the Opposition became leader of the Government, I certainly would.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman would entrust the enforcement of conscription to one who is altogether opposed to conscription.

Mr. OLIVER: I do not know that he is altogether opposed to conscription.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. OLIVER: I heard him say here to-day that if his amendment is adopted and it is agreed to by the country, he would be a party to assisting the enforcing of conscription.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But he is opposed to conscription. Would the hon. gentleman, then, entrust such a measure to him?

Mr. OLIVER: I certainly would entrust to the leader of the Opposition, if he were leader of the Government, the authority to enforce conscription, believing that he would enforce it if it were the law of the country and if the people had declared for it. But the leader of the Opposition and others on this side of the House are not prepared to take the responsibility of supporting a conscription measure when, having usurped the authority of the people, we sit here by our own authority, not by the authority of the people. That is the position that we want thoroughly defined. If the Liberal party stands for anything it stands for the rule of the majority of the people. We believe in responsible government, but when a Government that is absolutely not responsible to the people, and which holds office without regard to the people, brings forward a measure which lays a burden upon all the people, then all the people have a right to be heard with regard to that measure before it is put in force. That is what we say, and that is all we say.

The leader of the Opposition has said that if a majority of the people are for conscription he will do his part in seeing that the law is carried out. I noticed how lightly the Minister of Trade and Commerce considered the authority of the people; it struck me that that certainly was good Tory doctrine. The fact that this Parliament did not hold authority from the people was a matter of the smallest possible consideration. We were Parliament, and because we were Parliament we should exercise our authority according to our judgment. If the military enthusiasm of our people declined, and if, because of the mismanagement of the Prime Minister in his leadership, our men at the front were not being supported, then we must make the people go—because we were Parliament.

Mr. BURRELL: My hon. friend said just now that this Parliament had usurped the authority of the people. Does my hon. friend not believe that when the members of Parliament unanimously extended the life of Parliament for one year in order to avoid bitter contest during the war the people in vast majority cordially approved that action?

Mr. OLIVER: I do not know whether they did or not. We were careful not to take any chances on their doing it; we simply elected ourselves. I am not arguing that there was not at that time good and sufficient reason for the action that we took. I am arguing that because we took that action at that time is not a reason why we should take the same action again. Having taken the law into our own hands; having set ourselves up in a position independent of the people, we should, before forcing this measure upon them, submit it to their judgment and obtain their opinion upon it.

The leader of the Opposition drew attention in some measure to the condition of the House itself, aside from the fact that its term had expired and that the authority of the people, so far as we were concerned, had been exhausted. Taking the House as of 221 members, 9 seats are vacant by death, 11 by resignation, and 5 by reason of the members being unavoidably absent. There are two double seats: that is, two members each sit for two seats.

There are under military orders and pay 26 members of this House. These men under the military law are subject to service and entitled to pay therefor. I maintain that that is in effect an infraction of the independence of Parliament, whether it is inside the law or not. I am not criticising either the man or the military service, but it goes without saying that no matter who he is or how great the service he may render, the member of Parliament who is under military orders and receiving military pay is not in the position an independent member of Parliament should be in. He is not, as a matter of fact, an independent member of this House.

There are in this House, if I am correct in my count, 20 seats which are represented by men who were elected absolutely on the principle of opposition to Imperial Military service. It is this House, with this composition, that is to enforce conscription. Is it any wonder that the Conscription Bill is of the character that it is? We have had an administration of our military affairs since the war began that has not been to the credit of Canada, and I am one of those who believe that the influence of those men in the Cabinet and outside who were absolutely opposed to Canada's participation in Great Britain's wars is one of the great reasons why we have not had a more effective administration of our affairs in this war.

My right hon. friend the Prime Minister in his speech a few days ago suggested what might happen to members of this House if the Conscription Bill were not passed. What does he think will happen to members of this House and of this Government who armed the men in the trenches at Ypres with rifles that would not shoot under stress of circumstances, and who kept them armed with those rifles and sent other men into the trenches armed with the same rifles for one long year after they had it on the authority of the British general that the rifle was inefficient? Perhaps it was not the influence of those who were opposed to Canada's participation in the wars of the Empire that was responsible for that condition, but undoubtedly that was the condition that did exist, and for that condition this Government is responsible, and it will be well for other members of the Government and other members of Parliament if they can show that it was those who were opposed to Canada's participation in the war who were responsible for the blood of the men who died at Langemarck and Zillebeck because the Government armed them with a rifle that they knew to be inefficient.

In a House of 221 members we have 9 seats vacant by death, 11 by resignation, 2 double seats, 5 unavoidably absent, 26 under military orders and pay, 20 elected to oppose military service for the Empire, 2 are under-secretaries, and 2 occupy special positions without pay, but with allowances, I suppose; I speak of the Director of National Service and the hon. member for East Kootenay (Mr. Green), who is now acting for the Government in the coal strikes. There is a total of 79 seats which are either vacant or the representatives of which are not in the position of an absolutely independent member of Parliament. In a House of Commons of 235 seats, as it would be after a general election, there would be 79 as above, 22 unrepresented, and 8 over represented, a total of 109 seats, or nearly one-half not represented as they ought to be. It is this Parliament, which has outlived the term for which it was elected, with nearly one-half of the seats unrepresented or represented by members who are not in the position they should be in, that proposes to put through a Conscription Bill compelling 100,000 of our men to give military service at the front, under the plea and pretense that the loyalty and military enthusiasm of our people have failed us in this time of stress. This conscription measure is brought forward as an excuse and apology for the Government's failure to discharge their duties and responsibilities for the honour of Canada and the safety of the Empire.

Mr. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the House was very much surprised this afternoon when the right hon. leader of the Opposition moved an amendment to the second reading of this Bill, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton. We have listened to the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) for an hour and three quarters endeavouring to show in the first place that the Bill does not go far enough, and in his next breath telling the House and country that the Bill is an iniquitous measure because it will tear the son from his mother and the husband from his wife. He tried to show that the Bill was not a Compulsory Service Bill, that in its working out it would practically defeat its own ends, and yet his chief condemnation of the Government tonight was that the Bill would have the dire effect upon the manhood of the country to which I have alluded. He says he is in favour of compulsory service, and always has been, and then deliberately seconds an amendment which amounts to a hoist for the Bill which would bring in compulsory service.

And he refuses, even though invited by the Prime Minister, to make a single suggestion to improve the Bill. He would send the Bill as it stands to the people to be ratified by the people, and would hand over the administration of it to the leader of the Opposition who is absolutely opposed to it; and yet he refuses to give any suggestion for the improvement of the Bill. To my mind, such a position is illogical and untenable.

Another point that my hon. friend makes is that this Bill is weak because, forsooth, Alberta and some other provinces, my own province for instance, have already contributed very liberally under the voluntary system, and it will take from these provinces certain individuals while allowing individuals in other provinces to escape. And why? Because he says the Bill provides for administration by an independent board which he chooses to call "irresponsible." What would he have said had the Government brought down a Bill to be administered, for instance, by the Minister of Militia or by some special committee of this House? He would at once have declared that it was a Bill for a political end, that it should have been entrusted to the courts. But because the Government bring down a Bill to be administered by the courts of the land, he says, forsooth, that this is an "irresponsible" way to administer the Bill. He might as well say that the courts of the land, from the Supreme Court and the Exchequer Court down to the police court, are irresponsible and do not administer the ordinary laws properly day after day. The very same men, the judges of the county courts, the judges of the Supreme Court, are the men chosen by the Government to administer the exclusion clauses of the Bill; and I repeat, his reflection upon these men must carry with it the inference that they are incapable of administering the ordinary laws of the land. Otherwise, his criticism means absolutely nothing; it is merely a captious criticism.

Referring to the munitions work, he took the Government to task because, he alleges, early in the year 1916, the Government and the Minister of Militia of that time had prevented the men, skilled workers, engaged in the manufacture of munitions, from enlisting. I have not heard of a single case of a man who insisted upon enlisting being denied that privilege.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I was not here when the hon. member for Edmonton spoke. Did he say that there was interference with the men employed in munitions enlisting?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Sir SAM HUGHES: It is an absolute falsehood.

Mr. OLIVER: I only read from Hansard what the ex-Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes) said.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) said something to the effect that there was a conspiracy between the Prime Minister and the Minister of Militia of that time to prevent individuals from enlisting and to keep them in the munition factories. That is a most unfair criticism of the Government; for the hon. gentleman himself, from his place in the House in 1915, and also I think in this very session of 1916, attacked, condemned, and maligned the Government because it was not assisting the Mother country in getting out munitions and was not giving sufficient support to the men at the front who at that time were suffering because munitions were not supplied in sufficient quantities. He knows that the one thing needed in 1915, when our boys went in at the front, was munitions; the thing that caused the slaughter at various points in Flanders was that they had not heavy artillery and munitions. And what gives the British at the front the advantage to-day? The tremendous quantity of munitions. And how have they been brought up to that point? By Canada, the United States, and the Motherland bending their skill and energy to their manufacture. The hon. member knew very well, when he made his unfair criticism, that the British Government brought men back from the front—thousands of them—to put them at work on munitions rather than allow them to remain in the front line. He seeks—and I consider it a most unfair and unkind criticism—and makes it an object of petty, picayune political attack, to compare the heroism of the men in the factory with that of the men on the firing line. We know that the men at the front, willing to lay down their lives, and hundreds of them making that last great sacrifice, are rendering to the country a service that can never be too highly appreciated. At the same time, it must be admitted that the men in certain walks of life can do their country a great service for the time being by sending to the men at the front the support of munitions. Let me give an instance. A young McGill student from my own city, skilled in analysing steel, enlisted as a private and was on his way to the front. But the former Minister of Militia got hold of him, and that young man is now in the Ordnance Department filling a position as a skilled engineer testing steel in the manufacture of ordnance, a thing that very few men in Canada understand. Would the hon. member for Edmonton take that young man out of the Ordnance Department and send him to the front? We on this side who differ with the hon. gentleman in political matters have always regarded him as an honest, rugged fighter, whatever we may have thought of his opinions. But his criticism to-night did not do him credit, nor do I think his constituents will approve the stand he has taken.

The hon. gentleman also referred to the failure of the voluntary system, and he very glibly tells us that the responsibility lies at the door of the Government. If this Government is entirely responsible for the failure of the voluntary system, then it follows absolutely that this Government and its supporters alone were engaged in the promotion of volunteering. But that is not true; the hon. gentleman and I know that it is not true. We can speak with assurance when we say that throughout Ontario and the West, and throughout Eastern Canada we know, but not with the same personal knowledge, both Liberals and Conservatives in every walk of life have joined hands in the work of making the voluntary system a success. We on this side have never hesitated to give credit to our Liberal friends in the West, and I could name them by the score, who have done great service in that line. But when the hon. gentleman stands in his place and seriously, on this solemn occasion, tries to make the House and the country believe that this Government alone is responsible for the voluntary system, he acknowledges that he and his friends have failed to do anything for that system.

He complains that this Government took no action between last June and this June, and this, he said repeatedly, is the time when the volunteer system failed. He says the Government should have taken action last June, and yet says that the Government having delayed for twelve months, it should delay for three months more, and perhaps not pass the measure at all. In one breath he charges the Government with not proposing conscription a year ago and in the next, with all his power, eloquence and influence, he seeks to delay the matter for another three or four months. If the Government was at fault, as he says it was, it is his duty, and the duty of every citizen of the country, to see that the thing is done now. Delay is not going to improve it. As a matter of fact, he knows, and I think the country at large knows, that there was an earnest effort on the part of the Government to avoid conscription. Why? In the first place, I think we had a decided pride in the fact that Canada had done so well under the voluntary system. I want to pause a moment to pay a tribute to Canada, to my country, for the splendid manner in which it has responded to the call in this great war under the voluntary system. I was hoping, as I am sure many others have been, that we would have been able to get the 500,000 men and stand out as the one country in the world that did not require compulsory service. But, unfortunately, for various reasons that has not been possible, and so the Government come down now, after exhausting every other effort to secure the men, with a compulsory measure. My hon. friend refuses to make any suggestions to improve this Bill. He chooses at this most critical time in the country's and the Empire's history, at this most critical time in the history of modern civilization, to enter on a course of destructive criticism and refuses to make a single constructive suggestion to help the Government, notwithstanding the fact that the sincerity of the Government in inviting such suggestions was conclusively shown by the fact that my right hon. friend the Prime Minister allowed this Bill to stand for several weeks after it was introduced in order to give the leader of the Opposition an opportunity of joining with him in a national, coalition Government. When my hon. friend seeks to cast a reflection upon the Prime Minister and his Government, he has to reckon with that fact, and I believe that the country will properly weigh criticisms of that kind.

We are faced with a single condition. This war is either justifiable or it is not, it is either right or wrong, it should be sustained or it should be abandoned. That is the situation with which we are faced to-day. We have no choice except between these two courses. There is no middle course. Either we must sustain the men at the front by sending reinforcements or we must abandon them. There is, I repeat, absolutely no middle course. It ill behooves us as members of this Parliament to stand in our places here, as the leader of the Opposition did this afternoon, go back to the Boer War, or to the Drummond and Athabasca election and rake up all the political squabbles that have arisen in this country during the last twenty years. Such a proceeding is unnecessary and ill-timed. The thing for us to do is to face the conditions now. The conditions are clear, and again I say there is no middle course. If we admit, as I think we must admit, that our cause is a just one, and that we are battling for right against despotism, tyranny and brutal might, we dare not abandon the fight, we must not fail at this time, and we must concentrate our efforts upon bringing into play to the utmost our national strength. This Bill presented by the Prime Minister is calculated to do that very thing, to bring into play the full strength of the manhood of the country.

My hon. friend from Edmonton, as did his leader this afternoon, raises the constitutional quibble—I have no other word to characterize it—that as a moribund Parliament we have no power, no mandate, and no right to go on with this measure until we have consulted the people. Let us look at the logic of that for one moment. Year after year the Finance Minister has been bringing before Parliament methods of financing which were equally as revolutionary as compulsory military service. Last year he brought in a new method of financing; this year he extends it. Certain hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House condemn these measures as too drastic and far reaching. Why did not the hon. member for Edmonton and his leader on those occasions demand that the Finance Minister submit these measures to the people; they were more revolutionary than this measure, because there is no question but what this Bill simply contains what has been on the statute book for the last fifty years. The hon. member for Edmonton smiles, but I will read the clause again, although it has been read two or three times. Clause 61 of the Militia Act of 1868 is as follows:

> Her Majesty may call out the militia, or any part thereof, for actual service—

Mark the words.

> —either within or without the Dominion, at any time whenever it appears advisable so to do by reason of war, invasion, or insurrection, or danger of any of them.

My hon. friend from Edmonton and the leader of the opposition will no doubt say that it is perfectly true, but that there is no danger of invasion. I do not think that the member for Edmonton would urge that, because I frankly believe that he realizes the seriousness of this war, and that it really means invasion if it means anything at all. But if that argument is raised, I quote what the leader of the opposition said in this House on August 19, 1914. Here are his words:

> Our territory is liable to attack and to invasion. Our shipping to Great Britain has been interrupted. England to-day is not engaged in an ordinary contest.

Could anything be clearer? The right hon. gentleman this afternoon urged seriously, and emphasized from his place in the House, that he never believed we were in danger of invasion. He said in 1914, in the first war session:

> Our territory is liable to attack and invasion, our commerce has been interrupted.

Again I call attention to the Act, in order that I may put this question for ever at rest:

> Her Majesty may call out the militia, or any part thereof, for actual service, either within or without the Dominion at any time, whenever it appears advisable so to do by reason of war, invasion, or insurrection, or danger of any of them.

Surely that is clear enough. But there is another phase of the question that I would call the attention of the House to. Supposing it is admitted for the sake of argument that there was no danger of direct invasion, but supposing we found that our commerce was interrupted. What would be the result? The property of Canada is not all contained within Canada. Wherever there are ships carrying cargo from Canada, there lies the property of Canada, and wherever lies the property of Canada, in a ship or otherwise, there lies the duty of Canada to defend that property. If the Canadian Government and the Canadian people say: We will send our cargoes out in our ships, and the minute they pass the three-mile limit we will have no further interest in them, their sense of national responsibility is about as low as that of any nation that we call civilized. It is not the case. The case is this, that wherever there is Canadian property, wherever there are Canadian lives or citizens, there lies Canadian duty and the duty of the Canadian Government to protect and defend them.

I wish to ask now this question: Who are particularly opposing this Bill? And I find, after careful thought, that there are two, or perhaps three elements. First, there is a section of organized labour, and I use the word "section" advisedly, a section of organized labour, because the sentiment is not by any means unanimous among the organized labour of Canada, who oppose the Bill, I shall refer to that later. Then there is almost a unanimous Quebec. I say almost because there are quite a large number of citizens of Quebec who are certainly in favour of this Bill and of prosecuting this war to a successful issue, and to these we give all honour and credit. But there is unquestionably a strong sentiment in that province opposing it, which I shall review in a moment. Third, there is a miscellaneous group, the slacker, the individual who has a misguided opinion that it is a sin to defend one's own family and hearth and rights, that in some way or other we should lie down and allow ourselves to be abused to any extent without offering any violence in return. There is that element, but I do not think they amount to much or have much influence in the upbuilding of the country.

Let me refer briefly to the situation in Quebec, and I hope to deal with it in all moderation and in a spirit of sincerity and kindness. I must refer, in connection with this subject, to an epoch-making event when Edward the Peacemaker consummated the entente cordiale between the two greatest democracies in the world, when they joined hands in the inspiring duty of preserving to the world those noble principles for which both had separately contended for many centuries. Sir, that was, I say, an epoch-making event which was welcomed by the democracies of the world as an evidence of the triumph of democracy over autocracy in the future history of events, and I think we can say this, that genuine and mutual were the efforts of the statesmen of both countries to bring that great event to a practical issue. But, sir, it rested with this great war to bring it to its ultimate result and effect, and this war has sealed that agreement, has sealed that Treaty, has sealed that understanding, with the blood of the noblest sons of the two nations, on the common field of battle. So in Canada, when war broke out, while we realized that there would undoubtedly be serious results, that there would be suffering, we welcomed to a certain degree this war, because we hoped it would for ever strike out of the national life of Canada the differences between the two great races in this country. I remember perfectly well how it was welcomed as an evidence of the good will of the two races in Canada, and we had hoped that now we could have a common ground upon which we could travel along side by side, in pursuance of our country's welfare. But, unfortunately, things have occurred that have dissipated that hope. I wish to read to the House some words that fell from the lips of the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) at that time, inspiring and graceful, so far as language is concerned. I suggest that the House should listen to these words, because they have unquestionably the right ring to them, and while we are sometimes mystified to harmonize the actions of the right hon. gentleman with his words, we at least must admire the sentiment expressed in them:—

10 p.m.

It is our duty, more pressing upon us than all other duties, at once, on this first day of this extraordinary session of the Canadian Parliament, to let Great Britain know, that there is in Canada but one mind and one heart and that all Canadians stand behind the Mother Country, conscious and proud that she has engaged in this war, not from any selfish motive, not for any purpose of aggrandizement, but to maintain untarnished the honour of her name, to fulfil her obligations to her Allies, to maintain her Treaty obligations, and to save civilization from the unbridled lust of conquest and domination.

I submit that these are noble words and noble sentiments that fell from the lips of the right hon. leader of the Opposition. But, I ask, what has happened in the last three years to change all this? What is there that makes the situation any different to-day? Has anything occurred in the past two or three years to make it less necessary that we should give our whole service to the Empire? Is there any reason why we should delay now, whereas the right hon. gentleman then said "at once" we should do this or that in support of the Motherland? He went on to say:

Long have we enjoyed the benefits of British citizenship; to-day it is our duty to accept its responsibilities and its sacrifices.

In my estimation, in these words we have a complete answer to the right hon gentleman's opposition to this Bill. There are responsibilities that he must take, that every member of this House and every citizen of Canada must take. We have heard from his lips and also from those of the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) the constitutional question of whether this Parliament has the power or right to proceed with the Bill. This country is ruled or governed by a responsible Parliament elected by the people. It is true that our term expired last October, but it was, by a unanimous vote of this House, in which both of these hon. gentlemen concurred, extended, and what for? Not to carry on the ordinary business of the country, but to carry on the business of this war. That was the underlying principle of the extension of Parliament, that the business of the war might be carried on. Will the right hon gentleman or my hon. friend from Edmonton say that this Bill is not calculated to advance the cause of the war? Will they say that it is not necessary? Will they say that we can delay for two or three months in securing reinforcements for the front? It is perfectly useless for them to say that we did not do our best in the past. The past is gone, we are dealing with the present and with the immediate future, our duty rests there and does not rest in the past, and no amount of criticism of the past will bring about the needed assistance at this time. There are certain arguments which have been advanced by those who are opposed to this measure, and I think they are pretty well summed up in a resolution passed in Montreal the other day. I will deal very briefly with a few of these utterances. In this resolution they say:

Prepared as we are to defend the territory of Canada against all foreign attacks, we are equally determined to defend the autonomy of Canada and the liberties of its citizens against every agression from within.

In other words, this is what is said: We are quite prepared to defend Canada from attack, but we are not prepared to do anything in the defending. In other words, supposing there was a band of outlaws loose in a neighbourhood, some of the people might congregate together for the common defence of the community; others would say: We will not take any part in the defence against these outlaws until they attack our premises, nor until they come to our farms, our stores or our houses, then we may take measure of defence, but so long as they do not attack us on our own soil we will make no defence.

It seems to me that is a parallel case. Here we are a nation among nations, a people among peoples, a democracy among democracies, and when the soul of democracy is attacked by the most villainous and brutal power the world ever developed, one of the greatest portions of that democracy, or nation among nations of democracies stands back and says, "No, we will go no further" until when, forsooth? "Until our own shores are attacked." That was the argument of the right hon. leader of the Opposition, and it is the argument set forth in this resolution from Montreal, in the province of Quebec. I contend that such an argument is absolutely untenable.

It is claimed by those same people that conscription violates the constitution. I have already set that at rest. Conscription does not violate the constitution, because one of the first Acts passed by this Confederated Dominion contains a clause for compulsory service within or without Canada, and I think that argument should be abandoned by those who are opposing this Bill, because it absolutely fails from end to end. They say it violates the constitution, and what do they suggest? The hon. gentleman from Edmonton suggests a referendum. Where will he find, in the whole constitution, authority for a referendum on a question of this kind? It is not there. Of course, we can create a system of referendum, and I have no particular objection to it, but we are living under a system of responsible Government by a representative Parliament, elected by the people. That responsibility is resting on us now, and this is not the time to discuss whether we are going to change our system, introduce referendums, and amend our constitution. This is not the time to squabble about new policies. It is the time to take advantage, as I have already suggested, of the powers we have and to put them into execution. This resolution goes on:

> We believe that all new efforts on the part of the nation should be directed to the sole object of re-organizing the economic forces of the country, and of supplying the allied nations, whose cause Canada has joined, England especially, with the foodstuffs which they so insistently ask for.

That is their idea of their full duty. In other words, it is suggested that Canada should devote all her attention to selling foodstuffs to the allied nations, to take the homely illustration I cited a moment ago, "We will not go out with the posse, but we will feed the posse at reasonable terms, we will not proceed to fight the Huns or stand in the way of their invasion and aggression, but we will gladly feed those who do the fighting — at profitable rates". That is the argument, without any question. Another objection or suggestion was made by Edouard Monpetit, a professor in Laval University, who said that "Canada had done more than her share in the war, and that her moral obligation had been fulfilled." Reference is also made to the question of devoting our attention to supplying foodstuffs. There is no question that it is important, but if Canada emerges from this war with her honour intact and unsullied, but bankrupt, I contend she will be infinitely better off and richer in her national life than if she came out with hundreds of millions of dollars, reaped from the war, but failed, at this time, to do her part in sustaining the Empire.

I will refer, briefly, to another phase of the argument advanced by labour advocates and draw attention to a few of their statements. I shall quote the official organ of the labour party in my own city. I have no objection to any responsible citizen advancing views adverse to my own, or to those which are held by the party to which I belong. It is perfectly right that they should do so, but I reserve the right to debate those views, and, if possible, to answer them. I wish to show that those among the trades unions of Canada who are opposing conscription are really not consistent in the action they are taking. At the outbreak of the war, the Dominion Trades and Labour Council inserted a clause in their report stating that organized labour was behind the Allies until they had gained a final and decisive victory. They admit the war is in the interests of democracy, and that the principles at stake are democratic. I will read an editorial in the British Columbia Federation, the official organ of the Labour Party of Canada, written June 1, 1917, and, while in this article is an argument against conscription, nevertheless I want to quote it, to show that they realize that this is a democratic war, in the interests of the best principles of democracy. The writer of the article says:

> The old idea that the war was a natural consequence of trade, and that the present one had its origin solely in conflicting trade rivalries, has long since become so thoroughly shot to pieces, that it is no longer entertained except by the most shallow and superficial thinkers. It is now very widely acknowledged that the terrible spectacle now being staged by a veritable world at war, is but the inevitable and deadly struggle between the despotism and autocracy of the older slavery (chattel and feudal) and the democratic tendency and spirit of the latter (the capitalist form). It is a struggle to the death between the political concept of the former, which was of necessity despotic and stationary, and the political concept of the latter, which is democratic and progressive.

In other words, this editorial writer properly contends that this war is one between autocracy represented by the German States, and democracy, represented by the Allies. Admitting that, they argue that conscription is an attempt to resurrect despotism. The whole case of labour organizations against conscription rests upon the one point, whether or not the measure of conscription before the country to-day is a despotic measure, reactionary and liable to introduce the old autocratic system. If that system can be proven, then it is wrong. If on the other hand, it can be demonstrated that it is rather a measure to support the cause of democracy, then I say the last excuse of the labour representatives is removed. Democracy gives privileges to all classes of the people. The democracy of France, of the United States, and of the British Empire, gives to the people of these countries the highest type of personal and national freedom that any country or any people ever enjoyed. None can gainsay that statement. If that be the case, there goes with it the corresponding duty of defending those rights and privileges, and the democracy that gave them to us. The very basis of democracy is compulsory service.

If you accept the idealistic view of the socialist who is opposing conscription, you accept the view that every man should be placed by the State in the sphere in which he is to move from time to time. The extreme view of the democratic socialist is that the State must control the activities of every man in the State; that is the underlying and fundamental principle of their belief. Yet these very men deny that principle when it is applied to the defence of the democracy which they claim to uphold. The situation is clear and unanswerable: If you accept the principles of democracy as advanced by the extreme democratic socialist, you accept the principle of compulsory service in various walks of life. To adopt compulsory military service, therefore, is actually to carry out the principle for which they so strongly stand.

It is argued that the people were not consulted. I ask the member for Edmonton and others who advance that argument: Was Belgium consulted when Germany invaded her territory? Was Serbia consulted? Were the people on the Lusitania consulted? Was Edith Cavell consulted? Was Captain Fryatt consulted? Were the members of families in Belgium consulted—not three years ago, but only last year—when they were separated and taken away to the worst kind of slavery in Germany? Were the common laws of humanity consulted on these occasions? It is contended that we should stand back and submit this proposal to an academic discussion throughout Canada, spend three or four months in deciding whether or not we should go ahead with it, while Germany with all her brutal force is—doing what? Consulting the convenience and comfort of the people with whom she is dealing? No; ruthlessly defying every law of humanity. The member for Edmonton and his leader suggest that these are times when we should engage in academic discussions; when we should quibble over principles; when we should debate whether such action is constitutional or unconstitutional; when we can afford to incur delay. The solemn duty rests upon those of us who are in Canada to do our part just as nobly, in our own limited way, as the boys at the front are, day after day and month after month, performing their duty. All this discussion, all this quibbling, all this political side-stepping, is wholly out of place; I am tempted to characterize it as almost a disgrace to this Parliament.

We have heard a great deal about conscripting wealth. But those who advocate the conscription of wealth are unable to define what they mean by the conscripting of wealth. "The conscripting of wealth" is one of the most convenient political phrases that I have ever heard. It is almost a twin sister to the term "free food." It has no meaning; it has never been defined; no one seems to be willing to take responsibility for it. What has the Finance Minister been doing during the last two years but conscripting wealth? Hon. gentlemen who now say that we should conscript wealth, not more than three or four weeks ago told the Finance Minister that he would ruin the industries of Canada, if he took too much of their profits. As a matter of fact, what is being done towards the conscripting of wealth? Hon. gentlemen are familiar with what is being done; it is only necessary to reiterate what has already been said. Twenty-five per cent of excess profits of 7 to 15 per cent is taken by the Government. Of excess profits of 15 to 20 per cent, the Government takes 50 per cent, and of excess profits 20 to 100 per cent, the Government takes 75 per cent. Surely that is a fair step towards the conscription of wealth.

It may be said, with a certain degree of force, that we should have an income tax. The Minister of Finance told us that it would be necessary to bring down further taxation later, and that it was not wise to launch every type of taxation at once. The taxation which he has launched and which takes a portion of excess profits during war time is the fairest type of taxation ever brought down in this House—and it is sufficient for the time being. Next year—if necessary, perhaps this year— the Minister of Finance can bring forward further methods of taxation.

The argument of our friends in Quebec that Canada has done enough may be answered in this way. I wonder if those hon. gentlemen opposite who have declared very loudly that they are going to vote against this Bill—one or two of them have already stated on the floor of the House that we have done too much for the Motherland in this war—ever think of the gentleman who ought to be sitting alongside the member for Edmonton, our colleague, Dr. Béland? Do they remember that the doctor had been in France when war broke out, and that he cheerfully gave his services to the French and Belgian Governments in order that he might aid the wounded and the dying? Do they remember that he and his wife were imprisoned, and that when his wife died the brutal Huns refused to give him an opportunity of seeing her on her death-bed? Not long ago a despatch stated that our colleague, after two or three years' imprisonment, lies at the point of death, and that he is not likely to survive much longer. If hon. gentlemen from Quebec who declare that they will oppose this Bill have forgotten the other atrocities and outrages that I have mentioned, have they forgotten their colleague, Dr. Béland? If they have, we have not.

Without any question, this is a war to defend the most cherished principles of democracy. If we fail in this struggle because of lack of attention to the duties that now present themselves, then, Sir, that democracy fails. To hear the arguments of some of the gentlemen who have spoken throughout the country—not on the floor of the House, I admit—one would almost think that it would be better to live under the Hun than to adopt compulsory service in Canada in defence of democracy. That was really the substance of his argument. It is inconceivable to me how anyone can consider such a thing for a moment. If we do not measure up at this time to the proper height, then democracy receives its death blow. There is only one course before us in my opinion, and that is to accept the Bill. If the Bill has weaknesses, let us point them out, as the Prime Minister says. In Committee of the Whole—we are here discussing the principle—I shall cheerfully join with other members in a careful consideration of each clause. If we can strengthen the Bill let us do it; if we can make it more rigid, let us do so. If we can define any points more clearly, let us do that also. No one knows better than the hon. member for Edmonton that it is absolutely impossible to get what he calls an equitable Bill. He says if this Bill was equitable and fair he would accept it. He knows very well that there is no law on the statute book that is absolutely impartial. We can only get as near to that ideal as the intelligence of this House will permit, and it behooves the hon. gentlemen and every other member of this House to make this Bill the best of its kind that can be produced.

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure): Mr. Speaker, we have heard a great deal this evening about the Hun at the gate. My hon. friend who has just preceded me (Mr. Stevens) represents Vancouver, one of the gates of Canada. My constituency lies near the other gate, and the Eastern gate is nearer the Hun than the Western gate. Speaking on behalf of my people, I can assure you, Sir, that we near the Eastern gate of Canada do not fear the Hun.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Why?

Mr. MARCIL: Because we can meet him as we have met him before. I come from a province where something was done for the British flag, before British Columbia and other provinces in the west were in existence. There might have been no British flag in America at the present time but for Quebec; that question was settled over a century ago and there is official evidence testifying to it. I represent a constituency which is largely French-speaking, although it has a large proportion of English-speaking settlers too, descendants of the United Empire Loyalists, and I know I am speaking for them in the remarks I shall make tonight. I am, according to Parliamentary doctrine, as much a representative of Vancouver as a representative of Bonaventure. Once a member is elected to this house he represents the whole of Canada, and it is as a member representing the whole of Canada that I intend to speak this evening and not on behalf of one locality or one province.

I was born in the province of Quebec. My ancestors came here nearly three centuries ago, and I hope to die and be buried on Canadian soil. I belong to this country and am faithful and loyal to it, and since the outbreak of war I have done everything it was possible for me to do in company with ministers of the Crown and others to stimulate recruiting and bring about the effort which I think Canada should make in the great contest before us. A great deal of interest is being taken at the present time in the situation in the province of Quebec. The leader of the Opposition, in his magnificent speech this afternoon, pointed out some reasons why recruiting had not been very active in that province. Many other reasons could have been given, but the chief reason is that recruiting in the province of Quebec was badly handled from the start. Even now it is not too late to adopt proper methods. If this measure were withdrawn and recruiting was carried on in the province of Quebec as it should be, by General Lessard, Colonel Blondin and other compatriots of the people of the province, I am sure we should get satisfactory results. Suppose, for a moment, that French-Canadians had been sent into Alberta, or Ontario, or British Columbia, and had asked the English-speaking people there to listen to French recruiting addresses, and to join French battalions, and practise French military manœuvres, what results do you think, Sir, would have been obtained in those English-speaking provinces? Men are men, and blood is thicker than water. The recruiting has not been properly handled in the province of Quebec. When Colonel Blondin undertook to raise a battalion he adopted the proper method. He was accompanied by General Lessard, who is one of the best men we have in Canada and should have been employed from the very start, but why he was not, we do not know. They went into those parts of the province where they were likely to get recruits, and the results they obtained were very satisfactory. Col. Blondin declared that he stopped recruiting because of the introduction of conscription, not because recruiting was a failure in the province of Quebec.

I was sent to this House to help administer the affairs of this country as best I could. I have sat now for 18 years in Parliament; I have seen 179 members come and go, and a score of Cabinet ministers; I have seen a half dozen men occupy the Speaker's chair; I have voted for all kinds of measures, for the buildings of railways, and for the opening up of Canada in every part. I have taken as deep an interest in the province of New Brunswick as in the province of Quebec, as deep an interest in Ontario as in the Maritime and Western Provinces. After 18 years faithful service I claim to stand before you to-night, Sir, as a Canadian who has done his duty well not only by his own people but by the people at large. I consider it my duty now to say that I have no mandate, and have not been authorized to vote in favour of this Military Service Bill which has been introduced by the Government. I want the Allies to win this war. Everybody in the province of Quebec and everybody in Canada wants the Allies to win. There is not a man, woman, or child in this country that does not want us to win the war. Our Red Cross associations, Patriotic, and Belgian Relief Funds are doing everything possible for the soldiers, and to all these our people are contributing with results that have done Canada so much honour. Canada has sent forward a volunteer army of nearly 400,000 men. In the early days of August, 1914, the Government began in fear and trembling by offering a division of 30,000. Was that the extent to which they wanted Canada to participate in this war? They were not prophets, but they felt that Canada could well send 30,000 men at that time. When Parliament met in the old building in August, 1914, members from the province of Quebec and every other province unanimously assented to all the measures brought down and cheerfully voted for every dollar that was asked for by the Government to win the war. We went into it as a band of brothers because we wanted Canada to figure prominently in this war for the great principles of humanity and freedom which we all have at heart. Why was this done? What did the leaders say? What did we all say in our recruiting speeches? What did the Minister of Finance say when he appeared with me in the Russell theatre in the city of Ottawa? He said that Canada's participation in the war was entirely voluntary, and every man had to settle with his own conscience the question of enlistment. That was the appeal that was made throughout the country; we appealed to the hearts of the people, and that was why we met with such success. Now the Government brings down a measure of conscription in a moribund and defunct parliament, in which 20 or more seats are vacant and several members away. We have overrun our term by several months.

If this Government wish to serve the Allies, if they wish to make more effective the participation of Canada in the war, if they are sincere in favouring participation, there is only one course for them to take, and that is to appeal to the people, to trust the people.

This Bill was announced when recruiting was going on at the rate of about six or seven thousand a month, and this notwithstanding that the Minister of the Interior found so great scarcity of labour for our prairie farms that he felt it necessary to send to the United States to bring help. Surely, this rate of recruiting was satisfactory. But it will all be wiped off if you have this conscription measure.

We are told that there is opposition to this measure in the province of Quebec. So there is. But in many other provinces also there is opposition to it. That opposition exists chiefly because this measure is introduced as a change of the rules after the game has begun. We went into this war voluntarily. The Prime Minister has just returned from the Imperial War Conference, and he has told us that nothing new in respect of the autonomy of the Overseas Dominions was touched upon or decided, because it was understood that that autonomy was to be preserved. If ever there was a question coming before the House on which the autonomy of the people must be preserved, it is a question in which the liberty of the subject is affected. If you want Canadians throughout Canada to participate actively in this war, do not attempt coercion, but appeal to the big heart of the nation, appeal to their patriotism and their better spirit; do not come down with the big stick and have half the population chasing the other half.

How is this measure going to be enforced? Are you going to jail two or three hundred thousand people? These people consent to the active participation of Canada in the war, but they are not going to be drummed into it. Gladstone, when he had to deal with Ireland, always said that coercion was of no use. Why is Ireland being left aside in the conscription measure in Britain? Because Lloyd George declared that he would not lose time in trying to enforce conscription in Ireland until Ireland was free to accept it voluntarily. Let the Irish question be settled, and Ireland will accept conscription and will do what she has always done, and Scotland too—and England as well, but never more than Ireland or Scotland—she will send forth to uphold the Empire's cause the best soldiers that Britain has had to support that cause throughout the world.

We want this matter dealt with fairly. We want to take the people into our confidence. We want dissolution of this Parliament, that we may go back to the men who sent us here, the men who are to pay the money and who ultimately will have to shed their blood. We want England to be victorious in this war, and we want Canada to participate, but in order that Canada may participate most effectively, we must go back to the people and go back immediately; we must appeal to their best feeling, but not try coercion, because coercion will not bring results.

Those who favour this coercion measure say they do not want to go to the country. And why? Because, they say, if it were submitted to the people it would be rejected. If rejected, it would be because the people do not like to be tyrannized over, and this is nothing more or less than an act of tyranny. What the Prime Minister should have done—and he ought to know it better than I or any other member of this House, because he has inside information—was to seek a renewal of his mandate to strengthen his arm, that he might carry on this war more effectively.

What would be the result now if this coercion measure is persisted in? You will apply it, but how many recruits will you secure by it? Do you think you can impose a measure of this kind upon an unwilling people who will not submit to it? We have evidence already that in some large cities in Canada there is no intention of submitting to coercion unless voted by the people in a constitutional manner.

I want Canada to continue her noble effort in this war. I think Canada has done splendidly ever since the war commenced. I think we have given evidences of our good-will in this matter of which we may well be proud, not only sending 400,000 men across the sea—no small contribution for a country of 7,000,000 of people—but assuming financial burdens so enormous that our children's children will hardly be able to pay them off. These things are greatly to the credit of the Canadian people. But why should not we remain united? Why should not Canadians from all provinces continue the effort so well begun? Why resort to coercive measures? Why not say to the people: our mandate has expired; we come back to you, and if you have confidence in the Administration we will go back and continue Canada's participation in the war according to the means that our country can command.

The right hon. the Prime Minister said that as a New Year's gift he would authorize the raising of recruits to the number of 500,000 men. Hardly had the words fallen from his lips when one of the ablest men of Canada, Lord Shaughnessy, said that 500,000 men could not be sent to the other side without seriously crippling our industries all over Canada. And those industries have been greatly affected as it is. We are told that we must maintain four divisions at the front The laws of the Medes and Persians alone could not be changed. Why must we maintain four divisions? Why not three, or five? I am not a military expert, and I question whether there are men in this House who are sufficiently qualified as military experts to say what is the particular value of four, or three, or five divisions. Canada must continue to do what she can to help Britain and win the war. But we have been told over and over again that production in this country is necessary, that it cannot be dispensed with, that the man on the farm is as valuable in his way as the man in the trenches. Why not, before resorting to coercive methods, have a really competent tribunal, composed of men big enough to impress their views upon the country, tell us that Canada can raise so many men for military purposes, but must retain so many men for production, and munition work? Are we to be told, on the mere say-so of the leader of one political party, that such and such a thing is to be done, and the whole country must submit?

The province of Quebec has objected to this Bill and will object to it because it has no faith in the present Government. For one thing half of the membership of the House from the province of Quebec has been elected to oppose the present Government and the other half from that province was elected in 1911 after the gospel had been preached that the citizens of Canada had no duty to fulfil to Britain outside of Canada in defence of her own territory. The result of that nefarious campaign in the province of Quebec was the bringing into power of the present Administration. The present Administration would never have occupied the treasury benches but for the men who were elected in Quebec under the resolutions adopted at the meeting at St. Eustache, and framed by Mr. Henri Bourassa and the late Mr. Monk. That was the platform upon which the colleagues, or allies, of the present Administration were elected in Quebec. We of the Liberal party, who stood loyally by the participation of Canada in British wars, who stood loyally in favour of the creation of a Canadian navy, because we thought it our duty to do what we could for the defence of the Empire of which we are part and parcel, were condemned on every hustings in Quebec although Quebec stood loyally by us to the extent of half of its membership in the House. To-day the views we preached are recognized by all parties in this province.

This afternoon I listened with a great deal of interest to the speech of my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster). The minister went back to what happened in this House in the last three years and put to us the question: What we were going to do about it. Were we going to stop our efforts? Were we going to tell the men in the trenches that we were not going to send them any more assistance? My view of it is this: If you attempt coercion you will send less men to the trenches than if you appeal to the proper spirit of the people. Let us go now before the country. I am sure that my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition will consent to the adoption of the remaining Supply and we can have the verdict of the people in the next two months. If that verdict is in favour of coercive measures everybody will submit to it. But if the verdict is in favour of carrying on the war as we have carried it on up to the present time, by appealing to the better sense, the better sentiment, of the Canadian people generally, we shall have the policy instituted and we will see that it is carried through.

I shall not, at this late hour, undertake to answer many of the points which were brought out because the House is pretty well informed upon all these things now. We have heard a great many allusions made to the province of Quebec and I do not want to say anything more particularly about that province. But, I will say that the people there are quite capable of coming to a decision and doing their duty properly. I am prepared to go back to my constituency, composed as it is of English and French-speaking Canadians, to meet the strongest representatives of the present Government that can be sent in joint debate before a French and English speaking audience, not only in my constituency but in any part of Quebec, and I am prepared to submit to the verdict of the people loyally no matter what that verdict is because in British governed countries when the people have spoken we must submit to their verdict. If the people of Canada think that coercive measures, that Germanized and Prussianized methods should prevail in Canada, and that they can do more for the allies than the methods of conciliation and union that we are preaching to-day, we shall submit to the verdict. But, I am satisfied that the people shall want first of all that Canada shall give the Allies a great example. What would be said to-morrow throughout the world if one-half of this country should chasten the other half and, by coercion bring about a contribution to the war when Great Britain is participating in this war on account of liberty and freedom?

We want to continue to do our full duty but we want to do it generously, we want to do it freely, we want to do it of our own free will, we want the man from Ontario to feel that his fellow Canadian citizen in the province of Quebec is prepared to defend his country, we want the people in the West to realize that if the Hun ever came to Canada it would be up the Saint-Lawrence river and that the citizens of Quebec would be the first to meet him. The citizens of Quebec have been called upon to meet the invader before. They met the invader in 1776, they repelled him from before the fortress of Quebec and forever after the British flag was kept flying over the citadel. They met the invader on the banks of the Chateauguay in 1812 and on that occasion de Salaberry and his 300 men were able to turn 7,000 Americans back to their own lines. In the present war the handful of French Canadians, 14,000 or 15,000 in number, who have enlisted in Quebec have shown at Langemarck, at Saint-Julien, at Ypres, and at Courcelette, that they are worthy descendants of the pioneers of Quebec. We want to do our share and that is why we do not want to be tabooed, we do not want to be ostracized, because after all the French race are the oldest Canadian settlers. This is our native soil and this is the flag that we accepted freely when the other was returned to the country from which it came. We of the province of Quebec are the oldest inhabitants of this territory. Quebec remains as it was at the time of Confederation, the keystone of the arch. Without the free consent of the province of Quebec there would not have been any Confederation and the Prime Minister in quoting the words of the Militia Act repeated several times the name of Sir George Etienne Cartier. You will find such names as George Etienne Cartier and Louis Hippolyte La Fontaine at every step in the constitutional history of Canada. The corner stone of free, constitutional government in Canada was laid by the broad manhood of the British stock of Ontario and the Frenchmen of the province of Quebec who accepted the new duties imposed upon them as subjects of the King were loyal to the country.

But three or four days ago the Governor General of Canada accepted an address in the city of Quebec from the Mayor and the Premier of the province and was given assurance that the province of Quebec remained still the old Loyalist province of the Dominion. Is it because you fall short of a few thousand men that you are going to ostracize these people? Is it because after 150 years of faithful service to the British flag you are going to tear asunder the bond of friendship that exist between the French and English in this country? I do not think that after mature deliberation it will be found to be the intention of the present Government to do so. We have the evidence of the Prime Minister who was willing, if the leader of the Opposition entered a coalition, to pass the measure and then submit it to the people. That was the intention of the Government. Why not do it now? If you have a majority and you pass the measure, it will be a slim majority. Suppose you have 25, 15 or 10 of a majority, is that a mandate to impose such a coercive measure as this which will deprive any citizen of Canada of his personal liberty? Do you consider that you have a mandate in the seventh session of the twelfth Parliament when the constitution of the country says that five years shall be the term of Parliament, when you have 20 seats or more vacant, when the western provinces are not represented as they should be and when we have been elected on a franchise framed on the census of 1901 which is 16 years old? We have here twenty seats that are not represented. I receive letters daily from Restigouche, in New Brunswick, which adjoins my own riding; people write me saying: Our member has been dead for four years, we are not represented at Ottawa, will you kindly attend to this and to that? I do so cheerfully. Is that the kind of Parliament that should undertake to impose such a measure as this upon the people? I say no, Mr. Speaker. The Premier of Canada comes from a province where British principles are better understood than this. He comes from the old province of Nova Scotia, which was the first North American province to adopt responsible government. He understands what the British principle is, that to give force and strength to a measure you must have public approval, and you must have the consent of the people, the consent of the governed. I say this, and these are my last words, we in this Chamber, no matter what our origin is, no matter what language we speak, whether we speak one or two or three languages, we are all citizens of Canada, we are all British subjects, we are friends, devotees of the Allies, admirers of the great principles for which they are contending; and I would be unworthy of my origin, and every member of this House would be unworthy of his, if he fell back at the present moment. But when there is such a serious difference of opinion on this point, I think that there is ample justification for sending this measure to the people. We should have another general election, we should explain to the people the position as it is now, we should make them understand exactly what has been done and what remains to be done, and I have faith in the verdict of the people; I have faith that there is still enough patriotism left, not only in my own province but in every province of Canada, to send back to this House a body of men who will be determined to uphold our institutions, because we know that the defeat of Britain and her Allies in this war would mean the wiping out of our free institutions in North America. We differ only as to method. I appeal to the majority of this House, I appeal to the majority who come from Ontario and from the western provinces as well, to delay this measure, not to go too fast with it, because they may do more harm than good. I am not in favour of the slacker, I am not in favour of protecting the man who should do his duty, but I want a mandate to do that; I want to go back to my people, and when I get that mandate I will come back and I will legislate in this House any measure that is called for by the circumstances. But at the present time I have no such mandate, and for those reasons I shall vote for the amendment offered by the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), and against the second reading of the Bill, regretting to do so, because I would have liked, for the name and for the honour of Canada, that we should have continued our participation in the war unanimously, both parties agreeing to all our war measures as in the past. But if necessity compels me to vote against the Bill I shall do so. I shall do so, not because I am opposed to conscription as an anti-democratic measure, but because I have no mandate from my people, and because I want to serve the cause of the Allies by clearing up the situation and coming back with a mandate before imposing such a measure.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman appeals to the House for a dissolution and a general election, as he desires a mandate. He states that he is not opposed to conscription. In the event of such a dissolution, would he appeal for a mandate for conscription or against conscription?

Mr. MARCIL: I would go back to the people and explain the position exactly as I found it and knew it, and if the people favoured conscription I would come back here and support it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What would you yourself ask for?

Mr. MARCIL: If you would supply me with the information that the Prime Minister of this country has I could give you my answer, but until I get that information I am asked to vote in the dark, and, therefore, I cannot do so.

Mr. MEIGHEN: You do not know whether you are against it or for it?

Mr. MARCIL: I am not against conscription, per se, or because I think it an anti-democratic measure, but if it had any worth in it it should have been adopted in 1914, and the Liberal party should have been called in then to join hands with our friends so that we could have had a united effort. But we did not insist on that; we supported you just the same.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It would not have been tyranny or coercion then?

On the motion of Mr. Morrison, the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Sir Edward Kemp, the House adjourned at 11.05 p.m.

Tuesday, June 19, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

FOOD CONTROLLER.

HON. W. J. HANNA APPOINTED FOOD CONTROLLER.

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I beg to lay upon the table of the House copies of Order in Council approved by His Excellency on the 16th instant, providing for the appointment of an officer to be known as Food Controller for Canada. I have further to inform the House that the Hon. W. J. Hanna, Toronto, has been asked to accept the position of Food Controller, and he states that he is free to do so upon the condition that no salary shall be attached to the office.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: That is something new.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: His Excellency, the Governor General, has been pleased to approve of Mr. Hanna's appointment.

MILITARY SERVICE ACT, 1917.

DEBATE CONTINUED ON MOTION FOR SECOND READING.

Consideration of the motion of the right hon. Sir Robert Borden (Prime Minister) for the second reading of Bill No. 75, Military Service Act, 1917, resumed from Monday, June 18.

Hon. Sir SAM HUGHES: Mr. Speaker, having occupied the position of Minister of Militia for a considerable time during the war, I am more or less familiar with matters concerning recruiting, how it is carried on, and why it fell off, and possibly I may be in a position to give some suggestions as to what in my opinion, at all events, would be the proper method to adopt for the future. I may point out that I gave notice on May 8, that I would move the following resolution.

On the first opportunity on going into Committee of Supply, I shall move:—That in the opinion of this House the best interests of Canada, of the Empire, and of humanity, will be served by the application of the Militia Act, or by other action, to raise troops for compulsory overseas service.

This was not intended as a "want of confidence" motion, although I wrote the Prime Minister on the 17th October last strongly recommending compulsory service. I spoke about it at meetings all over the country during October, and I have consistently advocated it ever since. If the Prime Minister has no objection, I shall read the letter which I sent him on the 17th October last.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I have no objection.

Sir SAM HUGHES: The letter reads as follow:

October 17, 1916.

Dear Sir Robert,—

Regarding Compulsory Service.

The following are my own personal views and I alone wish to be held responsible for them; that is, I do not wish to profess to express any one's views but my own; others, however, let me hope, may hold the same ideas.

As you are aware, I have always been in favour of universal training and service. If the Federal Government had control of the schools and educational institutions of the country generally, I would, as I have frequently stated, so far as I am personally concerned, favour compulsory training for the young lads and young men.

As I have, also, frequently pointed out, this training, even if war might never come, would be a great benefit to them from the manhood viewpoint. They would be better physically, mentally and morally. A higher standard of manhood would be established for Peace, and in case War should ever come, the Nation would be ready to defend its loved ones and its honour.

Since the outbreak of the War, Canada has raised considerably more than four hundred thousand men for all military purposes. This is about one hundred thousand men for each million of British birth or descent. After deducting the number of enlisted soldiers of other than British birth or descent, this still shows a higher percentage of enlistment than has occurred in Great Britain, or, I believe, any other country. This has been under the voluntary system.

But the War has assumed gigantic proportions beyond what was anticipated. It is no longer a War of peoples or nations, it is a War of the sacred principles of human liberty against Prussian autocracy and tyranny. It is a question of men and munitions. At last the munition problem is being fairly well met. The men problem is not yet solved. Sir William Robertson, Chief of the General Staff; Mr. Lloyd George, Secretary of State for War; Mr. Bonar Law, Colonial Secretary; Mr. Asquith, the Prime Minister, as well as His Majesty the King, have each and all pointed out that it is now a question of "men and still more men."

There are parts of Canada which have not yet been successfully reached by voluntary enlistment. Whether or not the influences against voluntary enlistment are backed up by Prussian gold, is a question as yet not fully determined.

There are, in Canada, of all British origins, vide the last census returns, less than 3,900,000; there are of French origin upwards of 2,000,000; German origin about 400,000; of Austro-Hungarian origin about 130,000, etc., etc.

Britain at the outset of the war, resorted to voluntary enlistment only; but after having exhausted every available means that could be used under the voluntary system, the Nation, in the end, has had to resort to Compulsory service. On every hand, able-bodied "slackers" were seen. Families would send one, two three, and sometimes more, sons to the Front, while the neighbours would remain at home, filling the positions vacated by those gallant boys.

The same principle has been carried out in Canada, only on a broader scale. There may be some excuses for those of German and Austro-Hungarian descent hesitating to enlist; there can be none for any other nationality. However, to their credit, a considerable number of gallant Canadians of these nationalities have enlisted and have done splendid service at the Front.

I have evidence in my possession, that there are distinct movements abroad, in parts of Canada, whereby persons are urged not to go to the Front; not to fight, but to let these of British descent go away and leave open their positions in order that those who remain as "slackers" should fill them.

Such condition is certainly unfair to the gallant fellows who have risked their lives in the service. In short, one might as well claim that the paying of taxes should be voluntary, as the defending the Empire, in such a crisis, should be voluntary.

Of course, proper exemption should be made for the maintenance of our great industrial, agricultural, commercial and other requirements at home; but this exemption can only be arrived at after complete inquiry and registration.

I, therefor, have the honour, in view of all the circumstances, to recommend that the gravity of the situation, the justice of the cause, the preservation of the Liberties of our Canadian people and the successful issue of the War require a system of compulsory service with careful observation of the above safeguards.

Will you kindly give this your best consideration and, should you agree with the principle involved, may I hope that effect will at an early date be given thereto.

Faithfully,

(Sgd) Sam Hughes.

The Right Honourable,
Sir Robert L. Borden, G.C.M.G.,
Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa, Canada.

I received no answer to that proposition. It is also well known that prominent members of the Cabinet, up till a couple of weeks ago, declared that there would be no compulsory service. It is further asserted that shortly before the Prime Minister sailed for England, definite pledges were given to certain dignitaries against conscription. In the presence of the Prime Minister during last December, the Chairman of the National Service Commission several times declared that compulsory service was out of the question; that to introduce it would mean civil war. The Minister of Militia, Hon. Sir Edward Kemp, quite recently declared in the House that the question of compulsory service had never been considered by the Cabinet. I have always pursued the educative line, realizing that men who are not informed on the subject tend to cater to fads and fancies of the public mind. They forget that under responsible government ministers must have the courage of their convictions—as was pointed out by the Minister of Trade and Commerce yesterday, in theory—and be leaders of public opinion; that only under autocratic forms of Government should advisers of the Crown be influenced by agitations forced upon them, and that the duty of members of Parliament is to educate kindly. Therefore, have I pursued a moderate line.

Had my aim been personal advancement or influence, or my desire to injure or embarrass the Government, it would have been easy early in the session, when such a motion would not have been accepted, to force it on the House. But my ambition is solely to help the boys at the front to win the war; therefore I took no action until I felt that the Cabinet and the country were well educated up to the line. Again, therefore, knowing the trend of a government to await being encouraged to act, have I pursued the educative policy, my aim being the success of my plans.

The day after the Prime Minister's return to Canada, with this same end in view, I sent him a letter. As it is not personal, I assume that there is no objection on the part of the Prime Minister to my reading it.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: No.

Sir SAM HUGHES: It was as follows:

May 16, 1917.

Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden, Prime Minister,
Ottawa.

Dear Sir Robert:

I have waited until your return before taking action in relation to our efforts in the war, or rather our lack of effort in the war.

I have given notice of a motion on going into the Committee of Supply in favour of compulsory service. This is not intended to be a want of confidence motion, if you can give me any assurance that the Government will seriously take up the question itself, and that energetic and effective action along right lines will follow.

I shall be glad if you will arrange a date this week, or early next, when this matter might be discussed in Parliament.

Faithfully,
(Sgd.) Sam Hughes.

The Prime Minister responded in his speech on the following Friday, enunciating the principle of compulsory overseas service. I, therefore, heartily endorsed the proposition he then made, and have hoped that the details of the measure would be such as to receive general approval. I had one, and only one, aim in all this business: to win the war; let Canada and Canadians, each and all do our duty, our full duty; let us maintain our civilization; let us not weary in well-doing, but stand or fall by the boys in the trenches. To raise troops for compulsory overseas service was the watchword.

Let us put a few questions. First, has Canada the authority to put in force a measure of compulsory service? The right hon. leader of the Opposition says that Canada has not that authority, and on that point we must cross swords with him. Second, what does that mean? Third, what does it involve? Fourth, what are the advantages? Fifth, what are the disadvantages or objections? Sixth, can it be accomplished, and with what consequences? Seventh, should there be exemptions? If so, of what nature? Eighth, how soon can it be accomplished? Ninth, will such soldiers be suitable? Tenth, why is a compulsory service necessary? Why not continue the voluntary system?

Let me refer to the first question: has Canada the authority? Section 15 of the British North America Act says:

> The Commander in Chief of the Land and Naval Militia, and of all naval and military forces, of and in Canada, is hereby declared to continue and be vested in the Queen.

"The Queen" here means, of course, the Governor General in Council. Section 91 of the British North America Act says:

> It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons, to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of Canada, in relation to all matters not coming within the classes of subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces; and for greater certainty, but not so as to restrict the generality of the foregoing terms of this section, it is hereby declared that (notwithstanding anything in this Act) the exclusive legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada extends to all matters coming within the classes of subjects next hereinafter enumerated; that is to say,—
> Sub-Sec. 7, Militia, Military and Naval Service and Defence.

That is all the British North America Act has bearing on the subject. The Militia Act goes further. The interpretation clause, section 2, says:

> (b) 'Emergency' means war, invasion, riot or insurrection, real or apprehended.
> (g) 'On active service,' as applied to a person subject to military service, means whenever he is enrolled, enlisted, drafted or warned for service or duty, during an emergency, or when he is on duty, or has been warned for duty in aid of the civil power.

Then section 4 deals with the command in chief.

Inasmuch, Mr. Speaker, as this legal aspect of the question was largely set forth in an address which I had the honour of delivering to the House in January, if it is permissible, I would like it to be taken as read.

Mr. SPEAKER: Perhaps it would be better if the hon. gentleman proceeded in the usual way.

Sir SAM HUGHES: All right. Section 4 says:

> The command in chief of the militia is declared to continue and be vested in the King, and shall be exercised and administered by His Majesty or by the Governor General as his representative.

"Governor-General" means, of course, the Governor-General in Council. Section 69, which deals with active service, provides:

> The Governor in Council may place the militia, or any part thereof, on active service anywhere in Canada, and also beyond Canada, for the defence thereof, at any time when it appears advisable so to do by reason of emergency.

Section 72, which deals with command in time of war, is as follows:

> In time of war, when the militia is called out for active service conjointly with His Majesty's regular forces, His Majesty may place in command thereof a senior general officer of his regular army.

That has been the case at the front; we have had a senior general officer in command of the Canadian Expeditionary Force.

Section 74 of the Militia Act (Army Act and Regulations) is our charter for our service beyond the seas, just as the British North America Act covers the administration of Canada. Section 74 reads:

> The Army Act for the time being in force in the United Kingdom, the King's regulation, and all other laws applicable to His Majesty's troops in Canada and not inconsistent with this Act or the regulations made thereunder, shall have force and effect as if they had been enacted by the Parliament of Canada for the government of the militia.

I would like the right hon. leader of the Opposition to note this. Thus Canada has full authority at any time to enrol and train her militia. The Government, if they chose to do so, could, in time of peace or in time of war, call out 300,000 men and train them; they could do it to-morrow. Canada has authority to send them overseas, for the defence of Canada, in an emergency, and "war" is an emergency, according to the interpretation clause of the Act.

Canada has full authority to equip, officer, and manage her forces as she pleases while they are within her borders. Beyond her borders and within her own laws, Canadian authority for management and control is wanting, except by adopting the Army Act. Canada has no constitutional authority, as I interpret it—and, of course, I am giving my own interpretation—to administer or control our men once we send them beyond our border until we adopt, as the law provides, the Army Act and the clauses relating thereto. After we have adopted the section of the Army Act in this regard, that section is as much a part of our constitution and law as is the British North America Act, and this Government and Parliament have as much authority to carry on the management of the militia under that law as if it were part and parcel of the British North America Act. But the British military law, especially the Army Act, gives that authority to Canada. The statesmen and war officers of Great Britain have foreseen such situations as now present themselves. Not only in cases where the colonial Governments raise the troops and pay the cost, but even where Britain enrols and pays colonials, the British Government has by law safeguarded, in every conceivable instance, the rights, privileges and liberties of the colonials. Therefore the Canadian forces are in no sense "British regulars." I come now to a consideration of the British military law, 1914. I refer first to the Army Act, section 190, subsection 23, page 557, which says:

The expression "colony" means any part of His Majesty's dominions exclusive of the British Islands and of British India, and includes Cyprus and any British protectorate, and where parts of such dominions are under both a central and a local legislature, all parts under the central legislature shall, for the purpose of this definition, be deemed to be one colony.

Chapter XI., page 194, military law, provides that the military forces of the Crown shall consist of three classes, British, Indian and Colonial. Colonial forces are defined by section 3 as follows:

The colonial forces are of two classes, namely, the forces raised by the government of a colony, and the forces raised in a colony by direct order of His Majesty to serve as auxiliary to, and in fact to form part for the time being of, the regular forces.

I should like the leader of the Opposition to take note of this, because later on I intend to point out a flaw in his argument. There are two classes of colonial forces. I have no record of the Canadian Government having sent a despatch to the British authorities asking that sections 175 and 176 of the Army Act be made applicable to Canada, but I presume they did so. There was no necessity, however, for doing that unless we desired to let the British authorities enrol troops in Canada and pay them. The Governor General in Council might pass a thousand Orders in Council in regard to those sections, but they would not be worth the paper they were written on, because sections 175 and 176 refer to other classes of colonial troops raised by the British Government with the consent of the colony and paid for by the British Government. They do not apply in any sense to the Canadian Expeditionary Force. I did not know that that action was taken until the leader of the Opposition so stated the other day, but that is why I have claimed from the outset that those troops were under the control of the Minister of Militia, that is, under the control of Canada, and should be controlled by Canada, because sections 175 and 176 deal with the class of colonial troops that are not referred to here. If the British authorities were to enlist men in Canada for aeroplane service or anything of that sort and pay them and control them, then they would come under sections 175 and 176, but not otherwise. Section 177 is the section which applies to us, and I will refer to it a little later on. Chapter 11 of the military law goes on to state:

The first class of colonial forces—those raised by the government of a colony—are only subject to the Army Act when so provided by the law of the colony and when serving with part of His Majesty's regular forces, and then only so far as the colonial law has not provided for their government and dicipline, and subject to the exceptions specified in the general orders of the general officer commanding the forces with which they are serving. The Army Act, however, section 177, provides that the colonial law may extend to the forces, although beyond the limits of the colony where they are raised.

The second class of colonial forces—of which the West India regiment, the Royal Malta Artillery, the West African Regiment, the non-Europeans of the Fortress Companies, Royal Engineers, at Hong Kong and Sierra Leone, and the Hong Kong Singapore Battalion, Royal Garrison Artillery, are examples—is referred to by sections 175, subsection 4, and 176, subsection 3, of the Army Act. Their pay and maintenance are voted annually by the Imperial Parliament, and they are in fact Imperial forces, although serving in a colony.

Section 177 is one which gives to Canada supreme control of her troops, not in Canada, as we have it here under the British North America Act, but in England and at the front. The Army Act, section 177, page 539, provides:

Where any force of volunteers, or of militia, or any other force, is raised in India or in a colony, any law of India or the colony may extend to the officers, non-commissioned officers and men belonging to such force, whether within or without the limits of India or the colony; and any such law may apply, in relation to such force and to any officers, non-commissioned officers and men thereof, all or any of the provisions of this Act, subject to such adaptations, modifications and exceptions as may be specified in such law, and where so applied this Act shall have effect in relation to such force, subject to such adaptations, modifications and exceptions as aforesaid; and where any such force is serving with part of His Majesty's regular forces, then so far as the law of India or the colony has not provided for the government and dicipline of such force, this Act and any other Act for the time being amending the same shall, subject to such exceptions and modifications as may be specified in the general orders of the general officer commanding His Majesty's forces with which such force is serving, apply to the officers, non-commissioned officers and men of such force, in like manner.

This section shall not apply to any officer belonging to any such force when attached to or doing duty with, or to any non-commissioned officer or man belonging to any such force when attached to or otherwise acting as part of or with, any portion of the regular, reserve, or auxiliary forces in the United Kingdom.

That sub-section means this: Prior to 1914, we were in the habit of letting some of our forces go overseas for the purpose of taking part in tournaments, the Queen's Jubilee, etc. The leader of the Opposition will remember instances of that. Although our troops wore the British uniform, they were not under British military law, and they were not under the law of Canada, because until we adopted section 177, we had no control over them beyond the three-mile limit. The section was enacted so as to meet this difficulty, so that while those soldiers were in England, while no Canadian law would cover their case, they would be attached to the British command and would be subject to that command for the time being.

I hesitate to differ from the leader of the Opposition, but I respectfully take the ground that it is admitted that Canada has the right to call out the whole militia, or any part thereof, to-morrow, whether in times of peace or war, for training purposes. It is admitted that Canada has the right to train, officer and arm these troops for the defence of this country, whether within or without Canada; and if we send these troops one inch beyond the three-mile limit of Canada we might just as well send them 3,000 miles away to the German frontier, because Canada's defence is not restricted to one inch, or one mile, or one thousand miles distance from her coasts, but is wherever Canada is threatened. I take the ground that we have the authority to do all these things within Canada, and in view of section 177 of the British Army Act, we have legal authority to control these men ourselves beyond the three-mile limit of Canada.

Secondly: What does compulsory service mean? It does not prevent the citizen who prefers to be recorded as a volunteer from enlisting as such. If he does not volunteer the Government should select men on a basis fair to all. These men must be trained and some of them sent overseas, but Canada must control and pay them there as well as here.

Thirdly, it involves the responsibility to the Canadian people for every man and every dollar. We have the responsibility now, but responsibility without the power to control constitutes an intolerable condition. Canada has already lost much in this regard. Compulsory service gives us this power.

[Sir Sam Hughes.]

The advantages of compulsory service are:

(a) Under the volunteer plan the basis is enthusiasm, love of liberty, intense patriotism, the setting aside all else for the cause—home, loved ones, position, wealth, aye, even life itself—and all for his personal love of a principle. The volunteer offers all, risks all, sacrifices all.

(b) Under compulsory service the State adjusts inequalities, and instead, for example, of taking all the boys in a family, leaving the neighbour's boys all at home, as frequently occurs under the voluntary system, the duty of service is fairly and evenly distributed. Tens of thousands of good Canadian fellows, willing to serve, are still in mufti because they do not think it fair for them to go and leave at home neighbours just as eligible, secure in comfort and drawing high pay in various industrial pursuits. After the war the one might be penniless, without a position, possibly shot to pieces and unfit to earn a livelihood, while the other would live in comparative luxury and health, enjoying the liberties so dearly earned by the former.

(c) Every citizen owes duty to the State; he must pay taxes, must be personally responsible for a share in the administration of justice, etc. So also, in every land, each is liable for service for the defence of homes and loved ones and against a common enemy to mankind.

(d) Compulsory service does not imply a vast standing army, as I regret to say a few labour leaders are endeavouring to make it appear, and I was going to add, a few labour leaders bearing all the earmarks of being in the pay of German agents in the United States. My system implies training from ten to sixteen years of age in schools; then occasional brushing up in after years. But Canada in this emergency has not the preliminary training done; so other conditions must be applied.

(e) Conscription as in Germany takes from his home and business in the best two or three years of his life, in peace times, every male citizen. The man becomes lost in the machine; under the brutal German system he becomes mentally and morally debased.

Under my proposal for compulsory overseas service, the men would be called out, and after preliminary training would cross the ocean. The drawbacks attending the German system would be avoided. No autocratic class would be created; each soldier would have before him, by merit and fitness, the possibility of rising to senior position. The training would benefit each for peace after the war; and above all, Canada would do her duty to the gallant fellows in the trenches. I venture the assertion that after a few weeks' training, the proudest men in Canada would be these lads, and they would all regret not having joined three years ago. When the war is over each will return to his duty as citizen, proud to have helped to overthrow the greatest autocracy that ever blighted humanity

(f) There are only two free governments upwards of a century old, namely, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and the United States. Why? Rulers become autocratic, selfish, corrupt, sycophantic, mere creatures of corporations and of so-called democratic organizations —because the greatest tyrant and autocrat is the so-called democrat, irresponsible to the whole people. It has been asserted that people's representatives in national assemblies too often become mere pawns on the checker-board. Even in Canada men are found who suggest—nay, who go farther and assert that two great corporations—one railway, and the other a financial group—control this Government and the business and administrative ends thereof. I am not endorsing this assertion, but merely giving vent to the rumour.

Mr. GRAHAM: Simply putting it on Hansard.

Sir SAM HUGHES: For ordinary wars the voluntary system would usually more than suffice. This war, however, staggers humanity. It is beyond all former comprehension; it is the bitter, tenacious, desperate struggle of dark-age autocracy against free democracy. For thirty years the autocratic German machine has been planning, getting ready, while the free democracies of France, of Britain, of Italy, and now of Russia and the United States, have been living in a fool's paradise, unprepared. Free democracies, properly trained and directed, will ever defeat autocracies. A good illustration of that is found in the old athletic days, when the amateur team always proved superior to the professional whether at lacrosse or football. The same is true in every land and under any circumstances, but the men must be trained. It is difficult, however, even in tree Canada to instil the idea that discipline is not repression; is not the breaking down of one's will; is not the restrictive limiting principles, but is the upbuilding, the educative, the strengthening, the controlling, the developing, the training to control and to command idea. Canadians at the front have been so trained; hence the free, self-reliant Canadian citizen soldier has come out triumphant, although more or less weighted down by the machine idea and incubus of regular service systems.

What are the disadvantages worthy of note in a proper compulsory service system? I look at this thing from one end to the other and frankly I must confess that I do not find any, except such as are created by agitators for a special purpose, and these agitators will soon disappear for the people will not tolerate them.

Can compulsory service be accomplished? The right hon. leader of the Opposition says that it cannot. I again show my faith in the Canadians and cross swords with him. I have every faith that it can be accomplished, and accomplished just as easily as rolling off a log, as the Yankee says. If taken up in the correct way the plan will be generally acceptable. It would be well of course that the public should be fully instructed in a kindly way as to their duty to serve in defence of homes, loved ones, free institutions and liberty. It might also be impressed upon some, a very limited few, that this is:

> No time for wile or long intrigue,
> Our country to her children cries,
> Those who're not for us are against;
> Better as foes than false allies.

According to Canada's census in 1911 there were in this country 1,700,000 males from 18 to 45 years. The immigration from 1911 to 1916 of persons from 18 to 45 years of age was 500,000. That is only an estimate but it is an estimate based on all the information at my disposal, because, out of the nearly 1,700,000 people who came to Canada during the years since the last census, of 1911, up to the present time, I estimate that 500,000 would be of the fighting age between 18 and 45. Then I accept about 100,000 less than the estimate of the statistician who prepared these figures as to the natural increase. I have put the amount of the average natural increase in population at 200,000 although, if I heard the figures correctly in the House yesterday, it was put at over 300,000. The result is that Canada to-day has 2,420,000 fighting men between 18 and 45 years of age within her borders and at the front.

We have enrolled 420,000 men, which leaves two millions of men between the ages of 18 and 45 free for service. Of these two million men, 1,200,000 are single. I do not know how these figures compare with those which were furnished yesterday, but, at all events, such is my estimate.

Of course, there will be certain exemptions and exceptions, but Canada could send another 200,000 men to the front and yet not weaken to any perceptible extent her producing capacity.

Should there be exemptions? I do not propose to enter into the details of the Bill to-day. My desire is that the Bill should go through with as little delay as possible and without any more discussion than is consistent with the proper consideration of the measure. But the exemptions would need to be very carefully looked at, and if I might here interject an idea, it is that one of the great objections to the conscriptive Bill is the form of the tribunal that is to administer it, but that is a matter the Prime Minister said could be amended. There should be exemptions. The Militia Act provides for them and this Act also provides for them.

The next question is: How soon can the force be enrolled? I am not trying to bring in Valcartier at all, but I believe that an ordinary man capable of taking hold of this matter could have this force ready to go overseas within the next four months. Within the next four months Canada should raise, equip and train 150,000 men, and by October they should be in the trenches. I do not think it would be much of a trick at all.

Will such soldiers be suitable? We have heard a good deal about boys not being fit to fight and not fit to do this and that. I have always had great faith in the boy. I was a boy once myself—you may not believe it, but it is true—and I still like to keep the boyish confidence. The most notable examples of bravery in this war have been afforded by lads mostly under 18 years of age. Thousands and tens of thousands of British, Canadian and Australian boys have displayed marvellous heroism and bravery. They fear nothing; they are ready to do anything. Then, to the question: Will such soldiers be suitable?—I say most assuredly, providing they are trained as citizen soldiers, and not repressed and dwarfed by permanent corps or regular service training. Discipline must not be regarded as repression but as development, education, polish, fitness. Train the boy to be self-reliant and fearless rather than to be an abject sort of machine.

It is sometimes supposed that young men do not make good soldiers. Let me once more impress upon the House that it was the boys of the Welsh regiment who smashed the famous French cuirassiers at Quatre Bras. The average age of the battalion, old and young, was below 20. Upwards of thirty per cent of Wellington's heroes at Waterloo were under 20 years of age. Twenty-five per cent of the warriors who climbed the heights of Alma, and fought in that misty morn at Inkerman, were also under 20 years of age, many of them under 17, and they were dandies. They were trained to fight in those days with cudgels. In this present great war, many of the most heroic acts have been performed by mere lads of 18. There is no fear but such soldiers will be suitable in every respect.

Why is compulsory service necessary? Compulsory service is necessary because the voluntary system, after accomplishing almost marvels, is exhausted. I have no exact evidence of it, but there is the best of reasons for believing that German gold, cleverly applied, did the trick. I do not for one moment believe that Bryan was bought by German gold in the United States but he was influenced by men who were bought by German gold. Henry Ford was approached by gentlemen who have since admitted, and sworn to it, that they were in the pay of the German agents who were influencing these gentlemen to take the line they did. I presume that if the evidence could all be brought out here, we would have some very interesting stories. I repeat that German gold, cleverly applied, did the trick. The records of American courts show clearly that the labour agitations, the contraband demands, the food riot movements, the "peace at any price" agitations, have all been controlled and directed by German gold. We have instances where gentlemen occupying high journalistic positions in this country were in receipt of money from the United States of America and it is now known, and it has been proved in the United States courts, that peace organizations in that country were to a very large extent maintained by German gold for years before the war. Early in 1916, when Canadian recruiting was at its zenith, whispers were heard from all Canadian centres—the work was skilfully done—dreading that workmen could not be found for the various industries and services in Canada. This matter was up in the House once before. I must here say in justice to the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) that it had been intimated to me last night that he had stated that I had been a party to helping the munition workers to smuggle men out for munition work instead of sending them to the front. I never did anything of the kind. The Prime Minister referred to this matter some time ago in the House and there is no harm in referring to it again.

Mr. OLIVER: I merely read extracts from Hansard and I had nothing whatever to say on the point myself.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I thought that the hon. gentleman made a comment coupling me with the Prime Minister in stating the claims of the munition workers.

Mr. OLIVER: I merely read what the minister said.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I will deal with that matter a little later. The dread was expressed that workmen could not be found for the various industries and services in Canada and it gradually took head. At the time I suspected German gold, and so informed the Prime Minister. The movement grew in force. and the Imperial Munitions Board, and the Finance Minister, each became anxious and restrictive. Finally the head of the Canadian Pacific Railway was influenced by the agitation, and while the Imperial Munitions Board and my hon. friend the Minister of Finance had limited themselves to impressive personal conversations with the Prime Minister and many others, Lord Shaughnessy went farther, and not only privately, as did the others, but openly, proclaimed himself in an address before the Board of Trade of Montreal. Lord Shaughnessy had been regarded in railway circles as a man of sound judgment; he had been trained under the greatest railway man of the age, Sir William van Horne; but he had not the breadth of judgment, had not the force of character, had not the fearlessness in face of trial of the great master, Van Horne.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: He was not affected by German gold?

Sir SAM HUGHES: One would imagine from the wishy-washy criticism of the financial critic of the Opposition that there was some influence at him.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Whether that was a pat on the back or not I do not know. At this juncture I should point out that these agitations manifested themselves all over the country. The Prime Minister was bombarded with them. He was an easier mark than I. I would throw them out of my office. I might recite this incident; the Prime Minister will not object. A very distinguished gentleman, head of one of the largest organizations in Canada, the manager of the Dominion Iron and Steel Company of Sydney, came to the office and, with tears in his voice and some in his eyes, begged us not to enlist and take the men away. I had chanced to visit that institution many years ago, and as I then went along the lines of furnaces and down through the coal mines, I saw as handsome a lot of fellows as ever stood inside jackets, Highland Scotchmen every man of them. I had gone through it in after years and found hundreds of men not one of whom could speak the English tongue, and almost every one of them an alien enemy, in time of war. I asked the manager, as the Prime Minister may remember, what had become of these gallant fellows that he was now asking us to restrain from enlisting, in order that they might shovel coal and handle furnaces in Sydney. I pointed out that his foresight should have been exercised years back in keeping gallant Canadians of British descent in our country, in place of driving them out to the four winds of Heaven and filling their places with aliens from the mines of Germany and Austria.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The ex-Minister directed in writing that a young man in the city of Halifax be not permitted to enlist for service.

Sir SAM HUGHES: The gentleman has wakened up; I am glad to see it; I was not aware that he had enough vitality. The young man to whom he refers, I understood, had been a soldier, and as long as I was Minister of Militia or acting in any military capacity and a soldier undertook to act as that gentleman did, he would not be allowed to remain in the service. But I learned afterwards that he was not a soldier at the time he had written the articles referred to, and accordingly I observed the law and I think I made him an officer. I know I gave him a chance anyway.

4 p.m.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: You prevented him from enlisting.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I did not. He was dismissed from the forces, that was the order I gave.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: You gave directions that he be not enlisted.

Sir SAM HUGHES: No, I gave directions that he be not appointed an officer.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The ex-Minister directed the officer commanding at Halifax that a certain individual there be not permitted to enlist as a private.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I do not remember the details. I do remember that this man had gone to the Old Country and had there written some of the most slanderous falsehoods; and I gave an order that if he was a soldier or an officer at the time, he should not be permitted to enter the forces of Canada, at all events until we had reason to believe he had learned his proper functions.

This agitation went on, then, about the labour question, and would you believe it, this man, the man who was in here demanding, with tears in his eyes, that we do not take the soldiers from Sydney, inside of two months was after me to give him command of a battery himself, and to take these very fellows away. The whole thing has been piffle from one end of Canada to the other. The Prime Minister, however, yielding to these influences—and I admit they were very serious, I was pestered with them until I threw them out—suggested to me a letting up in the recruiting. It was in vain that I protested and met the fallacious arguments.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: On what occasion was it that I suggested letting up on recruiting?

Sir SAM HUGHES: The leader of the Government on more than one occasion—take the very day when Mr. McDougall was present, the leader of the Government asked me again if I could not let up on recruiting; and, moreover, the right hon. leader of the Government later on pointed out—if he wants the whole story I will be glad to give it—pointed out that there was a tremendous agitation in Toronto over the subject, that he had had various communications from Toronto, that the Finance Minister had told him there was a perfect storm brewing there, and that agitation was due to the fact that men could not be obtained as workers. Mark Irish, of the Imperial Munitions Board; Mr. Flavelle, of the Imperial Munitions Board, and others had been insistent in their demands that these men would not be taken. If the Prime Minister will permit me, I will read letters that will cover the thing, letters from himself.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I would be very glad.

[Sir Sam Hughes.]

Sir SAM HUGHES: I would like the Prime Minister to see one of the letters before I read it.

Mr. CARROLL: As a matter of fact, was not recruiting called off at Sydney and Glace Bay over a year ago?

Sir SAM HUGHES: I did not call it off. I will show the Prime Minister a copy of the letter; I have not the original here.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The hon. gentleman can go on with his speech; I will make my reply.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Before I sailed for England in March, 1916, knowing that the Prime Minister had communicated his fears re the labour situation and the Quebec question to others—I might mention to Mr. Godfrey, of Toronto, and a number of others—and it being the transition period between winter billeting and spring encampment, I yielded to his request and partially let up on recruiting. I told the Prime Minister that the only excuse I could make was that it was between winter billeting and spring encampments at the time, and the records will show that we did not draw a man out, we did not give any men to the munitions; our officers simply did not exert themselves as vigorously as formerly, owing to the fact that we had no place to put the men without going to great expense, and spring camps were being formed.

It may be noted, incidentally, that these same organizations and gentlemen with affiliated interests, while prominent in patriotic and philanthropic professions, have, nevertheless, not been unmindful of the profiteering aspect of the war, hence, probably, their intense interest in the labour question. Only this week the head of the Munitions Board has taken it on himself to write a letter to the manufacturers of this country practically demanding that recruiting shall not interfere with his munitions, when every day if I go to any big factory in Montreal or Toronto I can see hundreds of men clamouring for work. I have seen five hundred men around the entrance to a factory in Montreal in the morning looking for work, at the very time these gentlemen were saying that we were taking away their workmen. There are 10,000 women in Toronto to-day, and hundreds of men, anxious for work in munition factories, and yet these gentlemen tell the public and the Government that we are interfering with the work of the factories, when it is perfect nonsense to say so.

Other contributing causes in the falling off of recruiting are, the abusive tone and language of many speakers at public meetings, calling indiscriminately all those not enlisting "slackers," "cowards," "shirkers," and thus forcing honest men to get their backs against the wall and become negative instead of positive.

Mr. MACDONALD: Speaking at Lindsay, Ontario, on April 28, regarding the conditions of which he spoke and the agitation, the hon. gentleman said:

> This unfortunately had an effect upon the Prime Minister. The result was that I was asked in March, 1916, not to press recruiting, and recruiting to-day has been dead in Canada for fighting purposes.

Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that the statement made by him in Lindsay is quite correct?

Sir SAM HUGHES: I am quite surprised at the hon. gentleman asking any such question. That speech is issued by myself, and I am not in the habit of issuing statements that I do not endorse. I will prove it before I have finished.

I had just referred to the abusive tone and language of many speakers at public meetings as one of the contributing causes in the falling off of recruiting. Many of these speakers were well-meaning gentlemen, fellows with their hair parted in the middle, coming out of the cities and towns, many of them not over the fighting age themselves, men who should have been in the trenches; and these men would lecture the fellows in the country. It is a pleasant task for city chaps to lecture country boys on their duty. I could mention fifty men from different places, all of fighting age, who had the hardihood to go out and lecture men who, from one cause or another, were not going to the front.

I may say that thus far—and I have had a good deal to do with it—whilst I have encouraged recruiting in every legitimate way by enthusiasm, along patriotic lines, I have never asked a man to go to the front. I have no right to do so. The actual action of certain prominent people in directing men not to go, but to stay at home, and secure the places of those going to the front, unfortunately has had its effect. Since the ex-Prime Minister, the hon. leader of the Opposition, is so wedded to his beloved province Quebec, I regret to say that that is a charge which he might well inquire into, relating to the common clergy of his own province.

The removal from Ontario, or rather the establishment of industries in Quebec province, because, as the excuse was, "labour is scarce in Ontario, so many having gone to the war; but plentiful in Quebec, whence few have enlisted"—this regard I took up the question, upon representation from Col. Thomas A. Duff, with Sir Joseph Flavelle, and Sir Robert Borden, with the result that these industries are now more fairly distributed, and the British provinces are not so much penalized because of their enlistment.

I thought it well to present to the House a memo on that subject. A very large industry is being erected at Maisonneuve, and the reason given by those who are establishing it was that they could not get labour in Toronto, so many men had gone to the front, but they could get plenty in Montreal because none had gone. This came to Colonel Duff's attention, and he sent me the correspondence, which I forwarded to Sir Robert, and I think action has been taken on it. The following is the letter which I sent to Mr. Flavelle:

October 30, 1916.

Dear Mr. Flavelle,—

From Colonel Thomas A. Duff of Toronto, one of the most worthy and reputable citizens of Ontario, the following letter has been received:

"3 Maynard Ave., Toronto.
October 26th, 1916.

"Dear Sir Sam,—

"In the belief that you are not aware of the action outlined herein, I desire to present to your notice, the following:

"Recently, it is understood, the Imperial Munitions Board, under the leadership of Mr. J. W. Flavelle, of Toronto, and Mr. Gordon, of Montreal, has let a contract with an American firm for munitions, involving the erection of a plant for the manufacture of fuses in Canada. These commodities are, of course, for the British Government, and the contract is let by that Government through the Imperial Munitions Board in Canada.

"I understand that the Board expressed the desire that the work should be done remote from the Atlantic seaboard—at Toronto or other suitable interior centre. It is further reported that this American firm declined to go to Toronto, or in Ontario, because it was said workmen could not be obtained, so many men having gone as soldiers to the war.

"Rumor has it that this great industry will, therefore, be located by the Imperial Munitions Board in, or adjoining, the city of Montreal, where labour is plentiful.

"Now, sir, how does this matter stand? Wise military precautions require such industries to be removed from the seaboard.

"The excuse is put forward that labour cannot be obtained in Toronto. Why, sir, this is absurd. Toronto has many returned soldiers who have manfully done their duty for King, country and liberty, and who are competent for such work. There are many more over military age, as well as some under, and others incapacitated for the front, who could well perform this work. Besides, Ontario has tens of thousands of the noblest and best women who are only too anxious to help in this great cause. Ontario, therefore, can supply many times the help needed. Of course, in any event, the few specialists necessary will have to be imported, or others trained.

"Let me point out to you, sir, in all sincerity, but in all seriousness, that this is unfair to Ontario. And why? First, this province now loses directly the industry and all that pertains to it in the way of local benefits. During the war our boys are at the front fighting, and their families and friends are, therefore, deprived of the privilege of profiting by this factory in our midst.

"At the end of the war the population of the province of Quebec will, in all probability, be increased by several thousand souls, who will have, meantime, profited financially and will have established comfortable homes in the city of Montreal or thereabouts, which is practically on the seaboard.

"At the end of the war, also, the state of affairs will be, Quebec province increased in wealth and population, as well as in the unit of representation in Parliament, because men have failed to defend their King and country; while Ontario's sons will return, possibly broken in health; their families dependent on Patriotic Funds; themselves without industries wherein to get employment; many of them maimed and crippled for life, and many more resting, as you once said in your farewell address to the boys, 'beneath the poppies of Belgium or the golden lilies of France.'

"The locating of this plant in Quebec looks like bonusing that province for the failure of its people to do their duty towards the Empire, and penalizing Ontario for the noble manner in which the cream of her manhood have offered and given their lives, and those left at home their substance for the cause of liberty.

"It is well known that many men, in certain parts of Canada, have been advised by those to whom they look for guidance, 'Do not enlist; do not fight against Germany; let others go; you should remain and get their places.'

"I lay these facts before you in the hope that in justice to the soldiers and their families from the province of Ontario a handicap may not be placed on her industries and her people through the loyalty of her sons in fighting for, what you term, the 'grand cause of human liberty.'

"Trusting you will take this matter up, I am,

"Faithfully yours,

(Sgd.) "Thomas A. Duff."

I am not familiar with the circumstances and I would esteem it a great favour if you would kindly advise me as to the true statement in the premises.

You can readily understand aside from the question of locality, what great importance must be attached to the location of these industries, that is whether they are accessible for enemy ships or not. For example, should, by any misfortune, Britain lose control of the sea, it is evident such factories should be inland, as nothing could then prevent enemy ships coming to Montreal.

[Sir Sam Hughes.]

There is no doubt either, that the locality issue is, as Colonel Duff points out, important. In short, this action places a discount, and a heavy discount on the loyalty of the splendid citizens of Toronto who have so magnificently done their duty in the trenches, in the other departments of the service and in the great philanthropic, patriotic and charitable aspects of this awful war.

Please let me hear at your earliest convenience, and oblige.

I am writing merely in my personal capacity as a citizen and not as a member of Parliament; as a Cabinet minister or as the honorary president of the Imperial Munitions Board.

Thanking you in advance.

Faithfully,

(Sgd.) Sam Hughes.

J. W. Flavelle, Esq.,
President Imperial Munitions Board,
Ottawa, Canada.

I sent it to Sir Robert, and I know that action of some kind was taken in the premises. With regard to the falling off: in many instances men enlisted—some civil servants—on the guarantee that their places would be filled by women till their return. In a few days they found other men in their places and no women. I protested to the Prime Minister and had, in so far as the Civil Service is concerned, the grievance partially removed. I was informed that the Prime Minister took prompt action in the matter. One of the difficulties in regard to recruiting was the growth of the mercenary idea "high pay at home, with easy work and no danger", as against "low pay at the front, with hard work, and extreme danger". Or as one tersely put it "$7 per day with feather bed at home; or $1.10 per day in mud to the waist, being shot at at the front".

There were many other local causes—growing up from time to time—all based on the primary conspiracy of the "labour" and "employment" cries.

It was noticeable throughout the length and breadth of the country that, as soon as the British conscription law was passed, the people of Canada seemed in favour of compulsory service. The passage of the law had a magic effect from one end of the country to the other, and the cry then was, "Give us compulsory service, the same as they have it in England, in order that the thing may be equal, and these men may not stay at home." Hundreds of people have told me—in fact thousands have made the statement openly—"Why should I go to the front when Jones' boys have not gone; give us a chance at the ballot, and make it even, and if we have to go we will all go willingly" and to-day I believe that if the Militia Act of 1868, or the later amending Act, were enforced in Canada, the man who would fail to observe it would find himself in a very small corner in every part of the country.

After my return from England, and after the Meredith-Duff Commission had concluded, I found myself hampered by being limited in the organization of new battalions. The Prime Minister, upon the demand of certain persons, had, as early as May, an Order in Council passed limiting the formation of these.

Our good friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) who has always been active, except when he wanders from Edmonton, last January, in the House of Commons, gave a list of regiments that were being recruited in Edmonton at one time. His list from Hansard is as follows:

The 56th Battalion—

That battalion never was in Edmonton; it came from Calgary.

The 63rd, 66th, 138th, 151st, 194th, 202nd, 218th and 223rd.

The 223rd was from Winnipeg. As to the 63rd Battalion, Edmonton was merely a central point. We took advantage of certain buildings that were there wherein to quarter our troops, that being the only convenient place that we could find in the whole of the northern part of Alberta. It was upon the urgent request of the citizens of Edmonton, backed up by the hon. gentleman himself, that we organized those regiments. Thousands of men came in from the hunting and railway camps all along the line. They did not live in Edmonton; they did not belong to Edmonton. There ought to be on file in the department records showing that petition after petition and deputation after deputation were received, representing that the people of Edmonton did not know what to do with these men and asking for the establishment of battalions there. Four of these battalions were up to strength within three weeks after their organization. Men were coming in from all over the country to join the colours; they were there, all ready to join before the battalions were organized. On June 3, 1915, the 63rd Battalion was formed; it was up to strength inside of a month. This battalion was in charge of Colonel McLeod, a very fine officer. On June 22, the 66th Battalion was formed under Col. McKinnery, who raised four battalions, aggregating about 4,000 men, inside of three weeks. On the 19th of November one of these was turned over to Colonel Belcher's battalion and on November 26, another batch of men were transferred to Colonel Arnott's battalion. So that there was no recruiting going on at this time; these battalions were full.

On January 28, the 194th Battalion was formed, under Colonel Craig from Vermilion, a fine boy. On February 4, the 202nd was formed under Colonel Bowen. Later on February 23, Cornwall's Battalion, the 218th, was formed. The organization of these battalions runs from June 3, 1915, to February 25, 1916. There was no overlapping. Recruiting was not abnormal, considering the fact that in that section of the country there are many single men and that this point was the recruiting depot for the whole of that part of the Dominion.

Mr. DOUGLAS: The hon. gentleman has not mentioned the 49th and 51st Battalions.

Sir SAM HUGHES: These battalions, which were raised long before that, were not mentioned by the member for Edmonton. I am merely quoting the statement of the member for Edmonton and dealing with the battalions that he mentioned as having been recruited in Edmonton at the same time.

There has been a lot of guff, privately and publicly, along this line. I remember that the Minister of Finance on one occasion became excited over the raising of three battalions in Toronto. If the Prime Minister does not object, I purpose reading some letters dealing with these battalions. There is one here which is marked "confidential"; I will let the Prime Minister see it.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not care to examine letters in the House. If my hon. friend desires to read confidential letters, one would suppose that the proper course would be to show them to one in advance. The hon. gentleman will have to take his own course in the matter.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Well, I am prepared to take my own course in the matter; I shall not read the letter. It has been referred to in the House, however. There is nothing in my letter that I am ashamed of, and it also is marked confidential. However, if the Prime Minister does not wish the letter to be read—

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Was it a letter written to me?

Sir SAM HUGHES: It was written by the Prime Minister to me.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: As to reading it, my hon. friend will have to take his own course.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Certainly I will take my own course; I will not read it.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: What is the date of it?

Sir SAM HUGHES: June 9, 1916. It refers to the raising of this corps. However, I will read one written by myself. It was marked confidential by my secretary, but I will remove the word "confidential," inasmuch as it is my own letter, I assume that is permissible. This letter is dated July 5, 1916, and is as follows:

Dear Sir Robert:

Re recruiting.

You may remember I recommended to you, that we could raise as high as four hundred thousand soldiers, for the front. Later on, you recommended five hundred thousand. We can easily live up to your offer, if right systems are pursued.

When I assured you, at the beginning of the war, that we could supply a Division and maintain it, many hesitated and thought it could not be done, among others, General Gwatkin, who has had altogether too much influence and too much to say—considering he knows little or nothing about Canada, and about the same of military matters.

Instead of a division from 17,000 to 20,000 men, we sent over 33,000, and kept in service in Canada about 2,000 or 3,000 more.

Three systems of recruiting have been pursued.

I deem it important that this should be placed before the country; there is nothing secret in it. The letter continues:

First system: In enrolling the First Contingent, I overrode all red tape; communicated directly with each officer, as well as through the regular channels, and the recruiting was accomplished very rapidly. The whole force was formed and shipped inside of six weeks from the date of its authorization. It was akin to the 'fiery cross' of old Scottish days.

The next system of recruiting was not mine. During my absence in England, the system of raising men by drafts, and the policy of sending over only subordinate officers was adopted. On learning of this I at once stopped it. No inspiration was given on this side of the water, and the evident aim was to inaugurate a system across the water that would throw all positions, above the rank of captain, in the hands of British officers, who had no more military training than our officers, and not as much practical experience of the world. I stopped that system which, so far as recruiting was concerned, was a failure, and for the first winter carried out the plan of battalion recruiting them in the various battalion headquarters. This constituted my second system.

The officers of the battalion became the active recruiting agents. From the outset, all recruiting officers were directed to work in harmony with every organization assisting in the cause—Daughters of the Empire; Red Cross; W. C. T. U's; Church Societies; clergymen of all creeds; business and local organizations of all kinds—in short, everything displaying the right spirit was given the welcome hand, but the Department retained control of our own people only; all else was voluntary.

Had we been paying these organizations the cost would have run into many millions.

From time to time individuals, professing to represent this or that organization, etc., would wish their particular plan to be exclusively adopted, but we quietly side-tracked them—patted them on the back and went on. The result has been simply startling. There has been no friction, and the world cannot produce so successful a record whether under compulsion or voluntary system. We have been in advance of equipment every time.

Third system: Last year, in preparation for the four divisions in the field, I extended the system of recruiting to every center where twenty-five men or upwards could be raised.

We took, as a basis, practically the Parliamentary ridings; in some cases two ridings; but in the larger centres, like Toronto, Montreal and Winnipeg where there are between the city and the county immediately adjoining, seven or eight ridings, we grouped them within the city boundary, although I believe it would have been better to have stuck to the Parliamentary ridings, even in such cases as that. Of course, the drill halls, being largely in one part of each city, caused us to follow the centralizing plan.

Yet we found gentlemen exercising their influence publicly and privately to bring the great city of Toronto, with a population of 500,000, down to the same level in the matter of recruiting as the county of Ontario, with a population of 40,000. Rather than have one battalion in Toronto, one in Peel county, one in Halton, one in Wentworth, one in Hamilton, we divided the country into areas each containing about 40,000 or 50,000 people, and established a battalion in each of those areas. With all due regard to those who have been speaking about Toronto, Winnipeg, Hamilton, Montreal, Edmonton, no more successful system was ever carried out or ever will be carried out than the recruiting system which was established on that basis.

The letter continues:

My own riding has turned out, up to date. about 4,800 men and yet we are represented by only one battalion. We furnished hundreds of men, indirectly, to the First Division, for which "Toronto", largely, got credit; other rural parts did the same. We supplied detachments to the artillery, to the 24th Battalion of Montreal; to the 39th Battalion; to the 59th Battalion; and to the 80th Battalion; before the county battalion system was inaugurated. Of course that was due to the hope that the war would soon end.

The county battalion system has worked marvellously. Now and then, of course, one gets some faddist who wants compulsion; who wants registration; who wants some committee under himself to run matters, but we did not quarrel with any of them—we simply side-tracked them but we certainly did not let any of them excite us, and everything has gone splendidly.

The troops go over as battalions; the senior officers give their time, and a good deal of money over and above what they get, for the little petty reward of going overseas with their corps. Even though these senior officers may not be fit to go into the trenches we think they are entitled to that recognition. All the others, who are fit, get chances in the trenches.

I do not wish to lecture any one, but I do trust that a spirit of fair play will be shown towards a number of gentlemen who have given their time and money to organize battalions with which they have gone overseas:

The system has worked perfectly in spite of a lot of petty intrigue to kill it. In short, the officers in place of following in one fad have utilized every fad and every system. We have taken good men, from any source whence they came, and let me say, I challenge history to show where such work has been done with so little friction.

Regarding Quebec province. I honestly believe I could enthuse it. It seems to be wakening up now. They have had no officers distributed through their counties; they have not been a military people, especially, in recent years, but the spirit is latent there.

Laurier has played on their prejudices; he has kept them at home to form a solid phalanx should an election occur, and he has endeavoured to stir up prejudice among the French people in every other province of Canada. He has made two recruiting speeches; one at Napanee which nearly killed him.

I hope this does not stir up any unpleasant memories.

It was in the United Empire Loyalist centre of Canada—a great place for a man such as he to "spout". His other speech was in Montreal. He made one solitary reference to recruiting, and two to the bilingual issue.

Still, I think Quebec needs only proper education to come right.

Throughout Canada, although all sorts of complaints from interested sources have come in—

This letter is dated July 5, 1916:

—I have not found one acre of land untilled; one wheel in a factory unturned; one bank that failed to receive or pay out cash on proper security; one man; one woman; or one institution of any kind; that has been held up by our recruiting.

There has been more or less dread here and there from interested parties for fear something might turn up that would injuriously affect some particular business, but it is a good deal like the little girl found by her mother in front of the fire-place crying. On being asked the trouble the little girl said "I was just thinking that I might grow up and get married sometime and I might have a little girl who would be playing around the fire-place and fall into it and get burned."

Following this, on July 10, 1916, I completed my report on recruiting to the Prime Minister, as follows:

In a recent memo to you I have reviewed my plans for recruiting. Of course there are many little special or specific methods that we adopt in various localities. For the future, it is my purpose to continue my third plan as outlined to you with all proper specific and special methods advisable.

There still remain upwards of one hundred and twenty-five thousand men to complete your offer of five hundred thousand. That is an average, in general terms, of one battalion to every two ridings. Some will furnish more, some will furnish less. These as infantry, with the artillery, Army Service Corps, Army Medical Corps, Engineers, etc., will more than make up the half million.

At the time you offered the half million men, it was as well known as it is now that Quebec was not doing her duty, nor were some other parts of Canada, although it must be borne in mind that the Acadians have done magnificently and I firmly believe that it is possible to get Quebec to fall into line later.

From the time a battalion is authorized until its formation is, as a rule, several months. First, officers must be carefully selected, then non-commissioned officers, and all must be trained. Active recruiting cannot begin before this time. Incentives of various kinds, of course, can be devised, such as special brigades, one to each province.

Supposing the war were to last until the winter of 1917. Canada at all times, under your promise, must retain fifty thousand troops, during the war, within her borders; all the rest are for the front. We have committed the mistake, thinking the war would not last long, of storing a lot of men in England. My plans are that division after division should be sent over to the front as soon as formed.

Thus at present we have four divisions, or two army corps, practically in the field. These could, as recent events have shown, be greatly advantaged by having either a reserve division for each corps, or a reserve corps, at the front. It would work out well and cost little if anything more to have these troops at the front instead of in Britain. Men get exhausted overworking and a change is greatly welcomed. Then in case of a drive or an overwhelming attack they would be on the ground.

The plan, insidiously devised, of keeping at least as many troops in England as are at the front, is silly. At the present moment, our whole force at the front is disorganized, and we have nothing to put in its place, excepting rapidly formed units from reinforcements who have had no experience at the front. By next spring there should be scarcely a Canadian soldier fit for the firing line left in England. There can be no object in having large numbers of troops in Canada, and in England at the end of the war.

If the war were to be perpetual, or even for forty years or so, I could readily see the propriety of having reinforcements in England balancing those at the front, but within a year or two from now one or other of the two sides in this war will be exhausted. Canada should not have, at the close of the war, a full quota of men in the firing line, a similar quota in England, and a similar quota in Canada. In short, as I regard it, at the close of the war the practical result will be that all our troops in England and in Canada might just as well have been left unenlisted, or at their homes. In other words, it is no real strength to our boys at the front to have a number of men in England and in Canada.

This does not imply that we would string all our men out in one long firing line. We might hold no more of a front than we now do but we should have behind these trenches battalions, brigades, divisions and even corps, taking their turn in the trenches to get trained. Then, should exhaustion take place, it would be time enough to amalgamate a little at a time until elimination would occur, and until victory or defeat would be ours. We would then have our men practically experienced and the original intention in raising the soldiers would be carried out. So far as recruiting for the future in Canada is concerned, your promise of half a million men could easily be fulfilled. But it will not be fulfilled if you permit yourself to be hampered by raising little drafts here and little drafts there sent over in charge of junior lieutenants.

This work is carried on by inspiration, not by fatheads, muddleheads or woodenheads. There has been a clean-cut system from the beginning. Every possible effort has been made in certain quarters to interfere with the force and keep it down to serfdom, to mistrust it and to humiliate it. That sort of thing must cease.

Bonaparte, as well as every other soldier of genius, recognized that dividing the soldiers' maximum efficiency into four parts, only one part depended on the actual man. Pride in himself, faith and confidence in his cause, belief in his leaders, etc., constituted the other three. Bonaparte had no use for woodenheads. He always claimed that—give him French officers, with a mixture of British soldiers, not English alone, but British, and these included large forces of Scotch, Irish and Welsh, in his wars—he would trim the world.

The Prime Minister stated that he thought if I wanted to read a letter, I should have consulted him first. Last October I sent him a letter in regard to compulsory service, but he never took the trouble to reply. Early in May I had a notice of motion before the House, but the Prime Minister did not pay any attention to it. I think, therefore, that I need not go out of my way to consult him in regard to reading letters in the House. I am ready to say on the floor of the House anything that I have to say, and as soon as the Prime Minister treats me in a courteous manner, I will act in the same way towards him.

History records that free governments, that is, responsible governments, gradually yield to petty bickerings; these to uncontrolled dogmatism; that to autocracy, and to dissolution. Nations and peoples forget that "Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty."

It has frequently been asserted that a responsible government is unfit to manage a nation in time of war, and that it should then give place to a dictatorship, or an autocracy. I have never believed in any such doctrine, and I hesitate not to affirm that no condition of affairs can arise which cannot be met efficiently under proper responsible government. The bases of popular government are intelligent, independent, interested, free men and women; Canada has these in millions. Secondly, the jealous guarding of the rights, first of ourselves, and then of others; this is not always properly observed in Canada, I regret to say. Thirdly, popular government demands equal rights and equal laws for all, and special privileges for none; this is not observed in Canada. Lastly it demands loyal, unselfish level-headed statesmen, who will not be misled by personal ambition or any other improper influence; Canada is not altogether deficient in this respect.

In either war or peace, the Cabinet should be properly controlled. No Government could possibly last under a system where each minister would be privileged to dabble and meddle in the details, not only of his own department, but of every other one. The Prime Minister should be familiar with all matters, except routine, being informed by the minister of the particular department; but only great questions of policy should concern the other departments. Non-observance of this principle, owing to the fact that following the Canadian Cabinet rule for generations, no minister has the right to manage his own department, but is subject to meddling, hindrance, and interferences from all other minsters' besides the Prime Minister, has primarily caused the failure of the volutary system of enlistment.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh.

Sir SAM HUGHES: It is the same with every Government. There is not an hon. gentleman opposite who managed his own department when he was minister. We have the evidence of one man that they "fought like blazes." It is a Prime Minister's right, and his only, to be satisfied by the minister of a department on matters other than that of policy.

It may not be amiss here once more to review voluntary enlistment. For the First Division my action was unique in history. All red tape was thrown aside and paternalism, which is one of the many banes of regular service systems, was entirely removed. Canada's citizen soldiers, not only then, but since, manfully proved my faith in them. In my absence in England, the debilitating plan of draft was resorted to, but I cancelled it on my return.

For the Second Division, during the winter months and at leisure, battalions were organized in various centres.

During 1915, it became evident, the war was more serious than anticipated, and that more men were needed. I resorted for the fall and winter of 1915-16 to the Home Locality System of recruiting. Nothing in history ever surpassed its success. I had plans laid for four hundred thousand men. Meantime the Prime Minister pledged five hundred thousand men. Personally, I have never seen why any limit should be fixed. We are in the war to establish human liberty and overthrow Kaiserism; and if it takes a million men for Canada's share they certainly should be sent. To complete the balance, however, of the five hundred thousand, the country was informally divided off so as to give, in general terms, about twice the area assigned for a battalion in the Home-Locality System. In short, for the Home-Locality System, a district of about forty thousand population was allotted to a battalion. In the last plan the unit was increased to about one hundred thousand This would have given between 525,000 and 550,000 men. During the winter of 1915-16, however, petty interferences began to hinder the work. These continued on into 1916, till finally, no battalion could be organized without delays. For example, before I left for England last June, I ordered the formation of three battalions in Manitoba. On my return in October they had not yet run the gauntlet of the Treasury Board and Privy Council. The three battalions have never yet been properly completed. Under my system they would have been ready to sail for England by the time they were finally authorized. However, I raised upwards of four hundred thousand men directly and indirectly with very little friction, and with the most marvellous good conduct and efficiency on the part of the soldiers.

Then, however, came the action early in 1916 regarding the labour question, and that was the beginning of the end of voluntary recruiting.

More than a month has elapsed since the Prime Minister's return, and his announcement of "Selective Conscription". The Militia Act, which, according to the Prime Minister has all the powers of this Bill except "selection",—or, to use his own words, "Thus, the only new feature proposed is the method of selection" to my mind is far more easy of application, broader and better adapted to the situation than this Bill. I do not favour selection by tribunals under the Justice Department; I prefer the ballot under the Militia Department. Under either plan troops will be allotted to a score of different departments in the actual militia service. Under the Bill they cannot be allotted to other employment. The Prime Minister read a list the other day of forty different branches of employment to which men could be allotted under the Bill. Under the Militia Act, however, men could be allotted to any national service, such as farmers, mechanics, miners, business men, etc. All would receive military, uniform rates of pay. Under this Bill, however, the man at home nightly in a feather bed may receive from $7 to $10 as a mechanic, while his brother in the trenches receives $1.10 for hard work and being shot at. Under the Militia Act the men could be now undergoing training in Canada, for I have yet to learn of the man objecting to training our men to defend homes, principles and loved ones.

Meantime, therefore, while the next few months are being wasted in discussion of this Bill—in appointing the machinery to carry out its measures, in hearing the tedious judicial appeals, in organizing the training camps, and in conducting the elections —let Canada act as she can act under the existing Militia Act until this Bill becomes law. There need be no delay, no friction, no need of compulsion to go overseas. The only compulsion would be to train, and no one could object to that. The machinery is ready. If the Government are actuated by honest desire to help on the cause they deserve credit. But I pass by every objection; set aside every obstacle; blot out every adverse claim; refuse to heed any criticism against the principles of the Bill. I stand for the Bill, and will help to make it a success—if such is possible. I wish to give it every chance; improve it, without loss of time; get it into operation forthwith, so that our beloved boys at the front may be properly supported, and the great cause of human liberty may be triumphant.

Let me appeal to the veteran leader of the Opposition to join, after pointing out his objections to the Bill, in having it become effective; grant a year's extension of Parliament, and have action such that our land under this Act may be in the firing line by the end of September.

I turn for a moment to some of the remarks made by the leader of the Opposition yesterday. He suggested that the Government request that sections 175 and 176 should be made applicable to the Canadian militia. I have already shown that the granting of the request would not be worth the paper it was written on. It could not be done. I have already taken up the question of the defence of Canada, and I need not detain the House discussing that point further.

The leader of the Opposition speaks of harmony. He is great on harmony. From the way he talks about it one would almost think he had been a musician. He said:

If to-day this harmony no longer exists the fault is not with this side of the House.

Well then, I do not know on whose side it is. If ever a Government has yielded to the demands of the leader of the Opposition, it is this Government, and on lines that, while not unconstitutional perhaps, have nevertheless brought all sorts of humiliation on the people of the other provinces. I cannot see where he had the right to make any statement such as that.

Speaking of the Militia Act, the right hon. gentleman said:

They may summon everybody when the enemy is at the frontier in order to preserve intact the soil of this our land.

Where does he find that in the law? I have studied the law myself, and I know that it cannot be found in it. He was simply putting words on Hansard that he had no right to put there. The militia can be summoned when the enemy is at the frontier; they can be summoned in times of peace or in times of war. But the right hon. gentleman says that everybody may be summoned when the enemy is at the frontier, and his words are not without some effect, coming from such an astute gentleman as he is.

Again he says:

I say that he could not under the Act as it is, send anybody across the ocean to serve in the war.

I do not see why the Government could not. Under the Act the Prime Minister certainly has power to send troops across the ocean. Further on the leader of the Opposition says:

The fact that the men of Quebec have not enlisted in larger numbers does not mean that they have degenerated. . . .I followed the enlistment very closely as it proceeded.

I am afraid that he followed a very long way behind. I had no right to approach the right hon. gentleman, but I have kept watch on him. I did approach the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) on two or three occasions and I am proud to say he took a very active part in recruiting and did his best to help us, but as far as I can learn the right hon. leader of the Opposition attended only two recruiting meetings.

I have found the record of only two meetings addressed by the leader of the Opposition in favour of recruiting, one at Napanee, where there are a lot of United Empire Loyalist people, and one in the city of Montreal. I have read his speeches at these meetings and I could only find in them one reference to recruiting and two to the bilingual issue. I was very much amazed. I thought that my right hon. friend lost the opportunity of a lifetime. What the right hon. gentleman says about the English, and French Canadian born population is all right but his reference to the disarming of the people of Quebec was a little out of place. In times of war the people are always disarmed by the troops that come in. I do not wish to charge the right hon. gentleman with making the suggestion that these people were disarmed improperly but I would point out to him that the disarming of the people is something that always takes place. Even during the war thousands of people were allowed to keep their arms but when the war was over those arms which had been taken away were restored.

He said that when the Naval Bill was introduced in 1910 some of those naughty men of the Nationalist organization opposed it. He says that whatsoever a man soweth so shall he reap. We remember that in 1896 Sir Charles Tupper brought in an estimate of $3,000,000 for the purpose of buying rifles for the militia force. We remember that men clad in semi-uniform, on the eve of the election went from door to door saying that they wanted young men for recruits, not canvassing them politically, but asking them: What is your age; have you done any drilling? This had a marvellous effect in sending voters to the polls against Sir Charles Tupper and this proposed expenditure of $3,000,000. My right hon. friend himself must admit that what he sowed in that election he had a right to reap later on. My right hon. friend and his friends placarded the country from one end to the other with accusations against the Tupper Administration because of their action with reference to the proposed expenditure of $3,000,000 and their action with regard to the Manitoba school question. The right hon. gentleman knows the line he took in his speeches in Quebec and the line that he took in Ontario. These expressions were diametrically opposed to each other as will be shown by his speeches and I will quote the speeches if he has forgotten them, but I do not think it is necessary. The right hon. gentleman knows that all is fair in love and war and if these gentleman outflanked him in 1911 surely he is sport enough not to kick about it but to take the trimming he got like a man.

I referred to the General Lessard incident yesterday and I shall not pursue the matter further as General Lessard has not an opportunity of speaking in the House. But, I was amazed at my right hon. friend referring to General Smuts' magnificent address in the city of London. He said:

> The Prime Minister, I am sure, will be the first to admit, having met General Smuts, having been with him in the Imperial Conference, that for the time being he was the lion of London.

Well, lions in London are cheap, but for all that there is no finer man than General Smuts. I want to say that the right hon. gentleman has not quoted from General Smuts. He did not quote anything from him, but I will quote something from General Smuts. General Smuts has on the statute book in South Africa a law which says that if the Government want to send troops to fight for the British flag they go. He has a compulsory service law on the statute books of South Africa making the men who were our enemies only a few years ago fight for the British flag when the Government of South Africa says so. I am a little sorry that the leader of the Opposition did not quote that.

I have taken a hurried glance at the speech of the leader of the Opposition and there is nothing else that I desire to refer to in it. I have already explained the misunderstanding with regard to the expression used by the hon. member for Edmonton. I might point out once more, as the hon. gentleman touched a little on the Ross rifle last night, that the Ross rifle has been, and is, the greatest and best rifle in the world. The Ross rifle has never failed to fire once with relatively one per cent of jams, as compared with fifty per cent of jams with the Lee-Enfield. The leader of the Opposition, I noticed, had something to say in the House yesterday with reference to this rifle, but if either he or the hon. member for Edmonton wishes the data it is available, and it shows that the cause of jamming was not the rifle, but bad ammunition. German agents undoubtedly blamed the rifle, but the fact is that the cause of the jamming was bad ammunition. I wish to point out that on the second day of the battle of St. Julien the Canadian troops were supplied with ammunition which had been withdrawn from British troops. I am not saying that it was done intentionally—I would be sorry to think that it was—but on the afternoon of the second day, when their ammunition had run out, they were supplied with ammunition that had been withdrawn from a British division. The same ammunition that had jammed the Canadian rifles also jammed the British rifles and the gallant Durhams and Yorks, who had been supplied with this same ammunition had to throw their rifles away and retire. It jammed. Therefore, in all fairness and honour, lay the blame to the proper cause and not play the game of the German agents and say that it was the Ross rifle when it was the ammunition that jammed in the Lee-Enfield rifle and the Ross rifle alike.

Mr. OLIVER: Perhaps the ex-minister might tell us how many Ross rifles are now in use by the Canadian forces at the front?

Sir SAM HUGHES: I do not think there are any; I am not sure about that. All I know is that the Ross rifle is better than the Lee-Enfield, but when the Prime Minister spoke to me about withdrawing it I knew the agitation that had gone on and which had been promoted by men who did not know that it was the ammunition that was the cause of the jamming. Although I know this quite well, I did not want to send soldiers into the trenches, who, by reason of this agitation, might not have confidence in the rifle. Therefore, inasmuch as the agitation had caused a want of confidence on the part of some of the boys, and in the interest of all parties concerned, I thought it would be well not to have a fight during the progress of the war over the matter, but to withdraw the rifle and allow it to be used for training purposes.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Who started the agitation?

Mr. OLIVER: Would the ex-minister say what was the number of casualties amongst the Canadians in the battle of Zillebeke?

Sir SAM HUGHES: The number is available but surely the hon. gentleman knows that the battle of Zillebeke was a shell fight. Our fellows were pounded by shells and there was not a rifle shot fired at them. It was long range fire and shells by the hundred were rained on them, the trenches were flattened out—I was there and saw the place—it was worse than any ploughed field, and the boys went down. Harry Baker's battalion was there, it was long range fire and high explosive shells were sent over.

Mr. OLIVER: The question of the efficiency of the Ross rifle is a serious question to the people of Canada. I have asked the minister how many Canadians lost their lives in the battle of Zillebeke. The Canadians were armed with Ross rifles on that occasion and General Sir Douglas Haig reports that in that battle the Ross rifle jammed in the hands of the Canadians.

Sir SAM HUGHES: The Canadians were not armed with the Ross rifle at the battle of Zillebeke last June. The third division never were armed with the Ross rifle there. I do not know that there were any Ross rifles at the battle of Zillebeke. I have great respect for Sir Douglas Haig, but it would not matter one particle to me, knowing the facts, if all the reports in the universe said to the contrary. The hon. gentleman is altogether wide in his remarks. The first division that had been armed with the Lee-Enfield rifle for months found that the rifle jammed just the same as the other did but the cause was bad ammunition.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The hon. gentleman spoke of an agitation against the Ross rifle. Who started the agitation against the Ross rifle?

Sir SAM HUGHES: The hon. member looks for information. I refer him to the pages of Hansard long years ago to gratify his thirst for knowledge. He knows as well as I know, and I am not going to take up time or dig up "dead corpses" here to-day. Let the hon. gentleman rest patient. He looks innocent, but he is anything but innocent.

Mr. Speaker, we are at war. Our boys have done magnificent work at the front, second to no troops in the world—I will not say better, but second to no troops in the world. They are suffering heavy losses. The Prime Minister has been at the front. I waited for his return. I knew he would be impressed by what he saw there. What may have been his views in the past on compulsory service, I know not and care not, but to-day he has brought down his Bill and is going in for compulsory service. I do not like the term conscriptive selection; but a rose by any other name would smell as sweet, and that is a matter of detail. I do not like the form of the measure; I should have preferred the Militia Act, which, I think, would have worked more smoothly and been quicker in its operation. There is scarcely anything, if there is anything at all, in this Bill that could not have been carried out under the Militia Act. It must be remembered that we would not be called on to ballot for every soldier under the Militia Act. It would be possible to pass an Order in Council under the War Measures Act and so to call out any class. But, in any event, we can call the militia out for training under the Militia Act, even if we do not send them overseas, and, in the name of Heaven, while this discussion is going on in the House, and if there is to be fighting while we are making our explanations here, let the boys be called out in the meantime and be trained under the Militia Act. That can be done and no one can object to it, and then when the Bill passes in some proper form we can apply its provisions and send them overseas if they do not volunteer. But I have faith that the boys called out for training would nearly all volunteer for service overseas. I will not throw a single impediment, directly or indirectly, in the way of the passing of this Bill, but will help on in every proper manner its passage through the House, in order that the boys at the front may be fully and properly protected and supported in their great struggle.

5 p.m.

Mr. HUGH GUTHRIE (South Wellington): Mr. Speaker, coming to a conclusion in my own mind in regard to the Military Service Bill now under discussion in this House on motion for second reading, I regret to say that, in regard to the principle of the Bill, I find myself in rather serious conflict with the opinions of my leader, and I think also with the opinions of the large majority of my political friends sittting upon this side of the House. Under ordinary circumstances I would feel very deep regret, very sincere concern, if that were the case, and had it not been for the kindly, generous and patriotic words of counsel and advice which my honoured leader has addressed not only to me but to all his followers with regard to this measure, I might feel some embarrassment, and not a little unpleasantness. His words of advice to the whole of us were that in regard to this measure he himself would prefer that each member should be guided solely by the dictates of his own conscience, entirely without regard to the ordinary and well recognized ties of party. For this reason I feel the more free to express without any reservation my own views and conclusions in regard to the measure, dictated alike by my conscience, my heart and my judgment. And, after having given to the Bill the best consideration it is in my power to bestow upon it, I find that I cannot agree in the conclusions so ably expressed, so forcibly uttered, by my honoured leader in the House yesterday.

One is, I think, bound to consider every sentence, every word uttered by the right hon. leader of the Opposition in regard to this matter. We know that his learning on the subject is most profound, we know that his parliamentary experience is not only the longest, but I think undoubtedly the most brilliant, in the annals of this Canadian Parliament. But, notwithstanding these things, acting upon my own judgment, judging the measure as well as I can, I have come to the conclusion that my support should go to this Bill and that it should be a whole-hearted support. In my opinion, the principle involved in the Military Service Bill at this very moment is one to the advantage of the people of Canada, to the advantage of Canada herself, to the advantage of the Empire and to the advantage of our Allies. For these reasons I intend to support it. While I make that general statement in regard to my support of the Bill, I still leave myself free in regard to criticise some of its details. I think that in many respects the Bill may yet be usefully amended, and if I correctly understood the Prime Minister when he introduced the Bill into this House, and also when he spoke on the second reading of the Bill yesterday, he expressed a sincere desire on behalf of himself and of his Government, that he should receive any serious and useful suggestions by way of amendment to the Bill—

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. GUTHRIE: —in order that the proposal, so far as possible, may in its operations be rendered absolutely free from partisanship, political prejudice, bias, or other baneful influence. And when the proper time comes I think I may be able to make some suggestions which will not operate as voiding the principle of the Bill, but will, I think, smooth its operations, and will perhaps place it in greater favour with the public at large.

There is just one observation I might make here, and that is that I have one other reservation to make, and to my mind it is a very important one; that is with reference to the question of conscription in general. I cannot bring myself to believe that this Bill is the full Government policy in regard to the question of conscription. I cannot bring myself to believe that this is the last word on conscription in the proper sense of the word that we are to have from the Government during the present session of the present Parliament. Conscription, to my mind, involves the taking of more than manhood, more than flesh and blood.

I would vote to withhold the operation of this Bill unless the Government is prepared to go further, and, during the present session, bring in concurrent legislation which would operate as a conscriptive measure upon the wealth and resources of Canada in general for the purposes of this war. This is a matter which, I think, touches my heart almost as much as any phase of the war. I do not like to feel that we, in this Parliament, think lightly of the flesh and blood of the people of Canada, and think highly of the accumulated wealth of the country, and that we will touch the one and dare not touch the other. May it never be said in Canada, or of Canada, in the words of the late Thomas Hood, the English poet:

" Oh God, that wealth should be so dear,
And flesh and blood so cheap."

I believe the people of Canada, when they speak of conscription in the meetings which have been held, where they have applauded the doctrine of conscription, meant something different from the conscription provided in this Bill. I believe, in the minds of the people, conscription of wealth, conscription of industry, and of resources, are included, and I trust that, during the present session, the Government will take steps to bring in concurrent legislation, more appropriately, no doubt, embodied in another Bill, which will let the people see that flesh and blood are not lightly held, and that wealth is not lightly exempt. I can place before myself the picture that any hon. member in this House can conjure up, if he so desires, of the man over military age, snugly settled in his own household, checking up his profit ledger, his stocks, bonds, debentures, mortgages and other investments, knowing that he has nothing very much at stake in the war at the present time, agreeing readily that the youth of Canada shall go to the front, and shall fight our battles, and that, so far, he has been practically exempt from any burdens of the war.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Hear, hear.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Some of those men live more cheaply than the ordinary middle class man. They are not taxed more than the other man is under the tariff. They pay nothing directly into the treasury of the Government for the purposes of the war. This is a thing I would like to see remedied.

I believe the people of Canada would be willing to be placed—nay, desire to be placed—upon an equal footing with the people of Great Britain, with regard to this war, and I, for one, cannot understand why so able a man as the Minister of Finance of Canada has, from year to year, postponed this question of taxing wealth. He has taxed the industries. He has clipped the manufacturers' profits, rightly or wrongly. He has taxed munition profits, and I believe they can bear more taxation. Why he cannot adopt that system of righteousness and equality in regard to the income of the rich man, I cannot understand. The Minister of Finance is a strong man. He understands the situation in Canada, and knows the public feeling. If he were given a free hand, he might act, but there must be some withholding force on the action of the Minister of Finance in regard to this matter. What that force is, I do not know, but people will conjure up certain things in their minds, when they get no explanation, because, at the opening of the war session in August, 1914, the matter was mentioned; and in the sessions of 1915 and 1916, and again this year, the matter has been brought most pointedly to the attention of the Minister of Finance. Each time he has put it off. He has procrastinated, and given reasons, which satisfy him, apparently, why the wealth of the country should not be taxed, but the time is coming when the people will imagine certain influences are behind the minister, unless he takes action. I trust that he will do so this session. If the Government will combine the conscription of wealth and resources of the country with the conscription of men for the firing line, I believe they will be backed, almost from one end of the Dominion of Canada to the other.

Having wandered, perhaps, a little from the Bill immediately before us, I will make a very brief survey of the position of Canada in reference to the war, from its outbreak in August, 1914, to the present time. I desire to make a consecutive statement, in order that the voters, whom I have the honour to represent in Parliament, may know my reasons for supporting this Bill, which emanates from the Government side, as it has not been very much my custom to support Government measures in the past seven years.

Most happily, Canada's experiences of war have been of very modest proportion and at long intervals, until the fatal day in August, 1914. War in 1914 found Canada and all or many of the present allied countries in a comparative state of unpreparedness, or perhaps, I would be speaking more nearly the truth if I said in a complete state of unpreparedness. The best prepared of the allied countries never dreamt of the terrific onslaught which was launched against liberty, humanity and civilization in August, 1914. None realized at first the awful significance of that outbreak, least of all, perhaps, the people of the dominions beyond the seas. We were safely and snugly situated, many thousands of miles from the actual scene of conflict. Our first enrolment in Canada proceeded upon the principle of voluntary enlistment. In Great Britain, after the regular army had been utilized, volunteers were called for until that system had reached its limit, and I think the system we adopted in Canada was adopted also in every other of the self-governing British dominions. In Canada, the first call for volunteers met with what, in my opinion, was a magnificent response; 33,000 men responded within six weeks, an equal or larger number in the next four or five weeks, and well do I remember, in the short session of August, 1914, standing on the corner of McLeod and Elgin streets, Ottawa, when we saw the Princess Patricias march proudly past. Well do I remember, on the 25th August, standing in front of the old Parliament Buildings, when we all cheered for the men from British Columbia, who were in service ready to go to the front just about twenty days after the call had gone forth for volunteers—and splendid fellows they were, many of whom have fought their last fight. They certainly answered the call in the most speedy and noblest fashion. I know that it is charged by many that our system of voluntary enlistment was a great blunder from the beginning, and that at the very outset we should have taken a course such as that recently adopted in the United States. Well, Mr. Speaker, we are all inclined to be very wise after the fact. It may be quite true that the United States has gone about the question of enrolment in a better manner than that adopted by us.

But the United States has had the opportunity of profiting by our experience and the experience of many other countries. In August, 1914, I think we were all in accord with the voluntary system being the proper system of enlistment in Canada. So far as my recollection goes, no one suggested any other system. If in our decision we blundered, the blunder was confined not to Canada alone; it took place in every other British Dominion. But I do not agree with any critic who says that the voluntary system in Canada has been in any degree a failure; I rather think that from beginning to end it has been a magnificent success. But conditions have changed since August 1914. Perhaps I might illustrate that change by relating an incident that occurred during the short session of 1914. I well remember a remark made by one of the two Conservative friends with whom I walked one day down the broad way leading from the Parliament Buildings. He said: If I were Prime Minister, my policy would be, $100,000,000 and 100,000 men—and I would dissolve Parliament and go to the country on that policy. But the other man said: No; what is the use of promising something that you cannot perform? It looked like a monstrous promise at that time; we did not know what was before us. Let me give you another instance. We thought we were doing mighty well in August, 1914, when we made a contribution to the Mother Country of a million sacks of flour. We thought that that was wonderful—and under ordinary circumstances it would have been wonderful. Little did we dream then of the conflict that was to come; little did we anticipate then the millions of dollars that we should contribute and the hundreds of thousands of men who should leave Canada. I mention these matters merely to show that we thought somewhat lightly of the war or of the prospects of a lengthy conflict when we first started upon a volunteering system.

The charge so often made that our system of volunteering has fallen down is, in my judgment, absolutely unfounded. The voluntary system is a good system, but like all other human systems, it has its limitations. I am inclined to think that we have now come almost to the limit of that system in Canada. I have been pretty much of that opinion since last November or December, about the time of the campaign on behalf of national service. The figures in respect of volunteering were falling off very rapidly. I myself held meetings in the campaign for national service, and I heard many expressions of opinion in regard to what the Government should do in the way of securing more recruits. In fact, when I came to Ottawa at the opening of this session I had a motion prepared on the very question of conscription. When I came back after the adjournment I learned that my hon. friend (Sir Sam Hughes) had placed such a motion on the Order Paper. Knowing full well that the remarks of a man of his standing and knowledge on this subject would have far more force and effect than anything that I could say, I thought no more of the matter.

To my mind, this is not a new question. Last spring recruiting in Canada had fallen so low that we did not have sufficient recruits to make up the actual wastage in Canada. Any man who has the war at heart—and I believe we all have the war at heart—must acknowledge that Government or Parliament must take some definite step to get more men, and to get them as speedily as they can be procured.

The figures which we hear from day to day in the House are, I think, not well known throughout the part of Canada which I have the honour to represent. I desire, therefore, to place upon Hansard a statement of the present disposition of Canadian troops as given in a return made in this House on the 15th of this month. The following is a statement of the troops available at that date:

In France, 136,400; in the Near East and the West Indies, 877; in England and en route, excluding troops in hospitals and convalescent homes, 108,736; in Canada, 17,353. This makes a total of 263,366. If we add to that, casualties estimated at 100,000, and medically unfit and discharged, 43,053, we have a total enlistment from the outbreak of the war to the present time of 406,419 men. This is a splendid showing in a country of Canada's size.

The figure which I have given as the number of medically unfit and discharged soldiers, which was taken from a return brought down on March 31 last, is made up as follows: Discharged in Canada, 26,658; returned and discharged, 11,917; discharged overseas, 1,478; a total of 43,053.

I should like to make also a brief statement of the number of men of military age available in Canada, exclusive of the 406,000 who have already enlisted. According to the census of 1911 and to the figures presented to the House yesterday by the Prime Minister, we have in Canada between the ages of 20 and 45, 760,453 single men and 823,098 married men, a total of 1,583,549. The following is a statement of male population according to age classifications in the Military Service Bill:

Age.	Single.	Married.	Total.
20-24	319,610	66,247
25-29	205,125	165,369
30-34	112,011	198,838
35-39	68,144	189,731
Total	704,890	620,185	1,325,075

Mr. CARROLL: Has the hon. gentleman any figures to show the number of men on duty and in training in Canada who are not of the Canadian Expeditionary Force?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Except the statement furnished in the House on the 15th of June, I have not any figures, but that statement shows the number of men in Canada to be 17,353. What strikes me from these two statements is, that we have ample power in Canada if we can utilize it, and the purpose of this Bill, if I understand it aright, is to utilize that manpower, not only for military purposes, but for all the necessary purposes in connection with the war.

I am going for a moment or two to discuss one or two sections of the Militia Act which seem to have given rise to some controversy in this House. I was always under the impression that under the Militia Act the Government could, in the case of an emergency, call out and send abroad to any quarter of the world all the manhood of Canada from eighteen to sixty years of age, simply upon an Order in Council and upon another condition that, if Parliament was not then in session, Parliament should be convened within fifteen days thereafter. I believe I was correct in that impression and that I am correct now. At the time of Confederation, at least in 1868, the law was that all the male population from eighteen to sixty years of age could thus be called out. I remember when the amendment to that Act was before the House in 1904 and the discussion that took place on that occasion. If my memory serves me aright, because I have not looked up the debate, on that occasion we added a clause especially relating to service of Canadians abroad on the order of the Governor in Council, and we placed in the statute that condition that Parliament must be convened within fifteen days after any such order was issued. That section, which is section 71 of the Militia Act and which is still in force in Canada, reads:

> Whenever the Governor in Council places the militia, or any part thereof, on active service, if Parliament is then separated by such adjournment or prorogation as will not expire within ten days, a proclamation shall be issued for the meeting of Parliament within fifteen days, and Parliament shall accordingly meet and sit upon the day appointed by such proclamation, and shall continue to sit and act in like manner as if it had stood adjourned or prorogued to the same day.

The reference in the section is to 4 Ed. VII, chapter 23, section 71. That section was placed in the Militia Act of Canada when my right hon. leader was the head of the Government and I, one of his humble supporters. That law has remained in force ever since, and if my memory serves me aright, when the Naval Service Bill was before the House in 1910, a special section was inserted in that Bill and the defence of the section by those who approved it, when it was attacked by those who objected to it, was that they had inserted the precise language of the Militia Act in the Naval Service Bill. I am prepared to stand by that section at the present time. So far as the conscription of men is concerned, there is wider and more drastic power in the Militia Act of Canada passed in 1868 and amended in 1904 than there is in the Military Service Bill now before this House. The only objection I have to that power is that it is too drastic. The Governor General, on the advice of his Cabinet, could, under that Act, call out the whole male population of Canada between eighteen and sixty years of age and could send them overseas, but I doubt very much if he could call them out for any other purpose than military service. It might be possible that, under the guise of the term "Military Service," men might be employed in the mines, or railroads, or other industries of that description, but the meaning of the law is that those who are called out shall be utilized for military purposes. That power is on the statute book, and it is a power that the Government can utilize to-day. What is the objection to the old Militia Act? Simply that we want to avoid conscripting men for a single purpose. We want to provide that every purpose pertaining to the war shall be supplied, and, to my mind, that is the chief feature in this Military Service Bill. We have been told by parliamentarians, by the press of the country, from the pulpit and at almost any meeting one can go to in any city, town, or village, that one of the first duties of this country is to produce foodstuffs. The farmers have been told, through their farm newspapers and through the general press; it has been dinned into everybody's ears, and everyone in this House knows that one of the great demands in this country, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, to-day is for agricultural labour. The men from the townships of Ontario have not volunteered in the same proportion as men from the cities, but I can speak best of the county of South Wellington, whence I come, and I know that not only in South Wellington, but in North Wellington every township is well represented in the infantry battalions and batteries at the front. They have contributed their full share, and what is the result? On every hand we hear the cry for hired help. Last week I returned home, and a man of thirty years of age, with 250 acres of land and 80 head of fine cattle, but with no hired help, said to me: "What has conscription to do for me? Is conscription going to take me?" I said: "No." He named in the county of Halton a farmer with two sons who owned 100 acres of land, and my suggestion would be: Might not conscription bring one of these sons from the small farm to the man who had 250 acres and no hired help?

Mr. NESBITT: Where does the Bill provide for that?

Mr. GUTHRIE: In the selective feature. At least I have so argued and so understood. If men who enroll for service under the Military Service law are better adapted for agricultural service than for military service, agricultural service is what they will be put to.

Mr. NESBITT: That is not provided for in the Bill.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Then that is a detail that should be remedied, but I understand that is the real purport of the Bill, and I have told some of my agricultural friends that in so many words. I do not believe you can get another man to-day from the farms of western Ontario without injuring the production which we say is only second in regard to our necessities for the war—men at the front coming first and production second. That is one reason why I prefer the Military Service Bill to the present Militia Act.

I believe there is a large number of men available in the cities and towns and villages of Canada who cannot be reached except by this Bill. I have probably addressed more recruiting and Patriotic Fund meetings in the province of Ontario than any other member of the House, except perhaps the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) and the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, and any one who has tried as hard as I have must have come to the conclusion that the men whom you want to reach are the very ones who do not attend recruiting meetings. At one town in western Ontario somewhat of a joke was perpetrated not long ago. A recruiting meeting at the market house was to be addressed by a sergeant from the lower provinces. He was an excellent speaker, but as there were hardly any men present the meeting was adjourned, and the recruiting sergeant received permission from the manager of the picture show at the other end of the town to make his speech there. Many of the men at the theatre felt quite insulted and complained to the manager that if such a thing ever occurred again they would no longer patronize his show. The fact is, the men you want to enroll do not attend the recruiting meetings. I am speaking only of the places I know best, and am not referring to other parts of Canada at all. I am sure that if this Bill is passed a great many men now in Guelph will go to the front and probably volunteer before conscription comes in. I look in the banks and see able-bodied male clerks doing women's work. I see them also in the dry goods and retail stores, in the counting houses and a dozen other places where female labour could easily do the work. These men cannot be aroused to enlist either by personal interview or by speeches at meetings. I think there is no way of getting them unless by some measure of force. The city of Guelph with a population of 18,000, has given almost 10 per cent of her population, or about 1,700 men. That is a pretty good showing for a town of that size, but there are still 300 or 400 more men in that city who could be reached by a measure of this kind, and who will not come forward unless compulsion is used. I suppose conditions are much the same in other cities throughout Canada

I much prefer this Bill to the Militia Act. I am in favour of it because, for one reason, it will enable every necessary branch of labour to be supplied. In this connection I wish to refer to a circular which I think has been sent to every member of the House from the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, dated June 11, 1917. This circular comes from a body of men for whom I have the highest respect and regard. During the seventeen years I have sat in the House there have been very few occasions upon which I have not been able to see eye to eye with the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada. I believe that union labour in Canada represents an exceedingly valuable body of our population. Not only are they good workers, but clear and level-headed men of good judgment and common sense. Sometimes they make mistakes as other people do, and I believe that in this circular they are labouring under some misapprehension. There is not a great deal of difference between the Trades and Labour Congress and myself in regard to this circular; in fact, we are very close together except on one point. One paragraph of the circular says, under the heading of Conscription:

> On December 27th, 1916, Premier Borden informed the executive of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, that if conscription should prove the only effective method to preserve the existence of the State and of the institutions and liberties which we enjoy, I should not hesitate to act accordingly.

The Trades and Labour Congress followed that up with this clause of their own:

> We are positively of the opinion that this situation has not arrived.

With that statement I certainly take issue. The next paragraph says:

> The necessities for the effective conduct of the war are food, munitions, shipping, and military man power, and Canada is geographically well situated to supply the first named three essentials, and can do much to assist in winning the war by developing her production in these essentials to her fullest extent.

The only exception I take to that is the order in which the necessities are put. They have put last what I would put first, namely, military man power. I would entirely agree with them if the order were reversed thus: military man power, food, munitions and shipping. I entirely disagree with them when they say that the time has not arrived, and I believe that when the Trades and Labour Congress thoroughly understand the situation they will see that I am right and they are wrong. If I were simply to endorse their statement—and that is their statement—they would have mighty little respect for me and I would have mighty little respect for myself. Union labour in this country has furnished our forces with a tremendous number of men. It is entitled to very great credit for what it has done to back up our men at the front and our war operations generally. But we have now evidently reached a line of cleavage, and upon this question I and my friends of the Trades and Labour Congress do not agree. I believe that the time has come for putting a Military Service Bill into force; the Trades and Labour Congress take the opposite view, that the time has not yet arrived.

There is another organization with which I have not so much sympathy, known as the British Columbia Federation of Labour, and another organization known as the Social-Democratic Party of Canada. The British Columbia Federation of Labour went on record as being opposed to conscription on the general proposition that:

> Military or industrial conscription is the imposition of a form of servitude which is obnoxious to a so called free people.

I do not think it is worth while taking up the time of the House discussing propositions of that kind. So far as the Social-Democratic party in this country is concerned I take no interest in it. I do not think it is helpful in any way. I desire to say a few words in regard to the amendment moved by my right hon. friend and leader that the opinion of the people should be taken with regard to this Bill upon a referendum.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

MILITARY SERVICE ACT, 1917.

Consideration of the proposed motion of Sir Robert Borden for the second reading of Bill No. 75, Military Service Act, 1917, resumed.

Mr. HUGH GUTHRIE (resuming): Mr. Speaker, just before six o'clock, I was endeavouring to discuss some of the selective features of the Militia Bill which is now before the House. My attention was called during the adjournment to some of the language which I used, and on further examination of the Bill, I concluded that perhaps my language in regard to agricultural labour was broader than the terms of the Bill would warrant. I notice that the Bill in its preamble mentions the question of agricultural labour and says:

And whereas, by reason of the large number of men who have already left agricultural and industrial pursuits in Canada to join such Expeditionary Force as volunteers, and of the necessity of sustaining under such conditions the productivity of the Dominion, it is expedient to secure the men still required, not by ballot as provided in the Militia Act, but by selective draft.

Then on referring to section 11 of the Bill I find it provides that:

An application may be made, by or in respect of any man in the class or subclass called out by such proclamation to a local tribunal established in the province in which such man ordinarily resides, for a certificate of exemption on any of the following grounds:—

(a) That it is expedient in the national interest that the man should, instead of being employed in military service, be engaged in other work in which he is habitually engaged;

(b) That it is expedient in the national interest that the man should, instead of being employed in military service, be engaged in other work in which he wishes to be engaged and for which he has special qualifications.

I must say that on reading this section again, the language I used before adjournment at six o'clock seems to be rather too broad. My understanding of the Bill at that time was that, under the selective system, a board would have power to supply agricultural labour just to the same extent as it would have power to tell a man to serve in the military forces. On reading the Act more carefully, I find that this exemption is to be granted only at the request of the man himself. I think that is a detail of the Bill which may well be looked into, and amended, if necessary, when we come to the committee stage. In every city, town and village in Ontario, farm labour has become scarce for two reasons: First, by reason of enlistment; and, secondly, by reason of the attractive wages paid by manufacturing companies during the present war, and particularly by munition factories. If a man, by making an application, can continue earning $4, $5 or $6 a day in a munition factory, he will not, as a matter of choice, return to the farm, although he is especially qualified to do farm work. I think the board having control of these matters should certainly be entitled to conscript that man's work, and have him engage in agricultural labour if he is not going forward for military purposes. That was my understanding of the Bill when I spoke, and if it is not the letter of the Bill, I think it should be made plain, because the farmers are suffering very gravely from the want of help from the two causes I have mentioned. I maintain that the farmer in the back concession of a back township who makes two blades of grass grow this year where but one grew last year, is doing a patriotic duty, and is serving his country to the utmost of his capacity. That man needs help and should be helped, and there should be something in this Bill to supply him with labour ordinarily called agricultural labour, which has flocked to the cities, towns and villages, where manufacturing industries pay much higher wages than are paid in the country. This is the sacrifice the individual will have to make.

There are other great lines of industry that may have to be helped also. I doubt very much if you will get very many men from the transportation companies or from shipping companies. I hear on every hand that men are becoming scarcer and scarcer upon the railways, and that great difficulty will be experienced this year in securing crews for both lake and ocean shipping. It may be that, for transportation purposes, men may have to be taken from other callings, and I think that the board dealing with these matters should be given power under this Act to arrange to furnish a supply of labour for transportation and shipping companies. There is, of course, a great deal of necessary and essential labour that must be performed in Canada. We are dependent for our food, our raiment, and our shelter, and need a tremendous number of men, whose services will be required for the production of articles required for consumption in Canada alone. Notwithstanding that, there are so many industries in Canada to-day that are producing what at any time we would call luxuries, in addition to the men whom I mentioned earlier in my address, that I have no doubt the classes enumerated in the first four section of this Bill will readily yield all the men that are necessary, and more, within the present year at all events, for military purposes, and that the different industries which are essential to the proper carrying on of the war may all likewise be supplied.

Now a word in regard to the amendment moved by my right hon. leader (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) upon the question of a referendum. Upon this point I cannot agree with the view taken by my leader. I have never been favourable to the principle of referendum. I think it is antagonistic to our ideas of responsible Government. We are elected to this House by our electors to pass necessary legislation, to adopt necessary measures, according to the judgment and ability which we have, and if we make mistakes, if we blunder, if we do wrong, our responsibility is directly to our electors, who can turn us out at the first ensuing general election.

If you adopt the principle of a referendum, you are going to find the Government of Canada in this position: that upon every difficult question the Government will adopt the referendum if, for no other purpose than to avoid any conflict of opinion in regard to itself. Our system is, and has always been, founded upon the doctrine of responsibility. The Government is responsible to Parliament and the people; and members of Parliament are responsible to the people, and if the people desire a change they have a right to make it. While it is said the system of referendum and of initiative and recall are more or less favoured, particularly in the Western States, and to some extent in the western provinces of Canada, I believe the constitutional method of dealing with the question is for Parliament to decide it, and the people then have the right to review our work at each general election. My right hon. leader took that course on more than one occasion, notably in 1911, on the reciprocity issue. He might have had a referendum on that question and continued to hold power, but I submit that would not have been constitutional and not good British parliamentary practice in that case, nor would it be good practice at the present time. I remember also, when the Navy debate took place in the House, in 1910, the question of referendum was brought up once more. My right hon. leader might have sheltered himself under the referendum, instead of allowing himself to be involved upon this question in the election of 1911. But he took the course a statesman would take, and said, "No, when the time comes we will appeal to the people," and he did appeal to the people, and on that and other issues was defeated. The Government takes its own course in these matters, and if blunders or mistakes are made the Government is responsible to the people. For that broad reason, I do not favour a referendum.

Then, again, I think, upon this question a referendum is entirely unnecessary. In my view of the matter, the first duty of the people, and the first duty of Parliament, is to defend their country. That is a natural duty, a natural right, one that we are bound to assume and perform. If we take our oath of loyalty, we assume that obligation. We require no mandate for the performance of a paramount duty.

Another objection is that, instead of threshing the question out in this House—and it is a difficult question—we would transfer the contest to the platforms of this country, where it would be a more difficult question and might cause very serious disturbance. There is no reason for referring it for decision to the electors. Why not, in a manly way, settle it ourselves? I believe also that it is not possible at the present time to have a fair referendum. I would never consent under any conditions to have a referendum which did not include the men who have volunteered and gone abroad in the service of the country. If my memory serves me, the total vote in the election of 1911 was about 1,200,000. When you consider that something over 400,000 have enlisted, that means that 33 per cent of your electorate is out of Canada. How are you going to take the vote of these men? It cannot be taken. When the Soldiers' Bill was introduced by the present Government I was suffering from illness and was not in the House, but I thought if ever a Government went the extreme length in trying to poll the soldier vote, it was the present Government. I did not believe at the time that the Government was serious, nor that they would poll that vote if they could. But apart from that, is it possible to take the soldiers vote, are you going to poll the vote of the men in France? Are you going to cease firing and pass the ballot boxes around? You must remember there are 136,000 loyal Canadians at the firing line. How are you going to take the soldiers' vote in England, where we have 28,000 troops at present, probably on their way to the front, and 80,000 in training, the balance being in hospitals and convalescent homes. Do you think that vote could be polled? What have you on this side of the water? You have a population which says, "We will not enlist." Do hon. gentlemen think that men who will not enlist will support a compulsion on referendum? The proposition would be defeated. The men who did not want to go to defend their country would vote against it. I do not think that would be a fair vote. I believe, if any one is entitled to vote on this question, it is the men who are overseas, and I see no way of fairly taking their votes without a tremendous expenditure of time, if it be possible to take it at all, I believe that is one fundamental reason for opposing a referendum upon this question. Never would I consent to have a slacker at home vote, and a man at the front be deprived of his vote.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. GUTHRIE: However, the difficulty can be overcome in another way. If you allow this Bill to pass without a referendum, you may consult the people afterwards, when the boys come home. You may then get some fair expression of opinion on the question, which I do not believe you can ever obtain until the war is over, and the boys return. A referendum to my mind would leave the decision of one of the most vital questions which has arisen in Canada to the very people who have neglected to volunteer, and to the parents of those who are so timid as not to permit their sons, who would otherwise volunteer, to enlist for service. I will never consent to have the question submitted to such an electorate.

These are, substantially, my reasons for opposing the amendment moved by my right hon. friend, and leader. He has referred to another question, which I will discuss very, very briefly; that is that this Parliament is in the nature of a moribund Parliament, or, as he described it, a rump Parliament, his contention being that, on that ground, this House should not deal with it.

I do not take that view of the matter. My view is that this Parliament is in every respect legally constituted. I do not think that I am telling any secrets or betraying any confidences when I say that in February, 1916, I was about the only man on this side of the House, except some members from the province of Quebec, who were opposed to the first extension of the term of Parliament. I thought that there should be no extension. I pointed out then to my friends: if you grant extension this year, what are you going to do next year, when the war may be more serious than ever? Last year we on this side of the House committed ourselves unanimously to the granting of an extension. Both Houses of Parliament agreed to the extension and the British Government, as our supreme authority, amended the British North America Act so as to extend the life of Parliament for one year. That extension was strictly constitutional; it did not limit our authority in any way. If anything, it was an enabling Act, to enable us to carry on our national affairs. It could not and did not restrict our rights; every Act that we could legally pass a year ago we can just as legally pass to-day. The Parliament of Canada sitting here to-day is legally constituted for all purposes and can deal with full power and authority with the Military Service Bill or with any other Bill which may be brought before it. The question is as to the wisdom or the propriety of any course that is proposed and not as to our constitutional right to pass this, that, or the other Bill.

I have noticed in the newspapers during this month the reports of many of the church congresses of Canada which usually meet in the month of June. I have read the report of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian church in Canada, representative of that church from the Atlantic to the Pacific. I have read the reports of the Methodist Conferences held in various parts of the Dominion; of the annual meetings of the Baptist church, and of various meetings of the Anglican Synods. Speaking generally, each of those church courts has passed almost unanimously motions in support of the present Military Service Bill. In some cases they have added that which I believe to be exceedingly important, namely, that wealth and other resources should likewise be conscripted; but in no case have I seen anything like a proposal for a referendum or a general election. The Minister of Public Works (Hon. Robert Rogers) in the month of June, 1915, put his ear to the ground and heard murmurings and rumblings, which gradually increased to tones of thunder, and he told us that the people demanded an immediate election. I may tell the hon. gentleman that if he puts his ear to the ground now he will still hear murmurings and rumblings, growing louder and louder until they become like tones of thunder. They ask, however, not for a general election, but that we have no general election at the present time. A referendum on this question would be the equivalent to a general election, and to that I am opposed.

It is asked, is there any demand for a Conscription Bill of this kind? Apart from the church courts, the municipal bodies, and the boards of trade that have passed on the question, I do not know that there is any general demand among the people on the subject. We have read reports of meetings at Toronto and elsewhere, at which resolutions endorsing the principle of this Bill have been adopted, but I do not know that among the people themselves there has been any general demand for such legislation; in fact, I am inclined to believe that the demand has been the other way. I have received only a few letters on the subject, and none of them have been decided in their expressions of opinion, and none of them have been signed. I think that there are a good many people who do not want to show their hands in regard to conscription. My suggestion would be that if we are to have a referendum on it, the people should vote as we vote in this Parliament, by standing up, or showing their hands. I would favour the old open vote, in order that we may know just where the people stand with regard to the referendum. I have not received any petitions against the proposal except the one directed to me by the Trades and Labour Council. But there certainly is an urgent call for men. Every man on this side of the House knows it; every man on the other side knows it. The question is, how are we going to get them? So far, nobody has told us; nobody has suggested how we shall get the necessary men—that is, aside from the adoption of this Bill or the enforcement of the Militia Act. I thought, perhaps, my right hon. friend and leader might make some suggestion, but he did not. Perhaps as the debate goes on some suggestion may come from somebody, but personally I see no way of getting more men unless we adopt some compulsory system.

There is a clause in the proposed measure which provides that the legislation shall come into force upon the proclamation of the Governor General in Council. Whether that is a wise proposal I do not know. I would prefer that a definite date be fixed, say two or three months hence, rather than that the coming into force of the Act should be left altogether to the whim of the Government. If a date two or three months hence were fixed and the Bill were passed the result might have a good effect upon recruiting. There is no doubt that after the Prime Minister made his first statement in the House with regard to conscription, a larger number of recruits presented themselves at the various recruiting offices than had been the case for some time previously. I am sorry to say that the results of the presentation of recruits was not in all cases very satisfactory. In one case where 29 men presented themselves two days after the speech delivered by the Prime Minister the local board who examined them rejected 23 as medically unfit and accepted 6. Another board in another city passed upon the same 29 men on the following day and reversed the figures, accepting 23 and rejecting 6. The Prime Minister must safeguard this Bill in that respect. Local influences may and will be used; I am strongly opposed to the appointment of anything like local boards. It will not cost much to establish boards here and there in different places throughout the Dominion and move them from time to time so there may be no chance of partiality in their decisions. That is my only reason for mentioning this matter.

But, as I have said, the call throughout Canada and the world is for men. The call comes from every quarter; it comes from the men in the trenches and in the hospitals, from the returned soldiers and perhaps also from the dead. There is no doubt that the people of Canada are under the most solemn pledge that men or women could give to support the men who have gone into the trenches; we cannot avoid that responsibility whatever else we may avoid. I shall place on the records of this House a poem of noble thought and sublime inspiration which tells of that call from the dead. A young man, a school friend of mine, Jack McCrea, of Guelph, now as Captain John McCrea, serving at the front with a detachment from McGill University, is the author of this now celebrated poem. It was first published in Punch in London and was afterwards copied in many British, American and Canadian newspapers. One paper said it was perhaps as pure a bit of poetry as had ever been written in the English language. Another paper said that there was more direct appeal in the few lines than there would be in a volume of large dimensions. These lines, I believe, should be in every school-book in this country, and I read them that they may be printed in Hansard:

In Flanders' Fields.

In Flanders fields the poppies blow
Between the crosses, row on row,
That mark our place, and in the sky
The larks still bravely singing, fly,
Scarce heard amidst the guns below.
We are the Dead. Short days ago
We lived, felt dawn, saw sunset glow,
Loved and were loved, and now we lie
In Flanders' fields.

Take up our quarrel with the foe,
To you from falling hands we throw
The torch,—be yours to hold it high;
If ye break faith with us who die,
We shall not sleep though poppies grow
In Flanders' fields.

Surely, in those beautiful words, there is an appeal from the dead. There is a condition which we must meet soon, or it will not be very long before Canada is unrepresented at the front. I have my own ideas on this matter, and I am going to conclude by stating them.

Perhaps I stand by myself on this question, but for a long time I have been and still am in favour of co-operation between the parties in this House, not only at the present moment, but as long as the war lasts. I favour coalition; I favour an extension of the term of Parliament, and I favour this Bill. I do not believe this Bill will be successfully put in force by a single political party; I fear it will not. We are all agreed that we must have men. I have read very carefully the correspondence which has passed between the Prime Minister and my right hon. friend and leader on the question of a coalition Government. To the ordinary mind, no insurmountable objection was presented in the correspondence, nothing that a little compromise could not overcome. We have certain facts before us, and we are all agreed on them. On the one hand we have on the statute book now a Militia Act which can be enforced at any time and which is more stringent in its terms than the present Military Service Bill. On the other hand, we have the Military Service Bill providing for conscription on the principle of selection. If I read the correspondence aright, the leaders of the parties in this House could not come together on the single question of conscription. As I have said, I do not consider that an insurmountable objection; I believe if the two leaders really intended to agree, they could agree upon this question. There must be some give and take, some compromise in such a matter. Why not have a consolidation of the two Bills, leaving the Canada Militia Act practically as it stands, but adding to it the selective clauses of the present measure? Conscriptive legislation is on the statute book now; we are neither introducing nor passing it. It is there and has been since 1868. The selective clauses are new. I am quite satisfied that the Prime Minister has no thirst to hold on to power, and I am just as confident that on the part of my right hon. friend and leader that he has no keen desire to attain power. I believe both leaders are both absolutely sincere, but something which I think could be and should be overcome, stands between them. What an example it would be to the whole of this country if the two great political parties came together and settled their differences. I do not mean past disputes; I do not mean questions of the management or mismanagement of the war in the past three years; I mean that only from this time forward. If an agreement could be reached on the main question and nothing taken up save measures which pertain to the war, it would be a happy day for Canada. Then after the war, we can fight out our differences.

I cannot approve the suggestion of the Prime Minister, as set out in the correspondence, that a coalition should be formed; that this Bill should be passed, and then that an appeal be made to the people for a mandate. What we want to avoid is a general election, not to bring one on, what we should do is to come together and have the term of Parliament extended and carry this war to a successful conclusion, and then if the people condemn us, let them condemn us and turn us out. So long as we have done our duty, we need not fear. The time is not too late for the leaders to come together. This matter is so serious that I can scarcely put my thoughts into language. I know that in every corner of Canada the people would approve it if our leaders came together. This Bill, if it is passed, is going to get us nowhere; no one party will be able to enforce it successfully; it will cause strife and discord in many parts of Canada. Perhaps if some of those less prominent members on either side of the House were to take up the matter of coalition it might not be a bad thing. I believe that all the brains of this House of Commons are not to be found on the front benches of either party. Perhaps if a few of us back-benchers could sit down for half an hour or an hour, we might work out something feasible which our leaders might accept, but I most sincerely ask that negotiations be not concluded at the present time and that another effort may be made to secure coalition. I know there has in the past been a great deal said, particularly in the newspapers, which is hard to overlook; that insult has been heaped upon insult by the press of both parties. These things sting and smart; but when we are face to face with a fight to a finish, with a world conflict, when my leader's sentiments are that Canada is in this war "to the last ditch" and, some years ago "to the last man and the last dollar," and when these are also the sentiments of the Prime Minister, surely these worthy gentlemen can come together on this question, upon some ground acceptable to all Canadians.

If not, could not a committee be got together which might perform some useful services? There need be no quarrel over names in any coalition government; put it on the basis of the members of His Majesty's Privy Council in Canada. There are plenty of able men of the Privy Council in this House well qualified for office. Let them get together and set about to win the war. When the war is won let us have a general election, and if the people do not approve the arrangement they can turn it out of power. That is my suggestion, and I make it as seriously as ever I spoke in my life.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Rouville): Mr. Speaker, first of all may I be allowed to congratulate my hon. friend from South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) upon the very eloquent address which he has just delivered. It is the glorious privilege of Liberalism not merely to differ from Conservatism, but to be at times individualistic to the point of differing with its own friends. Although I admire the general form and tenor of my hon. friend's remarks, with many of his statements I am bound to take issue.

In discussing this question I intend to be moderate as usual, but to be firm also, because I believe this is the most complex problem that has ever been approached by the Canadian House of Commons since Confederation. Although it is distasteful in debates where there is such a sharp cleavage of opinion to have to produce a loyalty passport, I wish to say once for all that in taking the stand I intend to take on this Bill, I yield to no one in my loyalty to His Majesty the King. The hon. member for South Wellington spoke a moment ago of the oath of allegiance which the members of this House have taken, and of the danger to unity if this measure were brought direct before the people in the shape of a referendum. Let me remind my hon. friend that there is at the antipodes another British dominion called Australia, which is just as loyal and law-abiding as is Canada. In Australia a referendum was taken on this very question, and I think a greater service was rendered to the Empire in that way than if Mr. Hughes, Prime Minister of Australia, had forced his conscription measure on an unwilling electorate. Need I say that all of us, whether we are of the Conservative or of the Liberal party, whether we belong to the great province of Ontario or to the old province of Quebec, whether we are from the East or from the West, are united on the question of winning the war. We all are anxious to win the war, and win it as speedily as possible. In the year 1914 a pledge was given on behalf of Great Britain, by that great British statesman, the Hon. Herbert Asquith, then Prime Minister, in which, defining the issues before the British people, he used the following language:

If I am asked what we are fighting for I can reply in two sentences. In the first place to fulfill a solemn international obligation,—an obligation which if it had been entered into between private persons in the ordinary concerns of life would have been regarded as an obligation not only of law but of honour which no self-respecting man could possibly have repudiated. I say secondly, we are fighting to vindicate the principle which in these days when material force sometimes seems to be the dominating influence and factor in the development of mankind, that small nationalities are not to be crushed in defiance of international good-faith by the arbitrary will of a strong and overmastering power.

The reasons Mr. Asquith gave at the beginning of the war why Great Britain came into this stupendous struggle hold good to-day, and the Canadian people, whether they belong to the French-speaking or English-speaking nationalities, stand and abide by those lofty principles. Canada sided cheerfully with Great Britain and the Allies, and I maintain that all the war measures that have been presented by the Government since August, 1914, have received practically the unanimous consent of the House. It was furthermore stated over and over again that in all these matters we would act constitutionally, that our aid to Great Britain and the Empire would and should be voluntary; and our aid has been voluntary.

Let me tell my hon. friend from South Wellington that I personally have as much at stake in this war as he has. I am one of those who have given up an only son to fight the battle of liberty. At the age of 18 he left the University classroom to fight for his King and country, but he went with unfaltering steps to fight as a volunteer, not as conscript; the two things are quite different. Perhaps it is because I have French blood in my veins, but I make quite a distinction between voluntarily offering to fight and fighting under compulsion. That is the essential difference between my hon. friend and myself, and it is quite a difference, I am free to admit. If the cause is great and noble, let us concede at once like men and patriots that Canada has done wonderfully well since the beginning of the war. She has done as nobly as any country of her size and population could have done under similar circumstances. A few comparisons, actual and historical as well, may be useful. The effort of Canada in this war is not to be compared with that of Great Britain or France as regards numbers, because you cannot apply the law of averages as between a country with a population of 7,000,000 and countries with a population running from 35,000,000 to 50,- 000,000. We have heard about compulsory service being adopted by the United States of America, and of the armies which that country is going to levy in this war. Have you ever thought, Mr. Speaker, of applying the law of averages as between the effort of Canada and the effort which the United States of America are going to make? I do not think our population at the present time amounts to 8,000,000, but placing it at that figure, and the population of the United States at 112,000,000, which are the latest figures I have seen in the American press, I find that Canadian troops are equivalent to American troops in the following proportions, according to population:

Canadian troops.		American troops.
80,000	Equal to	1,120,000
160,000		2,240,000
320,000		4,480,000
400,000		5,600,000

Sir, I am not afraid to compare the potential effort of the United States and that of Canada. Let me give the evidence of a gentleman whom we know well, the ex-President of the United States, Mr. Taft, who spends his summers at Murray Bay, in the province of Quebec, and he is none the worse for that. Mr. Taft, speaking the other day at the National Conference of Charities and Corrections on the subject of "International Adjustment After the War," declared that:—

> The United States would have to put billions of money and millions of men into the struggle.

Mr. Taft paid a splendid tribute to the patriotism of the British colonies.

> Canada alone has sent about 400,000 to Europe out of a population of not more than 7,000,000. If we are to do our part in the same proportion we must send not less than 6,000,000 to the front.

That is the true test as between what has been done by Canada and what should be done by the United States of America.

But let me pass from actual to historical comparisons. If I had time I could, by quoting history, memoirs and statistics, establish that Napoleon Bonaparte, in France, during the First Republic, during the First Empire, and until after Waterloo, never used, under the power of conscription, more than four per cent of the available population of France, while we in Canada, with less than 8,000,000 people, have raised through the voluntary system more than five per cent of the total population. With reference to the conscription system under Napoleon, let me remind you that in 1800 the population of the French Republic was 33,111,000. During the Consulate 210,000 men only were raised in France from 1800 to 1803. During the most successful years of the First Empire, under Napoleon Bonaparte, from 1804 to 1809, there were 746,000 men raised by conscription out of a population of nearly 35,000,000. During that period we know that, unfortunately, the most sanguinary battles were fought—Montebello, Marengo, Hohenlinden, Elchingen, Austerlitz, Saalfeld, Jena, Auerstadt, Eylau, Friedland, Abensberg, Eckmuhl, Essling, and Wagram. And these campaigns: Marengo, Ulm, Jena, Peninsula, and Wagram.

From 1808 to 1812, during the decline of the Empire, through conscription, 517,000 soldiers were levied in France. In 1812 the population of France was 45,700,000, making the percentage of the population serving under conscription one and one-quarter per cent during the three-year period. Under those circumstances, and in view of the comparisons I have given, may I not say that the effort of Canada has been noble, generous, ample, and that before adding through conscription to the numbers she has already sent to the front, it is only just and fair that we should at least pause and consult the people.

9 p.m.

I listened with great attention to the very eloquent speech delivered by my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) yesterday and also to the speech of my hon. friend from South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) this afternoon on the interpretation to be given to these words contained in section 69 of the Militia Act "beyond Canada" and "for the defence thereof." Let me read the section, because I believe my hon. friend from South Wellington was in error when he argued that the principal change at the time of the revision of the Militia Act in 1904 was made in section 71. There were three chief modifications of the Militia Act as brought down by the late Sir Frederick Borden in 1904. The first was one concerning the commanding officer of the Canadian militia. Until the year 1904 the command of the militia had to be given to a British officer, whilst since 1904 the command can be given to a Canadian military officer. The other change has regard to the raising of the militia of Canada in times of emergency to be sent without the country. The change made in that clause consists in the addition of the words "for the defence thereof." Let me read that section:

The Governor in Council may place the militia, or any part thereof, on active service anywhere in Canada, and also beyond Canada, for the defence thereof—

These words were added. They were not in the old statute. They were added for a reason which I shall explain in a moment.

—for the defence thereof, at any time when it appears advisable so to do by reason of emergency.

The third modification was made by section 71, and it has reference to the calling of Parliament. It reads as follows:

Whenever the Governor in Council places the militia, or any part thereof, on active service, if Parliament is then separated by such adjournment or prorogation as will not expire within ten days, a proclamation shall be issued for the meeting of Parliament within fifteen days, and Parliament shall accordingly meet and sit upon the day appointed by such proclamation, and shall continue to sit and act in like manner as if it had stood adjourned or prorogued to the same day.

Nobody takes exception to that very wise clause having been inserted in the Militia Act. It is not in question, at all events. The only point at issue is whether or not we should give to section 69 of the Militia Act the interpretation which was given yesterday by the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the hon. member for South Wellington. Before the enactment of section 69, there was nothing in the Canadian statute which indicated clearly whether Canada, or the Parliament of Canada, had the right to send troops abroad for the defence of Canada or for the defence of the Empire, if you please. The question was debated at considerable length during the session of 1904.

I am rather surprised that the right hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) and my friend for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) should not have read over again the debate which took place on that occasion. They might have found enlightenment; they might have discovered that the words "for the defence thereof" were embalmed in that section in order to clear a situation which heretofore had been obscure. Let me refer to the father of the law itself, let me refer to the ipsissima verba of Sir Frederick Borden when explaining the clause which was numbered 77, I think, as the Bill was introduced. I quote from the debate:

Mr. W. A. Maclean: Am I to understand that clause 77, (now clause 69) limits the Canadian militia in their service outside of Canada to the defence of Canada?

Sir Frederick Borden: Yes.

Mr. Maclean: Not for the defence of the Empire?

Sir Frederick Borden: No.

[Mr. Lemieux.]

Mr. Maclean: Then the active militia of Canada under this proposed Act could not be sent outside this country by the Government to take part in the defence of the Empire except under a special contract as in the case of the troops sent to South Africa?

Sir Frederick Borden: Yes.

Mr. Speaker, I could proceed and quote column after column of Hansard on the same subject.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: My hon. friend appears to have read that debate. Does he not know that Sir Frederick Borden said over and over again that the change he proposed to make made no difference in the law as it then stood?

Mr. LEMIEUX: On the contrary, he said that he had consulted the Imperial authorities, that he had scanned the legislation of all the various provinces before Confederation, but that he found that in none of the statute-books was there a constitutional obligation for those provinces to send their soldiers outside of their own territory.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: At the same time he also said that it made no change whatever in the law as it stood prior to that amendment.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: That is correct, he said that.

Mr. LEMIEUX: And what he said was true, as there was nothing in the statute before this amendment providing for the sending of our troops outside of our territory except for the defence of that very territory.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: Why does my hon. friend base any argument on the change made in 1904?

Mr. LEMIEUX: He made the statute clearer. There were many people, as the debate will show, for instance my hon. friend's leader, the ex-Minister of Militia and Defence (Sir Sam Hughes), the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean), and the late Mr. Gourley, who contended with very great vigour that of course we could send our troops to any part of the world the moment the Empire was at war. Sir Frederick Borden said: No, you cannot do that under our law, but because there is an impression that that may be done, I shall make the law clear. I have consulted the authorities in London and they have agreed to that modification.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: The Minister of Justice said, yes, they could.

Mr. HAZEN: What did Sir Charles Fitzpatrick say on the subject?

Mr. LEMIEUX: I have not his words here, but Sir Charles Fitzpatrick would not have said otherwise than did the statute, which is very clear. Besides, Sir Frederick Borden was very emphatic. Here are his words in answer to the late Mr. Barker who was playing the part of my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen), out-Heroding Herod:

> The hon. gentleman has asked with an affectation of much anxiety, what the world will think, and what the rest of the British Empire will think of Canada—though I have told him over and over again that upon the Statute-book of every colony of the British Empire is to be found precisely the same provision as he is now criticising. And, Sir, upon the Statute-book of the Mother Country herself, the hon. gentleman will find this section 12, part 3 (presumably of the Army Act) "any part of the militia shall be liable to serve in any part of the United Kingdom; but no part of the militia shall be carried or ordered to go out of the United Kingdom."

So that in every British colony, in every province before Confederation, even in the Mother Country, militia troops could not be dispatched outside of the territory except for the defence of the territory itself. That case is made abundantly clear. And, Mr. Speaker, why should we be discussing this point? Has not the Prime Minister himself, as was made so evident yesterday by the dispatch read by the right hon. leader of the Opposition, admitted the force of the view taken by Sir Frederick Borden as he introduced that legislation in 1904? He said through the Governor General to the home Government that Canada contemplated aiding the Mother Country in that great struggle, but that, unfortunately, they were handicapped as to their right to dispatch troops outside of our own territory. As a result, Sir, an Order in Council was passed at the request of this Government by the Imperial authorities incorporating our troops into the Imperial army. This fact is unchallenged, and I do not see the object of discussing whether or not constitutionally we have a right to send our men outside of Canada except for the defence of our own country. I do not say that Canada will not, I do not say that Canada may not, but that Canada must, makes in my opinion, all the difference in the world.

Sir, on this grave issue I stand upon the bedrock of our constitution, and I claim that England has accepted the Canadian contention that there is no constitutional obligation upon us to take part in wars outside of Canada, except for the defence of our territory. I am proud to say that we have taken part in this stupendous struggle for liberty, but it is on the principle of the voluntary system, and it is on that principle that I, as a Canadian, desire that Canada shall continue to the end to be with the Allies. I may say at once to the father confessor of the Tory party, my good friend, the Solicitor General, that I am opposed to compulsory service, and I do not understand his anxiety in asking every member on this side of the House to state whether he will support conscription or be against it, if a referendum be submitted. I say to him that conscription for Canada is the Milner system—the autocratic system.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Every man in this free British country has a right to his own opinions, and has as much right to be against the compulsory system as has the Quaker, the Mennonite, aye, as much right to his opinion as Sir John Simon, Mr. John Morley. No one either will question my hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) the right to his opinion in favour of the compulsory system.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I am opposed to compulsory service, and why? We have entered this war on the principle of voluntary service, and the pledge of the Government to that effect is positive, direct and binding. The honour of Canada, the honour of the Government are at stake. The Prime Minister and his colleagues, from the highest to the humblest, have repeated, from one end of the country to the other, the statement that there would be no conscription in Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. LEMIEUX: They have repeated it in public meetings, on every platform; they have repeated it here time and again before the assembled Parliament. I need not quote the pledges of the Prime Minister, as he will not deny them. Shall I say, Sir, that when the National Service cards were issued, the Prime Minister authorized some of his colleagues to declare that the people might sign those cards as they did not mean compulsory service. I say to him that he has authorized some of his colleagues to make that declaration to the Archbishop of Montreal, who issued a letter, inviting the faithful of Montreal to sign the National Service cards, because, he had the assurance that they did not mean compulsory service. He distinctly accepted the pledge and the word of honour of the Government that there would be no compulsory service. In what position to-day is that dignitary of the Church?

Mr. MURPHY: Hear, hear.

Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend, the Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Sevigny) stated in the county of Dorchester, to his electors a few weeks ago, that there would be no conscription. The members of Parliament who took part in that contest heard his statement. He was elected on the strength of that pledge, and the paper which speaks for the Conservative party in Quebec, L'Evénement, the organ of my hon. friend (Mr. Sévigny) stated most positively that there would be no conscription. Let me translate one of the last articles published by that paper before polling day. I forget the date, but the words are as follows:

The heading of the article is:

"Un tiens vaut mieux que deux tu l'auras."

The only translation I can make of that old adage is: "A bird in the hand is worth two in the bush." The article proceeds:

The electors of Dorchester are now well notified. They know that they will never have conscription from the Conservative party. They do not know what they will have from a Liberal government, the party of conscription.

And, Sir, on the 26th January, 1917, whilst that election was raging, the following article appeared in that same paper:

If the Borden Government had been in favour of conscription, conscription would have been decreed, but the Government have declared that they will not have conscription. that they do not desire to have it, as they can organize up the defence of Canada without having recourse to conscription. If the electors of Dorchester were to elect a Liberal member, and that conscription would come afterwards, they then could not complain, they would have been notified. They know what they will have from a Conservative government. They do not know what they will have from a Liberal government. A bird in the hand is worth two in the bush. That is the wisdom of the nation which thus speaketh.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. LEMIEUX: So that, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister, his colleagues and the latest addition in the Cabinet, my hon. friend the Minister of Inland Revenue and his organ in Quebec, all pledged the honour of the Government that there would be no conscription through the Tory party, but on the contrary they announced that conscription would come through the Liberal party. Mr. Speaker, that is not all. I could read many other speeches which have been delivered by members of that party. This is however too serious a question to revel in personalities. What I want to convey to the House is this: since the war has commenced I have addressed meeting after meeting in the province of Quebec, in the district of Montreal, and in the province of Ontario. I have addressed at least a dozen meetings with the right hon. the leader of the Opposition, appealing to our fellow countrymen in the great cause for which we are fighting at the present time, and I am surprised to hear the very ungenerous reflection which has been cast on the attitude of the right hon. gentleman since the beginning of the war.

Mr. MURPHY: Surprised?

Mr. LEMIEUX: I appeal to my hon. friend the Minister of Justice, because at least I should expect justice from him. Is it not a fact that the right hon. gentleman has, from the very inception of the war, on many, many occasions addressed his fellow countrymen in the province of Quebec, in order to stimulate their zeal in the great cause that we are fighting for to-day? I know that my hon. friend cannot deny this assertion. I, personally, addressed meeting after meeting in my riding of Rouville, in the district of Montreal, in the province of Quebec generally, in Ontario and also in the Eastern Townships. On every occasion, basing my statements on the pledges given by the Government, I told my electors and my fellow-countrymen that the aid which Canada was giving to the Mother Country was purely voluntary; that the people of Canada would never be required to serve the Mother Country under compulsion. Sir, if to-day I were to support a measure of compulsory service I should be a deceiver of my fellow-men. I and my friends around me are not afraid to swim against the current. We are quite ready to take an unpopular stand for the sake of a princiunpopular stand for the sake of a principle. We did this in 1909, in 1910 and in 1911.

Mr. SEVIGNY: Does my hon. friend say that the course which he is now taking is unpopular in the province of Quebec?

Mr. LEMIEUX: I do not say that, but I do say that public opinion in the province of Quebec is a respectable and above all a constitutional opinion. Since my hon. friend interrupts me, let me quote for his benefit what the Manchester Guardian said on this very question a few days ago. My hon. friend knows that the Manchester Guardian is the leading organ of radical opinion in Great Britain; in my humble judgment, it is the most honest and most respectable of all the papers published in Great Britain. I can safely say this, as Lord Northcliffe has not yet reached Ottawa. The Manchester Guardian said:

A year ago conscription for Canada was agreed to be impossible. Various things have combined to remove some of the difficulties, but grave obstacles still stand in the way. When the National Service scheme was first launched, its director said conscription might lead to civil war.

A well informed paper!

That so soon afterwards it should be in fact proposed shows the striking effect on Canadian opinion of the entry of the United States into the war. Two courses are open to Sir Robert Borden—either to utilize the Militia Act to secure a large extension of the home forces—thus releasing other men for the front—or to put the issue of compulsion direct before the people. The latter method was adopted by Australia and though that Government failed of their aim, it is so clearly the more honest procedure that the Canadian Government is not likely to incur the odium of foregoing it.

May I not say to the Minister of Inland Revenue that after all the province of Quebec is not in such bad company when in the old country it finds such a supporter as the editor of the Manchester Guardian? It is true, Sir, that the larger proportion of the people of Quebec province are against compulsory service. But how does that happen? The leader of the Opposition gave a little bit of history yesterday; let me also refresh the memory of my hon. friend. He evidently forgets how that public opinion was nurtured in his native province, how it was hammered at meeting after meeting, through resolution after resolution, on platform after platform, by the very men who surround him, and of whom he was one of the leaders. My hon. friend has had the courage to confess that he was wrong. He was wrong, he says, because he was young—he was only thirty. I accept my hon. friend's admission that he was young at thirty and that he was wrong because he was so young! But what can we expect from him when, at fifty, he will have the illusion of being young, and will still be making mistakes? In 1911 we had to swim against the current. My hon. friend will admit that; we stood like men by our guns.

Mr. SEVIGNY: You did it in a very clever way.

Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend's cleverness is, of course, greater than mine, but I shall always prefer my own which, at least, is honest and logical, as compared with his. My hon. friend in 1911 paraded from one end of the province to the other, holding in his youthful hands the banner of the Nationalist party, on which were emblazoned the principles of that party. What were those principles? I call the attention especially of the member for St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames) to the principles which he, above all others propagated in the Eastern Townships, in the counties of Northern Ontario and of Western Canada wherever there was a sprinkling of French Canadian electors to be seduced. These were the principles: First, no participation by Canada in Imperial wars outside her territory. Second, to spurn any attempt at recruiting for British troops. Third, to oppose the establishment in Canada of a naval school with the help and for the benefit of Imperial authorities. Fourth, control over our militia and our military colleges in time of war as in time of peace and for the defence of our territory exclusively. Fifth, refusal to grant leave of absence to any military officer in order that he may take part in any Imperial wars.

Mr. MURPHY: What was that second one, again?

Mr. LEMIEUX: To spurn—the word is so euphonic and does convey so much—any attempt at recruiting for British troops. My hon. friend propounded that principle in the province of Quebec, and the member for St. Antoine did more, he financed the Nationalist party to propagate it at that time. In 1911 I pledged my word of honour—and the right hon. leader of the Opposition and other Liberal members also pledged their word of honour—when bitterly and eloquently assailed by the hon. gentleman and his friends, that under our naval policy there would be no conscription. About half the province of Quebec followed the lead of the Nationalist orators, and half—perhaps a little more—followed the lead of my right hon. friend. Events have proved since that the right hon. gentleman was right, and that the other gentlemen were neither right nor honest.

Sir, I repeat that, if to-day I were to support a measure of conscription, I would be a deceiver. I would rather relinquish my privileges as a member of this House, in which I have sat for now nearly 21 years, than be a deceiver of my electors, of my province and of the people of Canada.

I am opposed to this military Service Bill because, before conscription of manpower, the least the Government should do is to enact a Bill for conscription of the accumulated wealth in this country. There are shocking inequalities in the various taxation measures which have been voted by this House since the beginning of the war, and can we ignore the circumstance that the cost of living in this country is abnormally high to-day? The June report of the Department of Labour reveals the fact that the cost of living is still increasing. In retail prices of food, the cost of the weekly food budget, including some 30 staple foods, of the average workingman's family, rose from $10.37 to $11.82 during the month of May. Of this increase of $1.45, one-third occurred in meats, one-third in bread and flour, and one-quarter in potatoes. Rice, beans and sugar also showed some increases; cheese was a little higher, but milk and butter declined, although only slightly, whereas the increase is usually substantial. And no relief is in sight for the consumer. The present Bill is all risks for the poor and all immunities for the wealthy. It is said, and rightly so, that equality of protection carries with it equality of obligation of service. This is a fair principle. When the other day this measure was introduced by the Prime Minister, he said that he realized that the future of civilization and humanity was at stake and he added:

> All citizens are entitled to equal protection of the laws, and upon them is imposed an equal obligation. There can be no national unity unless this principle is accepted. I cannot bring myself to believe that any class or community will expect to assert for itself the right or the power to defy the law, and to set up for itself different standards from those which are applied to the people as a whole.

This is a fine doctrine, preached by the Prime Minister, but does it apply merely to man-power? Cannot accumulated wealth be called into the service of the nation? There is as much obligation on the well-to-do people of this country to give service to the Crown and to the country in this emergency as there is obligation of service on the part of the man on the street. By this Conscription Bill you confiscate the liberty of the subject, and yet by ignoring the accumulated wealth of the country, you release that wealth from the obligation it owes to the country in which it has been made. Not only does the Government, in this drastic measure, ignore in a friendly way the accumulated wealth of the country, but the Government, in the course of this session and of the preceding session, have practically created in Canada, on account of the war, what I will call a bonded aristocracy. The Minister of Finance, an able man—I agree with my hon. friend from South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie)—yes, he is an able man to tax the poor, but a very unable man to tax the wealthy to their due proportion. He was forced to borrow money from the United States, the country with which a few years ago he would not truck nor trade. Finding, however, the financial market of the United States a little stiff, he came back to Canada and borrowed millions and hundreds of millions of dollars from the Canadian people. I am told that the great financial institutions, the large investors, the millionaires, have exchanged their securities for Canadian bonds, and for what reason? Because under the legislation passed by this Government, through this eminently able Minister of Finance, those bonds are exempt from all taxation, and thus of the remaining wealth little will be left to develop the resources of this country after the war. The Minister of Finance will have to come yet to an income tax, but the clippings will be very few on the coupons of the wealthy, as they will have been exchanged for war bonds of the Canadian Government. Again, I say that before enacting a law for the conscription of man-power, it is the duty of the Government to first enact a law for the conscription of accumulated wealth in Canada. If Brown, or Jones, or Smith must be conscripted as regards his blood, the least we can expect is that the plutocrats and the war profiteers should be conscripted as regards their accumulated wealth. I may be told by my hon. friends opposite that this is the language of a demagogue. I am no demagogue. My hon. friend (Sir Herbert Ames) nods his head as much as to say that I am a demagogue. I will give him the opinion of a Toronto paper, edited by a good Tory editor, a financial authority from Toronto, but with a conscience. This is from the Financial Post:—

> Not only are the taxless Government bonds likely to create a new aristocracy who will take their revenue from the nation and pay no share of it themselves, but, if other bonds and stocks are subject to heavy taxation, there will be direct discouragement to the upbuilding of that productive capacity so necessary to create the required national wealth. To-day there is a movement on the part of the millionaires—

The Ames, Holden and others.

> —to take their funds out of investments where they have a productive capacity and put them into Government issues where, for their lifetime they will be free from taxation.
> Their action may be due to patriotism; but if so they should be willing to subscribe and still pay their share of future tax burdens which it may be necessary for the country to impose. To prevent the sinking away in this manner of immense blocks of wealth upon which the country may have no future call, provision should be made now that tax immunity apply only to holders of reasonable amounts of Government bonds, say up to $100,000.

The editor of the Financial Post is very modest; he is going to give them some leeway to the extent of $100,000. I thought there were no demagogues in the good sanctimonious Tory jingo party in Toronto. Sir, if it is the act of a demagogue to preach equality of taxation I confess I am in good company, with Adam Smith and Mr. Thiers, the greatest statesman, indeed the liberator of France after the Franco-Prussian war. Has the Government done anything to equalize taxation in this country since the war began. They started by adding 7 per cent to the general tariff, and by cutting away the British preference; that is what this party of super-loyalists did. Since then they have taxed a little here and a little there, but have never come whole-heartedly to the rescue of the poor consumer. I repeat that the issue to-day is not conscription of blood, and I call the attention of my hon. friend from St Antoine particularly to this—

Sir HERBERT AMES: Do you want to know what I think? I think that instead of wasting our time here we should send men to the front. Now call on me again.

Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend is very anxious to send other men to the front. Will he finance them as he financed the Nationalist party in 1911? Notwithstanding the assumed superiority of my hon. friend, I repeat that the issue before Canada to-day is not conscription of blood but the control of foodstuffs. Let us see what other countries have done as compared with Canada. It was only this afternoon that we heard of the appointment of a food controller in this country. The United States on the very first day of entering the war appointed Mr. Hoover as food controller. Great Britain in the very first year of the war established one fixed maximum price for foodstuffs, decided what unnecessary imports should be debarred to make room for essentials, established the eight hour day, a minimum wage, and equal pay for women workers; took control of all railroads on the basis of 1914 profits, also mines and other industries, prohibited landlords from raising rents, increased wages in proportion to the increased cost of living, confiscated exorbitant profits, established meatless days, forbade the making of fancy bread and pastry, jailed war profiteers and grafters. France established a moratorium for rents and mortages, fixed a maximum price for foodstuffs, established a minimum wage and an eight-hour work day, bought flour abroad and sold it to bakers at cost price, encouraged production by all possible means, took control of all industries, mines and railways, requisitioned all necessary war material and supplies, paying for them in Government bonds, established meatless days, forbade the making of fancy bread and pastry, confiscated exorbitant profits, jailed war profiteers and grafters.

The United States are following the same course. It was only to-day, think of it, after three years of war, that Canada appointed a food controller and only yesterday a fuel controller. In Canada, the great wheat-producing country of the world, we are paying 12 cents a pound for bread; France is paying 4 cents and England 5 cents a pound for bread made of wheat imported from Canada. That is where Canada stands after three years of war as compared with France, Great Britain and the United States. Yes, the duty, the pressing duty of the hour, is not the conscription of blood but the relief of the consumer, the control of food and the fixing of maximum prices.

Mr. NICKLE: Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that he considers that regulation of food prices should take priority over sending reinforcements to the thin lines of the Canadians in Flanders?

Mr. LEMIEUX: I put the case clearly —something which the Minister of Labour never does. I repeat to my hon. friend that the pressing duty of Canada at the present day and hour is not the conscription of blood for election purposes, but the control of food.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Shame.

Mr. LEMIEUX: So far from being ashamed I repeat that at the present moment, when 400,000 men have been recruited under the voluntary system, when farms are being depleted—the Lieutenant Governor of Ontario stated only the other day that there was not one man available to every 100 acres of arable land in that province—when the cost of living is going sky high, the duty of Canada is not to conscript blood but to conscript wealth and to protect the consumer of this country.

Sir HERBERT AMES: What do you propose to do for the men at the front?

Mr. LEMIEUX: To keep the men on the farms of Canada so as to produce wheat and send them food, for one thing, and to equip them with munitions. That is what the Government themselves proposed to do not so very long ago. Only a few days before Judge Galt's report was published, the following notice was published in the newspapers of the United States.

Farm Hands Wanted.

Western Canada Farmers Require 50,000 American Farm Labourers at Once.

Urgent demand sent out for farm help by the Government of Canada. Good wages Steady employment. Low railway fares Pleasant surroundings. Comfortable homes. No compulsory military service. Farm hands from the United States are absolutely guaranteed against conscription. This advertisement is to secure farm help to replace Canadian farmers who have enlisted for the war.

A splendid opportunity for the young man to investigate Western Canada's agricultural offerings, and to do so at no expense.

Only those accustomed to farming need apply.

For particulars as to railway rates and districts where labour is required or other information regarding Western Canada, apply to C. J. Broughton, 112 W. Adams St., Chicago, Ill., Authorized Canadian Government Agent.

Raise High Priced Wheat on Fertile Canadian Soil.

Canada extends to you a hearty invitation to settle on her FREE Homestead lands of 160 acres each or secure some of the low priced lands in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. This year wheat is higher but Canadian land just as cheap, so the opportunity is more attractive than ever. Canada wants you to help feed the world by tilling some of her fertile soil land similar to that which during many years has averaged 20 to 45 bushels of wheat to the acre. Think of the money you can make with wheat around $2 a bushel and land so easy to get. Wonderful yields also of oats, barley and flax. Mixed farming in Western Canada is as profitable an industry as grain growing.

The Government this year is asking farmers to put increased acreage into grain. Military service is not compulsory in Canada, but there is a great demand for farm labour to replace the many young men who have volunteered for service. The climate is healthful and agreeable, railway facilities excellent, good schools and churches convenient. Write for literature as to reduced railway rates to Supt. of Immigration, Ottawa, Can., or to O. C. Rutledge, 301 East Genesee St., Syracuse, N.Y.; F. A. Harrison, 210 North Third St., Harrisburg, Pa.

You have my answer in that advertisement, published under the authority of the Government.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I hear the Tories jeering and laughing. They are jeering and laughing not at me but at the Minister of the Interior, at their own Government and they may well afford to jeer and to laugh for have you ever heard of anything so ridiculous, so nonsensical? A few weeks ago that advertisement came out in hundreds of newspapers in the United States calling for 50,000 farm hands to replace the young Canadians who have gone to the front.

Mr. MURPHY: And they will not be conscripted?

Mr. LEMIEUX: The farm hands from the United States are assured that they will not be conscripted. And yet, a few days afterwards—I do not say for what motive but hon. gentlemen know it full well—they suddenly bring in a conscription measure. My hon. friend from South Wellington, speaking before dinner, thought that he detected something like a mobilization of the economic forces of the country in some of the sections of the Bill. But no, Mr. Speaker, it is an exclusive conscription of the blood of Canada whilst on the other hand 50,000 young men from the United states are invited to take the place of our kith and kin and against whom there will be no conscription measure applied.

Sir HERBERT AMES: May I—

Mr. LEMIEUX: Wait a moment. My hon. friend, I hope, will speak. Surely, he will not sleep as he did during the naval debate. My hon. friend, I know, takes exception to my language. Of course, I have no right to express my views; the Milnerized type of politician will not allow another man to honestly express his convictions. But I intend to boldly speak the language which I believe to be right.

Sir HERBERT AMES: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. LEMIEUX: My opposition of this Bill and the opposition of the province which my hon. friend (Sir Herbert Ames) represents just as much as I do—

Sir HERBERT AMES: I do.

Mr. LEMIEUX: —is based on old and respectable traditions. Quebec belongs to the minority and all minorities in the world are jealous of their constitutional rights. It is said that Quebec is always beside the mark, is not with the rest of Confederation on this or that issue. But let me, Sir, take an example from the United Kingdom. The Isle of Man, with a handful of population, has kept for centuries its constitutional rights. It has a Parliament and laws of its own. Wales has kept its schools, its language, and Mr. Lloyd George, the great rebel of the Boer War, has exacted that the Welsh Fusiliers shall be sent to the front wearing a distinct national uniform. The Scotch have maintained their customs and their kilts, their language and their schools. So, for one who reads and observes, it becomes a truism that after all diversity is one of the elements of beauty. We in Quebec have our own laws, our own language, our own customs and we have for the constitution the jealous regard which is due to that enactment. The view taken by the sober people of Quebec, is that, according to the constitution of Canada, there is to be no conscription of blood for service abroad. For the defence of the territory, certainly, and that they have proven again and again from the time of the cession until now. The province of Quebec, while asking for a referendum on this question, is willing to loyally abide by the result.

The province of Quebec is not alone, Sir, in opposition to this drastic measure. Let us be frank and sincere with ourselves. The first rumblings against conscription came from the city of Winnipeg represented by the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers), then from Calgary, then from Vancouver, from Hamilton, from Toronto and from Ottawa. This afternoon my hon. friend from South Wellington cited the very severe language used by the Federation of Labour of British Columbia. I do not approve of that severity. The Federation of Labour of British Columbia ask that due consideration be given to their opposition and conclude by stating that

It is the intention to use all the forces at our command to resist conscription in any form.

The French Canadian race, to which I have the honour to belong, is a law-abiding race, and although it is practically a unit against conscription, yet it pleads for a referendum and it is ready to abide by the verdict of the majority, whilst the people of British Columbia, of English blood, mark my words, are ready to use all the force at their command to resist conscription in any form.

Let us now take the attitude of organized labour people in Canada:

We are positively of the opinion that this situation has not arrived.

That is to say a situation calling for conscription.

The necessities for the effective conduct of the war are: Food, munitions, shipping and military man power, and Canada is geographically well situated to supply the first named three essentials and can do much to assist in winning the war by developing her production of these essentials to her fullest extent.

We are strongly of the opinion that this is the best service that Canada, with her small population, can render. We declare ourselves as most emphatically opposed to the proposed conscription measure, and we urge the workers of Canada to oppose by every means in their power enactment of such legislation.

Mr. Speaker, the French-Canadians in their meetings have protested against this measure of conscription being imposed by a rump, by a moribund, by an unrepresentative Parliament; but never in any of the meetings held by them protesting against this measure, has it been threatened that when the people shall have pronounced by a majority in favour of conscription, they favour conscription, they will resist it. On the contrary, the French-Canadians pledge their respect to the law.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I stated a moment ago that at the present moment the pressing question was not the conscription of blood but the mobilization of labour, the taxation of wealth, and the controlling of all food. Am I stating something extraordinary? Has it not been stated over and over again within my hearing by the hon. Minister of Finance? From one end of the country to the other his slogan has been: "Production, production, and production." And there are some goodly people from the wild and woolly West who claim that there was a slip of the tongue when he first uttered that slogan, that he did not say production, production, production, but that he said protection, protection, protection.

I am surprised to find in some papers published in Ontario, and generally in English-speaking Canada, reflections upon the loyalty of the French-Canadians because of this question of enlistment. It is said that up to the 30th of April there were in round figures 125,000 Anglo-Canadian born, 155,000 British born and only 14,100 French-Canadians who had enlisted. Mr. Speaker, I said last year at the Canadian Club here in Ottawa, basing my statements on the figures which had been given me by my friend the present Minister of Militia (Sir Edward Kemp), that there were 17,000 French-Canadians enlisted in the various contingents that had gone overseas or were about to go. I see nothing in the incomplete information tabled in this House that would tend to alter my calculations in this regard. I say that since the beginning of the war several members have tried in vain to obtain from the Department of Militia and Defence a complete and detailed statement of the number of French-Canadians who had enlisted, not only in the province of Quebec, but in the various units of the different provinces. I claim that we have enlisted 20,000 to 22,000 French-Canadians who are at the front or about to leave for the front. That is the information I have. I have some relatives at the front; I have lost one at the front; at Ypres I lost a nephew last year—and I happen to possess some information. Our regiments have been merged into larger units from other provinces; I will ask my hon. friends from the northern sections of Ontario, from western Canada which is represented by my friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver), and from the Maritime Provinces if it is not a fact that in every unit coming from these sections there is a large, yes, a generous sprinkling of French-Canadians within the ranks. So far we have been unable to get from the Minister of Militia and Defence the exact figures, but I assert, and I think my hon. friend the Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Sevigny) will not deny it, that there are at the front, or about to leave for the front, at least 20,000 to 22,000 French-Canadians.

Mr. MORPHY: Does the hon. gentleman not think that those brave French-Canadians who have gone to the front should have the support of their compatriots in overwhelming numbers without waiting for any talk about referendums?

Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend speaks the language of the Orange Sentinel. There is a sting in his question. I feel there is a sting in his question. Who has ever told my hon. friend that the French-Canadians were recreant to support the boys at the front?

Mr. MORPHY: It does not look like it.

Mr. LEMIEUX: If the hon. gentleman thinks that there can be a wave of enthusiasm in the province of Quebec in favour of recruiting with the methods that have been employed, he is sadly mistaken. I will explain to my hon. friend at once. A few days ago my hon. friend from Dufferin (Mr. Best) rose from his seat in this House and read a statement which had been published by the Orange Sentinel to the effect that the soldiers passing through the province of Quebec had been insulted, and that some of them had even been stoned at Rivière du Loup. Immediately the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), understanding the sinister meaning of that dastardly campaign, challenged the accusation and asked for an investigation, and this was immediately granted by my hon. friend the Minister of Militia and Defence (Sir Edward Kemp). That story has circulated from one end of the country to the other; it has gone from one paper to the other; it has inflamed passions from one end of the country to the other, and my province has been branded by those papers as a province of shirkers, of slackers, of cowards! Is that not a fact?

Mr. MORPHY: Will the hon. gentleman permit another question?

Mr. LEMIEUX: And now an investigation has taken place presided over by a commission appointed by this Government. I have the report before me; it was laid on the table of the House the other day. It is a public document, and I challenge —no I will not challenge my hon. friend because he is fair—but I will challenge the editor of the Orange Sentinel to publish as prominently as he published the charge, the findings of the report. Mr. Speaker, is it possible to create enthusiasm when a whole province is vilified by proceedings of that character? Sir, we must trust each other, we must respect each other, respect not only our qualities—every race has its own qualities—but respect even our prejudices and our failings. That is how I have in my public career endeavoured to understand the British character. I have found failings, I have found shortcomings with that race, but on the whole I admire and respect the race. I believe as Clémenceau so well said last year when the British parliamentary delegation went from London to Paris, I believe that we ought to know each other, that we ought to understand each other, and thus by knowing and by understanding each other we would come to love each other.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Clemenceau added with some humour: "I expected you Englishmen from across the channel, yes, I awaited you, since endless centuries, since the days of Hastings and since the Black Prince." To my fellowmen of British extraction, may I not say: "We are awaiting you since the Plains of Abraham and since the battle of St. Foye. Why do you not trust us, as your fellowmen, as your partners, just as the British overseas have trusted the Boers, as they have trusted the Scotch and the Welsh, as they are about to trust the Irish, after so many years of misunderstandings, contentions and miseries? ".

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Referring to the small number of French Canadians who have enlisted so far, I desire to quote from a very illuminative article on this subject published in the Montreal Star on Saturday last, comparing the quota of the British born with the English Canadians and the French Canadians in this war. The article reads as follows:

The British-born with their instantly-acting instinct of patriotism, enlisted at once. They constituted something like eighty-five per cent of the first contingent. This was not because they were more loyal than the rest of us when we all had time to think it out—it was merely because their patriotism was more instinctive and automatic. It took the Canadian-born a little longer to emerge from the miasmic fogs of pacifism; but they were presently marching into the gap bravely.

French Canada—with much the same mental attitude to begin with— was much slower in taking fire. Why? Largely because their instinctive patriotism had become wholly local. They were loyal to Canada alone. They were long divorced from France—first, by the conquest when they were deserted; next (let us remember in fairness) by the British demand that they cease to look to France which was then our enemy; next, by the Revolution and its subsequent war upon their cherished religion.

Mr. Speaker, you have in these well poised sentences the explanation of a peculiar psychology. There it is pointed out how it happens that, instinctively, the British-born were first to respond to the call; then the English Canadians and then the French Canadians.

I have said on many other occasions, and I repeat this evening, that recruiting is largely, if not wholly, carried on successfully in urban centres. The province of Ontario is dotted with industrial centres. In the province of Quebec, outside of Sherbrooke, Three Rivers. Sorel, Montreal and Quebec, we have few or little industrial centres. Quebec is a mostly rural province, and bear in mind that she gets no influx of immigration from the old country.

Mr. Speaker, I will with your leave complete the statement I have made to the House this evening in all frankness and sincerity. Sir, no effort worthy of the name has been made to intelligently recruit in the province of Quebec since the beginning of the war.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Hon. gentlemen know that from the session of Parliament in 1914 I urged the Government to appoint General Lessard as recruiting agent. He is the best and most qualified officer, and a man in whose judgment and ability our people have all confidence. Yet, General Lessard was only appointed on the 29th March, 1917, and my hon. friends will be honest enough to grant that all that delay was due to some bickerings and quarrels which happened at the time of the Boer war between General Lessard and the Minister of Militia and Defence. Is that a motive which should have deferred the early appointment of General Lessard to promote recruiting in Quebec? Sir, we had another excellent officer, a veteran from South Africa, Colonel Pelletier, of Quebec, son of the late Lieutenant Governor, Sir Alphonse Pelletier. At the beginning of the war he was ignored and finally he was given his pension. There was in Montreal Colonel Roy, who was the district commanding officer. He knew our people, was trusted, and spoke the language of the majority. He was sent to British Columbia, and later on was pensioned and replaced by General Wilson of Montreal, who is a personal friend of mine, a gentleman, but who hardly speaks a word of French. I was chairman of the civilian committee of the Asselin regiment, and I must say, in all justice to my friend the ex-Minister of Militia and Defence, that he gave us, the French Canadians of Montreal, a most loyal support in the recruiting of that regiment. I thank him publicly to-day, as I thanked him publicly on many, many occasions previously. With the help received from his department, in less than two months, Major Asselin, who was very popular, who was exceedingly brilliant, succeeded in raising a regiment, but what happened? We founded great hopes on that regiment. We expected that it would be the nucleus of many similar regiments in the province of Quebec. It was even hinted that my hon. friend the Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Sevigny) would take a course at Kingston, in order to do as Major Asselin had done. What happened? Major Asselin's regiment was sent to Bermuda for several months. I do not blame the Government for that. There were military reasons, I suppose, for that action. Several other regiments have gone there. But what I and the people of Quebec resent is this: the regiment was transferred to a camp in Great Britain, I forget which camp, and, as soon as it reached Great Britain, the first order received by Major Asselin was that of the dislocation of his unit. It was divided into several drafts and distributed amongst many regiments. The same fate happened to Colonel Piuze who raised a regiment in the district represented by my hon. friend the member for Kamouraska (Mr. Lapointe). I know there are reasons for that and I do not blame the Government. But there is some pride in our people; they would have been glad to read of the Asselin regiment at the front as the Asselin regiment, just as they were proud to hear of the 22nd battalion at the front as the 22nd battalion. True it is that there may have been military reasons for disbanding the battalion, but it is to say the least most unfortunate that the Government did not see its way clear to do for the Asselin battalion what was done for the Irish Brigade that was raised in Montreal. Although that brigade had not the required numbers, its identity was maintained and it was given a tour in Ireland to arouse the people in that country as well as the Irish people in Canada to the necessities of the hour. That was wise policy on the part of the Government.

Mr. MURPHY: What has been done since with that brigade?

Mr. LEMIEUX: I do not know.

Mr. MURPHY: Neither do I.

Mr. H. B. MORPHY: Does the hon. member not know that the matter of which he complains was one of serious complaint also throughout western Ontario, because of units from the various counties there being broken up by reason of militia regulations and orders of the British War Office?

Mr. LEMIEUX: I quite understand that; I know it is a fact. But there is a distinction.

Mr. MORPHY: None whatever.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Yes, there is, and my hon. friend is too fair not to admit it. The battalions from Ontario which were scattered amongst other units in Great Britain were composed of men speaking the English language. They could be understood by the Welsh and Irish Fusiliers, the Durhams and the Yorks, that were so jauntily mentioned this afternoon by the ex-Minister of Militia. But the men recruited by Major Asselin were young French-Canadians, mostly speaking only the French language. The battalion was sent to England, and there dislocated, the men being spread amongst various units where they did not understand the language; where they did not speak the language of their commanding officers. I will give my hon. friend another instance —and I hope that the member for Kingston will listen to me for a moment. This will give the House an idea of how something unfair may sometimes be done unwittingly. Last winter I was travelling from Quebec to Montreal. It was a bitterly cold evening. I was in a pullman car—although I am not a minister of the Crown, I sometimes travel in a pullman car. I noticed a young man, rather short and stocky, dressed in kilties. As I looked at him I said to myself: surely this is not a Highlander—yet he has the kilties, and a Scotch cap. As I looked at him he also looked at me, and then addressing him in French. I said: "Are you not a Scotchman?" He said: "No, I am Albert Martel, from Quebec." I said: "Under what guise are you travelling?" "Oh, well," he said, "I was in Ottawa; our regiment, which was being recruited by Colonel de Salaberry, was disbanded for certain reasons, and I offered my services to the Kingston Queen's Highlanders, which left a few weeks ago." What was the strength of that unit?

Mr. NICKLE: About 700.

Mr. LEMIEUX: As Martel was passing from the pullman to the first class coaches, I said: "Where are you going?" He answered: "To see my men." "Your men?" "Yes," he said, "I am recruiting in Quebec for the Queen's Highlanders; I will introduce you to 17 Highlanders from Sir Wilfrid Laurier's constituency. I am going to Ottawa—it is not the shortest way to Kingston —but I am going there with my men because Ottawa is dry and I want to spend a Sunday in that place." They came to Ottawa, and I saw alighting from the train the 18 kilties, fine, bright fellows, not one of them speaking a word of English. That is the first chapter of my little story.

A few days ago the bell was rung at my residence. A gentleman in kilts was ushered in. "Bonjour, monsieur; I am Lieutenant Martel." "Oh," I said, "the gentleman I met this winter. Are you still recruiting for the Queen's Highlanders?" "I have recruited," he answered, "101 men; they left a few weeks ago with a battalion made up of about 700 Scotchmen." "Did you not follow your men?" I asked. He answered: "No." Now there comes a blank in my story, but if the member for Kingston will come to me after the sitting I will tell him why Lieutenant Martel did not follow his men, though he promised the fathers and mothers of those French-Canadian Highlanders that he would follow them to England. Bear in mind that they were confided to his care, because he spoke their language, because he understood them, because they and their families had confidence in him. At the last moment, for reasons which I will give my hon. friend—and which I gave to the Minister of Justice the other day, who told me since that I had a very good case indeed—Martel did not go. The men who left with the Highlanders will never be accounted as French-Canadians from Quebec. Lieutenant Martel, who is in Ottawa, can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that 35 of his recruits do not speak a word of English; yet they are distributed among an English-speaking unit. I have faith in the Scotch. I love the Irish and I love the English, but I confess that I have a failing for the Scotch. These French-Canadians are in good company; I do not fear for them. But, Sir, do you not think that, in all fairness and in all justice, Lieutenant Albert Martel, who promised the fathers and mothers and relatives of these men that he would follow them to the last ditch, should have accompanied them when they marched off? I will not say why he did not accompany them.

Mr. ERNEST LAPOINTE: Why do you not?

Mr. LEMIEUX: I will not; I will tell the member for Kingston. The reason is stated in the letters that I sent the other day to the Minister of Justice.

Mr. MORPHY: Does the hon. gentleman agree with the reasons given?

Mr. LEMIEUX: No.

Mr. MORPHY: You dissent from the reasons?

Mr. LEMIEUX: Certainly, and I will appeal to the fairness of my hon. friend when I tell him the facts.

Mr. NICKLE: Unless my hon. friend thinks that on grounds of public policy those reasons should be kept secret, it might be just as well to remove this air of mystery. Perhaps I may be able to give him some information and enlightenment.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I will tell my hon. friend. I will now unbosom myself to the House in all sincerity and in all honesty of purpose. I do not see in the Chamber any hon. gentleman representing a Toronto constituency.

If one of them were here, I would say this: What would he think if I, being Minister of Militia, or better still, if the Minister of Inland Revenue being promoted to be Minister of Militia, were to appoint as chief recruiting agent for the city of Toronto the Superior of the Jesuit Order? With all due respect for the Jesuits and for my hon. friends from Toronto, would the Superior of the Jesuit Order have any success in the cause of recruiting in Toronto or say in Guelph, Kingston or St. Thomas? The answer is only too obvious. What has happened in Montreal? As I stated the other day to Maréchal Joffre, the district and suburbs of Montreal are, outside of Paris and possibly Lyons in France, the largest French district in the world. The chief recruiting agent in Montreal, appointed by my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Militia and Defence (Sir Sam Hughes), is a personal friend of mine, but he is the pastor of St. James Methodist chuch. He is a Liberal in principle; he is a home-ruler also. I have spoken with him in his own church, and I was taunted by some of my Catholic friends that I had turned Methodist, but as I was preaching for recruiting purposes, I was easily absolved. But, in all fairness and common sense, is it reasonable to expect that a Superior of the Jesuits would meet with any success in recruiting in the city of Toronto, and is it to be expected that one of the ministers of the Methodist church would have any success in recruiting in a French and Catholic district like the district of Montreal? To put the question is to suggest the answer at once. That appointment was made, not for the purpose, I grant, of putting obstacles in the way of recruiting, but it was made all the same and there it is. I do not wish to impute motives to the ex-Minister of Militia.

Mr. ROGERS: Does he not get any English recruits in Montreal?

Mr. LEMIEUX: Yes, he has some English recruits, but does my hon. friend think it was conducive to bringing in French recruits which he and his friends say they expected from the province of Quebec, to so appoint a Methodist minister in that large French and Catholic district? It is useless to play upon words. My hon. friend must be credited with common sense. He might have appointed a Jesuit as recruiting officer in St. Boniface, but he would not have appointed a Jesuit in the city of Winnipeg. The matter is too self evident; it seems, Sir, as if every obstacle were put in the way of recruiting in the province of Quebec.

Mr. BOYCE: Does my hon. friend not know of the opposite case where, for instance, Ontario regiments have had their officers taken away from them and have been put under French-Canadian officers? If he does not, I can give him some instances.

Mr. LEMIEUX: That is not the point at all. I am speaking of the recruiting work, of the appeals made to the laymen to join the ranks. Those appeals were made in the English language; the recruits were merged into English-speaking units. The moment a French-Canadian officer speaks the English language, if he retains his rank and receives no favour, I see no objection to him taking command of an English-speaking regiment. In Quebec and Montreal, there have been and there are cases where the chief officers are English-speaking, and no objection is taken, far from it.

Mr. BOYCE: French-speaking officers have been appointed in preference to English-speaking officers, and that has been done without objection in instances which I can quote to my hon. friend.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Certainly. There is no objection when there is no preferment, when it is only a matter of course. I do not object to an English officer having precedence over a French-Canadian officer if his rank will command that precedence. What I am pointing out is this: In the district of Montreal, the chief recruiting officer, a personal friend of mine, a charming, enlightened and great speaker for those who understand him, was a pastor of the Methodist church. The Minister of Militia and Defence might have done better if he had appointed a gentleman whose language and whose ambient air would have been more congenial to the men to whom he was appealing.

I have only a few words to add and it is on this question of a referendum. I will then conclude. This is of all measures the most vital that has ever been introduced into this Parliament; it is a departure from all our traditions; it means the alienation of human liberty; Parliament, functus officio, unrepresentative, moribund, with more than 20 seats vacant, with a West under-represented, cannot and dare not attempt to legislate for the people of Canada under such circumstances. There is only one solution and that is a referendum. The referendum, it is true, is more familiar to Latin than to British countries, but it has been accepted in Switzerland for many years; it has been accepted in some of the states of the neighbouring Republic with a measure of success; it has been accepted by some of the western provinces; it is the law of the land in Australia and New Zealand, and we ourselves, sometimes refer matters of municipal government to the people before enacting them. The other day we received as our honored guest one of the foremost statemen of the world. I refer to the right hon. Arthur James Balfour, who represents, I believe, in the Empire and in the world, the most enlightened conservatism that I know of. His noble language, the other day, establishes that fact. He, a Conservative, asserted his belief, his faith in democracy and in democratic rule. On the question of tariff reform which, a few years ago, agitated public opinion in Great Britain, the position taken by Mr. Balfour, which is well worth the consideration of my hon. friend from South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) was as follows:

> The advantage of the referendum is this—that the issue is quite clear and quite precise. . . The referendum has an enormous advantage. It does not involve a general election; it does not involve all the personal bitterness inevitably involved in the contest between the two competitors for a seat; it does not carry with it a change of government; and it does get a clear verdict from the people. . . Nevertheless, I frankly say that without question tariff reform is a great change. I admit that this election, or any election perhaps—certainly this election—cannot be described as taken upon tariff reform simply; but I have not the least objection to submit the principles of tariff reform to referendum.

If Mr. Balfour was willing to break away from the traditions of England and take a referendum on such a purely theoretical question as tariff reform, surely we in Canada, can afford to take a referendum on the conscription of the yeomanry of this country. But Mr. Balfour is not alone of that view. Professor Dicey one of the highest authorities on constitutional government, has declared himself favourably on the principle of referendum in British affairs. Lecky, who is also one of the foremost authorities on the British Government and constitution, in "Democracy and Liberty" volume I, p. 287 and following presents a most elaborate argument in favour of the referendum. I have prepared a short synopsis of it. The referendum would prevent the placing of the essential elements of the constitution at the mercy of a simple majority in a single Parliament—a majority perhaps composed of heterogeneous and discordant factions combined for a party purpose without the direct and deliberate assent of the people. It seems as those words of his were uttered on this very question and under the circumstances of to-day. The referendum would have the immense advantage of disentangling issues, separating the one great question from the many minor questions with which it may be mixed. Confused or blended issues are among the gravest political dangers of our time. Revolutionary and predatory measures are less likely to be carried on their merits because their purposes have obtained a majority by joining with them a sufficient number of other measures appealing to different sections of the electorate. It would be a great gain to English politics if a capital question could be decided by the electorate on its own merits, on a direct and simple issue. If the nation is moving towards revolution it should at least do so with its eyes open and with a clear and deliberate intention. Such a vote would prove to be the most powerful bulwark against violent and dishonest change. It would bring into action the opinion of the great silent masses of the community and reduce to their true proportion many movements to which party combinations or noisy agitations had given a wholly fictitious prominence. It would lift above the dominion of party a capital measure, and thus greatly increase the probability of its representing the genuine wishes of the electorate. It would enable the nation to reject a measure which it dislikes without destroying a ministry of which it approves. Democracy has been crowned king. The voice of the multitude is the ultimate court of appeal. It would be an appeal from a party majority, probably made up of discordant groups, to the genuine opinion of the country.

Besides Professor Dicey, Mr. Lecky and Mr. Balfour, we have another opinion, that of the right hon. leader of the Government on this question. The late Mr. Monk once moved for a referendum on the naval question, to which a sub-amendment was moved by the present Prime Minister; this being lost, the right hon. the Prime Minister was given the privilege of voting for Mr. Monk's amendment for a referendum. Yes, he and all his followers, with the exception of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, voted for the referendum.

If it was necessary to submit the naval policy of the Laurier Government to a referendum—a policy which did not involve conscription, a policy which had been dealt with by the Imperial Conferences of 1902 and 1909—surely, Sir, it is much more logical and much more urgent to submit to a referendum such a momentous question as that of the conscription of the blood of the young men of this country, enacted by a moribund and unrepresentative Parliament.

I have trespassed too long on the time of the House, but I will say this in conclusion, and I say it with all the firmness and all the good faith that I can attach to solemn statement: knowing the people of my province to be above all things a law-abiding people, if a referendum is taken, whether it goes for or against conscription, the French-Canadians, who are the descendants of those who defended Canada in 1775, in 1812, will abide by the verdict of the majority. If conscription comes they will not have to be bullied or dragooned into the ranks, but will obey the law and fight the battles of Canada as valiantly as their fellow-men of a different race and a different creed.

On the motion of Hon. Mr. Crothers, the debate was adjourned.

On the motion of Hon. Mr. Rogers, the House adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

Wednesday, June 20, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

PRINTING OF PARLIAMENT.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE moved:

That the recommendations contained in the first report of the Joint Committee of both Houses on the printing of Parliament, presented to the House on June 7, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

FIRST READING OF SENATE BILL.

Bill No. 90, respecting The Security Life Insurance Company of Canada.—Mr. Macdonell.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by asterisks.)

NATIONAL SERVICE REGISTRATION CARDS.

Mr. SMITH:

1. How many registration cards were sent out by the National Service Board?

2. How many were answered in full?
3. How many were only partially answered?
4. What portion were not answered at all?
5. What is the number of cards received from single men of military age?
6. What is the estimated number of single men of military age now in Canada who are not in military service??

Sir ROBERT BORDEN:

1. No record was kept of the number of cards distributed. Distribution was made by the postmasters of Canada, and a sufficient number of cards was sent to each post office to meet the estimated requirements at that post office. In some cases additional quantities were requisitioned by postmasters; in other cases they were over supplied.

2. 1,342,755.

3. 97,640.

4. 108,965 cards were returned in envelopes without any of the questions being answered, but in most cases the names of the senders were obtained.

5. 252,034 single men, 18 to 45 years old, indicated that they were British subjects by birth or naturalization, and apparently fit for military service; that is to say, they had normal use of their eyes, ears, feet and arms, and did not suffer from illness for a period of more than one month during the twelve months preceding the filling in of the cards.

6. Answered by the papers laid on the Table by the Minister of Militia and Defence on June 13, 1917.

The Secretary of the National Service Board has submitted the following comment concerning the answers to questions 5 and 6:

"Our figure is 252,034 single men of military age and fitness. In our record we have, at the request of the militia authorities, discarded absolutely the following:

"(1) Those who are not British subjects.

"(2) Those who had more than three persons dependent upon them.

"(3) Those who suffered from obvious physical disabilities such as defective eyesight, hearing, or loss of limb.

"(4) Those who had lost over one month from any illness whatever during the preceding twelve months.

"(5) Those who on their own statement had been rejected for military service.

"From the best estimate we are able to make, we received returns, in connection with the man-power inventory, from approximately 80 per cent of the total males in Canada between 18 and 65. It must, however, be borne in mind that out of the 20 per cent who failed to send in cards, the majority would likely be single men, apparently fit for military duty."

SALE OF SMALL ARMS AMMUNITION.

Mr. SINCLAIR:

Has the Government recovered the $15,000 said to have been deposited in a trust account in the Bank of Montreal, New York, arising out of the sale to the Admiralty of small arms ammunition made by one Colonel J. Wesley Allison?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: No, in view of telegram from Mr. Bonar Law to the Governor General under date of 16th June, 1916, in which he states that "the special account opened with the Bank of Montreal at New York is not yet closed, there being a balance on deposit which will be accounted for to the Admiralty."

CLARENCE WELLS.

Mr. SINCLAIR:

1. Was Clarence Wells, of White Head, N.S., convicted for violation of the fishery regulations?
2. If so, when and what fine was imposed?
3. Was the fine collected?
4. If not, why has the fine not been collected?

Mr. HAZEN:

1. A search of the records for two years back shows that during that time Clarence Wells was not convicted for violation of the fisheries regulations.

2, 3 and 4. Answered by No. 1.

PURCHASE OF AUTOMOBILE.

*Mr. FORTIER:

1. Did the Department of Public Works purchase, in 1914, an automobile from one Alex Morrison of Montreal?
2. If so, what was the price paid for such automobile?

Mr. REID:

1. No. On 3rd October, 1916, an automobile was purchased from Alex. Morrison, of Montreal.

2. $400, and accessories, $214.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN.

*Mr. MURPHY:

1. What are the names of the members of the military staff at North Vancouver?
2. What are their respective duties or occupations?
3. What is the rank and rate of pay of each?
4. What amount has been paid to each?
5. Upon what date or dates did the members of the said staff enlist, and how long have they been attached to the staff?

THE RELEASE OF EDWARD LEVI BAUGH.

On the notice of motion:

For a copy of the reports made by the trial judge and the penitentiary surgeons in connection with the release from penitentiary of Edward Levi Baugh.—Mr. Murphy.

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY: This notice of motion has been called a number of times. Once, when I chanced to be out of the House for a few minutes, the Minister of Justice said that it was not customary to bring down reports made by the medical officers in such cases as that referred to in this motion. If it is agreeable, I am willing that the motion should pass on the understanding that those papers are not asked for. The motion has been called several times when the Minister of Justice has not been present.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: If the hon. gentleman has no objection, I would suggest that the motion stand until the Minister of Justice is here.

Mr. MURPHY: Very well.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: There is some practice in the department about these matters, with which I am not very familiar. If I were familiar with them, I should not ask that the motion stand.

Motion stands.

THE FRENCH HANSARD.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. MEDERIC MARTIN: May I ask the Prime Minister whether it would be possible to have the French version of Hansard issued earlier? We have received none since last Monday.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I really have not anything to do with these matters. I shall ascertain what authorities have direction, and shall commend my hon. friend's request to their attention.

COST OF LIVING IN THE YUKON.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. FRANK OLIVER: I desire to bring to the attention of the House a further telegram which I have received from Dawson in regard to the cost of living conditions there. It is dated at Dawson, Yukon Territory, June 19.

Mr. SPEAKER: Does the hon. gentleman intend to ask a question?

Mr. OLIVER: I wish to ask if the Government has communicated with the Commissioner of the Yukon with regard to the subject matter of this telegram, or if it intends to do so. The telegram is as follows:

Wiring open letter to Premier Borden. Please publish where it helps most. Situation most desperate; God alone knows what will happen unless Ottawa intervenes immediately. Premier's letter follows: "Dawson, Y.T. At mass meeting June 18, attendance six hundred, mostly working people, following resolution passed, with four dissenting votes: Whereas Yukon conditions have reached a stage where the cost of living so far exceeds the rate of wages that the very existence of the community is threatened; whereas George Williams, the present incumbent of the Commissioner's chair, has shown strong sympathy and decided partiality towards those directly responsible for the recent unwarranted increase in the cost of foods; whereas owing to these facts he is not a safe person to be at the head of the local administration at the present crisis; whereas at the last session of the Yukon council two votes of censure were passed on Administrator Williams, one for extravagant wastefulness of the public funds, and one for usurping the rights of the council by paying out unwarranted sums of the public moneys: therefore be it resolved that in the opinion of this mass meeting of the citizens of Dawson and vicinity the Ottawa authorities be asked to suspend Administrator Williams from his office as Administrator of the Yukon Territory until his official actions shall be fully investigated. Moved by L. C. Nelson, seconded by J. D. Sheppard. Sir, we regret you did not realize urgency of message June 1. Writing the heads of firms in San Francisco too slow method of relieving situation. President Sloss and General Manager Fairbanks of Northern Commercial Company arrived Dawson from San Francisco June 16. Situation is desperate. Majority of Yukon Gold Company employees on strike because company refuses 10 per cent increase wages to meet 60 and 100 per cent rise on foodstuffs. Big business completely controls Yukon Territory. We cannot win unless Ottawa takes prompt and decisive action. Regret to say Yukon administration is the obedient servant of big business. Dawson press the servile mouthpiece of local administration. Only possible remedy complete immediate investigation. We can ill afford the cost of these telegrams. General public opinion that Government telegraph should relieve us of further expense.

Have the Government communicated with the Commissioner of the Yukon in connection with this communication that has already been received, and if not, will they be good enough to communicate with the commissioner in regard to the subject matter of this communication and to inform the House of the result?

Hon. T. W. CROTHERS (Minister of Labour): So far as I am aware no word has been received from the Commissioner of the Yukon, and I have not heard anything of the substance of this telegram beyond what was received about a week ago when I told my hon. friend what we had done in the matter.

RECRUITING.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. G. W. KYTE: Has any Order in Council been passed affecting the change in enlistment referred to yesterday by the ex-Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes) in these words:

> In my absence in England, the debilitating plan of draft was resorted to, but I cancelled it on my return.

If there is any such Order in Council, it should be laid on the table of the House.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: All Orders in Council with regard to recruiting were laid upon the Table a long time ago. If the hon. member will refer to what has been laid on the Table, he will see an Order in Council that was passed about the 12th day of January, 1916, increasing the authorized forces of Canada to 500,000 men. At a subsequent date in March, April, or possibly May—I do not recollect the precise date—another Order in Council was passed providing that new regiments should not be organized under the Order in Council of the 12th January without the authority of the Governor in Council, the reason being that it had been represented to the Government that too many regiments had been authorized in one place at one time.

Mr. MARCIL: Will the Prime Minister explain whether recruiting has been discontinued officially, or whether it is still proceeding? I refer to Quebec particularly.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Recruiting has not been discontinued.

LABOUR STRIKE IN WESTERN COAL MINES.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. OLIVER: Has the Minister of Labour any further report to make in regard to the coal strike in the West? There is a report that the negotiations have broken down.

Mr. CROTHERS: The negotiations have not proved successful. The rumour to which my hon. friend refers is well founded. We are taking steps immediately to see to it that the mines shall be opened under Government guidance.

RECRUITING OF BRITISH SUBJECTS IN THE UNITED STATES.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY: In the Canadian press of yesterday, there appeared this despatch:

[Mr. Crothers.]

> New York, June 19.—Recruiting headquarters for French-Canadians in New England and New York will be opened here by Major L. J. Daly, Gingras of the Canadian 258th Battalion, who arrived yesterday from Quebec. There are 500,000 French-Canadian males in the district he said.

Is there such a mission to the United States, and if so, is it being conducted under any arrangement with the United States Government?

Hon. Sir EDWARD KEMP (Minister of Militia): By an Act of the United States Congress passed a few days ago, permission was granted to the British Government and the Canadian Government to recruit British subjects in the United States in connection with the organizations which the United States' Government purpose establishing in regard to recruiting United States citizens for the war. Our military officers have therefore arranged with the United States military officers to carry on recruiting through such agencies, and that work is being carried on not only as regards people of French-Canadian nationality in the New England states, but in other parts of the United States among all British subjects. After such recruits have been passed as being medically fit for service, if they desire to go to Great Britain, they are sent there direct, and if they desire to enlist in the Canadian army, they are sent direct to Canada.

UNITED STATES SOLDIERS.

SUGGESTED TRAINING IN CANADIAN CAMPS.

On the Orders of the Day.

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL: Is there any truth in the rumour that the United States Government is going to train a large number of troops at Valcartier during the summer?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The United States Government has not yet made application to the Government of Canada for permission to occupy any of our Canadian camps, but if they do, the matter will be considered.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN.

On the Orders of the Day.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: On the 25th of April last, an Order of the House was passed for a copy of the correspondence in the Post Office Department with respect to the vacant postmastership at Charlottetown. That Order has not yet been obeyed. The correspondence cannot be voluminous, and I think a clerk could make a copy within an hour or two. When will the return be brought down?

Hon. C. J. DOHERTY: The matter has not yet been brought to my attention, but I will make inquiry at once and expedite the bringing down of the return.

MILITARY SERVICE ACT, 1917.

DEBATE CONTINUED ON MOTION FOR SECOND READING.

Consideration of the motion of the right hon. Sir Robert Borden (Prime Minister) for the second reading of Bill No. 75, Military Service Act, 1917, resumed from Tuesday, June 19.

Hon. T. W. CROTHERS (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to delay the adoption of this measure longer than a few minutes, for I believe that in a few sentences I can fairly show ample justification for the acceptance of the principle of this Bill both by the House and by the country. There are a few outstanding facts which I desire to bring to the attention of the House. In the month of August, 1914, we determined not only to join in this world-war, but to stay in it until victory should crown the efforts of the Allies. The time has come when, in order to continue in the war properly, we must have more men to send to the front. It is admitted by every one that more men cannot be secured under the voluntary system.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Not at all.

Mr. CROTHERS: Well, if that is not admitted by my hon. friend, the facts show that is the case. The time has come when the only way of filling the gaps and answering the call of our men who are fighting in the trenches is by the adoption of compulsory service, and the question before the House at the present time is whether or not we shall adopt the principle of this Bill. A considerable time has been devoted to the discussion of the details of the Bill, but I submit that it is entirely out of order at this stage. It is the principle of this Bill which is or which should be under discussion on its second reading.

When war was declared against Germany by the British Government on the 4th of August, 1914, every part of the British Empire, including Canada, became thereby at war with Germany. It is within the memory of the members of this House that on the 1st of August, 1914, when a declaration of war appeared imminent, this Government proffered the assistance of Canada to the British Government, and that offer was accepted as soon as war was declared. We at once proceeded to get ready to render all the assistance in our power. Parliament was summoned for the 18th of August, 1914. There were then three or four courses open to us. We might have sat down and calculated the cost of participating in this world-wide war. We might have considered that it would involve the organization, equipment, and transportation of a large army. We might have reckoned on losing thousands upon thousands of our best and bravest lives in this great contest. We might have calculated that it would make thousands of women widows, and thousands of children fatherless. We might have thought of all the burdens that would be placed on our shoulders by participation in this war—burdens which are not likely to be removed during our day. We might have considered all these things and said: We refuse to take any part in this war. That, of course, would have meant severing our connection with the British Empire. But there was not a man in this House, or in this country from the Atlantic to the Pacific, who suggested that we should sever our connection with the Mother Country and strike out for independence. Or we might have said: We are nearly three years removed from consultation with the electorate, and the last time we consulted them the question of war was not considered at all. My right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, if he had been as anxious for a referendum then as he is to-day, might have said what we have heard repeated over and over again in this House, "We have no mandate from the people to participate in this war, and we ought therefore to have a referendum;" and then there would have been some reason in it. Or he might have said: The House should be dissolved and a general election held. But no one in this House suggested that we should have a referendum or a general election before participating in this war. We were here representing the people of this country from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and we thought we knew how the people of this country felt on the question of the war. We were all agreed as to the course to be taken.

Let us see what was said at that time by the right hon. Prime Minister and the right hon. leader of the Opposition. Sir Robert Borden said:—

As to our duty we are all agreed;

No dissenting voice.

We stand shoulder to shoulder with Britain and the other British dominions in this quarrel. And that duty we shall not fail to fulfil as the honour of Canada demands.

Mark the words: As the honour of Canada demands.

Not for love of battle, not for lust of conquest, not for greed of possessions, but for the cause of honour, to maintain solemn pledges, to uphold principles of liberty, to withstand forces that would convert the world into an armed camp; yea, in the very name of the peace that we sought at any cost save that of dishonour, we have entered into this war; and while gravely conscious of the tremendous issues involved and of all the sacrifices that they may entail, we do not shrink from them—

Are any of us proposing to shrink from them to-day?

—but with firm hearts as we abide the event.

Further on he said:—

But, let me say that while we are now upborne by the exaltation and enthusiasm which comes in the first days of a national crisis, so great that it moves the hearts of all men, we must not forget that days may come when our patience, our endurance and our fortitude will be tried to the utmost. In those days—

Those days are upon us now.

In those days let us see to it that no heart grows faint and that no courage be found wanting.

Those words show that the Prime Minister saw into the future. The right hon. leader of the Opposition on that occasion spoke as follows:—

The gravity of the occasion which has called us together makes it incumbent upon us even to disregard the formalities and conventionalities which in ordinary times the rules of the House written and unwritten enjoin as a wise safeguard against precipitate action, but which, on such an occasion at this might impede us in dealing with the momentous question before us. This session has been called for the purpose of giving the authority of Parliament and the sanction of law to such measures as have already been taken by the Government, and any further measures that may be needed to insure the defence of Canada and to give what aid may be in our power to the mother country in the stupendous struggle which now confronts her. . . .If in what has been done or in what remains to be done there may be anything which in our judgment should not be done or should be differently done, we raise no question, we take no exception, we offer no criticism, and we shall offer no criticism so long as there is danger at the front. It is our duty, more pressing upon us than all other duties, at once, on this first day of this extraordinary session of the Canadian Parliament, to let Great Britain know, and to let the friends and foes of Great Britain know, that there is in Canada but one mind and one heart, and that all Canadians stand behind the mother country conscious and proud that she has engaged in this war, not from any selfish motive, for any purpose of aggrandisement, but to maintain untarnished the honour of her name, to fulfil her obligations to her Allies, to maintain her treaty obligations, and to save civilization from the unbridled lust of conquest and domination.

We are British subjects, and today we are face to face with the consequences which are involved in that proud fact. Long we have enjoyed the benefits of our British citizenship; today it is our duty to accept its responsibilities and its sacrifices.

We have long said that when Great Britain is at war we are at war, to-day we realize that Great Britain is at war and that Canada is at war also.

He said further:

From the day war was declared—nay, from the day the possibility of war was first mooted —our shipping to Great Britain and to Europe has been interrupted. Ships were lying at the docks fully loaded and ready to put to sea, but unable to do so because of the fact that when England is at war Canadian property on the high seas is liable to capture. . . . More than once I have declared that if England were ever in danger,—nay, not only in danger, but if she were ever engaged in such a contest as would put her strength to the test—then it would be the duty of Canada to assist the motherland to the utmost of Canada's ability.

When we came to this House, on the 18th of August, 1914, the right hon. leader of the Opposition and every other member of this House must have had in mind the provisions of the Militia Act. Let me read certain of those provisions:

10. All the male inhabitants of Canada of the age of 18 years upwards, and under 60, not exempt or disqualified by law, and being British subjects, shall be liable to service in the Militia; provided that the Governor General may require all the male inhabitants of Canada, capable of bearing arms, to serve in the case of a levée en masse.

69. The Governor in Council may place the militia, or any part thereof, on active service anywhere in Canada, and also beyond Canada, for the defence thereof, at any time when it appears advisable so to do by reason of emergency.

The question was raised last night by my hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) as to whether we have authority to send our forces to France to fight. At the time the Militia Act was being amended in 1904, the then Minister of Justice, the present Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada expressed this opinion:

The Governor in Council may send the militia of Canada out of Canada at any time when deemed necessary for the defence of Canada. If, in the opinion of the Governor in Council, it should be necessary, because of a war going on in India, to send our militia out there for the defence of Canada, they may, in the exercise of their discretion, do it, because they are the sole judges of what is necessary to be done in defence of Canada.

So, when we met on August 18, 1914, every member of the House had before him the provisions of the Militia Act which give the Governor General in Council power to send the militia anywhere outside of Canada for the defence of Canada, and which made it compulsory for every male between eighteen and sixty to serve. In that session we expressed our approval of Canada's entering into the war, knowing that it might become necessary to the defence of Canada to send our soldiers to France; knowing that it was in contemplation at that very time to send our soldiers to France—volunteers of course, but they knew that under that Act we could compel them to go—and there is not a single representative in this House who objected to that condition of things. If there was a single member who felt then as some of them say they feel now, that they are opposed to all war; that they do not want to take any part in a European war, that was the time for him to rise in his place in this House and say so. But not one of them said that he objected to the war, or objected to sending our forces to France, or that he opposed the terms of the Militia Act under which they might be forced to go to France. As silence gives consent, all the membership of this House agreed, not only that it was our duty to enter the war, but to pledge ourselves that we would continue in it until it was won. Is there a gentleman within the sound of my voice who will say that that is not true? Will the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) or the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) or the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) say that he did not personally, individually, express approval of our entering into the war and our determination to continue in it until victory should be ours? But that is not all. Every member of this House is here in a representative capacity, he represents thousands of constituents; and every one of us pledged his constituents to the declaration that we ought to enter the war and ought to continue in the war until victory should be achieved. Thus collectively the people of Canada, without any referendum, without any general election—not the people of one province but of all the provinces—declared themselves in favour of Canada taking part in this war and remaining side by side with our Allies until the war was won. We pledged ourselves individually. We pledged our constituents also, that they would use all reasonable means for the prosecution of this war, that they would provide men and money to carry on the war. Was not this implied in the attitude we took? Did not we declare to the British Government, to our sister nations overseas, and to our Allies, that we individually, our constituents to a man, and the people of Canada as a whole, were unanimous in joining them in this struggle and in remaining in it with them until victory should be achieved? We not only gave our pledge to the British Government and to our Allies, but we pledged ourselves to the brave young men of this country, that if they would go to the front and fight for us, we would stand behind them so long as the war should last.

We entered into a covenant with every young man who enlisted that if he would take the position of the greatest sacrifice possible to a man and go to the front and risk his life for the freedom of this country, we would supply him with food and equipment and munitions and guns, and send him assistance as might be necessary, as long as the war lasted. Did not we promise him that? What do we propose now—some of us? What do we propose now? To abandon the men who have gone to the front, desert the men who have risked their lives for our freedom? The member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) made a similar pledge to that which the rest of us made. I believe that personally he has redeemed that pledge, because he has done a great deal throughout Ontario to assist recruiting. I believe his constituents have redeemed the pledge he made for them on the 18th of August, 1914. My hon. friend from Vancouver (Mr. Stevens) made such a pledge, not only on his own behalf but on behalf of his constituents in the city of Vancouver. I believe that he has redeemed the pledge that he gave personally; I believe his constituents in the city of Vancouver have redeemed the pledge that he gave on their behalf. My hon. friend from Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) gave a like pledge for himself and for his constituents and for the people of Canada. Has he redeemed his pledge? Have his constituents redeemed the pledge he made on their behalf? I put the question; I do not answer it. My hon. friend from Megantic (Mr. Pacaud) was here. He made a pledge on his own behalf; he made a pledge on behalf of his constituents, that they would stand behind the boys at the front, that they would supply a fair share of men and money to back up the boys who had gone to the front. Has he discharged his duty? Have his constituents discharged their duty? Let us get this question home to each one of us and see what the answer is, putting our hand on our heart and appealing to our conscience—has each one of us redeemed his pledge? The member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) made a promise of that sort, made it on his own behalf, made it on behalf of his constituents; has he redeemed the pledge? Have his constituents redeemed the pledge? Let us ask ourselves that question, and let us answer it. The question now is, and it is a very simple question, whether or not we are to declare to the world that, having put our shoulder to the wheel, we have determined to turn back; having promised the Allies, having promised especially our young men who went to the front to sacrifice their prospects in life and perhaps to make the supreme sacrifice of life itself, having promised them that, are we prepared to declare to the world that we are quitters? That is what it means. There is no way of getting these men to send to the front except through compulsory service. That I think is admitted by every one.

Mr. MARCIL: That is where we disagree.

Mr. CROTHERS: Oh, disagree! I wish my hon. friend from Bonaventure would back up his arguments by producing some men and not merely leaving it to argument.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Will my hon. friend allow me to ask a question? I do it because I am relying on information in newspaper reports. I have seen it stated that during the last month something over 7,000 men enlisted. Is that correct?

Mr. CROTHERS: I do not know I am sure, whether it is correct or not. Suppose it is—

Mr. PUGSLEY: Should not the minister know that? I was told the other day in St. John that the enlistments are as great upon the average as they have been since the war began. A good many are for the artillery. I would ask my hon. friend why recruiting for the artillery has been discontinued by order.

Mr. CROTHERS: Mr. Speaker, I shall not attempt to answer these military questions.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CROTHERS: Is there anything to laugh about because one minister does not know everything that is going on in the other departments?

Mr. PUGSLEY: He ought to know before he makes these statements.

[Mr. Crothers.]

Mr. CROTHERS: I can explain.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Will my hon. friend pardon me—

Mr. CROTHERS: I do not think that I will.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The minister has made a statement that recruiting has absolutely stopped. The minister ought—

Mr. SPEAKER: The Minister of Labour has the floor; unless with his consent he should not be interrupted.

Mr. CROTHERS: Let me give you an explanation as it has been given to me from several sources, of considerable recruiting during the last few weeks. I know two young men who came forward when Sir Robert Borden made the announcement of conscription and said: Well, we will have to go under the Military Service Act, and we would rather go now; we will go as volunteers; and the two went that day and volunteered. A great many have come in that way. Why, if they desire to come from Bonaventure, or Rouville, or Megantic, or anywhere else, we will receive them with open arms, and if they were to come as numerously from that province as they have from some of the other provinces, neither the Militia Act nor the Military Service Act would be necessary at all. It ill becomes these men, it seems to me, to ask these questions. They say it is not necessary to have the Military Service Act or to enforce the Militia Act. Give us your proof of your statements by bringing forward recruits, bringing them forward as you promised you would on the 18th of August, 1914, when you promised that your constituents would do a fair share in the work of carrying on this war. That you promised, and that promise you have not carried out; and if it had been carried out by all of us and by all of our constituents it would not be necessary to have either a Militia Act or a Compulsory Service Act at this present time. As I said a moment ago, the question is whether or not we are going to announce to the world that we are quitters, whether or not we are going to announce to the world that we are going to abandon the men who went to the front under a covenant that we made with them that we would stand behind them until the war was won. Is that what the member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) desires to announce to the world? That is what it means if you reject compulsory service. It is said now that we ought to have a referendum. A referendum! When the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), who was then Prime Minister, arranged that a number of our soldiers should go to South Africa, not for the defence of Canada—there was no talk about an invasion of Canada—he did not take a referendum; he did not call Parliament together. If I remember aright, when he proposed to build the National Transcontinental Railway at a cost of about $200,000,000 he first entered into the agreement with the Grand Trunk Pacific railway before he brought the proposal to Parliament at all, although he was three years away from a consultation with the people.

On the 18th August, 1914, when the leader of the Opposition, with greater show of reason than now, might have said, "Let us have a referendum," he did not do so. He gave a pledge that the people of this country would take part in the war and continue to the end. Now, he wants to ask them whether they wish to continue or not. It is an insult to the people of Canada to propose this referendum.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. CROTHERS: What does it imply? On the 18th August, 1914, we said the people of Canada were unanimously in favour of our entering the war, and of continuing in it till the end. The referendum implies that they have wearied in well-doing, that the people of Canada are quitters and wish to abandon our boys at the front, and these gentlemen suggest that a majority of the people will be against conscription.

Mr. PUGSLEY: How is that implied?

Mr. CROTHERS: If my hon. friend from St. John cannot see how it is implied, I do not think I will enlighten him. None are so blind as those who do not wish to see.

Mr. MARCIL: Australia voted against conscription, but did not go back on the boys at the front.

Mr. CROTHERS: Conditions in Australia are very different from conditions in Canada. I do not know the pledges that they made in Australia.

Mr. PUGSLEY: In what respect are they different?

Mr. CROTHERS: I want to say to the hon. gentleman from Bonaventure that we have it on very good authority that "by their fruit ye shall know them"—not by their words or their eloquence, or their promise that their constituencies will produce a fair share of men and money—but by their works ye shall know them. Something has been said about the working men of this country. Having been pretty intimately associated with the workingmen during the last five years, I wish to say that of the 160,000 members of labour organizations in Canada, 30,000 have abandoned the bench and gone to the front to fight for us and liberty.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. CROTHERS: There being 160,000 members of labour organizations and assuming that the workingmen of Canada who are not in organizations have volunteered to fight for their country in the same ratio as have the union men, then there are at the front 150,000 men who were employed at manual labour, fighting for liberty. What is the proposition placed before us? Is it to abandon them? Does any man mean to tell me that the labour element in Canada is opposed to a war, which is waged to secure liberty and freedom when 150,000 of them have left the bench, shouldered the rifle, risked their lives, left fatherless children, all for the sake of human liberty. Do hon. gentlemen mean to tell me that the working people of this country are opposed to conscription when our continuance in this war depends absolutely upon compulsory service. That fact has sunken deep in the mind of every member of this House, and no matter what any man may say, he knows it in his heart. The only way we can back up the boys at the front is by applying the Military Service Act. It is sometimes asked, "Why do you not enforce the Militia Act?" It was enforced in August last. That law was on the statute-book which provided that every male in Canada between the ages of 18 and 60, whether in Quebec or British Columbia, could be compelled to serve his country. It was only a question of how he should be selected. The Militia Act provides that it could be done by ballot, by mere chance—haphazard. If the most important man to this community were to pick out a ballot which meant he should go, he would have to go.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Why should he not go?

Mr. CROTHERS: Because he is of more use at home.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. CROTHERS: The main difference between the Militia Act and the Military Service Act is in the mode of selecting the men, and in this Act provision is made for keeping at home the men urgently needed in Canada, and those we can spare go to the front. We all know that it is as important to feed a soldier as to give him a rifle. It is as important that he should have suitable clothing, shells and guns, as it is that he should be there in the firing line. He cannot be provided with food, equipment, and shells, unless men are left at home to do their part. There are men in this country who are not sufficiently robust to go to the front, but who can work here. Under the Military Service Bill we can select them. The people of Quebec, under the Militia Act, since 1868 have been bound to serve in our army sent beyond Canada, according to the opinion of the Chief Justice of the highest court in this country. So it is in any country in the world that makes any claim to civilization. The state must be protected, and that means protection to the individual. The individual must bear his responsibility, and, if need be, save the state. Under this Militia Act, we are bound to serve the state, if we are between the ages of 18 and 60.

I digressed a little from the question of labour. I think it my duty to say that the best elements in labour to-day in Canada are in favour of conscription, and of going to the front. What have they been doing for their brethren who have gone to the front? They have been paying thousands and thousands of dollars in insurance premiums from time to time when their brothers were away; and, when the breadwinner had sacrificed his life for the liberties of the country, they have seen to it that his widow and fatherless children did not want. Does any man mean to tell me that men of that character are in favour of abandoning their brethren at the front to-day? No, God forbid. I know the workingmen of this country too well to believe anything of that kind. I repeat that the best elements in the working classes of Canada to-day are in favour of conscription, because they believe it to be necessary, in order to back up our men at the front.

There are on record some letters from representative labour men in the United States and in England. Mr. Gompers, who was appointed by the President of the United States as chairman of a committee to assist the National Council of Defence, wrote to a number of workingmen and asked them to join in assisting the President in this great war. John F. Curley answered:

> I will gladly serve, and to the best of my ability do my share for my country in the time of her need.

[Mr. Crothers.]

William Green, secretary-treasurer of the United Mine Workers of America, wrote that he would gladly join the committee and do his best for it. Andrew C. Hughes said that the members of the Coopers' International Union stood ready for service at any point designated by the Government. Thomas McNeill was proud to join in the defence of the country. James Lord said:

> Real patriotism can only exist with the conservation of human liberties, and when the people of our nation can read the situation in this spirit, the things we all hold dear will not perish, no matter what situation or crisis may confront us. I will be at the meeting at the appointed time.

On May 27, the British Workers' League adopted the following resolution:

> We hope that this manifestation of popular sympathy and solidarity on the part of the masses of London's citizens will help to silence the few weak and sinister voices that have been raised in pleas for a premature and dastardly peace—a peace whereby all the sacrifices and all the courage of your brothers and ours would be wasted. We have lived through hours as dark with impending disaster as any that nations have ever suffered, and now that the sun of victory is dawning on our horizon, the masses of the British people are more determined than ever to be worthy of their dead, to be worthy of their past, and with you to be no unworthy architects of a future in which war and tyranny shall be banished from the world for all time.

I believe that the wage-earners of this country are in favour of continuing the war and of backing up our boys at the front. They are, therefore, in favour of the application of compulsory service, as there is no other way of backing up our soldiers.

Mr. VERVILLE: How long after United States declared war was this famous committee named?

Mr. CROTHERS: I could not tell my hon. friend. Perhaps he knows.

Mr. VERVILLE: I am asking my hon. friend.

Mr. CROTHERS: My hon. friend does not know; neither do I. I know that on May 27 last this resolution was adopted.

Mr. GRAHAM: It could not have been very long after war was declared.

Mr. CROTHERS: Why?

Mr. GRAHAM: Because the United States declared war only recently.

Mr. CROTHERS: This resolution was adopted by the British Workmen's League.

Mr. VERVILLE: I was asking about the United States. How long after war was declared in the United States was this famous committee named?

Mr. CROTHERS: I do not remember; very shortly after.

Mr. VERVILLE: I think it was before.

Mr. CROTHERS: No, I do not think it was before. For some time compulsory service was distasteful to the people of England, but they finally found that conscription was absolutely necessary in order that the ranks at the front should be filled. Every European nation participating in this war has adopted compulsory service. United States, that great democracy to the south of us, has adopted compulsory service. Away back in 1865, fifty years ago, at the time of the Civil War, they had compulsion. Abraham Lincoln made many drafts upon the people for military purposes during the course of that war. It was implied in August, 1914, that the time might come when compulsory service would be necessary in Canada. Let me repeat what the Prime Minister said at that time:

Let me say that while we are now upborne by the exaltation and enthusiasm which come in the first days of a national crisis, so great that it moves the hearts of all men, we must not forget that days may come when our patience and our fortitude will be tried to the utmost. In those days let us see to it that no heart grow faint and that no courage be found wanting.

These are the days that are upon us now. Are any hearts growing faint? The right hon. leader of the Opposition thinks that the hearts of the people are growing faint. He says that while they were all in favour of going into the war at its commencement in August, 1914, and of continuing it to the end, they have changed their minds; they want a referendum. The right hon. gentleman wants to ask a slacker in British Columbia or in Quebec whether he wants to be coerced into fighting. What sort of answer would he get from such persons? It is an insult to the people to suggest that they want to quit at this hour. Everybody hates a quitter; everybody admires perseverance; everybody admires the person, party or Government who will stand up for what is right in days of stress as well as in days of peace and plenty. The proposal that has been made would, if accepted, declare to the world that we are quitters. It would be an everlasting shame to the people of Canada if anything of that kind should occur.

Some picayune criticism has been made of the Government in connection with this war. Certainly mistakes have been made; the man who makes no mistakes, makes nothing. On the whole, the people of Canada have done well in recruiting. We are proud of the work that most of the men have done; of some we are not so proud. We are proud of the work that all the women have done. We are proud of the young men who have gone to the front and have covered themselves with glory for the sake of humanity. But we are not living in the past. The question is not what has been done, but what shall we now do? The question is not whether our sires fought valiantly at Queenston Heights or Chateauguay—some people think we should live on that as long as possible—but whether the sons of those sires have inherited the heroism and the valour that enabled their fathers to do credit to themselves and to their country on the field of battle. If the spirits of our sires who fought at Queenston Heights and Chateauguay hover over us to-day; God grant that they do not look down upon any degenerate or recreant sons.

A very extraordinary position was taken by the member for Edmonton. I am bound to say that I was amazed at the position which he took while speaking in this debate. When the hon. member was making some objection to the details of this Bill—and he, an ex-minister of the Crown, knows perfectly well that at this stage it is only the principle of the Bill that should be discussed, and that the details may be altered in committee—the Prime Minister said to him:

I really did say, in introducing the Bill and again to-day, that we would be very glad to have suggestions which would improve the Bill. If my hon. friend is so strongly opposed to the provision which we have suggested, would he be good enough to give us the benefit of his suggestion as to what the provision should be?

The Prime Minister says to my hon. friend (Mr. Oliver), an ex-minister of the Crown, a man who has been in public life for many years: This Bill is not like the laws of the Medes and the Persians; it may be amended in detail when it reaches the committee stage; you object to some of the details; what do you suggest instead? This is the reply of that statesman from Edmonton:

Mr. Oliver: Really I do not appreciate that as being my function.

No; a great war is on; our boys at the front are dying by the thousands; hundreds of them are coming home as cripples, and yet the hon. member does not deem it any portion of his duty to make suggestions to improve a Bill, to the details of which he objects. He says:

That is the business of the Government of this country.

I think he said on another occasion that it was his business to criticise, to find fault. It is apparently his business to do nothing to help the Government or to help the boys at the front, if his doing nothing would incidentally help his political party. The hon. member says:

That is the business of the Government of this country. They have brought down a Bill, they are challenging public opinion upon it; they have a right to do so. My business in this House is to show how and where this measure falls short of being in the best interests of the country, if in my judgment it does fall short. Having done that, I have discharged my responsibility.

And he continues:

And I again point out that this Government has brought forward a measure here, under the pretense that it is a measure that shall be a fair measure of conscription, and it is a measure that does not contain within its four corners the first elements or fairness in the matter of conscription.

Sir Robert Borden: What would be fair?

The Prime Minister asks this old Parliamentarian, this old politician, an ex-minister of the Crown: What would be fair? The answer is:

Mr. Oliver: I am saying to the Prime Minister that that is his business.

The hon. member says to the Prime Minister: That is your business; I will not say one word to help out the boys at the front; I will not say one word to make more perfect this legislation that aims at compelling men to go to the front; that is your business; if I should say one word that would make the Bill more perfect, it might by some circuitous route confer some benefit or advantage upon the Government of the day. Therefore, partisan as my hon. friend is, he lets the boys at the front suffer; he is willing to let this Bill go through imperfect if may be: he lets the people of the country be deprived of his experience, because if he offered any suggestion, it might turn out to be advantageous to the Government of the day. Well the people of this country do not appreciate such conduct.

Mr. OLIVER: Perhaps the minister will be good enough to say what I should have done.

Mr. CROTHERS: I am glad that my hon. friend was moved off his seat anyway. He must have thought what the Bill should be when he pointed out that it was defective. Therefore, it was his duty, not perhaps as a dyed-in-the-wool partisan, but as a citizen of Canada interested in our success in this war, in the welfare of our boys at the front and of those who may hereafter be chosen to go to the front, to offer suggestions which would improve the Bill. I am sorry to say that his attitude for the past three years has been as I have described. I am sorry to say also that I can look at others opposite who have adopted the same attitude. In their opinion, partisanship is the more important, to injure the party in power and to secure advantage to themselves than to advance a measure designed for the benefit of those brave men who are fighting our battles. I believe, with the hon. member for Edmonton, that compulsory service, under a selective draft, is better than the other method.

Mr. OLIVER: I beg the minister's pardon. I did not speak in favour of the selective draft; I spoke in favour of compulsory service.

Mr. CROTHERS: I am glad that my hon. friend sees that fine distinction. He would perhaps prefer the Militia Act that was in force for many years while he was in power. He is in favour of taking men from eighteen to sixty years of age under the Militia Act in preference to the method adopted under the Military Service Act. I believe the people of this country want their representatives in this House to use their experience and ability in the interest of prosecuting the war successfully. I think they expect the Prime Minister, the leader of the Opposition, and every other hon. member to carry out the pledge made on the 15th of August, 1914. Each hon. member should carry it out, and his constituents should carry out that pledge made on their behalf. I ask every hon. member: Are your constituents doing their fair share, according to what they have promised to do?

Mr. OLIVER: On behalf of my constituents, I can say that they are.

Mr. CROTHERS: I said that.

Mr. OLIVER: I would like to compare them with my hon. friend's constituents, if he is willing to make a comparison.

Mr. CROTHERS: I am perfectly willing to make a comparison, but I did my hon. friend the justice a few minutes ago of saying that I believed he had carried out his promise.

Mr. OLIVER: I beg your pardon, I did not know that.

Mr. CROTHERS: I will not detain the House any longer. I sincerely hope every hon. member will vote in favour of conscription. Conscription is the only logical action to take; it is absolutely necessary unless we are going to allow our men at the front to be bowled out. It is just possible that it may not be necessary to put conscription into force as recruiting is reviving, as the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) has mentioned. Conscription is in force in the United States; it is in force in every country in Europe, and it is necessary to have it here unless we are going to break down and be compelled to bow our heads in shame before the civilized world.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (North Cape Breton): Mr. Speaker, when the Minister of Labour commenced his speech I really thought he was serious and was going to deal with a serious question in a serious manner, as ministers of the Crown are expected to deal with the business of this country in an enlightened and serious manner. The minister did not go very far into his speech when I was reminded of the old Scotch divine who spoke only Gaelic, and who was rather unexpectedly called upon to preach an English sermon. This divine took as his text: "The Devil goeth about like a roaring lion seeking whom he may devour."

Mr. CROTHERS: That is a chestnut. Give us something fresh.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am glad there are other nuts besides the one the hon. member is rubbing. This Scottish divine, in his Presbyterian way, divided his text into three parts: Who, the devil, he was; where, the devil, he was going; and what, the devil, he was roaring about. Those were the questions which suggested themselves to me when the Minister of Labour was on his feet. He tells us that we shall be known by our fruits. If that test were applied to the minister he would be a wanderer and a stranger on the earth, and nobody would know him. He would certainly be like that accursed fig tree at the root of which the axe was placed, and which bore no fruit henceforth for ever.

Mr. KYTE: He is already marked.

Mr. McKENZIE: The minister said at the start that he did not want to delay the House and would only speak for a few minutes. I am not complaining about the time he took, but if he would only pass around a little brief saying that he was going to read the speeches of the Prime Minister and the leader of the Opposition on the war we could look these things up for ourselves and save the expense of having them duplicated on Hansard. It would have taken him about the same time to read the 119th Psalm, and we should have had no objection to his reading that in preference to the speeches of the Prime Minister and the leader of the Opposition, because in reading those he was simply repeating facts the truth of which nobody questions.

He also told us that everybody hated a quitter. Perhaps so, but it depends upon when he is quitting, and how. To judge by the physiognomies of hon. gentlemen opposite when the Minister of Labour sat down, I think they preferred a quitter to one who kept on threshing old straw and beating the air. Is there anybody in this House, or in this country, who says that we are not in favour of Canada's participation in this war? Is there anybody in this House or out of it who takes a different position to-day from the position we took on the 14th of August, 1914? When the war broke out hon. gentlemen on this side of the House were in favour of Canada taking part in it and standing by the Mother Country, of which we are all so proud; that was the position we took in August, 1914, and that is our position to-day. But the Minister of Labour talks to us as if we were a kindergarten class, and tells us what our duty is and what we ought to be and do. We on this side of the House know what our duty is just as well as the Minister of Labour and those who sit around him, and are just as loyal and determined to carry on to the end.

The Minister of Labour speaks as if the leader of the Opposition had departed from the attitude he took at the beginning of the war. Nothing of the kind. Anything that was said by the Prime Minister or the leader of the Opposition in the war session of 1914 must be read in the light of conditions existing at that time. We had then a voluntary system. For nearly fifty years nobody in this country had ever thought of compulsory service, and nobody ever said anything about compulsory service in the war session of 1914. Everything that was then said in regard to the force we expected to put in the field and the support they should receive had reference to the voluntary system; that was the system under which we intended to fight. To suggest that the leader of the Opposition would have anything to say against Canada's standing behind the Mother Country is simply absurd. Any one who talks that way should be reminded of the history of Canada in connection with matters of this kind. We all remember what took place in 1884 when the great Tory chief, Sir John A. Macdonald, was in charge of the destinies of this country. England was then at war, and suggested to Sir John A. Macdonald that it would be well to have assistance from Canada along certain lines. Did Sir John A. Macdonald give any assistance to the Mother Country at that time? Nothing of the sort. He turned the suggestion down cold. Not a ship, not a man, not a dollar was sent from Canada at that time, but Sir John and his supporters in Ontario were never accused of being disloyal because of his action at that time. It remained for Sir Wilfrid Laurier when the Boer war broke out in 1899 to make the great departure of sending soldiers from this country to fight the battles of Great Britain. It is not very likely that the man who took upon himself the responsibility of first sending soldiers from this country to fight the battles of Great Britain, in the face of what might be regarded as strenuous opposition in some parts of this country, will go back on the precedent which he himself created, and behind which the people of this country firmly stood. The Minister of Labour said that nothing further could be done to support our soldiers at the front unless this Bill was passed. I would expect him to have some knowledge of the facts when he makes a statement of that kind, but when he was asked by the hon. member for St. John how recruiting was going, he knew nothing whatever about it. He did not know that 8,000 men had been recruited in Canada in the last month, yet only the moment before he had been proclaiming to the world that the voluntary system had fallen down in this country and nothing further could be expected from it. The next question he was asked was why recruiting for the artillery had been stopped in this country. It is reported that in Great Britain and France they have more artillery men than they require, but the hon. gentleman knew nothing about it, and all he did was to launch a volume of words upon this House and country without knowing what he was talking about. If it is a fact that we can get more artillery men in Canada than we have room for, it does not look as if the voluntary system had fallen down in this country.

Nobody knows better than the minister knows—or ought to know—that there is no better arm going to the front than that of the artillery. If we have as much artillery as we require—and it is said that we have and that of the very best kind—why should the minister seek to impress upon us the belief that recruiting by the voluntary system has fallen down? I submit that the facts go to show that if the voluntary system were given a fair show we should get all the men we want, and we should retain the pride, and dignity, and honour, of having done our part under the voluntary system and not by compulsion.

The Minister of Labour told us that labour was in favour of the war. He read letters from a certain committee, but he knew nothing about them, their position, or their tendencies, and so what he said on that point was perfectly in line with the rest of his speech. Nobody need be disturbed by any of the noise we have heard this afternoon in connection with conscription or voluntary service. I think it only right to remind the hon. gentleman (Mr. Crothers) that as Minister of Labour he has not done much to keep the labour element, which is a very important element, in proper shape for the service they have to do at home, or in proper temper for the service they might do their country at the front. The record of the hon. gentleman in connection with labour questions shows that he does nothing at all with regard to any problem until it is too late—he is rather of the post mortem variety. A few days ago we had a gathering of labour leaders in the city of Ottawa, the men who are supposed to know the conditions of labour, and the feelings of labour, with regard to the Government and with regard to the war. These men presented to the Prime Minister a memorial setting forth what they thought of the action of the Minister of Labour and of the Government generally. The contractors for munitions are under Government control and subject to Government regulation—for this we have the word of the Prime Minister. This being so, the relations existing between labour and these contractors should be governed, and governed as far as possible to the satisfaction of labour. The memorial that these labour leaders presented was brought to the attention of the House by the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Kyte). So far the allegations made have not been denied, but, on the other hand, we do not hear that anything has been done to improve the conditions under which labour is carried on. As I am following the Minister of Labour, I think it only right to present to the House the statement of the labour men. I hope there is still prospect of the minister doing something about it, even though of a post mortem character. I put this in Hansard in the hope that more attention will be paid to it and some remedy found for the evils complained of:—

1. Violation of sanitary requirements—gross negligence in regard to the protection of the health of the workers, in camp and plant construction.

2. Lowering the wage standards already established in different sections of the Dominion.

3. Elimination of the eight hour day and the introduction of the 10, 12 and 14 hour day, and seven-day week.

4. The unnecessary dilution of labour by the introduction of female labour, before proper steps have been taken to utilize available skilled mechanics.

5. Where dilution has occurred no general effort has been made to maintain the same standard wages as received by the men.

6. Substitution of cheap, semi-skilled labour from rural districts for construction work, because of their willingness to accept less than the Trades Union rates.

7. A declared policy of refusing to recognize Trades Union representatives in determining the wages and hours on contracts let by them.

8. Challenging Trades Union officials to obtain reasonable conditions by use of their organized power instead of through negotiations which would result in strikes.

The unanimous conclusion was reached that the time had arrived for the re-organization of this board on the basis of equal representation of labour with the employing interests.

We therefore ask that you endorse the conclusion arrived at by forwarding a letter to Premier Borden, House of Commons, Ottawa, and to the federal representatives from your constituency. Give this immediate attention. It is important.

These are the conditions of labour under the benign control and direction of the hon. gentleman who has just addressed the House. By dealing with these matters, he would be doing something calculated to assist in bringing more men to the support of the country and towards making the voluntary system more popular. I need hardly tell you, Mr. Speaker, that it is highly important that the people of this country should be as well treated and as carefully looked after as possible, if we expect them to be in a proper frame of mind to volunteer to meet the public demands made upon them in connection with the war, or any other public matter.

The hon. minister has spent a great deal of time in proving that this law is not new, that it is merely the law that has been on the statute-books for the last fifty years. If so, why then introduce this new Bill? If it is the same law, a law which has produced good results, with which the people are contented, and which has raised no trouble or obstacle in the minds of the people, why does the Prime Minister introduce this new measure causing trouble, dissatisfaction and fear among the people? Is this of the nature of a war dance? We know that savage tribes, when engaged in war, hold war dances to get up their fighting blood. But there was no necessity to stir the blood of the people of Canada after the fashion of an Indian war dance. I trust not; the old plan is always as necessary, and I trust we shall fall back upon it and that there will be no further trouble and no further question of the people with this new law.

When we said in 1914 that we would do everything we could in this war, and when we are saying to-day that we are willing to do everything we can do in this war, it must certainly be borne in mind that we are going to do everything we can do as a united people, that we are going to do everything that Canada can do as a nation, working together, every man from the Atlantic to the Pacific a Canadian, a true subject of the King, doing what, according to his best conscience and his best knowledge and his best understanding of his constitutional rights, thinks is his duty to do. And if we are going to introduce in Canada any other methods of carrying on the war or assisting in it, we are taking steps that are going to break up this country, and the end will be worse than the beginning. I assure you that the getting of 50,000 men or even 100,000 men in Canada, after we have broken up the ties of love and affection and good-will that are to-day binding together every nationality and province, if we smash Confederation in doing it, the Kaiser would be very much more pleased at the breaking up of Confederation than he would be afraid of the number of men we would so obtain. It is therefore up to those who are in charge of the Government of this country, to carry on the war, to help the war, to bring it to a satisfactory conclusion, along lines, that are not going to break up happy communities in the Dominion of Canada.

Hon. gentlemen opposite may think that I am not sincere in anything I say on this point, and that I am disposed to talk politics. But there is an hon. gentleman sitting among themselves who, until a few days ago, occupied the high position of a minister of the Crown and who was honoured by the Prime Minister by being picked out from the large number of good followers he had about him from Quebec and made Secretary of State for Canada. That hon. gentleman sent a letter to the Prime Minister a few days ago just on this point, and in order that hon. gentlemen opposite and on my own side of the House may know that that gentleman concurs exactly in what I have stated, I will read his letter to the Prime Minister:

Dear Sir Robert,

On the 18th of May last when you acquainted the House with your intention presenting a Bill providing for compulsory service during the present war.

From the moment you submitted your intention to the Council, I drew your attention to its extreme gravity and to the consequences which, to my mind, would follow.

I have, however, thought it my duty in these critical times, to abstain from any hasty decision, as long as I could entertain the hope that these considerations, as well as the very serious events which were meanwhile developing, would induce you to modify, if not to completely change your decision.

I cannot now expect that my hope will be realized; you have in fact decided to introduce, without further delay, your proposed Bill, and have it passed during this session.

Therefore, I feel bound to sever my connection with the Cabinet on this question.

I have always thought, and do yet think, that the best interests of Canada make it a duty for this country to give to the cause of the allies its most generous support. But to do this, I cannot concur in any measure which in my estimation imperils national unity. The proposed law, I have every reason to fear, threatens to destroy this unity, and to give rise throughout the country to deep internal divisions of long duration, and even detrimental to the needs of the present moment. Indeed it is better to keep the country united in the present effort than to attempt a mightier one at the cost of national disruption.

I, therefore, find myself unable to approve of the intended law, and the only course open to me is to offer my resignation as a minister of the Crown.

That, Sir, is carrying out precisely what my own view is on that point and connecting that up with what I have already said, I think it is the duty of this country, and that we are doing our full duty, when, in the first instance, we exhaust every legitimate effort to get the number of men we want by the voluntary system, and give the voluntary system a fair show. If finally it is proved to us that that cannot be carried out, it will then be time enough to resort to the compulsory system.

The Minister of Labour talked lightly of our duty in the matter of conscription. I want to bring home to this House and to this minister that it is not a light matter to force anybody to go to the front, and perhaps be shot. I have, perhaps, as much interest as any man in this House in the winning of the war. I do not come to this House with any handicap that anybody can throw slurs at my loyalty or the country or people from which I sprang. I stand upon as good a foundation from the standpoint of loyalty and the history of my people, as any man in this House. Therefore I do not fear any taunts or slurs being thrown at me in connection with my loyalty to my King and country. But, at the same time, there is a duty devolving upon us to accomplish this end, and to accomplish it in the easiest possible way, and in the way that will bring least responsibility and heart rending to ourselves and to the country in days to come. A young man may be married, with two or three children around him. He volunteers to go to the front. That is his own act, we are glad that he does it, and we pray that he may return happy to his wife and family. But if anything happens to him, if he is shot down and leaves a widow and two or three little orphans, we have not any great responsibility about it, in a way, because he is a volunteer, he went himself, and it has been his own free voluntary act that has brought that condition about. But if we send an officer of the Crown into that house and tear that man away from his wife and his children and send him to the front and he is shot, it comes home to us with trying feelings indeed that we are responsible for sending the officer after him; we are responsible for sending him to the front; we are responsible for throwing his children upon the mercy of the cold charity of this country, and leaving his wife a widow. These are the conditions that come about in this country, and must of necessity come about, by a compulsory system. Let me impress upon the House and upon you, Sir, that it is only when there is the clearest possible evidence that there is no escaping from compulsory service, that it should be adopted in this or any other country. I submit to you that if the voluntary system had received a fair trial and a fair start in this country, there would be no necessity whatever to resort to means such as the effect of the Bill which is now before the House should it become law. I submit to you, Sir, that voluntary enlistment did not receive a fair show at the hands of our hon. friends. I submit to you that from the very beginning of the war, throughout every day and every month of it from the day of the declaration of war down to this day, hon. gentlemen opposite, who are supporters of the Government and who are members of the Government, were just as rigid in their party affiliations, and just as rigid in their dispensing of patronage, in connection with the war as in connection with anything else. And, that being the case, they created a cleavage in this country which they cannot very well overcome. They have made two camps, as far as their favourites, and advancement and promotion were concerned. They have given favours to their friends, and left nothing attractive to the other side. We have had appropriation after appropriation voted in this House, and we have had money Bills introduced by the Minister of Finance, and I have always taken opportunity, when a vote was passed, to say: I do not object to any moneys you are getting, but see to it that the money is used in the best interest of the country, and give up your partisan dispensing of patronage. I have had promises that that would be done, but never any fulfilment of those promises. That has been the state of affairs from the commencement of the war to the present time. It is possible, Mr. Speaker, for a man to create dissensions and dissatisfactions in his own house. If a man has six boys, and he gives three of them boots and clothing, and treats them lavishly, although perhaps not better than they ought to be treated, but he lets the other three go barefooted, with no proper food, and does not look after them properly, could it be expected that the same service, fealty, love and affection would be accorded to the parent by the three neglected sons that he would expect from those upon whom he lavishes his goods and his love? That would not be natural. That is the way this country has been treated by the Government. They have given their moneys, promotions, offices, advancement, and, if they could, would have given military crosses and knighthoods to the Tories, and they have left the Liberals out in the cold. I think it is a most marvellous thing that we obtained the result we did in this country under the voluntary system, judging by the way it was handled by hon. gentleman who had the responsibility of procuring enlistment and the conduct of the war generally. What say you as to the fairness of the way in which matters were conducted in this country by the Government themselves since the outbreak of the war, if we are to believe the correspondence—not merely stories—between the ex-Minister of Militia and the Prime Minister? That correspondence has been brought down, and is on the records of this House over the signature of the ex-Minister of Militia, and it shows that four long months had passed while he was trying to get the second contingent to the front, when it was just as necessary to send assistance to the boys in the trenches as it is now. That period elapsed with something like 40,000 or 50,000 men ready to be sent, but they were held. And why? Because they had no equipments? Not at all. Were they held because they were not trained and ready to take their places at the front? Not at all. They were held, Sir, because there was a faction in the Cabinet, fighting for graft, and wanting to get the money of the country, to apply it to their own purposes and the purposes of their friends.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. McKENZIE: Nothing could be more fiendish, and nothing or more deserving of crucifixion, if it were possible to invoke such a punishment in this country, of every man in the Cabinet who had anything to do with that nefarious act of holding up men for three months, because there was a wrangle in the Cabinet, as to who would get his hand deepest into the Treasury, or the fund to be obtained from the purchase of equipment furnished to these men. That statement is published and is a matter of record. It is official, as between the retiring minister and the Prime Minister, and it never has been denied. I will repeat what I stated in the presence of the Prime Minister and the Government, that, partisan as I am, I would not believe such a thing, if it came to me through the newspapers, or through sources of my own party, but when it comes over the signature of the Minister of Militia, who knows what is going on in the sanctum-sanctorum of the Government, I have nothing to do but believe it, until substantial evidence to the contrary is produced. As, such evidence has not been forthcoming, nothing remains but for the country to believe that the facts are just as they were presented, and that members of the Government were content to sit down for four months, bickering about how much money they could make, and permitting the boys at the front to be killed, while the support that should be sent to them, in the nature of forty or fifty thousand men, remained idle in this country, at a cost of twenty-five or thirty million of money, absolutely to no purpose. It would have been better for them to have voted some money between themselves, put it in the Estimates and let the country pay for it. There would be no trouble about their friends behind them forcing it through Parliament, and they could divide it up between them. That would show they had some manhood about them, instead of leaving the boys at the front exposed to death and danger, while they were squabbling over matters here. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce told us the other day that voluntary recruiting failed. If it failed, these are the hurdles on which it stumbled. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has never given us any explanation, and he is responsible for these things, just as much as any other minister of the Cabinet. So far, we have heard no word of explanation from him or anybody else. The ex-minister told us yesterday that it was a heresy, a doctrine that could not be sustained in this country, that one minister was responsible for the conduct of another, and that it was busybody practice on the part of a minister to interfere with another minister. That is not the constitution of this country. That is not the responsibility which is regarded in this country as devolving upon ministers. The ministers are themselves responsible.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Hear, hear.

Mr. McKENZIE: And the one is answerable to the other, and they are all answerable for the conduct of the Government. But yesterday we heard from the ex-minister this pernicious doctrine pronounced, and there was not a murmur of dissent from any gentleman on the Government benches. They accepted that proposition as being all right. I think they were so thoroughly scared of the hon. gentleman who has left the Cabinet that he can say what he likes and kick just as much as he pleases. Nobody will answer him, but they allow his statements to go unchallenged, all of them praying: Lord be merciful to us, because we have all sinned, and come short of thy glory, and if we allow the statements of this gentleman to pass without saying anything to him, it is possible he may leave us alone. That is the only reason I can advance why, when such a pernicious doctrine as that was propounded, that a minister had to be king of his own department and, that he could do just as he pleased, no answer was made to him. If the ex-Minister of Militia could have done as he pleased those four months of expensive and painful waiting would have been saved, and the men would have been sent to the front. But this pernicious system of mutual responsibility of members of the Government stood in his way, and, as far as I could see, every man on the Government benches said, amen.

These are matters which, as far as partnership is concerned, I desire to bring to the attention of the hon. gentleman who now leads the House (Sir George Foster). I am sure that hon. gentleman is not without influence in the cabinet. We are now in the midst of the war, and if those things were bad, if those blunders have been made, and if we have paid dearly for them, and are suffering on that account, there is certainly no logical reason why they should be continued.

Even at this fifty-ninth minute of the eleventh hour we ask the minister who is leading the House to take this matter in hand, to use his influence to prevent graft and to do away with the abuses resulting from political patronage. He told us long ago that these things were pernicious, that they were poisoning the very body politic of our country. Let him now see that everybody is treated fairly; that the cleavage which has taken place among the great masses of the people be done away with; that every man who wishes to join the military forces may realize that whether he is Grit or Tory he has friends in the Cabinet who will stand by him and give him a square deal. If all persons were treated on an equal basis things would be very different from what they are to-day.

You may ask me, Mr. Speaker, what is my authority for saying that partisanship has been rife. My authority is my own knowledge and my own eyes. In the counties of Cape Breton and Victoria we had and still have a battalion known as the 94th Highlanders. Though that battalion has not been asked to go to the front, it has been the means of organizing and training over 600 men who have gone to the front, some of whom have since died, many of whom are bravely serving their country in France and Flanders. That battalion was in charge of its old officers, Colonel McRae, Major Gillies, and Major McLean, first-class military men. A year ago or so, when the ex-Minister of Militia went to the county of Cape Breton he made a tour of those camps, accompanied by a couple of Tory spies. Of course, he was given the secret sign as to who was Grit and who was Tory. He was told that Major Gillies was a Grit, that Major McLean was a Grit; that Colonel McRae was not just as docile as he should be; that he was exercising some little will of his own; that he was not discharging men as he was asked to discharge them and that he would not take on some of the cripples that he was asked to take on. It was pointed out, therefore, that these men were thorns in the flesh of the Tory party, and should be put out of the way. What happened? After the ex-Minister of Militia returned to Ottawa, Major McLean, Major Gillies and Colonel McRae were dismissed; and to-day they are degraded and disgraced. No explanation for their dismissal was given; they were simply told to quit. When things like this get abroad, the men say: what is the good of being attached to the 94th Highlanders? What is the good of giving our services? These three officers were attached to the battalion for twenty-five years. Simply because a Tory heeler, a local M.P.P. for Cape Breton county, went round with the minister and pointed them out, they were branded for death, and death was meted out to them. That, Sir, is the condition of things in my county; that is one of the reasons why I say that partisanship has been rampant in Canada since the war began. As to the time before the war I find no fault. I am a partisan myself, and if, in time of peace, party business is carried on decently along party lines, I have no objection., But in war times, when all persons should be treated fairly, patronage should have no part in the management of the affairs of the country, particularly those which have to do with the prosecution of the war.

I may be asked what further evidence I have. Men are appointed to positions from day to day; do you see any Grits appointed? Far be it from hon. gentlemen opposite to appoint a Grit, no matter what ability he may possess. A Fuel Controller has been appointed by the Department of Labour. With the gentleman who was appointed—a former member of this House—I have no fault to find; but he is a partisan of the deepest dye. I do not know where I could put my hand on a stronger partisan—that is, if I may judge from his conduct while he was in this House. We have a Food Controller. Is he a Grit? One would almost think that the Government would reason this way: we have appointed a Tory as a Fuel Controller; we will appoint a Liberal as Food Controller. That will please the Liberals, and show them that we desire to be fair. But that would never do. The Government went to Ontario and found this man Hanna. I suppose he is a good man, but he is a strong Tory. His partisanship and Toryism were brought to the attention of the country during many months—perhaps not for good reasons; but he is known in the Maritime Provinces as a man whose zeal for party has sometimes got him into financial difficulty. These Tory officials go around the country with orders to call upon other Tories less influential, perhaps, than themselves, and with less sense of responsibility. Whatever is done is done through the agency of partyism, from start to finish. When there is a suggestion that a coalition Government be formed we are told that we should all come together and set aside party considerations. If that spirit is abroad, and if the members of the Government want to give any evidence of their good faith they should make some appointments along the lines that I have indicated. But they would be very sorry to do that, because they would then be departing from the principle to which they will adhere to the end. I do not know that it is worth my while giving further evidence of the baneful effect of partisanship upon recruiting. Although the ex-Minister of Militia has denied any such partisanship, the evidence is so profuse, prolific and overwhelming that we must accept it in preference to the denial of the ex-Minister of Militia.

On January 1, 1916, the Prime Minister made a proclamation that Canada would enrol 500,000 men. About that I have nothing to say; the action has already been criticised and fully debated. But when the Prime Minister made that proclamation he knew what the law was; he knew what the practice was; he knew by what means the people expected these 500,000 men to be recruited. And we have it on the authority of the ex-Minister of Militia that a few months afterwards, in March or April of the same year, a further proclamation went out to the Minister of Militia of that day telling him to let up on recruiting; not to put forth any further effort in that regard. If voluntary recruiting fell down, that was another hurdle that was thrown in its way by the leader of the Government himself. When the ex-Minister of Militia referred to this matter in the House yesterday I did not hear any murmur of complaint either from the Prime Minister or from any person sitting on the other side.

I have already put on Hansard some of the things that were said by the ex-Minister of Militia. So far we have heard no denial of these charges, some of which are very grave. He charges the Government and its officials with being under the influence of German gold.

That may be, I do not know; but it would strike me as most extraordinary that ministers of the Crown, unless they were under some disability or under some control of the ex-Minister of Militia, would permit him to use language of that kind if they could well contradict him. Those are things which are well calculated to lessen confidence and cause recruiting to fall down, as has been described by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. If it be true that this fighting has been going on in the Cabinet; that the ministers cannot get along together; that the outgoing Minister of Militia had no confidence in the Minister of War Overseas or in the Minister of Finance, and that there was a general broil all around, how can they expect the people of this country to have confidence in any of them, either separately or collectively? That being the case, and the evidence of it being that this gentleman was sent about his business and that he has been telling abroad and plainly what his ideas were, why he went out and what he did with the other ministers while he was with them, and no one denying his statements, we have a right to believe these stories the ex-Minister of Militia has been telling.

A great deal of objection is raised to the taking of a plebiscite; it is said that this question should not be submitted to the people. The Minister of Labour says that we are insulting the people by speaking to them about a plebiscite, but there is a very good authority to the contrary. We were all delighted the other day to see in this House Mr. Balfour, that excellent representative of English ideas and politics. When the House of Lords turned down the Lloyd George Budget and said that they would not pass it until it was referred to a decision of the people, there was a good deal of talk that that course should not be taken. Mr. Balfour, however, is reported in the English House of Commons as saying:

> Why should the people object to this course? Why are you told that you are insulted, that the Lords insulted you? It is a most extraordinary thing that the House of Lords should insult you by simply asking you your opinion.

That is what Mr. Balfour said about the plebiscite to which the House of Lords sought to have that question referred at that time, and I would not find it easy to understand how it is that myself or any other member of this House is insulting the judgment of the people of this country by asking their opinion on a question of this kind.

When we were elected over five years ago, there was no talk of war. We had on the statute book for fifty years a law in connection with the militia under which it was always regarded as optional whether men went to war or not. There was no war in sight at the time, and we have from the people who sent us here no mandate along that line at all. At this hour of the day, when the five years have expired, when we are in a sixth year which is not constitutional, and which is only a term that we have given ourselves by our own act, and when we are representing only ourselves in this House and not the people by the voice of the people, it is only fair and just, when a new question of this kind is coming up for decision and judgment, and when we have no mandate from the people on this point, that the people should be called upon to lead the way as to what they want done on this question. There is no question in the world about the people being behind us in whatever we do to bring this war to a successful issue. At the same time, when there is evidently no great hurry, so far as the Government is concerned, there is no excuse why we should not submit this matter to the people. One would gather from some of the speeches made on the other side of the House that there is a great hurry about this matter; that it should be forced along very hurriedly; that it is a great shame to delay it for one minute, and that the law is to be put into force immediately. I find on the Order Paper this notice, dated May 23:

> Sir Robert Borden—The following proposed resolution:—
> Resolved,—That an humble address be presented to His Most Excellent Majesty the King, in the following words:
>
> To the King's Most Excellent Majesty: > Most Gracious Sovereign:
>
> We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of Canada, in Parliament assembled, humbly approach Your Majesty praying that you may graciously be pleased to give your consent to submit a measure to the Parliament of the United Kingdom, to amend the British North America Act, 1867, in the manner following, or to the following effect:
>
> "An Act to amend the British North America Act, 1867."
>
> Be it enacted by the King's Most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords, Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, as follows:
>
> 1. Notwithstanding anything in the British North America Act, 1867, or in any Act amending the same, or in any Order in Council, or terms or conditions of union, made or approved under the said Act, or under any Act of the Canadian Parliament, the term of the Twelfth Parliament of Canada is hereby extended until the Seventh day of October, 1918.

This resolution asking for an extension of Parliament until October, 1918, is, I presume, to be brought before the House of Commons. That means, of course, that if it goes through, we shall be here for another year after October 1917. The Prime Minister has said in this House—and he has said it in the negotiations for a coalition Government—that he is willing that this Bill should not go into force until after a general election. The Government is certainly going to ask for an extension of Parliament, the end of which will be about a year and a half from now. After that, at some time, there will be an election, and according to the declaration of the Prime Minister, after that will come a proclamation bringing this measure into force. Therefore, we have in prospect an extension of Parliament of a year and a half at least, a general election, and a vague and indefinite idea that at some time in the dim future a proclamation will be issued by the Governor in Council bringing this measure into force. There can therefore be no hurry about this matter; there is plenty of time, and if there is such an abundance of time as nearly two years before the Government has any intention of bringing this measure into force, the question of haste is not the reason why this matter cannot be submitted to the judgment of the people.

So far as the opinion of hon. gentlemen opposite is concerned, have we any precedent for this thing? It is not very long since the attitude we took upon the Naval Bill was at issue in this country, and when we began to deal with that matter, we were a new Parliament with all the seats filled. The resolution out of which the Naval Act originated was introduced by the hon. member, who is now the Minister of Trade and Commerce, on the 29th of March, 1909, when we were just fresh from the people, a general election having taken place in the fall of 1908. That resolution was introduced and the Bill passed through Parliament, and steps were being taken to implement the will of Parliament in regard to it.

Compare the importance of that question with the measure before the House to-day. In 1909 it was simply a question of building ships, simply a question of spending money for a useful purpose. We were not touching the property of any person; we were not depriving the wife of her husband, the mother of her son, or the child of its father. We were not dealing with any sacred, civil or religious rights. All that was involved was the expenditure of money for the building of ships. But the measure before us to-day involves the sending of the sons and husbands and fathers in this country to the trenches where they may be shot down. It surely requires no time to bring home forcibly to every man in this country that the question now before the House is much more important and far-reaching than the naval question of 1911. Nevertheless, hon. gentlemen opposite clamoured on that occasion for a referendum, and refused to have anything to do with the Naval Act until the people were consulted. What was the situation then? On the 29th March, 1909, the present Minister of Trade and Commerce, then the member for North Toronto, moved in the House of Commons a resolution practically as follows (a few minor changes being subsequently made in the wording):

> The House is of opinion that under the present constitutional relations between the mother country and the self-governing dominions the payment of regular and periodical contributions to the Imperial treasury for naval and military purposes would not, as far as Canada is concerned, be the most satisfactory solution of the question of defence. The House will cordially approve of any necessary expenditure designed to promote the speedy organization of a Canadian Naval Service in co-operation with and in close relation to the Imperial Navy, along the lines suggested by the Admiralty at the last Imperial Conference, and in full sympathy with the view that the naval supremacy of Britain is essential to the security of commerce, the safety of the Empire, and the peace of the world. The House expresses its firm conviction that whenever the need arises, the Canadian people will be found ready and willing to make any sacrifices that are required to give to the Imperial authorities the most loyal and hearty co-operation in every movement for the maintenance of the integrity and honour of the Empire.

When the Naval Bill was introduced by the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier for the implementing of the above resolution, Sir Robert Borden, then leader of the Opposition, on the 3rd February, 1910, moved the following resolution (Hansard 1909-10, p. 2991):

> That no permanent policy should be entered upon involving large future expenditures of this character until it has been submitted to the people and has received their approval.

In support of that resolution, Sir Robert Borden spoke in part as follows (Hansard 1909-10, p. 2989):

> I venture to recall to my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) the reason which he gave in a speech delivered at Sherbrooke, in the Province of Quebec, in the month of January, 1900, that was after he had considered his attitude in regard to the participation of this country in the South African war. His words are as follows: "We believe it our duty as a British colony to take part in the war and permit 2,000 Canadian volunteers to enlist in the English army and to fight for the mother country. We did it because we believed it our duty to do it, and in response to the unanimous sentiments of the people of this country. We are a free country. Ours is a constitutional Government, and our duty is to put into execution the popular will, and the moment the popular will was known to us we had that duty to discharge and we discharged it of our free will. There was no power to constrain us to act as we did, but in the plenitude of our legislative independence we had the right to reply to the popular will." I would invite my right hon. friend to-day to respond again to the popular will; and the will of the country to-day is that these different proposals ought to be submitted to the people, and the people ought to be permitted to pass upon them before any permanent policy of this kind is engaged in. I think there is a great deal to be said in favour of that course. I am as strong as any man in this country in the belief that it is the duty of Canada to participate upon a permanent basis in the defence of this Empire, and to do our reasonable share in that regard, but I say that to attempt to force a policy of this kind upon the people of this country without giving them an opportunity to say "yea" or "nay" in regard to it would be one of the worst mistakes that could be made by any man who really favoured that policy.

The Prime Minister then took the view that it would be one of the worst mistakes to force upon the people a policy on which they had not had an opportunity to say yea or nay. There voted for that resolution moved by Sir Robert Borden, Messrs:

Armstrong, Arthurs, Parker, Barnard, Best, Blain, Borden (Halifax), Boyce, Bradbury, Bristol, Broder, Burrell, Campbell, Chisholm (Huron), Cowan, Crocket, Crothers, Curry (Simcoe), Daniel, Doherty, Donnelly, Edwards, Elson, Fraser, Goodeve, Gordon (Nipissing), Haggart (Lanark), Haggart (Winnipeg), Henderson, Harrow, Hughes, Jameson, Kidd, Lake, Lalor, Lancaster, Lennox, Lewis, Macdonnell, McCall, McCarthy, Madden, McGrath, Marshall, Meighen, Middlebro, Northrup, Owen, Perley, Porter, Price, Reid (Grenville), Rhodes, Roche, Russell, Schaffner, Sexsmith, Sharpe (Liskeard), Sharpe (Ontario), Smythe, Sproule, Stanfield, Staples, Stewart, Taylor (Leeds), Taylor (New Westminster), Thoburn, Thornton, Wallace, White (Renfrew), Wilcox (Essex), Wilson (Lennox & Addington), Worthington, Wright.

That was the opinion of that army of gentlemen who think we should now be insulting the people if we asked them for their opinion of this measure. The present Minister of Labour was among those who voted for the resolution. He took the view that the people should be consulted on the question of building ships, which only involved the purchase of some hemlock and steel rivets and so on. Now he says it would be an insult to get the people's opinion on a measure the object of which is to drive our men to the cannon's mouth. It is remarkable how one's geographical position changes one's mind. I do not think I could find any better support for the argument for a referendum than the resolution I have just read. The present Minister of Trade and Commerce was practically the only hon. gentleman opposite who did not vote on that resolution. I remember the occasion well. The Minister of Trade and Commerce suddenly discovered that he had to go to Toronto, and although his train did not go until eleven he left the House at ten o'clock.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: What a memory the hon. gentleman has.

Mr. MURPHY: We all remember that.

Mr. McKENZIE: He certainly left with a great deal of alacrity that night, and that accounts for his name not being on the list I have just read, but I suppose that if he had had the opportunity he would have declared as paired members do "Had I voted I should have voted for the resolution."

From the facts I have placed before the House it is perfectly clear that we are doing no new thing when we ask that the people be consulted on this question. It has already been brought to the attention of the House that a referendum was taken in Australia, where conditions are entirely different from here. In Australia there is only one language, and practically only one people, holding probably the same ideas regarding constitutional rights. Nevertheless, it was thought proper to consult the people of Australia before a law was enforced interfering with their freedom of action. The ex-Secretary of State for Canada, a gentleman of standing in the province of Quebec and in the Conservative party also, or he would not have been Secretary of State, takes the same view, that it would be disastrous to attempt to enforce any law in this country which might have the result of bringing about a condition of affairs that could not be remedied for perhaps centuries to come.

There is no doubt about our ability to stand behind the men at the front and to do all that is necessary to maintain the glorious position which the Canadian people and the Canadian armies have taken in this war. We should get together and consult the people on this question, and we have the promise of the best men in the province of Quebec that the people of that province will cheerfully abide by the verdict of the people, no matter how Quebec province itself may vote.

As a humble member of this House I submit that the best course to take is the peaceful course. It may be a little slower, but it will keep this country united from the Atlantic to the Pacific for the one great purpose of winning the war. I submit that we should not attempt to force upon the people of this country a law which, although it may mean temporary glory and success for the Conservative party, will in its ultimate results be disastrous not merely to the Conservative party, but to the country as a whole.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) told us that we should give light and leading, that we should blaze a trail for the people in this matter. It is not our right to blaze a trail for anybody in a matter of this kind. It is for the fathers and mothers of boys to say whether they are in favour of passing this law; it is not for me as a member of this House, after the term of office for which I was elected has expired, and when I am here by the grace of my own vote,—it is not for me to say to fathers and mothers that their boys shall be rent from their hearts and sent to the trenches, with all the disastrous results that may follow. I wish to relieve myself from any such position by letting the people themselves pronounce judgment in this matter. Let that be done, and then, whether I am a member of this House or not, or in whatever position in life I may be, I shall do everything I can to carry out the law; I will give it all the support that a humble loyal subject of His Majesty can give in a great crisis such as this. For the present, I have no hesitation in taking the ground that this Bill should not pass until the people of Canada have an opportunity to declare their will regarding it, thus maintaining the unity of this country.

I am prepared, as a Scotchman and a Presbyterian, to stand behind my leader. He has led his party, whose membership covers the country from ocean to ocean, for the last thirty years; and we have no more reason to doubt his leadership now than we have had at any time in all the years gone by. I receive letters from Scotchmen, from Irishmen, from all classes and all denominations in my county. They do not ask me for any reasons about the course of the leader; they say, "Sir Wilfrid will steer the ship right." They have ample and absolute confidence in him. It is no small matter to break up a party. The party system is one of our institutions, and the Liberal party is a great and noble part of our party system. I belong to the Liberal party, and I deem it my duty, as it is my right, to seek to make it successful by using every effort from within the party to better it and advance its interests, and not to go outside its lines or to throw obstacles in its way. I have confidence in my leader; and I believe that I shall better serve the cause of the Liberal party, the cause of our country, and the best interests of the boys at the front by standing with my leader than by anything else that I can do at this juncture. We were told yesterday by the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) that the Presbyterian church had passed certain resolutions. I am not going to speak for any other church, but this I do say—that if there is one institution in this country more than any other that is a free institution, one that consults the will of the people, that institution is the Presbyterian church. That church had to deal with the question of the union of the churches. Its General Assembly might well have said: We are sent as representatives of the people; we are a Parliament and can pass this measure. But let me tell the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) that they resorted to a plebiscite; they sent the question down to every humble individual, every boy and every girl, every old man and old woman who belonged to that church was called upon for his or her opinion on that question. That is the course that was taken by the Presbyterian church in the case of a departure such as this is, and if the hon. member for Wellington wants to get any precedent or solace from the conduct of the Presbyterian church in matters of this kind he will find that they are believers in the will of the people, believers in consulting the people throughout before they take any new departure or break away from old conditions.

An hon. MEMBER: Did they not say they were in favour of conscription?

Mr. McKENZIE: All they said was that they were in favour of conscription provided there was conscription of wealth and material and all the rest as well. But that is not this Bill, and the resolution is not divisible; you cannot approbate and reprobate, as the old saying was; you cannot take the part of the resolution with which you are complying and ignore the other part. That resolution cannot be used at all unless it is used in its entirety, and I submit, therefore, that the resolution is no authority. Let me say that I hope and trust that the Government will come to better reasoning about this matter and will steer a course that will answer the purpose which no doubt they have in view of bringing the war to a successful issue and filling up our ranks; but let them do it without breaking up Confederation; do it without having civil war in this country; do it by having peace and unity and going forward hand in hand, as this great people have done in the past and as they hope to do in the future.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. WILLIAM S. MIDDLEBRO (North Grey): Mr. Speaker, as hon. members of this House know, I have not of recent years, troubled them much by expressing my opinions upon the various matters which have been brought before Parliament, but the Bill, the second reading of which is now before the House, is of such tremendous importance that I feel impelled to express my views on it. My hon. friend (Mr. McKenzie), who has just spoken, made several references to the question of a referendum. I do not purpose to follow him through the devious courses of his speech, but I should like to touch upon one or two questions with which he dealt, more particularly, as I observed, that at the conclusion of his speech he seemed to be heartily congratulated by some of his friends upon the argument he advanced in favour of a referendum. I should like to preface my remarks by saying that I desire that anything I say may be received in the most kindly spirit, which is certainly the spirit by which my remarks shall be inspired. The hon. gentleman from North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) cited as a precedent for submitting this Bill to the people by referendum, thus following the amendment of his honoured leader, that in 1910, when Sir Wilfrid Laurier introduced his Naval Service Bill for the establishment of a permanent naval policy for Canada, we on this side voted that the matter should be submitted to the people. I should like to point out to the hon. gentleman, in the first place, that he begs the question, because the passage of the Naval Service Bill in 1910 meant the enactment of an entirely new law on the statutes of Canada, while the present Bill is merely a variation of the law as it stands on our statute-books to-day. In other words we are not now introducing any new principle or any new law; we are simply taking a portion of the old law, and making it conformable to the circumstances and conditions now existing in our country. But, even if that were not so the hon. gentleman from Cape Breton has again begged the question in this respect. In 1912, when Sir Robert Borden initiated his policy for immediate contribution of money for the purpose of providing ships for the British Navy to meet the emergency, he did not ask the Government to go to the country. But in regard to the permanent policy, which the Government in 1910 proposed to impose upon the people of Canada, he urged that the Government should consult the people.

And so, to-day, we are not introducing any new permanent policy. Any man who looks within the four corners of the Bill can see that the present Bill is simply a temporary urgent measure to enable the selection of 100,000 men for a particular purpose, namely to fill up the gap and assist those gallant Canadians who voluntarily have gone overseas to defend the principles of freedom and justice. There is no parallel whatever between the two cases, because the only instance in which we voted for the submission of a question to the people was not by way of a referendum, but by way of an election in order to have the people approve of it. The only case in which we said that the matter should be submitted to the people was in regard to a permanent policy, such as the Naval Service Act introduced by Sir Wilfrid Laurier in 1910. Upon that question we said that they should consult the people by means of a general election, and, when we came into power, we took exactly the same ground. Then Sir Robert Borden proposed to provide three dreadnoughts as an emergency contribution to Great Britain, and he introduced and passed that through the Commons but was unable to put the measure through Parliament by reason of the action of the Senate. But at the same time he said:

> Then, Sir, as to the permanent policy, I think the people have a right to be consulted.

So that the argument of my hon. friend from Cape Breton falls to the ground for two reasons. This is not a new thing, and it is not a departure from the statutory law. It provides for the selection of 100,- 000 from hundreds of thousands who would be liable for service, under the law as it stands on the statutes to-day. The hon. member for Cape Breton said:

> There is no question whatever that the people are behind us in whatever we do to bring this war to a successful conclusion. There is no hurry.

If the people are behind us in whatever we do to carry this war to a succesful conclusion, what is the use of a referendum?

Those are his own words. I submit the whole argument my hon. friend attempted to deduce this afternoon in favour of a referendum to the people has been cut from under his feet by his own very words. The hon. member further said:

> If this Act is not new law, what is the use of introducing it?

Again my hon. friend has failed to grasp that practically the only object in introducing the present Bill was not to say that certain men should be liable for military service who were not before liable but it was to say that only the men of those classes specified should be liable for military service, and if we had these provisions giving power to make selection, in the old Act, no doubt the present Act would not have been introduced. But, that would not get us away from the fact that under the existing law the man power of Canada would be subject to conscription, if we may use that term, or to compulsion, just the same as under the present Bill.

Let me say a word or two with reference to the marks made by my hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux). I feel almost like apologizing to the House for attempting to controvert his contention. Notwithstanding all that has been said in this House, he seems to be of the opinion still, that there is no constitutional right or authority in Parliament to pass the Bill now before us. If that is the kind of doctrine he is preaching to the people of Quebec, I can easily understand why the people of that province have the opinion which they appear to have on this question to-day, and it is unfortunate that these people should be led to believe that what we are attempting to do in this House to-day is unconstitutional unless the question is first submitted to them. Perhaps the House will excuse me, if I, briefly, place my views before the House on the constitutionality of this question.

By the Revised Statutes of Canada, chapter 41, it is provided that "His Majesty may call out the militia, or any part thereof, for active service, either within or without Canada, at any time when it appears advisable to do so, by reason of war, invasion or insurrection, or danger of either, and the militiamen, when so called out for active service, shall continue to serve for at least one year from the date of their being called out for active service, if required to do so, or for any period longer that His Majesty appoints."

If we read the English language and take the ordinarily accepted meaning of words, then there is no doubt that the militia of Canada may be called out for active service either within or without Canada at any time under the above section, and under that Act "militia" is declared to include all male inhabitants 18 years old and under 60, and that all male inhabitants capable of bearing arms may be called out in case of a levee en masse.

It is a peculiar thing that by the Militia Act of 1904, while the words "for the defence of Canada" were added by the Laurier Administration, upon being questioned in the House as to whether or not the addition of those words made any difference in the meaning of the then existing Act, as to the rights or powers of the Government to call out the militia for service outside of Canada, it was admitted by the then Minister of Militia (Sir Frederick Borden), notwithstanding what my hon. friend from Rouville said the other day, that it made no change whatever in the law or the policy of the old Act. The Act, as then changed, reads as follows:

> The Governor in Council may place the militia, or any part thereof, on active service anywhere in Canada, and also beyond Canada for the defence thereof at any time when it appears advisable so to do by reason of any emergency.

The words "for the defence thereof" were added.

So that if what we are doing can be in any way construed as being for the defence of Canada, no hon. gentleman in this House has the right to say that we have not absolute authority to call out the militia of Canada for service in the Canadian Expeditionary Force abroad.

As to the interpretation of the words "for the defence of Canada," Sir Frederick Borden, as reported on page 6492 of Hansard, 1904, said that the insertion of these words constituted no change of policy. He said:

> There has been no change in policy. It seems to me that we have made clear in this section exactly what is understood as the object of a militia force in every country. In the mother country, and in every province of this Dominion prior to Confederation, this has been the rule. We are always able to meet times of stress and emergency. If it becomes necessary to send troops to assist the Empire at distant points, we always have the means at hand of doing so. Parliament can be called and a special force organized.

I believe that Sir Charles Fitzpatrick, then Mr. Fitzpatrick, was Minister of Justice at that time. He was afterwards appointed by the late Administration to the position of Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada. If my right hon. friend had such confidence in the ability of Sir Charles Fitzpatrick as to appoint him to the position of Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada, he should be willing to accept the opinion of that gentleman as to the constitutionality of this Act and as to our power to send troops out of Canada for the defence of our country. This is what Sir Charles Fitzpatrick said at that time:

The Governor in Council may send the militia of Canada out of Canada at any time when deemed necessary for the defence of Canada. If, in the opinion of the Governor in Council it should be necessary, because of a war going on in India, to send militia out there for the defence of Canada, they may, in the exercise of their discretion, do it, because they are the sole judges of what is necessary to be done in the defence of Canada.

The then Minister of Justice said that the Governor in Council were the sole judges of where troops should be sent in the defence of Canada; they might send them out of Canada as far, he said, as India. Then he went on to say:

But we do not think it advisable that that power should be absolutely and unrestrictedly in the hands of the Governor in Council. We think it advisable that the period during which they may exercise that power should be restricted and that Parliament should be called together and be consulted at the earliest opportunity. Parliament must be summoned in 15 days and then the whole matter will be in the hands of the people's representatives.

Is that not quite clear? The whole matter would then be in the hands of the people's representatives, whereas for the first 15 days it would be absolutely in the hands of the Governor in Council.

Mr. Bourassa and Mr. Lavergne, then loyal followers of the then Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) were in the House on that occasion and took part in the discussion. Upon the particular clause in question Mr. Bourassa expressed himself as follows:

I admit that an emergency may arise when the Government should have the power to call out the militia immediately. I do not dispute that; but suppose an occasion should arise on which Canada should be called upon to organize its militia and send a large portion of it outside of Canada when in the judgment of a large number of the people and the Parliament of Canada, it would be to the disadvantage of the country to have so large a number of troops sent out. Parliament should be the final judge of that question, and the Government should call Parliament to deal with that matter.

Later he said:

Before we proceed to another clause—

They were at that time dealing with the clause respecting the right to send the militia out of Canada.

—I wish to say that if there is to be a new clause making it obligatory on the Government to call Parliament within a fixed date, after having made use of the power granted under clause 77, then I shall not propose any amendment. But if there be such a new clause, I wish it to be distinctly understood that I shall be at liberty to move some amendment to this clause.

In accordance with the views of Mr. Bourassa, a clause was added making it obligatory for Parliament to meet within 15 days. As Mr. Bourassa said, Parliament would then be supreme.

Mr. Lavergne was in the House at that time, and interjected some remarks. He was present when Mr. Bourassa made his speech, and he made no objection to the doctrine and the principles there enunciated and laid down by Mr. Bourassa: that Parliament was supreme in this matter, and that we had the right to send troops outside of Canada for the defence of Canada. That is the position he took in 1904, when he was a member of the House and a supporter of Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

War was declared on the 4th of August, 1914. Parliament was summoned within 15 days, namely, on the 18th day of August. Between the 4th and the 18th the Governor in Council had authorized the raising of troops for service abroad, and in the August session of 1914 this action was unanimously ratified by Parliament. There can be no doubt, therefore, that according to the principles announced by Sir Frederick Borden, Sir Charles Fitzpatrick and Mr. Bourassa, the Canadian Expeditionary Force is abroad to-day by reason of authority contained in the statutes of the Dominion of Canada. These gentlemen all recognized that the defence of Canada might necessarily take place abroad. Will any man in this House say that our first and most effective lines of defence to-day are not those in Flanders and France? If our soldiers are pushed back from Flanders and France they will ultimately be on the banks of the St. Lawrence. Is it not better to make our fight effective in France and Flanders and to be successful there in order that we shall have no need of trenches in Canada? In this way we shall avoid the devastation and destruction that go with first line trenches, and we shall accomplish all that we could accomplish were we to defend ourselves upon the shores of Canada. With this difference: our being compelled to defend ourselves upon the shores of Canada would mean our being defeated in Europe and if we were defeated in Europe there would be no use in attempting to defend ourselves in Canada from the aggressions of a power like a victorious Germany.

My right hon. friend has said, in his speech on the second reading of this Bill, that he has never feared and does not now fear an invasion of Canada. Well, I do not know how he can say that. I think the right hon. gentleman is mistaken in his belief. I recall an occasion not more than six months prior to the declaration of war when the right hon. gentleman, taunting Sir Robert Borden because of his Naval Emergency Bill to give three dreadnoughts to Great Britain, used these words:—

> Emergency? Who speaks to-day of emergency?
>
> Twelve months have passed since my right hon. friend the Prime Minister introduced his measure.
>
> The Naval Bill.
> Twelve months and more have passed since that time when he saw the German peril. He saw Germany almost ready to jump at the throat of Great Britain. He saw clouds on the horizon; he saw these clouds rent by lightning; he heard the murmurs and rumbling of distant thunder. But my right hon. friend to-day may live in peace. The atmosphere is pure, the sky is clear. . . . The German peril has disappeared, if indeed there ever was such a thing.

That was only six months before the war. My right hon. friend had a great deal more ground and reason for making that assertion then that the German peril had disappeared than he has for saying to-day that he sees no danger and has no fear of an invasion of Canada, and that since the beginning of the war he never had any such fear. I think I am quite safe in making that statement.

I will now come to the question of conscription. I have always maintained that the bogey of conscription in advance is much more unpopular policy than conscription actually put into force. We have to-day 400,000 men who have voluntarily conscripted themselves, and all that the present Bill asks is that 100,000 more, by intelligent selection, should join the 400,000 and go across the seas and help to do their bit to bring this war to a successful conclusion. That is all that the Bill means, the careful selection of 100,000 more men, men who can be spared, men who are not required in those avocations and occupations which are essential to the winning of the war. I would like to place upon record a few quotations from some of the British statesmen who have spoken upon this question. First of all I would like to give to the House the words of the Right Hon. Mr. Balfour, because we have had the pleasure of hearing him in this House, and I know when he spoke he made a most favourable impression upon all the members. Mr. Balfour, speaking upon the occasion of the introduction of a Conscription Bill in the British House of Commons in January, 1916, referring to those who were opposed to the principle of conscription, said:

> Let them remember they are living in a world of fact and reality; that we are face to face with great perils, and that great sacrifices are demanded of us. Let them not go forward, and in obedience to what I cannot help regarding as merely speculative difficulties deny to the Government what the Government think is absolutely necessary for the conduct of the war, and without which the Government cannot possibly carry on that war with any hope of success. These are considerations which I most earnestly press upon their minds. This is not a debating society dealing with abstract resolutions. This is not even a great legislative assembly, legislating for all time. All you are asked to do is to help the Government to give adequate support to the forces of the Crown during a period which cannot, measured by the life of nations, be long, the period of this war, which may be but a few months and may be more, but which cannot be long even compared with the life of Parliament. Surely for the moment you can abandon these abstractions. Deal with the situation as you find it, acting on the advice of those who, whatever their shortcomings, whatever their failings may have been, at all events have greater knowledge from their very position, of the facts of the case, and of the necessities that have to be met than any private, unofficial member of this House can possibly have.

Then Mr. Asquith, speaking on the same occasion, said:

> Will any general sympathy be felt for men, for the most part still young—all of them under forty-one—who, unable to bring themselves within any one of these exemptions after full opportunity of presenting their case, are required to do what every one recognizes to be their duty as a matter of moral and national obligation in the time of greatest stress in all our history.

And then Mr. Bonar Law used these words:

> When this war broke out I felt as strongly as those who had taken the most active part in what is called the National Service movement, that our method of raising recruits by the voluntary system was not a good method for such a war as this. I thought it was not a good method, first of all, because it seemed to me utterly unfair that in the same town, or perhaps in the same street, three or four sons of one family should go and another family on whom the State had precisely the same claim should not send a single man to the army. I thought it a bad system for another reason, the very reason on which many of those who are opposed to this Bill oppose it now—that it was a wasteful system, and that if we were to make any attempt to have a proper correlation between the men employed in the necessary Civil Services and those who go to fight our battles, that could not be arrived at by a system of haphazard enlistment and recruiting which depended on the voluntary will of individual people.

At this point I wish to say that in my opinion the introduction of this Bill can in no way be considered as a precedent for a permanent policy of conscription for Canada. In the years to come, when we look back upon this historical occasion, the verdict of future generations will be that it was a triumph for voluntarism that we raised 400,000 men by a voluntary system reverse ,and as we require only 100,000 men by military compulsion. This will not be considered as a precedent for conscription; it will be considered as a precedent for the reverse, and as we require only 100,00 men to be raised by this method, there is no question of a permanent policy being adopted by this country. The Bill itself shows that there is not. The Bill is practically dead when 100,000 men have been conscribed under its term, and it has no further effect without additional legislation by this Parliament.

The British Parliament never asked that the policy of conscription should be referred to a referendum. In New Zealand the people never asked for a referendum on that policy; the Parliament of those countries acting upon their own authority and according to British practice, put a conscription measure into force without consulting the people. Notwithstanding what has been said by my right hon. friend, the Premier who now controls the destinies of Australia, as he is known to be a conscriptionist, as he fought his election upon that ground and as he was returned to power, the people knowing what his policy was, would have the right to-day to enforce some measure of conscription in Australia, and no doubt he will do so in a short time. In the great republic to the south of us, after an experience of three years of this war, when the people of the United States were asked to participate in it, when they were asked to raise perhaps five or six hundred thousand men, did the Government submit the matter to a referendum? The measure was passed by the House of Representatives without consulting the people, and the people have submitted to it in a most remarkable degree. These are instances in which such matters have not been submitted to the people by way of a referendum, and I know of no instance whatever where any party in any Parliament in any country has asked that the question of conscription be submitted to the people, by way of a referendum, as the leader of the Opposition is asking here to-day. I would like to read a few of the provisions of the United States Bill and compare it with the Bill before the House. Under the United States Act the president is empowered to raise 500,000 men:

Such draft as herein provided shall be based upon liability to military service of all male citizens, or male persons not alien enemies who have declared their intention to become citizens, between the ages of twenty-one and thirty years, both inclusive, and shall take place and be maintained under such regulations as the President may prescribe not inconsistent with the terms of this Act.

The quotas for the several states, territories and the District of Columbia or subdivisions thereof, shall be determined in proportion to the population thereof and credit shall be given to any state, territory, district, or subdivision thereof for the number of men who were in military service of the United States as members of the National Guard on April 1, 1917, or who have since that date entered the military service of the United States from any such territory, district or subdivision either as members of the regular army or the National Guard.

According to these provisions every state in the Union must contribute its quota of the 500,000 men. But the Act goes further than that. It says:

Notwithstanding the exemptions enumerated herein each state, territory, and the District of Columbia shall be required to supply its quota in the proportion that its population bears to the total population of the United States.

So notwithstanding disabilities or anything else each state must supply its quota according to population. The exemptions are as follows:

The Vice President of the United States, the officers legislative, executive and judicial of the United States and of the several states, territories and the District of Columbia, regular or duly ordained ministers of religion, students who at the time of the approval of this Act are preparing for the ministry in recognized theological or divinity schools.

These exemptions are not mentioned in our Bill but are left to the good sense of the Boards of Selection. The President of the United States is given the right to exempt either totally or partially the following:

> County and municipal officials, custom house clerks, persons employed in the United States in the transmission of the mail, artificers and workmen employed in the armouries, arsenals and navy yards of the United States, and such other persons employed in the service of the United States as the President may designate. Also pilots; mariners actually employed in sea service of any citizen or merchant within the United States; persons engaged in industries, including agriculture, found to be necessary to the maintenance of the military establishment or the effective operation of the military forces or the maintenance of national interest during the emergency; those in a status with respect to persons dependent upon them for support which renders their exclusion or discharge advisable; and those found to be physically or morally deficient.

Then there is a provision, as in our Act, for the establishment of local boards, one for each county, and one for each 30,000 of a city population. They are appointed by the President to hear and determine all questions of exemption. Except that they have no jurisdiction—I do not exactly know the reason for this—over the class of persons described as "engaged in industries, including agriculture, found to be necessary to the maintenance of the military establishment or the effective operation of the military forces or the maintenance of the national interests during the emergency." It may be that there is something in the argument of my hon. friend from Edmonton. It may be that the United States have taken the position that local boards should not have the wide powers of discrimination in the class I have just mentioned, for "maintenance of national interests during the emergency" is a very wide term indeed.

The United States Act also provides for a district board which hears appeals from the local boards, and which has original exclusive jurisdiction in determining what persons shall come within the class I have just read. Appeals are provided for the same as in our Act.

So for all practical purposes, with the exception that the United States Act specifically mentions some classes who are exempt, their Act is the same as ours, except that it requires each state to supply its quota according to population. Our Act is a very simple one, requiring very little study to see what it means. Clause 2 is the operating section, and describes the classes that shall be subject to military duty. The balance of the Act is practically devoted to the selection of the men and the necessary machinery therefor. Under this Act there is an intelligent selection of the persons called for military duty having regard to conditions in Canada to-day, whereas under the old Act the selection by ballot was a most haphazard affair. The operating section reads:

> Every male British subject who comes within one of the classes described in section 3 of this Act . . . shall be liable to be called out as hereinafter provided on active service in the Canadian Expeditionary Force for the defence of Canada, either in or beyond Canada.

That is the exact wording of the old Act, and Sir Charles Fitzpatrick construed it as giving the Governor in Council and Parliament power to say that the men so called out could be sent to India or any other place.

I wish to say a word or two with reference to some remarks made by the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) yesterday. He made what seemed to me a most remarkable statement when he said that the conscription of wealth should be a condition precedent to the conscription of man-power. Apparently, he is firmly convinced that the first and essential consideration at the present time is the conscription of wealth; he thinks that is more necessary than the conscription of men. So far as I know there has been no appeal for wealth to be used in this war that has not been met; that is, we are not suffering by reason of the lack of wealth in our conduct of the war. Up to the present time the needs of the Government have been met by means of taxation and other means which have proved sufficient for the effectual carrying on of the war. In view of that, there is no need to seek vengeance on somebody who has not a son to send to the front, by extracting from his pocket something that is not yet actually needed at the present time, and throwing it up against a corner of the fence; that will not help to win the war. Arms, ammunition and wealth are necessary for the winning of the war, but of what avail are they without man-power? Major W. P. Purney, the president of the Great War Veterans Association, has expressed some views on this question. He thinks there should be some conscription of wealth, but he believes that the conscription of men should come before the conscription of wealth. He goes further and says:

> If the conscription of wealth is in any way going to interfere with the conscription of men I would brush it aside.

I should like to put on Hansard what he said before the Committee of Returned Soldiers last month:

While we have very broad and far-reaching views on this question, and while we may connect the conscription of manhood for fighting purposes with the conscription of the other resources of our country, yet I want it to be clearly understood that we stand, and stand clearly for selective conscription. The other phases of conscription which may be dealt with here this morning or elsewhere later, while they also may express our views and our hopes, yet we want it clearly understood that we are quite willing to sacrifice the consideration of them if they should have the effect of blocking or delaying the main scheme of simple selective conscription, for our comrade across the sea is calling and he must not call in vain.

That is the opinion of the president of the Great War Veterans Association representing 10,000 returned soldiers from all over the Dominion.

While on this question of the conscription of wealth, let me say that the use of the phrase is a very general one and that very few people seem to know exactly what it means. If it means imposing upon the people of Canada sufficient taxes for the purpose of effectively carrying on the war, I am in favour of the conscription of wealth. If it means anything different from that, or anything more than that, will some hon. gentleman please give us an accurate definition of it. If the conscription of wealth means the collection of taxes for the purposes of the war, we have already carried out that policy in large degree. According to the figures I have before me, the Finance Minister, since the beginning of the war, has been the cause of Parliament enacting legislation by way of taxation in various forms which, he estimates, by the end of the present fiscal year will have brought into the treasury, in round figures, $200,000,000. There seems to be an idea abroad that the great capitalists of this country are not being taxed, that there is no conscription of wealth so far as they are concerned. Let me read a few figures showing the taxes being paid to-day by great companies in Canada and that would have been paid by these companies had the new amendments to the laws for special taxation been in force, and which will be collected for the present fiscal year.

When we brought these taxation measures into the House we were not commended by hon. gentlemen on the other side for what we had done; we got no thanks for the taxes placed upon these rich corporations; quite the reverse. The hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt), speaking on the Bill to amend the Business War Profits Tax Act, 1916, said, as reported at page 1503 of Hansard:—

Mr. Nesbitt: I know that it will be a detriment to the obtaining of capital in this country for industry. . . . I do not know what the minister's aim is exactly. . . . If his aim is to stop big business in this country he is going the right way about it. . . . So far as I am personally concerned, I think there is no one thing that we want in this country more than capital. We cannot possibly develop the natural resources of this country without it. We hear a great many people talking, both after dinner and before, about the wonderful natural resources of Canada, but we cannot develop them without encouraging capital to develop them. My hon. friend, I think, is discouraging capital by his peculiar legislation here. . . .

Sir Thomas White: My hon. friend from North Oxford has brought up an article in the Financial Times condemning this excess profits tax on the ground that it would be a detriment to obtaining special capital for industry.

Mr. Nesbitt: I read what the Financial Times said; I did not say it myself.

Sir Thomas White: Do you agree with what the Financial Times said?

Mr. Nesbitt: Yes, I do.

Then the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham), speaking on the 22nd May last, said:—

Not a few industries engaged in the manufacture of munitions and other commodities influenced by the war assert that after the war there will be a very critical period of readjustment. Some of them fear that during that period of readjustment they will be able to do nothing more than pay running expenses. The most conservative of these have been preparing for that period by placing to one side each year a reasonable reserve, feeling that when their present large business ceases—as we hope it will very shortly—they will find themselves, under the new system of taxation, in a serious financial plight. They tell me that during the two or three years succeeding the war these reserves will be used up in their effort to readjust themselves to new conditions and to prepare for a staple business in the future. Some of them, I understand, think that the action of the Government in taking such a large proportion of the amount they now have on hand will cause them to come to a condition of practical bankruptcy during the period of readjustment. I feel confident that the minister, far from having that in mind, would like to protect our industries against this result. To my mind this is the most serious aspect of the matter; the figures that have been presented to me by some concerns lead me to believe that there is a good deal in the contention.

The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) used these words:—

But my hon. friend's proposals do not come under that proposition, and the exactions he is taking will slacken the industry, impair the prospect of capital investment, and dampen the patriotic enthusiasm of the party who is being taxed.

In addition to that, I have before me articles published in the Financial Times, one of which is headed: "Sir Thomas White Puts Hands on the Throat of Canada's Productive Capacity by Iniquitous Taxation." And the article says:—

Sir Thomas White, by his extraordinary scheme of profit taxation, has simply put his hands on the throat of Canadian productive enterprise and if he does not squeeze the country's business to death, he will leave it with little or no vitality to meet the tremendous obligations which the country has entailed.

You find such statements as this in the Financial Journal:—

Canada expects this day that Sir Thomas White will do his duty and withdraw injurious tax plan. Action must be quickly taken to offset the tendency to cancel machinery and installation orders by Canadian and American firms. One Montreal firm withdraws $1,000,000 outlay on additional plant. An American firm cancels plans to erect $2,500,000 plant here, employing 2,500 men, and another firm cancels large order for lathes to replace worn out machinery.—A serious blow at Canada's whole buying position—affecting, labour and capital alike.

So we are doing what we can to conscript wealth; we are making these wealthy concerns pay these large sums of money, and making them pay them upon the principle that those who are making profits out of the war should be the first to pay taxes for the carrying on of the war.

Now, while I have said all this, I want it distinctly understood that, so far as I am concerned, just so soon as it is necessary to raise further taxes for the further revenues for the purpose of carrying on this war by the imposition of income tax or by any other method, I am prepared to vote for any reasonable measure along that line and I think I am safe in saying that the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White), who has guided us so successfully through our financial storms up to the present day, will be able to take care of the nation when that time arrives.

The hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) touched upon another question, and found fault with the Government because they had delayed so long in appointing a food controller; and he instanced the cases of the United States, Great Britain and other nations of Europe, which earlier in the war had appointed food controllers. But he forgot this fact, that there was not the same necessity for the appointment of a food controller at so early a date in Canada as, for instance, in Great Britain, and why? Because this country is a large exporter of food products, while in Great Britain they have to depend to a very large extent upon imports of food products from abroad. And there they found it necessary to control their food prices, while here the price is practically controlled by the production and export of this country. But we have arrived at a time when, in the opinion of the Government, it is necessary to appoint a food controller, and I think

I am safe in saying that the man appointed in the present instance, Hon. W. J. Hanna, who has offered his services free of charge to this country, is a man pre-eminently fitted for the position.

The hon. member for Rouville says that the present Bill confiscates the liberty of the subject. Well, is that not begging the whole question? The present Bill confiscates the liberty of the subject in order that the liberty of the subject may not be confiscated. That is the proper argument. The present Bill to a certain extent confiscates the liberty of 100,000 men in order that the Dominion of Canada and the Empire, and indeed all the nations of the entent Allies, may have permanent liberty for all time to come. I should like to ask the hon. member for Rouville, if he were in the House, what is that liberty worth which is not worth fighting for, and how do you expect to get it if you do not fight for it? Do you expect to have somebody else do the fighting in order that you may maintain your liberty? That is a fair proposition to put to him. If he is not willing to fight for liberty but wishes to let other people fight for him, he has a right to be deprived of a certain amount of his liberty in order that other people may get the benefit of permanent liberty hereafter. The hon. member for Rouville said that no effort had been made worthy of the name to intelligently recruit in Quebec. I am not going to dispute that with him, that no effort worthy of the name has been made to intelligently recruit in the province of Quebec. I only know that, according to the returns brought down by the Minister of Militia and Defence the other day, there are only 8,196 French Canadians now serving overseas who enlisted from the province of Quebec; and I would agree with him that there must be some reason to account for that very small enlistment. But who is responsible for public opinion in the province of Quebec? I have no sympathy, and I say it boldly and frankly. I have no sympathy with many of the expressions that have been made in the past by so-called Nationalist members of this House throughout the length and breadth of the province of Quebec, as to our relations with the British Empire. But I make bold to say that it surely cannot be so that the Nationalist members of this House have such influence in the province of Quebec that only 8,000 French Canadians have been sent abroad out of a total population of 1,700,000. It were idle to argue that Somebody has great political influence in the province of Quebec. I have always understood that my right hon. friend was the leader of public opinion in the province of Quebec. I know that when he goes down there in a political campaign he can come back sometimes with sixty out of sixty-five of the constituencies behind him. I know that not very long ago, indeed during this session, very recently at all events, he went down with his friend Sir Lomer Gouin and together they carried sixty out of sixty-five seats in a provincial election in the province of Quebec. If they have influence with my French Canadian compatriots in the province of Quebec to such an extent that they can take sixty out of sixty-five seats on a question of politics, why have they not sufficient influence to go down to that province and bring back more than 8,000 recruits, the number who have gone across the seas to save the Empire in this great time of national stress and emergency?

9 p.m.

Mr. PARDEE: Does the hon. member consider my right hon. leader the strongest man in Quebec for that purpose?

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: Well now, I do not think I shall answer that, I do not want to create any animosities in this debate; but simply to state facts, and the people can judge for themselves.

Mr. PARDEE: Another question. If what the hon. member says here, and I presume honestly believes, is true, why did Bourassa stump for the Conservative party in the last Dominion election in Ontario?

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: I am telling my hon. friend that I am stating conditions as I find them to-day.

Mr. PARDEE: Yes.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: I am not now blaming one party more than another in the province of Quebec; that would serve no good purpose in this debate, but I want to state the conditions in Quebec as I find them to-day. And I ask the question, can we not find a dozen broad-minded, patriotic, forceful, strong, independent men in the province of Quebec, uninfluenced by party considerations of the past, who will go out to-day and enter upon a campaign in that province to endeavour to make the people of Quebec see that their salvation lies in the upholding and upbuilding of the British Empire? There is no people on the face of the earth that enjoys more privileges than our French Canadian minority in the province of Quebec. I should like to ask them under what other political constitution, under what other political formation, under what other form of Government they could live where they would have more freedom, both politically and religiously, than they enjoy in the province of Quebec to-day under the British Crown? That is the point I want to make, and I make it in all kindly spirit. It seems to me that the best interests of he French Canadian people themselves are inseparably bound and wrapped up in the welfare of the British Empire, and I cannot get away from that. I have spoken to men on this side of the House and on that side, and I ask, what is the reason that, instead of preaching the doctrines which have been preached in Quebec, twelve or thirteen strong independent men will not now say: We have made a mistake and believe that it is in the best interest of the French Canadian people themselves that we should campaign Quebec and endeavour to contribute our quota in this war as other portions of Canada are doing—and if that course were adopted we should have a happy, a united, and a free Canada, for all time to come. That is the position I take.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Then you had better vote for the amendment.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: What are the figures with respect to recruiting in the various provinces? According to the figures which I have, up to the 31st of March, 1917, the population of the various provinces, the number of men enlisted, and the percentage of enlistments to the population are as follows:

Province.	Population.	Number Recruited.	Percent of Total Population.
Quebec	2,003,712	44,000	2¼
Prince Edward Island	93,728	2,700	2⅞
New Brunswick	351,889	17,500	5
Ontario	2,523,074	168,300	6⅝
British Columbia	392,466	39,200	10
Alberta	374,663	35,000	9⅓
Manitoba and Saskatchewan	948,046	79,500	6⅝
Nova Scotia	492,330	22,300	4½

I have some figures which I think will interest hon. members, and they are somewhat of a surprise to me. It is not fair to my own province and not fair to other provinces simply to take the population of the provinces and compare the number of men recruited to the population. The fairest way is to take the number of males of military age in each province, and compare them with the number of men who have enlisted, and I give both tables below:

	Males between 20 and 40 years.	Percentage of the total.
Prince Edward Island	14,328	15.3
New Brunswick	59,086	10.6
Nova Scotia	85,798	17.5
Quebec	342,149	17.1
Ontario	515,442	20.5
Manitoba	110,454	24.2
Saskatchewan	144,832	29.4
Alberta	112,321	30.0
British Columbia	146,740	37.1
Total males	1,531,156	20.1

From these figures one would imagine that for example that the province of British Columbia having sent 37 per cent of its population had made the best record, but as a matter of fact—

Mr. PUGSLEY: The hon. gentleman must be wrong. You say British Columbia is sending 37 per cent of its population.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: The number of men of military age in British Columbia is 37 per cent of the total population. That is what I should have said and not that 37 per cent had enlisted . I have now the other table here which shows the actual number of men enlisted compared with the number of men of military age in the different provinces, and it works out in this way:

	Men of military age recruited.	Percentage of men of military age enlisted.
New Brunswick	17,500	30
Prince Edward Island	2,700	18
Quebec	44,000	12
Nova Scotia	22,300	26
Ontario	168,300	32
Manitoba and Saskatchewan	79,500	31
Alberta	35,100	31
British Columbia	39,200	26

There is another comparison, and that is this, that in the western provinces there are more single men in proportion to the population than in the eastern provinces. For instance, in Ontario the percentage of single men of military age is 45. In Quebec, the percentage of single men of military age is only 40, in Alberta the percentage is 55, while in British Columbia the percentage of single men of military age is 59 per cent. So that when British Columbia says she has sent 39 per cent out of a comparatively small population, as a matter of fact, she has not sent as many men as Ontario in proportion to the men of military age in Ontario. In that regard I might point out that the province of Ontario has the highest percentage of enlistments of all the provinces out of its men of military age being one per cent over Manitoba and Saskatchewan, the next highest.

We have now reached the time when we must do something to increase our enlistment. I think it is admitted by everybody that there is now an absolute imperative necessity for some change in the method of selecting men for the purpose of assisting our boys who have gone overseas. So far as I can see, no method has been suggested by which we can do this except the one that is contained in Bill 75 before the House. Shall we send more troops, or shall we abandon our boys to their fate and allow all their past and future sacrifices to be in vain, disappoint our Allies and gratify our enemies by the acknowledgment that we have reached the limit of our manpower? So far as I am concerned, I would say absolutely, I will never consent to do that.

Then there is the alternative method of a referendum, as to whether we are in honour bound to go to the rescue of the boys we sent to the front and guaranteed to see them through—a referendum to ascertain whether we shall extinguish the fire in our house which is now burning and our boys in it, and await till the conflagration gets beyond our control, a referendum to ascertain whether the slacker is to be compelled to fight two or three months hence when he has refused for nearly three years to do so, a referendum which the "peace at any price" faddist, social cranks or extremists will hail as an opportunity for avoiding service or enforcing their own peculiar doctrines.

A referendum in which those most vitally interested and who should have the greatest say, namely, the soldiers overseas, would have no vote, or an insufficient opportunity of voting because of the difficulty of securing it, and which would cause such delay that if carried, the assistance may come too late.

A referendum which nevertheless would give to the voters of Austro-German and neutral sympathies the right to veto conscription, while our boys are at the front fighting for them who refuse to enlist.

A referendum which from its very nature would have the effect of stopping recruiting until the verdict was known. If carried the delay caused by submission might be fatal at this critical stage of the war.

A referendum which would be nothing more nor less than a secret, silent, safety first national register for the do-nothings of Canada.

At the last general election there were 1,307,528 votes cast. We have now sent overseas, roughtly speaking, 400,000 voters, a little less than one-third of the total vote cast at the last election.

And I think we are all prepared to say whether they are of age or not, that these men are entitled to the franchise upon the present occasion. That is pretty nearly one-third of the total vote of Canada at the last election. Will any man say that each of these soldiers overseas has not two friends in Canada who are sufficiently interested in him to say: I am in favour of conscription, because my brother, my father, my friend, or my relative is at the front? If each soldier overseas had two friends who were sufficiently interested in him to desire conscription that would add another 800,000 in addition to the votes to those of the soldiers overseas—for I assume that they also would be in favour of conscription. Adding these three together, you have in round numbers 1,200,000 voters who would be in all probability in favour of conscription. These are very rough figures, but they give some idea as to what the people would say if this matter were referred to them by means of a referendum. I am unable to estimate the number of persons, who, outside of the two friends of each soldier, would vote for conscription because they believed that they were absolutely in honour bound to do something towards sending to the assistance of their friends the 100,000 men asked for by this Bill.

Mr. PUGSLEY: If 1,200,000 persons voted for conscription it would be sure to carry, would it not?

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: If it is sure to be carried, what is the need of a referendum? It would be only a waste of valuable time. That was the argument of the hon. member for North Cape Breton. He said that it would be sure to carry and that the people would back up whatever we did here to carry the war to a successful conclusion. What we are doing here is designed to assist in bringing the war to a successful conclusion.

I do not know that hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House realize the nervous and anxious condition of a great many of our people. In my town many people fear that the ring of the door-bell or of the telephone or the arrival of a telegram may sound the death-knell of their hopes and prayers for the safe return from across the seas of those who are near and dear to them. That feeling prevails throughout various parts of Canada. I see no reason why the House should submit a question of this kind to the people, knowing their feelings at this time. Not very long ago I received from the city council of Owen Sound a resolution which was moved by John G. Hay, president of the North American Bent Chair Company, one of the largest industries in the town, employing four or five hundred men. As hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House know, Mr. Hay is one of the most prominent Liberals in my province. The resolution, which was seconded by Mr. Keith Webster, reeve of the town and treasurer of the Liberal Association in my riding, was unanimously adopted by a council of mixed political complexion, which included a defeated candidate of the Liberal party. The resolution, so far as it relates to conscription, is as follows:—

To the Senate and House of Commons of the Dominion of Canada, and especially to the Premier, Sir R. L. Borden, and Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the leader of His Majesty's loyal Opposition.

This Memorial of the Municipal Council of the town of Owen Sound.

Respectfully sheweth :

We would suggest that the leaders aforesaid get together and agree on legislation that would give power to a small war council composed of both political parties, to make or unmake laws as may in its opinion be necessary to win the war as speedily as possible, and that said legislation be made broad enough to take into said war council any Canadian of outstanding ability whether he happens to be a member of the House of Commons or not.

We believe that if this line of action is taken it will make possible the quick building of standarized wooden boats in many inland water ports as well as at ocean ports and thus help to properly feed our sons and brothers who are fighting for our existence as an Empire.

And further, we feel that before this war is brought to a successful conclusion party politics must be dropped as it is by your memorialists, and that every means must be taken to make the best use of the energies of the whole population of the Dominion; those required for military service in the field to be taken by selective conscription, having regard to the vocations of civil life from which they can best be spared, and the remainder alloted to munition factories, farms and manufacturing industries the operation of which is essential to the winning of the war, thus bringing about an equality of service by compelling every military district to be represented pro rata in the field, and if it is found that any military district in the Dominion has not given its fair quota of men for the Canadian Expeditionary Forces, to compel said military district to at once do its share and by full co-operation win the war.

It is to our party leaders that we, your memorialists, earnestly appeal to do everything humanly possible to speedily bring this war to a successful conclusion, and then appeal to the people for their verdict. We feel that any other course would not be patriotic and that any party, or body of men, forcing a general election will be met by the disapproval of that portion of the people who have given their husbands, sons and near relatives, many of whom have made the supreme sacrifice, to the cause of Liberty and justice.

I may point out that that resolution was adopted before the Conscription Bill was brought down, and, I believe, before it was even announced.

I am supporting this Bill because I believe it is now the only available and effective method by which we may do our final bit in bringing the war to a speedy and successful termination, keep faith with the men who are so grimly fighting our battles, and ensure that their past and future sacrifices shall not be in vain.

We have reached a new milestone in the history of Canada, of the Empire, and, indeed, of the world; and we are in honour bound to see that the pages of our history shall reveal nothing at this crucial moment to cause regret on the part of those who shall in future direct the destinies of Canada. In a matter of such transcendent moment in our history, the fate of an individual member of Parliament is of small account as compared with the adoption of a proper national policy. It is gratifying to see party affiliations breaking asunder at the country's last imperative call, and I feel absolutely confident that time will amply justify the course of all those members of this House who combine on this occasion to support this Bill as a reasonable measure of selective compulsory military service.

Mr. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, in rising to discuss this Bill, which I consider to be the most important piece of legislation introduced into this House since Confederation, I desire to claim for my opinion, which is the result of my own judgment of what is right, the respectful consideration which should always be granted to deliberate and conscientious opinions.

It is fortunate indeed, as is noticeable by the very moderate remarks of the member for North Grey (Mr. Middlebro) that this House has not been lashed into an hysterical fury, as has been represented by certain sections of the press. A difference of opinion upon this question, affecting as it does the fundamental structure of our national constitution and involving a serious change in our national life, is not to be interpreted as an alliance with the German Kaiser and a manifestation of hostility to the great cause for which Great Britain and her Allies are fighting. If such a difference of opinion is not respected in this House or elsewhere in Canada, this country would not be worthy of the great sacrifices which have been made to sustain her honour in the great struggle on behalf of freedom and liberty.

As to the supreme object to be obtained, there is no division or controversy. Surely nobody thinks that any member of this House would like to see Germany victorious.

A difference of opinion arises, because we do not agree as to the best methods to pursue, taking into consideration the needs of the Allies, the particular conditions prevailing in this country, the imperative duty to maintain national unity, and the proper safeguarding of the provisions which govern our Federal constitution. It would be useless for me to discuss this proposal of the Government unless it is understood that those who hold the opinions I do are as sincere and honest as the supporters of the Bill, seeking as loyally as they do to solve the very difficult problems which confront us at this period of our history.

I am opposed to this Bill because I believe the voluntary system is the best and the only system suited for this country in the present war, and that coercion will be detrimental to the one aim we all desire to attain, namely, the winning of the war. My second objection is that this proposal is a flagrant and direct violation of all the pledges given by the leaders and public men of this country to the Canadian people since the beginning of the war, upon the strength of which pledges so many sacrifices have been made. I also oppose this Bil because it involves a radical and most serious change in our constitutional relations and constitutes a departure from well-known principles agreed to by all parties as to the constitution of this Confederation. I claim that this Parliament has no mandate to enact such a change without consulting the Canadian people.

In the first place, I do not agree with those who say that the voluntary system has been a failure either in this country or in Great Britain. We can fairly argue that we have raised under our voluntary system a larger army than was ever contemplated by any student of military affairs in this country. We have made and we are now making a very large contribution to the war which the Mother Country and her Allies are waging, and it is a calumny upon ourselves and upon the Mother Country to suggest that they do not fully realize and recognize the magnitude of our efforts and of our contribution. It was my privilege a few months ago to spend some weeks in England and France, and I heard in all quarters words of the greatest praise as to Canada's contribution to the war. No one there ever anticipated that this young country, with its population sparsely disseminated over a wide territory, could raise, equip and put into the field an army approximating 400,000 men, and that at a cost considerably larger than what is paid by any of the belligerent countries for the same number of men. Why should Canadians minimize and under-estimate the magnificent and heroic sacrifices our country has made?

It is not true that the voluntary system has been a failure in England. 5,000,000 men have been raised as volunteers in the British Isles, only one additional million has been brought under arms by conscription. Great publicity has recently been given to certain words of the Prime Minister of Great Britain who said that the United States should avoid the blunders made by Great Britain at the beginning of the war. It has been intimated that Mr. Lloyd George was there referring to the merits or demerits of the compulsory system. The British blunder was not in the method adopted to raise the men necessary to fight the battles, but in failing for a certain time to take proper means to provide those men with an adequate quantity of munitions and supplies upon the battlefield. The men were never wanting; what was needed was sufficient artillery and machine guns. Voluntary enlistment in England, however, was at all times hindered by the antagonism and hostility of the powerful class of conscriptionists who had been clamouring for years for compulsory military service. One of the largest and most influential newspapers in England was refusing peremptorily to publish advertisements for voluntary enlistment and was assailing the system every day. The conscriptionists were a strong and influential faction, and their policy was finally adopted to disarm dangerous opposition, and as a diplomatic measure rather than military necessity.

But historical, economic and political conditions are quite different in this country, and the conscriptionists of Canada will not be as successful as those of Great Britain. It is true we have some newspaper editors who are vying with each other to play the Northcliffe part in Canada, but our democratic atmosphere is not congenial to that peculiar kind of autocracy. Our institutions are free; the people of Canada have made great sacrifices for freedom in the past, and they are not going to surrender even a portion of their liberties at the instigation of privileged classes or of titled or would-be titled editors. Canada of her own free will has agreed to help the Mother Country in this war. Our participation in this war, to the declaration of which we were no party, and in the settlement of which we shall have no voice, is voluntary and must remain voluntary. It is a voluntary participation, nationally and collectively, and it must remain a voluntary participation individually as regards all the citizens of this country. The greatest factor of our national unity up to the present time has been that spirit of true freedom animating our soldiers and our citizens, that spirit that comes only from being a free people. We want to prosecute this war as free men; we must not lose our own democracy in order to try to democratize Germany.

The selective conscription provided for in this Bill is the very opposite of democracy. We are going to appoint men who will prescribe that the son of a citizen will have to enlist and go overseas and give his life for his country, and to declare that his neighbour's son will remain comfortably at home. The whole system will be based upon discrimination; the sons of the poor and the workingmen will be conscripted; the rich and the wealthy will have appeal courts to delay and check their enlistment, and a paternal Government will see that soft places and easy clerkships are found for them if they cannot be exempted. Favouritism and patronage are not eliminated from the system which is now proposed; indeed, in many cases, they will actually control and influence the selection. Will the so-called selective conscription provide an equality of sacrifice? I maintain that the administration of this measure will be a source of continual injustice and inequalities. If a man does not report for service when called up he will be court-martialled or put in jail, and if, after enlistment, he absents himself from duty without leave he will be shot. On the other hand, the man who is exempted will receive high wages, and if he refuses to work he will likely be given a still higher wage. Is that equality of sacrifice?

To those members of the Government who contend that the voluntary system has been a failure I would recall the words of Lord Derby, director general of recruiting, in a letter to the British Nation, dated October 15, 1915:—

> No man has the right to say that a system is a failure unless he has done his best to make it a success.

I deliberately make the statement that this Government collectively and individually have not done their best to make the voluntary system a success. The former Minister of Militia has publicly stated that the Prime Minister actually directed that recruiting be stopped, or at least that there be a letting up. In the province of Quebec the voluntary system has not been given fair play. The military authorities have accumulated blunder upon blunder in recruiting. Men who could have exercised influence and authority have been systematically ostracized and their help refused.

It is a well known fact that military training and institutions have never been encouraged in Lower Canada.

As my right hon. leader pointed out in his address, the French Canadians were disarmed after the conquest and for reasons which I do not desire to discuss they have been kept out of the militia as much as possible. Nevertheless, they were able to save Canada for Great Britain on two occasions. Look at the list of staff officers and holders of other high military positions in this country and you will see that the parties who are so anxious to compile census statistics in order to show that the French Canadians have not enlisted in proportion to their population have never considered the population of Quebec in the distribution of military offices and commands. When the First Canadian Contingent was organized French Canadian officers who offered their services were not accepted. Fifty-three commanding officers were appointed and only one of them was a French Canadian, Mr. H. H. Panet, and he was the only man qualified for the position. Nobody thought of quoting figures and census statistics then in order that the officers of my race might be given a fair share of appointments.

The time at my disposal will not permit me to enumerate the errors made in recruiting in the province of Quebec, but my hon. friend from Rouville yesterday quoted many startling instances. The misdeeds and blunders of the Government have been a permanent obstacle in the way of voluntary enlistment. In addition to that, it has been the misfortune of this country to have in the Cabinet during the war as representatives of the province of Quebec, men who do not command the support or even the respect of public opinion in that province.

This is a very serious debate, and it is my desire to avoid as much as possible anything which would have the slightest appearance of political partisanship, but the question of recruiting in the province of Quebec cannot properly be discussed without referring to the matter with which I am now going to deal. This Government is a combination of men who were elected on absolutely opposite platforms. It has properly been called a hybrid alliance. No union is possible amongst its members without the most flagrant violation of some of their pledges and promises. I believe history will hold the Prime Minister responsible for having set a premium on what was in point of fact public immorality. What authority could be exercised in the province of Quebec for recruiting purposes by those former Nationalists whom the Prime Minister called to his Cabinet? Most assuredly they can have no authority with the majority of the electors whom they could not lead astray in 1911, and they have still less influence with the other portion of the electorate whom they carried with them on their policy of no participation by Canada under any circumstances in the wars of the Empire. These gentlemen could not open their mouths at a recruiting meeting without contradicting themselves and swallowing their former doctrines. To blow and swallow at the same time is a pretty difficult feat, and these gentlemen were very unsuccessful in their attempts to accomplish it. Enlistment in Quebec has been carried on in spite of the Government, and it is rather a matter for wonder the degree of success that has been attained. If the leader of the Opposition is the dominant factor in the province of Quebec, as has been contended by the Government, and as was stated only a few minutes ago by my hon. friend from North Grey (Mr. Middlebro), why did not the Prime Minister take his advice and call him to the Council in 1914? All the other belligerent countries have brought their best men together in order to attain the highest degree of national efficiency. President Wilson at the present time has entrusted the most delicate and important missions to distinguished and eminent political opponents. Why did not the Prime Minister of this country do the big thing and the right thing in the same direction? Do you not think, Mr. Speaker, that it would have been better for the unity and national welfare of this country if the Prime Minister had asked the leader of the Opposition to co-operate with him at the recent War Conference in London, even at the cost of dispensing for a few weeks with the company of the Minister of Public Works.

One great obstacle to recruiting in the province of Quebec has been the unfair, irritating, and in certain respects, the slanderous campaign carried on by one influential section of the Ontario press against the people of our province. They have charged that we are unwilling to co-operate in this great work. We do not pay much attention to the foolish and unreasonable statements of irresponsible men; there are fools in all parts of the world; no nation or race can claim a monopoly of them. But when the most influential section of the press of a province adopts as its permanent policy calumny and abuse of a sister province we have a pernicious state of affairs and one fraught with great danger to the present and future welfare of the country.

Only a few days ago two great Toronto newspapers were engaged in an acrimonious controversy as to which of the two had written the more violent, bitter articles against Quebec and her inhabitants. And I must confess that each seemed to be right in its contentions; it would be very hard to give a decision on the point. French Canadians have been slandered before the world; and from Ontario articles have been sent to, and reproduced in, the press of the United States, of France, of England, misrepresenting the people of Quebec in the most dishonest way. Was that all done in order to produce good? Was it a step towards a united and combined national effort? Again I say, it is a wonder that enlistment has been so large in spite of what seems to have been a deliberate effort to stop it. And let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, that I do not believe in the accuracy of the figures which have been given by the Minister of Militia as to the number of recruits of French descent. I believe that a much larger number have enlisted than has been shown. Why, you cannot take up the casualty list from day to day—and I stand by that supreme test—without seeing the names of French Canadians in much greater numbers than the figures of the department would justify. Are we to infer that French Canadians are always put in the lead in places of danger? I repeat that their number would have been still greater were voluntary enlistment given fair play, and had we in the Government of this country men who could carry the respect and support of the people of the province of Quebec.

I believe that the union of all Canadians is the greatest strength of national defence; one of the greatest factors towards the winning of the war is to have a united body of citizens all intent upon bringing about unity, in order to uphold the efforts of our soldiers in the field and show that there is behind them a united country. This Bill, in the circumstances which have preceded, which accompany, and which will follow it, is going to disrupt that national unity and irreparably divide this fair country. Conscription should not and cannot be enforced in this country, as in every other British country, without something like general consent. Does anybody challenge this proposition? I state it on very good authority, on no less an authority than that of the very distinguished British statesman who introduced compulsory service in the British Parliament, Right Hon. Mr. Asquith. Speaking in the House of Commons on the 2nd November, 1915, Mr. Asquith referred to the objections to compulsory service, and said:

> It is based upon an entirely different ground, namely, that the employment of compulsion under existing conditions would forfeit what I regard to be of supreme and capital importance, that is, the maintenance of national unity. That again is an abstract objection, but when translated into concrete terms it means this; if you were to apply, I do not speak of any particular method, but any method of coercion or compulsion, without something in the nature, I will not say of universal but of general consent, you would defeat your own purpose. It would not be a practicable or workable method of making good and filling up the gap left by the defects of the voluntary system.

And further he said:

> My proposition, if I were to formulate one, would be this: not that I rule out compulsion as an impossible expedient, but that compulsion, if resorted to, ought only to be resorted to, and can only from a practical point of view be resorted to, or, in other words, be made a workable expedient for filling up the gap which you have to supply,—with something in the nature of general consent.

And in the same debate Mr. John Redmond said:

> I, like the Prime Minister, am against compulsion. I believe that to impose compulsion in this country, unless, as he said, the country were practically unanimous in favour of it, would be a folly and a crime.

Hon. gentlemen may say that Mr. Asquith has modified his views in that regard. He has not modified them. When he introduced the first compulsory Bill on 6th January, 1916, he made it clear that public opinion in the country was calling upon him to redeem the pledge he had given to the married men who had enlisted under Lord Derby's scheme, that they should not be called upon to serve while younger and unmarried men were held back. And the opponents of compulsory service admitted that the great majority of the people of the United Kingdom were in favour of the Bill on account of the very diplomatic promise given by Mr. Asquith to the married men which had made all of them supporters of conscription. Ireland was not subject to the scheme of Lord Derby, nor to Mr. Asquith's pledge, and was excluded from the Bill. Have we in this country, in the language of Mr. Asquith, "something in the nature of general consent" to compulsory service? Why, the great objection to consulting the public on this matter that is urged by supporters of the Bill is the fear that it will be overwhelmingly defeated. My hon. friend from South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) went so far as to suggest that if a vote is to be taken, it ought to be an open vote. Let me say to my hon. friend in the most friendly spirit that these words sound queer in the mouth of a Liberal. The suggestion seemed quite appropriate when made by a new nobleman in the columns of the Montreal Star. Such a proposal I deem to be moreover, rather a reflection upon, even an insult to, the people with whom my hon. friend from South Wellington is better acquainted than I am, as conveying the idea that they would not have the courage to say openly what they think and believe. Using again the language of Mr. Asquith, I say that from the practical point of view, conscription cannot be a workable expedient without something of the nature of general consent. I submit, moreover, that all the nations and dominions participating in this war must contribute their utmost in order to overthrow the menace of German militarism, but the best way for them is to contribute according to their respective opportunities. In June, 1916, Sir George Paish wrote in the Statist:

> Victory over militarism will depend as much upon the world's farmers in general, and upon those of America and Canada in particular, as it does upon the armies at the front.

In one of the recent editions of L'Echo de Paris, M. Maurice Barrès, a famous writer says:

We, the Allies, have the superiority in numbers, and in the French-British lines we have even 1,000,000 more men than the Germans who face us. As to industrial superiority, it is decidedly on our side by reason of America coming into the war.

In another French newspaper, Le Journal of Paris, Senator Humbert has written as follows:

There is no longer any stock. The neutrals even have to ration themselves. New arrivals grow less. Famine menaces the entire world. I foresaw this supreme outcome of this awful crisis some twenty months ago, when I said: let us be sparing of our reserves in men. I was not heard, any more than when a year earlier I called for cannons and munitions. To-day is the danger not self evident? There is but one remedy: Bring back 200,000 or 300,000 Frenchmen of the older classes, to place the fields again in a state of cultivation. Such is the necessary means of recuperation. The condition of the armies, the large numerical advantage enjoyed by the Allies on the western front, compared to the Germans, allow the adoption without delay of this plank of salvation. Let us hasten; it is already late in the day; to-morrow it may be too late.

Surely those men know what they are talking about, and it would be better for the Government to urge on and help the farmers and workingmen of this country to supply the troops of our Allies with all food and material absolutely necessary to carry on the war, instead of breaking national unity and antagonising public opinion by the enacting of an improper measure of compulsion.

I am opposed to this Bill also because it is a direct violation of all the pledges given by this Government, this Parliament, and all the public men of this country, to the Canadian people. The right hon. the Prime Minister has solemnly told the people of Canada that there shall be no conscription. If compulsory service is enforced, I do not hesitate to say that many sacrifices volunteered by Canadian citizens would have been obtained under false pretenses. The right hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) spoke in rather light terms of pledges, and even of the constitution of the country. In time of war, he said, all these must be put aside. Sir, this is not good British doctrine. This is the German method, it is the very argument brought forth by the invaders of Belgium when they crushed the heroic little nation in violation of their pledges. But surely we must keep faith with our own people, and the spoken and written pledges of the rulers should not be treated as mere scraps of paper. Let me give a few quotations from speeches of our public men. Speaking in this House of Commons in 1914, the Prime Minister said, page 17 of Hansard:

The men of Canada who are going to the front are going as free men by voluntary enlistment as free men in a free country. They are coming forward voluntarily for the purpose of serving this Dominion and this Empire in a time of peril.

At the opening of the session of 1916, the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) said, in commenting upon the offer of 500,000 men:

But let me say—and I believe that upon this we should have an expression of opinion—that we must repel at once the impression which has been sought to be created that this offer is a preliminary step to conscription. There is to be no conscription in Canada.

To this the right hon. the Prime Minister replied:

My right hon. friend has alluded to conscription—to the idea in this country or elsewhere that there may be conscription in Canada. In speaking in the first two or three months of this war I made it clear to the people of Canada that we did not propose any conscription. I repeat that announcement to-day—with emphasis.

Speaking at Sohmer Park in Monteral on October 15, 1914, my right hon. leader (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) said:

It is a sacrifice that is quite voluntary. Canada is an absolutely free country. What has been done up to the present, what will be done in the future, will be absolutely voluntary.

Speaking at Montreal in August, 1914, the former Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes) said:

No man who leaves these shores will go except of his own free will, purely voluntary, and no married man shall go except with the consent of his wife and family, and when they go to vanquish our enemies, as vanquish them they will, they will go as free men, subjects of the British Empire, soldiers of His Majesty.

Speaking at Vancouver at the Canadian Club on November 16, 1915, the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) said:

We will continue to recruit just as long as there is an able-bodied man in the country who is willing to volunteer his services to his country, and just as long as we have a dollar or can raise a dollar to equip him and send him across the ocean.

In a statement issued at Ottawa on July 28th, 1915, the late Postmaster General (hon. T. Chase Casgrain) said:

I am pretty accurate in my political predictions, and I can say that there will be no conscription.

I could give many other quotations from many other gentlemen and from 10 p.m. the press of this country, but it is useless for me so to do, so clear is the question to every citizen of the country.

A further objection I have to this Bill is that it involves a grave change in the constitution, and enacts an entirely new principle without any mandate from the Canadian people. The right hon. Prime Minister states that the principle of this Bill is the same as has existed in the law of this country since 1868, as defined in the Militia Act enacted by this Parliament at the instigation of Sir George Etienne Cartier. Section 61 of that Act, upon which the right hon. gentleman bases his contention, reads as follows:

Her Majesty may call out the militia or any part thereof for actual service, either within or without the Dominion, at any time whenever it appears advisable so to do by reason of war, invasion, or insurrection, or danger of any of them.

Sir, I am surprised that my right hon. friend the Prime Minister did not go back a little further in the history of this country.

But, the Militia Act of 1868 was by no means the first Militia Act of Canada. The former Acts are of very great importance, in considering the true interpretation of the section I have just referred to. I propose to quote, from the various Militia Acts previous to 1868, the sections that correspond with section 61 of the Cartier Act. I will go back as far as 1808. In that year a militia law was enacted in Upper Canada, Statutes of Upper Canada, 48 George III, section 8 of chapter 1, which reads as follows:

Provided also that it shall not be lawful to order the militia or any part thereof, to march out of this province, except for the assistance of the province of Lower Canada (when the same shall be actually invaded or in a state of insurrection) or except in pursuit of an enemy who may have invaded this province, and except also for the destruction of any vessel or vessels built or building, or any depot or magazine, formed or forming, or for the attack of any enemy who may be embodying or marching for the purpose of invading this province, as for the attack of any fortification now erected, or which may be hereafter erected, to cover the invasion thereof."

In 1839 the province of Upper Canada enacted another Militia Act, Statutes of Upper Canada, 2 Vic., chapter 9. Section 7 of which reads as follows:

Or to march the said militia, or any portion thereof, to any place without the limits of this province, for the attack of any enemy that may have invaded, or may be marching or collected for the purpose of invading this province.

In 1846 the Parliament of United Canada enacted another Militia Act, 9 Victoria, chapter 28. Section 19 reads as follows:

And may march the militia into any part of the province and shall also have power to march the militia in any portion thereof, to any place without the limits of the province, but conterminus therewith, for the attack of any enemy that may have invaded or may be marching or collected for the purpose of invading this province.

In 1855 another Militia Act was enacted by the Parliament of United Canada, chapter 77 of the Statutes of the province of Canada, 18 Victoria. Section 66 reads as follows:

The militia so called out may be marched to any part of the province or to any place without the province, but conterminus therewith, where the enemy may be, and from which an attack on this province may be apprehended.

In 1863 a new Militia Act was enacted, chapter 2, of 27 Victoria, of the Statutes of the province of Canada. Section 33 reads as follows:

The Militia so called out may be marched to any part of the province or to any place without the province, but conterminus therewith where the enemy is, and from which an attack on this province is apprehended.

This is the last Act before Confederation. It is obvious that before Confederation, but pre-embodied in all the legislation relating to the militia, was a provision that it could not be sent out of the country, except in contiguous territory, to pursue an invader, or to meet him before he reaches this country.

Sir, Confederation was a compact entered into by the various provinces which compose it. Do you believe that Lower Canada would ever have agreed to this compact had it been stated, or even hinted, that her citizens and sons might be coerced at any time, by military compulsion, to go and fight with the Imperial troops and as part of the Imperial troops in European territory at Saloniki or Mesopotamia? Read the debates which took place at Confederation and accompanied Confederation and you will see that the only case which was thought of and discussed was that of a possible war between England and the United States of America. Sir John A. Macdonald, in introducing the Confederation Bill before the Parliament of United Canada, uttered the following words:

Although we knew it to be possible that Canada, from her position, might be exposed to all the horrors of war, by reason of causes of hostility arising between Great Britain and the United States—causes over which we had no control and which we had no hand in bringing about—yet there was a unanimous feeling of willingness to run all the hazards of war if war must come, rather than lose the connection between the Mother Country and these colonies.

In the same speech he said:

Instead of looking upon us as a merely dependent colony, England will have in us a friendly nation, a subordinate, but still a powerful people to stand by her in North America—

—not in Europe.

—in peace or in war.

These words are taken from the speech of Sir John A. Macdonald when introducing the Bill. The Militia Act of 1868 was passed under the same principle, and with the same idea in the minds of those who enacted it. Until a few days ago, I do not think that anybody who has studied the constitutional history of Canada ever expressed the opinion that her militia could be sent overseas by virtue of that Act. The debates that took place in 1868 showed that there was no intention to change the principle or the meaning of the section I am discussing. In considering the words "either within or without the Dominion" in a subsection we must not forget that Canada at that time included only the four provinces, Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, and it was important that the authorities should be empowered to send the militia outside of the area of those four provinces to protect and defend the British territory which forms to-day the other provinces of the Dominion.

I come now to the Militia Act of 1904. Surely this Act did not change or modify the principles which I have enunciated. The language of the section was made clearer by the insertion of the words "for the defence thereof." The right hon. Prime Minister quoted a few words from a speech by Sir Charles Fitzpatrick, then Minister of Justice. He took good care, it seems to me, not to cite the language of the father of the Act, the man responsible for the legislation, and who knew best what was the intention and aim of the Bill. Here is the language used by Sir Frederick Borden, then Minister of Militia:

Mr. Maclean: I would ask the minister if it is not the case that under the old section of the law as it now stands the militia of Canada could be used for the defence of the empire and sent out of this country for that purpose? But under the proposed law that is strictly prohibited.

Sir Frederick Borden: No. I am advised, and was advised at the time of the South African trouble, for instance, that under the law we could not do that.

Sir Sam Hughes: Could not do what?

[Mr. E. Lapointe.]

Sir Frederick Borden: That we could not send the militia to South Africa for service; under the law we were not able to do so. The present law has been changed, as I say, in conformity with that view and in sympathy with the idea which, as I said, controls the militia of the mother country and the militia of every one of the colonies of the Empire, where you will find precisely the same clause.

On August 1, 1904, in committee, he said:

Sir Frederick Borden: . . . .The troops we sent to South Africa were not sent under the militia law at all. They were sent under a special arrangement; they went as volunteers. The same thing could be done at any time. It certainly would not be done under the militia, either as it was or as we propose to make it, because there is no essential difference. Notwithstanding the fact that my hon. friend from Colchester questions my possession of common sense, I still believe that the Act as we propose it is essentially the same in that respect as it was before, the object being to make clear the actual intention.

The very fundamental idea of a militia force always has been, and is now, home defence.

He said further:

Sir Frederick Borden: I am sure my hon. friend would not pretend to say that under the law as it is to-day the Government could send a corps of the militia upon foreign service.

Mr Gourley: I have not the slightest doubt of it; you could send them anywhere.

Sir Frederick Borden: I am quite prepared to come to close quarters on that question and I am quite prepared to say that in so far as the militia are concerned I do not believe it is in the interests of the militia that a provision of that kind should be made.

Mr. Gourley: Why, every man in Canada wants to go.

Sir Frederick Borden: I do not think the hon. gentleman himself would seriously contemplate a proposition by which the Government would have authority to order the militia to serve a thousand miles away from Canada.

This is the language of the father of the Bill, the then Minister of Militia. The discussion continued:

Mr. Gourley: Why not? What are we here for?

Sir Frederick Borden: It is for the hon. gentleman to explain that.

Very sensible language. Sir Frederick Borden continued:

I do not think that any thoughtful man looking at the condition of things in this young country—

Mr. Gourley: Explain yourself. Tell me what you mean.

Sir Frederick Borden:—would seriously propose to enact a statute which would place in the hands of any Government the power of ordering out the militia to serve in distant parts of the world.

I repeat that until a few days ago nobody in this country thought that the Militia Act could be put in force except for purposes of home defence. The right hon. leader of the Opposition showed, by a cablegram which he read in the course of his address, that such was the opinion of the Government and of the Prime Minister himself. But I have another authority. Would it surprise members of the House when I say that the former Minister of Militia, who gave us yesterday a lecture on constitutional law, was of the same opinion? In Hansard of August, 1914, I read the following words, page 95:

> Mr. A. K. Maclean: In the event of further Canadian troops going to the front, will the system of volunteering be continued, or will the militia be asked to go in a body?
>
> Sir Sam Hughes: I might point out that upwards of 100,000 men have already volunteered, but we are only able to take 22,000, although I am told 27,000 have got on the trains. They simply climbed on and we couldn't keep them off.

Recruiting was going well at that time. He continued:

> So far as my own personal views are concerned, I am absolutely opposed to anything that is not voluntary in any sense—

These are the words that I want the House to note.

> —and I do not read in the law that I have any authority to ask Parliament to allow troops other than volunteers to leave the country.

Sir, holding as I do the strong opinion that this Bill is a departure from the rules and principles which have hitherto prevailed, I submit that such a departure cannot be made without the consent and the sanction of the people. The moral unity of Canada cannot be maintained or secured without government of the people and by the people, and the ruling of the majority. I believe in democratic principles in time of war as in time of peace. To this Parliament, which has outlived its constitutional existence, in which a large section of the people of Canada is not represented and which is asked to pass an arbitrary measure of compulsion, I commend these words of Burke:

> Let the Commons in Parliament assembled be one and the same thing with the commons at large. The distinctions that are made to separate us are unnatural and wicked contrivances. Let us identify, let us incorporate ourselves with the people.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce said that the proposal of a referendum was a dilatory expedient calculated only to delay the application of the law. My best answer to this argument is that the delay involved will not be greater than that which would have resulted had the proposal of the Prime Minister been accepted. The offer was to form a coalition Cabinet, pass this Bill and appeal to the country to put it into force. Where is the difference? Is it a crime that we should ask that the people be consulted in this matter by the only means which is at our disposal?

Sir, I ask the Government to be loyal to the Canadian people. I ask the Prime Minister to reconsider his decision; to reconcile the country, which is now threatened with internal trouble and disruption. The only way to do that is to accept the amendment of the leader of the Opposition and trust the Canadian people.

Mr. J. A. BARRETTE (Berthier) (translation): Mr. Speaker, when the Prime Minister introduced in the House the Military Service Bill, he stated in plain words that the measure was not inspired from Downing Street but that he it was who on his own impulse as head of the Canadian people, had taken upon himself to frame such an Act. He thinks the seriousness of the present emergency justifies his introducing compulsory service, whatever disastrous consequences may follow in the wake of such a measure, which may well be said to be the bane of Canada's welfare. My sense of duty urges me to express openly in this House my views in the matter and the opinion of my constituents. I shall discuss the issue dispassionately in the light of reason and facts.

I admit that since the declaration of war, all measures tending to Canada's participation in the struggle have received the undivided support of both sides of the House; no dissentient voice was heard. To this day we have done our share of our own free will, and so long as our participation has been voluntary the Canadian people have nobly done their duty. Last January, the Prime Minister was invited to London to attend the Imperial War Conference, and he came back more of an Imperialist than ever. Allow me to suggest, Mr. Speaker, the necessity of inserting at once in the Statutes a very important piece of legislation prohibiting the Prime Minister of Canada from going out of the country during his term of office. Since 1896, every time a Canadian minister has gone overseas to represent Canada at imperial conferences, he returned an imperialist to the core, blind to the true interests of the Canadian people.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I must acquaint the House with the position I took previously on this important matter. In October, 1916, at a largely attended meeting held at Berthierville, in the presence of the ex-Secretary of State (Mr. Patenaude), I stated to the electors of my county and my province that I was irreconcilably opposed to any kind of compulsory service and pledged myself to combat it in every possible way. This year, on the Sunday after the Prime Minister had stated his policy, I forthwith announced to the electors of my parish that I was as opposed as ever I was to conscription of any kind and recalled the pledge I had given in 1916.

When I made these statements, there was no question of conscription at all, and I was then acting freely, knowing I was acting in the best interests of my constituents as well as of my country.

As soon as the Prime Minister had announced to this House his intention of introducing a new war policy, the popular sentiment, which had been in favour of the war, was completely modified to such an extent that it has become hostile to any participation in the present war. In all sections of the country, protests were made at public meetings, and numerous petitions have been sent to the members of this House.

With your leave, Mr. Speaker, I will read the copy of a resolution adopted by the council of the parish of Ste. Genevieve of Berthier, strongly protesting against this conscription Bill, and which reads as follows:

At a general meeting of the municipal council of the parish of Sainte Geneviève de Berthier, held in the city of Berthier, at the council's regular meeting place, on Tuesday, the fifth day of June, 1917, at 8 o'clock a.m., in accordance with the provisions of the Quebec Municipal Code; at which were present: His Honour the Mayor, J. F. Fernet, and Councillors Charles Denis, Arthur Ducharme, Octavien Lavallée and Paul Savignac, forming a quorum of the said council, His Honour the Mayor chairman. Councillor Ducharme moved, seconded by Councillor Denis, and it was unanimously resolved:

Whereas, Sir Robert L. Borden, Prime Minister of Canada, has declared in the House of Commons that he will submit a Bill providing for a system of selective conscription for the overseas military service:

Whereas, the sending across the seas of Canadian troops has already seriously compromised the country's economic situation, and whereas it is in the interest, both of Canada and the Empire and its alies, that the Canadian population should turn all its energies to promoting agricultural and manufacturing industries;

Whereas, since the beginning of the war raging in Europe, Sir Robert L. Borden has declared in the House of Commons, at different times, and particularly on January 17, 1916, that the Government did not intend to adopt conscription;

Whereas, the cost of living is ever increasing, it would be more proper for the Canadian Government to take the necessary measures towards improving agricultural conditions;

Therefore, this Council, interpreting the unanimous feelings of the population of the parish of Sainte Geneviève de Berthier, strongly protests, both in its own name and on behalf of the said parish's entire population, against the imposition of conscription, without previously consulting the people, either by means of a referendum or through general elections, and that copies of the present resolution be sent to the Prime Minister of Canada, the Honourable Sir Robert L. Borden, to the leader of the Opposition, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, to our representative at Ottawa, Mr, J. A. Barrette; and be it further resolved that the Dominion member be instructed to vote against any conscription proposal.

A true copy of the resolution passed by the municipal council of the parish of Sainte Geneviève de Berthier, taken from the book of proceedings, and in my custody, as secretary-treasurer.

(Signed) J. A. Lavallée,
Secretary-Treasurer.

To this resolution of protest, I have answered as follows:

To Mr. J. A. Lavallée, notary,
Secretary-Treasurer of the parish of Berthier, Berthierville.

Dear Mr. Lavallée,

I have duly received copy of the resolution of the municipal council of the parish of Sainte Geneviève de Berthier.

I congratulate you upon your civic spirit, and I am convinced that it was through your enlightened patriotism that this resolution was unanimously passed, and that you have really at heart the interests of the French Canadian race.

I beg leave, Mr. Secretary, to repeat to you the statement I made last fall at a large meeting held at Berthierville, in the presence of 6,000 electors of the county, and from its vicinity, where I stated that I was completely opposed to conscription. This year, on the Sunday following the declaration made by the Prime Minister of Canada, I alike stated publicly in my own parish that I was altogether opposed to this Government measure. I then acted freely, knowing I was doing so in the best interest of my constituents.

I sincerely hope this declaration will rejoice the heart of all the true French Canadians of my county and of my province.

Please accept, my dear friend, the expression of my highest sentiments and believe me,

Yours most truly,

(Signed) J. A. Barrette.

Ottawa, June 6, 1917.

Similar requests from the parishes of Lavaltrie, Lonoraie, St. Gabriel de Brandon, St. Norbert and St. Barthelemi, have alike been addressed to me. To all these requests, I have made the same answer as I have just read to the members of this House. I have likewise sent to every municipal secretary of my county a copy of said letter. That must clearly show you that I have always been, by principle and in fact, against the conscription which it is desired to impose upon us to-day. I know that this bold and strong attitude of mine will probably be diversely interpreted by some political friends, as my county has been particularly favoured, as far as Public Works are concerned.

May I be allowed to tell the House that since 1911 until the present day my county has been favoured with a good deal more public works of every kind than under all former administrations from Confederation up to the day when I was returned as the member for the county of Berthier.

I know that my frank determination may relax some friendships which I held dear, but when a principle was at stake I have never paused before breaking away from my party and silencing my heart so as to listen only to the voice of my conscience. How could it be held that I remain indifferent to so radical an innovation which will cause perturbation in the political annals of the country, seeing that in the past I have always been able to rise above partisanship.

Allow me, Mr. Speaker, to glance upon the past and to recall to the House that in 1912, when it was proposed to enlarge the territory of Manitoba by the annexation of Keewatin, the rights which the minority in the annexed part held under the constitution had to be safeguarded. In spite of the threats of a few narrow-minded politicians, I was not afraid to break away from my party and vote for the Mondou amendment. Allow me also to recall to your memory that during the session of 1916, when the rights of the minority had to be upheld in the province of Ontario, I voted again in favour of the Lapointe motion without caring for the hue and cry of my party.

It is not astonishing, Sir, to hear me say to-day that I am altogether against conscription. By referring to the Debates of the session of 1912-13, Vol. I, fol. 570, you will find that the hon. member from Yamaska (Mr. Mondou) submitted as an amendment to the speech from the Throne a motion which laid a principle totally different from that which says that "when England is at war, Canada is also at war." The motion of Mr. Mondou was in the following terms:

> Mr. Speaker, I beg to move the following amendment to the Address:
>
> That this House is ready and willing to adopt, at any time, efficient measures for the defence of Canada, an autonomous colony under the British Crown; but that this House is nevertheless of opinion that the Canadian Parliament has no right to impose on the Canadian people responsibilities in regard to the general defence of the Empire, as long as under the present status of constitutional relations between Canada and the United Empire of Great Britain and Ireland, the Government of His Majesty, responsible to the people of the United Empire alone, will reserve for itself the exclusive management and control of Imperial and international questions.

While inviting the House to defeat the amendment moved by Mr. Mondou, the Prime Minister spoke as follows (See Hansard, 1912-13, Vol. I, fol. 579):

> The other considerations which have been alluded to will be held in regard in the future. I would go further than my right hon. friend in one respect. My right hon. friend says that the amendment has been proposed at an inopportune time, and he is not prepared to say what his attitude in regard to this amendment would be if it had been proposed at the proper time. Whether it properly came up in debate or not, I would vote against it, for the reason that it would prevent Canada from lifting her finger in the defence of the Empire if war were declared to-morrow.

I am pleased to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that Mr. Achim, Mr. Lamarche, Mr. Mondou and your servant were the only members of the House who voted for that amendment.

Later on, during the same session, when the $35,000,000 Bill relating the construction of three Dreadnoughts in England was before the Canadian Parliament, I also voted against that measure because I wanted to fulfil the promises that had been made to the electors of my constituency at the time of the election in 1911. If my memory serves me right, during that campaign the Laurier navy scheme was decried everywhere and held as nefarious on every husting, and it was said that our children ought not to be sent to be disemboweled on the seas of China and everywhere else. The Borden tribute which was to amount to $20,000,000 was equally disapproved. In a fit of generosity the Prime Minister increased that tribute to $35,000,000. Was that increase from $20,000,000 to $35,000,000 a legitimate reason to uphold a measure which I had condemned? At the same session the hon. member from Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) submitted an amendment to the Bill and said that the measure should not be passed until it was put before the people at a general eleciton.

I may remark, Sir, that I voted for the Turriff motion.

Having made all those statements, how could it be asserted that I did not oppose with all my might that unjust scheme of conscription.

Australians have had the opportunity of voicing their opinion by means of a referendum. Why should that privilege be denied to the people of Canada? Are we not entitled to that same liberty enjoyed by exclusively British colonies? I always beleved that England was a democratic country and that wherever waved the British flag, there could democratic institutions find security and protection. To-day we claim our right to freedom, and I place as much trust in the patriotism of the French Canadians as in the loyalty of my English-speaking countrymen. I much prefer Henri Bourassa speaking his mind openly before the whole country to certain narrow-minded members on the Government side of the House who cannot find the courage to say openly what is in their mind or who even proclaim loudly what is not in their heart.

Mr. Lamarche, ex-member for Nicolet, whom I should like to see again in this House, speaking the other day at the Monument National, asked whether Canada in the present war should make a further effort, or call a halt. When the Prime Minister announced his conscription policy, he stirred up dormant consciences and gave the people of this country an opportunity of examining in the light of reason and facts whether Canada had done its duty. So long as our participation in the war was voluntary, I supported all measures to that end, but when it is intended to turn a free and generous gift into compulsion, I also hold without a moment's hesitation that we should call a halt, that further efforts on our part would drive the country to ruin and bankruptcy and that we shall have our hands full trying to meet our accumulated obligations.

At the meeting at the Monument National to which I referred, Mr. Montpetit demonstrated beyond possible doubt that by contributing further Canada would imperil its economic development. I think, Mr. Speaker, the people's welfare calls upon us to put a stop immediately to the sending of troops to the front. In so doing, we would allay a serious agitation and restore peace in the homes; mothers would regain their happiness when they see that their sons are kept to them to till the land, and, as explained by the distinguished economist whom I have just named, the Empire would derive more benefit from our sons' work on the farm. Otherwise the wound inflicted Canada will never heal.

I now state before the House that in future, I shall support any leader or any party who declares himself against compulsory service. The people through a referendum should have a say in the matter.

I shall for those reasons vote against the Military Service Bill and for any amendment that may have the effect of nullifying the bill.

I beg to give another reason for my vote. How can the Government, after its mandate has expired, justify the passing of such an extreme measure? I have always taken the real duty of a representative to be to carry out the people's wishes and ensure the people's welfare. Perhaps my stand against conscription will not have all the effect desired, but at least will I be able to repeat in my heart the words of a noble mother, Admiral Bouvet's, in front of her son's coffin: "Open wide the doors, for never has so great an honour entered this house." There are defeats, Mr. Speaker, that carry with them more glory than victories, and as for me I never felt so honoured as when I take this opportunity of combatting a measure so baneful and unpatriotic.

Before I resume my seat, I beg to move in amendment to the amendment, seconded by my hon. friend Mr. Achim: that all the words of the said amendment after the word "following" be taken out and the following substituted therefor: "that this Bill be not now read a second time, but be read a second time this day six months."

Mr. SPEAKER: Sir Robert Borden moves:

That Bill No. 75, Military Service Act, 1917, be now read a second time.

To which Sir Wilfrid Laurier moves in amendment:

That all the words of the question after the word "that" be struck out and the following be substituted therefor:—

"The further consideration of this Bill be deferred until the principle thereof has, by means of a referendum, been submitted to and approved of by the electors of Canada."

To which Mr. Barrette moves, seconded by Mr. Achim, in amendment to the said amendment:

That all the words after the word "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor: "this Bill be not now read a second time, but it be read a second time this day six months."

On the motion of Mr. F. F. Pardee, the debate was adjourned.

On the motion of Hon. Mr. Sévigny, the House adjourned at 10.47 p.m.

Thursday, June 21, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

PAPER PRESENTED.

List of points on National Transcontinental Railway, Eastern Division, from which rails were lifted for shipment overseas to France.—Mr. Cochrane.

EXPENSES OF PARLIAMENTARY SESSIONS.

Mr. W. B. NORTHRUP (East Hastings) presented the first report of the Select Committee appointed by this House to act with a like committee of the Senate to consider the cost of each session of Parliament, as follows:

The Select Committee appointed by the House to act with a like committee of the Senate to consider the cost of each session of Parliament and of reducing the same, beg leave to present the following as their first report:

Your committee recommend that the quorum of the two committees when meeting together shall consist of seven members.

Mr. GRAHAM: Has any work been done by the committee?

Mr. NORTHRUP: This report is simply the first report after the two committees had met. We found that, owing to an adjournment of the Senate, it might be impossible to obtain a quorum, and so it was agreed to ask this House to reduce the number of the quorum to seven.

On motion of Mr. Northrup the report was concurred in.

PROTECTION OF MIGRATORY BIRDS.

Hon. W. J. ROCHE (Minister of the Interior) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 92, respecting a certain convention between His Majesty and the United States of America for the protection of migratory birds in Canada and the United States.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. ROCHE: This Bill is the result of a treaty that was entered into between His Majesty and the United States Government a few months ago for the better protection of migratory birds. It was found that migratory birds, both game birds and insectivorous birds, that migrate from the United States to Canada and vice versa, have become very much reduced in numbers owing to the laxness and non-enforcement of game laws, and because some of the states as well as some of the provinces of Canada had not sufficiently effective game laws. It was therefore decided that the only possible way in which these birds could be properly protected was by a treaty between the two countries. Such a treaty was entered into which has been assented to by the various states that have jurisdiction over the game laws in the United States, and by the various provinces that have jurisdiction over the game laws in Canada. There is to-day a Bill before Congress giving effect to the treaty so far as the United States is concerned, and this Bill takes similar action with regard to Canada.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS.

MILITIA DEPARTMENT MOTOR CARS.

Mr. TOBIN:

1. How many motor cars are used by the Militia Department at Halifax?
2. For what purpose are the said cars used?

Sir EDWARD KEMP:

1. Four.

2. These cars are used by the General Officer Commanding the District and the staff in connection with military duties.

ST. CHARLES RIVER DAM.

Mr. LACHANCE:

1. Since when was the work on the dam in the St. Charles river, Quebec, stopped, and upon whose order or request?
2. For what reason was it so stopped?
3. When will the work be again started?

Mr. REID:

1. Work on the St. Charles river works at Quebec has not been stopped.

2 and 3. Answered by No. 1.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN.

Mr. TOBIN:

What are the names, rank, pay, and nature and place of employment of all officers attached to headquarters at Halifax and the various departments of the military service or connected in any way with Military Division No. 6?

COST OF LIVING IN THE YUKON.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. OLIVER: If I may be permitted, I would like to give the signature to the telegram which I read yesterday from the Yukon, because I find it does not appear in Hansard. The signature was that of Mrs. Geraldine Sharpe, of the Women's Protective League. I also received, under date of June 20, a confirmatory telegram from Mrs. Marie Fotheringham, of the Women's Progressive League.

LABOUR STRIKE IN WESTERN COAL MINES.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. OLIVER: Would the Minister of Labour give the House such information as he can in regard to the present situation of the difficulties respecting the coal miners of Alberta?

Mr. CROTHERS: I do not think I can add anything to the statement I made yesterday, which was to the effect that the Government were taking action with the view to having the mines opened. We expect this will be done in a day or two.

Mr. W. A. BUCHANAN (Medicine Hat): I have a couple of telegrams to-day from the unions in Alberta stating that the men had agreed to return to work on the terms agreed to by the Policy Committee and Mr. R. F. Green, M.P., and that their only objection was to the penalty clause, which the operators insisted upon. Is that the case or not?

Mr. CROTHERS: I think the information that my hon. friend has received is correct. The representatives of the miners and operators agreed on everything except the penalty clause.

Mr. OLIVER: Might I further suggest to the Minister of Labour that he take the earliest possible opportunity of placing before the House and the country the conclusions of the Government in regard to the production of coal in the West. The importance of this matter cannot be exaggerated, and I think it would be very, very much in order if the minister would inform the House and the country as to the situation at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. KNOWLES: Did the minister state that the Government would be operating the mines in a day or two, or simply that they would have an announcement to make then?

Mr. CROTHERS: We expect the mines to be in operation within the next two or three days.

MILITARY SERVICE ACT, 1917.

DEBATE CONTINUED ON MOTION FOR SECOND READING.

Consideration of the motion of the Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden (Prime Minister) for the second reading of Bill No. 75, Military Service Act, 1917, and the amendment of Sir Wilfrid Laurier thereto, and on the amendment to the amendment by Mr. Barrette, resumed from Wednesday, June 20.

Mr. F. F. PARDEE (West Lambton): Mr. Speaker, to my mind there is one thought, and one thought only, in the minds of the people of the Dominion of Canada to-day. That one thought possesses our people in their waking, and I had almost said in their sleeping hours; that thought is of the crisis the Empire is struggling through, and of the means by which we may use all our resources to bring the war to a successful conclusion for the Allied powers. I am speaking here to-day, Sir, as a Canadian to Canadians and not as party man to party man, for this is not an hour for partisan speeches.

Democracy has made great strides. Prior to August, 1914, I take it, there was not a man in this House—there was scarcely a man in this Dominion—who would have believed, that in this twentieth century, any nation or any people would attempt to strike a blow at the very foundation of democracy, with all the ambitions it inspires in the human heart and with all the benefits it has conferred on the world—and to substitute for it an autocracy, which through the ages has crushed the human race. Such was the wanton design of Germany. Tyrannical to the last degree, cursed with militarism in all its phases, the right of free speech denied, and the people's own parliament practically elected for them, Germany stands opposed to democracy, and for the maintenance of a nation of men in bondage instead of a free people. It is of Germany that Mr. Balfour has said there could be no greater danger to the world than the menace of a nation which believed itself to be superior to all law, human and divine. By the power of might over right Germany seeks to compel other nations to act according to her tenets. Does Canada want that? If that be a true picture of Germany, and I do not think I have overstated the case, is Canada not prepared to say that with all her resources in men and money and in the pride of her young democratic nationhood she shall stand to protect her free institutions against this Prussian slavery, and to help her sister enlightened nations to repel the onslaughts of Prussian barbarism on civilization? These are the thoughts that appeal to me; these are the thoughts that must come home to every one who ponders on the present day situation in world affairs. I say, Sir, that Canada cannot afford to allow the tenets of Germany to prevail through our lack of effort.

Do the people of Canada realize that to-day they are enjoying the greatest freedom to be found amongst nations? Do they realize that, if Germany conquers, they will become bondsmen instead of freemen? That they do realize it to the full, I have reason to doubt, judging by what has taken place during the last year or year and a half. We entered the war with the greatest enthusiasm; we cheered our men off to the front; we threw our hats in the air; we pledged ourselves that we would stand for what we thought was right. The war has gone on. The war has lasted longer than most Canadians ever thought it would.

We are now getting on to the end of the third year, and does the thought ever strike us that very possibly the Canadian people are commencing to take this war as a matter of course? Do Canadians, men and women alike, not need an awakening? Heaven knows that our women have done wonderfully as have most of the men, but the fact remains, in my humble judgment, we have got to rise to the stern needs and duties that lie before us. The people of Canada living at home in peace, comfort and happiness, if they desire to hold up their heads amongst the peoples of the world, must show that they have real Canadianism enough to make the necessary sacrifice to support the men who to-day are protecting us in the enjoyment of all that life holds dear. We have got to have enough red blood in us to say that if the gallant men fighting in the trenches are willing to make the greatest sacrifice, we shall make some commensurate sacrifice on our part. Does the rich man realize, as he rolls down the street in his motor, with his wife and his daughter, that did he live in Germany and walk along the street of a German city, unless his wife or daughter made way for a German officer, she would be spat upon or slapped on the face with a sword? Does he realize in his wealth how small the sacrifice that he and others of his class have made? Does he realize that in neglecting to make that sacrifice, he becomes a unit in the force that is helping Germany?

This is not the day for soft words and soft actions. The time has long since gone by for that. Now the Canadian people, men and women, need an awakening which can only come through strong individual and concentrated leadership. Failing that, everything is at a standstill; failing that, our last condition may be worse than our first.

We must not think too much of party; we must remember that whatever party be in power, our country remains and her problems remain with her. The fate of parties, to my mind, matters not so long as we do our part for the cause of liberty and right and the preservation of our democratic institutions. Four hundred thousand of our people have gone; they went voluntarily, they went as young, red-blooded Canadians should have gone. Does anybody think for a moment that they went because they loved war and all that it means? No. They went from the highest motives of national and Imperial feeling; they went as young patriots; they went to uphold the liberty that our fathers and forefathers have secured and handed down to us. They are gone—they are yonder—fighting, bleeding, dying, sacrificing themselves in this greatest war for principle, honour, and liberty. Is it not apparent that the duty of the Canadian people, and of this Parliament, to see to it that the men who have gone shall have the backing of the men who stay at home?

These are the reasons, imperfectly though I may have expressed them, that appeal to me in considering this question. There are thousands of young men scattered all over this country to-day who are not necessary for the purpose of carrying on the business of the state, and if they will not fight they are not fit to be free; and the man who is not fit to be free ought be made to fight. Every citizen has the protection of the state, and when the existence of his protector is imperilled it is his duty to give that protector his support, to the offering up of his life if necessary.

Let me say, in passing, that I am speaking to-day only of the province I know. It would be presumption on my part to speak for any other. But this I do know, that in Ontario, in the towns and villages of this province, there are thousands of young men whose place should be at the front, and I have absolutely no objection to saying to them here, that when the time comes, so far as I am concerned and great although I know the responsibility is, through this vote of mine, to the front they must go.

I come to the amendment that has been moved by my leader (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), and I may say to you, Sir, that I find myself politically in the most painful position of my life. I have been a follower of Sir Wilfrid Laurier since I knew enough to be a Liberal. I have admired him; I recognize the fact that to-day, among the statesmen of Greater Britain, he stands pre-eminent. I recognize the fact that he guided the destinies of this country for many years, and that no man could possibly have better filled that high office. I recognize further, and I say it with no disparagement whatever, that although to-day he is but the leader of the Opposition, he is a predominating figure in the British Empire. You can well understand, therefore, that, in differing from a man of whom I hold that opinion, I feel that my action may be presumptuous. I do it only for the reason that my sincere conviction is that my course is right—I could not do it otherwise. To my other friends in this House, my French-Canadian friends, let me say this, that although I differ from them on the matter of a referendum, I fully recognize that they have for years fought a fight that has been as full of patriotism and as full of Canadianism as has been fought by any group of men in this House. All I can say to them is that, although I disagree from them, I believe their convictions to be as honest and as earnest as my own, and honest and earnest convictions are always worthy of respect.

Of the referendum let me say just a word. It may seem a paradox for me to say what I have to say, yet the world is to-day full of paradoxes. There is not much logic to-day. What is stood by to-day is knocked down to-morrow in the way of opinions. The true reason why I am not in favour of a referendum is that I believe that, in the present moment of unrest, it is not desirable. The Government made a promise that conscription would never come. It has thrown suddenly into the political and national ring the widest and biggest question that the people of Canada, or their representatives, have ever had to consider, without any preparatory education to bring the people's mind to a state of calm and sober judgment. Under these conditions I believe that the referendum would be defeated, and I fear, with that defeat, the door would be shut absolutely in the face of recruiting and in the face of all other kinds of conscription which ought to be made. You may tell me that the opinion of the people should rule; you may tell me I am going against the will of the people, I say in answer that along these lines and others, the people of the Dominion of Canada are to-day asking to be led, and not to do the leading. So it is that I must vote against the amendment proposed by my revered leader.

Sir, this is not a time for party recrimination. I have desired and endeavoured to keep absolutely away from the flavour of it. Yet it must be recognized that mistakes have been made. Let us be quite fair, let us be quite frank with ourselves. Mistakes have been made; there has been lack of recruiting leadership, there has been lack of organization; there has been lethargy: there have been blunders in administration, and I am sorry to say there has been the strongest sort of partisanship in this crisis. It appears to me that there has been an absolute failure to rise to the possibilities and the necessities of national and patriotic service. We have not done it, we have not got out of the rut. We have not literally raised ourselves by our own boot straps as we ought to have done.

What has been done cannot be undone; but the mistakes, the blunders, the lethargy, the failure to give leadership, which, more than anything else, have contributed to the situation which confronts us now, must be atoned for by the most vigorous, honest and consecrated effort on the part of Government and Parliament from this time on. The Canadian people must be assured that henceforth the members of the Government and of Parliament, the men who have assumed the tremendous responsibility of calling citizens to the colours by compulsion, will themselves consecrate all their energies, all their abilities, all their endeavours, to the cause for which they demand that their fellow-citizens shall fight.

I would say to the Government, earnestly and sincerely, that when to-day we are here voting for the conscription of men, we should also conscript other resources of the people of Canada. This Government and this Parliament will be accused, and rightly accused, if we bring not forth further conscription of wealth and of resources. It must not be said that we, sitting here calmly in our places in this chamber, are willing and content, by a mere yea or nay, to spill the blood of the youth of Canada, but that we are afraid to spill the rich man's money. I may be told that there has been part conscription of wealth to-day, by reason of the business tax, but I do not think the pocket of the rich man in this country has yet been touched.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. PARDEE: Go where you will, north, south, east and west, and you find every evidence of a surplus of wealth. The Government is absolutely bound, in duty and in fairness to the men who to-day in the trenches of France are protecting that wealth, to make those rich men give out of their abundance for the sustenance of the soldier. Whether the Conscription Bill will pass or not I cannot tell. I have concluded to ask this Government a thing that is dear to me, something I cannot disabuse my mind of, even though I vote for the principle of the Bill.

The Prime Minister has asked members of this side of the House for suggestions. May I meet that request by earnestly urging the national advisability of preceding the operation of the Bill by a last big and sincere appeal to the patriotism of young Canadian manhood to voluntarily come forward to back their brothers at the front. Under direct and real Government leadership in this respect—and with the conscientious co-operation of Canadians of all parties, all classes, all provinces— I believe that Canadian patriotism would yet make the actual operation of the compulsory service measure unnecessary. Such an appeal, backed by an earnest educational campaign, and conducted in the true spirit, would, I verily believe, result in the coming forward of the 100,000 men required, and more. If this can thus be done—and I believe it yet can—is it not worth while to save a situation fraught with serious possibilities of schism and strife, a situation which may all too easily produce a moral effect neither creditable to Canada nor helpful to the cause we aim to serve. I sincerely trust that the Prime Minister will give earnest consideration to this suggestion.

I have to disagree with many of my party, and with my honored and revered chief, but let me assure the House that I have thought long and earnestly over these matters—so long and so earnestly—that my conclusions are no longer opinions; they have become sincere convictions.

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Solicitor General): No one could be present during this debate, or, if not present, could look out with intelligent mind on the manifestations of sentiment everywhere appearing without being convinced that this discussion is of greater consequence than any that has ever before taken place in this Parliament. I say that, not because the issue is in doubt. Substantial unanimity, though not entire unanimity, on this side of the House would perhaps carry the Bill. But the courage of certain hon. gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber—courage in an hour of trial—has placed the issue beyond all doubt at all. However, it is not the mere passage of the measure that is of final consequence. It is the enforcement of the Bill that we must keep in mind. It is not so much the enactment of law as obedience to law that counts. That is why this Bill should be thoroughly considered, and why the debate should be conducted in such a spirit, and with such a purpose, as will afford an example to the people of Canada. The right and honourable thing must be done. The right and honourable thing will be done. The right and honourable thing is embodied in this Bill. But the important duty of members of Parliament is to see to it that we make plain to every reasonable man to the four corners of this Dominion, that we pass this Bill, and enforce it, only because it is the right thing to do—that we do so, far from any spirit of vindictiveness, or for any unworthy or insufficient reason, but because, in this crisis of the nation, it is the only right thing to do. It will become us, also, to demonstrate in this House—to be in this House a reflection of the overwhelming sentiment of this country, that the war in which we are engaged must be pressed on to victory by the only means in which it can be pressed.

I regard the forwarding of troops to the front as a necessity, as an all-essential, as something we cannot shirk. Does anybody dispute that? Whatever means are necessary to procure these men, they must be sent, and whatever action is necessary on our part to support our army at present in France, we must adopt. No one has seriously argued in this House—and I give every hon. gentleman the credit of saying no one seriously believes—that we can dispatch 350,000 men overseas, commissioned by us to stand between our country and destruction, and leave them to be decimated and destroyed. The obligation of honour is upon us, it is the plainest obligation that ever was placed on a nation. The obligation of honour is fortified by the primary obligation of all people to protect the security of the state. There is no other way in which either the honour or the security of the state can be preserved.

In the next place, we are able to send these men; we have the men to send. Does anybody dispute that? It is argued feebly by some that we require all our men for our industrial, commercial and agricultural pursuits. True, we can use them all here; there are opportunities in Canada to occupy them all. But surely a reasonable mind must agree that we need them far more sorely in France. It is true that we cannot send them without some inconvenience. The soldiers who represent France on that 350-mile battle line in Europe are not there without inconvenience to the people at home; neither are the soldiers who represent Great Britain. When the men are sent away, necessarily, more women will be employed in our factories, more old men will be employed on our street cars, more boys will be employed on farms during the summer instead of passing their time at lake resorts. There might even be a very small diminution of production in Canada. But all this we can afford infinitely better than we can afford to allow our lines in France to be decimated, weakened or destroyed. We can afford the men; we must send them; what other way is there of sending them?

Some have suggested that if we withdrew this Bill we could sustain our forces at the front by a continuation of the voluntary system. The hon. gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. Pardee) and who has delivered an address which will long live in the records of this Parliament, has suggested that, at all events under the shadow of this Bill, more men may be secured. I do not doubt that that is true; possibly under the shadow of this Bill more men will enlist, under a sort of voluntary system. But that emphasizes, does not destroy, the necessity for the Bill. Who can contend, with justification, that the voluntary system has not been adequately tried in Canada, both as to vigour of effort and as to length of time? The member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley), if I understood correctly an interruption that he made yesterday, feels that the voluntary system is now doing enough. Well, for twelve months it has produced an average of 6,000, or 7,000 men a month, while the wastage in Canada and in England amounts to a very substantial portion of that figure. In the two months through which we have just passed, the voluntary system yielded us not one man for four of those who were casualties among our armies in France. Add the casualties in France and the wastage in England to the wastage in Canada, and it is as plain as any rule of arithmetic that further reliance on the voluntary system will in time—perhaps in a very short time—so reduce our forces that we shall have no substantial representation in the war.

It has been suggested that everything has not been done that might have been done. Perhaps that is so, all I know is that we have done everything that we were able to devise, that the resources of the Administration were able to evolve, to make the voluntary system successful. Has there been during the whole course of this debate a suggestion of any practical step that might have been taken and which was not taken to make the voluntary system successful? I have not heard one. Was there not a sufficient number of recruiting officers? Were the recruiting officers not the proper men? In some cases, perhaps, they were not; no Government that ever existed could select in every particular case the proper man. There may have been an English recruiting officer in Montreal, but there were French recruiting officers as well in Montreal. One would think, listening to the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) that the only man commissioned to recruit in Montreal was the Methodist minister of whom he complained. I obtained to-day from the Militia Department a list of recruiting officers in the province of Quebec and in the city of Montreal. When I got that list I thought they had sent me a list of French-Canadian recruits; the number was almost legion. I will not weary the House by reading the list; it is sufficient to say that there was no discrimination whatsoever. I am sure that hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House know that to be the fact.

Was there not sufficient earnestness in the carrying on of the voluntary system? I do not think that the earnestness displayed by the adherents of this party excelled in any degree the earnestness of many adherents of the party represented by hon. gentlemen opposite. And I believe each was as generously manifested in every part of Canada as it was in Manitoba or Ontario. I know of no resource that was not adopted; the system became at last one which was a system of voluntary enlistment only in a very modified and attenuated sense. It became a system rather of conscription by cajolery—and not altogether too creditable to Canada. Consequently, speaking from the viewpoint, not only of the Government, but of the Dominion, there is no other way of getting men than by adopting this measure. The men must be had; we have them to send, and there is no other way of procuring them and sending them. The business of the country, therefore, is, by this system, to get the men and to send them overseas.

In objection to this course it is urged that, however essential it may be or whatever may be our physical power to accomplish it, we are restrained by constitutional limitations from performing this duty. I will not burden the discussion with a long, wire-drawn argument as to our powers. Every one who wants to face this issue rather than evade it will admit that if we have not the constitutional power, we had better get it; and there is nowhere to get it except in this House. Who, except ourselves, can legislate constitutional validity into what we desire to do? The Parliament of Great Britain is as powerless to do so as is the Parliament of France. The Parliament of Canada has full constitutional power. If the law is not right, surely it is our duty to put the law right with the least possible delay. But the law in principle is right. The law, as it stands at present is quite sufficient to enable us to act, except from this point of view: the Militia Act enables us to get men compulsorily by a system of hit and miss, of selection by lot. It does not provide the machinery for the allocation or selection of men after they are got together by lot. It simply reaches the point of the enlistment, or, rather, the point of the reporting of the men; after that it is chaos. But the essential feature of compulsion, liability to service, is embedded in the Militia Act, even in more naked and pronounced form than it is in The Military Service Act.

Strenuous effort is being exerted to show that the intention of the Militia Act was to limit compulsion to defence within this country, or, at all events, within this continent. I listened with great interest to the argument of the member for Kamouraska (Mr. E. Lapointe) and I address these words in particular to my French Canadian friends. The Militia Act provides that all males between 18 and 60 shall be liable to service, and that liability may be exercised for the purpose of securing the defence of Canada within or beyond Canada. I have not given the precise words, but that is a clear interpretation of them. The militia, after it has been compulsorily recruited, may be sent anywhere "within or beyond Canada for the defence thereof." Those are the exact words. Consequently, it is essential that at the point to which and in the purpose for which the militia is sent, the defence of Canada must be involved. The hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. E. Lapointe), who is an able gentleman, presents a concise, succinct argument, at all events, the best, I think, that could be presented from his point of view. But let us analyse it. He argues that because Sir Frederick Borden, in 1904, at one point of the debate—and remember that Sir Frederick Borden said something of an opposite nature at another point—stated that where the defence of the Empire was involved, soldiers compulsorily recruited could not be sent overseas on behalf of Canada, and he mentioned at that time the South African war. I do not know that very serious argument could be urged against Sir Frederick Borden's contention as so applied. It could be argued with great force that the security and defence even of Great Britain were not involved in the South African war. I do not know that the contrary could be argued. Certainly the defence of Canada was not involved directly in the South African war, if indeed it was involved indirectly. Sir Frederick Borden was not so far out in his answer to the question of Mr. Maclean in that regard. But the hon. member goes on to make this most astonishing statement:

> Until a few days ago, I do not think that anybody who has studied the constitutional history of Canada ever expressed the opinion that her militia could be sent overseas by virtue of that Act.

The speech of the hon. member is made for the purpose of distribution throughout the province of Quebec, and for the purpose of urging his compatriots in that province against the adoption of the Military Service Act. Is the statement I have quoted a fair one? I would feel justified in going further. Is that a true statement to send out to the people of Quebec—that until a few days ago no one who had ever studied the constitutional history of Canada ever expressed the opinion that the militia could be sent overseas by virtue of that Act? The hon. member repeats that statement in two other places. Now I affirm this, and I challenge contradiction right now or later. No hon. member can point me to a statement made by any constituted legal authority in Canada, at any time since the first Militia Act was passed in 1868 up to the present hour, who ever said anything else than that under the Militia Act our troops can be sent overseas. I go further. I am convinced it is safe to assert that until the outbreak of this war no lawyer in this country, whether a responsible official or not except a political agitator, ever ventured the opinion that we could not under the Militia Act send our troops overseas.

Will hon. gentlemen believe this? Even the arch-agitator on this issue himself (Mr. Bourassa) when the present Militia Act was passed, used language which clearly showed and admitted that soldiers enlisted under that Act could be sent overseas. Why does the hon. member for Kamouraska make the statements that he does? I repeat once more, and I challenge contradiction here and now, that from the date this law was enacted until this hour, no constituted legal authority either provincial or Dominion, in this country, ever questioned our power under the Militia Act to send our troops overseas. Does the hon. member quote any one in opposition to that statement? Does he quote any legal authority at all? He quotes a physician on the one hand and an editor on the other. Then he makes bold to say that no one who has studied constitutional history has ever doubted that we could not under the Militia Act send our troops overseas. Is the speech of the hon. member for Kamouraska a right or proper speech in this our country to send to the people of Quebec or of any province? He quotes Sir Frederick Borden as a constitutional authority, but Sir Frederick Borden expressed opinions consistent with both positions. Sir Frederick Borden, however, was a physician. The hon. member quoted the hon. member for Victoria (Sir Sam Hughes), but the hon. member for Victoria on a further study of the Act has stated in the plainest language that under the Militia Act our troops can certainly be sent overseas. Why does the hon. member for Kamouraska make such statements in the presence of the language of the Minister of Justice in the late Government—and the hon. member in his speech referred to the language of that gentleman—who, in words the plainest that man could possibly utter told the House when the Act was adopted that under that Act the troops of this country compulsorily enlisted could be sent overseas, even to India, if in the judgment of the Governor General in Council the defence of Canada was being fought overseas. Sir Charles Fitzpatrick stated at that time that the discretion belonged solely to the Governor General in Council until Parliament later on passed upon his decision. Yet, in the face of that assertion by the constituted legal authority of Canada when the Act was passed in 1904 and almost in the hearing of that distinguished man, the hon. member stated to this House that no one ever asserted such a thing until a few days ago.

Mr. CARROLL: Does the Solicitor General make a distinction between the power of the Government to send conscripted troops overseas and the power of the Government to send voluntarily enlisted troops overseas?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I make no distinction whatever. The Act makes no distinction; it says that you may enlist troops voluntarily or by conscription, and that after you have enlisted them, you can send them beyond Canada for the defence of Canada. Sir Charles Fitzpatrick said, as any one would have said, that it was a matter for the Government, in the exercise of its discretion, to decide, whether it believed that the war being fought overseas was a war involving the defence of Canada. Consequently, so far as compulsory law goes now, the power exists. It has indeed already passed through eleven general elections in this country and has been approved by the people of Canada.

[Mr. Meighen.]

We are told however, that, although we have power as a Government and certainly power as a Parliament to declare that our troops in this war shall go overseas beyond Canada for the defence of Canada, we should not exercise that power. Why? The leader of the Opposition tells us that he is not afraid of an invasion of Canada. The hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) is also brave; he is not afraid of an invasion of Canada either. These hon. gentlemen in their predictions—because at best they are only prophecies—are either right or wrong. If they are wrong, and if there is danger of an invasion of Canada, then we had better get ready as soon as we can and fortify ourselves at the vital point in Europe, against that invasion. They will admit that themselves. If on the contrary they are justified in expecting that there will not be an invasion of this country—that we as Canada are not in danger—I ask why are we not in danger? Why are they so brave? Why do they rest so comfortably? It is because the defence of Canada is being fought over there in France, If the defence of Canada is not made secure by success in France, then Canada is in danger of invasion. And if our defence is bound up with our success in France then it is our bounden duty under the Militia Act to send our troops there for our defence. Let us come to grips on this question. If there is any weakness in that argument I would like to know what it is. One or the other is true: Either we are in danger of invasion right now or later on, as the result of this war, or we are not in danger. If the first is true, then we should certainly send our troops to repel the invader, imminent or apprehended. If the second is true, then our defence is being fought out over there, and it is only by our success over there that we can possibly avoid invasion. It is because the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) believes that the troops of this Empire and of France and Italy will succeed on the western front and the troops of Russia succeed on the eastern front that he sits comfortably in his seat and feels that this country is not in danger of invasion. That means they are fighting out there the defence of Canada. If that is the case, how can he decline the duty that he must surely feel upon his heart of sending the troops of Canada to sustain the defence of Canada overseas?

The hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Lapointe) reads some ancient legislation of 1808 and 1839 to show that under that legislation we might possibly send troops to a country conterminous with this country. But the phrases of those old acts are left out of the legislation of 1868 and they are left out of the legislation of 1904, showing that times had changed since 1808 and 1839, and that Parliament realized in 1868 that the defence of Canada might be fought out elsewhere than on this continent, and that they should take power to defend this country overseas. I put this to hon. gentlemen opposite: Is it not possible, is it not reasonable, that our ancestors in 1839 might have felt themselves in a very different position from what we feel ourselves in to-day? Those were the days of bows and arrows, of little ships and little armies. Is it not possible that the men of that day might have felt that only in this continent could we be assailed as Canada, while we to-day might see clearly that only overseas can we be effectually protected now?

I pass from that and proceed to take up certain of the contentions that have been advanced in support of the amendment moved by the leader of the Opposition. It had been a matter of great interest, and indeed of curiosity, to observe the wonderful collection of opinions that are massed behind this referendum amendment. The referendum amendment is really not an amendment at all. At all events it is not a policy: it is the negation of a policy. Why is it adopted? Merely as an expedient to avoid facing the issue, and to collect behind the Opposition leader all the support he can get. What are the opinions behind the amendment? It is seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver), who complains that we have already waited too long on this matter: that we should have taken this course and had a referendum started a year ago. It is moved by the leader of the Opposition, who complains that we have dashed the Bill upon them too suddenly and too soon. What is the ground of the leader of the Opposition? He argues that the Bill is going to bring about disunion in this country, and will be met with opposition, if not with resistance, on the part of French Canada. His amendment is seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton who wants a bill that will take all of these 100,000 men out of French Canada alone.

Mr. OLIVER: I would like my hon. friend to keep closer to the facts than that. Hansard is my record.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would not have said so if it had not been on Hansard. The hon. gentleman's words are capable of that interpretation, and of no other interpretation. I know he did not use those words with the intention that that interpretation should be applied.

Mr. OLIVER: Thank you.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He took the ground that this Bill would take men out of Alberta or of Edmonton constituency, from which enough men had already gone, his idea being to make the Bill unpopular in the constituency of Edmonton. What is the inevitable conclusion from his words? This is what he said, as reported in Unrevised Hansard, page 2520:

> We have been led to believe that a conscription measure would be fair to the country, and as we have done our duty, in a measure, so it would compel the people in other parts of the country to do their duty. Now, that is the kind of conscription measure I want to see, but that is not the kind of conscription measure my hon. friend has brought down.

Mr. OLIVER: Hear, hear.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He wants to compel those who have not done their duty to do it.

Mr. OLIVER: Hear, hear.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What does he say on the previous page?

> Given a proper measure of universal military service, and there is equality in the distribution of the burden, an equality that does not exist in the case of voluntary service. . . . . If there is not equality of service under the compulsory principle, then, instead of it being a democratic method of meeting a great emergency, it becomes an instrument of tyranny and unfairness in every particular.

Those are his words: I want a conscription measure that provides for equality of service. And how? By taking those who have not enlisted voluntarily until you bring about an equality.

Mr. OLIVER: Hear, hear.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How are you going to get an equality in this country unless in addition to the 8,000 of French-Canadian extraction already enlisted in the province of Quebec we take 100,000 more?

Mr. OLIVER: If it requires 100,000 men from the province of Quebec for the province of Quebec to do its share, then certainly take the 100,000, but my hon. friend does not suggest that it does require that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Would 108,000 from French Canada be any more proportionately than equal to the present contribution from Alberta, man for man, and how can you get an equality unless the contributions are proportionately equal?

Mr. OLIVER: I could not say without a pencil and paper. When my hon. friend attempts to make it appear to this House that I said anything that could be construed as stating that all the further military requirements of Canada should be supplied from the province of Quebec he is using language which has absolutely no foundation, and which is absurd on the face of it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will leave the House and the country to figure out for itself how an equality is going to be reached unless the contributions are proportionately equal.

Mr. OLIVER: Equality is what we want.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is the inevitable conclusion from his words, and I do not intend that he shall escape that conclusion. He used the words only for the purpose of currying favour in his own province.

Mr. OLIVER: Will the hon. member be good enough not to impute motives to other hon. members of this House?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will not impute dishonourable motives but I have a right to impute honourable motives. There is nothing dishonourable about that.

Mr. OLIVER: I rise to a point of order. My point of order is that the Solicitor General, or any other hon. member of this House, must take the statements of other hon. members as they are uttered and he has no right to impute any motives.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I took the statement as it was uttered. I do not want to change the statement but surely I have a right to argue from that statement what I believe to be its inevitable conclusion.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The Solicitor General entirely ignores what my hon. friend from Edmonton says he said and alleges that my hon. friend from Edmonton made a statement in order to curry favour with the district of Edmonton. I understand that is what my hon. friend complains of?

Mr. OLIVER: Yes.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Is that in order, Mr. Speaker?

The DEPUTY SPEAKER: I do not think that the hon. the Solicitor General has imputed motives or has said anything to which the attention of the Speaker should be called.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: Now, that is the character and the variety of the opinion that is behind this amendment. These are the conflicting views that are expressed for the purpose of urging the adoption of this amendment. What is the meaning of it? Here is an amendment moved by the leader of the Opposition who moved it because he himself is against conscription. It is seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton who seconds it because he is in favour of conscription. And its first sponsor is the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) who does not know whether he is in favour of conscription or against it. It will be clear to every one that the purpose of this amendment is to evade rather than to face a very great issue at this time. It is to avoid rather than to enforce the performance of a duty. It is a refuge of discord,—a haven of the disunited. It is not a declaration of faith, it is a declaration of scepticism.

We cannot win this war by referendums. Do the soldiers in France want a referendum?

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is the object of the amendment.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But the hon. member knows very well that the soldiers in France cannot vote on a referendum and where did he or any one else ever express the purpose of asking the soldiers if they wanted a referendum? Will he be willing to leave that question to the soldiers in France? to say whether they want a referendum or not? Would anybody suppose that those who have taken upon themselves this burden, those who are war-weary and worn, whose strength is wasted, whose nerves and vitality are a thousand times exhausted, will say to the people of Canada: Do not send us help unless you ask the slackers at home whether they want to be forced to come? Does anybody suggest such a preposterous thing? A referendum is moved for these conflicting reasons by hon. gentlemen opposite, and it is supported by still more conflicting influences all over this country and all over the world. Do hon. gentlemen realize where they are when they support this proposal? Do they realize the company they are in? I make an appeal to hon. gentlemen opposite who, at other times, and under brighter skies, might have felt that there was a sound principle behind the referendum, to argue out for themselves whether that principle has any application at a time like this. Is the referendum peculiarly suited for war? Is the referendum suited to a time when the best of our electorate, thirty-three per cent of the whole, are overseas and when only a mere fraction of their number might possibly be counted in the vote? Could you apply the principles that might ordinarily be argued with reference to the referendum system to the conditions at this hour? None of those principles apply at all.

The first function of the Government and the first duty of the nation is to secure the safety of the state. The Government or Parliament that fails in that duty commits the cardinal, the unpardonable sin. Surely we have the courage to give a lead to the people of this country. Surely we have the courage to take the step which the hon. member for Edmonton himself admits is the only effective step that can be taken. No man wants to see assistance given to our soldiers in France more than he does. No man has more reason to want to than he has. Why then delay or imperil for an hour the passage of a Bill which is the only means by which assistance can be given? He admits that we cannot get men under the voluntary system. It has been at a standstill for twelve months, he says.

Mr. OLIVER: If the hon. gentleman is alluding to me, would he be good enough to keep within the range of what I have said? I have not said that it would not be possible to get enough men by the voluntary system.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the hon. gentleman supports conscription, is not that the best reason—

Mr. OLIVER: Not at all. I believe that the conscription system is the proper system of recruiting, whether we can get men by the voluntary system or not, if it is administered fairly.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then we should have had conscription at first?

Mr. OLIVER: I have always said that I believed the conscription system was the fairer system, but I recognized the difficulties of putting it into force and I did not press it upon the Government, recognizing those difficulties.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What I said was that the hon. gentleman stated that we could not get them by the voluntary system, and if he referred to the way in which the Government exercising its best judgment was endeavouring to get them, perhaps he will admit that I was correct. I at least admit that he is right that we have exhausted all our efforts in that direction. The results of the past twelve months have shown that recruits cannot be got by our methods at all events, which we believed to be the best at our command. Why, then, imperil the success of the only measure that will get them for the sake of any expediency whatsoever? Time will not wait; why then delay the only system that can be adopted by any evasion at all? What has the Toronto Globe said? I wish to say in all sincerity that I recognize the contribution that the Liberal press of this country has made towards enabling the Government under this Act to do something real and substantial to carry on the war. The Toronto Globe has said that the voluntary system is as dead as Julius Ceasar. Months ago the Liberal press of this country proclaimed that we could not get these troops under the voluntary system. Personally, I have been of that opinion for many a month gone by. We have waited only until we thought the public of Canada generally had realized that fact with such overmastering conviction as to mean the general consent of this country to the putting through of this Bill. Why imperil it? Do hon. gentlemen realize that the passing of this referendum amendment will bring joy to the friends of Germany in every part of the world? It will be welcomed at Potsdam. It would be supported, were he here, by the head of the German nation itself. It will be welcomed by every German newspaper on this and every other continent. It will be welcomed by every slacker all over Canada. That is the company that hon. gentleman are in who support this referendum. The passing of this amendment would be a subject of rejoicing to every pool-room loafer, to every movie veteran, to every sporting fan, to all who have shrunk from duty. But it would be a subject of resentment, regret and pain to the men who have nobly done their part to preserve the liberty, and uphold the honour of Canada.

What does this amendment really mean? What do its consequences entail? A referendum on the principle of the Bill!—what does that mean? Does it mean that "conscription" shall go to the country by way of referendum, that we shall put a question on the voting paper: "Are you in favour of conscription or not?" Why the whole country has passed on conscription as a principle at eleven general elections. There has never been a voice raised against the Militia Act as it stood, that I have heard, on this score, through all these forty-nine years. Now would any body after those eleven verdicts suggest—let us come to grips again—would any body suggest that that question be put to the electorate, Are you in favour of conscription? That is not the way the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) surely would have the question put. Then how would it be put? Are you in favour of sending conscripted men overseas? Is that the way the hon. gentleman would suggest it be placed before this country? Would not the answer of scores of thousands immediately be: it all depends on what way you get them, it all depends on the terms of your Act. Consequently, we should have to expose the Bill itself to a vote. Indeed I never before heard of a referendum except on a Bill. Now, is it the suggestion of hon. gentlemen opposite that the Bill that embodies not only the principle, but embodies also the terms upon which the principle shall be carried out, shall go to the electorate for a yes or a no? Is that the suggestion of hon. gentlemen opposite? Why, the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) would have to vote against the Bill himself, because he says that within the four corners of this Bill there is not the first element of fairness. One has only to analyze this referendum plea to see how perilous it is, how impossible it is.

The Conscription Bill in its present form, while it may be improved on, is at least the best that some of us can produce. Yet I believe that if the Bill as it stands were submitted to the electorate, it would meet with the opposition of many a man who supports the principle of conscription itself; and any Bill, however drafted, would be confronted with opposition on the part of many who themselves believe in its principle. Do hon. gentlemen really suggest that this great measure, on the success of which depends the sustenance of our armies in France, depends the support of those who have appealed to us in language that we can never forget, appealed to us for months, yea for years, to add to their number, to reduce their burdens, if possible to limit their perils—that this Bill, on which so largely depends the honour and security of this country—should be exposed to such improper hazards, to such unfair opposition, as it would encounter under a conscription referendum? I appeal to hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House who may perhaps in other days have subscribed themselves as believers in a referendum principle, first of all to realize that on a referendum vote we shall get the vote of those who have failed to do their duty on a parity with the vote of those who have enlisted. We will get that vote to even a greater degree, because everyone who has ever been in France recognizes that at best and with the utmost thoroughness we could poll only a mere fraction of the vote of the soldiers there. I appeal to hon. gentlemen to realize also that, above all things in the carrying on of a war, we must avoid every possible cause or excuse for delay. Germany does not carry on this war by referendums—she will not wait while we hold a referendum. Ask your boys in France whether they are fighting Germany with referendums. They are fighting under the authority of the governing power—and there is no other way to carry on a war. Let us rise to the level of our duty, let us be not afraid to lead. We have been execrated from end to end of Canada for failure of leadership and all the rest. Many of those men who have lagged behind but who ought to have gone to the front have lampooned the leader of this Government because of alleged failure of leadership. Newspaper after newspaper has thundered that out. Well, here is some leadership. Here and now is a chance to follow. Let us as a Parliament get in front; let those who lagged behind and cried for leadership walk up now, close the gap, and stand behind the Prime Minister. The people of Canada we have oft been told, call to the Parliament of Canada for strong and fearless leadership. Are we going to answer that call with our hands up in the air and cry out to the people: "For Heaven's sake, lead us." Such is the amendment of the right hon. leader of the Opposition.

It is all very well to deliberate upon something that is left for us to decide, but we have already decided on the carrying on of this war, and on carrying it on with all our might. If there ever was a time for a referendum—which I deny—it was in August, 1914; it is not now. We have committed ourselves as a nation, we have signed the bond, it is for us now to discharge the obligation.

I want to say something else, and I do so with especial earnestness. It may be that in the heat of discussion I do not avoid animosities perhaps as carefully as I should; but I say this to those hon. gentlemen opposite whose position with regard to this Bill is surrounded by embarrassments much heavier than those that surround us, I say to them that this Bill is not designed and is not framed to be unjust to the province of Quebec or to any other section of this country. I point to the provisions of the Bill. This is not the time to discuss it in detail, but a few words will, I think, make my meaning apparent to everybody. It is framed and it is advanced in no spirit of recrimination whatsoever, in no spirit of petty jealousy, because the real men of this country, from end to end, are not of that feeling and do not want that feeling expressed by this Bill. We of English-speaking Canada have the kindest feelings towards our French Canadian compatriots. We realize that there are certain considerations having to do with this subject of recruiting that apply to them that do not apply with the same force to us. I want to say to the members from Quebec that this Bill as drafted is not intended to, and will not, if I understand the Bill, work unfairly to that province. Rather, on the other hand, for just and good reasons—not because that province desires any favouritism and it gets no favouritism but for just and good reasons, this Bill in its results will work more lightly on the province of Quebec than on any other province in Canada. In what way will it work more lightly? In the first place, the province of Quebec is an agricultural province. A much larger proportion of its population is engaged in agriculture than is the case at least with any other of the older provinces of Canada. Agriculture is one of our essential industries, our greatest essential industry, necessarily employing much the largest proportion of our population. Consequently, under the terms of the Bill, the exemptions to agriculture will far outnumber the exemptions to other avocations of our people. Therefore, the exemption clauses, applied evenly and fairly all over this Dominion, as is the intent, will, for just and good and sound reasons, be of more value to the province of Quebec than to any other province of Canada.

Secondly, in the province of Quebec, the young men marry at an earlier age than in the English provinces. It is a custom that deserves commendation. How does that affect the operation of this Act? Under this Act, the first three classes to be called out embrace only unmarried men between the ages of 20 and 34. Under those three classes it is not impossible that the whole 100,000 may be secured, and, in that case, the Act will apply to a smaller proportion in the province of Quebec than in any other province. This, however, is the case not because the Bill makes favourites, but because the Bill is fair. It is in the general interests of the state. Consequently, this Bill, so far from being designed or framed to result in unfairness to the province of Quebec, will, on the contrary, in its practical effects, for good and sufficient reasons of state, fall more lightly on Quebec than on any other province.

We as a people have a right to deliberate, and to vote, to negative, if we so desire, any proposition which is still open and left for us to decide. But surely the prosecution of this war with the whole might of Canada is not a subject which is now left to us to decide. That question has been passed upon. Its prosecution is now a matter only of good faith: 300,000 living men and 20,000 dead are over there, the hostages of our good faith. All that is left to us now is a choice between fidelity and desertion, between courage and poltroonery, between honour and everlasting shame.

We are told this action will result in disunion. I see no reason why it should produce disunion. It is framed to avoid disunion. But let no man deceive himself. We do not avoid disunion by dropping back to where we were, any more than we avoid disunion by going ahead with this measure. I see no more peril in the one course than in the other. At all events, I see no more peril in honourably marching on. You might possibly have union by stepping back, and letting the voluntary system, dead as Julius Cæsar, continue in force. I do not think you would. But if you did it would be the concord of inertia and of lassitude—the concord of disgrace. There is no reason in this measure for disunion, and I do not think that result will come. I am as confident as I have ever been of anything in my life that if the members of this House, reading and studying this Bill, and hearing this debate, will go to their constituents and tell them the meaning, purpose and spirit of this Bill there will be no possibility whatever of discord or resistance. It is not the substance, but the name of the Bill that has become a bogey.

We are ready, on our part, to do much to avoid the danger of disunion. This Government has shown that spirit from the beginning of this crisis. We have been ready to pay a great price, to make a big sacrifice, if, by that price or sacrifice, we could avoid even the possibility of disunion in Canada. The leader of the Government has said to the great leader of the French Canadian race: "I will share with you the reins of power. Though elected here, as we have been, by the votes of the people, I will divide with you, man for man, political power in this country. Not only that, but, in order that we may do our part in this war in this the only way it can be done, we are ready to discuss with you other matters, ready to meet you and adopt a course that is fair as between the ideals of both parties." The Prime Minister has repeated that assurance in this debate. The spirit that animated those negotiations still exists, and has not been exchanged for another. What more can we do? While we would do almost anything to avoid the disaster of disunion, we cannot purchase union at the price of national disgrace.

My only effort has been to lay before hon. gentlemen in this Chamber a statement of the spirit in which the Government has approached this matter, to lay before them our policy and, if I could to establish that policy as right and just, and to express our overpowering determination to do our duty, as we see it, in this grave and terrible crisis. Speaking on behalf of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, I pay my tribute to the clear vision and courage of the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie), and the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Pardee). I say to them that they have, in a manner that we will long remember, discharged to their utmost their obligation to prevent discord and strife. The speeches they have made will place their names high in the roll of honour in Canada, to be seen and remembered for generations to come. I appeal to hon. gentlemen opposite, and to hon. gentlemen around me, for party divisions as we once had them are not just the same to-day—I appeal to all hon. members to take the course which, in my belief, alone can command the respect of this House, of Canada, and of the world.

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY (Russell): Mr. Speaker, the slogan in the country to-day is, "win the war." That slogan will be the key-note of my criticism of the measure under consideration by the House. It has been made all the easier for me to adopt that slogan as the key-note of my criticism by reason of the fact that the first citizen from the county which I have the honour to represent in this House who offered up his young life in the great struggle which is convulsing the world was a young French Canadian, a boy named Hector Filion. Other citizens of that county representing divers races and creeds have since followed that French boy's example, until to-day the casualty honour roll of the county of Russell, like that of so many other counties in this Dominion, is distressingly large.

At the outset, may I be permitted to say —not in a boastful spirit; not as asserting any claim that may not with equal truth be asserted by every hon. gentleman in this House—that in a desire to help win this war, I yield to no man in Canada. For that reason, Sir, if I object to the Bill brought down by the Government, it is because I am profoundly convinced that in its principle as well as in its application that measure will hinder rather than help in winning the war. My reasons for that conviction, Sir, I will place before you and before my colleagues in this House as briefly as possible.

It will not detract in the slightest degree from the gravity of the matter that we have in hand if I say that it was in accordance with the traditions of the day that the Prime Minister, without consultation and without deliberation, on New Year's Day, 1916, took the resolution, and then publicly announced, that Canada would contribute 500,000 men to the Army of the Allies. Like other resolutions formed by other people on a like occasion, the Prime Minister has found it impossible to carry out this. Because of that failure he now asks Parliament to help him out of his difficulty by enacting this Bill.

The Prime Minister's difficulty does not appear now for the first time, nor is the Bill before the House the first attempt to relieve him of it. That difficulty presented itself very shortly after the Prime Minister's promise was made. In an endeavour to extricate himself, the right hon. gentleman last summer created the National Service Board, but it was speedily found that the cure was no better than the disease. Now, rather than admit his double failure, the Prime Minister proposes another remedy no more efficacious than the former one. That, Sir, is the condition with which we have to deal.

For the purpose of the argument that I wish to develop, let me point out that in making a promise not based on data of any kind the Prime Minister might have undertaken to send 600,000 or 700,000 men with just as much reason as he had for promising to send 500,000 men. Had he chanced to promise either of those larger numbers, could it be contended, as it is contended in the case of the 500,000, that Canada had failed to fulfil her pledge? Canada made no pledge; that the Prime Minister frankly admits. Canada was not consulted; therefore Canada must not, least of all by Canadians themselves, be held up to the other nations as a slacker nation. Canada has done voluntarily, without pledge or compulsion of any kind, that which stands to her credit in this war; and I submit that it is derogating from the high reputation Canada has won in the estimation of the world through voluntary service to attempt now to substitute compulsion of any kind for the free-will offering she has already made and which she is prepared to continue to make if equality of sacrifice be established and if her people be consulted as to the leadership they desire to enforce that equality.

5 p.m.

At this stage of the Bill it is not customary, nor is it my intention, to discuss details which can be fully dealt with in committee. I therefore propose to confine my criticism to certain outstanding objections that cannot be too strongly emphasized.

In the first place, I submit that Parliament has no mandate to pass this Bill. Elected in peace times, its constitutional term extended by itself, this Parliament exists only on sufferance and has no authority to impose harsh legislation of this kind without first consulting the electors. It is of equal importance to point out to the House and to the country that the Government has no request, no warrant from the men at the front, to introduce legislation of this character. On this point the words of the Prime Minister may profitably be recalled. He said:

> I bring from that splendid manhood of Canada at the front an earnest and thrilling message that we shall stand beside them in the stress and welter of this struggle and bring them such support that the effort and sacrifice which have been consecrated to this supreme task shall not be in vain.

Stripped of its rhetoric, this pronouncement makes it quite plain that the men at the front made no request for conscription. In fact, it is not pretended that they have made a collective request of any kind. But, Mr. Speaker, whether these men asked or did not ask for support, it is our duty to see that they lack nothing which Canada can send them. That, however, as I propose to show later, does not imply that it is only by conscription that we can perform our whole duty towards those brave men who have first claim upon the physical, the moral and the material support of their grateful fellow-countrymen.

Whether the reason for introducing this Bill be advanced in precise terms or be left to the public to infer, the impression made is the same, namely, that it has been brought down because voluntary enlistment has failed. That I deny absolutely. Voluntary enlistment did not fail, for the excellent reason that voluntary enlistment was never given a fair trial. The proof of this we have in the way things were conducted. Who can forget the rip and tear and smash—the special trains—the parades—the reviews—the crop of honorary colonels—and the noisy press agencies, of the first two years of the war? We all remember those things, and we know that while they prevailed voluntary enlistment was not and could not have been properly attended to. But apart from this, we have from the ex-Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes) himself a most important statement with regard to the failure of voluntary enlistment. Speaking at Lindsay on the 28th of April last, the ex-Minister of Militia said:

> More than one year ago an agitation was begun on the question of labour. We were recruiting "too many regiments"; we were "taking too many men away from work"; "munitions manufacturers and others would be at a standstill"; "farmers could not put in their crops"; and "Canada has already done her full duty," were daily recited. They unfortunately had an effect upon the Prime Minister. The result was that I was asked in March, 1916, not to press recruiting, and recruiting to-day is, and has been dead in Canada for fighting purposes. "Safety First," or the useful and well paid, but not dangerous jobs, are readily filled; but for the gallant boys in the trenches there is little or no backing.

That is a most damaging statement made by a former member of the Government, made, he alleges, because of things that happened while he was a member of that Government, and that statement reflects not only upon the Government methods and action, but upon the Prime Minister himself. Up to the present time, that statement has not been disputed. Such being the case, how can Parliament or the country be expected to accept the statement now advanced, that voluntary enlistment has failed? Equally, may I ask: How can Parliament or the country be asked to accept this Bill as a substitute for that which was not given a fair trial?

In considering this Bill we have also naturally to consider whether the Government, in the first instance, went ahead on the basis of any survey or calculation of the man-power Canada could supply in a war such as this. Evidently they did not, and it is equally evident that they have not done so even now. We are told that there are five divisions in the Canadian Army, and that this Bill is intended to fill the gaps in those five divisions. It has been stated—and I have seen no contradiction—that there is on file in the Militia Department in Ottawa a report made by Imperial officers sent over here for the purpose stating that, having regard to Canada's population and to all the data that must be taken into account in estimating the numerical basis of an army for this country, Canada should confine her fighting forces to three divisions, so as to be able to meet all possible demands from wastage in the ranks, when on active service. That report, I understand, was made before the war. The events of the war have proved its correctness. What explanation has the Government to give for ignoring that report; and when they chose to do so, how can they expect us to approve this Bill as a cloak for their inattention to the most elementary detail of military organization?

This brings me to the consideration of another practical matter which I have not heard mentioned in this debate thus far. It is said that the men required are to fill the gaps in the ranks at the front. But how many are required? Who knows? Surely we ought to have answers to these questions before we are asked to proceed. Who can answer them? Frankly, I do not know. It would, however, seem to me that the man most likely to be able to answer would be the Commander-in-Chief of the Canadian forces. If that be correct, then what does he say as to the number of thousands of men required to fill the gaps in the Canadian ranks? Does he say that the number already enlisted are not sufficient to furnish these thousands? If he does not, should not that fact be made clear? Otherwise, how are we to know just what we should do? It is true that statistics have been brought down, but they do not reach the crux of the situation. At best, these statistics are only careful estimates; they are not and cannot be complete or conclusive from the standpoint of military requirements. Therefore, I suggest to the Government that every effort be made to get the information I refer to before this Bill is advanced another stage. If, moreover, it be established on reliable military advice, that we have too many divisions, does it not seem to be common sense, based on what I understand to be sound military practice, to readjust the organization and to consolidate the men that are available in the way best adapted to make their number most effective?

[Mr. Murphy.]

The discussion thus far upon the Bill and the amendment introduced by the leader of the Opposition has elicited facts and views that are helpful as disclosing the real position of the Government, and as an aid in determining the real value of the Bill. By reference to the Orders in Council and the official despatches of the Government, the leader of the Opposition, in refutation of the Prime Minister's argument that the Bill contains no new principle, was able to show that a new principle is involved, and that at the outbreak of the war the Government was not of opinion that the principle embodied in the Militia Act was the same as the principle set forth in this Bill. My right hon. leader's argument and reasoning were so cogent, and it is so important that the public be seized of his viewpoint, that I ask the indulgence of the House while I restate his views on this subject in his own words: This is what he said:

> Now, the Prime Minister says that he is introducing no new principle, that he could have sent abroad the 400,000 men who have been sent, under the authority of the existing Act. Sir, I take issue with my right hon. friend on that. I say he had not any such power.

Then later on he said:

> In support of this contention of mine that this Government could not, under the Militia Act, send the forces that they did, I will contrast with the Government of to-day the Government of 1914.
>
> The Government then did not pretend that they were using the Militia Act in sending Canadian forces across the sea; they did not send them under that Act at all. Here is a despatch of His Royal Highness the Governor General, sent by the Prime Minister which is an absolute refutation of the doctrine which has just been asserted by him. This was sent by the Governor General to the Secretary of State for the colonies, and dated August 1, 1914:
>
> Ottawa, August 1, 1914.
> "In view of the impending danger of war involving the Empire my Advisers are anxiously considering the most effective means of rendering every possible aid and they welcome any suggestions and advice which Imperial naval and military authorities may deem it expedient to offer. They are confident that a considerable force would be available for service abroad. A question has been mooted respecting the status of any Canadian force serving abroad as under section 69 of Canadian Militia Act the active militia can only be placed on actual service beyond Canada for the defence thereof."
>
> Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.
>
> Sir Wilfrid Laurier: If it was "for the defence thereof" what was the necessity of stating that there was doubt as to the status of these troops?
> "It has been suggested that regiments might enlist as Imperial troops for stated periods, Canadian Government undertaking to make all necessary financial provision for their equipment, pay and maintenance."

Thus, at the very beginning of the war, it was recognized that the words "for the defence thereof" could not apply to this case; that the troops could not be sent under the Militia Act, and that they should be sent as Imperial troops and as serving voluntarily in the war. That is conclusive.

Sir Sam Hughes: What is the date of that despatch?

Sir Wilfrid Laurier: First of August, 1914. Then there is an Order in Council, passed on August 6, as follows:

"The Committee of the Privy Council have had before them a report, dated 6th August, 1914, from the Minister of Militia and Defence, representing: in view of the state of war now existing between the United Kingdom, and the Dominions, Colonies, and Dependencies of the British Empire on the one side, and Germany on the other side, creating a menace to the well-being and integrity of the Empire, and having regard to the duty of the Dominion of Canada as one of those Dominions to provide for its own defence and to assist in maintaining the integrity and honour of the Empire, that it is desirable to mobilize Militia units of the various arms of the service of such effective strength as may from time to time be determined by Your Royal Highness in Council, such units to be composed of officers and men who are willing to volunteer for Overseas service under the British Crown."

And so this was for voluntary service alone. Nor is that all. There was this despatch sent by the Governor General on 5th of August:

"My Government being desirous of putting beyond doubt status of Canadian volunteers requests that His Majesty may be pleased to issue an order bringing these volunteers under sections 175 and 176 of the Army Act."

Thus, being in doubt of the power of the Government to send troops under the Militia Act, they asked that the Government of Great Britain should issue an order to enlist them for the British Army. And so we have reason to believe that the Militia Act, as we have understood it, never applied to this case.

It is quite true that other hon. gentlemen have joined issue with my right hon. friend on this point. The subject was debated at some length by my hon. friend from South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) the other day, and by my hon. friend the Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen) this afternoon. But with all respect for these hon. gentlemen, and for any others who may share their view, I prefer the view of my right hon. leader. I rely upon his forty years' experience in this Parliament, and upon his intimate connection with the change that was made in 1904 in the Militia Act which has been under discussion. I have only to add that if this Military Service Bill makes no change in principle, but merely a change in the method of selection, what is the reason for bringing it in at all? Why not merely bring down an amendment to the Militia Act if the difference was so trifling as that? Is not the refutation of that contention contained in the very fact that this Bill has been introduced?

The right hon. leader of the Opposition dealt with the labour situation as affected by this Bill. His argument was challenged by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster). May I digress for a moment to say that in all probability, with the exception of the right hon. leader of the Opposition, no hon. member of this House has had such a long and genuine admiration for the debating power and eloquence of the Minister of Trade and Commerce as myself. I well remember the first occasion upon which I heard him, now more years ago than I care to recall. From that day to the present I have always acknowledged his great power as a debater. I do not think that power was ever more eloquently displayed than when he spoke in this Chamber a few days ago. Notwithstanding that, I take the liberty of joining issue with him. In the course of his speech the other day, addressing himself to the argument of my right hon. leader on the labour situation, the Minister of Trade and Commerce instanced the position of labour in Great Britain and the United States under compulsory military service. I submit that the comparison failed to meet the argument of my right hon. leader for two reasons: In the first place, the Derby registration scheme preceded the introduction of compulsory military service in Great Britain; and in the second place the United States Government recognized labour as soon as it decided to go into the war, and immediately availed itself of the services of Samuel Gompers, the leader of organized labour in the United States. Even after three years of war this Government has done nothing like that in this country. If my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce and other hon. members of the Government will not heed the advice of the leader of the Opposition, perhaps they will listen to the advice of a friend of their own. Foreseeing the effect of this Bill on labour, Sir Joseph Flavelle addressed a letter to the Canadian manufacturers of war munitions, in which he says:

Dear Sirs.—May I, on behalf of the board solicit your serious co-operation in personal attention and forethought whereby misunderstandings or difficulties with your work-people may be averted?

I am led to say this because I remember the necessity of securing further support for the men at the front means there will be considerable impairment of the present factory working forces in Canada.

As there is great industrial activity and a general shortage of efficient labour, it is to be expected that restlessness in labour circles will be increased rather than decreased when men now at work are taken out of employment and used for military service.

That statement should give the Government pause in the course upon which they have embarked, and into which they are trying to rush Parliament and the country. Munitions must be produced and forwarded, or you imperil the lives of the men at the front. Food must be produced and forwarded or you sap the strength of the men at the front. Is it not better to have one man in the trenches well armed and well fed than two men poorly armed and half fed? That is the practical situation which presents itself to the mind of Sir Joseph Flavelle and of every other practical man in the country. I have no doubt that that was the situation that presented itself to the mind of the new food controller appointed in Great Britain, Lord Rhondda, who within the last forty-eight hours flashed across the ocean a message almost pathetic in its appeal to the United States and Canada to come to the assistance of Great Britain and the soldiers in the matter of the production of food.

Then there were one or two other observations of my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce to which I desire to refer. With fine old Tory contempt for the people, the minister scouted the amendment proposed by the leader of the Opposition. Let the verdict, he said, be passed by the people later on, or by history. In other words, when the Tory party is in power with a safe majority in both Houses why should we ever have an election? As I listened to my hon. friend, the glitter of the new Mace on the Table caught my eye, and recalling that we are near the end of the sixth year of this Parliament, I wondered whether my hon. friend had convinced himself and the other members of the Government that a Cromwell can not appear twice in history. If he has not reached that conclusion he might give the matter further attention in the light of this discussion.

My hon. friend who sits beside me (Mr. Oliver) has seconded the amendment proposed by my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition. When speaking in support of the amendment he declared himself to be in favour of conscription. He was questioned by the Solicitor General as to whether he would entrust the administration of a conscription law to the leader of the Opposition, who is opposed to conscription. The hon. member for Edmonton said that he would, and he had ample warrant for that reply. In fact, had the Solicitor General reflected for a moment he never would have asked the question. How could the hon. member for Edmonton have replied otherwise than he did, when the Solicitor General knows that the Prime Minister asked the leader of the Opposition to join him in a coalition government to pass conscription and to assist him in the administration of it? Surely the Solicitor General will not condemn what his own leader thought was so eminently proper.

It is an axiom of general acceptance that a law which is not sustained by the moral sanction of the people cannot be enforced by constitutional means. This afternoon the Solicitor General said that above all it is the enforcement of the Bill that we must keep in mind. I quite agree with him. We have ample evidence that the Bill we are considering is not sustained by the moral sanction of the Canadian people. Let me cite some of the evidence. Speaking in Toronto in December last, the Director of National Service, the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. Bennett), had the courage to say to some interrupters in the audience he was addressing that, as the result of representations made to him in the western provinces, which he had just visited with the Prime Minister, he was convinced there would be civil war if an attempt were made to force conscription on the people of Canada. Mark you, Mr. Speaker, that opinion was formed by reason of conditions in Western Canada, not in Quebec. Since then organized labour has declared against conscription; so has the largest employer of organized labour in the Dominion, the Canadian Pacific Railway, through its president, Lord Shaughnessy. From the rural districts of the country, already depleted of man power, have come strong protests against conscription.

All these represent such a powerful body of public opinion against the measure that more should not be required to prove its unwisdom and untimeliness. But, there is more. The Bill itself specifically recognizes that the Mennonites and other sects are opposed to it and the people of these denominations are exempted from its operations. Without taking into account any other classes of the population than those I have mentioned, those alone make it plain that such a measure cannot be generally administered. The Solicitor General this afternoon said that it is the enforcement of the Bill above all that we must keep in mind and again I say, I quite agree with him. While this is the fact you would at times be led to think by the writings of certain journalists and the speeches of certain individuals that the only people opposed to conscription are the French Canadians. As I have just shown, there is no justification for any such idea but the campaign by which it is sought to give currency to this idea in the English parts of Canada is fraught with such possibilities of grave danger to the State that I know of no better public service that can be rendered at this juncture than to place before Parliament and the country the resulting situation as it affects the whole people and to suggest how best, in my judgment, to deal with the situation.

We have heard a great deal about recruiting not being satisfactory in the province of Quebec. Indeed, the Minister of Trade and Commerce addressed himself to the leader of the Opposition as if that hon. gentleman alone, although in Opposition, were responsible for the poor recruiting in Quebec. In effect, the Minister of Trade and Commerce said to the leader of the Opposition: "Look here, Sir Wilfrid; we want to govern the rest of this country but you must govern Quebec and we will hold you responsible for everything that happens in Quebec." That from an hon. gentleman who, on the night of the Drummond-Arthabaska election in 1910, joined with the Nationalists in intoning the Te Deum over their victory by sending a telegram couched in the words: "Anything to beat Laurier."

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I have heard of that telegram so often that I would be infinitely obliged to my hon. friend if he would give me a copy of it.

Mr. MURPHY: I will try to oblige my hon. friend. I think this is the first time he has ever asked to be furnished with a facsimile of his own writing.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I do want it now badly. I would like to put it in my scrap book.

Mr. MURPHY: If it be the case that recruiting is not satisfactory in Quebec the Government cannot shift the responsibility from its own shoulders. What did the Government do to encourage recruiting in Quebec? Nothing. It did even worse than that, if I may be pardoned a Hibernianism, it placed in charge of recruiting in Quebec an English-speaking clergyman, of estimable character and highly respected, it is true, but not a soldier, and differing in race, language, and religion from the overwhelming French-Catholic majority of that province.

Mr. Speaker, that was not giving the French people leadership—that was denying them leadership. And, all the time, the Government had at its disposal the services of General Lessard, a brave and accomplished French-Canadian soldier, with a magnificent record in South Africa, a man whose appointment at the head of recruiting in his native province at the outbreak of the war would have appealed to the imagination and the enthusiasm of his fellow-countrymen and would have stimulated enlistment as nothing else would have done. But General Lessard was kept away from Quebec; he was assigned inferior duties in other parts of the country, and Canada and the Empire were the losers. The Government's initial blunder in Quebec was followed by others just as inexcusable. These I need not enumerate, but I may point out that a belated recruiting campaign was started by the Postmaster General (Hon. Mr. Blondin) a short time ago and was then abruptly called off. But it lasted long enough to enable the Postmaster General to publicly declare that recruiting in Quebec had been bungled from the start, and that if proper methods had been adopted in the beginning the response of the French Canadians would have been satisfactory in every respect. There is the testimony of a member of the Government, responsible for recruiting. How can the Government escape the condemnation of one of its own members, and how can the Government justify a Bill which one of its own members makes it manifest is introduced for the purpose of covering up its own blunders?

There is another state of affairs of which notice must be taken if we are honestly desirous of understanding the attitude of French Canada towards recruiting. One phase of that situation is created by the open and covert attacks made upon the French people. Let me cite a few instances, beginning with one mentioned the other evening by the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux). Not many weeks ago, as hon. gentlemen will recall, it was publicly charged that a troop train was stoned while passing through the province of Quebec. The charge was widely circulated, and some credence was given to it even in this House. Much indignation was aroused, and, as usual in these cases, there was some senseless talk about reprisals. To the credit of the Government, I must say that, when my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) asked that the charge be investigated, the Government promptly appointed a commission for that purpose. And what was the result? The inquiry completely exonerated the French residents of the place where the stoning of the train was said to have occurred. It did more; it placed the blame on some of the soldiers themselves. Incidentally it revealed that if the disturbers had had a knowledge of the French language, in all probability there would have been no trouble at all.

Let me refer to another incident in another part of the country. At a conscription meeting held in Queen's Park, Toronto, a returned soldier, who is not, I am convinced, a fair representative of his comrades, is reported to have evoked the loudest cheers of the afternoon by saying that the Government should conscript the foreigners, and that the returned soldiers would fight the French. I am within the judgment of every fair-minded man in Canada when I say that such language as that is deplorable, deplorable in the highest degree. And yet, Sir, in the newspapers of the city where Lount and Matthews gave up their lives that the principles of liberty and justice might survive; in the newspapers of the city where George Brown and Edward Blake lived and preached the gospel of democracy and freedom, I have failed to notice one word of regret or reproof for the language that was used at that meeting. Worse, than that, Sir, we have heard an echo of that very language in this very Chamber. In moving the introduction of this Bill, the Prime Minister, speaking of the Canadians who had enlisted, said:

> If what are left of 400,000 such men come back to Canada with fierce resentment, and even rage in their hearts, conscious that they have been deserted and betrayed, how shall we meet them when they ask the reason? I am not so much concerned for the day when this Bill becomes law, as for the day when these men return if it is rejected.

Mr. Speaker, I ask if it would be possible to use language more unfair to the soldiers who have fought for the principle that public opinion must be respected; that there must not be government without the consent of the governed; the soldiers who have fought for the very principle embodied in the amendment of the right hon. leader of the Opposition (sir Wilfrid Laurier)? I ask, would it be possible to use language more unjust to those who oppose this Bill on principle, but who are ready and willing to obey its provisions when approved by a majority of the people? I ask, Sir, would it be possible to use language more provocative, more destructive of that very spirit of fairness and moderation for which the Prime Minister himself appealed in the discussion of this Bill? The words of a mob orator, unskilled in public speaking, without responsibility and carried away by the excitement of the moment, may at times and on public grounds be excused; but no such excuse can be advanced for the words of a Prime Minister, speaking in a deliberative assembly such as this. Much as I regret the Prime Minister's words, it is not my intention to retort in kind. Rather, Sir, would I appeal from Philip drunk to Philip sober; rather would I ask the Prime Minister to bear in mind his own dictum that it is easy to sow the wind of clamour, and to apply, in quarters where it is most needed—and they are not far distant from his own political household—his own conclusion that those who make that sowing may reap such a whirlwind as they do not dream of to-day. If my right hon. friend will do that, I am confident he will decide that the first application of the lesson should be made elsewhere than in the province of Quebec.

But, Sir, it is not merely to such attacks as those I have alluded that we are to attribute the lack of that united effort which it is pretended this Bill will supply. These attacks are bad enough, but there is a more deep-rooted cause of discontent, which this Bill will undoubtedly not remove, but which I am profoundly convinced this Bill will make much worse. It is evident to every Canadian who is concerned about his country's welfare and the unity of its people, that neither can be secured while our French fellow-citizens are disturbed by the belief that there is a disposition on the part of the English majority to deprive them of the use of their language. At such a critical time as this, it is useless to argue whether that belief is well or ill founded. Argument of that kind will accomplish nothing. The sensible, the courageous, and the patriotic thing to do is to frankly recognize that the belief exists, and to seek to dispel it at the earliest possible moment. The statesman or the Government that will adopt that course will do more to stimulate recruiting, will do more for the boys in the trenches, and will render better and more effective service to Canada and the Empire than all the Bills this Parliament can pass.

In this same connection, I would offer a friendly suggestion to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty). He is designated in the Bill as the minister by whom its provisions are to be carried out. For reasons that will readily occur to my hon.

friend, without my stating them, it would. in my judgment, be better to designate some other minister for that work; in fact, as this is a war measure, its proper administrator would seem to be the Minister of Militia, and should that hon. gentleman require any legal assistance, it can be provided in the Act that such should be furnished him by the Solicitor General.

Mr. BURNHAM: Will the hon. gentleman state why he objects to the Minister of Justice administering the Act?

Mr. MURPHY: I do not object, if the minister wishes to act. I am merely making a suggestion. Referring to the speech of the hon. gentleman from South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie), I may observe that in form and in tone that speech was as unexceptionable as any I have heard delivered in Parliament. I may say the same about that of the hon. gentleman from Lambton (Mr. Pardee); and, as I am in a generous mood, I think I would extend that compliment to the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen). I desire to say further, with reference to the speech of my hon. friend from South Wellington, that I do not agree with his arguments and conclusions, save in one instance, namely, when he said that he did not believe that this Bill would be successfully enforced by a single political party. I share that belief in its entirety. The Government would do well to hearken to the warning contained in the speech of the hon. gentleman from South Wellington, because it is manifest that the Government alone cannot put this Bill in force. Mr. Speaker, let us rid ourselves of cant. This Bill attempts the impossible. That the Government knows this to be the case was hinted by the hon. Minister of Labour yesterday when he intimated that the operation of the Bill might be postponed. Is that not why it contains the provision that it is not to come into force until a proclamation is issued? It is not yet too late for the Government to be frank and courageous. Let them acknowledge that their action was hasty, and that it is better to yield before than after they have caused a disastrous cleavage in our national life.

More than once during this debate we have heard it stated that criticism that is not constructive is not helpful. Mindful of that, and responding to the Prime Minister's request for suggestions, I desire on my own account, and speaking for myself, to submit a constructive war-time policy to the Government. In the order in which its features occurred to me, and from the point of view of necessity and the public good, I suggest that, instead of enacting this Bill, the Government should adopt the motion of which notice was given by my hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) on the 13th of the present month, and pass the necessary legislation to give it immediate effect, so that every moral and material force available in the Dominion and not yet reached would make its contribution as man power as done. Stop horse-racing, stop the publication and sale of racing forms, stop all games and sports conducted merely for raising gate money, close all bar rooms, pool rooms, billiard rooms and moving picture shows. Under the existing law make a national survey, showing who are engaged at productive or other necessary work, and those who are not. Give those who are not so engaged, who are of military age, and who cannot satisfactorily account for not being at such work, the option of enlisting voluntarily, or of doing necessary work for which they are suited, and if all the men and means required are not procured in this way then take counsel with the leader of the Opposition, and with the Premiers of all the Provinces, as to what further should be done. This course will involve no delay or avoidable hardship. It will impress the whole country with the seriousness and the good faith of the Government, as well as the gravity of the work the Government has in hand. It will be a guarantee against unfair discrimination of any kind. It will appeal to the people's sense of fair play and equal sacrifice. It will evoke the spirit of nation-wide patriotism. It will stimulate generous rivalry instead of prejudice and passion. It will stop national waste of man power and resources. And, in my belief, the response will exceed that which the most sanguine can expect. In any event, Sir, I make the suggestion in all sincerity, and in order to avoid the dangers to which I believe the Government's present course is leading.

In conclusion, I have a last appealto make. On Parliament Hill there is a monument composed of two figures, those of Baldwin an Lafontaine. United in life, this Parliament wisely decided that in the nation's memory they would not be separated in death. There they stand, and for all time there they will stand, gazing into the distance across the Ottawa river and beyond the sky line of the Laurentian hills—two figures, the embodiment in bronze of a noble ideal, typifying the union of the two great forces in our national life, both consecrated to the attainment of a lofty and a sacred purpose. As we pass by that monument should we not, particularly in these days of our country's stress and trial, take vision and inspiration from the history of the two great Canadians whom it commemorates? And what more inspiring chapter of that history can we recall for the benefit of our fellow citizens and to point their way to present duty than that which tells us that when Baldwin was defeated in the province of Ontario he was promptly elected for the county of Rimouski in the province of Quebec, and that, when later on, Lafontaine met defeat in his native province, he was just as promptly elected for one of the divisions of the county of York, in the province of Ontario? That is the spirit that we should strive to have prevail in every province in this Dominion. That is the example we should follow, and we will follow it only if our minds be illumined by the constitutional light that guided the steps of Baldwin and Lafontaine, only if our hearts be attuned as theirs were, to constant forbearance and mutual good will. What was possible in Canada three-quarters of a century ago should be possible to-day. Nay, more; what was possible in Canada three-quarters of a century ago should much more easily be possible to-day. Believing that, I urge the Government to withdraw this Bill or to suspend its consideration until the people shall have been consulted. If neither of these courses be adopted, it is my conviction that the best service that can be rendered in behalf of national unity is to vote against this Bill, and if the Government persists in its announced intention of forcing a division upon the amendment placed in your hands by the right hon. leader of the Opposition, I will vote for that amendment as an earnest of my desire to promote peace and unity at home and content and effectiveness among our soldiers overseas.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. J. A. M. ARMSTRONG (North York): Mr. Speaker, in rising to make a few observations on the Bill now before the House, I am prompted, not by any desire to impede in any way the progress of the Bill, but by a desire to exercise my prerogative in order to place myself on record with regard to the principle of compulsory service, because many months ago, before conscription became a live issue around the corridors of this House, I advocated it publicly in the riding that I have the honour to represent. Those who know the political history of the part of the province from which I come, know that the riding of North York has long claimed to be the birthplace and cradle of reform; that it has given to the public life of Canada men like George Brown, William Lyon Mackenzie, Sir William Mulock, and Sir Allen Aylesworth, names that are closely interwoven with the history and principle of old-time Liberalism. The hon. member for Russell (Mr. Murphy) mentioned, during the course of his remarks this afternoon the names of Lount and Matthews as two martyrs to the cause of liberty. I would like to supplement his remarks by informing the House that the chief lieutenants of William Lyon Mackenzie lived practically all their lives in the vicinity where I live to-day, and where my father and grandfather lived before me, and that there are living there to-day the descendants of those lieutenants of Mackenzie, the descendants of the men who, according to the hon. member for Russell, fought for liberty in the days gone by. I stand in this House, to a certain extent at least, by virtue of the support of those men. I am proud to say that those families are to-day well represented on the fields of France, and I think, therefore, I can claim, as much as any man in this House, to represent the two great political lines of thought in Ontario.

I stated a moment ago that I advocated conscription a year ago. I did so for these reasons: I knew that the people I represent were British to the core; I knew that, under the voluntary system that was then in force, we could not hope to secure the men that were required; I knew that we dare not longer turn a deaf ear to the cry from our brothers overseas. I, therefore advocated conscription, based upon a plan that would take every available fit man in his proper turn, having regard to industrial conditions and the need at home. For the same reasons, I stand ready to support the Military Service Bill now before the House. Subsequent events have tended only to strengthen my conviction that the course which the Government purpose taking under this Bill is the only course possible if Canada is to maintain her proper part in this great world-struggle. When the great republic to the south of us became involved in this war, notwithstanding the fact that she had not previously been affected by the war, but rather had fattened and grown rich by reason of her commercial dealings with the then Allied nations—and one might have thought that under such conditions she would have hesitated before plunging the whole resources of the nation in men and money into the war—she did not hesitate nor equivocate, but she put through a Conscription Bill and called out her efficient man-power to the colours, thereby laying down the principle that every citizen of the State is a servant of the State, and that he who accepts and enjoys the benefits of citizenship must be prepared and willing to accept the responsibilities which that citizenship entails, the proof of which willingness is to stand for and fight for the welfare of the State. This cannot be done by agitating any narrow or provincial policy; it cannot be done by pandering to any local class or race, in particular in this country of ours. I have ever claimed that selfishness is and always has been the curse of humanity. I do not say this with any acrimony or any desire to be unduly offensive in this House; I give it as my candid opinion that selfishness is the mainspring behind the opposition to conscription, not only in this House but throughout this country.

At the outbreak of war nearly three years ago, the whole of Canada was pledged by her representatives assembled in Parliament, to the full extent of her resources in men and money. We heard no word at that time of a referendum. Was the voice of the leader of the Opposition heard at that time asking that the people's voice should be heard with regard to our participation in the war? It was not, and I am glad, and I am ready and willing to say that every true Canadian was proud to see the leader of the Opposition stand shoulder to shoulder with the Prime Minister, pledging himself and his followers to stand behind the Government to the full extent of Canada's resources in men and money until victory was achieved. I leave it to the judgment of the House and of the people of Canada how the leader of the Opposition has fulfilled that pledge.

Some men have had the temerity to say that Canada has done enough in this war. The hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) implied that in his speech yesterday, and the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Murphy) indirectly implied it in his speech this afternoon. Canada has not done enough until this war is won, and it cannot be won without men. Canada has not done enough until that great military machine, conceived and perfected by Germany during the last fifty years, that machine which since the outbreak of hostilities has violated every law of God and man, is smashed beyond repair, and it cannot be smashed without men. Canada has not done enough until the power of the houses of the Hapsburgs and the Hohenzollerns is a thing of the past, and that cannot be achieved without men. Until we are assured beyond the peradventure of a doubt that liberty, justice, truth and national honour shall not perish from the earth, Canada has not done enough; and we cannot achieve that end until victory is won on the field of battle, and we cannot achieve that victory without men. Four hundred thousand of Canada's sons have, up to to-day answered the call of the motherland. Thousands and thousands of our homes are to-day under the shadow of death and bereavement. Thousands of Canada's mothers, wives, sisters and sweethearts will go down to their graves with their heads bowed in sorrow and their hearts torn with anguish, mourning "for the touch of a vanished hand and the sound of a voice that is still." With thousands of our homes thrown into mourning, with the cry of our boys ringing across the waters calling for help, with the very life of the nation hanging in the balance, shall we stop in our fight for liberty, justice and humanity because, forsooth, certain elements in this country say: We do not like the idea of being forced to do our duty?

Why is conscription necessary at this time? I do not wish to be offensive, and as far as possible I shall avoid any acrimonious remarks, but I believe in calling a spade a spade, and in justice to the rest of Canada, I must say that the reason why conscription faces us to-day is because French Canada has failed to do its duty. I am not going into all the reasons why enlistment has been apparently so dilatory in that province, but in my humble judgment if the province of Quebec had come up to the same standard set by the other parts of Canada, conscription would not have been heard of about the corridors of this House for many months to come.

A great deal has been said by speakers who have preceded me as to whether or not Canada had the right to send her troops beyond her borders under the old Militia Act. I have listened to both sides of that argument, and while I am forced to say in all honesty that I am convinced the leader of the Government has made his case clear, and doubly so since I have listened to the Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen) this afternoon, I personally do not care two straws whether it is constitutional or not. Personally I would puncture the constitution a dozen times, if it was necessary, in order to stand by the boys at the front and to uphold Canada's honour in this struggle. The Prime Minister has presented to Parliament a Bill the object of which is to implement Canada's pledge to the boys who have gone overseas. The leader of the Opposition offers a referendum. The call is for men, and he offers a vote. The Minister of Labour yesterday made the statement that the referendum was an insult to the people of Canada, and I believe he was not far wrong, and I will give my reasons. No fair-minded man will deny that we need men at the front, and no fair-minded man will deny that the voluntary system has fallen down. Therefore it follows as the night follows day that the only way to get men is by compulsory service. As we have promised to support the men at the front, the duty therefore devolves upon the Canadian people of getting the men by enforcing conscription. The right hon. leader of the Opposition proposes that we should say to the people of Canada: We want you to answer Yea or Nay to this question, "Are you ready to do your duty?" Personally I entirely agree with the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) as to the whole policy of the referendum; I do not believe in a referendum. If I were to vote for a referendum on such a question as this I should feel that I was evading my personal responsibilities in this House in a very cowardly way; however, that is only the personal opinion of a very humble and obscure back-bencher, and I utter it solely for the purpose of putting it on Hansard, and not in the expectation that it will carry any weight in this House.

The hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Pardee) said this afternoon that this was the saddest day of his life, when he was breaking away from the leader he had followed for years. I can thoroughly enter into his feelings, although I have never been, and hope I never shall be, in that unfortunate position. But I can tell him that that is not the only sad thing about the condition that exists in this House to-day. One of the saddest sights this country ever saw or ever will see was when the leader of the Opposition stood up in his place in this House and opposed this Bill. He, the acknowledged leader of French Canada and the chief of a great party in this country, should have been reminded by that flag beneath whose broad folds he stood of all the privileges and liberties which his French compatriots enjoy, and which have been guaranteed by the nation for which that flag stands. It should have reminded him of the great men in days gone by who have lived and died for the nation it represents, and of the boys who at that very hour were fighting and bleeding and dying on the fields and in the trenches of France and Flanders for the liberties of which we boast so proudly in this House.

I throw aside the constitutional arguments in discussing this question, as they do not affect me one way or the other. There is too much at stake and the people of this country have not the time to discuss the constitution at this hour. I say it is time the boys at the front had a rest, and it is up to us to see that they get a rest. I claim that every boy who left this country for overseas held a moral mortgage on the available manhood of Canada who remained at home, and I claim that we have heard their call from three thousand miles away to those in authority in Canada that that mortgage be foreclosed and the debt paid. I claim it is high time we got busy and paid that debt, high time to implement the pledge given long before the first man left our shores.

What are the arguments against this Bill? Or rather against the principle of this Bill, because if there is any argument at all it is against the principle of conscription. Almost every hon. member who has spoken has attacked the volunteer system as it was in operation under the Conservative party. I do not wish to be unfair to any hon. member, and I would not refer to these things at all if they had not been hurled at us across the floor of the House by the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) the other night. He prefaced his remarks by saying that he would be very moderate though firm, but before he got through he indulged in some of the most extreme and violent language heard in this House since the debate started. He claimed that the reason why recruiting had fallen down in the province of Quebec was that it had never been given a fair trial. The hon. member for Russell (Mr. Murphy) also claimed the same thing, as did the hon. member for North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie), who says he has followed his right hon. leader for thirty years, and we must take his word for anything he says. Let me read what the hon. member for Rouville says. He was replying to a question by the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Morphy):

> If the hon. gentleman thinks that there can be a wave of enthusiasm in the province of Quebec in favour of recruiting with the means that have been employed, he is sadly mistaken. I will give my hon. friend the reason why at once. A few days ago my hon. friend from Dufferin (Mr. Best) rose from his seat in this House and read a statement which had been published by the Orange Sentinel to the effect that the soldiers passing through the province of Quebec had been insulted, and that some of them had even been stoned at Rivière du Loup.

This has also been referred to by my hon. friend from Russell. In fairness to my hon. friend from Dufferin (Mr. Best) I should like to point out that he did not read that statement from the Orange Sentinel at all, but from a Toronto daily newspaper. I should also like to point out the fact that the hon. member for Rouville seems to have entirely overlooked the fact that we have been at war for nearly three years. This incident took place this session, and yet he points to it as a reason why recruiting has fallen down in the province of Quebec during the two and a half years previous. I might go further. The hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Lapointe) has the same peculiar ideas about recruiting in his native province. He said:

> Only a few days ago two great Toronto newspapers were engaged in an acrimonious controversy as to which of the two had written the more violent, bitter articles against Quebec and her inhabitants.

But the hon. member for Kamouraska has apparently overlooked the fact that we have been at war for nearly three years. The hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) has another very unique argument. He says that the people of Montreal would not enlist because a Methodist minister was put in charge of recruiting. That opens up the whole question of the volunteer system. I do not take any stock in any of these excuses. I believe in rendering unto Caesar the things which are Caesars, and I believe in giving credit where credit is due. I will give credit to the late Minister of Militia and Defence (Sir Sam Hughes) for the energy and spirit that he put into the work when he was at it. I will give credit to every member of this Government and to every member of this House for the magnificent effort they have made to stimulate recruiting throughout Canada, but after all the credit is due to the boys themselves who came forward voluntarily—I speak for the Anglo-Saxon parts of Canada—to the recruiting stations early in the game by hundreds of thousands, from the east, west, north and south, and who did not care two cents whether the man they found behind the recruiting desk was black or white, Jew or Gentile, an evangelist or a Jesuit priest. The credit is entirely due to these boys. Yet, the hon. member for Rouville says that the reason they did not enlist in Montreal was because a Methodist minister was placed in charge of recruiting.

Just one word in passing, about my own opinion of the volunteer system. This war has changed many ideas; it has changed nearly all our ideas. At the outbreak of the war I thought the volunteer system was the only thing, but my mind has changed and I am convinced that while it is a beautiful thing, while it is a grand thing while it calls out all that is best in a man, yet, if you are engaged in a war of the magnitude of this war, it is the most unfair, unjust, unbusinesslike way of waging warfare that was ever conceived by the mind of man.

The hon. member for Kamouraska spoke last night about the equality of sacrifice. I challenge any one in this House or in the Dominion to show me a greater example of inequality of sacrifice than that which obtains to-day in Canada under the volunteer system. Hon. gentlemen opposite, including the leader of the Opposition, have referred more or less to what has been termed the Nationalist-Conservative alliance. I am not going to say here whether that alliance ever existed or whether it did not. Personally, I do not believe, at this serious time in the nation's history in digging into old records in order to throw a slur across the floor of this House. If I did I might point out to my hon. friends that they should go back to the day when the seed was sown and follow it up to the day when it brought forth fruit in the shape of the Nationalist party. They will find that some hon. gentlemen on their own side of the House were responsible for the sowing of that seed. But this is not the time to refer to that. I want to be fair to the leader of the Opposition, but I want to point out to him that when he raised his voice in opposition to this Bill, he, unwittingly no doubt, formed an alliance that he cannot separate himself from in all the years that are to come. He formed an alliance with Tancrede Marsil for one, and he had long ago formed an alliance with Lucien Cannon in Dorchester. He has formed an alliance with Tancrede Marsil, the reactionary, who has been shouting from the platform in the large centres of Quebec that we owe nothing to England, that we will meet force with force, and I think the other day he even threatened to march on Ottawa if this Bill should become law. I repeat I do not want to be unfair to the leader of the Opposition, but he knows as well as I do that in the next campaign in this country, when the Government goes to the people, as it must in the course of time, he will at least receive the benefit of the efforts of these men during that campaign and he cannot break away from the result. I also want to give the leader of the Opposition an opportunity of correcting an impression that might be left by the perusal of an article that I happened to read in one of the Montreal papers the other day. I think I am not misstating the position of the hon. gentleman when I say that his reason for refusing coalition was the fact that conscription had been decided upon by the leader of the Government. In reading the issue of the Montreal Gazette, dated June 19, I find the following statement:

> Sir Wilfrid Laurier's statement in Parliament that Canada was not in danger was the dominant note. Tancrede Marsil used the Liberal chieftain's argument, and also quoted other sections of Sir Wilfrid's speech in support of the campaign which he and his friends have been waging, taking great comfort from the speech, but saying that it did not mean that the battle against conscription was definitely gained, and also pointing out that the aim of the agitation had still another end, that of forcing general elections. The fact that there is no coalition nor unionist government was due to the agitation that had been raised, and this same agitation he believed had given Sir Wilfrid the necessary backing to fight the battle in Parliament against conscription.

I simply place that on record to show that the leader of the Opposition, in taking the stand that he has taken, has placed himself in a very peculiar position.

I appeal to my compatriots from the province of Quebec: Is it right, is it just, is it human, that our boys who are now in the trenches should fight on, fight on by themselves without any help, when their cries are ringing in our ears continuously? Very often these cries escape from their dying lips. Is that fair? Some hon. gentlemen say that if you force this Bill through the House you will have civil war. I listened to the eloquent speech of the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil), and the burden of it from beginning to end was that the French people were a peace-loving, law-abiding people. I much prefer to think that than to think that the French Canadian people would raise any trouble in this country, or that we should be led to believe that they contemplate civil war. I think too much of the French Canadian people, and I believe that they think too much of themselves, to entertain any such idea, and I believe that when this Bill goes on the statute book, it will be accepted by the people of French Canada in the same spirit as it will be accepted by the people of Anglo-Saxon Canada.

Has the position that this country would be in if this Bill did not go through ever occurred to the members of this House? In such a case, look ahead into the years that are to come, when you and I and all the rest have passed away; I can see our children and our children's children turning the pages of history and reading the record of the nation's shame. After all the sacrifices we have made, after all the blood that has been shed, I ask you, Mr. Speaker, I ask every member of this House and I ask the people of Canada: Do we want to hand down to our children this record of shame and humiliation? Shall we ask posterity—shall we force posterity—to wear that crown of thorns? Would it not be immeasurably preferable, no matter what the sacrifice may be, no matter how much our ideas may differ, that we should have the satisfaction of knowing that those who come after us can turn to the pages of history, can read of battles fought, of battles won, of a nation saved by brave deeds, and know that the Canadians of this day measured up to the standard of their forefathers, and that from the beginning to the end of this war, they kept ever before them as their watchword the immortal words of Nelson: "England expects every man this day will do his duty."

It is said that this is too great a sacrifice to ask. They tell us that it is not fair to ask the mothers of Canada to give up their boys. Let me point out to this House that the boys who have gone were just as dear to their mothers as the boys who remain at home, that the sacrifice that the mothers of those boys who have gone made is just as great as that which the mothers of those who remain at home will be asked to make. We all know that the sacrifice will be great. We know it must be great, unfortunately so. But we also know that no great good ever came to anybody or to any nation without sacrifice. We know that the greatest boon to humanity was bought and paid for by blood on the hill of Calvary. We are aware that the human mind cannot conceive, nor the human tongue frame, words that will take the tear from the eye or the ache from the heart of the mother whose boy is gone. But we do know that, while she may go down through life with her heart torn with sorrow and anguish, she has the satisfaction of knowing that when she passes to the great beyond, she can stand before the God that gave her life and say: I gave part of myself, my own flesh and blood, in order that the principles that Thou has laid down for the guidance of humanity, principles that were engraven upon the tablets of stone in the days of Moses, may continue to prevail through all the ages amongst the children of men, and in order that liberty and justice and the principles of Christianity may be the heritage of all men to all generations.

Mr. L. J. GAUTHIER (St. Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, although we have been told from the other side of the House that members on this side when they were making speeches were losing time, that time was not for speeches, but for deeds, I think it is my duty, in a debate of this kind, to go on record, because I want to discuss this situation as it is, and I want to appeal to the good sense of my fellow members, expecting that at least there may be some to-day in this House who may listen to the language of reason. We all agree that war is a necessity, we all agree that to fight war you must have men; but we all agree, too, that the sacrifices of every country must be made, not according to the principles of hysteria, but in accordance with the principles of sound judgment and good administration.

I have made a synopsis of the remarks I wish to place on Hansard. There are six questions that I wish to discuss, but I wish to tell you immediately that the number of questions will not give you an indication of the length of my address, because I do not want to detain the House too long. I want to discuss: first, what are the propositions before the House, second, what is the actual available man-power in Canada; third, what is the man-power necessary for our economic life; fourth, what motive has actuated the amendment to the amendment; fifth, what is the purport of the Bill; and sixth, why I favour the amendment of my leader (Sir Wilfrid Laurier).

The right hon. the Prime Minister claims that, according to the Militia Act, the Government is empowered to levy the militia of this country, and Canada, on account of the war, having to face an emergency, this Government is entitled and empowered to send militia beyond the borders of Canada, and that our first line of defence is in France. The right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) asks of the House that the Bill be submitted to the people, and that it shall not become law unless it has been endorsed by the majority of our population. The amendment to the amendment, moved by the hon. member for Berthier (Mr. Barrette), seconded by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Achim), proposes the six months' hoist. What, according to the census figures, is the available man-power of Canada? At page 42 of the Canada Year Book of 1914, we find that in 1911 the whole population of Canada was 7,206,643, divided, as stated at page 43 of the same book, into, male population, 3,821,995, and, female population, 3,384,648. At page 70 of the same book, we find that out of this male population of 3,821,995, you must take the following who are unfit or exempted on account of age. (I must say, before giving these figures to the House, that I have calculated the number of men over fourteen years of age, because, the census having taken place in 1911, these boys are now twenty years of age, and so fall under the proposed law. And I have figured down to the male population aged forty years, because, with the same calculation, these men have now attained the age of forty-six years and they are exempted.) Under one year, there were 93,513; from one to four years, 354,106; from five to nine years, 395,045; from ten to fourteen years, 354,911; from forty to forty-four, 213,018; from forty-five to forty-nine, 178,715; from fifty to fifty-four, 152,718; from fifty-five to fifty-nine, 112,952; from sixty to sixty-four, 94,318; sixty-five and over, 159,605;—making a grand total unfit or exempted on account of age of 2,119,501 men. Thus our available man-power at that time, deducting those that were unfit or exempted according to the census figures given us, was 1,702,494. At page 15 of volume 2 of the census of 1911 we find that the number of defectives in the male population was 15,530, leaving a balance of 1,686,964. We have enlisted, some say 400,000, others says 411,000, others say 430,000 men. Let us figure it at 405,000. So that we have, in this country, an available actual man power of 1,281,964. I must admit that to this amount should be added the male immigrants of military age who have come to Canada since 1911. We have no official figures as to the number. It is true, the ex-Minister of Militia and Defence (Sir Sam Hughes) has given us 500,000 as the approximate number. But coming from that source I should figure that the real number of male immigrants since 1911 is about half, because in every statement by the ex-Minister of Militia and Defence you must figure on at least 50 per cent of bombast. So that you would have an actual available man power of 1,331,964.

The next question, Sir, is, what is, according to the 1911 census, the man-power required to secure the expansion and the development of our economic life in this country. It is all right enough to say: "We hear the clamour of the boys at the front, they cry for help and want us to send more men." This afternoon I heard the Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen) state that we had signed the bond and we had to pay it. That would be all right if we had the means to do it. I contend, Sir, taking the figures of the census and the available man-power necessary for our economic life, that we are unable to supply the number of men that are asked for without paralyzing our economic life. In the sixth volume of the census of 1911 we find figures giving the male population interested in the development of trade, transportation and economic life. The numbers are as follows:—

Agriculture	917,848
Building trades	245,990
Domestic and personal service	75,134
Civil and municipal government	72,531
Fishing and hunting	34,547
Forestry	42,901
Manufacture	392,781
Mining	62,707
Commerce	240,903
Transportation	210,602
Making a grand total of	2,296,022

Out of this, we have supplied more than 400,000 men. Is it possible that a Government situated as this Government is, with the responsibility which I am pointing out, will not listen to argument, and that the language of reason will not appeal to them? Hon. gentlemen speaking in this House in favour of the Bill are making comparisons between European countries and Canada. I believe, Sir, that the comparison cannot stand. The European countries are thickly settled, having every year an overflow of population, and they must seek an outlet for that overflow. Canada is a new country, thinly settled, having immense resources, requiring, outside of our available supply of man-power, the constant overflow of population from the European countries. We are unable to develop the resources of this country, as they should be developed, with our own supply of men, and it is unfair to make a comparison between Canada and the European countries. Canada needs more man-power, and that is the reason we have spent millions of dollars to bring immigrants to this country to assist development. Since the beginning of the war, we have made sacrifices, we have appealed to young people, to women and to old men, to assist in our trade, our agriculture, our factories and in all the branches of our economical development to take the place of the boys who have gone to the front. There is a shortage of man-power. My hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) proved that the Government had appealed to the United States for 50,000 farm labourers. Is it not a fact that the Imperial Munitions Board is complaining constantly of the scarcity of wage earners and man-power, and that half of the big corporations in this country have asked the Government to stop enlistments because there is a scarcity of man-power? The ex-Minister of Militia and Defence, told the House and the country that the Government, at the request of the munition workers, had retarded enlistment. Yet, in the face of all this, the Government asks us to pass a Bill which will send 100,000 more men to the front. I know the responsibility that rests on my shoulders. I have listened to the address of the hon. gentleman who has just spoken (Mr. J. A. M. Armstrong). I am not afraid of threats, and I am not going to be stampeded or forced to support a measure which I do not wish to support.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. GAUTHIER: The fact that I belong to the minority, and that I come from the province of Quebec, will not prevent me from uttering sentences I think I should utter in the defence of the cause for which I stand here. I do not say that the 100,000 should not be sent. I do not say we have done too much. I do not say we should do no more. But, before sending 100,000 of our young men to the front, causing us to run the risk of endangering our economic life, it is the duty of the Government to go to the people and ask them if they are ready to make the sacrifice of paralyzing the development of this country for all years to come. If the people are satisfied to make the sacrifice, we pledge ourselves that we will bow to the will of the majority of the population. What more can you ask?

We claim that the Government has no mandate from the people in respect to this measure. We may be wrong, but we may be right, I do not wish to discuss the legal aspect of the question; I want to discuss it simply from a business standpoint and with due regard to the feelings of the people whom I represent. The legal aspects of this question are numerous. Some say that the Government is empowered to take this course; others say that it is not. I shall not discuss that; it is sufficient for me to say that the Government have enough responsibilities; that they should not shoulder any additional responsibilities that they are not compelled to assume.

I was amazed at the amendment to the amendment introduced by the member for Berthier (Mr. Barrette) and seconded by the member for Labelle (Mr. Achim). These two gentlemen belonged to the 54th battalion of Sherbrooke; they were appointed lieutenants on March 6, 1915. This can be proved by referring to page 362 of the quarterly Militia List, edition of May 30, 1917. But after having enlisted they decided, one to propose and the other to second the motion that this Bill be given the six months' hoist. I suppose, although they had enlisted, they decided that they did not want to fight.

We are engaged in a very serious debate, but permit me to say that I consider this amendment to the amendment to be a farce. It has been engineered not by the mover and the seconder of the motion, but by the Government itself. It is all very well to ask that opinions be sacrificed; it is all very well to plead the magnitude of the task which confronts us; when the Government appeal to the good-will of the Opposition, they should, in my humble judgment, play the game fairly. They have played the game; they have laid on the table of the House their trump card —the little joker from Berthier.

It was very interesting indeed to listen to the speech of the hon. member for Berthier. He spoke of his conscience, of his profound love for his race and for his province, and of the disinterestedness of the sentiments which he entertained for the welfare of the whole community. But he intermingled his references to the future of Canada and the aspirations of the different races in this country with remarks concerning public works in his riding. He told us that since he had been elected, more public works had been carried on in the county that he represented than had been the case since Confederation. He seeks to have us believe that in taking the courageous stand that he has taken, he is liable to be deprived of patronage. Let the hon. gentleman be at peace. I ask him, for the sake of our individual peace on this side of the House, not to trouble us with such laments, because we know that in this matter he is hand in hand with the Government. His amendment, being a negative one, would have been ruled out of order if it had not been introduced with the consent of the Government.

9 p.m. As it stands in order. the hon. member need not feel uneasy; he is all right. My opinion is that after this debate is over the hon. member will keep on going to the shrine of the golden calf, under the benevolent eye of his master. He deserves a reward from his master, but he deserves also a punishment from his electors. I hope that he will get his reward, because I am sure that he will get his punishment. On the altar of partisanship he has sacrificed more than his life; he has slaughtered without mercy the shattered remnant of his honour. He is entitled to the reward, and I hope he will get it.

I come now to an examination of the Bill itself. It is a wonderful Bill. One of the peculiar aspects of it is that everybody wants to conscript the other fellow. Hon. gentlemen from the West who favour the Bill do so on the condition that the measure will conscript Ontario; those members from Ontario who favour the Bill do so upon the understanding that Quebec will be conscripted. In order that everybody should be satisfied, the Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen) this afternoon, in his most suave manner, assured the people of Quebec not to worry, because the Bill would bear more lightly upon Quebec than upon the other provinces. The Government wants to raise 100,000 men—but imagine, Sir, somebody in each province explaining that the operations of the proposed Act will not reach that province! Where are they going to get the men, if nobody is conscripted?

The Bill is drafted in such a way, however, that it appeals to every part of the country except Quebec. Although I am only a back bencher, I am going to have the audacity—not in the name of my province, from which I hold no mandate, but on my own behalf—to answer some of the remarks of the Solicitor General.

He says that the Bill will bear more lightly on Quebec than on the other provinces. I protest against that sentiment. We resent the insult whether direct or indirect. Thank Heaven we do not belong to a race of cowards. We are willing to do our share to the bitter end, and no man in this House nor in this country can tell us that if we vote for the Bill we shall be exempted. We do not want to be put in reserve. Our forefathers discovered this country; we have no other country in the world. This country is ours; we want to fight to the limit for it, because we have the protection of the state I will not allow any hon. gentleman to cast a slur upon us. I am not a minister of the Crown in this Government, thank Heaven!

I would like, en passant, to say a few words in answer to one of our former friends, the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie). Let me prove how profound our distrust is of this Bill. Here is a gentleman who has seen fit to leave his party and his chief. His argument is this: He wants to secure farm labour for his riding, contending that in supporting this Bill, he will get the farm help he requires. Here is a Bill drafted to enlist 100,000 men and send them overseas. There is a scarcity of labour, and when the 100,000 men will have gone away, the hon. member will get his farm help. That is why he supports the Bill. I am not surprised because I have heard the hon. member stating recently that the war has compelled us to act illogically, and he is living up to his statement. To convince his colleagues and the other members that he was in the right upon this question, he was obliged to resort to a new mandate. He is called in this House as a representative of South Wellington. Does he represent his constituents on this question? I say: no, because, if he did, he would not refuse to submit the question to them. Does he represent labour? No, organized labour in this country is against the Bill. Does he represent the British-born who have come to this country since the beginning of the war? No, they are against the Bill; they left their country so as not to be called upon to perform military service. Does he represent the country? No, he tells us that if the Bill is submitted to the people, it will be defeated. What then does he represent? He represents the honour of Canada. I will not make any comment. Here is an hon. gentleman, who stated in his address the other day that nine out of ten of the voters of this country would poll their votes against this measure, pretending to impose upon the people a measure that they would not stand for. If that is not Toryism of the best brand, I do not know what Toryism is.

The supporters of the Bill claim that the Canadian Expeditionary Force requires 100,000 men, and that this Bill is designed to supply that number. The Prime Minister has pledged the word of Canada, and, to use the very language of the Solicitor General this afternoon, the Government have signed the bond and we have to pay it. Was the pledge made for the assistance of the Empire or for the asistance of Canada? I would like to answer these questions. The Empire requires good-will and unity from the Dominions overseas. This Bill means animosity between the races and the cessation of a united and combined effort. Is that going to help the Empire? Not at all. The Empire requires food and ammunition. This Bill will deprive the Mother Country of the necessary flow of our productions, both agricultural and mechanical. Is the pledge going to help Canada? No. Canada cannot progress without peace, harmony and mutual understanding. Under this Bill, we shall get just the contrary. More than that, the splendid contributions of Canada, already freely given to Great Britain will be in vain. Unless you supply everything you have promised, unless you redeem in their entirety the pledges and the promises, your effort will be in vain.

For the proof that the pledge was made without consulting any one and without regard to the capacity or the resources of the country, we have only to look at the Bill. To supplement the promise and to redeem the pledge, the Government is compelled to have recourse to compulsion, and with compulsion you are going to have disruption. Will that save or help the Empire? I say: no. Why then was the pledge made? If it was not for the aid of the Empire nor for the aid of Canada, was it made to win the war and save the Empire? I know that the British authorities have sent here an officer who, after taking into consideration our resources in man-power and the necessity for Canada to supply food and ammunition, has made a report to the Government asking Canada to supply fifty per cent of the number of men we have so far furnished. The Government must be aware of this report, because I have been told by a gentleman who has seen and read that report, that such a report exists. Why make such a pledge? My belief is that the pledge was made to secure a new lease of power for the Administration. I have no hesitation in stating that the purport of the Bill is iniquitous and nefarious.

I come now to the amendment. We have a democratic Government and the people should rule. Why should the Government refuse to appeal to the people? They want a united effort on the part of all our citizens. Let them appeal to the people then, and get rid of all disunion. I say that the Government has set a bad example. Distrust breeds distrust, and confidence engenders confidence. We have been told in the House that one member of the cabinet exchanged letters not so long ago with the Prime Minister, making certain charges against the conduct of a certain department by one of his colleagues, and the colleague concerned was not cognizant of this charge. If ministers cannot agree amongst themselves, if they distrust each other, it is not to be wondered at if they distrust the people. Why should not the Government appeal to the people? Let them state their case before the country, and if the people are made aware of the pledge that has been given and of the necessity as it exists in the mind of the Government, I am confident that we can trust them. Do you think, Sir, that for political purposes one part of the country would refuse to acknowledge the signature, the bond, the promise, the pledge which had been given in good faith by the Government of this country? No, Sir.

Before resuming my seat I shall be very frank with the House. I want to make a few remarks in the name of my people. This is one of the most solemn hours of my life. It may be the last opportunity I shall have of addressing the House of Commons and my country. I say to the Government: If you press this measure through, my people, declaring that this Government has no mandate, will use the very Bill itself to fight the matter out. We acknowledge that in this fight there will be pain and suffering. We may have to go to the direst consequences. My people are willing to go to the limit if you impose upon them such a piece of legislation; I believe they are right, and I will do as they intend to do.

Mr. JOHN H. BURNHAM (West Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I followed the speaker who has just sat down (Mr. Gauthier) with considerable interest until he reached his climax, his threat, which has so frightened me that I hardly think I shall be able to continue. I will do my best, however, and I promise not to detain the House very long. This amendment refers in a few words to a referendum, for which it calls. If there is to be an appeal to the people both the right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) and the right hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) have made it quite clear that they prefer an election. In his negotiations with the right hon. the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), the Prime Minister, in answer to the request of the leader of the Opposition, freely offered to hold a general election if a coalition government were formed and the Conscription Bill put through. There has, therefore, been a declaration by this Government, bearing in mind what the Prime Minister and the Minister of Trade and Commerce have said, that they are willing to consult the people by general election, but not by referendum. The wisdom of that course I do not presume for one moment to question. Rightly or wrongly, our Government have given the Opposition the idea that with a very little urging they can get this Government to consult the country by means of a general election at least. The right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce said:—

> I would not be willing to go to the people with a referendum under these conditions, without giving first my lead in the representative position I have.

That is, he would be willing to go if he had first given the people a lead. He also said:—

> What we propose is to do, in the light of the experience and knowledge that we have, our plain duty, and let the people pass their verdict as they choose later, or by history.

The Government therefore have clearly offered to procure a mandate from the people. The question then resolves itself into a general election or a referendum. A six months' hoist is before the House, but it is beneath my contempt; I decline to discuss it. The referendum I will discuss, because it purports to refer to the will of the people. But that other abortion proposes to deny the propriety of going to the people, and is more Germanesque than the Germans ever were. It denies the right of the people to pronounce upon this policy, and sweeps that right aside whilst proclaiming its passion for liberty in this House. What we have got tied up to in this House God only knows, and it is time there was some sort of demonstration in the country to wipe it out of existence. Where it came from I do not understand, but where it is going I have a pretty good idea.

If a general election were held the leaders of the various parties would be required to announce their policy. It does not follow that there would be only two leaders and only two policies; there might be a dozen. When the election was over the Governor General would have the right and the discretion to call upon the man whom he thought most likely to form a stable government, and he would do so. In the event of a referendum being taken if the people said yea we should be in the same position we are in now. But if the people said nay, where would we be? We would be nowhere. The Governor General could not appeal to the present leader of the Opposition, for he would have expressed no opinion. The only people who would have expressed an opinion would be the Nationalists. Would he send for them?

The referendum would lead us into a technical and political calamity. It would be an absolute impossibility. There can be no excuse for it in the face of this great conflict or for debate upon the form of going to the people. It is too absurd. If we go to the people and get the people's verdict let it be, as my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) said, in a manly, responsible way. Let us stand sponsor for our opinions, let us go and tell the people what we think, and abide by the consequences and not on Dick Swiveller or Artful Dodger principles. Let us not reduce ourselves to the vulgarity of being mere politicians; let us at least rise to the height of those splendid men who have given us such a glorious lead in France and Flanders, let us show that we are worthy of being related to them by taking the action which must be taken, without delay.

There can be no question but that the justification for the Government's course in going to the people is plain. The people are the basis of democratic Government. We are here as the representatives of the people and only as representatives of the people. The people indeed are doing the fighting, they supply the sinews of war, they pay the taxes, they furnish by their franchise, the moral and political power; the people are all in all. We are but a few trustees who have been entrusted with the task of carrying out their mighty wishes. As Mr. Balfour has so well said: "If democracy fails us now we are indeed undone."

It must be expected that we will have some weaklings amongst us, that some—perhaps many—will fail to rise to the height of this great conflict. That is but natural. But if we are to fight as a united, powerful people, worthy of our place amongst the nations it must be as a fairly, fully and justly organized people. Every man must do his duty and we must remember that just as there may be the shirker or slacker amongst us, so there will be the financial slacker, the man who declines to come forward and place his resources at the disposal of the country. I myself know men whose resources consist of money. The cost of their living is but little more than that of the humblest amongst us. They have no children; they have no hostages to fortune. They do not even come within the purview of the Finance Minister's tax on sugar for "they do not take sugar." The fact is that they give to this great conflict just exactly what suits them, which is often not very much. When I am confronted by the statement of a class of people who say: We understand conscription of men but we cannot consent to the conscription of wealth because, while we understand the conscription of men, we cannot comprehend the conscription of wealth. I am at a loss to understand it and I cannot but suspect the motives of the men who make it. Is that right? When they find out what direct taxation in its multitudinous forms means—and how prone some people of all political parties are to side-step direct responsibility—although they do not recognize the positive principle, they are quite able to say promptly what the negative is and they are sure, after looking at it from all aspects, that they do not understand it. Well, all you have to do to show that you do understand a thing is to show absolutely that you do not understand it, because there is no getting away from a proposition which you are able to deny from all angles and all points. The shirking of such men will soon, I understand and hope, come to an end.

It will not please the people, and they will not stand for it. It must be remembered that there are two sorts of people who do not want a general election. One is the man who is unduly optimistic, and the other is the man who hopes that you will not get a mandate and that thus you will break up the whole support of Canada in the war and, that it will end in disaster and confusion. They are the two extremes. These things must be remembered.

Conscription is spoken of as a terrible thing as if it were a form of compulsion that had emanated from the Evil One. Cannot we realize that conscription, when passed upon by the people becomes not conscription or compulsion but the will of the people? The man who rejects it rejects not compulsion or conscription but the will of the people. He is not a protester; he is a rebel. He belongs then to the minority, and instead of complaining of the tyranny of the majority he should at least be circumspect enough to view the conduct of the minority not only with suspicion but with a just regard to punishment by the country. The minority cannot rule the majority; the people in the majority will not permit it.

I was very much pleased to hear the hon. gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. Gauthier) admit, as indeed the leader of the Opposition has admitted, that once the people have given their mandate all Canada must obey. But the question then arises: Can Canada give a mandate? I say most distinctly it can. There is not a man at the front who does not write regularly to his relatives or to some one. Let him indite, not ordinary epistles of affection, but what he thinks on the clear-cut issue of conscription or no conscription. The correspondence system, and the delivery of letters at the front is marvellous, it is up to date and to say that it is impossible to take the votes of the men at the front in face of the fact that they receive and give letters, parcels, all sorts of things, materials of every description, by post, with the exception of a few who may be wounded who are carried to hospitals and who are for a time unable to use their hands, is to take a position that the situation does not warrant. All, with the exception of the badly wounded, could mark their ballots. No man is on the fighting line for more than ten days at a time, many of them much less. I am within the mark in saying that in the most extreme cases no man is on the fighting line, or the immediate relief line, for longer than fifteen days, and then he goes back to his battalion, which will not be very far away, for rest, recuperation and training.

Thus in the course of fifteen days every man in the army who could make his mark at all could vote, and if to-night it was decided to have an election, all that would be necessary would be to flash the tidings across the water, hand the ballots to the responsible parties, see that the colonels of the battalions were apprised of the fact. Furnished with the ballots, they, with their magnificent organization, could see to it, by means of a muster parade or any other kind of parade you like, or through their subordinate officers, that every man was furnished with an opportunity for marking his ballot, and you would have a vote from the men at the front far larger in proportion than ever you would have if they were here in Canada, because the average vote is never more than sixty per cent, and you may rest assured that, wounded or not wounded, you would get ninety-five per cent of the vote at the front. It is easy. I cannot understand the difficulty of it. I asked time and time again, before I returned from the Old Country, why it was that there was such an objection, and the answer I received was not that there would be difficulty in taking the vote, but that it was not considered wise to inflame the minds of the men with a multitude of issues. Avoid the multitude of issues and you have it. The men are discussing from day to day the question of conscription and support. Let them say what they think on that one issue, and I will venture the assertion that you will have the vote of the men at the front satisfactorily taken, counted in London, and the tidings here, weeks before you have the vote taken in Canada. We must be just in regard to this matter, and I must say that to any utterance of Sir Joseph Flavelle, a gentleman whom I know well—I used to sit near him in school; unfortunately I did not acquire his ability, I just acquired his acquaintance—we must attach great weight. In discussing his caution to Canada about her man-power, he says:

> I am led to say this because I remember the necessity of securing further support for the men at the front, means there will be considerable impairment—

Not diminution, but impairment.

> —of the present factory working forces in Canada.

Quite clearly when the head of the Munitions Board—and he has proven himself to be a faultless, a flawless manager of munition producing in Canada; so much so that he stands extremely high in Imperial confidence—utters this warning at this time, he is wise enough to know what it means, and that is that we must be duly and properly organized. The point I wish to make in connection with this is that this statement of the head of the Munitions Board has given a reasonable cause or subject of protest to those who demand the mandate of an election. When he has thrown doubt upon the ability of Canada to furnish, without great care, more man power for the front, he has handed material for the very protest these gentlemen are making, and, like those other men high in authority who have stated that they have no objection to an election, he has placed us in that very position that we must give due regard to the necessity or the opportunity of a mandate and to the fact of there being danger of decreasing the man-power in the country. The stability of a nation depends upon the fairness, the force, the vigour and the strength, the convincing manner, in which its affairs are administered. To quote the Munitions Board once again, there is not a murmur except from the politicians who have been unable to exercise any influence with the Munitions Board, and the reason they complain is, not because they wished to do anything improper, but because sundry of their constituents kept shoving them and urging them over and over again, asking them to exercise their influence, and they have found that it could not be done. In that way Sir Joseph Flavelle has established the confidence of the people, and also has shown conclusively that, as an organizer in that most difficult and nebulous part of our industry, namely the making of munitions, a thing we never did before, he is a past-master.

Let some man, then, be put in charge of agriculture; let another man be put in charge of food; let another man be put in charge of man-power; let another man be put in charge of a fair distribution of taxes, throwing all the resources of the country into the general pot, and not asking the working classes to hand over the men and the taxes both and do all the work—which they certainly will not do, and we in fairness should not expect them to do—and when we have organized, and when we have obtained, by moving rapidly, the mandate of the people, then, when we are conscious of our strength, the minority must give way. Then the Nationalists and all the other kickers will have to subside, and we shall hear no more of them. This course will not only have the effect of enabling us to assist in the war, but it will also have a splendid effect upon Canada for all time to come.

Mr. GEORGE McCRANEY (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, after a number of leading members of this House have dealt with this question, we have the experience which always occurs, that those who follow up repeat many of the arguments that have been used, and their contribution very often is only that they have given expression to views which have already been pronounced. I do not know that I can present to the House at this hour anything that is striking, but the fact that I have views on the question that is before us is the apology which I make for taking up the time of the House.

What are the responsibilities which we owe to 300,000 men who are now in England, France and Flanders, in the King's uniform, under authority of this Parliament? We shall answer the question pretty much in the views we hold as to the relation which the citizen bears to the state. Some of us hold the view that the relations are reciprocal, that the citizen who is damaged in his person, in his right, or in his property, has a right to the protection of the state, and also that when the state is in danger, the state has a right to call upon the citizen for his property and for his person in its defence. There is another point of view which is put forward. It is that the state must protect individuals and minorities, in their persons, their rights and properties, but that when the state is in jeopardy it is optional on the part of the citizen whether he shall serve it or not.

In this latter view military necessity plays no part. The only contingency under which the state might call upon the citizen is that our country should be invaded and all the horrors of an alien army be in our midst. To our forces in France and Flanders it denies all help except voluntary aid. If that view prevails, with the failure of recruiting efforts our men at the front are left to dwindle in numbers, to be discouraged in spirit, with companies growing smaller, and with final abandonment by our people. There are those who hold against conscription on principle. They have held that view for a number of years. If the last three years, with all its events, and the changes in opinion which the events have brought, have made no change in their point of view on such a principle as this, there is no tragedy which can happen between now and the end of the war that would change their minds.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. McCRANEY: No disaster could disturb principles so firmly set. There are few of us who do not abhor the idea of war at all, and the necessity for any compulsion of the citizens, and it is only under the most urgent necessity that we would consider such a thing. All of us had hoped that the war would have been concluded long before this, and that there would have been no occasion for legislation of the character that is now before the House. It is because of the question of time involved in the submarine menace, and also because of the practical withdrawal of Russia, that the seriousness of the situation has come before us, and that we are obliged now to consider methods of reinforcing our men on the battle line. My hon. friend from St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Gauthier) quoted the census returns to prove that we had not any men to spare to send to the front. I have never gone through the census reports, and I do not propose to. I have passed in front of the entrance to a number of picture shows in our cities, and I obtained all the information I wanted. I have no doubt there are other places we could go, to see young men in numbers shouting "Down with conscription," and we can easily make up our minds as to whether there is a surplus population that would be better otherwise employed. As to the necessities of the case, we have the assurance of the Prime Minister, who takes the responsibility of saying more men are required. We have figures given to us, showing that our losses are much in excess of the recruiting that is going on. We have the words of the men who come back to us, who tell us that more are needed. We are under obligations, as a Parliament, to fill up the ranks. We have sent those young men forward with all the assurances that this Parliament can give, and without any reserve as to whether further reinforcements would be by voluntary system or by conscription. Those of us who have been able to do so have made eloquent speeches bidding them farewell, which speeches become only empty platitudes unless we propose to make them good. We find that the wounded in battle, are obliged, after recovering, to go back into the trenches. Notwithstanding the testimony which my gallant friend from West Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) gives that men are only ten days in the front trenches, I am told that for seven and eight months they are never away from the battlefront, although not exposed to actual danger. Men are being sent home now not wounded, but because they are medically unfit to stay there longer. When these conditions prevail, I say that no man who has been wounded should be obliged to go back into the battleline. No man should be obliged to stay in France, either on the battleline or in the near reserve, without having sufficient rest. There are plenty of young men in our country to take their places, and I think we ought to see to it, so far as we have power, that their places are filled by these young men. It is said we need do nothing, because there are 100,000 men in England in reserve. If the Government meet some of the returned soldiers they will find that one of the sorest points is that there are so many senior officers in England who are unwilling to go over to France as lieutenants. I hope the Government will institute an inquiry, and have everybody sent home who is not of use there. I am not speaking from the standpoint alone of the military requirements at the front, but I should think an investigation of that character would relieve the sense of injustice that is felt, which we hear of every time we meet returned soldiers. I do not suppose they tell their troubles to members of the Government. I know they tell them to other individuals. I have seen it stated unofficially that the reserves in England are good for only about five months. The months pass quickly, and we have to make our decision and adopt our measures. I would like to believe that further recruiting would make up the reinforcements required. If that were so, I would urge the Government to withdraw the Bill and try recruiting first, but I would say that, if that attempt failed, the men's places must be filled, and, if the recruits cannot be obtained under the voluntary system they must be obtained anyway, and that there must be compulsion. But I know that those who hold against compulsion on principle would not agree to that, even as an ultimate resort, and it is useless to talk to them about it.

The Government has presented the Bill. The Bill is subject to any amendment that will tend to further its objects. It meets the present need, because its purpose is to supply men.

An amendment to the Bill has been moved by the leader of the Opposition. That amendment recognizes no need, suggests no remedy, applies no alternative; it proposes only that there shall be a referendum. The number of votes available from our soldiers in France, Flanders, England and Canada is about 300,000. It has been stated in the House—almost as a matter of generosity—that that vote would be taken. But I do not know why the trenches, hospitals and camps should be invaded with ballot boxes in order that we may find out whether the soldiers want reinforcements. In Scripture, the example of the unnatural father is the man who, when his son asked for bread, gave him a stone. The object of this amendment is, in answer to the request of the men for reinforcements, to give them a referendum. If the House declares itself in favour of a referendum, we shall go down to history as being in the position of the unnatural father who gave his son a stone when he asked for bread. Let us give bread, not a stone; let us give reinforcements, not a referendum.

The male population of military age in Canada may be roughly divided into two classes: those who can go but will not, and those who would go but cannot. I do not see how any assistance could be given to the men in France by giving these people an opportunity of expressing their opinion through a referendum. The only thing accomplished by a referendum is the providing of a line of retreat.

We have never appreciated the fact that the sacrifice made by the soldier is for the benefit of the community. We who are at home should bear burdens commensurate with our immunity from the conditions of the battlefield. Perhaps the present apathy towards recruiting and the attitude of a large part of the public in regard to this Bill are due to the fact that many of us have profited rather than suffered as a result of the war. Manufacturers have flourished; wages have greatly increased; mercantile businesses have multiplied their volume of trade; higher prices have come for agricultural products. In a material sense, only those who receive salaries or large incomes are bearing greater financial burdens than before the war. Our war finance has been carried on largely by borrowed money. We have raised comparatively little more than ordinary expenditure; only about $100,000,000 has been applied on a war expenditure of $700,000,000. I should like to see a stronger war policy in financial matters, the taxation of incomes and wealth, and an endeavour to even up the burdens borne by those who suffer and those who are able to save by the sacrifices of the soldiers. I welcome the announcement of the Finance Minister that a measure for the imposing of an income tax will be introduced. I hope that he will not stop there; that he will, by fixed and equitable principles, get larger contributions from those who receive the greatest—

Mr. PUGSLEY: Did the minister make that announcement?

Mr. McCRANEY: The announcement was made in the public press.

Mr. PUGSLEY: In the newspapers. That is a different matter.

Mr. McCRANEY: By a unanimous vote we passed a resolution last session asking the Imperial authorities to extend the life of this Parliament. Since then we have assumed all the responsibilities and all the duties which pertain to members of this Assembly. One of our duties is public leadership. The public expect that from the members of Parliament, but a referendum would at once deny them that leadership. The people are entitled to the judgment of this House in respect to the desirability of enforcing a measure of compulsory service. Having regard to the feeling which is abroad, I have come to the conclusion, since the bringing down of this measure was announced, that compulsory military service should not be enforced under the authority of this Parliament. This is a moribund Parliament; we would do better to have an election. My suggestion is that before this Bill is passed, the Government amend the section which relates to the coming of the Act into operation so as to provide that the Order in Council making it effective should not be passed until after a general election. Some people, I know, feel that a general election would fan certain smouldering sparks into a great conflagration. I have a more hopeful outlook than that—at least I did have when I came into the Chamber to-night, but it has been somewhat dissipated by the remarks of the member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Gauthier). I hope that the hon. gentleman will reconsider his position. He has always had the reputation of being fair and reasonable; and some parts of his speech did bear out that reputation. The character of an election depends upon the members of this House—if they do not abdicate their leadership. Up to this evening the character of this debate was most moderate. Perhaps the member for St. Hyacinthe was tempted to take the attitude that he did by the remarks of the member for North York (Mr. J. A. Armstrong); those who follow may take warning. I believe that this debate can be conducted reasonably and without passion, just as other debates have been which have dealt with serious and important questions. My hope is that a general election will cause, not a great conflagration, but the dying away of the smoking embers. We have confidence that the leadership of this country, even though it may disagree with the principle of the Bill, will use its best efforts after a general election to secure the obedience of the people to the law.

10 p.m.

Those are the assurances of men in this House, and I take them at their word. It may be said that the holding of a general election would cause a delay in bringing this measure into operation. I can imagine nothing more disastrous than the passage of this Bill and an attempt by this Parliament to apply it to some portions of this country. I do not think there would be any gain of time in that way; I believe time would be lost, and sometimes the longest way round is the shortest way there. My advice to the Government is to let it be known to the public that this Bill will not be enforced until after a general election. The public will understand the matter well; the passage of the Bill will be facilitated; many objections which are now made to the Bill will be removed, and I believe in the end the result will be more satisfactory than if any other course is pursued.

In this House we are overwhelmed by suspicion of each other; we suspect each other of playing a political game. I do not want to say that such a thing does not exist in this House, but I believe that if in this Parliament the prospect of a general election were four or five years distant, the temptation of that thing would be far removed, and we would get the best results under new conditions and with new men.

In saying what I have said to-night, I have spoken at variance with the views which have been expressed by my right hon. leader (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). With the Chief Whip of the party (Mr. Pardee). I feel that, having followed our leader for quite a number of years, it is with regret that I take the course I do. But I wish to say of my leader and his course upon this measure, notwithstanding the strictures that have been passed by my hon. friend from North York (Mr. J. A. M. Armstrong), that I believe the attitude of the leader of the Opposition is dictated by considerations which appeal to him as being his highest patriotic duty.

In this year we celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of Confederation. In the years since Confederation we have never previously had before us a question so full of national danger and requiring higher statesmanship. Perhaps I have been too optimistic in hoping that an election contest would be carried on with moderation and good sense, but I prefer to have that optimism. I hope the events of the next few months will do credit to the members of this Parliament and full justice to the 300,000 men on the other side of the water who are looking to us for reinforcements, and will justify the Confederation of which our forefathers laid the foundation half a century ago.

Mr. JOS. DEMERS (St. John and Iberville) (Translation): As the debate which is now engrossing the attention of Parliament and of the country is of greater consequence than any that have ever taken place in this House, it stands to reason that many hon. gentlemen should deem it their duty to give expression to their views and feelings.

I do not rise, Sir, to participate at any length in the debate that is now in progress, as I have no idea that I shall be able to add very much, if anything, to the exhaustive statements of those who have spoken before me; for, as my hon. friend (Mr. McCraney) has remarked, at this stage of the debate, those who follow up contribute very few new arguments and their speeches vary only in the shape given to the expression of their views.

Without any further delay, I enter upon the subject.
