I should like to say of few words about the fishing industry, particularly in British Columbia. This province is fortunate to be positioned on the Pacific rim. A quarter of the world's population, a billion people or so, live on the Pacific rim. On our side of it there is a relative abundance of fish and relatively few people. Across the Pacific the situation is the opposite. There is no abundance of fish, but there is a large population. That is why it is important for Canada to develop good marketing relationships with Pacific rim countries.

Contrary to what the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) said, Canadians—and I am speaking of those on the Pacific coast—have a responsibility. If we are unable to catch a variety of fish because it is uneconomic for our fishermen, I submit we do not have the right to take a dog in the manger attitude and say that if we cannot fish a species, then no one else can. This is not only a moral question, but is in the best interests of Canada from a practical point of view. Surely it is in our interests to develop relationships with Asian countries that are short of protein. Trust and confidence should be built not at the expense of the Canadian fisherman but to ensure that where there is a species he does not catch, he does not lose money.

That is not to say that we should not develop these species in the future. However, at a time when they are uneconomic for him I applaud the system that has been established for the licensing of foreign vessels, which can come into specific areas on the west coast for specific catches and be monitored by the Department of Fisheries. It would not be in our interests to do less.

I should like to mention the importance of the salmon industry in British Columbia, Mr. Speaker. This government—I hope I am not being partisan—is recognized—

Some hon. Members: Never.

Mr. Anderson: I knew that would be the response, Mr. Speaker. This government is recognized on the west coast as being one of the most progressive governments since Confederation.

An hon. Member: I withdraw.

Mr. Anderson: There is the 200-mile limit and the salmon enhancement program. These might not be important to members from Saskatchewan or Manitoba, but in British Columbia they are looked upon as a God-send for future developments that will bring untold wealth to the province.

The fourth largest industry in British Columbia is salmon fishing. That has nothing to do with herring or halibut. The third largest industry is tourism. Last year the minister announced a $150 million five-year program to enhance salmon stock in British Columbia. That was in addition to the 200-mile fishing limit established in January 1977. That is why I say this government will be recognized in British Columbia as having a great economic impact on the future of the province. I am proud to be part of a government which has brought in this forward looking legislation and programs which will benefit the people in my area—and all people in British Columbia.

I should like to mention some of the problems associated with the 200-mile limit and why I think Canada must take a rational approach when dealing with foreign nations. For some unknown reason the salmon has no respect for the 200-mile limit. It roams the Pacific and can be fished on the high seas by other nations. We have the 200-mile limit but we should also protect salmon on the high seas. This government has worked and fought for several years at the law of the sea conferences to have a salmon article included in the combined negotiating text that would allow protection of salmon on the high seas and ensure they can be fished only within the economic zone of the country of origin.

The hon. member for St. John's East brought up the question of foreign fleets. I believe that if we do not allow foreign fleets to fish surplus Canadian stocks which we are not ourselves fishing at the present time, it will be much more difficult to get agreement in regard to the high seas. If we allow surplus stocks to be fished by other nations, we are in a better position to get agreement on other vital issues, such as stocks of Canadian fish that go past the 200-mile limit. This refers not only to salmon but to other stocks off the east coast of Canada. It is also important to the trollers of British Columbia that fish off the coasts of Washington and Oregon states and to British Columbia fishermen who fish off the Gulf of Alaska for halibut.

We are not operating in a vacuum. The hon. member for St. John's East would have us believe that Canada can make decisions without taking into account how those decisions affect our trading partners. I am not speaking of the trade off of merchandise goods. If we show co-operation in the fishing of surplus stocks, it will obviously be to our long-term benefit in establishing relations with foreign fishing fleets and their governments so that markets for Canadian products can be opened up. This is important. It is all very well to have a source of fish on both the east and west coasts but markets for that fish must exist. We do not consume the fish ourselves. We consume about 10 per cent of the total catch and 90 per cent is exported. In our dealings with these nations it is imperative that we be fair-minded in order to develop these markets. We should be opening up markets with the Japanese, the Spanish and the EEC for our products.

The Japanese are allowed at the present time to catch certain kinds of groundfish off the west coast of Canada. Our fishermen are concerned that at some time in the future they will want to catch those stocks themselves. I applaud them for this, as I hope they do. But if there are surpluses in the future, these surpluses should be shared with other nations of the world. Canadian fishermen should have first opportunity and this principle should be written in stone. But if Canadian fishermen do not wish to take a stock for one reason or another, one cannot close the gates and say that no one else can.

I see the hon. Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc) is in the House and I would like to direct one suggestion to him. I understand the remarks which he made regarding the naming of the new department. For some time now I have thought that the perfect name to describe a new department and his title would be the ministry of aquaculture and minister of aquaculture. When it comes to dealing with farms, land and livestock we have a Minister of Agriculture. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) has many responsibilities besides farms and land; he deals with agricultural exhibits, but he is called the Minister of Agriculture. In the same way that we cultivate the land we are trying to cultivate the oceans, so I suggest it would be appropriate that his department be renamed the ministry of aquaculture. It would also lead to a better title for the hon. minister.

Mr. Mike Landers (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Environment)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to offer my congratulations to the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) for asking the government to amend the Government Organization Act of 1970 in order to set up a separate department of fisheries. We are glad of his support in this matter since it is already a declared policy of this government.

I would also like to offer to lend my Oxford dictionary to the hon. member. Apparently he is not aware of what the word "arrogant" means. If he were aware of what it means he would cut out his tongue before he would apply that word to the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc).

No doubt the hon. member will recall the swearing in ceremony on September 16 last year, when the hon. member for Kamloops-Cariboo (Mr. Marchand) became the Minister of State (Environment). At a press conference the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) stated, and I quote:

> We will separate the two departments as soon as we can get the legislation passed. In the meantime, Mr. LeBlanc will work with Mr. Marchand: one on the fisheries side, one on the environment side.

This made the government's intentions pretty clear. It was a first step in the process of separation. The next step is for the House to approve the change through a new Government Organization Act. It is good to know that we can anticipate the hon. member's support when such a bill is introduced. I would like to assure the House the details are being diligently worked out by department officials and advisers to the Prime Minister. However, there are other more pressing matters which take precedence over this particular act. Such priority legislation must come first before the House.

With this in mind, I feel sure that the hon. member and his colleagues will be eager to facilitate passage of the pending legislation. Then this matter, in which the hon. member has demonstrated such an interest, can come forward sooner. Of course, while officials are hard at work defining the exact outlines of the new departments, the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment will be concentrating his efforts on fisheries matters while the Minister of State (Environment) will be looking after the environment side.

In working out the details of this organizational change we must examine, Mr. Speaker, in practical terms, just what part of the present department's responsibilities should be allocated to each of the new departments. The hon. member has already demonstrated his interest in the operations of the department a number of times. Thus I am sure I do not have to explain to him how complex it is, nor explain the number of interrelated functions which have a bearing on both fisheries and environment.

I am sure everyone will agree that work should not be disrupted within the department during the separation of functions. Hon. members can appreciate that disruption at this or at any time could be critical if it affects either the fishing industry or the environment. Another consideration is the maintenance of links that already exist, and even the creation of new links. Two departments with so many common interests should continue to work in harmony and in a spirit of co-operation. In my opinion such a spirit will be even more productive than regulated interdepartmental structures.

In deciding where particular sections or units should go, whether to fisheries or to environment, we have to consider the effect not only on the unit or section but also on each department. More important, the public we serve must not be allowed to suffer from any disruption in the services we offer.

The aim of this exercise is to end up with two stronger departments, each more efficient than the combined department. The capabilities of these two new departments are expected to be greater than those of the former single ministry. I must emphasize this is the salient point in splitting the functions. We are seeking more efficiency and it is our belief that a proper division will accomplish just that. Do not expect to see any dilution of the present programs. Indeed, the result will be a distinct sharpening of focus. The mandates for work in both departments already exist; reorganization will allow us to refine and to re-emphasize them.

Within the environment there will have to be a strong emphasis on the watch dog role and there is a need to follow this through. There is a research role in environment, as there is in fisheries. This role may well prove to be one area where sharing and co-operation will be most profitable to both departments.

There are continuing demands for more research on the effects of climate variations; on the threats to human, animal and plant life from countless contaminants; on the capacity of air, water and soil to break these contaminants down into harmless substances; and on economical, practical means to control or eliminate industrial or domestic wastes which are harmful to the environment.

The need for research goes beyond pollution control. New technology needs to be developed to capture and re-use wastes as part of a policy of energy and other resource conservation. Therefore, there must be a stepping up of the research and development role. There will be concrete efforts made to transfer new technology to the provinces and to industry. There is an urgent need to share such new knowledge.

The government just recently renewed its commitment to one major resource sector, the forestry industry, in order to provide it with urgently needed research. This was specifically requested by the provinces at the recent meeting of premiers. We are already committed to research on the spruce budworm, the scourge of our forests. We plan to invest some $3 million in such research. The United States is spending $5 million in co-ordinated research which will complement our work.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, there has been considerable pressure for a separate fisheries department. Perhaps less vocal, but strong nevertheless, has been the movement to have a separate department to serve as a focus for the concerns of the environment and environmentalists. I use the term "environmentalist" here to indicate those who are not only concerned about the environment but who speak up for it and do something about it. It is the difference between being active rather than passive. Nearly everyone today is concerned to a degree about the environment—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I have to interrupt the hon. member because the time allotted to private members' business has now expired. I do now leave the chair till eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

● (2002)

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

AERONAUTICS ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING CHARGES FOR USE OF AIRPORTS, ETC.

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-4, to amend the Aeronautics Act, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, and the motion of Mr. Mazankowski.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): At five o'clock the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie) had the floor. He has 20 minutes remaining.

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to participate in the debate on Bill C-4, to amend the Aeronautics Act. I wish to speak on clause 4 which deals with the licensing of pilots and other persons engaged in the navigation of aircraft and of persons engaged in the design and manufacture of aircraft and aeronautical products. It has a lot to do with air safety.

This has been a matter of concern over the past number of years, particularly the last six months. It has been raised repeatedly by opposition members both in the House and in committee. We have received assurance after assurance that there is nothing to worry about, that everything is under control. I am sorry to say that is not the case in Canada today with regard to air safety. This is not a pleasant task I have this evening, but it is something that must be brought out into the open.

One of the last occasions when I raised this matter of air safety in Canada was on February 15 of this year. Part of my question to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) was as follows:

I ask what measures the minister's department has taken to see that airlines are adhering to MOT standards and that operational control procedures are up to standard?

I commented with regard to a recent crash at Pickle Lake. I pointed out at that time, and I quote:

Inspection and enforcement actions by Transport Canada was not effective in correcting the deficiencies of the carrier.

I asked when the Ministry of Transport would start enforcing and correcting safety regulations relating to Canadian airlines. The minister replied in part as follows:

Action has been taken since that time. I wish the hon. member would not try to mislead the public with regard to that matter. This action is important.

That action certainly is important. However, the minister is unfortunately not being fully informed by the Ministry of Transport, or is not being completely honest with members of the House and the Canadian public, with regard to problems in his department. I do not believe he is fully informed of all that is going on in his department. The minister went on to say:

We are trying to do that with an extremely able group of transport officials, inspectors and agents throughout the country.

I have no quarrel with that. The officials of MOT are an exceedingly competent group. The problem lies with the senior officials in the Ministry of Transport. This is causing serious concern. The minister further stated:

As a result, I think it is fair to say that we have a safer aviation system in this country than any country of the world.

● (2012)

Well, I would question that, Mr. Speaker. A matter was brought to my attention recently with regard to flight engineers. I have a document here which states:

At present the airlines are operating with unlicensed personnel in the flight engineer positions, contrary to various aircraft type approvals but acceptable in accordance with air navigation order series VII, No. 2.

This document is dated March 22, 1976. Here we find first documentation of the fact that flight engineers were not properly licensed. This situation has continued right up until last week and I can inform the House when corrective measures are to be taken: they are to be taken some time in the future.

Another government memorandum headed "Personnel Licensing Handbook" states:

New standards are proposed because there is an increase in the number of airplanes in Canada whose type approval or type certificate requires that a flight engineer be included as a member of the flight crew. We are concerned about the legal aspects since the present licence status of second officers fulfilling the flight engineers duties is contrary to the requirements of specific aircraft type approvals or type certificates ond consequently of the flight crew requirements contained in the relevant approved flight manuals.

[Mr. McKenzie.]

Hon. members will have noticed the reference to "legal aspects". All I can understand by that phrase is that, in the event of a crash involving loss of life, if it transpired that all the personnel on the plane were not properly licensed it would cost the Canadian taxpayers a tremendous amount of money. The tab would not be picked up by the insurance company but by the Canadian taxpayers. I do not understand how such a situation to which attention was called back in 1976 could go uncorrected.

An MOT regulation referring to flight engineer licenses states:

An applicant shall have reached his 21st birthday and shall have completed the following medical requirements in accordance with medical standards—

It goes on and on; the regulations set out in detail the qualifications these individuals must possess.

A further document makes the point that there is an apparent contravention of air regulations, ANOs and type certificates for B-747s, B-727s by Air Canada and CP Air. This is a memorandum from a civil aviation inspector to an inspector in Toronto. It states:

It has come to my attention that Air Canada and possibly CP Air are operating in contravention of Air Regulation 400, A.N.O.VII No.2, Part IV Section 38(1)(a) and 2, the aircraft type certificate and the aircraft flight manual.

Air Regulation 400 states "No person shall fly or attempt to fly as a crew member of an aircraft unless he is the holder of a valid and subsisting licence or permit appropriate to his duties."

This memorandum, Mr. Speaker, is dated February 20, 1978. This shows that the problem which was first identified in 1976 is still with us. It goes on to say:

If these apparent contraventions are allowed to continue, an accident or incident could result in acute embarrassment to Transport Canada and possibly a substantial loss to the Canadian taxpayer in any resulting court action.

Embarrassment to the minister and to the department! We are talking about air safety and the protection of people's lives, and all this document is interested in is possible embarrassment to the ministry. This matter goes back to a telex which was sent out on May 12, 1977 with regard to examining the operating certificates of various airlines. This communication states that there might be a case for charges under the provision of air navigation order series III, (7) and so on. This document is a directive to safety inspectors across Canada. It came from the inspection branch, aeronautical licensing, and contains the following words: "When carrying out your duties you must fully consider the possibility of embarrassment to the minister and any other potential political implications." Can you imagine such a state of affairs, Mr. Speaker? We are supposed to be talking about air safety. This could only happen under a Liberal government. Politics are being placed above air safety. According to this document, the main concern is not to embarrass Transport Canada. But what about the possible loss of 150 lives? Wouldn't that be an embarrassment, too? The situation to which I am calling attention has existed unchanged for the last two years. That is typical Liberalism.

I have here also another Government of Canada memorandum. It comes from the MOT office in Montreal and is directed to Ottawa. The subject is minimum flight crew—Boeing B-727 aircraft, and the document states:

The Acting Superintendent, Air Carrier Inspection and Certification division, has brought to my attention what appears to be an illegal practice by our national carrier, namely Air Canada.

The minimum flight crew requirements as per the Boeing B727 FAA Approved Flight Manual is quote: "pilot, co-pilot and flight engineer" unquote; however, Air Canada's flight crew for this aircraft consists of a pilot, co-pilot and second officer.

Article 400 of the Air Regulations, as well as Series VII, No. 2 of the Air Navigation Orders, are both very explicit in that the flight crew of any aircraft must conform to the requirements of the Approved Flight Manual and hold valid licences appropriate to their duties.

Since I am not aware any exceptions or dispensations to the Air Regulations regarding this matter, I have no alternative but to assume that Air Canada's Boeing B-727 operation is illegal.

I do not know the exact number of Boeing 727s that Air Canada is operating tonight, but according to this government document they are flying illegally. But that's all right; we don't want to do anything to embarrass the minister. Here we go again:

Considering the political implications of any action against our national carrier and the embarrassment to Transport-Canada that this may cause, I submit this problem to your attention for guidance and/or action. I must however, impress on you the urgency of this matter.

I myself would certainly think there was some urgency attached to this. "Don't do anything to embarrass the minister", flight inspectors are told. But what about the Canadian public? It is not the safety inspectors who are at fault, it is the senior officials. It is unfortunate the minister is not here tonight. I suggest to him that he should make some inquiries of his senior staff to find out what on earth is going on in his department. We have pointed out these infractions in respect of air safety in Canada time and time again. I have here further evidence of this fact, yet the government is worried about its political skin rather than the safety of the Canadian flying public. I am worried about the flying public.

I first became involved in air safety back in 1973. I was pretty naive in those days when I first came down here. Some evidence was brought to my attention about air safety and I wrote the then minister of transport. I received a most ridiculous answer indicating that I had produced no evidence and there was nothing to confirm my charges. I became angry and I raised the matter regarding air safety before the committee. I thought this was a subject that should be discussed in camera. However, the Liberal members of the committee were not going to have this matter discussed in camera. I thought that was the proper place to discuss air safety, but they were not having any of that.

At this time we are going to discuss this matter in the open, and I will continue to discuss it until corrective measures are taken. In the operations manual, section 38(1) under the heading "Crew Member Requirements" states:

No carrier may use a person as a flight crew member unless that person

(a) holds a valid licence issued under the Air Regulations appropriate to the duties to be performed; and

(b) is otherwise qualified in accordance with this Order.

This problem has been with us for at least two years, and apparently it was brought to the attention again of Air Canada last week in a letter dated March 9 to the vice-president, flight operations, Air Canada, Montreal International Airport, which points out:

This letter is in reference to the licensing of personnel assigned to flight engineer duties in your aircraft.

There has been a considerable increase in numbers of aircraft with flight engineer crew positions. We are concerned about legal aspects—

They are concerned about the legal aspects! The letter goes on to state:

We are concerned about legal aspects since the present licence status of second officers—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McKenzie: Just listen to those two jokers over there. This is a big joke to the Liberals who are concerned about the legal aspects. They will be embarrassed before I am through with them, and they need not think they are ever going to shut me up.

The letter states:

—since the present licence status of second officers is contrary to requirements of the various aircraft type approvals and crew requirements specified in Approved Airplane Flight Manuals. To rectify this situation it has been decided that where aeroplane type flight manuals specify three essential crew members, the flight engineer shall hold a valid flight engineer's licence endorsed for that aeroplane.

Today the flight engineers do not hold valid licences and they are flying illegally. This is the situation about which the Liberals are talking and about which they are concerned over legal aspects. They are not concerned about the safety of the flying public; they are concerned about the legal aspects, and they are concerned about embarrassment to the minister. That is their big concern.

Mr. Condon: Mr. Speaker, I have listened for the last 15 or 20 minutes to the venom coming from one hon. member. If he has accusations to make I would suggest that he make them outside where he does not have the immunity of the House. He is blaming the Liberal government for the crash at Cranbrook. We have had too much of this. We have had other members on the other side take shelter in the immunity of the House, instead of going outside and making specific allegations. I am getting sick of that. I wish the hon. member would have enough courage to go outside and make those allegations. What he is saying is that the Liberal government caused the crash at Cranbrook. I will not accept that and I do not think the public or any member of this House, other than the hon. member—and I question that "honourable"—will accept that.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I gather that my friend from across the way is disagreeing with what the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie) was saying. If you were listening, and I hope you were, he accused the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre of being less than honourable. If an hon. member is allowed to rise in his place and make accusations, he at least should not cast that kind of reflection on any member of the House. While he may have his own point of view in respect of what the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre said, I do not—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that we are now getting into a point of debate.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that the hon. member should stick to jails. At no time did I mention anything about Cranbrook. That will be coming out at a later date, and he can be sure of that.

In addition, Mr. Speaker, nothing is to be done about this serious problem regarding unlicensed flight engineers until July 1, 1978. I am calling upon the parliamentary secretary, because I understand the Minister of Transport if over in Hawaii, to take immediate action to get these flight engineers licensed. Never mind waiting until July 1, 1978. The government's main concern seems to be with the legal aspects. I am quite sure the hon. member has updated his driver's licence and the insurance on his home. I do not think he would let that lapse for six months, and neither would I.

This document to Air Canada also points out that the present employees assigned to flight engineer duties will have until October 1 to comply. This is absolutely ridiculous. This is a matter that was identified over two years ago, but there has been stalling, covering up and nothing done. These are unlicensed people. I am worried about the flying public while the government is worried about the legal aspects. I suggest to the parliamentary secretary that he talk to senior officials of MOT to get the proper procedure in place, and have present flight engineers fully licensed today, not next October.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, the first thing I should like to say is that I am sorry the hon. member for Winnipeg South was not permitted to continue his remarks.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Winnipeg South Centre.

Mr. Malone: I think it of importance to hon. members on the government side to have the opportunity of listening to the remarks of that hon. member. Obviously the reason for the shouting of "no" was that they were beginning to hear some information they felt they did not want to face up to. They were hearing information about their government—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order please. I suggest to the hon. member that he get back to the subject for discussion, Bill C-4.

[Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton).]

Mr. Malone: Mr. Speaker, I am talking about Bill C-4. The hon. member who preceded me was talking about Bill C-4. Members across the way were responding in respect of Bill C-4. I simply want to say that members opposite were hearing something embarrassing to the government in respect of Bill C-4. Perhaps they should read Hansard to see what the member was saying. He was giving information which would indicate that, unless this government takes corrective action, it will find itself facing political embarrassment, because it is obvious the government was trying to save its political skin at the risk of people's lives. The government has failed to put into effect the kind of legislation and action that would avoid those violations of air safety regulations that have occurred. Instead we have been left with haphazard chance, as documented in detail by the hon. member for Winnipeg South.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Winnipeg South Centre.

Mr. Malone: Winnipeg South Centre, I am sorry. I will have some questions to put tomorrow.

• (2032)

I find it somewhat appalling that we are still debating the amendment at this time because I think it would be a simple task for members on the government side to recognize that what we are asking is for a committee to deal with the matter if something extraordinary or irregular takes place with regard to air safety or air traffic. It seems to me that this is a prerogative of parliament. When we view the heavy handed and hard nosed reaction to legislation which is before the country today, it seems to me appropriate for hon. members opposite to let us go forward with the amendment on report stage and then give the bill third reading.

When we see that on the average this government has ten orders in council to consider each day and the cabinet meets but once a week, this means they must consider some 70 orders in council a week. Since we know that they receive 3,500 orders in council a year, it soon becomes apparent that what the minister is trying to do through Bill C-4 is to grasp even more regulatory powers in ministerial hands without giving parliament an opportunity to decide. That kind of action thwarts the whole process of parliamentary democracy. The government asks for more power to be given to the cabinet and less power to the representatives of the people who are elected to voice the will of the people all across this land.

The amendment merely asks that the consultation process take place and that there be legitimate parliamentary review. There is no just cause for not accepting it. I dare members on the opposite side to have the courage to be true parliamentarians. Let them prove that there is harm or some evil associated with the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski). If they cannot establish that there is something wrong with the amendment, let them simply allow us to pass it and to proceed to third reading of the bill.

Bill C-4 to amend the Aeronautics Act gives the minister increasing and arbitrary powers to impose the user-pay concept and to collect the charges and fees. We all know the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) today believes in the concept according to which he uses and we pay. I think that we should review with great seriousness that kind of system in government in view of the fact that aviation associations across Canada have complained some 20 times before the committee about the lack of consultation. What the amendment before us proposes is that, whenever there are 20 members or more who believe there is something significant which should be brought before the committee, there should be a process for so doing. Until now there has been no effective appeal procedure. Under the bill the minister asks to be licensed to make all regulatory changes relative to aviation without bringing them first before parliament, and then to be allowed to declare to the aviation users that they have no appeal or recourse through a proper appeal channel.

The Minister of Transport did not want witnesses to appear before the committee. He said that this was simply a housekeeping bill and therefore no witnesses should be called. The truth of the matter is that this bill changes the whole user-pay concept. It gives to the minister strong powers to allow him to establish user fees, to decide what they will be, how they will be collected, who will collect them and how often they will be collected. It is not merely a question of the user-pay concept.

Then we come to the great disparities in transport which are one of the catalysts in the disunity in this country. A great disparity occurs under the user-pay concept as it is applied to various modes of transportation. We find that in rail transportation the user pays some 74 per cent of the cost, that in air transport the user pays somewhat less than that, that in truck transport the user pays some 30 per cent and in marine transport some 19 per cent. This means that many regions of the country are gravely disadvantaged under the user-pay concept of the minister.

Furthermore, Bill C-4 locks in a regulatory, ironclad set of agreements whereby the minister can dictate at his own whim the way in which the user-pay concept is applied, which will have a drastic effect on various sectors of the country, so much so that we are finding, in the development of the Alcan pipeline, that a study is now under way to consider the transportation of pipe from Welland, Ontario, up the St. Lawrence Seaway, round the Panama Canal and up the Pacific coast to Alaska simply because it is far cheaper to send it that way than to send it across land. The real reason for that is the user-pay concept—that the user pays 74 per cent of the cost of rail transport as against 19 per cent of the cost of marine transportation. We are of the view that the minister should not have those kinds of powers and prerogatives to impose his will on various regions of the country.

The fact that we cannot haul steel pipe by rail across the country economically causes a loss which weighs heavily on the prairie region. The objective of the user-pay concept is to pay MOT's debts. In essence, what we have found is that the Department of Transport can indulge in all kinds of extravaganzas following which the user-pay concept comes into effect. What happens is that those who dream grandiose dreams never need worry about the price tag because they can simply tack the price tag on to those who use the system. There is no better example than the imaginative but silly plan for Mirabel airport and the imaginative and silly, if not stupid, plan for Calgary airport. Max Ward of Wardair stated at the opening of the Calgary airport that no one had checked with them, one of the users of the airport, about the user-pay concept. This government goes ahead holus-bolus believing it has the prerogative to dream up heavenly ideas about what an airport should look like, and, irrespective of the price tag, tacks the price on to whoever uses it.

The amendment states that there should be recourse from a government decision: that whenever there are motions from various aviation groups which come to 20 or more members of parliament, they can appeal to Mr. Speaker to set up a body within the committee system which would allow for some kind of appeal procedure. I do not know how the government of the day can sit quietly on its hands listening to the kinds of speeches that have been made in the House about some of the dangers in air traffic today, the lack of controls in air traffic safety and the weaknesses in its own legislation, yet continue stubbornly to refuse to allow a process to be created whereby concerns about various policies affecting the aeronautics industry could be voiced. So long as the user-pay concept is in practice, the government can indulge in extravagance and simply pass on the cost to the users. What we ask for in the amendment is simply a system of checks and balances.

If we are going to have the user pay policy, we ask that there also be a policy of user say. We are asking that there be a system whereby, if the government is going to impose a costing out for those who use aircraft facilities, those who use aircraft facilities have an input. At the present time that is not the case. Aviation groups say that they have complained 26 times to the committee and that they have attempted to be heard by the government. However, the government simply will not give them a hearing.

I would like to speak about the small aircraft industry and the tremendous disincentives the government has imposed upon it. Probably no other nation in the world is more naturally suited to the proliferation of air traffic than this country, unless perhaps it might be the Soviet Union. I can understand why countries like Luxembourg or Belgium might want to restrict the amount of air traffic, but in a country as vast and as sparsely populated as Canada the encouragement of air traffic makes sense. The majority of our resources are located far from inhabited areas. In many cases the only way to reach the resources of this great land is by air.

Few people understand the scope of Canada. It is farther from Yellowknife to the North Pole than it is from Yellowknife to San Francisco. It is a shorter trip from Edmonton to Mexico City than it is from Edmonton to Halifax. We live in a very large land. many of our resources are in places where there are no railways, no docks and no highways. Yet we have a government and a minister imposing excise taxes on aeroplanes, federal sales tax on aeroplanes, and the user pay concept, to the detriment of this nation and without consultation with the aviation groups which feel they ought to have an input. The minister has not only jeopardized the aviation industry but by his very actions has also jeopardized the development of the regions of Canada.

The minister was willing to jeopardize safety by charging user fees on every touch and go. I would like to explain that. The minister said that the user pay concept would apply every time a plane landed. Every time it landed a fee would have to be paid for the use of the airstrip. However, what about the young pilot training for an aircraft pilot's licence? Training pilots have to land their planes, take off, circle around, land again and then take off again. The minister said that every time a plane landed it would have to pay for the use of the airstrip. The minister thought he should charge a fee every time a plane touched a runway and lifted off again. That user pay policy affects safety itself.

Most people are conscious of pocket book issues, even if the government is not. They recognize that the government is trying to destroy aviation as a mode of travel in this nation. The government has been doing that with its import excise taxes, with federal sales taxes and with the user pay concept. It is trying to discourage most aspects of the air industry. Light aircraft in many cases can be demonstrated to be just as efficient, and often more so, than the automobile, but the use of the light aircraft mode of travel has been extensively discouraged, very much to the detriment of Canada. Most of Canada can be reached only by aircraft. It is the policy of our party that, if there is to be user pay, there must also be user say and that there should be an opportunity for those who use air travel in this nation to have a say. In effect, the Minister of Transport is attempting to shingle the roof with a sledgehammer. He does not want to listen. He does not want to see committees set up so that there can be the right of appeal.

The minister did not want any aviation groups to appear before the committee studying this bill. He was willing to jeopardize the safety of air traffic by charging the users of touch and go systems in pilot training. The minister wants to have the authority to avoid blame. I submit that with this bill the minister is attempting to take unto himself power without giving anyone any recourse.

The minister claimed that this is a mere housekeeping measure, but in fact he is attempting to change his policy under the sheets in the dark of night. He is chaining, gagging and restraining the public in solitary confinement. The personal concept of the minister is that he uses and we pay. That is a very unsavoury position for a minister to take. He has the same capacity for listening to the Canadian people as that of a brick.

The minister is the Edsel of Canadian national unity. To a large degree he has been a stumbling block in the development of transportation in this country. He is a masochistic minister with a cat-o'-nine-tails who continues to blame and whip users. To the minister it does not matter what extravagance there be, whether it be Mirabel, the Calgary airport or the planned airport for the Toronto region. The minister feels he can design and build whatever he wants, provided he has a whipping boy to blame and provided he can let users pay for his extravaganzas. In view of the concepts which have been perpetuated, representative government is virtually gone. The government is afraid to let people come before our committees to be heard. The government is afraid to allow an amendment which would allow 20 members—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired. He may continue, however, with unanimous consent. Does the hon. member have unanimous consent to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Malone: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I will not keep the House much longer.

The government is attempting to rule by regulation rather than to allow this parliament to open the channels of communication so that people may use the parliament of Canada as a means by which to appeal to members of this House and therefore to the country. This government acts largely by order in council. Some 3,500 orders in council were passed last year. Not one of them was brought before parliament. By contrast, in Great Britain there were only ten, and every single one was referred to the British parliament. This government has sidestepped parliament.

The whole concept of orders in council was introduced at a time when it was believed that the cabinet needed to act when parliament was in recess for the summer months. In earlier days when orders in council were passed by cabinet they had to be ratified by parliament. Today, legislation ends up on the books by order in council without the citizens of the country having had an opportunity to review it through their members of parliament.

We had an example of this in the past 18 months in Bill C-51, which contained what was called the gun control legislation. All the regulations are subject to change by order in council, as is also the case with Bill C-4, which is now before us. We recall that the metric system, when Celsius replaced Fahrenheit and kilometres replaced miles,—came into being without legislation but through order in Council. In Bill C-4, the government is again attempting to by-pass parliament in the belief that 30 people have the wisdom and the power to make all decisions for the country without recourse or appeal to parliament. People who have real concern about the issues involved would have no opportunity to take them to a forum where they could be heard.

If this government continues on its present path, elections will become a means of rotating parties. If every party were to adopt the same position as the government has, elections would simply be a chance for the people to express their will about who they want their dictator to be. Orders in council and the avoidance of parliament do not give representative government. It just means that every four years or so there will be a new government to make decisions irrespective of the wishes of the people.

I submit that the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Vegreville is a reasoned request that the government examine the Aeronautics Act again. He is offering the government a chance to allow people who might in some way be affronted by the regulations to bring their problems to the notice of parliament and its committees through to their duly elected representatives. In this way they will be able to explain their briefs and seek amendments.

What we have at the present time is a government locked in cement, unwilling to hear its constituents and believing that an election is only an opportunity to change one dictator for another. That is not a satisfactory state of affairs for this nation, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have heard a number of my friends in the official opposition mention consultation by the government with the people concerned with this legislation. The hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn) and the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) know what I am going to say. Over the past weekend there was so much consultation by the government with people in Edmonton, Regina and Calgary that we could hardly stand it. They hit Regina like a plague of Russian thistles or grasshoppers or gophers. They were underfoot all over the place, consulting. It remains to be seen whether the representations made to them by my stock producers, the trade union movement, the National Farmers Union and a few other organizations will lead to results.

The people out west are pretty tough, especially those from Saskatchewan. They have gone through drought, floods, Russian thistle, grasshoppers, coyotes, Liberals and Tories for 50 years.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Not necessarily in that order.

Mr. Benjamin: We are all asking ourselves where these fellows were when we needed them last year and the year before, and the year before that. With all this consultation in these last few weeks, we do not know whether it is conversion on the road to Damascus or whether there is an election coming.

I hope the consultation will bear fruit. I hope a number of Liberal candidates in Alberta and Saskatchewan will get some of the results that members of parliament from the Liberal, Conservative and New Democratic parties have been trying to get for the past four years. I think of postal walks, guaranteed prices for farm products related to the cost of production, and such things. We will all be happy, including those of us on the opposition benches, if the consultation on the weekend bears fruit. We will just nominate some more Liberal candidates every four years to get results and then the rest of us can stay as members of parliament.

My friends to my right mentioned user-pay. I notice that government spokesmen have been backing off that item lately. For the last few years I have been saying there is no mode of transportation in Canada where the user pays, and there never has been—not even pedestrians. Transportation has always been in a deficit position. As long as anybody clings to that concept our transportation systems will continue to discriminate against people because of where they live, and against products or produce because of where they are located.

During the debate on second reading of this bill, and in committee, we were reminded that there are three United States commercial air carriers who owe $5.8 million for user charges on the North Atlantic routes. Initially, I sensed that my colleagues in the official opposition felt sorry for Trans World Air Lines, Pan American Air Lines and Seaboard Air Carriers. In committee, however, we learned that these and all other carriers pay the same type of charges to Iceland, Denmark and Great Britain, but for some reason or other, they do not want to pay Canada. The three airlines are contesting this bill of $5.8 million in the federal court.

At this point, Mr. Speaker, I want to wish the Department of Transport well. If these companies do not pay their accounts I hope they are refused landing rights, navigational aids and everything else at Gander and at other airports in the Atlantic provinces. All other airlines have been paying fees to other countries as well as Canada, but these companies have been trying to chisel us. I hope the ministry succeeds in defending our right to collect reasonable charges for services that Canadian taxpayers provide to all international airlines.

Another provision in the bill that we approve in principle is the land zoning regulations. The government's stated objective is to protect airports and airport sites from urban development encroaching upon their boundaries. We agree that the federal aviation authority should have control over the development of land near airports and as well the ownership of it.

We would make one exception, Mr. Speaker. If there was housing development on the land long before an airport was built, it is then a little late in the day for the government to move in and restrict or refuse to properly compensate people who were there long before there was an airport. I agree that when a new airport is built or a present one is enlarged the public aviation authority should own and control that land. No development should be allowed within a one-mile radius of that airport. It should be a green belt, or farmland or perhaps a golf course. But no construction should be allowed. There are examples in Canada where housing developments existed long before an airport was built. I am thinking particularly of the Stanley Park area of Thunder Bay. If there are four houses on eight lots, and someone wants to construct houses on the other four lots, it makes little or no difference whatsoever to the use of that present airport location. That is the kind of exception which should be made in the control the national aviation authority should have over development in and around public airports.

My colleague, the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain was talking about liability insurance and compensation for passengers as well as for the next of kin of those killed in aircraft accidents. I agree to some extent with his remarks but I do not think he went far enough. Whether an accident or mishap is due to negligence, or to what the legal profession calls an act of God, it seems to me that every aircraft passenger should be insured. This should be a form of no fault insurance. A very small percentage of passengers travelling by air take out aircraft insurance. I suppose we all did the first few times we flew but after that we quit bothering. The fees charged for $50,000, $100,000 or $250,000 worth of insurance are relatively modest. It would seem to me that everyone travelling by air would be willing to pay a reasonable premium that would provide a standard and reasonable amount of compensation in the event of injury or death. I would estimate, and I stand to be corrected if I am very far out, that for somewhere between 50 cents and $1 extra on each airline ticket every passenger could obtain between $100,000 and $250,000 worth of insurance in the event of injury or death due to an airline accident, no matter what the cause.

It seems to me that kind of coverage should be compulsory, particularly for people travelling by commercial aircraft. There should not be any fine print on the back of the ticket. Every person who flies via a commercial airline should know that when they purchase their ticket the extra 50 cents or $1 paid is to cover $100,000 or $200,000 worth of insurance which will be paid by the insurance company to the injured party or to the next of kin in the event of accident. I suspect any insurance company or group of insurance companies, having that kind of business amounting to many millions of dollars a year, would be only too pleased to insure every passenger for $100,000 or $250,000 in the event of injury or death. Normal standard practice should automatically include insurance coverage in the purchase of an airline ticket.

As illustrated by my colleague the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain, litigation which goes through the courts six, eight, 10 years after the event should not be paid for by those who were injured or the next of kin of those killed. This litigation can cost tens of thousands of dollars. If the breadwinner dies due to an aircrash it can become necessary to borrow money to live. Surely as a matter of common decency a nominal charge on every airline ticket would cover the premium for a substantial insurance coverage for injury or death due to a mishap.

This is not socialist dogma, even though it might sound like that coming from me. It is a matter of treating one another decently. It is a matter of saying that there is something immoral about trying to make a profit from the misfortunes of others. It is something we should darn well do. In fact that is one regulation which, if the Minister of Transport brings it in tomorrow, I would agree with.

The amendment put forward by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) is an excellent one. We will support it. We agree with it. However, I want to caution my friends to the right that they should not be under any illusion; whether there be a majority Liberal government or a majority Conservative government, if this kind of amendment were part of the law it would still be voted down by the majority. If 20 members signed a motion and there was a debate, a majority government would still vote it down. However, it is still a valuable item to have in the legislation. The deputy minister, the airlines experts in the Ministry of Transport, members of the Canadian Transport Commission or even those in consultation with the airline industry would be aware in the course of drawing regulations that unless they do an excellent job with these regulations there will be some kind of a row in parliament. Therefore, these people will be more careful and thorough when drafting regulations. No matter what party is in power, none is perfect. Rome was not built in a day. Of course, the NDP was not building Rome either. There might be the odd miracle situation where some backbenchers of whatever party which had a majority would rebel and vote for a motion signed by 20 members. Some of them might even sign it. But with that caution hanging over the heads of those drafting regulations and those who sit in cabinet and pass them by order in council, I submit they would be more careful and conscious of what those affected by legislation feel about it.

Even with this kind of provision, Mr. Speaker, whether it be a majority or a minority government the party in power still has the ultimate responsibility, as it must under a system of responsible government. Letting parliament decide by vote concerning a motion signed by 20 members is the name of the game in this system of parliamentary government. If the motion passed and the regulations were submitted to the appropriate committee of this House, this would be a good indication that the government of the day had made a severe error in what it had drafted.

There is no doubt that 90 per cent of such motions would not get passed. Some might pass in a minority parliament, but in a majority parliament it would be extremely rare for one to pass. If one did, it would indicate a revolt amongst not only opposition members, but members on the government side as well. That is the value of the amendment.

I am under no illusion, and neither are my friends to my right, that this will be a 100 per cent guarantee of safeguard regarding government regulations. However, it will at least serve as part of the checks and balances in a parliamentary system of government, regardless which party is in power. This amendment provides an avenue of appeal before, during or after the publication of regulations not only by those affected, whether it is zoning or any other regulation, but by any other interested groups that might think the regulation too strong or think it should not be there at all.

If we are going to have regulations on zoning, the methods of determining compensation for those affected are inadequate. In fact, as I understand the bill, compensation is provided only to those using land in a manner which does not conform to the new regulations. It does not provide compensation to anyone else who might be caused injury by airport construction or operation. Surely that is an inadequate provision. Compensation should be available to those who can justify injury, not only those affected by land required for airport development.

I hope the government will accept this amendment. They know as well as we do that the overwhelming majority of motions would not pass this parliament even though 20 members would sign. In fact, a motion would not pass even if 50 members would sign it. It would be debated for a day or so. Unless there was some kind of severe injury being caused by the government which resulted in a revolt among backbenchers, 90 per cent of the motions would not pass. But the fact that it is there would at least indicate a desire and a willingness by the government to be a lot more conscious of what they put in regulations, when, how and where they consult about regulations, and how, when and where they enforce those regulations.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his allotted time has expired. He may continue only with unanimous consent. Does the hon. member have unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Benjamin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I had almost run out of gas anyway.

Mr. Alexander: Gas? Never use that word.

Mr. Nielsen: That's a bad word.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Like user-pay.

Mr. Benjamin: I am glad I have extra time because most of my colleagues agree with what I have to say. I have not really stepped on anyone's toes except those of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and others in my caucus by suggesting this kind of amendment would be useful in all types of legislation. This is something all members should think about. It is certainly not a partisan amendment because every political party takes its turn some time or other being in opposition or in government. Over the long haul, it really does no harm to a government, but it certainly is good for the work of parliament.

Most important, it gives the citizens of this country the feeling that there is an avenue of appeal through their elected representatives. It is a method other than having a cabinet hit your town two or three weeks before an election is called. It is an avenue by which citizens can voice their opinion and concerns to their elected members of parliament. There would be second thought, consideration or debate not only about the laws we pass, but about regulations a government may bring in as a result of those laws. Surely that is an improvement over what we have been doing for many years.

There is now provision in two or three pieces of legislation for this type of motion to be put, signed by ten, 20 or 50 members of parliament. It has been tried on a few occasions in the past few years. I do not think any have been passed by the majority of members of the House. However, it did provide an avenue for members on all sides to express their view concerning some activity by government as a result of a law passed by this parliament or regulations emanating from a law passed by this parliament. There was that opportunity for members on all sides to discuss it for a day or so.

This kind of amendment has been moved on many occasions by members of all three opposition parties. I am not certain, but I believe that when the government party was in opposition in the late fifties and early sixties they endeavoured to get this type of amendment, or something similar to it, incorporated into legislation. Therefore, it is not peculiar to any one particular party. It is a valuable mechanism in the legislative process. It is particularly valuable as an avenue to appeal or reconsider a decision made, or action taken, by the government or the administration of that government.

I hope members on all sides will accept this amendment as an excellent addition to this bill. We take pleasure in supporting the amendment.

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to intervene in the debate on this amendment to Bill C-4. I did not have the opportunity to participate in all the committee meetings I would have liked to with regard to this bill.

At the outset, I commend the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) on the work he has done both in the House and in committee. He is a true friend of general aviation. As a private pilot, I know some of what he has done for aviation. As I say, I regret I was not able to attend all of those meetings.

With regard to this bill, the hon. member for Vegreville has been able to convince the government to drop clauses 7 and 8 which would have resulted in two classes of both passengers and carriers. He was instrumental in eliminating the necessity of bonding all aircraft up to 12,500 pounds. The hon. member worked hard to get changes in the regulations having to do with the licencing of small airfields which is so important to flying farmers and others who operate small airfields, as I once did.

As to the necessity for this amendment, it is necessary for someone to get the various orders put out by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) because the Department of Transport is invariably cast in the role of an adversary. A person might think he was in court. Whatever it is, whether it is a medical update, the licensing of pilots, the licensing of fields or other facilities, there are regulations dealing with every aspect of general aviation and the department is always an adversary, never a supporter. I know from my own experience and from the mail I get that the department inevitably takes an adversary position.

There was a time when we had one or two friends in the department, people we could count on. Now I do not think we have any. There used to be one or two people who were well known to general aviation and who could be counted on. If there was a need for changes to be made we could go to them and get a sympathetic ear. But today it is my understanding from COPA and others who deal with the department on a regular basis that such a situation no longer exists.

In dealing with the amendment I want to concentrate on an area in which I am particularly interested, the regulations having to do with emergency locator transmitters. I have spoken on the subject of ELT's in this House for four or five years, ever since I came here.

Before making a few suggestions I want to go into the history of ELT's. The use of emergency locator transmitters was first considered as a matter for legislation about five years ago in the state of California. An attempt to introduce legislation there on a state-wide basis failed because in the United States, as in Canada, this is a federal matter. The U.S. Congress later passed a bill, TSO C-61, making the use of ELT's mandatory in certain types of light aircraft. The Canadian Department of Transport followed suit, introducing legislation with some differences so as to be more in tune with our climatic and geographic conditions.

The original regulation was issued as air navigation order series II, No. 17. The Department of Transport outlined the specifications in RSS.147. RSS.147 was issued three times—issues two and three were put out with different specifications. The difference was marginal, though, and I intend to come back to this point in a few moments. A notice was issued to maintenance engineers and aircraft owners saying that all ELT's had to comply with issue two or three by the time of annual certification or in six months, whichever came first. But a later clause stated that after six months the ELT must comply with the specifications in issue three.

About that time, Mr. Speaker, I was asking questions in the House having to do with specifications, cost and quality of this instrument, in addition to its Canadian content, but I could not get answers to those questions. It was not until the specifications were issued that we found out what we were faced with. The specifications for issue two were basically the same as those required in the United States, as I have just mentioned—48 hours and minus 20° centigrade. That is the length of time and temperature range. More stringent specifications were cited in the issue three—100 hours duration and a working range down to minus 40° centigrade.

The day before the issue three specifications became mandatory for ELT's another notice was issued withdrawing the clause and stating that issue two specifications were in order. Mr. Speaker, I have a strong feeling that this notice was put out very quietly and, I am constrained to say, with some slyness, if not with dishonesty. Because people were still led to believe until the last minute that issue three contained the regulations to which they were required to conform. I suggest the notice was snuck through because DND had planes fitted with ELT's which complied with the earlier issue but which could not be converted to conform with issue three.

Until August, 1974 reliability had never been defined in scientific terms and used as a criterion in assessing ELT's. As a result, some problems cropped up. The first was quality control. Since these instruments were now mandatory in aircraft, everyone got into the business and quality depreciated. The second was more complicated. A phenomenon known as inadvertent activation caused planes to appear to crash. It came about when the amplitude and duration of shock were reduced on the recommendation of Arizona State University where it was determined that many small aircraft could not sustain the amplitude of between five and seven Gs and duration of 55 milliseconds.

Mr. Benjamin: You have just lost me there. I just took off.

Mr. Ellis: I lose the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) quite easily on a subject of this sort, I appreciate that. I go into this history purposefully to show that these specifications were laid down and then broken by the department; they were laid down without the department really knowing what it was doing and 17,000 private aircraft owners were forced to put this apparatus in their airplanes.

The crash considerations to which I have referred were then changed and a duration of 11 milliseconds was introduced. When this happened, manufacturers began converting to high impedance electrical latches instead of mechanical latches. They found that the latches they had been using were activated by impact; there was a rash of such occurrences. To overcome some of these difficulties the industry turned to the use of lithium batteries which had already been introduced by a number of manufacturers. Widespread, indeed, almost exclusive use of lithium batteries was adopted. However, it was found that lithiums leaked sulphur dioxide.

If I am going to lose the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre, I shall lose him completely now because I am putting into the record the fact that while sulphur dioxide is chemically inert it becomes quite corrosive when combined with moisture. Or, to put it in another way, $SO_2 + H_2O = H_2SO_3$ and this becomes sulphur dioxide. It becomes even worse in the presence of oxygen, H_2SO_4 results, and even though the cell manufacturers realized this and tried to prevent it with the installation of a safety vent, cells not sealed properly would seep gas and corrosion would take place, damaging the electronically printed circuit board and causing accidents or disabling the instrument.

There was one unit which was immune because of the excellent seals which had been put in, but the firm concerned subsequently went out of the business. If a pilot or aircraft owner had one of these instruments and it would not work, he usually went to the Director General of Civil Aeronautics in Ottawa who gave him a waiver enabling him to fly without any ELT as long as a sign was placed on the side. If the pilot really wanted to comply he had to buy one of the other types.

But the problems surrounding the use of lithium persisted, resulting in explosions and at least one serious crash. The cause of this is not totally known. We know that experts from NASA in the United States and the U.S. army have been looking into this problem and they are coming up with some answers.

A task force was set up by the department when it admitted that ELT's were causing more problems than they were worth. That is when the department ordered the ELT's out of the aircraft. After having forced 17,000 owners to put these instruments in their aircraft, the department passed an order telling them to take them all out. At no time was there any mention of compensation for what they were doing.

Recently the department issued a news release saying it had decided on an interim solution to the ELT problem. What the department said was that it waived the specifications I quoted a few moments ago, coming up with a new specification of 50 hours and minus 20° Celsius. This degradation of specifications, while not that much different, allowed the use of standard batteries, not lithium but low temperature alkaline or magnesium battery packs. These new battery packs are considerably larger and in some cases require alterations to the aircraft to instal them.

Three manufacturers have been named as having acceptable non-lithium ELT's, and the Department of Transport has a set of regulations for installing them. However, these provide only a temporary solution, and I want to make the point that this is only a temporary solution. Those who own aircraft still do not have a permanent safety mechanism for the purpose for which they are intended.

There are three future possibilities for the ELT's. Two of these possibilities involve new battery packs; lithium thionol chloride and lithium carbon monofloride. There is another possibility which by 1982 we might be into, and that is when Canadians and Americans, working, perhaps not surprisingly, with the Russians who share a good part of the northern hemisphere with us, perfect a satellite which might be launched into a polar orbit. It would be the first search and rescue satellite. It would pass over every area in the northern hemiphere every four hours or less and could immediately pinpoint any downed aircraft and, of course, save many millions of dollars in air rescue costs. To be located, however, the ELT employed would require an entirely different structure from those we are familiar with now, and they would have to be vastly upgraded.

The first difficulty then with ELTs is the fact that one is dealing with three different departments: the Department of Communications, which governs the airwaves but frankly does not care too much about aircraft; the Department of Transport, which cares about aircraft but has no control over the airwaves; and, finally, the Department of National Defence, which is in charge of search and rescue.

The people who have really suffered in all of this, as I have tried to point out, are the aircraft owners. They never know what is coming next. They do not know when they will have to reach in their pockets and buy some new kind of hardware, and there is a good possibility that the next notice to airmen will tell them to rip out what they have just installed. Uppermost must be the safety factor. We never have any idea how many pilots have suffered injury or death because they did, or perhaps did not, have a lithium or non-lithium powered ELT.

The second group to suffer are the manufacturers who try to accommodate the flying public and try to do what the department wants, but every time they get an inventory big enough to serve the requirements the regulations are changed and they are out a pile of money.

The interim solution that was published in a bulletin from the Minister of Transport announced on February 7 that the department, air administration, has approved a modification which will permit the reinstallation of ELTs in approximately 6,000 aircraft. This came out just last month, and all it amounted to was a waiver of the existing specifications. Frankly, it does not satisfy the users or the climatic conditions. The worst part of it is that five years ago, when pilots or aircraft owners were installing ELTs, they had to meet two kinds of specifications. Now we are back to doing it the old way.

The department, in my opinion, has been irresponsible to almost everyone affected. The Minister of Transport knows that to be issuing something like a schedule 3 now means that in a few years either improved lithium will be back or there may well be a satellite tuned ELT in operation. Therefore he is not doing his job properly.

After this, Mr. Speaker, you can see how we need an evaluation of the regulations, and need to ask questions and find out how many dollars could be saved by the use of ELTs. That would have been a pretty straightforward task for some of us involved in aviation.

I want to spend a few minutes more dealing with one other practice that was brought to my attention. This is a practice that goes on and it is my contention that the department is in an adversary position because of the sort of thing it does. This has reference to the user-pay fee as it was being considered to apply to instrument flight rules in Canada; that is, IFR flights in Canada.

The Manitoba Aviation Council wrote to the minister and was kind enough to give me a copy of the letter. I do not intend to quote directly from it in detail, but it made the very good point that if pilots were to attempt to upgrade themselves in their flying they would fly, as I have done many times, under instrument flight rules when it was not necessary. They would take flight procedures in the air that were not necessary but which help them to become more proficient in the flying of their aircraft. Surely this must be the approach, and is in the best interests of the Department of Transport.

What was intended by the department was that it would charge extra if I, for example, wanted to fly from here to my home under instrument flight rules. I would have to pay extra. Obviously I would not do that if I did not have to. As a consequence, my instrument flying would perhaps suffer. The department attempted to do this right across Canada. It was going to put this into operation in a way that would endanger the actual livelihood of fixed base operators.

Anyone in general aviation in Canada knows that if you are flying in Canada you are usually flying east to west, and you have a number of routes available to you. Certainly if you are flying through Canada, where there are charges being levied to fly on instruments, all you have to do is slip across the border—and in the air the border is not very visible—and fly on instruments in the United States. In this way you by-pass the Canadian fixed base operators and deprive them of income from which they would benefit.

Canadian aviation has the potential to expand and improve considerably, but it will not do so if we are faced with restrictive and prohibitive rules such as those this department continually tries to impose.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent.

● (2142)

Mr. Ellis: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I should like to wrap up my comments with one more sentence and say that it is not helpful for me or any other pilot not to be allowed to use the facilities that are already there. Certainly using those facilities would be of benefit to all pilots. We are back to the adversary role which the department is continually playing. It would be of benefit to us to have the opportunity to review the regulations as they come up. This would not involve all the regulations but only those which are in need of review, those which are not in the best interests of general aviation.

Mr. Cecil Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to rise tonight to speak on the amendment to Bill C-4 proposed by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski), who has put a lot of work into the communications aspect of the work before the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications. Even though I am not a member of that committee, I have followed very closely developments in the aviation business in Canada, particularly since I come from a constituency which depends exclusively on aircraft to link us with many of the more remote communities. Some 25 to 30 communities in northern Manitoba alone depend exclusively on aircraft to service them, and if we looked across Canada we would find the same situation in Saskatchewan and in the Northwest Territories.

In speaking to the amendment I should like to point out some of the problems that we experience daily in air transportation and the confusing situation in which the operators find themselves. I will give hon. members a brief history of what has happened and I will use Manitoba as an example. Back in 1966 the then provincial Conservative government under Duff Roblin made a commitment that by 1970, Manitoba's centennial, every community of 100 persons or more would have an emergency airstrip. Prior to that time the 25 to 30 isolated communities in the north were serviced solely by float equipped aircraft in the summertime which would land on lakes adjacent to the communities. In the wintertime ski equipped aircraft landed on lakes. Anyone who has landed on a frozen lake in the wintertime, a lake covered with snow drifts, will know that it is a pretty hazardous operation. Many times the pilot actually risks his life and those of his passengers as well as risking damage to the aircraft.

Thus the decision was made to build emergency airstrips in the communities so as to enable pilots to service them and to take patients out to hospitals in larger centres, most of the remote communities being equipped only with small nursing stations with perhaps one nurse on staff. The airstrips were located in various communities without too many engineering services. There were fellows like myself who worked for the department in the province of Manitoba. We went out to those places, located suitable communities in need of an airstrip and found a site with free approaches, no obstacles in the way at either end. We always tried to pick an airstrip facing the prevailing winds.

Over a period of five to six years we had airstrips in most communities in northern Manitoba. They were classed only as emergency landing strips, a maximum of 2,000 feet long. This is when the Department of Transport arrived on the scene. Prior to that time these airstrips were classed only as emergency airstrips, but with the aviation industry in the north expanding in leaps and bounds and communities increasing in population, the demand for air travel also increased.

What happened then was that many of the operators in the north switched from ski to wheel operation. In many cases pilots landing on shorter airstrips considered the operation safe enough, but in the view of the Department of Transport the standard was not met in those operations. Their requirements in the north were the same as for Mirabel or the airports at Toronto or Winnipeg. The communities in the north had to have the same standards as were in the rest of the country.

This created havoc in the aviation industry and in the service to the various communities because the type of regulations that were being imposed prior to the involvement of MOT were the concern of the province of Manitoba. A certain set of criteria was arrived at with regard to the placement of terminal buildings, the approaches, the grading required, the width of the landing strip and the clearing and the distance required for a DC-3, a Twin Otter, a single engine Beaver or an Aztec or whatever type of aircraft might be landing in that community. We received specifications from DOT, as it was named then, and we tried to stick to them in the construction of the airstrips.

But lo and behold, after we made some 25 airstrips usable—we had not spent the amount of money which was probably required by DOT because their planning involved engineering studies, engineers on site and so on, and we did not have the funds to put into that type of construction—officials of the Department of Transport made a swing through northern Manitoba in 1975, checked all the airports and decided to close the following airstrips in northern Manitoba: Poplar River, St. Theresa Point, Oxford House, Red Sucker Lake, and Little Grand Rapids. These communities are isolated and the only way to reach them is by aircraft.

Certain specifications were set down which had to be met before these five airstrips could be licensed for certain air carriers, but because of the remoteness of these communities, what happened in many instances was that it was impossible to get equipment into the communities to bring the airstrips up to a standard that was created all of a sudden. In certain instances the location of the terminal building was not according to the regulations. This had a very bad effect on communities such as Oxford House, which an airplane could overfly on its way to another remote area but where it could not land because it did not have a class II or class III licence. So the people in the community had no air transportation facilities out of there unless they chartered an aircraft; and if they did that, it did not matter what aircraft they used because the Department of Transport did not require the regulations to be adhered to by a charter. However, there was a different situation if you were going in on a scheduled run.

This put the community in the position where it was costing more to bring goods in. It was costing more for transportation, and that hindered development. In the case of Oxford House, exactly one year later the terminal building sat exactly where it was in 1975. No further improvements have been made to that particular airstrip. The strip is some 4,200 feet long with a 300-foot wide landing surface which is gravel. However, no major changes to the design of that airstrip took place. This is one which had been closed. Lo and behold, in 1976 permission was granted to re-licence that airstrip for a class III carrier. For one year this community's development was hindered, and then all of a sudden there was a reversal.

When the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Ellis) was talking about ELTs, I was reminded of the confusion northern carriers face. As I said before, without aircraft in the north there is no means of transportation and communication. It seems that the larger the aircraft we get into these communities, the cheaper it will be.

In many locations and in many circumstances operators in the north are totally confused as to what the Ministry of Transport is doing with regard to the aviation business. I hear stories of air carriers still holding class II licences in communities where there have been no aircraft for the last six or seven years. That hinders the development of many other carriers in the area because communities are protected by licence but those licenses have not been used for the last five to six years. We can see this happening throughout the north. I receive repeated complaints from operators in the north. They are really confused about the directions which come from the Ministry of Transport. There are many good men in the Ministry of Transport, and I think they give good suggestions to the government, but the government is not sensitive enough to react to some of those suggestions. The government is hindering the aviation business and confusing those who are trying to get into it.

Just recently a chap from a very remote community applied for class IV licence so that he could serve that community, but the CTC turned the application down because it was felt that the community was already sufficiently served. That was the only aircraft based in that community, and the reason for having it there was to serve the community in case of emergency.

Back in 1976 it was decided to impose a $2.60 landing fee on private aircraft landing at airstrips. This caused concern among private pilots. It is necessary for many people in the north to have small aircraft in order to go to larger centres because they have no other means of communication. Because of pressure from this side of the House the government withdrew that part of its order in council and the fee remained at $1. However, it was only through pressure brought by various pilots' associations, private air carriers and others that there was a turnaround.

I would like to speak briefly about the amendment. As I understand it, Bill C-4 proposes to give the minister a more arbitrary power to collect money from users of airports. The user-pay concept is really what I see coming out of it. We see this concept being used by the Department of Transport not only with regard to air carriers but also with regard to ground transportation. The policy has been applied to the CNR as well.

In 1974 at Thompson, Manitoba it was recognized that an expansion of the airstrip would be necessary to accommodate the traffic that airport had. It was the eleventh busiest airport in Canada that year. It was a jumping off point not only for Manitoba but also for the Northwest Territories because of its location and because of its being served by rail and by road. Much effort was put into attempts to get an expansion of the airstrip, an expansion of the ramp area and an expansion of the cross strip.

Originally that airport was laid out by the Department of Transport. The site was selected by that department. I do not know who was responsible for the forward planning of that airstrip, but when it came time to expand the ramp area and to put in a cross strip it was found that there was permafrost in the general area. After soil samples were taken as a result of drilling it was found that there were many ice lenses and silt pockets to the east and to the west of the existing ramp. This caused the department to have to excavate thousands of yards of material, to dig the permafrost out and then to fill the excavation in with gravel. With the vast amounts of land we have in northern Manitoba one would have thought that perhpas in the planning of the airstrip in the first place a location which did not have a permafrost problem would be chosen. A group of engineers from the department chose the site, and in the wisdom of the department the present site was chosen. However, if a different site had been chosen thousands of dollars spent on excavation could have been saved.

Fortunately, we now have a ramp area, but it is still not sufficiently large due to the terrain. Many of the facilities have had to be put on the far side of the airstrip, and another road to that location has had to be built. All across the north many locations are still not served by good facilities when an emergency is imminent. In this regard I say that taking the ELTs out of aircraft in October was a serious mistake. I see now that we have them back in. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call it ten o'clock.

Adjournment Debate

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wonder if there is someone on the government side who can tell us what we will do tomorrow. Will we continue with Bill C-4 or with something else?

● (2202)

Mr. Blais: As I understand it, Mr. Speaker, we are going to continue with Bill C-4 to its conclusion and then proceed with Bill C-26.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY—VALUE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR—INTERNATIONAL INVESTMENT IN CANADA

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, the matter which brings me into the adjournment debate tonight stems from a series of questions I put to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) on March 7, 1978, which appear at page 3512 of Hansard. These questions dealt with the declining international confidence in Canada's economic future and the effect that lack of confidence has had on our bedraggled dollar. It is the continuing story of our shrinking dollar.

In a nutshell, I asked the minister on March 7 how it was that confidence in Canada had sunk to such a low that commercial loan companies such as Traders, IAC and GMAC required high credit ratings and lower borrowing rates than the federal government itself. I asked the minister also how it was that our foreign reserves had been allowed to become so vulnerable to the activities of international traders in Kuwaiti and elsewhere that one Kuwaiti investor had put the federal government on the run in their attempt to defend the dollar. How many more billion dollar investors were there, I asked, holding relatively short term or medium term securities that might be thrown on the Canadian market, wreaking havoc on the international exchange markets as far as our Canadian dollar was concerned?

As might be expected, the minister's answers to these questions, like his handling of the entire dollar crisis, was sadly deficient. In effect, he tried to shrug it off as some mere rumour.

I want to put on the record tonight that commercial loan facilities did get cheaper 90-day money on March 7 than the federal government, and that international investors have managed to sabotage government attempts to defend the dollar. The fact that the minister is either uninformed about the developments or unwilling to discuss them rationally only serves to undermine confidence in our country all the more.

Let there be no doubt, Mr. Speaker, the head-in-the-sand pronouncements of the Minister of Finance have already led to a significant loss of faith in this country and our dollar. This was clear as long as October of last year, when we had the last dollar crunch. On October 13, 1977 a Globe and Mail article reported that international investors were "confused" over the government's policies. I quote:

> The confusion over official policy was increased by Finance Minister Jean Chrétien's repeated statements that the government does not intend to defend any particular rate for the Canadian currency . . .
> ". . . when you have a floating currency, you have to let it float" Mr. Chrétien said.

The article concluded that many people believe that the inaction on the devalued dollar reflects unresolved policy differences within the government. Mr. Speaker, it was obvious then, as it is clear now, that this unfortunate minister's misstatements have contributed to rather than alleviated the dollar crisis. Such lack of confidence in the ability of the government is justified when you consider the response of this administration to the entire affair. Today, for example, the government is busy trying to convince Canadians that the devalued dollar is good for us. What nonsense, Mr. Speaker. The fact is that a lower dollar means higher inflation due to higher priced imports. Dropping 14 cents in relation to the U.S. dollar means a 4 per cent hike in the inflation rate; that is, 4 per cent on top of whatever inflation we already have built into the system. Is this good for Canadians?

If the 89-cent dollar is so good, why did the administration fight so long to keep it at par? Why did they encourage Canadians to borrow $15 billion in foreign funds so that the dollar would be kept stable? If it is good to have an 89-cent dollar, then it must have been wrong to have a $1.03 dollar before. If an 89-cent dollar is good, would not a 79-cent dollar be even better? Think what a 29-cent dollar could do for us.

The fact is that our dollar has been routed, and the only defence the administration has is to point out that a cheaper dollar will help our exports. But this is a little like Napoleon rationalizing his retreat from Moscow—it was good for the troops because they wanted to see Paris anyway. The whole world knows, and even the Minister of Finance must realize it some day, that a falling dollar such as we have had in Canada is bad for Canadians. Some day he will have to admit that.

I believe that tonight his parliamentary secretary should be required to give a fuller explanation why they are now trying to rationalize that a bad thing is something that is in fact good. The British tried this. The British devalued their currency three times. They were consistently fed the syrup this government is feeding to the Canadian public, that somehow a devalued dollar would restore the economy.

This government has treated our economic problems with aspirin. At one time we were told wage and price controls would solve inflation. We were told controls would give us 4 per cent inflation this year. Last month inflation was 9 per cent. Now we are being told the chronic problems we have in this country will be solved by some type of a falling dollar, to a level they have yet to state.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has now expired.

Mr. Ed Lumley (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it is our most recent information that borrowing costs to the Government of Canada on 90-day treasury bills remain below those of the major finance companies over the same term. I want to emphasize "over the same term." You cannot compare 90-day bills of the government with a 30-day note to a private company, a situation which is sometimes alluded to by members opposite. This must be particularly taken into consideration when account is taken of the commissions that such companies must pay to dealers that market their obligations.

Nevertheless, it is generally true that in Canada the spread between interest rates paid on Government of Canada debt and those on the debt of other Canadian borrowers has narrowed over, say, the last year, not only on short-term but also on long-term securities. The question then arises: Would one wish to describe this process as reflecting a decline in the government's credit rating? Can one simply look at interest rate levels, relative or absolute, and make such judgments? Despite this narrowing, the interest rate paid by the government of Canada on 90-day treasury bills has declined substantially in the past year. This can hardly be described as a deterioration in the credit rating of the Government of Canada.

In general, interest rate differentials between government and other securities of the same maturity have reflected the relative demand and supply of funds in particular markets.

The narrowing of the spread between rates on comparable government and corporate debt over the last several months reflects a rise in the volume of government debt marketed relative to that of corporations. This is a necessary concomitant of the deficits that the government currently runs to stimulate the economy. On the other hand, corporations' requirements for funds have recently declined sharply. This is indicative of the general improvement in corporate liquidity positions: undistributed corporate profits rose more than 26 per cent in 1977 over 1976.

In so far as our international credit rating is concerned, the Government of Canada has not itself, of course, raised money outside the country for several years. We anticipate no difficulty whatsoever in doing so now. In fact, we expect that the $750 million U.S. dollar bond issue which we are in the process of arranging will be very favourably received in the international financial market.

Mr. Stevens: Tax free.

Mr. Lumley: As to the report that a particular Kuwaiti investor has dumped hundreds of millions of Canadian dollars, this is a rumour without basis in fact. A number of stories have circulated in recent weeks that are similarly unfounded. Attempts by the opposition to add to their credence merely serves to increase the tendency to disorder that has arisen in the foreign exchange market from time to time. This is unhelpful to our efforts to preserve orderly market conditions. The recent steps taken by the government have helped to restore some stability to the market.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS—AKAMINA-KISHINENA, B.C.—PROTECTION OF WILDLIFE

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, on March 9 I addressed a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Faulkner) dealing with his responsibilities vis-à-vis national parks. My supplementary question was addressed to the Minister of State (Environment) (Mr. Marchand) dealing with the Canadian Wildlife Service and his responsibility in that context.

My question dealt with a wilderness area adjacent to a federal park, Waterton Lakes National Park. Immediately to the west of that national park is an area that is called the Akamina-Kishinena watershed or wilderness area. This area has been tentatively set aside by the British Columbia government as a wilderness area not yet in the classification of a park. Nevertheless, that is the ultimate aim and objective of the province of British Columbia. That at least has been the indication.

The area now has major infestation of Rocky Mountain pine beetle. It is the desire of the British Columbia forest service to clearcut log that area. I can certainly respect their concern and desire to eradicate in that valley the pine beetle and protect the valley from the deprivations of fire once the timber becomes so decadent that it becomes bone dry. I can understand why they want to salvage that timber.

There is another concern. Immediately they enter into that area to log it, they expose it to ready access by the public. They immediately apply a great deal of pressure to the wildlife in that area. It is in that context that I asked the minister to make representation to the province of British Columbia, through the Canadian Wildlife Service and his responsibility to them and their responsibility to him, asking the province to reconsider their decision to allow the forestry department to clearcut that area.

The Canadian Wildlife Service has become involved before in their concern for animals in the national parks, particularly with reference to the Rocky Mountain bighorn sheep which was nearly wiped out in Kootenay National Park as a result of a lung worm infection or disease. That was because of lack of forage for the number of sheep present.

The Canadian Wildlife Service has also addressed itself to studies of grizzly. In the Akamina-Kishinena we have an endangered species indeed, the grizzly. We have an even more endangered and rare species called the northern Rocky Mountain wolf. That is a very rare animal indeed to be seen in the mountains of southern British Columbia. In addition, there are such game as the Rocky Mountain bighorn, the Rocky Mountain goat, elk and deer. To clearcut that area would create an enormous disruption of the game patterns that move not only in the Akamina-Kishinena, but from that area into Waterton Lakes Park and indeed into the United States and Glacier Park.

I have been assured by Congressman Baucus of Montana of his very real concerns, the concerns of the state of Montana and the federal government of the United States, regarding a proposal to clearcut this area. I am sure we will see a response from the American government expressing their concern and recognizing their limits. They will express their concerns to the province of British Columbia regarding any interference with the wildlife in that area which is so closely associated with and adjacent to Waterton in Glacier National Park.

These animals know no boundary. They move back and forth in these areas, as is their migratory pattern and as the supply of food requires. Recently the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment while in Invermere, B.C. came out four square in opposition to the Kootenay River diversion. This is a provincial proposal. It is part of the Columbia River treaty, but is a responsibility of the provincial government. Yet the minister has taken it upon himself, and I am pleased to see him exercise his concern, to state unequivocally his opposition to the Kootenay River diversion. On a project of such a grand scale, involving such an impact, the minister is prepared to speak; but on an issue of lesser consequence to him, but one which, nevertheless, is of major consequence to many—the protection of wildlife in an area immediately adjacent to and forming part of a national park—we find the minister standing mute or intimating that it is outside the ambit of his responsibility. So also, for that matter, is the Kootenay River diversion project.

I must again ask the Minister of State (Environment) to summon up his courage and write a letter to the minister of forests and to the minister of recreation and conservation in the provincial government and to support his officials in the Canadian Wildlife Service as well as his colleague the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, who is responsible for the national parks, letting them know he has a real concern for what is going to happen to the wildlife in the Akamina-Kishinena and asking for their views.

Mr. Mike Landers (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Environment)): Mr. Speaker, the whole subject of the Akimena-Kishenena watershed, while one of environmental interest, is primarily a provincial responsibility. However, because of representations made by the U.S. state department, the government is examining the course of action it should take in the matter.

This triangular tract of British Columbia land wedged between Waterton Lakes National Park and the U.S. border has been found to be infested with the mountain pine beetle and consequently it has been proposed that the diseased lodge pole pines be salvaged. As it stands now, the matter is before the environment and land use committee which is made up of seven B.C. cabinet ministers, including the minister of recreation and conservation. This committee will make the decision on whether or not to accept the recommendation. When made, the decision will be binding.

The minister has confidence in the British Columbia environmental assessment regulations, which he believes to be sufficiently strong, and he is certain the committee will take into account not only the impact on wildlife but the effects on other aspects of the environment.

Fisheries and Environment Canada has noted the following facts about the area in undertaking its Canada land inventory. First, the area has little significance as far as water fowl are concerned. Second, part of the area is an important wintering range for elk. It is anticipated that as long as the land does not erode and some cover remains, these elk can continue in the area. As long as the elk and other small mammals remain, wolves will stay in the area. The same is true of grizzly bears, though they are known to travel long distances in any case.

It is understood that the cutting will be phased—it was already begun some time ago in the Sage Creek area. Cut areas will have time to regenerate before other areas are cut. Thus, wildlife can be accommodated. The opening up of the area to new growth can actually benefit wildlife.

The minister recognizes that the area was designated as a recreational preserve in 1956 and can appreciate the emotional impact of cutting trees there. Even now the Pacific Forest Research Centre of Environment Canada is assisting the B.C. forest service in a search for alternative methods to control the pine beetle. I hope they succeed.

Though I appreciate the hon. member's concern, our course of action cannot be dictated by the immediate need to answer the question. Rather, it must be determined by the long term well-being of our environment, and that will take more time to assess. All I can say now is that we are keeping an eye on the situation.

Mr. Brisco: A good reply!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The motion to adjourn is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.20 p.m.

COMMITTEE STUDY OF PROPOSALS FOR CREATING JOBS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion dealing with an important matter of pressing necessity.

Since the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) has refused to create jobs, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle):

That the House immediately appoint a special committee on economic urgency in Canada which would be asked to recommend an effective program enabling Canadians to return to work; that the committee consider and report on specific proposals providing for tax reductions and other measures suggested by the parties in the House and large private organizations; that the committee consider what short-term measures could induce economic growth and how employment could be better coordinated with other monetary and tax policies; that the committee be empowered to sit during the Easter recess; that the committee be provided with technical research services and other necessary resources to comply with its terms of reference; that, at the latest, the committee submit its findings and recommendations to the House by Monday, April 10; that the said committee include the members for Windsor West (Mr. Gray), for Scarborough East (Mr. O'Connell), for Montreal-Bourassa (Mr. Trudel), for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan), for Matane (Mr. De Bané), for Eglinton (Mr. Sharp), for Battleford-Kindersley (Mr. McIsaac), for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens), for Joliette (Mr. La Salle), for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies), for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser), for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman) and for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert).

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SLAYING OF ISRAELI CIVILIANS—CONDEMNATION OF PLO—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. My motion is concerned with the tragedy which struck the lives of hundreds of Israeli families last weekend. In view of this barbarous testament to our collective failure to find a solution to the Middle East dilemma, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall):

That this House utterly condemns the brutal murder of innocent Israeli citizens by terrorists of the Palestine Liberation Organization, and in addition finds it abhorrent that any body which wishes to gain legitimacy in the eyes of the world community would in any way associate itself with such an act of depravity.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate, pursuant to Standing Order 43, can be done at this time only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CALL FOR IMMEDIATE BUDGET TO CREATE JOBS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, I should like to move a motion under Standing Order 43 regarding an urgent and pressing matter. In view of the fact that we now have officially over one million and, unofficially, 1.6 million Canadians unemployed, the worst economic performance by any Canadian government, a milestone that has become a millstone around the necks of the Canadian people, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow):

That this House urges the government to bring in an immediate budget prior to the Easter recess designed to create jobs and decrease the horrendous level of unemployment in the country today.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

USE OF FRENCH IN BROADCASTING OF HOCKEY GAMES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I seek the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Considering that hockey plays such an important part in the lives of a great many Canadians who consider it their national sport; considering that it is held in high esteem by both Francophone and Anglophone Canadians; considering that all Canadians have the right to watch their programs in their own language on the CBC network; considering that Francophone Canadians are deprived of their right to watch hockey games in French in the areas which are covered by the CBC television stations in Toronto and Vancouver; and considering that the agreement between the MacLaren agency and the CBC already provides for the payment of television rights in this respect, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Allard):

That the House authorize the government to order the CBC to include the Toronto and Vancouver regions in the French network for the broadcasting of hockey games, or to make possible the French broadcasting of hockey games played in Toronto and Vancouver.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

REQUEST DREE PROGRAMS FOCUS ON DEPRESSED AREAS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of increasing unemployment which is not reported by Canada Manpower offices—as pointed out graphically in Monday's issue of the Globe and Mail—and in view of the decrease, in real terms, of the DREE budget with consequent lessening of assistance to those disadvantaged areas of the country which this program was originally designed to assist, which program was promoted with such fanfare by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta):

That the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, together with his cabinet colleagues, for the benefit of the Atlantic region and eastern Quebec, bring into sharper focus and on a more specific basis increased programs to alleviate unemployment, focus DREE aims and objectives more particularly on the real areas of need in the country, and that the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion consult with the Minister of Transport to ensure that both departmental policies are co-ordinated.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for discussion, pursuant to Standing Order 43, requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

COMMITTEE STUDY OF PROPOSALS FOR CREATING JOBS

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. As the minister knows, statistics released today indicate that there are now officially more than one million Canadians out of work for the first time in the history of Canada. The minister continues to refuse to introduce a budget immediately to deal with this problem.

If the government refuses to act, as it does, will the minister at least recommend to his colleagues that the government accept the recommendation I made earlier today and name an all-party emergency committee of this House, immediately, to study the proposals put forward by this party and by others in the House of Commons, and proposals put forward by the C.D. Howe Institute and others in the country, to work over the Easter recess and to report back before the middle of April so that if the government will not work, parliament can work to create jobs for the one million Canadians who are unemployed?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in relation to the proposition made by the C. D. Howe Institute in terms of cutting sales taxes at the provincial level, that is a proposition I myself made to the provinces in the fall, and renewed it at the finance ministers' meeting prior to the first ministers' meeting. That proposition could not be worked out.

The hon. member referred to the fact that unemployment increased somewhat last month, but he has not told the House or the public that employment increased by 100,000 from January to February, and by 287,000 in the past year.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, what the minister's answer indicates is that not only does he refuse to bring in a budget and let the government go to work, but he refuses to allow the Parliament of Canada a mandate so that it can go to work on behalf of the unemployed in this country. That is shameful behaviour by this minister.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Clark: The minister is playing cute games with regard to a budget, but will he give us an absolute assurance that he will bring in a budget before the dissolution of this parliament?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, last Friday I told a committee of this House that I felt it was important to wait until the government incentive measures, in force since January 1, had been applied in every sector of the Canadian economy before bringing in a new budget. I also stated that I was hoping to bring in a budget either in late April or early May. As for the dissolution of parliament, this is not a matter within my jurisdiction, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, what concerns us is that we believe the question of whether there will be a budget does not come under the control of the Minister of Finance and that the Prime Minister has said there will not be a budget, because he does not want the economy discussed in the House of Commons before there is an election.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

EFFECTIVE DATE OF EMPLOYMENT TAX CREDIT PROGRAM

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): This minister holds the double distinction of being the first minister whose policies have put one million Canadians out of work and the first minister in 15 years who has refused to bring in a budget.

I want to ask him about one of the measures the government has brought in, the employment tax credit. My office telephoned Manpower offices in Windsor, St. Catharines and Sudbury—three Ontario centres where unemployment today is at or near 12 per cent—and asked for the status of the employment tax credit program. In no case have application forms for employers who might seek that program reached those offices. On March 1, the minister told the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton that the program would start the next week, on March 8. Today is March 14. Why did the minister mislead the House and the people of Canada on the effective date of the employment tax credit program?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, when the program was announced, as I said in the House, I checked, before the end of the question period, with the department of manpower and immigration which was handling the administration of the program. They said that the program was to start on the day that I told the House of Commons. The program has been in place since that time. As to how many applications there are in the different offices, the legislation is in place, the regulations are in place and everything is in place. It is up to the private sector to take advantage of the program.

I should like to point out that the hon. member has not referred to the fact that unemployment decreased in all provinces of Canada last month except provinces where there is a Tory administration.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, this minister continues to try to play cute little political games while more and more Canadians are put out of work. The fact is that the forms for this program are not in the offices where they would do the most good. This program was promised first in February, and the government failed on that; it was promised in March, and they failed on that. What we want to know is when application forms will be available in these Ontario cities, the industrial heartland of the country, where the policies of this government are creating unemployment rates now in excess of 11 per cent and 12 per cent.

When will it be possible for Canadians who are looking for this government program in order to find a job to have forms they can work on? Will the minister give me a date? He has given us two that were wrong. He should give us a date that Canadians can rely on.

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I said and I want to repeat that the program is already in force at this moment. If some offices have not yet received those forms, I will inquire of my colleague, the Minister of Employment and Immigration, and see to it that the necessary steps be taken. The act and regulations have been adopted and the program is in place. If there are any administrative problems, we will make sure that they are corrected with the shortest delay.

MANPOWER

MEASURES TO CREATE JOBS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In the context of what is perceived by everybody except this government as an emergency situation, tragic in its proportions for human suffering, given the statutory responsibility that is the minister's, and in view of the failure of the Minister of Finance to bring in a new budget with the necessary stimulative measures to get the economy moving, what advice is the minister prepared to give his colleagues, now that there are over one million people, officially, unemployed in this country or, in real terms, 1.6 million? Surely the minister has some responsibility in this.

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, most assuredly, the government has expressed its concern and has followed this up with action, not on a month to month basis, but going back to the application of about one-quarter billion dollars being spent on the first phase of Canada Works; the federal labour-intensive program announced and administered by my colleague, the President of the Treasury Board, and the employment tax credit which the Leader of the Opposition chooses to ignore.

When that legislation was brought in, it is to the credit of my department that the civil servants worked day and night to put it into operation so that private enterprise could take advantage of what I think is an excellent program. I think it will prove itself. I have some confidence and faith in the private sector, but the Leader of the Opposition does not seem to have that. To suggest that nothing is being done is just not in accordance with the facts, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that the country has no confidence in this government. The minister seems to ignore the fact that this is a national emergency, of national proportions. Given the fact that in the industrial heartland of the country we now have an unemployment rate hovering at over 7 per cent, and an unemployment rate in the industrial cities of Ontario hovering at around 12 per cent, with only 32,000 jobs available in Canada today for over one million unemployed, is the minister going to laugh that off and carry on with his statistical shell-game, or is he going to own up to his responsibility and tell the House and the country what he proposes to do, as minister of employment, to meet this tragic, emergency situation?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, talking about a shell-game and playing with statistics, I suggest the hon. member is doing just that. A million jobs changed hands in Canada in the course of a year. To suggest that only that number of jobs is available is not in accordance with the facts. We have put programs in place. Notwithstanding the hon. member's suggestion that there are discouraged workers, it is rather interesting that these so-called discouraged workers have more confidence in this country than the opposition has, because the size of the labour force continues to increase. That is the problem we have.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, there are 33,000 more young people working this month than there were last month; there are 27,000 more adult women working this month than last; and some 8,000 more adult males working than last month. Jobs are, in fact, being created. As my colleague, the Minister of Finance, has stated, the people of this country have more confidence in this country and this government than the opposition would like to believe.

COMMITTEE STUDY OF PROPOSALS FOR CREATING JOBS

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, I direct my question to the Minister of Finance. It relates to the proposal put forward by the Leader of the Opposition. I think it is a good proposal. The minister did not give an answer to the proposal.

When the official level of one million unemployed is reached, it becomes a national emergency which calls for special measures of the House of Commons. Will the minister, therefore, consider putting together an all-party committee, because some of these problems may not be capable of solution in a partisan way but could be solved by putting together an all-party committee to look at the horrible situation of unemployment in Canada seeking a solution to which deserves the co-operation of all members of the House?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the rules of this House provide for the Minister of Finance to appear in front of the committee of the House. I do so once or twice a week.

Mr. Stevens: We cannot get you there.

Mr. Chrétien: I will give credit to the hon. member, who once in a while engages in a serious discussion and puts forward some propositions. Generally speaking, when I am there very few questions are asked of me by the official opposition on a specific proposition like that. Most of the propositions put forward by the Leader of the Opposition say that he will cut expenditures by $2 billion. But he has never been able to come forward with any proposal that amounts to any significant amount of money.

Mr. Clark: That is because you can't count.

Mr. Chrétien: It is misleading the people of Canada to make such propositions.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Finance. I appreciate his comment about me. Nevertheless, even granting, as I pointed out, the partisan nature of these meetings—it is the sort of "business as usual" method—this is not "business as usual" any more. Once the figure of one million unemployed is reached, it is a national emergency. It seems to me incumbent upon the Minister of Finance at least to try putting together a committee of the House of Commons to see if joint proposals can be made to solve unemployment in Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, under the circumstances, I do not propose setting up a special committee designed to deal with this problem, although it is a serious one. Our economy is going through a period of adjustment. The unemployment situation is very serious at this time and is of much concern to us. The labour force participation rate reached a record level this month and if it had remained the same as last month, the rate of unemployment would have gone down. In the past year, the Canadian economy has created 287,000 new jobs, which is an unprecedented achievement unequalled by any other democracy at this time.

INQUIRY WHETHER BUDGET WILL BE BROUGHT DOWN BEFORE EASTER

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. The minister stated in committee, and repeated here today, that he has ruled out a budget for March and indicated, and I quote, "May will be better for me because I will have more information". There is considerable information available at the moment from the Department of Regional Economic Expansion that unemployment will get worse in every region of Canada.

In light of that, and given the fact that the minister is reluctant to establish an all-party Commons committee, will he at least assure us that there will be a budget before an election is called? Otherwise there will be no way of coping with this problem for the next six or seven months.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, October 20 last, a budget was actually brought down, and I want to point out to the hon. member that the incentives proposed by the government at that time came into force on January 1, 1978. So, it is only fair and reasonable to wait for those measures to take effect before proposing further measures. For instance, the Leader of the Opposition said today that the job creation program in the private sector through incentives to employers has only become effective this month. It would only be fair and reasonable to ascertain its results before proposing another program.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

USE OF FRENCH IN BROADCASTING OF HOCKEY GAMES

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State.

Since hockey is considered as our national sport by both Anglophones and Francophones and since all Canadians have the right to be served in their own language by the French and English CBC networks, could the minister tell the House why hockey games are not broadcast in French by the CBC in the Toronto and Vancouver areas?

[English]

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I will be happy to explore the matter. It may very well be that the rights of "Hockey Night in Canada" are not owned by the CBC but by an outside company, and they have in their contract accepted limitations on the way the program can be shown. Before giving the hon. member that answer definitively, I would like to check the matter and report back to him.

[Translation]

Mr. Matte: Mr. Speaker, as a supplementary, I should like to ask the minister whether he considers that cultural and linguistic rights have priority over the rights of some agency such as the MacLaren agency? And in order to help the minister give an accurate and adequate reply, I also ask him why are hockey games now broadcast in French and in English in Montreal, when Francophones in Toronto and Vancouver are denied the services provided in Montreal?

[English]

Mr. Roberts: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I believe we must give very strong priority to those rights. As I tried to indicate to the hon. member, there may be legal ramifications. That should be explored before I reply further to him.

MANPOWER

REQUEST GRANTS UNDER YOUNG CANADA WORKS PROGRAM BE DOUBLED

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. In view of the statistics published this morning, which continue to cause great concern in the Canadian public, I would like to ask the minister if he has made representations to the President of the Treasury Board urging that grants for the Young Canada Works program be doubled if we seriously intend to meet the expectations and needs of thousands of Canadian students this summer?

[English]

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I have discussed the number of applications we have had under the Young Canada Works program. Once again, the program is successful. The ratio is about 3 to 1, which gives us excellent programs under the Young Canada Works operation. I want to look at the calibre of those that we might not be able to fund, to see if it would warrant making an application for further funding. One of the criticisms so often made of the Young Canada Works program is that we fund many projects that are not worth while or are a waste of taxpayers' money. I want to make sure we are making good use of the money before I make application to expand the program.

● (1432)

We are working in other areas, of course, and expect to supply some 60,000 jobs for young people this summer. We think this is a step in the right direction. The job experience training program, which will probably involve between 12,000 and 14,000 young people, is another direction we are taking. So we are moving on a number of fronts, not just under the Young Canada Works program.

[Translation]

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, I think I should rephrase my question to the minister. Given the present unemployment rate, it is self-evident that students will not be able to find summer jobs. I also believe that the minister is sufficiently responsible to understand the importance of a job for these students if they are to pursue their studies next fall. Furthermore, as I am satisfied that the funds earmarked for this endeavour are quite inadequate, I would like to ask the minister if he is at least prepared to recommend to the minister responsible to allocate additional funds so that a reasonable minimum number of students will be able to find work this summer?

[English]

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, it is certainly not correct to say that young people will not be able to get work this summer. In fact, they will be able to work. Where we have run into particular difficulty, as in the Sudbury area where Inco normally hired some 1,500 students, we have made funding available to meet the particular needs. But, as I have indicated, simply putting out a lot of money for a project which may bring discredit on a program is not acting in the best interests of either the young people or of a particular program which could be made to work on their behalf. I want to look at this aspect carefully, to make certain that we are making good use of the money and not simply wasting it on being seen to do something when, in fact, nothing is being accomplished.

SUGGESTED REAPPRAISAL OF GOVERNMENT'S FISCAL POLICIES

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that unemployment in Canada amounted to about 300,000 ten years ago, was 500,000 four years ago, has now passed the one million mark, and is likely, at the present rate of escalation, to hit the 1.5 million mark some time in the early 1980s, would the minister tell us whether he does not feel there should be a complete reappraisal of the government's fiscal stance in light of such alarming and rising unemployment in this country?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we have discussed these matters with the provinces and have tried to reach a common approach to economic policy in this country. Some of the provincial governments are presenting their budgets at this time. We had a review of the fiscal stance of the government when on October 20 last I made an economic statement in this House, which some hon. members called a mini-budget and others called a budget. When I feel the time has come to present another budget, we will present one. But I do not feel the time has yet arrived to do so. I feel we should wait to see what effect the $3 billion tax cut which came into force on January 1 has on the economy.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance continues to say we must wait. On May 25, 1976, the then minister of finance said unemployment would decline. On March 31, 1977, the then minister of finance stated he anticipated 5 per cent real growth and that unemployment would decline. In his October 20 statement, the present Minister of Finance said, "I want sustained growth of between 5 per cent and 6 per cent in order to bring unemployment down." Mr. Speaker, my question to the minister is: How can three budgets be so wrong? How can they be so wrong at the expense of the unemployed in this nation?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member obviously selects certain statistics and forgets to mention that, last month, the Canadian labour force increased by 3.1 per cent, that 100,000 new jobs were created in Canada in a one-month period and that there were 100,000 more people at work. Of course, people have confidence in the Canadian economy, as the Minister of Employment and Immigration said, because they join the labour force in increasing members, and this month, the labour force participation rate reached a record level of 62 per cent.

MEASURES TO REDUCE UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. It seems to me that the government's policy in so far as the unemployed are concerned is not to create jobs but to go to the country: ministers opposite do not appear to accept responsibility for creating jobs.

The industrial heartland of the country is being adversely affected, as these figures show: in Oshawa-Peterborough, the unemployment rate is 10.6 per cent; in Windsor, 10.6 per cent; in Barrie, 10.7 per cent; in Sudbury, 10 per cent; in St. Catharines, 12 per cent. Noting that this country is about to become a banana republic because of total ineptness in the management of the economy—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Alexander: —and given the fact that in the last quarter of 1977 there were some 1,050 business failures and that in the last quarter of 1976 there were 761, what specific steps does the minister intend to take to reverse this significant trend, one which is dangerous to the viability of the economy?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, we have just listened to a great speech by the hon. member—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Let's hear a great answer.

Mr. Horner: I appreciate the response my former colleagues are giving me.

An hon. Member: Tell us about Edmonton.

Mr. Horner: It is obvious hon. members opposite do not want an answer; they think they know it all already. What I was about to say, if the official opposition is prepared to allow me to speak, was that we have listened to a great speech by the hon. member outlining the difficulties experienced by many areas of Canada with regard to employment. We have presented pieces of legislation.

I did go to the spokesman for that party, desirous of getting through another piece of legislation having to do with the Export Development Corporation. I was told I would not get ready passage for it because the official opposition would not approve it. I told them, "You will be blamed, then, for contributing to unemployment in Ontario."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: The opposition did not seem to be concerned about the unemployed in Ontario at that particular time. The hon. member said, "You are going to get a rough time." I said, "You are going to get the blame." He was not worried then, and I do not see how the hon. member for Hamilton West can be worried now.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: I just want to say that that answer is baloney. The minister is abdicating his responsibility. Ministers over there have fiscal and monetary tools for dealing with this problem, but they have neither the guts nor the initiative to bring about some relief.

REQUEST MINISTER TRAVEL ONTARIO TO ASCERTAIN UNEMPLOYMENT SITUATION

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): I direct this question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Given the fact that the industrial base of Ontario is being eroded, will the hon. gentleman assure me that he will at least travel throughout Ontario, and particularly to St. Catharines where unemployment is presently running at the rate of 12 per cent and over, in order to determine whether some relief might be forthcoming? Could the minister give us at least that assurance, or does he also take the position that we must live with one million unemployed?

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for inviting me to travel throughout Ontario to see what the situation is in some cases. I should say to him that I intended to do so, and have in fact already done so. I went to the Windsor area, not so long ago, and I intend to go to another part of Ontario within the next few weeks precisely to see, with some of my officials, what the situation is like, and find out whether our department should intervene as I believe it might in certain cases. I trust those things can be done in due course.

POST OFFICE

POSSIBILITY OF ESTABLISHING SINGLE POSTAL CODE FOR ALL NCC DEPARTMENTS

Mr. Gaston Isabelle (Hull): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Postmaster General.

Further to the memo the Department of Indian and Northern Affairs sent out with the April 1978 issue of its magazine North advising its readers that henceforth their new address will be: Les Terrasses de la Chaudière, North Tower, 6th Floor, Ottawa, Ontario, when in fact that complex is located in Hull, Quebec, can the minister tell the House whether he intends to ask all departments to change their postal code so that the same can be used for all federal departments located in the national capital area, on the Quebec as well as the Ontario side, to spare us any more stupidities on the part of some thoughtless and narrow-minded civil servants in the face of reality, that is that Hull is an integral part of the capital of Canada?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I have already been made aware of that anomaly, for that is certainly what is it. I shall have to consult with the Minister of State for Urban Affairs, whose responsibility the national capital is, so that that anomaly can be corrected as soon as possible.

HOUSING

REQUESTED EXTENSION OF NEIGHBOURHOOD IMPROVEMENT PROGRAM

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. Given the fact that the construction industry, particularly housing, has been such an important factor in providing employment for Canadian citizens, and that we have over one million unemployed in Canada, would the minister indicate to the House whether the government is considering extending the provisions of the Neighbourhood Improvement Program, which has been such an important factor in both providing employment and improving the living standards of tens of thousands of people in the older parts of all Canadian cities? Is the government giving consideration to extending that program, which is now coming to an end as a result of the legislation?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, can the minister indicate whether an early announcement, including the amounts of money which will be made available, will be made so that the provinces and cities interested in extending the program can begin to make their plans? Also, can the minister indicate whether the government, at the same time as considering extending the Neighbourhood Improvement Program, will consider changing the plan to provide block funding for provinces and cities for sewage disposal systems, water extensions, and so on?

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should have been in the House a week ago. I have already answered these questions. I indicated that my officials have had consultation with provincial officials specifically in relation to the programs which have been put forward by the federal government, which are extremely popular and have been extremely valuable in job-creation and in the commencement of municipal activities.

INDUSTRY

MEASURES TO IMPROVE AILING MANUFACTURING INDUSTRY

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. As the minister's departmental study entitled "Manufacturing Performance" reads, "We have lost 80,000 manufacturing jobs since 1974", and as the Canadian Manufacturing Association indicated recently, "If we can overcome our $11.5 billion a year deficit in fully manufactured products, we could create 80,000 new jobs", would the minister take the first opportunity on motions to outline what, specifically, he is doing to get the Canadian manufacturing industry back on its feet so that it can start to overcome this gigantic $11.5 billion deficit in fully manufactured products and start to create those potential 80,000 new jobs?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I should like to outline what we are doing to assist manufacturing in this country. That paper from which the minister quoted is a brief outline of where we are at.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: You are just a little ahead of time, Jack, but it will not be long.

[Mr. Orlikow.]

Mr. Horner: The paper the hon. member quoted from is a brief outline of where we are at. The $11 billion end-product figure that he speaks of must be looked at in its true perspective. End-product exports increased 50 per cent from 1975 to 1977. We exported $10.7 billion worth of end products in 1975. Last year we exported $14.9 billion worth of end products. Thus, we are increasing, but we are also increasing—

Mr. Andre: That is hogwash.

Mr. Horner: The hon. member speaks of hogwash. I can only say that he is a good judge of what hogwash is; he has wallowed in it for a long time.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Horner: Let me continue to explain, Mr. Speaker. The $26 billion which the hon. member speaks of is the importation of end products into this country. In no way am I going to restrict Canadians in their right to purchase whatever they wish.

Mr. Clark: That is an interesting policy. Do you want to reconsider that?

Mr. Horner: My department is isolating that $26 billion and encouraging Canadian manufacturers to take any part or all of the $26 billion worth of goods that we now import. Besides that, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, from the minister's answer it is very obvious that this enormous deficit will increase, because the minister has stated very clearly that he will encourage import of fully manufactured products into this country.

An hon. Member: That is right; that is exactly what he said.

Mr. Hees: Following that statement, I ask the minister whether he intends, or if he is instructing his negotiators at GATT to follow the free trade line which he has so often said he prefers. When he is giving his answer, would he please stick to the facts and not so much to that commodity which is in such abundant supply on his cattle ranch in the west?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I never said I was going to encourage imports; I said that we were going to encourage Canadian manufacturers to take a piece, or all, of that $26 billion we are now importing: we are going to encourage Canadian manufacturers.

Mr. Clark: Read the record.

Some hon. Members: How?

Mr. Horner: How? By a whole series of incentives which my department is making available to the manufacturing industry.

Some hon. Members: When?

Mr. Horner: I went on to say that we have isolated 23 sectors in which we are doing a great deal of study with labour and management.

Mr. Clark: You have isolated St. Catharines, Windsor and Sudbury.

Mr. Horner: If the pretty little boy over there wants to speak, he can get up and do so.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Frontenac-Lennox and Addington.

Mr. Hees: You were saved by the bell. I had a dandy question for you, Jack. I was going to murder you on the next one. Lucky old Jack!

NORTHERN DEVELOPMENT

FRONTENAC COUNTY, ONT.—CONSTRUCTION OF TEMPORARY BRIDGE TO FACILITATE TRAVEL

Mr. A. D. Alkenbrack (Frontenac-Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. I have in my possession a petition from 120 residents, including tourist operators, in the townships of Pittsburgh and Storrington, in Frontenac county, fronting on the Rideau River system, protesting the fact that with the construction of the new Brass Point bridge across the Rideau River, a detour of up to 30 miles will be necessary in the daily travel of the inhabitants and tourists, especially to and from Storrington, in order to gain access to Highway No. 15 and the Kingston area. My question is: Why did his department not provide a temporary Bailey bridge to serve the public during the ten-month life of this $1.6 million contract, and avoid the extra energy, expense outlay and inconvenience to the people, to our tourist operators and to our American customers?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I will have to look into that matter and report to the hon. member.

HOUSING

SUGGESTION CMHC POLICY ADVERSELY AFFECTING NON-PROFIT HOUSING PROJECTS

Mr. D. M. Collenette (York East): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. It concerns the issuance last December of a Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation memorandum GMB-1241 affecting procurement techniques and loans to non-profit housing under sections 15.1 and 34.1(8) of the National Housing Act.

In view of the fact that this memorandum has killed, to all intents and purposes, all future non-profit housing projects across the country, especially in Toronto, since it imposes impossible conditions upon non-profit groups, will the minister order an immediate suspension of the provisions of the memorandum for a minimum of six months pending further consultation with the non-profit housing groups affected?

An hon. Member: Right on!

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the hon. minister is absent from the chamber for a moment. I will take notice of the question and report back to the hon. member.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

AMENDMENTS TO LEGISLATION—ALLEGED DETRIMENTAL EFFECT ON INDUSTRY

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the hon. Minister of Labour. In view of the fact that there are amendments presently before the committee affecting averaging under the Canada Labour Code, and that the grain industry and the trucking industry have given evidence that very serious problems will be created by these amendments, can the minister tell the House whether his colleague, the Minister of Transport, has received representations in this regard and has discussed them with him with a view to making some amendments from the government side?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Transport has received representations regarding the various averaging provisions in the bill. We are giving consideration to those representations at the present time.

Mr. Fraser: I should like to ask the minister how soon the committee will be apprised of any decision the minister is making, and when we will see those amendments.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): I would not like the hon. member to jump to the automatic conclusion that there will be amendments. I will be before the committee this Thursday night, as the hon. member knows, on the clause by clause study. Also, I take it I will be before the committee next week. So the hon. member will have ample opportunity to question me with respect to what, if anything, we will be doing regarding the representations we have received.

Oral Questions

MANPOWER

ADEQUACY OF GOVERNMENT PROGRAMS TO CREATE JOBS

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. As we have heard, the government has backed off the idea of bringing in a budget. Also, it has not brought in any measures of an economic nature to stimulate employment opportunities, especially for young people, other than those announced earlier this month for which smaller amounts were allocated than last year.

In view of the fact that the hard figures for February, unadjusted—perhaps we could even adjust those—show there has been an increase in youth unemployment to 449,000, or just under 50 per cent of the total unemployment—which makes it 16.6 per cent—does the minister feel that the programs he has already announced are adequate, in view of the fact that smaller amounts are allocated to them this year than was the case last year? Does the minister propose to bring in new programs to alleviate youth unemployment now; and the situation will get even worse when students come out of university in May and June?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): The hon. member speaks of programs other than those we have already in place. I suggest to him that, for example, under the Canada Works Program 40 per cent of the participants in the program are youths. Similarly, because I wanted to make a concerted attack on this problem I sought the advice of the National Youth Advisory Group and asked them to look at all the programs we have in place to see if we can make better or more effective use of the funding we have at present, or to suggest to us new programs which might be put in place to meet this need. That is why I am particularly impressed with the job experience training program which has resulted in an increase from 1,000 to 14,000 young people participating. It is a good program. So is the developmental use of UI funds on work-sharing in particular because it affects, in most instances, younger members of the work force.

All these programs are in place and are directed to the very severe problem of youth unemployment. We have concerns in that area, but the people who pay the tab know they are getting value for their money when we put that money out.

Mr. Dick: I always appreciate the fact that the minister recites, every time, programs which have been put in place, in some cases three or four years ago. Since youth unemployment has increased steadily from 9 per cent to 15.5 per cent, it seems that we need something new, that we need a new approach. Can the minister tell the House whether the youth advisory group which he set up early in February, and from which he said he is eagerly awaiting a report, has met? If it has, will he table the recommendations they have made?

Mr. Cullen: The reason I repeat the programs that have been put in place is that every time the hon. member speaks, he chooses to ignore these programs and the amount of money—

[Mr. Munro (Hamilton East).]

Mr. Dick: I know the programs are there, but they are not working.

Mr. Cullen: If hon. members on the other side have nothing, they do a lot of shouting, which at least attracts attention. We have a series of programs. I do not hesitate to recite them each time I am asked a question about youth unemployment, because we are working in that area.

The National Youth Advisory Group has met, not once but twice. I suggested this because I want to get direct advice from them and I want it to be as informal as possible; I do not want it to be too structured. We had representatives from the Canadian Labour Congress, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, from chambers of commerce and from young people themselves. It is an excellent idea. They want to study the programs that are in place and what funding might be made available, to give me an intelligent response to the questions I have put to them.

IMMIGRATION

GOVERNMENT POLICY ON VISA REQUIREMENTS FOR CUBAN VISITORS

Mr. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Some 13 months ago, in answer to a question in the House, he advised us that he was reviewing the visa status requirements for Cuban visitors to determine if they should continue to receive exemption status under the non-immigrant visa requirements. Can the minister inform the House of the government's policy at this time, after some 13 months of deliberations?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I want to look into that specific area because it does not involve solely the Cuban situation. We were looking at visas with respect to four or five other countries, and I would have to work out that kind of determination in concert with my colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I will check that out for the hon. member and report back to him.

Mr. Huntington: As these deliberations continue, I wonder if the minister can assure the House that the Cuban non-immigrant visitors to this country are all friendly and are not engaged in acts which could be interpreted as unfriendly to our form of government?

Mr. Cullen: I am not even sure that everybody who comes from British Columbia is friendly to this government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cullen: In any event, in view of this government's generosity of spirit, we are ready to assume that they are friendly, rather than to accept the opposite suggestion, which is what the hon. member seems to have in mind.

FISHERIES

ASSISTANCE IN IMPROVING FISHERY FACILITIES

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I have a question which I would like to put to the minister of fisheries and oceans, as he might be called. Following the recent federal-provincial conference, the Prime Minister and the Premiers agreed in their joint communiqué that initiatives should be launched concerning fleet development, onshore production facilities, harbour and wharf improvements. In view of this announcement, is the minister prepared now to launch initiatives of a long-term nature in line with the joint submission received from the governments of Nova Scotia and Newfoundland which suggests that funds be made available for the replacement of present obsolete side and stern trawlers, as well as expand the Canadian inshore fishing fleet and wharf facilities? If not, would he tell the House what concrete steps he plans to take to implement the pledge made at the first ministers' conference?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, to answer the hon. member's question fully would take more time than you would allow me. I might say to the hon. member that we expect more money for vessel construction for the fiscal year 1978-79. Companies are not knocking on my door asking to build new vessels. In fact, fishermen are rejoicing at the fact that their catch rate is improving. That is where we want to go; that is the type of initiative we want to see before we increase the size of the fleet.

The hon. member could not justify, with very few exceptions, the expansion of onshore facilities. As for wharf development, he knows very well that in the current fiscal year we will be putting some $50 million into wharves, harbours and other shore developments. That is quite an increase from the money that was put in seven years ago, when we were spending $8 million to $11 million.

Mr. Crouse: The Prime Minister and the other first ministers stated that greater provincial involvement in policy development should be facilitated in the fishery, and quick action taken to maximize our economic potential arising from the implementation of the 200-mile limit. What steps has the minister taken to ensure greater provincial involvement in policy development, and when can we expect a joint announcement by him and the provincial minister of fisheries of Nova Scotia that a start will be made with the opening of the swordfish industry in Nova Scotia which, I believe, has already been indicated by the provincial minister of fisheries in my province?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): If the hon. member would check Hansard, he would find that I have already answered that question. We are awaiting the U.S. decision to remove or maintain the ban on imports of swordfish from Canada.

In answer to the first question, may I say that the hon. member seems to ignore the fact that there were two federal-provincial conferences, one in December and one in February; and more will be planned, if necessary, in the next few months.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

FLUORIDE POISONING OF PLANTS AND WILDLIFE ON INDIAN LANDS

Mr. J. R. Holmes (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. On February 15, I raised the serious matter of fluoride poisoning on the St. Regis reserve. The report prepared by Dr. Conibear and Dr. Carnow for the St. Regis Band Council indicated that fluorides originating at the Reynolds metal company have affected all life forms on the island, and they recommended an epidemiological study be carried out.

Now that the minister has had an opportunity to review that report in detail and is aware of the seriousness of the situation on the reserve, can he indicate if he will reverse his decision and support the recommendations of Dr. Conibear and Dr. Carnow for that study?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, we have never opposed the recommendations of Dr. Carnow's study. What we recognized, and what I indicated to Chief Francis in my letter of February, was that there was a case to be made for a study. We agreed to that. What has been at issue is the scope of the study and whether it should go beyond fluorides.

I am pleased to be able to tell the hon. member that after some very positive discussions with my colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, we on this side are prepared to proceed with the study. We recognized the need for the study long before today. We are prepared to proceed with the study. The minister or her officials will be meeting with the band council on March 21 to define the scope of the study and whether it should go beyond simply the question of fluorosis. We think there is an argument for taking the study beyond that, but I think my colleague would like to discuss that with the chief and his band council.

ACCESS TO PANAMA CANAL—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Prime Minister, to whom I have given notice. My question concerns the Panama Canal treaty currently under consideration by a legislative chamber of our strong ally and neighbour, the United States. I do not invite the Prime Minister to intrude upon the deliberations of the American Senate; nevertheless, in view of the importance to the commerce and comity of our western hemisphere and the whole world of assured open access to the Canal, could the Prime Minister indicate that the Canadian government and people support the early conclusion of an agreement between Panama and the United States as a valuable contribution to hemispheric and international good will?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the way in which the hon. member has asked his question because Canada, of course, is not a party to this treaty. Hon. members on this side of the House and, I am sure, hon. members opposite would not want to intervene in a legislative process which is currently before the United States Senate. However, I think I can satisfy the hon. member by referring him to the so-called Declaration of Washington which was signed and adhered to by every western leader, head of state or head of government, with only one exception, when we convened in Washington early last September.

We signed the Declaration of Washington because we felt it was a development which would bring stability to the hemisphere. If I may quote two phrases from that declaration, I am sure the House would see the position of the Canadian government and, I believe, the Canadian parliament on this matter. They are:

> Considering that settlement of the Panama Canal issue represents a major step toward strengthening of relations among the nations of the western hemisphere on a basis of common interest, equality, and mutual respect for the sovereignty and independence of every state; Recognizing the importance for hemisphere and world commerce and navigation of arrangements for assuring the continuing accessibility and neutrality of the Panama Canal—

Therefore, the government certainly joins with the view expressed by the opposition that this treaty is conducive to bringing greater stability to the western hemisphere.

THE LATE MILTON GREGG, V.C.

TRIBUTES TO FORMER SOLDIER AND PARLIAMENTARIAN

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is with a great deal of sadness that I rise today to inform hon. members of this House that Canada has lost another of its great champions. This morning I received the news that the Hon. Milton F. Gregg, V.C., had died at his home in New Brunswick.

Many of us pass through this life without making a ripple on the surface, but such was not the case with our friend, Milton Gregg. He served with distinction during the First World War and won the Military Cross at Lens in 1917, a bar to the cross at Arras in 1918, and the Victoria Cross for most conspicuous bravery and initiative during operations near Cambrai in the same year.

Following the war, Brigadier General Gregg went into private business, and in 1934 he was appointed Sergeant-at-Arms here in the House of Commons.

He re-enlisted during the Second World War and again served overseas. Following the war years he served as president of the University of New Brunswick in Fredericton, and in 1947 was appointed Federal Minister of Fisheries. He was later appointed Minister of Veterans Affairs and even later, Labour Minister.

In 1964 Milton Gregg was appointed Commissioner for Canada in British Guyana. Four years later he retired. This retirement was short-lived, however, and later that same year he was appointed President of the Canadian Council for International Co-operation here in Ottawa.

Milton Gregg was in his eighty-sixth year, yet he had the stamina and initiative of a man half his age. He was part of the official delegation which accompanied me to Vimy Ridge last April as we celebrated the 60th Anniversary of that great battle in France.

It was always a pleasure and honour to be in the company of this great Canadian. He was loved and admired by those who had the pleasure of knowing him.

The measure of a man's life is not its duration but its donation. Milton Gregg excelled both ways. His life was long and happy, and his donation left this world a better place because he was part of it.

On behalf of the Government of Canada I would like to offer our deepest sympathy to Mrs. Gregg.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my leader and my party I join with the minister in expressing our sadness at the passing of that distinguished veteran Canadian, Brigadier General Milton Fowler Gregg. Not only did he serve with distinction in two world wars, attaining the highest military honour, the Victoria Cross, but he also served with distinction in this House of Commons. He probably is the only Canadian who ever served as Sergeant-at-Arms and then later served in three portfolios in the Government of Canada.

Canada is a better place in which to live as a result of Brigadier General Gregg's contribution, and in expressing sympathy to Mrs. Gregg we in this House give her the assurance of our appreciation of Brigadier General Gregg's exceptional and distinguished service to our nation.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my colleagues and I feel that it is most appropriate that we take a moment to salute this great Canadian. Those of us who knew Milton Gregg regard it as a high privilege to have been numbered among his friends. He was indeed a valiant Canadian. He was an outstanding gentleman who served this country in business, in education, and in the Government of Canada. I remember him particularly in the three portfolios that he held. He handled each of them with efficiency and with fairness to all who were interested in each of those departments. Indeed, it can be said that Canada is a better place because Milton Gregg lived so many years in our midst. We join in this tribute to his memory, and we extend our sympathy to Mrs. Gregg, to his daughter, and to all who were near and dear to him.

[Translation]

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, although I did not have the pleasure of knowing this famous Canadian who has done so much for his country, on behalf of the Social Credit Party of Canada and on my behalf, I wish to join with the government and all other opposition members in extending to Mrs. Gregg and her family our deepest sympathy.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MOTION TO ADJOURN

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that on this day when Canada's unemployment has reached over one million, and that we are facing a government that has no plans to cope with this disaster, and in view of the fact that what the government needs is time to hold a cabinet meeting to make a decision to bring in a budget, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas):

That this House do now adjourn.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those opposed to the motion will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen.

Motion to Adjourn

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre)) which was negative on the following division:

2. Does Parks Canada plan to open camping facilities to replace the Snaring River and Fiddle River campsites?

Mr. Ross Milne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. Fiddle River Campground was closed permanently in the fall of 1974. Snaring River Campground has not been closed. The Fiddle River Campground was closed for the following reasons: (a) The campground was worn out by overuse; (b) The Fiddle River Campground was operating in competition with Folding Mountain Campground located outside the Park which was run by a private operator. Parks Canada's policy is not to compete with privately-operated campgrounds adjacent to national parks.

2. In 1974, 90 new sites were opened at Wabasso Campground.

3. No.

4. Plans for Snaring River Campground are to add 50 sites to the existing 60 sites at a future date. The Fiddle River Campground will remain closed.

5. Two toilets are provided at Maligne Lake (one men's, one women's). In addition, Maligne Tours Ltd. have opened their chalets for the winter and toilets are available there.

* no record by constituency available

 Most up-to-date figure. Several project sponsors have not yet submitted their final reports for the 1976-77 Local Initiatives Program. NATIONAL FILM BOARD—"CONFLICT COMEDY" AND "RUNNING TIME" FILM PRODUCTION

Question No. 1,083—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Did the National Film Board produce a film for a period of over five years with the working title "Conflict Comedy" and a planned release title of "Running Time" and, if so (a) what was the exact date production (i) started (ii) ended (b) what are the names of all persons who directed the project and what position did Mr. Robert Verrall play in the production of the film (c) was the total cost of the production approximately $1.5 million and, if not, what was the exact cost?

2. Was the film released and, if not (a) for what reason (b) what are all the reasons justifying the expenditure of considerable public funds on a film which was never released?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): I am informed by the National Film Board as follows: 1. The National Film Board has produced a film entitled "Running Time". (a) Shooting—57 days during period June 5, 1972 to June 1, 1973. Editing—between June 1973 and February 28, 1976. Test print approved—June 8th, 1976. POINT OF ORDER

MR. STEVENS—HANSARD REPORT

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, as Your Honour recognized, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) alleged I had "tried to mislead the House" with respect to a question I had put to him during the question period. Your Honour expressed the view that it would be better if the word "tried" were removed from the record since it conveyed the impression I had deliberately sought to mislead the House. Looking through today's Hansard I note the word is still in the record, and I feel I should seek clarification of the position. As I understood your intervention yesterday, you felt the word should be deleted. The Minister of Finance gave no indication he was opposed to such a course; we assumed he was acquiescing in it, and I should now like to know whether the word ought to be deleted from the official record.

Mr. Speaker: I would have to confirm this, but I do not believe the official record can, in fact, be physically altered. It has simply to make reference to the fact that it was understood later that the intent of the use of the word by the minister had been withdrawn. I think the word would have to remain in the original text. However, I will ascertain what the practice is. I understand the point raised by the hon. member and I will examine it and see whether the interpretation I have given is the correct one.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

AMENDMENT TO PREVENT IMPORTATION OF GAMES SIMULATING CRIME AND VIOLENCE

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin) moved that Bill C-232, to amend the Customs Tariff (games of violence) be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, Bill C-232 proposes to ban the importation of coin operated or electronic games which simulate acts of crime or violence on the part of the player. The bill will achieve this purpose through an amendment to the Customs Tariff Act which would add an additional item to the prohibited list of items under Schedule C of the Customs Tariff.

These games of violence were first brought to my attention by an article in Safety Canada, a monthly publication of the Canada Safety Council. The March, 1977, issue advised of the imminent importation into Canada of "Death Race", a coin-in-the-slot electronic game destined for arcades and fairgrounds, the object of which is to drive a simulated vehicle in such a way as to "kill" as many pedestrians as possible in a 60-second period.

The pedestrians, depicted by small blips on a screen, weave about, and when one is hit a loud scream is heard. A player scoring 1-3 points is designated as a skeleton chaser. If he scores between four and ten points he is a bone cracker, and a score of between 11 and 20 points makes him a gremlin hunter. A score of 21 points or more makes the player an "expert driver".

To my mind, such games have absolutely no redeeming value, and their entry into Canada should be barred. We are living in an era when the younger generation is subject to all sorts of perverse influences: violence on television, and child pornography in books and magazines. Presently the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs is looking into this very matter. To allow yet another corrupting factor seems foolish at best.

At the age of 16 or so, when a young person finally gets his driver's licence and sits behind the steering wheel of a car, he should be doing so with a keen sense of responsibility. However, if part of his practice driving time has been spent at the wheels or controls of a machine such as "death race" and knocking down as many pedestrians as possible, what sort of responsible attitude can be expected?

Safety authorities and psychologists in both Canada and the United States are very concerned about this game. Clearly they are worried about the psychological impact that such macabre games will have on impressionable minds. A psychologist with the American National Safety Council, in expressing his concern about this game, stated; "Nearly 9,000 pedestrians were killed on our roads last year". That is no joke. We can get a comparable figure for the number of pedestrians killed in Canada last year. I am sure all but a very small percentage of the people playing this game would not jump in their cars and take off after pedestrians on the street; but perhaps one in a thousand or one in a million would. How can we do anything but share this person's concern? The carnage on our roads already is staggering. How do we know that such games as "Death Race" will not impress some unbalanced individuals, if they can be called that, to try their so-called skills on an actual highway?

In my attempts to stir the government to take action, under Standing Order 43 I proposed a motion on March 24, 1977. I urged the then minister of industry, trade and commerce to take steps to prevent the importation of the game at that time. In a motion to follow this up, I wrote a letter to the minister asking him to outline the steps available to him and the country to prohibit entry of the game. The minister's reply was most disheartening. He informed me that the only course available to ban the game at that time was if he could use the Export and Import Permits Act. However, the act allows for only the prohibition of such articles entering our country as those which are subject to government controls in the country of export. Because there is no ban or prohibition on the use of "Death Race" in the United States, under the present act the minister was powerless.

It seems quite incomprehensible that Canada's decision about banning a certain article should be dependent upon a foreign government's treatment of the same article. Upon learning of the restrictions in connection with the Export and Import Permits Act, the Canada Safety Council similarly was disturbed. Mr. Rick Green, the editor of Safety Canada, stated the following:

> It seems almost unbelievable that, to get this item removed from the arcades and fairgrounds in Canada to avoid the risk of influencing that marginal personality who just might be influenced, we must first hope a foreign—if friendly—government takes some action.

My luck was not better with the then minister of finance who suggested that action to ban the game was possible under section (c) of the Customs Tariff Act. Amendments of this kind could be proposed by the government only at the time of a budget. This meant that a year or more could pass before the government could make such amendments to the act in order to stop this game from entering Canada. Other federal departments were just as unhelpful. The Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs indicated that it could not act because the machine was not being offered for sale to a private individual. The Customs and Excise Branch of the Department of National Revenue indicated that it could stop entry of the game only if it was directed to do so by another department. Discouraged by this game of musical chairs with various government departments, finally I decided to pursue the matter on my own in the form of a private members bill.

Since I first raised the issue in the House of Commons, almost an entire year has elapsed, and already the game has entered Canada, along with games similar to it. The game is reported to be in operation in most major Canadian cities. I have seen its operation in Edmonton, as well as here in Ottawa. While we may not be able to prevent the use of this game in Canada, we can and should take action to prevent any further importation of games such as "Death Race". In order for this game to be removed from the Canadian market, perhaps a retroactive law should be put in place to compensate individuals who have already imported it.

My concern is shared by a good number of Canadians. Editorials condemning the game have appeared in a number of newspapers across Canada. The municipality of Guelph, Ontario, has decided to pass a bylaw banning the game from that city. Also a private member's bill was introduced by Mr. Gordon Taylor, a member of the Alberta legislative assembly. His bill is similar in nature to the one I am introducing today. It provides for an amendment to the provincial amusements act, which would provide the provincial government with the authority to censor games such as those that entertain by simulating the killing of human beings. In addition, the Canada Safety Council has given its full support to my efforts in this area.

I have never been one to seek government action or regulation, unless I thought it was very necessary. However, in this case I feel it is very much in the public interest to ban the importation of such games as "Death Race". There are other examples of such games, and I chose to use this one. I ask all hon. members to join with me in supporting this bill.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alan Martin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to involve myself in this debate on behalf of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Allmand). The hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger) is to be commended for bringing forward this area of concern. More and more Canadians are asking themselves about the influence of various items on the younger elements of our society. These items are put before them through various types of marketing devices such as television and others.

In fairness, it is important to put on record some of the concerns which we have regarding this particular bill and its ability to do the job the hon. member for Wetaskiwin would like to see it do. I am sure many other hon. members would support him in the general thrust of his bill.

● (1712)

The bill, entitled " Act to Amend the Customs Tariff" has as its purpose—and I quote from its explanatory note:

> . . . to prevent the importation into Canada of slot machines such as "Death Race" in which the object is to drive a simulated vehicle so as to "kill" as many pedestrians as possible in a given time period.

This bill opens up some very broad avenues of discussion at this time. I am sure that many members of the House share the view of the hon. member for Wetaskiwin that games of violence in general are reprehensible. In fact I think the whole idea of such games is abhorrent to many of us, probably to most of us, but I wonder if the hon. member is approaching the problem in the proper fashion by presenting the bill he has placed before the House.

Careful consideration of the bill reveals a very important limitation in it, namely, that it deals only with products such as the "Death Race" game which are imported into Canada, and not with those games which might be manufactured in this country. In other words, if the bill were to become law, there would be nothing to prevent manufacturers outside Canada from setting up shop in this country and manufacturing the products within our own territory.

At the same time, the bill attempts to deal with a problem which is considerably larger in scope than a few children's games. What we are dealing with here is the problem of violence in our society, and what we as a government can and should do about it.

Various people have said that the games are a hazard to our society and that they should be banned on that basis. We have heard this comment made about a number of games at different times. This might lead a person to assume that perhaps this should be done under the Hazardous Products Act administered by the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Perhaps I should outline briefly for hon. members the history and purpose of this legislation. The act came into force on June 27, 1969, and it was intended to deal with what might be referred to, in general terms, as consumer goods.

The act makes specific mention of such product categories as those designed for household, garden or personal use, for use in sports or recreational activities, or for use by children. It also mentions, without reference to end use, poisonous, toxic, flammable, explosive and corrosive products. However, it excludes from its purview food, drugs, cosmetics, pest control products, radioactive materials and explosives within the meaning of the Explosives Act.

Under the act, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Allmand) is empowered to require disclosure of information in the possession of the manufacturer of any product within its purview respecting the product's nature and composition.

On the advice of the minister, the governor in council may include in the schedule to the act any such product where he is satisfied that it is, or is likely to be, a danger to the health or safety of Canadians.

It is unlawful to advertise, sell or import into Canada a product included in Part I of the schedule of the Hazardous Products Act. It is, moreover, unlawful to advertise, sell or import into Canada a product included in Part II of the schedule, except as authorized by regulations.

The Hazardous Products Act has teeth. An offence is punishable on summary conviction by a fine of $1,000, imprisonment up to six months, or both, or as an indictable offence by imprisonment for up to two years.

Inspectors with powers of search and seizure are designated under the act. A hazardous products inspector may enter, at any time and any place where he reasonably believes a hazardous product, as defined under Part I and Part II of the act, is manufactured, prepared, preserved, sold or stored for sale.

The inspector may examine the product, take samples, and examine any records, books or other documents believed to contain information relevant to the enforcement of the act. Products found to be in contravention of the act or its regulations may be seized immediately. Perhaps, then, superficially, we might say this situation of apparently violent children's games could be covered by the existing law. Certainly we have the Hazardous Products Act, but it covers physical, not mental hazards, what might be said to be danger to life and limb situations. The item itself must be a hazard.

The Hazardous Products Act does not provide for banning products based on their offensiveness to good taste or because of a possible psychological influence on public driving habits or other behaviour. The applicability of federal legislation in that general area, such as that dealing with obscenity, is doubtful in this case.

I think, however, that in this case, Mr. Speaker, the problem may be solved by negotiation and voluntary limits imposed by the companies involved. Many product problems are very specific and are resolved on a voluntary basis by discussion with manufacturers. By way of example, information came to hand from a physician that a certain exercise cycle on the market was not equipped with a chain guard, and has caused injuries. On being advised of the problem by the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, the company took immediate corrective action. If there had been a widespread problem in the product area, more clout probably would have been required and action would have been taken to bring the product under the purview of the Hazardous Products Act. Appropriate mandatory engineering standards would have been established.

Although there are some who would not agree, every effort is made to take a reasonable approach in the administration of the act. The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs weighs all factors carefully before items are included in the schedule of the Hazardous Products Act.

This is of particular significance in determining the implementation dates for bans or regulations. The type and level of hazard and its consequence are normally examined in the light of product utility, economic impact on an industry, and possible effects on the consumer market place. We must make rational choices based upon full and realistic accounting of the consequences of our decision—the costs, social and otherwise, as well as the benefits. Any decisions must be based on reason, not on the fashion of the moment. They must be able to withstand time. They must be made on lasting human values.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, I think we can say that in this matter industry should recognize its responsibility here in how it structures these games. Where it is an electronic game, such as the TV war games on sale now, the moving target does not necessarily have to be a representation of a human being. It could be something else—a dot or an object of some sort moving across the screen. In this way, I think industry could still allow children the enjoyment of such a game of skill, and it would not have any negative elements attached to it, because these games do teach certain skills and, I think, have their usefulness. Some psychologists would agree that a certain amount of co-ordination is involved in these games, as well as a certain amount of judgmental skill in visual and manual operations. It would become, then, a question of shifting emphasis and not playing up the killing aspect of these types of games. Rather, the same sort of technique would be used to a useful effect.

I realize, of course, that it could be argued by manufacturers that these types of killing games, if I can refer to them as such, are precisely what the public wants. If they were to eliminate the human figures and substitute them with dots and various moving objects, nobody would want to buy them any more. That argument probably would be put forward. However, let me submit that if this were the case, what we would have would be clear evidence of a social problem. This would be of such magnitude, I think, that certainly stop-gap measures would be no way of trying to handle the situation. Merely taking a few games off the market would not deal with the root problem, which seems to be an obvious need on the part of people for this kind of excitement and stimulation.

This takes us into the much broader areas I mentioned earlier, the current values we are all having to deal with in our modern society and the problem we are having with violence in particular. These are very complex philosophical issues.

For example, it is still very questionable whether violence on television actually leads to violence in the real world. The same could be said of the types of games we are dealing with here. Is there, for example, a direct relationship in a child's mind between the game he or she is playing and the world outside the child's door?

We might use the game of chess as an example of what I mean here. In chess we are in a sense wiping out pieces or taking them out of play. Nobody, however, really relates this kind of action to killing, nor is it referred to as being violent in any way. Yet chess actually evolved as a war game.

By the same token it could be argued that these types of games—and violence on television, for example—serve as a kind of outlet for any tendency people may have toward violence. This could be said, just as some people argue that certain types of literature and magazines are outlets for other types of frustration. The games, then, just might be a way of sublimating some people's desires to kill people by eliminating a dot on a screen.

This is not to say that I and other members of this House are coming to the defence of these types of games. As I mentioned earlier, my natural reaction is to want to see an immediate end to the kind of game which has as its objective the killing of simulated human beings over a given time period.

What I am suggesting, however, is that merely from a practical point of view the problem we are dealing with is really too complex to be dealt with by a piece of legislation which attacks only one small aspect of violence. It might even be said that no matter how much you legislate against this sort of thing, you will never really eliminate it entirely.

While I sympathize with the intent of the hon. member's bill—and I think that the hon. member for Wetaskiwin has put before the House a concern which does merit more discussion—I suggest to him that the benefit of the fact that it has come before the House today and the discussion we are having in this private members' hour will hopefully lead to more concerted attention to an area which I know has many ifs and buts with regard to any action which might be taken. However, this is an area of increasing concern to Canadian society generally.

Mr. Robert Daudlin (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to speak for very long on this matter because I, for one, feel that this bill should proceed. At the beginning—and at the end, which will come very shortly—I want to congratulate the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger) for bringing this matter forward. From time to time matters come before this House which are, if one can categorize them or classify them, totally without partisanship. They are matters to which all good and honest thinking members who have the concern of their constituencies and the country as a whole at heart want to give substantial consideration.

The essence of this bill has been made clear by the two previous speakers. I need not refer to it again. The concerns raised by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Martin) are perhaps valid, but I am more concerned about the injuries and difficulties this kind of imported game can create for our youth and, indeed, even for persons of more adult years who have aberrations and who find pleasure in considering the possibility of the death of other individuals.

These possibilities are of too great a concern to reject this bill merely because there are difficulties vis-à-vis importing or manufacturing in this country. I suggest that if nothing else this bill deals with the importing of this particular kind of game, and the hon. member has afforded this House the opportunity to state once and for all very clearly to those persons outside as well as inside this country that we will not permit this kind of thing. That surely is an indication to a manufacturer in this country of our intention and of our endeavour to prevent this kind of thing being promulgated.

I suggest we should not reject this proposal simply because it deals only with part of the problem. Well meaning members in this House wish to give a clear indication of their abhorrence of this type of misuse of violence. In my view it is as abhorrent as the misuse or abuse of sex or any other kind of human act which our constituents from time to time consult us about, suggesting that somehow it should be legislated against.

I agree with the parliamentary secretary that there is difficulty in legislating morality and in eliminating completely certain acts and misconduct. All of us agree that there are many things against which we have already legislated in the Criminal Code. However, we all agree that we have not eliminated them. If we were to say that simply because we cannot eliminate an act we therefore must not consider legislating against it, this House would have to close its doors tomorrow because, as much as we legislate, there will be those who will attempt to find loopholes. There will be those who disregard the law, but I think all of us have to exercise a certain optimism and suggest that there are certain things that are right, and if they are right, their abuse is wrong, and that we want to indicate to the well meaning citizens of this country that we will legislate in order to indicate what is right and what is wrong in the common mind of the country. I reject the concept that because something cannot be eliminated there should be no legislation.

I do not concede that the legislation referred to by the parliamentary secretary necessarily deals with the issue which has been raised by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin. It is true that we have legislation dealing with hazardous products, but I find it very difficult to define the kind of game the hon. member has brought to our attention as a hazardous product per se. It could conceivably be described as a hand-eye co-ordination game, something which assists. The hon. member who has brought this matter forward found it difficult to find any socially redeeming factor in it.

If one looks at it very coldly and clinically, it may be that it is one of the more advanced electronic games in terms of hand-eye co-ordination, but beyond that there are no social values. We must be mindful of that, and we must be on guard to ensure that we do not allow these social values to be eroded in the name of, in this instance, hand-eye co-ordination skills.

• (1732)

I said I would not speak for long, Mr. Speaker, I have put on the record that I support the motion of the hon. member for Wetaskiwin. I said at the beginning that I compliment him for bringing this bill forward. I do so again and resume my seat.

[Translation]

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I would simply like to say a few words to suggest that we are in favour of this bill and at the same time to congratulate the mover of the bill now before us. As I understand, the purpose of this bill is to prevent the importation into Canada of slot machines such as "Death Race". When you examine that, you wonder what idea the designer had in mind when he created the game. It seems at first that it was perhaps with the idea of developing skill in young players, which would be somewhat formative. When you consider the game as such it is certainly not formative as it is built. It is of rather sadistic inspiration and I wonder whether its designer wanted to develop skill in young players instead of the human beings he put in his game. Had he put any other obstacle—bowling pins, flags or something else—it seems to me this would have been a lot more formative. The fact that a youth says "I am going to kill such or such fellow" has a bad influence on his mind. It is precisely the spirit of the game that is bad. The people who are put there could be hit. This remains in the youth's imagination while any physical obstacle would have made it a quite inoffensive game in my opinion. That is probably why this bill is important today although, as the minister's secretary suggested, somewhat restricted when dealing only with importation. It does not deal with toys that could be manufactured in this country.

A foreign manufacturer could easily circumvent customs by setting up a small industry in this country to manufacture the same game. I think that if we refer this bill to committee—and I hope it will be referred—a provision will have to be added to it to include all games which could also be manufactured in this country. You can try controlling imports or imposing fines all you want, but I think this must be stopped in its tracks so no industrialist will be tempted to market such a game if he knows that in Canada, for example, it is impossible to do so and the fine would not be, if he manages to circumvent customs, $2 or $3 but high enough to deter him. In those cases, I think that only money can deter a promoter of such games.

Mr. Speaker, we were asked to be brief. I hope there will be co-operation today so this bill can be referred to committee for in-depth study and become a law which will provide further protection for our young people.

[English]

Mrs. Simma Holt (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I just want to discuss this bill briefly. Like other hon. members, I would first congratulate the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger), and also the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Brisco) who has a bill on this subject. I was so concerned about this issue myself that I responded to the large amount of mail I received when this started to come into Canada by asking the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) to take action and the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Guay) to stop it at the border. We do not need to import violence and ugliness from the United States. We can import their beauty and their creativity but we must stop importing their violence and the worst aspects of the great American society.

It has been said that truth is beauty and beauty is truth. Conversely, this ugliness, this violence and this sadism must be the biggest and most horrendous deception ever practised on our contemporary society.

The Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, constituted by this parliament, is trying to find ways to prevent pornography entering this country. The material that is allowed to come in, despite the law, is beyond belief. I could not believe the evidence give to us by the witnesses. I did not imagine the extent of this type of violence.

First of all, we use our children for this so-called art, this pornography that is created and sold at great profit by organized crime, almost 100 per cent so in the United States. We have seen the routes of entry which are used. I can only wonder at the motive and kind of mind that created this so-called game. It has always been known that games for children are a process of education and a process of establishing roles. Unfortunately, too many roles were created by games. The one role we do not need in society is the indoctrination of children to violence. We use blocks to teach them to build, Scrabble to teach them to spell and plastiscene to help them create sculpures. If the TV electronic devices want to help create useful eye-hand co-ordination, the tennis game is good enough. Why is it necessary to teach children by playing the "Death Race" game to aim at human beings and kill them?

In recent years we have seen our children grow up in a "do your own thing" society where all persons must express themselves. The children of the Spock era were told that if they smashed windows they were expressing themselves. That was in the '40s and late, '50s and those children expressed themselves in more and more violent ways by the time they reached their teens or twenties.

We still think that is the kind of society we want. In the '50s and, '60s some children were not told the difference between right and wrong. Nobody taught them that difference. As a result, some of them grew up almost without that knowledge and became psychopaths. It was a very serious time when children were not told about religious concepts, for instance. Some parents said that could wait until they were 18. Now we find ourselves in a society where we are importing games of violence.

I congratulate all hon. members who move in any way to stop the import of dangerous toys into Canada or prevent them being created in Canada. It does not matter where it is created—it is a dangerous toy and, like pornography, does not improve the fabric or the quality of life.

We have become desensitized in our society by violence. We had the Viet Nam war brought into our living rooms in the grossest detail. Perhaps during the second world war if television had been available there might have been many lives spared the early shock and today we might have been less violent. However, that is only a guess. Maybe we would have been more violent. It is possible we would have started sooner in viewing violence in our living rooms while eating breakfast, lunch and dinner.

This is a bill I would like to endorse. It is time we stopped all this pollution of the mind and the spirit, particularly of young children and adolescents, but as well of society as a whole.

Mr. Roger Young (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I too will be brief this afternoon. However, I want to say at the outset that personally I would see no difficulty in having the hon. member's bill go forward to committee for further study.

Concerning the subject matter of the bill I would like to draw attention to a few of the problems I see with it. This may be helpful to the hon. member and the House. The purpose of the hon. member's bill is to prevent the importation into Canada of slot machines and games such as "Death Race". I believe we are all aware that the object of that game is to drive a simulated vehicle so as to kill as many pedestrians as possible within a given period of time.

This bill, C-232, seeks to amend the Customs Tariff. I might state that prohibited items under the Customs Tariff Act are determined by section 14 of that act, which in turn is referrable to Schedule "C". By item 99201-1 of Schedule "C" the following categories are identified, amongst others, as prohibited goods:

Books, printed paper, drawings, paintings, prints, photographs or representations of any kind of a treasonable or seditious, or of an immoral or indecent character.

It could be stated fairly that item 99201-1 of Schedule "C" is perhaps broad enough as presently framed to include within its ambit representations of an immoral or indecent character such as are described as being employed in the electronic game of violence known as "Death Race". I have canvassed some opinions to that extent and the game falls within those objects defined as prohibited goods. Thus, the provisions contained in Bill C-232 would be somewhat superfluous and unnecessary. Anyone asked the basic question whether running down and killing pedestrians in a game was a representation of an indecent or immoral character would undoubtedly answer yes.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: What about American television shows? They have a lot of depictions.

Mr. Young: There are probably some Canadian television shows which have the same depictions.

The definitional questions are important. My hon. friend refers to the method for barring coin-operated mechanical or electronic games simulating acts of crime or violence on the part of the player. I am sure we have all grown up with penny arcades and slot machine games. I see him smiling. Perhaps he as well as I spent part of our youth inspecting the inner reaches of penny arcades.

I am wondering if it is fair to say that such a definition would necessarily also exclude importation of coin-operated hunting games where one practises the hunting of bears. Shortly after the last war there was a game which sent torpedoes out of what looked like a submarine capsule into "enemy" ships. Things like that were quite common in the '50s and '60s and might also be included as games of violence. With the definition as broad as the hon. member has drafted it we would probably run the risk of outlawing many games which a large percentage of the general public consider as having some elements of violence attached to them but not really being of the kind which they would necessarily want to ban or bar.

I believe my friend the Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Martin) pointed out this bill covers only the importation of such games into the country from outside. Even with the passage of such a bill we would still be left with the possibility of having such games actually manufactured in this country. In that respect Bill C-232 would have no influence upon the situation.

This brings me to my major and final point, Mr. Speaker. If our purpose is truly to curb the anti-social psychological effects on our youth of games such as "Death Race", then perhaps a more appropriate form of amendment would be in terms of our general law concerning obscenity. These matters are scheduled for consideration at the uniform law conference which is to be convened later this summer. One of the proposals which is actively being considered at present is an amendment to section 159(8) of the Criminal Code. This section defines obscenity. The consideration expected to be given to an amendment to section 159(8) would deal with a proposal to eliminate the necessary nexus or connection between sex and crime or cruelty and violence. These proposals would hopefully make the undue exploitation of crime, cruelty, or violence per se tantamount to obscenity.

I might mention, as perhaps the hon. member is aware, that the justice and legal affairs committee, as mentioned by my colleague the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt), is presently studying the matters of pornography and obscenity. At the moment we are looking at the definitions. We may very well come up with suggestions which would be of assistance to the hon. member's purpose in redefining such matters as obscenity. I looked at a draft report this afternoon and I believe there is room for including something in the report of the justice and legal affairs committee which would be of assistance to the hon. member. I suggest to him that he might check with the justice critic of his party and join us on that committee as a representative of his party and attend the meetings. If it is not too late we might be able to incorporate some of his views into that report. We are at the draft stage at this time and it will be a few days before that report is given final consideration. It would go back to the full committee for final drafting and I am sure that the hon. member will be welcome to attend there.

I just wanted to draw hon. members' attention to some of the definitional problems and problems of scope which we have in dealing with this issue. I have sympathy for the hon. member's point and the reasons for bringing forward this bill. In my opinion, such games as "Death Race" one could say are scandalous and scurrilous. They are of an immoral nature or indecent character. My fear, and I am sure it is shared by the hon. member, is that by allowing such games into the country we allow the minds of our children to be conditioned to the fact that it is possible to drive a car erratically or in such a fashion as to run down people willy-nilly and actually kill them. That might be fantasy; it might be make-believe in terms of the game. But I do not like to see a situation where young people, or anyone for that matter, can so condition themselves to the operation of a game that at some time in the future when they would actually be driving a car they would carry out the same kind of an act which at one time was only a game. That is a horrible idea.

I thank the hon. member for bringing this matter forward. Perhaps we should go forward to committee and give it further study there.

Games of Violence

● (1752)

Mr. D. M. Collenette (York East): Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to talk on the bill this afternoon. However, after hearing some of the remarks of my colleagues, the hon. member for Niagara Falls (Mr. Young) and the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt), I thought I should add a few words.

Looking at the bill in the narrow sense, it has much to commend it. The game known as "Death Race" is to be abhorred. As a new parent, I would hate to think of my child participating in or deriving any pleasure from it. In that sense, I completely agree with the sentiments of the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger). He has done the House a service by bringing the issue forward for debate this afternoon.

One problem when discussing the banning of a game such as "Death Race" is that we open ourselves up to serious criticism about the civil liberties of society. The fact that someone enjoys the game called "Death Race", which others may feel is obscence, perverse or twisted, is in no way a reason for society to condemn that game. That is what bothers me about this bill.

The Conservative party, of which the hon. member is a prominent member, has made a lot of hay in the last few years to the effect that governments intrude too much in the lives of individual Canadians. However, we have here a private member's bill which would, in a sense, eliminate the option of some people enjoying a particular game. It does not matter how abhorrent we may feel it or how much effect it would have upon the person enjoying it. If someone wants to play poker, enjoy horse racing, bet on horses or even play the game of "Death Race"—and I hate to put them all in the same category—it would be unfair that the government or parliament should limit the choice of individual Canadians.

If we are talking "Death Race", we should also talk about other forms of subliminal advertising such as we see in consumer advertising over television. I am not an expert on that subject. The hon. member for York West (Mr. Fleming), who is in the chamber this afternoon, is an expert on broadcasting. I am sure he would have something to say on subliminal advertising.

When you talk about banning and the psychological ramifications and implications of banning something such as "Death Race", you have to deal with a lot of other questions in a broader scope. Take for example some of the brainwashing or subliminal techniques employed by religious groups.

In most of the big cities, such as on Yonge Street in Toronto, you have the so-called religious freaks who panhandle. They try to lure young kids who are perhaps a little mixed up into their religious sect. One group in particular that comes to mind is the Moonies. We have a heard a lot about the Moonies and how very responsible people meet someone on Yonge Street, for example on a Friday night, and ask them to get together for a coffee. They are a little bit down. The Moonies start talking about their philosohy, whatever it is. My reading of the subject is that these people are hooked very quickly.

[Mr. Young.]

It has been alleged that Moonies use techniques akin to the brainwashing used in the Korean War. Should we as a society outlaw the Moonies? I have received a lot of correspondence, believe it or not, from the hon. member's province of Alberta. I cannot remember the name of the church that was recently burned down on Avenue Road in Toronto. I believe it is the Church of Scientology. The children of many Albertans have been taken into that sect.

I do not know whether society should make rules and regulations to cover every aspect of human behaviour. An individual has certain inalienable rights. He should have free choice as to what he wants to do. Hopefully parents raise their children, in such a way that they will realize that "Death Race" is not a good thing and that it has a bad effect. But really, it is up to the individual to choose.

I am not trying to throw in a red herring, but prostitution is illegal under the Criminal Code. We have prostitution in all our major cities. What has been the effect of banning prostitution? It is still with us. Perhaps I should not be making the case that every city has a sin-strip or red light district. However, there are people in society who express themselves in what we might call abnormal behaviour. This is something not generally followed by all members of society. As long as these people are not infringing upon the rights of others, I cannot see why this parliament should pass laws to ban a particular game, for example.

There are other comments I would like to make, Mr. Speaker, but there are members who wish to speak before six o'clock.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I want to speak more in terms of speaking to other members of the House. I strongly support the intent of this bill and commend the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger) for bringing it to the attention of hon. members. This is a very serious problem. We are increasingly seeing activities, games and so on being put before young people which indicate to them that the use of violence can be effective. We should reject that concept.

As there has been such strong support from members on both sides, including two parliamentary secretaries and other members, I hope there will be agreement to let the bill go to committee where it can be effectively studied and amended in accordance with some of the good suggestions made here, rather than talked out. I hope government members will allow that to happen. That seems to be the prime purpose of the introduction of the bill by the hon. member.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I support the bill. Let's send it to committee.

Mr. Ed Lumley (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, obviously I do not want to be the spoil sport. Like all hon. members of this House, I extend my congratulations to the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger) for bringing forward this bill. As my colleague, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice

(Mr. Young), said, the hon. member has perhaps raised a much broader issue than he realizes. It might be a good idea, in concert with other hon. members who have bills of a similar nature, such as those dealing with pornography, to combine them and bring forward more broad legislation that the government can discuss and take to the justice committee.

The hon. member for Wetaskiwin is concerned, particularly for young people. It is obvious there are more than just hockey players in his area. The legislation he proposes, although well intentioned, is clearly insufficient to cover all aspects of this problem. If there is a need to prohibit games such as this, careful consideration must be given to drafting a more comprehensive piece of legislation.

Schedule "C" of the Customs Tariff can be effectively used to prohibit the importation of goods into Canada. As indicated in the explanatory note to the bill, section 14 of the Customs Tariff provided that goods enumerated in Schedule "C" are prohibited importation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hour provided for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENTS TO GIVE CERTAIN RIGHTS TO POLICE

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Blais that Bill C-26, to amend the Criminal Code, the Crown Liability Act and the Post Office Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to open the debate on second reading of Bill C-26. This bill contains important provisions which, when the legislation is enacted, will help Canada and the services responsible for security to better solve the serious problems they now face. I recognize, Mr. Speaker, that the provisions of this bill have been and still are the subject of many comments. I would first like to note that this bill is temporary since it provides for the bill itself and its effect to expire one year after the McDonald Commission submits its report and recommendations.

Mr. Speaker, in my comments tonight I would like to emphasize two major points, that is the need for this legislation and the powers it gives to the police and security service. In this regard, I hope hon. members will clearly understand that there is a real need for this legislation and that the additional help it will give to the police and security service is not excessive. Moreover, Mr. Speaker, my colleague, the Postmaster General (Mr. Lamontagne), will be able to support directly this bill and I await impatiently his comments.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, in proposing the legislation in special circumstances of the interception of first class mail, Bill C-26 addresses itself to two serious problems affecting Canadians today. The first is the use of the mails for the transmission of narcotics. The second is the use of the mails to support activities which are detrimental to national security. I wish to speak to each of these areas since the requirements they demand for government action establish the need for this legislation.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, drug addiction in Canada continues to be a subject of national concern and a serious problem. When it studied this problem in 1969, the LeDain Commission estimated that there were about 50,000 drug users in Canada as well as 15,000 regular addicts. The figures that I have been given show that in 1975, which is the last year for which we have precise figures, 13,927 heroin addicts were known to the Bureau of Dangerous Drugs. Moreover, 6,517 of them lived in British Columbia. Mr. Speaker, the number of these drug addicts is increasing. From 1969 to 1974, the number of known heroin addicts increased for the whole country from 2,714 to 16,000 or 20,000, and in British Columbia alone, from 1,874 to 6,517, according to present estimates.

[English]

The cost reflected in these statistics across the spectrum of victims, from society as a whole to the addicts themselves, is enormous. In the lower mainland of British Columbia where the most detailed analysis has been made it is estimated that between 50 per cent and 70 per cent of property conversion crimes such as robbery, burglary and shoplifting are heroin-related. In 1975, for example, heroin users committed at least 53 per cent of all serious robbery offences. Since 1965, crimes against property have risen by 190 per cent, crimes against persons by 108 per cent and the over-all crime rate by 186 per cent. Prostitution is also often heroin-related in that there is a direct correlation between prices charged by prostitutes and the price of a cap of heroin. Not surprisingly, heroin has precipitated an increase in the extent of underworld violence, including the possession of firearms and homicide. In this latter regard there were some 443 narcotic-related deaths in Canada between 1969 and 1974.

These figures mirror only one facet of the total cost. Federal and provincial governments are obliged to spend great amounts of time and money on treatment, law enforcement and other programs. As recently as January 18, 1978, four federal ministers in conjunction with ministers from British Columbia established a federal-provincial strategy committee to co-ordinate a program to deal more effectively with heroin abuses and illicit drug trafficking in British Columbia. I do not wish to imply that the interests of these ministers were restricted to one area of the country. The meeting in January was held to discuss recommendations by a special federal-provincial committee set up early in 1977 to develop a plan of attack on the serious heroin problem in Canada as a whole.

The first of the recommendations agreed to at the meeting in January called for "a balanced approach of supply and demand reduction, that is, cutting the availability of heroin on the street while at the same time reducing the number of addicts." This, I suggest, is the central aspect of hard drug addiction. I have noted, Mr. Speaker, that the number of known addicts is increasing year by year. At the same time, the amount of heroin seized by the RCMP is declining year by year. The facts of those seizures are as follows: in 1969-1970, 37.9 pounds; in 1970-71, 58.4 pounds; in 1971-72, 195 pounds; in 1972-73, 165.1 pounds; in 1973-74, 77.8 pounds; in 1974-75, 30.5 pounds; in 1975-76, 36.3 pounds; and in 1976-77, 17.6 pounds. Against these seizures, the estimated annual consumption of heroin in British Columbia alone is 365 pounds per year.

There is, I think, Mr. Speaker, a certain inevitability in the conclusion which must be drawn from the statistics I have just given. The numbers of known addicts, especially heroin addicts, is increasing while the amount of heroin seized is decreasing. Despite the efforts of law enforcement officials to seal off avenues of entry for narcotics, they are still getting into the country. I suggest that one way, possibly the major way, in which our growing addict population is being serviced is through that open conduit of the mails.

All members will recall, I believe, public statements by the commissioner of the RCMP on how this system works.

[Translation]

For instance, in Bangkok, Thailand, one gram of 100 per cent pure heroin sells for $4 to $6. This quantity is then sent by first class mail to Canada. When he receives that gram of heroin, the trafficker adds to it a substance like lactose to make 16 grams. So, from one gram he gets 16 grams that contain about 5 per cent heroin, and that is the quality of heroin presently sold in Canada. Those 16 grams are then used to make 228 capsules that sells for about $50 apiece in Canada. So you realize by a simple calculation that the initial $4 to $6 investment yields a profit of about $11,400 for the trafficker. One pound of heroin would yield almost a quarter of a million dollars. This represents for the potential trafficker a very profitable business that can be conducted through the mail. The heroin market, which represents some $225 million a year, is the fifth largest industry in British Columbia at present, coming behind forestry, mining, tourism and farming. You can realize how serious is this problem.

In British Columbia, one pound of heroin is worth almost $1 million because of the demand. At the national level, the price and market value of heroin are twice as much.

[English]

As to the incidence of such use of the mails, the commissioner also informed the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs of one case involving approximately 100 first class mail envelopes containing heroin. But the full extent of the use of the mails to transmit drugs undoubtedly goes well beyond that particular incident. The mails are being used, among other means, to service a growing addict population in Canada. This mails conduit is mostly from offshore, and I believe we have an obligation to stop it.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, Bill C-26 would not only authorize the opening of first class mail related to the drug trafficking I just mentioned, but it also would grant similar authority as concerns national security matters.

[English]

In regard to national security, I think it is worth repeating an observation made by the Mackenzie Royal Commission on Security in 1969. Those commissioners noted that the state has a responsibility:

> To protect its secrets from espionage, its information from unauthorized disclosure, its institutions from subversion and its policies from clandestine influence—

The Commission's report went on:

> There has been no period in history when attempts at activities of these kinds have not been undertaken. Such attempts—successful or unsuccessful—are taking place now and will undoubtedly continue to take place in one form or another as long as international relationships are based on the existence of nation states. In order to carry out its responsibilities, the state must make arrangements to determine the nature and extent of activities of this kind which exist at any given time, and to take such preventative or defensive measures as may be possible and appropriate.

The provisions of the bill relating to national security concerns are intended to provide such preventive or defensive measures. No one would suggest that the proposed measures themselves are an absolute requirement for the protection of our sovereignty, not any more than those measures relating to drugs are going to solve the whole drug problem in Canada. But they are important in accomplishing these ends.

Canada, and I have said this often, has the most secure civil liberties of any nation in the world. The reason for this is largely that Canadians have been vigilant in their protection. The 11 jurisdictions in Canada, including the provinces and the federal government, have given the issue of civil liberties within their own jurisdictions their attention and the healthy competition between them has incited each to adopt measures that have promoted those liberties. There is a recognition as well that our adoption of British parliamentary institutions as models for our own democratic process gave us a head start.

But those civil liberties will only remain as long as our sovereignty is maintained, as long as those institutions are permitted to function, and Canadians feel secure and protected from activities that are against their interests and those of their country.

Much publicity has been given to the use of the mails for communications purposes by the Japanese Red Army Terrorist Toshio Omura in Toronto, and the RCM Police interception of the mail as a means of neutralizing the threat posed by this dangerous individual. Despite the inadequacies of some reporting of testimony given relating to this incident, I am convinced that thoughtful consideration of the record before the present commission of inquiry headed by Justice McDonald will indeed demonstrate the importance of mail interception in the resolution of this matter.

It is difficult for me to concede, Mr. Speaker, that Canadians as a whole would argue that the private communications of a man such as Omura should remain sacrosanct. Omura is one of the most infamous terrorists in the world today and his record of misdeeds makes appalling reading—hijackings in his country and other terrorist actrocities—world wide. The logic that men such as he, once having gained access to Canada, are free through first class mail communications to hatch plots for violence here or elsewhere escapes me completely.

The same is true in respect of other acts of subversion, especially espionage. I think there is little value in dwelling on the details of espionage techniques used by such agents. What is clear is that such techniques do indeed involve the use of the mails for safe passage of communications. The activities of espionage agents are inimical to our well being, to our national interest, to our national security, and I think there is no obligation on our part to facilitate or make easy their unacceptable behaviour in Canada. Indeed, I firmly believe that we would be seriously remiss in the discharge of our duty as parliamentarians if we failed to make life as difficult as possible for such persons. That is what the security provisions of this bill intend.

Finally, in respect of the security issue, I think it is important to realize that both the Franks Commission in the United Kingdom in 1957 and the Australian Royal Commission on Intelligence and Security in 1977 agreed on the need to allow their respective national security organizations to intercept and open mail under warrant. I believe we are on firm ground in this matter and that nothing we are proposing in this bill is inconsistent with democratic principles as we understand them in this country.

I would like now to turn to two other aspects related to Bill C-26: the procedure for the issuance of warrants both for the interception of mail in respect of narcotics trafficking and security related activities, and the reporting requirements to parliament embodied in the bill.

In respect of warrants to intercept the mails to prevent offences against the Narcotics and Food and Drugs Acts, the procedures are similar to those now in place respecting the interception of electronic communications. First, approval for seeking a mail intercept warrant must be obtained from the superiors of the peace officer or public officer involved in the investigation. Second, a peace officer or public officer then submits an application for a warrant in writing to the Solicitor General of Canada, or an agent specifically designated by the Solicitor General to receive and review such applications. Accompanying the application will be an affidavit containing information pertinent to the investigation. The peace officer will be required to swear to the authenticity of the information contained in the affidavit. Third, once the Solicitor General or his agent approves the application, it is presented to a judge of the superior court of criminal jurisdiction for the area. If the judge is satisfied that issuance of a warrant would be in the best interests of the administration of justice, and that other investigative procedures have been tried and have failed, the judge may then issue a warrant.

In matters of national security, warrants authorizing the interception of first class mail will be issued only by the Solicitor General of Canada. Applications for a warrant will be presented to the Solicitor General by the director general of the security service who will be required to swear to the authenticity of the evidence provided. If the Solicitor General is satisfied by the evidence that an interception is necessary for the prevention or detection of subversive activity directed against Canada, he may then issue the warrant. The nature of subversive activities is defined under section 16(2) of the Official Secrets Act. That definition is quite evident in itself and is quite wide in its application.

The reporting procedures on the use of the provisions of this legislation are identical to those laid out in the Protection of Privacy Act and section 16 of the Official Secrets Act.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I would like to repeat in French my remarks dealing with the procedure for the issuance of warrants. In respect of warrants to intercept the mails in order to prevent offences against the Narcotics and Food and Drugs Acts, the procedures are similar to those now in place respecting the interception of electronic communications. First, approval for seeking a mail intercept warrant must be obtained from the superiors of the peace officer or public officer involved in the investigation. Second, a peace officer or public officer then submits an application for a warrant in writing to the Solicitor General of Canada, or an agent specifically designated by the Solicitor General to receive and review such applications. Accompanying the application will be an affidavit containing information pertinent to the investigation. Third, once the Solicitor General or his agent, approves the application, it is presented to a judge of the Superior Court of Criminal Jurisdiction for the area. If the judge is satisfied that issuance of a warrant would be in the best interests of the administration of justice, and that other investigative procedures have been tried and have failed, the judge may then issue a warrant.

In matters of national security, warrants authorizing the interception of first class mail will be issued only by the Solicitor General of Canada. Applications for a warrant will be presented to the Solicitor General by the director general of the security service who will be required to swear to the authenticity of the evidence provided. If the Solicitor General is satisfied by the evidence that an interception is necessary for the prevention or detection of subversive activity directed against Canada, he may then issue the warrant. The reporting procedures on the use of the provisions of this legislation are identical to those laid out in the Protection of Privacy Act and section 16 of the Official Secrets Act.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I think it is fair to say that all the facts that justify the introduction of such a legislation have been submitted to Parliament. I hope therefore that all members will give to this matter their close attention and will pass this bill without delay.

[English]

The subject matter of this legislation has received wide publicity and public consideration to date. I am very interested in hearing comments by hon. members opposite, as well as members from my own party, in terms of their own views with reference to this legislation. Simply, I wish to reiterate my conviction that the facts I have recited, and those which have been made public, justify the introduction and swift passage of this legislation. I know hon. members are interested in providing that swift passage. Indeed, to date there has been a great deal of public debate on this issue. We are ready now to proceed to action.

Hon. members are well aware that committee deliberations are really the forum in which these measures can be more fundamentally debated. Second reading can be expedited through promptly dealing with the major issues, after the necessary partisanship which accompanies these debates. In my address I have steered clear of partisan debate. We are dealing with a fundamental piece of legislation which is required now. Initially I suggested that it is of limited duration. Clause 17 of the bill provides that the effect of this legislation ceases to apply one year after the McDonald Commission has made its report and recommendations.

I am sure this debate will be a very interesting one. It will be non-partisan in nature, knowing the hon. members opposite who have indicated an interest in participating. I followed this bill with a great deal of interest first as postmaster general and now as the responsible minister. I assure hon. members that considerable care has been provided in the drafting of its provisions. I can vouch for the fact that the Attorney General of Canada has used nothing but the most expert draftsmanship in preparing this legislation.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Blais: Undoubtedly the provisions of this bill will meet with the approval of hon. members opposite. This bill has been tabled for some time now. First reading was given on February 7, which was more than a month ago. To date I have not received any indication from the opposition parties as to any objection they have to any of the provisions contained in this bill. Although there have been a number of public comments made generally, I have not seen anything which attacks any of the fundamental provisions presented in this bill. I am looking forward to this debate and the great deal of co-operation which will be forthcoming from hon. members opposite.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, we are dealing with Bill C-26 which is legislation that would make legal the interception and opening of mail in two general areas. The first of these is the criminal area, in which the bill purports to assist in the battle against drug traffic. The second area relates to national security, wherein the bill purports to assist in the prevention or detection of subversive activities.

● (2032)

This second reading debate upon which we embark tonight is generally regarded as a debate in principle, and I think it is incumbent upon me at the outset of my remarks to make very clear the principle which we as the Official Opposition support. We support in principle the legal interception of mail in special specified circumstances, given adequate safeguards and given the situation where the more normal, acceptable and traditional methods of law enforcement have proven ineffective. Therefore, we support Bill C-26 in principle. In our view it meets most of these requirements. We do not anticipate a prolonged second reading debate, but I think contributions might be made from all corners of the House.

I agree with the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) that it is important this legislation reach its proper forum which, in my view, is the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

In enunciating the principle contained in the legislation I referred to the legal interception of mail. There is nothing much that is new about that. Indeed, I am informed that most countries in the western world have legislation of this nature. In England, for example, the legal interception of mail was recorded as long ago as 1663. In the same country we can find statutes permitting this interception that are over 200 years old, and those statutes relate to interception as a means of attacking serious crime and as a means for the preservation of the safety of the state.

In talking about the principle of the bill, I also referred to special and specified circumstances and to the necessary, proper safeguards. The interception of mail or of any form of communication is inherently objectionable—surely few of us will disagree with that—and it is objectionable for three reasons. The first is that the power to intercept is in the hands of the state and its officials and it is exercised secretly; the extent and the purpose of the use of the power is not publicly known. Second, the uncontrolled use of this power by the government might be an unnecessary interference with the private rights of a country's citizens. Third, the powers can be exercised without an opportunity for protest or objection. Therefore, the power to intercept a communication must never be a general power. It must be carefully restricted, it must be applicable to well defined circumstances, it must be the subject of special safeguards.

It is almost trite for me to say that this legislation infringes on the basic freedom of the individual, but there is a corollary: that freedom is of precious little value if the individual is the victim of the law breaker or the subversive. Indeed, in terms of national security, when that is under attack and no adequate defence is available, that basic freedom has the potential of becoming meaningless by its elimination.

However, on balance what I really seek is the assurance that there will be strict observance of the purposes to which the interception of mail should be directed or confined, and I look to the government, through its Solicitor General, for that assurance. I do not look to the law enforcement agencies of this country. I do not look to the security service officials. I look to the Solicitor General and the government that he represents to assure me that proper safeguards are in place and are working. I look to him to assure me that the power is restricted and used appropriately; and I look to the Solicitor General to assure me that the power is not to be used as a matter of routine and as simply a substitute for the conventional law enforcement measures that are our tradition.

Acknowledging that the reality of our times is that crime and subversive activity do occur in Canada, and further acknowledging that our law enforcement and security services must contend with these threats, we look to the Solicitor General and the government for a final assurance. Can they assure us that it is necessary to compromise further the fundamental right of privacy in order to protect us effectively from the threats of crime and subversion?

There is no doubt that the Solicitor General and the government would give these assurances that I seek. The question is not whether they will give them but rather how valid are they once given. Because this is a government which gives assurances at any time, in any place, about anything. We have had assurances in the House that there were no illegal or irregular security service activities. How quickly that proved wrong! We have had assurances in the House that these incidents amounted to one or two in number and were isolated. How quickly that proved wrong! We have had assurances that the McDonald Royal Commission was going to solve all these problems, but once the commission was constituted events alone overtook it and left it far behind. We have had assurances that no members of parliament were subjected to electronic surveillance. There are many in the House and in this country that doubt that assurance. Most recently we have had an assurance about the extreme sensitivity of a particular top secret document, and yet there are widely circulated reports, which are uncontradicted, that some 58 copies of that so-called top secret, sensitive document have been distributed around this capital.

Let us be more relevant. Let us talk about assurances on mail opening, which is the subject matter of this bill. In July 1975, in the House, the then solicitor general, now Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Allmand), assured us that first class mail cannot be opened. The then postmaster general, Bryce Mackasey, in 1975 gave the same assurance in the House.

The present Solicitor General in his former role as postmaster general said the same thing in the House of Commons last November, only to be contradicted moments later by the then solicitor general, who got his news from the CBC. On November 9 the present Solicitor General told the House that he had checked with the Post Office's security and investigation officers. He assured us that there was no problem, but the director of the security intelligence branch of that department told the McDonald Commission that he knew about these instances in or about mid-October.

Why have all the assurances proved to be so false and so hollow? If one were a cynic, one would have to say that the motive for giving that type of assurance was simply to protect the political skin of he and they who gave it. That would be if one were cynical. If one were generous, one would say that these assurances which have been so false and so hollow were given to allay the suspicion and cynicism of Canadians. However, the result has been just exactly the opposite.

The bumbling, stumbling, fumbling and heavy-handed ineptitude of this government has been the very food for the cancer which has caused the suspicion and cynicism not just of members of this House but of Canadians everywhere. How did we get there? Where did this ineptitude come from? I think I know. It comes from the extraordinary and remarkable doctrine of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) regarding ministerial responsibility. I am not sure I can put it as succinctly as he can, but I can paraphrase. The Prime Minister gathers his cabinet around him and gives them the following marching orders: "For heaven's sake, do not inform yourself about what is going on in your department. Above all, do not ask the right questions of your departmental officials. Cloud yourself and shroud yourself in ignorance, because as long as you can survive without a criminal charge being brought against you, we will all be all right". That is the doctrine, and that is the feed and the fodder for the cynicism and suspicion which is abounding in this country.

In this atmosphere along comes Bill C-26, to permit the legal interception of mail. The Solicitor General knows full well that the reaction is cynicism and suspicion. There has been a virtual litany of editorial comments, and I will quickly quote a few. "It," meaning this legislation, "is at best premature. It is also opportunistic, threatening and profoundly distressing". Another editorial: "To legalize the opening of mail is an act of contempt remarkable even by the generous standard of Pierre Trudeau". Another one: "A piece of tough anti-crime legislation that will be popular at election time". Another one: "A rush to amend a law that has not been enforced". "Retroactive sanction of illegal activities". The editorials go on and on.

This is the atmosphere in which this House and a diligent, hard working Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs must deal with this extremely important legislation. Who is to blame? It is not the opposition or Canadians from coast to coast. Those who are to blame sit on the government benches opposite, those whose irresponsibility is remarkable and whose incompetence is a hallmark. And they are astonished that Canadians are cynical and suspicious.

Let me deal now with the McDonald Commission. Attracted to this Royal Commission has been a certain share of suspicion and cynicism. The commission lumbers along, taking five months to call its first witness. It was tagged by one editorialist as the government's tool for delay and described by another as follows: "A sluggish commission created by a government that does not have the courage to do its job". Another said that the commission was "proceeding in an aimless fashion with little sense of urgency".

However, in spite of all this there is a direct and important relationship between the McDonald Commission and this legislation. One activity forming the subject matter for study by the McDonald Commission is the interception of mail. On this issue the McDonald Commission has heard eight to ten days of evidence. It has heard from a number of witnesses. I estimate that about 2,000 pages of evidence have been recorded. What will the standing committee get from the McDonald Commission? Is there a commitment from this Solicitor General that there will be an interim report from the McDonald Commission which may be studied by the standing committee? There is no such commitment.

Is there any indication whatsoever that those 2,000 pages, produced at a cost of thousands or perhaps tens of thousands of dollars of taxpayers' money, will be before the standing committee? There is not one hint that the standing committee will have the benefit of the testimony given in those eight to ten days. There is not one indication that the standing committee will have any benefit whatsoever from that very important input so that it can deliberate wisely on this legislation. That is unacceptable, and it shows lack of integrity. During this second reading debate and in the committee the efforts of my party will be directed toward assuring that the standing committee becomes the beneficiary of the deliberations of the McDonald Commission.

The McDonald Commission itself is cynical. One commissioner is quoted as saying that this new legislation might be characterized by some as starting surgery before the diagnosis is completed. What does the Solicitor General say to that allegation? On the one hand he says that this is temporary or interim legislation. It is to end one year after the tabling of the final report of the McDonald Commission. This presumes that we will get a final report from that commission.

This bill takes the pressure off the McDonald Commission to be diligent in its efforts. It pre-empts the McDonald Commission. However, what the Solicitor General did not say is that this bill does not necessarily end one year after the tabling of that report. There is a very clear provision which, for some reason or other, the Solicitor General failed to mention, and that is that by joint resolution of both Houses the duration of this bill may be extended to any later date or, indeed, indefinitely. So on the one hand the Solicitor General tells this House that this is just temporary or interim legislation. On the other hand, this is what the same Solicitor General said in an interview with Standard Broadcast News on February 18, and I quote:

My information is that predecessors of mine had contemplated coming through with changes in legislation and this is the production or the emanation of a long process of analysis.

Imagine this long line of solicitors general contemplating, as they change with the seasons, one solicitor general after the other. Mr. Speaker, there was no time for contemplation. This unhappy parade of solicitors general was just like a group of punch drunk fighters ducking, bobbing and weaving—ducking their responsibilities, bobbing to avoid evidence of their incompetency and weaving a shroud of ignorance around themselves. These were the solicitors general who were contemplating and this is the legislation that is a production of this long process.

Let us go back to the interview, Mr. Speaker. On February 13, the Solicitor General went on to say:

The legislation relating to postal interception is really a sequence to the privacy legislation involving interception of communications.

The obvious question—and it was indeed put during the interview—is: What on earth is the possible position of the McDonald Commission in face of this legislation? The Solicitor General answered:

Well, I would hope that the decision we are making now would eventually be supported by the McDonald inquiry.

So much for the McDonald Commission as far as the Solicitor General is concerned. Others may agree—but they must be before the committee. If the Solicitor General is serious about this long process or about the integrity of the McDonald Commission, then why does he not give a commitment to ensure that the commission, its representatives, a summary of its evidence or an interim report is presented to the committee of this House that is studying this legislation?

That obviously brings up the next question, Mr. Speaker, which is one of timing. We can go back eight years to the Mackenzie Commission on security and the illegality of intercepting mail. The Mackenzie Commission report said:

. . . seems to us to provide an open invitation to hostile agents to make use of the mails for their secure communications. We believe that arrangements should be made . . . to permit the examination of the mail of persons suspected by the security authorities on reasonable grounds to be engaged in activities dangerous to the security of the state. However, any such examination should also be strictly controlled, and should require ministerial authorization in each instance.

That was eight years ago and that was not the first instance of a demand for legislation of this kind. At the McDonald Commission it was alleged that the RCMP had been asking for this authority since 1920. This allegation was not made by a member of the RCMP but by Mr. Howard, counsel for the McDonald Commission. An assistant commissioner of the RCMP could not confirm that it went back to 1920 but he could confirm that it went back at least to 1939. So what do we have? First, we have counsel for the McDonald Commission claiming that requests for this type of legislation dated back 58 years; second, we have confirmation from an RCMP assistant commissioner that requests go back at least 39 years; and third, we have the Mackenzie Royal Commission recommendation that is now nine years old.

In face of all this, what do we have? We have the then solicitor general in 1975, now the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Allmand), replying to questions put to him in this House about RCMP difficulties in dealing with narcotics traffickers because of the law prohibiting the opening of first class mail. On that day, July 23, 1975, the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) put the following question:

Does the minister not feel there should be an amendment to the effect that, while the privacy of the mail should be protected, this kind of traffic should not in any way be condoned by the failure of parliament to act?

The then solicitor general replied as follows:

Mr. Speaker, it is true that from to time the RCMP have indicated a concern over this. Sometimes they have felt that narcotics were being brought into the country in first class mail . . . in those cases they have dealt with the matter by following the mail to its source. But they have not made a big issue of it and as far as I know they have not recommended that we change the first class mail system. However, I will check with the force to find out what their exact recommendations are.

How typical that is of the ineptitude and incompetence of the series of solicitors general we have had. It is a perfect example of the incompetence of this parade of solicitors general.

Let us move now to the principal actor in this farce, the right hon. Prime Minister, that great pursuer of subversives, that great defender of law and order, that great enemy of the criminal and the subversive whose diligence in these matters increases in direct proportion to the proximity of a general election. The curtain lifts with the Prime Minister at centre stage at his press conference on November 18, when he said: we had caught a Japanese red army terrorist by opening his mail. Not by intercepting it, Mr. Speaker. The then solicitor general was very careful never to mention in this House that they had opened any mail, but merely intercepted it. Despite what the solicitor general told us earlier this evening, the truth was that the RCMP had indeed uncovered this terrorist—and they are to be commended—because they used legal and effective police methods that are their heritage and their tradition. I say again, they should be commended for it.

Let no one doubt, however, despite what the solicitor general told us this evening, what the evidence before the McDonald Commission clearly was. It was not about the opening and examination of the content of any mail. As far as I know, the only content of mail was an application to the University of Toronto and that had nothing to do with the uncovering and deportation of the Red Army terrorist. Yet the Prime Minister at the press conference said:

But when you catch a terrorist because you have opened an envelope, I don't think the bulk of the Canadian people would think that even if it was technically a crime, it would be something that should bring the RCMP people to jail.

What nonsense. What a disservice to the RCMP. How misleading to the country are statements such as that. That was not his best line on the subject, Mr. Speaker, and it was not his best line on that day. Listen to this one. It was a big moment. Referring to the opening of mail the Prime Minister of this country said:

If they can catch a terrorist or hijacker or kidnapper once out of five, to me that is a pretty good average.

There are two things in that statement. First, you open the mail to catch terrorists, hijackers and kidnappers; and second, one out of five, or 20 per cent, is a pretty good conviction rate.

Let us go to the first point, the Prime Minister's position that mail should be opened to catch hijackers, terrorists or kidnappers, and let us relate that to this bill. Terrorists may be caught because the Official Secrets Act is now applicable to the Post Office Act. I agree with the Prime Minister. But he did not say anything about drugs or about trading in narcotics or heroin, which is the subject matter of this bill. In terms of criminal activity there is not one word in this bill about hijackers or kidnappers. This bill, according to the solicitor general, is, and I quote:

. . . the production or the emanation of a long process of analysis and a sequel to the privacy legislation.

It has absolutely nothing to do with hijackers' activities. The only criminal offence dealt with, and indeed it is a very serious one, is drug trafficking. The privacy legislation deals with all kinds of serious offences—intimidation, forgery, hijacking, kidnapping, extortion, fraud on the public, use of the mails to defraud, fraudulent stock exchange transactions, murder. This is the production or emanation of a long process of analysis? Garbage.

What about letter bombs, Mr. Speaker? If a letter bomb was directed to a zealous Crown attorney in an attempt to assassinate him, there is nothing in this legislation to protect him. What about hardcore pornography which has been the subject matter of weeks and hours of study in this parliament by a very diligent committee? There is not one word about pornography. This is the emanation of a long process of analysis? The only criminal activity dealt with is drug trafficking. I agree with it.

The Solicitor General tonight talked about crimes attributed to the use of heroin and other drugs, prostitution, murder and the increase of known addicts since 1965. My question to him is, what has he been doing about it? He has known about it since 1965. What has he been doing? Nothing. Hon. members should check the amendments to see how much legislation has dealt with the fight or the war against hard drugs. What cowards this government has been in that war.

The inclusion of the provisions to open mail legally in an attempt to fight drug trafficking was probably a last minute idea of someone to give some popular appeal to this legislation. If I were cynical that is the only conclusion I could really draw. What is the distinction between those offences subject to legal interception by electronic means and those offences subject to legal interception by the opening of the mail?

Let me come to the Prime Minister's second point, Mr. Speaker. His target of 20 per cent, a one in five success rate, is not acceptable. It is not even high enough to be considered mediocre. With respect to activity against subversives, one does not look to arrest rates as a measurement of success. I acknowledge that. There is less stress on the need for convictions in anti-subversive activity. The concern is to safeguard the state and to keep it informed about the activities of those acting against its national security. There have been 65 openings of mail apparently since 1970. The only success trotted out by the Prime Minister and the Solicitor General is the Japanese Red Army terrorists. What a hollow example that has proved to be.

Let us look at the criminal side of things. Twenty per cent is ridiculously low in terms of an arrest rate. In a four-year period in the United Kingdom there was a 57 per cent arrest rate as a result of telephone taps alone. In terms of matters wherein there were major customs frauds, the interceptions resulted in an 80 per cent arrest rate. But to the Prime Minister one in five, a 20 per cent rate, is good. I ask the Solicitor General to consider most seriously, with respect to criminal activities that the government include a provision that there be a good reason, not a probability, to conclude that an interception of mail would result in an arrest.

Moving on to the security side of things, the Post Office Act is now subject to the provisions of the Official Secrets Act. Providing this legislation is successfully concluded, mail may be opened legally to prevent or to detect subversive activity. We support that. The Official Secrets Act is not being amended. We may not debate it. There is no opportunity to review its provisions or to discuss them. Many Canadians and many of my colleagues in this House are concerned about vagueness in the bill. Many think there should be a review. The Solicitor General laughs, sir. I do not think there is anything funny about the Official Secrets Act. I think it is a very serious matter. I dare say that the committee might think it is serious in spite of, not because of, the Solicitor General. But with this government everything is secret.

That act gives sole discretion to the Solicitor General and inevitably it will lead to suspicion. The mere fact that the Solicitor General is a politician may lead to suspicion. The report to parliament is one page long. There is no provision in the Official Secrets Act that mail opening is not to become a routine matter. Therefore, in addition to suggesting that there should be a review of the Official Secrets Act, my main concern is this. Given a situation where everything is up to the Solicitor General's discretion, who is watching the Solicitor General? No one that I know of in this House wants to become privy to genuinely secret material, but our experience with this unhappy parade of solicitors general is that they have never taken to inform themselves. Why, sir? Because of the Prime Minister's extraordinary doctrine of ministerial irresponsibility; and secondly, because no one was watching the solicitor general. He was accountable to no one and is accountable to no one under the Official Secrets Act.

There are a host of other questions to be asked and the proper forum is in the standing committee. One may ask why are telegrams and cables not dealt with? One might ask who are the Solicitor General's agents authorized to apply for mail opening warrants? Are they the provincial attorneys general? Are they all police officers? What will the monitoring system be? Monthly, quarterly, yearly? There is no indication. How many people will have access to this confidential information? There is a factor here, sir. Those 58 reports floating around Ottawa were not seen by 58 people. One has to multiply 58 by a factor, the factor being the number of pairs of eyes that have had access to those documents. What will the access to this material be? Will there be specific reports of interception of the mail to and from lawyers, their families, their employees and associates? No provision is made for that. Why not separate warrants for each individual whose mail is to be opened? Is there to be a uniform and elaborate system for keeping records? These are questions that should be properly dealt with in the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

In the last parliament, the twenty-ninth parliament, a similar matter, the Protection of Privacy Act, went to that committee. The resulting legislation was good legislation as a result of the evidence adduced before it and the diligence and integrity of the members who contributed to the hearings of that committee. One must hope this legislation will achieve the same result.

In conclusion, I repeat again that we support in principle the legal interception of mail in special and specified circumstances provided there are adequate safeguards and provided also that the usual and customary methods of law enforcement have proved ineffective. In supporting it, I say to the Solicitor General that he and the government he represents have sorely tested—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Jarvis: The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) has appeared late on the scene. I would not expect him to be cynical and suspicious in the face of this legislation. His insensitivity to that portfolio of government that demands sensitivity, that of the Solicitor General, is a fact of life far beyond the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. He has proved that time and time again.

I say to the Solicitor General through you, sir, that he has sorely tested the Canadian people. Because this legislation has been brought forward in an atmosphere of cynicism and suspicion and the fault lies only with this Solicitor General and this government.

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I listened most carefully to the remarks of my good friend from Perth-Wilmot (Mr. Jarvis). Without any doubt he is becoming the Cicero of the Conservative party.

Mr. Friesen: We have Cicero, you have the sissies.

Mr. Leggatt: Someone says that they have the Cicero and we have the sissies. We will see how they vote on the bill. Then we will know who has the Cicero and who the sissies.

If I had any doubt whatsoever, the eloquence of the honourable member for Perth-Wilmot convinced me with regard to the right course of action to take in connection with this legislation. I hope it has convinced a few people on the other side of the House, because I understand there are a number on the government side who not only have severe reservations but may very well vote against the legislation. The reasons advanced by the honourable member for Perth-Wilmot are excellent reasons, not for supporting this bill in principle, but for voting against this bill in principle and voting against it on second reading.

Any fair examination of the record to date—and we heard the record read to us eloquently by the hon. member I referred to—clearly shows that if there is a danger in the legislation, it is to advance any further discretion to the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais). That is exactly what this bill does.

I want to commence my remarks by reading an editorial from the Globe and Mail which sums up the position that responsible members of this House must take. It is their editorial of January 30, 1978. I quote:

> The interception of private mail by the police is threatening, not because we ourselves may fear the opening of our own mail, but because it is threatening in principle. The police have as great a duty to obey the law as has any private citizen. The law binds all men. This principle can be circumvented—but it cannot be obscured—by the granting of special legal privileges to the police. Such privileges exist, but they have a tentative existence; they cannot be granted wholesale or be permitted to take root. A privilege granted one day can far too easily be perceived the next day as a duty.

That has been the history of all the legislation passed in this House since I have come here. I refer to the electronics legislation and what we now have before us, the mail legislation. We have heard the argument about the Red terrorists captured allegedly as a result of opening the mail. The popular little number of narcotics has been specifically placed in the bill to catch the public eye and public support. As a result of this, we know that this bill is the most politically inspired piece of legislation to come forward in this session of parliament.

This bill is not designed to catch narcotics traffickers, but to delude the public and get a few extra votes. It will not do that. We are not going to let the cynicism and dishonesty of this government, in particular the cynicism of the Solicitor General, obscure the real reasons for this bill and the effect it will have.

We are not purists. In proper circumstances and at appropriate times it is not wrong for the mail to be opened with regard to certain specific offences, but only under circumstances where permission is granted by judicial warrant, where the person is specified and the particular piece of mail is specified. However, what we have before us is a shotgun approach to the subject of mail opening.

Were it only those provisions which dealt with specific offences under the Code, such as narcotics and food and drug control, and included were the protections of civil liberties, the notification of the individual, the judicial warrant and the specificity which is absent in the bill, I could agree with the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot that the bill could merit support in principle. However, that is not what we have before us.

The smallest clause in the bill is the most dangerous. If you read the bill quickly, you might miss it. I refer to Section 43 of the Post Office Act, printed on page 17 of the bill. It reads:

> Notwithstanding anything in any other Act or law, nothing is liable to demand, seizure or detention while in the course of post except under the authority of a warrant issued pursuant to section 16 of the Official Secrets Act—

If you kept reading, you might miss something. You have to look at the Official Secrets Act to understand what that really means. Under the section referred to the in the Official Secrets Act, the Solicitor General of Canada may issue a warrant authorizing the interception or seizure of any communication for the prevention or detection of subversive activity. The bill goes on to define subversive activity. This is important. Subclause (c) reads:

> —activities directed toward accomplishing governmental change within Canada or elsewhere by force or violence or any criminal means:

I emphasize "or any criminal means". This legislation gives to the Solicitor General an unbridled discretion to issue a warrant in determining which group he considers to be subversive, and any group can be subversive if they are suspected of using any criminal means.

● (2122)

Let me give the Solicitor General some examples of groups which could now become subject to the opening of mail at the hon. gentleman's discretion—and I am sure he will use that discretion in the broadest way he can, to judge by his record to date. Take, for example, one group which appears to be unpopular at the moment, the Greenpeace organization. The government recently made it an offence for anyone to go on the ice within half a mile of the seal herd. To do so carries a penalty under the criminal law. It would probably be a popular thing for the minister in present circumstances to issue warrants permitting all the mail of Greenpeace to be opened. That is just one example. I could mention many other groups, native groups, anti-poverty groups and so on.

In order to protect freedom, Mr. Speaker, you have to protect unpopular groups from attack by governments, and this bill is clearly an attack on the capacity of such groups to function in a normal political way.

Mr. Blais: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Gilbert: When he is finished.

Mr. Leggatt: I see the Solicitor General rising in his place. No doubt he wants to protest that the bill does not say this, or else he wants to claim that he would not exercise his discretion against such organizations.

Mr. Blais: Read section 16(2) of the Official Secrets Act.

Mr. Leggatt: That is what I am reading from. I would direct the Solicitor General to that section and ask him to read it and check the record of the government in applying the laws which parliament in its wisdom has passed. Surely the mail opening operation "Cathedral" is a classic example of the abuse of power by either the government or the police, or both combination. Yet today we are being asked to confirm the illegalities which took place and, in effect, to congratulate those who decided to break the law.

The section dealing with the Official Secrets Act is one of the most heinous pieces of legislation and one of the most severe violations of the liberties we have a right to expect as Canadians that I have seen come before the House since taking my seat here in 1972. I expect that in another five years we shall see members jumping up and apologizing because they have voted in favour of the mail bill. But by then it will be too late. The time to oppose this bill is now, not when our liberties have been lost.

We have heard some interesting argument as to the amount of evidence which has been before the McDonald Commission and the Keable Inquiry. The Solicitor General had something quite interesting to say about that. When some bright press reporter suggested this bill was premature, he defended it by saying—and I am quoting from the Vancouver Sun of February 18, 1978:

> Governments can't stop operating and can't stop taking executive decisions because commissions are sitting.

I put it to the Solicitor General that when opposition members asked questions about what was going on before those commissions, the government ceased to function. It ceased to answer questions. It did absolutely nothing except stonewall the opposition. But when people suggest the minister should wait and see what Mr. McDonald recommends, we get the answer that the government cannot cease operating. It is a cynical, blatant, dishonest grab for votes, that is what it is, and it is not going to catch a single drug trafficker.

Look at the record on drug trafficking. There are many things the government could have done. There are many things it could do. One of them would be to institute a decent compulsory treatment program for heroin addicts. Another would be to set up registration procedures along lines which have been so successful around the world. But what has been the response of the government? It is: Let's open their mail!

Mr. Benjamin: Very therapeutic!

Mr. Leggatt: I would be happy to put my seat on the line on the basis that the Solicitor General confirm that he is able to cut 10 per cent of the addiction in British Columbia as a result of opening mail. I do not think he can reduce any of the addiction by opening mail. What a silly argument in justification of this bill. That is why the comments of the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot were so apropos when he noted that the section applied only to narcotics, to drug addiction and that other offences such as kidnapping, murder and conspiracy to murder, rape and certain other offences under the Code did not appeal to the Solicitor General. No, this sounded like the one which would catch the eye of the public, the one he could cash in on best at election time.

We have come a long way in this country from the tradition of the liberty of the subject, from the concept that in a free society there should be some right to privacy somewhere. It is pretty well established that our telephone communications are not likely to be private, and now the Solicitor General is moving into the area of the mails.

I do not know whether the hon. gentleman really understands what he is doing. I say this to members of the government: if you keep this up, you will change the whole character of the country; you will change the traditions which people have for so long enjoyed in western society. This is a dangerous government, Mr. Speaker. It is a dangerous government and a desperate government which would take this particular measure as a quick vote-getting gimmick to try to perpetuate itself in office. I do not believe the people of Canada will fall for this legislation. I believe they will see it for what it is, phony from the word "Go". I hate to try to give lessons to an eminent lawyer like the Solicitor General on the subject of the rule of law—

Mr. Benjamin: I would not hire him, especially if I were innocent!

Mr. Leggatt: —but those of us who have had a little training in the law ought, perhaps, to return to law school again to study that principle, that the rule of law is for you and for me and for the police and for everyone. But when the police violate the law, as they have done with regard to mail in a massive way, not a single charge is laid against them.

I am not suggesting those police officers should go to jail. What I am suggesting is that the law should apply to all of us equally. To react to a fairly massive violation of the privacy of the mail with a bill to legalize it gives us on this side a good understanding of where the sensibilities of the Solicitor General lie on the subject of the rule of law. The difficulty for the present Solicitor General, as for his two predecessors in office, lies in his inability to distinguish between the interest of the Liberal party and the interest of Canada. They think they are one and the same. They have been in office so long it has now become impossible for them to distinguish between those two things. But they are different. They are very different. We are again about to embark upon a serious erosion of the rights we have come to enjoy because of tough forebears, including those who went out in world war two and died on the beaches of Dieppe to maintain freedom in Canada. I am sick and tired of watching this government squander these rights and freedoms every time it thinks it can get a quick vote through a piece of legislation.

How many convictions have we seen as a result of the opening of mail, based on the evidence before the Keable or McDonald inquiries? I suggest we have seen none, as far as I know, and that is on 65 openings. There have been many more openings and there may have been the odd conviction, but we do not know. However, does that justify this piece of legislation which will mean that a wide cross section of people will have their mail opened? I think not.

We are entering a dangerous period in our history. If we had any reservations about whether the Solicitor General should have discretion under the Official Secrets Act, and how the Solicitor General and the government should act, surely these reservations were resolved by the evidence before the Keable Inquiry.

The evidence before that inquiry was that on January 9, 1973 an illegal break in of the PQ was inspired, not by the RCMP, but by the Privy Council office. One Liberal government decided to attack a Liberal opposition in the province of Quebec and use the full force of the law in order to do it. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, would you trust a government or a Solicitor General like this with the discretion to determine which groups of Canadians shall be subject to having their mail opened? That is what we are being asked to do in this bill.

We have evidence that the New Democratic Party of British Columbia was placed under surveillance by an RCMP agent. I do not know whether there was any involvement of the government or the Solicitor General, and we may not know unless there is an inquiry into that. How far can we trust a government and how far can we trust a solicitor general with that lack of sensitivity about what is dissent and what is subversion? This is a government that is ready to attack any person or organization that attacks it, and to use the full force of the law in order to do so. For us in this House to sit here and reward that kind of government with this kind of legislation is unthinkable.

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, first I must thank the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) who has made a stirring plea against the bill, and the spokesman for the Progressive Conservatives who delivered a masterly speech against the bill. I do not know but I think his thoughts were stronger than his voice since he ended his comments by saying he was going to support the bill.

Mr. Speaker, Bill C-26 now under consideration is aimed at giving additional powers to the Solicitor General and the police to enable them to control drug traffic and subversive activities but at the same time, Mr. Speaker, it seriously infringes on one of the last strongholds of our civil liberties, that is the secrecy of mail. Through that bill, the government wants to legalize quickly what the RCMP has been doing for more than 40 years, that is to intercept and open the mail of individuals. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) made a statement last month which I translated from English to French and which was reported in the February 11 issue of the Montreal Star. May I be allowed to quote his statement: Like several ministers, I was not aware that illegal activities had occurred. Now we want to make them legal. He was referring of course to mail opening.

Mr. Speaker, those stories are hard to swallow. Indeed, for more than forty years the police have been illegally opening the mail of individuals and yet government authorities have the gall to say they were not aware of that kind of crime. What is to be concluded? I leave it to every knowledgeable Canadian to draw his or her own conclusion.

I would like to point out to the House that in addition to attempting to legalize a practice which already exists, no other argument or justification has been offered to us by the government. What evidence justifies the need for such powers, even if they are subject to controls? Legislation such as Bill C-26 can easily snowball and open the door to other intrusions on our basic liberties and rights.

It is reassuring, Mr. Speaker, to see that as concerns narcotics and drugs, the legislation leaves it to the judiciary to issue warrants to intercept mail on the understanding that the RCMP must have documented proof to convince the judge of the need for such police action. However, these guarantees become void in cases where the RCMP would require a warrant urgently.

Clause 178.28(2) of this bill reads as follows:

(2) Where the judge to whom an application is made pursuant to subsection (1) is satisfied that the urgency of the situation requires that interception or seizure of matter in the course of post commence before a warrant could, with reasonable diligence, be obtained under section 178.25, he may, on such terms and conditions, if any, as he considers advisable, issue a warrant in writing for a period of up to thirty-six hours.

This clause would allow the RCMP to obtain a warrant immediately without further ado. Why such a provision? We all know that drug trafficking by mail is only done on a small scale and most often in isolated cases. The RCMP itself often mentions the example of drugs sent to convicts. It seems to me that traffickers know safer and certainly quicker means than the Canadian mails to distribute their goods, since we all know that the postal service is very slow, as can vouch the unemployed who have not received their cheques these last few weeks. Moreover, the Post Office Act and the Narcotic Control Act already contain provisions in this regard. As concerns national security and subversive activities, which are the major concerns of the government, the Solicitor General would have all the authority needed without having to resort to the judiciary. The concept of national security may well become ambiguous. The Keable and McDonald inquiries have indeed shown repeatedly that the RCMP's judgment could sometimes be rather faltering. In view of the constant refusal on the part of the Solicitor General to hand over documents to the commissions I have just mentioned, we have no access to a fair and objective review of the government's actions even if in the case of the warrants issued by the courts, the Solicitor General will have to submit a detailed report as mentioned in clause 178, paragraph 34 and that, only at the end of each year.

How shall we know if the government is not abusing all the privileges vested upon it by the act? Will an eventual weak government use it in the future to spy on honest people who have every right to the confidential character of their mail? Many people will tell you that we are one of the rare countries in the world where there mail interception has not yet been made legal. This is precisely one of the reasons why we are rather reluctant to give these powers to the government and this is why this act is no matter for rejoicing.

Not having any forceful arguments to offer this House, the government is introducing this bill as temporary. Yet, in the past, interim bills have had a distinct tendency to become permanent. This is what gives me reason to doubt that the government will repeal this act, whatever the recommendations of the McDonald Commission report may be.

Allow me, Mr. Speaker, to quote from an article published in the Edmonton Journal on February 13 which stated the following:

> The act regarding electronic surveillance passed in 1974 limited the scope of these operations to inquiries on specific crimes. These operations were limited to a 30 day period and the individual concerned had to be notified after 90 days. Some four years later, the list of crimes was extended, electronic surveillance was authorized for periods of up to 90 days, permission was granted to delay the notification for up to three years and evidence based on illegal eavesdropping was made admissible in court. Now the government intends to extend these powers to mail opening. Can we ask ourselves how long it will take before the restrictions set on mail opening also disappear?

Already the bill we have before us even goes a bit further and gives the judge the right to extend the warrants upon request from the Solicitor General, for a period of up to three years. Mr. Speaker, when in front of such a bill the government can't manage to bring forth any convincing argument, and above all, when it does not seek alternative solutions, Canadians, through their representatives, have the right to ask for iron-clad guarantees. Yet such guarantees are virtually non-existent in Bill C-26. This bill is also untimely because the McDonald Commission is presently studying that issue and should make a report on it. This bill is also arbitrary in giving so much power to policemen and the Solicitor General without too many guarantees for individuals.

To legalize the opening of mail is to take away from the citizens of a community one of the only forms of communication that still come under the seal of confidentiality. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to this bill in its present form, mainly because it does not provide adequate guarantees. Mail being the last bastion of our privacy we are rightly entitled to ask ourselves what will be the next step.

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to support Bill C-26 introduced by the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais), an Act to amend the Criminal Code, the Crown Liability Act and the Post Office Act. I will try to do so in the simplest, most logical, passionless way because this bill is too important to be used as a political instrument. That is why I would like to deal with Bill C-26 introduced today for second reading. The purpose of this bill is to give, under certain conditions, law enforcement agencies the right to open first class mail when they have reason to believe that this would help the authorities to prevent criminal acts or apprehend their perpetrators.

Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to regulate freedom without eliminating it and to help neutralize certain elements whose objective seems to be to create disorder.

[English]

I am new to the Postmaster General's portfolio, but as a former mayor of Quebec City for 12 years I am not new to what constitutes sound government in the context of law and objections by the civil liberties group notwithstanding. I believe that Bill C-26 is a wise and necessary bill, and it will serve the best interests of the people of Canada as a whole. Furthermore, I am convinced that the built-in safeguards contained in the bill eliminate any perceived or imagined threats to the vast majority of law-abiding citizens who use the mails.

When meeting people, I am often asked: Is this bill really necessary? If it becomes law, what will it accomplish? All I can say is that if the legal opening of only one letter prevents only one serious crime against the state or an individual, it will have justified its existence on the statute books. If it prevents only one person from being drawn into the clutches of those who undermine the stability of our society by the veil of trafficking in drugs that is so widespread today, it will have served its purpose.

[Translation]

In the 12 years during which I was the mayor of Quebec City, I saw perhaps more than anyone else the dangers relating to drug trafficking, the international ramifications of which are facilitated in this country by the maritime and air routes converging particularly toward Montreal and Vancouver.

[English]

Bill C-26 is designed, among other things, to make this drug trafficking a lot less profitable, and certainly a lot more dangerous than it is now for drug peddlers. Also, with a bill directed only at those who oppose the forces of law and order in Canada, what does an honest person have to fear? To think his or her letters to friends and family will be scrutinized by the police is just nonsense.

I should like to refer, in addition, to the illegal narcotics trade, to aeroplane highjackings, bombings, assassinations, civil insurrection, and so on. These things could happen. Let us not be too naive. Why not prevent them now? This bill might help.

[Translation]

One must confess, Mr. Speaker, that we in Canada have been privileged with respect to criminal acts. Perhaps because of this privileged situation some Canadians could hesitate to give their support to this legislation but one should not be naive to the point of being led to believe that subversive or revolutionary forces have never been or are not at work to undermine or overthrow the democratic system in Canada or still that some criminals are not taking advantage of the great freedoms that exist in Canada.

[English]

Think about it seriously, Mr. Speaker. Is there any law-abiding citizen of Canada who would seriously argue that these dangers should be allowed to exist on the grounds that a first class letter must, under all and any circumstances, be protected by a seal of inviolable privacy? I cannot believe so, especially if the contents were known to the police. The danger I have just mentioned could be swiftly countered.

Canada is one of the only countries in the world, if not the only one, where a person is guilty of an offence any person who—and this also applies to the highest authorities—plunders, tampers, intercepts mail. This has provided criminals, and more particularly drug traffickers, with an impenetrable screen of protection, allowing them to use the mails as a messenger service without any fear of ever being caught. In Canada, at the present time, drug trafficking is done largely through the mails. One ounce of heroin is worth $2,000 and is easily hidden in an envelope.

Is there need to list all the terrible cases of drug victims? How many lives, reputations, fortunes, families have been destroyed by the evil of drugs. Hundreds! And some people would hesitate to give the police a minimum of discretion to fight those unscrupulous drug traffickers and to protect thousands of young Canadians against the pushers who only want to make a fast buck. All you need to do is to ask a city policeman to accompany him on his rounds on a weekend. You would realize that very often, the policeman is quite powerless because of laws which, in many cases, give much more leeway to the criminal than to the peace officer. Yet some are shocked by a legislation which makes it legal, under specific and closely controlled conditions, to open mail when there are reasons to believe that someone is going to commit a criminal offence or endanger the security of the state! Unthinkable!

Granted, there have been some allegations to the effect that the RCMP, albeit with the highest of motives, has for some time opened letters either being sent or received by persons suspected of criminal or subversive activities: but as far as the public, both law abiding and criminal, has been concerned, the mail system in Canada was safe from prying eyes, is safe and will be safe.

In Canada we already have legal search and wiretapping legislation. I doubt if any reasonable person would contend that the police forces in Canada should be deprived of the right to obtain warrants to search premises where there is good reason to suspect that criminal activities are taking place, or where stolen goods, arms, or ammunition are being stored. Search warrants and legal wiretapping have thus become a perfectly acceptable arm of law enforcement in this country as far as the vast majority of Canadians are concerned.

The search through a person's home or office constitutes, in the strictest sense of the word, an invasion of privacy. Electronic surveillance of telephone conversations is also an invasion of privacy. Yet these two activities are now considered by most people, and with very good reasons, as necessary means to safeguard law and order in Canada.

Why is it, therefore, that the mail of criminals or saboteurs is so sacred that it precludes any surveillance aimed at enforcing the law?

[English]

I referred earlier to the built-in safeguards of Bill C-26. I think it is a wise and necessary bill, but I wish to be perfectly clear on one important point, and that is that the bill will not permit the indiscriminate opening of first class mail.

[Translation]

I mentioned a while ago the safeguards which are part and parcel of this bill: the opening of the mail will have to be authorized by a warrant from a judge. The judge will ascertain what exactly the police are looking for and why the particular piece of mail has to be opened. This is a wise and necessary bill which determines under what conditions mail may be opened.

[English]

It is important to understand that mail opening will have to be authorized by a warrant from a judge, that there will have to be an inquiry to ascertain exactly what the police are looking for, what they want, and why it is necessary that the letter or letters in question should be opened.

Bill C-26 seeks to ensure that the best interests of the country can be served legally, and not under the cover of some clandestine operation. The opening of mail would be subject in principle to the same legislation as that governing wiretapping. I have heard of no abuses on that score. I expect none in the opening of mail. Anyway, it will be the responsibility of the government to ensure that there will be no abuses, although it is my opinion that the way the bill is worded, none would be possible if all its provisions are strictly adhered to.

In the case of wiretapping, the person whose phone has been tapped must be so informed within 90 days. Similar provisions are contained in the bill to legalize the opening by police of first class mail. Thus, this exercise would not be carried out under an all-embracing cloak of secrecy. Where longer term surveillance than 90 days in deemed advisable, such extension may be obtained only on the presentation to a judge of an application personally signed by the Solicitor General of Canada.

[Translation]

One more thing in conclusion: Bill C-26 is only temporary. It will cease to be in force one year after the tabling in the House of the final report prepared by the commissioners appointed under Part I of the Inquiries Act, better known as the McDonald Royal Commission. In the course of that year, the House may consider the possibility of maintaining, amending or replacing the legislation.

In my opinion, this legislation is necessary and important. Moreover, I believe most Canadians, if they are well informed on the matter, will themselves also find it important and necessary for the protection of their liberty against every kind of abuses. For all those reasons, Mr. Speaker, I hope this legislation will be adopted by all parties as quickly as possible.

[English]

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, before I begin my comments on Bill C-26, I would like to take the opportunity to commend the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot (Mr. Jarvis) on the manner in which he represented our party in opening the debate. The reason I say that is that in the period of time I have been here I have heard many fine presentations and lively debates, but this subject matter goes very deeply into the depth of the Canadian soul, and the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot achieved a fine balance in his presentation. The sincerity with which he presented the case was recognized by every member of the House, and tonight I felt honoured to be a colleague of his.

The opening of mail has been going on for some time. What we are doing in this bill is to make legal that which has been done illegally before. The atmosphere in which this bill is being debated is one of suspicion on the part of many Canadians and members of the opposition of the motives of this government. The reason I say that is that in the decade that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has been leader of this government, he has acquired the reputation throughout Canada of being soft on law and order. Regardless of where I go, when I speak to colleagues of mine I find they get the same feedback, that Canadians feel the Prime Minister has been soft on those who break our laws. In fact this is a permissive society, and the Prime Minister has been in the vanguard in the creation of our permissive society. The blame for a great part of the difficulties which our society is experiencing today, the pervading cynicism and the disregard for law and order, must be placed at the doorstep of the Prime Minister. It is in that atmosphere, including the events of the last six months, that this bill is now debated.

May I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

[Mr. Lamontagne.]

ENERGY—SMOKE DETECTION DEVICES—EFFECT OF RADIOACTIVE MATERIAL THEREIN

Hon. Martin O'Connell (Scarborough East): Mr. Speaker, I want to raise two matters concerning smoke detectors used in homes. The first is an appeal to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) to remove the 5 per cent federal sales tax valued at about $1 for each detector sold. The second is to raise concerns about the adequacy of the information and warnings given to home owners with respect to detectors that use small amounts of radioactive material for their operation.

Smoke detectors should be encouraged for every home. I back the use of smoke detectors. They are not unreasonably priced. They are lifesaving devices. They give early warning of smoke or fire. Indeed, they are mandatory under the national building code for new housing, and some municipal jurisdictions are considering making them mandatory in all existing housing. I am informed that the Ontario government makes smoke detectors and fire detectors mandatory in all Ontario housing for families and senior citizens across the province. The housing minister for Ontario has reported that of 64 fires in Ontario Housing Corporation units smoke detectors gave the initial warning in 54 cases, or over 80 per cent of the situations. He estimates that they possibly saved lives in 24 fires. Hundreds of thousands of smoke detectors are now in use, and I support the initiatives which have been taken so far.

I believe the federal government should now associate itself with this means of lifesaving and property saving by withdrawing its 5 per cent federal sales tax. This is what was asked for, for example, by Mr. Norman Rockall, a public spirited resident of Scarborough, who is leading a drive to have detectors installed in all Metro homes and, indeed, across Canada. Removing the federal sales tax is something the Government of Canada can do to match the fact that new federally assisted housing units must be protected by these devices. I made this request to the Minister of Finance in a letter dated February 7. I have also asked the province of Ontario to consider removing its provincial sales tax of 7 per cent levied on the retailed price, and valued at about $2.50 or $3 for an average unit. I hope my hon. colleagues will support these endeavours.

The second matter is the question of information concerning the safety of the popular ionization type detector. This ionization type, which is one of several, uses Americium 241, a highly active radioactive material which is part of the waste product from the nuclear cycle. Americium 241 is used in quantities so small as to constitute virtually no hazard, according to the Atomic Energy Control Board of Canada, which is the regulatory body. The hazard is no greater, for example, than that associated with a television set.

My research on the subject with the Atomic Energy Control Board somewhat re-assures me that in Canada, in contrast with the situation in the United States, all purchasers must be given warning of the presence of radioactive material and that they are also given some minimum instructions for disposal of used detectors. My concern, however, is about the inadequacy of consumer education provided in this situation, the inadequacy of the information given at the point of purchase and the inadequate instructions concerning disposal.

This is the warning I found on the inside of a model I recently examined, and I quote:

Caution: Radioactive material,
0.9 microcuries Americium 241. Disposal by return to supplier or as directed by the Atomic Energy Control Board, Ottawa.

A notice like this raises as many questions as answers, and I was therefore pleased that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie), in response to my question in the House last week, agreed to cause a review of AECB regulations relating to smoke detectors.

Here are some of the questions I think need answering: First, why are commercial procedures dealing with the use of ionization type detectors more rigorous than in the case of homes? Why must each commercial installation be approved and the facilities licensed?

● (2207)

Second, now that the radiation health protection branch of the Department of National Health and Welfare no longer tests prototypes of home models pending the function being transferred to the Atomic Energy Control Board under new legislation, who is testing models for safety under all conditions?

Third, what tests have been done in Canada with the ionization models, under conditions of fire?

Fourth, what right, if any, does a supplier or retail store have to refuse to accept a detector for disposal if it is returned to the supplier for that purpose? Can the supplier charge the home owner for disposal? What instructions have suppliers been given re disposal procedures?

Fifth, what guidance does AECB, in fact, give home owners who ask for directions for disposal purposes? What is the cost, if any, for disposal through the AECB?

Sixth, where, in fact, are used smoke detectors disposed of in Canada, if and when disposal directions are followed?

Finally, why is the caution sign placed inside the detector case or housing? Should it not be a requirement that the caution be put on the outside so it can be seen at the point of purchase, thus allowing the customer to make a choice among models? Should the caution not also be placed inside—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired.

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity of responding to the hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. O'Connell), who has shown a great interest in this subject and considerable concern. I am not sure that in the short time I have this evening I will be able to answer all the questions he has put before us. If I cannot cover them all I can assure him that my department will be very pleased to provide the answers to anything that I do not cover this evening.

The inspection, labelling and disposal of ionization-type smoke detectors has been reviewed with the responsible authority, the Atomic Energy Control Board, which regulates these devices under the terms of the Atomic Energy Control Act and regulations as regards prescribed substances. The purpose of the legislation and the board's work is the protection of the health and safety of the public.

The criteria with respect to the minute quantities of radioactive material included in smoke detectors manufactured or imported and sold in Canada cover normal operations as well as abnormal circumstances. A simple example of this is that, in order to minimize the chance of access to the tiny radioactive source they contain, the devices must be resistant to tampering with ordinary household tools. Perhaps that helps to answer one of the hon. member's questions.

Ionization-type smoke detectors are regulated through the AECB's radioisotope licensing process, which ensures that all criteria are met. I realize how little time I have, Mr. Speaker, but perhaps I could go on to say that with regard to labelling a radiation warning label is required to be fixed to the protective housing for the minute radioactive source within this type of smoke detector. This is to indicate to anyone who sees it that penetration of the labelled barrier would result in close proximity to radioactive material. I have been assured that there is no health hazard.

From the point of view of public health and safety there should be no concern whatsoever as there is no significant hazard from AECB approved smoke detectors. However, it may be appropriate that external labelling is worth considering from the standpoint of accurate and fair marketing practices, in the interests of informing the consumer at the point of purchase and at the time of purchase. This would be a matter for consideration by the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and was referred to in my answer to the hon. member in the House very recently when I said I would raise this matter with my colleague—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. minister but his allotted time has expired.

INDUSTRY—PLASTICS—SUGGESTION INDUSTRY BE EXEMPTED FROM TARIFF CUTS

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Mr. Speaker, on December 8 last I asked a question of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) concerning the GATT negotiations that are currently in progress in Geneva, Switzerland. Specifically, I asked the minister if he would seek an exemption for Canada's plastics industry from the general reduction in tariffs being sought by some GATT member countries.

The minister replied that Canada hopes to deal on a sector basis with non-ferrous metals at the meetings, and he said that that might well include plastics. Obviously, Mr. Speaker, the minister's answer was not good enough. Given the delicate balance in our plastics industry and the fact that time is running out on the GATT talks, we can only trust that it is not too late for the government to make a more positive effort in this area.

The inclusion by the minister of the words "hope" and "might" in his reply only reinforces the fears in our plastics industry that the government is not pressing their case forcefully enough in Geneva. Their fears are well founded, Mr. Speaker. If certain GATT member countries get their way and the tariffs on manufactured plastic products are removed or even reduced by as much as 25 per cent, the Canadian plastics industry will be forced out of both the international and domestic markets. Not only will they become non-competitive in the world marketplace for plastic products, but countries like the United States will be able to sell their products in Canada at a cheaper price than we would be able to produce the same articles.

It must be remembered that Canada imports more manufactured plastic products per capita than any other country in the world. We import more than the United States, which has ten times our population. We are trying to overcome that imbalance in plastics products trade, but we need more time.

When Canada first ventured into the plastics industry we had to import virtually our entire requirement for raw plastics from the United States. These raw plastics included polypropylene, polystyrene and polyethylene. When I first spoke out on this problem in December 1973, Canada produced only a fraction of our needs for these raw plastics, and we did not produce any polypropylene at all. In 1973 we imported more than 70 million pounds of that particular plastic.

Our main problem is that raw plastics are a by-product of the petrochemical industry, and we in Canada do not have a petrochemical industry of any real consequence. So we lose on two counts. We lose the jobs which would be created by such an industry, and we lose the opportunity to manufacture our own needs in raw plastics. In short, Mr. Speaker, right now our plastics industry is at the mercy of countries that do have a petrochemical industry sufficient for their own needs and are also able to export the product.

We have been caught on a third count, Mr. Speaker. When the demand for plastic products began to skyrocket a few years ago, the cost of raw plastics also experienced a rise. In 1973 the cost to our manufacturers of U.S.-produced plastics rose by as much as 40 per cent, and it has continued to rise since that time. Here again, Mr. Speaker, we are trying to offset that by expanding our petrochemical industry, but it will be several years before it will come close to meeting our demands for plastic.

To give some idea of the importance of our plastic industry, Mr. Speaker, there are over 1,400 plastics processors in Canada, with plants in 125 federal ridings, and employing over 45,000 people. Capital investment in the plastics industry in Canada is in excess of $3 billion. Three billion more dollars are being invested which will double our processing capacity and create more than 25,000 high quality jobs.

[Mr. Scott.]

It must not be overlooked, Mr. Speaker, that many other industries hiring many thousands of people depend to some extent on the plastics industry. These jobs, both the direct employment in the plastics industry and the indirect employment in other industries, are in grave peril unless Canada can convince our GATT partners that the tariffs must remain in place for the plastics trade at least for a few more years.

• (2217)

Mr. Bernard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the government is very sensitive to the claims of the hon. member. However, certain specific details should be given with regard to the plastics industry. The plastic goods consumption in Canada covers a vast array of goods and materials, which follow fairly closely the trends registered in the United States.

Because it is not profitable to produce a large number of materials from plastics, and other products, consumption being limited, it is no wonder plastic imports can represent as much as 25 per cent of the Canadian demand. However, Canadian exports amount to about 10 per cent of the local consumption. The industry is at a disadvantage with regard to exports and the competition from imports, because there is an insufficient supply of plastics in Canada; in addition, the cost of components is high as tariffs apply to most of them; and finally, because of the limited production of each article as the demand is poor for most of those goods. Those problems could be solved largely by establishing important new plastics ring plants in Canada, by access to foreign markets, and by increased productivity through greater production.

The government is working in conjunction with the industry itself on those three points, precisely to find favourable solutions. As for the GATT negotiations, the numerous representations made by the industry and individual companies have contributed much by giving the government all the available information on the problems and the possibilities for the industry that could stem from multilateral trade negotiations.

However, it would be contrary to the public interest to divulge the details of the Canadian position at those negotiations.

TRANSPORT—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO REDUCE AIRLINE DISASTERS

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, when speaking yesterday on Bill C-4,to amend the Aeronautics Act, I pointed out that flight engineers on Boeing 727 aircraft in Canada were not properly licensed by the Ministry of Transport. A Government of Canada memorandum, signed by the acting regional controller, civil aviation, to the director general of civil aviation in Ottawa, points out and I quote:

—I have no alternative but to assume that Air Canada's Boeing B-727 operation is illegal.

The next action taken was a letter sent to the vice-president, flight operations, Air Canada, pointing out that the Ministry of Transport was concerned about the legal aspects of flight engineers not being properly licensed. In my speech yesterday, I pointed out that this affected Air Canada. In a Canadian Press story today entitled "Airline jet crews 'illegal' government action hit", it states that only Air Canada was affected. I wish to point out that the directive to Air Canada was sent to a number of other airlines in Canada pointing out that their flight engineers were not properly licensed. Also included are CP Air, Eastern Provincial Airways, Quebec Air, Nordair Limited, Pacific Airlines, Transair Limited and Wardair Limited. More than just Air Canada is affected by unlicensed flight engineers.

Last week in committee I raised with the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) the fact that Mirabel airport is unsafe. I quoted from a MOT document which pointed out that Mirabel is not up to an acceptable level of safety. I also pointed out that Mirabel was built using earlier obsolete information which today does not meet proper safety standards. At last week's meeting the minister said he had no knowledge of this. After I raised this at the meeting, he made a press statement. One press story stated "Lang flatly denies Mirabel safety threat". He claimed that a mound of earth near a Mirabel airport runway did not pose a threat to safety.

I refer to another article, the heading of which reads "Mirabel knoll no danger". I should like to challenge that statement. Elsewhere the minister is reported as saying Mirabel was built to meet 1968 safety standards, not present standards. I should like to point out to him that the lateral zoning—this is transitional surface—at Mirabel does not meet either the 1968 criteria or the present standards. The minister further stated that Mirabel meets the international civil aviation organization annex 14 aerodrome standards. I would challenge that statement, also. Transitional surfaces are not detailed in MOT annex 14 as "standards". They are not compulsory, but, rather, recommended practices. ICAO member states normally follow recommended practices but such practices are not mandatory as is the case with our standards.

Runway 29 at Mirabel is a back course instrument landing system. Hence it has higher landing limits than a front course instrument landing system as on runway 11. There are two runways involved at Mirabel. One is runway 29, a back course instrument landing system, non-precision approach. Number two, runway 11, is a front course instrument landing system, precision approach. The transitional surfaces are clearly violated by the mound to the south of runways 29 and 11.

When Mirabel was first completed it was suggested that an inquiry into the construction at Mirabel was in order. My question to the minister is this: How could such a major deficiency as a man-made mound of dirt which violates the transitional surface of runways 11 and 29 have occurred if adequate supervision of this multi-billion dollar project had been maintained? Why was the grading contractor not obliged to remove the knoll which clearly violates the transitional surface to runways 11 and 29?

All this is further evidence that Mirabel is a white elephant and should be mothballed. Not only does it fail to meet an acceptable level of safety but over the past three years it has experienced an operating deficit of $164 million. This political gift to the province of Quebec is an unpardonable burden on the Canadian taxpayer. I would suggest that it be closed down. The savings realized through mothballing could go toward the $4,300,000 required to bring the airport up to a proper safety standard. The Department of Transport has verified that figure of $4.3 million required to make Mirabel a safe airport. An MOT memorandum states:

Correction of the problem now would be very expensive. A preliminary cost estimate indicates that $4.3 million will be required. There seems to be some confusion as to what standards were in effect during the period of construction. The whole situation seems to question the validity of the standards and their application. It also points up the need for more supervision of a major airport project like Mirabel by Region and HQ to ensure compliance with policies and standards.

It is unbelievable that a $600 million airport could have been built without stated standards and that an expenditure of $4.3 million should be required—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. The time allotted to the hon. member has expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles Lapointe (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I thought that the hon. member would have the wisdom to ascertain the irresponsible remarks he made yesterday during the debate on Bill C-4 regarding the illegality of Air Canada's Boeing 747 flights. On the contrary, Mr. Speaker, he is raising the matter again, and he is now implying that most of our airlines are flying illegally.

[English]

Maybe the hon. member has taken note of the declaration by Air Canada today denying categorically that it is flying its Boeing 727 aircraft illegally. The national carrier states that its second officers fulfil the requirements which must be met by flight engineers. Further, the airlines flight training program for 727 crews meets all the requirements of the Ministry of Transport as well as the specifications of the manufacturer.

• (2227)

The vice-president of flight operations of Air Canada, Captain Charles Simpson, is cited as saying that he has been assured by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) that all our second officers meet the necessary qualifications, having completed the approved MOT course. Air Canada's cockpit crew for the 727 include a captain, first officer and second officer. Yesterday, before the speech by the hon. member, Air Canada received formal notice from the Department of Transport confirming the competency of its 727 crews.

[Translation]

As for Mirabel, Mr. Speaker, it seems that the hon. member is looking for all kinds of pretexts to criticize this terrific endeavour by the Ministry of Transport. It is true that Mirabel is now experiencing some operational deficits, but I think it is logical to plan the development of our airports for the years to come and for their eventual use. Mirabel, as I said, is a terrific endeavour, one of the better designed international airports in its category and one that is most adapted to our environment, and I think this endeavour is extremely important for the future not only of Quebec, because the hon. member seems truly upset that this airport is in Quebec, not only of the Quebec transport industry, Mr. Speaker, but of the entire Canadian transport industry.

[English]

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I should like to caution the hon. member not to generalize and create false impressions about aviation safety in Canada. As the minister said in the House, most air carriers are very responsible and respectable and meet, indeed surpass, regulation requirements. They, with Transport Canada, strive together to maintain a remarkable record in aviation safety although, as I said at the start, no one is complacent about this record.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10:28 p.m.

REQUEST AIB INFORM ONTARIO THAT INCREASE IN OHIP PREMIUMS IS INFLATIONARY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that Statistics Canada this morning announced a further increase in the cost of living for February and a year to year increase of 8.7 per cent, and in view of the fact that the recent Ontario government's budget announced a health premium tax increase of 37.5 per cent, an average family increase of $144 a year which will not be recorded by Statistics Canada in their method of calculating the consumer price index, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That since this government's Anti-Inflation Board is still restricting wage and salary earners' increases to 6 per cent, the federal government instruct the Anti-Inflation Board to inform Ontario that the health premium increase be rescinded since it is inflationary, regressive and decreases the standard of living for most families in Ontario.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for discussion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SHIPPING

AIDS TO NAVIGATION IN EAST COAST SHIPPING LANES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that radar and other equipment was moved from Cuslett, in Placentia Bay, in the fall of 1976 to channel Port aux Basques in order to——provide a much needed aid to navigation in the international shipping lanes adjacent to Port aux Basques and the approaches to the port itself—

—as stated by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang), and in view of the fact that the Vessel Traffic Management Centre has been ready at Port aux Basques, fully equipped and staffed with five permanent coastguard marine traffic regulators and an officer in charge, together with three technicians, and that a notice was sent out to mariners on January 4 advising vessels entering the zone, including all the designated international shipping routes to the Gulf of St. Lawrence within an area of 39 miles of Port aux Basques, to establish radio contact as they enter the zone, and in view of the fact that this notice to shipping was withdrawn under instructions from Ottawa on January 20, without any reason for the said order but reflecting political interference from Ottawa and bureaucratic imperialism by the maritime region—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Crosbie: —of the Canadian coastguard, ever jealous of the Newfoundland region acquiring any power or responsibility, I move, seconded by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Howie):

That the Minister of Transport countermand the instructions of the Department of Transport at Ottawa of January 20, authorize the Vessel Traffic Management Centre at Port aux Basques to commence operating immediately for a zone comprising an area within 39 miles from channel Port aux Basques covering the international shipping lanes and ferry routes as originally intended, and that the minister explain on motions the reason for the waste of manpower and funds involved in having the Vessel Traffic Management Centre at Port aux Basques lie idle since January 20 and dismiss all those found responsible for interfering with the public interest through jealousy and bureaucratic imperialism.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

REQUEST WAR DISABILITY PENSION BE RAISED TO LEVEL OF 1973 FORMULA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, this is an urgent matter; that is why I ask leave to present it under Standing Order 43. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall):

● (1412)

That this House takes note of the continuing concern of veterans over the failure of the government to raise the basic rate of the war disability pension to the level of the formula agreed to in 1973, and calls on the Minister of Veterans Affairs to take this issue back to the cabinet so that the increase our veterans deserve can be agreed to and put into effect without further delay.

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the terms of Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion dealing with an important and urgent matter.

As the federal government announced a few days ago that it would borrow money abroad to cover its foreign account deficit, and as Canada is backed into a corner by its debts, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert):

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

VALUE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR—MEASURES TO COUNTERACT EFFECT ON FOOD PRICES

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. The cost of living increases announced this morning indicate that some of the most dramatic increases were in the area of fresh fruit, fresh vegetables and other imported foods. Clearly, these increased costs have been aggravated by the devaluation of the Canadian dollar. Clearly, too, the impact is hardest upon low income Canadians who spend more of their money on food than other Canadians.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Will the Minister of Finance tell us why he is allowing the impact of the devaluation to sit so unfairly upon lower income Canadians? What measures does he and his government propose to turn around a situation where the poor pay most for the devaluation of the Canadian dollar?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, of course, I have always said that devaluation of the Canadian dollar is not really only a benefit to the Canadian economy: one aspect of it is the fact that imported goods coming into Canada during the winter, especially foodstuffs, will be more expensive. That is a fact of life. I think Canadians would be well advised to be careful in their buying and make sure they are buying foods produced by Canadian farmers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

AVAILABILITY OF APPLICATION FORMS FOR EMPLOYMENT TAX CREDIT PROGRAM

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. Leader of the Opposition said yesterday that the forms made available by my colleague, the hon. Minister of Employment and Immigration, were not available in Manpower offices in some parts of Canada. I think the people who phoned on his behalf probably called the janitors, because the forms have been received in the offices referred to by him.

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, of course we can verify that later on.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Please do.

Mr. Clark: The matter I want to deal with right now is this very startling direction to the poor in Canada, that they will simply have to accept the situation where they pay far more than they used to for commodities on which they spend more of their dollars than the Minister of Finance does. The Minister of Finance says to them that it is just a fact of life. Clearly, it is an unacceptable situation to put that burden on the poor of Canada.

Will the minister not consider some slightly more generous policy than telling people that they have to put up with this fact of life? Since he is the Minister of Finance of Canada, will he not bring in some proposal, now, which will bring some aid to low income Canadians who are bearing the heaviest brunt of the economic policies of this government?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, first I should like to say to the House that, in fact, the consumer price index declined from last month to this month.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: Of course, I am always startled by the opposition continually complaining about the high level of expenditures, because the hon. Leader of the Opposition just rose in the House and proposed that. I think it is impossible in any economy to protect consumers against inflation, especially when it comes from abroad. It is a fact of life, and if we tried to protect all Canadians against that type of thing, it would be a real recipe for disaster.

If our Canadian dollar is being judged by the Common Market as being lower, Canadians have to accept that. Because of lack of discipline in the past in the marketplace in Canada, we have to pay that price today. It is quite evident that Canadians have accepted the fact better than the opposition, because they are accepting the compensations which are making Canadian products more competitive. This is why the Canadian balance of payments in trade has improved.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, it really is incredible that even a government led by a Prime Minister who claims that the number of Canadians living below the poverty line is, in fact, lower than he knows it to be, would suggest—

An hon. Member: Oh, come on!

Mr. Clark: It is incredible that a government like that would say—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I can wait them out.

An hon. Member: Let the cows yell.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister deliberately misleads Canadians about the number living below the poverty line.

An hon. Member: He just said the contrary.

Mr. Clark: Now this Minister of Finance tells the poor of Canada that they should simply accept, as a fact of life, that under a Liberal government they will have to suffer. What I want to ask the Minister of Finance, and we have pressed for this several times—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Clark: I can wait them out, if they continue shouting. I want to ask the Minister of Finance what his excuse is now for failing to bring in a budget that would bring some aid to the Canadians who are being hit the hardest by the increase in the cost of food in this country. Will the minister also tell us whether he is giving any active consideration to changes in the tax structure—a tax structure which is now helping to drive out of production some Canadians farmers whose efficiency has contributed to such reductions in the cost of food as now exist?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I think the Leader of the Opposition would have been well advised to stick to his text, because he was all over the place in the last question. I said that we had an economic statement on October 20 which stated the goals for our economy. We cut taxes by $3 billion from January 1. I said that I have to wait to see what the results will be on the Canadian economy before I decide to change the economic policy of the government.

I think that in Canada at this time we are experiencing a more stimulative economic policy than any of the developed western nations. The hon. member is very immature, in my judgment, if he does not want to wait until we have the report of the first quarter of 1978 before passing other judgments.

MEASURES TO PROVIDE RELIEF TO LOW INCOME CANADIANS

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the cost of waiting is paid in the form of plants closing down and an increase in the number of low income Canadians who are asked simply to accept as a fact of life that they have to pay more for basics under a Liberal government. I want to know from the Minister of Finance whether the government is now considering measures that will provide relief to low income Canadians who are the most victimized by the economic policies of this government, and whether the government is considering new proposals that could be part of a budget, if the Minister of Finance ever finds the courage to bring one in.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: This could help Canadian farmers whose capacity to continue producing efficiently is being jeopardized by the tax system. Is the government actively considering measures to aid consumers who are being victimized now by very high-cost imported food, and to aid farmers whose capacity to produce food efficiently is being undermined by this government's policies?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. gentleman forgets that in Canada we have programs which are indexed to the inflation rate and that they increase automatically every month or every three months according to the formula adopted by the House.

I do not understand the attitude of the hon. member who is making promises everywhere in Canada about tax cuts amounting to $2 billion coupled with reduced government spending and who at this very moment in the House of Commons makes other representations which will cost more money to Canadian taxpayers.

Mr. Speaker, I think that under the circumstances we have a stimulating policy for the economy. Canadian products are more competitive now that they have ever been in recent years. I think we would rather have a budget in a few weeks or a few months to gain an insight into the situation instead of taking the approach of the government of Ontario which has merely increased taxes instead of lowering them.

REASON FOR HIGH RATE OF INFLATION

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. I find it absolutely incomprehensible that almost at the end of the twentieth century we have a government such as this. Why does the minister think the government is here? It is supposed to provide a framework for full employment and price stability. It is overwhelming to see that the government sits there and thinks it does not have to do anything about any of these problems, with one million Canadians out of work.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillies: Is it the position of the Minister of Finance—literally, today—that with one million people out of work, with only 80 per cent of the capacity of our plant and equipment in use, inflation in Canada is the result of excess demands on the economy? Is that what the minister is trying to say to the Canadian people?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I never said that; I just said that we had measures which came into effect on January 1 and cut taxes to the tune of $3 billion. When I hear the opposition asking for some action, I think that when the hon. member goes back to Toronto he should ask the government there why it increased taxes by $350 million.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillies: Mr. Speaker, I happen to be one who thinks parliament is supposed to do something. I do not believe we are here to do nothing about the economic problems of this country. How long does the minister have to wait? The results are in. Retail sales in Canada in the month of January were up 6 per cent. Why is the minister saying he has to wait for statistics before taking action in that regard?

To be more specific, Mr. Speaker, there is no question that the degree of inflation in this country is a result of devaluation of the dollar. It is incomprehensible that the Minister of Finance would say that the dollar is floating, or the dollar is setting its own level, and the government has no responsibility to set the framework within which that happens. Why did he change interest rates too late? Why did he do that, if he expects the dollar to be just floating around? The question I ask is whether the minister is going to do something. Is the government going to try to do something about the devaluation of the dollar before it goes further down and causes more inflation? Does the government have any policy whatsoever or any action to propose?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, under the circumstances, it is evident that today the opposition is losing its cool. The hon. member made a long speech about the value of the Canadian dollar. I say to him that last night the minister of economic development of Quebec attributed the fact that the unemployment situation is better in Quebec to the level of the Canadian dollar. I would like the hon. member to read the speech made by the treasurer of Ontario, who said that the 90 cent dollar is good for the economy of Ontario.

Mr. Lawrence: He said we need a federal budget.

Mr. Gillies: I make no apologies for losing my cool, with one million Canadians out of work.

INCREASE IN PRICE OF OIL AND GAS—EFFECT ON CPI

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Finance. Since included in this morning's consumer price index is a whopping 14.5 per cent increase in fuel and utilities, I ask the minister whether he can confirm studies done by his department which show that the March 1 increase allowed by the government in the price of oil and natural gas will mean an additional 1 per cent increase in the CPI. This will mean a real cost of living increase this year of 8 per cent to 9 per cent, compared to his forecast of 6 per cent.

• (1427)

Will the minister confirm that his department's studies on the oil price increase and, further, that his own forecasts on the cost of living are out of kilter?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we decided some time ago that oil prices in Canada were to increase per barrel. We did not accept the international situation to the effect that the price increase had quadrupled in one month or one year. I would like to remind the hon. member that these policies were agreed to a long time ago and they are taken into account when we make our forecasts. I would also like to remind the hon. member that one of the great proponents of an international price for oil is the government of Saskatchewan.

REQUEST GOVERNMENT ASK ONTARIO TO RESCIND OHIP PREMIUM INCREASE

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, since the minister did not refer to that study or acknowledge that he had any knowledge of it, I will be happy to send him a copy. It was produced by his department.

My supplementary question to the Minister of Finance is this. Since the Anti-Inflation Board is restricting the salaries and wages of ordinary workers to an average of 6 per cent, and since the Ontario government has announced a 37.5 per cent increase in health premiums which, oddly enough, the Leader of the Progressive Conservative party has not mentioned today, will the minister get in touch with the Ontario government and request that it rescind this inflationary and regressive health tax which will seriously decrease the standard of living of many Ontario families?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I will take notice of the hon. member's view on the budget of Ontario. The hon. member has the opportunity to vote for having that type of government in this province. I do not.

Mr. Blackburn: My final supplementary question is addressed to the Minister of Finance. Given the fact that the minister's forecast of 6 per cent inflation is proving to be completely erroneous since we will be recording increases in the cost of living this year of between 8 per cent and 9 per cent, will the minister, as a minimum, change the guidelines of the Anti-Inflation Board to ensure that wage and salary earners in Canada receive increases at least up to the level of the CPI, so that a decrease will not be recorded in their standard of living?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I stated on several occasions that it is not possible to protect Canadians forever against the effects of this offshore inflation. Trying to do so would spell disaster as far as importing goods is concerned, for our purchasing power on international markets has dropped due to the devaluation of the Canadian dollar, and it would certainly fuel inflation and cause us to lose our competitive edge in the world.

The Canadian public has accepted this approach, and the terms of most working contracts today are within the limits we had set, which explains why Canada's competitive position on international markets has considerably improved over the past year.

AGRICULTURE

SUGGESTED GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE FOR QUEBEC INDUSTRIAL MILK PRODUCERS

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture.

Quebec industrial milk producers have had a lot of difficulties with quotas this winter and they had to stop producing milk or throw it away because bargaining between them and whole milk producers has been detrimental to them. In order to be fair, can the minister tell us whether he will make representations to the Quebec marketing board on this matter.

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member knows that the administration of a marketing commission, board or system of any kind within a province is the province's prerogative or right. We can make suggestions, but we cannot tell them how to distribute quotas: that is their responsibility. I must say some of them are not doing a very good job.

REQUEST MEASURES BE ADOPTED TO PROTECT DAIRY INDUSTRY

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, the dairy industry in Canada, especially in Quebec, is a basic industry. Considering that a few years ago the dairy producers fought vigorously against the government allowing the Canadian market to be flooded by a substitute called margarine which is now jeopardizing the dairy industry, can the Minister of Agriculture tell the House whether he will take steps to protect better the dairy industry so that milk production will not be reduced during the next dairy year thus ensuring that dairy producers will have a viable industry?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member is aware that several years ago dairy production was on a downward trend. It has increased and has been more stable in the past five years than at any time in its history. Returns to our dairy farmers have been the best in living memory. It is true there are some faults, but we have one of the best dairy policies in the world.

I ask the hon. member to make a comparison with the terrible dairy policy in the European Community, where they are compounding the problem and creating economic difficulties for us as a result of their inability to manage their system. It is being compounded as a result of their surplus dairy products being thrown on the world market at distress prices. The hon. member must remember that we are dealing in a world operation with surplus dairy products. We have our position. As far as I am concerned, we have one of the best dairy industries in the world; in fact, it is the envy of most of the world.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

SUGGESTION ELECTION WILL BE CALLED BEFORE BUDGET INTRODUCED

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the Minister of Finance for several days.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have always had admiration for his veracity. I am beginning to wonder why, over and over again, he asserts certain things which he must know are not true.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: The choral group over there is starting to hoot: that is the best contribution they can make. The minister pretends there is going to be a budget, or at least he suggests that possibility. I suggest that he and the Prime Minister have decided to hold the election in June, to have no budget, go to the country and pretend that we in the opposition denied them the opportunity of doing something for the Canadian economy which is in the worst mess it has been in for years.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased because of the compliment the right hon. member has paid to me: I thank him for that. Of course, I am the Minister of Finance and I operate in my own department. I am not in a position to decide the date of the election, and I am not influenced by that. I want to say to the right hon. member that I presented a budget, or economic statement, on October 20. I made provision for tax cuts amounting to $3 billion, which came into effect January 1.

The right hon. member will know, because he has been prime minister, that before we move we want to know the effects of a tax cut. We want to know that before we prepare a budget. That is reasonable and it is something that everyone expects. I am sure the right hon. member does not want me to bring in a budget like the Ontario government's budget that increased taxes.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, any alibi is apparently good for this government. I suggest to the minister that after the pilgrimage to western Canada of 14 ministers, at the expense of the Canadian people, he has found out that the criticism is of the government—and he is ruining this country day by day and week by week.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I had the pleasure of visiting Saskatchewan. I talked to a very non-partisan group, the Board of Trade of Saskatoon. I explained our economic problems and my faith in Canada. I am very proud to tell the right hon. member that his fellow Saskatchewaners gave me a standing ovation.

LABOUR RELATIONS

REQUEST FOR PROGRESS REPORT ON NEGOTIATIONS BETWEEN CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORP. AND UMW

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour: it concerns recent meetings he held, together with the Deputy Prime Minister and the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, with executive district 26 and some of us on the problem affecting the Prince mine.

Since there seems to be a strong conflict of opinion between the management of the Cape Breton Development Corporation and the district executive of the United Mine Workers, is the minister in a position to advise the House whether progress is being made between the parties regarding that mine, affecting several hundred men?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his intention to ask a question along these lines. I have been in touch with both Devco and the union. They are holding meetings today and, hopefully, over the course of the next few days, in an effort to resolve on their own, without further governmental intervention, the problems that were identified with regard to employment of people in that mine.

I might again emphasize that Devco indicated, I believe in the hon. member's presence, that they had no intention of closing the mine. The problem they will endeavour to work out is the employment of people while they are trying to settle their problems with the mine.

NATIONAL SECURITY

CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP IN RETURN FOR UNDERTAKING RCMP INTELLIGENCE WORK

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Solicitor General. How many persons have been recruited to work with or for the RCMP to perform dangerous, complex and important tasks in return for the assurance of Canadian citizenship as part of the remuneration for work and services performed?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I do not quite understand the purport of the hon. member's question. Indeed, I do not know to which area he wants to address his question or which area of the RCM Police he is asking about.

IMMIGRATION

DEPARTMENT'S POSITION ON ACCEPTING IMMIGRANTS PERFORMING RCMP INTELLIGENCE WORK

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, my question is perfectly clear. I will ask a supplementary of the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Has the Department of Immigration been refusing to ratify or confirm any arrangements, undertakings or contractual obligations made by or on behalf of the RCMP involving citizens of other countries who have been recruited or induced in any way to perform work and services with or for the RCMP?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, that question is pretty broad.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cullen: Do hon. members want an answer, or do they want to shout me down? We work, and are proud to co-operate, with the RCMP in the many areas they have to work in, guarding and protecting the security of this nation. We deal with each case they approach us with on an individual basis, check out the merits and decide, on the information received from them, what is in the best interests of the country. I make no apology for that. I will not go into specific cases, if the hon. member is not prepared to do so.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Speaker, I can assure both ministers that I am very prepared to go into specific cases. I am asking, as a matter of policy—and I can name them—whether such contractual obligations have been incurred by and on behalf of the RCMP, and whether such obligations and solemn promises are being repudiated by the Department of Employment and Immigration.

● (1442)

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, as I have indicated, there have been instances where certain arrangements have been made. The hon. gentleman is suggesting that some contractual obligations have been undertaken and that there have been breaches of those undertakings. I do not have any particulars. If the hon. member has some allegations to make, I would be pleased to have him indicate what they are. I remind him that if he is dealing with matters involving national security, I would appreciate some private indication of the nature of the complaints or allegations in order to avoid any discussion of matters which could be detrimental to national security.

TRADE

GATT NEGOTIATIONS RESPECTING ELECTRONICS INDUSTRY

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the Minister of Finance does not want to act as Minister of Finance but wants to amuse backbenchers, I would like to direct my question to the Prime Minister, the Liberal "Hee-Haw". Manufacturers' domestic sales of TV sets declined by 50 per cent in January. Four TV manufacturers ceased operating in Canada last year, and Canadian General Electric has just announced that it is going to discontinue manufacturing TV sets in Canada in June. Thirty thousand jobs have been lost in the electronic and electrical industry in the last eight years.

My question for the Prime Minister is, what steps is his government taking to assist the industry, and what instructions have been given to our negotiators at Geneva in negotiating particularly with respect to the electrical and electronics industry? We are in the process of de-industrialization. Is the Prime Minister taking any steps to stop that?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to take note of the question, on behalf of the minister.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, all the studies show that there is a loss of 10,000 manufacturing jobs a month in Canada now, and that central Canada is being denuded of industry. Is the Prime Minister prepared to get himself a Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to take some interest himself in this subject and to try to put a stop to this process? Has he any personal knowledge of what is happening in Geneva in those negotiations, and what instructions has he given? Is the industry to be thrown to the wind?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, it is possible at any time to point out a loss of jobs in any part of the country, but I remind the hon. member that statistics yesterday indicated that 290,000 jobs were created in the past year.

SMALL BUSINESS

FINANCING THROUGH FEDERAL BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT BANK

Mr. Leonard Hopkins (Renfrew North-Nipissing East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of State (Small Business). Because the Federal Business Development Bank is supposed to be a lender of last resort, and hence should be a risk capital bank to a certain degree and at the same time attempt to gear itself to the over-all needs of small business, is the minister planning any change in legislation or regulations to cancel the financial penalty that a small businessman is required to pay if he wishes to pay off his loan sooner than the required date? Also, is the minister planning to provide for longer term capital through the Federal Business Development Bank than the bank seems to have been willing to give to date?

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of State (Small Business)): Mr. Speaker, I would have to start by indicating that the Federal Business Development Bank is a Crown corporation and, as such, is governed by its enabling statute and managed by its directors. Naturally, the bank listens very carefully and very cordially to advice from its only shareholder. I point out that the prepayment penalty which is imposed on these term loans is a traditional practice and the bank is considering its position in this regard.

With regard to the bank being a lender of last resort, as it properly describes itself, I personally believe that a borrower of last resort, if he finds himself with funds and wants to pay off his loan, should be entitled to do so without penalty.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Abbott: I hope to meet next Monday with the newly appointed president of the bank, Mr. Guy Lavigeur, and have a chat with him about this subject and others. With regard to the extension of the term or otherwise, I might add that this is a matter which is very much related to the loan itself, to the risk of the borrower and to a number of other factors. I will be discussing these matters as well.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ALLEGED CONTRADICTION BETWEEN STATEMENTS ON TRADING RELATIONS WITH SOUTH AFRICA

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question involves two departments of the federal government; therefore, I should like to put it to the Prime Minister unless, because of its nature, he would like to pass it to the Deputy Prime Minister. On December 19 the Secretary of State for External Affairs, speaking in this House, said this:

> I am, therefore, announcing today that Canada is phasing out all its government-sponsored, commercially-supported activities in South Africa.

Later, the minister went on to say:

> In addition to this phasing out of our commercial activities, we will also withdraw all Export Development Corporation government account support from any transactions relating to South Africa.

An official publication put out by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, dated 1978, draws attention to the services available to businessmen around the world and says, in particular, that businessmen are urged to take advantage of the personalized government service available at its 88 posts around the world. Then the publication includes South Africa in the list of those 88 posts.

In view of that, I would like to ask the Prime Minister or the Deputy Prime Minister which policy prevails, the one announced by the Secretary of State for External Affairs which was approved in the House, or the one indicated in the official publication of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, obviously, the statement made in the House prevails. I am sure the hon. member knows that there are routes to take in order to get answers to questions of this kind. If he had given notice, we could have inquired whether or not this was a mistake in printing.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I will ignore the tone of that answer and ask the Prime Minister if he will take this matter up with the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and ask him why his departmental publications do not conform to the government policy which has been confirmed today by the Prime Minister.

[Mr. Abbott.]

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, obviously, the answer is the same. It is very possible that the publication was in draft form, and perhaps even in print, before the statement was made. But the hon. gentleman knows something of the traditions in this House and, if he really wanted an answer rather than a debate, he would have sent us notice of that question and he would have had the answer.

INVESTIGATION INTO SOURCES OF LEAKED INFORMATION

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, my question is reluctantly directed to the Solicitor General, because he may not want to answer; he may want to leave it to a more senior and competent minister, like the Deputy Prime Minister. However, my question relates to the attempt of the Solicitor General to find copies of documents which he has been fiercely looking for over the past few weeks.

In view of the article in the Toronto Sun of March 7, 1978, I wonder whether the minister has had the opportunity to request an interview by General Dare, himself, or a combination of both, with Peter Worthington, the editor in chief of the Toronto Sun. Has the minister initiated any investigation with respect to the source of information contained in the article to which I refer?

Mr. Paproski: Try Lubor Zink.

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I can understand the hon. gentleman's opening remarks and his sensitivity today, especially after the comments made by the Minister of Finance relating to his own success in the hon. gentleman's riding and relating to the ovation the minister received there.

Some hon. Members: Hear, Hear!

Mr. Blais: Having been in Saskatoon myself, I know that if I were the hon. gentleman I would be very concerned.

Mr. Andre: We are all concerned for our country with you guys in charge, you turkey.

Mr. Blais: I am sure the same goes for the Calgary area. I understand that our presence in that area—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the Solicitor General was intending to answer the question put by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar.

Mr. Gillies: The minister is a disgrace.

Mr. Blais: We will also be going to Don Valley soon. The question put by the hon. member referred to certain allegations contained in publications in Toronto. As I indicated previously, the subject matter is subject to investigation and that investigation is ongoing.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, when we in Saskatoon appear to be giving a standing ovation, we are usually slapping our thighs.

● (1452)

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The Prime Minister will learn that there will be more than thigh-slapping in the next election; I can tell him that. In view of the fact that the government has already involved itself in one raid on the Toronto Sun in relation to the attempt to get the source of the government blacklist leak from that newspaper, will the government give the Toronto Sun notice of any future raids they might carry out?

Mr. Blais: I am not the one conducting the investigation.

Mr. Gillies: That's for sure; you are not doing anything.

INQUIRY WHETHER WARREN HART TAPES WERE DESTROYED

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General, if I may bring him back from Saskatchewan to his responsibilities, which so far he has avoided so well.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Jarvis: I hear a chorus of "Oh, oh". Over there incompetence really does demand such a chorus. I should like to ask him a question about a specific incident, the Warren Hart incident. The Solicitor General is aware of the reports of the tapings by Mr. Hart, allegedly under the direction of a former solicitor general, a member of the House, and he is also aware of the reports that these tapes were destroyed. Will the minister advise the House whether, in fact, the tapes were destroyed and, if so, under whose authority; and were any transcripts made from those tapes before their destruction?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): I think all aspects of that question were covered quite explicitly by me on previous occasions when other members asked exactly the same questions. The hon. gentleman referred to allegations of directions respecting the taping. That has been specifically denied: no directions of that nature have ever been issued.

Mr. Jarvis: Mr. Warren Hart has been contacted by a Lieutenant-Colonel C. A. Christian. Can the Solicitor General confirm that that gentleman is in the employ of the McDonald commission? Would he, at the same time, tell us whether Lieutenant-Colonel Christian is the same Mr. Christian who was previously a member of the Canadian armed forces who was recalled in the late 1960s from a tour of duty in Europe?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of the gentleman who has been identified. But surely the hon. member has a telephone in his office and can obtain that information from the royal commission as readily as I can.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

MANPOWER

APPLICATION FORMS FOR FARMERS SEEKING OFFSHORE WORKERS

Mr. William Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Why is it that Canada Manpower centres and farm labour pools across Ontario are requiring farmers who apply for offshore labour to sign a blank application form, which gives Manpower the right to write in the wages at a later date without consulting the farmer?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): We have had few complaints from farmers in this area. They know about the wages spelled out and the means employed, in the interest of hiring offshore labour, to see that they get a fair shake. I do not think it is appropriate that they should be signing blank application forms. I will check it out. I thank the hon. member for his representation.

Mr. Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): In light of the confusion and frustration being experienced by fruit and vegetable farmers when applying for offshore labour at farm labour pools, will the minister now withdraw the conditions which are creating the problem and permit the farmers, who are producing cheap food for Canadians, to obtain the same number of offshore workers as they did last year, at least until the minister has had time to consult farm organizations?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, not only have I had time, but I made time to discuss this matter as recently as two days ago with apple growers in one part of Ontario. I think I met every group that is hiring offshore labour. We have gone over the terms and conditions. The concern that they recognize I have is that at a time of high unemployment, we should be making a solid effort to hire as many Canadians as we can. I have indicated we will bring in the same number this year as we did last year, so there will be no cutting back. We have indicated that we are prepared to be flexible in the timing so far as various farmers and various crop periods of the year are concerned. Also we are prepared to allow some flexibility in moving from one farm to another. So we have done everything possible to accommodate these individuals. But I think our prime responsibility is to Canadians looking for work.

Oral Questions

HEALTH AND WELFARE

OHIP PREMIUM INCREASE PROPOSED IN ONTARIO BUDGET

Hon. Stanley Haidasz (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare whether she has made, or is considering making, any representations to the Ontario minister of health on behalf of the hard pressed people of Ontario who are faced with an increase in the cost of living because of the unreasonable increase in OHIP premiums exceeding AIB guidelines.

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I wish I could, Mr. Speaker.

REQUEST FOR INCREASE IN MARKET SHARE QUOTA ON CHEESE

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. We are well aware of the minister's view on the market share quota, but would he seriously consider expanding the market share quota for Ontario—not very much, say 20 million pounds—on an experimental basis only, for aged Cheddar cheese strictly for export, the milk to be used for no other purpose than exported Cheddar cheese?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): We are willing to consider anything. However, I am sure the hon. member knows that the market share quota is decided by a group of people from all producer organizations in every province, along with the Canadian Dairy Commission. I can transmit his wish to them and have it discussed.

CANADA COUNCIL

GUIDELINES FOR ALLOCATION OF GRANTS

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State, whom I see at present counselling the Prime Minister, perhaps to see if he is eligible for a Canada Council grant.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Malone: Could the minister say whether or not he has received representations regarding the regulations that apply to Canada Council grants and, if so, could he give us an indication of the scope and the extent of those representations from across Canada appealing to the minister to establish definite guidelines for the allocation and receipt of Canada Council grants?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): I did not quite grasp the whole question, as a result of faulty hearing, but I believe the hon. member was asking whether I have received representations relating to Canada Council grants. The answer is that I have, indeed. However, the hon. member will know that the allocation of Canada Council grants is undertaken by the Council and is not under my direction. As a matter of course, I do transfer to the Council representations that I receive, for its information.

REPORTED PRESSURE ON SUN LIFE TO STAY IN MONTREAL

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I wished to address my question to the Minister of Finance, but in his absence perhaps I may direct it to his parliamentary secretary and get an answer from the minister tomorrow. Could the parliamentary secretary confirm the story that is going around financial houses, that members of the office of the Minister of Finance are putting pressure on major life insurance companies across this country to try to persuade Sun Life to stay in Montreal, and in return are offering them an extension of the monopoly for RRSP conversions?

Mr. Ed Lumley (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): I am not aware of the rumours alleged by the hon. member.

STORM DAMAGE TO FARM PROPERTIES—REQUEST FOR FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE

Mr. John Wise (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. It relates to the very severe Storm that Sweph across southwestern Ontario on January 26 of this year, causing general damage amounting to millions of dollars and also causing damage to individual farm properties, sometimes in excess of $200,000 each. Can the minister say what compensation, if any, he is prepared to make to farmers and, indeed, to other property owners for the storm damage?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member is aware that before we even consider giving any aid, we must receive some form of request from the province which has suffered the disaster. I received in my office, I believe yesterday, from the Ontario minister a report in which he asks me to participate in an interest-free loan program in that we share the cost of the interest which would be involved in providing these loans to the farmers.

If I understand it correctly, although I would have to review it to be certain, I think it is for the produce that was lost, not for the buildings, etc., because I am sure the hon. member knows as well as I do that insurance is available for that, and no province or federal government becomes involved in a program when insurance is available in such cases.

Mr. Wise: Mr. Speaker, do I take it from the minister's remarks that he is actually saying there will be no compensation forthcoming from the federal government with reference to storm damage? Is that what the minister is saying?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, I am saying that I received the request from the minister of agriculture for the province of Ontario, I believe yesterday. All he is asking us to do is participate in the interest cost of loans which he is proposing to administer to farmers in hard-hit areas. We are considering that matter at the present time.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

REQUEST WAR DISABILITY PENSION BE RAISED TO LEVEL OF 1973 FORMULA

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. In view of the fact that the percentage increase in the CPI, of 8.7 per cent, has surpassed already the percentage indexing allowed to war disability pensioners in January of the past year, and that the recommendations of the standing committee in 1973 were to equate the basic rate of pension with the standard of living, I wonder if the minister is going to do that now by introducing legislation to amend the war disability pensions act to allow for that equation of the veterans with the five lowest categories in the public service.

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am quite conscious of the question. When a review has taken place, the information will be conveyed to the House.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

MEASURE REGARDING OPERATION OF VEHICLES IN INTERPROVINCIAL JURISDICTION

Mr. Fernand E. Leblanc (Laurier) moved for leave to introduce a bill entitled "An Act to amend the Canada Labour Code (motor vehicle undertakings)".

Some hon. Members: Explain!

Mr. Leblanc (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to provide that, when the owner of a motor vehicle transport company operates both provincially and interprovincially, part III of the Canada Labour Code applies only to those employees involved in the operation of vehicles used for interprovincial transportation.

At present, this right is unfair for companies and employees involved solely in provincial transportation. They must compete with companies which operate interprovincially and which are not subject to provincial legislation when they operate within the same province as local companies.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

ICEBREAKING SERVICES

Question No. 729—Mr. Forrestall:

1. Is the government aware that ice dues are charged for the provision of icebreaking services at various Scandinavian and Baltic ports?

2. Does the government intend to implement ice dues for commercial vessels requiring icebreaking at St. Lawrence River ports and (a) if so, on what date (b) if not, for what reason?

3. Does the government consider that the lack of ice dues at St. Lawrence ports is discriminatory against the Ports of Halifax and Saint John?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): 1. Yes.

Present efforts are directed towards Seaway tolls, pilotage charges and the financial position of ports under the proposed Canadian Ports Commission. (b) N/A.

3. Transport Canada does not consider that the lack of ice dues at St. Lawrence ports is discriminatory against the ports of Halifax and Saint John. These ports which are not affected by ice in winter months have a natural advantage for shippers over ports located within ice covered waters.

Total: 27,046.

ASSISTANCE TO THE INTERNATIONAL AIR TRANSPORT ASSOCIATION

Question No. 902—Mr. Brisco:

1. Does the government assist the International Air Transport Association and, if so, to what extent and in what form?

2. Has financial assistance been provided to the Association and, if so, in what amount in the past five years and during the current year?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Transport Canada advises as follows: 1. Transport Canada provides assistance to the International Air Transport Association in the following forms: (a) Consultation on Air operations by IATA members while in Canadian airspace. (b) As a result of discussions held under the auspices of international organizations such as ICAO, government officials have cooperated with IATA technical officials to review and recommend courses of action related to specific technical problems.

2. No.

CONSUMABLE MEDICINAL PRODUCTS

Question No. 957—Mr. Howie:

Since January 1, 1977, how many consumable medicinal products were banned or recommended against use by the Department of National Health and Welfare?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Since January 1, 1977, four consumable medicinal products were removed from the Canadian market: two phenformin products, Animo-Cerv and anti-asthmatic cigarettes. Also effective January 1, 1978, the sale of 97 products containing chloroform as an active ingredient has been prohibited. Manufacturers have been advised of a proposal that a further ten products containing oxyphenisatin and related compounds be removed from sale.

STUDIES REGARDING CHILD NEGLECT OR ABUSE

Since January 1, 1976, were studies made for the Department of National Health and Welfare by outside consultants regarding child neglect or abuse?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Yes. The National Health Research and Development Program has supported studies in this subject area for a total of $24,540 for 1976-77 and for $142,097 for 1977-78. A study carried out by the Tree Foundation of Canada in conjunction with the Challenge for Change program of the National Film Board of Canada from December 1975 to September 1976, concerning a review of all available North American audio-visual material on child abuse, resulted in the Department of National Health and Welfare having purchased for distribution a number of films and filmstrips dealing with child abuse and neglect. These include copies of five general awareness films plus a CBC documentary, all of which are currently available in all National Film Board offices across Canada. 130 copies of 13 filmstrips intended for use by professional groups for training purposes are being distributed separately. In the first six weeks that the general awareness films were available, 117 bookings were made. The Department will continue to cover the costs of all booking charges associated with the distribution of the films. The Department contracted with the Canadian Home and School and Parent-Teaching Federation to write, produce and distribute a pamphlet on child abuse and neglect. This brochure is particularly oriented to schools and will be distributed shortly to all provincial federations who will in turn distribute it to 1,500 parent-teacher associations. The Department underwrote the cost of videotaping, shooting and recording the proceedings of the Second World Conference of the International Society on Family Law, June 1977 at McGill University, which was done by the Tree Foundation of Canada. The National Film Board in conjunction with Tree is editing and producing two half-hour cassettes which will be added to the child abuse materials for distribution.

RESEARCH INTO MOTION SICKNESS

Since April 1, 1976, what amount did the government grant or spend for research into motion sickness?

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): The Department of National Defence has no long term program dedicated specifically to research studies into motion sickness. However, some applied studies on motion sickness problems are being carried out and the cost since April 1, 1976 has been $2,400.

In so far as the Medical Research Council is concerned: $192,079.

In so far as the Departments of National Health and Welfare, Transport Canada and the National Research Council are concerned: Nil.

CREDIT TO POOR RISK OPERATORS IN AGRICULTURE

Question No. 1,138—Mr. Herbert:

1. Does the government intend to introduce measures to facilitate the provision of credit for poor risk operators in agriculture?

2. (a) For each of the past five years, what was the number of defaulters and the total amount involved for the Farm Credit Corporation (b) what was or is expected to be the actual loss of the amount defaulted?

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): I am informed by the Department of Finance and the Farm Credit Corporation as follows: 1. With regard to the Farm Improvement Loans Act, which is administered by the Department of Finance, no such measures are being considered. With regard to the Farm Credit Act, low equity loans may now be made to those under 35 years of age where there is a reasonable change of success. Studies are now underway to determine what further improvements in legislation might be made.

2. (a) Foreclosures and Arrears under Farm Credit Act, 1972-73 to 1976-77:

Year	No. of Foreclosures During Year	Arrears on March 31 Number of Borrowers	Arrears on March 31 Amount
1972-73	151	7,687	$13,960,811
1974-75	79	4,393	7,238,360
1975-76	2	5,001	9,429,672

(b) As of March 31, 1977, the allowance for doubtful accounts was $1,130,000.

Order Paper Questions

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of Fisheries and the Environment, Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Supply and Services and the National Research Council as follows: 1. Yes. (a) Yes; (b) Committee has received 181 submissions of ideas, models, drawings and modifications of traps. Several have been tested. Committee hopes to make recommendation by 1979.

2. No. (a) The purpose of the Committee is to invite ideas for traps and test them to ascertain if they meet standards for biological and mechanical suitability which the Committee has established. If the traps meet those standards, they are then tested in the field. Contracts have been let to establish those standards and to test traps, but not to invent them. (b) See 2. (a).

3. The Department of Fisheries and the Environment gave impetus to the formation of the Committee. The Department let contracts with the Canadian Standards Association and the University of Guelph to assist the Committee.

4. (a) Yes, the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development contributes an annual amount as follows: 1973-74—$3,750; 1974-75—$14,125; 1975-76—$18,642; 1976-77—$21,450; 1977-78—$22,800; 1978-79—$22,800, (proposed). The N.W.T. Government has made the following contributions: 1973-74—$672; 1974-75—$2,540; 1975-76—$3,350; 1976-77—$3,850; 1977-78—$4,000; 1978-79—$4,000, (proposed). (b) The departmental contribution, together with contributions from the provinces and territories, is used to finance the F.P.C.H.T. Program, a full report of which was submitted to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry, in February 1977. The 1977-78 Program included the following:

Administration: Office furniture; cleaning; press clippings; printing; translation; xerox; office rent; telephone; mail and miscellaneous (staff ads).

Salaries: Co-ordinator; Assistant; Secretary and Honorarium.

Other Operations: Inventor awareness; field testing; animal procurement; trap procurement; travel and costs of Scientific and Technical Sub-Committee.

Research: Terminal dive study; trap evaluation; trap development and optimization; lateral impact study and animal approach tests.

5. The Science Procurement Branch published the following request for proposals in the R&D Bulletin No. 28, dated July 1975: "... for the development of a suitable trapping system that meets both performance and humane needs ...". A contract for the determination of criteria and design of models for the evaluation of humane traps was let on July 14, 1976 to University of Guelph. The contractor's final report was delivered on January 19, 1978 and is under review. Further related work has been undertaken as follows: At the University of Guelph: Research to determine the kinamatic characteristics of animal traps. This work was completed in the summer of 1977 at a cost of $17,612. Research on the effect of side blows delivered to fur bearing species is under way at University of Guelph and the estimated cost is $9,000. Both these projects are funded by grants from the Federal Provincial Committee of Humane Trapping. At McMaster University: a contract was let by the Federal Provincial Committee of Humane Trapping for humane trap design, modification, development and optimization at an estimated cost of $10,000. This work is in progress.

Did the Minister of Finance recently suggest that Canadians should keep their dollars at home by holidaying in Canada during the current economic crisis and, if so, was he stating government policy and does this policy apply to all Canadians including the Prime Minister and members of the Cabinet?

2. Did the Prime Minister travel to or from Colorado during the 1977-78 Parliamentary Christmas Recess by means of government-owned aircraft and, if so (a) what type of aircraft was used and what was the total cost to the taxpayer including transportation, both in the air and waiting time, accommodations and food and drink for the Prime Minister and any person(s) accompanying him (b) what are the names and job designations of all government employees accompanying him and how long did they spend with him, in each case?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): In all probability they will be the existing Canada Pension Plan District Offices located in St. John's and Corner Brook and the existing local offices in Clarenville and Grand Falls.

SWINE INFLUENZA IMMUNIZATION COMPAIGN

Question No. 1,261—Mr. Yewchuk:

In 1976 and 1977 were lawsuits brought against the government after the launching of the swine influenza immunization campaign and the subsequent reported cases of Guillain-Barré Syndrom and, if so (a) how many (b) what was the claim in each case (c) what was the total amount paid to claimants?

PERMANENT EXHIBIT "THE SURVIVAL OF THE ACADIANS"

Question No. 1,300—Mr. Jones:

1. What is the cost of the permanent exhibit "The Survival of the Acadians" to be?

2. Were tenders called for the construction of this display, and if so, give details?

3. Will persons of the Maritime region be allowed to contribute to this exhibit and if so, what form will their contributions take?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1 and 2. The exhibit is still at a preliminary stage of development. Costs have not yet been determined, nor have tenders been called.

3. It is hoped that interested historical societies, New Brunswick government resource persons, the Memramcook Institute and University of Moncton and any private individuals who so wish, will contribute to this project. Their contribution will provide Parks Canada with the necessary historical information relating to the Acadian story, and may assist in the locating of appropriate artifacts for the exhibit. At this early stage, the form which these anticipated contributions will take cannot be identified with any greater precision.

4. To date, the Memramcook Institute and officials of the University of Moncton have offered assistance in identifying potential sources for historical information. Further contacts will be made with interested agencies and individuals as work progresses.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—DECLINE IN FARM INCOME

Mr. John Wise (Elgin) moved:

—That this House regrets the continuing decline in farm income and urges the government to:

(1) extend the deferral of capital gains taxation now levied on family farms to include partnerships and incorporated farms;

(2) promote agricultural exports and reduce Canada's present reliance on imported agricultural products;

(3) develop marketing programs that will encourage long-term income stability;

(4) encourage the expansion and improvement of agricultural research to ensure efficient production techniques;

(5) provide direct food aid and human and financial assistance to Third World countries.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members will note that pursuant to Standing Order 32(1)(k) and Standing Order 58(10), proceedings upon this motion will expire at the ordinary hour of adjournment this afternoon.

Mr. Wise: Mr. Speaker, the reason and the purpose of this motion today is another attempt by my colleagues and I to draw to the attention of the government its continuing failure to deal effectively with the serious problems of the agricultural industry in general, and more particularly, to deal with the problem of the continuing decline in farm incomes.

Primary producers will recognize, but the House should be reminded, that the last time the plight of the agricultural industry was debated in the House, it was on the initiative of hon. members of the official opposition. The complete absence of any government legislation, not only now but for the last number of months, contrasted with our past and present actions, clearly discloses this government's indifference or complete incompetence regarding agricultural problems. As well it reflects our deep concern, and underlines our continuing commitment to the growth and development of a very basic and vital sector of our economy.

Prior to 1976 Canadians could observe, compare and state with considerable accuracy that other countries which had failed or neglected to maintain or develop a strong and viable agricultural industry were countries which found themselves in serious difficulties, both socially and economically. Today, and partially because of what has happened in the primary sector of the industry, and indeed throughout the entire food chain, we need not look beyond our own borders to find a country suffering both socially and economically.

It is obvious that the government would like us to forget the one million unemployed, the shaky state of our economy and the decline in farm income. Particularly the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) would like us to forget that decline. It is incumbent upon us, as members of the opposition, to raise these questions. However, it is incumbent upon the government, a government which has held office for 36 of the last 40 years, to do something about them.

Their record of performance evidenced by their own statistics reflects an unacceptable and shameful performance. Farm income has dropped for the second consecutive year. If present indicators hold true, we can expect a further drop in income levels again this year.

When we compare the 1975 income level with that of 1976, the decline is $500 million. When we compare the income level from 1975 to 1977, a two year period, the decline is $1 billion, and citing the forecasts for 1978 we can expect a further decline of $1.5 billion in the three year period. Over that same period of time, expressed in percentage terms the decline is in excess of 40 per cent. That places Canadian farmers in the same position, as far as income levels are concerned, as they were in six years ago in 1972.

To make matters worse, if we look at what has happened to our input costs, or our expenses, we see increases almost as dramatic as the declines in farm income. Input costs increased by $500,000 between 1976 and 1977. If we compare the estimated increases for the current year with 1976 we might well experience a figure in the neighbourhood of $1 billion. Is it any wonder or mystery that negative profit margins are becoming common place on income tax forms submitted to the income tax department of this government by Canadian farmers?

These conditions have been reflected in the sale of farm machinery. Sales in this area have decreased by 10 per cent on a national basis. In fact, in the provinces of Saskatchewan and Manitoba declines in the sales of farm machinery to the extent of 24 per cent and 19 per cent respectively are reported. Farm borrowing has doubled over the last six years from $4 billion to

Given present conditions it is impossible, I suppose short of having a rich uncle, a rich aunt, or winning a lottery, to enter and succeed in this business of farming. Young farmers now in the business are in serious financial circumstances. Charles Munro, immediate past president of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, speaking at their recent convention in Quebec City, made reference to the fact that three quarters of the 4,465 farm credit loans made last year went to farmers under 35 years of age, and these loans averaged $73,000. At an interest rate of 10 per cent these borrowers would need some $61,000 in gross sales to cover expenses. The fact is that only 15 per cent of these borrowers had 1976 gross receipts of $60,000 or more. In 1976 it should be noted that less than half of all census farms had less than $15,000 gross sales.

Western livestock farmers in certain areas are showing their dissatisfaction by demonstrations and, indeed, by withholding their livestock from the market. In Atlantic Canada reports indicate heavy financial losses and people leaving the land in the maritimes in record numbers. The primary sector faced serious difficulties two years ago. No action has been taken during that time and the situation has worsened and must be described today as acute. Farmers cannot and will not continue to be ignored or swept aside by this government. Nor will they continue to be content or satisfied listening to the Minister of Agriculture and his entertaining speeches.

It is unacceptable that this minister has proposed not a single major new piece of legislation relative to the agricultural industry since assuming that portfolio in 1972. Certainly the minister has extended programs and brought forward amendments to a few others, but the fact remains that no new major or significant piece of legislation has been introduced. That in itself is clear and ample evidence of the lack of commitment by this government and this minister to the agricultural industry.

It has been said that the hon. member for Essex-Windsor wanted to be Minister of Agriculture in the worst way. I might suggest that if what has happened to farm income is any indication, then he certainly has achieved what he set out to accomplish. I hope for the good of the industry this minister will not avoid seizing upon this golden opportunity to lay before the House today some meaningful and concrete plans to deal specifically with the contents of our motion today. Surely the minister will want to make a positive response to the motion, and surely he will not want to resort to his usual recital of ongoing government programs, support and subsidy payments to producers. We must remember that when many of these support programs and subsidy payments are triggered into action, that in itself signals financial difficulties within that particular industry.

Producers deserve and will demand a firm commitment from government that it is prepared, not simply by political statements but rather by action and appropriate legislation, to deal effectively with the industry in order to ensure a return to financial stability. Producers above all are as anxious as any that inflation and stability within our economy be improved and resolved. Producers are heavy spenders, not because of their human nature but because of the nature of their businesses. They are large purchasers of goods and services and, consequently, are suffering extensively because of the mismanagement of the economy by this government.

Producers want and deserve the assurance that they will have access to a greater share of the domestic market. Import penetration has seriously damaged not only primary producers but the whole food processing chain, food processors and manufacturers. We need action and legislation, not to prohibit international trade but rather to limit it to an acceptable level which will permit and create an ongoing incentive for a healthy industry here at home in Canada.

We as a party are convinced that if we are to save our rapidly disappearing fruit and vegetable industry this government must implement seasonal surcharges and automatic surtaxes on a commodity by commodity basis at appropriately prescribed levels based on historic trade patterns. It is essential that this government bargain vigorously and successfully to restore equity in our tariff rates. These rates have existed for over a quarter of a century.

This government must adopt a firm policy of fair trade before free trade. Producers can and will adapt to changing market conditions, but they should not be expected to compete in any marketplace, particularly the marketplace here at home, against heavily subsidized food products and commodities.

Dairy farmers are still looking for a long term dairy policy, not just in words or printed political statements, but in reality and in practice. We recognize that this policy would obviously have to be changed from time to time, but these changes should be negotiated by the industry with the government and they should be signalled to the industry at least 12 months in advance. The dairy farmers continue to call for a reduction of 10 million to 15 million pounds of cheese imports, yet the present government continues to ignore that request. Cheese imports even today remain at the high level of 50 million pounds.

Perhaps the minister will seek an opportunity to address himself to this question as well this afternoon. I hope he will release the study he referred to when the $13.5 million consumer subsidy was dropped recently. This was a decision taken without any consultation with producers or consumers. If any case could be made for such a move, then common sense would indicate that a phase out approach should be utilized.

Beef producers have gone through three of the worst years in the history of their industry. These people want and deserve more up to date and more accurate market information. They must be commended for taking such action on their own. Since 1976 they have called for a Canadian meat import law, yet even today no such legislation appears on the order paper. The record reveals on numerous occasions our full commitment to that type of legislation. Producers and their respective organizations have sought an extension of capital gains deferral to partnerships and incorporated farms.

There is a desperate need to revise the valuation day values, taking into account inflation and other factors which have added artificially to the real production potential value of farm lands. I believe that a once in a lifetime exemption should be available, and it should be available now. Serious consideration should be given to the whole application of capital gains taxation as it relates to farm lands to determine its long term effect and its relationship to, and influence on, farm prices.

We want to know, Mr. Speaker, what efforts are being made in co-operation with commodity organizations to seek out and develop new markets abroad. What effort has the government made to increase the number of personnel trained in and knowledgeable of the agricultural industry and charged with the sole responsibility to promote trade in our embassies and trade offices throughout the world? Perhaps the minister will give a firm commitment to the establishment of an agricultural products export division to work with and assist commodity groups to explore and develop market possibilities abroad.

There still remains, Mr. Speaker, the need to encourage and assist our own marketing boards and marketing commissions so as to place greater emphasis on market development and sales promotion of their own products. We want to know what action has been taken by the government in that regard. Producers want to know what plans the government has to reverse the erosion of responsibility from the Department of Agriculture to other government departments, and producers now under orderly marketing systems want and deserve a clear exemption from the government's latest competition bill. They want this government to take seriously their obligation to contribute far more substantially to research and development funding. Canada's contribution in this regard is nothing more than shameful. No investment can be made today that will pay greater dividends in the future than moneys invested in research and development.

This government continues to ignore the Senate committee report on this subject which recommends an expenditure of 2.5 per cent of the gross national product by 1980. I suppose as we stand here we could look for 1985, but Canada spent less than 1.2 per cent of its gross national product. This is substantially less than comparable expenditures in France, Germany, Japan, Sweden, the U.K. and the U.S. Expenditures in these countries range from 1.7 to 2.4 per cent. In the biological science area the average National Research Council grant was only 6 per cent larger than in 1969 but its purchasing power was 40 per cent less. We are told by qualified people that as little as 4 per cent of total funds are actually available to do research work. The agricultural industry and particularly the primary sector cannot continue to function at the efficiency it has achieved today in the absence of a concerted effort adequately to fund areas of new crop varieties and production methods. This is particularly true in areas such as eastern and western Canada.

One of the fundamental requirements of an efficient food production system is a sound, adequately financed and well co-ordinated research and development capability. We have that potential, Mr. Speaker. We have the facilities and the resources and we possess an excellent intellectual group of scientifically trained academics as well; but we run the high risk of losing this latter resource if proper and prompt action is not taken. My colleagues will be enlarging upon this and making additional suggestions and recommendations in the very limited time available to us this afternoon, but the fact remains that farm income has fallen, and fallen dramatically, since 1975.

It is evident to all that the programs and policies of this government are undermining the agricultural industry. They are not building the industry, they are not developing the industry, and they are not strengthening the industry. The policies of this government serve neither the producer nor the consumer. They weaken our whole Canadian economy.

Canadian producers have accepted and will continue to accept their responsibilities and rise to the challenges that face them. But the time is limited. What is needed now is a government that recognizes the economic state of the industry today and is prepared to respond to that issue in a manner which ensures not only the survival of the industry, but its expansion and growth for the benefit of all Canadians and, indeed, for others throughout the world.

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I would like, first of all, to extend my appreciation to the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Wise) for bringing this motion before the House on an allotted day. Most of the farm community in Canada has been neglected for a long time. A lot of people who live in the cities of our nation when driving through rural areas see a big combine or tractor or a big barn and so on. They do not realize that young farmers, even those who have been in the farm industry for many years, are paying off tremendous mortgages on their farms and paying high prices for their machinery. The countryside may look to the non-farmer as if it is prospering, but if you talk to farmers you will know that they are not prospering in most instances.

The state of our farm economy affects all Canadians, and I welcome the opportunity to contribute to the debate on such an important and, unfortunately, neglected issue. I say neglected because, despite all of the media attention and fuss over Canada's supposed national food policy and the recent food strategy conference here in Ottawa, the government has so far failed to address the real problem confronting farmers today. The government's track record to date has been a classic case of much talk and very little action.

We all know times are tough for farmers across Canada, and indications are the situation is going to get worse. Farm incomes have declined for two years in a row, and the Department of Agriculture predicts net farm income will drop by a further 6 per cent this year. Farm incomes in 1977 were already down 11 per cent from 1976—a year which could be described as one of the darkest for Canadian farmers across this country in recent history. During that year farm incomes plummeted to 20 per cent below 1975 levels.

This morning we received the latest consumer price index released by Statistics Canada. It showed food prices increased 13.4 per cent between February of last year and February of this year. Obviously, there is something wrong with a system that allows prices to increase by over 13 per cent when the producer is receiving as much as 6, 11, and even 20 per cent less for his efforts. This includes not only the farmer but the farmer's wife as well because they very often work closely together in their production.

The blame for declining farm incomes rests squarely with the government in its failure to develop an effective agricultural policy for Canada. Agriculture and food production accounts for more than 40 per cent of our gross national product, and the absence of comprehensive planning in this vital sector threatens both the farmers and consumers. It is time a closer examination was made of Canada's food chain, and particularly the middleman in that chain, to find out why prices are rising while farm incomes are permitted to decline.

More than one farmer has written to me to say he has been forced into bankruptcy. Just last week I received a letter from a farmer in my constituency near St. George, Ontario, stating that "farmers are working themselves into the grave just trying to survive". Indeed, it is becoming very difficult to persuade young people to go into farming, and this is a tragedy. Urban businessmen would like their sons, or sons-in-law, to go into their industries. Why is it that farmers are finding it increasingly more difficult to attract their sons or sons-in-law, daughters and so on, to carry on with the family farming business? Many are abandoning the farm and heading for the cities. It is little wonder farming today is not a viable business proposition for most who are in it. There are some farmers across this country, of course, who are making some money. But generally speaking, farmers are not making a good profit on their investment and labour when confronted with high interest rates on their mortgages and considering the long hours they put in day after day.

I think part of this goes back with the Liberal party. I would suggest it even goes back with the Conservative party. They have taken farmers for granted. They have been able to do this in many cases because both old parties know that most people who were born and raised on a farm and went to a rural school, or to a small district high school, want to stay on the farm. That has been the traditional attitude. In recent years, however, the young people on the farms are taking a different attitude. Obviously the government is not.

I cannot blame young people for wanting to leave the farms today. They are in conflict with themselves. They want to leave the rural life not because they want the good life or the rich life but because they cannot have the rural life with a decent income in return for their labour, their investment and the interest on their mortgage.

Cattle producers have been suffering from depressed prices since 1974, that is three and a half years. I am addressing my remarks to the minister through you, Mr. Speaker, and I hope he is paying attention. Steer calves sell at 30 per cent below the cost of production and top grade cattle sell at 20 per cent below cost. At the same time beef prices to the consumer have increased by 33 per cent. Consumers need protection, but so do farmers. The price of wheat has also declined in the past few years to the point where it is difficult for farmers to meet the cost of production.

A healthy farm economy is in the interests of all Canadians. Already the farm income slide is affecting other sectors of the economy. Hard-pressed farmers purchased far less machinery in 1977, with the result that hundreds of workers have been laid off. This winter over 500 employees were temporarily laid off for a week at the Massey-Ferguson plant at Brantford, in my riding of Brant. Last month over 200 employees were laid off permanently at Massey-Ferguson in Toronto.

Mismanagement of the economy, and not just the farm economy, is at the root of this serious situation. The slowdown in the farm machinery industry is worsened by heavy imports from the United States and the government's failure to encourage the development of a strong domestic farm industry. Imports now account for more than 85 per cent of all the farm machinery sold to Canadian farmers. The declining value of our dollar promises to make new farm implements so expensive that they will be out of the reach of most farmers.

There are a number of steps that could be taken to aid the agricultural industry in Canada. Perhaps the most important is a re-examination of this government's tariff policies— or, I should probably say, the government's lack of tariff policy. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) seems to take pride in the low level of government support Canada provides for farmers compared to other countries. In a speech to the Canadian Bankers' Association last October—that must have been a jolly affair—he proudly pointed out that in Canada, even adding in all provincial plans, less than 4 per cent of gross government spending goes into agriculture, and that Canadian agriculture has the lowest tariffs in the world. In Canada, the average farm tariff is less than one half of one per cent across the board.

Canadian producers have long been asking for tariff equalization with the United States and other countries. This is a serious problem right across the country, but I am most familiar with the plight of fruit and vegetable growers in southern Ontario and the Niagara peninsula, as well as tobacco farmers and fruit and vegetable growers in my own constituency. I am trying not to be parochial here. I am talking about agriculture right across the country and not in one constituency. These farmers have been demanding a seasonal tariff for their produce to prevent the dumping of fruits and vegetables in their markets. This is easy to understand when you consider that last fall frozen or canned peaches could enter this country for 2¼ cents per pound, while the tariff on peaches going into the United States was set at 20 per cent. I ask the minister to consider those statistics very carefully.

Lack of government regulations has also affected the beef industry. The minister has been reluctant to upset trade with the United States and other countries, and producers are suffering. I have already noted the depressed prices producers receive for cattle. Part of the reason is the government's decision to raise this year's quota for imported beef another two million pounds over last year. I am going to repeat that, Mr. Speaker. Part of the reason is the government's decision to raise this year's quota for imported beef another two million pounds over last year. The market has been flooded by low grade beef from Australia and New Zealand that depresses prices across the board. The government is beginning to recognize that high tariff walls are necessary to protect and develop some of our more vulnerable manufacturing industries.

The motion moved today is in five parts, Mr. Speaker, and in twenty minutes I cannot address myself to each part although I agree with the motion in general.

We have a very real problem in this country. As I said earlier, people who live in the cities are paying very high prices for food produced in this country while farm incomes are away down and are going to be down again next year.

Let us look at some of the other human aspects of farming today apart from the statistics, which are bad enough and should clinch the argument if anybody from the government side wishes to refute what I have said. Let us consider the problem of the young farmer who takes a mortgage from the local bank. I talked to a tobacco farmer about two years ago who told me—and I am sure he was not lying—that the interest alone on his mortgage was $12,000 per year. As we all know, tobacco farmers are not making the money they did in the fifties. This is also true of fruit and vegetable growers. In fact, this is true of farming in general. For a young person to buy out a family farm, he has to get into such tremendous debt spread over so many years, and will receive so little for his labour and investment, that it will take him years to catch up, if in fact, he ever does.

Another problem which is not general across the country but affects fruit and vegetable growers and tobacco producers is labour—hired help. There are arguments on both sides. If a person drawing unemployment insurance knows he is going to be called back to work, for him to go through all the red tape of the UIC after he has a temporary job and then get back on UIC until he is called back, he would rather say to himself: "What is the point in going through all that red tape if I am going to be called back to work in three weeks?" There is something wrong there.

Some farmers in my riding have voiced their criticism to me about our local people—Canadians—young as well as middle-aged. To some extent their criticism is justified. Manpower often sends out people who want to go out for the day, have two square meals and then take off. That is not the general picture. A lot of the young people in my constituency, and I am talking about the fruit and vegetable growers, the tobacco growers and so on, put in a pretty good day's work. But not only do farmers have a problem of weather; they have the problem of acquiring good people at the right time.

[Mr. Blackburn.]

In most of these cases I have cited we are talking about planting, which is usually done in late May, and harvesting, which is usually done August through to September. I agree it is difficult for some farmers, particularly the small growers, to keep a man or woman on the payroll from early May to late September or early October. That is one of the reasons it is difficult to employ local farm help.

In view of the facts which I have stated today, why are we cutting down on offshore labour from the Caribbean? We have over one million people registered as being out of work. I know that I am treading on very thin ice here. I know that some of the farmers in the particular fields which I have just referred to prefer offshore labour. I also know that many of them prefer to hire local people, so we have to keep in mind this balance. It seems impossible to hire enough good local people who will work for decent wages. I am not talking about somebody who wants to get away with $2.75 an hour without room and board; I am talking about a lot of farmers who are prepared to pay $3.50 or $4 an hour with room and board or those who are willing to provide meals and transportation back and forth from, say, Brantford to the rural areas. These people are getting fed up with the government's manpower program, the agricultural offshore labour pool, or whatever it is called. They are fed up with the tightening up of the rules and regulations in this regard. On the other hand, I can understand the problem the government faces when it has allowed unemployment to reach one million—the official figure—in this country. I do not think there is any basic dispute if you are talking about the underemployed and people who are off the lists. Taking these into account the total would perhaps be one and a half million Canadians.

I end on this note, Mr. Speaker. I have worked as hard as I can to assist farmers in my riding, and the minister knows because I have sent him many letters. I am not trying to say that they are a special group. They do not want to be looked upon as a special group in our society; they want a fair share from their labour and their investment. At the same time, if they make a profit and they have money they will spend their money. That will then create jobs in the farm implement business, whether in Massey-Ferguson—and I am not any great lover of the Argus Corporation—or White Farm. I do not care which company it is or what that company produces in the way of machinery or other goods for farmers, it works both ways. If farmers are receiving a decent income then the workers in the plants who produce goods for farmers will also receive a decent income. Not only that, but they will retain their jobs.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to rise to speak on the motion put forward by the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Wise). Since most of the issues he has raised have been mentioned by me at some length in many of the speeches I have delivered during the past year, I would have thought there would have been some effort amongst the more literate members of the opposition to acquaint themselves with the content of the speeches made by myself and representatives of the Department of Agriculture.

Apparently this is not the case. Once again this demonstrates just how much importance is placed on agriculture by those occupying the opposition benches who are supposed to be its critics. If more energy was directed toward finding out what was actually happening and there was less criticism for criticism's sake, perhaps they would start living up to the name of their party by becoming a little more progressive.

As I was in the United States yesterday I was unable to talk to the hon. member for Elgin. Perhaps if I had been here I could have said: "Look, to be really constructive today you can say anything you want and we can give second reading to the farm credit bill and have it sent to the committee." Instead we are today wasting the time of the House of Commons on an opposition day.

Paper legislation does not necessarily make good agricultural policy, good food policy or whatever you want to call it. Spokesmen for both the Conservative and New Democratic parties have indicated, Mr. Speaker, that everything was doom and gloom in the agriculture industry in Canada. I can tell the House, and I am sure a lot of hon. members are aware, that is not the situation in the agriculture industry. There are a lot of people who feel quite good about it.

Let me go down the list and talk about some of the producers that are making a decent net income today in agriculture. Egg producers are making a decent net income; poultry farmers raising broilers and turkeys are receiving a decent net income; pork producers are receiving a decent net income; and fluid milk and industrial milk provides a decent net income. These farmers have never been in a position where they have paid so much income tax in their lives before. They only pay income tax on net income, as they should, and they are happy about doing that.

Let us turn to the horticultural industry and find out what they are doing in that industry. I do not have the note here at the moment, but I will find it. The hon. member for Elgin knows very well that in Ontario there are about 20 some producers of horticultural commodities represented on their marketing board and I would challenge him to name just one of those who is not making a net profit. I say to the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn), who spoke on behalf of the New Democratic Party, name one of those people covered under a marketing board or a provincial association of some kind or another who is not making a net income. And that applies across Canada to all who belong to some kind of an agricultural organization.

The poorest group of all at the moment are the potato producers in Canada. They are suffering more than any. They are not in the same position all across Canada. In Alberta and Manitoba they are probably just about breaking even. However, in Ontario, Quebec, Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick the potato producers are losing money because they refuse to organize but instead accept that same old dilapidated marketing system they have always had.

Then the hon. member talked about the beef producers. There has been a bigger loss in that industry and he said we did nothing to prevent it. I suggest he look at the record. The record shows that since August, 1974 we have had import controls almost constantly, with the exception of nine months in 1976. I was a bad fellow because I had import controls. Hon. members will recall that I got into trade wars and so on. I was told that was bad, that I should not get into a trade war with the United States, that great free trading nation to the south of us. The Canadian cattlemen charged in here with everything but their bulls, saying we must back off on this. Whenever I tried to do anything in cabinet, 29 telegrams were sent to my colleagues urging that I not be allowed to do that.

There is such disunity in the beef production industry today it is amazing that any producers are still active in that business. They did not want government to do anything until they got desperate. Then they made all kinds of requests. I can list four and a half pages of what we did in response to what they asked for, such as surcharges, payments and subsidy payments.

I stated at one time that I thought one of the surcharge programs with the United States and other oceanic countries shipping beef meant $100 million to the producers of beef in Canada. The head of the Cattlemen's Association, the managing director or whatever he is called, wrote to me and said, of all things, "Mr. Minister, you are being too conservative." He said it meant a saving of over $200 million in income advantage for the beef producers of Canada.

There are some beef producers in Canada who say they are still not making money. I have seen the books of some of them and they did not make that much in the last year. However, they are few and far between. Those in the cow-calf business are probably the ones who have suffered more than any other group. They have no other production entity to which they can turn. They cannot operate a complete finishing unit. These people were encouraged to get into the cow-calf operations by the provinces, which loaned them millions and millions of dollars. That was because there was going to be a great need for beef for a long time.

The hon. member for Brant stated that we increased the imports of beef into Canada this year. He knows we are a member of the Commonwealth and have trading agreements with its members. We are also a member of, and have signed trading agreements with, GATT.

Beef consumption increased by 4.4 per cent last year. Those countries that belong to the Commonwealth also belong to GATT. They could ask for a 4.4 per cent increase in exports to this country. We did not give it to them. They could ask for compensation from GATT and we would then have to pay that compensation. We would fight it as hard as we could.

Are we going to live in the international trading world or are we going to disappear from it? What do members opposite want us to do? If they want us to break away from the Commonwealth and GATT, let them say so.

The hon. member also talked about farm machinery. I wish to put some facts on the record. Farm implement sales dropped by an estimated 4 per cent in value last year. Quebec, however, bucked the trend with sharply higher purchases. The estimates show a general decline except for Quebec. The separatist premier of that province says that the agricultural situation is very bad, yet they increased their farm machinery purchases by 21 per cent last year.

Let us get the facts straight. Things are not the same all over. In Ontario, the province of the hon. member for Brant, farm machinery sales increased by about 6 per cent. If Massey-Ferguson plants are closing, it is not totally the fault of Canada. There is a general depression in agriculture in all countries of the world, especially those producing surplus food products. We still have more net return to farmers in this country than ever before.

Members opposite talk about how farm income has gone down. We would like to see it up. The hon. member for Elgin knows that those farmers who look after themselves without great masses of government legislation and great reams of paper are more efficient. The hon. member for Elgin was a dairy farmer and he made a good living at it. He told me that himself.

Mr. Wise: That was before you were Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. Whelan: I think he was a better dairy farmer than he is a member of parliament. When he comes to the House, he presents nothing but gloom and doom with regard to agriculture. The people of Elgin sent the hon. member to Ottawa to represent them because they knew he had expertise in agriculture. However, he has not kept up that expertise. He was a better producer of agricultural products than agricultural economics.

Talking about income, the total was 1 per cent ahead of 1976 income and about four tenths of 1 per cent ahead of the previous record of 1975, $10.07 billion. It exceeded the $10 billion mark for the second time in the history of our country. Costs were up, but what caused income to go down was world prices of grain. We export 74 per cent of our production of cereal grain. No other country in the world exports that much. True enough, we are financing the treasuries of countries like Japan, the OPEC countries and the European community.

The hon. member talked about how proud I was when we went to the bankers' meeting. He is damn right I am proud that I do not have to put that much money into the farm economy to make it one of the healthiest and most enviable in the world. It is right here in Canada, put together by ten provinces working together with the federal government.

No one else in the northern hemisphere can brag like I do. Everyone in this country should brag about it. We have one of the most productive and efficient agricultural industries in the world. In the last 30 years we have increased our productivity by about 500 per cent. This is something to which we can point. That is why the Chinese, Russians and those from other socialist countries come to see how we operate. They want to know how we can be so productive. They cannot understand how a country with only 5 per cent of its people in agriculture can produce so much for themselves and so much for the other people of the world. It is because we have the know-how and the ability.

We still have incentives in our programs to be that productive. We are not telling the Canadian farmers this year to discontinue wheat and grain production, as they are with the supply management system in the United States. I was there yesterday. They are going to come out with $75 an acre payments to keep the land idle. They have all kinds of other programs. When I left Washington this morning, the farmers were there by the thousands. They were in the offices and all over the buildings. The senators and congressmen react to that, especially the senators. Every senator has some rural constituents no matter where he is from, whether it be New York or California. It would not hurt if our members in the House of Commons had more rural constituents. Maybe they would then pay more attention to them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: The hon. member's colleagues go to the city of Windsor in my constituency, which is 96 per cent urban, and lambaste me because of the price of food. When we came back this morning, I asked him if he had said anything about marketing boards. He replied that he sure had but the media did not report it. I have no way of knowing whether it was an unfair speech or an unfair reporter. This is something I find a bit hard to accept.

The hon. member for Elgin talked about the roll-over tax. I agree with him, it is important. The hon. member for Elgin could have said that this government did something revolutionary, and parliament sanctioned it, when it allowed the transfer of farm property to a son or daughter.

Mr. Wise: That is the family farm.

Mr. Whelan: Yes, the family farm. At lot of farms are incorporated and are now family corporations. No other country has what we have at the present time. If there is an inequity and we can find a way to get around it, we will because we want the family farm to continue.

Many people talk about efficiency. The former chairman of the Food Prices Review Board and other learned and knowledgeable people said maybe we want bigger and more efficient units. Twenty universities in the United States of America—not just one—all came to the conclusion that the efficient family farm is the most important thing in our society in terms of food production. Those universities did not point to the great socialist type of farming, the great co-operative type of farming or anything else. They pointed to the family farm. Twenty universities conducted that survey, and they all said the same thing. We are also strong believers in family farms, marketing boards, programs, etc. These are the kinds of things we want.

With regard to marketing boards, there was a ministers' conference held in Winnipeg last January, and every minister there supported that type of program. Some say there has been no consultation and that we have no programs, but no two groups work closer together than the provincial ministries of agriculture and the federal Department of Agriculture in this confederation of ours. If all federal-provincial relations were conducted with that kind of harmony, I am sure no one would be suggesting that there should be a separatist movement in our country. Programs which have been worked out and upon which we are presently working are worked out in harmony. Stabilization programs and so forth are worked out with our provincial counterparts to ensure the best for this nation, which, as I said earlier, is the envy of the whole world.

With regard to production increases, efficiency and exports, the hon. member talked about the price of food, but he neglected to say that in 1977 alone it was the price of imported food which increased. Some of that food could very well be produced here. There are no restrictions or quotas on hog production in western Canada, but hog production there has decreased by about 50 per cent in a little over a year. Every working day last year we imported $1 million worth of pork. We imported $222 million worth of pork last year. The fact that products are coming in is not the fault of the Canadian farmer. The productivity of the Canadian farmer has increased by 500 per cent in 35 years. No other part of our society can claim that. All I want is for farmers to do some things for themselves, as the vast majority of them have been doing.

Earlier in my presentation I referred to beef farmers who refused to do some of the things other farmers in the dairy business, the horticultural business or the poultry business are willing to do. These other producers have been working together, running their own independent farms and selling their resources through marketing boards, associations and so forth. We should not be using the medieval system of bartering which is still used in the beef industry today. Producers are not saying "My beef animal is worth so much". They are saying "How much will you give me for it?" and bargaining from there, like they did before the time of Christ. Hon. members will remember that Christ threw the moneychangers out of the temple, and it is about time people in the beef industry recognized that they must do the same thing.

The hon. member spoke about Canada's exports. We are in a hurly-burly world when it comes to exports at the present time. Many countries are retrenching. They have rich treasuries. The United States said it would not get into a surplus dairy position, but it is in a surplus dairy position today. The United States said it would not enter markets other dairy producing countries were in, but it is starting to do so.

Needless to say, there was a lengthy discussion about that yesterday. If the Americans do enter those markets, hon. members can be sure we will be asking for compensation. Exports have risen every year since 1969. That includes the very difficult years of 1975 and 1976. Preliminary estimates for 1977 indicate that agricultural exports increased by more than $400 million in 1977. That represents an increase—not a decrease—of more than 11 per cent in one calendar year. That is an enviable record for any country.

There are approximately 24 million people in Canada. Canada is a northern hemisphere country which competes with such economic giants as the United States of America, which has a population of more than 230 million people. Canada competes with the European Economic Community which serves 260 million people. The EEC spends 74 per cent of the $15 billion it spends on its operations on agriculture, and the health of the European agricultural industry is not half as good as the health of the industry in Canada. When the head of the EEC was here the other day he said the EEC spends too much on agriculture, and everyone laughed. I said I agreed that it spends too much and that we have to compete because of its stupidity in the way it manages its agricultural economy.

In Europe there is a surplus of skim milk powder, fat products and so forth to a total of two million tons. About four years ago egg production in Canada decreased by one half of one per cent. A small percentage like that amounts to billions and billions of pounds when it comes to skim milk powder. At the beginning of 1978 there were no unsold surplus dairy products in the Dominion of Canada. The dairy industry in Canada is run by the Canadian Dairy Commission. Somebody said something today about no consultation with regard to taking a $13 million subsidy off skim milk powder. I have just finished reading an article in a great Montreal newspaper which says that skim milk costs 40 cents a quart in supermarkets in Montreal. It should cost that because skim milk is not skim milk powder. Skim milk powder costs $1.06 and produces four quarts of a highly nutritious drink. That amounts to 26.5 cents a quart. That is cheaper than Coke, ginger ale or anything of a similar weight, and these other beverages have no food value whatsoever.

Some say we are bad fellows when we transfer payments, index pensions for veterans and others and index family allowances. We transfer additional new dollars to the provinces to take care of poor people, and then we are condemned.

Some say there is no consultation. The hon. member for Elgin is from a very productive agricultural area. He is a good farmer from way down in southwestern Ontario. I would like to say to him that we did not consult when we put on the subsidy either. The agreement we have with the dairy farmers of Canada is designed to produce a return. If there need be social services in this country, let us not have the agricultural community providing them directly. We are already producing the cheapest food in the world when related to the earning power of our people. About 13.8 per cent of the earnings of Canadians is spent on food. In the United States the figure is 15 per cent. People accuse me of not having a food policy. Some people suggest that we have millions of bureaucrats looking into every can of soup or beans, into every chicken house, into every pig yard and everything else. One could imagine the cost if that was added to the cost of food, as is the case in some socialist countries where 30 per cent, 35 per cent or 40 per cent of their budgets are spent on food production.

I am proud of the system we have in this country, and our desire is to make it even better.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: People from all over the world come to see what we are doing in our country, and those who are not getting the economic return they should are being told that there are mechanisms for them to use. Those mechanisms are provided by the most democratic institution in the world, the parliament of Canada. If producers want to work together, those mechanisms are available. To those who think that that big country to the south of us is getting ready to be a great liberal trader because of the tremendous pressure which is on its government, I can say that that is not the impression I came away with from Washington yesterday. The United States is willing to lower the tariff on soybeans 60 per cent. That reduces the price 36 cents a bushel, leaving 24 cents a bushel. That still stops me or any farmer producing beans in southern Ontario from taking advantage of the market in Ohio and Michigan.

● (1612)

The other day the price went up to $7. To buy $7 beans in the U.S., you have to add 84 cents because of our devalued money. Did the trade pay our own producers that here in Canada? No, I can tell hon. members they did not do that. They cheated them out of over 90 cents a bushel. When they were buying American beans for nearly $7 in U.S. funds, they were paying $6.65 in Canadian funds for beans in Canada. If I had the same advantage as the buyer or processor had to go to Ohio, Michigan or Chicago to buy or sell my beans over there, I would be in a much better position because I could have loaded up with duty free fertilizer from Ohio or potash from Saskatchewan and brought it back in my big truck—if I had a big truck. I do not have a big truck because I am Minister of Agriculture.

I am just pointing out our disadvantages, and the advantages which the processors have over us. The United States does not intend to wipe out the 60 cents a bushel soybean tariff because the law only allows them to go down to 60 per cent. They cannot lower it below 60 per cent because the law does not allow it. Can you imagine a brave senator or congressman giving the administration the right to wipe out 100 per cent of the tariff? I cannot imagine that after yesterday. I could not imagine it before when I criticized the U.S. ambassador for running around and talking about liberalized trade. Tom Enders knows what their laws are, he knows how far they can go, and he knows they cannot go as far as we can because we are the freest agricultural trading nation in the world. We have been successful at that.

The hon. member for Brant referred to 1 per cent. I think it shows that industry is protected about 14 per cent and agriculture about 6.5 per cent or 7 per cent. We do not protect with tariffs any of the products that come into Canada that are high in price. I am talking about such products as coffee, spices and all these other products we import into Canada. We do not protect them with any significant tariff, and practically all of them are duty free. Many other countries do not do that. They look at that as revenue with which to offset some of their other costs of production. We have import controls on many products, and many people in western Canada think they are free traders. I do not know.

I see here the hon. member who used to be head of the grain commission in Canada, a very knowledgeable person. He knows there have not been free traders since 1935 when R. B. Bennett imposed the Wheat Board on the people of Canada because of the horrible system of marketing grain in western Canada. I cannot even bring a bushel of wheat into Canada—and I approve of the system—to do research as Minister of Agriculture unless I obtain a permit. That applies to any of the grains under the Canadian Wheat Board. No matter what the world price might be, whether it is cheap or expensive—and not many people will want to bring it in if it is expensive—you cannot bring those grains into Canada under that system.

With regard to the Canadian Dairy Commission, opposition members say we have done nothing. We had no quotas on cheese before the Minister of Agriculture placed a 50 million pound quota on special cheeses coming into Canada. All the dairy producers in the dairy processing industry heralded that as a breakthrough. It might be of interest to the hon. member for Elgin and his party to know that the 50 million pound quota is not being filled. Cheese consumption has gone up in Canada in two years by about 18 per cent. That 18 per cent is all domestically produced cheese. Am I supposed to go out and pound people's heads and say, "Get into cheese production"?

When the House checks what we have done in the dairy industry they will find that we have increased production of condensed milk by 38 per cent in one year. Why did we do that? That was done under the transfer of fat program. When you have condensed milk on the world market, you do not have butter or skim milk powder; you just take some of the moisture out of milk. It can be added back or used in that form. It is in little cans that can be easily used in thousands of different places in the world. It is in a much better form than skim milk powder. We know that butter cannot be used in many countries, so why produce a product that will be financing the treasuries of other countries?

Advertising has been mentioned. The hon. member knows that the Dairy Commission has received $4 million. We can give an example of what the marketing boards can do. We can go to Alberta which has some of the strictest provincial marketing boards that I have ever seen. Last year, with the cheap price of beef—there was never a time when the consumer got more beef for an hour's wages—a phenomenal thing took place in Alberta, which has the most expensive poultry in all of Canada. Perhaps it is slightly more expensive in British Columbia, but the producers in Alberta get the best return. Do you know, Mr. Speaker, that consumption of broiler chickens increased in Alberta 10 per cent when the national average was only 2.3 per cent? What does that tell you? The producers themselves sold the chicken.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I regret to interrupt the minister, but the time allotted to him has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, I will not take up much more time because this is an opposition day, and I appreciate the opportunity to participate in this debate.

When we talk about trade, I think we should have some symposia on this subject. We are developing marketing programs and working harder in that area than any other nation in the world. I am often criticized for travelling, but when I travel abroad it is generally because a group of associations have come to the Government of Canada and said: "We think the minister could have some impact on such countries as Brazil to sell our livestock, or on the Balkans to sell our poultry, breeding stock or livestock, or some of the farm machinery we make here." As the hon. member for Brant said, and I agree with him, we should have something like the auto pact with respect to farm machinery, although his leader criticized it the other day. I think we could make some improvements to it because we can see some failings in the auto pact. But if we had not had the auto pact, we would be in the same position with regard to auto parts as we are with farm machinery, which comes in duty free. That is something that many people do not know. Even many farmers think that farm machinery has a tariff on it. We can bring machinery parts in duty free while an American farmer cannot do so. I think the duty is 7 per cent on parts bought here and taken back to the United States.

Another way to discourage our know-how and spirit of entrepreneurship is to try to create a parts system for machinery in Canada. This is just impossible and is not warranted because one has to pay duty to supply the North American market.

The motion reads in part:

—encourage the expansion and improvement of agricultural research to ensure efficient production techniques;

I have never heard so much talk about research and what is happening to it, yet I have not heard one hon. member, one of the scientists, point out to me one research area that is suffering. We have done some of the greatest research in agriculture. There are no in-house research projects for which I am responsible that are suffering or that are going to suffer, because I am the one who makes the decision for any contracting out. Universities will go to some members in the House and say to them: "We must have agricultural research". That is contracting out. Make sure you let your constituents know that you made representations to the Minister of Agriculture and he responds to your request by giving a grant to a university to do agricultural research.

Provincial ministers have also said they do not want any more contracting out. They are proud of our CDA research group, the greatest in the world. We signed an agreement yesterday to share expertise and research with the United States. Thus we will share the research, not duplicate it. We think that is the best way of going about it. Instead of their doing research and us doing the same kind of research, which would be a complete duplication, we could have a shared program.

I should like to refer to direct food aid. Recently I made our pledge to the United Nations; it was approximately two weeks ago. Once again Canada is in the forefront of food aid and food aid development of every description. We are not ashamed of anything. I am not ashamed when I suggest some kind of cartel to sell our food on the world market in order to receive a decent price for it from countries such as Japan, the European Economic Community and the OPEC countries. These countries are stockpiling our food at below the cost of production. Then people, including hon. members on both sides of the House, ask us to use stablization programs to make sure our producers stay in business. They are still pointing out the great economic strides being made by countries like Japan. That indicates how powerful these countries are. The very system we operate under is based on stabilizing our commodities to stay in business. Then they are thrown on the world market. We pound one another on the head. What does all this economic nonsense add up to? Should we subsidize the treasuries of those countries? Should our funds be used in such a manner?

As I have indicated, we spend the least of any country in the world percentagewise. The budget of my department only amounts to 2 per cent of total federal expenditures. When all provincial and federal expenditures across Canada are added, one will find approximately 4 per cent goes to agriculture. We have a healthy, productive agricultural entity. The organization we have allows farmers to look after themselves. People say that the bureaucracy is running these agricultural entities which I am talking about, those people who have net incomes. They are not run by public service bureaucracy, they are run by the producers themselves. In some instances even consumers are on the board. They are running one of the most efficient ships in the world.

I think I would be remiss if I did not end up with a four letter word: eggs. What other product went down in price 3.4 per cent last year and still gives a very fair return to the producers? They receive a net profit for their investment, for the total cost of operation, for their managerial ability, etc. Some people have indicated that it is wrong for farmers to make a constant, steady income. They are efficient producers. I have added the word "efficient" because generally people do not. Never has there been a time in our history when an hour's wage would buy so many eggs as it does now. An hour's wage buys approximately eight dozen eggs.

When I was a young man, I remember working in a factory. I received 55 cents an hour for my work. At that time a dozen eggs cost 45 cents, a pound of beef cost 50 cents and a pound of butter cost 46 cents. It almost took an hour's wage to buy one pound of those products. Never before in our lives has an hour's wage bought so much. Our export policy, agricultural policy, food policy, or whatever one wants to call that humble-jumble, is the best in the world.

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, as I rise to take part in the debate on the motion proposed by the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Wise), I cannot help but think Canadian farmers are looking very closely at what we say about their declining incomes. After having heard what the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) said today, I feel somewhat inadequate. When it comes to bragging, I do not hold a candle to that minister. Sometimes I think perhaps he has missed his calling and should be travelling the world in order to inform them of how great things are in the Canadian farming industry. He is excellent at telling our farmers that they have never had it so good, but he forgot to deal with the motion entirely. He forgot to explain how he intends to deal with farm incomes which have dropped approximately 40 per cent in the last two years.

No one on this side of the House is saying that we are not proud of our farmers. No one is indicating that they are not efficient, nor among the best in the world. We agree with the Minister of Agriculture when he indicates that.

Mr. Oberle: They have to be good to withstand this mess.

Mr. Schellenberger: As my hon. colleague has so ably stated, they must be excellent farmers in order to continue to produce under the conditions they have faced over the last number of years. One must consider inflation, the cost of inputs and the lack of policy. As the hon. member for Elgin indicated, no bills have been put before the House dealing with the problem of net farm incomes. Farmers who are facing the 1978 crop season are doing so wondering just where their incomes will go this year.

Comparisons were brought out today concerning farm cash receipts. They show that receipts for January 1978 over 1977 are down .9 per cent. This is the most recent figure. Net farm income in Canada dropped 11 per cent from 1976 to 1977. Agriculture Canada forecasts for 1978 indicate a further decline of 6.1 per cent. All the bragging about the greatness of this industry will not help farmers balance their books at the end of 1978.

The problem of decreasing farm incomes has not been dealt with. Any farmer can attest to this when he commences his operations this spring. Almost all farm input costs are up. Seed, labour rates, chemicals, fertilizer, the entire gamut, have risen in cost.

I should like to put on the record certain statistics. The gross income for 1976 over 1975 is $33,000 compared to $31,000. Net farm incomes dropped from $12,900 to $11,933 for 1976 over 1975. From 1972 to 1977, the costs have risen 9 per cent over a decrease in income of 1 per cent.

I should like to refer to some individual statistics to indicate what is happening to farmer input costs in Canada today. His total input costs in 1977 over 1976— and this is based on 1961 equalling 100 per cent—went from 232.2 per cent in 1976 to 247.2 per cent in 1977. Mixed fertilizers are up three points, and straight fertilizers are up 3.4 per cent. Land and farm buildings have increased from 285 per cent in 1976 to 297 per cent in 1977. Farm machinery and motor vehicles have increased from 195 per cent in 1976 to 210 per cent in 1977. The same is true with regard to feed, electricity, farm labour and petro-chemical products. All have risen in cost from 1976 to 1977. One could go back to 1961 to show the ever-increasing cost on a percentage basis.

In many cases farmers have had to increase the debt loads they are carrying. If one looks at the total estimated farm credit in millions of dollars over the last number of years, and puts it on a per farm basis, the trend is shown. Perhaps this is not indicative of what has happened, because only farms consisting of more that 50 acres have been included. In 1974 the total credit on all farms was $6,904 million. In 1975 it increased to $8,170 million. In 1976 it went up to $9,536 million. I am sure the 1977 statistics would show a similar increase if they were available.

I should like to refer to average interest rates. Since farmers are required to borrow more money, interest rates have increased as well. In 1974 the average interest rate was 8.8 per cent for borrowed capital. In 1975 it increased to 9.2 per cent. In 1976 it increased to 9.6 per cent. That is another input cost a farmer has to pay in order to continue to meet his balance of payments, or deficit as we like to talk about it in this country. On a per farm basis again, the credit that each farmer on the average has to pay in his operation in 1976 was up from $20,938 in 1975 to $25,158, an increase on the average farm of almost $5,000. These statistics show every individual case over the last five years, and we could go beyond that if we wanted to use these statistics. They show that farm input costs have increased at a very rapid rate.

The minister referred to farm machinery. The cost of a self-propelled combine jumped 89.7 per cent in the years 1973 to 1977. Let us compare the increase in the cost of a tractor with the increase in the cost of an automobile during the same period of time. If the individual consumer had to pay the same percentage increase for his automobile, he would scream to high heaven. During that same period of time the cost of an automobile increased by 24 per cent, yet the cost of a tractor went up by 64 per cent, and for a combine the increase was 89 per cent. It is no wonder farmers are asking why they are consistently having to pay more through input costs than other members of society.

Consumers are always talking about constant dollars based on 1961 statistics. I thought it might be of interest if we did the same in respect of farm commodities. Using the 1961 index base as 100, the cost in relation to a bushel of barley was 217 per cent higher in 1975. If we take the price of a bushel of barley in 1971 as being 75 per cent and work that back to 1930, that bushel of barley would have been worth $1.32. The same bushel of barley based on 1961 dollars would be worth $1.02 in 1975. To produce that bushel of barley in 1930, on the 1961 index of 100 it would cost 41.7 cents. To produce it in 1975 would cost $2.17. This shows that a farmer producing a bushel of barley today has a cost five times greater than in 1930 but is getting less for the same bushel of barley. It costs twice as much as it did in 1961 to produce, but the farmer is getting only 20 cents more per bushel than in 1961.

One can relate these statistics to hogs and cattle, and in all cases in constant dollars farmers are in worse shape today than they were during the years of the depression.

An hon. Member: Oh, come on!

Mr. Schellenberger: Members can well ask how the farmer has been able to exist under these conditions. The only reason is that he has become more efficient. Small farmers have been driven off the farms by these cost increases resulting from the inefficiency of our system in providing farmers a fair return on production.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. member for St. Catharines is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Parent: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member opposite indicated that small farmers are being driven off the land. That is a false statement, because they are not. I happen to be a small farmer. My family still farms effectively and very efficiently, and they are making a good living.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hon. member may have a very valid point of argument, but it is certainly not a point of order.

Mr. Schellenberger: Mr. Speaker, all I can say in response to that interjection is that the hon. member should look again at the statistics. Today the number of people on farms is less than 6 per cent of the population. Not many years ago, probably just before 1968, some 17 per cent of the people of Canada were living on farms.

Let us have a look at what the consumer has to pay for his food today. Canadians are paying the lowest percentage of their disposable income on food. In 1976 Canadians spent only 13.8 per cent of their disposable income on food. This compares very favourably with other countries; 15 per cent by the Americans, 19.2 per cent by the French, 21 per cent by the British and 26 per cent by the Italians. As Canadians we spend proportionately less for our food than the people of most other nations, and this is at a time when our farmers are incurring higher and higher production costs.

Members of this party placed a motion before the House giving specific suggestions on how to increase the income of farmers. We also suggested that the Minister of Agriculture look very seriously at ways of decreasing input costs as well as the price of their commodities. Action is needed now if we are to improve the agricultural income picture and alleviate the constraints which are stifling growth within the agricultural sector.

Before dealing with some specific areas where attention is needed, it should be underlined, as it was underlined by the hon. member for Elgin, that a healthier national economy would definitely improve the income position of farmers and the agricultural sector of Canada. While this is a simple and somewhat obvious conclusion, it needs to be stated. We sometimes forget that the best producers in the country are also consumers who are confronted with the same increases in the cost of living as others and, therefore, need the same increases in their disposable incomes as those in urban climates.

Where are the prime areas where we would like to see action? First, we would like to see action in the field of taxation. Let us allow our farmers to keep more of their earnings, and I suppose this idea could be extended to all people in the country. We feel that one of the areas which should specifically be designated is the area of capital gains. We realize that the capital gains structure for family farms is excellent. However, the people who are left out are the corporate farmers. Many farmers were persuaded by government policy in 1971, when the capital gains tax was first brought in, to incorporate their operations. A large percentage of those corporate farms are in fact family farms. We have suggested over and over again that this method of capital gains should be extended to the corporate farm.

At the same time a large percentage of our farmers in Canada are over the age of 55, and many of them will soon be seeking retirement. If they sell their property now, because land prices from 1971 to 1978 have increased so rapidly a great percentage of the sale would go to capital gains. Many of these farmers would move into the cities for their retirement where a house would cost approximately $60,000 to $70,000. They might retire with, say, $140,000. A home in most towns, and I am only familiar with Alberta, will cost that farmer between $65,000 and $70,000. That comes off the $140,000. By the time he pays $30,000 or $40,000 in capital gains tax he has very little money to place in the bank for retirement. We are suggesting that every farmer be allowed a once-in-a-lifetime capital gains tax-free sale.

In order to combat the problem of price and, subsequently, income fluctuation, attention should be given to a more coherent stabilization policy. We now have the Western Grain Stabilization Act, and we have the Agricultural Stabilization Act. Many of us in western Canada feel there should be regional differences built into those stabilization acts. In the beef industry we find that consistently producers in eastern Canada are getting $4 to $5 more per hundred than we are in western Canada. At the same time the average is based on beef right across the country. Certainly, regional differences in our stabilization plan should be built in.

The hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. Hamilton) and myself have both proposed that individual stabilization plans should be built into the farmer's operation. There are a number of ways that this could work. The provincial department of agriculture in Alberta had a team of consultants examine the feasibility of such an income averaging scheme. Their suggestion was that the farmers be allowed to open a bank account with a minimum deposit term of one year and a maximum deposit term of seven years, and that the deposit be a minimum of $1,000. The farmers would have to be in the age group of 18 to 70, and only income from farm operations could be deposited into the fund. After examining the plan the management consultants concluded that income averaging trust accounts were indeed feasible and, if implemented, would help stabilize the rural economy and the prices of farm supplies.

As everyone realizes, there are cycles in the agricultural commodity phases. A farmer in a high cycle would be able to put part of his income in a tax-free account and withdraw that money when his net income was low. It could be further expanded to allow—as in the western grain stabilization fund—for fluctuations of government money at a time when the whole region is in a low income position.

Taxation and stabilization methods can do only part of the job. At present we are lagging behind the United States in agricultural productivity. Some of our traditional export markets for farm products are being eroded. It seems to me that one of the major reasons for this sluggishness is in the federal government's almost exclusive emphasis on price stability as achieved through supply management schemes. What we are suggesting is that the government place more emphasis on the marketing end of the marketing board and much less emphasis on the supply end of the supply management board.

Surely as everyone realizes, farmers like to produce everything that they are capable of producing; but when told that they have to live under quotas and that their input costs are guaranteed, a percentage of them could become sluggish and inefficient in their operations. We are stating that the Department of Agriculture should have a policy in marketing boards emphasizing the marketing end and de-emphasizing the supply management end of it. As well, it should increase the number—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but I have to inform him that his allotted time has expired. Nevertheless, he may continue if there is unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Schellenberger: Mr. Speaker, I thank hon. members. I will be very brief because others of my colleagues would like to address the House on this matter.

The last area that I would like to cover very quickly is renewable energy, and this goes along with the research end of the department. I think it is imperative that one of the areas that farmers can save money in terms of their input costs is in the field of energy. The department should be encouraging by way of research areas of renewable energy such as biomass and solar energy. This is an area I would like to see emphasized as much as possible in the future.

We have put forward an excellent motion. We have extended to the minister five areas which he should consider so as to increase the net income of farmers across this country. I urge the members of this House to support this motion.

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I am particularly pleased that the official opposition has chosen such an important matter as agriculture to conclude this important series of opposition days before Easter. I hope this Lenten period will be beneficial to all Canadian farmers, not only in Quebec but throughout Canada.

Agriculture is the most important industry, since it provides every human being with the necessary food to ensure his survival. One may be educated, have all kinds of degrees and great knowledge, but the fact is that a man must feed himself each day to recuperate and start again the next day. And it is with food coming from the agricultural sector that most human beings can recuperate from day to day. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, farming is the most important profession on earth, but unfortunately that sector has found and is still finding it very difficult to have its rights recognized, to obtain a fair income equivalent to that of workers in other sectors of economic activity.

Mr. Speaker, I remember having to go one day to a specialist in a hospital. Of course, those people who dispense their science to the sick have the right to be paid for their services. That is absolutely normal. I asked him for a bill. In those days, there was no hospital insurance, and you had to pay your own hospital expenses so I said to my specialist: For the love of God, let me have a bill and I will pay you. He pulled out of his drawer, a book containing a list of fees.

So, I told my good friend to spare himself the trouble of reading the list, or even of showing it to me because I was unable, at that time to show him my own book with the list of the rates I could charge those who availed themselves of my services: I had no such book. So then, I said to my specialist: "make me out a bill so I can pay you." He insisted on telling me what his fee was. On hearing it, I understood that at the going rate, some years ago, even at $2 an hour, it would take me 250 hours of work to pay him for his own four hours of work. As we both had the same number of hours in a day, and in a year, I told him: "I shall have to live to a ripe old age to be able to pay you, and if the other professionals with whom I deal charge the same rate, I shall never live long enough to pay all of you."

But he understood that the work of the farmer is just as important as that of any other person, in any other profession, because I had said to him: "Your work is essential because you repair bodies; but, on the other hand, I feel that my work is also just as important because the bodies that you heal, before they become ill, I have to feed them."

So, Mr. Speaker, I feel it is good that we should pause a moment today to think upon the part the farmer plays in our society. The farming community, Mr. Speaker, have rights, and I wholeheartedly agree that in the past few years we have progressed tremendously far. I recall, Mr. Speaker, that in hard times, during the depression, from 1930 to 1940, many farmers had incurred indebtedness after the first world war, during the inflation years, when people were buying land at extremely high prices and when farm products were selling at very good prices.

This easy period was followed by a decline in prices, while obligations remained the same; the farmers who had committed themselves at that time, were deep in debt, but had no money to pay. It was at that time, between 1930 and 1935, that the Conservative government of Prime Minister Bennett introduced a piece of legislation in this House which was passed by Parliament and was known as the Farmers Creditors Arrangement Act. Under this Act, creditors were required to accept reductions of monies owed them as well as agreements with borrowers so that those farmers could keep their farms, in order, in the years following, to continue their operations, and eventually pay off their debts.

Mr. Speaker, I was forced during these years—and I am not ashamed to say so—to turn with all the other people who were in the same situation, to wards the so-called "back to the land" movement. They got rid of the unemployed in cities by sending them to the so-called settlers' parishes. They were expatriated and left in misery. Today, we see abandoned churches and houses in many parishes which were built with enormous sacrifice and miseries during these years. As far as I am concerned, I was among the lucky ones. I was a farmer and I am not ashamed of it because Canada was precisely built during these first years, these first parishes, these first towns by people named "settlers". This word means that they settled, reclaimed land for cultivation, cut down trees, built farms to expand our national heritage.

I thank the Providence, Mr. Speaker, for giving me the opportunity to have this forum today to explain the colonization to those who do not understand anything to farm workers, to those who are the real builders of this country. It is time, Mr. Speaker, that we did some colonization in the minds and the brains of those who control finance in this country, who think only in terms of profits, stockpiling wealth and forget that there are people who deserve to be paid and to live. Mr. Speaker, I think that today's motion is a good one. Earlier I listened very attentively to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan). I did not have the opportunity to hear his whole speech because I was held up outside the House in an important committee. I had to be excused to come and take part in this debate.

Mr. Speaker, in all honesty I would like to make my contribution and second the efforts of all those parliamentarians, on either side of the House, who really want to ensure the survival of our agricultural sector.

Mr. Speaker, I recognize that in the last few years giant steps have been made in the dairy industry. But, on the other hand, just today I received representations from milk producers who have not had the opportunity in the last few months to deliver their production and get paid for it. That is unfortunate, Mr. Speaker.

Imagine, for example, if public servants of this Parliament—and there are thousands of them—would be forced at a given moment to work without getting paid every second week. Today is Wednesday, and you should have seen the number of public servants going into banks to cash their pay cheques, which I hope they earned well. On the other hand, you would have seen the number of people in front of the office of the Treasury Board to claim their pay cheques if they had been denied them today. That is the same feeling experienced by farm producers and milk producers. Those people must capitalize heavily.

Mr. Speaker, it can be boring to quote statistics, but I think that it is necessary from time to time. In 1975, the average capital investment for farms was $135,000. This is a lot of money, and to be able to stay on the farm, especially in dairy production, you must invest even more money. I would like to quote some figures because I believe that it is necessary to see in what direction we are going. In 1850, and some may say that this is old history and that they do not care to hear about it, but we do care about our history. This week, the Prime Minister of Canada quoted whole pages of our history during a visit to Western Canada. I think that he was right and that it is unfortunate that our young people do not know the history and the origins of their country better.

Yesterday, we had in Ottawa students from all provinces of Canada. I was able like many others, for instance, like the hon. member for Riviere-du-Loup-Temiscouata (Mr. Gendron) to meet these young people from Riviere-du-Loup and to see that they were very interested in this institution and in our proceedings. They visited the galleries and many of them were quite surprised to see that the French-speaking and English-speaking parliamentarians were able to meet, to exchange views, because they have been taught that we should hate each other and were not allowed to meet. It is therefore essential that our young people learn about our history, Mr. Speaker. This is why I want to quote some true figures to see if there is really nothing to be done to save our agriculture, which can not only provide food for the Canadian people, but also, because of the richness of our soil, produce a certain amount of food to ease the misery and hunger of human beings in other countries.

In 1850, the Canadian farmer provided for the needs of four people. He needed all of his time to do so. In 1960, the farmer could provide for the needs of 28 people. In 1976, which is not very long ago, the farmer could provide for the needs of 55 people. According to current estimates, the population of Canada will increase from 22.5 millions to 27 millions in 1990, if we stop allowing abortions, of course. We can therefore conclude that the farmer will then have to feed even more people. However, it is important to note that in 1930, the Canadian labour force amounted to four million people, of whom $1.3 million, or 33 per cent, were farmers.

But in 1965, the work force had risen to 9.3 million, of which 0.48 million or 5 per cent only were in farming. Therefore, food requirements will increase in coming years, which means that if we really want our farmers to be able to produce enough to feed all Canadians, they will have to invest more, to produce more through higher mechanization, which means higher expenditures. So production costs will increase. Something has to be done. More stability will have to be ensured to young farmers.

I live in a rural area and I must speak to these problems. I meet these people every weekend. I get letters and phone calls and as lately as today, I was asked: "What are you going to do about our quotas? Are you going to do something?" Mr. Speaker, we did fool ourselves. As early as 1955, when I was an active farmer living off the land, I was fighting against a product called margarine that was invading the market. We were asking the government to protect us, to protect our dairy industry against margarine. We were told there was no danger, it was a low-quality product, it was not dangerous, it could never replace butter, and so forth. Well, Mr. Speaker, behind that were big corportions, a powerful organization capable of taking over the market for that product, and today, Mr. Speaker, I am not blaming the consumers.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I regret to have to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired. He may continue with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Thank you. Mr. Speaker. My, such generosity today, how amazing! I thank you and I shall not take advantage of it.

I simply want to say this: we are now paying for our nearsightedness: this product has invaded the market, it now replaces the dairy product. As for the minister, who is listening to me very closely from his seat, I am convinced that deep down he knows that if this year, when the next dairy year is announced, and I hope he will announce the policy very soon and there will be improvements instead of condemnations, the consumption of dairy products has decreased, it is precisely because more dairy produce substitutes are consumed, and today, that is a well-established fact on the market, prices have gone up. Margarine is just as expensive as butter. So what should we do? I should like to propose something, Mr. Speaker. It is nothing new, it was done under a minority government and gave concrete results. Under a minority government, there was a discount policy for the consumption of whole milk. It does not sound like much, a nickel a quart, but when you add up all the quarts, millions of dollars have been paid in discounts to Canadian families for the consumption of whole milk.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the minister why we could not return to that policy because it was a human policy and it would be beneficial to families with several children. I understand that are converting to the metric system. Today it is called a litre. It is eight ounces less than a quart, so at 5 cents that would represent a substantial discount for families. So as not to overburden the neighbour, he may not have any children but in the present system we must still pay for the discount the other one is getting, since we have a higher gross national product and there is a lack of income available to families to be able to increase production made by Canadians and for Canadians, that is where the discount mechanism comes in. This discount mechanism could be paid by new credit, not by chartered bank borrowings, not by taxes on individuals, but by credit created and minted by the Bank of Canada and made available to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) and the Canadian Dairy Commission.

The Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) were telling us not long ago that the purchasing power had to be increased to stimulate consumption and restore balance in this country. I share their view but with different means. Instead of increasing the purchasing power of people who really need it by taking it out of the pockets of those who do not really have enough of it, let us rather increase the purchasing power of those families with new credit made available by the Bank of Canada. I will never give up on that because I am so convinced, Mr. Speaker, that this must be the instrument to bring about the increase in the money supply in this country based on industry and work. This seems to me to be so logical. Why go and borrow water from the neighbour's well when we have a good well full of good water? Why pay someone something to be able to use it when we have what we need at home and without hurting the other fellow?

Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that is elementary logic, and that is why I say, in closing, that in the interest of Canadians, agriculture must be protected, our farmers must be encouraged to remain on the land and continue to work and produce the food required to meet people's needs; but, in return, let us try to ensure them a stable income, a decent worker's wage. If we adopt such policies, Mr. Speaker, we can be sure that generations to come will be grateful to those who, today, have the courage to grab the bull by the horns and straighten out our economic system by protecting the basic industry, the most essential in our country, namely, agriculture, and in the case of Quebec, the dairy industry.

Mr. Yves Caron (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): First of all, I should like to tell the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) that we, on the government side, share his concern for Canadian agriculture and that, together with the Department of Agriculture, we are constantly striving to improve the situation of agriculture in Canada generally, but more specifically in the province of Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, the motion before the House today lists five areas of concern in agriculture, and I suggest that in his remarks a while ago, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) clearly indicated that he is well aware of them. I should like to mention the efforts the Department of Agriculture has been making to sell our surplus abroad, with particular emphasis on the work the Minister of Agriculture recently carried out in a number of countries. Canada is one of the major food producing countries in the world and must, because of this, assume a large burden of responsibility for the millions of starving human beings all over the world.

The malnutrition problem can be solved only by increasing the food production of developing countries. We must however expect food assistance in the form of donations from wealthy countries to continue to be necessary for a long time. Canadian food assistance is sent multilaterally and through certain non-government organizations. Before 1974, most of this assistance was given bilaterally, that is from country to country. In 1976, Canada sent directly to the poorest countries $125 million worth of food products. More than 20 countries have benefitted from this assistance in the last five years.

Canada sends most of its food assistance through the United Nations World Food Program which includes more than 100 donating or receiving countries. Canadian shipments are made up mostly of wheat surplus, wheat flour, powdered skim milk, which is often mentioned in relation with our dairy policy, cheese, fish, canned beef, beans and egg powder. From 1973, when the World Food Program was created, to 1976, the total contribution of Canada in funds and in food products amounted to $320 million, including $50 million in funds. UNICEF and other UN organizations also benefit from this type of assistance. Finally, part of our food assistance is distributed through non-government organizations.

Important conferences on this subject have been held in the last few weeks. The Minister of Agriculture represented our country at these conferences. At the 19th FAO Conference held in Rome on November 16, 1977, the Minister of Agriculture noted that the commitment of Canada to the World Food Program for the fiscal year 1977-78 amounted to 400,000 tons of grain, which is part of our commitment of one million ton for the current year, in addition to $13 million worth of other food products and $10 million in funds.

Canada also announced his intention, subject to parliamentary approval, to contribute $7.5 million for 500,000 tons of the emergency world food reserve. Our country also pays $33 million to the International Farm Development Fund because we believe it is important to invest in international farming development. In spite of the enormous quantity of food products transported from one continent to another, most human beings depend on the food produced in their own country or near their own town or village. This is why Canada strongly supports increased food production in underdeveloped countries. The Canadian aim is to devote 33 per cent of its bilateral funds to agricultural development projects for 1977 to 1982.

This sector would thus be the major beneficiary of our bilateral aid program. Right now almost 300 agricultural projects are already under way or are being planned and, for all practical purposes, Canadian assistance in various sectors is over $1 billion a year.

At the meeting of the OECD agriculture committee held in Paris on February 9 and 10 last, the Minister of Agriculture of Canada, as deputy chairman of the committee, pointed out that the food strategy which is being set up in Canada will be beneficial for Canadian farming as well as for our world food assistance. The aims suggested for the food strategy are as follows: to give consumers permanent access to high quality food at reasonable prices; second, to assure a decent agricultural income enabling farmers to enjoy an acceptable standard of living; third, to produce for export purposes the foodstuff for which the country enjoys a worldwide competitive position; fourth, to provide food assistance to needy countries.

On that occasion, he pointed out that it was no longer sufficient to assess the qualify of our food aid programs and that we should also consider the whole food supply management at the international level. Finally, at the United Nations and FAO Conference on the contributions to the World Food Program held in New York City on February 21 last, the minister reported that the Canadian government had allowed $95 million for each of the years 1979 and 1980. The two year plan therefore grants $170 million in food and $20 million in cash. That aid reflects the concern of Canada over the world food situation. Our contribution to the developing countries covers therefore three main aspects: aid under the form of food, whether wheat, skim powder or cheese which are surplus products in Canada and represent several tens of millions of dollars in technical aid.

So, Canada has tried over the years 70 to draw closer its ties with its neighbours of Latin America. One of the first steps in this direction is a bilateral technical aid program in Latin America, through the Canadian International Development Agency. This aid is aimed at three sectors: agriculture, education and community development. Another way for Canada to have closer ties is to increase its participation in regional institutions and organizations, such as the Inter-American Institute of Agricultural Sciences. Also, the department has appointed an official whose function will be to explain our agricultural research programs to the international organizations concerned.

Agriculture Canada is aware of its responsibilities in the face of the world food situation, and it is our farmers who are producing the foodstuff that Canada gives to developing countries. It is the officials of this department, be they agronomists, veterinarians or researchers, who support them, and the Department of Agriculture attends all international conferences on world food supply. It does its share to help underdeveloped countries or countries with insufficent food supply, and we can say that our current program is indeed very generous. The department wishes to remain active in this field.

Before resuming my seat, Mr. Speaker, because time is running out and one of my colleagues also wants to speak on this opposition motion, I would like to reassure the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) concerning the dairy policy. He voiced his concern over the soon to be announced new dairy policy. I must reassure him because this government has always endeavoured to have the most viable dairy policy for milk producers in Quebec and in Canada.

I must assure him that a special committee of government members—an agriculture sub-committee—has been working for three months to produce if not the best, at least a very good dairy policy for every industrial milk producer in Canada. We certainly share the concerns of producer federations over reduced quotas, but we are aiming for the maintenance in 1978-79 of quotas issued in 1977-78, under a farm policy being developed be the sub-committee on agriculture and hon. members from this side of the House.

Mr. Cliff McIsaac (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Wise) for introducing this motion today. I think it is very timely and appropriate that this House should discuss the problems and the plight of the farm producers of Canada. The hon. member spoke about declining farm income in various sectors. We then heard from other hon. members, including the minister. I commend the minister for his efforts and his devotion to the cause of the Canadian farmer.

Hon. members opposite like to criticize the minister at times, but I think in their hearts they know that this Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) has carried the cause of the farmer to every corner of this country and to every sector. He has done so at all times in a fearless, forthright manner. While hon. members opposite might at times disagree with him, I am sure they do not deny that fact and the effectiveness of the job he has done for the food producers of this country. The minister's efforts are not well known by many people, even people in rural communities who perhaps should have a better appreciation of farm producers' problems.

Farm production has become so complex that a great part of our population does not really understand some of the problems faced by farmers. I am happy to have in my possession a letter from which I will read one paragraph, as follows:

I need not tell you the high regard and esteem in which you are held by all associated with this Council.

This is a copy of a letter addressed to the minister.

As you indicated in your address, all of our members may not be Liberals, but let me assure that all accept you as a true friend and the best spokesman for horticultural producers we have known.

[Mr. Caron.]

That is signed by the secretary-treasurer of the Canadian Horticultural Council, and I think it is typical of the feelings of many farm groups in this country.

I realize that my time is very short. Having said what I have said with respect to the minister, let me say that I happened to see a clipping from a western Canadian newspaper over the weekend. It was a release by the deputy minister quoting a report of a task force on beef production. I only wish that some of the people conducting these studies who are working for the minister were as up to date as the minister is. According to this report, it costs 35 cents a pound to produce beef in this country today.

Somewhere along the line a report has been buried. That might have applied 15, 18 or 20 years ago, but it certainly does not apply today. I was amazed at that report, and I have not yet had an opportunity to find out where it came from or how it became public. I hope nobody in the minister's department believes that. I know the minister does not believe it. He knows that the situation is different from that. I only hope some of the officials he has working for him are more aware of the facts than that newspaper clipping serves to indicate.

An hon. member opposite mentioned capital gains legislation. I certainly agree with the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger) that there have been two major improvements for the farmer, but there is room for more. The initial rollover rights which apply now to the family farm—and have, I suppose, since the beginning of that legislation—could be expanded. I am sure the hon. member for Wetaskiwin is well aware that we have provided for an exchange of property to apply not only to the farmer but also to the small businessman. That was a major improvement.

We can certainly look forward to the extension of that rollover provision and other provisions relating to capital gains for the incorporated farm, which has over the years become the trend, according to tax advisers and others, for many farmers. Tax people recommended that, farmers picked it up and today they must leave their land outside their operating company. It seems to me that the law should be changed in that respect.

Perhaps we could look at another change, a change in the valuation day, December 31, 1971. Perhaps we could move that date forward and suggest an average of other dates to improve that figure to the benefit of the taxpayer. Perhaps we could provide some kind of indexation which would adjust the value of a particular farm. Another option might be a once-in-a-lifetime exemption for capital gains, whether for a farmer or a small businessman.

● (1732)

Precedents have been set with the former gift tax provisions under the Income Tax Act and other provincial legislation. That is an avenue which should be explored more fully. As a matter of fact, it is a resolution which was recently approved at the national Liberal convention, and I am sure there is no disagreement in principle on either side of the House with provisions of that kind to improve the tax situation of the farmer.

In conclusion, let me say a few words regarding what hon. members opposite said concerning the lack of a farm policy. We amended the Agricultural Stabilization Act a couple of years ago to include production costs. I can recall many hon. members opposite decrying the fact that we are even looking at that. They certainly did not want to do anything which could be construed as stabilizing, putting in a floor price or in any way supporting the incomes of producers. We are very concerned about that. Many of them fought every inch of the way as we worked for years to implement the western grain income stabilization act. I am very happy—it must be because an election is coming or something—that my hon. friends opposite are suddenly realizing that we should seek new ways to bring about greater stability in the incomes of farm and food producers in this country.

Mr. Speaker, in view of the time and of my commitments to hon. members opposite, I will now conclude my remarks.

Mr. Frank Hamilton (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, as I listened to the minister I was reminded of the story of the new reverend who went to the south west corner of Saskatchewan in the ranching country and on his first Sunday out there waited outside the church. Finally, one rancher showed up. As there were no more, they went inside, sang the hymn, preached the sermon and took the collection. Then the reverend went to the back of the church and met the rancher as he was leaving. He shook his hand, thought for a minute and said to the rancher: "Say, if you went out to feed your cattle and only one animal showed up, would you still feed it?" The rancher thought for a while and said: "Yes, I reckon I would, but I sure wouldn't give it the full load." Well, we sure got the whole load from the minister today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hamilton (Swift Current-Maple Creek): The minister has been described as a bull who carries his own china shop. It is an apt description. Some time ago he told us to pray. Today he spoke about Christ. I have here the March issue of Farm Light & Power which contains an article headlined: "Farmers repeating Bible story"—written by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan). It recounts the Old Testament story of the Egyptian famine. The minister writes:

> This is how I reconstruct that story:
> ... Joseph was appointed manager of the organization and bought up all the grain produced each year. But he instructed each farmer to hold back enough grain for seeding the next year.
> So, for seven years the farmers planted their own grain, including all the weed seeds and diseased seeds. The weeds and diseases multiplied. After seven years, Joseph brought about the famine he had predicted.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I read a different message into that story.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hamilton (Swift Current-Maple Creek): The minister is always talking about levelling out the boom and bust cycles in agriculture. This is what concerns us, because he has worked hard at it but so far has only managed to level out the boom periods. Today he compared the government to a ship. All I can say is that if this is the correct analogy, then farmers are certainly getting ready to take to the lifeboats.

With regard to the Farm Credit Corporation amendments, all I can say is: Bring them in, we will go to work on them.

The minister brags about marketing boards. My view from western Canada is that without exception they tend to reduce the number of producers. I grant you, Mr. Speaker, that the money is there, but the family farms are not, and that is the fastest way I know to depopulate our rural areas.

The minister spoke about the declining world price of grain responsible for the farm income slide. It is interesting to note right now that the top grade grain asking price in Vancouver is $4.30 a bushel. And still his colleague, that economic virgin from Saskatoon, has the temerity to tell farmers that they will be receiving nothing above the $2.75 initial price which they have already received. There is over $1.50 a bushel difference between what the farmer has received and will receive for the rest of the crop year and what the grain is selling for at present. Is it any wonder that my party is asking to have the Auditor General take a look at the accounts of the Canadian Wheat Board?

About a week ago some 14 of my colleagues and I went up to Saskatoon to meet with Mr. Justice Hall and have a talk with him about the recommendations contained in the Hall report. We were aware that so far only six of the 92 recommendations have been implemented, five others have been partially acted upon, but no action taken on the rest. We were disturbed to find that neither the government nor the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) had ever contacted the chief architect of the Hall commission. Our main concern was that the piecemeal approach of this government to implement the report was jeopardizing the whole concept of Judge Hall's report, which was to try to improve the economic situation on the prairies and rationalize our primary grain handling system.

Another concern was that the prairie rail action committee set up by the Minister of Transport, instead of the prairie rail authority recommended by the commission, was just a stall which would put us right back where we were before the commission was established, back in the hands of the eastern controlled Canadian Transport Commission. We are concerned that the railways are receiving far too much taxpayers' money without having to account in any way for how that money is being spent.

We were also disturbed at the fact that there is no government policy to assist the prairie livestock feeding industry or the oilseed crushers by offsetting the low statutory rates on grain.

Our policy on the Hall report is very plain and it has been stated before. First, we believe that the low Crow statutory rate for the grain producers must stay; that the government must pick up the difference between the Crow rate and the compensatory rate; that a subsidy is required to remove the current freight rate distortion on livestock, meat products and oilseed products—this would cost this year some $30 million—and that the railroads must be responsible for maintaining and upgrading their prairie rail network with no further subsidy from taxpayers.

At present, the railroads have the best of both worlds—subsidy plus grants to be spent as they wish. So far as I am aware, not one cent of the subsidy has been spent on branch lines. Certainly they have upgraded the mainlines. I was surprised at the last Wheat Board area meeting in Swift Current a couple of weeks ago to find that although the hopper cars, some 6,000 to 8,000 of them, are a complete gift to the railways, if they are involved in a wreck the railways are not even required to replace the wrecked cars. Yet they are responsible for maintenance. So what happens if the cars are damaged? Rather than fix them, they scrap them. This is incredible.

We tend to be a little nervous about the low statutory rates on grain but what do our good neighbours to the south do? Over $1 billion a year is spent by the U.S. corps of army engineers on their toll-free waterways. This makes the assistance that western Canada receives look pretty small.

I have a couple of interesting news releases put out by the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Transport. It is not much wonder they are putting out this sort of news release when you take a look at some of the editorials in the western papers. I have one here called the Free Press Report on Farming of February, which states in the editorial:

> If anybody in this country gave a damn about Canada's future as a grain exporter, the present situation at the west coast would be a national scandal . . .
> The scandalous part is that after a few years of reasonable grain prices and massive amounts of study and discussion, Canada isn't any better equipped to move grain through west coast ports than it was in 1972.
> All Canada has been able to do since the last transportation tie-up (besides offering incentives for more storage) has been to provide work for huge numbers of civil servants and numerous trips, at taxpayers' expense, to balmy Vancouver.

● (1742)

> What do farmers have to do to preserve their reputation as reliable suppliers of grain and oil seeds?
> This time Canada has no excuse—no serious labour problems or natural catastrophe has caused the backlog.
> Our customers have seen this before, and they are getting sick of it.

It continues:

> It's a problem that will only be solved with concrete, steel and long term investment.

The government has indicated that it will spend money on its terminal at Prince Rupert. This is at a time when the terminal is not being used to capacity and has not been for years. Also it is at a time when the government of Canada owns a terminal in the port of Vancouver which has not been used for the last 15 years.

I should like to refer to a newspaper article entitled: "Whelan promotes cartel". The Minister of Agriculture referred to this today. In part the article reads as follows:

[Mr. Hamilton (Swift Current-Maple Creek).]

> Food-producing countries should organize themselves as oil-producing nations have to force the industrial powers to pay higher food prices, Agriculture Minister Eugene Whelan said last week.

Certainly I would like to issue a word of caution on this question. Historically any scheme to build reserve stocks has tended to depress prices, even though administered pricing is involved. No buyer is likely to panic and pay the high prices we received a few years ago, as long as reserve stocks are available.

It has been fashionable in this country to think that our political rights guarantee equality in all things. This has come to mean equality not only at the starting line but at the finishing line as well. I just do not believe it. We should all have equality at the starting line and while the race is on. We should have the freedom to run that race as best we can. Finally, we should have the freedom to receive the rewards of that effort.

There is a great reservoir of energy and new ideas waiting to be tapped in Canada, but there is a feeling of hopelessness throughout the entire land. We need a change in policy, attitudes and outlook. We need a new Canada with a new government.

Mr. Florian Côté (Richelieu): Mr. Speaker, these last remaining minutes at my disposal will be very short indeed. I would have liked to deal first with the problem faced by the dairy industry, which seemed to concern even the mover (Mr. Wise) and the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert). I noticed that in the motion, five paragraphs are apparently putting this before the House as a whole and we are merely all in agreement this indeed has already been implemented by the governnment. The formulation of the motion is somewhat late, because we have the area of exports and help to underdeveloped countries, as mentioned by my colleague from Beauce (Mr. Caron). The minister also dealt with marketing. However, I would have liked to have more time to explain to some of my colleagues who may not really know the problem faced by the dairy industry the difficulty for the government of administering that industry since 1971 in a more democratic way. In 1971, in this large democracy of ours, jurisdiction over and administration of milk quotas were transferred at the request of the provinces. Since then, the only thing the Canadian government has to do is "repay", administration being a provincial responsibility. Mr. Speaker, may I say it is 5:45 p.m. There is a lot more I would like to say, but I respect our agreement.

Mr. MacGuigan: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order to request the unanimous consent of the House to revert to Presenting Reports from Standing or Special Committees in order to present a committee report.

Mr. Speaker: I understand the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan) will receive the unanimous consent of the House in order to revert to the reception of committee reports for the tabling of a report.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That is correct, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Is that agreed?

NORTHERN PIPELINE—GOVERNMENT POLICY ON SETTLEMENT OF NATIVE LAND CLAIMS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. J. R. Holmes (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. During yesterday's meeting, March 15, of the Special Committee on a Northern Gas Pipeline, an internal departmental document was identified and was quoted in part.

In view of the fact that the government document states, "The government of Canada is prepared to extinguish native land claims if necessary by legislation to support its international word and commitment but it will do so in a way which represents the fairest possible settlement to those involved", and that the contents of the document could prejudice Indian and native people and impede meaningful negotiations, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen):

That this House requests the Prime Minister to take the first opportunity on motions to clarify government policy with a view to reassuring the Indian and native people in the Yukon and British Columbia and indeed in Canada that the government will not legislate a unilateral settlement of native claims but will continue the policy of negotiating a fair and just settlement of those claims.

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to ask the unanimous consent of the House to deal with a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that Chrysler Corporation today announced it will be shutting down its truck plant in Windsor in July, with a loss of 800 jobs, while the operation moves to the United States, that within the last three years the federal government forgave Chrysler $17.5 million in duties built up because Chrysler had failed to meet its commitments regarding trucks under the auto pact, and that it is unlikely Chrysler will continue to be able to meet its commitments in the medium- to long-term after the closing of this plant, I move, seconded by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt):

That this House instruct the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to personally intervene and take whatever steps are necessary to force Chrysler to maintain production in this country.

WITHDRAWAL OF JANUARY, 1978, SUBSIDIES TO QUEBEC MILK PRODUCERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I seek the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity for Quebec dairy producers and especially this government's integrity.

In view of the fact that the CDC is holding back part of the subsidies dairy producers should have received for their January 1978 production, that approximately 50 per cent of Quebec dairy producers have gone along with the government's request to comply with the set quotas, and that these are precisely the producers who are most severely punished by the CDC's decision, in spite of the fact that their only mistake has been to do their duty and comply with the government's regulations, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert):

That the House direct the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) to order CDC Chairman Gilles Choquette to shed light on the marketing boards' quota tampering, and ask the federal government to cancel this shameful holding back from Quebec dairy producers of the subsidies they should have received for their January 1978 production.

MINISTER'S SPEECH NO SUBSTITUTE FOR BUDGET—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas):

● (1412)

That this House wishes to make it clear to the Minister of Finance that a speech by him at 8 o'clock tonight during the debate on Bill C-31 is not to be construed as a substitute for a budget, and this House calls on the Prime Minister to make it clear that there will be a budget before parliament is dissolved for the holding of a general election.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

GOVERNMENT INITIATIVES TO RE-ESTABLISH PEACE IN MIDDLE EAST—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I rise to bring a matter of urgent and pressing necessity before the House regarding the critical situation in the Middle East.

While Canadians can understand the frustration which has led people to resort to violence and terrorism, such activities cannot be condoned, whether in the form of terrorism or open aggression. Such activities are unacceptable from any source. I therefore move:

That this government, at the earliest possible moment, bring forth initiatives at the Security Council of the United Nations, bilaterally with the United States and with the states currently in confrontation, that would re-stabilize the situation in the Middle East in order that earlier, positive peace initiatives may be resumed.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate, pursuant to Standing Order 43, requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

REQUESTED ASSISTANCE FOR CASTLEGAR, B.C.—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that radon gas has been discovered in the ground-water supply in the city of Castlegar, in view of the fact that the Department of National Health and Welfare is to conduct a survey of the basements of residences in Castlegar for the detection of radon gas, and in view of the fact that up to now the federal government has ignored an application by that city for assistance under the DREE program, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen):

That the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion reconsider his decision to fund that community under the DREE program.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

That in view of the kidnapping this morning in Rome of former premier Aldo Moro, a political figure respected internationally for his integrity and stature, this House express to the government of Italy the deep shock felt by this House and by the people of Canada upon learning of the kidnapping, and express the hope and prayers on Canada's part that Mr. Moro be freed unharmed and soon.

INDUSTRY

TRADE IMBALANCE RESULTING FROM AUTOMOTIVE PACT WITH U.S.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I want to put a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce regarding our trade deficit in the automotive account that we note has risen 8.5 per cent to $1,088 million. The minister is quoted as having said on the CTV program "Question Period" recently:

We've done very well in the auto pact; we've only lost about a billion in parts.

He is also quoted as saying:

More agreements similar to that might help Canada.

I ask the minister if he is aware that we have had five consecutive years of trade deficits in the automotive account. That amounts to $5,653 million and represents 39 per cent of our total balance of payments deficit over the past five-year period. The Canadian study done on the auto pact by his department indicates that the share of new trade would decline because new investment is being concentrated in the United States. Does the Minister still believe that the government has done very well, noting the effect the automotive trade imbalance is having on our balance of payments?

● (1417)

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, there are many ways to look at the automotive pact. We gain in employment. We have 11.2 per cent of the employment in the automotive pact, and we have about 8.9 per cent of the market. Actually, our exports of automotive vehicles and parts increased something like 25 per cent last year. I hope that with the efforts we are taking in 1978, we will come much closer to balancing automotive trade between Canada and the U.S. in total parts and vehicles. The 8.5 per cent which the hon. member speaks of, if he compares that with the inflationary rate he will see that we are holding our own very well.

Mr. Kempling: Mr. Speaker, I would never consider a trade imbalance of $1,088 million as "holding our own very well." Be that as it may, the automotive agreement is a bilateral agreement between the Americans and Canadians. However, from the Canadian side it is a multilateral agreement.

I ask the minister why the government has not negotiated with the Americans for a North American content in automobile production and specified this by agreement as to the percentage of components we could have in that content. Why has he not done this, to offset the terrible loss in automotive parts that we are suffering at the present time?

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, our exports of automobiles increased something like 26 per cent last year over 1976. In order to increase our export of vehicles, we have to import parts to put into the vehicles.

An hon. Member: That is intelligent.

Mr. Horner: If our vehicle exports increase, then it is understandable in the agreement that many more parts might have to come into Canada in order to allow us to increase our exports of vehicles. If the hon. member is suggesting that we go to the United States and renegotiate the automotive pact, that is a thought which we have considered from time to time. But we have not given up on the auto pact. We believe that with a great deal more encouragement we can get more parts manufactured in Canada.

Mr. Kempling: Mr. Speaker, I am not suggesting that we necessarily renegotiate the auto pact, because it is an ongoing process. I am concerned about the parts which come in from Brazil and Mexico. I am talking about North American content. I ask the minister, what negotiations is he having with Chrysler Corporation regarding the closing of their truck plant in Windsor? Is he aware that we will lose 800 jobs? Does he know what effect this will have on our balance of payments and balance of trade? Also, what effect will it have on Chrysler's Canadian value added equation in the auto pact agreement?

State. Does the minister still believe that the government has

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, my officials are in Windsor this week talking to Chrysler. I understand that Chrysler is to shut down one old truck plant. In the last two years they have spent $43 million in overhauling their new truck plant. They hope there will be no loss of jobs and that they will be able to accommodate the workers from the old truck plant in the new truck plant.

GENERAL MOTORS—POSSIBILITY OF ESTABLISHING FOUNDRY IN CANADA

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. The minister will recognize that, under the auto pact, our country is now facing an increasing deficit as concerns automotive parts, but according to certain information, it seems that General Motors would be very interested in establishing a large foundry in Canada. Can the minister tell the House if he has had personal negotiations with officials of this company concerning the building of a foundry in Canada in the near future?

● (1422)

[English]

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, as I have said many times in this House, we are carrying on negotiations with the Big Three automobile manufacturers. They are considering a foundry such as the hon. member speaks of. For me to comment on it now would perhaps hinder, rather than help the negotiations. I know the hon. member wants to see the negotiations come to a successful conclusion. For me to intervene now and say something publicly would not help.

[Translation]

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the minister responsible for these negotiations if there still is a possibility of a major foundry being established in Canada by General Motors, which would make us very happy, and can he tell us if he has recommended any locations for this project? If so, can he say where this foundry could be built in Canada?

[English]

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, many areas are being considered. Here, again, I do not believe the government should decide where it is to be. We have placed before General Motors the options available to them in Canada, and we are awaiting their decision.

ANNOUNCED CLOSING OF CHRYSLER PLANT IN WINDSOR—INCREASE IN UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. At 11.30 this morning the city of Windsor was informed by Chrysler Corporation that it was closing its truck plant, thus creating unemployment of 800 in the Windsor area, in July of this year. When did the minister first become aware that that plant might be closing, what consultation did his department undertake with Chrysler Corporation, and what steps does he intend to take to keep the plant operating in the Windsor area?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): As I said, Mr. Speaker, my officials have been in Windsor all week discussing Chrysler's hopes and expectations with regard to that truck plant. It is not for my officials to say the truck plant is old and needs a complete overhaul, or that a new plant will not do the same work as the old plant is doing. As I said earlier, Chrysler has spent $43 million on a new truck plant and hopes to accommodate the workers laid off at the old plant.

Mr. Rodriguez: The new branch plant is operating at almost full capacity at the moment; therefore, it will not be able to absorb another 800 workers. Chrysler Corporation is building a plant in Jefferson, in the United States, to replace the old truck plant. In view of the fact this government forgave $17.5 million in duties which were owed by Chrysler up to 1975 because they failed to meet their commitment under the auto pact for the production of trucks in Canada, what steps does the minister intend to take to protect those 800 jobs now, and to make sure that Chrysler does not again default in its commitments, having already received a gift of $17.5 million from the taxpayers of Canada?

Mr. Horner: I like the hon. member's term "use force" to force Chrysler. We are in a free society. We can encourage. As I have said many times, I do not particularly want to do away with the automotive agreement. My understanding is that the workers who are laid off now will receive 90 per cent of what they are earning. We will have to wait and see whether Chrysler can accommodate them in a new plant. They are merely on a temporary lay-off now and will receive 90 per cent of their salary.

Mr. Rodriguez: Whenever we on this side of the House ask the government to do something beneficial for Canadians we are accused of forcing the company. However, when they announce sudden lay-offs they are never accused of forcing our hand. They are holding the taxpayers up to blackmail. That is absolutely callous on the part of the government. There are now rumours in Windsor of the same sort that preceded today's announcement, that Chrysler will soon be shutting down its six-cylinder operation in that city.

Can the minister tell this House exactly what meaningful consultation is going on with the company? Is he being kept aware of the company's plans? Has his department approved any further shutdowns or been informed of any further shutdowns by Chrysler? Is the minister going to simply sit there and say "There's nobody here but us chickens"?

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I am not going to run down every rumour that I hear with regard to a shutdown of a plant. I would like to add to what I have already said that most of the old plant that is now being shut down will be renovated and it is hoped it will be back in operation before the end of 1979.

AGRICULTURE

WITHDRAWAL OF JANUARY, 1978, SUBSIDIES TO QUEBEC MILK PRODUCERS

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the Minister of Agriculture.

Certain actions deserve questions and especially replies on the part of the Minister of Agriculture. My question concerns the Canadian Dairy Commission whose function it is to set and implement milk quotas for producers. In view of the fact that the CDC has withheld from Quebec milk producers the promised subsidies for milk production within the quotas set for January 1978, I would like to ask the minister if he does not think it a shame to penalize the Quebec milk producers by letting the CDC withhold the subsidies for their production in January 1978?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member has a copy of the letter which was sent to the dairy producers in Quebec. A meeting was held with their organizations on January 26 this year to try to iron out their difficulties, to determine who is getting the quota and whether they are entitled to receive quota payments. That has not yet been ironed out. They promised they would have this information for the Dairy Commission within a few weeks. I understand that a meeting between the two producer groups and the Dairy Commission will be taking place in Montreal this coming Friday.

● (1427)

Mr. Beaudoin: Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary.

I should like to ask the minister whether he intends to cancel that holdback on the subsidies for the January 1978 production of the Quebec dairy producers, which consists of hiding the errors in the estimates and the lack of coordination of the CDC with regard to the producers. In addition, can he tell the House whether the CDC will be forced to tell the truth about the manipulation of the quotas by the market offices in Montreal and elsewhere?

[English]

Mr. Whelan: As far as I know, the CDC is a very honest organization. If anyone has any information that the CDC is doing something dishonest, I want to know that also. They want to make sure that the industrial milk subsidy goes to those who are entitled to it. The provincial marketing boards in Quebec, Ontario and other provinces have jurisdiction over the allocation of quotas. There is a mix-up in the province of Quebec, but they hope to iron it out on Friday. We are not satisfied with the way this quota is being paid in the province of Quebec.

[Translation]

Mr. Beaudoin: Mr. Speaker, the minister did not answer the question I put to him. I asked him specifically if the commissioners of the CDC will force the marketing offices, especially in the province of Quebec, to tell the truth about the manipulations or exchanges of quotas which I feel are completely abnormal?

[English]

Mr. Whelan: Everything within the power of the Dairy Commission will be done to make sure that any wrongs in Quebec or in any other province will be rectified.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF DISTINGUISHED VISITORS

Mr. Speaker: Before continuing with the question period, I invite all hon. members to join with me in recognizing the presence in our gallery of two very distinguished visitors from separate countries, heading delegations of great importance in our relationships, the first being Mr. Minoru Masuda, Vice-Minister of International Affairs, Ministry of International Trade and Industry, Japan, and the other, Dr. Sandor Beckl, State Secretary and President of the National Bureau of Sport and Physical Education, Hungary.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

NORTHERN PIPELINE—GOVERNMENT POLICY ON SETTLEMENT OF NATIVE LAND CLAIMS

Mr. J. R. Holmes (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I have a brief but important question for the Prime Minister. It arises from the fact that a departmental document discussed at the Special Committee on a Northern Gas Pipeline yesterday, stated:

> The government of Canada is prepared to extinguish native land claims if necessary by legislation to support its international word and commitment but it will only do so in a way which represents the fairest possible settlement to those involved.

● (1432)

I ask the Prime Minister if he will reassure the Indian and native people of the Yukon and British Columbia, and indeed people across Canada, that the government will not legislate a unilateral settlement but will continue a policy of negotiating a fair and just settlement of native claims.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I understand that this phrase was taken from a document prepared at a lower level of the bureaucracy, indicating various alternatives. There is no hesitation on my part in repeating what the Deputy Prime Minister said last night before the committee, that there is no intention on the part of the government to proceed in any other way than by looking for a negotiated settlement. The legislation speaks for itself. It has been reported out of the committee today, I understand, and indicates no intention to legislate.

NORTHERN PIPELINE—B.C. WITHDRAWING FROM COMMITMENTS ON NATIVE LAND CLAIMS

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister relating to the document quoted by my friend, the hon. member for Lambton-Kent. The document also states that it is the intention of the province of B.C. not to accept any responsibility and, indeed, to withdraw from any previous commitments it might have made to the government of Canada in respect of the province's obligation on the question of Indian land claims. Can the Prime Minister inform the House whether that position can be confirmed and whether it would not be a serious hindrance to signing the pipeline treaty with the United States?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have no further details on the status of the negotiations with British Columbia. I do know that the Deputy Prime Minister has spoken to the authorities of that province on several occasions. As to the exact status of negotiations on Indian claims jointly with the province of B.C., the question would have to be addressed to the minister responsible for Indian affairs.

NEGOTIATIONS ON PURCHASE OF "MERCATOR I"—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. It arises out of the rumours circulating in the metropolitan area of Halifax that the federal government has entered into negotiations or is giving serious consideration to the purchase of Mercator I from its present owners, an overhaul and modification program for it and its eventual turning over to the Bedford Institute of Oceanography for oceanographic purposes.

Can the minister indicate to the House whether or not he is aware of these negotiations, and whether or not any conversations are being carried out between the government of Canada and the government of Nova Scotia or any other related interests with respect to this procedure?

[Mr. Holmes.]

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, as has been alluded to by the hon. member, and as I am informed—although I will check this—it is only a rumour.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ALLEGED MISLEADING STATEMENT BY MINISTER ON $3 BILLION TAX CUT

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Perhaps he could be given an opportunity to return from a visit to his Social Credit friends.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stevens: My question is in reference to a serious misrepresentation which I think the minister has repeatedly made to the House. I refer, for example, to what the minister stated last Tuesday in reply to a question put by me, when he said:

> I feel we should wait to see what effect the $3 billion tax cut which came into force on January 1 has on the economy.

That is just not true. There was no $3 billion tax cut effective January 1. I hope the minister will take this opportunity to explain why he so misled the House.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have on several occasions in my speeches given a breakdown of those $3 billion. I do not have the figures here with me but, if I remember correctly, $850 million came from the automatic indexation. There were the $700 million because of the $100 given for the months of January and February, and there was other information of the same nature, which I do not have now but which I shall give the House, in addition to about $900 million in incentives to the industrial sector.

[English]

Mr. Stevens: The minister has outlined $1.6 billion of spending, which includes $850 million of indexing which, may I point out with all due respect, is not a tax cut. Would he not agree that the further $1.4 billion to which he referred were actually tax cuts which became effective one year earlier, starting January 1, 1977, and were certainly not felt for the first time on January 1 of this year?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I have made those statements many times in the House. I have given explanations about it. The budgetary position of the government gave an impulse of $3 billion to the economy as of January 1. I will be pleased to give from time to time an explanation to the hon. member who does not seem to understand.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

KIDNAPPING OF FORMER ITALIAN PREMIER, ALDO MORO—EXPRESSION OF HOPE FOR EARLY RELEASE

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister. It has to do with another political kidnapping which took place this morning in Rome, that of former premier Aldo Moro. Does the Government of Canada intend to express to the government of Italy the deep shock felt by the Canadian parliament and by the people of Canada, and indicate our hopes and prayers that Mr. Moro will be freed soon, unharmed?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have already sent to the President of Italy, on behalf of the government, an expression of our sense of deep shock and grief which the government feels at such senseless violence. I added the thought that certainly in a democratic society, that kind of violence is absolutely unjustifiable in the furthering of a cause. I also added, on behalf of the government, our condolences to the people of Italy, to the former prime minister's family and to the families of the victims of these senseless murders.

The government certainly agrees with the terms of the motion put forward by the hon. member. Of course, I cannot speak on behalf of parliament, but I understand there have been some negotiations with members on the other side and they might be prepared to agree to the terms of the motion. However, I do not know if the negotiations have been undertaken with all concerned.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

NATIONAL SECURITY

COMMITMENTS MADE TO RCMP OPERATIVE

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a brief question for the Solicitor General concerning the RCMP operative about whom we spoke yesterday. I ask whether he has been able to secure the co-operation of his colleague, the Minister of Employment and Immigration, and whether he is able to assure the House that any commitments that have been made to this important operative, who has been in the country for some years and who still has services to perform, will be kept.

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Without accepting that any commitments have been made, I will say that there have been discussions between myself and the Minister of Employment and Immigration and the matter is well in hand. As I have indicated to the hon. gentleman privately, I will be able to provide him with additional information in due course.

IMMIGRATION

DEPARTMENT'S CO-OPERATION WITH RCMP ON RCMP OPERATIVE

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a brief supplementary question for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. I believe the minister now realizes that this man wrote to him on several occasions last year. I believe the minister has now briefed himself from the file. Can he give us the assurance that there has been complete co-operation between the RCMP, in terms of its commitments to policy, and his department in carrying them out?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): With respect to the individual and the letter which the hon. member was good enough to show me yesterday, I would simply confirm that he is here on a ministerial permit and that no illegal action took place. Certainly, no commitment was made by my department to that individual.

● (1442)

CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP IN RETURN FOR UNDERTAKING RCMP INTELLIGENCE WORK

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the same minister and follow up on the policy area. Is it the policy of the government to offer landed immigrant status, and with that status the possibility of eventual citizenship status, to non-Canadians in return for work which they have done for our security services in the Canadian national interest?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): No, Mr. Speaker, it is not the policy of the government to offer landed immigrant status on that particular basis. I have a responsibility to Canadian citizens to see that individuals who make application to come to this country meet the standards and conditions set for people all over the world. However, from time to time we issue ministerial permits to accommodate people who want to come into this country. Representatives and members of the hon. member's party have requested permission for an individual to come into the country for a week or a month to participate in a particular forum or to make a speech at a particular time. We issue ministerial permits, but we do not give them landed immigrant status. Certainly in so far as citizenship is concerned, that, of course, is within the purview of the Secretary of State.

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, I am not referring to the short-term minister's permits of which the minister and I have spoken on many occasions. I ask the minister whether he or the officials in his department have from time to time received representations from various governmental departments or ministers to have the Department of Employment and Immigration grant landed immigrant status to non-Canadians who have served in Canada's national interests on security matters. Further, can the minister indicate whether landed immigrant status was offered but turned down by his department after the offer had been made by a department such as that of the Solicitor General?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, with respect to the second part of the hon. member's question, individuals do not receive landed immigrant status. Representations may very well be made by departments. As I have indicated, we accommodate not only the office of the Solicitor General but hon. members opposite with ministerial permits. There has been no blanket policy or, for that matter, individual policy to indicate that landed immigrant status will be granted if a particular operation is performed. That commitment has not been made by my department. If it has been made by others, it was done without the knowledge of my department and certainly without its concurrence.

REQUEST AREAS OF SOUTHERN AND CENTRAL ONTARIO QUALIFY FOR DREE ASSISTANCE

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion and follows questions posed by my colleagues several days ago in the House. On a number of occasions I have approached the minister's department asking that regions of southern and central Ontario be considered for DREE eligibility. In light of increased unemployment which indicates that these areas are every bit as needy as some other regions favoured by his department, is the minister now prepared to give my request serious consideration?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I give very serious consideration to representations made by hon. members on problems which they encounter in their own region but there are of course limits which I must respect. One must remember that I come across problems too, and I would like to say also to the hon. member and to those from this part of Ontario who made representations to ministers that we are currently negotiating amendments to existing agreements with the government of Ontario. So it is possible that within the next few days we will be able to announce that progress has been made which will allow us to help the regions mentioned by the hon. member.

[English]

Mr. Scott: Mr. Speaker, on February 8, 1978, approximately five weeks ago, I wrote the minister suggesting that we get together to discuss this matter personally, as it affects my riding. I have not yet received a reply to that request. I ask the minister if he will consider discussing this important matter with me, so that I can present the case for the people of my region.

[Mr. Epp.]

Mr. Lessard: Mr. Speaker, I can inform the hon. member that he will receive a reply, because I signed the answer to his letter a couple of days ago.

An hon. Member: It is in the mail.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McRae: —by far the best of any other country in the OECD, there are still one million people unemployed. Given the high cost of creating jobs, is the minister giving consideration in a future budget to incentives for voluntary work-sharing and pairing so as to free-up a certain number of jobs?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I will take the representation of the hon. member into consideration. When we have a budget, we will see if we can do something along those lines.

SUGGESTED ESTABLISHMENT OF FERROSILICON PLANT IN RIMOUSKI, QUEBEC

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

Could the minister tell the House whether there were some new developments in the case concerning the establishment of the ferrosilicon plant in Rimouski?

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, not as far as I know as I checked the matter not long ago and there was no development in connection with that case.

Mr. Allard: Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question. Considering the minister's reply, could he tell the House whether he expects an early settlement of the matter?

Mr. Lessard: Mr. Speaker, not at the rate at which the case is evolving. I would be quite surprised if a decision was taken during the next few months.

EDUCATION

SUGGESTED FEDERAL GRANTS FOR NEEDY STUDENTS

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State. It relates to the protests which are taking place on many university campuses today. Given the fact that some provincial governments have announced funding cutbacks to universities, which will be reflected in higher tuition fees and reduced student aid, thereby discouraging many young people from attending post-secondary institutions and throwing them into a disastrous labour market, will the minister urge the government to institute an emergency program of federal grants for needy students, since the present federal loan program alone does not meet student needs and is only an invitation to go deeper into debt?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, we are concerned about this problem. It is for that reason I hope to be able to introduce in the House very shortly amendments to the Canadian student loans plan. I hope the hon. member will be able to give me his assurance that his party will give prompt and speedy passage to those legislative changes.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Symes: Mr. Speaker, given the fact that the minister knows full well that national students' organizations object to merely increasing loans because that decreases the grants allotted to students, I hope the minister takes my first question seriously. By way of supplementary, since graduating or terminating students must begin repayment of student loans six months after leaving their educational institutions, and in light of the disastrous unemployment rate, will the minister ensure that any bill to amend the Student Loans Act will provide that students need only begin to repay the loans after first obtaining full-time employment?

Mr. Roberts: Mr. Speaker, I have already given the hon. member that assurance privately that I will explore this.

REPORTED PRESSURE ON SUN LIFE TO STAY IN MONTREAL

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Has he seen a copy of the question which I asked yesterday in the House concerning the Registered Retirement Savings Plan conversions?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I have checked with people in my office and in the department. There is absolutely no foundation to that rumour.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

INQUIRY WHETHER CHARGES LAID UNDER OFFICIAL SECRETS ACT

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Justice in his capacity as the chief law officer of Canada. Has he had any requests from any other minister, or from anyone, to lay any charges under the Official Secrets Act against any persons in the media or in any corporation? If so, has he made a decision in that regard, in light of his statement in the Globe and Mail this morning?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member would agree with me that it is a long-standing tradition in the House for attorneys general or law officers of the Crown not to speculate on whether charges are going to be laid. Therefore, I will not answer his question except to say at this point that I have signed no consent for any prosecutions under the Official Secrets Act. I appreciate the fact that the hon. member for Leeds and other hon. members of the House have a lively interest and, in fact, a right to know as quickly as possible what my position may or may not be. At the same time, I hope the hon. member for Calgary North appreciates that in a matter of this nature my decision should be arrived at with some care.

PENITENTIARIES

ST. JÉRÔME—INVOLVEMENT OF GOVERNMENT IN NEGOTIATIONS RESPECTING HOSTAGE-TAKING INCIDENT

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General to whom I gave notice a few moments ago. The question relates to the hostage-taking incident in St. Jérôme at the provincial institution. I acknowledge that it is a provincial responsibility, press releases in the last hour have indicated some form of approach to the federal government, presumably to the Solicitor General or the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

I ask the Solicitor General if it is his position that any direct involvement by the federal government would only be at the request of the province of Quebec and its appropriate minister, or would the federal government become involved on the basis of a request from the negotiators, for example?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the former case is the one I have followed and intend to continue following, namely, that the proper channels will have to be followed, and that would be through the intermediary of the minister of justice of the province of Quebec.

Oral Questions

NATIONAL DEFENCE

PURCHASE OF LEOPARD I TANKS

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. Can the minister tell the House if he has agreed to have available an extra $60 million to give to the Department of National Defence for its capital budget for the financial year 1978-79 or, indeed, for this financial year, if the department discovers that due to adverse foreign exchange costs it has to pay up to $50 million more than it planned to for the purchase of Leopard I tanks? Is there some kind of contractual link between the ministers in this regard?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I think that question should be addressed to the Minister of National Defence.

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday evening the Minister of National Defence said that he had voluntarily surrendered $60 million to the Treasury Board in cash flow this year on the understanding that as the program progressed, that money would be recovered; in other words, it would be added to the end for when it is required.

Does the minister have any contract or firm understanding that the President of the Treasury Board would be prepared to rise and tell us about in the House of Commons, or is it just a handshake arrangement?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows from being at the committee meeting the other night, this money goes to contracts which could not be entered into without great care this year. They will be added on at the end of the contract. The delivery of equipment will be the same. It is not to be diverted to any other purpose. It is our understanding with the Treasury Board that that will take place.

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, I hate to ask a second supplementary question of the same minister, but he has had $60 million taken out of his estimates. Does he have anything in writing, any note, any IOU, or some contract with the President of the Treasury Board that he will get that $60 million back?

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, the President of the Treasury Board and I do not work on contractual arrangements. It is certainly an understanding. The programs will not be impaired.

NORTHERN PIPELINE—DISCUSSIONS ON ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT OF CERTAIN AREAS

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In view of the substantial economic development that the government has indicated will follow the construction and completion of the Alaska pipeline, can the minister advise why his department has not taken any initiatives to discuss economic development with municipal and regional officials in northern British Columbia? Will such discussions take place and, if so, when; or are things going to be left to chance?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, there are discussions now going on between my officials and some other officials of the provincial government. Contrary to what the hon. member has suggested, there are no negotiations with municipal authorities but there are consultations between provincial authorities, some officials of provincial departments and officials of my department who are trying to put into force a subagreement on the industrial development of that province which was signed last year.

FINANCING OF CO-OP IMPLEMENTS, WINNIPEG

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. Last week the minister admitted rather reluctantly to the Standing Committee on Agriculture that he was going back to cabinet with a new proposal for the financing of the Co-op Implements' operation in Winnipeg. Does he have a decision on that? He was going to cabinet last Thursday, as we understood it. If he has a decision, could he indicate to the House what it is?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the supplementary estimates for agriculture had an item for Co-op Implements of $8.5 million. We are having some difficulty getting the provinces to come up with an equal amount to match that. I think those difficulties are being ironed out at the present time, because I believe the province of Alberta met with Co-op Implements' officials and their lawyers. I hope they are in agreement by now. I am very optimistic that it will be finalized at the end of this month, which is the deadline.

PUBLIC WORKS

GOVERNMENT PARTICIPATION IN CELEBRATION OF CENTENNIAL OF CNE

Mr. Jim Fleming (York West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Public Works. Considering that this year marks the one-hundredth anniversary of the Canadian National Exhibition, and that community spokesmen from the municipal and federal levels in Toronto have been pressing for government of Canada participation in the celebrations, can the minister say if he will act on these appeals and ensure a proper federal presence at the one-hundredth anniversary?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, we believe it is important for the federal government to have a clear and obvious presence at this function. We are making arrangements for the rental of the automotive building and are gathering together all the federal government exhibitors who for many years have exhibited at the CNE. This year, for the one-hundredth anniversary, we will have them gathered together in one building.

UNFULFILLED ORDERS FOR OLYMPIC COINS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Postmaster General. Because at least one Olympic coin dealer ignored a double-registered letter and telephone calls related to undelivered, prepaid Olympic coin orders, plus the fact that some of these dealers are rumoured to be on the verge of bankruptcy, will the government accept responsibility for supplying the coins ordered or refunding the purchase price to customers, as they operate under federal legislation?

[Translation]

Hon. J.-Gilles Lamontagne (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding the fact that it is federal legislation, I do not believe that the government has any responsibility with regard to the financial predicament of this Olympic coin dealer. Therefore I think the only thing to do is to try to find a way to help those who seem to have been cheated and to assist them.

[English]

Mr. Towers: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Due to the fact that Canadian Olympic coin dealers are not filling orders for which they have received payment—in some cases over a year ago—can the Postmaster General assure this House that the same situation did not occur in other countries?

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, I should like to tell the hon. gentleman that this question is under review in my department and a decision will be taken soon.

SPORTS

COMMONWEALTH GAMES—LACROSSE DEMONSTRATION BY NATIVE TEAM

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport). Since the Commonwealth Games will be holding a lacrosse demonstration in Edmonton this summer, and a native team has not been invited to participate, could the minister use her good offices to intervene in this situation?

Hon. Iona Campagnolo (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): Mr. Speaker, I have already intervened. There was a suggestion that one native team from the St. Regis reserve should participate in the Senior B championships. They declined because they did not wish to attend the Commonwealth Games but would rather attend the Senior B championships to be held this year in British Columbia. I am investigating the possibility of a midget team demonstrating techniques of lacrosse at the Commonwealth Games. This is not yet settled.

POST OFFICE

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON CLOSING OF POST OFFICE BOX LOBBIES AFTER WORKING HOURS

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron-Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Public Works. It concerns a disturbing rumour. Can the minister advise whether his department is giving consideration to closing all post office box lobbies after regular working hours?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Department of Public Works and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Not that I am aware of, Mr. Speaker. I think this question should be addressed to my colleague, the Postmaster General, but certainly I am not aware of any policy in our department to do that.

Mr. McKinley: Mr. Speaker, may I put a supplementary question to the Postmaster General? Is there any truth in the rumour that the Post Office department is giving consideration to closing all post office box lobbies after regular working hours?

Hon. J.-Gilles Lamontagne (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, there is absolutely no foundation to that rumour.

PRIVILEGE

MR. RODRIGUEZ—ALLEGED ELECTRONIC SURVEILLANCE OF HON. MEMBER

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, about a week ago, on Wednesday, March 8, I raised a question of privilege relating to alleged electronic surveillance of myself by one Warren Hart. When Your Honour replied to me on that date you made comments which gave me guidance in preparing the motion which I am now prepared to introduce. If you find that I have a prima facie case of privilege I would ask that you put this motion to the House.

● (1502)

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

That the allegation by one Warren Hart, in a sworn affidavit, that he taped electronically, on one or more occasions, the hon. member for Nickel Belt, together with the admission by the Solicitor General that the said Warren Hart was for a time in the employ of the RCMP, be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, for the prupose of inquiring into the said allegation and the circumstances relating to any such electronic surveillance of the said hon. member, including an inquiry as to what happened to any tapes of the said hon. member that may have been made by the said Warren Hart.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is referring back to circumstances which had been raised several times by himself initially when the information was first brought to the attention of the House, and subsequently by a proposed motion of privilege which I adjudicated upon, as he has just described. At that time I indicated that if the motion was to be purged of discrepancies or alleged discrepancies with statements made by the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) which have been accepted by the House, and certain other difficulties, it may stand on its own merits. It raises a very serious matter, as I indicated then.

It may very well be that after due deliberation the House ought not to be deprived of the opportunity to address itself to this very important question as to whether electronic surveillance, which is, after all, a very recent and new development, constitutes that kind of interference in the activities of the member of parliament which would stand on the same basis as both classic kinds of interferences which were the basis of privilege in the early days' precedents. Therefore, I hope the hon. member will grant me a few days to consider the matter to see whether the House ought to pronounce itself on this important issue. I will endeavour to adjudicate it in a final way either on Monday or Tuesday.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the usual House business question. I understand that the pipeline bill is now out of the committee. In fact, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) made reference to that. All of us are happy that is so. Could the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) tell us what priority he attaches to that in terms of dealing with it now that it is back in the House? While he is doing that, since this is the last House business question that we can ask in the ordinary way before the adjournment at Easter time, could he tell us what the government's intentions are with respect to the legislation we will be dealing with when we come back here April 3?

An hon. Member: If we come back.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) knows the business for today. Tomorrow we will deal with Bill C-26 then, if possible, Bill C-21. There is a bill in the name of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Faulkner) which may be given first reading today that would be considered. With respect to the northern pipeline bill which will be reported out of the committee either today or tomorrow, I would propose to deal with that bill probably beginning Tuesday so that hon. members might have an opportunity to put down whatever amendments they wish to place before the House. Following that, the amendments which we hope will come out of the committee relating to the anti-inflation program would be dealt with following the northern pipeline bill.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, perhaps it might be helpful to the House if we could be advised today what the government's legislative priorities are as we look toward spring as it turns into summer. Given the fact there are some rumours that we might be facing an election this year, it would be interesting to know what the government intends to deal with specifically prior to that election. If my hon. friend is in a position to tell the House today, it would be most helpful indeed.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to indicate what business we have on our priority list, provided the hon. member will not hold me to an obligation to deal with it before an election. There are a large number of items on the order paper and we will be bringing them forward—as has been indicated, the bill relating to a referendum and possibly bills relating to constitutional reform. As the hon. member knows, there are on the order paper proposals relating to the Public Service Staff Relations Act, and to the Farm Credit Act which are also very high on the priority list. We will have a rather substantial body of legislation to deal with, including a possible budget after we return.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, there is one other matter I would like to mention. I would like to inform my friend that if the government wanted to deal with the pipeline bill this evening, from the point of view of getting it back in the House, if necessary we would be prepared to give consent for that few moments to deal with that matter, because there is some anxiety that we deal with it quickly.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I trust that the additional matter which the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) raised just now can be left to consultation.

May I ask a question of the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) with respect to a possible budget, to which he has just referred? I realize that the hon. gentleman's right hand does not know what the right hon. gentleman to his left has in mind regarding an election. But there have been suggestions by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) that he might not bring a budget down until the month of May, which would mean that there would be no budget if the election is to be held in June. In view of that fact, will the Deputy Prime Minister take this matter up with the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and ask him to make it clear to the House that there will be a budget before an election is called? Surely the Deputy Prime Minister agrees that it would be unthinkable for the government to go to the country without presenting a budget.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I have already discussed these matters with the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). They are under consideration, and the additional views of the hon. member, which seem to be in the direction of putting off an election as long as possible, will be considered.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend, as he often does, has misinterpreted what I said. The election can come as soon as the government will bring it on. My point was there should be a budget before there is an election.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, it is very entertaining to see the old hands of the House play around with the procedure! In any case, in his initial answer to the House leader of the opposition, the President of Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) mentioned a number of bills which will necessarily have to be studied and possibly agreed to by the House, and many sittings will be required to do this. I would not want, either to be indiscreet, Mr. Speaker, about the conversation I had with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) during the sitting, to the full knowledge of everybody. We were not hiding away, Mr. Speaker, that took place right here.

Anyway, to come back seriously to the proceedings of the House, I should like to ask the President of Privy Council whether it will actually be possible to deal with these bills in a normal way. I am prepared, as well as my colleagues, to give my support so that parliament and the administration of our country will operate normally. However, it is only normal for us to obtain a guarantee from the President of the Privy Council that he will give us the opportunity to work within normal delays, notwithstanding the holding of a general election. Naturally, we are ready to face a general election when the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) decides to hold one, but let us forget that for now and let us work so as to govern our country in the best possible way. Having said that, I should like the President of Privy Council to state clearly if all the bills he mentioned a moment ago will be dealt with in a normal way, so that we can discuss them normally and adopt them for what they are worth.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has introduced a caveat into his question which I accept, namely the possibility of an election. Apart from that, legislation will be dealt with in the normal way.

Mr. McGrath: On the same point of order, Mr. Speaker, in September, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) promised legislation dealing with a separate Department of Fisheries. That is a very important matter and, in the Atlantic provinces, a matter of some priority. Last Monday in the House the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc) indicated there would be legislation setting up a separate Department of Fisheries and that this was a matter of some priority. May I ask the government House leader if we can expect this legislation amending the Government Organization Act to set up a Department of Fisheries either before the House is dissolved or a summer recess, whichever comes first.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, we place a high priority on this legislation. I am glad the hon. member has mentioned it. We will introduce it just as soon as possible and deal with it just as quickly as hon. members wish, which I believe will be very quick indeed.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, there is one question regarding the order of business following immediately. My friend mentioned his intention to call Bill C-26, followed by Bill C-21. Would he consent to reversing that order and calling Bill C-21 first? I can say to him the debate will be very short indeed and we can dispose of it as soon as it is out.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, Bill C-21, I gather, is the Transfer of Offenders Act. I believe that will be satisfactory.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MOTION TO ADJOURN

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that many milk producers are being penalized by way of a withholding of the subsidies they have earned on the January 1978 production for the quotas they have respected, and since nothing has been provided by the government to regulate the implementation of quotas and since certain delay is needed to hold a cabinet meeting where alternatives could be submitted which could settle that intolerable situation for Canadian milk producers, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert):

That this House do now adjourn.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 136, 1,090, 1,169, 1,239 1,271, 1,292, 1,305 and 1,316.

I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

DEEP SEA LOBSTER FISHERY

Question No. 136—Mr. Crouse:

1. What are the names of the Canadian companies who have licenses to fish for deep sea lobsters and how many traps is each permitted to use on a yearly basis?

2. When deep sea lobster traps were found during the Spring of 1977, within the 50-mile limit, in violation of lobster fishing regulations, to which company did they belong?

3. Was a decision taken by the Minister of Fisheries to move the traps outside the 50-mile limit, rather than destroy them and, if so, were the traps put up for sale or were they returned to their original owner?

4. Were the lobsters found in the traps sold and the proceeds given on a pro rata basis to the inshore fishermen and, if not, were they (a) returned to the sea (b) retained by the owner of the illegally set traps?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): 1. The following Canadian companies are licensed to fish for deep sea lobsters: (a) Sable Fish Packers Ltd.; (b) Port La Tour Fisheries Ltd.; (c) Armdale Fisheries Ltd.; (d) Donna Rae Ltd.; (e) C. W. MacLeod Fisheries Ltd. Each licence is authorized to fish 1,000 traps during a nine month season.

2. At the time of the incident, there was no requirement to mark buoys or traps for identification, therefore ownership could not be proved.

3. The traps were reset outside the 50-mile limit under the direction of fishery officers. The traps were not put up for sale nor returned to the owner since ownership could not be proved. The traps were emptied and reset outside the 50-mile limit.

4. The lobsters found in the traps were returned to the sea in the area in which they were caught under the supervision of two fishery officers.

GRANTS TO NATIVE ASSOCIATIONS IN NEWFOUNDLAND

Question No. 1,090—Mr. Marshall:

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Secretary of State: The Secretary of State Department disbursed the following amounts to native associations in Newfoundland in 1976-77: Indian and Metis Association of Newfoundland/Labrador, $215,176.24; Labrador Inuit Association, $131,290.00; Cartwright Interim Committee, $10,473.00. Total, $356,939.24.

GRANTS TO THE HOCKEY CULTURAL EXCHANGE

Question No. 1,239—Mr. Epp:

Did the government make any grants to the Hockey Cultural Exchange Program and, if so (a) in what amounts (b) for what purposes?

Hon. Iona Campagnolo (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): In so far as the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) is concerned: No program entitled "Hockey Cultural Exchange Program" was funded. However, during the 1973-74 fiscal year the University of British Columbia Team was chosen by the Canadian Amateur Hockey Association to visit the People's Republic of China. The Fitness and Amateur Sport Branch and the Department of External Affairs shared the cost of $39,500 which was used for travel. This same cost-sharing arrangement was implemented during the 1976-77 fiscal year, when the University of Toronto Team visited the People's Republic of China. The cost of this trip was $48,000. On both tours, coaches and referees clinics were conducted in China by the Canadians.

CBC—AMOUNT SPENT ON TELEPHONE CALLS FOR VARIOUS PROGRAMS

Question No. 1,271—Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi):

1. In 1977, what amount was spent on telephone calls by CBC for the programs (a) As it Happens (b) Cross Country Check-up (c) Morning Side?

2. Does CBC intend to establish production facilities in the Province of New Brunswick and, if so, on what date?

[Mr. Roberts.]

3. Does CBC intend to provide access to AM and FM programming by the Corporation to the citizens of northern New Brunswick and, if so, on what date?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows: 1. It has not been customary to require the CBC to provide such details of its internal management and administration as the costs involved in producing programs. The background to this custom is explained in detail in the reply to question No. 2,530, May 22, 1975.

2. The CBC now has French radio and television production facilities in Moncton and Fredericton, as well as English radio production facilities at Moncton, Fredericton and, to a lesser extent, Saint John. The Corporation is planning additional English television production facilities at Saint John, Fredericton and Moncton which will improve production capability and distribution. English radio facilities will be enlarged at Saint John and staffed to originate local programming. The projects are expected to be completed within the next couple of years.

3. CBC has planned the full AM radio coverage of northern New Brunswick, and discussions are to be held with DOC and CRTC with respect to the use of the FM band for this purpose. FM stereo service in northern New Brunswick is not anticipated in the near future. Because of budget limitations no dates for extension of AM service can be given at this time, but it is a Corporation priority to provide service to those areas not now served.

CANADIAN FORCES EXCHANGE SYSTEM FACILITIES

Question No. 1,292—Mr. Jones:

1. What is Canex?

2. Are such operations under the direct supervision of the Armed Forces Personnel or are they under the control or operation of the Canadian Armed Forces, the Department of National Defence, the Department of Supply and Services, and/or any other organization?

3. How many Canex stores are in operation within Canada and without?

4. What is the total volume, expenses, profits or deficits and details of financial situations of each unit and in total over the last ten (10) years?

5. Who are permitted to make purchases and sales at each Canex operation?

6. What are the qualifications to become a purchaser or seller of goods in any Canex operation?

7. Are such stores or operations open to the Armed Forces Personnel only or are they also open to civilian personnel and public as well?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): 1. Canex (Canadian Forces Exchange System) is a system of retail sales outlets operated on Canadian Armed Forces bases, stations and ships for the benefit of military personnel and their families.

2. Operations are under the direct control of a Board of Directors shared by the Chief of Defence Staff.

3. Retail Stores, 66; Supermarket/Groceterias, 60; Service Stations/Gas bars, 70; Cafeteria/Snack bars/Canteens, 55; Vending Operations, 35; Total, 286.

4. To provide detailed data on volume, expenses, profits etc. for each of the above unit outlets would require researching hundreds of financial statements all over Canada and overseas for which the department does not have the necessary resources. However, volume and profit for the total Canex operation was as follows:

Fiscal Year	Sales ($000,000)	Net Profit ($000,000)
1970/71	72.0	3.0
1973/74	87.2	5.1
1976/77	125.4	6.5

5. Purchasing Personnel—Base or Station Canex Officers, Sales Personnel, Civilian personnel hired and paid by Canex and at some isolated units with a small Canex operation, Canadian Armed Forces personnel are involved on a part-time basis.

6. Appropriate experience and training, and integrity to carry out the task in a responsible manner.

7. Personnel authorized to use Canex are members of the regular forces and civilians employed by DND and their dependants, members of the Reserve Forces when on duty, retired military personnel and widows in receipt of a forces pension, retired DND civilian personnel in receipt of a pension, Canex employees, DND school teachers and members of the RCMP and their dependents.

2. How many man-drops did the Airborne Regiment and/or the Special Service Force accomplish during the period September 1 to December 31, 1977?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): 1 and 2. Airborne Regiment: September 1 to December 31 1976—2,354; Special Service Force: September 1 to December 31 1977—2,091.

INTERIM SUPPLY ENDING MARCH 31, 1979

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board) moved that Bill C-31, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending March 31, 1979, be read the second time and referred to committee of the whole.

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, thank you for giving me this opportunity of becoming involved in this very significant debate. It is significant because I note that the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) indicated on November 7, 1977, that there was a new procedure required with respect to interim supply, and that a bill would be brought in which would give the intention of the government and, as a matter of fact, give some evidence providing a new procedure that will give ample opportunity for normal debate.

We have a bill before us, but as far as I am concerned this is not the bill to which we should be directing ourselves at this particular time. Once again I am shocked at the lack of credibility of the government.

I should like to refer to Hansard dated November 7, 1977, at page 646, which reads as follows:

> In the past, borrowing authority has normally been sought in one of the first appropriation acts of a new fiscal year. The long-established procedure was to attach a clause requesting new borrowing powers to supply bills brought before the House. However, as hon. members are aware, this procedure provided no opportunity to debate the authority being sought. In the past two years, following a recommendation by the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization and agreement between the House leaders, one day was established for debate on this topic. Furthermore, it was agreed that the government would change the procedure for obtaining new borrowing authority.

I should like to emphasize that. It continues:

> The government intends to introduce a bill soon providing a new procedure which will give ample opportunity for normal debate.

I do not know where that bill is. We are extremely disappointed. We do not know what the procedures are, nor do I call this a normal debate. As I understand it, all stages of this bill have to be completed by this evening.

Also I am concerned when I note the cheek of the government. It is asking for more money at this particular time, to the extent of approximately $5 billion. This is after repeated requests by the opposition, and by the people of Canada, for a budget. As yet we do not have that budget. If I understand correctly, we are liable not to have one. As a matter of fact everyone in the House is prepared to bet that we will go to the people without any budget whatsoever. That is a shameful attitude for any government to take, given the fact that the country is in one solid mess.

I do not understand this government. We have had ten years of ineptness and mismanagement, and yet ministers walk around saying that everything is great. The dishonesty and incompetence that are being practised by this government are appalling. When I think of the forecasts that are so out of whack and how this affects the unemployed, those on fixed incomes, the poor, it seems to me that the economic advisers leave very much to be desired in this regard. They have been wrong in their forecasts in terms of growth, inflation, and unemployment, and yet the Minister of Finance on a number of occasions has indicated that he has every confidence in these people. I should not say that they are incompetent, because I do not think that is fair, but I will say they leave very much to be desired in terms of advising the Minister of Finance. On the other hand, he does not seem to know that the advice that he is being given has been totally wrong.

[Mr. Alexander.]

It is little wonder that no one has any confidence in this country. Here we are bumbling and fumbling along toward economic disaster. We ask serious questions in this House of the Minister of Finance. It is no laughing matter when you have one and one half million, including the hidden jobless, unemployed. What does the minister do? He just pushes aside our questions with facetious answers, red herrings, and hooting by his own back benchers, who are callous and just take an attitude regarding the plight of our unemployed that, to me, is most astonishing.

What we need around here—and I do not know how we are going to get it until we have a change in government—are medium and long term forecasts that can be relied upon in terms of growth, inflation, and unemployment. We are not on the track right now.

Regarding last month's economic summit—which was a triumph for the provinces and a disaster for the federal government—it seemed to me that the leadership came from the provinces. I sat there and listened to first minister after first minister indicating what their plans were for the development of this economy of ours. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the Minister of Finance, all of them, they sat around in awe until the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) came up with that big flim-flam of his regarding jobs. It was one of the most dishonest presentations I have ever heard, and there the minister sits smiling.

I would like to read something from Don McGillivray's column in the Ottawa Citizen of March 10:

> Finance Minister Jean Chrétien's dream of a good start on recovery this year, without extra stimulus, has faded in the face of adverse statistics:

Just let me read about four or five lines further:

> Canadians are socking more money away into savings—11.2 per cent of their after-tax income in the last three months of 1977, a jump from 10.4 per cent in the previous quarter.

In other words, there is no confidence in this government nor the economy.

> Business investment shows no sign of revival. It was down by $162 million, or 1.6 per cent, in the last quarter of 1977, after allowing for seasonal factors.

Once again, this shows no confidence in this government nor in the economy.

> Statistics Canada's latest survey of business capital spending intentions this year shows a gain of about $1 billion or 3.4 per cent. But this turns into a drop of about $1 billion when stated in 1977 dollars, minus inflation.

Again, there is no confidence in this government nor in the economy.

> Corporations are afraid of being caught with too much stock on hand if demand weakens. They have started to cut back on inventories again, reversing the build-up of last summer.

No confidence!

As I said the other day, the business failures are frightening. We are facing a national disaster here, a crisis in unemployment, and these people walk around trying to bamboozle, flim-flam and con Canadians to the effect that, "You do not have to worry, everything will be all right." There can be no credibility because every time they say everything is all right, we find out that they are wrong in their forecasting of growth, inflation, and unemployment. The country is in a mess, and most of this comes as a result of the ineptness, mismanagement, and incompetence of this government.

Last year's growth was only 2.6 per cent, yet the Minister of Finance bamboozles the people again by saying he expects a growth of 5 per cent. The Royal Bank of Canada is more correct when it says 3.3 per cent. What we really need is about 5.5 per cent average growth if we are going to have a 5.5 per cent unemployment rate and a 3.5 per cent inflation rate as we hit the year 1981. We are so far off target that it is a disgrace. It is a national disaster.

In my view, we need an address on the state of the economy. We must come clean with the Canadian people and tell them, whether we are in a mess or not. It is the responsibility of the Minister of Finance to be honest, rather than trying to flim-flam the Canadian people. He is here to give them direction and to create a positive atmosphere whereby this country can reach its ultimate destiny, and here he is playing around with an ad hoc, catch-as-catch-can approach. Is it any wonder that our dollar is destroyed, that the business communities and banking institutions offshore have no confidence? Is there any wonder when we find it is incompetence that we continually face?

The government, Mr. Speaker, preaches restraint, but it practices extravagance. The one time minister of finance inaugurated the current spending program, the budget of June 23, 1975. At that time the main estimates for 1976 had received the approval of parliament. They forecasted budgetary spending of $32.2 billion. The main estimates of 1979 forecasted budgetary spending of $46.5 billion. Thus, during the three years of the restraint program, main estimates for budgetary spending have increased by $14.3 billion, or 44 per cent. Main estimates have increased an average of 13 per cent a year. That is hardly evidence of restraint.

My colleague, the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens), on March 14 put it in these words—I just want to read what he said because he is concerned, as are the vast majority of the Canadian people—he wanted to know how three budgets could go so wrong. As reported at page 3748 of Hansard dated March 14, the Minister of Finance continued to say we must wait. What are we waiting for, complete disaster? The hon. member for York-Simcoe stated:

> On May 25, 1976, the then minister of finance said unemployment would decline. On March 31, 1977, the then minister of finance stated we anticipated 5 per cent real growth and that unemployment would decline. In his October 20 statement, the present Minister of Finance said, "I want sustained growth of between 5 per cent and 6 per cent in order to bring unemployment down."

How can three budgets have been so wrong, Mr. Speaker, at the expense of the unemployed in this nation? That is the key question. How can they be so wrong?

The government now has the cheek to introduce Bill C-31. I think it is important to read what was said on March 15 when the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) moved interim supply on behalf of the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras). The motion begins as follows:

> That a sum not exceeding $5,657,022,492.00 being the aggregate of: (a) three-twelfths of the total of the amounts of the items set forth in the Estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1979, laid before the House of Commons on February 22, 1978 . . .

We have to read the rest of it because we cannot find it in the bill. The bill in paragraph 2 states: "not otherwise provided for, and being the aggregate of". The thing is, they want another $5 billion. The motion then calls for "an additional eight-twelfths of the total amount of Energy, Mines and Resources", "an additional six-twelfths", "an additional five-twelfths of the total amount of Treasury Board", "an additional four-twelfths of the total amount of Finance", "an additional three-twelfths of the total amount of Communications", "an additional two-twelfths of the total amount of Energy, Mines and Resources," and then "an additional one-twelfth of the total amount of Energy, Mines and Resources." It is these additional amounts that bother us, Mr. Speaker. The government has found again that it is necessary to request increased borrowing authority, and this is a clear indication that things are out of hand. This government is out of control; its spending is unlimited. You would think that the taxpayers had a bottomless pocket that we can dip into without explanation. This government is out of control—it has lost control of the economy, and that is readily evident.

The number of officially unemployed Canadians has risen to over one million for the first time in Canadian history. I heard the Prime Minister, or I read about the Prime Minister and the Minister of Employment and Immigration saying, "If you want a job, go out of the country." They claim that the statistics are exaggerated and say it is not their responsibility to create jobs. Are they going to the people with this millstone hanging over their heads? I am going to use those expressions, Mr. Speaker, whenever the Prime Minister wants to pull the plug. They are making all sorts of plans right now and deciding when the opportune time will be. By-elections were called for October 16. What a lot of nonsense that is. We are going in June—heaven knows what day in June.

Mr. Woolliams: Stanley knows.

Mr. Alexander: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) knows. I think he said June 19 or June 26.

The government has lost control. Inflation is running at 8.7 per cent—and that is with controls. Members of all parties on this side of the House are asking what the government is going to do and what the facts are about government borrowing during the present fiscal year. Initially the House approved $7 billion of new borrowing authority based on a $6.4 billion cash requirement. The government increased its tax requirements to $8.5 billion as announced by the Minister of Finance in his October 20 throne speech remarks. In reality that was his mini budget. I think this is also a mini budget we are discussing now, this further borrowing of $5 billion that the government is requesting.

By the end of December the government had already used $6.2 billion, or 73 per cent of that cash requirement and, of course, everyone knows that spending accelerates in the last few months of the fiscal year. Thus as early as December it was evident that the government might be in deep trouble and in need of further borrowing authority. What incompetence it shows when it did not accept that fact—what ineptitude. The government had already taken the necessary steps when in December the bill to amend the Income Tax Act was passed providing it with an additional $9 billion borrowing authority.

The depth of the problem is even more evident if one compares the latest request with statements made by the Minister of Finance in a speech made on second reading debate on the income tax amendments last November. At that time the minister made the following statement—and these statements are germane—they are right to the point because they indicate they do not know what they are doing over there. They have lost control. It is an ad hoc approach, which is amazing, given the fact that they have been in power for the past years—

Mr. Woolliams: 44 years.

Mr. Alexander: —it is just amazing, and yet they think they can go to the people and say, "We are the messiahs". Do you know what the Minister of Finance has been telling the Canadian people?

Mr. Woolliams: I have no idea!

Mr. Alexander: Well, just listen to this. My good friend, the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams), says he has no idea. This is what the Minister of Finance said regarding spending on November 7, 1977, as reported at page 646 of Hansard:

> The increase in borrowing authority sought at the present is to cover estimated financial requirements into the next fiscal year and to provide a substantial margin for contingencies.

In another great statement reported on the same page, he said:

> The government also needs a large contingency amount to provide it with flexibility in planning next year's Canada Savings Bonds' campaign.

Later, in yet another great statement, he said:

> The increase in the borrowing authority will serve to cover our financial requirements well into the next fiscal year and will provide a cushion for contingencies.

These statements give a clear indication that the $9 billion increase in borrowing authority would be sufficient for the coming fiscal year—at least until after the Canada Savings Bonds' campaign, which does not even begin until September. Where is the credibility of this government, Mr. Speaker? No where. Why should we trust this government? Why should we accept what they say now as being a fact? When we refer to these statements, we see that the minister said, I am asking you for increased borrowing authority, but it will be enough. It will be enough to cover everything, including any contingency. Yet, Mr. Speaker, less than four months later the government is back again asking for a further increase in the borrowing authority. Well clearly, the situation is out of control, and it is time for the government to take a hard look at its spending of proposals.

Part of the problem, in my view, exists because the government tries each year, when it tables its main estimates, to fool the Canadian public and parliament with regard to the amount of additional spending that it is actually planning to undertake. In reality, ministers seem to be fooling nobody but themselves. As the hon. member for Calgary Centre said, they play a flim-flam game. It happened last year when the government tabled the main estimates and talked about a 7 per cent increase in government spending. They conveniently forgot that there would be supplementary estimates and thus projected a cash requirement of $6.4 billion. Sure enough, along came the supplementary estimates of $1.9 billion. In October, the Minister of Finance raised the cash requirement projection to $8.5 billion and he had to ask for increased borrowing authority.

Just two weeks ago the government slipped in another $1 billion in the second set of supplementary estimates, and now it is requesting further borrowing authority. Where is the government taking this country? All I can see is bankruptcy and economic disaster.

I thought I heard somebody mumbling and trying to intervene, Mr. Speaker. I suppose they are mumbling in shock at what is going on in government circles. Here we are, on the same merry go round this year. In tabling the main estimates the President of the Treasury Board talked about how he has controlled government spending to a 9.8 per cent increase. In fact, if anticipated further supplementary estimates are taken into account, the spending increase will likely be closer to 13 or 14 per cent. Undoubtedly the cash requirement will have to be increased again when the government comes around to the realization that it has not controlled spending to 9.8 per cent at all. Once again ministers are fooling only themselves.

We are concerned with the approach this government takes when it comes to placing matters before the Canadian people. Ministers deceive, they mislead and they are less than honest. Why should we have to accept this as a philosophy of life, of parliamentary life? That is not our position. We believe in openness, in coming clean, in freedom of information. Now this government asks us for another $5 billion when we were all under the impression that it had its borrowing under control. Why should we give it to them? It is time that this flim-flam and shell game came to an end. The government should make a serious attempt to review its expenditure program and reduce government spending. It is time to be honest with the Canadian people. Sneaking in an extra billion dollars of expenditures and an extra billion dollars of borrowing authority throughout the year is not the solution to Canada's seriously deteriorating economy.

As I said earlier, Mr. Speaker, what we need is a new bureaucracy within the department of the Minister of Finance. Apparently their forecasting was wrong. As long as their forecasting is wrong, whether we are talking about growth, inflation or unemployment, this country will remain in serious difficulties.

I want to thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, for giving this opportunity to me to put these few remarks before the House and before the people of Canada in order that they will know that they cannot trust this government.

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I want to take the opportunity to make some comments about this particular bill, C-31. It is symptomatic of the kinds of reactions that we get from this government across the way to the most serious problem facing the country. In fact every single day we have example after example of lay-offs. We have examples of multi-national corporations in this country cutting back a work force and withdrawing a local office to the parent company's country. This bill seems to envisage the parameters for the limits to which this government can react to those kinds of serious problems.

We have just heard an explication of juggling budgetary figures and juggling supplementary estimates and estimates. In this bill we have the government again fiddling with figures and presenting figures to parliament and to the people which can in no way be comprehended. In terms of the problem that is faced people cannot understand how that particular kind of legislation affects it. I am most concerned. When listening to the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) one would think that if there were a Conservative government things would be different. It ain't necessarily so. I always get upset about that. I have seen the Conservatives in the House in operation. They have splinters all over their posteriors when it comes to dealing with issues in the House.

In Ontario we have an example of a Conservative government and we have heard the chatterbox from Chatham tell it, D'Arcy McKeough, the treasurer. He thinks the greatest thing on wheels is those federal Liberals. He agrees with their budget. He agrees with their projections. He agrees with their inaction with respect to layoffs in the mining industry and any other manufacturing industry in this country. He agrees philosophically with Liberals that in effect the government ought not to interfere in the market place and that they should sit on the sidelines and let everything happen.

When I looked through Bill C-31 it is an example of the limits to which the government plays games with the Canadian people. Juggle a few millions here and few billions there. It gives the impression to the people of Canada that their problems are being dealt with. It is a kind of fiscal legerdemain where the government fools around with the figures and gives the picture that things are happening and will happen.

I always thought Canada was bounded by the limitations of the Nickel Belt riding. All hon. members tend to get the impression that the whole country, the whole world, rotates around their own particular riding and their own concerns. Nickel Belt is a marvellous riding. The hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mrs. Jean Pigott) says it is a very lovely riding. She ought to know because she was there. Some disastrous action was taken recently by the major employers in the Sudbury basin. It was felt in a very real way. It was not the first time that a multinational mining company which dominates the economy of the region has laid off workers in the Sudbury basin. We became extremely concerned this time because the figures reached 3,400 which would result in spin off effects to the economy of the basin. We were loud and vehement in demanding immediate action from the federal and provincial governments with respect to those particular problems.

Since those lay-offs became effective on February 13 I took the opportunity to go to Newfoundland. I had no sooner arrived in Newfoundland than I was confronted with the spectre of the Alcan fluorspar mine closing in St. Lawrence. There is a situation where Alcan was saying to the people of Newfoundland, and to the people of St. Lawrence in particular, "We are closing here because we can purchase the fluorspar cheaper in Mexico. We can make a bigger profit in Mexico by purchasing the fluorspar there than by producing the fluorspar in St. Lawrence." They laid off 400 workers which was the whole work force in that community. These people had lived there for 40 years.

They always tell me about the capitalist risks but they never talk of the workers' risks. That graveyard in St. John's was filled with workers who had died prematurely from silicosis. There we had a company unilaterally deciding that they were pulling out and that they would buy their fluorspar from a company called Fluorspar Empresa de Mexico. This company happens to be owned by Noranda which is a well known company in this country.

The people in their helplessness tried to come to grips with the reality of that problem. They were paying their mortgages on their homes. They turned to the people who they had elected, their provincial and federal government representatives. They said, "What are we going to do?" They made suggestions, Mr. Speaker, and we raised those suggestions in this House. We said the least any self-respecting government ought to do was to impose an import tariff on fluorspar, temporary if you want, sir, and a percentage to make it more economical for Alcan to continue to take out fluorspar from St. Lawrence.

During the question period today I was amazed to hear the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) tell this House that we cannot dictate to Chrysler Corporation. We cannot dictate to the multinational corporations in this country. If our governments which have a mandate from the people cannot dictate and set the behaviour pattern for the multinational corporations in this country, who the hell can?

Alcan, Inco, Falconbridge, Noranda, Granby mines and all the rest do not mind holding a pistol to the heads of their employees, telling them they are going to be laid off. They do not hesitate to dictate to the people. However, who is governing this country? Is it the boards of directors of Inco, Falcon-bridge, Alcan and the rest of them, or those who are elected with the confidence and support of the Canadian people?

The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce stated in a pompous way that we cannot tell them anything. We are to be the recipients of their actions. In so doing, we have allowed another 400 workers to become unemployed, in addition to a lack of productivity in that area. In other words, what we had in St. Lawrence was a strike by capital. Capital refused to go to work in St. Lawrence.

I could be sensitive about the feelings of those people and their helplessness in that situation, about the fact that they could not come to grips with the problem. All they got from the government, which was elected by and has the mandate of the people, was that "There is nothing we can do."

The week before last I visited Vancouver, British Columbia. I arrived on a Thursday evening. On the Friday morning the Grand Duke mine announced it would be closing in Stewart, B.C., laying off 400 workers. The mine owners said they were down to second grade copper ore which was not economical to mine and, therefore, they were closing the mine.

There again we have the people of a particular community helpless in regard to coming to grips with a very serious problem. We sent some of our miners to the Grand Duke years ago. When we had layoffs in 1972, the miners went to Grand Duke. When they returned on holidays, they stated they were making a pile of money. What they were doing was high-grading the ore in the Stewart mine. As a result, today that mine has second grade copper which the company says it is uneconomical to mine.

There is also the situation in the Sudbury basin, my area. On February 13, 3,400 jobs went down the tube. The government was not given previous notice of the lay-offs. This government was told at midnight, October 20, the day the announcement was made. We were told that nickel markets were soft, the companies could not sell the nickel and they were therefore forced to lay-off workers. As a result, they intended to reduce the work force from 13,000 to 10,000. Those jobs have been lost. However, I now understand the company is running up overtime on production. Production levels are at the same height as they were prior to the lay-off notice.

Last week the treasurer of Ontario, D'Arcy McKeough, brought in a budget. He stated that Falconbridge and Inco would be permitted to write off their European offshore operations against taxable income in Ontario. How that will create jobs in the Sudbury basin, I do not know.

The Conservatives in this chamber say that things will be different under a Tory leadership and a Tory government. They had an opportunity to show leadership in the province of Ontario. We have not seen any results from that.

Jobs were lost in the Sudbury basin, but overtime is piling up and production levels are remaining the same. At the time of the announcement of the lay-offs, we kept pushing the government to stockpile nickel. The government said it could not interfere in the market place and, if nickel was not selling, there was no use stockpiling it. Therefore, the workers were laid off. Those are the realities the people of this country experience every day.

While in Windsor last week I heard rumours about the possible closing of the truck plant there. At eleven o'clock this morning, Chrysler Corporation announced it would be closing its truck plant and moving to Jefferson in the United States. They are going to build a plant and manufacture the trucks there. Therefore 800 jobs in the Windsor area will be going down the drain.

Today I questioned the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce about this. All I could get from him was that the government was studying the situation and that it could not tell the corporations what to do. That is the kind of reaction that Canadians from coast to coast get from this government. These are the problems with which they have to deal.

In these dying days of this parliament, the government brings forward the shell game of figures. The people of this country are looking to parliament for some action to solve the problems they face. The main problem that faces them, eroding their confidence and their livelihood, is that of unemployment.

When I first came to Canada I had the impression that the Tories were different from the Liberals. One thing that has been brought home to me in the past 21 or 22 years I have been here is that there really is no difference in their philosophies and approaches to the economy.

When the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) brought in his mini-budget last fall, he stated that we were looking to the private sector to create the jobs in this country. He stated that the government must not involve itself in the operation of the economy, that it should sit on the sidelines and stage. It has been doing a lot of staging. It has fixed the acoustics, put in the proper lighting and a proper background. However, the jobs are not being created. That is the problem.

What the government has been doing is handing out tax concessions. It forgave $17½ million in duties to Chrysler Corporation which should have been paid under the auto pact agreement. Under Bill C-11 which was passed last fall, $10 million was given to Inco. Alcan received $11 million last fall. Inco was allowed to defer $378 million in taxes, in effect an interest free loan. Alcan was allowed to defer $180 million in taxes, again an interest free loan. Between Guatemala and Indonesia it was some $17 million in low interest loans—we do not know the rate exactly but it is below 6 per cent. So Inco is putting one billion dollars into developing ores in Indonesia and $233 million in Guatemala.

Falconbridge, through its parent company, MacIntyre Mines, and its parent company, Superior Oil of Texas, along with Noranda, is putting a billion dollars into Chile for the strip mining of copper. I am always impressed by the patriotism of the multi-national corporations. I recall the days the AIB was brought into being. When the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) two or three years ago announced one Thanksgiving evening that he was establishing such a board and that the workers' wages would be controlled, the workers were in the process of negotiations with Inco and Falconbridge. The corporation then said "We cannot pay you in excess of the guidelines. We are good corporate citizens and we cannot break the law."

Those were true words of Samuel Johnson when he said that patriotism was the last refuge of a scoundrel. At a time in our history when we need large investments of capital in this country, those same multi-national corporations, having made their wealth here, are going beyond our borders and investing in paragons of human freedom such as Chile, Indonesia, and Guatemala. They are doing this with the aid and support of a government which has failed to take action in accordance with the needs of the people. This is a period when the government ought to be assisting in the creation of jobs for those who want to work. Instead, it is saying to the multi-national corporations "Go right ahead and create jobs abroad."

The situation is so blatant as to have led that radical, left-wing organization known as the Canadian Council of Catholic Bishops to issue the following press release at the time of the lay-offs. It was put out by Bishop Proulx, and by Bishop Alexander Carter of the Sault Ste. Marie Diocese. I want to read it because it constitutes an indictment of this government:

> The massive lay-off of workers violates one of the most fundamental rights of life, namely, the right to work and to provide the basic needs of one's family. Moreover, the decisions of the companies to cut back production and terminate jobs were announced suddenly and made without prior consultation. The workers became victims of market forces and the companies exaggerated concentration of profits... Sudbury has been primarily developed to serve the interests of trans-national mining companies and world nickel markets. As a result, the economic and social life of the people in this mining community has been fragile and vulnerable.

Later on in the document we find the statement:

> Powerful, foreign-controlled companies exercise increasing power in Canadian society, beyond the reach of public intervention.

Remember, this is not a radical, left-wing organization. This is the Canadian Council of Catholic Bishops talking about a matter of very real concern in this country.

Where do we get investment capital? At the moment the government is running out inviting an increase of foreign ownership, preparing for a further sell-out of the economy. It is inviting foreign, multi-national corporations to come in still further and put Canadians into the position of being hewers of wood and drawers of water. It is simply piling up problems for the future.

The corporations of which we have had experience in Sudbury have always placed their own interests first. I had an interesting telephone debate the other day with a Mr. Alfred Powis, who is the President of Noranda Mines. During our conversation, Mr. Powis said to me, "Look, if Inco had not gone to Indonesia, some other mining company would have gone there. Wasn't it better that a Canadian mining company should have taken this initiative?" I have heard the same argument made by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, (Mr. Gillespie), that mouthpiece for the mining companies. I said to Mr. Powis, "Mr. Powis, you are absolutely correct. I have absolutely no argument with you. I think you are right, and I tip my hat to Inco and Falconbridge for having applied that kind of reasoning. The corporations set goals. The senior officers who serve them have obtained their mandate from the shareholders, and that mandate is to increase the volume of profits and hence the value of the shares as much as possible so that the shares become more attractive. I have no objection to a corporation fulfilling those goals and carrying out its mandate."

Then I said, "Now tell me, Mr. Powis, who sets the goals for Canada? What are Canada's goals? Are you telling me that Inco's goals are the same as Canada's—that what is good for Inco is good enough for Canada?" I see the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce shaking his head. That is what happens when you take a Tory and make him a Liberal cabinet minister. He screws everything up. We do not need to elect a Tory government to find out what it would do.

We have a Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, but who sets the goals for Canada? Surely the goals of multi-national corporations are not ours. The truth, unfortunately, is that members on the treasury benches have no goals. There can be no goals because they have no plan. There is no national economic plan and no sector strategy.

The other day the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources had a big "confab." This is what happens before elections—they discover they have to communicate. The minister called all the ministers of mines from the various provinces together in an attempt to develop a national mining strategy. What happened? That chatterbox from Chatham, D'Arcy McKeough, ran back to Ontario where he came out last week with a big giveaway to Inco and Falconbridge, allowing them to continue to process ore from Canada in their European refineries, indeed, encouraging them to do so by letting them write off against Ontario taxes the cost of their operations in Europe. I think this was a despicable act by someone elected to serve the taxpayers of the province of Ontario.

I asked the minister how that figured in with a national strategy on mines. I put a question to him on this subject during the question period. He played the old game of never answering the question put to him. He simply said it was the provinces which had control over these resources and over their taxation policy.

What I want to see from the government is a national economic plan with sector strategies, not mere words, but supported by legislation which would direct investment into sectors which need investment capital. We have said time and time again that in this strategy the surplus generated from the resource must be plowed back into the community where it was mined. It is surprising, and I know it will come as a shock—it might not come as a shock to some hon. members—that, for example, we do not have a research and development program in the nickel industry in the Sudbury basin. Indeed, we do not have much nickel research and development in Canada, and we have none in the Sudbury basin. When we ship out our mineral resources, we are also shipping out our human resources because we educate our young people to levels which equip them to undertake challenging and interesting jobs, but since we do not have those jobs, our young people are shipped out with the ore.

We have said that we must have the infrastructure. They call us the nickel capital of the world. Our only claim to that title is the fact that our people rip out the resource from the ground, put it into box cars and ship it out. The objective of any national economic plan must be that the resource be used, first of all for the benefit of this generation and future generations of Canadians, so that any surplus generated from the resource is plowed back and put into the infrastructure in the communities from which the resource was taken.

We talk about related industries. For example, there is no reason in the world why we should not be producing equipment for mining in the Sudbury basin. At present we have to import equipment from Finland. Imagine importing to the Sudbury basin mining equipment from Finland! We have the mines there, many of which are now closed, which could be turned into laboratories for developing new mining equipment.

We do not have a nickel rolling mill. The Royal Canadian Mint buys 50 per cent of its rolled nickel from Inco, and that comes from Pittsburgh. They purchase the other 50 per cent from Sherritt Gordon. It comes from the Philippines to the Sherrit Gordon mill at Fort Saskatchewan and then is sold to the Royal Canadian Mint. Even the coins in your pocket, Mr. Speaker, are not the result of Canadian labour to any extent other than the extraction of the metal from the ground.

We should look at how the Japanese protect their industries. We have raised this question with the minister numerous times. In effect, Japan has a temporary import tariff of 13 per cent on finished nickel. We have said that surely we should have some sort of import tariff against raw nickel coming into this country when we have nickel stockpiled up to our eyeballs. The problem is that we have a government which is part and parcel of the establishment. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce laughs, but let me point out to him that no sooner had the former minister of finance stepped out of his ministerial portfolio, than he was clasped to the bosom of the boys on Bay Street and given a $200,000 a year job. Now he is set for life. The previous minister of finance has also gone to his rewards on Bay Street and will be clasped to the bosom of the boys there.

One only has to look at the structure of the government. They are only puppets and mouthpieces of those who invest in the country and have the big bucks. They do exactly what they are told by Bay Street, no more, no less. They do not challenge that structure because that is the way the boys on Bay Street like it, and that is the way they will have it.

We spoke about what is needed. We need a national economic plan with sector strategies. Furthermore, we need a government whose first basic commitment is to full employment and which will never allow the Canadian worker to be used as any kind of tool in any fight, whether it be against inflation, against unemployment, or against anything else. The Canadian worker must not be used as a tool in those struggles as the government sees them.

Indeed, the Prime Minister, speaking at the Liberal conference in Toronto some five or six weeks ago, when asked whether he expected inflation to come down in the next year or so, said that he expected it to come down and the reason was that he did not think workers would be asking for big increases in their wages as they had been doing prior to the controls. He also said that the reason he did not think they would ask for these big increases was that there was such a large pool of unemployed people in this country. Imagine the Prime Minister making a statement like that! He was saying in effect that the government had a plan to have a large pool of unemployed.

As a matter of fact, they should be very proud of themselves over there; they can be proud of their accomplishment in the number of unemployed having reached one million. Perhaps they should give a lottery prize to the one millionth person unemployed. It goes well with the way the government approaches problems in this country. If you have a debt in the Olympics fund, create a lottery; if you need to subsidize amateur sports, start a lottery. The provinces have picked that up now. If we cannot deal with problems in a realistic way, we deal with them in dreamland, in the never-never land. We say "You too can win $1 million. Have a provincial Loto, have a Perfecto, have a Wintario, have a Loto Canada." They are following a dangerous path, I suggest. We have to deal with these problems and we need a commitment to full employment.

The first and foremost thrust of the government should be to ensure that jobs are not disappearing in communities which can least afford it. That is why we suggest that in the short term the government should be stockpiling nickel because we recognize that, as soon as people lose their jobs, we will pay them unemployment insurance. Now we find new changes in the unemployment insurance scheme. When those changes were brought in, all the Tories voted in favour of them. The hon. member for Hamilton West was all for changing the required number of weeks worked to enable the unemployed to collect benefits. Now we find in all parts of the country that people cannot even get unemployment insurance benefits because they could not accumulate the required number of weeks worked to participate in the scheme. What they are doing is to rush into welfare programs. In our area in Ontario we find that the welfare programs are out of funds, so we have large numbers of people sitting around hoping that some organization will give them a few dollars.

I said that the NDP is committed to economic planning. We have said that there must be a national economic plan with sector strategies. We have said that in this party we believe in full employment. We cannot support tinkering and manipulating with the economic structure in this country. We have said that a clear alternative rests in this corner on this side of the House. Very often members on the other side of the House become removed from the problems of the people of this country, so we are expressing these feelings in an attempt to give them a quick kick in the rear end so that they can realize what the problems are, and perhaps start to solve them. With this aim in mind, I should like to move the following motion, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That Bill C-31 be not read now a second time but that the subject matter be referred to the Standing Committee on Finance and Economic Affairs with instruction that the said committee give consideration to the making of recommendations for inclusion in this said bill, that the salary for the Minister of Finance be reduced to $100.14 a week, this being the average level of unemployment insurance benefits, so that the minister may have an appreciation of what it is like to live as one of Canada's 1.6 million unemployed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. Hon. members have heard the amendment presented by the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez). I should ask for the indulgence of hon. members to give the Chair time to consider whether the amendment is receivable or not, and rule thereon. I ask hon. members to wait until after eight o'clock tonight, at which time the Chair will make a ruling on this matter.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre).

Mr. Andre: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but I have a note which indicates that I was to recognize the hon. Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council (Mr. Pinard). Is that agreeable to the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre)?

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to that, provided I have the opportunity of being recognized next.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Very well. The hon. member will be.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I believe there is an agreement that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) will speak tonight at the very first opportunity, unless I am mistaken. I see the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is signalling to me. I should therefore like to have his opinion on the matter.

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, it has been mentioned around the halls that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) proposes to speak tonight, but I know of no agreement that he be given a special time. He can take his turn along with the rest of us ordinary members.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker,have noticed one thing. On this side of the House, no one has yet spoken on this bill this afternoon, on the other hand, two hon. members have on the other side. So, I would not be averse to the idea that two government members, ordinary members or ministers, should speak one after the other, though I know, of course, that it is up to the Speaker of the House to decide, on the matter.

So, very briefly, Mr. Speaker, this bill requests the authorization to spend a certain amount in the various department during the coming fiscal year, and of course, a good part of that money will be spent on agriculture in Canada. I shall make one short comment. I think it is fundamental and of prime importance to point out that, on the agricultural scene in Canada, many things have happened in the last while. The department was reorganized, its services were relocated according to the new strategy of agricultural expansion and the new food policy. With regard to the agricultural expansion strategy, it emphasizes a team approach in agriculture, in that it gives a greater role to the provinces, producers, processors and consumers. The key elements of that food and agriculture strategy are as follows: First, increase production effectiveness; second, promote the sale of the products with the most trading potential; third, help low income farmers to improve their living standards through agriculture; fourth, preserve and improve natural farming resources and soil utilization; fifth, increase the effectiveness of the marketing system; sixth, protect the farmers against income instability and the natural risk of farm production; seventh, ensure longer term protection against foreign competition for certain products; and eighth, extend the access of Canadian farm products to foreign markets.

Concrete achievements at this time are as follows: first, a free system of paid telephone messages implemented since November 1, 1977; second, three new federal assistance programs totalling $28 million, announced in October 1977 and designed to increase our feed grain storage capacity, to increase local feed grain stocks and to promote the building of grain elevators; third, the Canadian missions at the GATT meetings have consulted farming representatives on many occasions; and fourth, the Eastern and Western Divisions of the Research Branch will have their headquarters relocated outside Ottawa, in Saskatoon and Quebec City.

Mr. Speaker, there is also the food strategy. A white paper on our food strategy was published in June 1977 and its three objectives are as follows: first, maintain food prices; second, maintain adequate supplies; and third, provide producer and fishermen with stable incomes adjusted to their work and their investments. Agriculture is very important in the Drummond constituency which I represent, and I am pleased that the Canadian government is considering spending very substantial amounts to help our farmers in all areas of production.

Unfortunately, since I have only a few minutes left, I do not have the time before five o'clock this afternoon to give more details about all the farming policies of the federal government, but if the Chair allows me to do so, I would like to take this opportunity to mention the dairy products promotion program, which is all to the credit of the government and which is already beginning to show positive results. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call your attention to the various dairy research programs put forward by Agriculture Canada. Because it is concerned with the need to better balance the production and consumption of dairy products in Canada, the department has been working with the private sector and research bodies on a $4 million program that was called for in the national dairy policy announced last spring. This program is administered by the Canadian Dairy Commission and aims at stimulating consumption and the use of milk products, especially skim milk powder. And since 48 per cent of industrial milk producers are based in the province of Quebec, it is my view that those government expenditures will first and foremost benefit Quebec producers, a great number of whom are in the constituency of Drummond I represent here in this House.

There are three main goals: new product development, advertising and market research. Nearly $1 million have been allocated to the first goal, $2.4 million to the second and $500,000 to the third one. The Canadian government has signed contracts with various private firms for the development of new products, such as cheese of low fat content, Greek cheese and skim milk cheese.

Another project is aimed at increasing the opportunities for skim milk marketing in underdeveloped countries. The maximum term for these projects is three years, and the Canadian dairy product bureau, a producer body established to promote milk consumption, will be leading a $2.4 million advertising campaign. Last year, the Canadian government helped industrial milk producers by writing off the $152 million export debt, but this was of a short term nature only. The $4 million research and promotion program, put forward as I said by the Canadian government for the benefit of our farmers, should bring longer term answers.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely notices of motions, private and public bills.

The Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council.

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, there has been an agreement among the leaders of the various parties to proceed first with consideration of private bill 1001 and then with motion No. 4 standing in the name of the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert). I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to proceed in that way and to allow the other motions and bills to stand.

[Mr. Pinard.]

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the hon. parliamentary secretary is correct this time. There has been such an agreement.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) says that it is true, then I will go along with it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. Hon. members have heard the representations of the hon. parliamentary secretary. Is it agreed and so ordered that we proceed to Bill C-1001 immediately?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Agreed and so ordered.

PRIVATE BILLS

[English]

BELL CANADA

The House resumed, from Thursday, Febraury 9, consideration of the motion of Mr. O'Connell that Bill C-1001, respecting Bell Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Leggatt.

Hon. Martin O'Connell (Scarborough East): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the consent that the House has given for us to proceed with this bill at this time. After considering the questions raised in the extended debate in the House on Bill C-1001—debate that began in the previous session some 14 months ago—I would like to advise the House that, as the sponsor of this private bill, I intend to introduce three important amendments in the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, assuming the House is willing to send the bill to the committee. I will describe to the House the essential nature of these amendments, all of which were circulated some days ago either to House leaders or whips, or to other representatives of all parties in the House. I should also say that the proposed amendments arise out of discussions held under my auspices as sponsor of the bill.

The amendments arose out of discussions I had with officers of the company and with certain party representatives in the House. I have also had the benefit of some brief and informal discussions with members of all parties in the House. Therefore, my hope is that the amendments—which I now give assurance will be moved in the appropriate standing committee—will enable the House to give second reading this afternoon to the bill and send it to the committee for formal amendment and further consideration.

The first two amendments to be proposed would delete clause 5.2 and clause 5.3 on page 7 of the bill entirely. The third amendment would delete clause 4 on page 8—the clause which is consequential to the aforementioned clauses, 5.2 and 5.3. A further amendment would delete the words "and 2" in line 6, clause 6, page 9. The result of these amendments would be to withdraw the request in the bill for a letters patent procedure and a negative resolution procedure as a future means of amending Bell Canada's basic charter. The amendments would also withdraw the request for certain ancillary powers sought through the application to Bell Canada's charter of Section 16 of the Canada Corporations Act.

Finally, the amendment would withdraw the request in the bill that future individual common stock issues of the company not require CRTC approval. The effect of the latter amendment would be to continue the present requirement that each stock issue be approved by the CRTC. Those are the proposed three principal amendments. I believe they will overcome the main objections expressed in various parts of the House in varying degrees.

What will remain in the amended bill are two important matters. The first is the company's need and request for a new, higher ceiling for equity capital to assist in financing new construction and the new equipment program in the years ahead. It is a requirement of the bill that parliament give assent to new and higher capital ceilings for common stock issues—before they can be made. There also remain certain provisions for greater financial flexibility suited to today's market conditions, for example, the right to split common shares and create classes of shares.

I trust, Mr. Speaker, that these explanations and assurances will assist the House in coming to a decision with respect to the amendment to the second reading motion, which is before us. I would hope that the amendment would be withdrawn and that we could then come to a conclusion of second reading this afternoon and that the House would agree to move the bill to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the intervention by the hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. O'Connell) on behalf of Bell Canada and his commitment to move in committee the amendments that he described. I consider the amendments that will be moved a tremendous victory for my party and those in the Creditiste party, who assisted us in debating the bill for over a year, because we felt that the provisions in the bill were not in the public interest. I think it is a great achievement, despite the charges in the past that we were filibustering, that Bell Canada has finally come around to our point of view and has agreed to drop the offending clauses from the bill.

I would remind the House that this bill began as a bill called S-2 in the Senate. Indeed, it was passed with only one day's debate in the other place back in December, 1976, which says something about the degree of scrutiny of legislation in that chamber. The bill was sent to the House of Commons in January, 1977. Once the members of the New Democratic Party saw its contents, we were determined that the bill would not go through this House unamended. As a result, we have delayed it until proper amendments were forthcoming from Bell Canada.

Why did we object to this bill, Mr. Speaker? We found that it was not just a bill, as was first claimed, to increase the capitalization of Bell Canada from $1.75 billion to $5 billion, but that it contained many more significant clauses that would have, in our opinion, ended effective parliamentary scrutiny over this giant monopoly. If Bill C-1001 were passed as it was originally written, the effect would be that Bell Canada would not have to come before this House of Commons and be subject to debate on its performance and obligations. It would have been merely through a negative resolution procedure which would not have allowed for thorough debate such as we have had today. The bill in its original form would have allowed Bell Canada legally to own companies not related with telephone operations.

I regret to say that Bell has been moving in this direction in an indirect and quasi-legal way on a limited basis in the past. This is in contravention of its act of incorporation, an act of this House of Commons. So this bill would have given Bell that freedom to move into non-telecommunication fields. We maintain that Bell's ownership of non-telephone related companies would be against the public interest. We maintain that Bell was given a monopoly position by parliament on the clear condition that it would not invest in other fields. Bell Canada was trying to change this position through this bill we have before us. If it had passed in its original form, Bell, unlike any other company in Canada, would have retained its monopoly position in telecommunications in certain provinces and, at the same time, been allowed to own other businesses not related to its monopoly service.

Bell, in our opinion, by looking at its act of incorporation, was charged by parliament to provide good telephone service at reasonable prices. Our submission was, and still is, that if Bell is allowed to own other businesses not related to telephone service, then the telephone subscriber in the long run would face higher rates and poor service. The reason for this is quite obvious. Telephone subscribers would begin to subsidize Bell's non-telephone business ventures—and if anyone cares to go through the debates on this issue in past records of Hansard they will be able to see examples of this that we have brought out. Indeed, the people who I think would be affected most detrimentally would be those rural subscribers of Bell Canada who today have had a very bad deal from the company. We have given example after example of rural subscribers who have faced year after year of multi-party lines and who have faced exorbitant charges to get telephone service to their areas. Bell has a lamentable record in improving rural service, and our fear is that if it moved into other business ventures, rural service would become even worse.

We know how Bell Canada pleads poverty year after year and how it asks for rate increases and how, despite our regulatory system which is to protect the consumer, Bell continues to get these rate increase. In the years 1970 to 1977 Bell was granted rate increases totalling $416 million.

In 1978 Bell is asking for a 20 per cent rate increase, which, if approved, will give Bell some $399 million additional, on an annual basis. That would mean, for example, that telephone subscribers at Toronto and Montreal, who are paying the current rate of $8.15 a month for basic telephone service, would see their telephone bill go up to $9.80 a month. Compare that to a government telephone system in Manitoba where subscribers in Winnipeg are charged only $4.90 for the same kind of telephone service.

We say that there has to be much closer scrutiny by the regulatory agencies of these kinds of rate increases, and one of the opportunities, the rare opportunity that parliament has to examine this history of rate increases and the workings of the regulatory commission is through debates such as this, when Bell is required to come before this Chamber in order to get amendments to its act of incorporation.

We have also complained in the past—I do not have time to go into the details—of how the subsidiaries were not taken into account. For example, there is Northern Telecom and its profit structure in the CRTC determining the rate increases for Bell. But most of all we have been concerned about the rural service, or lack of it, as I have mentioned earlier.

I have raised, through debate in this Chamber examples of people in the smaller communities outside my riding in the district of Algoma who have made direct representations to me and also to Mr. Bud Wildman, the MPP for the area, who complained they had not had good telephone service or affordable telephone service from Bell Canada. I am happy to report that through many discussions we have had with executives of Bell, not only related to the content of this bill but to the problem of rural service, we have won some major improvements for rural subscribers in northern Ontario. We have noticed an acceleration in the reduction of the number of parties on a rural party line. I think, for example, of Prince township within my riding where, by 1979, they will be reduced to four people on a party line. That does not mean that all is well because we still have examples of individuals facing ten-party telephone lines or even more, or people facing telephone bills running into the hundreds of dollars annually in order to get a telephone line to a rural community.

What disappoints me most is the silence, throughout this debate that has gone on for over a year, of many of the Liberal and Conservative members who represent rural areas, who could have used this opportunity to bring before the public and Bell the examples of the poor service in their constituencies as well. I notice in particular, regarding the complaints that I received from the riding of Algoma, that the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Foster) has not participated in this debate, and I regret that.

As I said at the beginning, Mr. Speaker, we have won major concessions from Bell Canada in the amendments that have been announced today. This has only come about because of determined opposition by the members of the NDP caucus in not allowing this bill speedy passage as was originally hoped. I consider it a major victory for the telephone subscribers of Bell Canada. It means that on future occasions we will be able to debate and examine in this Chamber the operations of Bell, and demand of Bell that, in return for any future consideration of amendments or what-have-you, we expect good service at affordable costs. I wish to commend the member for Scarborough East for bringing in these amendments. I look forward to discussion of them in committee and to calling witnesses, in particular the CRTC, so that we can examine the implications of this bill.

I would like, in conclusion, to thank my colleagues who, every second Thursday, were loyally here to debate this bill. I thank, in particular, those outside the House who have assisted us—Dr. Robert Babe, Mr. Gary Steeves, Action Bell Canada, and the many hundreds of people who either called or wrote us giving us examples of poor service, and encouraging us in this debate to get the needed amendments that we now have achieved.

I look forward to having this bill moved to committee, and I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that the New Democratic Party is in agreement that we move the bill to committee for further study.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. In view of the statements that have just been made by the hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. O'Connell), and by my colleague from Sault Ste Marie (Mr. Symes) it is clear that we are prepared to let this bill have second reading and be sent to the appropriate committee.

There is standing against the second reading motion, however, an amendment that would give the bill a six months' hoist. Since we are willing to let the bill go to committee, I wish to say on behalf of the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt), as well as on my own behalf, since we moved and seconded that motion, that we would be prepared to ask the consent of the House to withdraw that motion so that we can go directly to the vote on the main motion. This is proposed in light of the excellent agreement worked out mainly between the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie and the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) on the one hand, and the hon. member for Scarborough East on the other.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Hon. members have heard the request of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). Is there unanimous consent that the amendment be withdrawn?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment (Mr. Leggatt) withdrawn.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

• (1722)

Mr. O'Connell: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I believe standing order 103(1) requires a one week's delay to intervene after second reading in the House before a Standing Committee can consider a bill sent to it.

I would like to ask the House whether it would be prepared to give unanimous consent to waive that provision of Standing Order 103(1), in view of the possible tight time bind in which we may find ourselves with the House recessing on Wednesday next week and this notwithstanding the desire of most members of the House to move the bill to committee stage quickly.

In asking for that unanimous consent I might say that it would be contingent upon the committee being willing to receive the bill with less than one week's notice. I have not been able to consult the committee chairman beyond discussing with him generally that the bill will likely come to him some time soon. He does not know that it will be prior to the one week's interval. Therefore, I would like to ask the House if it would give unanimous consent to waive Standing Order 103(1) on the condition that the committee is willing to receive the bill.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we are prepared to join in giving that consent. The hon. member for Scarborough East spoke to us about it a short while ago. There was one other point which was part of the understanding and that was with respect to the times of any meetings of the committee. They would be arranged by consultation, bearing in mind the possibility of members being present and the possibility of the availability of certain witnesses. So far as the waiving of the one week's requirement is concerned, as set out in Standing Order 103(1), we are prepared to agree to that.

We have an excellent example today, Mr. Speaker, of how useful it is to consult and to get together when there is an important problem before us.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, we agree also.

Mr. O'Connell: Mr. Speaker, it is understood and agreed that the witnesses would have to be available.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Hon. members have heard the suggestion of the hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. O'Connell). Is it agreed and so ordered?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

[Translation]

COPIES OF CORRESPONDENCE RELATING TO DECENTRALIZATION OF DEPARTMENT OF VETERANS AFFAIRS

Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil) moved:

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of all correspondence, notes, minutes of meetings and other communications relating to the decentralization of the Department of Veterans Affairs to the Province of Prince Edward Island.

[English]

He said: Mr. Speaker, this notice of motion for the production of papers was put on the order paper because, in my opinion, the decision which was made to relocate most of the Department of Veterans Affairs to Prince Edward Island was made without adequate prior study. I fully support the program of decentralization. Equally I am happy that the Department of Veterans Affairs will, in large measure, be moving to Prince Edward Island. However, it is my opinion that before any such large move is made, proper studies should be conducted so that the full implications would be known before the decision is taken and the decision surely should be contingent upon the study.

The relocation of the Department of Veterans Affairs to Charlottetown was announced on October 28, 1976. A departmental task force was set up in November of that year to co-ordinate with the province and the municipality to monitor social, economic, physical activities and impacts. The site selection was due in the fall of 1977.

Part of my problems probably stems from the fact that the original announcement was made without any prior information given to interested members, myself included. In my riding there are many veterans, and there is also a large veterans hospital. Because of these contacts, I have constant communication with many of the employees of the Department of Veterans Affairs in Ottawa.

I received many phone calls concerning the announcement. I knew nothing about it. As the newspapers reported, I was especially irritated that the announcement should be made first in the media without concerned MP's being made aware of it. It was not alone. The Dominion President of the Royal Canadian Legion stated the Legion's opposition to the move. He said that the proposed move was not anticipated and the minister's announcement came as a complete surprise. The Dominion President made it clear that he was not opposed to the program of decentralization or the fact that the department was moving to Prince Edward Island, but the fact there had been no consultation was of concern.

The employees were eventually consulted. A questionnaire was given to them. Language concerns and possible disruptions to family life were seen as the main reasons for an overwhelming majority rejection of the move. Some 90 per cent of those responding to the questionnaire were opposed to the transfer. They had, of course, a multitude of reasons for their rejection. One of the obvious reasons why public servants might be unwilling to move was indicated by the fact that a quarter of the employees had members of their families working in the Ottawa area so that they too would be disrupted by the move.

Employees of the Department of Veterans Affairs were also concerned about the disruption to schooling. Many of the children from families affected by the move were enrolled in school systems either in Ottawa, Ontario, or in Hull, Quebec. The minister admitted himself that the department had not analysed the implications of the relocation on DVA staff, and that no employer/employee assistance policy had been adopted. In my opinion this is not the best way to proceed if we want to maintain morale in the department.

Of special concern to me was the subject of language. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) on November 25, in connection with the decentralization plans into the province of Quebec, stated that the government was presently negotiating with Quebec. He said that if there is no agreement to permit English speaking public servants who will be going into Quebec to send their children to English schools, there will be no move. If there is to be decentralization in another province which does not provide for education in French for French speaking people, there will be no decentralization. He went on to say "except where personnel for decentralized units could be hired locally."

I questioned that move to Prince Edward Island. I put many questions on the order paper. I wanted to know what the department or the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) had done to ensure there would be adequate French language schooling facilities available in Prince Edward Island. Prince Edward Island, which has four members of parliament in this House, one of whom is a minister, is smaller than the constituency that I represent and has far fewer persons living in it. Because it is a province, it has a lot more clout than my constituency. I would think it would be possible to make some arrangements.

We talked many times about what might have been done. After much prompting and a lapse of several months, the then president of the treasury board, now the Minister of Finance, was in communication with the premier of the province of Prince Edward Island. He stated that we now have to face up to the issue and asked what the premier was going to do about it. The premier stated that he was prepared to provide French language instruction in the province of Prince Edward Island for those children who needed it.

It is disappointing that we have continually to make these representations and bring pressure to bear in areas where these matters should be looked after in advance. In other words, before considering a move into Prince Edward Island, such subjects as language of instruction for children should have been looked into and some assurance obtained from the premier of that province. I know some will say the situation is different in Quebec because of their bill 101. I suggest whether or not there is language legislation, any province can in a practical fashion exclude teaching in the second official language by not providing the facilities.

For many years in the province of Ontario, discrimination was practised with money. They did not need a bill 101. The same situation continues in many of the other English speaking provinces today. To say there is not the same problem in Prince Edward Island because there is no bill 101 just does not hold water.

There are many other areas about which we asked questions and where answers should have been given before an announcement was made. The department uses 660,000 square feet of office space. In Ottawa alone, about 180,000 square feet of office space is used. It costs $800,000 per annum for the space they are presently utilizing. We all know of the concerns of the people in Ottawa because of the space that will be vacated.

I would like to know whether the relocation is going to affect, for example, Saint John, New Brunswick where 21,000 square feet of space is occupied at a cost of $154,000 per annum. In Toronto, something less than 40,000 square feet of space is occupied at a cost of $200,000 per annum. I could give similar statistics for areas of other provinces. So far these questions have been unanswered.

I also wanted to know the estimated cost of the relocation. I was told the total estimated cost is $8½ million. Without any further explanation I am inclined to question the figure. I very much doubt whether any consideration has been given to the dislocating effect of such a move.

I was interested in whether there would be any organizational changes in those departments being decentralized. I asked the question whether changes were necessary in the organizational structure of senior management personnel in departments affected by decentralization. The answer was no. I asked whether decentralization necessitated a change in reporting lines and responsibility of such personnel. The answer was no.

As an individual who operated a company with offices in several provinces of this country, I find it extremely difficult to imagine a major move of this nature going ahead without some changes in the top organizational structure of the department or in the reporting lines of those personnel. Surely just distance itself will affect in some way the reporting lines of the senior personnel.

My concern was directed to certain other areas. I asked the estimated cost and the approximate number of square feet of the new building which is to be constructed in Charlottetown, P.E.I. The answer was:

—not known at this time as detailed accommodation requirements have not yet been identified by Department of Veterans Affairs.

I asked whether land had been purchased or an option taken on land in Charlottetown for the construction of the new building. The answer was no. I asked what amount of land acquisition and construction costs, if any, would be charged by the Department of Public Works to the Department of Veterans Affairs in connection with this move. I was told "none".

The reason was that the Department of Public Works was responsible for cost of land acquisition and office space for the Department of Veterans Affairs and under current policy, the cost of providing and maintaining office space would be carried in the budget of the Department of Public Works as long as the facility was required. If I do not know now, how am I going to know later? It is going to be in the budget of the Department of Public Works? I am a member of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs but that information is not going to be in the estimates of the Department of Veterans Affairs. I suppose one could float between committees and maybe finally get the question to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Buchanan). Of course, he will say that decisions are being made by the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald). This is the run-around we sometimes get between committees.

In any major move of this nature, we have the stated policy of government that we are going to decentralize. Surely the next move should be a study and questioning of employees. When the study has been completed in reasonable detail, the announcement can then be made based on our findings, the availability of space, the cost of moving, the availability of educational facilities and so on.

Let me give hon. members another example in connection with Place Guy Favreau in Montreal. We shall be spending multi-millions of dollars in the construction of this building, which is an illustration of decentralization in reverse. I asked the minister what departmental offices were scheduled to occupy space in that project. The answer was: "We cannot at this early date identify specific government offices which will be relocated into complex Guy Favreau." The answer continued:

> Public Works does not to date maintain records of numbers of personnel in client premises . . . an analysis is currently under way which will recommend renegotiation of economically favourable leases and relegation of some Crown-owned properties. The allocation of space in Place Guy Favreau will be made after this analysis has taken place.

I mention this for two reasons. First, we have decided to put up a building in Montreal at a cost in excess of $100 million before deciding who should move into it. That, Mr. Speaker, is reverse decentralization. The responsible department, the Department of Public Works, does not know what it is doing in this case because it has received no information from the other departments. So in one case the Department of Veterans Affairs passes the buck to the Department of Public Works, while in the other the Department of Public Works passes the buck to departments generally.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that I have good reason to place my motion on the order paper asking for the production of papers so that a little more light might be cast upon this whole issue. That is why I asked for the correspondence, the minutes of meetings and other communications relating to the decentralization of the Department of Veterans Affairs to the province of Prince Edward Island.

Veterans Affairs

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, long before I came to this House I was an academic and a firm believer in having before me the fullest documentation possible before arriving at a judgment on any subject. I am, therefore, in agreement with the motion. I am also much committed to the idea of freedom of information to the fullest possible extent with respect to government and government transactions.

I listened carefully to what the hon. member had to say. He intimated he was not opposed to the move to Prince Edward Island, but—it was a substantial "but" for a three-letter word. I cannot understand why he should be surprised that this proposal should be made. It is long ago since this chamber first discussed the decentralization of the administration to various parts of the country. A number of departments are already functioning from one end of the country to the other. It is past my understanding that this move to Charlottetown, the cradle of confederation, should cause so much consternation or that it should be held up as an example of inflicting pain and anguish upon public servants. I can understand that great difficulties might arise over family matters, children's education, and so on but there are not many operations in the private sector or, indeed, in the government itself where guaranteed geographical security is part of the job commitment. I never had a big business empire such as the hon. member referred to but I am wondering whether in that empire extending all across the country there are not many people who were called upon to move very suddenly from one part of Canada to another.

The move to Prince Edward Island will not take place suddenly. I hope all those concerned will be able to make suitable arrangements to provide for their families, their children and so on. But I do not accept with good grace the suggestion that Prince Edward Island is incapable of offering language training for those who will be working in the Department of Veterans Affairs. Instead of quibbling about things like this I believe this House and the country should applaud the honourable and gallant Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) who has arranged for the transfer of the department to the city of Charlottetown, a city where the per capita representation of veterans in the Boer War, the first world war, the second world war and the Korean war was very high.

It is very fitting that a minister of such great military distinction should be the man responsible for the initiation of such a move. it is conceivable that the move will be finished under another government, but those are the fortunes of political warfare. Before I leave this place I want to salute the Minister of Veterans Affairs for the action he took and say to the mover of this motion that any public servant now living in the national capital who finds that his work will take him to the city of Charlottetown is very much blessed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macquarrie: His real income will not change but his psychic income will be greatly increased. I have not lived in Charlottetown for a hundred years—

An hon. Member: It just seems like that!

Mr. Macquarrie: —but these people will be well treated. Those who join the department from Prince Edward Island will include many fine people who will maintain the quality of service which is provided. This is a department dedicated to looking after a select group of Canadians, those who bore hardship and endured the struggle at times of national peril. While I think it is wise to have all the information before us, nobody concerned should consider that they were taken by surprise. Sooner or later, decentralization was bound to strike Prince Edward Island. Surely somewhere along the line, if Camrose, Alberta, or whatever it is called up in the north, which the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) is presently representing, can get the Farm Credit Corporation, Prince Edward Island is entitled to something.

I am firmly convinced that the decentralization of bureaucracy is a good thing. The more we can get the Canadian people to look upon this great structure of government as being their own, the better. We saw the cabinet moving about the west—

Mr. Gilbert: At public expense!

Mr. Macquarrie: The hon. member says "at public expense".

An hon. Member: In the public interest!

Mr. Gilbert: It was a political propaganda event.

• (1752)

Mr. Macquarrie: Perhaps I can say what I am going to say. I appreciate the help from all sides, but I would just as soon utter my own thoughts. I was going to say that I think it is an excellent thing for members of the government to be moving across the country. That makes me a very good Canadian citizen. But as a good Progressive Conservative I say it is an excellent thing that the present government move across the country so that people can see them at close range. If they get to know them as well as we know them here, there will be a great future, not only for my party but also for the country.

Mr. Gilbert: Yes, great changes will take place.

Mr. Macquarrie: I look forward to welcoming the people from the Department of Veterans Affairs in Charlottetown. I am voluntarily withdrawing. I do not know what will happen to my colleague, the hon. member for Cardigan, but he will have his memorial there. I am looking forward to my memorial, which is the Charlottetown airport. The last time I was there I saw a beautiful replica right in the foyer. It is pretty crowded there, but that is one thing I welcome. I think we may each leave something tangible—surely there are many intangibles—but I welcome and salute the fact that, as the people on the Island say, "the honourable Danny Dan" has done well.

Mr. Donald Wood (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I should like to applaud most of the comments made by the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie), but with regard to the comments made by the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert), I should like to say no wonder we have regional disparity in our country when we hear centralized comments such as those that he expressed. I was surprised and disappointed to have heard a member of the House speak in this manner.

I am particularly happy to have this opportunity to speak for just a few moments about the planned relocation of the Department of Veterans Affairs from Ottawa to Charlottetown, a move of real importance and magnitude which will be completed in about three years.

We all know the government is committed to the policy of decentralizing some of its operations and the associated relocating of selected agencies, branches and divisions of certain departments outside the national capital region. When one thinks and speaks of decentralization, certainly DREE is a shining example of success. In 1974 DREE made the move to decentralize, and today the Atlantic provinces have 281 people in the four provincial offices and in the regional office in Moncton, as compared to 77 prior to decentralization. But, perhaps even more important, the decentralization of DREE has resulted in over 70 per cent of the senior executive positions being located now outside of Ottawa. This means that 90 per cent of the incentive grant decisions under RDIA are made right in Atlantic Canada.

The relocation of the Department of Veterans Affairs, which is the fifth largest federal department, is seen as an important instrument for attaining such priority national objectives as, first, bringing government operations closer to the people, second, reducing regional economic disparities, and third, promoting a more balanced urban development.

Officials of the Department of Veterans Affairs have worked with the Treasury Board secretariat task force on decentralization for more than a year to determine which units and functions can be relocated. They also developed details of operation, cost and other factors which would permit cabinet to decide which units can best be relocated.

In preparation for relocation, the Department of Veterans Affairs, in conjunction with the Departmental of Regional Economic Expansion and the Department of Urban Affairs, together with representatives of the province of Prince Edward Island and of the city of Charlottetown, have formed a trilevel committee to address itself to all aspects involved in the relocation. The provincial and municipal representatives of the co-ordinating committee are: Dr. Tom Connor, deputy minister of development, and Mr. John Butler, city manager for Charlottetown. Also included in the advance planning team is Dr. John Glendenning, president of Holland college in Charlottetown, with whom the department might soon be working to develop curricula to provide islanders with skill training for possible recruitment to the Department of Veterans Affairs. It is also important to note that there are more federal officials on this co-ordinating committee than provincial and municipal officials because there is a lot of work to be done by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, the Department of Urban Affairs and, of course, the Department of Veterans Affairs.

When the committee addresses itself to all aspects of the relocation and a great many different subjects, among the committee's concerns will be the effect of the move of employees of the Department of Veterans Affairs and their families on the medical, health, cultural and educational facilities in P.E.I. There has been considerable discussion about the provision of public education in the second official language in Charlottetown when the department moves. It is considered a priority. In that respect, the provincial government has agreed that French language education will be available in Charlottetown by 1981. However—we must understand this—precise language training needs of employees of the department cannot be determined until closer to the actual relocation date.

Officials of the personnel section of the department have had consultations recently with a Holland college committee examining business courses to be offered, especially bilingual secretarial, administrative, stenographic and clerical. Former Charlottetown mayor Frank Zakem, who is also principal of Holland College's Charlottetown centre, says that these post-secondary courses which, he predicts, might begin in 1979 will emphasize skills in bilingualism.

However, I should like to emphasize again that the extent of the requirement for French language training will not be definitely known until it is determined how many French speaking employees will choose to relocate. Here are some of the statistics we have already drawn up indicating the number of personnel interested in relocating. The result of the department's first relocation questionnaire circulated to all Department of Veterans Affairs' employees shows that out of 228 employees whose mother tongue is French, 32 indicated they would make the move the Charlottetown, 135 said they would not, and 61 were undecided. Out of the survey of the Anglophone speaking employees—there are 454 of them—108 said they would relocate, 200 said they would not, and 146 were undecided. To put these figures together and to put it all in perspective, 20.5 per cent of the head office staff indicated a willingness to relocate, 49 per cent said they were not planning to relocate, and 30.4 per cent were undecided.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hour appointed for private members' business having expired I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

INTERIM SUPPLY FOR FINANCIAL YEAR ENDING MARCH 31, 1979

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Cullen (for the President of the Treasury Board) that Bill C-31, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending March 31, 1979, be read for the second time and referred to committee of the whole.

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, before the House recessed at 5 p.m., I was dealing with agriculture and the dairy products promotion program. I should have stressed that the advertising campaign will centre on cheese, because consumption is increasing and the annual cheese consumption per capita is in the neighborhood of 15 pounds, while it is double that figure in some European countries.

In the area of market research, funds will be used for finding new markets for the existing dairy products. As an illustration, one project will go into the possibility of increasing daily sales in restaurants, hotels and institutions. The Canadian Farm Economic Research Council received grants to research the use of powder skim milk in animal feeding and various studies are under way on the economic aspects of feeding powder skim milk to suckling calves.

Over the last few years, milk overproduction and low demand for powder skim milk, a by-product of butter manufacturing, has been one of the main problems in that area. Butter and powder skim milk surpluses from increased world dairy production and lower butter consumption depressed world prices to a fraction of their normal level. The Canadian government is supporting the domestic price of powder skim milk at the 72 cents per pound level, while world price plummeted to 20 cents and less. In order to export, Canadian producers must therefore pay some 50 cents a pound, which significantly curtails their level of revenues. This is why I referred earlier to the $152 million government subsidy in the form of export debt write-off, the debt incurred by producers.

Mr. Speaker, of course in this time of year, in mid-March, there is talk of the forthcoming dairy policy. A number of Liberal members and myself are now attending various meetings, in a concerted effort to convince cabinet to approve and announce the best possible dairy policy. This would be forthcoming in the beginning of April. Last year, we succeeded in obtaining a very good daily policy and this year we would like this policy to be even better, in the interest of all our farmers.

I have every reason to hope, Mr. Speaker, that the dairy policy for 1978-79 will be most profitable, not only for the producers but also for the consumers, that is for the people generally. Before closing my remarks, Mr. Speaker, there is a program I should like to explain. I am thinking here of the program to increase the production of fodder in Quebec. An agreement was signed by our Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) and his provincial counterpart on last February 17. The federal-provincial agreement provides for the expenditure of $33.5 million towards the implementation of four programs to help our Quebec producers improve their self-sufficiency in the area of fodder.

At the present time, Quebec produces only 34 per cent of the fodder crops it needs; the rest is imported from the Prairies, Ontario and even the United States. The federal government has committed itself to paying Quebec producers the total cost of those programs, that is a total amount of $33.5 million, or $6.7 million a year for the next five years starting on April 1, 1978. This program will end on May 31, 1983. Four programs are available to enable Quebec farmers to finance grain stocking facilities on the farm including silos, ventilation systems and corn dryers. Our producers may also benefit from subsidies for the purchase of grain harvesters, hay dryers and silos to improve the conservation quality and quantity of grain and fodder crops produced in Quebec. Those programs will be administered by the Quebec Department of Agriculture and the provincial offices in each area will maintain the liaison with producers.

Therefore, all farmers who wish to take part in those programs will be provided with forms and expertise by local offices of the Quebec Department of Agriculture as of April 1, 1978. A federal-provincial committee will supervise the general administration of those programs.

The federal government will pay to the Quebec consolidated fund an amount of $6.7 million annually. The payments made to producers through Quebec will clearly show the contribution of the Canadian government, that is any cheque made to producers will come from federal funds for carrying out those four programs.

This is, Mr. Speaker, what I had to say concerning agriculture during consideration of Bill C-31 for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending March 31, 1979. If I insisted on agriculture it is because it is a vital sector of our society, agriculture being not only the concern of producers but also that of consumers and the Canadian government, has it can be noted, is very much aware of farming problems in Canada as very substantial funds are allotted to agriculture in the best interests of the people.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I would just like to seek the unanimous consent of hon. members of the House in order to make a short statement. I understand the standing committee will be sitting in another room and there is an agreement among its members that the meeting will reconvene some time after I have made my statement. As there was only one member from our side who spoke today perhaps I might be allowed to make my short statement, and that would make it possible for me to make myself available to committee members for interrogation on the bill which has to be concluded before the committee tonight.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I believe under the rules I was recognized prior to five o'clock and would probably have been finishing my remarks about now. However, I agreed to let the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader have the floor on the condition that I would be recognized after that. I am not interested in attempting to disrupt the business of the Minister of Finance but we are interested in putting some questions to him.

I would like to offer the minister the opportunity to speak now if he will agree that we go into committee of the whole after the completion of his remarks so that we might have an opportunity of quizzing him on the impact of the comments he intends to make. His remarks may not be long in duration, but probably important in terms of impact. Therefore we would like that opportunity.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. The Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) on a point of order.

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, discussions on Bill C-31 began this afternoon and, except for myself, only members opposite have participated in the debate. Indeed, one Conservative member has spoken as well as the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) and at seven minutes to five o'clock, I am the only government member who has been recognized this afternoon on that bill. I was allowed 40 minutes. I knew that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) wanted to make himself available for the Committee on Finance tonight and that is why I have shortened my speech and spoke for only about seven minutes. I was entitled to another half hour. I was expecting the same courtesy from the hon. member who spoke before me. I am quite surprised by his attitude, and given the circumstances, when he claims that he had been recognized before me this afternoon, he knows quite well that this was a mistake since no government member at that time had yet been recognized. Now, all I want from the hon. member is to be gentlemanlike and courteous and allow the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) to make his short statement and make himself available for the Committee on Finance before which he must appear.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I recognize the hon. member for York-Simcoe on the same point of order.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I think perhaps there is some misunderstanding. Certainly our impression this afternoon was that at about this time this evening we might have reached the point where we would go into committee of the whole, and then those who wished to use the time to make what might be regarded as speeches could do so. This would allow us an opportunity to question the minister on the statement he now wishes to read into the record.

Perhaps we could make a compromise. If the minister would indicate that he was at least willing to answer questions, notwithstanding the fact that we would not be in committee of the whole, I think that would satisfy us and we could get on with the formal proceedings of the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The Chairman has no choice but to ask all members if there is unanimous consent in response to the permission sought by the Minister of Finance to speak now. If there is not unanimous consent I cannot grant him that opportunity. If there is I will do so. But I cannot impose any conditions.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, I think it is clear that there may be a misunderstanding on your part in respect of what has been suggested on this side, and I say that with great respect to yourself. What the hon. member for Calgary Centre and our financial critic have suggested is that we are prepared to allow the Minister of Finance to speak, but because we do not know what he is going to say, and we are very interested in knowing, as I am sure the nation is, we would like him to consent, as part of the unanimous consent, to a 15 minute question period. No doubt what he has to say will require some clarification. If the minister does not agree to that, then I must agree with your comments.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): With all due respect to hon. members, especially the hon. member who has just spoken, I must first seek the unanimous consent of the House in respect of whether the minister shall be recognized. If there is that consent, after he has been recognized hon. members can then ask whether there will be a question period, and that request may be granted. Before that, however, I must seek unanimous consent that the hon. Minister of Finance be recognized. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): There is not unanimous consent.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, the only reason hon. members said no was that the hon. member for Calgary Centre was recognized before dinner hour and deferred—

An hon. Member: Why shouldn't he?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I have before me an amendment moved by the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) to the effect that the bill be not now read a second time, but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, and the amendment goes on to offer certain instructions to that committee. Without getting into the difficult procedural problems respecting instructions to committees, I would simply draw the attention of the House to the fact that we are operating under a special order in respect of this bill which requires that it be given second reading, be considered in committee of the whole, reported, given third reading and passed before the adjournment of the House tonight. This amendment proposes an alternative procedure not provided for in the special order, and for that reason alone I regret that I must rule the amendment unacceptable.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): But it was a good idea.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, before proceeding with my remarks, so there is no misunderstanding, I should like to say—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order please. Is the hon. member seeking to be recognized for the purpose of discussing the bill or is he rising on a point of order?

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the point of order. I should like to ask for the unanimous consent of the House that the Minister of Finance be allowed to speak, followed by a 15-minute question period.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Members have heard again the proposal of the hon. member for Calgary Centre, that unanimous consent by given the Minister of Finance. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Paproski: Who said "no"?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I asked whether there was unanimous consent and I heard a "no". Therefore, there is not unanimous consent.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—

● (2022)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): If the hon. member is seeking the floor on a point of order to make remarks that certain members have not been recognized, I do not think that is procedural and, therefore, I would not recognize the hon. member on that point of order. If the hon. member wants the floor on a point of order relating to the remarks made by the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre), I will accept that.

Mr. Paproski: I would just like to explain to you, Mr. Speaker, that prior to the dinner hour we discussed this when I approached you at the chair and informed you that there was a possibility of a problem here. I knew there was going to be a problem. Now the minister wants to say a few words. It is fine for him to say a few words providing he answers a few questions at the same time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I see no point of order. I recognize the member for Calgary Centre, and the floor is therefore open to him.

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, we are debating today at second reading Bill C-31, which could go into committee of the whole if the government is willing to answer some questions in regard to spending, the economy and other related matters. But it is not. Therefore, we will have only this opportunity tonight at second reading to debate this bill, which is part of a process that is one of the most meaningless and embarrassing things that we in parliament are called upon to do. The whole process of estimates, spending allocation and supply appropriation is a giant sham, a charade that we perpetrate on the people of Canada every year.

In the third week of February the government presents its main estimates on spending. We know from experience those are not, in fact, their intended expenditures for the rest of the year but only part of them. They are going to present more later on. Committees are given references to look at government spending, but as we all know, that does not happen. There is no opportunity for members of parliament to get to the root of the activities of government departments to determine how they are spending their money.

Each year at this time we end up with an interim supply bill, and in June the final appropriation bill is presented to the House. This is the first time we have had a second reading debate on the bill. Unfortunately, members of parliament have no real opportunity to influence the contents of this bill in any real way. There is no parliamentary control over government spending, none whatsoever. Any attempt to claim otherwise is perpetrating a sham and a charade on the people of Canada. There is no chance for democratic input into government spending planning. There is no way for the people's representatives to exercise any authority over spending. In fact, Mr. Speaker, we would be more honest with the people of Canada if we passed a one-clause bill saying the government could spend whatever they wanted to spend, because this, in fact, is what happens. The government do whatever they want to do. We in parliament have no control whatsoever. To go through this annual charade of pretending there is parliamentary examination of estimates, of spending plans, parliamentary approval of spending plans, parliamentary approval of appropriations, is a charade that we are perpetrating on the people of Canada.

My constituents—and I think the constituents of every other riding in the country—believe in our democratic system. They believe that their members of parliament authorize the taxes, spending, and so on; and they further believe that their representatives monitor or audit the day to day operations of the government. That is what the people of Canada believe. That is what we are taught in school about our parliamentary system. That, in fact, has nothing to do with reality, because in reality taxes become law when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) says they become law. There is no opportunity for parliament to exercise any influence by virtue of standing orders. Spending is exactly what the blue book says it will be. There is no contradictory control or parliamentary input.

The people's representatives have no input whatsoever in terms of determining spending. The day to day monitoring of government activities is impossible due to our inability under the current system to obtain information or find out what is going on. When we have a situation, as we have here today, where we are offering to the Minister of Finance an opportunity to make a statement so that we can question him afterwards to find out what is going on, the minister's parliamentary secretary says no. He does not want that. He does not want parliament to find out.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. Perhaps the Chair should clarify one point at this time. It is not that anyone said no. I just said we could not permit members questioning the minister unless we passed second reading and went into committee of the whole. We cannot permit questions being asked at this stage. That was not sought. The ruling that I made earlier was that we could not go into committee at this time. We are still on second reading. We cannot go into committee until we have passed second reading. Therefore, the remarks being made at the present time are not justified.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I will not endeavour to argue with the Chair. I have always believed that the House is the master of its own rules and by unanimous consent we can do whatever we want. I was merely seeking unanimous consent to offer that opportunity, which was not granted.

Nevertheless, in terms of this whole spending process which Bill C-31 is a part of, what actually happens here and what people believe happens here are two totally different things. The reality is not democracy, but something else—I do not know what it is. It sure is not parliamentary democracy, and the sooner the people of Canada recognize that fact the sooner we can get back to a democratic system.

Compare our situation with the situation in the United States, Mr. Speaker. A budget is presented by the executive to congress in January, and it contains both taxation and spending plans of the government for the fiscal year starting on October 1. In other words, the legislature in the United States gets nine months to consider the taxing and spending plans of the U.S. government. We get, at most, five weeks. In the United States, congress demands and gets full information and they get changes. We demand information and get nothing and have no recourse. There is never any change. Even in the minority parliament, when the majority of members wanted changes we were precluded from obtaining them under the rules.

In the United States, congress was what the people believe it to be—a legislative assembly. Parliament in Canada, in terms of spending, is nothing like that whatsoever. We have no ability to legislate taxes or spending. That is done entirely by the executive branch. Again, it is a sham perpetrated on the people of Canada to claim that parliament collects taxes and controls government spending.

Apologists for this system from amongst the government say that the check here is ministerial responsibility. That is the phrase they love to use when they are defending the system they operate under. What does it mean, Mr. Speaker? According to the Oxford Dictionary "responsible" means "liable to be called to account, answerable, morally accountable for actions." How can the House of Commons call a minister to account? How can we exercise this ministerial responsibility?

When the Minister of Finance was president of the treasury board in February, 1975, and tabled the main estimates for the coming fiscal year, he said that spending for the following year was going to be $28.2 billion in budgetary terms and $1.3 billion in loans for a total of $29.5 billion, representing a very modest 15 per cent increase over the previous year. He said he and his colleague the then minister of finance, the current Bay Street buccaneer were going to keep things to 15 per cent.

Let us examine what happened, Mr. Speaker. In reality, spending for that year was not $29.5 billion, it was $38.2 billion. The increase was not 15 per cent but 21 per cent. The Minister of Finance, who was then President of the Treasury Board, misled this House and the people of Canada about the government's spending plans. He was the responsible minister, but did he resign? He is still here. Did he apologize? Did he in any way account for this? Was he held responsible for this gross inaccuracy that he perpetrated on this House and the people of Canada? He was not. He is now perpetrating the same type of gross inaccuracies regarding some other aspects of government activities—unemployment, spending, debt and numerous other things.

Under this government ministerial responsibility is a sham. It is a shroud behind which they hide. It is a fraud. The Auditor General fills his report every year with instances of misspending by this government of illegal, improper activities. But has any minister resigned? Has one of them apologized? Has any responsibility been taken by ministers? Has the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) accepted responsibility for the AECL kafuffle and all the abuses that occurred there? Not on your life, Mr. Speaker. It is absurd to suggest that we have a system of ministerial responsibility in this country. We have no such thing.

The second line of defence of the apologists of the current system is that, through the debates in the House, through bills, through things like the blue book, the public is given information, and through that there is a weight of public opinion to keep the government and ministers responsible. Again, that is a sham. We have no freedom of information act in this country. The information we obtain is that which the government gives us, no other. We do not know, so we cannot ask the right questions. Even when we do ask the right questions we are not assured that we are getting the right answers. Mr. Gordon Robertson, the second highest bureaucrat of this government, when talking about freedom of information said it is just agitation by vested interests, such as members of parliament and journalists. That was his reaction to our requests for information.

There is outright deception in the form of presentation of data, Mr. Speaker. Let us take the estimates which were presented less than a month ago by the President of Treasury Board (Mr. Andras), as an example. I shall outline four ways in which the method of presentation by the government deceives the House of Commons and the people of Canada about their spending plans.

When dealing with non-budgetary expenditure—loans and advances—they subtract low repayments. Thus, if last year one agency was given a loan of $500 million, and another agency repaid a loan of like amount, the net effect on the spending estimates presented to parliament would be zero. There would be no effect. If this year that loan of $500 million was written off, as is frequently the case with this government, that $500 million would not show up either because that is a no-cash transfer system situation. It does not show up in the figures. The people of Canada would end up spending $500 million of tax moneys and the President of the Treasury Board would not reflect that expenditure in the figures he gives to the House of Commons and the people of Canada. Therefore, we are deceived again about government spending plans.

This year for the first time some Crown corporation loans were not included in government loans. Whereas last year the Export Development Corporation received loans from the government of Canada of $400 million, in the coming fiscal year they will make a loan directly from the private sector. Government spending for the following year is thereby reduced by this $400 million to the Export Development Corporation, but there has been no change in terms of the loan. The people of Canada are still responsible for that loan. It is no different from the previous year, yet the numbers we get from the President of the Treasury Board say that they are spending $400 million less in that way. That is a sham. It is a charade. It is dishonest.

Then we have a situation where the minister predicts future supplementary estimates through the year. Last year he predicted supplementary estimates of $1,800 million. They turned out to be $3 billion. Did the minister apologize? Did he retract? Did he correct that? Did he explain why there was such a difference between his prediction and fact? Not on your life, Mr. Speaker. That is what ministerial responsibility means.

He also predicted that certain funds would not be spent, that they would lapse. He predicted for this year that there would be $1 billion lapsing, which is larger than any other year. If one were using historic precedents the amount of lapse would be about $600 million, not $1 billion as predicted by the Minister of Finance.

There is one other thing the government has been doing to hide true spending, and that is to push expenses off to the private sector. In the pipeline bill there is provision for a monitoring agency which is to cost around $200 million. That is not to be paid by the government but by the pipeline company. Civil servants will be working there. There is $200 million of government spending which is not going to show up in the estimates, and it is not going to look like government spending.

Bill C-20, which deals with northern land use regulations, contains a clause requiring companies to contribute to an environmental protection fund. The moneys involved will never go through consolidated revenue and will never show up as government spending, yet, in fact, they are a tax to the company. If honesty were the mode of operation they should be reflected in the government spending estimates to indicate that the money was being spent in this way.

It is in these ways that this government deceives the people of Canada. Any apologist for the system who says public opinion is a check on government extravagance simply does not realize that in fact the public cannot have an opinion about something they have no information on.

I am sorry the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is not here this evening, as I should like to give a further example of deception. He went out to Edmonton on a campaign trip paid for by the people of Canada and while there made a speech. This is reported in the Ottawa Citizen of March 14, under the heading "The Trudeau & Co. Shell Game", and begins as follows:

Someone is lying—Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau, his advisers, or Statistics Canada.

It goes on to demonstrate the flimflammary of our Prime Minister, his abuse of fact, his willingness to distort, twist, misuse and deceive the Canadian public in the interests of electioneering.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andre: The article ends as follows:

But it should be informative to discover whether you can fool most of the people all of the time.

With that kind of leadership, is it any wonder that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, when electioneering at public expense in Lloydminster, should make a statement that led to headlines like this—

Mrs. Holt: There is nothing in that front row.

Mr. Andre: There is the bionic mouth, Mr. Speaker. The headline said that the minister claimed a P.C. victory may jeopardize the heavy oil plant. If it were half parliamentary, Mr. Speaker, I would say that is a damn lie, but I cannot say that because it is not parliamentary. It sure as heck is not the truth. We voted for Bill C-19 on second reading. If that incompetent minister had paid a little attention the bill would have been through committee weeks ago.

● (2042)

While on the subject, we have a tradition here of not criticizing officials and bureaucrats and not attacking them because they cannot defend themselves. We are supposed to direct our concerns to the responsible minister. I understand and appreciate that. In turn, Mr. Speaker, the requirement is officials not get involved in the political process. Therefore, I was more than a little upset to hear from four different delegations which had been to see officials of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. Certain senior officials in that department had told these individuals that the hon. member for Calgary Centre was making unreasonable demands and delaying that bill. Mr. Speaker, let me indicate that if those officials want to get involved in politics, they should be told to get out and run, otherwise keep their mounths shut.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andre: The third level of defence of this sham of a system is that the public at elections can indicate their concerns about government, that we can hold government responsible at election time. How do you do that? The Prime Minister has had 150 ministerial changes. Who the blazes are you to hold responsible? What postmaster general can we hold responsible for the fact that during the period 1969 to 1977 the amount of mail went up 17.9 per cent but the number of post office employees went up 42.7 per cent? All that is the magic effect of automation. The figures show almost 18 per cent more mail and 43 per cent more employees, and they do not work. What postmaster general are we supposed to hold responsible for that, Mr. Speaker? That is what I would like to know.

Can the people trust what this government says? This is the government that has said, no, no, to price and income controls. They said they would not work, and they would never do it. Then they introduced them a year later. This is a government led by a man who said he would wrestle inflation to the ground. He wrestled inflation to the ground, this great tiger. This is a government led by a man who said that separatism is dead. This is a man who at the last election promised $250 million to help remove railways from downtown urban centres. The list goes on and on. This is a man, this is a government, this is a party which has deceived the Canadian people repeatedly.

The strategy is very clear. They do not think the public is very bright. They think the public will accept whatever lies they are told right now. They will have a whole new batch and a whole new image and a new haircut and they will go to the people and the people will forget about all these lies from the past and believe them from now on. I do not think the Canadian people are that dumb and I do not think that will happen. I think hon. members on the other side are in for a surprise. The people of Canada must realize that we no longer have parliamentary democracy in this country. They must not be deluded into thinking that we in parliament can hold this government responsible, that there are really checks and balances.

As my leader pointed out the other night, if the Americans had this system Senator Sam Irvin would have had to ask Richard Nixon's permission to study Watergate. What do you think of the chances of that happening, Mr. Speaker, in the American system? The fact is that in our system the cabinet can do whatever it wants. It can spend like drunken sailors, and it does. It can hide embarrassing information, and it does. It can distort the truth, and it does. It can ignore the wishes of the Canadian citizenry, and it does. All they feel is necessary is that near elections they put on the act they think the public wants to see, tell whatever fresh new lies are necessary to get elected, and that is all that is required. The only way that we could be less democratic than we are today is if we did away with elections altogether. And only the most naive would dismiss that as a possibility with that bunch.

Even as a debating forum our opportunities are being restricted. We wanted the opportunity given today to the Minister of Finance to make a statement, and for the opposition to be given a chance to ask questions of him so that the whole truth could get to the people of Canada. But the gurus on the other side said no. They are not interested in that. They are plainly not interested in talking about the economy. There are a million unemployed and the minister does not want to talk about that. Our dollar is only worth 88 cents and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) thinks that is the greatest thing that ever happened. I am sure if our dollar went down to a quarter he would be ecstatic. He would be beside himself with glee.

With the anti-inflation program ending we have no debate or discussion as to what is to follow on. I can understand that; the government does not know what to do. It has no idea of how to get out of this mess. It created a million unemployed with its policies. It created an 88-cent dollar with its policies. It created the regional disparity in this country with its policies and it does not know what to do. It is not going to allow parliament to discuss these problems because it is not in their interests to do so. The Liberals want the people to accept a lot of half-truths and mistruths and they expect with that formula they can get back into office. Mr. Speaker, I do not think the people of Canada are that foolish. I think the people of Canada recognize that this coming election is a vote of confidence in this government. They will look at the record and they will see that there are a million people unemployed. They will look at double-digit inflation and at all the blunders of this government, along with the half-truths, the mistruths and the outright lies that have come from this government, and they will vote accordingly, knowing full well that if they vote for the Liberals again they will get more of the same and that there may not be any country at the end of it all.

As Mr. Calami said in an article in Tuesday's Citizen, it will be interesting to see if you can fool most of the people all of the time. I do not think you can. I think this government are in for a rude shock when they get up their courage and go to the people.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, Clause 5 of the interim supply bill now before the House seeks a supplementary statutory borrowing authority of $5 billion. It also seeks explicit authorization for the government to borrow in foreign currencies as well as Canadian dollars.

Under the Financial Administration Act, only parliament may authorize the government to borrow money or issue securities. This requirement refers to borrowings that increase the amount of outstanding loans. The act gives the government a continuing authority to borrow funds to repay maturing debt.

The traditional procedure for seeking new borrowing powers is to attach a clause to supply bills brought before the House. However, this procedure provides no opportunity to debate the borrowing authority request because the clause is not part of the estimates discussed in standing committees and because supply bills are usually passed without debate. For these reasons, it was agreed in March 1976 and again in March 1977 to give the House an opportunity to debate the borrowing authority.

Hon. members will recall that last March, borrowing authority of $7 billion was provided to meet anticipated cash requirements for the 1977-78 fiscal year. Authority to borrow an additional $9 billion was sought and provided as part of the income tax bill passed in December. This request was made because it was recognized that the government's 1977-78 cash requirements were going to exceed the borrowing authority provided earlier and that an additional substantial margin was required then to meet contingencies such as foreign borrowings and the possibility of an advance refunding of maturing Canada savings bonds. It was anticipated that the contingency margin sought would in fact allow the government to meet a significant part of cash requirements for 1978-79.

The authority in this bill to borrow a further $5 billion, together with the unused portion of the $16 billion authority granted in March and December of 1977, should provide the government with sufficient borrowing powers to meet all cash requirements for the fiscal year 1978-79, and provide a margin as usual for contingencies.

To provide greater clarity, clause 5 makes it explicit that the borrowing authority covers foreign currencies as well as Canadian dollars. While this authority has always been implicit, and has not been questioned in our previous foreign currency issues, we think it is helpful to follow the example of other Canadian borrowers in this regard.

I now expect that cash requirements for fiscal year 1977-78 will total $8.8 billion and as of now I am anticipating a cash requirement of about $11 billion for fiscal year 1978-79.

My colleague, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) has already announced that budgetary expenditures, as well as loans, advances and capital assets should represent $48.8 billion in 1978-79, which is 9.8 per cent over the level forecast for 1977-78. Budgetary expenditures should increase by a little less than 10 per cent, with supplementary estimates and cancellations. As for loans, advances and capital assets, they should increase by about 6 per cent.

I expect budgetary revenues to increase by about 13 per cent in 1978-79. As the $100 reduction for each taxpayer has mostly affected personal income tax revenues for 1977-78, these should increase fairly rapidly in 1978-79. The budgetary deficit should remain at approximately the 1977-78 level. However, our financial requirements, apart from exchange operations, will be substantially greater as we must pay approximately $2.6 billion in accrued interests and bonuses payable on Canada savings bonds maturing on November 1, 1978. We expect that many Canadians will want to reinvest this money in more Canada savings bonds, and we certainly encourage them to do so. We therefore foresee that these bonds will this year satisfy a greater proportion of our needs than in the two past years.

As at the end of February our treasury totalled $5.2 billion, a fairly high level; the borrowing authority asked for should allow the government to plan and efficiently carry out management of the public debt. The unused part of the existing borrowing rights, and the new $5 billion authority requested will cover our domestic cash requirements in 1978-79, and will be used to draw on the $1.5 billion U.S. credit opening and the $750 million U.S. loan which is being negotiated.

Our borrowings in Canada are completed for the current fiscal year, except for the treasury bonds which will be offered in the last two adjudications for March. The government increased by about $8.2 billion its outstanding internal debt. The new issues of negotiable shares and the increase in the number of treasury bonds, in net terms, amounted respectively to about $3.5 billion and $2.9 billion. The balance of the increase was provided by the Canada savings bonds, the outstanding debt derived from them having been increased by $1.8 billion during the fiscal year.

We expect to meet in part our financial needs for 1978-79 through our treasury. The balance will be provided through current program providing for an increase in weekly adjudications of treasury bonds, new issues of negotiable bonds from time to time and the periodic campaign for Canada savings bonds in the fall.

[English]

That is the statement, Mr. Speaker, that I wanted to make this evening on the borrowing authority. It is for an additional $5 billion.

I want to make one comment before closing because somebody said "shame". I would like him to explain to me how he would manage to borrow less and still cut taxes by an additional $2 billion, as his party proposes. It makes absolutely no sense to say that his party would cut taxes an additional $2 billion and at the same time say "shame" because there is too much borrowing in this country at the present time. The hon. member would be well advised to make up his mind about this.

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, this is a sad day. This is a sad evening.

[Mr. Chrétien.]

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, was I recognized? This is a sad day. It is a sad evening for parliament and for the people of Canada. On October 20, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), under the guise of a statement during the debate on that day, chose to give what he now says was a budget, without the benefit of parliament having the normal six day debating period it would have on a budget.

This evening, under the guise of making a statement with respect to the bill now before us, the minister has filled in some details as to what we may expect with regard to the revenue and spending position of this government for the coming fiscal year 1979, again, I would emphasize without giving this House the privilege it would have if the government had the courage to bring in a budget. We do not have the privilege to debate the minister's budgetary position.

Not only did the minister bring in his statement in the context that it was, but he has adamantly refused to allow the members of this House to ask questions with regard to that statement. He adamantly refuses to allow the House to go into committee of the whole so that we can have a meaningful review.

The point I wish to make is that there is a great deal unanswered in the minister's statement tonight. He has indicated that we may anticipate a cash requirement of $11 billion for fiscal year 1979. However, he did not make it clear what cash requirement he was referring to. Was he referring to what is generally looked upon as the budgetary cash requirement? Was he referring to the cash requirement after foreign exchange dealings? Most important, the Minister of Finance should have made clear tonight whether the $11 billion, which he is now admitting to be the government's cash requirement for fiscal 1979, includes the borrowings that the government intends to make regarding the Export Development Corporation, the CNR and various other Crown corporations.

Let me put this into perspective. We have a Minister of Finance who lacks the courage to bring in a proper budget, but who indicates we have a $11 billion cash requirement without making it clear to this House that that does not include the cash requirements of such agencies as the Export Development Corporation, which will be going to the public for additional funds. We were told this was part of a larger plan to commit $2 billion of possible future Canadian financing to be raised in the name of Canada. Add that to the $11 billion which has been disclosed here tonight and we are up to $13 billion which the minister is saying will be the fiscal requirement for 1979. Add, further, the borrowing planned by the CNR and other agencies and it becomes clear why the general public is expecting borrowing by Canada to the tune of $14 billion.

Let us put this into perspective. When the minister says tonight he foresees a financial need of $11 billion, it means that 22 per cent of his spending will not be paid for out of revenue in the coming year. In other words, 22 per cent of everything that is being spent on behalf of the Canadian public is being put on the cuff. Between $11 billion and $13 billion represents funds being spent by the government to cover the current shortfall incurred with regard to operations which will have to be paid for by generations to come. What a legacy to inherit! Future generations will have to pay for the government's mismanagement and ineptitude in choosing to run our financial affairs so badly.

Again, to put this issue into perspective, on May 25, 1976 we did see a proper budget introduced. At that time the minister of finance disclosed that the total financial requirement of the government, including those of Crown corporations, was $1.5 billion. That was for the fiscal year 1975. Tonight, four years later, we are told $11 billion will be required. Mr. Speaker, the climb has been sensational. In the 1976 fiscal year, the total sum the government needed to cover the shortfall in its operations was $4.6 billion. In 1977, the total was estimated to be $4.7 billion. In 1978, the fiscal year which will shortly be running out, we are told the total amount required is $8.8 billion. Mr. Speaker, no other nation is incurring such a huge deficit and cash requirement in terms of its population, the total federal government's spending program and the gross national product. That is the truth. It is time those Liberal backbenchers stopped giggling over there behind their ministers, stopped blindly supporting those ministers and asked a few questions. Why have they tolerated the type of deficit which is being incurred?

Why did the minister choose to make this revelation tonight? There may be members who are curious. Why did he choose tonight to spell out the cash requirement for 1979? The truth is, he was told to do so. He was told to make this disclosure by the bankers of New York City. They said he was bound to disclose exactly what was to happen in Canada in 1979. They said to him, in effect: "You may be able to fudge these figures as far as the people of Canada are concerned, but we need to know the facts."

I refer now to the preliminary prospectus which was filed in New York and particularly to the pages in that prospectus dealing with the public debt. Pages 18 and 19 spell out more clearly than the government has ever done what the problem is. It is revealed in this document that as of January 1, 1978, the total direct debt of the federal government was $49.7 billion. This compares with $29 billion in 1973. In the short period of six years they have run up our debt by $20 billion. Tonight we are told they are still spending, or at least attempting to borrow, $7 billion for which they received authority in March, 1977, $9 billion for which they received authority to borrow in November, plus another $5 billion they are wanting us to approve tonight. Mr. Speaker, the Department of Finance seems to have lost control over the budgetary process.

Unfortunately, it is not only the present generation which will be paying for this spending spree the government has embarked on; it will be future generations as well. Not only is the direct debt of the government revealed, but the document also shows that at the end of December, 1977, Crown corporations had borrowed $1.2 billion and that indirect guarantees to which the government is committed amount to almost $21 billion. In short, if we put together the various debts and guarantee obligations of the government we find, according to this document filed in New York, that the government has got us into something exceeding $75 billion of debt.

An hon. Member: Disgusting!

Mr. Stevens: Those are the facts, and rather than come to parliament and make the statement he has made it would be better if the minister were to tell parliament why the government has got into this mess, why it has run into this cash requirement it is now obliged to disclose. Surely the House is entitled to find out exactly the height of the debt ceiling the government presently contemplates.

If we agree to extend the borrowing authority by a further $5 billion, where will it all end? We know from the records filed in New York that the borrowing they have used up already amounts to something like $75 billion. If we add the figure to which the minister has referred tonight the ceiling will be hovering around the $85 billion mark. We should be told clearly exactly what obligations the government intends to run up on behalf of the Canadian public.

Not only has the government incurred the debt to which I have referred, but it has done something which, to my mind, is intolerable: it has monetized an increasing amount of the debt it was incurring. Last year, the Bank of Canada was forced, because of the cash requirement shortfall, to buy from government nearly $2 billion of further obligation in the name of the government of Canada.

At the end of December of last year, the total debt owed by the Bank of Canada in government of Canada securities was $10.225 billion. As I said, that is approximately $2 billion more than at the end of 1976. But let hon. members put that again in perspective. When the emperor became the Prime Minister of this country, when the Prime Minister took over the reins of government in 1968, the total Bank of Canada holdings of government securities amounted to $3.8 billion. From $3.8 billion they have increased to something over $7 billion, and the hard fact is that that is what people call monetizing the debt. There is no mystery about inflation in this country. Since the government took power, real growth in Canada has been 55 per cent. The government has created, largely through what I have referred to as the monetizing of debt, 156 per cent more money in the country. Is it any surprise that we have had 100 per cent inflation since the Prime Minister took the reins of power? I ask urgently that all members of parliament, before they vote to give the government still further borrowing authority of $5 billion ask themselves why we are getting into such a lopsided debt position when we were told, as we are still being told by the government, that we are doing relatively well. If this were not as strong a country as it is, we could not withstand the inept management of a government such as we have.

Mr. F. A. Philbrook (Halton): Mr. Speaker, thank you very much for giving me the privilege of speaking on Bill C-31, the supplementary estimates. I will not speak very long because I know some of my colleagues want to participate in this debate. I will not go into the details of the supplementary estimates—

Mr. Woolliams: Why don't you read them from cover to cover? I am interested.

Mr. Philbrook: If the hon. member does not mind, I will speak off the cuff, but I will pick up my papers.

I should like to touch on a couple of points regarding the economy because this bill on supplementary estimates is a very important part of government spending, which in turn is an important part of our whole economic situation. We have heard a great deal in recent times about some of the hot issues of the day which, by and large, are shared by all countries in the world, all our trading partners. I refer to such issues as unemployment, inflation, trade deficits and currency exchanges, along with government spending which, as I said, is certainly an important part of our economy and which was an important topic of discussion at the recent federal-provincial conference at which we gained a great deal of reassurance that both the federal and provincial governments recognize there must be a change in government spending. They recognize that there must be retrenchment or more restraint and also that the whole problem of excessive government spending must be dealt with.

There is also the other aspect of competitiveness, which is the other side of the problem. As we all know, to make this country more competitive, as it should be, wage costs should be better controlled, as they seemed to be during the anti-inflation period, on a more permanent basis. Productivity, the ability of this country to work hard and produce efficiently, should also be increased. Under productivity there are a number of factors. It is not just a matter of how hard the worker works, as many of us have thought in the past, but how best to modernize our means of production, our productive machinery, also how to identify markets which need our products and in which we can compete.

There is also the business of lost work time. It has been a very serious concern in this country in recent years, perhaps more so than in other countries, perhaps not so much in the way of strikes, but rather the matter of how long the strikes last. We also worry about the special area of strikes in the essential services because those are key monopoly functions that this country cannot do without if it is to have a healthy economy.

Recently I took the trouble to send out a questionnaire on interruptions of work in our essential services—strikes, lockouts, and so on. I found in the early returns, which are fairly heavy, an interesting, although not surprising, fact, namely that the majority of people answering seemed to say yes, we must put a stop to strikes in essential services. I am sure they had such areas as the post office, transportation, Air Canada, and so on, in mind as well as our civil service and security forces which also occupy key monopoly positions in the economy.

I received a letter from a constituent, whom I regard as a friend and supporter. He is certainly not an opponent or critic. He spoke very straightforwardly and honestly in his letter about strikes in the essential services, in the following terms:

> Strikes and work stoppages in the public service will have to be stopped somehow, not because it is in the public service but because the service is a monopoly and people have no viable option. Strikes must be made illegal not just in "essential services" but in all cases where a monopoly service operates. The people cannot be held to ransom by a monopoly, public or private.

He goes on to say as well that it will not just be a matter of passing legislation but that we will have to have the courage to enforce it, which is another dimension. This gentleman, who is concerned, articulate and well qualified, a gentleman named Mr. Frank Price of Oakville, Ontario, is a senior executive in GSW Appliances Limited of Canada. He took the trouble to send me a copy of his recent address to the Ontario Economic Council entitled "Investment in Manufacturing Industries" in which he outlined, very courageously and in a straightforward manner, the serious problems in our economy today as well as the problem of national unity, probably the most serious problem in the past decade.

I will not go into the report but I would recommend it to anyone who would like to read a good analysis of a serious situation. It is dated March 6, 1978. In his closing remarks he states that the key to our economy is fresh capital investment in the manufacturing area. He concludes by saying the following:

> The outline for investment in manufacturing in Ontario today is bad, discouraging, scary, yes, all of those things. In my opinion, the OEC paper—> —seriously understates the problem. Unless something major is done to encourage new investments, we will lose what is left of our manufacturing industry in this country. We need all of the recommendations in the position paper, but perhaps a more important ingredient would be demonstrable evidence that governments in this country believe in the private business system. We do not have any other wealth creating system in this country. We had better all acknowledge that fact and publicly voice our support of the system. We then must so legislate that we allow the system to function.

That is his own paper

He makes the following recommendations about what to do in our manufacturing area and therefore what to do in the best way about our economy. First, we must start to measure international trade in jobs created or lost rather than in dollars. Second, we must recognize that the more primary products we export, the more secondary products we will import. Third, we must consider foreign imports for what they are, an increase in our unemployment. Fourth, we must identify which new jobs will be created, and by whom, before we liberalize trade. Fifth we must conserve our capital and consider how many jobs are created with each major capital investment. Sixth, we must increase our investment in new technology to three times its present level by tax deferment. Seventh, we must limit the growth in government expenditures at all levels to half the growth in the GNP.

There is some hope. At the recent first ministers' conference some governments came down hard on the side of the free enterprise system. If we can translate this into positive action now, we may yet create a viable manufacturing industry in this underdeveloped country of ours. If we do not, I fear the consequences.

In a recent speech before the Vancouver Institute, J. B. Klein, a former board chairman of MacMillan-Bloedel and a former British Columbia supreme court judge, said that parliamentary democracy is becoming less responsible to the people, and we may have to change our system of government. I am sure he had the American congressional system in mind. Mr. Klein concluded by saying that if we do not get business in general, and manufacturing in particular, moving and moving soon in our country, Canadians may well insist that we change our system. Along with this, as has been said in recent days in the House, it is obvious there must be something resembling industrial strategy. We must have more forward planning in the area of industries—short, medium and long term. Therefore, we have a great deal to do to put our own house in order.

I said that I would not speak very long, but in closing I would not feel right without mentioning the other dimension of our trade and economic problems, which is the international effect on our economy. I am referring to trade, which would bring us prosperity and some stability in the world, and also to offering aid and development to those who need it the most. We have problems with our wealthy, industrialized, western trading partners; there is no question about that. Hopefully these will be ironed out at GATT, although the process will be very difficult.

With regard to the second world, the communist world, we need to trade with them more than we are at the present time. Certainly we cannot afford to let them lapse into isolation. That would be very, very dangerous politically and militarily. Yet we have to be very careful in our trade with them for obvious reasons. We have to walk the tightrope with the second world. If Canada is going to make a breakthrough, the real challenge will be in the area of the so-called third world, which is sometimes referred to now as the third and fourth worlds because of Arab oil wells. Some of those countries have slipped back farther now than they were before.

As I indicated previously, we will have to continue offering aid; there is no question about that. It is for our own sake and for their sake. Of course, the real answer is in trade, as well as helping them to develop their own resources in order for them to become healthy trading partners like our present western trading partners, rather than charity cases. Within that umbrella of development, which will be a long and difficult process in many cases, we must start paying more attention and making more effort in certain areas that will assist development.

I am not referring only to areas which would help directly. I am also referring to areas which would not inhibit efforts third world countries are making to become healthy trading partners. One such area is population. We have not talked about that too much in the House. I would like to talk about that at length some time. I had hoped to in the last debate on external affairs, but unfortunately it did not work out. Like many subjects in the area of international affairs, this is a subject which must come into its own again very soon. That is not just because of the human social implication, but also because of the very practical material implications for us as well as the third world countries.

Under the sponsorship of the United Nations, a new worldwide parliamentarians group working on population and development is being formed. Recently I was very pleased to be asked to chair that worldwide group of parliamentarians. I think we will begin to accomplish things in the very near future. I hope the House will hear more on that debate. In both senses and dimensions, both international and domestic, we have quite a job to do. I have every confidence that the government will achieve those challenges.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, we are seeing something tonight which I have not seen in the number of years I have been in parliament. It is approximately a year since we have had a budget in Canada. Tonight we saw the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) refer to a document which he read from. Sometimes he calls it a budget, sometimes he calls it an economic statement. Once again tonight he referred to it as a budget. As was indicated by our finance critic in the debate in answer to the minister this evening, we are almost never allowed to question the minister on that. According to the rules of the House, we are only allowed to question him for a few moments. Under the rules of the House, we are not permitted to have a six-day debate.

We are now into that period of parliamentary history where there is an uncertainty. We are witnessing this place decaying and dying, because we are moving into a period where there is likely to be a federal election. If my memory serves me correctly, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) came into the House and announced that there would be four or five by-elections on October 16. We know he did that with a smirk on his face, and that he had no intention of holding those by-elections on that date. Whether the Prime Minister has let his cabinet in on the secret or not, he has planned with his advisers to announce an election between now and October 16. Also we know between now and that date that perhaps there will not be a budget.

Surely I can speak so that Canadians will understand when we talk about billions. For example, we have been told that this year's deficit is greater than Canada's entire budget when the Prime Minister and his gang took over in 1968. The minister read a statement tonight in a manner similar to that of an elementary schoolboy reading from a text book. Never before have I witnessed either a Liberal or Conservative minister of finance reading in such a manner. Since I have not experienced the New Democratic Party in office federally, I cannot criticize them in this regard.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Just stick around.

Mr. Woolliams: I have never seen such an inept and economically illiterate minister of finance in my lifetime. He entered the chamber and insulted the House by reading from a statement and refusing a simple, ordinary request. We were prepared to yield the floor to him. We requested 15 minutes of his time in order to interrogate him on the statement, which indicates that Canada is seeking a quantity of money from the United States. If it is to be believed, we have been told that bonds are being sold in the United States. Apparently there will be a law for Americans in Canada as well as another one for Canadians. Canadians who buy bonds to bolster the economic policies of the government will be required to pay income tax on them, but Americans will be exempt from that tax.

Over the years I have heard the so-called learned gentlemen who sit on the Treasury benches talking about foreign investment. Here we are today in such a state of economic collapse and economic disaster, the worst since the 1930's, having to go cap in hand to the United States to ask them please to lend us $750 million at a rate of interest higher than that paid by any other country in the western world, and we say that we will not even charge tax on the earnings. There is a law for the Americans in Canada and another law for Canadians. If ever there was discrimination against our taxpayers, that is it, and I hope I get that message across.

To digress for just a moment, I might add that the relationship between Canada and the United States under this government has not been too good over the years, and every backbencher in the Liberal party knows that.

One of our great difficulties in dealing with matters of financial and economic policy is that we are always talking in billions of dollars. How many Canadians know what the budget was in 1965 when we were defeated? How many know what it was in 1968? The message has got across to the public that the national debt has tripled. They know that.

An hon. Member: You mean back in 1963.

Mr. Woolliams: Yes, back in 1963, you are quite correct. I am very pleased that the hon. member has drawn that to my attention. It does seem a long time ago, but when you think back that far you can imagine how awful a time it has been for a Conservative, putting up with this government since 1963. I cannot believe it is that long.

Returning to what Canadians do know about the value of the dollar, they know all the taxes they are paying and that 14 cents of every dollar goes to pay the interest on the national debt, most of which occurred since 1968.

Let us take a look at that economic pie that is put out for the taxpayers in beautiful colour. It shows the share for national health and welfare, defence, and one other, and then it shows the cost of our national debt. As a matter of fact, I think our national debt is third highest.

I do not have much time left, but in the remaining minutes let me deal with what I believe are the two fundamental things causing concern to the average Canadian. His first concern is about his take-home pay. He knows tonight that government expenditures will amount to $46.5 billion. Who knows what a billion dollars looks like? I guess you could stretch it in $20 dollar bills from Nova Scotia to Victoria and never even miss a link. Perhaps you could even come back again. Our debt is getting close to $48 billion.

The average Canadian is concerned about his own take-home pay or, if he is a small businessman or a professional, his take-home profit. Taxes have increased and increased and the budget is built in by statutory law. That is the only reason I might have sympathy for the Minister of Finance, if I have any sympathy for him at all.

This government has legislated and legislated to such an extent that it now has a budget of over $40 billion, and no matter how the minister wriggles and squirms, unless he has a sunset aspect in some of these loans, he has a built-in budget and built-in taxation, and this means less take-home pay for the worker and less take-home profits for the business and professional man. No matter how you look at it, the minister is chained to that situation.

The average man's second concern is in respect of ever-spiralling inflation. The greatest thief of all from the Canadian taxpayer, outside of the high taxes that he is forced to pay, is the thief of inflation. Inflation steals from the weak, from the average income family, from the poor, from widows, from veterans, from everyone. Inflation is the biggest thief of all, but nothing has been done by this government to control it. Is it any wonder there has been a loss of confidence in the Canadian dollar in the international economic process? Not only has the Canadian dollar dropped below the 90 cent barrier, but it is even lower because of the drop in the value of the American dollar in terms of the German mark and the Japanese yen. As a consequence we are really buying on an export market, particularly when you take into account the fact that we have a 65 cent dollar.

One of the greatest aspects or difficulties in respect of inflation is the spiralling cost of energy. The cost has increased not only to drive our automobiles—and an automobile has become a necessity in Canada today—not only to heat our homes, but to run our factories which produce our products. This ends up increasing the cost of consumer goods.

Recently when I was back at home doing a little campaigning a man came to see me to tell me he had started a small factory in Didsbury, Alberta. He is attempting to make galvanized farm bins and Quonset type buildings. He got started nicely and wrote to the steel companies in Hamilton and elsewhere inquiring about the supply of galvanized materials, but he was told they were not able to supply the steel for his factory. He said he had to work it out somehow or another. He was paying $21 per hundredweight for galvanized steel. These companies now want $32 per hundredweight. He is relying on steel imported from Japan and West Germany. This is the case at a time in Canada when we have 1.5 million unemployed. This man is prepared to employ 50 to 75 men, and probably 250 within a short period of time. Can anyone imagine this situation in a nation such as this with iron ore resources and many existing factories? Our steel companies cannot supply this man with steel. There has to be something wrong.

Let us consider what the situation is when we talk about the cost of gas and oil. We have been criticized in the past for what we have said in this regard. I have some statistics produced by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) on May 10, 1977. They are slightly out of date because the price of gas and oil has gone up since the cost of a barrel of crude has increased almost to the world price. I am not going to go into that at the moment. The cost of crude oil is 12.3 cents a gallon. At the present time provincial and federal royalties and taxes on crude are 18.1 cents; the cost of refining and margin is 5 cents; the marketing cost and margin is 18.6 cents; federal sales and excise tax is 14.9 cents; and provincial road tax is 10 cents.

Let me put this in terms of a dollar so we know what we are talking about in relation to the cost of the product. I wish there were more members of the NDP here to listen to this because they are always talking about corporate profits. I do not remember which minister it was, but one minister the other day was entirely correct when he spoke of this matter. He said the cost of the crude product is 32.1 cents per gallon. You cannot drive up to a pump and buy gasoline for 32.1 cents per gallon. That goes back to my boyhood days when we paid 25 cents at the pumps. It is only seven cents more.

We talk about the high prices of corporate bodies. They are exploring and developing gas and oil and at the same time trying to cope with inflation. This is very relevant when we are dealing with the budget. If 32.1 cents is the cost of the product, the provincial take in taxes is 29.4 cents. So every time someone buys a gallon of gasoline across the board, whether it is Ontario, Alberta or British Columbia, he is giving approximately 29.4 cents to the provinces. That is what it should be at the pumps.

The federal take is 25.1 cents. The wholesale and retail margins are 13.4 cents. I will just review that: the cost of the product is 32.1 cents, the provincial tax is 29.4 cents, the federal take is 25.1 cents, and the wholesale and retail margin is 13.4 cents. What it really boils down to is extravagance; policies by the government without any priorities. That is why we are in this mess.

The Minister of Finance earlier tonight said what a ridiculous argument the Conservatives have when they say that they are going to cut taxes by $2 billion, and yet are criticizing the government because they have a $48 billion deficit. That is a fallacious argument. It is a dishonest argument because anybody could take $48 billion and with proper priorities and proper trimming reduce the amount of money we are going to spend, thereby reducing the taxes to the average man in this country so that he would have more take home pay.

Mr. Andras: Tell me what you would do.

Mr. Woolliams: I must say it is not easy—

Mr. Andras: Tell me precisely what you are going to do.

Mr. Woolliams: Well, if you cannot trim down $48 billion then you are illiterate. I can answer that very quickly. Over the years as you sat as a minister on the treasury benches, the government have brought in new programs without any thought of where the money is coming from. They have had deals and they have forced these policies on the provinces, forcing the provinces to tax their people more. It has become a vicious circle.

Mr. Andras: Is that the answer to the question?

Mr. Woolliams: Well, you do not know the answer and that's for sure. So I say there is no doubt about it that when you get to the question of inflation, energy is the problem. The problem is not in the cost of the product but in the cost of taxes that are hidden, direct or indirect, on a gallon of gasoline and a gallon of oil. That is partly why we are in this mess today in reference to energy.

May I end on this point. One of the things the government does is get you off the track. I was very pleased to receive after a speaking tour a pamphlet from a constituent in St. Catharines put out by the member of parliament for St. Catharines (Mr. Parent). It is one of the greatest pamphlets I have ever read. This is how you get the people off the problems of inflation and high taxation. It says:

Just Thinking . . .

Corrupt the young; get them away from religion. Get them interested in sex. Make them superficial; destroy their ruggedness;

They sure know how to do that.

2. Divide the people into hostile groups by constantly harping on controversial matters of no importance;

This government has done that to get us off their economic policies.

3. Destroy the people's faith in their natural leaders by holding the latter up to contempt, ridicule and disgrace. Always preach true democracy, but seize power as fast and as ruthlessly as possible;

Mr. Parent: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Paproski: It is a quarter to ten. Sit down, the Speaker is up.

Mr. Parent: I would ask that the hon. member state where I quoted that from. He is saying I made that thing up. I did not. I quoted it from the communist manifesto of 1917.

Mr. Paproski: Oh, you are one of those, are you?

Mr. Woolliams: It continues:

4. Incite unnecessary strikes in vital industries, encourage civil disorders.

5. Cause breakdown of the old moral virtues . . . honesty . . . self-restraint . . . faith in the pledged word, ruggedness.

Now, my good friend said where he got it from. In May 1919 in Düsseldorf the allied forces found this copy. Why would he quote it in a pamphlet? It is because it is exactly what this government has been doing.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It being 9.45 p.m., it is my duty, pursuant to order made Monday, March 13 of this year, to put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of all remaining stages of Bill C-31. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Turner in the chair.

• (2152)

Clauses 2 to 4 inclusive agreed to.

On Clause 5—Power to borrow $5,000,000,000 for public works and general purposes.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order with respect to the language or phraseology in lines 33 and 34 of clause 5. I say to the President of the Treasury Board that I have checked previous legislation of this kind and I find that the phraseology is the same; but when the minister comes to do this again, I think he should look at the language where it says "as may be required for public works and general purposes." That gives the impression that it is for public works—public buildings and so on. I think the language should be modernized. Perhaps it could read "required for general purposes" or even "required by any and all purposes." Is it not misleading to give the impression that in the main this money is for public works? It is for everything.

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member's suggestion and certainly if we do this again we will use some other wording.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 6 agreed to.

Schedules A to G inclusive agreed to.

Clause 1 agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the bill be read the third time?

Some hon. Members: By leave, now.

Mr. Andras moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

Mr. Speaker: Shall I call it ten o'clock?

[Mr. Woolliams.]

POINT OF ORDER

MR. BAKER (GRENVILLE-CARLETON)—REVIEW OF RULES OF PROCEDURE

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I thought this time might be open for us to discuss some things arising out of the procedure today and yesterday that are rather important. There are seven minutes left on the clock.

I should like to indicate to the government, through you, sir, the great importance that must be attached in the next little while to reviewing the rules of this place so that there can be meaningful discussion of the estimates which are the springboard of government policies. It does not matter whether we support the government or sit in opposition, one of the difficulties that faces all of us is that procedures have developed that do not allow us the opportunity to examine the supplementary estimates or the main estimates thoroughly.

It is as important to members on the government side as to us that we seriously consider changing our rules and practices. I realize it may be difficult to do that in what I think are the dying days of this session of parliament, but I think we should consider the matter very carefully.

One thing that has become apparent is that we do not have the opportunity to examine the government's programs. Our standing committee system, to which estimates are referred, is an excellent system from the point of view of examining legislation. Over the last little while some members have developed an expertise in certain kinds of legislation through their experience and background, and that is good. I do not think that anyone is very happy or very proud of the limitations placed on all of us to look at government programs, however. I know there is a strong feeling in the opposition parties shared by some of my friends on the government side that this is the case.

We have appointed a comptroller general to examine proposed government expenditures and there is a review of how the government manages expenditures and carries out its mandate through the Auditor General. One very important facet of this examination is missing, and that is the right to examine government programs and the workings of government departments in depth. All of us have faced the difficulty of dealing with public servants in standing committees. They are well informed, and therefore the government and the minister are very well informed; but they are faced by members of parliament, and not just members of the opposition, who are not well informed.

After going through what can only be described as a charade—and I do not use that word in a pejorative way but as a member of parliament looking at millions and millions of dollars of estimates—we have to admit we do not deal with the estimates at great length.

It may be claimed that some members are not capable of looking at them, but that argument will only be used as a means of turning the issue away. I think we must look at our committees, not only from the point of view of examining the estimates of departments in detail, but from the point of view of having some basic, independent research facility that can examine these matters. I am sure the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) does not go anywhere in this country and say that the system is adequate. Knowing him as I do, I am sure he would be much happier with the assistance of that kind of informed parliament. I think it would be a help to the government, to parliament and to the people of Canada.

We have a challenger ahead of us at some stage. We cannot deal with it now, but I think this is a complaint of grievance which I would like to put before you on behalf of members on all sides of the House.

Hon. Martin O'Connell (Scarborough East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to share in this expression of concern about the means at our disposal for the control of expenditures. I think it is a part of a general concern that has arisen over the complexity of legislation, the growth of the regulatory process, the growth and difficulty of managing expenditures. Along with the hon. member, I have suggested on other occasions that we need a different kind of approach from that provided in the standing committees. I think we need an expenditures committee that can take a four or five year view, that can assess expenditures as they accrue over the years and find better ways of managing them and perhaps better ways for government management.

I do not think we can presently do this in depth or in a way satisfactory to us as the institution that controls government ultimately. It comes right back to expenditures. I want to say I share the expression of concern raised by the hon. member and hope that the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) and his colleagues will give very serious thought to the concern we all feel, regardless of where we sit in this House.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The concerns expressed by the two hon. members are well noted. Of course, the House notes with some encouragement that recently we circulated the supply bill earlier in the day on the last day on which it is to be voted. All day today the House took under consideration the supply bill. This is certainly a step forward in terms of our procedures and avoids the unseemly last minute decision aspect of the procedure we have been following of late.

However, it still leaves room for the concern which has been expressed in terms of the ability of parliament adequately to examine supply. I do not think the situation is as a result of ill-will on the part of any member or party in the House of Commons. It seems to be more a result of the constraints of time that we face. I am sure this will be the subject on ongoing attention on all sides of the House.

It being ten o'clock this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m. pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At 10.02 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

CALL FOR IMMEDIATE INTRODUCTION OF BUDGET—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. There has been no budget brought down by this government since March 31, 1977, despite the serious deterioration in the country's economy. Budgets are necessary for planning for Canadian business and taxpayers; budgets contain supporting information and documentation to substantiate projections, and uncertainty of taxation or incentives undermines business confidence and the taxpayers' forward-planning.

In view of this government's horrendous deficit covering current operating expenses, which means mortgaging our country and future generations as a testament to this government's incompetence, I move, seconded by the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens):

That this House direct the Minister of Finance to immediately bring down a budget.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate, pursuant to Standing Order 43, can be made at this time only with the unanimous consent of the House.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

LAY-OFFS AT FIRESTONE'S CALGARY PLANT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Firestone of Canada Ltd. has just laid off 110 workers at its Calgary plant, bringing the total number of lay-offs to 270 in the past year. Firestone had been given a 15-year grace period from city taxes in return for providing Calgarians with jobs. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert):

That this House condemns the Firestone company's refusal to co-operate with UIC officials and directs the Minister of Employment and Immigration to intervene on behalf of the workers at that plant.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion, pursuant to Standing Order 43, can be done at this time only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

REQUESTED ESTABLISHMENT OF OMBUDSMAN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the terms of Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion dealing with an urgent and important matter.

As the protection of the citizens should be the basic concern of any government, and as it also behoves the federal government to ensure the citizens better protection in their dealings with the state, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier):

That this House call upon the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) to take all steps required, as soon as possible, to introduce a bill creating for Canada the office of a federal ombudsman, given the fact that present efforts by the government to determine how best to guarantee the citizens optimum protection in their dealings with the state are inadequate.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the terms of Standing Order 43, that motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

POSSIBLE TAKE-OVER OF COME-BY-CHANCE OIL REFINERY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In light of the fact that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) is reported by the Clarenville Packet as having advised that he had meetings with three reputable companies to discuss the possible take-over of the Come-By-Chance oil refinery, and that a number of options are open to the federal government, and in talks in the United States he had been told that "there was talk of using Come-By-Chance and all other surplus refining capacity in eastern Canada on a basis that would help supply the eastern seaboard of the U.S. if Canada would establish Come-By-Chance as an 'in bond' refinery with American crude in and American finished products out destined for the United States," I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

● (1112)

That the minister make a statement on motions outlining the reputable companies he has met with who might take over the Come-By-Chance oil refinery, and whether or not the government of Canada is entering into arrangements so that the oil refinery at Come-By-Chance could be used as an 'in bond' refinery so that the 600 persons once employed at the refinery might again have jobs available, or advise the House whether his interview with the Clarenville Packet was in reality meaningless.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for discussion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

TRANSPORT

RECALL OF CHRYSLER CARS FOR MODIFICATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move an urgent and pressing motion. In view of the fact that certain models of Volaré and Aspen cars which have been sold in Canada have been found to have design defects which could cause the cars to stall under potentially dangerous circumstances, in view of the fact that the Automobile Protection Association made the departments of transport, both in Canada and in the United States, aware of this problem last October, and in view of the fact that on December 20 the United States department of transport announced Chrysler was recalling over one million cars that have been affected, in order to have the defect corrected, and while as yet no recalls have happened in Canada—allegedly because dealers do not have the parts—I move, seconded by the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. Hogan):

[Mr. Speaker.]

That this House instruct the Department of Transport to instruct Chrysler to commence recall on the 200,000 cars involved in Canada and to explain why the recall could be commenced three months earlier in the United States than in Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for discussion is permissible, pursuant to Standing Order 43, only with unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

GOVERNMENT CASH REQUIREMENTS FOR FISCAL YEAR 1978-79

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance, who appears to be tiptoeing through the parliamentary process in a desperate attempt not to bring a budget into this House. Last evening he was at least forced to admit that the government's cash requirements for the coming fiscal year will be about $11 billion.

Would the minister indicate if this is the total cash requirement, including the requirements that may be needed with respect to Crown corporation borrowings which the government has got into the habit of not including in their cash requirements?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, on the contrary, yesterday I was not forced to make that statement: I made it on a very voluntary basis. I came into the House to ask for an increase in the borrowing authority that we have always had on interim supply. I volunteered the information to the House, rather than trying to hide anything, on the cash requirements of the government.

For many years, Crown corporations have been borrowing in the marketplace like other businesses. Of course, when they borrow on their own, we do not have to include them as borrowing from the government. I said that the cash requirement of $11 billion for 1978-79 included $2.6 billion in interest and bonus payments. That is a one-shot affair; it is not something we had to cope with last year. The cash requirement for the normal operations of the government will be similar to what we have this year.

Mr. Stevens: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The minister referred to the fact that Crown corporation borrowings are not included in the cash requirement as revealed last night.

Mr. Chrétien: Some.

Mr. Stevens: Notwithstanding the fact that Crown corporations bind and covenant the people of Canada, would the minister indicate what he estimates to be the total Crown corporation borrowing in the 1979 fiscal year and what he thinks will be the total cash requirement for the government of Canada, including those Crown corporation borrowings?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I just said that it was a desire of the Crown corporations, and very often of this House, to let the corporations that have matured be in the marketplace like other corporations. I just said that they are in the marketplace, they are operating on their own authority, and thus are not to be included in the cash requirements of the government. Many of those corporations now operate in the marketplace.

Mr. Stevens: A further supplementary, Mr. Speaker. The public document filed in the registration statement with the SEC in Washington reveals the startling truth of this government's debt program in the last few years, a debt program that by the end of this year, based on the minister's statement last night, will indicate they have doubled our borrowing in the last four years. Bearing in mind that in two years the government has saddled the Canadian public with $23 billion of borrowings, would the minister indicate when he sees this trend reversing?

● (1117)

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I hope the hon. member and his party will be consistent, because their leader, in Toronto, yesterday was advocating a tax cut—

An hon. Member: Answer the question.

Mr. Chrétien: —of $2 billion, which will cause even more borrowing.

Mr. Stevens: Answer the question.

Mr. Chrétien: I respect the position of the NDP which says you can borrow and borrow and borrow and there is no limit to it. But at least the hon. member's party should make up its mind. If you want me to cut taxes by a further $2 billion, it means that with the other $11 billion dollars of cash requirements the total will be $13 billion.

An hon. Member: Answer the question.

Mr. Chrétien: I ask the hon. member to check with his leader before he gets up in the House of Commons.

BUDGETARY DEFICITS

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, this Minister of Finance is undoubtedly the worst, in both languages, since confederation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: In the budget statement I was given on March 31, 1977, in this House, table I—a work of fiction it turns out to be, and not fact—stated that the deficit of the government of Canada on our budgetary account for this fiscal year would be $7.1 billion. Seven months later, in October, the minister said that the deficit was going to be $9.2 billion, an increase of over 30 per cent from the estimate seven months earlier.

The minister realizes that the confidence of the financial community is very important. How can they be confident, with such errors? My question, Mr. Speaker, is this: Given that the Department of Finance made an error of 30 per cent in the projections of the deficit for last year, what can we take from the minister's weasel wording in his remarks last night when he said that the deficit this year should be the same as 1977-78? Would he guarantee to the House that this is going to be true, that there will not be an error of 30 per cent to 40 per cent in that figure?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, for a guy who has to run away from being minister of finance of his own province—

Some hon. Members: Answer the question.

An hon. Member: Stop being so chippy.

Mr. Chrétien: I was in exactly the reverse position: many people of my province wanted me to return to Quebec, and I decided to stay here.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: I stated yesterday that the cash requirements of $11 billion include interest and bonuses on an official bond issue, a Canada Savings Bond issue, in 1969 which will mature November 1, 1978. Aside from the cash requirements of the government for 1978-79, they will be about the same as last year, because my colleague, the President of the Treasury Board, has succeeded in holding the growth of public spending to under 10 per cent for next year.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance is proud to be called a street fighter. As I told him the other day, he is not even an Ally-Oop. The last three ministers of finance are still running, and the minister will be running from his position before the year is out.

The minister said last night that his forecasts were for a budgetary deficit of the same next year as last year, over $9 billion. He said that loan advances and capital assets should represent $48.8 billion. All through his remarks he said "should". Why is the minister using such imprecise language, and when is the minister going to give us back-up for these figures such as would be contained in the budget? Will he provide us with as much back-up for these figures that he gave last night as he would provide in a budget? We know even last year's figures in the budget were wrong. Would the minister at least give us the comfort, and the investment and financial community the comfort, of looking at the figures that should be presented in this House before there is an election under false pretences?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, as early as the fourth week after my appointment as Minister of Finance I made an economic statement, which some people called a mini-budget and others a budget, determining rather clearly the financial and fiscal position of the Government of Canada. I said, and I repeat, that I do not think it is useful to have a budget at this time since we had something equivalent to a budget on October 20, 1978. I would like to see the effect of the incentives we gave to the Canadian economy resulting from Bill C-11 which was passed last December, and I think it is quite wise to wait for some time to know the performance of the Canadian economy in the first quarter of the year.

● (1122)

[English]

Mr. Crosbie: Will the Minister of Finance confirm or deny the suggestion that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is going to have the gall to come before the House within the next few days to ask for an increase in the borrowing authority of the Export Development Corporation to the extent of $20 billion? If that is the case, why will the minister not tell us what are the borrowing expectations for Crown corporations for this year? Twenty billion dollars is the figure that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is suggesting the Export Development Corporation should have.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, this borrowing is done by the corporation to help Canadian exports, which are on the increase. I am amazed that the opposition do not want to help the export industry of this country.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

VETERANS AFFAIRS

REQUEST WAR DISABILITY PENSION BE RAISED TO LEVEL OF 1973 FORMULA

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a serious and important question for the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Given the fact that all signs indicate there may not be much more time for the passing of legislation in the thirtieth parliament, and the fact that this House demonstrated on March 1 that it can put an important piece of veterans' legislation through all stages in a few hours, will the minister do his best to get his cabinet colleagues to agree to a bill to restore the basic rate of the war disability pension to the level that was agreed upon in 1973, namely, that the basic rate be equal to the average take-home pay of the five categories of public servants that were designated in 1973?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this and many other matters are under consideration in my department.

Mr. Crosbie: You are under consideration by the electorate.

[Mr. Crosbie.]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I preface my supplementary with the same point I made earlier. Time is of the essence in this parliament, and these matters are of great urgency to the veterans of Canada and their families. If the minister is not able to get action in this session on the question of the basic rate, will he try to get action with regard to the pensions of widows of disabled veterans, particularly those who receive no pension at all because the husband's pension was less than 48 per cent? Will the minister try to get that through, if he cannot get the other—but preferably both—before this parliament is dissolved?

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, the same answer applies: This is also under consideration by my department.

SUGGESTED ESTABLISHMENT OF OMBUDSMAN

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice.

Considering the announcement made recently by the minister that he was going to table a bill to establish the position of ombudsman for Canada, could the minister tell us when he will put this bill before the House?

[English]

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I have been working very diligently with my officials in the drafting and preparation of the bill. I hope that work will be completed soon.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SITUATION IN MIDDLE EAST—GOVERNMENT INITIATIVES TO RESTORE PEACE

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It has to do with the very perilous position the world is in today as a result of the situation in the Middle East. It is perilous to the future of the Middle East, perilous to peace and generally dangerous to the world.

● (1127)

Will the minister enlighten the House as to the information he has on the situation, within the limitations I realize he has to observe? Will he provide an opportunity on Monday for a full discussion of this question because, after all, there is something to which Canada can contribute. We have a particular interest in the Middle East. Could the hon. gentleman also tell us whether, in the event that a peace force is set up—as is apparently being considered by some countries in the western world—Canada will follow the course which it did under the administration of Mr. St. Laurent and myself, that of providing a responsible group of Canadians experienced in the operation of such a force? This would be a step which Canada could take now, and it would bring results, because everywhere in the world Canadian peace forces are recognized and appreciated.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this is one occasion upon which I can say with all sincerity that I agree with the preamble to the right hon. member's question. It is a most serious situation. Along with many other countries, we have already deplored the terrorist action which occurred in Israel and the retaliatory action which followed. Unfortunately, this diminishes the prospect of a peaceful settlement in the Middle East.

As for developments since then, hon. members will be aware that yesterday I expressed the view that it would be desirable to see the withdrawal of Israeli forces from the southern part of Lebanon. This carries implicit in it the view, which I hold, that there is a need for some kind of stabilizing or peacekeeping force such as the right hon. member suggested. I made it known some months ago that Canada is prepared to consider participation in such a force if there is a proposal for its establishment and if it receives the approval of the United Nations, something which, as the right hon. gentleman knows, would be necessary if the force is to be effective. Events over the weekend will determine whether or not a call for such a course will be made in a formal way. I believe the President of the United States made a suggestion to that effect yesterday.

As to the matter of a discussion in the House, I would have no objection, but the timing is important. It would be a question of determining whether the actions of the various governments concerned have reached a point at which discussion among ourselves in Canada would be useful and beneficial. I will undertake to keep the House advised as fully as possible. We are prepared to look at peacekeeping if a number of conditions are met, to our satisfaction, including the fundamental one that such a force would be able to carry out its mandate and restore a high level of stability to an extremely troubled and perilous situation.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The answer given to me is in keeping with what I had expected, except for the last three or four lines when the minister made available an escape hatch for Canada. Why did he include the proviso as to whether this, that or the other prerequisites are met? The force is bound to be helpful. It is bound to be effective. It is time for Canada to take the initiative, as we have in the past, instead of waiting for other nations. It is time to give a lead to peace-loving countries all over the world and to make our own contribution.

Mr. Jamieson: Now the situation is back to normal and I can disagree with the right hon. member again. The qualification I made was a studied one. The reason for it is simple and hon. members opposite should find no difficulty in accepting it. Such a peace force would of necessity require agreement, for example, from Israel. Unless Israel was prepared as one of the concerned parties—and there are others—to accept this force and to be governed by it, we would be putting Canadian forces into a very difficult and risky situation which would be counterproductive and, would involve, as not the least of our considerations, a serious risk to their lives and to their safety. All I am saying is that the qualification is that we must be safisfied that the force can carry out the mandate it is given.

If you will permit me another moment, Mr. Speaker, there is also the problem, which we would obviously have to discuss, as to the role such a peacekeeping force can perform. For example, we are already very heavily committed with regard to a logistics support role on the Golan Heights and also in the Sinai. If we were asked to perform that role, we could not expand our capability; therefore, it is again a matter of defining and asking just what we can do. However, that does not diminish our commitment in any way.

I would like to emphasize that the initiative I took in the Middle East back in October I think indicates that we are, and should be, as the right hon. member has properly said, concerned and willing to act.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

AVAILABILITY OF APPLICATION FORMS FOR EMPLOYMENT TAX CREDIT

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Given the fact that the employment tax credit bill, with all its shortcomings, is about all we have, and since even that cannot have its maximum effect because of the erosion of confidence in this government and the failure of the minister to bring in a budget, can the minister tell the House why it has taken so long to get the forms into the marketplace? There are parts of the country which have not yet received them. Can the minister tell us when we can expect this measure to be in place in order to have whatever effect it will have on creating jobs?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I understand that all the forms are in place. I do not know if the hon. member has information to the contrary, but I think his question should be asked of the Minister of Employment and Immigration who administers the program, not me.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I ask the Minister of Employment and Immigration, then, whether he can explain why it has taken so long to get the forms out. The eastern townships of Quebec got them only late this week. Can the minister also tell us what programs he intends to put in place for advertising and militant promotion in order to maximize the return from this measure which is all we have from this government?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to say that my department did, in fact, meet its deadline, contrary to what the Leader of the Opposition was propounding at the beginning of this week. The forms were in place with respect to Quebec. We wanted to make certain we got the forms out in bilingual fashion. They were all available on Monday and were moved out by bus to the various regions.

I am also pleased to say that initial indications are that there will be a positive and solid response to this particular program. The forms are in place. There may be one or two outlying offices where for one reason or another they have not been received, but the vast majority of Manpower offices have the forms. Employers can hire now and fill out the forms retroactively.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, given the fact that this program is being handled by Canada Manpower centres which, let us face it, do not have a real presence in the business community, can the minister tell us how he intends to reach the business community? More particularly, when will the minister start his promotional campaign, and does he intend to promote the program actively in business journals and through chambers of commerce?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, I am proud to say that the business community is much better informed than my hon. colleague gives it credit for, because it is in fact aware of the program. There has been some impatience on the part of the business community. It has been waiting for us to get the forms out and the necessary regulations passed. However, preliminary indications are that the business community is aware of this opportunity and is, in fact, moving forward to take advantage of it. It is a splendid program and I am pleased to see that we are getting the appropriate reaction.

ALLEGED INEPT FORECASTING OF ECONOMIC SITUATION—EFFECT ON BUSINESS AND CONSUMERS

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. We have noticed that there has been inept forecasting regarding growth, inflation, unemployment and cash requirements, which destroys the confidence of business and consumers. How can the minister tell us that he can rely on the expertise he has, and is it not about time he started to question competence?

[Mr. Chrétien.]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad that this question comes this morning because yesterday, with grand fanfare, the opposition proclaimed that Mr. de Cotret of the Conference Board of Canada had joined them. The Conservatives claim that that is a great acquisition. I am glad to say that the prediction of the Conference Board of Canada for growth in 1978 was 5 per cent, exactly the same as that of the Minister of Finance. Perhaps now hon. members opposite will have someone who will tell them what the reality is, something which they cannot understand themselves.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, all indicators seem to show that we will need more than 2.5 per cent growth. We will need something over 5 per cent, and that is a fact.

Mr. Andras: He said 5 per cent.

Mr. Alexander: When the minister went to Washington in March of 1978, he indicated that we would have a $7.7 billion cash requirement, yet last night the figure jumped to $8.8 billion. How can the minister reconcile this? It is one thing to mislead the House of Commons and the Canadian people; it is another thing to go to Washington and mislead the people there.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, speaking of misleading, I have not been to Washington in the last three years, so I think the hon. member has his facts wrong.

Mr. Alexander: You got my message, though. Answer my question.

Mr. Chrétien: With regard to predictions, I said very clearly yesterday that the increased cash requirements are caused by the fact that we have to pay interest and bonuses on the special Canada Savings Bond issue which comes to maturity on November 1, 1978. For normal operations, the cash requirements will be almost the same this year.

HEALTH

REQUEST FOR REVIEW OF BAN ON SACCHARIN

Mrs. Simma Holt (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Now that the courts have ruled that the sugar companies of Canada are joined in a monopoly, and therefore hold tremendous power and influence to block and prevent competition, and in light of this finding which, incidentally, might influence some members of the fourth estate to retract some of their invective against the former minister of consumer and corporate affairs, who alone tackled the monopoly—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Holt: —will the minister have an independent investigator from outside her department review the ludicrous research upon which Canada alone banned saccharin, with the possibility of reversing that ban?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I will check again to ensure that independent researchers have indeed assessed the study on which the government based its restriction on the sale of saccharin. I know for a fact, however, that the United States congress Office of Technological Assessment has evaluated the Canadian study and concluded that it was valid.

As to the deep concern of the hon. member about diabetics, to which she did not refer to today but which is known to this House and for which I would like to commend her, I would like to add that I will do my utmost to encourage the efforts of the industrial research sectors in Canada to produce acceptable replacement sweeteners.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

NEED TO CREATE INVESTOR CONFIDENCE

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Since 1977 was the fifth consecutive year in which there was a net outflow of direct investment capital from Canada, when does the minister propose to create a climate of investor confidence so that Canadian jobs, wealth and output may be protected?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not quite understand what the hon. member means. We are trying to create the most favourable climate, and I think the hon. member could help in this regard if the opposition would stop spreading all kinds of rumours exaggerating the deficits or cash requirements of the federal government. If the opposition were a bit more responsible, things might improve somewhat. I am told—

[English]

Mr. Stevens: You confirmed the deficit.

Mr. Chrétien: I am glad that the Leader of the Opposition decided to bring someone into his party to replace the hon. member for York-Simcoe as financial critic.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McKenzie: We do not have to spread any rumours; the outflow of capital is referred to daily in the newspapers. It is the uncertainty caused by the federal government, and not the unity question, that is driving business and investment out of Canada and creating record unemployment. Are we to rely completely on government make-work projects as the only hope for future jobs for the over one million unemployed in Canada?

● (1142)

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, in spite of what the hon. member says, the question of national unity is one of the problems. Last week the Treasurer of Ontario, Mr. McKeough, said that the reduction of the Canadian dollar to the level it is at now was caused 40 per cent by the political insecurity. I invite the hon. member to read the speech of Mr. McKeough on that topic.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

GOVERNMENT POLICY ON LEGALIZATION OF MARIJUANA

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice. In view of the fact that the last Liberal convention passed a resolution in favour of the legalization of marijuana, and that last August the Minister of Justice stated that he would declassify marijuana from the Criminal Code to the Food and Drugs Act, would the Minister of Justice state to Canadians what the government's policy is on this very important matter?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I stated earlier that the Minister of National Health and Welfare, the Solicitor General and I have studied Bill S-19 to determine what amendments should be made to that bill, toward its introduction. I am not sure whether it is deliberate or not, but the hon. member has put me in some difficulty. I am aware the Prime Minister made a statement on this matter yesterday. Because of other events this morning, I have not had an opportunity of reading his comments. Therefore, I think the question should be directed more properly to the Prime Minister.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Speaker, I will direct the same question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the last Liberal convention passed a resolution in favour of the legalization of marijuana, and that last August the Minister of Justice stated that he would declassify marijuana from the Criminal Code to the Food and Drugs Act, would the Prime Minister state the policy of the government on this very important matter?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we made that policy very clear when we introduced a bill in the Senate, which was passed in its amended form by the Senate. That represents the policy of the government. We would gladly introduce it and pass it through the House if we could have unanimous consent to do so in half a day.

CEILING ON MAIL DELIVERY CONTRACTS

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Postmaster General. In view of the discrimination against rural mailmen who are threatened with the loss of their jobs by the $10,000 ceiling on contracts, notwithstanding their substantial investment in transportation equipment, when will the Postmaster General bring in amendments to the Post Office Act to remedy this injustice? Of course, it is aggravated by continuing inflation, and amendments were promised by his predecessor when he appeared before the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications last May 5.

Hon. J.-Gilles Lamontagne (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I have received many inquiries concerning the $10,000 limit with regard to rural contracts for delivering mail. I know these people are suffering because of inflation and other costs. At the moment, we are trying to revise all these contracts, but unfortunately the limit set by the Post Office Act is $10,000. Probably we will have to pass an amendment to the Post Office Act in the future in an attempt to give justice to these people.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, because of the importance of this issue, as was emphasized by the Postmaster General, and while there is yet time, will the hon. minister introduce amendments to the Post Office Act not only to resolve this particular injustice but also to legalize rate increases and deal with the many other urgent amendments which must be made to the Post Office Act if the Post Office Department is to get back on the road to recovery?

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, the Post Office Department is already back on the road to recovery. According to the last statistics, it is getting better in many parts of the country.

An hon. Member: Not in Nova Scotia.

Mr. Lamontagne: Perhaps that is an exception.

Mr. Dinsdale: What about Toronto?

Mr. Lamontagne: I can tell the hon. member that there are many things to be amended in the Post Office Act. I think we will see revisions carried out in due time.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

REQUEST WAR DISABILITY PENSION BE RAISED TO LEVEL OF 1973 FORMULA—DISREPAIR OF VETERANS HOMES

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is really supplementary to the one asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I hope I can frame the question so that the Minister of Veterans Affairs will not use the word "consideration" in his reply. The minister is aware that a committee is studying the basic rate of pension in the 48 per cent widows' inequity. Can the minister give some hope to the veterans of the country by indicating what progress is being made by this committee, and when we can expect a decision?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would prefer not to be that precise today. The study is progressing quite rapidly.

[Mr. Dinsdale.]

Mr. Marshall: Mr. Speaker, dealing with another glaring inequity, can the minister indicate what progress has been made with regard to the submission of the provincial command of the Canadian Legion in Newfoundland which did a survey and came up with 4,000 deteriorated homes which require repairs? A commitment was made three or four years ago that a pilot project would be done so that the project would spread across the country. Can the minister give a definite commitment now to providing those funds? Can he indicate what progress has been made? What is his answer?

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, considerable progress has been made. As the hon. member knows, last year all communities in Newfoundland with fewer than 2,500 residents were designated for rural RRAP. Certain areas will receive higher priority than others. Now that the budget for this program is $3 million, which is ten times that of the 1976-1977 budget, I understand there has been an appreciable increase in applications for assistance under the program. RRAP is capable of meeting the needs of veterans in most areas. Hon. members of the House should recall that when areas are designated, it is done by the provinces. Thus, this program is progressing considerably. I have spoken to my colleague, the Minister of State for Urban Affairs, and everything possible is being done at this time.

URBAN AFFAIRS

REQUEST NEWLY-FORMED MUNICIPALITIES IN QUEBEC BE ELIGIBLE FOR RRAP ASSISTANCE

Mr. Alexandre Cyr (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs.

First of all, I wish to express to the minister the House's satisfaction for the "sugary" victory he has won this week. He has been advised that several municipalities in the Gaspé area had applied for their designations under RRAP. Will he make public shortly the names of the Quebec communities which will be designated in the new agreement which will be signed with the Quebec government and which will make it possible for a larger number of municipalities to benefit from RRAP?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I shall be shortly in a position to announce that all small municipalities in the province of Quebec will be designated for RRAP purposes. The current discussions with the Quebec government have been very successful. The Quebec government has indicated its desire that all small municipalities should be designated, and we are indeed delighted that it went along with our suggestion.

TRADE

TEXTILES—INQUIRY WHETHER TARIFFS EXEMPTION LIST SUBMITTED TO GATT

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. It concerns the increase in unemployment in the textile industry. Given the threat of further unemployment that reduced tariffs in the textile trade would bring to communities which are dependent on this industry, and given the increasing uncertainty and concern in these communities because of lack of information about what is taking place with the GATT negotiations in Geneva, I should like to ask the minister if an exemptions list for Canadian tariffs is now in place and whether textiles are included on that list.

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, we are entering into the MTN negotiations. We are putting on the table those things we believe we require from other countries. We are asking for things. We do not have an exemptions list as yet. I should like to inform the House that in the last half of 1977, investments in the textile industry rose, employment rose, and there is new confidence in this Canadian industry.

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister whether it is the government's intention to submit an exemptions list and whether textiles will be on that list, because the answer the minister has given is pretty cold comfort to dozens of textile communities throughout Ontario and Quebec for whom uncertainty and secrecy are the greatest fears, as his colleague, the Minister of Finance, should be telling him.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, we are going to great lengths to inform the industry of their exact position. During the whole negotiation we are going to great lengths to inform the provinces about what is going on at Geneva. I think never before in any trade negotiations at GATT have so many people been so well informed, nor have the provinces been so well informed as now.

CANADIAN CULTURE

CONFERENCE ON MULTICULTURALISM

Mr. Gus Mitges (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State (Multiculturalism) and pertains to a conference or seminar which will be sponsored by the department of multiculturalism and held here in Ottawa on the twenty-third of this month. Will he explain what criteria were used to determine who would receive invitations, and give us an idea of the total cost of this conference to the government?

Hon. Norman A. Cafik (Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): Mr. Speaker, there is an upcoming conference for all the ethnic press in Canada. It will be taking place later this month; in fact, next week. The purpose of the conference is to explain the new provisions of the Immigration Act and the human rights act. It will also deal with multiculturalism policy and our relations with the ethnic media.

In terms of cost, as this is being shared between the Department of Employment and Immigration and my department, the figures are not readily available. As soon as they are available, I will be very pleased to let the hon. member know.

Mr. Mitges: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact, as the Minister has stated, that an invitation to the conference was extended to representatives of the ethnic media from across Canada, would the minister explain why Mr. Kissin, editor of the Toronto Jewish Press, did not receive an invitation, among others who have been in touch with my office to indicate they were not invited, considering that Mr. Kissin's newspaper has one of the largest circulations among the ethnic press in Canada?

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, I very much appreciate the hon. member drawing that information to my attention. If he knows of any other persons of the ethnic press who have not been invited, perhaps he would be kind enough to forward that information to my directorate and we will see that invitations are, in fact, extended.

REQUEST NATIONAL BODY STUDY FOOD POLICY

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Since nothing has really come out of the national food policy conference that was held in Ottawa in February, except confusion, would the minister indicate whether the government is considering setting up a new national body to advise the government on food policy and, if so, would this national body that has been talked about include representatives of the various food systems in Canada?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member says nothing has come out of the federal strategy conference that took place here. Even some of the greatest procrastinators in the media were complimentary of the conference, saying it was a success. Some of the people who had condemned it from the start said it has been a success. They are putting all that information together—a lot of it was submitted by working groups—in order to arrive at a decision. Because the hon. member, on such a day as this, March 17, St. Patrick's Day, is not being so kind to the Minister of Agriculture, I would say to him, may the little people be kind to him.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Murta: Mr. Speaker, we are both Irish, so there is no point in the minister saying what he has just said. I would like him to answer my question. We can debate whether the conference was positive—and our opinions are obviously not the same—but my question was in terms of whether the government is giving serious consideration to setting up a national body to monitor food policy in this country. Is the government giving consideration to this? Will the minister answer that direct question?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, many suggestions have been made. There has been no decision as to what avenue we will follow at this time.

INDUSTRY

CLOSING OF CHRYSLER PLANT AT WINDSOR, ONT.—PROGRESS REPORT ON DISCUSSIONS WITH COMPANY

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Now that his officials have returned from Windsor, where I understand they spent yesterday with Chrysler of Canada, does he have any further report to make on the closing of the light truck production plant at Windsor?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, my department has given me a brief report on what was found at Windsor. The plant will be shut down for extensive renovations and is expected to be reopened early in 1979. The plant will supply parts for the new Pillette Road plant. Chrysler has invested $43 million in the new plant and increased employment to 2,500. Almost half of the 750 employees who have been laid off will return to work when the plant reopens. The remainder will be employed at the Pillette plant and plants in the area. Chrysler does not expect any permanent lay-offs. Employees will receive 90 per cent of their take-home earnings.

Of course, it is regrettable, but these renovations have to take place in order to keep our industry competitive. The Big Three automotive companies are spending about $300 million a year upgrading their plants generally. I should also point out that this year alone, cars brought into Canada from offshore have increased in price 18 per cent, so I think our automotive industry should be competitive on the North American continent.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. It is not intended to trespass on today. Perhaps I would have asked the question in any event if I had been recognized. We want to take over some time, Mr. Speaker, but not right this morning. My question really relates to what might be in the weeks ahead, and it is for the Prime Minister who is obviously one of the more prominent thespians on the political stage. In the vain hope of getting some idea of his concept of leadership, would he please tell the House, when he stands with his thumbs in his belt in his new prime ministerial pose, does he feel like Tom Mix, or Tom Thumb?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

REQUEST FOR REDUCTION IN CATTLE IMPORTS

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

[Editor's Note: Mr. Trudeau moved to another seat in the chamber.]

Mr. Trudeau: George, come on over.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Editor's Note: Mr. Hees crossed the chamber and stood in Mr. Trudeau's place.]

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, may I answer the question?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: I find life very dull over here, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Editor's Note: Mr. Hees resumed his seat.]

Mr. Speaker: Something like this could only happen after the hon. Minister of Agriculture wished the little people upon us.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, my question was to be for the Hon. George Hees, the acting prime minister, but I will address it, instead, to the friendly leprechaun, that fellow who claims to be Minister of Agriculture.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nystrom: The Canadian cattle industry has said that the number of cattle inventoried in our country dropped by 6 per cent last year, due in part, or perhaps in the main, to low prices and high imports. In light of these recent figures, will the minister give serious consideration to cutting down on imports of cattle from abroad, keeping in mind that this government increased these import quotas by 2 million pounds last year?

• (1202)

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is using figures wrongly again, which is not uncommon for him, because we have not increased the quota that much. They are entitled to a 4.4 per cent increase in quota, according to the international trading agreement. We have increased it by 1.5 per cent, which is not what the hon. member said, or some 1,400,000 pounds.

All I can say to him is that we are very concerned because we see a tremendous increase in the production of beef in Australia alone—34 million head of cattle in that country—and the tremendous productive capacity that is there. All they have to do is leave them on the range, and they can harvest them. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and myself are watching this very closely because they are under import control at the present time. They have been for the last four years, except for about nine months in 1976.

Various cabinet ministers have met the cattle people. I even saw the hon. member at one of our meetings in Regina last week. I am sure he found it very informative. I am sure, also, that he was there for beef interests and not political interests; he had the concern of farmers at heart. I am sure he heard various farm groups expressing their views to us at that time. We are taking them into consideration.

Mr. Nystrom: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Really, all I want is an answer to my question and the question asked by hundreds of farmers who met the minister on Saturday. Is it his intention to cut back on imports, as the farmers want? At the same time, would he give consideration now to introducing a national meat authority, as the overwhelming number of farmers in Regina wanted when he met them on Saturday?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, our concern is the concern of the beef industry in total, as it always has been. I am sure the hon. member recognizes that there is no group with more widely different ideas, more disseminated, than the beef producers of Canada. To put them all together and come up with a proper program is not as easy as one might think. You do not cut off imports from your trading partners with a snap of the fingers; it is not that easy. There are trading agreements with Commonwealth partners and members of GATT. I believe all the Commonwealth partners are members of GATT. You just do not throw those adrift and then fight compensation and trade wars, etc.

As a matter of fact I had hoped that the chief spokesman for the leprechauns in this House, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), would have risen in his place to extend to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the House on behalf of all of us here who pride ourselves on our Irish extraction, the top of the morning, sir, to you, on this St. Patrick's day.

PRIVILEGE

MR. SYMES—ALTERATION IN OFFICIAL HANSARD RECORD

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege relating to an answer I received yesterday from the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts) and the alteration of the official record of the House, namely, Hansard, which I submit misleads the public in what the answer of the minister was.

If I might explain my question of privilege I would hope that the minister would rise on this occasion to state clearly exactly how this alteration of the official record took place and to clarify what the government's position is on student loans.

By way of explanation I refer to page 3829 of Hansard of yesterday, and to my second question to the Secretary of State relating to the problem under the Students Loans Act whereby a graduation student, having obtained a student loan, must begin repayment of that loan after six months. There are no provisions in the act to waive that until the student obtains full employment. Any waiver of that repayment provision is entirely discretionary on the part of the banks that issue the loan. My question was as follows:

> Mr. Speaker, given the fact that the minister knows full well that national students' organizations object to merely increasing loans because that decreases the grants allotted to students, I hope the minister takes my first question seriously. By way of supplementary, since graduating or terminating students must begin repayment of student loans six months after leaving their educational institutions, and in light of the disastrous unemployment rate, will the minister ensure that any bill to amend the Student Loans Act will provide that students need only begin to repay the loans after first obtaining full-time employment?

I submit the essence of the question is: "Will the minister ensure that any bill to amend the Student Loans Act will provide that students need only begin to repay loans after first obtaining full-time employment?"

The official transcript—more commonly called the "blues"—the literal taking down of the notes, indicates that the Secretary of State replied as follows:

> Mr. Speaker, I have already given the hon. member that assurance privately.

I believe the television transcript or record of proceedings of yesterday will also confirm the original notes. In the official record of Hansard we find that five extra words have been added to the minister's answer, which I submit substantially alter the interpretation of the answer given yesterday.

In Hansard we read on page 3829 the Secretary of State saying:

> Mr. Speaker, I have already given the honourable member that assurance privately that I will explore this.

Those extra words "that I will explore this" indicate a certain degree of ambiguity which, I submit, substantially alters the interpretation I had and indeed that the public had yesterday—that the minister had given assurances that there would be amendments to the Students Loans Act providing a student would not have to repay until he gained full employment.

The official transcript of yesterday says the minister will explore the matter—a quite contradictory interpretation of what we heard yesterday. I should like to know how that Hansard record was altered in such a way as to contradict clearly the answer of yesterday. I would also hope that the minister would explain what is the government's actual position on repayment of student loans?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, first of all I want to thank the hon. member for having indicated to me that he intended to raise this question of privilege. That was a kind thing for him to do and I appreciate it.

I can explain it quite simply that the words were added to try to make clear what was, in fact, the situation. As the hon. member knows, we have had some discussions about the legislation, and to have left the impression that I had given the assurance to him that the change which he wanted to see in the legislation would in fact be presented, would not have been true. That was not in fact the substance of our conversation and it did not seem to me desirable to have the public record misstate the facts of the situation.

I admit, Mr. Speaker, that there is not a right to contravene the sense of the answer and that was not my intention in adding those words to make the response clearer. It would have been the essence of his question, or the part that stuck in my mind was his desire that we take these issues seriously, and that was the assurance which I wished to give him and which I give to him still.

I would therefore welcome the opportunity that he has presented if there have been—he has told me this privately—some press reports which indicated that the legislation would contain the provision for a six-month delay of the re-collection of loans until after the point when the former student was employed. It enables me to indicate that that had not been the intention of the proposed legislation, but I indicated to him that I would explore this possibility. Since such a change would indeed take place in regulations and not in legislation itself, I would hope that he would not let that lacuna—that vacuum in the legislation from his point of view—impede the passage of legislation which I believe is of very considerable significance to the students of the country and would assist them greatly.

On the other matter which I also promised to explore, that of the situation or the position of the provinces in relation to grants, I have been assured after telephone consultations that it is not the intention of the provinces to make any changes in the ratio of grants to loans. There may be some provinces which will want to make changes in relation to grants vis-à-vis their own bursaries. That undertaking has been made to me as a result of telephone conversations. I hope that meets one of the concerns of the hon. member and that he and his colleagues in the New Democratic Party will therefore be prepared to give speedy treatment to this legislation when it is presented to the House.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, this raises a very important question. I think the minister by his answer indicated he changed the purport of the transcript. If that practice continued, the debates in the House can become meaningless and irrelevant. They can change from day to day, overnight, and outside the House. The minister knows there is a procedure available to him to rise on a question of privilege and indicate that he inadvertently misled the House or did not give a complete answer, and that would be accepted with applause by all members.

Further, and I say this as kindly as I can, this statement has come from a minister who, in terms of his estimates, indicated that there was some difficulty for some period of time. I followed his answer with interest, and I would like to reserve the right to raise the matter later if that should appear to be necessary.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Hon. members have touched upon a point which concerns my authority in respect of the faithful recording of the proceedings of the House. I will discuss it, of course, with the Editors of Hansard to determine what in fact has taken place. It is a matter of great and substantial importance to the accuracy of the record of the proceedings.

NATIONAL SECURITY

STATEMENT ON APPLICATION OF OFFICIAL SECRETS ACT

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, during the past several weeks, considerable attention has been given in the House and in the country to the conduct of the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt) involving highly sensitive national security information. This House is also aware of an article published in the Toronto Sun on March 7, 1978, which made detailed and explicit references to a secret document containing national security information. While the two events may appear to have been related, I wish to indicate at the outset that I have not been made aware of any information that would relate the hon. member for Leeds to the article which appeared in the Toronto Sun.

In each of these instances, it is clear that certain documents and information of the most sensitive nature have been unlawfully released by, or obtained from, someone authorized to have them. Unfortunately, the person or persons responsible for this unlawful release of information have not been identified. The investigation into the circumstances of the release of this information will continue to be vigorously pursued and appropriate action will be taken when possible.

In some circles, the public servant who leaks sensitive information has some approval and "glamour". In my view, they have none. Such actions are contemptible and cowardly.

If a person in the service of this country is so dissatisfied, as is that person's fundamental right, with the conduct of public business by a duly elected government, their remedy is not in skulking about delivering brown envelopes and thereby discrediting their associates who serve Canada with devotion and integrity. Their remedy is to resign and endeavour, through our free institutions, to influence public affairs and public opinion. That, Mr. Speaker, in my view, is the lawful, proper and courageous way.

Because of the importance of the issues involved in these matters, I think that this House and the people of Canada are entitled at the first opportunity to know the decisions that I have reached on whether prosecutions should be instituted under the provisions of the Official Secrets Act against the hon. member for Leeds or against others in connection with the publication of the article in the Toronto Sun.

The privilege of free speech in this chamber and the freedom of the press are matters which are fundamental to our democratic system. Decisions on issues which tend to draw these fundamental principles into conflict with the protection of our national security interests must be taken with great care. What may be seen by some as a matter to be decided with speed has therefore been seen by me as a matter that demanded decision with careful thought and consideration.

What I have had to face, and resolve to my satisfaction, is whether and under what circumstances to authorize prosecutions under the Official Secrets Act. I have been guided by those parliamentary, constitutional, and legal principles which should be taken into account by the Attorney General in the discharge of this particular responsibility. Mr. Speaker, it might be useful to set some of those out.

In arriving at these I have been guided by recognized authorities such as Lord Shawcross, Edwards, Erskine, May and Bourinot, and more recently and very helpfully, my valuable discussions with Commonwealth attorneys general in Winnipeg last summer on the office of attorney general, and more particularly my personal conversations at that time with the Attorney General of England and Wales and the Lord Chancellor.

I am aware that, since the enactment of the Official Secrets Act, this would appear to have been the first occasion in Canada where consideration has to be given to the provisions of the Official Secrets Act and the right of a member of the House to freely express his views in the House in the course of carrying on his parliamentary business.

The first principle, in my view, is that there must be excluded any consideration based upon narrow, partisan views, or based upon the political consequences to me or to others.

In arriving at a decision on such a sensitive issue as this, the Attorney General is entitled to seek information and advice from others but in no way is he directed by his colleagues in the government or by parliament itself. That is not to say that the Attorney General is not accountable to parliament for his decisions, which he obviously is.

Clearly, I am entitled to seek and obtain information from others, including my colleague, the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais), and the Commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police on the security implications of recent disclosures. This I have done.

In my view, the special position of the Attorney General in this regard is clearly entrenched in our parliamentary practice. Based on the authorities and on my own experience as a member of the government for ten years, which has included my three immediate predecessors, this special position has been diligently protected in theory and in practice.

Mr. Speaker, the second principle is that every citizen is subject to the law. One of the pillars of our system of government, dating back three centuries, is that neither the King nor any other person, be he a member of this House, a member of the government, a member of the press, or someone possessed of title or position, is above the law. The law should apply to all, equally. He who breaks it must bear the consequences.

Third, with today's differing ideological viewpoints between different countries, it is essential for the preservation of our democratic way of life that there should be maintained a strong and vigorous security service. In spite of all that has been alleged and what is properly being examined by the McDonald Commission, we are being well served by a group of dedicated individuals.

• (1222)

The functioning of a security service by its very nature demands that most of its operations remain secret. Unlawful disclosure of the details of what is known about the operations of foreign intelligence agents in this country, or provision to others of information about the operations of our security service, is to destroy and render useless the work of this service.

Fourthly, in exercising a discretion as to whether or not to consent to a prosecution under the Official Secrets Act, the Attorney General should ensure that the widest possible public interests of Canada are taken into account; that, as a member of this House, he has responsibilities toward the rights, privileges, traditions and immunities so necessary for the proper functioning of parliament; and finally that each competing public interest is weighed and balanced against the others in as responsible a way as possible.

In the present situation, the hon. member for Leeds has made statements in the House which must clearly have been based upon highly classified national security information. In my judgment, the hon. member's use of the secret information he was not entitled to have was contrary to the national interest. However, by law, his statements cannot constitute the foundation for a prosecution under the Official Secrets Act since it is well established that no charge in a court can be based on any statement made by an hon. member in this House.

The hon. member for Leeds did, however, make additional statements. In my view, these statements did not add substantially to what he had already said in the House. There is some doubt as to the extent to which a court would view these statements as being protected by any parliamentary privilege or immunity. The existence of this doubt guides me in my decision whether or not to provide my consent to a prosecution.

The obligation of the Attorney General in deciding whether or not to provide his consent under the Official Secrets Act calls into play the many factors I referred to earlier. In my view, an Attorney General should not provide such a consent unless the case is free from substantial doubt.

Having considered the evidence produced in the investigation to date, and having considered applicable legal and parliamentary principles, I have concluded that I should not consent to a prosecution against the hon. member for Leeds.

I must emphasize that in any case free from these elements of doubt, involving unlawful disclosure of information relating to national security by an hon. member, I would not hesitate to have a court of criminal jurisdiction pass upon the issue.

This House has established a committee to examine the privileges and immunities of members of parliament, including the application of the Offical Secrets Act. That examination is necessary and, in my view, urgent. It is essential to protect the position of members of parliament to continue to be able to speak freely and candidly in carrying out the responsibilities that we bear on behalf of our constituents and the country at large without any harassment.

I look forward to the report of the special committee which I hope will outline the principles that should govern a member of this House when dealing with security or other highly sensitive matters and which will, I hope, strike a balance between the imperative public interest that the national security and integrity of the state ought not to be imperilled and the equally imperative public interest that members of this House should enjoy a freedom of speech commensurate with the necessity of fulfilling our obligations. It is historic and preferable that this House, and not the courts, settle these issues.

Mr. Speaker, with the highest of immunities goes the highest of responsibilities. I would urge all hon. members, prior to asking a question, or disclosing sensitive information of any kind, to take reasonable steps to bring the matter to the attention of the responsible minister of the Commissioner of the RCMP so that the member may be fully apprised of the possible seriousness of the matter and so that measures in proper cases might be taken to protect the information from public disclosure with its attendant risk of doing serious damage to our national security. To be fair, I want to add quickly that I am advised that there are members of the House and members of the press gallery and the public who do this.

I would further commend to the attention of hon. members what was said by the 1939 United Kingdom Select Committee on the Official Secrets Act and Privileges of Members, relating to the Duncan Sandys case, and I quote:

> Your committee are of opinion that the soliciting or receipt of information is not a proceeding in parliament, and that neither the privilege of freedom of speech nor any of the cognate privileges would afford a defence of a member of parliament charged with soliciting, inciting or endeavouring to persuade a person holding office under the Crown, to disclose information which such person was not authorized to disclose or with receiving information knowing, or having reasonable grounds to believe, that the information was communicated to him in contravention of the Official Secrets Act.

With respect to the publication of the article in the Toronto Sun, parliament has not extended to any other person or body, the rights, privileges or immunities that are accorded by law to parliament and its members.

That is not to say that the press is not in a somewhat special position in our society, for without full and free dissemination of information through an independent and responsible press, a free society cannot continue to exist. That freedom is exercised under and pursuant to the rule of law. In that respect, members of the press are in no different a position from anyone else. I am confident that the courts are the proper forum for dealing with and defining the rights and responsibilities of the press.

Because of this special position of the press and lest any step be misconstrued as an attack on the essential freedom of the press, it is important that the process of the criminal law be invoked only after most careful and studied consideration.

It is with such consideration that I have examined the available evidence, including the extent of the information that was published, the present state of the law, the various competing public interests, and all other relevant factors in consenting, as I have done, to a prosecution under the Official Secrets Act in connection with the publication of the article in the Toronto Sun.

In arriving at these decisions, I have sought the opinion of the officers of the Department of Justice, and they concur in my decisions.

May I just add that because of the fact that an information was being sworn and laid, I felt it was appropriate that those people to whom it was being directed should concurrently know what I was saying before others. Therefore, I felt I should not and I did not provide to opposition House leaders or spokesmen a copy of my statement. That is not my usual practice, but I felt it was required in these circumstances. I trust they will appreciate that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

2. What amount will be given to New Brunswick for this purpose in each of the next five fiscal years?

3. Is financial assistance intended to be available for (a) community operated bus systems (b) privately operated bus systems (c) systems operated entirely within the municipality (d) systems operated between urban centres?

4. What are the minimum requirements for federal assistance?

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): I am informed by the Department of Transport and the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs as follows: 1. Federal assistance for urban transit will be available to New Brunswick through the Urban Transportation Assistance Program which will be implemented April 1, 1978. Total funding available to New Brunswick will be $6,774,000 over the five year life of the program ending March 31, 1983.

2. The annual allocation to New Brunswick is to be $2 per capita according to the population of the Province as recorded in the official census of 1976. Accordingly, the province may receive up to $1,354,800 annually over the five year life of the program.

3. (a) Federal assistance through the Urban Transportation Assistance Program will be available to community operated bus systems. (b) Assistance will be available for privately operated bus systems, however all funds are to be made available through the province and accordingly it will be the responsibility of the province to specify projects which it wishes to have funded. (c) Federal urban transportation assistance will be available to transit systems which operate entirely within the municipality. (d) Federal urban transit assistance will not be available to intercity services.

(ii) Improving standards of urban environmental quality and land use efficiency. (iii) Contributing to energy conservation. (iv) improving safety at railway crossings. (v) the Urban Transportation Assistance Program does not provide any funds for operating subsidy. The funds are to be used for capital acquisitions or improvements only. In addition, each project is to be evaluated against the objective it was designed to meet to determine the effectiveness of federal assistance for urban transportation. Approval of a grade separation or railway relocation project will be subject to the provisions of the Railway Relocation and Crossing Act and Urban Development and Transportation Plans Regulations.

AT-SOURCE SEPARATION OF RECYCLABLE WASTE PAPER

Question No. 881—Mr. Saltsman:

1. (a) Has Crown Assets Disposal Corporation signed a contract to sell recyclable waste paper and, if so, what are the terms of that contract (b) are all government departments and agencies now giving their waste paper to CADC so that it may be sold, or are some selling the waste paper on an individual basis?

2. (a) Has CADC agreed to commence source separation of waste paper from garbage so that only paper would be collected by a recycling firm (b) has source separation been delayed and, if so, on what date will separation begin?

3. (a) If source separation has not begun, and the waste paper is not being bought from CADC, how much is it costing the government to dispose of this garbage every day (b) how much would the government be receiving in revenue if the waste paper was being sold to a recycling firm?

4. What efforts are being made to educate various departments and agencies as to the purpose and benefits of paper source separation and the proposed implementation of this plan?

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): I am informed by the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation, the Departments of Public Works and Fisheries and the Environment as follows: 1. (a) No, Crown Assets Disposal Corporation has signed a contract to sell mixed office waste paper. (b) Crown Assets Disposal Corporation administers two contracts for the disposal of waste paper. In the National Capital Area, the major waste paper generating federal facilities are included in those two contracts. The number of facilities in the existing contracts would increase with the implementation of the federal high quality waste paper separation program. This program involves segregation at the point of generation of high quality waste paper from the rest of refuse. This refuse, including waste paper is currently disposed of under a refuse removal contract administered by the Department of Public Works.

2. (a) No. (b) At-source separation has not been delayed. Before the Federal Government could start a large scale implementation program, the system had to be demonstrated, guidelines developed and all costs identified. The pilot study to demonstrate this selected at-source separation system, was completed on April 30, 1977. The system has since then been implemented in three facilities occupied by approximately 3,000 federal employees. Three additional facilities with approximately 5,000 employees are being brought into the program in early February.

3. (a) It is not possible to answer this part of the Question as the Department of Public Works' figures show only garbage as a whole and do not give a breakdown for waste paper as a separate item. (b) If departments located in the National Capital area implement the at-source separation program, there is a potential to recover in excess of 4,000 tons/year of high grade waste paper. This would be in addition to the quantity that is currently being recovered through CADC contract. The revenue from the sale of such paper would be determined through CADC's tendering process and would reflect current market conditions.

4. The Department of Fisheries and the Environment is finalizing a Federal Government Guideline which outlines steps to be taken to organize and manage an at-source separation system. When approved, the Guideline will be distributed to all departments to assist them to implement at-source segregation systems for high grade waste paper. Publicity material as well as assistance is also available from the Department of Fisheries and the Environment to brief departmental co-ordinators on such programs.

NEW DRUG SUBMISSIONS

Question No. 929—Mr. Herbert:

1. For each of the past five years, how many new drug submissions have been received by the Department of National Health and Welfare and how many received notices of compliance?

2. What is the average time period between the receipt of a submission and issuance of notice of compliance?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare):

2.

1972	49	513	351
1973	50	310	283
1974	67	341	265
1975	63	335	287
1976	46	446	353

UNEMPLOYMENT IN THE CONSTITUENCY OF RICHMOND

Question No. 1,027—Mr. Beaudoin:

In (a) 1975 (b) 1976 (c) 1977, were there any unemployed in the Constituency of Richmond and, if so (i) how many (ii) in what economic sector were they the most numerous?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): (a), (b) and (c) There are no statistics on unemployment for the Constituency of Richmond, in total or by economic sector, for the years 1975, 1976 and 1977. The only valid estimates of unemployment for constituencies are those given by the Census of Canada. (The latest Census data available are for 1971). The Labour Force Survey, which is the other official source of unemployment estimates, does not produce data by constituency. Because no constituency unemployment estimates are available, the Department has, only for the purpose of allocating Canada Works Program and Local Initiatives Program funds, produced constituency labour surplus estimates. However, these estimates are not comparable from one program to the next, since they are based on different definitions and they pertain to different time periods. The following are the labour surplus estimates produced for the constituency in the last three years. It is emphasized, however, that these figures are based on different definitions and should not be compared with one another. LIP 75/76: 3,174 (First Quarter, 1975); LIP 76/77: 2,354 (First Quarter, 1976); CWP 77/78 Phase I: 2,208 (December 75—March 76); CWP 77/78 Phase II: 2,874 (November 76—March 77).

QUEBEC FIRMS RECEIVING INCENTIVES UNDER DREE

Question No. 1,152—Mr. Herbert:

For each private firm in Quebec that accepted development incentive offers from the Department of Regional Economic Expansion in the past two years, what was the known amount, if any, at the time that the Department made the offer of direct or indirect financial assistance from the (a) Government of Quebec (b) local municipal authority?

Mr. Donald Wood (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): In so far as the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is concerned the reply is as follows: No information, relating to commercial or financial matters, which has a bearing on files administered under the Regional Development Incentives Act may be divulged by the Department, in view of the commercial confidentiality of the contents of these files.

MARITIME FORCES—FISHERY PATROL

Question No. 1,206—Mr. McKinnon:

1. How many days of fishery patrolling have the patrol ships Tanu, Laurier and Howay carried out since April 1, 1977 and at what cost?

2. What operating funds for how many ship-days of patrolling are left for each ship prior to April 1, 1978?

3. At what cost per day will a DND Destroyer carry out a fishery patrol on the West Coast?

4. How many ship-days are outstanding for DND fishery patrols on the West Coast prior to April 1, 1978?

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of Fisheries and the Environment and National Defence as follows: 1. "Tanu", "Laurier", "Howay", 407 days April 1, 1977 to January 31, 1978. Cost $427,350 exclusive of ships crew's salaries.

2. "Tanu"—$72,000 for 45 days; "Laurier"—$40,000 for 50 days; "Howay",—$40,000 for 50 days; February 1, 1978 to March 31, 1978 exclusive of ships crews' salaries.

3. $5,210.

4. As of January 31, 1978 there were 20 shipdays outstanding prior to April 1, 1978.

MR. RENÉ-JEAN RAVAULT AND STUDY ON FRANCOPHONE ASSIMILATION

Question No. 1,209—Mr. Epp:

Did Mr. René-Jean Ravault carry out a study for the government on Francophone assimilation and, if so (a) at what cost (b) how much was he paid?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Yes, Mr. René-Jean Ravault made a study on the assistance from the Department of the Secretary of State to the French-speaking communities outside Québec. He submitted his report in June 1977 to the Official Language Minority Groups Program of the Secretary of State. (a) Cost of the study, $24,117.58; (b) Amount paid to Mr. R-J Ravault, $24,117.58; The breakdown of this sum is as follows: Fees, $18,500.00; Travel, $2,493.24; Administrative costs, $3,124.34; $24,117.58.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

TRANSFER OF OFFENDERS ACT

MEASURE RESPECTING TREATIES ON TRANSFER OF PERSONS FOUND GUILTY OF CRIMINAL OFFENCES

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General) moved that Bill C-21, to implement treaties on the transfer of persons found guilty of criminal offences, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Blais moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

● (1232)

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): I intend to be very brief in speaking on Bill C-21. This bill is one which I personally, along with many members of parliament on both sides, have asked for with reference to the exchange of prisoners between the state of Mexico and the state of Canada. I have asked many questions in relation to this subject. What I am about to say is by way of introduction—it may appear to contradict the questions I asked in committee when it was studying the bill.

I had asked the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) whether there was an agreement between Mexico and Canada, and on March 10 I received a letter from the hon. gentleman—it was not addressed to me in confidence so I believe I can quote it. The Solicitor General, in his usual friendly fashion, wrote:

Dear Eldon Woolliams,

Following Mr. Vincent's acknowledgement of November 23, 1977, your letter of November 15, 1977, addressed to my predecessor concerning the Canada-Mexico Prisoner Exchange Treaty, was brought to my attention.

Although discussions have already taken place between Mexico and Canada regarding the possibility of a prisoner exchange treaty, an agreement to that effect has not yet been reached. Consequently, I cannot provide you with more detailed information on that subject at the present time.

I call attention to those words in the letter which say an agreement had not been reached. We were told in the committee that there had been an agreement reached but that it had not been ratified. I make nothing of this as argument, Mr. Speaker. I am not challenging the minister at the moment. I believe there is a misunderstanding here with regard to terminology. I suppose the question is whether there is an agreement in place and ready to be ratified, or whether there is any agreement at all.

There is one point I should like to make with regard to this. Over a year ago the United States got their agreement and put their legislation in shape, since when they have been operating along the lines of the bill before us. I would hope that before this measure is passed the minister will clarify the situation in every respect.

As I have said over and over again—and I have heard many of my hon. friends on this side say it, not only in this Chamber but in caucus—none of us, and I am sure this applies to members on both sides of the House, condones Canadian citizens going to a foreign country and breaking the law of that country, particularly when it involves, as it does in many of these cases, the use of drugs or trafficking in drugs.

One of the most difficult things to control today is the international trade in drugs, particularly hard drugs. Unfortunately, many of our young people who go down to Mexico because of the attraction of a climate which we all enjoy—I think of Acapulco and other places—find, as is reported in our news media and elsewhere, that marijuana is grown in Mexico as a crop and they cannot believe a little simple possession may put them behind bars, waiting for months and sometimes years to be charged for what they consider to be a very minor crime in their own country.

I want to deal with some of these problems because in 1963, I believe it was, I was chosen by my party, then forming the Government of Canada, along with Chief Justice Tremblay of the province of Quebec, to lecture at a special seminar on civil rights in Mexico City where members of the United Nations from all over the world were attending. I cannot forget the statements which were made then by Mexican officials, Mexican professors and others on the question of civil rights.

But it was while I was in Mexico City that the Chief Justice and myself received a telephone call from two people who had been incarcerated in one of the Mexico City jails and held there for two years without charges being laid following an argument about the price of a motel. I did the leg work to dig up the facts, as was only proper since Chief Justice Tremblay, because of his position could not become directly involved. As a Canadian and as a member of parliament I did the work. I went down to see them. They had run short of money in Mexico and had wired their parents in the City of Montreal. They had sent them a cable transferring some money. The fact that the money came from such a source tipped off the motel people who tripled the price of the accommodation and, when the girls refused to pay, they were thrown behind bars and held, without a charge being laid, under conditions to which I shall refer in a few moments.

One of the big problems in Mexico is this: if you have any money at all the state does not feed you while you are in jail. You have to pay for your own meals, and so on. I was told by these girls—and they struck me as being honest people—that the older prisoners, the male prisoners, governed the food supply and that if they, the girls, did not perform certain sexual acts, they did not eat. It is under such abominable conditions as these, Mr. Speaker, that Canadians are being incarcerated. This is what started me on a crusade to get people out of jails of that kind.

I want to put another case on record. I rose in the House of Commons some time ago, about two years ago, I believe, to move a motion under Standing Order 43. It read:

> Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43 I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that Miss Bethune, daughter of longshoreman Ray Bethune, of Vancouver has been incarcerated since February in a Mexican jail whereby her father has spent some $18,000 to obtain a hearing or a release, I move that the Department of External Affairs after discussions with the Department of Justice and through the Minister of Secretary of State of External Affairs protest in the strongest terms that Miss Bethune be given an immediate hearing and, if innocent, be released from the deplorable jail conditions in which she is incarcerated and subjected to indignities and conditions similar to those inflicted on other Canadians now and in the past in that nation.

I am glad to see there is some remedy provided in the bill with respect to the second point I wish to make. There are weaknesses in the legislation, but I shall deal with them in due course. This is the kind of situation which arises. When young people are detained, for whatever reason, cables are sent to their parents informing them that the services of a solicitor are required. Money is required to buy food for their children while they are in prison. This is used as a system of blackmail so as to get money out of parents in Canada. There is never any accounting for this money. Much of it disappears, and nobody knows what happens to it. It is about time we came to grips with this situation.

I should like to quote, now, from the Toronto Star, an article written on December 7, 1976 under a Mexico City dateline. It starts:

> There might be something dumber than having dope in Mexico City, but I don't know what it could be. Norman Piché, a 25 year-old Montrealer, knows what he is talking about. He and 11 other Canadians are languishing in vermin-infested Mexican prisons because most of them tried to make a quick buck by smuggling drugs.

● (1242)

We do not endorse what they did, but I am complaining about the conditions under which these people have been held.

> To make matters worse, the Canadians feel that Ottawa is doing little to help them.

Without the pressure which was exerted by myself and other members of parliament, we would not have received any answers from the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson). We were not getting relief. I do not want to read this whole article, but for those who are interested, it shows the kinds of conditions under which these people were incarcerated.

That brings me to another point which is of concern to me. I know our procedures do not allow hon. members to quote bills. At this stage we are supposed to be discussing the principle of the bill, but with the leave of the House I would like to quote from one part of the bill at page two. Clause 4 of the bill states:

> Where a Canadian offender is transferred to Canada, his finding of guilt and sentence, if any, by a court of the foreign state from which he is transferred is deemed to be a finding of guilt and a sentence imposed by a court of competent jurisdiction . . .

That is good, but section 617 of the Criminal Code does not apply in respect to the offence of which a Canadian offender has been found guilty in the foreign state from which he is transferred, and his finding of guilt and his sentence, if any, are not subject to any appeal or to any other form of review in Canada. That is provided for in clause 5 of the bill.

This bill really only applies where a person actually has been charged. The criticism I have in this regard is not with reference to what this bill will do for those who are charged. I read very carefully the remarks of the parliamentary secretary, and I think I am correct in saying that even where a sentence is under two years, it is possible to transfer a prisoner if he has been convicted, provided there is provincial consent. That is a good part of the bill, and I endorse it.

I support this bill. I am glad we have gone for even half a pie, but the escape clause concerns me. The Mexican authorities do not have to charge people. They can say matters are under investigation. The same old blackmail will be practised against parents. Without a charge this bill does not apply, so people will continue to rot in vermin-infested dungeons in Mexico. That is what I do not like, and that is why I want to say a few words in that regard. There has to be a positive answer. We like to have good relationships with our neighbours, particularly on the North American continent, and more particularly with Mexico and the United States. We also want good relationships with South American countries.

The field of diplomacy is really outside the minister's jurisdiction, but ambassadors have been reluctant to bring very much pressure to bear with regard to the grievance I have mentioned. In the past all they have done is handled money as brokers do. It seems to disappear into thin air, and nothing happens. In view of what Mexico has said with regard to civil rights, and in view of its style and process, there should be actions instead of words, and Mexico should not be objecting strongly. I am glad to see that a former secretary of state for external affairs is here. I know he knows the difficulty, but we should be objecting strongly to this kind of blackmail and to the holding of Canadians without charge in Mexico. Surely at the highest level of diplomacy in Canada we can get better treatment for our Canadian citizens by the Mexican authorities.

I think I have covered what I wanted to say. In conclusion I would like to say that I endorse this bill. It will not come to a vote because I think everyone is basically in accord with it. We have gone a long way. Perhaps it is not possible to legislate in cases where people are not charged. I want to be fair, but if that is the argument—and it is an argument of substance—I must come back to what I said, that in the strongest terms we must say that we want the provisions of this bill carried out with agreement. Perhaps this legislation ratifies an agreement, but we want the agreement carried out.

In the days of the dictators of Europe people rotted in jail. This is going back 300 or 400 years in history. They rotted in jails without being charged. In my opinion, holding people without charging them is illegal, but there is nothing Canadian authorities—the Attorney General of Canada (Mr. Basford) or the attorneys general of the various provinces—can do.

I hope due process of law will be interpreted in wide terms. The United States has already done its thing, as it were. There has already been an exchange. The article to which I referred earlier indicates the situation for some young Canadians. Some were charged, and some were not. Some were charged and convicted. Some are waiting for their trials, and that can take months and sometimes years. John Howard, the prison reformer, would blush. Some Americans were allowed to go home more than a year ago, and we are still waiting for action by this institution. Therefore I will be brief.

I hope the bill will be passed immediately. I thank the House for its kind attention. I congratulate the government for introducing this legislation. I am critical about the delay, but perhaps that is part of the parliamentary process. Perhaps I am mellow because this is Friday, but let us get on with the job. Let us pass this bill, but let us not forget the warning I have given with reference to people who have been held in jail without being charged and with reference to people who are charged but who never get to trial.

[Translation]

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to thank my parliamentary secretary, the hon. member for Lachine-Lakeshore (Mr. Blaker), who very ably led the debate on the bill on second reading as well as in the committee stage. He performed in a masterly manner, Mr. Speaker, and I wish to thank him publicly.

[English]

I join with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), who made some complimentary remarks about the hon. member for Lachine-Lakeshore last Friday when this bill was introduced at second reading.

With reference to the remarks of the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams), it is true that the information I provided to him in my letter tends to be misleading. I do not think I should have indicated that there was no agreement because an agreement has been signed. It was signed at the time the letter was written. It was signed in November of 1977, but it has not been ratified. Notwithstanding the fact that it has not been ratified I think the execution of the agreement indicates the content of the exchange. In fairness, I think the letter referred to the last argument the hon. gentleman made. I was addressing myself to that argument, and the nature of the comments I made in that letter still apply at this time.

I agree with the hon. gentleman that there should not be a long detention prior to trial. We in Canada recognize that as part of our bundle of civil rights. We recognize that individuals ought to be brought before the courts immediately upon being charged and that there should be no undue delay.

The old adage that justice delayed is justice denied is very applicable.

In attempting to offer some solace to the hon. gentleman, who recognizes the difficulties in achieving what ought to be achieved, I might indicate that in my view this treaty and this legislation will permit additional treaties to be signed and subsequently ratified, which will encourage an increase of exchanges between legal jurisdictions and legal systems throughout the world.

● (1252)

If we deal with offenders and the exchange of offenders, naturally there will be an increase in the familiarization of each other's systems, even with Mexico. Undoubtedly the signing and ratification of that treaty, after this bill is passed, will encourage an increase in exchanges between Canadian justice authorities and those in Mexico. As a result of that, we will be able to assist to a greater degree the Department of External Affairs and our representatives in foreign countries in order to achieve the ends the hon. member identified, namely, ensuring that Canadian citizens who run counter to laws in foreign lands are dealt with expeditiously, fairly, equitably, and in accordance with the standard of justice in those countries; and that Canadian authorities are kept abreast of the manner in which those individuals are dealt with.

In conclusion, I thank hon. members who participated in this debate. It has been a very constructive one. We have canvassed the issues very readily. It is that type of co-operation which is essential to the proper functioning of parliament at this particular time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) indicated at second reading stage of this bill and in the standing committee, our party supports this legislation. We are not dealing with the offences which persons may have committed, nor the severity or otherwise of the sentences imposed. We are dealing with the making of arrangements for transferring persons detained in certain foreign prisons to this country and vice versa. This is good legislation, and it is long overdue.

We share the concern of the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) regarding those detained in foreign prisons awaiting trial. I welcome the assurance of the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) that he shares that concern as well, and that the matter is being pursued. We were prepared to give unanimous consent to proceed with the report stage of this bill today, even though the rules require a bit more time. We hope the bill can be passed today. As a matter of fact if I sit down, perhaps it would be passed by one o'clock.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

Elections

ELECTIONS

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING ELECTORAL PROCESSES

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development) moved that Bill C-33, to amend the Canada Elections Act, the Election Expenses Act and the Northwest Territories Act in respect of territorial elections, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the reason I was anxious to deal with this bill is because I think we can dispose of it before one o'clock. There have been discussions with all parties. Particularly I want to thank the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), the hon. member for the Northwest Territories (Mr. Firth), the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), and the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette). They agreed to give this bill all three readings today before one o'clock. That is the understanding.

Effectively the bill transfers the legislative and administrative responsibilities for the conduct of councils' elections in the Yukon and the Northwest Territories to the councils, the commissioners and their staff. This bill has been the subject of consultation with the people in both the Northwest Territories and the Yukon. It has their support. Therefore, with Your Honour's indulgence, perhaps the bill can receive all three readings today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, there is an all-party agreement for Bill C-33 to go through all three stages today. This power to administer elections has always been in the Yukon. It was transferred approximately five years ago to the Chief Electoral Officer. It was thought that some money would be saved and efficiency would be improved. With the growth of the territories, we now find we would like to have the powers resident locally once again.

Provisions exist in the Yukon Act which provides them with the power to run their own elections. Simply, the territories want the power returned to them. The minister is correct when he indicated that there was an all-party agreement for the bill to pass all three stages this afternoon.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Firth) has been made aware of the contents of this bill. The bill seems to carry out what we were told would be in it. I may add that the hon. member for Northwest Territories expressed the hope that we would pass the bill quickly. It received first reading yesterday. We are happy to give it second reading now, consideration in committee of the whole and third reading, before lunch.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. Is there unanimous consent to changing the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Ethier in the chair.

Clauses 1 to 7 inclusive agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): When shall the bill be read the third time?

Some hon. Members: By leave, now.

Mr. Faulkner moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENTS TO GIVE CERTAIN RIGHTS TO POLICE

The House resumed, from Tuesday, March 14, consideration of the motion of Mr. Blais that Bill C-26, to amend the Criminal Code, the Crown Liability Act and the Post Office Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, this is an important bill and one which I believe ought to be given very sober and careful consideration by this House.

● (1412)

After a number of years in this House, it has struck me that the more purple the rhetoric of the speech which deals with a subject, often the less substantial is its content. I regret to say that I find this to be the case in what we have heard so far from the hon. members opposite on this bill. Indeed, the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot (Mr. Jarvis) gave such a thespian performance that I could only believe that, representing as he does the city of Stratford, he was auditioning for a role there later this summer in the event that his electoral fortunes do not go as he would wish. The hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) on his own side who followed him was, nevertheless, most impressed by his colleague's address. Perhaps he though he was playing the role of Henry V. As I heard it, it sounded more like Polonius.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): This sounds more like baloney.

Mr. MacGuigan: I think we have to look at the public's perception of a matter such as this when we are concerned with something which is not only a matter of technical concern to members of parliament or a small group of learned people, but to the whole public. It potentially involves the whole country.

The hon. member for Perth-Wilmot has cited the Mackenzie report at page 3772 of Hansard where he points out that the Mackenzie commission recommended that the power of opening mail be available to the government. The Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) rightly drew attention to the fact that the Franks commission which reported in the United Kingdom in 1957 and the Australian Royal Commission on Intelligence and Security in 1977 also agreed that the power to intercept and open the mail should be possessed by the government.

In a constituency bulletin I recently put this question to my constituents on the subject, which I phrased as follows:

> Do you favour legislation which would give the power, under appropriate safeguards, to open first class mail to apprehend drugs or to protect national security?

As you will note, it covers both aspects of this bill which is before us. I gave my constituents until this week to reply. I received approximately 700 replies, and the breakdown is as follows: those who favoured such legislation totalled 74.6 per cent and those who were opposed totalled 25.4 per cent.

One cannot treat the results of such a questionnaire with scientific exactitude because it is not a poll in the same sense as in a Gallup poll, but I have no doubt that the same proportion of support for legislation of this kind would be found in a proper poll in any constituency, indeed, in the constituencies of the hon. members who have either spoken against the bill or those who have very haltingly spoken in its favour. I submit that this is certainly an occasion for consideration of public attitudes since it involves the public and the public's mail. It is their mail, not our mail, and the public should be listened to.

With respect to drugs I sense, even on the part of the opposition, a disposition not to raise very difficult questions as to the provisions. I would like to quote a publication which came across my desk this week. It is a newsletter of the Council on Drug Abuse, dated February, 1977. I received it on the very day that the hon. members opposite were making their speeches. My quote is from a news story in the newsletter entitled "Heroin In Our Mail To Continue Or Not?". It reads as follows:

> It was reported at a meeting of the International Narcotic Enforcement Officers Association held in Toronto in August that the use of first class mail for the importation of heroin into Canada was prevalent.
> One gram of heroin worth $5 at source can easily be mailed in a regular envelope. By the time this has been cut and adulterated with other substances and passed down the distribution chain, the resulting portions sell for $16,000 on the streets . . .

The use of the mail is an insidious means of importing with little risk of detection.

That was only the relevant part, but I notice that the Solicitor General was more modest in estimating the street value of such a gram of heroin. He placed it at $11,400. I am prepared to accept his figures on that. The point is that the value increases enormously with distribution and, of course, with the addition of other substances which increase the quantity. This is therefore a serious problem that we have to confront.

Earlier in the year the Commissioner of the RCMP presented the problem to the justice committee, and the members of the committee realized that something had to be done to prevent this from happening. This was not an area in which we could wait the requisite length of time until the McDonald commission had reported. One of the important aspects of this bill is that this is sunset legislation. The bill will end within a limited time after the presentation of the report of the McDonald commission.

Some hon. members opposite have raised the question, "What if the McDonald commission does not make a final report?" Can anyone in this House seriously imagine a commission on a matter of such vital importance to the country not making a final report? If for some reason it did not, surely another commission would be appointed that would make a final report. It is inconceivable that there would be no final report of that commission. The length of the life of this legislation is tied to that report.

As I mentioned, Mr. Speaker, I sense a disposition even on the part of the opposition, of opponents to the bill, not to raise serious questions about mail opening with respect to narcotics, but rather to attempt to attack the opening of mail for purposes of national security. The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) made the sharpest attack on the possible meaning of this section. He said as reported at page 3775 of Hansard:

This legislation gives to the Solicitor General an unbridled discretion to issue a warrant in determining which group he considers to be subversive, and any group can be subversive if they are suspected of using any criminal means.

Let me give the Solicitor General some examples of groups which could now become subject to the opening of mail at the hon. gentleman's discretion—and I am sure he will use that discretion in the broadest way he can, to judge by his record to date. Take, for example, one group which appears to be unpopular at the moment, the Greenpeace organization. The government recently made it an offence for anyone to go on the ice within half a mile of the seal herd. To do so carries a penalty under the criminal law. It would probably be a popular thing for the minister in present circumstances to issue warrants permitting all the mail of Greenpeace to be opened. That is just one example. I could mention many other groups, native groups, anti-poverty groups and so on.

While obviously, Mr. Speaker, a member who is attacking a bill is free to try to extend the legislation to make it look at its worst, I think that this is a poor interpretation to give to the bill. It is an impossible interpretation, and I think it arouses needless anxiety where there should be none. Section 16(2) of the Official Secrets Act, which was added to the act at the time we amended the protection of privacy legislation with respect to wiretapping and electronic eavesdropping, reads as follows:

(2) The Solicitor General of Canada may issue a warrant authorizing the interception or seizure of any communication if he is satisfied by evidence on oath that such interception or seizure is necessary for the prevention or detection of subversive activity directed against Canada—

● (1422)

That is the relative part of that subsection because it goes on to say:

—or detrimental to the security of Canada or is necessary for the purpose of gathering foreign intelligence information essential to the security of Canada.

The words that the hon. member for New Westminster has put in question are those relating to "the prevention or detection of subversive activity directed against Canada." Those words are defined in 16.(3) which defines subversive activity under a number of possibilities. Three of those are directed toward activities of foreign countries: foreign intelligence activities are dealt with in subparagraph (b), activities by a foreign power in subparagraph (d), and activities of a foreign terrorist group in subparagraph (e). Those are not particularly relevant to the present discussion since the hon. member for New Westminster did not bring them into contention. Subparagraph (a) deals, simply with espionage or sabotage. It cannot really be supposed that there is any problem about that.

The subparagraph about which the hon. member has argued there can be some question is subparagraph (c) which reads as follows:

(c) activities directed toward accomplishing governmental change within Canada or elsewhere by force or violence or any criminal means;

That is where the hon. member for New Westminster found the phrase "or any criminal means." He has ignored a very important part of that subsection, however,—"activities directed toward accomplishing governmental change." Surely no one is going to argue, whatever his views on the seal hunt, that taking a stand one way or the other is a means of accomplishing governmental change in Canada. By overlooking that important part of the definition of subversive activity, it seems to me that the hon. member for New Westminster has given an entirely impossible interpretation to this legislation in suggesting that it could be applied to groups such as Greenpeace. I think this is somewhat mischievous. It could arouse a real apprehension on the part of such groups that they might be subject to scrutiny of this kind when there really is no possibility under the legislation that that could occur.

I should add that the Solicitor General would in any event have to find that in his best judgment and based on evidence under oath there were activities directed toward accomplishing governmental change by force or violence, or any criminal means. There is a fairly heavy onus to be satisfied by those who appear before him seeking such a warrant.

Indeed, it seems to me that the only valid question to raise about the power to open mail for the protection of national security is with respect to the organ of government which should give permission. I do not really see, and I do not think the public of Canada sees, how anyone who is determined to subvert the Government of Canada, whether it be another foreign government or whether it be genuinely subversive elements within Canada, should be allowed to use our mails to get away with that with impunity. The valid question is with respect to the person or body or organ of government which can give power to do that. In this part of the legislation, that power rests in the Solicitor General rather than in the courts. Some members of the opposition have attempted to make the argument that this is not appropriate.

I want to recall that this issue in a very slightly different context has been before parliament for quite some time. I think it was in 1969 that the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs first had a reference on the subject of wiretapping. At that time the committee had a very difficult time deciding who should grant such authorization. Whichever way you decide that question—whether you go to the courts or decide to leave it all in the hands of the Solicitor General, as many members of the committee wanted to do at that time for all cases of electronic eavesdropping, whichever way you decide, it is a very narrow decision to be made. Very good arguments can be made in favour of either position. On the one hand you can argue that the courts are the traditional protectors of our liberty, and on the other hand you can argue that because of ministerial responsibility it is better to put that onus squarely on the government in a way that they cannot escape it.

I think I should say that many of the remarks of the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot were beside the point. He talked about the kind of problem that has become apparent recently in law enforcement in Canada with respect to the activities of the RCMP and other police. We are aware of those and we deplore them and have set up a royal commission to attempt to discover the truth. But the fact is, those are not governmental activities in the sense that they are directed by the government. The opposition case—if there is any case—with respect to such activities, directed at the government, can only be that the government did not take sufficient responsibility. I do not agree with that case, but that has to be their argument.

Mr. Speaker, here is a case where the government is taking responsibility. That is precisely the purpose of this legislation. The Solicitor General on behalf of the government, takes responsibility in cases of this kind for the issuance of authorization. Therefore, any arguments which attempt to invoke any popular feeling today against police activities are beside the mark. They do not refer to what can happen under this legislation

That was a slight digression, Mr. Speaker, in the course of telling you about the consideration of this question previously by this parliament. The justice committee considered it in 1969. It came into the House with the protection of privacy legislation and, of course, that legislation has been amended several times since. On each occasion it was considered by the House and then by the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. Again I say it is a very close decision whichever way you go.

I do not think we have to decide that question today in the context of this bill for the following reason. The government is proposing legislation which is sunset legislation—it will expire after the report of the McDonald commission is presented. It is really up to the McDonald commission to settle this question.

It seems to me that at the moment parliament must follow the precedent it has established in the area of wiretapping and electronic eavesdropping. It must follow that precedent and adopt the same procedures here as were approved by parliament at that time. I would think that any other course would be irresponsible on the part of the government. Until the McDonald commission reports, I think the government has the clear duty to follow the procedure which parliament has set up in this parallel case. In other words, we are not dealing with an eternal principle here but with a mechanism which will be subject to review at the time of the report of the McDonald commission. In the interim we must follow existing procedures.

It may be that if the McDonald commission recommends to the contrary with respect to the authorizing authority, we will then have to go back and review the wiretapping legislation and see if such a change should be there as well. Surely we do not want to act in a precipitous way, however, without the benefit of their expertise.

This is a stop gap measure, Mr. Speaker. It is not a final determination of the issues. As a stop gap measure the government has followed not only the best existing precedents but the only existing precedents. There really is no alternative to the provision which this bill places before us at the present time.

The only remaining matter on which I wish to comment is the question of why we proceed now—why we go ahead without awaiting the report of the McDonald commission on the whole thing. Some opposition speakers, in particular the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot, have said, "When we raise questions about things that are before the McDonald commission you say you have to await the report of the commission, but when we want to raise something you argue we are being inconsistent in taking this up now."

Mr. Speaker, the kind of issues they have been raising are matters concerning the guilt or liability of individuals. Those are matters which have to be determined by the commission. They are not appropriate matters for parliament to decide.

We are now confronted with a matter in which the government, through the Solicitor General, has shown a gap in the law which can allow drugs to be circulated by first class mail, and which can allow national security to be imperiled. We simply cannot wait, without legislation, on a matter of this kind now that the gap has been discovered. We cannot wait until the McDonald commission reports. We must have something in place. When the McDonald commission reports, that will be a different story and we will have to reconsider the whole matter. The government's good faith in this matter is shown by the fact that this is sunset legislation and that it will come to a conclusion at the appropriate time after the presentation of that report.

We are confronted with a situation in which there is a genuine need for action. The precedents are very clear and were established by the Protection of Privacy Act. It seems to me that we are proceeding responsibly and carefully if we pass this legislation because it protects all aspects of the public interest. It protects the public interest against crime and it also protects the public interest in liberty because it provides these extraordinary powers only under very strict limitations.

Mr. Speaker, that is the case for the bill, and as such I am pleased to support it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1432)

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, the bill that is now before us does two things principally, as I understand it. It authorizes the government or the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) and the government to proceed in connection with drug offences under the Narcotics Control Act and the Food and Drug Act to intercept communications that go through the mail in the same way that they are now authorized to intercept telephone communications under the earlier legislation, and with the same safeguards as in that legislation. In other words, there has to be an annual report to parliament. There has to be a notice given to the person whose mail is intercepted, within 90 days, unless a judge grants a longer time, up to three years. You have to go to a judge to get the authorization. You have to submit affidavits to him and so on.

I am not going to deal with the first part of the bill. I am very lukewarm about that. I do not like our present law relating to wiretapping. I do not like the first part of this bill that relates to the Narcotics Control Act. I do not like the cynicism that caused the government to bring into this House legislation combining the two subjects of narcotics control and drugs and national security. They are not connected. It was only a political manoeuvre to attempt to put people in a position that if they are against the bill because of its national security provisions, they can somehow be said to be supporters of those who sell and traffic in drugs and the like. That is the only purpose there can be of combining these two things.

I want to deal myself with the part of the bill that I find to be particularly obnoxious, and that has to do with national security. First, I have to agree that I believe that the state should have the right in certain circumstances, carefully defined, as our spokesman, the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot (Mr. Jarvis), said the other day, carefully defined and carefully safeguarded, the right to open written communications through the mail in the interest of seeing that the state survives—and that we all survive in a civilized society. The same as I have to concede it should have the right to listen in on telephonic communications, or bug people, and the like, if it is done with certain safeguards and to certain very strict purposes.

I have to agree there has to be some kind of power in the state or in the government to do that. But, Mr. Speaker, I do not agree with the kind of power that the government is arrogating to itself in this bill to carry out that objective. I do not agree with it because it has been left in the hands of the government and in the hands of the Solicitor General to decide what is the matter when there is a national security question involved. That gentleman, without reference to anyone else, is to decide whether my mail is to be opened or your mail is to be opened, or whose mail is to be opened. He does not have to report to this parliament. He does not have to report to any other authority. He does not have to submit anything to a judge or some outside third party. He, and he alone, is to decide the issue.

Well, I say quite frankly that I do not trust the government and I do not trust the Solicitor General to make those decisions. If this Solicitor General were not there, and this government were not there, I would not trust the next government or the next solicitor general. I do not trust the executives to make those decisions by themselves. There should be some other authority that can be appealed to in the event of disagreement as to what is a national security matter and what is not. Apart from the fact that I do not believe any government should have the authority, I, in particular, have no reason, I have seen nothing demonstrated to me to trust the present Solicitor General to carry out these objectives. I just do not. His record of the last few weeks does not inspire me with confidence that he should have that authority. It is erratic to say the least.

It may be true, as the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan) suggests, that the public is overwhelmingly in favour of having mail interception, whether for national security, drug reasons or whatever reasons. That is probably true. He cited a figure of 74 per cent approval from his mail-out. But, Mr. Speaker, that is not the determinant of the issue. That does not determine in the House whether we should agree with the legislation or not because the great majority of the public may not care. The great majority of the public does not think a lot about these issues and they feel that they themselves are innocent of any wrongdoing, that they are not criminals themselves. They have never engaged in any criminal activity or any conduct detrimental to our security interests, so why should not mail be opened. That is the way they feel. What we do have, Mr.Speaker, is a minority of people who are concerned and who must also be considered. We also pride ourselves in saying that we are a country of great civil liberties.

As a matter of fact, in the very disappointing speech which the Solicitor General gave when he opened this debate, he mentioned that himself. Mr. Blais said as reported at page 3768 of Hansard of March 14:

> Canada, and I have said this often, has the most secure civil liberties of any nation in the world.

What the Solicitor General said when he said that was buncombe. It is not the truth. And it is certainly not the truth if we pass unchanged the legislation which he has introduced to this House. What kind of poppycock is that statement? I will tell you right now, Mr. Speaker. The United States of America has got far more effective and secure civil liberties than Canada has. We do not even have a bill of rights in our constitution.

This statement of the Solicitor General's is pure buncombe that Canada has the most secure civil liberties of any nation in the world. It has not. It has the Official Secrets Act which gives the Solicitor General and the government unlimited power. It has many other powers so that civil liberties do not even weigh in the balance. How can anyone say that, with the record of the last six or eight months of what has been revealed of illegal activity by the people who work for the executive branch of the government? How, after what we have heard for the last six or eight months, can any Solicitor General stand up and say that we are so secure in our civil liberties?

Where were the civil liberties when the barn was burned down in Quebec? Where were the civil liberties when the break-in took place in L'Agence de Presse down in Quebec? Where were the civil liberties then? Where were the civil liberties when they broke into the Parti Québécois headquarters to take membership lists? Where were they then? Where are the civil liberties, when, as the Laycraft inquiry has shown out in Alberta, the law has been ignored by the RCMP and by National Revenue officials who interchange information? The income tax people are giving information to the RCMP illegally when the RCMP wants it, and vice versa; as revealed in the Laycraft inquiry. Where were the civil liberties then? So the vast majority of people are not interested in civil liberties because they never come across it. Their rights are not interfered with. But there are other people who do get interfered with, who do come across the law. And then they become concerned about civil liberties when they see what can be done to them even if they are innocent. I am concerned with civil liberties, Mr. Speaker, and that is why I am not going to support this bill in its present form.

The member for Perth-Wilmot (Mr. Jarvis) who opened the debate for our side has done a first-class job. He has done an excellent job. He has done an excellent job as critic of the Solicitor General. I agree with the principle that he stated when he opened the debate are reported at page 3770 of Hansard of the same date:

> We support in principle the legal interception of mail in special specified circumstances, given adequate safeguards and given the situation where the more normal, acceptable and traditional methods of law enforcement have proven ineffective. Therefore, we support Bill C-26 in principle. In our view it meets most of these requirements.

He went on to say changes will have to be made in committee. I cannot accept his statement, Mr. Speaker, that I can support the bill in principle. I might be able to support the bill if it goes to committee and it comes out with adequate safeguards in relation to national security so that the Solicitor General himself, and he only, is not left in a position of having the power to decide what mail interceptions are going to take place or not. If it is amended to provide some effective safeguards I could go along with it. Therefore, I intend to abstain when the vote comes if I am here because I want to wait and see whether the bill comes back improved. If the bill comes back as it is now without substantial improvements that protect civil liberties, I will vote against it on third reading.

I do not want to embarrass my own party, but this is a matter that transcends party consideration, in my view. I agree, Mr. Speaker, the Solicitor General opened the debate and he did nothing to show why we need the legislation passed. The gall and the impudence of it will take your breath away. What the Solicitor General is doing in effect is saying, "Look, we have sinned for 40 years. We have violated the laws of this land." What law did you violate? Section 43 of the Post Office Act, which excluded any other act from interfering with the post office and stated that nothing is liable to demand, seizure and detention while in the course of post except as permitted by the law.

For 40 years, the government, the Solicitor General and everybody in government who should have known about this permitted the law to be ignored and permitted interception of mail to take place illegally in Canada. Now they come before us and say, "We have sinned, forgive us for our past sinning, and authorize us to go on sinning in the future." They have not given any reason why it was necessary in the past or why it is necessary in the future.

The present Solicitor General when Postmaster General assured the world that mail was not being intercepted and opened. The present Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Allmand) assured anyone who was interested that mail was not being intercepted or opened.

When all this became public, they agreed that mail was being illegally intercepted. There was no apology, not even a word to say they were sorry. They just brazenly came into this House with other legislation to authorize them to keep on intercepting and opening mail and, in the case of national security, without any check by anybody of what they are doing.

If the old saying that patriotism is the last refuge of a scoundrel is an accurate statement, and it certainly was accurate with regard to some people who used to wrap themselves in the flag, then national security is the last refuge of a power-mad and power-hungry government that wants to stay in power forever. That is what this is, this national security, this security blanket in which the Liberal party is trying to wrap itself. It is the last refuge of a scoundrel of a government. I am not going to give it support unless something is done to improve vastly the safeguards that are there.

The hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville said that this is sunset legislation. What a joke! It is the sunset on civil liberties in Canada. It is another part of pulling the shades down over our civil liberties. That is our sunset. How many angels can dance on the tongue of a former dean of a law school that he would get up in his House and make the subtle little distinctions with regard to the law now before us. The sunset law, he says. It is to be in effect until a year after the McDonald royal commission reports, and then, if the House passes a resolution, it is to continue.

The hon. member went on to say that it is up to the McDonald commission to settle this question. It is not up to the McDonald commission. The McDonald commission will never settle the question for me. I will read their report to see whether I think it is valuable or makes sense. To say that the McDonald commission will settle the question is ridiculous. We are going to settle the question, if we are re-elected. Those of us who will be here in one or two years' time, if that royal commission ever finishes its work, and it is a pretty slow commission proceeding at a pretty slow pace, will decide the issue in this House, not the McDonald Royal Commission. While we are waiting to be guided by the McDonald commission, we only have to say we are disappointed at a lack of progress to date.

For the government to have the gall to come in with this legislation in view of the record that has been revealed since the last solicitor general spoke in this House last October is most surprising. The McDonald royal commission was announced last October 27.

An hon. Member: It was in June.

Mr. Crosbie: Was it in June? I thought the statement was in October. Their terms of reference were widened in October. The hon. member is correct, it was last June.

We have had questions about former solicitors general, who are still members of this House, for the past year or two on past issues that affect the McDonald commission and the Keable commission. Instead of the government and the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) insisting that they be first before that commission to clear their names and clear up all the confusion, they have been hiding out ever since that commission has been appointed.

We have been told by the McDonald commission they are not going to start questioning people like that until next summer. If that is not a cover-up, I do not know what is. If I were in the position of either one of those two gentlemen, I would insist to Judge McDonald that I appear before the commission now, under oath, to explain and clear up the discrepancy, and not month after month sit like a dummy.

We have a mummers troupe now at the National Arts Centre which is presenting "They Club Seals, Don't They?" I would like to have them cut loose in here and club some sense into the government. They are called The Mummers Troupe. The Mummers Troupe should be joined by the government because they are mummers also. They are mum. To be mum means to say nothing, to keep quiet, to cover up, to hide.

The government is the mummers troupe. They should all troup over to the Arts Centre and join the Mummers Troupe tonight and do something useful instead of the positively harmful things they are now doing to Canada, such as bringing in legislation like this.

The time of the present Solicitor General will be short. He may as well go over and join the Mummers. In fact, he was the original mummer. He was not going to answer any questions. He was mum, mum, mum. He was so mum, he was a mummy. He is in the long history of the Egyptian mummy.

Let us look at this piece of legislation.

Mr. Lachance: It's about time; you have already taken 15 minutes.

Mr. Crosbie: You do not have to stay here. You can leave if you are not interested. This is the report that has to be filed under the Official Secrets Act if it is a national security matter under Section 16(5) about interceptions, whether they be telephone interceptions or mail interceptions. God knows what other kind of interceptions go on, hidden by the Official Secrets Act. It is one skimpy page. It tells you nothing. There were 471 warrants issued for an average of 244 days. The methods were wiretapping and eaves dropping by microphone. One warrant authorized interception of a written communiqué. It goes on with a pansy little statement about the warrants being very valuable in detecting subversive activities, and so on. It is only one page. It is nothing. That is what we get under the Official Secrets Act. The Solicitor General has full power, but reports nothing to the House.

Under the privacy legislation, another report has to be made to do with wiretapping under the Criminal Code. That is a 21 page report. There is not all that much more information in it, but at least you can see how many warrants were issued, how many led to a charge being laid, and how many charges were successfully prosecuted. That is shown in this 21 page report.

In the legislation now before us, the only kind of report we will get about the mail is this spindly little thing, this wizened, weak nothing, that tells us nothing and tells the country nothing. That is all we are going to get under this legislation. That is the only safeguard we have.

The Globe and Mail had an editorial on Thursday, February 9, that made a lot of sense. It pointed out that with respect to wiretapping and the parts of this bill under the Narcotics Control Act where it is necessary to make reports and go to judge, and I quote:

—the protections are largely illusory.

I agree with that. When discussing the national security part of this, it goes on to state:

> Warrants empowering police to intercept or open mail under the Official Secrets Act would not require the sanction of a judge; they would be issued by the Solicitor General of Canada. People whose mail had been opened on the authority of such a warrant would not have to be told that their mail had been opened. Their mail could be opened even though neither the Solicitor General nor the police—nor anyone else—had any grounds even to suspect that a crime were being committed or contemplated. It would all be done in the interest of (that term again) national security, the prevention of "subversive activity".
> What constitutes subversive activity? The definition, and the scope of the definition, will change from day to day, will change according to the political and social mood of the times, will vary according to the political insecurity of the government in power.

If the present government's proposed legislation becomes law, then private mail could be opened with no one save the police and the government permitted to know whose mail had been opened or what it contained. This is not what we consider to be law geared solely for the protection of the public from harm. This is law capable of causing harm as severe as any of the dangers it might conceivably seek to prevent.

I agree with that 100 per cent. That is just what this is. I do not trust this government. They do not need to have this legislation passed. They have already demonstrated that they are eager and willing to engage in illegal activities whenever they want. They do not need this legislation and they are not going to get my approval unless there are a lot more safeguards put into this bill. Not on your life! It has not been demonstrated that it is necessary. We know the government can already deal with bombs going through the mail and so on. They have that authority in other areas.

The record of the government is shameful. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) made a sad mistake. I made a mistake of giving him a vote for the leadership of the Liberal party. I should be sculded for ever having done it. I was a delegate at that time. Thank God I saw the light. At that time he was a civil libertarian.

Mr. Daudlin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member. I do not want to take any of his time. My point of order does not relate to the substance of what the hon. member is saying but rather to the electronic Hansard we now have in the House, namely, the television cameras.

● (1452)

Just a moment ago in the lobby of the House, while watching the hon. member on television, I noticed that instead of showing the hon. member in the midst of his speech the camera was zeroing in on the notes the hon. member was using. I suggest that when the electronic medium was brought into the House its purpose was to provide an electronic Hansard which would record visually and in sound what was going on in the chamber. But zeroing in on a speaker's notes is not the function of an electronic Hansard and in my view, directions should be given from the Chair that the practice should cease.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. member might have a point of order or even a question of privilege. I will take it under advisement and make a judgment at a later date.

Mr. Crosbie: Well, my notes are in order, I hope.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: So if they zero in on my notes it should be all right.

Well, the Prime Minister was a great civil libertarian in his day. Was. He is now the new Duplessis of Canada. That's what he is today. And when we are considering whether this bill should be passed or not, Mr. Speaker, we should consider the mood and thoughts and how the government acts. Let's look at the Prime Minister today, 15 years after Cité Libre and all that business, fifteen years after fighting Mr. Duplessis he is the new Duplessis of Canada.

An hon. Member: Oh!

[Mr. Crosbie.]

Mr. Crosbie: Just listen a moment and I will convince you. You'll be right over here with us in a few minutes. I have here the transcript of the Prime Minister's press conference of October 28, 1977. He was asked a question—I am referring to page six of the transcript. Just a moment. I will get to that one in a minute. I want now to refer to page four. The Prime Minister said, "I think in circumstances like that if the law has to be broken technically in order to save a city then either it should be broken technically or the law should be changed to make that not an illegal act. And that is what McDonald is going to advise us on."

Well, the Prime Minister was asked about breaking into a building by certain people who worked for the RCMP security services. He was asked whether this illegal act should be tolerated. He went on to say how policemen broke the law sometimes and drove fast to catch a man who was escaping from a bank. Then he went on with this irrelevancy that if the law had to be broken technically to save a city then he thought that either it should be broken or that the law should be changed. Now, Mr. Speaker, that is the kind of codswallop a hypocrite uses, that a person who doesn't care about the truth uses, that a person that doesn't care about civil liberties uses.

What does it have to do with breaking the law technically to save a city if somebody breaks and enters an office to take membership lists, or if somebody burns down a barn, or if somebody gives information wrongfully to National Revenue or the RCMP if they are not supposed to, or if the law forbids it, or if somebody intercepts and opens mail when it is illegal to do so? What has that got to do with saving a city? That is not saving anything. That is the specious argument of an authoritarian. That is the argument of a padlock law supporter. So never let it be put to us again that the Prime Minister is a civil libertarian. He is not. He has left that long behind him. He is a man who is now anxious to cling to power by any means at all.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Has there been anybody prosecuted for all these illegal acts yet? Not on your life!

Mr. Woolliams: They have been given medals.

Mr. Crosbie: The great civil libertarian. Those people are getting medals! Now, on another question. The Prime Minister said the government and the Solicitor General and those who were involved should not really know much about security matters. They should not interfere with what the police were doing in the security service and with the RCMP. At the same press conference he said, and I quote from page six:

> And if the government, the ministers or myself had begun asking the RCMP in any detail about their operations and where did you get this fact on the file and who gave you this information and what do you say on so and so in your file and how do you know—we would certainly have been accused by the opposition and probably by people like yourself, Mr. Wilson, of having undue political influence and interference in the RCMP.

So he is suggesting that the less we know the better. It is like the story of three monkeys, one had his hands over his eyes, the other had his hands over his ears, and the third had his mouth shut. See no evil; hear no evil. This is the new doctrine of ministerial responsibility. That is what we are being led to believe happened over all these illegal acts for the last seven or eight years—that the solicitors general were instructed and the Prime Minister agreed not to ask the RCMP security services anything but just leave them on their own—Don't ask any awkward questions or try to find out what is happening. That is not our practice." But the lie was given to that, Mr. Speaker, just about a week ago when the Prime Minister and the Solicitor General went berserk getting every kind of detail from the RCMP and security service they could. They got all the files and every little bit of information they could to try to prosecute and persecute the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt). That gives the lie to the Prime Minister's high protestations that their principles were never to interfere with the RCMP.

Mr. Woolliams: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Well, to serve their political purposes, sir, they put their snouts into the security files immediately. And they did not have the gumption—and they were correct—to try to prosecute the hon. member for Leeds; it is the biggest surrender since Napoleon left Moscow. But instead they are going to bully the media. They are attempting to show the mailed fist to the media. They are going to prosecute the Toronto Sun. They know they are on a sticky wicket with the member for Leeds so they are attempting to intimidate the press. Well, what a scurvy bunch. And still, that scurvy bunch are asking me to support them in having more power without any reference to anyone; that the Solicitor General should have this tremendous power, untramelled in any way. How can I go along with that? I cannot. I will not.

Only if the bill comes out of committee with protection for the people of Canada, for us, and for everyone else concerned, will I support the bill. I agree there has to be the right to intercept, but only under very careful safeguards, both on the security side and the criminal side. The behaviour of this government only gives me every reason to continue to cling to that point of view.

An hon. Member: Five o'clock!

Mr. Crosbie: No, it is not yet five o'clock.

Mr. Woolliams: They would like it to be five o'clock, but it is close to midnight for them.

Mr. Crosbie: The time is close to zero hour for them. The sunset law is going to come down on their heads very shortly.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to talk about the Prime Minister and his Japanese terrorist. We caught a Japanese terrorist, he says, by intercepting the mail. It is the first time I ever heard of a Japanese terrorist being small enough to fit into an envelope. What was he in? What kind of a cardboard carton was the Japanese terrorist in, Mr. Speaker, that they caught him coming through the mail? The poor devil would have starved to death had he got caught in the Canadian Post Office before he could ever have been delivered to the receiver. What kind of malarkey are we supposed to swallow here in Canada from this government? Japanese terrorist!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Well, so much for that. It turned out, before the McDonald commission, that there was no Japanese terrorist caught in any manner by means of the interception of any mail. Every attempt to get information from the government is stopped. The Keable commission, which was in no way under its control and which was doing a fine job in the province of Quebec, asking proper questions, being meticulous, burrowing in to get the information we are all interested in having if we are interested in civil liberties, has been guillotined by the government opposite, not because it is digging into something under federal jurisdiction but because it is digging into the truth. And it is the truth the government cannot stand having revealed. So it is the self same government which now comes rushing in to ask us to put our imprimatur on this bill and to forgive them for acting illegally for the 39 or however many years it is they have acted.

Where is the freedom of information act, Mr. Speaker? Have they rushed into the House with a freedom of information act? They offered us that little green paper! They must think we are too green to burn. They used to use such an expression about Newfoundlanders. They used to say that Newfoundlanders were too green to burn. Well, where is the freedom of information bill? One would have thought they would have brought it in at the same time as this bill—the one which will allow the government to intercept the mail. Where is it? It is nowhere. It is not coming because this government cannot afford to let any information go out, other than what it chooses to evacuate through anaemic press releases which come flooding into our offices day after day.

My God, the amount of paper wasted by the government opposite in these things is enough to give one the horrors. Not information, but poppycock and piffle and vacuous statements of vacuous ministers evacuating on the Canadian public. What we want is a freedom of information act. I imagine at one time the Civil Liberties Association thought the Prime Minister wasn't too bad. Well, they wrote him a letter a while ago in response to that press conference that I quoted from, and here is their letter. It was in the papers November 16, 1977, signed by some very eminent people, fine people. Judge Emmett Hall, a great appointment of a former prime minister, an adornment to the Supreme Court of Canada, a man of impeccable credentials, a royal commissioner of superb talent and ability, signed this letter addressed to the Prime Minister about the RCMP, the government and the rule of law. It was an open letter making certain suggestions, pointing out the same statements that I quoted from the Prime Minister today saying how shocked they were and asking him to correct the statements, to make all relevant information on RCMP law breaking immediately available, to launch immediate disciplinary proceedings, to launch immediate investigations into illegal conduct at the Post Office, to establish a parliamentary committee to inquire into how various ministers of the Crown have exercised their responsibility.

Has the Prime Minister agreed to any of this? Has our great civil libertarian Prime Minister agreed to one thing that the Civil Liberties Association of Canada requested? He has not. They have not. They have ignored it because they think that the majority of people are not concerned about these matters. They think they are safe in ignoring them. Well, I don't think they are safe in ignoring it, Mr. Speaker. That is what the Nixon administration thought down in the United States of America when they originally got started on their grubby path to glory. We all saw how glorious it was when they got finished.

Now, we don't have the same protection here. The Bill of Rights that was passed by the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) doesn't, through the interpretation of our courts, supersede and come ahead of every other law of the land. So for a solicitor general to make such a blatantly false statement as he made, unknowingly I will agree—I agree unknowingly, not knowingly, because the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) doesn't know what he is talking about, so it is not deliberate. It is not intentional. For him to say that Canada is the greatest bastion of civil liberties in the world today demonstrates the lamentable lack of his state of knowledge of civil liberties. He knows nothing about them.

The greatest bastion of civil liberties in the world today is the United States of America. The second greatest would be Great Britain where they have a tradition, where they believe in what they say, where governments are very careful, in security matters and all other matters, not to step out of line because of the force of public opinion in that society. That's where civil liberties are strong and vibrant today, not in Canada where a government feels free to act illegally for years and then comes before the House of Commons and asks them to pass legislation not only authorizing but giving them even more powers than they had assumed before.

Well, Mr. Speaker, we have the U.S. experience. There was a good article by Michael Valpy in the Vancouver Sun of February 18 on this subject. He compared it to the United States of America, and he referred to the 1972 Keith decision where Justice Lewis Powell, a conservative on the bench of the United States of America, said, and I quote:

"We cannot accept the government's argument that internal security matters are too subtle and complex for judicial evaluation . . . If the threat is too subtle or complex for our senior law enforcement officers to convey its significance to a court, one may question whether there is probable cause for surveillance."

Now isn't that just solid common sense? If the Solicitor General can't persuade a judge that he needs a warrant for national security purposes or if his officers are so opaque or so unable to convince the judge, surely to God there is no cause for surveillance.

"That decision effectively ended warrantless wiretapping in purely domestic security surveillances (with the court reserving judgment on the rights of foreign agents . . .

In the 1975 Zwelbon v. Mitchell decision, the court further restricted the executive's powers: "A warrant must be obtained before a wiretap is installed on a domestic organization that is neither the agent of nor acting in collaboration with a foreign power, even if surveillance is installed under presidential directive in the name of foreign intelligence gathering for protection of the national security."

It doesn't matter what the name is; you have still got to go and get judicial sanction before you start off on this course. But under this legislation our Solicitor General can open mail and give his sanction; he can open anyone's mail without reference to anyone. He doesn't have to justify it. He doesn't have to discuss it. And, Mr. Speaker, when we have a situation like we had a week or two ago with our hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt) when the government was threatening and bully-ragging and browbeating and waving all its weapons and saying what it was going to do, when we had that situation we had no impartial third party to decide. But the government said it was national security, and the government is not going to explain why. It's not even going to say how many copies there are of the document, the 58 copies. They won't even say that there are 58 or one copy. That's national security, you know, to give any information. That's what the government said.

Well, obviously we've got to have some other authority, judicial or parliamentary, to which these matters can be referred as to whether it is really a national security issue. It could be a committee of the House of Commons with five people on it representing the various parties, but there has got to be a judicial reference. There has to be more information come to us on how many warrants were given for national security and what kind of national security, did anything result from those warrants or not and so on, when we are agreeing to the Canadian people having their rights changed and infringed like this.

We need more information, and we need the minister to justify what he is doing before at least a judge or someone, the same as in the other part of this bill. Everybody is very careful what they say about the RCMP. Let me say this, Mr. Speaker. I think the RCMP is a fine police service.

Mrs. Holt: How can you?

Mr. Crosbie: But that doesn't mean to say that I am afraid to criticize the RCMP. Not on your life, sir. I am not afraid of criticizing anyone, and if the RCMP deserve criticism, I am going to criticize them; or if the police deserve criticism, I will criticize them. That doesn't mean to say I don't think they are doing a fine job. What is required is to have the RCMP removed from the security services altogether. They shouldn't be involved in that grubbier side of extra-legal operations. That should be done by security forces. The RCMP should be left to do their thing in the area they are best capable of doing it where their reputation is not going to be sullied by some of the things that are bound to sully it in this grey security area. That is the first thing the government should do.

Not only have there been all the violations of the law I mentioned earlier, but the same thing is being done with Ontario Health Insurance Plan records. The law has been broken there. The RCMP, doing security checks or something like that, got information from the Ontario Health Insurance Plan without permission and "may have jeopardized the prospects of the applicants' getting the jobs, Ontario Attorney-General McMurtry said Tuesday". This is a clipping from the Journal of March 1. Here's a case where some people may not have got jobs because of illegal actions of the security forces. Are we to treat that lightly? Suppose it is only one case in Canada a year. Are we to treat it as though it is unimportant? Supposing that 99 out of every 100 people in Canada think we are wrong not to give the government absolute power to open everything and to listen to everything and to take away all our privacy. Supposing 99 per cent think that. Would we be right to allow some people to lose jobs or not get jobs because of illegal actions of the government? Surely that is not a reasonable position to take, and it is not a position that I will take or can take.

This bill, Mr. Speaker, is going to go to the committee, the House of Commons Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, and I have little hope that it is going to come out much better than it went in. I don't think the government is likely to agree that there should be changes made in it, and if it comes out as it went in, as I say, I will be voting against it. I have to go on the record as being against it. I will be against it in any event, but I am doubly against it because of the sorry record of this government in security matters. It just does not inspire in me the confidence to give them any further authority.

The Solicitor General apparently is going to accept personal responsibility for warrants now under this legislation. I wonder how long it will be when a question is asked before he says no, no, he doesn't take any responsibility; he just signs them blindly; that "they send them up to me from the security service and I blindfold myself, honourable gentlemen in the House of Commons, and I sign them, so I can't take responsibility". That will be the song we will hear in six months' time when the bill goes through, or in a year's time. He should report to the House with full details, if he gets this power, every year, and there should be a special national security committee of this House, in my opinion, with all parties represented, and all questions of security involving ministers and M.P.'s should certainly go to that committee where national security is involved. We should have a freedom of information act to show us that the government has got some sincerity and is not afraid to have any information at all go out on them.

So, Mr. Speaker, in winding up, here is the honourable drug-taker from Vancouver—the woman who is against drug-taking, I am sorry, from Vancouver. It is too bad she was overborne by her party. The party that is supporting the pot ignored the hon. member here a few weeks ago.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, what we want in dealing with this bill and in dealing with the government—

An hon. Member: They want a pot in every chicken.

Mr. Crosbie: They want a pot in every chicken.

Mrs. Holt: What about the Conservative conventions?

Mr. Woolliams: We have never had a pot in our conventions.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Lefebvre): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Lefebvre): In order for him to continue there must be unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Crosbie: I just wanted to end, Mr. Speaker, if that is agreed. I was at my last sentence. What we want then, Mr. Speaker, addressed to this bill is a sculping knife to get at the truth. We have got to use the truth-dealing gaff on this bill, the same one that the sealers are using. We have got to pelt the hide off the smug seals of Liberal self-satisfaction. We have got to puncture their pretentions. We have got to remove the blubber of Liberal blunders and really get into this bill, Mr. Speaker, and eviscerate it before I can vote for it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Claude-André Lachance (Lafontaine-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I shall speak later on about the remarks of the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) when I come to the problem of national security as dealt with in this bill, but I should like to limit myself, first of all, to remarks of a judicial nature, at the risk of sounding like a dotard to my colleague for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) about the concept of direct or indirect evidence, and the pertinence of that evidence before the courts.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, it is extremely interesting to note that Bill C-26 now before the House is the direct counterpart, with regards to communications, of another bill which dealt with oral communications, namely the Protection of Privacy Act and the regulations on the guarantees related to wiretapping. Mr. Speaker, I noticed with great interest when I first read the provisions of this bill that in clause 178, paragraph 2 in Bill C-26 the same concept was introduced that had been the object of an intervention on my part on March 3, 1978, on a motion for second reading of Bill C-227 by the hon. member for Calgary North, concept which can be defined thus: To mar the image of justice, concept which allows to guarantee, once and for all, the pertinence in a debate or judicial proceedings, of wiretapping, or in the case of Bill C-26, wiretapping itself, when the Crown, for some reason or other, decides to introduce as evidence, which it can do under the terms of section 178, paragraphs (1), (2) and (3), evidence provided directly or indirectly by wiretapping or illegal interception. I always use the term wiretapping or interception because, as I said a few moments ago, those are exactly the same concepts underlying Bill C-26, if it is approved by the House, and the legislation on electronic surveillance as well as the Criminal Code amendments which were passed by this House in the spring of 1977. In what respect is this clause 2 so interesting for those who want to protect fundamental liberties in this country? Once again, Mr. Speaker, I would like to return to the reasons which prompted the government to introduce last spring, and now in the case of Bill C-26 provisions which allow the police to intervene in areas that were traditionally reserved and where they had no means whatsoever to stand in the way of organized crime. Because, once again, it is still the principle and concept of maintaining balance between fundamental liberties and organized crime prevention which is present in all those provisions and which allows to police, under strict guarantees, either to intercept an oral communication or, in the present case, to intercept a written communication.

The danger pointed out by the hon. member for Calgary North in the bill which he introduced in the House, a bill which has still not been passed on second reading, Bill C-227, was precisely due to his concern that, when legal safeguards are included in the consent given to police forces to intercept an oral communication, those safeguards were not adequate and thus opened the door to potential abuses by police forces if the courts were unable to expose, if necessary, an illegal action of those police forces while it was still possible for the attorney general to submit under the amendment presented in the spring of 1977 some direct or indirect evidence as a result of illegal wiretapping and that the wiretapping itself was not relevant to the prosecution.

I replied to the hon. member, in my intervention of March 3, 1978 as he will remember, that I felt that the provision contained in section 178.16 of the Criminal Code, now in effect and which reads as follows: When the juge thinks the introduction of this evidence might damage the image of justice, he is in a position to refuse this evidence coming directly or indirectly from illegal wiretapping. So, as I said, this new concept has not been tested by the Supreme Court, which explains why I raise it once again, so that in due time the people who will have to interpret it know exactly what it means, namely that the introduction of this concept protected and sanctioned the relevance at the trial of the wiretapping itself. Consequently, police corps would be ill-advised to take the opportunity of a so-called open door in the provisions of the Criminal Code to tap illegally while they know very well that if they could get a direct or indirect evidence through illegal wiretapping they would never be able to introduce it in the trial without taking the risk of this illegal wiretapping being used by the counsel for the defence saying it damages the image of justice.

So it is, Mr. Speaker, a legal subtlety, a subtlety of evidence; I realize and recognize this. But I think this provision is so fundamental that I consider it to be my duty to rise twice in the span of two weeks and explain twice this very concept on two related areas so that in due time, when the Supreme Court will be called upon to interpret it, it will do so in the most enlightened way with everything available since the judges of the Supreme Court must hopefully read Hansard—if not, this is more or less assumed—so they will know exactly what was the intention of the legislator when he incorporated this provision of in the law, in the Criminal Code.

So, Mr. Speaker, to come back to the bill now before us, Bill C-26, we find again this very provision under subclause (2) to which I was referring earlier, which reads as follows:

> (2) The judge or magistrate presiding at any proceedings may,
> (a) notwithstanding subsection (1), refuse to admit evidence obtained directly or indirectly as a result of information acquired by interception of a communication in the course of post that is itself inadmissible as evidence . . .
> where he is of the opinion that the admission thereof would bring the administration of justice into disrepute.

Mr. Speaker, at the risk of repeating myself, I suggest this is fundamental. It is fundamental because any interception by the police that would not have been authorized according to the procedures set out in this bill, namely the warrant that must be issued by a judge with all the legal guarantees that accompany it, this provision allows the evidence, the interception itself, even if the evidence resulting directly or indirectly therefrom is only being introduced as evidence, to cross-examine a policeman in the witness box and ask him: But where did you get that evidence? And then the judge, Mr. Speaker, under the principle of relevancy and because of this provision, has to allow the question. And then, the witness must answer: Your Honour, we have obtained this evidence through mail interception. Was this a legal operation? And then the witness has to explain if this interception was legal or illegal to demonstrate that he has not tarnished the image of justice in using and presenting that evidence.

Mr. Speaker, I know that the hon. member for Calgary North is becoming very nervous. So I encourage him to take part in this debate if he wishes a little later and then we shall be able to denounce the illegal use of an interception in that trial and eventually bring the police officer before the court on different grounds, for having contravened the provisions of what will eventually become a law, Bill C-26.

So, if I insist so much on that aspect, Mr. Speaker, it is only to explain that what might appear at the beginning to be a vague concept—to tarnish the image of justice—what might be considered a legal subtlety, is in fact one of the most basic guarantees that have been included in amendments to the Criminal Code last spring and that are included again in Bill C-26 to prevent police forces from abusing their powers and feeling entirely protected against any prosecution. Without that guarantee it would not be possible to submit as evidence the interception itself when direct or indirect evidence is presented before the court.

Therefore, the hon. member for Calgary North is perfectly free not to agree with me, taking into account that healthy differences of opinion between us will not result in a controversy nor mean the end of a beautiful friendship, for, contrary to what may think the hon. member for St. John's West who certainly came out today with wild remarks, hon. members on both sides of the House are eager to find the proper balance between the need to fight organized crime and the need to protect our basic freedoms.

Mr. Speaker, I am always somewhat amazed and disappointed whenever hon. members, for the sake of party politics, try to denounce a "so-called" politically oriented policy, when we all know through experience, documentary evidence and otherwise that hon. members on this side are just as concerned with the issue of basic freedoms as any hon. member opposite. However, it is extremely important to try by all means at our disposal, even if we must admit that they are imperfect, to fight organized crime, which is a real danger in our society, while protecting the basic freedoms, and that must be our long term objective, an objective which must be present in all our activities in the House and our whole Canadian democracy.

It is therefore this balance, Mr. Speaker, that we must try to establish and, unfortunately, I have not found it in some of the previous interventions. I know that the hon. member for Calgary North is concerned about this matter. When I spoke on March 3 last, I said that I respected him for his efforts in trying to meet this objective in his own way, even though we do not agree about those means. Even though I do not agree with him about the means, our aims are the same.

But I am always a bit disappointed when someone like the hon. member for St. John's West makes a long speech without suggesting one answer to the problem of national security and spends instead forty minutes making a rambling speech to denounce present practices, which we must admit are unfortunate, but which are now the subject of investigations on the part of a royal commission, and concludes in flamboyant rhetoric that the government is completely incompetent as concerns national security and that we cannot trust them. No, Mr. Speaker!

It is true that the concept of national security greatly concerns me. It is true that the legacy of the 1970 crisis is perhaps not one of the things of which we can be most proud. In fact, Mr. Speaker, the necessary research on national security was made by a member on this side of the House. The concept of national security is very vague. It is hard to define. It was introduced in our legislation to meet a certain need at a certain time. It is a concept whose possible utilization could result in enormous abuses and this greatly concerns me.

But, Mr. Speaker, it is certainly not with speeches such as the one that we have heard this afternoon from the hon. member for St. John's West that we will solve the problem. It makes me pretty mad to hear such rambling speeches. I therefore urge him to read the speech the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Joyal) made on February 17, since the latter does not have a reputation for being a yes-man. The hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont has looked into the origins of the concept. He has tried to define it and to set forth the problems inherent to the national security concept.

Mr. Speaker, it is true that eventually this House will have to study thoroughly the concept of national security and define its meaning as well as the use we intend to make it and which objectives we are seeking when including that concept in several pieces of legislation dealing with immigration, electronic monitoring or mail interception.

Besides, Mr. Speaker, I know that my colleague from Montmorency (Mr. Duclos) intends to deal with this issue which concerns him a lot and I know from conversations I have had with him that we both share to a great extent the same concerns as do other members of this House. Yet does this mean that one has to extrapolate and denounce, under the pretense that once again we are including this concept of national security in a bill, alleged practices on the part of the government, stretch the facts to tarnish reputations, indulge in sensationalism, which is precisely what I am deploring Mr. Speaker in the case of the hon. member for St. John's West.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that certain members from both sides of this House will seriously and thoroughly explore this concept of national security to try and define its limits so that we may be able to solve this problem which is a serious one, a matter which will not be solved by passionate speeches such as we have heard earlier and during which not a single solution was presented because there was not even a definition of that concept. I strongly urge the members from the other side, whose interest in this issue I am aware of, to rise and participate in this debate to make clear not only to the government but to this House and the country at large what we intend to do to fight organized crime and also to get prepared to prevent such unfortunate incidents as people now experience in Germany, Israel, France, Italy or elsewhere at a time when the very foundations of western democracy are being shattered by terrorism, a challenge we must be prepared to meet.

Mr. Speaker, this bill gives me reason for concern. I feel concerned because once again it includes a concept which I do not understand well because it is ill-defined, yet this does not mean, Mr. Speaker, that one must condemn altogether those who support it; on the contrary, I am confident that since this legislation is only temporary it will be reintroduced before this House though, as is often said, what is temporary becomes permanent and what is permanent becomes temporary. Since this temporary legislation will be back before this House after the McDonald commission has presented its report and since we will then have had the opportunity of studying again this issue, the House should support this bill, provided we are given an opportunity later on to study in depth the scope of the national security concept which, in itself, calls for a good debate in order to become better defined.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. member for Calgary North.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Hear, hear!

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, it being Friday afternoon I will take support from wherever it comes. No, I seriously appreciate it. I am being a little facetious.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): After all, you are at the left wing of the Tory party physically.

Mr. Woolliams: That is right, and I am glad to be here.

I was quite impressed by the remarks of the hon. member for Lafontaine-Rosemont (Mr. Lachance) when he spoke on my private member's bill. I know that he is as conscientious and serious in his references to this matter as I am, but I would like to take a moment to get the debate back on the rails. I have a feeling it got slightly off the rails.

This bill is very narrow in its scope, and I say that in its proper sense. It deals with two things. It deals with the right—and I will deal with the authorization in a moment—to open mail for drugs, and secondly for purposes of national security. Coming back to the first point, the right to open mail, the bill does not deal with other offences in the Criminal Code such as rape, murder or robbery with violence. It deals with a very simple thing when we are dealing with criminal law, and that is the right to open mail in reference to drugs or the trafficking in drugs. That right can only be obtained by the police upon authorization from a judge in accordance with the terms and conditions of the Criminal Code as it applies to the privacy act. That is what the bill says. I am not going to spend much time on that part because I am in accord with the provisions.

I may differ with some of my fellow members in my own party as to whether we should wait for the report of the McDonald commission, but I have always said that if I were the minister of justice and wanted to give one of my legal friends a great job I would make him a commissioner. You never know when it is going to end. You do not know how long it is going to last, or what it is going to cost. The libraries must be filled with commission reports.

Coming back to the question of drugs, I cannot think of anything that is associated with international trade and within our own domestic society that demoralizes the people of our society more than the traffic of drugs. It is not so much the harm that taking the drugs does to individuals but what happens to them once they are hooked on these drugs. Hon. members have only to read the reports, particularly those that come out of British Columbia, to know that once a girl or a boy, or a man or woman, get hooked on drugs, they must stoop to all of the low, base crimes of the nation to obtain money to afford their habit. Because such drugs are illegal, they can only be obtained from an illegal source, the trafficker. I am not considering medical prescriptions.

Most of the crime in our urban centres can be traced to drug trafficking, whether it is prostitution or robbers with violence. Take, for example, the woman walking down the street with a purse in her hand and she is pushed down, her glasses are smashed and she is run over, all to obtain money to be able to afford the habit.

I do not know in my own mind whether the right to open mail in reference to drugs will give the police the necessary evidence, but if it does not then it will not be used that much. Therefore, I am not going to spend much time on that phase of the bill. I am one and I speak for myself. I notice that the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot (Mr. Jarvis) took the same position. He is our critic of the Department of the Solicitor General on this side of the House. I have never really liked the word "critic" because it sounds as though we do not ever produce positive suggestions. I know that the hon. members over there believe that I do offer positive suggestions by moving a number of private member's bills and having alternatives in the speeches I deliver.

As far as opening mail with reference to drugs is concerned, I support it 100 per cent. I support it because I am prepared to give the police officers that authority, providing it is obtained by authorization from a judge. I hope that the Criminal Code will be amended in line with my private member's bill, where the person who is the object of the electronic surveillance will be notified within 90 days, or an extension of time thereof necessary to solve and investigate the crime in question. With that I endorse the bill.

I will point out one thing that I have not seen any legislation on, and it is with regard to the position of the courts in this country, the judiciary. Many laymen think that all of the law flows from parliamentary legislation. That is entirely wrong. There is more common law made by the courts based on precedents. It is the custom and tradition of mankind that our law is crystallized by precedention our courts. More important, when we pass a bill in this House on laws that govern the rights of the court it is interpreted by that court. The court will take the words in their grammatical sense and interpret them, no matter what we intended. That is the law of the land, and that is the way it must be because to operate under any other system of jurisprudence would be very bad.

Before I go into the question of security, I would like to deal with a second point. The second part of this bill deals with national security. Here we do not have the features of the first part of the bill, where an application must be approved by a judge to authorize wiretapping. This can be done by a writ and the signature of the Solicitor General without any report to the person who is the object of that wiretap.

Although I did not agree with everything the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) said, I agree with him in this regard, that I am not prepared to give the Solicitor

General (Mr. Blais) or those who come after him the authority to issue those warrants. I hope this provision will be changed in committee. If those warrants, under national security, are to be issued they should be issued in the same manner as a warrant under the privacy act for electronic surveillance on the telephone or for the opening of mail when investigating drug traffic in Canada.

It may be claimed that national security is a different field and, therefore, the powers should be given to the executive rather than the judiciary because the matter is highly confidential and we must always protect classified information. There may be some merit to that argument but I have great faith in the judiciary of this country. On the whole, over the years we have appointed good people to the various benches, whether District Court, the Supreme Court trial division, the Appeal Court, the Supreme Court of Canada, or the Federal Court. I think with very few exceptions they are people of great integrity, intelligence and compassion. I think they have the capacity to keep matters confidential.

Surely one could apply to a judge for a warrant. Maybe all the facts of classified information would not have to be set out, although I am sure a judge who takes an oath of allegiance to the Queen—not to the government—to do a proper job without discrimination of any kind, would be able to keep information confidential. That is a positive suggestion, Mr. Speaker, and I hope the government will give it serious consideration if and when this bill goes to committee. I am prepared to make such an amendment in committee. I hope my amendment does not fall like the seeds and the stones from the sower of the seeds in the Bible and fail to germinate or sprout because there are always too many Grits to vote me down on my positive suggestions. I am usually told a few minutes later that I do not come out with anything positive, it having been thrown in the waste basket by the Grits in question.

I want to deal with something that really frightens me, Mr. Speaker. I want to read from the report of the Solicitor General of Canada issued pursuant to section 178.22 of the Criminal Code of Canada. This covers the period from January 1, 1977 to December 31, 1977. The number of wiretap authorizations obtained under the Criminal Code was 589; wiretap authorizations under the Narcotics Control Act, 1344; under the Food and Drug Act, 197; under the Customs Act, 24; under the Excise Act, 9; and under the Bankruptcy Act, 1. The total authorization for that year was 2,164. The amount is going up like inflation, Mr. Speaker. There were 879 persons arrested whose identities became known through wiretaps. Out of 2,164 wiretaps, approximately one-third were arrested.

There is something else I wanted to put on record regarding the issuing of warrants authorized by a judge. As the hon. member for St. John's West said, we cannot find out the facts about these warrants that were issued by the Solicitor General. He accused the minister of being blindfolded but I do not know whether that is correct. However, only 28 persons were convicted as a result of wiretap information. Mr. Speaker, that is 28 convictions out of 2,164 wiretaps. That is quite a thunderstorm, but I suggest the result is a mere shower.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): How many of the investigations are still going on?

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, that was the story last year. One thing about the Liberals, they never change their philosophy or their policy. Their policy is power. That very question was put to me a year ago when I was speaking in this House.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Answer it now.

Mr. Woolliams: All right, I will. Last year they said there would be a carryover. That is included in the 28. There is a carryover every year but it does not really affect the result, except for one or two. I hope that answers the hon. member satisfactorily.

Mrs. Holt: It is also justice not to charge if you have not complete evidence.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to argue. I hope my good friends make their own speeches. I came here with the facts, but when you talk facts to the Liberals they just cannot take the truth.

Let us look at something else now. These are not my figures, they come from the Solicitor General's office.

Mrs. Holt: Because he is an honest person.

Mr. Woolliams: I am not going to get into whether he is honest or dishonest or what he is. I wish my good friend from Vancouver, whom I always give a good hearing in committee and in the House, would restrain herself. I know she gets frustrated sitting there because she does not go along with many things that happen. Sometimes she explodes in committee because of that frustration. If she could only restrain herself for a few moments, it would be a great help to all concerned.

I should like to refer to the Solicitor General's report again. Referring to the Official Secrets Act, it shows that 471 warrants were issued by the Solicitor General. The average length of time—

Mr. MacFarlane: Was it 472?

Mr. Woolliams: I did not know the hon. member wanted to be included. I will see that is done next year. The Liberal whip said it should have been 472. Perhaps he has some inside information about himself that I do not have. I hope he will go to Hamilton and get himself a good lawyer this afternoon!

Mr. MacFarlane: I thought they had missed you!

Mr. Woolliams: The average length of time for the warrants was 244.55 days. That is out of 471 warrants. Aside from the case in Montreal the report is secret and silent about how many arrests and charges there were. I know of only one case, and I do not know whether wire-tapping was used in that Montreal case or not. Even if it was, there was only one conviction out of 471 listenings conducted under the Official Secrets Act. The figures on both sides of the fence, whether under the Criminal Code, the Narcotics Act and the Official Secrets Act, are almost identical. I think that shows the danger of too much extension.

I want to repeat that I believe that in order to wiretap under the Official Secrets Act for national security, the judge should grant authority.

This is a very difficult act. It would be very difficult to defend oneself under the Officials Secrets Act and it would also be very difficult to get a prosecution. It is like the old laws on rape; it was very difficult to defend or to prosecute a rape case because the language was quite vague.

● (1552)

The Protection of Privacy Act deals basically with national security, which we are dealing with under this Bill C-26. I want to read once again something I have taken objection to, and I quote:

(2) The Solicitor General of Canada may issue a warrant authorizing the interception or seizure of any communication if he is satisfied by evidence on oath that such interception or seizure is necessary for the prevention or detection of subversive activity directed against Canada or detrimental to the security of Canada or is necessary for the purpose of gathering foreign intelligence information essential to the security of Canada.

Then we go to the next clause, which is the definition of "subversive activity" which means various things, such as espionage or sabotage. But one thing that strikes me is that it means activities directed toward accomplishing government change within Canada. As I said the other day when speaking on my own private member's bill, in any election, when the government finally goes to the people, isn't the opposition asking the Canadian people for a change in the government? In view of economic policies of this government and the economic mess which we find ourselves in with this deficit, if we do not get a change in government this time, the country will be bankrupt. As the member from Crowfoot, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner), said only a month before he took that strange walk to join the cattle rustlers, "The country cannot stand another year of Trudeau."

Now I come to subversive activity. Subversive activity means activity toward accomplishing governmental change within Canada. Well, anybody might be suspected of a breach of national security if that is the law of the land. I think it is a very dangerous law. I do not like to put that kind of law or that kind of a tool into the hands of this present Solicitor General or any other solicitor general that may be appointed in the future; solicitors general have not always shown they can obey the law either.

The Official Secrets Act has many sections and they are difficult. For example Section 2(3) provides:

(3) In this Act . . .

(b) expressions referring to obtaining or retaining any sketch, plan, model, article, note, or document, include the copying of, or causing to be copied, the whole or any part of any sketch, plan, model, article, note or document; and

(c) expressions referring to the communication of any sketch, plan, model, article, note or document include the transfer or transmission of the sketch, plan, model, article, note or document.

[Mr. Woolliams.]

Section 3 provides:

(1) Every person is guilty of an offence under this Act who, for any purpose prejudicial to the safety or interests of the State,—

That is subject to very wide interpretation. What does it mean? There is probably not one member in this House who could come up with the same definition. Likewise there would not be one judge who would come up with the same definition. Under this act it would be very difficult to prosecute, but it is just as difficult to defend, depending on the circumstances, depending on the political temperament of the country and depending on what the judge had for breakfast.

Under this same section concerning prosecution the act says:

(2) On a prosecution under this section, it is not necessary—

And listen to this.

—to show that the accused person was guilty of any particular act tending to show a purpose prejudicial to the safety or interests of the State, and notwithstanding that no such act is proved against him,—

The lady from Vancouver will not like that, she likes "her".

—he may be convicted if, from the circumstances of the case, or his conduct, or his known character as proved, it appears that his purpose was a purpose prejudicial to the safety or interests of the State;—

With that kind of ambiguity in the law I must say I am not prepared now or tomorrow to give the Solicitor General the power and the authority to sign warrants without a judge's authorization. I want to repeat that I have absolute confidence in the judiciary of this country. If it is a matter of some evidence that has to be disclosed to a judge which is classified, I am confident, whether that judge is male or female, that he or she would keep that information confidential and private from the public, for the good of Canada. I continue reading this same section:

—and if any sketch, plan, model, article, note, document or information relating to or used in any prohibited place, or anything in such a place, or any secret official code word or pass word is made, obtained, collected, recorded, published or communicated by any person other than a person acting under lawful authority, it shall be deemed to have been made, obtained, collected, recorded, published or communicated for a purpose prejudicial to the safety or interests of the State—

In other words, if any person is in possession of such information, whether or not it was obtained accidentally, if hon. members wanted to take the extreme interpretation of that section that person—man or woman—in Canada could be found guilty. Suppose a person listened in on the telephone having obtained the Solicitor General's warrant and someone asked: "Did you find a document, a sketch, a note or a copy on your desk?", and the answer was "Yes, I read it". Maybe the person in question had no idea whether it was harmful to the state or not but that person could very well under this section of that act be convicted without any notice to himself and without any authorization by a judge. I say that is not good enough, not when we are dealing with this kind of an act.

Then I go on to another section. Again I quote:

4. (1) Every person is guilty of an offence under this Act who, having in his possession or control any secret official code word, or pass word, or any sketch, plan—

And further down it says:

(a) communicates the code word,—

The person might indicate that code word over the telephone innocently if he did not know that it had been laid down on a piece of paper inadvertently and placed on his desk. I am not prepared under those circumstances—and again I emphasize this—to let the Solicitor General have this power, in particular this Solicitor General or one to be appointed in the future. Indeed those in the past were not always above the law. Therefore, I want a judge to give the authorization.

Can I call it four o'clock, sir?

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. It being four o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely public bills—

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I request the unanimous consent of the House so we may proceed to consideration of Bill C-234 and that all items appearing on the order paper before that bill be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. The House has heard the request of the parliamentary secretary. Is there unanimous consent?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Agreed.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Agreed.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

[English]

HOLIDAYS ACT

ESTABLISHMENT OF NATIONAL HERITAGE DAY

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Windsor-Walkerville) moved that Bill C-234, respecting National Heritage Day, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is, on the one hand, a pleasure to be able to speak again on this important piece of unfinished business. On the other hand, it is a slightly unhappy occasion in that it is necessary to speak on it again, to find that the bill has not yet been passed and that the government bill with a similar initiative which had been introduced in the last session has not been reintroduced. Nevertheless, I understand that the government is committed to this initiative and will at least in time bring forth legislation on its own behalf.

In the meantime, I would certainly like to advance the acceptance of national heritage day through my Bill C-234. Indeed, as I will develop in the course of my remarks, there is at least one substantial difference, perhaps two, between the bill which I am proposing and that which it appears the government would desire. I would suggest on both points that the consensus of parties which is represented in my bill is the preferable position to take.

I wish to say first that it is a pleasure to have an opportunity on an occasion such as this to celebrate my national heritage as well. We Irish have become so Anglicized that we do not have as many chances to parade our original origins now as we used to. In some places they still turn rivers green on St. Patrick's Day. In most cases all we can do is wear a badge to indicate our origin. In my case all of my ancestors came here from Ireland in the 1830's and forties. It is a long time ago, but I like to look back on that heritage because I believe it has made an important contribution to what Canada is today.

That is what each of us feels about his heritage in Canada. That is one of the great things about this country, perhaps the greatest, that we each have a distinctive heritage. Each of us can look at his own heritage and his own contribution to Canada with pride. Our government looks at all of these with pride as having made a contribution to the development of our country.

With respect to national heritage day, I believe two provinces have adopted national heritage days. I think the territory of the Yukon has also done so. In addition, there are a number of large organizations which are very instrumental in pressing for the establishment of our heritage. Kinsmen are one of those groups and I frequently had an opportunity of appearing before them. They have been taking a major initiative with regard to this legislation. I believe Optimists International have taken a similar position.

Bill C-234 is a symbol of the richness of our national heritage. I believe it is strongly supported by all the people of Canada. In a questionnaire which I included in a householder last month, I asked my constituents the question: "Do you favour Heritage Day as a national holiday in February?". The replies are now in, about 700 in all. Of those, 68.7 per cent favour a heritage day as a national holiday in February. Only 31.3 per cent are opposed. In fact, most of those who were opposed objected only to the date, not to the concept. They wrote on the questionnaire other dates they would prefer. Nevertheless, the date proposed in this bill is obviously the one around which there is the greatest popular consensus.

I would like to go back to the genesis of this bill in the justice committee. In 1973, this matter came before the justice committee with some degree of force because there were quite a number of bills at that time which were referred to the committee. The committee was being asked in some way to resolve this problem.

I might just mention that some of those who presented bills were the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie), the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) and the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt), I believe. He was certainly a member of the justice subcommittee which straightened out the matter and I believe he had a bill. There were also several former parliamentarians such as Mr. Reginald Stackhouse, the hon. member for Scarborough East at that time, and Mr. Nelson from British Columbia. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) will know his constituency.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Burnaby-Seymour.

Mr. MacGuigan: He was the member for that area at that time. Having regard to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, I would like to pay a special tribute to him for his support in this important task.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacGuigan: He has been indefatigable in his activities with regard to this legislation. I am encouraged by that because I have noticed in the course of my public life, and even more in the course of his, that he very often in the long run gets his way with many of those pieces of legislation for which he so tenaciously struggles in this House. That gives me added reason to hope that before very long we will see the fruits of his labour, mine and those of many other people and get this measure on the statute books of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacGuigan: I wish to refer to the report of a subcommittee of the justice committee that was presented in that committee on December 18, 1973. As I mentioned, there was a diversity of options. The justice committee set up a subcommittee of which I was the chairman. We were able to bring in a unanimous report which made the following recommendations. Although this is found in the minutes of the justice committee at page 32:4, I do not think it would be a bad idea to put it in Hansard today. I presented the report of the subcommitte on the subject matter. It read as follows:

> The Sub-committee on the subject-matter of a National Holiday of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs has the honour of presenting to the Committee the following recommendations:
> (1) That the Government consider the advisability of introducing legislation to establish the third Monday of February as a new legal holiday;
> (2) That this holiday be kept and observed under the name of Heritage Day;
> (3) That the particular aspect of our heritage to be honoured on this day should be varied by proclamation from year to year. In the opinion of the Sub-committee the focal point of the celebration for the first year should be the Canadian Flag, for the second year our first Prime Minister, Sir John A. Macdonald, and for the third year, our native peoples;
> (4) That a new Standing Joint Committee of both Houses of Parliament, chaired by the Speakers of both Houses, should be established to recommend to the Government the theme of the holiday from year to year;
> (5) That the Government consider the advisability of issuing a special stamp and coin each year to mark the celebration more fully.

After debate thereon, on the motion of the hon. member for York-Simcoe the report was concurred in unanimously by the justice committee. I might just make a few additional comments on that.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): What year was that?

Mr. MacGuigan: December 18, 1973. The name was varied from heritage day to national heritage day on my initiative because of the difficulty of finding an adequate translation in the French. It was thought that the word "patrimoine" by itself might not signify exactly the right thing, that "patrimoine national" was the preferred phrase. Therefore, we made the insertion of the word "national" in the English as well to keep the name of the holiday parallel in both languages.

There was a subsequent resolution of the justice committee which recommended that the Canadian Bill of Rights should be the focal point of the celebration in the fourth year. That has also been added to the bill.

I did not proceed with the idea of a standing joint committee of both Houses of Parliament chaired by the Speakers of both Houses to advise the government, not because I had a change of mind on this, but because it seemed a bit too elaborate a setup for a single matter of this kind.

The matter was put in the hands of the government to decide by proclamation but with the understanding and recommendation I am making here now that this be done on the basis of a consensus of party leaders, or whatever form of consensus might be established, so that the holiday which was established would not be one which brought any acrimony to the Canadian scene but was one which had very general support in all segments in this House and, therefore, in all parts of Canada. Indeed, it would be political folly for a government to proceed in any other way on a matter of this kind.

I will come to that subject later, but not too much later because I do not want to prevent other members from making a contribution to this debate. I wish we were not having a debate but simply putting the bill through. Since I do not sense that to be the disposition of the House, I think this to be an opportune time to put some things on record.

The bill which is before us represents an initiative of an all-party body. It represents the feelings of all groups in Canada. There seem to be only two arguments against it. One was raised by the hon. member for Palliser (Mr. Schumacher) on a previous occasion and his opinion may be shared by other hon. members.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): By the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts), for example.

Mr. MacGuigan: I do not think that is the view of the Secretary of State. I think there is simply a reluctance there to proceed at the moment. As for consideration of the question of the work ethic, the notion of the work ethic put forward by the hon. member for Palliser is not mine. My notion is that people should work when they wish to, or when it is their duty, but that they should also have time off. It would not be excessive to have 12 holidays a year rather than the nine or ten presently recognized. Consequently, I have no difficulty with this concept.

There are some who link their opposition to this proposal with our present economic difficulties and they tend to think its adoption would present difficulties for business. Several years ago a survey was made with respect to employees under federal jurisdiction. It showed that most of such employees in Canada already enjoyed more days off than were designated in legislation. That was in 1973. In other words, we are merely establishing a minimum by what we propose to do here because employees are already receiving more days than are prescribed by statute, so the number of holidays will not necessarily increase. At the time of the survey, 95 per cent of employees had nine or more general holidays when only eight were required by legislation. Some 72 per cent had ten holidays, at least two more than legislation at the time required. This is an indication that the business community does recognize that holidays make an essential contribution to work. I hope that once our temporary economic difficulties are over the government will recover its courage and proceed with this bill immediately. I hope this will come about early in the next parliament.

Another type of argument is used—I do not think it is one which will stir the country. There has been a feeling expressed in committee that the government might use its unilateral proclamation power to vary the focal point of the celebration each year, misusing the discretion given to it for its own purposes, and that this would be divisive. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that a government which attempted to use tactics of that kind would not profit politically by so doing.

On the other hand, it is quite likely that in the mind of the government there is hesitation about accepting such a power on the ground that it is too weighty a responsibility; in the mind of the public it would be taking responsibility for whatever day is established and nobody else would share it. Well, that is a very good argument, it seems to me, in favour of the government's appointing a public committee. It could be a committee of this House or it could be a committee of citizens, or a combination of both, set up to make recommendations as to what the focal point should be each year. I would suggest that this be done on an annual basis, without making too many decisions far in advance. This should not arouse selfish instincts because as long as the country and the world continue there will be a succession of opportunities to name a day, and a group which does not get the year it desires recognized in terms of its special hero will still have another opportunity the following year. So it is not a question of the government ever having to say no. The government merely has to say: You have to wait a bit longer until your subject matter is recommended by the advisory committee.

The advantage of having this power of proclamation lies in the opportunity it affords to recognize the richness of our country. Canada is a country with so many cultures that we have been able to adopt an official policy of multiculturalism which states there is no official culture, that the earlier notion that there was such a thing as biculturalism in Canada was a mistaken one, and that while we think about bilingualism we now couple this not with biculturalism but with multiculturalism. We recognize all these cultures and their contribution to the present and the future and, indeed, to the past of our country.

This power of designation by government on the recommendation of public spirited citizens and parliamentarians, coupled with the ability to issue stamps and coins and all the things which would help Canadians to recognize aspects of their life together, seems to me to be an immensely useful one. Even if you look at it from the point of view of historical discoverers, or if you look at it from the point of view of immigrant groups, on however you look at it, there are just so many aspects of our national heritage to be recognized that you can think of a century of subjects to be recognized without having to sit down for more than three or four minutes.

There is no trouble about arriving at aspects of our national life which we want to celebrate. So this power of designating those aspects, of giving a little special recognition to them from time to time, is very important. It could make an enormous contribution to our life as a society. So I would hope that when the government does again embrace this initiative, or if it is prepared to support my bill, the power to designate the aspect of the holiday will be embodied in the legislation.

I just want to say in conclusion that the genesis of this bill suggests that it should not be a matter of partisan strife. There is, I believe, a genuine national consensus on the need for such a holiday. The only real dispute among most ordinary Canadians has to do with when it should be each year. That is a fortunate position for a parliament to be in, to be able to take an initiative which is so generally acceptable to the people, and I urge that this step be taken very soon.

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I am proud and honoured to follow a fellow Islander, the hon. member who has just spoken, a very distinguished parliamentarian and a one-time opponent of mine in a general election.

Mr. MacGuigan: I would rather forget about that!

Mr. Macquarrie: A few years ago the Liberal party in Prince Edward Island thought it should scour the highways and byways to get a more highly educated man than Macquarrie. It discovered the hon. gentleman, whose erudition and education I salute and respect. I look upon him as one of the most distinguished Islanders of this generation or any other following a very distinguished and honourable family in our province.

I want to say, too, that I have the greatest respect for what he has done in the course of his duty as committee chairman. He has brought broadmindedness and, generally, an apolitical attitude toward some very important issues facing the Canadian people and parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macquarrie: It is not for me to give advice to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in the twilight of my political career, but if I were forced to do so I would say this to him. The people of Windsor and many hundreds of thousands of Canadians cannot understand why the hon. gentleman is not in the cabinet.

● (1622)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macquarrie: He has abilities and capabilities to spare, once you even him up with the present members. That is the only nasty thing I will say. It is not meant to be nasty; it is a tribute to my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island, and if the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) takes that advice and my party loses ground, then we will charge it up to my professorial rather than my political posture.

I am very pleased with the leadership the hon. member has given to this matter, and I am very disheartened by what the government has done about it. In my couple of decades here I have noted that there is a great tendency on the part of this government, if there is something developed by a private member which wins acceptance in parliament or in the country, immediately to cut off that initiative of the private member and to produce a bill.

I remember that time after time my very dear friend the Liberal member for Cochrane (Mr. Stewart) produced bills to get the likenesses of Canadian prime ministers on the currency of our country. God help us, it is nearly time that that was done. He also introduced a bill to get the flag of Canada into this chamber. His bills were always talked out or ignored. I was sitting in the House when the then minister of finance stood up without even consulting the hon. member for Cochrane and said that the government would bring out an issue of currency with Laurier on the five dollar bill and John A. Macdonald on the ten. I think that is very suitable because when you buy a bottle of rum, you need a ten dollar bill, and I always use a John A. Macdonald bill. I think I am being very historic as well as gustatorily correct. I am told Borden is on the one hundred dollar bill—I have not seen one—and that Mackenzie King is on the fifty. We should have done that long ago.

We Canadians have been reluctant to let our Canadianism show. I went to school in the United States in grade one. Perhaps that is where I went astray. Abe Lincoln was there, and George Washington was there. I was taught exactly how to salute the flag, what to do with my hand and what words to say, and I can say them yet. But will we give John A. Macdonald credit? Will we give Laurier a chance? Will we honour Borden? Will we respectfully give credit to the great men who brought into being a great country?

I have studied—and the hon. member is a great scholar—the nation builders of the world. I have taught in university about Cavour, Mazzini, Bismarck and all the rest of them. But our founding fathers do not have to take second place to any statesmen in the world.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macquarrie: The task which faced Macdonald, Brown, Cartier and McGee was enormously difficult. The challenge was tremendous and horrendous, but they overcame it. I often say, and I am sure my hon. friend agrees with me, that we are unworthy successors if we allow what those men created to disappear. Surely to God on this St. Patrick's Day—that Scottish born saint whom we all honour—we must realize that bringing this country into being was far more difficult than keeping it together in a time of advanced communication. In 1864—and it is wonderful that I am following the hon. member because Canada began in Charlottetown, the cradle of confederation—the problems of communication and transportation were enormous and difficult. The people did not know one another. It was reported in a very distinguished Nova Scotia newspaper that maritimers did not know many Canadians, and the few they did know they did not like.

However, it took people like Macdonald and Brown to build Canada. Brown even started to drink during his visit to Charlottetown. We are very proud of that. He had quite a good time. He probably relaxed for the first time in his life. All these people decided that the ideal of the country was very important. Yet we are reluctant to honour Macdonald. We are reluctant to have likenesses of these men on our coins. We are totally unmindful of Cartier. Having studied a good deal of history I often wonder what might have happened had Macdonald died before Cartier and Cartier had become the leader of our party. If that had happened, today we would be what I think we should be, the favourites of the province of Quebec. However, that did not happen. These men were great figures. Only recently have we even mustered up the courage to put on the stamps of the nation the likenesses of wonderful men like Mr. Pearson, Mr. St. Laurent and a man I did not like very much but admired greatly, Mr. Bennett. These people were leaders. I thought that the hon. member who has just spoken did an excellent job in integrating all our various interests.

For 15 years I have been pleading in this House for a day to remember John A. Macdonald, the father of our country. He was the outstanding architect of Confederation. He was not the only one, but the outstanding one. In consultation with the hon. member I was prepared to forget that John A. was born on January 11, which is a rather bad time, ten days after New Year's Day. John A. was a Scotsman. He knew all about hogmanay. It took him about ten days to recover. We were prepared to move it on into February. We talked it over with the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) who—please, God—may be Minister of Finance before the year is out, and we all agreed. There was a very good discussion and a consensus in the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs which, if I am right, was then chaired by His Honour Mr. Speaker. That, in my judgment, was parliament working at its best. It is unfortunate that here today there is not a single cabinet minister I can address this remark to, but I think it behooves the executive to note occasionally the consensus and the will of the people's representatives.

I think it was quite unbecoming, improper and unnecessary for the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts) to pre-empt the hon. member and the rest of us, and even more unbecoming, if I may use that kind of garbled English—and I do not often do that—for him then to renege on his own interference. We do not have the holiday. We have put the consensus of parliament into discard, and that I find totally reprehensible. At a time when it was more important than ever before that this institution be well regarded by the public which it represents, the government did a double disservice not only to the hon. member, to me, to the hon. member for York-Simcoe and to Sir John A. Macdonald, but also to the parliamentary institution itself. For that I think they deserve the harshest condemnation, and I hope they will take advice and not continue this practice which I have indicated. I mentioned the hon. member for Cochrane, but it has happened many times. Perhaps the most important hour in this parliament is the private members' hour, when we do not listen to the orders of our beloved friends, my highly regarded whip on my right and the House leader, and when members who are here because people sent them here decide what they are going to talk about and what they are going to say. Because representative government is older than responsible government, I think the emphasis should be on that private members' hour.

The learned and hon. member who has just spoken rendered a great service by making a good, earnest and sensitive representation on behalf of people. He is a very courageous committee chairman. He is sensitive to very hot public issues, if I may say so. I applaud him for his leadership.

I never make long speeches. Perhaps my speeches are longer than I think. I believe I am to be followed by the venerable hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). He is the chancellor of an outstanding university which has still not offered me a degree. As a Scot, I can say that I am proud we gave the Irish St. Patrick. I am very mindful of where my strength came from. I remember the many Irish Prince Edward Islanders who voted for me over the years. I was happy to have an opportunity to follow my fellow islander, the distinguished hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan). I am happy to support him in his endeavours to establish a national heritage day.

I am not afraid Canada will fall apart if another holiday is celebrated. Is our economy so frail? Are our people so weak? Are things so bad that if one more holiday occurs, the entire country will go to hell? I cannot believe it. I am interested in greater productivity during working days. I discount the days people do not work. There is no reason why a highly developed country like Canada, with its advanced technology and albeit lousy government, cannot afford a holiday every month.

We must celebrate and honour our native people. We must honour discovery day. We must honour Sir John A. Macdonald. Then we can honour Sir Wilfred Laurier, Sir Robert Borden and even Mackenzie King, God forgive me. There have been many tremendous Canadians. There was Dr. Wilder Penfield, who was probably one of the ablest and most brilliant men the world ever produced. There was Dr. Bethune. Also there is Dr. McClure, who is still living. He was the former moderator of the United Church of Canada. There are scores of people who should be honoured by us for one day. We should stand aside and honour these people who make up our heritage.

If I were greedy and wanted to use up more time, I could name many people. I could talk about Senator Cairine Wilson, Nellie McClung, C. G. D. Roberts, the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield), C. D. Howe, Charles Tupper, M. J. Coldwell and J. S. Woodsworth. It would be exciting, imaginative and valuable to have a national heritage day. As was suggested by the hon. member, from year to year a Canadian could be chosen to receive honour. We could survive for 100 years and not be required to use the same list twice. I will not live for 100 years, because I am too intemperate.

While I condemn the government for its niggardly action and their even more reprehensible reaction, I commend and support the measure before the House.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the quality of debate that we have on Friday afternoons leads me to make the suggestion that perhaps we should use the power of parliament to declare five days of the week to be Friday. We could have delightful debates. Today we passed two or three bills. Perhaps everything would become better and more productive around here if every sitting day was a Friday.

After listening to two Prince Edward Islanders speaking with their usual modesty, I confess I began to wonder what right a Canadian from another part of the country might have to take part in this debate. But I realized I could boast of my New Brunswick and Nova Scotian ancestry. That gets me into the picture.

Also I noticed that this is a day of accolades. They are being handed out all over the place. I want to join in on some of them. Before I join in on the accolades to the living, I should like to indicate that I enjoyed the manner in which the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) referred to great names in Canadian history. He started away back in our history and got to the era of Borden. Then he picked up with Bennett, but he missed one in between. The second time around, he decided that he should mention Mackenzie King in order to save his soul.

An hon. Member: Mackenzie King probably heard him!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes, probably he was heard. I join with the hon. member for Hillsborough in paying tribute to the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan) in connection with his persistence regarding this bill asking for a national heritage day. I am sure all members of the House would join with me in paying tribute as well to the hon. member for Hillsborough for the 21 years of service he has given to parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): He has decided that what he has done is enough at least for now. His presence in the House of Commons has been enjoyed very much. The students who will sit in front of him in Mount Allison University will indeed be fortunate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Returning to the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville and this bill, it strikes me there is a double significance about it. I support the hon. member for Hillsborough by saying that consideration should be given to it. As the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville pointed out, his bill represents a consensus or a bringing together of the ideas of several hon. members. Perhaps more than any private member's bill that has been before parliament in a long time, it is not just one member's bill. As I say, it is before us as a result of several bills having been introduced.

The hon. member for Hillsborough presented a bill to honour Sir John A. Macdonald. As was mentioned before, Mr. Ed Nelson presented one as well. In fact there were four or five, including one of my own. I was calling for a holiday in February, midway between Christmas and Easter, by whatever name it might be called. All these bills got to committee. It was in committee that the idea to combine them was developed. Thus, this bill comes before us. It is not just the product of the thinking of the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville, but it is the combined thinking of several private members from all parties. I wish we could get around to passing this piece of legislation. I see no reason why this bill could not be passed today, so that it can go to committee.

I will not take the time of the House to go into arguments concerning economic restraint and productivity. Those who argue that we need more work and that people must be more productive surely will not follow that to its logical conclusion and indicate that we should cancel the holidays we now have. We have a number of holidays during the year because we believe people are more productive if they have a bit of time off. I suggest an extra day off in the long winter in Canada between Christmas and Easter would be a good idea. I support the bill on that count, and I also support it very strongly for the reasons presented by the two previous speakers, namely that we do have a heritage in this country which we should celebrate and talk about, and that we should tell our people about. I think that on every count we ought to have this day.

Having said that in the friendly fashion that develops here on Friday afternoons, I think I must also join in the criticism levelled on the government by the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville, and which was levelled even more strongly by the hon. member for Hillsborough, for not having proceeded with it. Originally it was a private member's idea, or the idea of several private members.

The bill in the name of the member for Windsor-Walkerville, two or three years ago, did not get through, and then the government took it up. In the session previous to this one it had two bills; Bill C-30 and C-32. Bill C-30 was to establish a national heritage day as one of the national holidays of this country, and Bill C-32 amended the Canada Labour Code in respect of what was to happen on certain holidays. Private members can put bills down year after year and know they may have to wait twenty, thirty or forty years before getting them through; but when the government makes it a matter of government policy and puts it down, that is a declaration of what the government wants. For the government to have backed away from that in the last session I think was reprehensible, particularly so because it had taken the idea away from private members.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): This session when we thought that last session's Bill C-30 or Bill C-32, or both of them, would be brought back again we were told by the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts) that this was not to be done. I think this is most unfortunate. I suppose it is too much to hope that my friend's bill will get passed, but I would rather see this bill passed than the government's bill because it does represent the thinking and the ideas of private members. If that cannot be done, I hope it will not be long before this kind of legislation is passed and the third Monday of February becomes national heritage day.

There is one other element about this that disturbs me. Four or five years ago when this matter was under very active consideration and it looked as though it would pass, Mr. Justice Emmett Hall settled a railway dispute, and part of that settlement was that when the parliament of Canada passed a bill for heritage day that would be an additional holiday for railway workers. Those railway workers feel they have been short changed very seriously by the fact that such a bill has not been passed, and now once each year for three or four years they have lost a holiday they thought was included in the award of Mr. Justice Hall.

There is more that could be said, Mr. Speaker, but I had better sit down so I will not be part of the process of talking this bill out. So far here we are: we are unanimous and everybody seems to be in a good mood, so let us pass this bill this afternoon.

Mr. F. A. Philbrook (Halton): Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, for the privilege of speaking today on Bill C-234, an act respecting national heritage day. Unlike some of my colleagues, I will be very, very brief, not only because I have to catch a plane back to Oakville, but because most of the major points have been expressed very eloquently so far and, most important of all, because I want to see this bill passed and not talked out.

Let me congratulate and support very strongly the sponsor of this bill, my colleague the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan). As has been said, it seems to me the main objection thrown up time and time again to this bill is that in hard economic terms it would badly influence or take away from the productivity of this country. That is a spurious argument. In fact, being the only holiday during the hardest time in the Canadian year, the hardest part of winter, it would lend itself to many strong arguments as to why it would improve on the productivity of this country. If in fact it would make people less productive or would take away from our work output, then we should be doing away with the holidays we have so far. We should be doing away with weekends off. We should be doing away with the whole principle and practice of coffee breaks, all of which is obviously ridiculous.

To close on a positive note, this holiday would be good for the productivity of this country, contrary to what others have said. Surely the most important thing we can do at this time in our history, with issues, worries and anxieties about major things like national unity and our economy, both of which are often overplayed, is to have this holiday to remind ourselves of what a great country this really is.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I want to rise for just a few moments as this may be one of the last times we will have the opportunity of hearing the voice of the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) in the House of Commons. That hon. member has become known throughout the world as a proponent of heritage and as an authority on the early history of our country. He has become what I would like to call an ornament in parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): When he takes his leave of us this institution will have lost one of its richest assets.

I want to speak for a moment as the House leader of the Progressive Conservative party, and I hope the House will allow me to do so during the private members' hour. There will be other tributes paid to the hon. member, but there will be no tribute more sincere than mine on behalf of all my colleagues in parliament for the contribution he has made to the thought and political processes of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): It is not just to this country that he has confined his duties. The hon. member for Hillsborough is known throughout the world as a man of great conviction, a man of great eloquence and a man with a tremendous sense of compassion and concern for his fellow man, whatever be the colour, creed, race or religion of that man.

I should say as the House leader of the official opposition that we as a party, his province, his parliament and his country would be richer were he to change his mind and stay.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Private members' hour is devoted to the business of those of us who were elected but do not hold an executive function in the government of Canada or a position recognized in our constitution. The House leader of the official opposition and the House leader of the NDP hold positions different from that of the Leader of the Opposition. As a result, the rules pertaining to the private members' hour do not bar House leaders from participating.

When a House leader rises in his place he does not necessarily speak for his party. Like other members of the House, he can also speak for himself. It is in that way that I want to speak for just a few minutes regarding this piece of legislation.

The hon. member for Hillsborough has given us a lesson today that we ought not to forget. We ought not to distort our history and we ought not to take away from the richness of our heritage by our petty squabbling. If Sir John A. Macdonald and Sir George-Étienne Cartier had concentrated on those things that made them different one from the other, we would not have a country. We would not have this parliament.

• (1652)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): If we had relied on referendums in those days to decide whether or not we would have a Canada, we would not have had a Canada. The maritime provinces would have said no to confederation to begin with, and I dare say there would have been others who would have said no as well. The creation of this country and the fact that it has existed for 110 years was not an act of referendum. It was an act of statescraft and great men, who were bigger than themselves, who were prepared to sit down and discuss the country despite their differences, and were prepared to say that there is something worth while to be done, some good reason for us to build together a nation in the northern half of North America. That is why we are here as a nation.

If we can accept that spirit, somehow or other we will remain a nation. Because a nation is more than bricks and mortar and plants and highways. There is the matter of spirit in a country. Without assessing blame today, we have lost that spirit in Canada. It is not dead, it is just lost for a while. It has not flickered out, it has been dimmed. I think our heritage is important to us, and we ought to recognize it not just in terms of a holiday—even though that idea is not offensive to me—but in terms of those who have gone before and on whose greatness we are building so that we can make our country more united.

I say those words in tribute to the hon. member for Hillsborough because throughout his parliamentary career that is what he has tried to do. I think parliament is richer for his presence today, and when he is gone its poverty to the extent of his leaving will be felt by all of us.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I am proud to join today in the tribute that has been paid by my friend and my neighbour, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) to a great Canadian and Parliamentarian, I suppose in this place the first parliamentarian. He is one of the most eloquent men here, and he has made our chamber and our political process a richer thing by his presence.

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I too want to make a few remarks with regard to Bill C-32—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Bill C-234.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Bill C-234, I am sorry, Mr. Speaker. I must be suffering from dyslexia today.

Before going directly to the bill, I would like to add my voice to those who have already expressed to the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) their very good wishes for when he retires from politics and goes back to the academic life. I am pleased that he will be taking up residence in my native province. I am also pleased to know that he will be taking up residence in an area whre my party is strong, and he will probably have little political influence. I hope, however, that he has a great influence—and I know he will—on those who enter his classroom and who partake of his wisdom. I wish him well.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): It has been noted already that the quality of debate seems to be better in this chamber on Fridays, and I am not sure why that is. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has suggested that we pass a bill here declaring all days to be Friday for the purpose of debate. I think that might be a good idea because on at least two days this week the opposition parties in this House tried to give us heritage day without passing a bill. Maybe that would get rid of these silly motions to adjourn the House which waste our time.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): I also want to differ a bit with my hon. friend from Hillsborough in taking credit for Scotland for producing St. Patrick. He is known as a scholar, and I hesitate to argue with him on this point, but the research I have done on this venerable man—I am referring to St. Patrick, not the hon. member for Hillsborough—indicates he was born in France. It makes no great deal of difference to me, since some of my ancestors came from France, some came from Scotland and some came from Ireland. I am one of those people who is a mixture.

I think it is important, Mr. Speaker, when speaking to this bill dealing with our national heritage that we mention, even if briefly, that such a day as national heritage day might move Canadians to call to mind the contribution that has been made to this country by our native people, by the Indians and the Inuit. Perhaps that would serve as a point of focus to bring the culture and heritage of those people more to the minds of other Canadians. It would certainly be advantageous for the country.

I support the idea of a national heritage day, but I wonder if declaring a holiday is the proper way to do it. I wonder whether, Mr. Speaker, if in the classrooms of this nation on a designated day all the teachers of this nation were to spend that day developing projects looking back into history, showing films or slide presentations, or having the students themselves develop ideas on the heritage of Canada—on the great people to whom the hon. member for Hillsborough referred, and others whom time does not permit mentioning here today—that would not do more to focus attention on the richness, the wealth and the diversity of the heritage that is ours. Therefore, I question the validity of making the day a holiday.

I am also wondering if this in fact is an appropriate time, in view of the difficult economic situation in which we in Canada find ourselves at the moment—

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

MIDDLE EAST—CANADIAN PEACEKEEPING FORCE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to ask for the unanimous consent of the House on a motion relating to a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the resolution passed yesterday by the Security Council of the United Nations proposing a UN force to confirm an Israeli withdrawal from southern Lebanon and supervise a ceasefire, thus leading to the demilitarized character of the area, I move, seconded by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker):

That this House advise the Canadian government of its support for the UN resolution; and calls upon the government to indicate to the United Nations its readiness to send an appropriate number of Canadian troops to a mission that would be clearly defined as peacekeeping between the Palestinians and the Israelis in an effort to build the conditions for permanent peace in the Middle East.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 43, presentation of such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The Prime Minister said no.

Mr. Trudeau: I said no, yes.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I wanted to identify him.

STATUS OF WOMEN

GOVERNMENT URGED TO END DISCRIMINATION AGAINST WOMEN IN WORK FORCE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 43 on a matter of pressing and urgent necessity relating to the discriminatory tax laws against the increasing number of married women who work full time on unincorporated family farms, fishing operations and small businesses.

In view of the fact that a proposal to redress this inequity was included in a series of amendments on women's rights put forward recently by this party, which members of the government rejected in total while showing some sympathy for this particular proposal, and in order to give the House an opportunity to address itself to that specific proposal, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald):

That the government immediately act to end such discrimination by developing policies to encourage women's participation in unincorporated family farms and business by allowing the deduction of salaries paid to spouses.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 43, presentation of such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

INCREASE IN UNEMPLOYMENT RATE FOR WOMEN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that labour force statistics released a few days ago reflected a further increase in the unemployment rate for women reaching an official level of 10.1 per cent, or 412,000, and considering the unofficial rate of unemployment for women has now reached 16.8 per cent, or 740,000, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House urges the government to bring in, as part of an over-all new package to deal with our unemployment crisis, specific measures to change this discriminatory situation for Canadian women.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for discussion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE CONSTITUTION

PROPOSED ADOPTION OF NEW CONSTITUTION ASSURING EQUAL RIGHTS AND PRIVILEGES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I consider this day, March 20, 1978, an historic day for Canada.

Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion on an important and urgent matter.

Since, for the future of Canada, it is essential that parliament recognize that all Canadians, whether from the east or from the west, have equal rights and obligations as well as their own particular responsibilities, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette):

That every single Canadian, regardless of the ethnic group to which he belongs, be recognized as having the same rights and privileges as all Canadian citizens, as of the day a new constitution is passed by the Canadian parliament after being duly recommended by the provinces and the Canadian people, following a referendum held on that new constitution and approved by the majority of Canadians, which constitution will in fact be a truly Canadian constitution for our country, Canada, as well as the creed of all Canadians, regardless of their ethnic origin.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, such a motion cannot be put without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

COMMITTEE OF MEDICAL MEN TO STUDY ALLEGED FORGETFULNESS OF CABINET MEMBERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the discovery of a substance called choline which is supposed to perform miraculous cures for senility and loss of memory, as noted in recent publications describing the work of Douglas Hospital's geriatric division, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Halton-Wentworth (Mr. Kempling):

That this House form a select committee of qualified medical practitioners, of whom there are several in this august chamber, to administer choline pills to the Prime Minister and those of his cabinet who have demonstrated great difficulty and, in some cases, a complete inability in recalling matters relating to so-called national security matters, income tax, immigration, dredging, nuclear exports, finance—indeed, those matters which in lieu of a meaningful freedom of information act they would ordinarily be expected to recall for the edification of the House and the people of Canada.

[Mr. Speaker.]

CANADIAN RADIO-TELEVISION COMMISSION

PROTEST AGAINST WITHDRAWAL OF SERVICES FROM CHURCHILL, MAN.—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Cecil Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact the CRTC found adequate grounds and funds for establishing CBC French television services in the community of Flin Flon, which has only 275 French speaking persons out of a total population of 9,345, and in The Pas, which has a French speaking population of 310 out of a total population of 6,095, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta):

That this government urge the CRTC to revoke their decision allowing CBC English radio to withdraw station services from Churchill, Manitoba, a community of some 1,600 people.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for discussion at this time, pursuant to Standing Order 43, can be done only with unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

MIDDLE EAST—CANADIAN PEACEKEEPING FORCE

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister. At the beginning, I must express my regret that the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs denied, once again, the right of the Parliament of Canada to become involved in a very important matter relating to external affairs when they uttered "no" to the resolution introduced under Standing Order 43.

I now ask the Prime Minister, as head of the Government of Canada, whether the government will support in a practical way the Security Council resolution of yesterday by making Canadian troops available to serve on the proposed United Nations' interim force in Lebanon.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, if I may answer that question by the hon. Leader of the Opposition, in the first instance, I should emphasize to him that had there been consultation in advance on the particular motion which he put, I would have been more than pleased, and the government would have been more than pleased, to devise mutually acceptable wording after we had had an opportunity to brief the hon. Leader of the Opposition on the circumstances that exist at the present time.

The position at the moment is that we have repeated our agreement in principle to participate in the peace-keeping force agreed to by the Security Council on Saturday. The problem at the moment without going beyond that is; first of all, we have not been asked; second, there are a number of questions with regard to the details of the mandate.

As I told the right hon. member for Prince Albert on Friday, we wish to be very sure that if Canadians are going to be used in this operation, they are going to be in as secure a position as possible under the circumstances and, also, that they will have the capability of carrying out that mandate. This is now being discussed in the Security Council at the United Nations. The next 24 hours or so should see the situation clarified. We will then be in a better position to decide whether we have the capability to carry out any task that may be asked of us.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is to the Prime Minister. I must preface it by expressing regret that the government cannot learn to work within the rules of parliament and to discuss and respond to public business in the House of Commons. Can the Prime Minister advise whether the Government of Canada has received reasonable assurance that Israel is prepared to accept all of the provisions of the Security Council resolution?

Mr. Jamieson: At the moment, Mr. Speaker, the answer is no. This is one of the reasons we are not prepared at this time to make a positive and specific commitment even if asked, which I again emphasize we have not been. We have only heard from Prime Minister Begin in his statement upon arrival in the United States and from general assurances by various spokesmen within Israel that they are prepared to co-operate, although they have expressed very strong reservations about the efficacy of such a force.

Under these circumstances, therefore, we are waiting, as indeed are other members of the Security Council, for a categorical declaration by Israel that it is prepared to accept the ceasefire, and also that it is prepared to answer the United Nations Security Council demand for an immediate withdrawal from Lebanon.

Mr. Clark: My supplementary is to the Prime Minister, as the head of the Government of Canada. In the event that Canada does receive, and decides to accept, an invitation to be part of that peacekeeping force, would it be the intention of the Government of Canada to use Canadian troops which are presently with the United Nations disengagement observer force? Can the Prime Minister, as the head of the Government of Canada, advise whether that can be done without jeopardizing the strength of the mission on the Golan Heights?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, that is one of the forces we have in place there at the present time. The task has not been defined. We are looking at our capability, depending on what the request is from the United Nations.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, my final supplementary question is to the Prime Minister, as the head of the government. In considering its response to this Security Council resolution, is the Government of Canada considering proposing any time limit upon the commitment of Canada's contribution and, if so, what would that time limit be?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Jamieson: May I say in answer to this particular ploy on the part of the Leader of the Opposition that if he would allow some of his colleagues to participate, we might get better questions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jamieson: The time limit as proposed for the Lebanon force has been a matter of six months. That is the time that is stated in the resolution. There is, however, a prior suggestion, namely, for a two-week involvement by existing forces in the area, particularly those of Sweden and Austria, and possibly others, which would move in on a preliminary basis to more or less pave the way for the larger and more permanent force. It is anticipated that this would involve a period of two weeks. It is in that connection that a tentative proposal has been put forward for Canadian logistical support, from forces now on the ground in the Middle East, for that particular movement.

● (1422)

It is this complex of proposals which, I emphasize once again, is taking some time to clarify and that is the reason why it is not possible at this time to state with precision what the involvement of Canada is going to be.

POSSIBLE HARASSMENT OF PEACEKEEPING FORCES BY PLO

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. If Israel disengages, what assurances would be forthcoming from the forces to the north of the disengagement area? The PLO is not recognized, and Lebanon seems unable to guarantee the situation in that area, so the peacekeeping forces might well find themselves harassed and engaged by the PLO or their friends. What assurance is there that they will be controllable by the peacekeeping forces?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, that is the most sensible question asked this afternoon. It makes, by the way, a total mockery of the motion originally introduced by the Leader of the Opposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jamieson: It is precisely because such questions have not been answered that we are reluctant to commit Canadian forces to what could be a very precarious situation. That is why the resolution was not acceptable to this side of the House. It ought not to have been put in the way it was by the Leader of the Opposition and supported by the right hon. member for Prince Albert.

To answer the hon. member's question, this is one of the matters we are now seeking to have clarified, that is, what acceptance will there be by the PLO of the legitimacy and the rights of whatever peacekeeping force is put in place, so that there will not be attempted incursions by the PLO who might disregard the peacekeeping forces. There is also the question of what is described as the so-called Arab peacekeeping force, the Syrians to the north of the red line on the Litani River. Once these matters are resolved, it will be easier to reach a final decision.

Mr. McKinnon: It takes a considerable length of time to get these questions through when the minister sees fit to indulge in political argument in the middle of his answers.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McKinnon: Can the minister tell the House whether we are offering logistic troops, administrative troops and combat troops—the whole lot—if they want them, or whether we have restricted our offer to logistic troops only? At the same time, would the hon. gentleman undertake to come before parliament for approval of the Canadian contribution before troops are finally committed in this area?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, to be precise, we are not offering anything at the moment. All we have said is that we are prepared to make a contribution if it is deemed we have the capability to do so. Again, it is for the reasons the hon. gentleman outlined that we have adopted this stance. If, for example, our role is to be largely logistical, we would have to examine that request in light of the responsibilities we now have in Ismailia and on the Golan Heights. We could not substantially expand our logistical support beyond that at the present time.

One of the suggestions I have made, with the concurrence of my colleague, the Minister of National Defence—and one which the United Nations has accepted—is that the whole program be examined in light of an over-all theatre approach. In other words, there would be some co-ordination between the new force and those already in place on the Golan and in the Sinai. If that were to be done, it is quite possible the Canadian logistical capability might be of some value in that kind of context. Once again, I think it important to re-emphasize that the decision was made only yesterday. This is an enormously complex and precarious kind of situation, and we want to be very sure before making any long-term or permanent commitment.

EMPLOYMENT

REPORTED UNDERREPRESENTATION OF WOMEN IN CANADA MANPOWER TRAINING PROGRAMS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, whatever one might say about the questions which are being asked, the answers are certainly getting longer, if not better. I would like to direct my question to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. He will recall that two weeks ago my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, asked whether he had received the report of the Advisory Council on the Status of Women which, among other things, indicated that women in Canada Manpower training programs are underrepresented in apprenticeship and skill training programs. At the same time, the report pointed out that sex stereotyping is still practised by Manpower centres in many parts of the country, so that women are underrepresented in courses for managerial and administrative positions. In light of that, has the minister in the last couple of weeks had a chance to read this important report and, if so, has he acted upon it, particularly with reference to these central concerns which are expressed?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, first I should like to welcome back the leader of the New Democratic Party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cullen: I am pleased to see him looking so well. I might indicate, with tongue in cheek, that he might have got his hernia from carrying around the inflated statistics he throws at me every once in a while.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cullen: In more serious vein, I did in fact read the report referred to by the hon. member. The statistics are not quite in line with those we have in our department. In language and upgrading courses, the percentages of women were 54.6 per cent and 54.8 per cent. In basic training and skill development, we spent about $123 million: about $68 million of that was spent on women. In language courses, $15 million of $28 million was spent on women. In skill training, the figure was $85 million of $213 million. I agree with the statistics in the report with regard to the apprenticeship program, where we spent close to $80 million but only about $2.5 million on women.

I am not certain whether that is because women were not applying, or because they were taking the wrong attitude toward the apprenticeship program; but that area does warrant looking into.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, if the minister reads the report, he will find it was not because women were not applying for courses in these areas; it was because of the attitudes being taken by officials in terms of not encouraging women to go into these kinds of training programs. Perhaps he will check that out.

I would like to ask the minister a second question which is directly related to women and the Canadian economy. The minister will recall that in a recent statement he prepared for members of the Liberal caucus, he implied that unemployment among Canadian women does not really matter because, to use his phrase, they are, in the main, secondary members of the labour force. Since that incorrect statement was made some time ago in a report to the Liberal caucus and it was brought to the attention of the House in debate just a short time ago, has the minister had time to consider the fact that about 40 per cent of the Canadian labour force is made up of women?

Has the minister considered that almost half of that 40 per cent are the heads of single-parent families and are working as a matter of necessity? If so, will he take this opportunity to correct the incorrect information he passed on to the Liberal caucus and to make it clear to the people of Canada, particularly Canadian women, that they have the same rights in the economy as men?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, the only error is the interpretation the hon. member has placed on that particular statement. The statement indicated that we were comparing unemployment statistics in the present situation and in the 1960s with the situation in the depression years. We indicated that because of unemployment insurance and other programs, and the fact that many of the people who were laid off were actually secondary and tertiary earners, that did not have the same impact as it did in the thirties.

However, we were not suggesting that many secondary and, for that matter, tertiary wage earners do not have to work for room and board and a decent standard of living. We were not suggesting that it was not important, but simply that the impact today is not the same as it was in the thirties.

● (1432)

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, considering the fact that the families of almost half the married women who are working would be at the poverty level in Canada without those incomes, and considering that this is an important part of the Canadian economy, does the minister not realize the type of statement he made before the Liberal caucus, which implies something to the contrary, really constitutes a discriminatory statement in its implications about Canadian women and the important roles they play for their families in the economy?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, no one, least of all this particular minister, would underestimate the importance of a secondary wage earner. In 40, 50, 60 or, for that matter, 100 per cent of the cases they are out working because they want to work. In many instances they are out working because they have to. I have never downgraded that. Simply, I point out in that statement, in comparing it to the thirties, that there were wage earners in families plus the other assistances which were available: it did not have as dramatic an effect as it had in the thirties. That was the sole point. To suggest that it is improper, not right, or is not damaging for women not to be in the work force is just a misinterpretation of what is in that report. I gather the hon. member has a copy; I did not know he came that close to the Liberal caucus.

NATIONAL UNITY

REQUEST FOR MEASURES TO FAVOUR EXCHANGE BETWEEN FRANCOPHONES AND ANGLOPHONES

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister and deals with the young people of Canada.

As I said recently in a motion, there is deep unrest between Francophones and Anglophones and since there is hardly any communication between both groups, it is easy to understand the differences of opinion between them. Given Canada's large deficit due to money spent abroad by Canadians, which ran to something like $1.7 billion in 1977-78, and also given that Canadians would find it highly profitable to know better their fellow citizens of different language and various parts of the country, which would eliminate the unrest which causes the gap between French-speaking and English-speaking Canadians who obviously do not know enough about each other, would the right hon. Prime Minister tell the House whether his government intends to bring in a new policy or new youth exchange programs, especially as far as university students are concerned, in order to increase the number of exchanges between young Canadians from coast to coast?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is clear that the federal government believes in these exchanges since we already have a very large number of programs to that effect; however, we do not have any new measures or programs to announce at the present time.

Mr. Beaudoin: Mr. Speaker, could the right hon. Prime Minister tell the House whether, given the present circumstances and the discomfort felt, everyone, including older people, he intends to bring in new policies or ideas to express at last the wishes of the federal government towards a better understanding in the country?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member will remember that several months ago we had a debate on this subject. We also established a commission to report on this, and the Robarts-Pepin inquiry commision went all over the country. They heard many representations on this subject. So we are waiting for an interim report and a possible report which we shall be able to discuss in parliament.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REPRESENTATIONS TO USSR RESPECTING EMIGRATION OF SOVIET NATIONALS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I ask him whether recently—I mean, within the last three or four weeks—the Government of Canada has been in touch with the Soviet Union asking the permission of that country to give unhampered immigration to all who have committed no crime to the state but foresee in the Soviet Union a life of intolerable discrimination.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure of the precise wording of the right hon. member's question. For example, my colleague, the Minister of State for Multiculturalism, met with the Soviet ambassador at Belgrade about two weeks ago, at which time it sounds to me that the representations made to the ambassador were essentially along the lines referred to by the right hon. member.

In any event, I know the burden of his representations was that the Soviets ought to be more forthcoming and prepared to allow the exit from the Soviet Union of persons such as those to whom the right hon. member has referred.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, would the minister indicate what the reaction was? Was it the same attitude of indifference to such representations that the Soviet Union has followed continually over the last seven or eight years?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, the right hon. member might wish to ask a specific question of the Minister of State for Multiculturalism as to what the response was. Upon his return, he advised me that there had been some receptivity, although I gathered from the minister's report to me that it was not something which caused him great jubilation.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I ask the hon. Minister of State for Multiculturalism whether the reply on the part of the U.S.S.R. gave him no cause for jubilation but, rather, one of continued humiliation at the refusal of the U.S.S.R. to act?

Hon. Norman A. Cafik (Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): Mr. Speaker, I had no reason in my trip to Belgrade to be humiliated in any respect whatsoever.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cafik: I made representations to Mr. Vorontsov, who is head of the Soviet delegation to the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe. During that straightforward meeting, I suggested to the ambassador that they give consideration to establishing a more effective mechanism whereby we could deal with human right's violations in that country which were of particular concern to this government. Mr. Vorontsov indicated that he was prepared to make representations to his superiors in Moscow in the hope they would accept a lower level of activity in terms of dealing with it on not so much a government to government relationship, but official to official, in order to cut through the red tape and, hopefully, be able to arrive at a more expeditious treatment of access to travelling from one country to the other. I felt quite pleased at the response he made and hoped that in our discussions later on we would establish such a mechanism which would be beneficial to Canadians and to the human rights issue in the Soviet Union.

STATUS OF WOMEN

DISCRIMINATION AGAINST WOMEN IN CAP PROGRAM

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the minister responsible for the Status of Women. It relates to the obvious difficulties in the Career Assignment Program of the public service. Between 1968 and 1976, only 71 women have participated—which is roughly 10.3 per cent—even though they make up 33 per cent of the labour force in the public service.

In view of the fact that the co-ordinator for the Status of Women, who serves directly under the minister, has indicated to me that the Public Service Commission has found it difficult to obtain even 10 per cent female participation in CAP, and that part of this problem lies with the managers who have the responsibility of recommending women for this program, will the minister describe and indicate, in view of the answer given to me by the chairman of the Public Service Commission, what special measures are being taken to inform women of CAP and what steps are being taken to encourage managers to make use of this program and overcome the very serious discrimination which obviously exists in this important area?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for raising this question again. I have also discussed this matter with senior officials of the Public Service Commission. They pointed out substantially the same problem which has been indicated by the hon. member. I have urged them to take additional and special steps to bring this matter to the attention of the management of the various departments. I have been advised that such steps have already been taken. All the deputy ministers have been advised that the Public Service Commission and the government attach great importance to recruiting and attracting more women to that particular program.

I do not remember if the figure quoted by the hon. member is the exact percentage. The percentage I was given was higher than the one he gave. Nonetheless, the problem remains, whatever the percentage is. During the course of last week, Treasury Board reviewed the various proposals made by the various departments as to the opportunities for women in the public service. It has taken certain decisions which I believe will be of great interest and importance in terms of stimulating even further the opportunities for women in the public service.

The various departments will be informed about those decisions as soon as Treasury Board has processed them.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, first of all, in view of the statement with respect to special measures, I hope the minister can give us a more detailed indication of what these steps by deputy ministers might be, so there can be some real assurance in this area.

● (1442)

Having regard to the further initiatives being taken by Treasury Board covering the employment of women generally in the public service, and the fact that more than 100,000 women are in fact directly concerned or affected by these possible measures, and the annual accounting that has taken place for Treasury Board regarding the equal opportunity program since 1975, on March 8 the minister indicated to me he would give serious consideration to making public those plans presently in effect, plus these additional ones now being implemented by Treasury Board, would the minister now give some clear indication when he will be able to make a public statement on this matter, giving some public indication so we will know that effective steps are, in fact, being taken?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the President of the Treasury Board will want to expand on this. The only thing I can tell the hon. member is that we have, indeed, decided to make these figures available. I understand the President of the Treasury Board is reviewing the appropriate time and method of making them available. This is a matter of compiling and getting the information translated. As far as the availability of the information and the content of the plans of the various departments is concerned, the government has agreed to make the information available on a regular basis as soon as it is available.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact there are new plans which will now be made public, as I understand from the Minister responsible for the Status of Women, and in view of the fact it is not yet clear whether the accounting that has taken place on an annual basis—which has basically been internal up to now, and that is important information in terms of where progress has and has not been made and for what reasons—will also be made public in order that we will have a full picture of what has been happening since we instituted programs in 1975, would the President of the Treasury Board indicate what further measures will obviously be necessary in order to achieve effective opportunities for women in the public service?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, that is under consideration. I will be completing my examination of it in the near future and will advise the hon. member.

Oral Questions

CANADA WORKS PROGRAM

EXTENSION AND FUNDING OF PROGRAM

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. In view of the importance of the Canada Works Program to many communities across the country in the creation of employment and the carrying out of projects, would the minister tell us whether there is going to be a cycle of the program later this summer, what the deadline for applications will be, and how much funding will be provided for this program?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I have written to each member of parliament on the Young Canada Works Program and the date involved. In so far as the Canada Works Program is concerned, applications will be available in April of 1978, and June 24, 1978, is the application deadline. Projects will commence in September.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

AVAILABILITY TO NATIVE WOMEN'S GROUPS OF DOCUMENTS ON HISTORY OF INDIAN ACT

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In view of the fact that the federal government has committed funds to the Indian Rights for Indian Women's Association to research their present status under the Indian Act, especially as it applies to section 10 and section 12(1)(B), I should like to ask what steps the minister is taking to reverse the statements made over the weekend by an employee of the department, Dr. Katie Cooke, to the effect that native women's groups will not be allowed or able to obtain documents on the history of the Indian Act. And will the minister assure the House that the information will be forthcoming to Indian women's groups?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, that appears to me to be a perfectly reasonable request. I will be pleased to look into it. I was not aware of the statement by Dr. Cooke.

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, given the recent statement by the president of the National Indian Brotherhood that the joint cabinet-NIB committee revising the Indian Act is, as he says, "a farce, a process that is simply not working", and given the continuing discriminatory aspects of the present Indian Act—which is a matter of great concern both to the native people and many other Canadians—will the minister say whether this joint committee has yet set a deadline for its reporting procedures, or will it be setting a deadline on when its work shall be completed? Has it considered any kind of mechanism or any interim measures which might be taken until it reports, in order to relieve discriminatory aspects against Indian women?

Mr. Faulkner: Mr. Speaker, I am surprised by the alleged comments of the president of the Indian Brotherhood. He and I have met on several occasions regarding the work of the NIB-cabinet committee. I indicated to him that I want some results from that process by the next full meetings in June. He indicated to me that was his intention as well. We both agreed that progress to date had not been substantial. My intention is to work with him and he, in turn, with the executive council, in an attempt to establish reasonable targets that might emerge at the meetings in June. That is my intention now.

We also indicated to the NIB and members of the executive committee—I say "we" because members of the cabinet participated in that meeting—that we thought, whatever we addressed in respect of amending the Indian Act, the one item that certainly would be part of it even if we did not want it to be part—and we do—is the question affecting the rights of Indian women. They know that. It is on the agenda of the NIB-cabinet committee and I hope to be able to deal with it in June.

CANADIAN HUMAN RIGHTS ACT

DATE OF ESTABLISHMENT OF GUIDELINES UNDER LEGISLATION

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. In view of the fact that even though part I of the Canadian Human Rights Act was proclaimed as at March 1, the provisions of section 11, having to do with equal pay for work of equal value, will not come into effect until the guidelines have been established, can the Minister of Justice undertake that those guidelines will be established not later than June 1?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, section 11 is in effect. That is to say, there is no further action required by the government to proclaim section 11; it has been proclaimed. The Human Rights commission has informed me that it is working on the preparation of guidelines and has a number of committees which have been meeting for some months, as a matter of fact, on the development of guidelines, so that on June 1 it will be able, as a Human Rights commission, to deal with complaints made to it about equal pay for work of equal value.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Justice, although this one may involve the President of the Treasury Board as well? In view of the fact that there seems to be some conflict between clause 6 of Bill C-28, the amendments to the Public Service Staff Relations Act, and the Canadian Human Rights Act, in that the latter act lays down provisions for equal pay for women, will the two ministers look at clause 6 of Bill C-28 to see whether it qualifies under the provisions of the Canadian Human Rights Act and, in fact, whether it qualifies under the Canadian Bill of Rights?

[Miss MacDonald.]

Mr. Basford: Yes, Mr. Speaker, and I suspect we will not have any difficulty in being able to arrange to talk about it.

NATURAL RESOURCES

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL DISCUSSIONS ON EQUITY OF MINING TAX

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Following the Mining Association's suggestion last week that it would like to see a level of taxation for the industry in Canada that is lowered perhaps to 50 per cent initially and, hopefully, to 45 per cent eventually, will the government take the lead in following the suggestion of the association to hold joint meetings among the provincial and federal governments with a view to seeing if there could not be a more equitable tax treatment of our mining companies?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I was not at that particular brief presentation, although afterwards I did meet some of the members of the Mining Association. I reminded them, as I believe the ministers did, that in fact when the first ministers and myself met in the middle of February we agreed that further meetings and work should be done on the tax question regarding the mining industry.

Our point of view—and the House knows it—is that the federal government has not substantially increased its participation in the tax returns, but the provinces have considerably. However, we are prepared to seek some form of accommodation. I assured representatives of the mining industry that we would be following up on decisions taken in February to have further meetings with the provinces. They may have begun, but I would have to have a report from the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Stevens: A supplementary question, again to the Prime Minister. As the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, following the suggestion made by the Mining Association, commented that there may be room for the establishment of still further international mineral cartels, would the Prime Minister indicate if it is government policy to have more international mineral cartels and, if so, have any meetings been held in secret with industry or with other countries with a view to establishing this type of cartel arrangement?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, on the part of the government a position has been taken in the case of the uranium cartel. The hon. member knows something about that. It was that, when we are faced with restrictive competitive positions on the part of other countries, and when these positions of other countries of a cartel-like nature endanger Canadian jobs, we will not, as a matter of principle, hesitate to use our own cartel arrangement. That is the principle of it.

I have no knowledge of any preparation within government to seek any other such cartels, but if we do, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources could certainly point them out.

Mr. Stevens: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, for the Prime Minister. If he learns of any plans to set up another international cartel in any mineral field, would he assure the House that this time they will protect the consumer in Canada against whatever price is dictated by the cartel? In particular, would he indicate how they will protect the Canadian consumer, bearing in mind how the consumer has now been ravaged—certainly in the province of Ontario—as a result of the uranium cartel conspired in by his own government?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, with your permission, I should like to deal with this question. The hon. member has put words into my mouth. I never said anything about creating new international cartels; the hon. member knows that perfectly well. That is a particular technique which he has become famous for, to invent a phrase or take one that someone else uses, and put it in a minister's mouth.

Let me make quite clear what I did say, because I think it is important for the Canadian people. I said that the mining industry—this is what the mining industry has been telling me—has been facing some very serious international questions such as deterioration of international markets. I put it to the mining industry that it would be in the interest of Canada if we were to start some new initiatives with respect to other countries so affected.

It seemed to me that the international negotiations with respect to the copper industry might be something which we could consider in other areas as well. The hon. member is concerned about the industry, and I know that he is also concerned about consumers, but he should recognize that consumers are also workers. Unless there is a market for Canadian products, consumers will suffer.

TRANSPORT

GOVERNMENT ACCEPTANCE OF RECOMMENDATIONS OF SNAVELY COMMISSION

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport which arises out of the latest report of the Snavely commission. I am sure that by now the minister has had an opportunity to examine the report, particularly those areas which deal with the implementation of the recommendations of the Hall report. Could the minister tell the House if the government agrees with the Snavely conclusions and if it is contemplating any action based on those conclusions? If so, in what areas?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, while I have had a chance to begin to look at the report, I could not say that the government has arrived at any conclusions about it. Of course, we have had more time to look at the main recommendations of the Hall commission report, and some of the Snavely commission work is directly related to that.

At a meeting today with representatives of the railway labour unions, I indicated that it was completely consistent with standing government policy to suggest that because grain is carried at a rate below cost, there follows a governmental obligation to make up the difference rather than have it borne by the system. I also indicated that facing up to that additional payment to the railways was beyond our capabilities in these days of fiscal restraint. What we had done, instead, was the most important job of beginning the work of rehabilitating the rail lines. We had earlier committed $100 million to that program but, of course, only ten days ago had committed to a continuation of that program so that when the work is complete every line transfer to the basic rail network, every one of those grain-dependent lines remaining on the prairies—and there will be many of them—will be in first-class shape.

Mr. Mazankowski: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Am I to take it from the minister's answer that, while he agrees with the recommendations of Mr. Justice Hall that the railways should be paid the actual cost of delivering the grain, he does not agree that the federal government should pick up the difference? I presume, therefore, that he agrees with the conclusions of Mr. Snavely. May I ask the minister when we can expect a clear, categorical statement, with respect to this very central recommendation of the Hall report, on whether the government is going to accept that total package and, if not, why not?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Vegreville has got it exactly wrong. I indicated it was very clearly government policy even before Mr. Hall spoke, that when a lower charge or lower revenue is imposed upon a transportation system as a matter of government policy, then the government agrees that it should take up the difference. That, of course, is a situation which has existed for some time with the Crow rate at a low rate. The Hall recommendation is clearly being carried out as that rate continues. The question arises, then, when will the government agree to pay the difference between the Crow rate and cost?

I indicated earlier that it was our policy, basically, to move in that direction, as our broad policy statements have made it clear, but that as a matter of fiscal restraint it was not possible to do that now. I would hope hon. members would appreciate that what we have done is put the money into the hands of the railways when, dollar for dollar, they then spend it on programs for upgrading and rebuilding the rail line. We have not put into their hands the extra money to make up losses or lack of profit in handling grain. That, frankly, has to wait for another day when the treasury is not under such fiscal restraint as it is today.

Oral Questions

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

PROSECUTIONS UNDER OFFICIAL SECRETS ACT

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Justice as Attorney General for Canada. I should like to ask him about his apparent lack of consistency in singling out the Toronto Sun for prosecution under the Official Secrets Act—a very regressive step, in my opinion—and not taking a similar step with CTV, which essentially publicized the same data.

Is it because the Toronto Sun, like the hon. member for Leeds, is a critic of the government and only one of several independent news agencies or papers, while the CTV is the only national, independent television network? Would the minister indicate why he chose the Toronto Sun only?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, if I may say so, the question is somewhat beneath the hon. member.

An hon. Member: No, it is not.

Mr. Basford: Without going into the details—which would be improper on my part—the cases are quite different.

Mr. MacKay: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister not agree that the data used by the Toronto Sun and CTV was essentially the same? Would he also not agree that the situation is really disclosing an indictment of the government's failure in acting to protect Canada's national interests rather than anything that could possibly be interpreted as against Canada's interests? Would the minister not agree that this is a very, very questionable prosecution in view of the wide distribution of this so-called official material?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the CTV program to which the hon. member refers.

An hon. Member: How do you know it is different?

Mr. Basford: The reports from my officials and others are of a different nature. On the last part of the hon. member's question, obviously I am not going to start commenting on the case that is now before the courts, with regard to the Toronto Sun. I am not commenting on it either in this House or outside. There is a trial to be held and the prospect of a jury to be empanelled. I would ask hon. members to be restrained in the comments they make about it, so that the accused and the issues of law that are in question can be heard properly by a court. As I said on Friday, these are issues to be determined by a court.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

NORTHERN PIPELINE—WITHDRAWAL OF B.C. GOVERNMENT FROM COMMITMENT ON LAND CLAIMS

Mr. Jack Pearsall (Coast Chilcotin): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Last week, at a hearing of the special pipeline committee, a document prepared in the office of native claims was produced which made reference to a withdrawal on the part of the B.C. government from its commitment to the negotiation of Indian land claims, and which has since been published in the Vancouver papers. Would the minister inform the House whether there is substance to this report?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for the question. There is no substance to the report. There was some uncertainty, in November, as to what the province's intentions were in respect of the settlement of outstanding claims in British Columbia. I subsequently had a meeting in January with the minister, Mr. Allan Williams. Since that meeting, I think there is an understanding between the two governments and an earnest attempt to try to deal with the Nishga claims and, hopefully others.

There have been two or three meetings involving the three parties to the claims, the provincial government, the federal government and representatives of the Nishga people. There is no substance in that document, Mr. Speaker. Negotiations are proceeding well in British Columbia.

PUBLIC SERVICE

REPORT ON EMPLOYMENT OF HANDICAPPED PERSONS

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Treasury Board. It is the third time that I have asked the President of the Treasury Board when he will be tabling in this House the report of the Public Service Commission from the secretariat of his department dealing with the problems of handicapped people entering into and performing within the Public Service of Canada. It is the third time I have asked him to table the report. When is he going to table the report?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member, on the third occasion, will be lucky. I intend to table this report either tomorrow or on April 4. It will probably be tomorrow, but if not it will be April 4 because there is a recess in between.

PRIVILEGE

MR. SYMES—ALTERATION IN OFFICIAL HANSARD RECORD

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. On Friday the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes) raised, by way of a question of privilege, an apparent alteration to Hansard during the course of the preparation of the "blues" as they have been commonly referred to in our practice, by the hon. Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts).

The matter, as I indicated then, is rather fundamental to our procedures here, and our practices in recording the proceedings. I undertook to examine the circumstances to determine what in fact had occurred. On Friday the Secretary of State contributed his own intervention and indicated that indeed he had added the words, which were allegedly added, as stated by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie. He explained to the House his reasons for doing so.

The privilege of members in making alterations of this sort to Hansard, or the editors in making alterations of any sort to Hansard, is a long established practice of the House. To put upon members the stricture that the words would be recorded exactly as they were spoken sometimes would produce a printed text which would require punctuation and other assistances of a grammatical nature to make it intelligible.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I say that very seriously. All of us in making speeches in the House, of course, speak faster and faster and have in our minds ideas which we want to express. Sometimes the actual words used are not as clear as the ideas. It has been a long established practice that there are often cases where words spoken when reported do not at all convey their meaning. Therefore, there has been some liberty in attempting to punctuate and add grammatical changes.

On the one hand I think it is well understood by all hon. members that it would be too difficult a stricture to produce the text without any of that kind of assistance. On the other hand, it has always been understood that the purpose of this procedure is not in any way to change the substance of the words which have been used by any member in debate. It has always been exercised in such a way, both on behalf of members of the House and on behalf of the Debates reporting staff, that it is accepted to clarify the expression that was intended, but not in any way to change the substance of the phrases spoken.

There is an obligation on members not to extend that exercise beyond its original intention. There is an even greater obligation upon the reporting staff and the editorial staff in Debates not to permit that kind of change to go beyond the original intention.

In the particular case raised by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie I cannot come to any other conclusion except that the addition of the words was more than simply grammatical. It changed the very substance of the answer which was given by the minister in the circumstances.

Point of Order—Mr. Daudlin

Perhaps our practice has become relaxed over time. Because this privilege does exist in the hands of members they may expect that, if they have reached too far, the editorial staff will correct them and reject that kind of change. This has some merit. I do understand that to a very great extent members do rely on the judgment of the editorial staff in that respect. They expect that if they have over-reached a matter, that it will be rejected by the editorial staff. I look upon that as a fundamental obligation, as part of the duties of the editorial staff. However, it is part of the duty which in this case I do not think was properly exercised.

In examining the events which have taken place I have an initial indication that it was not accidental on the part of the editorial staff, and I have isolated the cause. It is an administrative matter, under my jurisdiction, which needs more attention. I simply wanted to report to hon. members that I have taken the matter that far, and I will need some time to give it further consideration as to what action might have to take place.

I do not think under any circumstances I would have anything more to say in terms of the minister's actions than I have already said. Respecting the person on the editorial staff who was involved, I will be having more to say and do about that, and I will report it to the House in due course.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. DAUDLIN—USE OF TELEVISION CAMERAS

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Kent-Essex (Mr. Daudlin) raised the problem on Friday afternoon concerning the angle of a television camera that was used. We try to be very careful about the use of cameras.

We have not issued explicit written instructions in any way, because I think all hon. members would agree that it would be extremely difficult to codify the instructions to the camera operators. We have asked them, and we have received co-operation all the way through this experience, that they would use only the guiding principle that we were doing this as an electronic Hansard and that the operation ought to be of a high quality. I believe that all hon. members would agree with me that the camera operators and everybody associated with television in the House of Commons have kept that principle very much in the forefront of their minds and they have done an excellent job.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: In this particular instance I have explored the problem as the hon. member requested. There was, indeed, some justification for the use of the camera in that particular position and some technical reason for attempting to tee on the notes, not in an effort to bring the notes to the camera so as to expose them to the viewer, but simply to avoid having to change cameras rapidly, in the middle of a sentence, on a particular member. It was not done as a gimmick or as a new exploration of a technique; it was done in good faith.

I am satisfied that the camera and production crews were attempting to do the proper thing. It did set a dangerous precedent though, and all of us are grateful that it was brought to our attention by the hon. member. It will keep us alert on a continuing basis to see that we are careful and faithful to the fundamental principle of electronic Hansard as we have been so far successfully.

PRIVILEGE

MR. LAMBERT (BELLECHASSE)—REQUEST FOR REVISION OF STANDING ORDER 43

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, again today we have witnessed something which has become a regular occurrence in the House, and the public watching the televised debates is wondering and asking us questions. I do wish we could give an adequate answer to the questions on the various standing orders governing our debates. Also, Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that the people of this country are voicing their opinion. That is extremely important, since we are spending millions to broadcast our debates so that Canadians may have a better understanding of the orders of the House, the reasons for a specific ruling or for the attitude of an hon. member regarding motions or orders or bills put before the House.

Mr. Speaker, I think that since the inception of parliamentary broadcasting, we as members of the House gladly put up with the physical inconvenience of glaring floodlights which considerably raise the temperature inside this chamber. As for me, Mr. Speaker, I accept that because I want Canadians to be more closely associated with the governing body in order to improve the efficiency of the government.

Mr. Speaker, you have been making tremendous efforts and I am very pleased to say so today, because you have a very difficult part to play. Through my question of privilege, I want to show all Canadians how difficult it is to perform this duty in an impartial way in order to give all representatives of this country, those I refer to as the delegates of the general assembly representing the whole country, the opportunity to be seen and heard. I hope all Canadians who will be listening to what I am saying will understand how difficult it is to deliberate in a democratic way under rules which do not provide us with the means of making ourselves understood. In this respect, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words about Standing Order 43. This very day, I rose under the provisions of Standing Order 43, duly seconded as required by these provisions, to deal with a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, because we are precisely in a situation I would describe as panic over our national constitution, a constitution which should be the political creed of every Canadian, whatever his language and extraction. As Canadians, we should all have exactly the same political creed.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is discussing the motion he has proposed himself this afternoon under Standing Order 43. Surely this is not the moment to discuss the merits of the motion. It is simply a matter of raising the question of privilege. This raises a difficulty for all members of the House when a motion is moved under Standing Order 43. According to the rules of the House, every member has the right to deny unaninous consent. If the hon. member has another question of privilege to raise, I will listen to him carefully.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is your duty to address these remarks to me, but as members of the House we must live daily with the application of Standing Order 43. This very day, Mr. Speaker, I moved a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity which concerns not only all parliamentarians, but all Canadians as well. If I rise on a question of privilege, it is because I deplore the fact that the opposition of only one member is enough to prevent the discussion of a motion under Standing Order 43. I remember that not so long ago, the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) raised this matter. A few months ago, I had the opportunity myself to suggest that Standing Order 43 be reviewed. In conclusion, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette):

> That this House refer to the Committee on Procedure and Organization for review the implementation of Standing Order 43, in order to ensure that the rules of democracy are strictly adhered to and that no single member is empowered under these provisions to go against the will of all the others.

I feel, Mr. Speaker, that ours is a democratic institution and that we should indeed give all its members the opportunity to deal objectively and positively with the motions put before the House. That is why I suggest that the motion I am now moving seconded by the hon. member for Témiscamingue, should be referred to the Committee on Procedure and Organization for a full study of the implementation of Standing Order 43.

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I support the request made by my colleague for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert). In fact, the Chair has pointed out several times that there was abuse on the part of hon. members moving motions under Standing Order 43. If there is abuse in the presentation of motions under Standing Order 43, it is precisely because there is also abuse in the process of rejecting such motions.

Generally speaking, motions moved under Standing Order 43 are accepted, especially when they concern innocuous matters, for instance congratulations to the Montreal Canadiens when they win the Stanley Cup, to the Alouettes when they win the Grey Cup and so on. We know that motions moved under Standing Order 43 must concern urgent and essential matters, but since government members take pleasure in always saying no without even identifying themselves, this prevents opposition members and even government members from moving motions under Standing Order 43 which could be debated in the case of an emergency on a given day or during a given period.

We therefore request that application of motions moved under Standing Order 43 be referred to the Committee on Procedure and Organization so that it may study the right to move such motions, and especially the right to refuse them, subject to identification of the one who refuses the request of the hon. member to hold a special debate. The one who refuses this request should identify himself. This is why we ask that the principle of motions moved under Standing Order 43 be referred to the Committee on Procedure and Organization for a serious study so that this motion may be used intelligently in the future.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question raised by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) and supported by the hon. member for Témiscamingue is very important and it has been raised as a question of privilege, which requires examination on the part of the Chair. I shall give this motion careful consideration and reserve my judgment until later. I would first like to say that many suggestions aimed at improving our Standing Orders have been made in this regard. I therefore accept this excellent suggestion concerning the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization, but I note that this does not really constitute a question of privilege. However, I shall study the matter.

MULTICULTURALISM—MONEY SPENT IN CONSTITUENCY OF NICKEL BELT SINCE 1970

Question No. 1,110—Mr. Rodriguez:

For each fiscal year since 1970, what amount was spent in the constituency of Nickel Belt by the Ministry of State (Multiculturalism) and those agencies that report to it?

Hon. Norman A. Cafik (Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): The Multiculturalism Directorate provides grants and services to voluntary organizations whose membership and activities are usually spread over an area greater than any one electoral district, and records are not maintained on the basis of these districts. Similarly, expenditures by the federal cultural agencies on multicultural subjects are not recorded with reference to electoral districts. Accordingly, it would be extremely costly and time consuming to calculate the information requested.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT TO GIVE CERTAIN RIGHTS TO POLICE

The House resumed, from Friday, March 17, consideration of the motion of Mr. Blais that Bill C-26, to amend the Criminal Code, the Crown Liability Act and the Post Office Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, on Friday I addressed myself to the House on the subject of Bill C-26, and when the debate was interrupted I had just about concluded my remarks. Today I wish to say one or two things in summary.

The bill before us is twofold in its thrust. I stated on Friday that we in this party would not object to the opening of mail as envisaged in the first part, provided it is done upon the authorization of a judge in accordance with the terms and conditions of the Privacy Act. I do not think reasonable people would object to the opening of mail under these circumstances when the intention is to restrict trafficking in hard drugs. Indeed, I believe this would be a step in the right direction. Nevertheless, I do oppose very strenuously the granting of authority to the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais), under the second aspect of the bill, enabling him to issue warrants without authorization from a judge, with regard to matters coming under the Official Secrets Act and involving questions of national security. I would refer to the section of that act, section 3 which sets out that:

Every person is guilty of an offence under this Act who, for any purpose prejudicial to the safety or interests of the State,

(a) approaches, inspects, passes over, or is in the neighbourhood of, or enters any prohibited place;

(b) makes any sketch, plan, model or note—

And so on. Then it goes on to say in subsection (2):

On a prosecution under this section, it is not necessary to show that the accused person was guilty of any particular act tending to show a purpose prejudicial to the safety or interest of the State—

In other words, this is really a matter of executive discretion rather than being a judicial matter.

Section 4(1) states that every person is guilty of an offence under the act who, having in his possession or control any secret official code word or password or any sketch, plan, model, document, and so on, communicates that information to any unauthorized person, uses the information for the benefit of a foreign power or in a manner prejudicial to the safety or interest of the state, or retains it in his possession or control when he has no right to retain it, or fails to take reasonable care of such information, or so conducts himself so as to endanger its safety. Again, the words used here are subject to wide interpretation by the courts. Take, for example, the phrase "retains a sketch". Some person, perhaps a member of parliament, might find himself involuntarily in possession of one of those 58 copies of a document which are floating around, a document which is said to be highly classified. The act might well be read as though such a person could be convicted.

The executive discretion here is twofold. Consent to lay a charge lies with the Attorney General of Canada (Mr. Basford), as we saw the other day. In the second place, it is the Solicitor General who has the authority to issue a warrant to open mail on what he considers to be reasonable grounds. Mr. Speaker, I believe that even when questions of national security are involved, authority to open mail should lay with the judiciary. I say this, having absolute confidence in the judiciary of this nation. Application should be made to the judges in camera, an ex parte application, as we call it. Judges take an oath to the Queen, thank God; they do not take an oath to the government. They are quite capable of keeping these matters confidential. Should a judge grant an order in respect to an application of this kind made to him, the person whose mail is being opened, be it the sender or the receiver, should be notified within 90 days.

Section 3(4) of the Official Secrets Act says:

Every person is guilty of an offence under this Act who

(a) retains for any purpose prejudicial to the safety or interests of the State—

On Friday I asked what term "purpose prejudicial to the safety or interests of the state" means on any official document. Is this to be subject to executive discretion?

—any official document, whether or not completed or issued for use—

● (1532)

The danger is that a person could receive a document, if the government was negligent enough. It is alleged that there are 58 copies of a classified document floating around. Any number of government departments and agencies could have copies of this document. A copy could land on someone's desk. It could land on my desk, and someone could say that the hon. member for Calgary North has a secret official document which is classified, and therefore he is guilty under the Official Secrets Act.

The Official Secrets Act has not been amended for years. I think it was drawn up in 1919. It has not been changed, and I say it is too dangerous to allow the Solicitor General the power to issue warrants against the media, members of parliament, and the citizens of this country. The minister is absent today, but when the bill gets to the committee I hope he will see his way clear to accept, for once, a reasonable, positive amendment which would provide that mail may be opened under the Official Secrets Act only with authorization from a judge, and only if the person who is the object of the mail opening is notified within 90 days, and that period could be extended by a judge.

We have heard a lot of hullabaloo recently with regard to security. A poem was sent to me by one of my constituents. Much of it does not apply to this matter, so I will read just one verse of it, as follows:

We have the S.S.—

Meaning the security service.

—roaming over the land,
Our mail might as well be on the newsstand,
In the name of security M.P.'s are confronted
As well as the media on matters unfounded,
To secure our fair land is not their promotion,
As much as to keep the Grit Party in motion.

Here is another verse:

Tom Cossitt got hold of some documents rare
And caught the P.M. unaware,
Whose anger was such, but his reason not much,
When he called on General Dare.

This woman caught the significance of what has been going on, and in a few poetic lines put it in its proper perspective. Intimidation of the worst kind has been inflicted upon the media. Members of parliament have been intimidated for getting information, and there will be intimidation against Canadians generally because of the power provided by the Official Secrets Act. I am not prepared to give holus-bolus to the Solicitor General the power to issue warrants, the expiration of which we do not know, to open the mail of Canadian citizens. As the woman said in her poem, the mail might as well be on the newsstands.

Mr. Roger Young (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-26 has two objectives. The first objective is to permit more effective investigation and prosecution of organized crime in one of its most dangerous and lucrative activities, narcotics smuggling. Second, it will give us an important tool to deal with espionage and international terrorism. While the latter objective is extremely important for the security of Canada, it is the former, the control of drugs, where we can expect the interception of postal communication to be most frequently applied.

In the past three years this government has introduced a number of measures designed to enhance the protection of Canadians against crime and violence. They included stricter sentencing, prohibition of certain firearms favoured by professional criminals, tightening of bail law, tougher measures regarding electronic surveillance, and a new bill regarding fugitive offenders and extradition.

These measures are important and will have their effect, but more is needed. Bill C-26 is, of course, a temporary measure which will expire one year after the McDonald inquiry makes its report. In the interim we cannot risk increasing the vulnerability of Canada to abuse of the postal system for purposes of endangering national security or trafficking in drugs.

Let me begin my remarks by noting that at present Canada is the only major western country which does not provide for the authorized interception of mail by post. In Britain the secretary of state has had this power since 1663. In 1957 a committee of privy councillors was established to look at the interception of communications as it existed in Britain, with a view to seeing whether the practice should cease. The committee found that such interception was vital both in terms of national security and crime detection. In its report to parliament the committee stated, and I quote:

> The Security Service is part of the defence system of the country, and its supreme task is the defence of the Realm, and this necessarily involves protection from espionage, from sabotage, and indeed, from every kind of action that threatens the security of the State. It is upon the security of the State that the citizens rely for the enjoyment of their freedom . . .

That report went on somewhat later to say, and I quote again:

> If it could be shown that this method of intercepting communications, either by letter or by telegram or by telephone conversation affected the law-abiding citizen to his detriment, even though the power was being exercised to prevent and detect crime, we would have hesitated to recommend that the power of interception should continue to be exercised for this purpose. But so far from the citizen being injured by the exercise of the power in the circumstances we have set, we think the citizen benefits therefrom. The adjustment between the rights of the individual and the rights of the community must depend upon the needs and conditions which exist at any given moment and we do not think there is any real conflict between the rights of the individual citizen and the exercise of the power to intercept by the Secretary of State . . .

The committee was adamant about the need for proper safeguards in making interceptions, of course, and I believe that our bill provides better protection than any similar legislation anywhere. In the United States, for example, a peace officer who feels there are reasonable grounds to believe that mail contains contraband simply applies for a regular warrant from a federal magistrate or justice of the peace, which entitles him to intercept and seize postal communications.

Indeed, American customs officials may legally open any first class international mail without a warrant if they have reason to believe it may contain contraband. In the case of the United States versus Ramsay the court upheld the right of a postal inspector to open an airmail letter from Thailand solely because Thailand was a known source of narcotics, and the envelope appeared bulky. It was subsequently found to contain heroin. I should note that while opening mail and seizing the contents is permissible under American law without a warrant, reading of the contents of the correspondence is not.

While we do not wish to hamper unduly the difficult task of Canadian law enforcement officials to combat narcotics smuggling, we do feel it necessary to provide strict controls over the authorization of mail interception in Canada. Generally, the safeguards provided in this bill as it relates to narcotics control are similar to those passed by parliament when it enacted legislation with regard to electronic surveillance.

A warrant is valid for a maximum of only 60 days, for example. Any application for a renewal of the warrant must be accompanied by full particulars as to why the renewal is needed, including times and dates when interceptions or seizures were made under the warrant as well as the information which was obtained.

In addition, if a previous application for a renewal was made and refused or withdrawn, the date and names of judges involved must be provided. This would prevent the possibility of the police or prosecutor shopping around for a lenient judge in seeking renewals.

● (1542)

Within 90 days of the end of the period for which the warrant was issued, the person who was the object of a mail interception must be notified of the fact. If a lengthy, ongoing investigation is anticipated and a longer notification period is required, the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) must personally sign the application to defer notification, but the deferment may be for no longer than three years. Furthermore, the judge to whom the application is made must be satisfied that such an extension will serve the best interests of justice.

Strict rules are provided to govern the admissibility in court of information gleaned from mail interceptions. For example, an illegally intercepted postal communication would be inadmissible in a court, and any evidence derived from such an interception could also be deemed to be inadmissible if, in the view of the judge, admitting such evidence would bring the administration of justice into disrepute.

Also safeguards are provided to protect the solicitor-client relationship. No warrant may be issued to intercept postal communication addressed to or originating from a solicitor's office or residence, unless the judge is satisfied that there are reasonable grounds to believe the solicitor, one of his partners, employees, or member of his household, has been or is about to become a party to an offence. If under these circumstances a warrant is issued, the issuing judge must include such terms governing the interception as he feels are advisable to protect privileged communication between solicitors and clients. This is very similar to the provisions in the Criminal Code relating to electronic surveillance.

Bill C-26 provides serious criminal penalties for persons who disclose the contents of legally intercepted communications under any but the specific circumstances outlined in the legislation. These include giving testimony at a trial where the communication is considered to be admissible evidence, in the course of a criminal investigation, or where the disclosure is made to a peace officer in the interests of the administration of justice. Should peace officers make an illegal postal interception, or illegally disclose the contents of intercepted communications, we are proposing to amend the Crown Liability Act to permit the citizen who was the object of that interception to launch a civil suit for damages, not only against the public servants involved but against the government itself. This provision to permit suits against the government was included in the electronic surveillance legislation. It is a radical departure from common law which has indicated always that citizens may not sue the Crown. However, we feel it important to give Canadians this resource, and to reinforce the principle that these powers will be used honestly and judiciously.

One very important provision which I feel sure hon. members will applaud is that which requires the Solicitor General to make an annual report to parliament on all warrants for postal interceptions issued each year, including those relating to national security. The report must detail not only the number of applications for warrants, renewals and extensions of notifications, but also the number of persons apprehended as a result of information obtained through interceptions, their offences, and a variety of other information which will allow one to judge the effectiveness of the legislation and the restraint with which it is being employed.

As far as interceptions authorized in the interests of protecting national security are concerned, the same conditions which parliament required when it enacted electronic surveillance laws apply. These include the requirement for the minister to report to parliament on all such authorizations.

I consider the new legislation to be most important. It provides our law enforcement officials with a legitimate investigative tool which other western nations have possessed for some time. We have had disquieting evidence of late of the dangers which threaten the security of Canadians. Espionage, international terrorism, and the violent activities of the underworld in Canada have all been in the news. While we must use every possible method to protect Canadians from these dangers, those methods must be consistent with our free and democratic way of life.

Thus, all the steps we take in the area of peace and security must be balanced by measures to safeguard our civil liberties.

Striking that balance is most difficult. In the case of mail interception, we have chosen the route of judicial scrutiny, authorization, and reporting to the people through parliament to protect basic rights and freedoms. I firmly believe that protection to be the most effective Canadians can have.

In summation, and for the purposes of the record, I should like to refer to a small article which appeared in a publication by the Council on Drug Abuse. I am not sure of the exact date, but the heading is: "Heroin In Our mail To Continue Or Not?" The article reads as follows:

> The current controversy raging in the federal House, among civil liberty groups, in the media and among individuals, regarding the right of the RCMP to open first class mail clouds somewhat the almost worry-free use of the mail for the importation of heroin.
> It was reported at a meeting of the International Narcotic Enforcement Officers Association held in Toronto in August that the use of first class mail for the importation of heroin into Canada was prevalent.
> One gram of heroin worth $5 at source can easily be mailed in a regular envelope. By the time this has been cut and adulterated with other substances and passed down the distrbution chain, the resulting portions sell for $16,000 on the streets.
> The Golden Triangle, Burma, Thailand and Laos, is the main source for heroin in Canada, being routed through Western Europe and Hong Kong.
> The use of the mail is an insidious means of importing with little risk of detection. This is a somewhat different proposition from what is presently being fought over.
> If our narcotic enforcement offices are denied the right to open suspected heroin-carrying envelopes, we safeguard our civil rights but provide safe passage and high profits for our criminal element. And then it's public health vs. civil rights!

Very pointedly that last sentence sums up the essence of this debate. If our narcotic enforcement officers are denied the right to open suspected heroin-carrying envelopes, we safeguard our civil rights but provide safe passage and high profits for our criminal element. It is public health versus human rights.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Will the hon. parliamentary secretary accept a question by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay)?

Mr. Young: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the hon. member now that he has finished his speech. Can he briefly indicate how it will be possible to protect the solicitor-client privilege, when it is communications originating from or addressed to the office or residence of a solicitor? As far as I am aware, the term "solicitor" is not even defined. Is it a practising solicitor or a non-practising solicitor? Could the hon. member put my mind at ease on this?

Mr. Young: Mr. Speaker, I thought I made clear in my remarks that there were some very stringent safeguards in the bill. There are rights to bring a case against an officer acting outside the terms of the act, to sue the Crown itself. If it is a question of whether the word "solicitor" has been defined or not, perhaps that can be looked at in committee. I think the hon. member and I know what solicitors are in this country. They are pretty well described as accepted members of the bar and practising members of the profession.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I regret that I was away on Friday, but I read with interest the contributions made to this debate.

I was interested in a statement made by the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan) who indicated that he had distributed a questionnaire. Approximately 74 per cent of the people who responded said that they approved of the principle of the legislation, but with adequate safeguards. Those are the magic words. I do not know the extent to which the people who responded to the questionnaire are familiar with what is in this bill. If they are familiar with it and are solid, intelligent people, I am sure they know it does not contain adequate safeguards. That is the issue that faces us.

● (1552)

I am not going to vote against the bill on second reading. I think the way things are going in parliamentary debate the matter of second reading has become almost irrelevant, but I do say that if this bill comes back from the committee without the necessary repairs having being made so that it contains adequate safeguards, I will vote against it on third reading. There is no question about that.

Some of my colleagues on this side of the House have dealt with precision and knowledge with some of the weaknesses and frailties of this measure. It is not necessary for me to retrace that ground.

Having regard to procedures taken in respect of drug trafficking, providing there are adequate safeguards, I suppose it can be said there is some reasonable ground for passing the measure. I am not aware of any information the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) has given regarding the number of convictions that have been obtained through the opening of mail. I do not know how many case there have been initiated by the RCMP or other authorities under the narcotics act as a result of this practice. There have been cases where mail has been opened and perhaps the mail contained a drug or narcotic. Perhaps we could put it this way. Once the bill is passed, if it is passed with adequate safeguards, from then on in if anyone has been sending drugs by mail that practice will probably cease. That might be of some benefit.

The same question applies to the matter of subversion. We are talking about the enemy without, but what about the dangers from within? What about the likelihood of this country moving slowly and inexorably toward either a police state or totalitarianism? We watch the leaves floating on a stream and we know which way the current is going. If we examine what is happening in this country it should put us on guard so that we do not place in the hands of any government, not just those hon. gentlemen in the treasury benches opposite, those kinds of powers contained in this bill which, added to the other authorities they have, make me apprehensive.

If we couple these powers with those contained in the War Measures Act, the Official Secrets Act, and the Federal Courts Act, we have some idea of the power this government holds. If we consider these provisions along with the government's refusal to provide adequate knowledge and information about what is going on in government, and to provide the people of this country with an adequate law which establishes their right to know what is going on, this becomes very apprehensive.

Liberties do not disappear with a bang, they usually rot away. That is what is happening in this country right today. If one looks at what is happening in Italy, for example the kidnapping there of a former Prime Minister, and compares that with the situation here, one will see that we are heading down the road in the same direction. I am sure somewhere in the streets and sidewalks of Italy there is probably a future dictator waiting for the chaos which is developing there to provide the impetus for the establishment of a führer or Il Duce. We went through this a number of years ago in this world and there is no reason to believe we have any immunity from it in this country.

I quite accept the fact that the public is entitled to adequate protection and a guarantee of a measure of stability and law which will allow the people of Canada the opportunity to continue to exercise the democratic process, and walk the streets in peace and security. However, when, in the name of securing that, we give the government and its bureaucrats the kinds of rights which are contained in this measure, then I think we are going much too far.

Relevant to the issue I was dealing with a little while ago, I have been handed a document by the learned hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay), which contains a provision of the Migratory Birds Convention Act, Section 11, which says in part that any game officer or peace officer may enter any place or premise where he has reason to believe migratory game exists. That kind of provision is followed in almost every statute which is passed today and I refer to that right to search and seize; and it is not just given to police or peace officers.

The proposed competition act contains the widest possible powers. Practically every piece of legislation this government brings to this House contains the demand that we give to it the kind of authority contained in this measure. I worry about that. I am worried and concerned about the mood of resentment that exists on the part of the public of Canada today, brought on largely by the actions of this government, by what I consider to be the corruption, tainted with incompetence, stupidity and arrogance of this government.

We have no assurance that the safeguards which now exist, and they are very limited, will continue. The checks and balances upon which any democratic system must flourish have long since degenerated in this parliament. The powers which the government has taken and the limitation placed upon the right of the House to challenge and scrutinize the government, together with the limitations on our opportunities to find out exactly what is going on, have brought to the minds of the public of Canada a mood of cynicism, distress, and lack of co-operation which, in my opinion, will at some time provide a climate for a complete change.

As bad as our system of government is, it is still the best system of government known to society. I want to keep it that way. When the government takes the responsibility of bringing in legislation of this kind, allowing it to do legally what it has been doing illegally in the past, I think it should hedge that legislation with the best possible safeguards obtainable. I am going to suggest a few now which I think may appeal to some members of the House, although perhaps not to the government.

Too often government ministers come in here to read departmental briefs. We often talk about ministerial responsibility. The only information the ministers come in here with is the information that their officials think they are safely capable of handling. All too often the decisions they make are the decisions made by their departments.

I hope the Solicitor General may be persuaded to take a very hard look at some of the reasonable criticism that has been made of this bill and some of its provisions. I hope the Minister will take a serious look at some of the difficulties in the bill as well as some of its dangerous clauses, and then return to the House at the committee stage in a spirit of co-operation and flexibility. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman is really aware of that word "flexibility", because he has not shown much yet. It may well be that if he survives long enough he will understand flexibility.

We should look at some of the provisions which provide for this matter of Crown liability. It is all very well for the parliamentary secretary to suggest that this constitutes a safeguard. When you look at the Crown Liability Act you will find there are very wide loopholes, yet the parliamentary secretary and the Solicitor General are attempting to convey to this House and the public that it constitutes adequate safeguards. There may be circumstances in which the provisions of this act have been abused because there are very wide discretions and exemptions. There is one section which says that if a peace officer discloses information he has for what he believes is in the best interests of the administration of justice, he is exempt. Now, I do not think that is very adequate in terms of providing a means by which the government can be held in restraint in the way it exercises the provisions and powers which are given to it under this bill.

I do not think that a peace officer or a servant of the government should have the right to pass on information to another person which he has received as a result of an interception made under this legislation under the guise he is advancing the interests of justice. That is giving him a discretion, almost a judicial discretion, which enables him and the government to escape the consequences of their bad judgment and their breach of the law, which would be the case but for that exemption. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that is not sound. I suggest this evidence, obtained improperly and illegally, may well be used both in civil and criminal cases. This is a very dangerous precedent, and I would hope the committee will have a good hard look at it.

The word wilfully which appears in proposed section 178.32 is a very dangerous word. I think that word should be taken out, but these are aspects which relate to the bill itself. I think we should go beyond that. The Solicitor General is asking for powers for an indefinite period. We do not know how long the McDonald royal commission will sit. It may be two years, plus a year after that, plus such time as the government of the day may want in order to prepare the kind of legislation necessary to replace this. Mr. Speaker, we are looking at three to four years before the legislation will be on the statute books.

What else is the government prepared to do to give us some assurance of its good intentions? What about the War Measures Act? It is related. You cannot look at this particular bill without looking at what happened in 1970 and subsequently. The right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) assured this House and the nation that legislation would be introduced to replace the War Measures Act, legislation of a more moderate nature. Certainly, the name War Measures Act would be supplanted. Is the Solicitor General prepared to carry that assurance on and tell us, on behalf of the government, that that will be done, that the public of this country will have some guarantee that the provisions of the War Measures Act will not be imposed upon us as they were in 1970?

Is the hon. gentleman prepared to tell us that the government will look at reasonable amendents to the Official Secrets Act? The Official Secrets Act today is an obscene statute. It was originally conceived to cover the issues of espionage and subversion, but has now been extended to cover all aspects of the disclosure of information, unless done by an authorized person. The Solicitor General and apologists for the government said, "Of course, we know that we have that power but we do not exercise it." That is a pretty shabby excuse for keeping on the statute books an act as explosive as the Official Secrets Act.

The act was originally passed in the United Kingdom to deal exclusively with questions of espionage, but was later extended to cover domestic matters because somebody in a very high position in the United Kingdom found that information which had been intended for him had been given to other members of the public and to the press. Thus, the bill was amended to cover these domestic aspects of the disclosure of information. It was debated in the House of Commons at Westminster for about ten minutes.

In 1938 the same bill, almost verbatim but with some changes in the positions of the sections, was bought to Canada and was passed in a mood of alarm and hysteria which prevailed at that time. It was passed with about ten minutes' debate. Surely the Solicitor General must agree with the reasonable proposition that if that legislation were cut down to cover only cases of espionage, subversion and true security, he would have a great deal more capacity. He would have a great deal more co-operation from this House and from the public because the bill would then be a reasonable bill.

To have the amendments go forth in their present form, Mr. Speaker, in a bill of that kind, is far more than I am prepared to allow this government or any government. I particularly would not allow such a thing in the control of this government, with its characteristic arrogance and secrecy and its tendency to ignore the public and equate the interests of the state with the interests of the Liberal party. I suggest, under those circumstances, this bill would pass a lot more smoothly and be received throughout the country with far more assurance if the government would give us an undertaking that it is prepared to make that recommendation. I do not expect the government to bring the bill in right away. After all it has taken 40 years of illegally opening mail before we brought in a bill legalizing it and retroactively sanctifying it.

Is the hon. gentleman prepared to give us an assurance that Section 41 of the Federal Courts Act will be reviewed, and that the right of the people of this country to be informed will be restored? With assurance of that kind, we in this House and the public will feel a little more satisfied because the slow, subtle, insidious derogation of the rights and privileges of the people of this country will have been stopped. When we have a government whose legislative proposals contain provisions of this kind—where a bill brought in contains the right of the government without warrant to seize and take, where a government which has said it was going to provide for the discontinuance of the practice of writs of assistance, has gone back on that promise—what assurance do we have that its ministers will administer with safety and reason the powers which they are asking us to give them?

In my hands have been placed the provisions of Section 41(2) of the Federal Courts Act. I know it by heart. It has been embedded in my heart. It is a very bad piece of legislation. It is legislation passed by this government in haste after it had found out that provisions of the Conway and Rimmer trial in England would have made this government compellable to produce documents at the discretion of the courts. The government does not trust the courts. The government is not prepared to give to the courts the right to make that decision.

I suggest to my hon. friends—not with too much hope—and directing my question to the hon. gentleman opposite, that while I agree with him that without adequate safeguards the right may well be given to the authorities to open mail for the two reasons set out in the bill; surely better safeguards could be provided. I suggest that a parliamentary committee be set up to look at the whole question of security. I am not suggesting for one moment that such a committee should have the right to examine the day-to-day detailed operations of the policy or security. That is not a job for this parliament.

There is at the present time an arrangement proposed by law and by practice whereby the RCMP and security forces report to the Solicitor General and the Prime Minister. Those security forces have control over the disposal of several hundreds of million of dollars a year. Nobody knows how much or for what purposes it is used. The money, to a large extent, is probably well spent. Mr. Speaker, those kinds of rights must not be left without some form of challenge in this House. If we were made aware of those powers we should have some right to ask the Prime Minister or the Solicitor General in committee about the existing relationship between the government, the RCMP, and the security forces. If the security forces know they have to answer to the Prime Minister and the Solicitor

General, and know that those officials will have to go before a parliamentary committee, in my opinion that would constitute a very salutary and wholesome restraint. Police forces would not then engage in the kind of tactics which, in my opinion, derogate from the safety of the state.

● (1612)

I practised law for many years in a small community, Mr. Speaker. The RCMP had the respect of the people in such small communities. They covered great territories, patrolled large areas, and there was reciprocal good will and understanding between the police force and the public. That does not exist to the same extent today because of the size and the powers of the force, but perhaps it could if society were stable and the public were assured of their safety. That condition has to be restored.

The public has a great deal of respect, and properly so, for the RCMP as an institution, but something has to be done to bring back a spirit of co-operation, understanding, and reason. That can only be achieved through a parliamentary committee with the right to call witnesses. I dislike sittings in camera, but from time to time on issues of this kind it might be necessary to hold in camera sittings in order to examine the Solicitor General and/or the Prime Minister.

Many people I have spoken to agree with me that parliament should have some final opportunity to challenge what the security forces are doing and what the RCMP forces are doing, not by direct examination but by using the mechanism of cabinet officials to whom they report. Perhaps the Solicitor General would be prepared to give assurances along those lines at the conclusion of this debate or even in committee, at report stage or on third reading. If so, I would be prepared to support the bill. I think this bill, with the proper assurances, needs to be supported, but it has to be changed. Some radical changes should be made to it.

Mr. Blais: Do you agree with the principle?

Mr. Baldwin: I agree with the principle, given adequate safeguards. It is the lack of adequate safeguards given by any government—but particularly the government of which the minister is such a shining ornament—that bothers me. To give those powers without any opportunity to challenge, without some of the safeguards I have mentioned, I believe goes far beyond the principle of the bill.

I say to the Solicitor General: think something of this country. Think of the problems we have had in the past, and that other countries have had. Think of the future. This bill, by itself, will bring us more trouble than it will solve problems.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I hope the Chair will permit me, at the second reading of Bill C-26, to make a few remarks about mail opening and seizure of narcotics by the RCMP. For the definition of narcotics, controlled drugs or restricted drugs, let us refer to the Food and Drugs Act. What is more surprising, however, is that at a time when we are studying a bill aiming at tightening control over drug traffic the right hon. prime minister (Mr. Trudeau) himself is talking about legalizing the use of marijuana. Certainly, the people of Canada have reasons for concern.

It has been said that this measure will provide adequate safeguards, and I think it is very important. The point which I want to emphasize this afternoon is clause 178, dealing with search and mail interception warrants. I think it is the most important aspect of Bill C-26. In its present form, the clause is unacceptable because it condones the actions of such people who are responsible for the disaster over the last years and the resulting consequences. In fact, if we remove all the needless literature and retain only the essential elements of Bill C-26 we come to the conclusion that this piece of legislation does nothing more than sanction all the illegal acts committed by the RCMP over 40 years, and that was revealed to us before the McDonald commission when the RCMP admitted that it had been opening mail without authorization.

That is indeed the way of proceeding in British common law—repeated illegalities can often become legislation. That could lead us quite far! Hence, the Solicitor General of Canada uses that old principle to exonerate the members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police who openly recognized having committed crimes in Quebec against our Criminal Code for which they have not been convicted, with the exception of course of Mr. Samson because he had the misfortune of almost losing his life in executing orders from his superiors. In short, the Solicitor General tells us: Those criminal illegalities are over, we are asking you to make them legal by approving this legislation. That is how you can make an orange out of a mushroom! Do Canadians and Quebeckers particularly not have the right to question seriously such doubful procedure from the federal government? Many times members of the RCMP have recognized their being guilty of criminal arson, dynamite theft and illegal raids into the premises of L'Agence de Presse Libre du Québec, and into those of recognized political opposition parties. They have even gone as far as writing communiques which were supposedly signed by the FLQ. And all that, on Quebec territory!

Since the fall of 1970, all Quebeckers have been at a loss to find out who is mainly responsible for everything that happened in Quebec. The Quebec government itself, aware of the dangers faced by the province and intent on discharging its responsibility to administer justice has been making tremendous efforts to shed light on all those events. This work has been extremely complicated by the federal government's hidden presence, its devious efforts to hinder progress. Indeed, every time Quebec takes an initiative Ottawa resorts to every trick in the bag to block the way. This has become plain cat-and-mouse play.

As one illustration among hundreds I have been accumulating since that feud started between the provincial premier and the federal Prime Minister, I shall refer to the Keable inquiry. After everything that was revealed by RCMP members themselves who pleaded guilty to crimes committed in the province of Quebec, the Quebec government as was its duty established the Keable inquiry to make light on those somber events. But the federal government was irked by Quebec using its right, creating its own enquiry on facts that happened in the province. With the unavowed aim of making the issue still more confused, of jamming the message to draw the people's attention away from the real issues, the government spared no effort to prevent the Keable inquiry from doing its work. It even declared it unconstitutional, even though it had said in this House that justice was a purely provincial matter. The aim probably was to take out of the way some annoying witnesses, or at least delay that inquiry's report until after the coming elections. Even though the Solicitor General was rebuked on a number of occasions, he still continued to hassle the inquiry. And there is something more preposterous still. The government did not even wait for its own inquiry, the McDonald inquiry, tabling its report. It put forward Bill C-26, that normally should have evolved from that report. How is it possible to inform our citizens?

Not even in this House, Mr. Speaker, could we know the truth about the RCMP, because as soon as we tried to know more about the relationship between the Solicitor General and the force, as soon as we tried to get into some detail, the Solicitor General would withdraw from the map as we say in Quebec. He would resign, and everyone kept wondering how come so many solicitors general had resigned in succession. Of course the people do not know that, once out of office after resigning, the Solicitor General is no longer accountable for his administration to opposition members. He does not have to give answers in this House anymore. Those are the facts. This is where this one-way kind of policy has led the RCMP. Is the RCMP the only one to blame for this, Mr. Speaker?

Maybe some members of the RCMP should have complied with the principle that an inferior is not required to obey an immoral order and maybe also his superiors should not have given in to certain political pressures? All this still has to be spelled out, so long as the mute will not speak out, but in the future, the RCMP must not be used as a political tool of a party in power.

Mr. Speaker, this leads me to say why I cannot support this bill in its present wording. On page 2, paragraph 178.25 (1) which deals with the issuance of warrants for the opening of mail provides, and I quote:

> On ex parte application made in writing signed by the Solicitor General of Canada or an agent specially designated by him in writing for the purposes of this section, a judge of a superior court of criminal jurisdiction or a judge as defined in section 482 may issue a warrant in relation to the investigation of an offence authorizing the incerception of any communication and the seizure of any controlled drug, restricted drug or narcotic that is in the course of post if he is satisfied by evidence on oath
> (a) that it would be in the best interests of the administration of justice to do so; and
> (b) that other investigative procedures have been tried and have failed,

In short, it is again a political authority, namely the Solicitor General, a highly political figure, or someone else specifically designated by him, who will sign the application to have a warrant issued by a judge. Now, everybody knows quite well that judges are appointed by the party in power. It therefore seems normal in politics to expect that the party in power will get the co-operation of those it was kind enough to appoint to high positions. But beware. The danger is always present. Yesterday it was the Royal Canadian Mounted Police whose image was tarnished in Quebec, but tomorrow if we do not remove the roots of that evil, it will be some other authority.

If the people in Quebec has lost confidence in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, it is not only due to that police force, Mr. Speaker. This government must make up its mind and stop burying its head in the sand, even putting away those who interfere. The RCMP authorities have enough character to take up the challenge and regain the reputation that police corps has always had with Quebeckers. Obviously there will always be a great temptation when confronted with a government enjoying an absolute majority. This is why it is necessary to pass legislation to free the RCMP from any political intervention. Whatever may be the amendment considered, it should allow the RCMP to be immune from politics.

● (1632)

That is the reason why I urge this House to add a clause to Bill C-26 to guarantee the absolute independence of the RCMP, particularly in Quebec. The role of the RCMP must definitely be redefined. Indeed, that is a recommendation of the Saulnier task force in its report on police organization and duties in Quebec.

I would like to quote from an article by Bertrand Descôteaux, in Le Devoir of January 27. It reads in part:

> The role of the RCMP in Quebec must be redefined so that police department will only have to deal with the enforcement of federal legislation of a fiscal nature and such parts of the Criminal Code with international ramifications.
>
> The Quebec Provincial Police and municipal police departments should enforce all other legislations in effect in Quebec, including federal laws.
> The Saulnier report notes that although criminal law and procedure are under federal jurisdiction, the administration of justice, general police responsibilities, the enforcement of the Criminal Code and the elimination of crime are under provincial jurisdiction.
> It also points out that the duties of the RCMP and the QPP often overlap in Quebec as both police departments may be called upon to perform the same duties. There seems to be no reason for not clearly setting apart the role and responsibilities of each, according to this report which concludes that the RCMP should only deal with the implementation of federal legislations of a fiscal nature such as the Income Tax Act, the Customs Act, the Excise Act—

In concluding, I would have another proposal to make to the House, Mr. Speaker. This proposal should be considered. This is a suggestion that I want to make to the standing committee of the House of Commons. In the future, the new legislation should include an amendment to the effect that the RCMP is authorized to open the mail only in the presence of the addressee. It is not good enough that the addressee be warned within 90 days after the opening, as the hon. member who spoke before me suggested, the RCMP should be allowed to seize that mail, keep the parcel, call in the addressee and have him open his parcel in front of the RCMP. I think that would be a very democratic way to act, our police would be protected and we would have a legislation which would protect our police and the people in general.

So we hope that our suggestions will be considered seriously at the committee stage, otherwise, Mr. Speaker, we will not be able to support this bill.

Mr. Louis Duclos (Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, I wanted to speak in this debate because it gives me the opportunity to deal briefly with matters which are of the essence of the democratic life in Canada which is so valuable that its citizens must be alert at all times in order to protect it against those who only pay lip service to the genuine democratic values. Mr. Speaker, after the disclosures of the past months about the irresponsible and undemocratic conduct of some elements of the RCMP security service, and after the ensuing discussions on the nature of the authority which should be granted to our police forces, Bill C-26 plunges us into the thick of a debate which is as old as democracy itself, a debate which, I think, never resolved.

The fundamental question to which no satisfactory answer could be given up to now could be enunciated as follows: To what extent may a democratic society, in certain circumstances, set aside some fundamental liberties in order to protect itself against those who would like precisely to avail themselves of the freedom of action it allows to build a society in which everyone would be completely deprived of freedom?

Mr. Speaker, of course, it would be a mistake not to give our police forces the authority they need to fight crime, subversion and terrorism effectively, although legally. That is why they must have the right to intercept and open the mail, provided they comply with a number of conditions provided under the legislation. On the other hand, Mr. Speaker, it should be kept in mind that Canada must participate in the worldwide fight against drug trafficking and international terrorism. Canada must live up to its reputation on the international scene, and it should not be allowed to become the weakest link in the chain of the nations engaged in this fight and its territory to become the preferred theater of operations for drug traffickers and terrorists. It must be realized also that every liberal democracy in the western world allows some sort of mail interception and opening.

Having said this, Mr. Speaker, we must nevertheless ask ourselves whether Bill C-26 will succeed in striking the delicate balance, which is such an essential part of democracy, between the need to protect our national security and the need to protect civil rights and freedoms, more specifically the right of every individual to privacy. In other words, Mr. Speaker, such a piece of legislation must leave the hands of our law enforcers free to perform their duties, but it must also contain provisions to counterbalance the arbitrariness of their decisions.

In that respect, Mr. Speaker, this legislation is disconcerting to the extent that it helps perpetuate and give credit to this despicable habit of systematically excluding the judiciary whenever national security is concerned. I cannot help but endorse before the House, Mr. Speaker, the very pertinent comments of Jean-Claude Leclerc, in his editorial in Le Devoir of February 10 last, and I quote:

> The government persists in supporting the notion that democracy and judicial authority cease to be of any value when counter-espionage and anti-subversive activities start casting their dark shadows.

By amending section 43 of the Post Office Act, clause 4 of Bill C-26 allows interception and opening of mails under a warrant issued pursuant to section 16 of the Official Secrets Act, which allows the Solicitor General of Canada (Mr. Blais) to issue, and I quote from section 16(2):

> . . . a warrant authorizing the interception or seizure of any communication if he is satisfied by evidence on oath that such interception or seizure is necessary for the prevention or detection of subversive activity directed against Canada or detrimental to the security of Canada.

Moreover, Mr. Speaker, clause 1 of the bill would add to the Criminal Code a provision dispensing the Solicitor General with the obligation to advise within 90 days following the period for which the warrant was issued every person whose communications were intercepted under a warrant issued under the same section 16(2) of the Official Secrets Act. It would undoubtedly be very difficult to argue that such provisions are in line with the spirit of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights which was adopted exactly 30 years ago and of which section 12 reads as follows:

> No one shall be subjected to arbitrary interference with his privacy, family, home or correspondence, nor to attacks upon his honour and reputation. Everyone has the right to the protection of the law against such interference or attacks.

Mr. Speaker, what protection does the proposed legislation offer the citizen who is suspected—I am not saying the citizen who is guilty but who is suspected—of having broken the Official Secrets Act? None whatsoever because not only are the courts totally excluded as far as the issuance of warrants allowing the police to intercept mail is concerned, but the Solicitor General is not even required to inform the person named in the warrant that his or her mail has been intercepted and opened, whether or not there were grounds to lay charges against that person.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot agree with those who claim that the control exercised by the Solicitor General over the issuance of warrants provides all the safeguards required and adequately protects the people against the misuse of authority to which all security services are prone. I think that what we have learned in recent months in this regard is quite eloquent and that I need not dwell on the illegal acts committed by some irresponsible elements of the RCMP. Although I do not doubt that the present Solicitor General is deeply committed to the civil liberties, I can hardly imagine that he or any of his successors could stand in the way of a police force that will resort to every means to embarrass a politician, and I would be surprised if he often dared refuse to issue the warrants that are asked for. That is why it seems essential to me that intercepting and opening the mail of anyone suspected of having broken the Official Secrets Act should be authorized by a warrant issued by a judge of the superior court of criminal jurisdiction. Besides, offences under the Narcotics Control Act and the Food and Drugs Act are dealt with in that way.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot accept that one should hide behind the notion of national security to escape the judgment of the judicial authority whose objectivity, competence and equity are almost unanimously recognized throughout the country. I am still waiting for a clear demonstration that the security of the state would be endangered if our courts were entrusted with the responsibility of issuing warrants when the Official Secrets Act has been violated. Had it been able to, the RCMP—which has been opening the mail of Canadians illegally for 40 years—would doubtless have already shown us why applying to judges would have prevented them from getting their man.

I also hope this bill will be amended so that any citizen whose mail has been intercepted or seized under the authority of a warrant issued under the Official Secrets Act is eventually advised of it if no formal charge was laid against him. If the past is any guarantee for the future, it strikes me that the time is ill-chosen to extend the authority of the RCMP without, at the same time, subjecting them in every case, including those in which national security is involved, to the control of the judiciary.

● (1642)

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I am frightened of the bill before us. I am frightened because checks and balances should be present in it but are not. It seems to me that while the power to open mail in certain circumstances is a legitimate, investigatory tool for our law enforcement agencies to have, it is one whose use should be kept under rigid control and strict safeguards.

Similar legislation exists in the United States, but the reporting requirements in that country are far more stringent than they are here. There is no real requirement in this bill to report other than bare statistics to the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais). We have an example of the extent of the reporting process in the annual report which is required under Section 16(5) of the Official Secrets Act. This report, under date of February 1, 1978, is entirely contained on one page. I might indicate in passing that pursuant to this section, 471 warrants were issued—this is in a country of 23 million people. In the same annual report in relation to the provisions of the privacy act we find that in 1974, 140 authorizations were granted; in 1975, 563; in 1976, 613; and in 1977, 615.

Compare those statistics with the figures from England where this kind of power, based upon the prerogative of the Crown rather than upon statute, has been in existence since the earliest times. In 1956, for example, there were 159 telephone interceptions, and in 1955, 231. And this is in a country of 55 million people. The whole question of interceptions in Britain, whether of telephone conversations or interceptions of mail, was reviewed by a special committee of the Privy Council. The figures speak for themselves. Here, in a country of 22 million people we are intruding upon the privacy of the lives of our citizens three or four times as much as is the case in England.

I have here a recent report from the United States. It was made by the judiciary committee of the Senate and House down there. In 1974 there were 216 mail openings for reasons of national security. So we carry out three times as many telephone intrusions as they do in the United States, a country of 280 million people. In 1973 and 1974, there were 323 mail openings carried out directly at the request of the postal inspection service during those two years. Of those openings, 72 were related to illegal lotteries, and the largest number, 240, involved the illegal mailing of narcotics. Fraud, firearms and burglaries were included in the total figure, but the two big ones were narcotics cases and lotteries.

What kind of control mechanism exists in the United States to see that that kind of authority is not abused? I am referring now to an amendment to the legislation which permits mail opening in the United States. With regard to reporting requirements in the case of warrants issued authorizing the opening of mail, hon. members will note that this kind of procedure goes beyond the bare reporting of statistics to the Solicitor General. First, within 30 days after the date of issuance of a warrant to open any mail or the denial of such a warrant, the person seeking such warrant shall report to the administrative offices of the United States courts and to the committee on the judiciary of the Senate and House of Representatives. This was a point which was made by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin).

The first thing that must be reported is the fact that the warrant was applied for; second, the fact that the warrant was issued as applied for, was modified or was denied; third, the offence specified in the warrant; fourth, the identity of the investigative or law enforcement officer and the agency making the application, and the person authorizing the application to be made.

The fifth thing which must be reported is the names of the sender and the addressee of all mail opened pursuant to such warrant; sixth, a copy of the approved warrant; seventh, the nature of the facilities from which or the place where any such mail was opened; and eighth, the disposition of all such records including any log, copy or summary, of any such mail or the contents of such mail and the identity of and action taken by all individuals who had access to any such mail. This must be done in addition to the following: Within 60 days after the date of any warrant authorizing the opening of any mail, or the denial of any such warrant, the judge hearing the application for such warrant shall transmit to the committee on the judiciary of the Senate and House of Representatives a complete transcript of the proceedings.

That seems to me to be the kind of free and open society we should be attempting to achieve here. The government takes the position that if it goes this far with the whole process of interception, whether it be by electronic means or by opening mail, and if it takes the route of full disclosure, that will somehow imperil the ability of law enforcement agencies to do a proper job, and imperil the security of the country. The answer to that is that a similar control process has been set up in England where the practice has been extant since, I believe, 1561 and based, as I have pointed out, on a prerogative.

I commend to hon. members the report of the committee of privy councillors not only for their interest with respect to the manner in which the people of England deal with this question of mail opening and electronic surveillance but also with respect to the history mail opening. A committee of privy councillors was appointed to inquire into the interception of communications. The report was presented to parliament by the prime minister of that day, Mr. MacMillan, by command of Her Majesty, in October of 1957. The report is fairly lengthy, but I think it would be useful to read some portions of it into the record. The committee came to the conclusion that the state of the law in England at the time might fairly be expressed in the following fashion:

(a) The power to intercept letters has been exercised from the earliest times, and has been recognized in successive Acts of Parliament.

(b) This power extends to telegrams.

(c) It is difficult to resist the view that if there is a lawful power to intercept communications in the form of letters and telegrams, then it is wide enough to cover telephone communications

That is from page 139 of the report. The next stage of the report of that committee of privy councillors deals with the purpose for these intrusions into what would normally be the privacy of citizens. It deals with the use and extent of the power of interception. The committee found that the warrant of the secretary of state set out the name and address or telephone number of the persons whose communications were to be intercepted and, on occasion, a single warrant had been issued containing a number of names. That practice was discontinued after the submission of this report, so that each warrant now specifies only one name.

The report went on to say that the secretary of state—here it would be the Solicitor General—had to satisfy himself on the facts of each particular case that it was proper to issue his warrant. In practice the principle upon which the secretary of state acted was that the purposes for which communications may be intercepted must be either for the detection of serious crimes or for the safeguarding of the security of the state. Since this House passed legislation authorizing electronic eavesdropping, the government has made much of the fact that there have been a number of convictions either under the Narcotic Control Act or the Criminal Code which would not have been possible had it not been for the use of electronic surveillance methods.

In England they regard it as such a deep invasion into the privacy of the rights of the individual that they go to great lengths to spell out that it is only in serious criminal activities that this power of surveillance or of mail opening is used. I note that the legislation before us is limited, I believe, to criminal matters which would bring sentences of up to five years. I am not certain of that. It certainly is in the surveillance legislation.

Mr. Blais: The Food and Drugs Act.

Mr. Nielsen: I am grateful for that intervention by the Solicitor General. I submit that the power to issue a warrant under privacy legislation and under this legislation should not be used for the purposes of obtaining a conviction for mere possession. For traffickers in narcotics, and particularly for traffickers in heroin, I think it is an essential tool for law enforcement officers to have in this country. The issue of warrants in England for the interception of letters in connection with offences under the Dangerous Drugs Acts began as far back as 1922, and after the war the number of warrants sharply declined. No warrants have been issued since early 1956. Perhaps that is partially the result of the fact that heroin addiction is treated somewhat differently in that country than it is here.

The fact that no warrants have been issued since 1956, the latest year for which I have statistics, is undoubtedly associated with the sharp decline in the drug traffic in that country because of what is generally referred to as the legalization of medical treatments of heroin addicts in that country and the medical use of heroin. It is the Home Office in England which has the authority to act in the case of the issuance of warrants. The principles upon which the Home Office acts in deciding whether to grant an application for a warrant to intercept communications—

INCOME TAX

SUGGESTED DEDUCTIONS FOR VOLUNTARY FIREMEN

Mr. Armand Caouette (Villeneuve) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of amending the Income Tax Act in order to exclude from taxable income all indemnities received by a voluntary fireman in the exercise of his duties, as well as to allow such firemen to deduct from their income all expenses incurred in the exercise of their duties.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the motion before the House this afternoon is of great importance to me and I am sure to all the hon. members, and it is of particular significance to a group of people who show a great deal of courage when protecting the Canadian people against fire, one of their worst enemies.

Mr. Speaker, it is not enough to be Canadian, one also has to have a great deal of courage and determination because fire is one of the greatest enemies anyone may be confronted with nowadays. A few years ago, at my house a fire broke out where eleven people lost their lives. Even though it was 5:30 in the morning and the temperature was 30 to 40 degrees below zero, many people rushed to my place to fight the fire. These people, Mr. Speaker, deserve the support of parliament to carry on this kind of work.

I have received many letters and briefs from volunteer firefighters and also from local governments. That is why, Mr. Speaker, I say that this motion is extremely important at this time. I know that many hon. members will have the opportunity to speak in this debate, but I would like them to refrain from doing what they do in many cases when other motions are before the House of Commons. I know, as the Canadian people do, that some members will rise to support my motion. However in order for my motion to pass and to be referred to a committee, the debate on it would have to be limited because once the one hour period is expired, the motion will be talked out in which case the people I just mentioned, the volunteer firefighters, will be greatly disappointed because, for them, firefighting does not take only courage nowadays, but also a lot of money. They need quite a lot of money to save human lives! As I said earlier, if it were not for them, many people would die in fires. The reason I moved such a motion, Mr. Speaker, is that nowadays many municipalities have enormous difficulty in recruiting volunteer firefighters, as I will prove later by quoting from letters that I have received. It is very difficult for municipalities to recruit volunteer firefighters to help the victims of fires. For instance, I have here a letter from the Amos volunteer firefighters department, which reads as follows:

Following a decision made at our last general assembly—

—on September 22 last—

—it was unanimously decided to send you a request concerning tax exemptions on the wages of volunteer firefighters.

The reason for that request is that we have a total budget of $28,000 for the 30 firefighters who cover fires in our town, whatever the number of fires that we may have to fight and of practices that we may hold, and including preventive measures.

You probably know that the majority of our firefighters are low wage-earners. Moreover, we use our cars to go to the scene of the fire and we often lose personal belongings (watches, glasses, etc.) and damage our shoes and clothing.

They have to send their clothes to the cleaners after just about every fire. The letter goes on:

Another thing is that as concerns our family, each firefighter in turn must be on call during the weekends in the summer.

We must give this service to the people but more than often we do it at the expense of our own families.

Furthermore since you have changed the tax concessions to our members, several of them have resigned.

For all those reasons, we are asking you to give a complete tax exemption to all voluntary firemen or to allow them a minimum of $1,000 before deductions.

In view of the fact that a Canadian citizen with less than $1,000 bank interest is not taxed, we believe this is a reasonable request.

We hope that our representatives will find a solution to this issue.

Thank you in advance for your co-operation.

Mr. Speaker, this confirms what I said earlier, namely that our municipalities have many problems today, specially municipalities with a small population which cannot afford to hire full-time firemen and for which the only recourse is to hire volunteers. Mr. Speaker, perhaps those associations should be told to ask local authorities for an increase in their budget.

● (1712)

Similar associations and particularly volunteer firemen associations are aware of the dilemma now facing already overtaxed municipalities. But those people are benevolent enough to continue going to the scene of fires without always begging their municipality for an increase that would cover part of their expenses, like the cleaning and replacement cost of clothes. We know that when the alarm bell rings the fireman forgets about his clothes and has no time to worry about the expensive suit he is wearing, a suit that might cost up to $200. I think that when the Income Tax Act was applied to volunteer firemen in 1951, a suit cost about $30. Today it costs $200.

This reason would justify a supplementary exemption as mentioned in the letter from the Amos volunteer firemen asking that the present exemption be raised from $300 to $1,000.

I received a letter from the Fire Department of the city of Val-d'Or dated February 24 last and I quote:

We, the volunteer firemen of the Fire Department of the city of Val-d'Or, are making the following request:

The Department of Revenue allows volunteer firemen a $300 exemption on income received during a year and all revenues in excess of that amount are taxable. We want that amount to be substantially increased or that the revenue not be taxable or that we be entitled to the actual expenses incurred in the performance of our duties.

The legislation providing for the $300 exemption was passed in 1951, 27 years ago. Since then all expenses have doubled or even tripled and indexation provisions have not been extended to us.

The work of the volunteer fireman is a part-time occupation and almost a vocation. We must use our own cars to answer urgent calls and our expenses are not paid. You probably know how much it costs to operate a car, and besides, there is a danger involved when we have to drive where to the fire scene. A fireman involved in an accident while driving to a fire has no priority and is held responsible for minor accidents and legal actions resulting from them. Also, the clothes we wear for our regular job are often torn or burned while fighting a fire and we must pay ourselves for these losses.

Let us be realistic! This $300 exemption was reasonable in the 50's, but today this same amount takes us back to the age of the caveman.

We want the Minister of Revenue to study this question and find a positive solution as soon as possible. The work we do is more or less a service we provide to our fellow citizen momentarily in trouble. We receive a small salary which is trivial compared to the services provided and . . .

—by both the federal government and the provincial government—

—we are being taxed.

Our employers co-operate by allowing the fireman to leave his permanent occupation for fighting a fire.

And the next point, Mr. Speaker, is very important.

We want the minister of Revenue to cooperate in his own way by amending the 1951 act.

Which one of you would be willing to battle a fire for just a few dollars an hour on a bitterly cold night and resume his regular work the following morning?

And at this point he emphasized what I mentioned earlier in my remarks:

Let us remember the fire which on January 22nd, 1974 destroyed a house at 5:35 a.m. and took the lives of 13 persons.

—I said 11 but there were actually 13 persons.

There are many other occasions when we endanger our own lives in order to save the lives of others.

Mr. Speaker, many other persons, or associations like the volunteer firefighters association of the city of Noranda made the same recommendations as the two townships which I mentioned.

Mr. Speaker, all these people are giving good services to their communities, is it not only fair that we, as members of this House, reciprocate by complying with their request. Where are more than one or two communities making such a request.

I have received a telegram from the Federation of voluntary fire fighters, Quebec province, which reads, and I quote:

The Quebec Federation of Professional Fire Fighters strongly supports the resolution of the Quebec voluntary Fire Fighters in asking for a tax exemption for the wages earned while engaged in fire fighting. Alfred Morin, president of the Quebec Federation of Professional Fire Fighters.

I have also received from the Canadian Association of Fire Chiefs Inc. the report of its 67 annual conference which was held from the 24th to the 28th of August 1975 at Mississauga. That report contains a resolution drafted as follows: Presented by the section of the voluntary firefighters of British-Columbia fire chiefs association. Topic: Increase in income tax exemption for all voluntary firefighters. In view of the fact that voluntary firefighters must face an increase in their responsibilities and their functions as a result of the rapid increase in population, number of dwellings, and the cost of this essential service to the community that the income tax act which provides an exemption of $300.00 for expenses incurred in performing the functions of volunteer firefighters, has not been updated since its introduction some 27 years ago, it is thereby resolved that the Canadian Association of Fire Chiefs is asking the appropriate ministers of the federal and provincial governments to bring up the exemption to $1,000.00. Recommendations of the committee on resolutions to approve this resolution. Decision of the conference: Approved.

Mr. Speaker, I think that the time has come for this parliament to give some attention to this motion and at least give these people a chance of having their motion referred to the committee.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would like to quote from a letter I have here, under the letterhead City of Rouyn, Volunteer Firefighters, Fire Department, and I quote:

Dear Sir:

Rouyn's Volunteer Firefighters would like to register their strong support for your representations on income tax exemptions for volunteer firefighters.

As you are aware, the current $300 exemption has been in force for a good many years, and it would be fair that the amount be adjusted to current conditions. Some adequate revision would be a big encouragement to volunteer firefighters without whom fire protection could not be made available in a host of communities . . .

For all those reasons, Mr. Speaker, it is important that a member of this House make representations to the government for a solution to a double problem, firstly the recruiting and secondly the retaining of volunteers, since communities are faced with a constant flow of resignations. This must be appraised not only in the light of the few illustrations I have just given, but across the crountry. In the province of Quebec alone there are nearly 4,000 people acting as volunteer firefighters. It is easy to imagine how many people across the land would like to see their services adequately recognized. Because, as they themselves suggest, this is a service to the community, and the federal government is imposing a penalty with an astronomically high tax rate.

As I said earlier, I would not like to see that motion talked out, I would very much like that it be referred to committee. I therefore conclude by asking all hon. members to support the motion, and indeed to refer it to committee.

[English]

Mr. C. Douglas (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, first of all may I congratulate the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) for bringing forward this motion for debate at this time. It is with great pleasure that I rise to take part in this private members' hour and give support to the motion put forth dealing with tax concessions for members of our volunteer fire departments.

The motion asks the government to consider the advisability of amending the Income Tax Act in order to exclude from taxable incomes all indemnities received by volunteer firemen in the exercise of their duties as well as to allow such firemen deduct from their income all expenses incurred in the exercise of their duties.

I have had recent and considerable conversation and correspondence with volunteer firefighters in my particular area. The hon. member for Villeneuve mentioned that many of the fire departments and firefighting associations in his area express a desire that $1,000 be the deductible amount from income tax. While I agree in principle with the resolution, I have to differ with the motion in substance and to this end, at the conclusion of my remarks, I will propose an amendment to the resolution which I hope will find favour not only with the members of this House but with the government as well. I hope it will be accepted for sincere and serious consideration by the government prior to the completion of this debate.

This subject, Mr. Speaker, was recently driven home to me in a serious way when volunteer firefighters in my area began contacting me about a reassessment problem that they were having with Revenue Canada following an audit of municipal books by the tax department. It appears that certain sums of money were unaccounted for, and it was realized that these sums had been given in the form of honorariums to volunteer fire departments. As you can guess, Mr. Speaker, the individual firefighters shortly thereafter began receiving reassessment notices from Revenue Canada. This caused a considerable stir in my section of the country and in many of the small communities served by volunteer firefighting groups.

As a whole I would like to express my sincere thanks to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Guay) and his officials for the consideration they have given to the reassessments and the commitment given to me in writing to limit their reassessments of the tax to the one year period of 1976 from a previous assessment of up to four and five years back in income tax returns. The minister's action was certainly appreciated by myself and by the volunteer firefighters of the county. I do not know how many other hon. members had the same thing happen to them in the last year or so, but I can guarantee to each and every one of them that if and when it occurs they are going to be confronted by a deluge of angry volunteer firefighters at their doors wanting to know what is going to happen about that reassessment.

The firefighters realize, of course, that in many instances they were at fault in not reporting the revenue they had received as volunteer firefighters. They realize, as do the hon. members in this chamber, that all income must be and should be reported as income in their income tax returns. I must add that they honestly and sincerely looked upon those payments, not as an income but as a true honorarium for the services that they unselfishly bestowed upon their communities.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, the basic principle of our income tax law is that generally no deductions are allowed in respect to personal and living expenses. However, exceptions are made where the expense incurred personally by a taxpayer or a group of taxpayers resulted in a social or economic benefit to the community or to taxpayers at large. I must say that no other segment of our population fits into that example as do our volunteer or part time firefighters. They fitted into that example when it was introduced in 1951. They continue to do so today, and will do so with ever-increasing importance in the years to come.

The Royal Commission on Taxation, which undertook an extensive study of the Canadian income tax system some years ago, strongly recommended at that time that this principle be maintained. Therefore, the tax exemption in respect to volunteer firemen was granted as an exception to the rule. The rule was that all income must be taken into account. I strongly believe that our volunteer firefighters across the nation continue to contribute personally to their community with respect to social and economic benefits now more than ever before.

I was surprised and appalled to receive in some of my correspondance with Revenue Canada and the finance department, in answer to one of my letters, this statement which reads as follows:

The tax exemption was introduced at a time when the services of volunteer firemen were very necessary to communities and, in some area, were the only such services provided. Today, these services are generally provided by provincial, municipal or other local governments and the services of volunteer firemen are not as widespread throughout Canada as before.

Now, I ask you, Mr. Speaker, and I ask this House, have you ever heard such utter nonsense? Never before has the volunteer fire service been more important to this country than it is today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas (Bruce-Grey): Take for example, my own county. There is not one full time fire department available to the residents of that county. However, there are some 314 volunteer firemen or part-time firemen, and I must say that they prefer being called part-time firemen rather than volunteer firemen. They have expressed that to me at meetings and individually, and I agree with them. They are part-time firemen as well as being volunteer firemen. They do not see themselves as volunteers. They are part-time professionally trained and professionally competent firefighters. I agree with them in that respect 100 per cent.

These 314 firefighters are divided among 18 departments. They have 30 modern and up-to-date pumpers, and two full time chiefs. Now, in the hands of these 314 men, whether you want to call them volunteers or part-time firemen, rests the protection from fire of property worth $617 million. That is what these 314 part-ime firemen are protecting in my area. They also protect the lives of some 56,000 people. If this is diminishing in importance, I fail to see it.

The county of Bruce is no exception. It is the rule throughout rural Ontario, and I am sure that the member from Huron-Middlesex (Mr. McKinley), who is here, will back me up because his county, as well as the county of Grey, are also primarily protected through the services of volunteer or part-time firemen, with the exception perhaps of Owen Sound. They are also protected mainly by volunteer fire brigades.

All across this land of ours volunteer fire fighters protect the majority of communities. For someone in the department to say this is of diminishing importance makes me wonder why he does not get out and get the feel of this nation from coast to coast. The volunteer fire departments are the backbone of this nation's fire protection. Volunteers are becoming more difficult to recruit and to retain after training. The hon. member for Villeneuve brought this fact to our attention.

In many conversations and letters Mr. Irwin Lobsinger, the Bruce county fire co-ordinator, has pointed out to me that the additional recreation time in our daily lives is depleting the ranks of volunteer fire fighters on weekends and holidays. Also, many people find it necessary to travel away from their community to work in other localities and this means they are only available at night or weekends. People are required who are willing to give their time and talent to protect the community during the day. He also points out that continued red tape and tax harassment will lead to the disappearance of this vital and economical service. If this should happen the increased cost to provincial and federal treasuries, as well as to local communities, would be disastrous. Somewhere, somebody has to pay for this service which is being provided now by part-time volunteers.

Recently I received a resolution from the town of Port Elgin regarding this matter, one which has been endorsed unequivocally by every municipality in the county of Bruce and, I understand, by other municipalities in Ontario. I am in total agreement with the resolution and I should like to read it into the record. It begins as follows:

Whereas allowances given to volunteer firemen are, under existing law, liable for Income Tax, subject to an allowable expense deduction of $300.00 per annum; and

Whereas the services performed by volunteer firemen are in smaller municipalities given at a very economical rate for the benefit of the citizens generally; and

Whereas such allowances will never be in any considerable amount because municipalities paying the same will create permanent fire forces if the expense of a volunteer force renders the same economically feasible; and

Whereas the volunteer firemen are put to considerable expenses and personal sacrifice in the public interest for the following reasons among others:

(a) they are required to report to fires at a moment's notice in whatever clothes they may be wearing at the time—

Anyone who has seen a volunteer fire service at work realizes that firemen show up in what they are wearing when the bell rings, no matter what time of day or night. I have seen volunteer firemen leave a wedding in the clothes they were wearing at the church in order to answer the bell. During one church service in our community the church was emptied because everybody there belonged to the volunteer fire service. The resolution continues:

(b) they are required to use their own vehicles to report to fires

(c) they are not eligible for fringe benefits available to other public employees.

I think that is important. They work diligently and hard, yet they are not allowed any of the fringe benefits that full-time employees of the municipality enjoy. The resolution continues:

(d) they are frequently subjected to deductions from their regular pay.

These are volunteers, most of whom work full-time in the community. A fire has no thought for time, Mr. Speaker. These firemen go when the bell rings and may be away from their jobs up to 24 hours. Deductions are made by the employer for the time they have been off work, in some instances. It goes on:

(e) their usual activities may be interrupted at any time—

Many of the volunteer part-time firemen are small businessmen. In resort areas in the summer they have to close up business if the bell rings and report to the fire station and so lose income at a time when they are liable to get the best returns on their investment. They sometimes lose income for one or two days in order to serve as volunteer firemen. These are the type of people we are talking about—people who give up their own income in order to protect the incomes and lives of others.

The resolution goes on:

(f) they are required to assume the personal risks attendant upon this high risk activity;

In the same way as full-time firemen, they risk smoke inhalation, death from falling timbers, everything that a full-time firemen is asked to risk, including his own life, but they are not given the recognition they deserve. The resolution continues:

Whereas the expense allowance of $300.00 above referred to is grossly inadequate in the circumstance;

I believe that, Mr. Speaker; it is grossly inadequate in the circumstances. Then it goes on:

Therefore be it resolved that recommendations be made to the federal minister of revenue:

(1) that the foregoing expense deduction be increased to $1,000.00

(2) that income tax assessments already made on volunteer firemen's allowances under $1,000.00 per annum during the last four years be waived

(3) that this resolution be circulated to the organization of small urban municipalities, the Ontario Association of Fire Chiefs, all Bruce county municipalities,—

Some other people are mentioned there. What are these part-time firemen asking for, Mr. Speaker? Here I differ with the motion proposed by the hon. member for Villeneuve. They are not asking for unlimited deductibility but that the present $300 deduction be brought in line with the times and increased to $1,000. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Middlesex-London-Lambton (Mr. Condon):

That the motion be amended by striking out all words after "amending the Income Tax Act" and inserting the following:

"in order to exclude from taxable income indemnities received by part-time firemen in the exercise of their duties of up to one thousand dollars, where such expenses and incomes are substantiated by proper T-4 slips issued by duly constituted municipal councils for the purpose of the filing of individual income tax returns by each such part-time fireman.

I believe this amendment would bring the deductions allowed to this very special and indispensable segment of our population into line with today's cost of living. It would encourage Canadians to participate in this honourable and unselfish service so necessary to communities and this nation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, having heard the proposer of this motion and the hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Communications (Mr. Douglas) speak with such determination in the interests of this resolution, I want to indicate on behalf of my party that we support the motion and are prepared to support the amendment in order to get it through private members' hour. Let me put this in perspective. It is fine to have speeches in support of this very commendable motion, but I do not want to witness these speeches past six o'clock. On behalf of members of this party I can guarantee that we will not speak to prevent this matter from coming to a vote. We will vote in support of the amended version as proposed by the parliamentary secretary in order to ensure that this matter does receive the sanction of parliament.

● (1742)

The hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) who proposed this motion indicated during his speech that he wanted to have this matter referred to committee. I think it is in the form of a notice of motion and if we do give our approval in parliament it will be a very strong inducement to the government to act upon it, whether it is the government before this election or after the election. I can tell the House that after the next election I can almost guarantee that we will give sympathetic consideration to this matter.

This motion is very narrow in its application. It deals with one segment of the population in communities across Canada who perform valued services. I will not do anything except second the statements by the mover of the motion, the hon. member for Villeneuve, and the statements made by the parliamentary secretary concerning the value of part-time or volunteer firemen. These people perform outstanding service on little notice and it is fair to say at some considerable expense to themselves. It is one of those motions that has its genesis in the fact that we are facing a period of substantial inflation, one in which it is essential for us as parliamentarians to make sure that our taxation law is as sensitive and responsive as it can be to the various segments of our society. There are certain ways in which the Income Tax Act can be adjusted and amended to have a responsiveness to certain realities in our community.

I am in support of this particular motion because it applies to a very large part of our country which sometimes does not get the attention that it ought to in so far as government and taxation policy is concerned. I am referring to that substantial part of our country outside the large urban areas—rural Canada, if you will. In those areas it is still not considered to be heretical to do volunteer work in the community, to feel a sense of community, or to participate in a variety of ways without adequate compensation and very often without any compensation. It seems to me that we as parliamentarians can try to make the Income Tax Act, by way of example, a little more responsive to improve the fabric of living in rural society. In rural Canada there are some unique problems due to lack of population and lack of funds.

I want to give my unqualified support to the principle contained in the motion as well as to the amendment put forward by the Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications because it refers to a particular segment of the population from communities who give far and above the value of the dollar that they are paid. They provide in parts of our country a service which might not otherwise be available.

I know my colleague, the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Ellis), has a few remarks he wishes to add so I will conclude. I want to ask members of this House who are present today not to allow this bill to be talked out at six o'clock but to resume their seats so the Speaker may put the motion to us for acceptance.

Mr. J. Larry Condon (Middlesex-London-Lambton): Mr. Speaker, I would also like to compliment the member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) regarding this motion. It certainly shows the concern which he has for the firefighters of that particular area, not just those of Quebec but firefighters all across Canada.

Representation from the fire fighters has been sporadic; it has not been a ten-province type of lobby which I am sure would be much more effective. I have a letter from the chief of the Strathroy fire department, which is the town where I live, which says that at the annual fire chiefs' convention held at Oshawa this year the enclosed resolution was passed by the members. The chief stated that he had in turn had his fire fighters' association endorse it as well as the council of the town of Strathroy in that they accepted and approved the minutes of the fire, light and hall meeting where this resolution was introduced. This is the same resolution that was presented by the member for Bruce-Grey (Mr. Douglas), asking that the money deductible should be increased from $300 to $1,000. That is why I fully support and second his amendment.

People in the bigger cities do not realize what the fire department in a rural area does. I am not just talking about rural areas in the farming community, I am talking about small and medium-sized cities. The same problem exists in the area where the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Watson) comes from. All the firefighters there are volunteers. This problem arises not only in small areas but I think can be found all over Canada. These people have certainly been forgotten.

It was mentioned that these men who are volunteers or part-time firemen do lay their lives on the line every time they answer a fire call. I would like to bring to the attention of this House the fact that during a fire in downtown Strathroy less than three months ago two of our firemen came very close to death. As a matter of fact, there were two deaths in that particular fire. These firemen have only dedication in their hearts for the fire department and great concern for people other than themselves. They put themselves in positions of mortal danger every time there is a fire. It is not only the fire that is dangerous to them; with the harsh winters we have experienced recently, getting on a fire truck in icy weather is laying one's life on the line.

I would also like to mention the dedication that is found in the town of Strathroy. In each snowstorm that Strathroy has had in the last two years these firefighters have come to the fire hall and sat all night waiting for a possible fire. They have done this because of the accumulation of snow in the rural area which may make it impossible for them to reach their objective. They are not just waiting for the fire bell but are prepared to put themselves out on weekends, during the week and overnight, when they are working on day shift, to make sure a sufficient number of them are present for the protection of the towns and small villages.

I know that there are two or three more members who wish to speak on this matter but I want to comment briefly on what the member for Bruce-Grey mentioned about correspondence with the revenue department. This was a letter which he received when requesting tax exemption for his own area and I quote:

> The tax exemption was introduced at a time when the services of volunteer firemen were very necessary to communities and, in some areas, were the only such services provided. Today, these services are generally provided by provincial, municipal or other local governments and the services of volunteer firemen are not as widespread throughout Canada as before.

I would like to reiterate what the hon. member for Bruce-Grey has said. Obviously this bureaucrat has never been outside Toronto, Montreal or Vancouver. He has no idea of the situation in rural areas and the smaller towns. This is one of the frustrations we get when we see these bureaucrats sitting in their ivory towers, writing letters like this to people who know better. I was very upset when the hon. member for Bruce-Grey raised that matter.

● (1752)

With regard to the difference between $300 and $1,000, the average amount of fires last year in rural areas and surrounding rural areas was about 60. That includes barn fires and town fires. As was mentioned previously, when the bell rings these people leave work or their houses in any type of weather. They do not take time to change their clothes before they go.

The Strathroy fire department, if I may brag a bit about them, has proven that when the firebell goes, it takes one minute from the time the bell rings to the time they get to the fire. Although it is only a small town of 8,500 that would be an enviable record not just for Strathroy but all of Canada.

In conclusion, I fully support the amendment of the hon. member for Bruce-Grey. I have more comments I could make, but I will close because there are others who wish to speak on this subject.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we give our support to the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) and the proposal he has presented to the House today. It is my view that the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Bruce-Grey (Mr. Douglas) is simply a refinement that we can all accept. Spokesmen for three parties have stated they favour the proposition. I make it four. That makes it unanimous. Let us pass it.

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I enter this debate very briefly. Volunteer fire departments have been a part of my live since I was a small child in the town of Campbellford. When I was mayor of Belleville, I was privileged to work in the Hastings and Prince Edward Fire Mutual Aid, with the township of Hastings and township of Prince Edward working with the city of Belleville. Unfortunately, after that the city of Belleville discontinued its service to the rural areas. As a consequence, more rural fire departments sprang up.

The townships have been very generous with their time and their funds to the extent they can with the very limited budgets they have. For example, in the township of Thurlow, under the guidance of Bob Pearce, we have the "jaws of life", huge hydraulic jaws which is part of their equipment. This is used when there are accidents on the very busy 401 and in other parts of the township. The work these men do is exemplary. It has been spoken of many times in the House this afternoon.

This subject was first brought to my attention by the president of Fire Mutual Aid who at that time was Cecil Neal of the village of Marmora. He asked that this be brought up. I wrote, as others have done. I was not aware of these other letters. I wrote to the department to see whether we could get some relief and received the same answer that others have obviously received. The hon. member suggested that if all fire departments get together, we might get some satisfaction. It might be worth while.

The fire departments in the Hastings and Prince Edward area not only spend their time waiting and servicing fires, but also train and keep their equipment in order. In the totally volunteer fire department in the township of Wollaston, they sometimes have to scrounge for material. The township of Wollaston is very small and has a very small budget. They use a second-hand truck they were able to get from a richer municipality. They use a second-hand generator and a second-hand pump. They have worked on that equipment and they keep it polished and in working order.

As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) said, with all parties having shown their support for this motion it should at least go to committee where we can perhaps convince the appropriate minister that this action is necessary. These men are not asking for a great deal. They are asking only that some of their expenses and a portion of their honorarium, which at best amounts to only a few cents for the work they put in, be taken into consideration when they pay their income tax.

With only four minutes remaining on the clock, I hope hon. members will let this come to a vote.

[Translation]

Mr. Yves Demers (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to rise on such an important matter. As my colleagues have demonstrated, enforcement of the Income Tax Act represents a huge challenge for the government which must collect tax contributions equitably and adapt the fiscal system to this country's changing economic needs. As regards personal income tax, the government tries to establish a fair share of the burden according to each taxpayer's contributive ability and the eligibility of expenses incurred by individuals for deductions geared to earned income. While a deduction lightens the tax burden for individuals directly affected, it increases the burden for taxpayers who will not benefit from it but will have to foot the bill.

I readily understand that some of my colleagues in this House want that $1,000 of the volunteer firemen's income to be deductible. I readily understand their intentions, but I would believe that would be unfair for municipalities which have to pay high salaries to their firemen because municipalities which do pay their firemen have to pay some income tax and the salaries must therefore be very high. I think that if we are to do justice on even basis throughout the country, we might be treating unfairly the taxpayers in larger municipalities who have to pay their firefighters. I have perhaps a suggestion so that both situations would be consistent. The municipalities which have volunteer firemen might increase these indemnities, even if they would become taxable. Then, all Canadian municipalities would be on the same footing.

There is another principle which should be safeguarded, Mr. Speaker. Volunteer firemen are not the only ones who do voluntary work in this country; many Canadians do so either to help senior citizens or hospital patients who need visitors, and there are also all the other Canadians who do some voluntary work in various sectors of our society. I think those people should be granted the same privilege which is now being asked, because they also play a very important part in our society. The reason why I am mentioning these facts is to draw the attention of the House and to suggest that tax measures are extremely complex and we must consider all the other Canadian taxpayers and the impact the proposed measures may have on them. I also want to say that the government has made a sustained effort in that direction, even before the tax reform.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hour allotted to private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

● (2002)

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENTS TO GIVE CERTAIN RIGHTS TO POLICE

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Blais that Bill C-26, to amend the Criminal Code, the Crown Liability Act and the Post Office Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. At five o'clock the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) had the floor and he has 25 minutes remaining.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, before five o'clock I was elucidating the principles upon which the British issued warrants for the interception of communications. The criteria which they emphasized were, first, that the offence must be a really serious one—a lower limit of three years' imprisonment was set for offences which would warrant the interception of communications. In the second place, normal methods of investigation must have been tried and failed or must, in the nature of things, be unlikely to succeed. Third, there must be good reason to believe that interception would result in conviction.

The arrangements concerning the issuance of warrants to security services are similar to those relating to the criminal end of things but the objectives of the security services are quite different. In England the principles governing the issuing of warrants to the security services can be cited in the following terms: there must be a major subversive or espionage activity which is likely to injure the national interest and, further, the material likely to be obtained by interception must be of direct use in compiling the information necessary to the security services in carrying out the tasks laid upon it by the state.

The committee of the Privy Council to which I have referred made two very important recommendations which should commend themselves to the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) in the absence of any provisions in the bill before us similar to those in the British legislation and apparently to those in the United States legislation as well. The recommendation of the Council is found in paragraph 74 of the report and is as follows:

● (2012)

We feel that the outstanding warrants should be reviewed more frequently. We therefore recommend that there should be a regular review not less than once a month both by the Home Office—

In this case that would be the office of the Solicitor General.

—and by every authority that is granted a warrant to intercept. This review should be not only of the numbers of warrants outstanding, but of each particular warrant.

This is the kind of safeguard which the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), myself and other members on this side are very sensitive about. They also recommended in paragraph 75 of their report that warrants should no longer be valid until they are cancelled but that their validity should be for a defined period that appears on their face. Normally this should be for a period of no longer than a month and in no case should it be for a period of longer than two months. If an extension of the validity of a warrant is desired, the reason for this should be sent to the home office for its consideration before any extension is approved.

I draw the attention of the Solicitor General to the fact that this kind of review process is well entrenched in the United States legislation which requires submission of every judicial submission to the joint committee of the Senate and House of Representatives.

The report of the special committee of Privy Councillors dealt with two other rather important features of interception legislation. One concerned itself with the use of intercepted information in the civil courts, and I notice a provision in the bill which is before us, section 178.31, where intercepted communications are admissible as evidence in any criminal proceeding which may be taken against any person. That, as I understand the bulk of United States judicial decisions, is not possible there, and that is specifically provided for in the British legislation. In paragraph 101 of their report the privy councillors who formed a special committee decided, and I quote:

We therefore conclude by recommending that there should be no disclosure of the information obtained on public grounds by the exercise of this great power, to private individuals or private bodies or domestic tribunals of any kind whatsoever.

They went on in paragraph 113 to say:

As we have pointed out in paragraphs 105 and 106, the obtaining of arrests and convictions is not necessarily a major objective of the Security Service. It is therefore not possible to measure the effectiveness of interception as used by the Security Service by reference to arrests and convictions.

That has a direct bearing on the report of the Solicitor General to parliament with respect to the Protection of Privacy Act.

It is therefore not possible to measure the effectiveness of interception as used by the Security Service by reference to arrests and convictions.

So statistics do not necessarily shore up the position of the government with respect to the unobstructed facility of interception by any means. The committee went on:

The evidence we heard overwhelmingly established the following facts:—

1. There are continuous organised and dangerous efforts to spy out secrets of the State.

2. Similar organized and continuous efforts are made to spread subversion and to penetrate the apparatus of the Government and work of high security.

3. The weakest link in this highly skilled and trained chain of espionage and subversion is communication between the agents and persons concerned.

4. Methods of interception are highly effective; they are often the only effective method of countering espionage and subversion and of safeguarding the vital secrets of the State. We received a great deal of direct evidence of the success achieved solely by the interception of communications.

That committee visited a centre where telephone tapping was operated, and the committee members themselves held a telephone conversation which was tapped and recorded by a machine in their presence. There was a very small number of persons supervising that purely mechanical operation, which I do not think is the case here in our system. In paragraph 116 we find the following words:

. . . whether it is relevant to the inquiry in hand or not, whether or not it contains private and personal or even privileged conversations.

This brings us to the whole thrust of the question of the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) when he inquired as to the difficulties inherent in the provision for the opening of the mail of solicitors. In England, it is at the point when the recording is passed to the authorities concerned with the use of interception that the whole content of the interceptions becomes known to officials, whether or not it is relevant to the inquiry in hand, whether or not it contains private and personal or even privileged communications. I will come back to that in a moment when I speak about a matter which the Chair, I think, should be taking under consideration with respect to the matter of privilege to which I referred concerning the rights and immunities of members, and in particular the effect of this bill in so far as the opening of mails in the post offices on these premises, which are not under the jurisdiction of Mr. Speaker but of the Postmaster General (Mr. Lamontagne).

In England, the number of officials who have access to this information is small, "small" compared with the recent disclosure that some 58 copies of a highly sensitive document are being circulated to God knows whom, including file clerks, secretaries and so forth.

In England, in no particular case of interception is the number in excess of three or four carefully chosen officers. They have the duty to select and transcribe only those parts of the material that are relevant to the inquiry in hand. The quantity of relevant material that is thus transcribed varies from case to case. It can be extensive, but in the great majority of cases it bears a small proportion to the total material recorded by the machines. The material that is not selected and transcribed is destroyed. Of particular importance in a nation of 55 million people, with regard to interceptions with respect to security services there are only two officers who have access to that kind of intercepted material. I commend that as a policy which the Solicitor General should adopt.

The final point I have to make is of great concern to all hon. members, and it has to do with how far the provisions of this bill and, for that matter, the provisions of the Criminal Code of Canada with respect to the Protection of Privacy Act should apply to members of parliament. The committee to which I have referred dealt with that specific question, and in paragraph 124 it reported the following:

> Questions have recently been asked in the House of Commons about the propriety of intercepting the communications of members of parliament. We have therefore taken advice upon this matter and considered it. The essential point is whether the interception of a Member of Parliament's letters or telephone would constitute a breach of privilege. This is of course for the House itself to determine.

That is something which is under consideration now by the Special Committee on Rights and Immunities of Members of Parliament under the chairmanship of Mr. Speaker. The report goes on to say the following:

> So far as we have been able to discover, a Member of Parliament is not to be distinguished from an ordinary member of the public, so far as the interception of communications is concerned, unless the communications were held to be in connection with a Parliamentary proceeding.

This is an important phrase which should be considered by the special committee.

● (2022)

Dealing with the question of the interception of members' letters, the British House of Commons expressed itself clearly in a resolution in 1735. This was contained in a report of the secret committee of the House of Commons in 1844. I will not bore the House with the quotation of those words; simply I commend the quotation from the report of the privy councillors who examined this question in 1957 in England. They concluded that this seemed to be a clear recognition by the House of the right of the secretary of state to intercept members' postal packages by the use of an express warrant. So far as we know, this recognition has never been subsequently rescinded or modified.

Then the committee went on to consider how the power to intercept communications should be used in the future. At page 154 of their report, the objections were laid out with respect to civil liberties questions which have been raised. The objections can be summarized as follows: First, the powers of interception are in the hands of state officials. They are exercised in secret, and the extent of the exercise and the purposes for which the powers are exercised are not publicly known. Second, there is some apprehension that the powers may be used to invade private rights and to interfere with the liberty of the subject unnecessarily. Third, the circumstances in which the powers may be exercised do not give to the subject any reasonable opportunities for protest or objection. These are all very valid points.

Paragraph 137 of the report of the privy councillors reads as follows:

> We have examined the exact circumstances in which the powers of the secretary of state have been exercised, in order to see what is the extent of the interference with the privacy of the individual or his liberty, and whether such interference ought to be prohibited for the future, or whether it is necessary or justifiable in the interests of the citizens as a whole that the procedure in force at the present time should continue. The freedom of the individual is quite valueless if he can be made the victim of the law breaker. Every civilized society must have power to protect itself from wrongdoers. It must have powers to arrest, search and imprison those who break the laws. If these powers are properly and wisely exercised, it may be thought that they are in themselves aids to the maintenance of the true freedom of the individual.
> It is therefore most important to observe that from the evidence tendered to us, it is plain that the exercise of the power to intercept communications by the secretary of state has never been regarded as a general power, but as a power, carefully restricted to special and well-defined circumstances and purposes, and hedged about with clearly formulated rules and subject to very special safeguards.

That point was made by the hon. member for Peace River.

I should like to deal with the report of the committee of privy councillors, appointed to inquire into the interception of communications in England, by placing on the record one or two of their summary of conclusions and recommendations. One of the most important was that they recommended that in no circumstances should material obtained by interception be made available to any body or person whatever outside the public service. That safeguard is not in the bill before the House. I urge the Solicitor General to cause the government to introduce that safeguard into the bill.

In its deliberations the committee considered a particular case respecting the interception of communications to a solicitor in England, where the results of that communication were transmitted to the bar council. I am sure the Solicitor General should limit the dissemination of information gathered by the interceptive processes, such as that suggested in this bill, to the public service and the public service only. That is where it should stop.

Another rather important recommendation of this report was that the committee was satisfied that interception should be highly selective and that it should be used only where there is good reason to believe that a serious criminal offence has been or is being committed, or that security interest is involved. Also that committee concluded that only a minimum number of people should have access to intercepted material, either in its original or in its selected form, and that this number is very small. Again I point out to the Solicitor General that the practice in England restricts that kind of information to two officials. I ask him to compare that with the alleged reports indicating that some 58 copies of a security document were disseminated among government services. In a nation of 55 million people, only two officials see the information.

Also I draw the Solicitor General's attention to the diversity of the statistics between a nation that size and one the size of the United States with respect to the number of interceptions as reported by his predecessors in the two previous reports tabled under the Official Secrets Act and the Protection of Privacy Act. The committee in England was satisfied that it was a useful tool for protecting national security. In general principle we agree with that. Also we agree that it is a very useful investigative tool in order to assist law enforcement officers of this country in performing their duties. An hon. member opposite cited the example of a gram of heroin being worth $5 at source and being finally transmitted in this country at a value of approximately $16,000. If the passage of this bill can eliminate that kind of thing, then there cannot possibly be any reasonable resistance to placing that tool in the hands of Canadian law enforcement officers. We feel it will at least curtail that type of thing.

My personal recommendation, which is not made on behalf of my party, is that a review process should be set up along the lines of the recommendations that the privy councillors included in their report. That report indicates there should be a regular review of outstanding warrants, not less than once a month, by the office of the solicitor general and by every authority that is granted a warrant to intercept. That is an essential follow up as a safeguard against abuse.

The committee also recommended that warrants should no longer be valid until they are cancelled, but their validity should be for a defined period that appears on their face. I think this bill covers that, but the period is far too long. They recommended that the cancellation of a warrant by the authority to whom it was issued should be forthwith reported to the home office. In other words, that will be reported to the office of the Solicitor General in Canada. Also it recommended that in future each warrant issued by the secretary of state, which in this case would be the Solicitor General, should specify the particulars set out by the committee of privy councillors.

Another recommendation was that full records showing the details set out by the committee of privy councillors should be kept in the home office in the case of each interception. The reports now filed by the Solicitor General with respect to criminal matters should include far more information than is included now. I understand it may well be against the interests of national security even to publish the numbers which the committee report concluded. Perhaps even the numbers mentioned by the Solicitor General, with respect to security matters in his report under the Protection of Privacy Act or under this bill, should not be mentioned. There is a valid argument for that, but only if the annual monthly reporting goes to him as part of his ministerial responsibility to review the particulars of these warrants issued in respect of national security matters.

● (2032)

A further recommendation is, as I have just stated, that:

> It would be against the public interest for the Secretary of State to give figures of the extent of the interception in communications, for the reasons set out.

That has reference to national security cases.

In respect of a member of parliament, the committee concluded that he is in exactly the same position as any private citizen in regard to the interception of his communications unless those communications were held to be connected with a proceeding in parliament. That is a very important phrase, and the subject matter of the question of privilege I raised some time ago, of which the Special Committee on Rights and Immunities of Members is now seized.

I should like to be able to inform members of parliament of my familiarity with this subject. I have discussed the matter with the Solicitor General in an off-hand way and he is aware that my background is such that I am bound by the Official Secrets Act in respect of any such disclosure. In any event, even if I took advantage of the immunities offered by parliament it would be against my better judgment to familiarize members with my knowledge of those matters. However, the Solicitor General knows whereof I speak. He knows what is going on in this country, and he knows also of the need for giving very serious consideration to the suggestions I have made here and which apparently have found favour in the mother of parliaments.

The interception of communications of a private citizen, whether by opening his mail, by intercepting a telephone communication or by electronic surveillance, which is very highly sophisticated these days, is a deep intrusion into the civil liberties and the private affairs of any citizen. The safeguards are absent from the bill is respect of a review of that process. All that is required of the minister is to produce a raft of numerical statistics, but that is not good enough. In my submission, the review should go at least to the extent it goes in England and in the United States. They go even further in the United States.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Nielsen: I have just two sentences, Mr. Speaker. They go even further in the United States. They have provided that these matters be referred on a regular basis to what in effect would amount to our Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. Perhaps that is not necessary and the suggestion of the hon. member for Peace River is more in accord with what our practice should be. However, that kind of practice should be set up, to be held in camera if necessary, so as not to jeopardize the interests of national security.

The other matter is this. At least in England they have gone to the extent of requiring a review beyond a mere statistical report. There must be a periodic, regular review of the exercise of these extraordinary powers; and they are extraordinary, interfering as they do with the rights and liberties of the subject. There is an obligation by the government of the day to look at the details of the issuance of these warrants in a special committee, in order to establish that they have been validly exercised and that no abuses have occurred. There must not only be no abuse of these powers, but by adopting the English principle, and even the United States principle, there must appear to be no abuse of the exercise of these powers.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre De Bané (Matane): Mr. Speaker, with this bill that seems rather innocuous, I think we are dealing with one of the most basic questions that we were called upon to consider during this session. Indeed, we are studying a bill concerning one of the most basic rights of the citizen, that is his right to privacy.

Of course, we recognize that community life entails some constraints, but I think that before the government introduces a bill designed to infringe upon the basic rights of the citizens, strong and watertight evidence is needed.

Now, what is the situation? The Solicitor General stated, when he opened the debate, as recorded on page 3768 of Hansard:

No one would suggest that the proposed measures themselves are an absolute requirement for the protection of our sovereignty, not any more than those measures relating to drugs are going to solve the whole drug problem in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, the best proof that this legislation is not urgent is that no government in the last 40 years has deemed advisable to violate the secrecy of the mail. Why then such a hurry to introduce this bill when a royal commission is precisely looking into this matter and when the government itself is not sure of its position. And on this point I quote the Prime Minister himself who stated at a press conference on February 10 last:

[English]

If the commission says it is not necessary then it will no longer be authorized. The law will cease existing.

● (2042)

[Translation]

So I wonder why would the government take the liberty of violating one of the fundamental rights of the citizens before obtaining the recommendations of its own commission? It could have asked the commission to produce an interim report but preferred to disregard altogether the commission which was established by the government itself to study this matter. This is, Mr. Speaker, the first reason why I am not prepared to vote for this bill. I think that when we want to infringe on the fundamental rights of the citizens, we should have an overwhelming proof rather than prejudging the reports of a commission saying that the legislation will be revoked if the commission thinks the power which is to be given to the police is dangerous.

The second reason, Mr. Speaker, for which I am against this bill is that for several months we have seen a sad sight, namely different ministers who had to admit that they were unaware of the irregularities committed by the RCMP and, worse still, that this illegal practice had been going on for 40 years. Mr. Speaker, this is an extremely serious matter and as long as hon. members and the population are not convinced that mechanisms have been put in place like in other countries to control the operations of the police, to ensure that everyone is subject to the law, I am not prepared to vote for this bill.

Mr. Speaker, this matter of the fundamental rights of citizens outweighs by far all other considerations. The question to be debated in fact is whether the citizen or the individual comes before the state or not. This is in fact the most important question. Once again, I think that the right to privacy is one of the fundamental rights which is closely related to the freedom of expression, and as stated by the commission formed by some hon. members in England in 1957:

[English]

The report of the committee of privy councillors appointed to inquire into the interception of communications, whether practised by unauthorized individuals or by officials purporting to act under authority, stated that the feeling still persists that such interceptions offend against the usual and proper standards of behaviour as being an invasion of privacy.

[Translation]

But I should like to quote a few interesting excerpts from the official report of the proceedings of the Select Committee of the American Senate which deals with the same subject. For instance, on page 93, Chairman Frank Church is reported as saying to Mr. Helms, Director General of the CIA:

[English]

We are talking about a plan that went on for 20 years that everybody recognized was against the law . . . I am trying to find out why a program like this went on for 20 years, was against the law of the country by every indication we have . . . and all I am trying to find out from you is whether you believe that the CIA does not have to abide by these laws . . .

[Translation]

And the Chairman added:

[English]

In fact, the Inspectors General of your own Agency who looked into the program said that in their estimation it produced very little worth-while intelligence. They were concerned about its illegality, and at one point recommended that it be discontinued.

[Translation]

Again the Chairman is speaking, on page 41:

[English]

Yesterday, we heard from the members of the Inspector General's office of the CIA, an office that conducted periodic reviews of this program and an office which concluded that it was of marginal value, in terms of the intelligence collecting, so much so that it was recommended to the Agency, finally, that the program either be discontinued or turned over to the FBI.

[Translation]

Then, on page 33, Senator Huddleston asked Mr. Osborn, one of the directors general, the following question, quote:

[English]

Do you know of any instances that were cited where it had been helpful to them in carrying out their responsibility?

[Translation]

And Mr. Osborn replied, on page 33:

[English]

Not specific instances, Senator, no.

[Translation]

On page 168, Senator Schwartz asked the following question, I quote:

[English]

Over the course of the 15 years that you received information from the CIA program, the record shows you received some 50,000 copies of letters. Did it lead to the identification of a single illegal agent?

Mr. Branigan, the chief inspector of the CIA, said:

To my knowledge, no.

[Translation]

And to give you an idea of the extent of this program in the United States, I should like to quote from one of Senator Church's statements. I am referring to page 131:

[English]

Beginning in 1953 and ending finally in 1973, the figures show that there was a total volume of letters coming through the New York Post Office that was subject to culling and opening and photographing by the CIA, in this particular program, a total of 28,322,796. Of that number, based as we have heard now on certain watch lists that were established, but in the main, on random selection accounting for two thirds of the inspections, there was a total of 2,705,726 envelopes that were photographed plus 389,324 envelopes that were copied. And the number of those letters that were illegally opened and whose contents were photographed came to 215,820,—

[Translation]

And then he quoted a series of figures.

[English]

I think those figures speak for themselves, that it was a program that not only extended for a great number of years but was also very sizeable.

[Translation)

So, Mr. Speaker, besides it is significant that, as far as Canada is concerned, the only case relating to security that has been mentioned is still the one concerning that Japanese terrorist. In the past several months, we have not heard of any other case. Furthermore, according to the testimony given to the McDonald commission, I think that the opening of that letter was not absolutely essential to the arrest of that terrorist. I might be asked why do I take such an interest in civil liberties, in the liberties enjoyed by each of us, but I do think that basically this is the main concern of all the members in this House.

I will quote a passage from a book published by the government a few year ago, on the type of constitution we would like Canadians to enjoy and which says, and I quote:

The first and foremost objective of the Canadian Federation, according to the government of Canada, is to protect the rights of the individuals. That means first guaranteeing the individual rights of all Canadians. That is a fundamental element of the state: take away those rights and few Canadians will think their country is worth preserving.

That is why, Mr. Speaker, I believe that question to be fundamental and that we do not have the right to say: If the McDonald commission suggests that that power is not necessary, then we will drop the law. I think this is a very ill advised way of doing things.

And in the same vein I must say that it has become obvious that the Keable commission in Quebec that was supposed to look into that question of the protection of individual rights and police compliance with the law, Mr. Speaker, was intended to be used mainly to foster another federal-provincial quarrel. When we consider that 95 per cent of the hearings of that commission dealt with the activities of the federal police and barely 5 per cent with those of police departments coming under the jurisdiction of the Quebec government and when we see how the commissioner was appointed, a young lawyer of 30 who was a member of the party in power. Let us compare with the appointment by the previous government in Quebec of the Cliche commission where a permanent judge was selected to preside over a commission with two other commissioners who were opposed to the government. Now as far as the federal government is concerned, an experienced, independent and permanent judge was selected, a judge who was not afraid to put adds in the newspapers asking the people of this country to inform him of illegalities they could be aware of relating to the federal police. Nothing like that was done with the Keable commission.

So, Mr. Speaker, I am under the impression that when we are dealing with matters of basic rights such as the one which is now before the House and we do not have the right to to use it to foster federal-provincial quarrels. Fundamental rights are essentially rights that no government can touch. And I would like to conclude by quoting the following comment by Ramsey Clark, the former attorney general of the United States:

● (2052)

[English]

Privacy is the basis of individuality. To be alone and be let alone, to be with chosen company, to say what you think, or don't think, but to say what you will, is to be yourself. Solitude is imperative, even in a high rise apartment. Personality develops from within. To reflect is to know yourself. Character is formed through years of self examination. Without this opportunity, character will be formed largely by uncontrolled external social stimulations . . . Few conversations would be what they are if the speakers thought others were listening. Silly, secret, thoughtless and thoughtful statements would all be affected.

[Translation]

So, Mr. Speaker, I think we would be very ill-advised to put a stop to any new infringement upon that fundamental right pending the report of the McDonald commission, and I think we would be well advised to consider what the United States government recently did through the executive order that was made by the President of the United States in the month of January. Concerning that executive order, let me quote an article published in the newspaper Le Figaro of January 29: What is true is that for the first time in the history of the greatest and oldest trade in the world, members of the United States CIA will come from now on under the jurisdiction of the courts. Even when ordered by the President, any surveillance against an individual suspected of spying shall be authorized first under a warrant signed by seven federal judges.

Mr. Speaker, I think that our system happens to be based on the independence of the judiciary which must control law enforcement by the executive, and I think that our tendency to entrust both powers with the government is quite dangerous. Let us not forget what happened last year before the parliamentary committee dealing with the immigration bill, when the deputy minister refused to let cases of rejected applicants be referred to the Supreme Court, under the pretext that Supreme Court judges might be national security risks.

So, Mr. Speaker, for all those reasons, and after due consideration and given the fact that we do not have yet our police forces under proper control, I have decided to oppose this legislation.

[English]

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I should like to commend the hon. member for Matane (Mr. De Bané) for the very sincere way in which he has expressed the civil liberties concerns felt by many members in this House with respect to this bill.

At this time it is not necessary to review all the aspects of the bill. I only want to focus in this brief contribution on the one aspect that provides, for me, the most serious problem, and that is the lack of a judicial warrant for mail opening investigations of national security cases. I am going to be asking the government when this bill gets to the committee either to amend it appropriately or to drop the clause that provides for the legality of mail opening in national security cases. Unless they are willing to do for national security cases what they are willing to do for drug cases, namely, to secure an order of a court and ensure that before anyone's civil liberties are interfered with the court is going to be the ultimate protector of that individual, not a politician or minister or government.

I am going to leave aside the politics of the bill. I am not even going to discuss the motive or why this bill has come before us now. I have several suspicions. I am not going to bother with the question that we are legalizing ex post facto, or with what has been going on and the prematurity of the bill, or discuss the legislation before the McDonald commission makes its report. I am going to accept without argument the rationale advanced by the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) and seconded by the Postmaster General (Mr. Lamontagne) that we need this legislation to catch drug offenders.

I am rather with the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) who expressed some doubt that this new law—if it gets that far—will be an important element in catching drug offenders but I am willing to give the government the benefit of the doubt.

I think all of us want to do whatever we can to end the horrifying spectacle of drug abuse, the trafficking, the ultimate violation of one's human rights by making one a drug addict. Let us go along with that. We remember that the bill provides, for one who is suspected of trafficking in drugs and using the mails to further this process, that when a police investigator wants to have access to that person's mail he makes application, gets an affidavit, secures the information, puts it before a court which is concerned about the authenticity, then it goes to the Solicitor General for his approval. Finally, when the Solicitor General approves it, it is presented to a judge or a superior court in the relative area.

That meets the criteria established by my colleague the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot (Mr. Jarvis) in offering support by our party for this bill. He said that it met the criteria of the specific circumstances of mail opening with adequate safeguards. That is to say, it would be put beyond politics. As far as our institutional system allows, a court will take the responsibility upon a recommendation by the Solicitor General. My colleague for Perth-Wilmot said this will give the adequate safeguards we want.

When we turn to the question of national security and the police seeking a warrant for the acquiring of evidence in such cases, we see that the application started by the director general of the security service becomes then a sworn statement. This sworn statement is presented to the Solicitor General who, once satisfied, issues a warrant for the opening of the mail. We know this follows in the case of the Official Secrets Act. We know that it follows the same precedent set by the wiretapping legislation that drew the distinction between wiretapping to obtain evidence for criminal offences in which a court order would have to be acquired; but in wiretapping for national security cases the Solicitor General's warrant by itself is enough.

Here I come to the reason for this brief contribution. I bring to the subject a non-legal mind and I would like to speak for the laymen of our country who find it hard to understand why in cases of drugs and the suspicion of one trafficking in drugs, in order to open that person's mail a court order is required. Whereas in the case of a person suspected of undermining the national security of our country, which is a far graver offence, the opening of mail belonging to a person in this category can be done solely on the approval of the Solicitor General. That is something which I do not understand.

The Solicitor General asked us to consider the authority he will be given to examine under Section 16(2) of the Official Secrets Act. I read Section 16(2)(c) of the Official Secrets Act:

—activities directed toward accomplishing governmental change within Canada or elsewhere by force or violence or any criminal means;

I want to offer to the House my conviction that that section is a very grave part of the Official Secrets Act. If we are to proceed in our modern society with more and more intrusions of privacy, more and more suspensions of civil rights, then I think it behooves us to amend the Official Secrets Act to take the necessary legislative steps to ensure that it is a court and not a politician who will give the final approval by law for the opening of mail. Unless we do such things, we will not have the adequate safeguards that many members of the House have been calling for.

I come now to the comments made by the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan). He is a distinguished member of parliament and he is also chairman of the justice and legal affairs committee. His contribution to the debate which was made a few days ago I would take quite seriously. He approached this very question as to whether there ought to be a provision in this bill for a court order in cases involving national security as distinct from the approval of the Solicitor General himself. He said that argument could be advanced on both sides. He said it is a narrow decision. We must consider, on the one hand, that the courts are the traditional protectors of our liberty; on the other hand, allowing the Solicitor General to have the final say on mail opening in national security cases would bring us more ministerial responsibility. The hon. member said it is better to put the onus squarely on the government.

In my view, the member for Windsor-Walkerville missed the point when he presented the equation in such terms. He argued that because this is sunset legislation it will expire a year after the McDonald commission report comes in, and we all know that is a long way down the track. It may be 1985 or even much later than that. in any event for a considerable period of time we will have a law allowing the Solicitor General to express final approval concerning national security cases. I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, this arrangement is opening the door even wider to political control in individual security cases.

I would not say the member for Windsor-Walkerville was very strong on the side of the bill. He seemed to be ambivalent, but he finally went over to the side of supporting the bill, giving the Solicitor General the final authority. He asked us in so doing to express our confidence in ministerial responsibility. It is that very question that I am unable to answer satisfactorily to my friend the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville. I cannot give my confidence to this government. I think I would be reluctant to give it to any government, but certainly to this government after witnessing the conduct of the various solicitors general, including the present one who has been stonewalling the House on answers to legitimate questions.

The government has been blaming the RCMP for the government's own mistakes. Innumerable copies of documents have been leaked. Now we find the hon. gentleman for Matane (Mr. De Bané) saying he is opposing the bill, offering his conviction tonight that the public is not at all convinced that there are adequate institutional mechanisms for the protection of privacy in this country. I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member for Matane, in expressing that opinion tonight, is absolutely right.

The very least that should be done is to amend this bill in committee. We should do away with the section on national security entirely. After all, what evidence has been brought before the House that it is absolutely needed now? The weight of the Solicitor General's speech and the entirety of the Postmaster General's speech was on the subject of drugs. Nobody on this side of the House is advancing a counter-argument that we do not need it. We are willing to give him the benefit of the doubt. The hon. member for New Westminster was not very convinced.

I think most of us are ready to give the government the benefit of the doubt on drug cases, to accept that legislation is needed and will probably do some good. No one has satisfactorily explained why we should need it for national security cases. Therefore, in the absence of a strong argument I think all the more opposition ought to be exerted against giving the Solicitor General this monopoly of power. I say that we ought to go after the drug pushers and we ought to do everything we can do fight crime. But in so doing we must answer what has now become for me the classic parliamentary question that we face in this debate. Genuine steps must be taken against terrorism, against crime, against all those factors of modern society that are making our world a dangerous place.

We want to do the right thing to protect society. At the same time, we want to protect civil liberties. We have to find a way to do both. We want to do this job that we as parliamentarians have the very serious responsibility to do. We want to do it in a way that can secure the safety in society which the citizens of Canada expect us to legislate without opening the door to political control in the violation of privacy. That, then, is the question that is involved as we discuss the principle of this bill.

We want to fight crime and protect civil liberties at the same time. Only a court can ensure that we will do this, not politicans. It is imperative that before this bill comes back for third reading this most objectionable feature of the bill be removed. If it comes back without having been removed, I and many members of this House will have a great deal of difficulty giving it any further approval.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak for just a few minutes to confirm the position of this party which was indicated some days ago by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt).

It is our feeling that we must vote against this bill at second reading. I can state our position briefly and clearly. Indeed, some of the arguments that I might have liked to have made were presented very effectively tonight by the hon. member for Matane (Mr. De Bané). I congratulate him on that excellent speech.

Almost everyone who has spoken in this debate has declared that, although there are times when the state ought to have the right to intercept or open mail, it should be done only under appropriate safeguards. Those who have taken the trouble to define appropriate safeguards have made it clear that what they meant was a warrant from a judge.

Most of those who have defended this bill have emphasized the fact that, with respect to requests for opening mail, where the senders or the receivers are suspected of being involved in drug traffic, a warrant has to be obtained from a judge. But in the case of security the situation is quite different. The person who issues the warrant in that case is the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais). It can come about in two ways. On the one hand, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police can request of the Solicitor General that he issue a warrant, or the Solicitor General on his own initiative can issue a warrant. That disturbs and concerns us deeply.

I could take time, but I will not, to recount some of the things we have been through in recent weeks and months. Surely the experiences that we have had underline the necessity for the objectivity of a judge rather than for a decision being made by a member of the executive. It is that fatal flaw in the bill that makes us feel we should not vote for it in its present form.

It is true that the bill is going to committee. It is true that it is theoretically possible for the committee to amend the bill. However, a number of those who have spoken, especially members of the Progressive Conservative party, have said that although they are prepared to vote for second reading of the bill, they will oppose it on third reading unless a change is made so that warrants for opening mail in respect of security have to be obtained from a judge.

We think this matter is serious. We are alarmed about what has been happening recently. As I say, it is too serious to give an affirmative vote at this point. Now is the time to take our stand against the element in the bill that to us is not only a denial of civil liberties, but is a case of putting too much power into the hands of the executive.

That is the reason that we in the New Democratic Party have taken our stand against this bill. We are not against the portion of the bill that deals with drug traffic. We are not against totally the idea that there can be instances in which the state should have the right to open mail. However, Mr. Speaker, we insist that in no case should it be done without a warrant obtained from a judge. Because of that flaw, we feel, as we did at the beginning of this debate, that we must vote against the second reading of this bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I must inform hon. members that if the minister speaks now, he will close the debate.

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief. It has been my pleasure to have heard the large number of participants in this debate. I feel the debate has been constructive. I look forward to a very serious, fruitful and worthwhile discussion in committee.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

There has been a strong expression of approval for the principle of this bill. I appreciate that approval. There has also been some indication of a fear relating to the safeguards. I want to indicate to hon. members that I am reviewing all the suggestions that have been made and I will consider whether there might be some grounds for presenting some amendments.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blais: I encourage all members to look at the debates and the arguments that have been presented. We are dealing with a very serious matter. It is one I have not taken lightly and one that I will not take lightly.

I understand, Mr. Speaker, there is agreement that there be a recorded vote at a quarter to ten. That is agreeable to the government. I understand it is also agreeable to the opposition parties. Upon this recorded vote being called, I understand there is an item of business standing in the name of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) that is ready to proceed. That matter will be proceeded with until a quarter to ten, at which time the division bells will ring and the vote will be taken at ten o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is the House ready for the question?

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I think the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) meant that we should proceed with the item under the aegis of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) now, to be interrupted at a quarter to ten for the taking of the vote. Therefore, we are not ready for the taking of the question until a quarter to ten.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I would like the question to be put now. I have concluded the debate. As I understand it, there will be a requirement for a recorded vote and that recorded vote will be put over until a quarter to ten.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, there is not agreement between House leaders that there be a recorded vote at 9:45 unless five members stand to ask for a vote. I want to bring that to the attention of the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): In my opinion, the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): According to the agreement made a few seconds ago, the vote will be taken at 9:45.

FARM CREDIT ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture) moved that Bill C-29, to amend the Farm Credit Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the Farm Credit Corporation has been administering the Farm Credit Act for close to 20 years. In that time, it has approved over 192,000 loans totalling more than $3.1 billion.

A further indication of the importance of this agency is that it extends approximately 60 to 70 per cent of all the long-term farm credit in Canada. In recent years, private lenders, the chartered banks in particular, have become more active in the general field of farm credit, and more particularly in the area of long-term credit.

I noticed the other day that the Royal Bank has announced a new farm mortgage program. This is in line with something which I, in common with other members of the House, have been advocating for a long time—that the private sector enter the mortgage field. They will be making loans to farmers of up to $300,000 over a period of 15 to 20 years. I want to take this opportunity to compliment the Royal Bank on this project. If more of the private lending institutions would do the same, my job and that of the Farm Credit Corporation would be a lot easier.

I sincerely welcome this increased participation. The Farm Credit Corporation is a long way from meeting the total demand, and unless steps are taken to meet it, the gap will continue to widen. Projections are that it will soon take close to $1 billion per year to meet the long-term credit needs of Canadian farmers.

This bill brings forth a number of amendments designed to update the Farm Credit Act so that Canadian farmers can maintain their position of leadership in the world and increase their productivity level through the wise use of credit.

The major amendments are as follows. First, that the F.C.C.'s capital be increased from $100 million to $150 million, thus increasing the corporation's borrowing capacity to $3.75 billion from $2.5 billion. There is real urgency for this amendment because the corporation's capital will be used up by May 1978. Second, that most age restrictions on lending be removed except for loans to persons phasing into farming. This special advantage would continue to be offered to persons under 35 years of age. Third, that the maximum loan for a single farming enterprise be increased to $200,000 for one qualifying applicant and $400,000 for two or more qualifying applicants.

Before going on to discuss the lesser amendments, let me give the reasons for these three proposals. The present authorized capital of $100 million and the corporation's borrowing capacity of 25 times that, or $2.5 billion, will be exhausted early in 1978-79. The corporation's capital was last increased in 1975 by about 50 percent from $66 million. Between 1971 and 1976, the total value of farm capital in Canada increased from $23.7 billion to $57.0 billion representing an increase of close to 140 per cent. The number of farms with annual sales of $5,000 or more has increased by 18 per cent. The number whose sales exceed $10,000 increased by more then 63 per cent. The corporation therefore needs a significant increase in borrowing power to be able to keep pace with the increase in total farm capital. But it should be noted that the F.C.C. will continue to be restrictive in its lending guidelines in order to stay in line with the government's restraint program. This means that applications will continue to be assessed according to the applicant's need for funds from the Farm Credit Corporation.

Thus, we shall be staying within the guidelines and the intent of the farm credit legislation when it was first brought in; that is, to be a lending organisation which would lend money only to farmers who really needed such assistance and who could not find any other organisation which would lend them the money they required. Sometimes I think that farm credit has departed from that policy.

The second amendment removes age as a qualifying factor for lending limits. Hon. members will recall that when I proposed the 1975 amendments to the Farm Credit Act, the main thrust of that bill was to help young people to get started in farming. Since then, the F.C.C.'s total lending to young farmers has steadily increased. This year almost three quarters of all loans went to persons under 35 years of age. This represents some $410 million.

A great number of farmers, farm organizations and the F.C.C. advisory committee as well as members of parliament have written to me and made recommendations in the past few years. One of the points that constantly comes up is that need does not magically stop at 35. The present amendments extend these advantages to all farmers. Nothing is taken away from the young farmers by these amendments. They simply acknowledge that basic credit requirements do not change on a specific birth date. Experience indicates that the imposition of the 35-year age limit encourages borrowers to rearrange business structures to qualify a spouse or child. This amendment will give more flexibility in meeting real credit needs.

The 35-year age limit would remain on what we now call Part IV or beginning farmer loans, which allow the borrower to retain an off-farm job for up to five years before becoming principally engaged in farming.

We must recognize that capitalization under all its forms is increasing in agriculture. With the farm labour problems of the past and the future, increased mechanization will continue. Many of the costs of technological change cannot be paid for immediately out of current incomes. Time is required.

I wish to remind hon. members that in recent years the farmer has very often been faced with the cost-price squeeze. This cost-price squeeze has forced him to pay for most capital requirements over a substantial period of time. The third amendment therefore deals with increases in lending limits. Under its present legislation, the Farm Credit Corporation can lend up to $100,000 for standard farm loans and up to $150,000 for loans for young farmers. The $150,000 limit for young farmers was set in 1975 and the $100,000 limit for the standard loans was set in 1972. According to Statistics Canada, land values have increased 25 per cent since 1975 and 130 per cent since 1972. Furthermore, a farm today is nearly 10 per cent larger than it was in 1975.

The present loan limit applies to farm units as well as to applicants. Thus, the maximum loan for a farm operated by father and child or by partners is presently $100,000, or $150,000 depending on age. If this bill is approved, the Farm Credit Act would provide a new loan limit of $200,000 per qualifying operator up to a maximum of $400,000 for a farm unit where there are two or more qualifying operators. We feel this will facilitate joint operations, encourage greater efficiency and a smoother phasing-in of the young operator into the family farm business.

This increase in lending limits is presently necessary so that the Farm Credit Corporation can meet the credit needs of Canadian farmers. There are a number of sectors which have become increasingly difficult to finance. For example, a grain-livestock operation of some 1,100 acres in Alberta presently costs about $400,000. In Saskatchewan—let us say on the Regina plains—if one wishes to purchase two sections of wheatland, it would likely cost over $500,000. In Ontario, a 75-cow dairy farm would cost more than $300,000. Cash cropping land of about 200 acres in size in southwestern Ontario would probably cost nearly $300,000 today. These are but a few examples of some typical capitalization requirements on family farms in Canada.

In looking at these proposed amendments some critics will say that raising loan limits, removing the age limits and adding capital for the corporation will have an inflationary effect on land values. There may be a small element of truth to this statement, since the provision of more adequate credit will at all times favour the buying and selling of land. However, farmland gets its value because of its capacity to produce income. It is really economic conditions—that is, the level of income produced—which is the main determinant of land prices, not credit. An increase in the lending limits and removal of age limits only mean that the farmer with the greatest need can more easily compete for the land available.

A small number of other amendments are included in this bill which are designed to streamline the administrative operations of the act. One of these is the use of market value to assess all loans. That is a change. The Farm Credit Corporation presently uses two values in assessing the security it takes, market value and appraised value. Generally, market values are used for young borrowers and the appraised value for older borrowers. Market value is based on recent sales of similar properties, while appraised or productive value is based mainly on the capitalized value of net income. Appraised value is calculated and therefore is a theoretical value which is bound to be confusing.

The use of these different values has been confusing to borrowers and to other agencies as well as to the F.C.C. staff. In recommending the use of market values and repayment ability it is understood that loan limits would be based on the lower of the two. This point should be stressed. No matter how high or low the market value, all loans are determined on the repayment ability of the proposed operation.

We are also going to remove the supervision fee. Under the original act passed in 1969 a supervision fee of $25 was set for supervised loans, those which exceed 75 per cent of the appraised value. The fee is now more of a nuisance than anything else and sometimes gets in the way of establishing good relationships between the borrower and staff of F.C.C. Under the proposed legislation advisory services would be provided only where and when needed and when requested.

With regard to the provision for losses on these loans, the present act has established a reserve where actual losses have been charged. This amendment would allow the corporation to make provision for these losses according to accepted accounting principles. We see no difficulty in this at all. We think that the costs for administering these losses will nearly offset just writing them off.

The last amendment proposes that penalty interest be dropped. It is believed that removal of penalty interest would make the Farm Credit Act more compatible with the spirit of the Interest Act, which prohibits penalty interest except in those acts which specifically provide for it.

Even a higher penalty interest would probably not have the desired deterrent effect because farmers traditionally pay off loans as fast as they can, even when the interest rate is well below the market rate. That is history. In some instances, instead of taking capital and investing it in a trust company or in some long term investment at perhaps 9 per cent, they pay their old mortgages off in full. Some of those mortgages have interest rates of 5 per cent and 6 per cent. They just do not want to be in debt.

In 1978 farmers will face further increases in costs of farm inputs, and the present outlook is for slightly decreased net income. When one considers that these farmers represent a mere 6 per cent of our population yet produce most of the food which all 24 million Canadians consume, as well as food for many millions of people in the rest of the world, and earn about $4 billion in foreign exchange from exports, one can understand the importance of these amendments. One of the tools of our modern economy, credit, must be available to the Canadian provider of food, the farmer.

I also want to mention that loans under the Farm Credit Act are not grants or gifts. Borrowers do enjoy a slightly lower than market rate. The F.C.C. interest rate is presently 9¼ per cent. On a $200,000 loan amortized over 29 years this represents an average of $13,000 in interest payments alone per year. The Farm Credit Act is a tool which gives operators of family farms a chance to make a success of their operations. One need only look at F.C.C. statistics to realize that this opportunity is not taken lightly. Farmers have by far the best repayment record in Canadian society.

I have faith in the ability of Canadian farmers to continue to produce high quality food in an efficient manner. I urge hon. members to show their support for these efforts by giving farmers this needed legislation. I look forward to speedy second reading of this bill and its going to the committee as soon as possible, where we will try to answer all the questions of the members of the committee.

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, because of the limited time we have, I would like to reserve my right to make further comments when the bill is debated at some other time. At the outset, however, I would like to congratulate the new chairman of the Farm Credit Corporation, Rollard Poirier. We are looking foreward to working with him in the days ahead.

From an outsider's point of view, the recent administration of the F.C.C. has been troublesome. It will have to contend with the political move of its head office to Alberta. There has been a very critical internal audit of its operations which has caused some consternation within the corporation and within the farming community. The F.C.C. has gone through some changes in recent months, and the bill we are presently debating will give us a chance to question the minister's officials on these changes. Under the past chairman, Mr. Owen, who was the original chairman of the F.C.C., the corporation ran like clockwork. The corporation has not done so recently, and I contend that that is because there has been political manipulation and meddling which has caused the problems.

In relation to the head office move which I mentioned earlier my party would not feel there was anything wrong with the proposed move to Camrose if it were the result of some formula. The reason for the move is a political one, and in the opinion of my party it should not take place without the establishment of guidelines for the move. Above all, politics should not be one of the criteria followed when making a major decision such as this.

The internal management audit which I mentioned earlier has raised many questions. When this bill is before us in committee we will want to question the minister and his officials on some of the matters which were raised by the audit. We will want to know what recommendations have been made.

There were questions raised concerning poor morale and poor corporation leadership. In the eyes of the staff in the corporation, and also in the eyes of farmers, there was a lack of credibility in management. There was a lack of confidence concerning the leadership in the branches and head office. The management audit made approximately 75 recommendations. Certainly the members of my party want to know what recommendations have been implemented, how the recommendations are working, and what recommendations the government intends to discard. Also it would be interesting to know why the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) kept the audit a secret for such a long time, until in effect it was leaked to an opposition member of parliament.

Basically we agree with the increases set out in the Farm Credit Corporation amendments. At the present time credit is needed desperately with respect to farming. Banks have been important lenders to the farming industry. For the most part, the banks have done a credible job. Chartered banks have been the leading institutions in terms of lending money to farmers over the past few years. Approximately 57 per cent of the total agricultural credit in 1975 was being lent by banks, compared to 43 per cent in 1967. Farmers are suffering from a severe cost-price squeeze. As the hon. minister well knows, and as hon. members of the House who represent rural ridings well know, the index of farm product prices rose by 50 percentage points between March, 1973 and March, 1977. The input costs were up approximately 80 percentage points in the same period.

In order to provide the House with an indication of the increase in costs, hired farm labour has increased by 160 percentage points in the past four years; building replacement costs have risen 92 percentage points in the past four years. Cash receipts from January to July of 1976 were $6 billion. For the same period in 1977, these were down to $5.6 billion. Statistics Canada indicated that in the past three years, 1976, 1977 and 1978, farm incomes dropped approximately 42 per cent. I do not know of any other group in our society that would put up with those figures, other than Canadian agricultural producers.

As we all know, farmers are eternal optimists. One of the reasons the recent agricultural strike in western Canada was so very successful was the deep underlying feeling that agricultural prices certainly must increase. In conclusion, I want to point out that my party is in agreement with most of the amendments outlined by the hon. minister and his colleagues.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

Bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, there was an indication given to the House that we would be dealing with report stage of pipeline legislation tomorrow. Is there someone who can confirm that?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I am advised that is correct.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

MANPOWER—APPLICATION FORMS FOR FARMERS SEEKING OFFSHORE WORKERS

Mr. William Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, I rise tonight to expand on a question that I asked the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) on March 15 relating to offshore labour to assist farmers in my area, fruit and vegetable farmers in particular, and later on tobacco farmers. The question I asked the minister was why the Manpower centres and farm labour pools across Ontario require farmers who apply for offshore labour to sign blank application forms which give Manpower the right to write in wages at a later date without consulting the farmer. The minister said, among other things, one sentence that meant something to me at the time, and it is as follows:

I do not think it is appropriate that they should be signing blank application forms. I will check it out. I thank the hon. member for his representation.

Since then the minister has written me a letter at some length trying to explain exactly what the officials in the Manpower centres have been trying to do. To set the record straight, I should like to read the blank form the farmers were asked to sign. It begins as follows:

THIS IS TO CONFIRM that I understand and agree that the workers I have requested on ORDER NO.....

FOR.....employment

(crop/occupation)

WILL BE PAID at the prevailing wage levels now being determined by the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission . . .

The farmer is asked to sign that without any wage being stated. Surely the farmer has a right to know what wages he is expected to pay before he signs a document such as that.

Farmers are upset about it. Representations have been made to me on many occasions personally, by telephone and in writing. Surely it is not right.

In addition to the principle of the thing, it puts farmers in a very bad situation because in the case of the fruit and vegetable farmers they have already negotiated the price at which the product will be sold. Now they find they do not know what it will cost to produce because the wages have not been set.

In expanding on the question I asked about the way in which applications for offshore labour are circumscribed by certain conditions that the minister and his officials laid down. This brings up the whole question of offshore workers versus Canadian workers. I realize the minister is on the spot with high unemployment all across Canada, and when we ask for offshore labour it looks bad. Let me put the thing in proper perspective, however. Let us understand that less than 2 per cent of the farm labour force for seasonal farm labour is supplied from offshore. That means 98 per cent of the work is already being done by Canadians.

We would not be asking for any help if we could depend on the type of people provided by Manpower from among Canadians who profess to be interested in working on farms. The farm labour pools in co-operation with Canada Manpower Centres are now supposedly screening Canadians who suggest they want to be transported across Canada to work on farms. The directors of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture sent a resolution to the department saying the screening system was totally inadequate. If it were adequate we would not be getting the type of man who comes to work on a farm, works for a day or two and says "I don't like it", then quits and gets transportation back home. That is the reason the farmer is so interested in getting the type of worker he knows will stay, as is the case with offshore workers from the Caribbean Islands, from Mexico, and foreign students.

One thing that has caused farmers to be completely frustrated over this whole matter is the announcement made by the minister in March, I believe, that offshore labour will be admitted into Canada in the same numbers as last year. Every farmer expected to get the help he had last year. Now, when he goes to put in his order he finds the application circumscribed with so many conditions that he just cannot met them. He is totally frustrated.

I suggested to the minister in my second question the other day that for the present, until he gets things ironed out, the same number of offshore workers be allowed in and be allowed to work on the same farms as they did last year. Then the hon. gentleman might sit down with the farmers, or the organizations which represent them, and find out whether some satisfactory method could be worked out for both the farmer who employs offshore labour and the Manpower centres which administer the program.

The government's attitude toward the offshore supplementary labour I have been talking about is really weighted against the farmer. The government and the ministry are looking only at the statistics. Since a great number of Canadians are unemployed, they are bringing in only a small number of offshore workers. After all, there is the human side. On one hand we have a Department of Agriculture which is supposed to assist the farmer; on the other we have another department throwing roadblocks in the farmer's way. The farmer is trying to get his crop off in the most efficient manner so that he may reap a return and maintain a decent standard of living. That is perhaps the root of the problem. I am almost certain, that there is not a single person advising the minister on his manpower program who has ever operated a farm or had to meet a payroll for employees working on a farm. If they did that they would have a totally different viewpoint.

I ask the minister again to take another look at the way this offshore labour program is being implemented. Do not get me wrong, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the type of work that is done by 98 per cent of the labour force who are Canadians, and especially by those who come from the locality in which the work is done. They know what it means to do farm work. They do an excellent job for the farmer. It is those people upon whom we cannot depend who cause the problem.

Mr. Raymond Dupont (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am grateful to the hon. member for having given me notice of the question as to whether farmers have to sign a blank application form for foreign labourers allowing the salary to be filled in at a later date.

In the first place, with regard to the workers recruited under the programs for seasonal farm labourers from Mexico and the Caribbean, wage criteria are detailed in an agreement signed by the employer, the worker and a representative of the foreign government involved. According to the criteria which apply to the 1978 programs, the employer must pay foreign workers the same salary as that paid Canadian workers for the same work, provided that salary is not less than the minimum wage set for that occupation or less than the average wage paid last year for the crop concerned in the province in question.

Employers sign an offer of employment giving details on the work to be performed, and the salary. Because of the delay in establishing pay rates in effect last year in Ontario, employers are now asked, although temporary, to sign offers of employment specifying, under the salary, clause, that they agree to conform to the salary criteria outlined in the agreement between employer and worker. This temporary provision allows people from the Caribbean Islands and Mexico to come to Canada, if their services are immediately required, and simplifies the review of applications submitted by employers to recruit offshore workers who must come into Canada within a short time.

As the hon. member no doubt knows, in recent years some Ontario employers have expressed concern over the way the commission sets the salary rates in effect. I must mention that these rates are based on the market situation. However, they are an essential element of the program and the agreements with foreign countries, which stipulate that workers are not to receive a salary lower than that of other workers, and more so, not lower that the average salary given for that particular harvest. To make sure that information on salary rates is as precise as possible, the commission is this year conducting a general survey in Ontario, so as to find out the real salary received by workers in 1977.

This survey is organized under the federal labour-intensive program and will make it possible to set up a detailed list of actual salaries paid according to the crop and the kind of employment. The survey is directed to both employers and workers; the latter being disseminated throughout Canada, the survey will be completed a little later than expected. The final results will be known in early April, that is well before most applications from offshore workers will be considered. Of course, the employees who already know what are minimum wages in effect in Ontario should have a good idea of the average wages generally paid last year for each crop.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the parliamentary secretary but his allotted time has expired.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—ISRAEL—POSSIBLE CHANGE OF POSITION ON RIGHT TO OCCUPIED TERRITORY

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, it is now some time since I asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) why Canada found it necessary to vote with the United States, Israel, El Salvador and no one else against a motion condemning continued Israeli occupation of the territory of other sovereign states. The minister's reply, while lucid, was something less than precise. He referred to the English text as referring to "occupied territory", as distinct, I presume, from "territories". Doubtless he had in mind UN resolution No. 242, so often referred to by Canadian secretaries of state for external affairs as the very cornerstone and inner shrine of Canadian policy. But rarely does this minister, nor did his predecessors, refer to an integral part of resolution 242 which begins by emphasizing "the inadmissibility of the acquisition of territory by war".

It is all very well for the minister to refer to his growing irritation about "rather senseless UN resolutions." I think he must contain his impatience and remember that the UN is a reflection of a vast and variegated world community and that not all members are great powers or western states. Yet the principle of one-state-one-vote must prevail else we are faithless to the great declarations of equality and brotherhood on which the UN charter is based.

What is much more sad than any interpretations of resolution 242 or evaluation of the UN charter is the grave realization that what I discussed so many weeks ago has done such a major disservice to efforts to bring about peace in the tragically troubled Middle East. The dramatic, genuine and indeed heroic peace mission of President Sadat may have foundered. It did not fail because Mr. Sadat lost heart. It did not collapse because he forgot the most severely harassed victims of the UN creation of Israel, the Palestinians. It failed long before the regrettable, reprehensible, indeed deplorable destruction of the lives of Israeli bus riders by PLO operatives. The grand design for peace conceived and executed by the President of Egypt foundered on Israeli intransigence respecting the withdrawal from settlements in the Sinai and other areas of land which were never turned over to Israeli sovereignty by the United Nations.

• (2222)

In addition, while President Sadat suffered the slings and arrows of some of his Arab brethren, the government of Israel decided and declared that they would establish new settlements, under their control in the Sinai and other areas which were never placed under their jurisdiction.

In the last few days upon the Ossa of sorrow has been placed the Pelion of anguish. The sovereign state of Lebanon has been invaded and hundreds, possibly thousands, of innocent women and children put to the sword or forced to flee in fear and trembling in the face of the mighty Israeli arsenal of naked power.

I hope Canadian peacekeepers will be able to be helpful. I hope that Israel, so often heedless of the resolutions of the UN which created it, will this time listen to the world community. One notes that there is an apparent willingness on the part of the Canadian government to contribute to a peace-keeping force. I fully agree with the concerns expressed by my hon. friend from Victoria (Mr. McKinnon) and re-echoed by the minister this afternoon. But I think it quite unfair and presumptuous to suggest, before the fact, that only those in the north might be non co-operative with the peace force.

There is something familiar in the minister's statement when he says that we have not been asked to make a contribution. In the post-1973 situation it sometimes seemed we were preaching for a call which did not come through all that quickly. Possibly the Arab states question our objectivity on the Middle East situation. On the evidence of our actions and utterances I would not be surprised if they made this reading, despite the fact that the Arabs do not always seem too alert in knowing their friends from their enemies.

I close with an appeal for greater objectivity and a deeper commitment to the real victims in the Middle East. I hope Canada will be able to make a tangible contribution to a Middle East peace. I also hope that neither Israel nor the PLO will refuse co-operation with the UN peace force. They will render both themselves and mankind a disservice if they fail to heed the call for compliance.

[Translation]

Mr. Raymond Dupont (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as indicated by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) in the answer he gave on Tuesday, November 29 to the question of the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie), the government has not modified its position regarding the Middle East.

On October 28, 1977, Canada supported a resolution condemning the Israeli policy of colonization of occupied territories. During the general debate of the General Assembly in the fall, the Secretary of State for External Affairs once again restated the concern of Canada over the colonization policy of Israel and its incidence on a resumption of constructive negotiations toward achieving peace. We continue to be opposed to the creation of colonies in the occupied territories for the main reason that in our opinion, it is detrimental to the conclusion of a negotiated solution suited to the framework of resolution 242 of the Security Council.

On November 25, 1977, Canada voted against the resolution regarding the situation in the Middle East because it contained elements which went beyond the negotiation pattern provided under resolutions 242 and 338 of the Security Council and which prejudged the outcome of discussion under way and negotiations which will eventually take place in Geneva. It is therefore illogical to condemn Israel because it is still occupying territories captured in 1967 because the occupation is simply a result of the absence of a peace agreement. Obviously, one cannot sincerely expect Israel to evacuate territories before negotiations are held. It also goes without saying that the subject of its withdrawal will be an important issue during these negotiations. Furthermore, this resolution called for the participation of the Palestine Liberation Organization. Canada does not recognize the PLO even if it believes that Palestinians have the right to defend their point of view and participate in the negotiations dealing with their own future.

It therefore follows that our votes on these two resolutions are quite compatible and in agreement with the principles we had stated regarding the Middle East. In effect, the first one, under certain aspects, went further than the framework of resolution 242 and was not compatible with the negotiation process mentioned in that resolution. As to the second one, it dealt with an element of the Israeli policy in the occupied territories which, in our opinion, diminished the prospects of a quick resumption of the negotiations and the achievement of peace.

Just some time ago, Canada voted in favour of a resolution of the Security Council calling for Israel to withdraw from southern Lebanon in order to be replaced by a United Nations force set up for peacekeeping purposes in that very territory.

AGRICULTURE—PRICE OF POTATOES LESS THAN COST OF PRODUCTION—ACTION TO ALLEVIATE

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday March 7, I asked the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) to take some action to alleviate the unfavourable effect of low potato prices in eastern Canada this year. This is the fifth time since December of last year that I have raised this serious problem in the House of Commons. Many family farms risk going under if the producers cannot obtain new financing for their operations or if they cannot pay back to the finance companies the sums borrowed last spring for their sowing operations.

I will only mention in passing the payments due to federal and provincial farm credit corporations which are also asking for their money. This spring will therefore be even more difficult for those who want to stay on the farm, but who must now decide whether or not to plant this year, or else to rent or sell their land, which would be a very extreme and difficult solution. With thousands of barrels of potatoes still in storage, with bankers who want to be repaid and not knowing the precise intentions of the government, how can the farmers make decisions which are so important for their operation and their family? The potato producers do not doubt for one moment that the federal government wants to help them, especially the present Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) who has often shown not only a good understanding of the problems of potato production, but who has also reacted favourably and positively in the past to the needs of farmers.

As I stated during the proceedings on adjournment on February 20, the farmers are more than ever aware of the need to establish an organization truly capable of providing a certain stability for markets, and especially for prices. And whatever we might hear from the defenders of consumer interests who complain of all sorts of abuses, sometimes and even often justifiably, we cannot accuse the primary producers of unduly benefitting from our free enterprise system. The potato producer, and I should say rather some potato producers have admittedly obtained relatively high prices for their product in the past, but this has happened only rarely, and mostly because of exceptional circumstances and for limited if not insignificant quantities. On the contrary, in the last 10 years most producers have generally obtained rather low prices, barely sufficient to cover production costs.

I know very few people in this House, if any, who would invest every year $25,000, $30,000, $35,000 or even more in high-quality planting potatoes, fertilizers, fungicides, insecticides, defoliants. I know very few who would invest $60,000, $80,000 or more, according to acreage, in tractors, cultivating machines, croppers, warehouses, without even knowing what nature and the markets hold in store for them. But there are hundreds of them, in my province of New Brunswick, who take that risk. They did so last spring. The result is they got much less on the domestic market for their products than it cost them to produce.

Of course the benefit went to the consumer, who last summer could buy high quality potatoes at a ridiculous price. It is therefore fair, in a federal system such as ours, that the federal government, through the Agricultural Stabilization Board, come in and soon so that potato growers can take difficult decisions for the next crop year so that these decisions become easier, so that those farmers can decide in a sound and sensible way and not lose their shirts. The government, through the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), made a commitment. They must act now, before it is too late for a large number of family farms. Mr. Speaker, time is of the essence.

Mr. Raymond Dupont (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend the hon. member from Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin) for his concern for potato growers in his area.

Mr. Speaker, the problems faced this year by the eastern Canada potato industry are shared by the industry throughout North America. Because of a small increase in the acreage planted and favourable weather conditions, the 1977 crop has been bigger than normal. The shortage in Europe resulted in very good exports last year but that situation did not reoccur this year, hence the producers found themselves in a predicament. A few export outlets in the United States were developed but none of these proved to be of valuable interest for New Brunswick producers. Returns to producers remained between $1.60 and $2 a hundredweight. That level at this point of the marketing season was not enough to cover the producers' production costs. The matter was referred to the Agricultural Stabilization Board and preliminary meetings were held with producers' representatives and provincial government authorities with a view to providing assistance programs.

A few options were considered to offer producers financial assistance in view of the difficult circumstances. Markets in eastern Canada are closely related because of the competitive factors. The volume of potatoes in storage is constantly decreasing. However, the industry will have to make extensive marketing efforts to sell the rest of the crop. The usual method when a crop is being stabilized is to analyze returns to producers after the crop has been marketed. If the provisions of the Agricultural Stabilization Act call for a payment to producers at that time, then the crop is designated under the act and steps are taken for stabilization. The minister has been closely involved with the concerns of the potato industry and indicated in the House that the need for a stabilization program will be considered at the end of the season.

GOVERNMENT OF PAKISTAN URGED TO COMMUTE DEATH SENTENCE PASSED ON FORMER PRIME MINISTER BHUTTO AND ASSOCIATES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, having enjoyed the friendship of the state of Pakistan during my period as prime minister, and having formed tremendous admiration for that country, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move, seconded by the hon. member for Okanagan-Kootenay (Mr. Johnston):

This parliament, having learned of the sentence of death passed on former Prime Minister Bhutto and his associates, is moved by humanitarian concern to urge most strongly that the government of Pakistan choose the option of mercy and commute the death sentence.

Mr. Speaker: The unanimous consent of the House is required for the presentation of such a motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion.

MINISTER TO DIRECT CNR TO DEFER CHANGES IN SERVICE UNTIL CONSIDERATION OF SULLIVAN REPORT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Decisions by Canadian National Railways in Newfoundland to remove ferry service, removal of refrigerator freight cars and changes in coastal service are contradictory and presumptuous to the objectives of the Sullivan commission looking into all aspects of transportation in the province of Newfoundland. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon):

That this House orders that the Minister of Transport direct CNR to defer the announced changes and any further changes of CN rail and coastal service until consideration is given to the Sullivan commission report.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for discussion, pursuant to Standing Order 43, only with unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

MAILING OF LIBERAL PARTY PAMPHLET WITH FAMILY ALLOWANCE AND PENSION CHEQUES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that six million family allowance recipients and old age pensioners will receive with this month's cheque an unsolicited Liberal party pamphlet paid for by the Government of Canada, considering that this pamphlet provides a one-sided, partisan description of the economic policies of the Government of Canada, providing no information about either family allowances or old age pensions, and considering it will cost $100,000 to produce and mail the pre-election pamphlet—money that is being taken out of the tax revenues by the Liberal government—I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House instructs the government to refer this matter to the Auditor General and the Chief Electoral Officer to ensure that this pre-election expense is paid for by the Liberal Party of Canada.

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

SHERBROOKE, QUEBEC—SUGGESTED DECENTRALIZATION OF DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY, MINES AND RESOURCES

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion dealing with an important matter of pressing necessity.

Considering the special situation in Quebec as regards the administration of Bill 101; considering that the federal government intends to decentralize the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources and set up a centre in Sherbrooke; considering that only residents from the vicinity of Sherbrooke or at least from Quebec might work at that centre, thus removing the conditions governing amendments to Bill 101 required by the federal government to encourage families from outside Quebec to move to Sherbrooke, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier):

That the government carry out the decentralization of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources in Sherbrooke, without any prerequisite.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Under Standing Order 43, presentation of such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

CULTURAL AFFAIRS

OPPOSITION TO FILM "THE THREE FACES OF JESUS" BEING SHOWN IN CANADA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Leonard C. Jones (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, my motion is presented as a matter of urgent and pressing necessity and national concern under Standing Order 43. Quite frankly, I believe it is deserving of unanimous support by all members of this House. Whereas steps have been made to import or introduce into Canada the film "The Three Faces of Jesus"; whereas this is Holy Week and all Christian Canadians and good, decent-thinking Canadians of various other religious faiths are concerned with the import, introduction and showing of such a distorted and ill-conceived film in Canada; and whereas there has been a general lowering of the appreciation of the fundamental principles and ideals of Christianity and this film will result in greater depreciation of these basic principles and ideals and the general morals of society in Canada under the guise of freedom, liberty, and permissiveness; and whereas various other nations have already taken steps not to allow the said film in their country; therefore, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte):

(1) That this House go on record as strongly opposing the importation and/or introduction into Canada and showing of the film "The Three Faces of Jesus";

(2) That the Prime Minister, Secretary of State, Minister of Justice, Solicitor General and the Minister of National Revenue use their good offices, in conjunction with the appropriate provincial officials, to cause this film not to be imported, introduced or shown in Canada;

(3) That such other steps as it may deem necessary be taken by the governor general in council—that is, the cabinet—or any of its members to carry out the purport of this motion;

(4) That this motion be acted upon immediately during this Holy Week period prior to Good Friday and Easter Sunday, the saddest and most joyous days in the Christian year.

Mr. Speaker: The unanimous consent of the House would be required, pursuant to Standing Order 43, for the presentation of such a motion for discussion. Is there unanimous consent?

NATIONAL DEFENCE

THEFT OF PUBLIC FUNDS AT CFB OTTAWA NORTH—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 43 concerning a matter I revealed in the House some months ago on the subject of theft or conversion of public funds at Canada Forces Base Ottawa North in the amount of approximately a quarter of a million dollars. Having learned that the RCMP has recently completed their investigation and handed in their report a while ago to the Department of National Defence, I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle):

That the Minister of National Defence make a statement giving full details on this matter, including the amount of funds stolen, the amount of funds recovered, the nature of charges that have been or are being laid against certain parties in and outside the armed forces including the identity thereof; that he assure the House that all such charges will be heard in a civil court wherever military personnel are involved, and not in a secret court martial; and, finally, that he explain why audits that would have uncovered this matter sooner were not held for some years.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for discussion can only be done with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

TRADE

GATT NEGOTIATIONS ON TARIFFS ON FRUIT, VEGETABLES AND HORTICULTURAL PRODUCTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, as is usual on this first day of spring, I rise in my place under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to seek unanimous consent on an urgent and pressing matter, nothing being more urgent and pressing on a day like this than the evidence of spring symbolized by the daffodils from the riding of Esquimalt-Saanich that are being made available to all members in the lobbies today; evidence, further, if we look outside today, that there is a vast range of vegetational maturity in this country of ours, earlier in the west than in central Canada. In view of these circumstances, and because of the current GATT discussions in Geneva, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon):

That this House commend to the current government, and in particular the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, in close consultation with the Horticultural Council, an urgent re-examination of the GATT proposals to ensure that a seasonally and regionally adjusted tariff concept be put forward at the GATT discussions to ensure that Canadian fruit, vegetable and horticultural production, on a regional basis, shall not suffer, thereby protecting the incomes of Canadians whose livelihoods depend on these products.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for debate, pursuant to Standing Order 43, requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

GOVERNMENT ACTION TO REDUCE NUMBER OF BANKRUPTCIES

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance, the "stand pat" minister who seems to be running around the country saying that everything is all right while the country is going down the drain. We note that in the year 1977 we had some 4,000 bankruptcies, an all-time record. In the month of January, 1978, we had 503 bankruptcies, twice that of January 1977. My question is simply this: What is the minister going to do? What special steps is he prepared to take in order to reduce this very alarming trend of increasing bankruptcies?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am very amazed that the hon. member should have put that question. For the last three years he has been advocating a return to the marketplace so that the marketplace could decide who should survive and who should not. I want to remind him that we have established economic policies and guidelines. I am informed that in January there was a big increase in retail sales, as compared with last year. We are hoping that the tax incentives provided in Bill C-11, which was passed by the House last December, will produce the results expected from them.

Mr. Alexander: Judging from that answer, I gather the minister's attitude seems to be "Wait, wait, wait", while the country is going down the drain. I would point out that we are facing an all-time level of bankruptcies and that unemployment is at an all-time high. When will the hon. gentleman have any evidence that the ineffective stimulus he has provided with respect to the economy is working so that the House and the country may know whether or not a budget is needed?

Mr. Chrétien: Again, I am very amazed by the hon. member's question. Most of his hon. friends are telling the public that we are running too big a deficit, but today he is suggesting we should incur an even larger deficit. I wish hon. members on the other side would make up their minds and produce a coherent policy.

Mr. Alexander: All I know is that the Canadian people are getting tired of the minister's complacency, hesitancy, foot-dragging and ineffectiveness.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

LABOUR CONDITIONS

DEPARTMENTAL STATEMENT ON UNEMPLOYMENT FIGURES—REQUEST ACCURATE STATISTICS BE GIVEN

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): I should like to pose a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce—who I hope will be more responsible than the Minister of Finance—regarding unemployment. Mrs. Dagum, who is the economist responsible for seasonally adjusting the unemployment figures, has stated:

There is need for a new definition of unemployment if we don't want to mislead people. I don't think the figures we now have really represent unemployment.

Now that we know the figures concerning unemployment are misleading to a certain extent, will the minister take such steps as are required to ensure that the House and the country get the proper figures? Further, will he discuss this matter with Mrs. Dagum to see that the House is not misled in future?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I would agree we do need a more realistic set of figures by which to gauge unemployment. If the opposition would allow the government to devise a new set of statistics and would not complain about the new system, we might well go ahead.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Oral Questions

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

STEPS TO REDUCE PRESSURE ON BUSINESS CAUSED BY LARGE NUMBER OF BANKRUPTCIES

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Following the release on bankruptcies by Statistics Canada, Dunn and Bradstreet reports that the loss to the Canadian economy is in the order of $800 million, which is twice as much as the figure for 1976. Now that the minister has added to the problem by increasing interest rates, can he tell us whether his department is doing anything to reduce the pressure on business, particularly on the small business sector which is dramatically affected by these bankruptcies?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): The hon. member has not mentioned the fact that interest rates today are .5 per cent lower than they were about 18 months ago, so I do not think he can complain that interest rates have been a significant factor in this situation. As he knows, we were forced to raise the interest rate by half a point some ten days ago, after the spread had been reduced from four points to less than a point with the U.S.A., in order to maintain a situation in which some funds flow into the Canadian economy from outside. To do this we had to enlarge the spread to one point, but we are still far from the four-point spread we were dealing with a few months ago.

● (1422)

Mr. Kempling: Mr. Speaker, there was a first ministers' conference in Ottawa a few weeks ago, and today ten premiers, ten provincial legislatures, more than one million unemployed Canadians and this House are all waiting for the federal response. I want to know when the minister is going to call a finance ministers' conference—I hope not later than next month—to prepare specific proposals for ratification at the next first ministers' conference. When is that conference going to be held?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, since the first ministers' conference, I am disappointed to see that the governments of Newfoundland and Ontario have decided to increase taxes. At least I am not doing that at this time.

Mr. Kempling: It is rather obvious that the government has nothing to offer. Nearly half the bankruptcies recorded in the Statistics Canada report were in Ontario. Will the minister tell the House why, at the GATT negotiations, he has allowed the Canadian negotiators to go in with nearly everything up for grabs, while the American negotiators went in with a list of industries which are to be excluded from the negotiations? Why has the minister not followed through with his promise made at the first ministers' conference to inform the premiers of the provinces of this list Canada is taking into those negotiations?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, there is constant consultation between the federal government and the provincial governments with regard to the GATT negotiations. I am surprised that the hon. member is not taking that into account. We are in a position at this time to make some offers, and we will see what other offers there will be. We will make a final decision when we see what we can gain from those negotiations.

Canada is a trading nation. In relation to its population, it probably trades more than any other country. I think we have to be very careful before we begin too much protectionism, because it is very difficult to sell if we are not in a position to open our markets. That is a position with which the government of Ontario agrees.

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

MAILING OF LIBERAL PARTY PAMPHLET WITH FAMILY ALLOWANCE AND PENSION CHEQUES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of both the Prime Minister and the Deputy Prime Minister, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister. The Treasury Board office confirmed this morning that a piece of blatant Liberal propaganda, a copy of which I have in my hand, is being mailed out to all recipients of family allowance cheques and old age pension cheques. The leaflet contains no information either about family allowances or pensions, but it does contain blatant propaganda about the government's economic performance. Is the Acting Prime Minister aware of this leaflet, and is he aware that Treasury Board confirms it will cost $100,000 to mail? Does he not think this constitutes a clear violation of the Election Expenses Act?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if the leaflet tries to convey the impression the leader of the New Democratic Party suggests, the people who prepared the leaflet would have been well advised to colour it red rather than green.

Mr. Clark: Everything is in the red over there.

Mr. Chrétien: I am not sure that the cost of the leaflet is the cost indicated by the hon. member. I am amazed, because hon. members opposite always claim that we do not make enough information available. When we do, the information is called propaganda. I think the policy of the government is that we should inform the public. I remember that when Mr. Dave Barrett was premier of British Columbia, coloured pictures and propaganda were sent all around the province.

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I have the distinct impression that this government would not recognize a bucketful of slime if it fell into it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1427)

Mr. Broadbent: No member on either side of the House could object if the government sent a leaflet to pensioners which contained information about pensions, or if it sent leaflets about family allowances to people receiving family allowances. I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister, in all seriousness, if he thinks it is appropriate to mail general propaganda about the government's economic performance at public expense of $100,000. The cost was confirmed this morning. Is that appropriate?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I feel it is the government's duty to inform the public. I have not read the document the hon. member has in his possession. I find it strange, however, that the hon. member should object to our providing information to people at the same time we are sending them their cheques. This is a procedure which the government has been following for a very long time whenever it wants to explain its policies.

I have not read this leaflet, but knowing the President of Privy Council, I am sure that the information is meant to illustrate the policy of the Canadian government, not those of a political party.

[English]

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I have a final supplementary. I will quote very briefly from the pamphlet. This pamphlet is going to pensioners and recipients of family allowance. It reads in part:

In coming months, you may go to your doctor or to a provincial hospital, visit a national park or a provincial museum. You will surely watch television or mail a few letters. Remember that federal funds help finance these public services—including those provided by provincial governments.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: Does the minister think it is appropriate to spend $100,000 mailing this pamphlet to pensioners and recipients of family allowance? If he thinks it is appropriate to use public funds in that manner to propagandize his government's economic performance, why does the government not provide equal funds to opposition parties to state their side of the story?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I have listened very carefully, and there is nothing but the truth in what is written there. I think Canadians are entitled to know, when they receive a pension, that it is the people of Canada who pay for it and that those laws have been voted by the parliament of Canada. I think the hon. member would have a point if we were saying that this was provided by the Liberal party, but we have said that it has been provided by the government of Canada. Most of the things mentioned there have been voted for unanimously by this House. No one has ever voted against pension increases or national parks. All hon. members of parliament have voted for those in the past, and I am sure they will do so in the future.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

FINANCE

REASON MINISTER HAS NOT INTRODUCED A BUDGET

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, my question was intended for the right hon. Prime Minister, or in his absence for the Deputy Prime Minister; but in view of the latter's absence, I shall have to put it to the Acting Deputy Prime Minister.

In a statement made during his tour yesterday of the Eastern Townships, the Minister of State for Urban Affairs admitted candidly that that gathering of ministers and Liberal members in Quebec had been organized to increase the Liberal representation in that area. Now, as far as we know, the House has not been prorogued yet and the minister took the liberty of denigrating the parliamentary opposition by claiming that we have been keeping the government from acting. Now, as that is a shameless lie, would the minister tell the House what is keeping the government from getting legislation passed and, in addition, from bringing in its annual budget? Is it because most of the ministers are out politicking in Quebec?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the first part of the question is somewhat unfair to the Prime Minister who left Ottawa today to meet the Secretary General of the United Nations, and even more unfair to the Deputy Prime Minister who, unfortunately, had to stay home because of illness. I have been asked several times before to take over during their absence.

Mr. Speaker, if I were to make observations every time the hon. member for Témiscamingue is not in the House of Commons, I would be standing up all the time. Now, Mr. Speaker, ministers and hon. members of the government have acquired the very good habit of visiting all parts of Canada to meet the people and hear their points of view, to explain our policies and try to establish better communications with the people.

Of course, in the Eastern Townships, there are two ridings which do not belong to us yet but I understand that the hon. leader of the Social Credit Party of Canada is very concerned; he is afraid of losing them—with reason, I think.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary.

As you can see, when a question is asked, they take pleasure in beating about the bush without answering it. Considering that the ministers are complaining in the province of Quebec that the opposition prevents them from legislating, and that when we want to ask them a question in the House, these ministers are not here, I repeat my first question: What prevents the Minister of Finance from introducing his budget now while the opposition is prepared to discuss the budget in the House, however ridiculous it may be?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I think perhaps the hon. member is right. The minister should not have complained about filibustering by the Social Crediters because they are generally absent.

As far as a budget is concerned, I declared several times that I am reviewing the situation and that I shall have a budget when we think the moment is appropriate. I think it would be important to receive the information on the first quarter of 1978 before changing the economic policies announced by the government. It is indeed very surprising that the Conservatives have acquired a new critic for economic matters who said on TV last weekend that I was perfectly right to expect a 5 per cent growth for 1978, while the Leader of the Opposition himself said in Toronto the previous day that nobody would believe my predictions, except for his new recruits.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I can understand why the Liberals should feel the need to dispatch a vanguard three months in advance to try and win two ridings, given the rate of inflation and unemployment that prevail in Canada, but the fact remains that a minister accuses the opposition of being absent from the House and upsetting the parliamentary schedule. So I would ask the minister what he intends to do in the field of finance to rectify now our economic situation, so that we can discuss the question right away. Why does he keep deferring the presentation of his budget?

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

MIDDLE EAST—CANADIAN PEACEKEEPING FORCE

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Yesterday he said he expected that within 24 hours things in Lebanon concerning the interim peacekeeping force would be much clearer. Could he tell the House what the situation is today? Have we been asked for troops and, if so, what kind of troops? Have we offered troops and, if so, what kind of troops?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I hope that with your indulgence I can give a brief answer on all those points.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: So do we.

Mr. Jamieson: If the hon. member will give me sufficient time, I will be glad to answer as fully as possible. The proposed operation is in two phases. The first is an advance force which would consist of some Swedish and some Austrian troops. In that connection, there has now been a specific request to Canada for some logistic support for that brief operation which is likely to take from two weeks to a month. We are examining the proposal in a positive way. The Minister of National Defence, Admiral Falls and I met this morning along with the under-secretary of the department, and we hope we can do something in connection with that particular request.

In terms of phase two of the operation, namely, the establishment of the special force as agreed to by the Security Council, the Secretary General is working on it at the present time. There has not been a request to Canada, and in sor far as we have been able to determine it is unlikely that we will be asked to participate in that activity because of the large number of Canadian forces already in the Middle East region. There are approximately 1,100. There is a general feeling that perhaps the burden might be more equitably shared among various countries.

I am glad to say that we learned shortly before lunch today that Norway, for example, has agreed, I believe in principle and perhaps, indeed, has actually committed itself, to the special force. There is some prospect that France may also be prepared to make a contribution. All of this is very welcome to us as it helps to spread the burden of peacekeeping in that troubled area.

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, I thank the Secretary of State for External Affairs for that full answer. On reading Hansard, I noticed that he omitted to answer one of my questions yesterday which concerned parliamentary approval for moving troops to new peacekeeping tasks. Would the minister state now that as a matter of principle he agrees with Mr. Pearson's principle that no new commitment of peacekeeping should be taken on without parliamentary approval?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, in principle I do not see that there is any particular difficulty with consulting parliament. I have tried in this particular case to put all the facts before the House. I would think it would have to be examined on an individual basis. If, as in the case with phase one as I outlined it, we are simply agreeing to provide some interim logistical support, I would think it is entirely proper to move on the basis of established policy.

I think I have demonstrated that there is no reluctance on my part to consult with the House through committees, in committee of the whole, or in some other way. As to this particular case, I think it is hypothetical at the moment because, I repeat, there is no request before the government.

TRANSPORT

GOVERNMENT ACTION TO FACILITATE MOVEMENT OF GRAIN

Mr. Craig Stewart (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the minister responsible for the Wheat Board, and not only in that capacity but also in his capacity as Minister of Transport. As grain shipments are very slow off the prairies this year, which means that farmers not only face exceptionally low grain prices but also low quotas, and as most grain elevators on the prairies are plugged, plus the fact that the Canadian Wheat Board is 32 million bushels behind in export clearance—I might add that many farmers have grain stored outside, on the ground—can the minister tell the House and the farmers what immediate steps the government is taking to correct this serious situation and get the grain moving?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the statement that we are a certain number of bushels behind is only accurate in relation to some very high targets of exports which we have set. Indeed, our targets are for record exports. The right hon. member for Prince Albert laughs, but that is twice as much as was ever exported in any one year during the time of his government.

We and the Wheat Board are examining every method to improve turn-around, and such matters as possible use of a bulk handling facility at Vancouver in addition to the regular terminals are being looked at. I am confident that as the months go by and the snow difficulties on the prairies are behind us, we will move toward our target and end the year with a record export figure.

Mr. Stewart (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, the figures I used and which the minister questioned are from the president of the Manitoba pool elevators. My supplementary question is as follows: As it is an unfortunate fact that Manitoba granaries are the last to be emptied each year, and as Manitoba farmer's grain deliveries are 9.2 million bushels behind last year, will special attention be paid to this situation particularly before the farmers face the spring thaw and road restrictions?

● (1442)

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I was not questioning the hon. member's figures at all, but just putting them in perspective. When we said last month that we had had a difficult January, we had a January in which we exported a record volume of grain, so the difficulty was somewhat relative. I assure the hon. member that the Canadian Wheat Board and I are extremely sympathetic to the particular difficulties of the Manitoba producers who have had to wait this year for delivery opportunities, because in reaching a record volume of exports the Wheat Board has to try to make use of cars and railway equipment in the most sensible fashion. This means, during the winter season, taking the grain from the farther distant points into Thunder Bay and the east, knowing that when the record movement will have to take place during May, June, July and August, the closer points in Manitoba can be served more efficiently and effectively, with a faster turn-around. It is a difficulty.

I am glad the cash advance programs are available to help farmers. They are very significant. I can assure producers in Manitoba that quotas will be opened very rapidly, not necessarily before the spring break-up but certainly during May, June, July and August.

An hon. Member: Around election time!

Mr. Lang: Before, during and after an election, as we have shown, we have set records every year without regard to that question.

An hon. Member: Same old story.

An hon. Member: Nobody believes you.

IMMIGRATION

STEPS TO ASSIST LEBANESE IN JOINING RELATIVES IN CANADA

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Employment and Immigration? In light of the very serious and, to say the least, sad situation now existing in Lebanon, can the minister tell the House what action his department is taking to assist Lebanese affected by the conflict to join their anxious relatives in Canada, and if special consideration will be extended to those actually in Canada?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for giving me notice of this particular question.

An hon. Member: I think it was the other way around.

Mr. Cullen: I might say that the initiative came from the hon. member, not from my department, for this question.

An hon. Member: You are smiling.

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, cases arising out of the situation in Lebanon will be treated on a priority basis. Those Lebanese presently in Canada, of course, will be looked at sympathetically and no one will be asked to return to that particular region. In addition to that, we will look very sympathetically at other cases of people who want to apply for immigrant status here, and we will consider those who seek employment. We will deal as sympathetically as we can and in an understanding way, given the problem.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

ESTABLISHMENT OF FORESTRY POLICY

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): My question is for the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations. I would like to refer him to the approach made to the federal government during the recent first ministers' conference in support of the establishment of a federal forestry policy, in particular the five-point terms of reference that were enumerated.

Could the minister tell the House whether it is the intention of the federal government to reinstitute a national forestry policy again, a policy which could address itself to the very serious problems that one sector of the forest industry is facing at the present time, namely, the pulp and paper sector?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Mr. Speaker, the minister responsible for forestry is unfortunately detained outside of the House. He might be able to expand further in this respect at a later time. I would like to bring to the attention of the hon. member that under the jurisdiction of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, a sectorial study of the forest industry is being carried on by officials of the forestry department. This sectorial study of the pulp and paper industry is very advanced. If the hon. member wishes to ask further questions of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, he will be able to provide him with more information.

The pulp and paper industry has been identified as an important area in terms of our industrial strategy and there is federal, provincial and private sector consultation at the present time with regard to this whole matter.

Mr. Oberle: Mr. Speaker, it is clearly the intention of all the provinces to require the federal government to re-initiate a federal forestry policy. It is true there are 27 different departments meddling in this very important segment, not only of our economy, but of our lives, our environment and all ecological questions that arise. Can the minister assure the House, today, that the minister of forestry and the environment will assume jurisdiction over the 27 departments and address himself to this very serious matter?

Mr. Lalonde: I would like to say to the hon. member that there is at least a slight exaggeration in the number he has mentioned. As far as the forestry policy of the federal government is concerned, it is at the present time under the direction and control of the minister responsible for forestry. He is also actively involved in consultations, as I have said, with the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce respecting the situation in the pulp and paper industry. I would hope that those consultations, which involve the provinces and the private sector, will prove extremely fruitful with regard to this very important industry.

GRAIN

REASON FOR DELAY IN MAKING STABILIZATION PAYMENTS

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. What is holding up the calculation and payments under the Western Grain Stabilization Act? The minister will know that with skyrocketing prices for farm items, and the fact that the farmer requires his money right now in order to get into production, it is a very important time for him. What is holding up the minister's statement on this particular payment?

[Mr. Oberle.]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, essentially, the calculations take some time. The figures are somewhat complex. I indicated several weeks ago that I expected, perhaps by the end of March, to be able to indicate the nature of the payment and also the timing of the payment. That is still a distinct possibility. There was a significant delay in the reporting of grain receipts by the grain companies. These came in much later than they should, including throughout February and into early March. In order to get all the reports in, we had to impose a March 15 deadline. That has obviously delayed completion of the calculation. But, as I say, I hope within the next ten days to be able to make an announcement.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I know that the minister would not want to be accused of making these announcements and payments just before a federal election; I will not even suggest it on the floor of the House.

An hon. Member: Not Otto.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Listening to him and looking at him, he appears to have been burned again for some reason. I would ask him, in the interest of making this plan more responsive to the realities of western Canada, whether he would give serious consideration to the suggestions made on our side of the House for a more regional approach to the payments, or indeed on an individual basis, so that farmers would get payments on a regular basis and not on a basis dictated by events like national elections every few years.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member may have forgotten that I indicated quite clearly that I would be prepared to work toward a regionally-based plan—indeed, that is written into the bill—but we have not yet come up with a satisfactory system for doing that. The advisory committee, composed of producers has from time to time looked at the question. We do not have a solution to the regional issue. As far as timing is concerned, I indicated at the time the bill was going through the House, and I have indicated year after year since, that the month of April is the right time for a payment when one is due. It is now apparent that this year one will be due for the 1977 year. I am as anxious as anyone to get the amount determined and the payment into farmers' hands.

An hon. Member: Just before the election.

Mr. Lang: I am certainly aware of how badly farmers need cash, particularly at seeding time. I heard the hon. member's suggestion that this payment is related to an election, and it may well be close—

An hon. Member: No!

Mr. Lang: —but for years we have said that the payment should be made in April. I think that is a statement he really should not make, in all conscience—certainly not among friends.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Who do you think you are kidding?

Mr. Lang: I say to him particularly that in this case an election gain is from having the stabilization plan which this government fought for, and got through, to the great benefit of Canadian farmers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: You are something else.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SUGGESTION GOVERNMENT AGENCIES BE PROHIBITED FROM TRADING WITH SOUTH AFRICA

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the fact that the government of Canada recently announced measures aimed at cutting back trade and support for the government of South Africa, and in view of the fact that the government's present campaign against the South African government has shown no appreciable effect so far, can the minister tell this House if his government is prepared to go further by stopping all interaction between any government agencies involved in commerce and trade with the government of South Africa?

● (1452)

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, when I made the initial announcement with regard to various measures undertaken by the government, which I believe was in December last, I also mentioned—and I refer the hon. member to the statement—that there were a number of other matters being considered which fall generally within the definitions he has just outlined, such as the matter of credit, the matter of preference under the Commonwealth preference scheme, and a number of others. Work is continuing on them. I hope to be in a position shortly to indicate whether these measures will be taken, or not, on the basis of what the studies reveal.

If I can have just another moment, I should say that the question of Namibia is one which I have discussed with other western countries. Given the prospect, however slim at the moment, but still a prospect, that we can get a resolution of the basic problems this year, there is a feeling that perhaps we ought not to move in terms of any further sanctions relating to Namibia until the outcome of the present negotiations is known.

Mr. Rodriguez: In view of the fact the minister's announcement to this House and the country was some 3½ to four months ago, and the government has said that the major commercial transactions between Canada and South Africa are handled by the private sector, will the minister tell the House if his government is prepared to discourage support of the South African government by private Canadian companies, by cancelling double-taxation agreements between Canada and South Africa and withdrawing any government money now held on deposit in any Canadian bank involved in loans to South Africa?

Mr. Jamieson: On the first of those queries, that is precisely the matter to which I was referring when I mentioned Namibia. The double-taxation relates to Canadian operations in that particular area. What has been concluded among the foreign ministers of the five western countries in the Security Council is that the principal objective at the moment, on which we worked in New York a month ago, is to achieve a peaceful transition to full power for the people of Namibia, in a peaceful context. That is the number one objective. What we must weigh is whether actions of the kinds which are now being proposed, and have been for some time, would be counterproductive to that effort. If is it determined both can move forward simultaneously, that is the way we will probably go.

Mr. Rodriguez: In view of the fact the matter of Namibia is of grave concern, and the departure from Namibia by South Africa is of concern to this House and the country, I put it to the minister that our concern about the regime in South Africa is based on the fact that the black man and the white man are not equal, and the fact that there is "bantustanization" in progress. Is the minister prepared to take those steps against the regime in South Africa which will indicate that we in Canada are seriously concerned about that philosophy on which its government is based?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I have no hesitation whatever in repeating what I have said on many occasions, that this government—and, I am sure, this parliament and this country—is unalterably opposed to apartheid. We have already taken certain measures. We are prepared and are examining the possibility of going further. It is strictly a question of how far we can go on our own without still greater support from the world community, and at what point such actions become counterproductive to the principal goal of getting apartheid eliminated as a basic principle and achieving freedom for Namibia. Those are just two of the issues involved.

Finally, I should reiterate the point that I would be delighted if this House would debate at some time whether we should go so far as to inhibit private enterprise, private individuals not seeking any support from the Government of Canada, in any dealings they wish to have with South Africa or any other country.

POST OFFICE

MINISTER'S INSTRUCTIONS RESPECTING DELIVERY OF FAMILY ALLOWANCE CHEQUES

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Postmaster General. The executives of the Post Office and the minister seem insensitive to postal workers who are now being suspended because they dared to deliver mail early, namely, family allowance cheques. Were those the minister's instructions? If so, will he now declare them void, because it demonstrates insensitivity toward labourers, workers and carriers in the Post Office?

[Translation]

Hon. J.-Gilles Lamontagne (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, the Postmaster General has never given any instructions as to when a letter must or must not be delivered. It is a matter of internal management, but it is up to the superintendant of each section to decide when the mail must be delivered, especially when the mail consists of letters containing family allowance cheques or old age security pension cheques for which a precise date of delivery is given. We cannot deliver these letters any time we feel like it.

[English]

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I will direct my supplementary question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, in light of the callous answer given by the Postmaster General with regard to the suspension of postal carriers and workers. Will the Minister of National Health and Welfare implement in her department a computer which will set out the date on which these cheques will be negotiable? Those who are carrying the mail are serving Canadians. The performance of the Post Office is now in question. Will the minister implement a program which will set out the date when these cheques can be cashed, so that these people will not suffer loss of pay and embarrassment as a result of being suspended?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I do not understand why this question is put to me since I have nothing to do with the internal administration of post offices. My department always sees to it that an emergency plan allows for cheques to reach their destination if serious impediments ever occur. But we have nothing to do with what the hon. member is referring to.

FINANCE

REASON FOR LARGE BORROWING ON NEW YORK MARKET

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Will the minister explain why he went to the New York market for a $750 million loan, breaking the long-term tradition of federal government borrowing in Canada? Is he opening the way for heavy borrowings in the coming year in the Canadian bond market?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I explained that we decided to go into the American market in order to raise funds in the United States. One reason was that Canadians are not borrowing as they used to in the American market. In addition, this money will be used for reserve purposes.

AGRICULTURE

REQUEST SUBSIDIES BE PAID TO QUEBEC MILK PRODUCERS

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture.

Recently the Canadian Dairy Commission sent a letter to milk producers in Quebec stating:

> We wish to advise you that payment of the milk subsidy on your January deliveries which was to be mailed out this week will be postponed . . . or withheld.

Considering that the decision made by the Canadian Dairy Commission is causing enormous difficulties and could jeopardize the existence of a number of milk producers, does the minister intend to instruct the Canadian Dairy Commission to take the necessary steps so that subsidies be paid to milk producers who need them, as the minister knows?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): As I said in answer to a question in the House the other day, Mr. Speaker, a problem exists between the two dairy groups in the province of Quebec, the group representing the fluid milk producers, which involves about 30 per cent of the milk production in Quebec, and the group representing the industrial milk producers, which represents about 70 per cent of the producers in Quebec. These two groups of producers held meetings over the weekend involving the provincial organizations, farm organizations and the Canadian Dairy Commission. They did not come to any decision. They have to straighten this out.

The Canadian Dairy Commission is responsible for seeing that the stabilization payments go to those who are entitled to receive them. I understand they are going to hold public hearings. I heard this morning that public hearings would be held on the administration of the milk marketing system for fluid milk within the province of Quebec. I am not sure whether they are going to be successful. I was told that representatives of the fluid milk producers would make legal representation to have an injunction served to stop the public hearings. I think public hearings is a good idea.

NATIONAL SECURITY

DISTRIBUTION OF "TOP SECRET" DOCUMENT

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice, who is represented through senior officials on both IAC, the Intelligence Advisory Committee, and SAC, the Security Advisory Committee. In view of reports that 58 documents were circulated, entitled "Canadian-related activities of the Russian Intelligence Service", marked "Top Secret—For Canadian Eyes Only", can the Minister of Justice inform the House whether and, if so, why, at least eight copies of the 58 were distributed to foreign countries? Was this done on ministerial authority?

● (1502)

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, my department is not in charge of the distribution of these documents, but as the Solicitor General so wisely said a little while ago in this House, it would not be proper to outline in the House the distribution of such documents. It is evident there is no purpose in informing those who want to obtain those documents of the method of distribution or to whom they are distributed.

Mr. Jarvis: May I ask the Minister of Justice, who is represented by a top official on each committee, whether it is possible that a document marked "Top Secret—For Canadian Eyes Only" could be distributed to a foreign government or to its agencies, in the absence of ministerial authority and, if that is not the case, which minister is responsible for giving that authority?

Mr. Basford: I will have to take notice of the question as to who specifically directs the distribution of these documents.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Probably the Queen's Printer.

PRIVILEGE

MR. RODRIGUEZ—ALLEGED ELECTRONIC SURVEILLANCE OF HON. MEMBER

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) has several times raised a question of privilege, specifically on March 16, regarding electronic surveillance of members of parliament. He has put forward a motion requesting that an instance of such surveillance in which he was allegedly involved be submitted to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. For the benefit of hon. members I will read the motion:

> That the allegation by one Warren Hart, in a sworn affidavit, that he taped electronically, on one or more occasions, the member for Nickel Belt, together with the admission by the Solicitor General that the said Warren Hart was for a time in the employ of the RCMP, be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, for the purpose of inquiring into the said allegation and the circumstances relating to any such electronic surveillance of the said member, including an inquiry as to what happened to any tapes of the said member that may have been made by the said Warren Hart.

I have suggested, while attempting to deal with this matter in the past, that it is obviously one which is entirely new to our jurisprudence in that there is, of course, no precedent in any of the earlier practices of this House or of Westminster which relate in any way to electronic surveillance. It would have been helpful to the Chair if, in these circumstances, the alleged surveillance had taken place within the precincts of parliament. The case has another dimension altogether when it is alleged to have taken place elsewhere.

On the face of it, it seems to me that the electronic surveillance of a member could be regarded as a form of harassment, or obstruction, or molestation, or intimidation of a member, all of which phrases have been used in our precedents to support the position that such conduct is a contempt of the House. In this case I confess that the novelty of the basic problem, the ingredient that though it happened outside the precincts of parliament that it did occur while the agent allegedly, according to his sworn statement, was under contract to the national police force, are aspects which leave me in considerable doubt.

We have already established the fact that this was not a conflict between statements made or assurances given by the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) to the hon. member with respect to the fact that this man was under no instructions to carry out this form of activity. Nevertheless, there is the ingredient that he was under contract. This has been established and it raises a number of elements which, frankly, puzzle me in deciding whether or not in these circumstances electronic surveillance of the sort alleged might be considered by the House to be an infringement of the privileges or a harassment or a molestation of one of its members in keeping with the terminology used in the past when electronic surveillance did not exist.

In this connection I wish to refer the House to some excellent language contained in the Report of the Select Committee on Parliamentary Privilege dated 1967, in the United Kingdom. I have the reference here and I will table it with my notes today for the benefit of the reporters. The document is dated February 20, 1967, and I call attention to the following passage which appears on page 111:

> From this circumstance it might be inferred that the test applied by the Speaker in deciding whether to give precedence over the orders of the day to a complaint of breach of privilege—or rather to the motion which the Member who has made the complaint desires to move in reference thereto—is, Does the act complained of appear to me at first sight to be a breach of privilege? Rigorously applied, it would mean that no complaint of breach of privilege could ever be entertained unless the Speaker was of opinion that the act or conduct complained of was a breach of privilege. The result would be that the House, which alone is competent to decide whether a particular act is a breach of privilege, would have no opportunity of deciding the question unless the government gave time for its discussion. Borderline cases and arguable ones would be excluded automatically because in such cases the Speaker could not say that he was of opinion that the act or conduct which was the subject of complaint prima facie constituted a breach of privilege.

I ask hon. members to note the phrase "which alone is competent to decide". That is the point I wish to stress. To continue quoting:

> In my submission the question which the Speaker should ask himself, when he has to decide whether to grant precedence over other public business to a motion which a Member who has complained of some act or conduct as constituting a breach of privilege desires to move, should be, not—do I consider that, assuming that the facts are as stated, the act or conduct constitutes a breach of privilege, but could it reasonably be held to be a breach of privilege, or to put it shortly, has the Member an arguable point? If the Speaker feels any doubt on the question, he should, in my view, leave it to the House.

That is the position in which I find myself here. In all the circumstances, I hesitate very much to take away on procedural grounds the possibility of reaching a decision on a subject to which the House might wish to address itself. In debating the motion put forward by the hon. member, members of the House might make valuable contributions to the question of whether or not we should treat this kind of electronic interference in some special way. Indeed, if the House decides in its wisdom that the matter should be referred to a committee for consideration, the committee hearing might result in an indication of the proper attitude which should be taken toward the matter. Therefore, on balance, in the special circumstances which exist here, it is my conclusion that I should resolve my doubt in favour of putting the question to the House at the proper time.

There are other matters to be dealt with this afternoon. There are other procedural matters to be dealt with and further items under Routine Proceedings to be considered before Orders of the Day are called. Perhaps I could let the matter stand over and put the question to the House prior to calling Orders of the Day, until which time hon. members would have the opportunity of reflecting upon what their attitude would be toward the motion.

MR. LAWRENCE—ANSWERS GIVEN BY SOLICITOR GENERAL

Mr. Speaker: The second question of privilege which is outstanding relates to a matter which dates back to February 3, 1978, a question of privilege respecting answers to questions asked during the oral question period. This relates to a series of events beginning when the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) indicated in answer to a question that he did not intend to comment day by day on evidence adduced before the McDonald commission.

This response gave rise to a question of privilege, during the discussion of which I expressed the view that the matter, at that point, was hypothetical and that it should be tested by putting further questions to the minister during that or subsequent question periods. At that time both the hon. member for Rocky Mountain (Mr. Clark) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) made motions to refer the issue to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

At the conclusion of the discussion I expressed the view that, in the final analysis, the House was forced back upon the position that in our practice a minister is not obliged to answer a question and therefore it was futile for the Chair even to attempt to determine the validity of the grounds upon which a minister in any individual case might refuse to make an answer. I also stated it might be useful to reserve judgment on the two motions for an extended period in order to determine exactly what would take place during the question periods which followed.

On March 9 a number of questions were addressed to the Solicitor General dealing generally with administrative procedures involved in the handling of certain secret documents and procedures for the issuing of warrants under the Official Secrets Act. The Solicitor General indicated in reply that he did not intend to comment on those matters, and consequently the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot (Mr. Jarvis) raised a question of privilege and asked that the earlier motions to which I have referred, those of the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre which had been offered earlier, be revived. At that stage I took the matter under further consideration, and I must say that again I can see no way in which the Chair can intervene, since the Chair cannot be called upon to make a value judgment respecting answers given to questions and, of course, cannot under any circumstances compel a minister to make an answer during any question period.

I think also it is understood that the House ought not to seek redress from the Chair in a situation of this kind because to find otherwise, it seems to me, would be to make a shift of ministerial responsibility onto the shoulders of the Chair, which I think all hon. members would consider to be a regrettable development.

In other words, we return to the basic point that since there can be no obligation upon a minister to make an answer, and since such an obligation, if it did exist or if it were capable of definition, would seem to be incapable of enforcement in any given circumstances, in the final analysis on both these motions we are reduced to that basic point, and I must set them aside.

MR. NIELSEN—POSTAL SERVICE

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a very brief question of privilege with respect to how unauthorized material finds its way into the hands of members of parliament. It can be explained simply by my reading a memorandum from my constituency office secretary addressed to myself and dated March 13, 1978, which reads as follows:

> You will find enclosed herewith a House of Commons requisition dated January 17/78 for envelopes which were sent to this office and received on March 7th last, in a blue postal bag addressed to you.
> Today, during my lunch hour, I untied the bag and emptied same of the two parcels. The parcels tumbled out onto the floor along with the enclosed packet of letters which was bound by the rubber band and the yellow square of paper bearing the following postal stamp which reads "COURTRIGHT PM 19 VIII 77 ONT".
>
> Presumably the date was October 19, 1977.
>
> The packet contains 6 letters properly addressed, stamped, postmarked and self-addressed.
> I am sending them to you for your attention by registered mail this afternoon—
>
> I received them yesterday.
>
> —as I feel very strongly that someone in parliament should be made aware of the neglect that residents of Canada receive at the hands of our present postal service. "Service" is not the correct term for this type of error in directing mail. You will note that the 6 letters were sent to Montreal, P.Q., and here I am with them in hand in Whitehorse, Yukon.
> I am certain the senders have been greatly inconvenienced—an understatement, to say the least.
>
> They were received unopened, and they are being returned unopened across the aisle today. I hope that they are not secret material.

POINTS OF ORDER

MR. CAFIK—SUGGESTION PRIVILEGE MOTION BE DEFERRED

Hon. Norman A. Cafik (Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order with respect to the question of privilege with which Your Honour dealt earlier, relating to the question raised by the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) and the suggestion of Your Honour that perhaps we should have a little time to reflect upon it, I wonder if it would be agreeable to defer the matter until tomorrow so that the House leaders can have an opportunity to discuss the most appropriate way of dealing with the question. I suggest this so that we might be able to resolve the issue. It would be helpful to us if we had that opportunity.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I hope we will not delay this kind of matter for another day. There has been quite an appropriate delay during which Your Honour had to read a considerable number of precedents. I think the issues are fairly clear, and I think we can deal with the matter in the normal way today. It is important that it be dealt with today, having regard to the nature of the matter. I hope that the motion will be put and that it will be referred by the House. However, I do not think we should delay another day.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think I should be clear on the practice which would ordinarily be followed. I think hon. members should understand that the question for the Chair is whether a motion put forward by any hon. member at any given time has with it that character of privilege which gives it priority over other business. If the Chair once decides that the matter does affect the privileges of members, the Chair then gives the motion priority on that basis. I think this is an accurate description of what has often been roughly described as prima facie questions of privilege, which is not really an accurate description. In any case, having made that finding, the matter then, by the very virtue of that decision, has priority over other business. If not, then the hon. member is quite often invited to try to reintroduce his motion in the ordinary way. However, in this case, having made that finding, the matter would proceed as a matter of priority over other House business.

If the Chair were to be advised that there had been some tentative agreement or preliminary agreement to defer the discussion to some other time, I would naturally take that into account. Failing any advice or agreement on that basis, I would have to put down the matter as a matter of priority business.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we would not object if there were a deferral for an hour or something like that, but I agree with the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) that the matter has been delayed long enough, that it ought to be dealt with today, and that in the absence of unanimous consent to set aside Your Honour's recommendation, it should proceed today.

Point of Order—Mr. W. Baker

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, I think it would be quite agreeable to our side if there were a delay for an hour so that we can decide, in the interests of all members of parliament, the best way to deal with this. We would be quite agreeable. If there were a specific motion before the House as a result of the ruling—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): There is.

Mr. Cafik: My understanding, and I may be incorrect, is that if it is a specific motion to refer the matter to a given committee, that is one question. If it is a motion which is debatable as a question of privilege without any particular course for the matter to take, I think then there would be reason to have some short delay for consultation between House leaders. It is unclear in my mind at this time.

Mr. Speaker: I think we should all realize that the language of the motion is such that it ought to be examined. That might be useful, bearing in mind that this matter is going to be put on the floor for discussion, if necessary, at some time today. I do not know. I think it is ordinary to expect that it ought to be examined to see whether there might be consent with respect to the disposition of the motion. That might very well be productive, so some short delay might be countenanced. However, I cannot impose that delay or initiate it. I would have to be advised that there is some agreement for delay of a few minutes or an hour or so, and therefore I will attend to other business to see whether there can be consultation and agreement.

MR. BAKER (GRENVILLE-CARLETON)—PARLIAMENTARY APPROVAL FOR PEACEKEEPING FORCE

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I want to thank the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) for delaying his departure from the House for a few moments. I know he is busy.

The hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon) raised a very important point today in the question period, and that was the problem we face with respect to a request which may be made for peacekeeping forces in the Middle East and the relationship of that problem to discussion in this parliament of that matter, which would potentially commit Canadian armed forces from all across the country, from constituencies represented by hon. members in this House. I realize that the issue is tentative, but I also realize that events seem to be moving in such a direction that a request is going to be made.

I wonder if it would be appropriate if I were to suggest, in the course of this point of order, that the Secretary of State for External Affairs study the precedents, particularly the precedent which was created or acted upon in 1973, I believe it was, when a peacekeeping force was sent to Viet Nam. As I recollect it, on that occasion the then secretary of state for external affairs put down a resolution, and there was a day's debate on that matter so that the Parliament of Canada could express itself on what was quite an important thing in terms of the involvement itself and so that the government knew that whatever it did on that occasion, it had the backing of the Parliament of Canada. If something should occur during the Easter recess, between today and April 3, would the minister at least undertake to explore the possibility of putting down a resolution as soon as we come back or, if he cannot do that, would he undertake to consult with the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) so that it might be done shortly thereafter, but before the troops are finally committed?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for having given me as much advance notice as was possible on this matter. I think he realizes that I am at a distinct disadvantage in this particular exchange, because I am not the expert on the rules the hon. member is. On the other hand, I have no quarrel with the premise of the question. It is entirely appropriate that parliament should have an opportunity to be fully apprised of the circumstances under which Canadian forces are committed to various peacekeeping activities. The technique for doing so is one on which I will be glad to consult with the Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen). Also I will look at the very good precedents established by my predecessor, the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Sharp).

I realize, as I think the House and the hon. member do, that there are certain problems with the process because of the necessity, as indeed in the present case, for a degree of confidentiality with regard to what is being proposed. I hope I have demonstrated my willingness to make the House as aware as I can of all the circumstances. I undertake to consider very seriously the proposals of the hon. member in finding out the best and most appropriate way to meet the spirit of what he has suggested.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. DIEFENBAKER—SUGGESTION PRIVILEGE MOTION BE DEALT WITH IMMEDIATELY

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. As I understand it, a few moments ago Your Honour pointed out that precedence should be given to privilege. That matter has not been dealt with and should be dealt with at once, rather than allowing extraneous matters to be brought in now. I take the strongest possible objection to any delay in connection with a matter involving privilege. As Your Honour was most clear and definite in the views you expressed, I feel it is only fair this matter should be dealt with at once. After all, tomorrow we adjourn for a period of several days, and by that time the question of privilege will have been dissipated by the passage of time.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There is no danger of the matter being dissipated by the passage of time. What I have indicated to the House is that I have decided already that the matter contains privilege, and therefore enjoys priority. In my opinion, therefore, it would take priority over any other order of the day. I am taking simply a moment to conclude routine proceedings, which gives an opportunity to see whether there may be some agreement on the motion. If not, then I will call it ahead of any order of the day this very afternoon. There is no danger. I thought we should conclude routine proceedings first, which would allow for some interval in order for reaction to take place, to see whether there might in fact be an agreement to send the motion to committee without debate. I do not know. I am only delaying it for a few moments.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, that may very well be, but that declaration does not give precedence to privilege. The hon. Minister of State for Multiculturalism (Mr. Cafik) seems to be very anxious to make a speech. I know the House will listen with anticipated joy to the revelations he will make. But the fact remains that before this question of privilege can be postponed, there must be consent on the part of the House. Personally I take the strongest possible objection to any delay in that connection.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think I can put the matter another way: when I came into the House I had the option of going through routine proceedings and dealing with questions of privilege at the end. I could have held back my decision just as easily until just prior to orders of the day. That would have put the House at the distinct disadvantage of facing the unexpected discussion of a motion this afternoon without even a few minutes to anticipate. Instead, I have advanced that decision on my part to the beginning of routine proceedings. I have indicated that I would call the matter as the first order of business for the day.

MULTICULTURALISM

ANNOUNCEMENT OF NEW PROGRAMS

Hon. Norman A. Cafik (Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): Mr. Speaker, I wish to inform the House today of new and expanded programs in the Directorate of Multiculturalism. As hon. members know, on October 8, 1971, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) recognized the importance of Canadian heritage by announcing the government's policy on multiculturalism. On that occasion he said:

> For although there are two official languages, there is no official culture, nor does any ethnic group take precedence over any other. No citizen or group of citizens is other than Canadian and all should be treated fairly.

Multiculturalism has two dimensions: vertical and horizontal.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cafik: The vertical dimension is designed to encourage and support cultural pluralism among the ethno-cultural groups—

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Who was the author of your speech?

Mr. Paproski: Who wrote it? Was it John Munro?

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, I know hon. members opposite have very little respect for multiculturalism in this country.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cafik: But I think they should at least listen.

The vertical dimension is designed to encourage and support cultural pluralism among the ethno-cultural groups, while the impact of the horizontal dimension is to ensure that multiculturalism and its objectives are taken into account by the government at all levels.

In terms of the vertical dimension, I am pleased to announce that the government will provide $50 million through the Multiculturalism directorate over the next five years to encourage equal opportunities for Canada's cultural groups to share their rich cultural traditions with all Canadians. The new emphasis of multiculturalism will be "unity through human understanding." Additional resources in this coming fiscal year of $2.5 million will enable the multicultural program to provide support to a wide range of activities which will increase the awareness of multicultural reality in Canada.

National ethno-cultural organizations now will have financial assistance available to them toward their operating costs. Also, special consideration can be given now to projects promoting the integration of immigrants. Increased assistance also will be provided to all Canadian cultural groups for projects aiding in group development, the performing and visual arts, literary publications, and Canadian ethnic studies. Programs currently under way will be expanded so as to provide more flexibility to the unique projects involved.

Over and above the programs administered by the Multiculturalism Directorate, Treasury Board allocates an additional annual budget of $2.4 million to the cultural agencies for multicultural activities undertaken by the National Museum of Man, the National Film Board, the National Library, and the Public Archives. These cultural agencies will continue to enable Canadians to become more aware of our rich heritage.

In terms of the horizontal dimension, the directorate and I are very concerned about the problems of visible minorities, the human rights question, equal opportunities for Canadians of all backgrounds, promoting the concept of Canada's cultural pluralism among all Canadians, and reinforcing Canadian unity.

In over-all budget terms the program, including funding for multicultural acitivities through the cultural agencies, has grown from an amount in 1977-1978 of $8.407 million to $10.196 million in 1978-1979, an increase of 28.8 per cent in this last year, showing the deep commitment of the government to this program. This does not take into account special funds given through other departmental activities related to this important area of public policy.

As the Prime Minister said, "A policy of multiculturalism within an officially bilingual framework is basically the conscious support of individual freedom of choice." We are free to be ourselves. But this cannot and should not be left to chance. If freedom of choice is in danger for some group, it is in danger for all. The objective of our policy is the retention and development of our cultural groups to the degree that a given group exhibits a desire for this. Government aid to cultural groups will continue to proceed on the basis of aid to self-effort.

● (1532)

The special role of the government is to provide opportunities to all Canadians to realize these goals, so that they may retain their values in a free society where Canadians of divergent backgrounds are treated with mutual respect and equality.

Mr. Gus Mitges (Grey-Simcoe): Before I begin my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out that I should have been given the courtesy of receiving much more notice of the minister's statement here this afternoon than I received. Even the courtesy of two hours' notice—a minimum amount of time—was denied me. I hope that the government and the minister responsible will look into this matter and correct the injustice once and for all.

We on this side of the House are not really surprised by the statement made by the Minister of State (Multiculturalism) (Mr. Cafik) here in the House this afternoon. The minister's statement typifies the government's "here today, gone tomorrow" attitude regarding multiculturalism—reaching a crescendo in an election year and then dramatically falling flat on its face once the election is over.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mitges: The government has announced an amount of $50 million for the multicultural program over a period of five years. When this is broken down it amounts to $10 million a year, an increase of slightly less than $2 million a year over the present budgeted amount. A $50 million promise really means only a $2 million possibility. It goes back to four years ago when this government first promised to increase the multicultural budget to $10 million annually. It has taken the government four years and another pending election to reiterate this promise.

I am distressed, as my colleagues are distressed, that this government has time and time again used multiculturalism to manipulate and curry favour with the ethnic communities all across our land, especially in election years. I am sure that this ploy by the government has finally run its course, because our ethnic communities have become wise to the ways of this government and will not be taken in or fooled again.

When you consider that our ethnic communities—and I am referring to those which have neither English nor French as their ethnic backgrounds—represent more than one third of the population of Canada, a budget of $10 million annually is an effrontery of the first magnitude. I am sure it will not go unnoticed by ethnic communities from one end of Canada to the other.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Cafik.]

Mr. Mitges: We in our party have a considerable stake in a true and honest concept of multiculturalism for Canada. This is well evidenced by the ethnic composition of the membership of our party. We have a higher level of ethnic representation than any other federal political party. So, you can understand, Mr. Speaker, that our concern about multiculturalism comes straight from the heart.

In conclusion, I would like to quote from a letter I received today from Dr. Hlynka, a member of the Ukranian Canadian community of Winnipeg. I am quoting him because his thoughts are our thoughts and really the thoughts of all ethnic people in Canada today. Dr. Hlynka said:

> I want to see justice for the cause of multiculturalism in Canada. To my mind that means that all three components of the Canadian nation—English, French, and multicultural—must be clearly and fully recognized . . . in any revised constitution, and in the hearts and minds of all Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mitges: This is the goal, the challenge, and the direction that my party is taking and will continue to take in our constant pursuit and search for equal treatment and justice for all Canadians regardless of their ethnic origins or backgrounds.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I think the most interesting thing about the statement made today by the Minister of State (Multiculturalism) (Mr. Cafik) is its timing. It seems to me that the pattern of announcements concerning multiculturalism in Canada has a lot to do with elections. In 1972 there were many announcements about multiculturalism, and there was a special minister appointed. I might add that that minister did a very good job, and he still sits in the House today. He is the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz).

However, as soon as the election was over in 1974 the minister was booted out of office, and multiculturalism did not have a minister to answer for it in the House. We then had three years of the government's paying absolutely no attention whatsoever to multiculturalism in this country, but, of course, when an election comes up again, we have a new minister appointed. It is just a few weeks before the election call is likely to come, and we have an announcement about more money coming into the area of multiculturalism in Canada. It is blatant partisanship. The government is trying to use the ethnic people in our country as election pawns. It is looking at what used to be a traditional Liberal vote in Canada, and it is nervous about that vote, including the Italian vote in Toronto.

The government believes that it can buy the ethnic people in this country for just a few bucks of their own tax money, and I think that is a very shameful tactic by this government. It is something that the people of this country will not forget.

All of us agree that extra money should be spent on multiculturalism. We have all said that time and time again in the House, but what I am saying is that the timing of this announcement is more than suspicious. The government should be ashamed of this. There are more and more announcements being made now that are strikingly political and strikingly partisan. When you do that on issue after issue, there is going to be more and more cynicism toward all political parties. The most shameful thing about the announcement is its timing, an attempt by the Liberal party to vie for more votes in the coming election.

I was rather surprised by the support of multiculturalism voiced by the hon. member from the Conservative party because I, along with other members of this House, read with great interest that the leader of his party was saying before Christmas that he would consider abolishing the ministry of multiculturalism in this country.

Mr. Paproski: That is not true.

Mr. Nystrom: A good friend in the Senate, Senator Yuzyk, is now organizing a write-in campaign to his leader to try keep the department of multiculturalism intact, should the hon. member for Rocky Mountain (Mr. Clark) become prime minister of this country. The time has come when we should stop playing politics with the people of Canada who come from other than French or English origins and treat them as real Canadians. They are citizens in spite of where they come from, whether it be Europe or anywhere else in the world. They have helped to build Canada and make it what it is. It is about time we realized they are good Canadians and that they have made their contribution, whether they be European or from some other part of the world. Hopefully, along with Canadians of English and French origin they can help us keep this country together and make it a prosperous place in the years ahead.

[Translation]

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, like the two hon. members who spoke before me, I see that this announcement is closely linked to the coming election which is already being fought by ministers and members in the Eastern Townships, particularly in Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, there is no question that the free evolution and fulfillment of all ethnic groups in Canada is a most commendable objective as related quite simply to the human development that every ethnic group is entitled to have. But I see that once again the government is using those self-evident factors to focus attention on its problem of national unity which again it considers as an opportunity of drawing sympathy toward the party which under the circumstances is now running this country. So when they talk about "unity through human understanding" they could have talked a lot more accurately, as my colleague from Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) often suggests, of "harmony through human understanding." That would be more accurate. But since they have had this habit for months of focussing everything on national unity so this problem of national unity will be the exclusive realm of the party now in power, Mr. Speaker, it is always a bit strange to see them use everything to bring all issues back to this fundamental question. Again, it appears on page 3 of this statement as follows:

Multiculturalism

. . . promoting the concept of Canada's cultural pluralism among all Canadians and reinforcing Canadian unity.

They always talk continuously about national unity and the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is going into an election campaign with the thought that he is the only one who can salvage national unity. Mr. Speaker, we share the same view, we all want this essential harmony if our country is to evolve and develop. That is obvious. But we would urge that all decisions made by this government not be tinged with that electoral aspect which kills genuine, good intentions.

Here is another point before I sit down. Multiculturalism should not be assimilated with biculturalism or bilingualism. It will be remembered, and the statement refers to it, that the right hon. Prime Minister was remarkably ambiguous with respect to the distinction to be made between the two. If I consider the quotation of the right hon. Prime Minister that we have here to prove that ambiguity, I will say, Mr. Speaker, that this is typical of the party which is now running this country—ambiguous, opportunist, not knowing how to administer in a really objective way, having brought this country to this culminating point of national crisis and claiming to be the only one able to solve it because perhaps it was the only one to bring it about. So, to quote the right hon. Prime Minister:

A policy of multiculturalism within an officially bilingual framework is basically the conscious support of individual freedom of choice.

Mr. Speaker, that sentence is meaningless. It does not fit into everyday life. To make such a connection is sheer stupidity in my view. There is no connection whatsoever between bilingualism and multiculturalism. Bilingualism is the recognized fact that two languages are used in this country, and multiculturalism is the individual's fulfillment on the basis of what he is. We are all for that, but when they try to confuse the issue so that it means both bilingualism and national unity, clearly the government are once more playing politics.

It is a sad reflection that in an area as factual as multiculturalism, the free evolution and fulfillment of individuals in this country, such a serious issue is used for purely electioneering purposes. This is evident, Mr. Speaker, from the monies that are allocated. Even though they try to swell the amount to $50 million by computing over a five year basis, it is only $10 million a year and no more. And the way prices are going at the current inflation rate, we know full well the practical import of $10 million spread over an area as large as Canada's, a country endowed with so many cultural ethnic groups.

Mr. Speaker, they should also be more specific about including in those groups Canada's Francophones, more plainly the French-Canadians. Because they are not immigrant contributors, but founding partners. Therefore in respect of French-speaking groups of Canadian ancestry, if I may call them, the problem is not the same. There is a question of a basic right issuing prior tenure of the land. So a clear distinction should be made there. French-speaking Canadian minorities that may exist in New Brunswick, Manitoba, British Columbia, and so forth have acquired the same rights as the English-speaking minority in Quebec. So I think those two concepts must not be mingled together, and that is exactly what this quotation from the Prime Minister does, and if I go on reading it will be seen how I am right.

We are free to be ourselves, but this freedom cannot and should not be left to chance.

Now what does that mean again? Well, these are eggs now being laid by the Prime Minister of our country, and they are square eggs, Mr. Speaker. He goes on:

If freedom of choice is in danger for some group, it is in danger for all.

What choice? What is it all about? Does it relate to the distinction to be made between French Canadians and English Canadians? Is it about ethnic groups? What does it have to do with the subject matter?

So, Mr. Speaker, I should like to take the opportunity of this statement to emphasize those points which will have to be clarified and to bring the government to consider much more seriously all the things and all the areas having to do with the free evolution and fulfilment of individuals in this country.

[English]

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I understand that after ministerial statements we are allowed to ask a question or two. I want to ask one question in particular so that there will be no mistake about the stand of this party in respect to multiculturalism. I resent the member of the socialist party bootlegging in what was a complete untruth.

It is a poor thing to register concern about the multicultural aspect of this country by dipping into the taxpayers' pockets in order to pay him off, and I resent that very much. I want to remind the minister that it is his party, through the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the former minister responsible for multiculturalism, and the present minister, who sat on the government side, when this side of the House introduced an amendment to the Immigration Act to bring in the word multiculturalism. This was a positive step and one which would indicate that we in this House recognized the great contribution—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member please ask the question?

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I was just going to ask the question because I saw you out of the corner of my eye and knew I was treading on dangerous ground.

Mr. Cafik: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: The minister says hear, hear! What information does the minister have for the Canadian people now in terms of recommending to the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen), in light of this great concern about the multiculturalism aspect of this country, that he introduce an amendment to the Immigration Act? Mr. Speaker, I see the Attorney General (Mr. Basford) bothering the Minister of State (Multiculturalism) (Mr. Cafik) when I am asking an extremely important question. Where is the respect around here?

The minister promised me that he was going to take this matter up with his colleagues. I should like to know if he has done so in order that an amendment to the Immigration Act, which would be a positive step, would be introduced to insert the word "multiculturalism". This would give some credibility to the minister's concern.

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, I think the matter raised by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) is a legitimate one. There is no doubt whatsoever that the ethno-cultural community—the non-Francophone or non-Anglophone community—put forward strong representations about the inclusion of a reference to the multicultural aspect of our society in the Immigration Act. I was not involved, as I was chairman of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs at the same time. In any event, I am quite cognizant of the genuine desire of the ethno-cultural community to have some substantive base in legislation for the multicultural concept. I must admit that I relate favourably to that genuine concern.

I have indicated previously to the hon. member for Hamilton West that I was looking into the possibilities of dealing with this question. Now that the Immigration Act is a fact of law there are better ways of looking at this question in order to achieve more substantive references to multiculturalism. It has been suggested, not only in this House but by the public generally, that there may be some desirability to refer to multiculturalism in any new constitution that might be brought forward. Quite clearly that would be one of the most significant ways that one could give recognition to this concept in the law and in the constitution itself. That is one avenue to consider. There are other avenues that should be considered.

Should we have a legislative base for multiculturalism itself by virtue of a special act of parliament which would promote programs and develop concepts? I believe that is an area where more significant achievement could be made than by opening up the Immigration Act and making a reference specifically in that act. I would draw to the hon. member's attention that the concerns of this House, and the concerns of the public at large, are my concern. I am addressing myself to this question so that we can give important and symbolic recognition to the multicultural dimension of Canada, which is a pragmatic reality of our nation. Whether to do that in terms of legislation or acts of parliament is a useful matter to consider. My directorate is actively pursuing ways and means by which this may be better done in order to achieve the objectives which have been brought to my attention.

Mr. Alexander: That was very interesting, very interesting but to me it is still foot dragging. We are talking about a constitution, which I understand the minister just stole from a spokesman for our party. We are talking about a special act. The way this government moves leaves a lot to be desired. It is very well for the minister to stand up and be so oratorically brilliant, which has not moved me one bit.

It would be very easy for the minister to get the consent of his colleague, the Minister of Employment and Immigration, to bring in this one very simple immigration matter to give it some credibility. That is what I am asking the minister. I appreciate him saying that we can amend the constitution. When is that going to be? I want concrete action now. The minister talks about a special act or special acts. When will that occur? I want action now. Surely the minister can consider with some sympathy the submission which I am making at the moment. In this way he will have credibility. If he does not accept it, Mr. Speaker, with all due respect and in light of the great love I have for my colleague, I believe he will have destroyed his credibility. He should take concrete steps immediately and at least start with the Immigration Act.

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member is deeply concerned about the credibility of myself as a minister, and of the department or Directorate of Multiculturalism, I am sure he could take many positive steps to assure that particular desirable objective. I would appreciate any support that he could offer. But it would seem to me that the hon. member ought to be as much concerned about substantive achievements to ensure the well-being of the ethno-cultural communities and that they are brought fully and equally into our society as he would be about the symbolic matter to which he seems to be attaching so much importance. If we were to put the words which the hon. member has in mind into the Immigration Act, I do not think it would make one iota of difference in terms of the application of that act. I think the hon. member would recognize that—

Mr. Alexander: I do not.

Mr. Cafik: You may not recognize it, but I thought being a lawyer you ought to. In any event, it seems to me that when we look at the increase now of about 28.8 per cent in multicultural budgeting this year in a time of restraint, the hon. member would recognize that indicates in itself the sincerity with which we address this important question. I would think the ethno-cultural communities are prepared to accept delivery of hard facts and programs for their benefit as evidence of our credibility rather than the pious words of any hon. member who is locked in to such symbolic gestures.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If we have another question, I think we ought to keep it brief.

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a very simple question for the minister which he should be able to answer briefly. He is speaking here of a budget of $50 million over five years. That means there will be an average budget of $10 million a year. He goes on in his statement to indicate that the budget in this election year will be $10.196 million, higher than the average. Taking account of inflation which this government has not quite wrestled to the ground, that means, given an aggregate of $50 million over a five-year period, there will be a diminution, a winding down of the expenditures contemplated by the Government of Canada on multicultural activities as we move farther away from election year. Will the minister of state tell the House of Commons what calendar the government contemplates for the winding down of the expenditure on multiculturalism, which is spelled out in his statement?

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, I would be very glad to reply to that question. Perhaps the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) might have a look at this statement again, read it, and find out what in fact it really says. He will note that within some of the paragraphs in the statement we talk about budgeting through the cultural agencies as well, which amounts to roughly $2.5 million a year, which is over and above the $10 million. This means that the over-all budgetary projection within the cultural agencies and within the program itself, all directed toward multicultural programs, will be in the neighbourhood of $65 million within the next five years. There is no projection for decreases in funding whatsoever; there is a significant increase.

I would also point out there is some concern about an election year. If the opposition think that our programs are so desirable and so attractive that it worries them that they are brought forward at this time, all I can say is we accept the compliment. When the question is raised of why now, I would draw to the attention of hon. members that the fiscal year ends at the end of this month, and we are talking about budgeting for the next fiscal year which begins in just a few days. It is for that reason, and for the reason that I want to be courteous to members of the House of Commons, that I draw to their attention what the programs and priorities of the government are for the forthcoming year. That is the hard reality of the timing at this particular moment.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, that is really quite an incredible statement, even for the minister. If he is at all consistent I suppose we will expect that each of the other ministers of the Crown, however many there are—

Some hon. Members: Sixty-two.

Mr. Clark: —will be getting up before the House rises for Easter to spell out the increases that they contemplate. Just so I can be clear on what the minister is saying, may we have a brief, unequivocal commitment by the minister that he can answer yes or no—is the minister giving us a commitment now that it is not the intention of the government to reduce the expenditure on multicultural activities in any of the subsequent years in the five-year period? Yes or no?

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, I think it is quite acceptable for the hon. member to put the question, but not really to direct how it ought to be answered. I would say that in terms of our commitment to multiculturalism it is ongoing, it is larger than last year, and it will continue to be larger in the future. It is not our intention to cut back funding for multicultural programs.

● (1602)

I would make one other point that I think is important. The question was raised and alluded to by the Leader of the Opposition that the funding we have for about one third of the Canadian people, being $10 million, is rather inadequate. I make two points in response.

First, I have yet to hear, other than perhaps today indirectly, anybody in the opposition in my presence suggest that there ought to be more funding for multiculturalism. I would welcome anybody doing that. I have only had a couple of questions in the House of Commons as Minister of Multiculturalism, which indicates the degree of interest being taken in that regard.

I would point out that all ethno-cultural communities are Canadian and they benefit from all government programs in Canada as Canadians. The amount of money we are talking about is money specifically earmarked for them as ethno-cultural Canadians over and above all the benefits that every Canadian in this country enjoys.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I think the minister will find that one reason he does not receive very many questions has to do very directly with the quality of his answers. I wonder if he will tell us now, since he has refused to give us a commitment, that there will not be a reduction in subsequent years of the budget for multiculturalism. What portion of that estimated $50 million over the next five years will be directed toward advertising, and what portion will be directed toward administration?

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, I would first indicate that I did not refuse to give a commitment that we would not cut back on multiculturalism. I was very precise in that regard. It is not the intention of the government to cut back in any way on multicultural programs. I make that very clear, if my words were not as clear as the hon. member could understand. In any event, in terms of the budget, the advertising budget of the Directorate of Multiculturalism is half a million dollars a year. That budget is directed to the ethnic media in order to be able to communicate through that important instrument of communication with the ethno-cultural community. That is an important aspect of our program.

In terms of actual granting programs, in the neighbourhood of $5 million will be made available directly in grants through the numerous programs that we have within our directorate. In terms of operational funding, the amount is $2.6 million. I would draw to the attention of hon. members that that $2.6 million is not strictly for operational expense. It carries within it funding for studies that are undertaken, for example, the ethnic attitude study which should be tabled very shortly. It deals with special projects that I am involved in now, for example, with the visible minorities and how we are trying to deal with that. Contract funding will deal with specific policy areas that are very important to the continuation of this program and the achievement of objectives to provide equal opportunity and to overcome disadvantages to the ethno-cultural community.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, in rising to ask the Minister of State (Multiculturalism) (Mr. Cafik) a question, I would first like to thank him for his statement and also to pay tribute to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) for announcing the official policy of multiculturalism in 1971.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Haidasz: What amount of the $10 million expenditure per annum will be directed to the ethnic press and media for other than advertising, something they have requested for some time?

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is raising an important question. I draw to his attention, and of other hon. members if they are not aware, that we are now having a two-day conference with the ethnic press here in Ottawa to deal with a wide range of programs and policies. The aspect that I am dealing with in multiculturalism is hopefully to establish a relationship with the ethno-cultural press in which they can give valid and useful advice to myself as to how we may best assist the ethnic press in legitimate and proper terms. In terms of funding, for example, the Ethnic Press Federation have been concerned about support funding for their national body. At the moment, no decision has been taken in that regard. I have had a number of representations. Hopefully, I will have the opportunity to discuss that aspect of the problem with the Ethnic Press Federation within the next two days, if that is what the hon. member has in mind. I think that the general substance of the comment is a recognition of the importance of the ethnic press in Canada. I certainly agree that they perform a very valuable—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will conclude the questioning with the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes) and the hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo (Mr. Beatty).

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I have a very brief question. I hope I can have a brief answer. In talking to many ethnic groups, one of the problems they have brought to me on many occasions is the lack of any granting of funds for capital purposes such as helping to renovate a hall or build a new one. In a sense, this is very important because it is the centre of most of the activity for multicultural groups. Has the minister's department studied and will it give consideration to providing some sort of granting of funds for capital purposes to aid in the construction or renovation of halls, maybe on a matching basis along the lines of Wintario?

Mr. Cafik: Yes, Mr. Speaker, consideration is being given to that. With the adjustments in the program that we have announced here today, we did not move in the direction of providing funding for capital projects. It would take an enormous amount of money. I should point out that on other levels of the federal government within other departments, through job creation programs and so on, ethno-cultural community organizations are as entitled to make application in those directions for those purposes as any other group in Canada.

In the area that the hon. member is concerned about, the new program dealing with operational support in group development will provide funding for continuing activity for a period of up to three years for operational support. This is an area that is also of considerable concern to the community. We have moved in that direction at this time. I think it will be welcomed by the communities. In terms of specific funding for capital purposes, hopefully they will get the funding they require through other activities of the government rather than directly through our budget.

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I will not take much of the time of the House. Having listened to the minister's statement, I simply want to make the observation that it is apparent the minister is, as usual, reaching ever higher platitudes of achievement.

Mr. Cafik: I appreciate the compliment.

BROADCASTING ACT

AMENDMENT TO PERMIT INEXPENSIVE USE OF BROADCASTS FOR EDUCATIONAL PURPOSES

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-428, to amend the Broadcasting Act (educational use of programs).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to enable school boards to tape radio and television broadcasts for use in schools at a cost that is not prohibitive and without incurring liability for copyright infringement. To this end, the bill would empower the Canadian Radio-Television and Telecommunications Commission to require the necessary contractual arrangements to be worked out between stations and networks on the one hand and authors and artists on the other.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

CANADA BUSINESS CORPORATIONS ACT

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. C. Douglas (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 282, 532, 1,113, 1,148, 1,241, 1,250, 1,260 and 1,340. I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

N.F.B.—USE OF PRIVATE EMPLOYMENT AGENCIES BY CANADIAN GOVERNMENT PHOTO CENTRE

Question No. 282—Mr. McKenzie:

1. Has the Canadian Government Photo Centre obtained (a) part-time (b) full-time employees from private employment agencies in (i) British Columbia (ii) Alberta (iii) Saskatchewan (iv) Manitoba (v) Ontario (vi) Quebec (vii) New Brunswick (viii) Nova Scotia (ix) Prince Edward Island (x) Newfoundland and, if so, in each case, how many?

2. Are such employees paid from supplementary estimates and, if not, from what estimates are they paid?

3. By province, what was the (a) average hourly rate paid to employment agencies (b) average hourly rate paid to employees (c) total amount paid by the Canadian Government Photo Centre in (i) 1975 (ii) 1976?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): I am informed by the National Film Board as follows: 1. The Canadian Government Photo Centre has obtained (a) part-time and (b) full-time employees from private employment agencies in Ontario only. In 1975/76 17 part-time and one full-time employee were engaged in this manner. In 1976/77 23 part-time and three full-time employees were so engaged.

2. The Canadian Government Photo Centre operates on a Revolving Fund and is dependent on revenue from sales to finance its operation. Casual employees are therefore not paid from either main or supplementary estimates but from revenues earned.

3. (a) In the province of Ontario the average hourly rate paid to employment agencies in 1975/76 was $4.09 for part-time employees and $3.10 for full-time employees; for 1976/77 the average hourly rate paid to employment agencies was $4.27 for part-time employees and $4.30 for full-time employees. (b) Information not known. (c) The Canadian Government Photo Centre paid in 1975/76 and in 1976/77 a total amount of $39,050.06 and $46,889.31 respectively.

NUCLEAR EXPLOSION BY CHINA

Question No. 532—Mr. Howie:

Following the last known nuclear explosion by China, were significant increases in radioactive measurement detected in any Canadian province and, if so, what were the readings?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The last known nuclear explosion by China was carried out on September 17, 1977. Increases in radioactivity in surface air were noted at 18 out of 24 sampling stations.

The sampling locations, the maximum levels observed and the dates of collection are as follows:

Calgary	1.68 pCi/m³	September 25
Edmonton	0.91 pCi/m³	September 25
Fort Churchill	0.73 pCi/m³	October 2
Fredericton	0.58 pCi/m³	September 29
Inuvik	0.56 pCi/m³	September 28
Montreal	0.48 pCi/m³	October 12
Moosonee	0.59 pCi/m³	September 27
Regina	1.43 pCi/m³	September 29
St. John's	0.58 pCi/m³	October 5
Saskatoon	0.83 pCi/m³	September 29
Sault Ste. Marie	0.57 pCi/m³	October 1
Thunder Bay	0.78 pCi/m³	September 28
Toronto	0.79 pCi/m³	September 30
Vancouver	0.53 pCi/m³	September 24
Whitehorse	1.54 pCi/m³	September 22
Windsor	1.45 pCi/m³	September 25
Winnipeg	0.97 pCi/m³	October 3
Yellowknife	0.64 pCi/m³	September 30

Although these increases were readily detected above the pre-test national average of 0.05 picocuries per cubic meter (pCi/m³), the absolute values are very small. The health effects arising from breathing radioactivity in air at these levels for the short period are negligible. In addition, radioactivity in pasteurized milk was measured. Increases of the radioactive element, iodine-131, were observed at 10 out of 16 sampling locations. The cities, the maximum levels measured and the dates of collection are as follows:

Calgary	19 pCi/l	October 1-7
Edmonton	14 pCi/l	October 8-14
Halifax	27 pCi/l	October 1-7
Moncton	20 pCi/l	October 1-7
Ottawa	29 pCi/l	October 8-14
Quebec	13 pCi/l	October 8-14
St. John's	13 pCi/l	October 8-14
Sault Ste. Marie	18 pCi/l	October 1-7
Vancouver	18 pCi/l	September 24-30
Windsor	55 pCi/l	October 8-14

These levels are not of concern to public health because they are a small fraction of the maximum permissible concentration of 2000 pCi/l. Moreover, the increases were observed for only a short period.

EXPENDITURES BY DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE IN CONSTITUENCY OF NICKEL BELT

Question No. 1,113—Mr. Rodriguez:

For each fiscal year since 1970, what amount was spent in the Constituency of Nickel Belt by the Department of National Health and Welfare and those agencies that report to it?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare):

Year	Support to Individual Athletes	Support to Projects Dealing with the Non-Medical Use of Drugs	Contributions under the New Horizons Program	Operating Costs of Regional Office (Sudbury)	Total
1970-71	Nil	Nil	Nil	Not available	Not available
1971-72	Nil	Nil	Nil	Not available	Not available
1972-73	Nil	Nil	8,900	Not available	Not available
1973-74	Nil	Nil	43,376	107,900	151,276
1974-75	Nil	Nil	7,607	128,800	136,407
1975-76	Nil	36,250	32,346	125,300	193,896
1976-77	1,800	Nil	37,757	151,500	191,057

In addition to the above, the Department of National Health and Welfare has incurred numerous other expenditures in the province of Ontario, but it is not possible to isolate these expenditures on a constituency basis.

XYLITOL

Question No. 1,148—Mr. Yewchuk:

1. Were tests conducted on xylitol to determine its potential as an anti-carie agent and, if so (a) what were they (b) what were the results?

2. Were steps taken to determine the usefulness of xylitol as a substitute for sugar since the imposition of the saccharin ban and, if so (a) what were they (b) what were the results?

3. Did the Department of National Health and Welfare study the problem linked with the future use of xylitol by diabetics and, if so, what were the results?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. Yes. (a) and (b) Several studies have suggested that xylitol reduces dental caries. In one study, laboratory animals were fed a diet which contained sugar and produced dental caries. When xylitol was substituted for sugar in the diet, the dental caries were practically eliminated. In another study, a group of human volunteers consuming a normal diet including sugar was compared to a group consuming a normal diet which included xylitol in place of sugar. It was found that after one year dental caries were reduced in the xylitol group by approximately 90 percent. In a third study, two groups of human volunteers, both consuming a normal diet, consumed several sticks of either a xylitol-sweetened chewing gum or a sucrose-sweetened chewing gum each day for one year. By the end of the year, the xylitol group had significantly fewer dental caries than the sugar group.

2. (a) and (b) The usefulness of xylitol as a substitute for sugar has been considered. Xylitol is not a suitable substitute in situations where reduction of calorie intake is indicated because the caloric value of both xylitol and sugar is about 4 kilocalories per gram. Since in Canada, dietary treatment of diabetics emphasizes control of calorie intake, the use of xylitol as a substitute for sugar is not advocated even though xylitol is absorbed more slowly than sucrose and seems to lack a hyperglycemic effect. Xylitol has advantages as a substitute for sugar in chewing gum because it is non-cariogenic.

3. The Department of National Health and Welfare has considered the problem linked with the future use of xylitol by diabetics. At present, xylitol is used only in "sugar-free" (or "sugarless") chewing gums. It is not permitted in other foods for special dietary use including calorie-reduced and low calorie foods and carbohydrate-reduced foods. Since these are the only special dietary foods intended for use by diabetics, it is apparent that the Department in no way encourages the use of xylitol by diabetics, nor does it permit its inclusion in foods normally used by diabetics. Further evaluation of the effect of xylitol in diabetics is being carried out by the Federation of American Societies for Experimental Biology (FASEB).

LIAISON BETWEEN CANADA AND SYDNEY RESEARCH TEAM ON SOLAR ENERGY

Question No. 1,250—Mr. Robinson:

Is the government aware that Saudi Arabia has given Sydney University $5.5 million to continue solar energy research and, if so, have arrangements been made for government officials responsible for the development of Canada's renewable resources to lease with the Sydney research team?

Mr. Maurice Dupras (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): The government is aware that Saudi Arabia has given Sydney University $5.5 million to continue and expand solar research. Government officials are familiar with the solar energy research at the University of Sydney and, as a result of the visit of the Hon. Alastair Gillespie, Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, to Australia in January 1977, an exchange of information between Canada and Australia on solar energy is underway.

PAVING OF HIGHWAYS IN THE YUKON AND NORTHWEST TERRITORIES

Question No. 1,260—Mr. Masniuk:

1. Does the government plan to pave the (a) Alaska (b) Klondike (c) Robert Campbell (d) Dempsters highways in the Yukon Territory and, if so, in each case, what is the work schedule?

2. Does the government plan to pave the (a) Mackenzie (b) new Laird (c) Hay River-Yellowknife highways (nos. 2, 1 & 3) in the Northwest Territories and, if so, in each case, what is the work schedule?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. (a) The Shakwak project, which includes paving the Alaska Highway from the Alaska-Yukon border to Haines Junction and the Haines Road south of Haines Junction, will be carried out between 1978 and 1989. The first sections will be paved from km 230.4 to 255.4 and from km 1635.5 to 1664.5 in 1980. The schedule shows different sections to be paved each year until 1989. However, the tentative schedule is dependent on the pipeline construction schedule and upon the results of the EARP panel hearings. (b) Paving was started on M. 94-104 in 1977 and will be finished in 1978. Mile 0-20 was completed previously but an overlay will be added. Paving of M. 20-35 is planned for 1978-79. (c) Paving of M. 0-6.34 was completed in 1976-77. (d) No paving is planned at present.

2. (a) Paving is planned from M. 0-51.5 (NWT—Alberta border) at Enterprise. Widening and gravelling will be carried out from 1979-80 to 1981-82 and paving is scheduled from 1980-81 to 1983-84. (b) No paving is planned at present. (c) It is expected to pave M. 0-22.5 of the Hay River highway in 1979-80. No paving is planned at present for the Yellowknife highway.

INFLATABLE LANDING BOATS

Question No. 1,340—Mr. McKinnon:

Has $123,735 worth of inflatable landing boats been ordered from Nautylatex Canada Ltd. for the Armed Forces and, if so (a) which element of the Forces is to receive them (b) how many have been ordered?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): Yes. (a) Land force combat arms, Land Force field engineers, Maritime surface forces; (b) Three-man reconnaissance boats, 35; Six-man landing boats, 65; Ten-man landing boats, 65; Total, 165.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The questions referred to by the parliamentary secretary are deemed to have been answered. Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. McKENZIE—DELAY IN ANSWERING QUESTIONS

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, there has been undue delay in answering some of my questions which go back to last October. One of them relates to the total cost of the CBC in handling the Manitoba election last October 11. I feel this question should have been answered by now. Also, I have had another question on the order paper since December 7 in reference to whether Liberal members are using the DOT telex to send out political messages. I realize the answer could be embarrassing to the government, but I feel three and a half months should be long enough to enable the government to reply to it.

Mr. C. Douglas (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): I will certainly take that representation as notice and pass it on to the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of Privy Council (Mr. Pinard). I am sure he will have answers ready for the hon. member as soon as possible.

PRIVILEGE

MR. RODRIGUEZ—ELECTRONIC SURVEILLANCE OF HON. MEMBER

Mr. Speaker: It is my intention, as I indicated earlier, to put to the House at this point the question on the motion of the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) which was the subject of a question of privilege raised again earlier today. The motion is as follows:

That this matter of privilege concerning possible electronic surveillance against myself, the sworn statement of Mr. Warren Hart and the statements of the Solicitor General be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, and that that body be requested to undertake to bring before it any persons having or claiming knowledge of this affair, so that the whole truth may be discovered and publicized in such a way as to restore the confidence of my constituents in the confidentiality of our communications and thus end the breach of privilege which exists.

Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

[Mr. Speaker.]

And more than five hon. members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Rodriguez) which was negatived on the following division:

FOREIGN AID PROHIBITION ACT

BAN ON ASSISTANCE TO COUNTRIES VIOLATING HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont) moved that Bill C-204, to prohibit aid to foreign countries violating human rights, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the bill that is up for discussion this afternoon has raised a fair bit of controversy and a good deal of interest across the country. It is an issue which concerns people not only in this country but in a number of other countries, with regard to our international responsibilities as they affect the growing concern and mounting apprehension over the loss of human rights in countries with which we have an economic relationship and to which we provide, in some instances, a good deal of economic assistance.

I can frankly say that this bill has generated a response to my office unlike any other international issue in the 12 years I have been a member here. Literally hundreds of letters have arrived from individuals and organizations across Canada offering public support for the principle that strategic and economic advantage are not the soul legitimate determinants of our nation's foreign policy.

Canadian respect and support for human rights is deep-seated. We are proud of Canada's defence of these principles under the leadership of many prime ministers, certainly that of the former prime minister of the Liberal party and that of the present right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) when he was prime minister of this country. They gave in their own time outstanding leadership with regard to the defence of human rights.

I hope, during the course of a few remarks this afternoon, to mention some of the comments I received. Obviously, because the time is somewhat less than it might normally be for a discussion on an important issue of this kind, I want to provide an opportunity for other members to express their views with regard to it.

It would be fair to say that up until the last few years no serious consideration had been given by any western government to relating the area of economic activity or economic responsibility to the serious violation of human rights that takes place in a number of countries. Even though there was no formal mechanism, or observation, or relationship of these two aspects of foreign policy, it is not true to say that the consideration of human rights was not a part, if only in an unspoken or unidentified way, of basic foreign policy.

If we were to examine the trading patterns and aid patterns of Canada since World War II, we would notice a wide variation with regard to our response, depending upon our perception of these countries to be countries that would be worthy of funds or economic assistance. Worthy can be defined from many points of view. It can be defined in terms of a serious intent with respect to the development of their own country. It can be defined in terms of whether they share the same kind of strategic or political interests. It can also be defined in terms of whether we have respect for the way in which a government treats its people.

Recently in the United States and in the American Congress initiatives have been taken with regard to programs of foreign aid as they are directed toward countries where there has been a rapid increase in the serious violation of human rights. I think of the particular and growing concern there has been in a number of Latin American countries, some of which the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Duclos), the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin), and I, had an opportunity to visit a couple of years ago to examine the serious situation with regard to the loss of basic human rights in those countries.

As a result of American initiatives, beginning roughly in 1974, certain kinds of economic assistance have in fact been terminated to countries like Chile, Argentina, and Uruguay. However, we would have to recognize that the major advance with respect to dealing with this problem occurred with the election of the Carter regime in 1976.

Beginning in 1977, the Carter administration's concern with human rights became a major component of United States foreign policy. Indeed, legislation which has imposed limitations on aid, direct and indirect, to certain designated countries, has been passed by Congress and signed by the President.

We see in particular that under the Foreign Aid Appropriations Act which became law on October 3, 1977, security assistance to Argentina, Chile, Ethiopia, Uruguay, Brazil, El Salvador and Guatemala has been prohibited. In addition, action has been taken in international forums to prevent or limit the role of the American government with regard to foreign aid contributions to countries where there is a serious violation of human rights. This, with the establishment in the U.S. State Department of a new office which would deal directly with the question of human rights and humanitarian affairs, headed by an assistant secretary and deputy assistant under secretaries for refugees and migration, as well as for prisoners of war missing in action, has indicated a major thrust on the part of American foreign policy.

In our own country, a similar kind of action has not ensued. Indeed, some members may recall that a little less than a year ago, in response to the new initiative of the Carter administration, I raised questions with the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), and subsequently with the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) in committee, about the possibility of looking at our over-all economic patronage, our aid programs as they operate under CIDA, and our trade package, particularly as expressed under the Export Development Corporation, to see whether actions in these areas were in line with our basic commitment to a fundamental observation of human rights. At that time both the Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs gave a clear indication that they felt it would be difficult and publicly unacceptable to relate these two facets of Canadian public policy. Interestingly enough, the hundreds of letters I received from individuals and organizations across the country did not share the stumbling blocks or problems that seemed to exist in the mind of the government.

I think the government has begun to realize that this is a major issue. I wish to quote from a speech which the Secretary of State for External Affairs made in this House on December 19. It is an example of the change of attitude on the part of the minister and his department. He was speaking in a special external affairs debate we had at that time and was turning his attention particularly to South Africa. He said:

> It is true, of course, that in other countries of the world there are clear violations of and disregard for human rights. There, too, Canada is expressing its concern, as are all members of this House. South Africa stands alone. It is the only country which as a basic part of its government structure—whether it is constitutional in the legal sense is beside the point—has a declared and unequivocal policy. It stands apart as a country which makes decisions affecting human beings on the basis of race and colour.

The minister went on to say that, as a result of the new concern the Canadian government had with respect to developments in South Africa, steps would be taken to reduce drastically the level of support or promotion of economic activity on the part of the government in South Africa. He announced the closing of a number of consulates, the withdrawal of trade missions, the removal of trade preference, and the general discouragement of economic activity on the part of Canada with South Africa. There can be no misunderstanding on this point. The government made a specific change in its policy with respect to the relationship of human rights and economic activity in the announcement of the minister on December 19.

● (1722)

In that connection it is significant that today, just before this debate began, a number of well known organizations held a public press conference at which they announced a Canadian campaign to stop bank loans to South Africa. I regard this as an important step in itself, because it signalled very clearly to the Canadian banks that a number of leading organizations will no longer accept the policies and programs followed by them in connection with their economic support for a government which, as the Secretary of State for External Affairs himself said, stands alone in its acceptance of a political structure which judges people and sets them apart on the basis of race.

The organizations which have taken part in this nation-wide campaign to stop bank loans to South Africa include the main Canadian churches, which are grouped together in a task force, the Canadian Labour Congress, the Canadian Union of Public Employees, the National Union of Students, the Canadian University Service Overseas, OXFAM Canada and the Canadian Council for International Co-operation. All these bodies have said that they, in their own way, in their own banking activities, will make it clear that they will no longer use certain banks, nor will they encourage their memberships to use them, until they make a definite move away from the present policy of providing economic support for South Africa.

I have read the reports in recent years of meetings between these groups and the banks in an effort in a patient way to obtain a clear account of the policy which is being followed. Those efforts were unsuccessful. Indeed one of the ridiculous anomalies of the present situation is that one can sometimes find out more about Canadian banking activities from reports of the United States Congress than from reports made available in this country either directly or through institutions which are under the jurisdiction of parliament to which public disclosure ought to be made.

I will just say a few words more with respect to the bill itself. Its purpose is to identify countries where the violation of human rights is occurring in a gross and continuing way to an extent clearly unacceptable even upon the basis of the most minimal standards. I realize there is an ethnocentric concern in some minds as to whether or not one group of people can make a decision with regard to a violation of human rights occurring among another group of people or in another country. Arguments can be raised as to distinctions between violations of human rights as opposed to the restriction of civil liberties and social opportunities.

I am calling attention this afternoon to the increasing number of governments and regimes, dictatorships on both the right and the left, which make a point, both as policy and daily practice, of violating the rights of their own citizens by arresting them without warning, imprisoning them without any recourse to legal protection, submitting them to torture, and executing them in many cases, to say nothing of the circumstances in which hundreds, sometimes thousands of people, disappear without trace. With many of these countries we have important economic relationships. They include Indonesia where, according to Amnesty International, there are between 50,000 and 100,000 political prisoners. They include Brazil, Argentina, and some of the Soviet countries with which we have tried to be reasonable at recent meetings in Belgrade, meetings which have quite obviously failed.

This legislative proposal is calling for some kind of responsibility in international affairs similar to that which we all accept with respect to our domestic affairs. In view of the wide interest and concern expressed on this subject I hope there will be an opportunity at the end of our discussion this afternoon to refer the subject matter to the Standing Committee on External Affairs where the bill could be scrutinized, and before which witnesses can be heard, so as to enable satisfactory recommendations to be made to the House for effective government action.

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, we have before us a bill the purpose of which would appear to be to prevent Canadian aid by grant or loan to countries which, in accordance with the views of certain international non-governmental organizations, have consistently violated human rights. It would also restrict trade with such countries.

As hon. members will appreciate, the problem of finding appropriate and effective methods of ensuring greater respect for human rights is one of the most delicate issues in foreign policy, one which we are constantly seeking to resolve. In this respect I believe that the government and the sponsors of this bill share certain common objectives, though we may not agree on the most effective means of attaining our goal.

In addressing this issue I believe it would help our understanding of the problem if I were first to say a few words about the Canadian government's general approach to date on the human rights issue as it relates to development assistance and to export financing assistance. As a general rule, we have not directly linked these matters with the internal policies of the governments in question, since it is intended by such programs that the people of the countries concerned should, in the long run, be the beneficiaries of the aid and assistance offered. At the same time, however, we have also found it appropriate to remind governments, by both bilateral and multilateral means, of our expectation with regard to the protection of human rights.

On the trade side, with respect to our dealings in peaceful goods, we have normally followed a business oriented approach which we have considered to be in line with normal commercial practices. We have, with very few exceptions, regarded the export of Canadian goods and services as the highest priority.

As for our development assistance, over 80 per cent in any event goes to the poorest countries and indeed to the poorest people within those countries; it is focused on basic human needs. We believe that to restrict the aid program on the basis of human rights criteria relative to the performance of governments would simply penalize the poor and would therefore be counter-productive in terms of the ultimate goals of the aid program.

Two recent exceptions, one relating to aid and the other to economic assistance, have been Uganda and South Africa. Although the nature of the "continuing and gross violations of human rights" in the two countries are quite different, the two situations shared one aspect in common—a near global consensus in the UN on the fact that the violations deserved condemnation, i.e. mass murder and torture in the case of Uganda, and apartheid in South Africa. Out of this emerged a further consensus on the relative importance of human rights to the issue and on the kind of action to take. This justified the Canadian government to act, leading to cessation of aid in the instance of Uganda and to the elimination of any Canadian government sponsored export assistance to South Africa.

In the case of Uganda, human rights violations were both evident and persistent, and in effect dictated the temporary end of any meaningful relationship with that country. It was also relevant, however, that the administration of an aid program had, in any case, been made impossible by the chaotic internal situation there, due in large part to continuing human rights violations. As for South Africa, the apartheid issue was given great weight but this was counterbalanced by other valid Canadian concerns, such as trade in peaceful goods. Thus, there has not been a total rupture of the bilateral relationship on the economic side, but government facilities and mechanisms are no longer used. Whether in either case the action we have taken will be persuasive in promoting greater respect for human rights is a question which we will have to examine over a certain time frame and in the light of the parallel actions of others, and even then the answer is likely to be inconclusive and highly subjective.

In the multilateral field Canada takes account of human rights considerations if these figure in a specific project proposal by one of the development banks. We have, however, resisted efforts by others to apply the performance of governments in human rights as a general yardstick for the acceptability of a given development project, since we consider it essential to preserve the abilities of these institutions to function effectively in the development field.

Those of us who live in countries of western traditions frequently assume that those standards of conduct and behaviour towards our fellow man which we traditionally favour are also perceived as having equal validity by other governments. But the perspective of other countries is, in fact, often different, partly because they may not be western or democratic in background or partly because their economic situations are vastly different from ours.

Thus, western democracies traditionally accord priority to civil and political rights, while Third World countries often place their emphasis on pressing economic needs. We are told regularly in international bodies that a majority of underdeveloped states are more concerned with alleviating starvation and promoting their development and, in so doing, attach a greater priority to the duties of citizens than to their rights.

In the absence of consensus and of effective enforcement machinery at the international level, therefore, we have been forced to rely on other methods, essentially political and diplomatic, to convey to other governments our concerns about human rights. Canada can use multilateral bodies such as the Commission on Human Rights to make known our attitude toward events in other countries. At such meetings we can vote on resolutions varying in tone and substance from mild requests for information to denunciations and condemnations. Multilateral bodies may impose sanctions dealing with aid or trade in specific types of goods or trade generally. Such sanctions may be legally binding, as are Security Council sanctions, or voluntary, as are resolutions of the General Assembly. States may, of course, impose sanctions unilaterally or jointly with other states by curtailing aid, ending trade relations or by going as far as suspending diplomatic relations.

We can also make direct representations on a bilateral basis. Such representations may range from expressions of concern through requests for redress of specific grievances to formal protests.

[Mr. Robinson.]

Canadians are justifiably indignant at flagrant abuses of the fundamental rights of the individual in countries such as Uganda, South Africa and in many other countries in eastern Europe, Latin America and elsewhere, and we have sought to express this concern in the manner we believe is most effective. Nevertheless, there are no firm and fixed rules for raising and discussing what are essentially the domestic concerns of other states. Some countries simply refuse categorically to permit any exchange of views.

When we approach the issue of raising human rights questions with other countries, we generally consider two criteria in deciding a course of action. The first is whether an action would be appropriate. The second is what action will likely be effective. Whether action, if taken, will be effective has to be subjected to balanced and careful examination.

When we have cordial relations with states, for example, low key, private discussions are demonstrably more likely to resolve outstanding individual difficulties. This, in turn, can establish an atmosphere in which it should be easier for us to seek to have resolved other problems of concern to Canadians. When relations are poor and progress on human rights issues is negligible, it may be necessary to make our case public, even though public pressure may as often contribute to a hardening of attitudes as to a meeting of minds. Whether a given course of action will be effective depends as well on our ultimate goals. If we seek to rectify isolated abuses or aberrations in a state's normal performance in the human rights field, the task is generally manageable. We are not, however, likely to be able to alter a firm policy or the fundamental basis of another state's society or political system, certainly neither easily nor quickly.

The intent of this bill, that of seeking to guarantee a positive commitment to traditional and fundamental human rights, is one to which this government wholeheartedly subscribes. It is one which we have consistently promoted in all international forums, most recently at the Commission on Human Rights which has just concluded its thirty-fourth session in Geneva.

Nevertheless, it is our belief that, if adopted, this bill would distort the aims and purposes of Canadian international development assistance. This bill would make the conduct of Canadian policy in the fields of development assistance and export financing hostage to only one factor, human rights, a factor which is largely beyond our control.

Canada's external relations are and must be governed by, and responsive to, many variables. They cannot and must not be conditioned by the type of rigid, essentially one track framework contemplated by this bill. When the totality of any of our bilateral relationships is considered, only in rare cases would human rights violations by themselves be sufficient reason to withdraw Canadian support. The judgment called for even in such cases is a difficult one, necessitating the weighing of all the various factors involved in our relationships and a determination of the relative importance of the human rights parameter.

Any hypothetical moral suasion or pressure provided by implementation of the provisions of this bill to improve the human rights performance of a given country or countries would, in our view, be far outweighed by the following risks which seem to us inherent in the proposed approach it sets out.

First, sanctions against some governments may well lead not to greater democracy but less. Second, if the bill were to be strictly implemented, meaningful Canadian relations with a large number of countries would be effectively curtailed; as many as 60, based on the latest Amnesty International list—

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Where is the proof?

Mr. Robinson: I think the information is there.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Read it chapter and verse.

Mr. Robinson: I would be pleased to answer the hon. member's question after I complete my remarks.

If the bill were to be strictly implemented, meaningful Canadian relations with a large number of countries would be effectively curtailed—as many as 60, based on the latest Amnesty International list of countries practising torture, or even 100, based on the Freedom House list of "unfree societies".

Further, given the absence of a clear national constituency in favour of developing assistance, implementation of such a law, particularly during a period of recognized domestic economic difficulties, could provide both an excuse and the means to press for significant reductions in foreign aid.

This, in our view, would be counterproductive. Moreover, decreased aid flows would certainly not help us bring Canadian influence to bear through quiet diplomacy on violating states where our aid is a significant factor.

This bill would, moreover, place Canada in the untenable role of an international moral arbiter. As such, I believe that our ability to exercise the kind of leadership we took at the Conference on International Economic Co-operation would be seriously undermined, if not destroyed. If implemented, this bill would force Canada to inject political and controversial issues into international development assistance institutions which, to date, have been largely free of such matters so that they could respect the fundamental developmental thrust of their activities. This in turn could lead to a serious impairment of their ability to function effectively—particularly international financial institutions—thereby creating serious roadblocks to third world development and ultimately provoking confrontation.

Finally, and of more immediate relevance to our domestic economic interest, is the importance to Canada of trade, which this bill would also affect. Restrictions placed on export financing facilities because of human rights violations, regardless of other considerations, would adversely affect our export capabilities and could lead to the potential loss to the Canadian economy of substantial income. Canada's ability to compete internationally would be inhibited if exporters and investors were no longer confident of the kind of government support necessary to promote good business relationships in given countries.

The bill would have other trade consequences as well. The provisions in clause 3(c), depending on the countries concerned, could conflict with existing Canadian trade obligations, multilaterally with respect to GATT and to British preferential tariff treatment or bilaterally.

Turning to somewhat more technical considerations, in our view the bill would also cause the following administrative or operational problems to our development programs. Its implementation could easily disrupt millions of dollars of aid projects currently under way, particularly in those cases where further appropriations are required for completion. The ability to make long term commitments and to undertake forward planning, which is crucial to effective aid programming, would be seriously undermined.

With specific reference to clause 3(a) of the bill, Canada cannot prevent the use of its contributions by an international financial institution in any given recipient country, even if our executive director were to vote against a project up for consideration. In respect of the IBRD, moreover, where we do not have a single national vote, our constituency situation could cause political problems should we be compelled to vote on the basis of Canadian perceptions of human rights considerations. While Canada has a majority position, and could insist on a given response, such action might not be acceptable to the other constituency members and might even cause the break-up of the constituency, and hence the effectiveness of our participation in the financial institution.

Finally, and most important, Canadian contributions to international financial institutions cannot, in any event, legally be made conditional on human rights considerations. To act in this manner would be in violation of the articles of agreement of the banks, which expressly forbid such politicization.

The administrative feasibility of the bill is also questionable, especially in relation to the definition of violations of human rights, gross or otherwise. While most of us would certainly agree that torture, murder and imprisonment without trial would violate human rights, the circumstances under which such actions might occur and the number of cases are surely also relevant. As I have already indicated, unfortunately there is no universally accepted definition of such matters. What constitutes a consistent pattern of gross violation? Must the evidence be first hand? Will the government in question be given an opportunity to rebut allegations of gross violation? On what tribunal could we confidently rely to sort out such problems and still protect our national sovereignty?

Even if it were possible to establish a clear, workable definition of what we as Canadians could consider to be relevant human rights violations, it seems to us that it would be administratively very complex to draw up and maintain a list of prohibited countries, and that the exercise could moreover become a vehicle for pursuing a variety of prejudice. The bill makes no provision for obtaining and evaluating the evidence on which the decision to denominate a country prohibited is based. Substantiated facts are not easy to come by. We would have to base our judgment on many non-governmental and non-Canadian sources for such information. Therefore, I would question also the provision in clause 5 of the bill which provides for obtaining the opinion of the International Commission of Jurists, which is only one of a number of reputable non-governmental organizations interested in human rights matters. Not only would the reliability of its information be open to question, since organizations such as the International Commission of Jurists frequently are not allowed to enter a country where violations are alleged to be taking place, but more significantly, to rely on such outside information would be to place important Canadian government policy matters in the hands of others rather than to accept responsibility at the level of our own government.

The bill gives rise to other questions too. Domestically, who would decide whether a given country is to be listed as a prohibited country? Would the government be prepared to designate a responsible agency? Would this be the governor in council, such as the cabinet, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson), or a group of ministers? What mechanism would be established so as to enable a country once designated to be removed from the prohibited list? What would be the criteria? For example, would a statement by the government indicating that it would try to improve its record suffice, or would there have to be some kind of tangible improvement? Would this improvement have to be maintained over a certain period of time before a country lost its prohibited classification? Would a simple change of government be grounds for removal from the prohibited list?

In conclusion, we consider that the proposed bill, despite the good intentions which it is intended to further, would be a radical and possibly even counterproductive departure from present Canadian policy. It would make human rights violations not merely one relevant factor in our aid and export finance policy, but an over-riding criterion which would determine action regardless of other important Canadian concerns and interests, as well as the interests of poor people in the countries concerned.

Human rights is an area in which the questions as to what can be most effectively done in particular cases are many and the answers are few. We shall continue to do our best to respond to particular cases in ways which we hope will express our concern for the fate of persons under unresponsive and repressive rule, but we do not consider Bill C-204 a useful mechanism to that end. Consequently, because of the reasons I have enumerated, the government is unable to support this proposed legislation.

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) for bringing this very important bill before parliament in order for us to have an opportunity to discuss it. According to the procedures which have been followed in the past, unfortunately hon. members on the government side obviously will talk the bill out, so that it will never get to committee and form the basis of something which is very important in terms of our behaviour in the international community.

[Mr. Robinson.]

Having listened to the previous speaker outlining his objections to the bill, it seemed to me that is a famous cry over there: although they are very concerned about human and civil rights, they are not prepared to take tough actions which show leadership in this particular field.

I do not understand why hon. members can make such arguments as the ones we heard this afternoon. I have looked at the precedents set in terms of Rhodesia. This country embarked on an embargo respecting Rhodesia. Government agencies, such as the Export Development Corporation, were very proud to declare, approximately two years ago in a committee which I participated in, that they do not offer loans to companies operating in Rhodesia nor to the Rhodesian government. That is because the Rhodesian government is not recognized. The fact of the matter is that it was recognized that Rhodesia is beyond the ambit of Commonwealth nations. It is outside the Commonwealth. That precedent has been set. Canada participated with other countries in taking action against a country which has a rather questionable régime. Apart from the illegality of the régime, it is a régime which practises apartheid.

There have been other experiences in the western hemisphere. For example, there was the embargo against trade with Cuba. The United States placed an embargo on that island, and of course forbade trade between the United States and that country as well as any other country in Latin America which was a member of the Organization of American States. Indeed, the United States even tried to influence Canada with respect to participating in the embargo. Very often through their branch plants, the embargo law was observed.

I should like to deal specifically with South Africa. Often hon. members of the House have said that we cannot interfere by judging the political morality of a regime. I agree with that. I have no quarrel with that. It is a very broad area, and it is a very subjective one. It depends on the viewpoint of the person who is judging. That is very, very true. The regime in South Africa is based on the principle that the black man is not the equal of the white man, that in the creation of man, somehow or other God made the black man a lesser being than the white man. Obviously that is a philosophy which every single individual in the House rejects. That concept is false and inhuman. It is similar to the entire question of what happened in Germany prior to the Second World War. Of course, we all know the results of that. At that time we rejected the principle of a superior race, as we do now.

So what is the problem? Why cannot the problem of apartheid be identified? Indeed, it was the action of the leader of the Canadian government which resulted in South Africa being placed outside the Commonwealth. I am referring to the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). In 1961 he was the prime minister of Canada. At that time South Africa was placed outside the Commonwealth. South Africa still enjoys Commonwealth tariff preference. The Commonwealth agreement with respect to sugar is still in effect. We still give them a premium price for their sugar, and it seems to me that that runs contrary to the very principle for which we put them out of the Commonwealth.

• (1752)

The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) made much of the fact that we were forbidding EDC to consider loans to South Africa. The Export Development Corporation has not made a loan to them in 15 years. On the other hand, we know that the Canadian consulate office in Johannesburg offers technical assistance through Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce officials to Canadian corporations wishing to do business in South Africa. That is speaking out of both sides of your mouth at the same time.

We are not asking any other country to do anything, but there are things that the government can do. We say that apartheid is despicable. If we feel apartheid is so despicable, we must take action to show how we feel.

Mr. Philbrook: What about Guatemala?

Mr. Rodriguez: The hon. member refers to Guatemala. I am glad he raised Guatemala, but I will deal with that later.

Mr. Philbrook: Double standard.

Mr. Rodriguez: What have we done by this de facto approbation of the South African regime? What we have is Canadian banks anxiously running in to lend money to South Africa. When concerned Canadians recognize the hypocrisy of the position we take internationally, they are told that the loans do not really help the South African government, that they are just a small wedge in the total South African scene. There are other banks in the world which lend money to South Africa. John Vorster is quoted as saying—and we have to take his word for it—that "each new investment in South Africa is another brick in the wall of our continued existence". The leader of the South African government is saying in effect that they need that type of investment from Canadian banks so that the regime in South Africa can be built up and can continue to exist.

We have been very phoney in our whole approach to South Africa. The philosophy on which the regime is built is one which Canadians despise. Our whole philosophy is contrary to the concept of apartheid, but we have a government which is prepared not only in a de facto way to prop up the regime, but also to help it along. For example, a double taxation agreement was established with South Africa with respect to companies that do business with that country so that they are not taxed in both places, they are only taxed in one place. If that does not perpetuate the South African regime, I do not know what it does.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs said today that we have to wait to see what other governments are doing. Why do we have to wait to see what other governments are doing? Do we not know what is right and just in the eyes of the international community?

It did not take Sweden, West Germany and Great Britain long to recognize the proper thing to do with respect to investment in Chile. That is the other country to which I was going to turn. The Allende regime was legally and democratically elected in the country in Latin America where the history of democratic government was the longest. It was a legally elected government, and yet today two officials from IT and T are being charged with perjury. They perjured themselves in front of a Senate committee by denying that IT and T had worked to undermine the regime. It has now been found that IT and T did work to undermine the regime. We have had evidence from Amnesty International, church groups and from individuals who were incarcerated and tortured in Chile.

What is this government doing? We find that the Export Development Corporation is moving in with Noranda and Falconbridge and setting up business. One billion dollars have been invested to strip mine copper in Chile at a time when we in Canada could use the investment to create jobs. They are running in to make a quick buck on the misery of the Chilean people.

Those are two examples which every decent, self-respecting regime in the world can identify as regimes that defy and deny civil rights and, indeed, abuse humanity. This government through its agencies ought to withdraw any further support to those regimes. The government should show an example to the world and to the people of Canada and start putting its money where its mouth is.

I will stop there, Mr. Speaker, because I would like to see this bill go to committee and become law.

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, before I start I would like to know what time you intend to adjourn the private members' hour in view of the fact that it started at 5.10.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): There is nothing in our rules that permit us to sit beyond six o'clock.

Mr. Roche: Since it is two minutes to six, I will confine myself to one or two sentences. I do not want to talk this bill out; I would rather see it go to committee.

I commend the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) for having brought before us for the second time in two weeks a bill dealing with foreign aid. What the hon. member is asking us to do fundamentally is to shore up Canada's standards on human rights by taking more concrete action than we have hitherto. He wants this bill to go to a committee for study. If there is anyting that the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence needs to do, it is to make a serious study that would get to the heart of the issue.

I commend this bill to hon. members. Its time will come. Eventually the hon. member for Egmont will see his idea incorporated. It is not yet six o'clock.

Mr. F. A. Philbrook (Halton): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to congratulate the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) very sincerely for proposing this bill. Without a doubt, what we are discussing here today endorses the noblest of concepts, human dignity. Unfortunately, those of us who feel compelled to point out some difficulties—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. Unfortunately, it is also six o'clock. The hour allotted for private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

NORTHERN PIPELINE ACT

ESTABLISHMENT OF AGENCY TO SUPERVISE PIPELINE CONSTRUCTION

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-25, to establish the Northern Pipeline Agency, to facilitate the planning and construction of a pipeline for the transmission of natural gas from Alaska and Northern Canada and to give effect to an Agreement between Canada and the United States of America on principles applicable to such a pipeline and to amend certain acts in relation thereto, as reported (with amendments) from the Special Committee on a Northern Gas Pipeline.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Hon. members are aware that there are some 11 proposed motions to amend Bill C-25 at the report stage. I have given to hon. members present my suggestions as to how these motions may be grouped for discussion and voting and I will go over those. However, there has been some understanding about motions 8, 9 and 10 I will come to those in a moment. Motions 1 and 11, in the name of the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie, I think should be grouped together for the purpose of debate with a vote on motion 1 disposing of motion 11. It seems to me that motion 11 will have no existence if motion No. 1 is not carried.

Motion 2, in the name of the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie, appears to have two very serious difficulties and I will be hearing argument on it. The idea of a committee introduced into the minister's orbit of authority seems to be a totally new concept within the bill. Furthermore, unless the committee is already employed in some way or it is composed of unpaid volunteers, the motion would raise the element of new expenses which are not covered in the recommendation.

[Mr. Philbrook.]

Motions 3, 5 and 7 I think would be discussed and voted upon separately if votes are required.

Motions 4 and 6 both deal with native claims and I think should be grouped together for discussion, although probably they should be voted on separately if votes are required.

My initial impression of motions 8, 9 and 10 is that they should be grouped together for discussion because they all deal with manpower and procurement conditions set out in Schedule III. I had thought that probably a vote on motion No. 8 might dispose of all three but I understand there is some feeling that motion No. 8 should be voted separately from a second vote which would take place on motions 9 and 10. That seems to me to be satisfactory. I do not have any strong feelings about the original suggestion. So we could take it as arranged that the three motions, Nos. 8, 9 and 10, would be discussed together and there would be a separate vote on motion 8 and a second vote on motions 9 and 10, if in fact votes are required.

If there are any other comments at this time I would be glad to have them, particularly in respect to motion 2.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the statement you have just made makes unnecessary any extended remarks at this point. You were good enough to supply us with a copy of what you intended to say, so we have had discussions about motions 8, 9 and 10. It was our desire that motions 8 and 9 be voted on separately, since motion No. 8 deals with Canadian labour and motion No. 9 deals with Canadian material. However, Your Honour has accepted that point so we are at one in that respect.

This means that in so far as the lineup you have given to us is concerned, the only question we still raise has to do with motion No. 2. My hon. friend the member for Sault Ste. Marie feels that it does not involve the expenditure of any new money. At some point, whenever Your Honour directs, he would like to have the opportunity to argue in favour of its admissibility. With that one request we accept the proposal you have placed before us.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If there are no other comments, my preference would be to take that argument now so that the whole House would have the benefit of knowing whether they are dealing with or without motion No. 2.

Mr. Symes: Mr. Speaker, motion 2, standing in my name, calls for the establishment of a committee to review the bids for goods and services from Canadian sources for the Alcan pipeline to ensure that there is no price fixing. We felt that this amendment was necessary in light of other amendments we have moved which would guarantee Canadian content. The purpose of this amendment was to prevent any abuse of that guarantee provision as it relates to prices.

I would argue that the committee proposed in the amendment would not constitute any expenditure of public funds. If Your Honour will look at clause 9 of the bill on page 6 you will notice that clause 9 says "The Minister may". It then lists a number of duties and powers for the minister. Clause 9(d), which motion 2 seeks to amend, states in the bill that the minister may:

oversee and survey all aspects of the planning and construction of, and procurement for, the pipeline;—

We know, of course, the minister alone will not be overseeing these various aspects. He would have assisting him a committee made up of departmental officials seconded from the department of energy or any other government department, composed of people who are already on staff. Therefore, it would not require additional funds to hire them. That is the context in which we have used the word "committee"; it is a group of civil servants to assist the minister to ensure that there will be no price fixing in the bids submitted. In that sense I do not see that there would be any necessity for extra expenditure of funds. This would not be a parliamentary committee but merely an administrative committee to advise the minister, made up of people who are already on staff.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Yukon is rising on a procedural point?

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate that the member for Sault Ste. Marie did not attend any of the meetings of the special committee set up to study this bill. It is also unfortunate the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands is not here tonight, though I am sure he is engaged in other serious business elsewhere. He would have been able to explain to the House that the amendment proposed in motion No. 2 has been covered by an undertaking given by the Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council in the committee to amend Standing Order 65(1) so as to set up the very kind of committee of which he speaks and for which he seeks an amendment. It would be a continuation of the special committee set up to examine the bill. The minister's undertaking in the committee was in these words:

● (2022)

That Standing Order 65(1) be amended by adding immediately after substection (s), the following: "(t)—

This would set up a special standing committee on northern pipelines to accomplish the very objectives contained in motion No. 2.

—On Northern Pipelines, to consist of not more than 15 members, to which shall stand permanently referred all reports, orders, agreements, regulations, directions and approvals mentioned in sections 12, 13, 14, 15 and 22 of the Northern Pipeline Act; provided that the said committee shall report quarterly thereon in every session."

Provided that this subsection shall be deleted from the Standing Orders on the day on which the Northern Pipeline Agency ceases to exist.

That is not the final wording. The Deputy Prime Minister is still considering our suggestion with regard to reporting on a quarterly basis or once every four months. We are very close to agreement on that score. That is the kind of procedure that would avoid the pitfalls into which the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie falls in suggesting an amendment along the lines that he has in motion No. 2 which offends the provisions with regard to public expenditures.

I say to the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie that his motion is unnecessary. We have a commitment from the government and an undertaking from the minister that that committee will be set up to ensure that the very admirable intent spelled out in the international agreement between the two countries is adhered to with regard to Canadian labour, goods and materials—Canadian content in general. That and other very important aspects will be monitored by that committee which the minister and the government have undertaken to set up.

Mr. Symes: After the fact.

Mr. Nielsen: I hear the interjection of the hon. member. It will not be after the fact. It will be on a continuing basis in the committee.

This is a unique experience in the history of this House as long as I have been here. A standing committee is being set up to monitor a piece of legislation about which there is understandably deep concern with regard to the achievement of the terms of the international agreement, particularly those with regard to Canadian content.

We are satisfied with the minister's undertaking, satisfied with the government's commitment and satisfied that that committee will be able to accomplish the purpose of ensuring that the Canadian content provisions will be adhered to.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I first wish to note that the hon. member for Yukon made mention of the fact that the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie had not been at any meetings of the special committee. That is quite correct. The hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie was not a member of that committee. The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands was our representative on that committee throughout its sessions. He happens to be away now and his place is being taken at this stage of the debate by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie. Nothing much turns on it, but I thought it was an unnecessary reference by the hon. member for Yukon.

As to his point about the commitment made by the Deputy Prime Minister to introduce an amendment to the Standing Orders, I suggest that does not have anything to do with the procedural admissibility of the amendment in motion No. 2. I also want to point out that they are two different concepts altogether, namely the establishing of a standing committee of the House of Commons to monitor what goes on with regard to the northern gas pipeline and an internal departmental committee that checks on purchases to make sure there is no price fixing and so on.

It is not good enough for the hon. member for Yukon to say that the committee which the Deputy Prime Minister will ask the House to set up can do that job. We do not know when parliament will be sitting. We do not know when that committee will be able to do its job. There are bound to be times when the government will be making purchases or letting contracts when parliament is not even here or when the committee is not sitting.

What we feel is necessary is a committee inside of the department or inside of the government service to check on purchases and contracts before they are entered into, to make sure there is no price fixing or violations of the agreement between Canada and the United States. I submit they are two different things. The hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie is perfectly aware of the commitment made by the Deputy Prime Minister. He hopes in this debate that the commitment made in the committee will be given to parliament and that we can be sure we will have that committee.

I heard the hon. member for Yukon saying there is almost an agreement as to what the wording will be. We want that commitment made on the floor of the House of Commons and we want that commitment kept. However, knowing full well that we may get that committee, it does not take the place of this before the fact continuing committee inside the department to deal with this matter.

I submit the argument that another committee is being promised does not touch the question of the procedural admissibility of the motion set out as No. 2. The point Your Honour raised is the question that has to be faced. Does it involve the expenditure of money? As my friend from Sault Ste. Marie pointed out, we do not envisage an outside committee that will cost extra money, but rather a committee within the public service. On that ground, the motion ought to be allowed as procedurally admissible.

Mr. Speaker: On the procedural point, I do not think there is any question about the motivation and the importance of the subject that is dealt with in the particular amendment. However, I am forced to the conclusion that the motion fails on procedural grounds either one way or the other.

The argument is that the committee that is envisaged here, as has been described by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie, at least in his mind, a committee only of officials of the minister. If that is so, surely that is a discretion that the minister enjoys without the necessity of having to give it to him in a statute. If it is in fact simply the discretion in the minister who is given by this section the authority to preside over all of these elements that are contained in here, all of which are very important, surely the minister possesses the authority to delegate that to officials on his own staff without having to have it put in the statute, in which case it becomes superfluous.

On the other hand, if it is more than that, if it is authority for the minister to set up some committee outside of his own staff or outside of his own department, it becomes first of all a new concept and in any case would require some expenses. Because if the people are not already on his staff, they have to be paid.

On balance, I have to conclude that this amendment imports into the statute a concept that was not there originally. It seems to raise a very serious problem about the financial recommendation provisions. Despite the argument that has been put forward here this evening, I have to set it aside on those procedural grounds. Therefore, we would begin by calling motion No. 1 which would be grouped for discussion with motion No. 11.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, I have an objection to make concerning the procedure to follow in the case of amendment No. 7. I wonder if it would be preferable to make this objection now or when you call motion No. 7? I can raise my objection now if you wish.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion, it would be preferable to listen immediately to the objection of the hon. member.

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that if this motion is to be acceptable, it would need the royal recommendation for the following reasons: The legislation provides for the creation of an agency called the Northern Pipeline Agency. Moreover, the legislation provides that the cost of this agency will be fully payable by the company. However, amendment No. 7 aims at limiting reimbursement of this cost by the company to one per cent, as specifically stated in the motion, that is one per cent of the actual construction costs of the pipeline.

Consequently, the amendment aims at limiting reimbursement by the company of the administration cost of the pipeline. If this cost exceeds one per cent, it will have to be paid by the government or the taxpayers. There has not been any royal recommendation to ask the state to shoulder such an expense.

The nature of our objection, Mr. Speaker, concerns simply the fact that it can happen that the limit set out in the suggested amendment be lower than the actual administration cost of the pipeline, in which case the taxpayers will have to pay the difference and we do not have the necessary royal recommendation. This is the nature of my objection.

[English]

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, what the hon. member is arguing is a hypothesis. As he knows, there is a similar provision in the United States legislation setting out a formula which places a cap on the expenditures of the government with respect to costs which can be passed on to the builder companies.

What the hon. member is arguing is that the one per cent cost cap might be exceeded. I would point out it is always open to the government or to any member to amend that motion so as to increase the one per cent if the government could show that costs are going to be exceeded. The cost at one per cent would amount to $40 million over the life of the international agreement. If the case could be proven by debate on the motion that the cost could be kept well below that figure—and we think we can make such a case—then there would be no cost to the Canadian taxpayer, so it would not offend the provisions of our practice with respect to obtaining a Governor General's warrant. So this is open to amendment. For this reason I believe the argument put forward by the hon. member is premature.

The point raised by the parliamentary secretary is a good one. It is one to which we gave consideration prior to grouping the amendments. I can see there is a possibility in certain circumstances that since this section provides for the collection of money, and if a limit were to be imposed which is not now contemplated in the recommendation, it could have the effect of reducing by that amount the revenue to be gained in that way, thereby increasing the charge on the taxpayer. On balance I felt that to remove this element from the argument solely on procedural grounds would be reaching too far, because it seems to me the words here are capable of several other interpretations. I thought it more appropriate to allow this proposed amendment to go to debate to see whether the arguments developed proved that there is, in fact, a risk of a further drain on the treasury, in which case an amended Royal Recommendation might be needed.

It seemed to me that where we are dealing with a section in a statute which sets out fees in certain circumstances, or payment by private companies or applicants in certain circumstances, it would be very strict if I were to eliminate an amendment which sought to place control or upper limit upon those fees. While it may be necessary as the debate develops to take such a position, I did not think I ought to do it ahead of time.

I am mindful of the point raised by the hon. member but at the moment I think I ought not to accept it unless, during the course of the debate, I see some indication as to the operation of the section which expands upon the point which the parliamentary secretary has made.

Mr. Symes: Mr. Speaker, I should like to raise a point of order before we proceed with the motion before us. It relates to certain commitments made by the Deputy Prime Minister before a committee of the House. I have had some with the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and I think it would be beneficial if certain of those commitments which relate to certain documents were tabled in the House and an explanation given with regard to the commitment in respect of Standing Order 65.

I refer hon. members to the record of the Special Committee on a Northern Gas Pipeline, issue No. 11 for March 15, where the Deputy Prime Minister, as reported at page 11:17 and 11:18 gave the committee the assurance that, before we proceed with later debate on this bill, he would provide for members of the House a draft agreement between the Government of Canada and Foothills Pipeline Company on the Dempster link, as it is called, and also the draft agreement on natural gas throughput. Perhaps it would facilitate our consideration of the bill if those two documents were tabled.

In addition, I wonder whether we might have on record in this House the government's commitment to amend Standing Order 65—the exact nature of the amendment the government is willing to propose in line with its undertaking in committee.

Mr. Faulkner: I rise on the point of order raised by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie, Mr. Speaker. Dealing with the second item, namely the commitment of the Deputy Prime Minister to propose an amendment to standing orders to provide for the northern pipeline committee to continue its work after this bill goes through and in the course of the construction, I reiterate that commitment now at the report stage. There is, I believe, circulating around the chamber tonight a proposed revised form of the Standing Order, but I am not sure we are agreed on all its aspects. So rather than read that proposal into the record I would suggest we carry on with the discussion this evening; hopefully, the Deputy Prime Minister will be back tomorrow and he might then wish to bring the matter to a head in discussion with representatives from all parties. I am ready to provide hon. members with copies of the proposed Standing Order should they be required, and talks can proceed with regard to any areas where there may be dispute.

As for the draft copy of the Dempster link agreement and the natural gas throughput agreement, I have copies here both in English and in French and I will be pleased to table them if consent to do so is forthcoming, or to circulate them, whichever is the wish of hon. members.

• (2042)

Mr. Speaker: Does the minister have leave of the House to table those documents at this time?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I would like to make one point on the subject of the commitment of the minister. That commitment is spelled out in detail in the minutes of the special committee set up to study the pipeline. Very uniquely in my experience in this House, that committee went through all the clauses of this bill without a single vote being taken on any of the proposals of the opposition as they were advanced. They were found to be acceptable by the government, and significant progress was made.

However, the only area which has yet to be clarified—and which I do not think is in dispute—is the frequency with which the special committee to be set up under the Standing Orders to review and to monitor will report to the House. Our suggestion has been a quarterly review, but we are flexible. It could be once every four months, but we do not think it should be any less frequent than that.

I think we must support the minister and urge the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie and his party to leave that area open. It is not urgent to pass that amendment to the Standing Orders at this stage and, indeed, it can be done after we return from the Easter recess. It certainly cannot be passed before the bill is passed. If we had that flexibility—in view of the minister's illness, which is the reason for his absence from this debate—I think we would be far better off than we would be if we dealt with that matter today.

Northern Pipeline

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie) moved:

That Bill C-25, to establish the Northern Pipeline Agency, to facilitate the planning and construction of a pipeline for the transmission of natural gas from Alaska and Northern Canada and to give effect to an Agreement between Canada and the United States of America on principles applicable to such a pipeline and to amend certain Acts in relation thereto, be amended in Clause 3 by:

(a) deleting the word "and" in line 29 at page 3

(b) striking out line 32 at page 3 and substituting the following therefor:

"industrial benefits by guaranteeing the highest"

(c) striking out lines 35 to 38 at page 3 and substituting the following therefor:

"tion of, and procurement for, the pipeline; and

(g) to facilitate the efficient and expeditious planning and construction of the pipeline while at the same time ensuring that federal government financial guarantees of any kind will not be required in order to complete the project.

Mr. Speaker: Motion No. 1 is grouped for discussion and voting with motion No. 11.

Mr. Symes moved:

That Bill C-25, to establish the Northern Pipeline Agency, to facilitate the planning and construction of a pipeline for the transmission of natural gas from Alaska and Northern Canada and to give effect to an Agreement between Canada and the United States of America on principles applicable to such a pipeline and to amend certain Acts in relation thereto, be amended in Schedule III at page 52, by striking out line 2 of paragraph 12(a) and substituting the following therefor:

"relating to the financing of the pipeline consistent with paragraph 3(g) and sub-clause 21(2) of this Act and such".

He said: Mr. Speaker, Bill C-25, regarding the northern pipeline, or the Alcan pipeline as it is commonly called, is one of the most important bills to come before this House in recent times because it incorporates legislation to provide for one of the largest construction undertakings since the St. Lawrence Seaway. This vast energy pipeline will be designed to transport gas from Alaska through Canada to southern United States markets.

The New Democratic Party are in favour of the Alcan pipeline, but we are not in favour of the bill before us because we feel there are a number of deficiencies in it with regard to guaranteeing maximum Canadian content in terms of steel for the pipeline and in terms of jobs, whether they be in the steel industry or in the construction industry. We are also concerned that we do not have any guarantee or provision in the legislation to ensure that, if the cost of this pipeline exceeds original estimates and the pipeline companies run into financial difficulties, they will not end up coming to the government of Canada, and hence to the taxpayers of Canada, for supplementary funding out of the public purse.

That is why I moved motion No. 1, which would do two things. It would provide stronger wording in the legislation to ensure that we get maximum Canadian content in this vast pipeline, and also that we do not end up becoming involved in some kind of government backstopping or financial guarantees in case there are cost overruns.

As we were told when we heard from the applicant, Foothills, this great pipeline will cost some $10 billion. That is the original estimate. Some $4 billion to $6 billion of that will be spent on the Canadian section. We were told by the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) that this pipeline would generate 100,000 man-years of employment in Canada. We applaud that kind of job creation. Because of the way the Liberal government has mismanaged our economy, because there are more than one million Canadians officially unemployed and because real unemployment is running at about 1.5 million, any project we can undertake which will employ steel workers and construction workers and which will benefit depressed regions is welcome.

One would think, given the disastrous economic situation in Canada, that any responsible government would try to ensure that we did not get the optimum level of Canadian content but rather the maximum level, and that we did not get about 60 per cent of the contracts but 90 per cent or 98 per cent. In return for giving the United States the right of way, this land bridge across Canada, to move American gas to American markets—because that is essentially what this project will be, at least in its beginning stages—surely it should not be unreasonable for Canada to expect in return something besides token job creation or token steel contracts.

We should be demanding maximum Canadian content in the pipeline, but nowhere in the legislation do we see any attempt to make ironclad provisions for maximum Canadian content and Canadian job creation. We have to rely on the assurances of the Deputy Prime Minister and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) that we will get 90 per cent Candian content and 100,000 man-years of employment.

Why are we in this party somewhat suspicious of that verbal guarantee?

Mr. Blackburn: We have good grounds.

Mr. Symes: My colleague, the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn), says we have good grounds, because when we look at the past record of negotiations between the Liberal government of Canada and the government of the United States, we find that usually we come out holding the short end of the stick. Let us face the fact that Americans are some of the best negotiators. The United States is a very powerful country. It has much leverage which it can bring to bear whenever it enters into bilateral negotiations.

One has only to think of the past experiences of the Canadian government in such negotiations. I think, for example, of the Columbia River Treaty and the Canada-U.S. auto pact. Anyone who has examined those two international trade treaties in detail has come to the conclusion that, although we were promised at the time that these agreements were going to create great benefits for Canada, in reality it turned out somewhat differently. We are already facing huge deficits in the auto pact agreement and we are losing jobs to U.S. auto producers.

Surely in light of some of this bad experience when we had our fingers burned in the past, we should be wary of this government's assurances that everything will be all right, that two or three years down the road when the pipeline actually gets under construction and the bids have been made we will indeed have 90 per cent or more of the content and the kind of job creation the minister promised. All we have are those verbal assurances of the minister and the wording that is before us in the legislation.

When we look at the wording in the legislation we see that we do not get absolute and clear guarantees. The legislation prefers to use such words as, and I look at clause 3(f), "to advance national economic and energy interests and to maximize related industrial benefits by ensuring the highest possible degree of Canadian participation". It does not use the words "guaranteeing the highest", it uses the words "ensuring the highest". Anyone who has any kind of elementary education knows the difference between those two words.

That is why we have moved the amendment to replace the word "ensure" with the word "guarantee". We feel this wording gives much more direction to the government and makes it much more difficult for the government to get off the hook and begin to explain away, somewhere down the road, why we are not getting 90 per cent content but only 60 per cent or 70 per cent.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, when you look at the official announcements of both governments after the treaty was negotiated concerning this pipeline, we remember how the Canadian officials told us that this was the greatest coup Canadian negotiators had made in a long time; we have this great project and we are going to receive tremendous benefits. However, at the same time Dr. Schlesinger, the United States energy minister, was saying that they in the United States had worked out one of the best deals ever. They had arranged the pipeline and the treaty in such a way that they would not get undue hindrance from Canada, and they were also confident they would win a great many of the contracts for the building of the pipeline.

Indeed, when one looks at the preparations American industry is now making, at advertisements in some of the financial journals and interdepartmental reports in the United States, and when we look at the activities of many U.S. pipeline companies, one gets the horrible fear that they believe they have most of the contracts sewn up already. I think, for example, of pipeline contractors who have been able to pick up, at bargain basement prices, the pipeline construction material used for building the Alaska oil pipeline, and how these U.S. contractors now have that equipment in place and are ready to bid on various construction contracts, at great advantage to any Canadian company which has to start buying new machinery at higher prices. We see these things taking place already, and that, coupled with our knowledge of past mistakes, makes us believe we must have some very strong language and very strong clauses in this bill if we are to end up with the majority of the benefits from this great pipeline undertaking.

I know the Deputy Prime Minister is a man of integrity, and when he says we are going to get 90 per cent of the contracts and 100,000 man-years of employment I am sure he quite genuinely believes that is so. I do not argue with that, and we are expected to take him at his word. However, in my experience here in the House of Commons one politician's word has never been as strong or as binding as an act of parliament, binding on this minister, this government, future ministers and future governments in respect of a certain course of action. Politicians come and go and promises are forgotten, but legislation remains and is to be obeyed. This is why we say the bill as it presently stands is a weak bill, and it is for this reason that we want to move these amendments and hope the House will support us.

We have come across some studies by the federal government which cause us to worry that we are, indeed, going to get 90 per cent of the contracts. It is interesting to note that when this pipeline was first proposed we were told by officials both of Foothills and the National Energy Board that if we were to get the 100,000 man-years of employment, or that kind of maximum job creation, it would mean we were going to get 98 per cent of the content of this pipeline.

We started off with the figure of 98 per cent, and that figure dropped to 90 per cent. That is the figure the Deputy Prime Minister has been using. We do not now hear the 98 per cent figure in respect of Canadian content that we heard when there was competition between this bid and the Mackenzie Valley pipeline bid. This makes us worry a bit.

We then came across an internal study commissioned by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion which stated that unless there were guarantees in the legislation for Canadian content a more realistic projection for Canadian content was not 90 per cent but only 67 per cent. That frightens us. A Canadian government department which has done an analysis taking all factors into consideration has stated in black and white that, unless we have guarantees in the legislation, the more realistic Canadian content figure is only 67 per cent. When you drop down to 67 per cent in content you drop down the number of man-years of employment created. Indeed, unless we get the Dempster lateral or spur line built we will not have the 100,000 man-years of employment but something more like 68,000 man-years. If we drop down to 67 per cent Canadian content we lose some 32,000 man-years of employment, or even more, and we lose all kinds of contracts for the steel industry of Canada.

I come from a community which has Canada's third largest steel producer, Algoma Steel. I know the workers of Algoma will benefit indirectly from the pipeline. They will not be making the pipe at Sault Ste. Marie but they will be providing some of the plate for Stelco, and they will also be picking up some of the slack in other areas of the steel industry. It seems to me that for the sake of the 40,000 steel workers across Canada and the tens of thousands of other workers who depend on the health of the Canadian steel industry, it is not unreasonable that we have some kind of guarantees in this legislation as far as content is concerned.

That is one additional reason for motion No. 1, to put the word "guarantee", in relation to the highest Canadian content, into this legislation. We can then hold the Deputy Prime Minister to his promise of 90 per cent or more Canadian content.

Many members of the House will say it is not necessary to have that kind of guarantee in the legislation because the pipe size gives the Canadian industry a great competitive advantage. They will say the pipe size is 56-inch diameter, which we are able to produce and in respect of which other countries will have difficulties. I know that the heads of Stelco and Ipsco have said: "Yes, we are confident we can produce and fulfill the contracts". I do not question that at all. We have a very efficient and competitive steel industry. As I will explain in later motions, we fear there will be unfair foreign competition which will undermine the ability of Canadian steel producers to bid competitively on the world market. Indeed, we may see the Japanese, West Germans or Americans, through all types of hidden subsidies, being able to offer lower bids than Canadian companies.

● (2102)

Also perhaps the government will be powerless to stop those bids without specific guarantees in the legislation before us. Certainly the presidents of Stelco and other steel companies are correct; they will receive a lot of the contracts. But "a lot" is a very nebulous phrase sometimes. That is why we say that we must not just look for the optimum, that we must look for the maximum. The maximum must be spelled out, as the Deputy Prime Minister has done, in terms of 90 per cent Canadian content.

The other amendment before us in motion No. 1 is to add a subclause to clause 3 to ensure that we do not run into the position somewhere down the road of requiring the federal government to provide financial backstopping for the company. What do I mean by that? That is a system whereby the company comes to the federal government and says: "Well, we have got the pipeline two-thirds built and we are running into difficulty raising the capital necessary to continue the construction of the line. Therefore, we would like some type of government backstopping or standing behind us in the money markets to ensure that we can raise the extra capital".

This is a very dangerous situation. When pipelines are built, experience indicates that the original estimates have a habit of escalating very rapidly. One has to think only of the Montreal Olympics and what the original costs were. The mayor of Montreal said that the Olympics can no more have a deficit than a man can have a baby. Yet we have ended up with the federal government providing all kinds of indirect subsidies and financial assistance in order to bail the Olympics out of the huge deficit it got into.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie now is dealing with clause 3. As I understand it, that clause is not grouped with motions 1 and 11. Surely the hon. member should stick to motions 1 and 11 and not deal with his other amendments until they come up in proper order.

[Mr. Symes.]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. member for Yukon raises a good point of order.

Mr. Symes: Mr. Speaker, with all respect, motion No. 1, which I have moved and am now discussing, has two aspects. One deals with guaranteeing Canadian content and a new subclause (g). Perhaps I should read that for the benefit of the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen). It reads as follows:

> to facilitate the efficient and expeditious planning and construction of the pipeline while at the same time ensuring that federal government financial guarantees of any kind will not be required in order to complete the project.

I am now addressing myself to the second part of my motion. I believe that is entirely in order.

Mr. Nielsen: I apologize. The hon. member is entirely correct.

Mr. Symes: I thank the hon. member. I was saying that we must be careful that we do not get into the trap of having public money bailing out the private pipeline company in the end. It is not Canadian consumers who will receive the Alaska gas; it is gas moving to the United States. There is some question that we will ever build the Dempster spur line to the Mackenzie Valley gas fields in light of the increased finds of natural gas in southern Alberta. Of course, this gas is approximately one-third the price of Arctic gas. Thus, the argument cannot be used that it is all right for public money to provide some financial backstopping to the company because we will receive some of this gas. That is not a guaranteed situation. Certainly it is untrue in the early years of the pipeline.

When the Alaska oil pipeline was completed, the original estimates had doubled or had more than doubled. We must look at the safeguard that the president of the United States ensured in legislation placed before Congress on this very matter. The Americans have a provision in their legislation relating to the pipeline to the effect that the government of the United States will not provide financial backstopping for the company in the future. In light of their Alaska oil pipeline experience, Americans are wise enough to have that kind of provision written into their legislation.

Nowhere in the bill before us do we see a similar provision. There is no commitment on the part of the government that it will not bail the company out if it runs into financial difficulties down the road. If the Americans found it wise in light of past experience to have such a clause in their legislation, I cannot fathom why our government has not provided such a clause to ensure that we do not fall into the trap of having to use public funds to bail the company out if the original cost estimates are exceeded.

These are the reasons for putting forward motion No. 1. I think it is important that the wording be strengthened to have the type of provision which guarantees the highest possible amount of Canadian content and Canadian job creation. We do not use wishy-washy words; we have stated it in black and white. We hold this government to that commitment by an act of parliament.

The second aspect of motion No. 1 is an inclusion in the legislation so that the government is bound by this provision that we do not get into financial guarantees; and if we ever come across that situation in the future, it will not be an executive decision by the government to commit public funds but the government will have to return to the House of Commons to get an amendment to the act. As responsible members of parliament, and as protectors of the public purse, that is something we should expect of this extravagant government across the way.

I commend to the House those two aspects of motion No. 1. Surely hon. members of the Conservative party, who are worried about the government's record in terms of past treaties, job creation and government expenditure, would support this motion, which provides some kind of legislative guarantee that the government will own up to its promises.

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, before dealing with motion No. 1 at report stage, perhaps I can indicate to all hon. members that the Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen), who has been responsible for piloting this bill on the government side from the beginning of negotiations, will be feeling stronger tomorrow and will take his place as the minister responsible for the bill.

● (2112)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Faulkner: I know hon. members opposite are glad to see me in the House and will bear with me during this part of the proceedings; but at the same time I am sure they will be glad to see the Deputy Prime Minister back tomorrow.

An hon. Member: You are one of the best ministers in the cabinet.

Mr. Faulkner: That is right. The proposal put forward by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes) is really a proposal in parts. The first amendment proposes changing the words "ensuring the highest possible degree of participation" to "guaranteeing the highest possible degree of participation". In a second and different substantive part of the same motion, he deals with the question of whether there should be an explicit exclusion of federal government financial guarantees. I will attempt to deal with both of them briefly.

At the committee stage—and I am sure the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) will confirm this when he speaks shortly after I—these issues were dealt with extensively. They were canvassed thoroughly, and some of the arguments that were raised at the committee stage were ignored by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie. In proposing the first part of his motion, which deals with guaranteeing the highest possible degree of Canadian participation, he chose to ignore the fact that it would be in conflict with the generally competitive basis provision of the Canada-U.S. agreement. He also chose to ignore the point that was raised in committee that a provision of this kind would be in contravention of Canada's obligations under GATT.

Leaving aside those two rather important objections to accepting this particular proposal at the committee hearing, there was no request from the companies for such a provision. They seemed to have a great deal more confidence in their abilities to meet the target of Canadian content than does the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie or, indeed, the New Democratic Party.

The companies have been quite explicit that they do not need the guarantees. They do not want this legislative monopoly, and, in fact, they are arguing against it. What they want is to be able to compete on fair, competitive terms, and they can do it. They do not accept the notion that because they are Canadian, somehow they cannot compete with the Americans, or that somehow there is going to be an insidious conspiracy of unfair competition that is going to render them "out of court". There are other ways of dealing with unfair competition, and it should be dealt with directly. So, Mr. Speaker, I find it unnecessary at the report stage to recanvass all the ground that was gone over exhaustively in the committee. The fact is that the companies do not want it. They are opposed to it. They do not think it is necessary, and, furthermore, it creates the additional problems which I have just mentioned.

The hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie went on to provide a fairly personal account of deals struck by governments in the past and the toughness of American negotiators. I think it is fair to say, without getting into a long historical argument with the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie, that the deal which has been struck is a good deal. I am anxious to see the bill pass, and I do not want to create unnecessary obstacles to its passage.

The hon. member has indicated to us that he would like to see the bill pass. He represents a constituency which produces some steel. He knows the bill's passage is going to create employment. He probably knows in his heart of hearts that he does not need these legislative guarantees, these legislative monopolies, to create opportunities for his people and other people in Hamilton and Saskatchewan, particularly in Saskatchewan where there are some colleagues of his. The fact remains that the bill would create employment; it would create job opportunities for Canadians in many parts of this country. We should not try to compromise this bill now with amendments of this kind, particularly since the principal players are not requesting it. By any standard of analysis, when you look at the ability of Canadian companies to compete, they are able to do so.

Let me turn to the second part of the motion which is an additional clause 3(g). Very simply, what it provides is that there should be no federal government financial guarantees of any kind. First of all, there has been no request for federal financial guarantees from any corner. The witnesses who appeared before the committee said they are not asking for federal financial guarantees. In fact, the pipeline company even went further than that and said that if it had to have federal guarantees, it would get out. I am not sure that wording is entirely accurate. The other point, which I think is more important, is that if a federal financial guarantee was ever required, it would come before parliament in the normal course of business.

For both those reasons, Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is necessary to include particularly in the second part of the amendment, the words "guaranteeing the highest" as proposed. I recommend that the House reject motion No. 1.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes) had taken the trouble to look in the Oxford dictionary for the definitions of "ensure" and "guarantee", he would agree that the terms are synonymous. According to Oxford, "ensure" means "to make certain, to secure something to or for a person". "Guarantee" in the Oxford dictionary means exactly the same thing. So the motion with respect to changing the word "ensuring" in sub-clause (f) of clause 3 is mere grandstanding, as far as I am concerned.

The hon. member knows that his party is in a difficult position because they know the benefits of this pipeline to the west, apart of which enjoys, for the moment at least, a government of their own political stripe. It would have assisted greatly in the debate if the hon. member had been in attendance at the committee meetings. The companies involved in the building of this line have no fears whatsoever that the Canadian steel industry and Canadian labour will not be employed to the fullest possible extent. Indeed, they know that Canadian labour organizations want this bill, and they do not want it cluttered up or obstructed, which appears to be the course of the NDP at the moment.

The Canadian steel industry has expressed full confidence not only in being able to supply the steel for the Canadian section, but also in bidding successfully on the American portion of the line. I think that disposes of the grandstanding approach to changing the word "ensure" to "guarantee". It is a very feeble attempt at gaining media attention for something that is impractical.

The minister has mentioned the two reasons that this amendment is impractical, and it sharpens the differences between the position taken by the NDP and our own position. The NDP wants guarantees written into the legislation with respect to the Canadian provisions of the international agreement. Canadian labour does not want that. The Canadian steel industry does not want that. The Canadian pipe industry does not want that. Operating companies do not want that. So why is there all this grandstanding on the part of the NDP?

● (2122)

It has been our intention from the outset to assist the passage of this bill, but in doing so to ensure the legislation would be improved so as to guarantee that the best interests of Canadians would be served. In doing that, we gave very close scrutiny to the section of the bill dealing with Canadian content.

[Mr. Faulkner.]

When the bill was first introduced it was immediately apparent that there were several major omissions and that amendments would be required to rectify defects. The committee that was set up specifically to focus on an examination of the bill did an excellent job, in my view. It also did a unique job because this is the first time that a bill has passed through committee in terms of a negotiating process which resulted in no votes on clauses. This was because we got the most from our suggested amendments that we could possibly get from the government.

By far the most important omission was the absence of any guarantee to ensure the very admirable intention spelled out in the Canada-U.S. international agreement as to Canadian content—that is, the use of Canadian labour, materials and products. We, as much as they, wanted guarantees that these intentions would be carried out. The NDP took the unworkable and impracticable position that the bill should be amended so as to legislate that kind of guarantee.

That is impracticable and unworkable for two reasons. First of all, we are bound by an international agreement which we signed with the United States. Second, as the minister pointed out, it would offend GATT. Those two impediments are enough to destroy the suggested addition of sub-clause (g).

It is worthy of note that neither Canadian labour leaders themselves nor the steel and pipe producers in Canada wanted any such guarantees written into the bill. It also should be remembered—and this is for the benefit of the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie—that Premier Blakeney of Saskatchewan, at the recent federal-provincial conference here in Ottawa, took a very strong stand that the pipeline legislation should not be obstructed by reason of the vital importance of the pipeline project to his province and his government, to say nothing of the national interest to be served and of the 100,000 man-year jobs that would be supplied in a time of high unemployment.

We on this side also wanted to achieve the admirable objective of guarantees with respect to Canadian content but our alternative was not the impracticable and unworkable alternative suggested by the NDP. Our alternative was set forth in the speech of our leader on August 14 last, when the project was first discussed. We wanted a parliamentary review. How much more preferable is the elective process than a civil service process for review. They suggested that a special committee should be set up comprised of civil servants but that has been ruled out of order. We wanted the elected representatives to do it by setting up a special committee, and the government has accepted that. They have gone a long way to meet our suggestions and have accepted that position.

The special standing committee on northern pipelines is going to be set up. It will review on a quarterly basis, or at least on a four-month basis—which is the extent to which I am prepared to negotiate—all aspects of the progress of the pipeline. All aspects, Mr. Speaker—Canadian content provisions, labour provisions, the orders and directions of the boards, the agreements that are reached, the contracts that are submitted. This committee is going to be hard at work looking at every inch of the progress of that pipeline. It seems to me the government has done the right thing in accepting that suggestion, advanced by us in the first instance.

An hon. Member: Why do you not cross the floor?

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, if I had crossed the floor as some members of the NDP suggests, we would have the bill in its original form and not in the improved form it is in now.

If the special standing committee on northern pipelines meets on a quarterly basis, we can assure that the terms of the agreement reached by our two countries are actually being achieved. The important additional responsibilities of that committee in its review process would be to review all the activities of the agencies, the boards, the designated officers and the agreements that are made, as well as the regulations that I am sure will be made by the hundreds. The government has agreed to establish that committee for the purposes of review.

With respect to the argument about financial backstopping, I think that is the most specious and empty argument I have heard from anyone familiar with the parliamentary process. There is no provision in this bill whatsoever which imposes a charge on the taxpayers of Canada. In order for that to happen, an amendment would have to be made to the bill. The hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie knows that very well. There is no need for us now to write in a negative provision in the bill to prevent that. If we reach that stage—which I do not expect to happen—the government would be bound to bring in a proposed amendment to the bill to permit backstopping. That is simply not going to happen.

Some 22 amendments to this bill were proposed in committee. Half of them were disposed of by the concession of the government in accepting the proposition to set up a parliamentary review process. Among the rest were some major amendments, such as setting up a monitoring process to be carried out by the committee that will be formed and relating to the complete absence of a native presence in the bill. The government has accepted in part our suggestions with respect to writing the native population affected into the bill. We had very serious reservations with respect to the judicial process. The government has literally accepted all of our recommendations with respect to those amendments.

There is something I cannot understand, however. The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) sat in on most of those meetings, agreed with every one of the amendments we presented, and agreed that they would achieve the objectives that his party is now attempting to achieve by these sham amendments—for that is what they are—for the purpose, I can only conjecture, of impressing the media.

The parliamentary review process that we have from the government now by way of a commitment is the very kind of guarantee we want. It will insist upon the implementation of the admirable objectives set out in the agreement.

An hon. Member: Go over there.

An hon. Member: Join them.

Mr. Nielsen: Hon. members tell me to go over to the other side, Mr. Speaker. I wonder which member over there will receive a telephone call from Premier Blakeney tomorrow telling him not to obstruct any more.

Their amendments are unacceptable. They are empty, they are specious, they are unnecessary, primarily because we have achieved the only practicable, workable solution with respect to seeing to it that the government lives up to its intentions and that the company lives up to its intentions by the monitoring process. This amendment to our Standing Orders will set up a committee of elected representatives of the people who will accept their responsibility.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn) is indicating that he wishes to ask a question. He can do so only if it is accepted by the hon. member who has the floor. Will the hon. member accept a question?

Mr. Nielsen: Certainly.

Mr. Blackburn: Mr. Speaker, I just want to ask one question of the hon. member for the Yukon. I assume he is well aware of the importance of this project in his part of the country. I think he gave the speech that he has just made a few weeks ago. The hon. member is talking about guarantees. Perhaps we should not have guarantees that it should be a competitive market situation.

● (2132)

I would like to ask the hon. member for Yukon if he knows or is aware of the fact that the steel industries and steel manufacturing concerns in Japan and Italy, to name two countries, are very heavily subsidized by their respective governments. When the bidding is being done for these contracts, is it possible for this House and this government to find out just how much public funds from those countries will be put into those contracts and those bids before those bids are placed. That is the crucial point. In Canada we can find out if there is any government subsidy with Stelco or Ipsco and so on, but I want to find out if there is any possible means, of which the the member is aware right now, by which we can find out in this country how much subsidy is given to the Japanese steel manufacturers and the Italian steel manufacturers so that they might just possibly underbid our own steel pipeline manufacturers.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, that question is very quickly and easily answered. I know the hon. member did not attend the committee meetings; he probably had other responsibilities. But if he read the committee reports and the bill he will see that the minister and the agency have the broadest possible powers with respect to the contracts that are let. Every agreement entered into must be submitted to the minister. Every agreement that is submitted to the minister must be submitted to the committee that is to be set up. It will not all happen at once, this project will take several years. So there will be an ongoing review by the elected representatives sitting in this House that will form a special committee. If we see that the government is not meeting their objectives as to Canadian content, then a debate will arise in this House and the government will be accountable.

An hon. Member: Too late!

Mr. Nielsen: It is not too late if it is done on a quarterly basis. The steel orders or the pipe orders will not be placed for five-year projects inside of three months. That would be ridiculous. The monitoring process plus the powers of the agency, plus the powers of the minister as well as the powers of the governor in council, which are so broad and sweeping in this bill, provide that kind of guarantee. That is to say nothing of the fact that the Canadian steel industry itself, which must know the factors inherent in the bidding process, is confident that it can outbid any other steel industry, wherever it is, be it in Japan, Italy or anywhere else. The same applies to the pipe industry. I am satisfied with that kind of comfortable position with respect to successfully gaining the majority of the Canadian content for this project.

Mr. Blackburn: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the member for Yukon whether he can cite anything in the bill or from the committee hearings that would give the Canadian government the right to delve into and investigate how bids are set up in Japan or Italy. Is there anything in this bill that gives the Canadian government the right to go to the other two countries and find out whether those governments have subsidized their own steel industry, or to what extent they underbid our own?

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, that is a very silly question. The government has no power to get into the internal affairs of another country. The power the government has and the power which the standing committee will have will be to look at the contracts—

An hon. Member: No way.

Mr. Nielsen: The hon. member asked me a question and I listened to him while he was asking it. I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, but I listened to the hon. member while he was asking the question and now I ask him to listen to the answer. The government and the minister will have the power to veto the contracts that are intended to be entered into. That is where the crunch comes. If the government approves a contract which the hon. member might think offends the intention spelled out in the international agreement, that contract comes before the monitoring committee of this House and then we will have a word to say about it if they fall down on their job—

An hon. Member: After the fact.

Mr. Nielsen: It is after the fact by three months. I emphasize the fact that all these orders are not going to be placed within three months. We will have ongoing responsibility to be critical of the government, to expose any failures that they may fall heir to with respect to Canadian content provisions on an ongoing basis. Quite frankly, it would be political suicide for them not to adhere to those Canadian content provisions in the light of that monitoring process.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I have had some real difficulty this evening figuring out which party the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) belongs to. He has been defending the government legislation a lot more strongly than the government has.

An hon. Member: Much more effectively.

Mr. Nystrom: Perhaps he has been defending it more effectively; I am not saying that he has not. Perhaps the minister for sport and fitness should move over one seat and let the happy wanderer from the Yukon join the happy rancher from Crowfoot.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nystrom: I think that is his objective—to run as a Liberal candidate in the next election campaign.

An hon. Member: He will soon be the unhappy rancher.

Mr. Nystrom: I am happy to see that the member from Edmonton is saying that the member for Yukon will soon be an unhappy rancher—

An hon. Member: I meant the member for Crowfoot.

Mr. Nystrom: The member for Yukon seems to be very content to argue in the House that if the government that he has so much confidence in makes a mistake we can rectify an error right here on the floor of the House. If we cannot rectify it in the House, we can do so in the committee. In other words, we can make a correction after they have made a mistake.

I for one do not have that much confidence in the Liberal government. First of all, their priorities may not be the same as ours. Secondly, if we refer the question to a committee, the government has a majority on that committee and there is no way of knowing if we in the opposition can do anything to change what has happened or to change their minds. The member for Yukon has been a member of parliament longer than I have. He should know that when the government gets into House committees hon. members are often frustrated by the majority that sits across the way. There are absolutely no guarantees that if the government is doing something wrong we on this side of the House can rectify it. I say that to the government members as well. If they happen to lose the election—and it might be very soon—when they are sitting in the opposition I am sure they would want more guarantees than are in this legislation to stop a government that is doing the wrong thing. I quote no less an authority than the member for Yukon's hero, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner). The hon. member is defending the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, who said on February 20 at page 3036 of Hansard, in response to points made on this side of the House about guarantees:

It should be noted that neither (11A) of the anti-dumping regulations nor the imposition of countervailing duties for reasons of export financing subsidies appear to have been tested as yet.

Then he says something that is crucial:

Moreover, the anti-dumping option would really only come into play after the fact,—

And I stress, Mr. Speaker, "after the fact". He continues:

—which renders its use, other than as a threat mechanism, somewhat ineffective.

Here is the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce saying that the anti-dumping provisions we have in this country are useless. He says they have been nothing more than a threat. Yet we have the member for Yukon saying that if we discover the government is not living up to its moral commitments—and really all we have in the legislation is moral commitments—then we can do something about it in the House.

● (2142)

If the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Faulkner) had time to look at the bill, he would probably agree that we are giving a blank cheque to the minister. His own colleague said we do not have any mechanism to ensure that we will have Canadian content. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce said that the legislation is ineffective.

The hon. member for Yukon is playing with words. He picks up a dictionary and gives us the definition of "ensure" and "guarantee". The two words are very similar. However, that is not the point we are trying to make in this debate. Our point is that we should legislate guarantees so that there are commitments in the bill to have Canadian content.

The hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes) is trying to be consistent in the amendment he is moving. Motion No. 9, which should be coming a little later, states in part:

—the level of Canadian content is at least 90% with respect to the origin of products, services and their constituent components,—

That means that 90 per cent of what goes into the pipeline is to be Canadian. That is part of the legislation. Just as we have legislation in Canada which states that every month old age pensioners will receive cheques and every year income tax will be imposed upon Canadian citizens and companies, so we should have legislation stating that 90 per cent of what goes into the Canadian pipeline must be Canadian.

The way the legislation reads now, a lot is left to the imagination of a minister. The ideology of a minister, even of the same party, or the sensitivities of that department's bureaucrats to negotiations going on vis-à-vis trade and so on, might play an important role as to how "guarantee" or "ensure" is interpreted.

All the legislation says in clause 3(f) is "to advance national economic and energy interests and to maximize related industrial benefits by ensuring the highest possible degree of Canadian participation in all aspects" of the pipeline. That may mean 90 per cent. However, it may also mean 25, 30, 40 or 50 per cent. We do not know what it will mean when it is not spelled out in the legislation.

The hon. member for Yukon referred to the premier of Saskatchewan. I spoke with Al Blakeney a week ago Saturday when the federal cabinet came to Regina about this question. He is indeed happy that the pipeline is going to be built and that the Ipsco plant in Regina can build some of the plant. If there is fair competition, he is sure that Ipsco can compete. They are efficient, have good management and can compete with anybody in the world. What he is afraid of is unfair competition as a result of subsidies given by American or Japanese steel producers in order to get a contract.

Mr. Nielsen: Does he endorse your amendments?

Mr. Nystrom: He endorses the philosophy of the amendments.

Mr. Nielsen: Does he endorse your amendments?

Mr. Nystrom: I am sure he would endorse the amendments word for word. He certainly endorses the principle of what we are trying to do, namely legislate a guarantee that my constituents, the constituents of the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn) and others in Saskatchewan will have jobs. They want security. They want a guarantee in the legislation.

The government talks about the importance of Canadian content and Canadian jobs, as do the members of the Progressive Conservative party. Why not put in the legislation what we are all talking about? Why be chicken-livered and leave it open to the interpretation of a future minister and future department? That is not good enough for Canadians. This is an important project that is going to cost a lot of money.

We are doing a favour to the United States by providing a land bridge to take American gas from one part of their country to another. In return, the fancy diplomatic language in the bill is not good enough. Instead of just saying we are going to ensure something, we should spell out guarantees in the legislation. That is not asking too much.

If the government really means what it is saying, why not legislate those guarantees in a clear and explicit way so that the Canadian people know they have security in the future? Workers in Saskatchewan, Sault Ste. Marie or wherever the steel is produced will then know what the future holds for them, and the companies can expand their plants and facilities accordingly.

That is not a hypothetical situation in my province. Ipsco is owned in part by the government of Alberta and in part by the government of Saskatchewan. They applied for a DREE grant to expand their plant and facilities on the prairies. Part of the future of that plant depends on whether they get a contract to help build the Alcan line and how large a contract they receive. If we can have a specific guarantee that a minimum 90 per cent of the content will be Canadian, they could plan their business and activities and the province could do likewise. That makes good business and economic sense.

I am glad the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar has more sense than the hon. member for Yukon. If I understood him correctly, he said there would not be a Liberal elected there for years to come because of this type of legislation. It is this type of stupid legislation which hurts that party and makes people cynical about them at the federal level. I wish the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar would argue against the position taken by the hon. member for Yukon, who is defending the government.

The second part of the motion by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie is to ensure that the federal government will not have any financial obligation to the pipeline if at some time in the future more money is needed to complete construction. The hon. member for Yukon said there is no bill before the House which states that the federal government has to provide more money, that there is no mention in the legislation that more money will be needed, that there is no financial obligation, that everything will be okay. I have heard that argument many times in the past. The engineers and economists say a certain project will cost so much money. However, the final cost is much higher. I can think of many such publicly financed projects like Expo, the Olympics and the National Arts Centre, where the final cost was much higher. Many private projects cost much more on completion than originally estimated by architects and economists.

In this motion, we say that if there should happen to be this type of cost over-run, the Government of Canada, on behalf of the people of Canada, should not bear the responsibility of that over-run. That could be legislated very easily before we pass this bill. All we want from this government and this House is a commitment that in five or ten years, or how many years it takes to build the pipeline, the Canadian taxpayers will not be responsible for any deficit.

If the cost should be an extra $2 billion or $3 billion, we may see before this House a bill asking us to subsidize the pipeline. I remember many areas where the government has broken faith. The hon. member for Yukon is of the same mentality now as the hon. member for Crowfoot was a year ago when he was willing to forgive the Liberals for everything.

I remember the 1974 election. Many Liberals remember it with a certain amount of guilt. They promised they would never impose wage and price controls. They said the leader of the Conservative party was an evil man who was going to impose wage and price controls which would wreck the Canadian economy. They were certainly right about one thing; they ruined the Canadian economy. But it was not the Conservative party which brought them in, it was the Liberal party. It was the leader of the very party which one year prior to imposing controls reversed his stand and imposed them. In effect, they lied to the working people of this country. That is the type of integrity the government across the way really has. If they had that integrity then I do not know how the hon. member for Yukon can trust them when it comes to the pipeline.

Mr. Nielsen: I trust the parliamentary process.

Mr. Nystrom: The hon. member says he trusts the parliamentary process. How were we able to stop the government imposing wage and price controls through the parliamentary process? There was nothing we could do. We tried. We fought. There were massive demonstrations in this country, including one of the largest this country has ever seen, certainly in my day, by the trade unions and working people against the legislation. Questions were asked in the House and there were all kinds of debates, but we could not stop them. The Liberals had a majority and they did not listen to us. They imposed on us a bill we did not want. So how can we stop them bringing in a bill if they come back with another majority, hypothetically, and in a couple of years ask us to bail out the pipeline? Can anybody answer that question? How can we stop them? We cannot do it. If the Conservative party thinks we can, I should like to see them take that argument to the people.

Mr. Nielsen: It is up to the people at the polls.

Mr. Nystrom: A lot of us still have the memory of Mayor Jean Drapeau of Montreal.

Those are the two principal parts of the motion moved by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie. I suggest, in closing, that there are two main approaches we ought to be discussing in connection with this bill at the present stage. One is that we guarantee jobs so that we can build this country together from coast to coast. Surely we need some of that vision. In the second place, we find a very simple phrase in the motion which would guarantee to the Canadian people that they will not have to meet any financial obligation in the future to pay a cost over-run incurred by a private consortium which is building a pipeline across our country from one part of the United States to another.

Surely that, too, is a reasonable request, one which any reasonable Canadian would expect parliament to legislate on his behalf. The apologists for the oil companies, such as the hon. member for the Yukon, should be—

An hon. Member: Ashamed.

Mr. Nystrom: —ashamed of themselves. Or, perhaps, they will be getting up one day in parliament and saying: "I am sorry, we should have legislated those guarantees for the ordinary people of Canada because that is the job we were elected to do".

Mr. Young: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Nystrom: You are not filibustering, are you?

Mr. Young: No. I just want to ask the hon. member a couple of very direct questions. One thing he has asked this government to do is to guarantee jobs for people in this country. I just want to ask him if he thinks that anyone in this country—anyone—has a guaranteed job. First of all, you have to work. Nobody in this country has a guaranteed job. He made his argument on the basis that the government should be provided guaranteed jobs to people—guaranteed content—and then he went on to say he was taking the part of the "little people" and trying to protect the taxpayers.

I just want to ask the hon. member if he will help the taxpayers of this country and come forward on behalf of his party and on behalf of those for whom he is asking for guaranteed jobs and guarantee to the people of this country that, first, the work will be done on time; second, that it will be high quality work; and, third, that there will be no strikes, prompt delivery of goods and that we will get the job done? Let the hon. member come forward and give those guarantees to the "little people" of our country—the taxpayers.

Mr. Nystrom: I think those are very good questions. The first one was whether anyone had a guaranteed job in this country. Well, Mr. Speaker, there are quite a few in the Senate and they are guaranteed from the time one is appointed to age 75. There are also quite a few other guaranteed jobs in this country.

An hon. Member: Through the Liberal party!

Mr. Nystrom: The second question the hon. member asked was whether there would be a good quality job done, whether the work would be done on time and whether delivery of goods would be made on time. I want to say very very simply, Mr. Speaker, that I have enough faith in the people of Canada and in the workers that they will do the job on time, that they will do good quality work, that they will provide good workmanship and that they will deliver the goods on time.

Mr. Young: I, too, have faith in the people!

Mr. Nystrom: I have that kind of faith in Canadians and that is why I am arguing that these things should be done by Canadians. I have that confidence.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. If the hon. member wishes to continue with his answer he will have to get the consent of the House because his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the hon. member seeking the consent of the House to complete his answer?

Is the House ready for the question?

Mr. Nielsen: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Having regard to the grouping proposed, may I suggest we get unanimous consent to defer the votes on the various groupings until the end of the debate on the report stage?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is in the rules, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair will defer the vote. Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The question is on the motion in the name of the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie.

All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to section 11 of Standing Order 75 the recorded division on the motion stands deferred.

Some hon. Members: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The House will now proceed to the consideration of motion No. 3 in the name of the hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo (Mr. Beatty).

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo) moved:

Motion No. 3.

That Bill C-25, an act to establish the Northern Pipeline Agency, to facilitate the planning and construction of a pipeline for the transmission of natural gas from Alaska and northern Canada and to give effect to an agreement between Canada and the United States of America on principles applicable to such a pipeline and to amend certain acts in relation thereto, be amended in paragraph 17(1)(b) by striking out line 44 at page 8 and line 1 at page 9 and substituting the following therefor:

"inces of British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Ontario and Quebec nominated by the Lieuten-".

He said: Mr. Speaker, we could perhaps call it ten o'clock. I undertake that when I speak tomorrow on the motion I shall be every bit as brief as my hon. friend.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

HEALTH AND WELFARE—OHIP—PREMIUM INCREASE PROPOSED IN ONTARIO BUDGET

Hon. Stanley Haidasz (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, we all know that this fourth session of the thirtieth parliament is drawing to a close—

Some hon. Members: Explain!

Mr. Haidasz: —and this may be my last opportunity to rise in this House to pursue my appeal of March 15 directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin), asking her to intercede with the minister of health of Ontario.

We are faced today with increased costs for health care. Both as a general practitioner from a working man's area in Toronto and as the federal member of parliament for Parkdale, I have been concerned about health services and health costs and I, along with my colleagues in this House in previous parliaments, have promoted health insurance. In 1957 we passed the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act and in 1966 the Medical Care Act. In both of those measures the federal government entered a contract with the provinces to pay 50 per cent of the costs of hospitalization and medical insurance.

● (2202)

The people of Ontario were stunned a couple of weeks ago by the budget announcement that, effective May 1, 1978, OHIP premiums will be increased by 37.5 per cent. This excessive increase of health care premiums raises not only the cost of living above the AIB guideline of 6 per cent but is also a tax which is inequitable. Moreover, this increased premium comes at at time when hospitals are being forced to reduce their services because of cuts in the financial assistance provided by the provincial government.

An extra $271 million is expected to be raised to meet health costs in Ontario, but there is neither a guarantee nor a promise of improved service. Rather, there is the prospect of decreased service. The resultant huge premium will make health costs for Ontarians the highest contribution in Canada.

The fairest manner to obtain the money for health costs, I believe, would be taxes based on the ability of people to pay; or better, by cutting the fat and frills from various government programs. Six other provinces in Canada have eliminated health premiums completely and finance health costs with general revenues, claiming that there are fairer ways to get the money for such a need. In the remaining provinces, excluding Ontario, where premiums or their equivalent are in force, a much lower proportion of the total cost of health care is financed by them. In Ontario, however, we learn that it will be 34 per cent, whereas in Quebec the figure is 13 per cent and in Alberta only 10 per cent. It appears that Ontario has adopted an unfair and regressive policy. Why not divert some Wintario lottery funds to help meet the health costs of the people of Ontario?

This is not the time to raise taxes or premiums. It is, rather, the time for tax cuts and economic stimulation to ease unemployment, a duty of all provincial governments. We can endure a tax increase on alcohol, cigarettes or both because we can do without them, but we cannot do without health care or hospitalization when such are needed.

Since federal and provincial governments share responsibility for dealing with health matters in Canada, a formal structure has been established for federal-provincial collaboration and co-operation. The Government of Canada, as I mentioned, contributes approximately 50 per cent of the sharable cost of health and hospital services for the people of Canada. I therefore believe that the Minister of National Health and Welfare has a role to play in seeing that we not only have a good standard of health care from coast to coast, but also that the cost of that health care is kept within reasonable bounds. That is why I appeal this evening to the minister, through her parliamentary secretary, to do whatever she can to intercede before the minister of health of Ontario and the Ontario treasurer on behalf of the people of Ontario, who are faced with this 37.5 per cent increase in OHIP premiums.

[Mr. Haidasz.]

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased indeed to have this opportunity to respond to my friend, the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz), and to comment on the 37.5 per cent increase in OHIP premiums which was announced in the recent Ontario budget.

I believe it is important to put the Ontario budget decision to increase OHIP premiums into the proper perspective. The decision is far more closely related to revenue policy and budget policy than it is to health policy. It is, quite simply, a choice of the Ontario government that raising OHIP premiums is preferable to increasing taxes or allowing an increase in the Ontario deficit level.

● (2207)

The OHIP premium system is, in fact, a form of taxation. It has very little to do with the actual utilization of the health care system. A premium system, like a sales tax, is regressive in nature since for most of the population it does not consider the ability to pay for the family or individual subscriber. Indeed, with a premium of the size introduced in the Ontario budget, the percentage of a family's income devoted to paying OHIP premiums can be substantial. For example, for a family head with gross income of $10,000, who pays the full premium himself, over 5 per cent of his income will be devoted to the OHIP premium tax. This percentage decreases with increasing family income since the premium is the same for everyone. The only exceptions to this are the elderly, who are exempted irrespective of their ability to pay the premium, and the low-income, who receive premium assistance or waiver of premium.

As well, it would be interesting to know how much money is being spent by the Ontario government on the collection of premiums, since it must have a separate administrative mechanism for this task, independent of its participation in the personal income tax system administered by the federal government on its behalf.

However, Mr. Speaker, I wish to point out that if Ontario increases its OHIP premiums, it is not because of a decrease in federal contributions to the province. In fact, the federal contributions to Ontario for fiscal year 1978-79 will increase by $250 million, covering 90 per cent of the expected increase of $276 million in total health expenditures in Ontario. This illustrates that the federal government tries to avoid as much as possible the need to increase substantially the direct cost of health to people.

Furthermore, this recent decision illustrates a rather interesting change in policy for Ontario. In 1971 the Premier of Ontario announced important reforms to the OHIP premium system. One of the reforms which was highlighted at that time was a general reduction in premium levels. The 1978 version of reform announced by the same government is a general premium increase of 37.5 per cent. This change has taken place even though health costs in Ontario are consuming a lower percentage of the total governmental expenditures than was the case in 1970-71.

I do want to make several comments on the implications for the health programs per se, even though I view the OHIP changes—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. That will be impossible because the allotted three minutes for the answer have expired.

TRANSPORT—MOVEMENT OF POTATOES FROM EASTERN TO CENTRAL CANADA

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, our farmers, our marketing boards and even the provincial government have been on record for a long time regarding their views about the approaching crisis in potato transportation. I first drew this matter to the government's attention about 16 months ago, on November 30, 1976. Half a year later the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) got around to appointing a group to study the problem, in May, 1977. We still have no official word on new rail cars, and meanwhile the rail car unit or reefer car fleet of some 4,500 a few years ago has new been drastically reduced to some 700.

Finally, in July of last year the first report of the government group studying potato distribution was released. This group, headed by a senior official from Transport Canada, Mr. Nick Mulder, included a representative from DREE in Prince Edward Island, and made a valuable contribution to underline the present concern and growing apprehension about potato transportation.

In this group the Minister of Transport's own officials spelled out to him what Islanders have known for years about our potato industry. They told him that "the problems have become acute" in distribution; that "of late, because of cost pressures, the lean years seem to be outnumbering the fat ones" for our farmers; and that "the problems of potato distribution have been ignored too long" by government. If that is not enough to get action from this minister, when his own officials condemn his neglect of the industry, I do not know what will.

The only reason there was no crisis this season was the extremely low level of shipments from New Brunswick, thus meaning there were enough transportation vehicles available to move the heavy shipment of potatoes this season to market. The minister, to his credit, did upgrade the potato ports in the three maritime provinces, but on the single, most significant and immediate need of the industry, new rail cars, he has been absolutely silent, even though the first report was made in July of last year.

Last July the minister's own officials informed him that at least 170 new cars were needed for the next season. Rail will obviously continue to be the backbone of our potato distribution network, carrying some 85 per cent of our shipments to central Canada.

Two weeks ago, on March 7, the minister promised me in the House of Commons that an announcement on new rail cars would be made roughly within two weeks. His two weeks are up today. Today is an important day for me because it happens to be my daughter's birthday. Certainly I will remember the minister's failure to make an announcement by this date. If he has any regard for the situation in Atlantic Canada, surely he will live up to that commitment.

• (2212)

The Minister of Transport is not the only footdragger on this issue. I do not think it would be an exaggeration to say that Canadian National Railways has obstructed progress on this problem at almost every stage. Instead of constructive proposals for helping our potato industry, our supposed public railway has given excuse after excuse for washing their hands of the problem. Fortunately, the Mulder report shows up the excuses of CN for what they are—a sorry evasion of public responsibility by one of Canada's oldest Crown corporations. CN indicates that there are enough rail cars.

The report prepared last summer, after extensive consultations with informed potato industry representatives, indicated that at least 170 new cars are needed for the next shipping season alone. CN said that the new cars should not be its responsibility. The report referred to the following:

> . . . acceptance by transportation companies of the responsibility for supplying equipment which is properly designated and maintained for potato transportation . . .

Specifically it recommends that the new cars be ordered and paid for by CN. The report continues by indicating that CN should lower its rates and ensure stricter government control, inspection and maintenance of cars during the cold shipping season. In addition, the report shows that CN's claim that trucks will eventually replace rail cars is a lot of hot air. That is the only hot air CN has with respect to its reefer cars. The claim that trucks will replace rail cars is absolute nonsense, as every potato grower knows.

There is an example in the report which illustrates how unresponsive CN has been on this question. Canadian Pacific, which is a privately owned company, has agreed to lease and improve the extra rail cars needed for the short term, while CN simply continues to make excuses. Recently there was the further suggestion on an interim basis, as I mentioned to the hon. minister the other day, that some 300 cars were available at roughly one-quarter of the cost from Hanover Trust.

In my opinion, one of the most valuable conclusions of the government's report is the following statement:

> The federal government must provide the leadership and stimulus to resolve the major problems over the next few years.

We are still awaiting an answer from the minister. He is not present in the chamber tonight, but perhaps his parliamentary secretary can finally indicate some action after 16 long months.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles Lapointe (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) raised this important question of the movement of potatoes which gives me an opportunity to point out briefly what the government is doing in this area.

For the past year, the federal government has worked with various potato dealers to improve the movement of that commodity from eastern to central Canada and also to export markets. Of course we had excellent co-operation, assistance and support from the P.E.I. Potato Marketing Board, the New Brunswick Potato Shippers' Association, the Canadian National, the Canadian Pacific, the Atlantic Provinces Truckers Association, the staff in the ports of St. John, Halifax and Prince Edward Island and also, of course, Mr. Speaker, the assistance and co-operation of the governments of Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick.

In working in close co-operation with them, Mr. Speaker, and in establishing the facts and the real needs we were able to reach a general agreement on the measures to be taken and to implement those measures for the following purposes. First of all, one of the prime goals was to reduce the rate of increase in freight rates applicable to potatoes. Second, one of the other goals was to provide more efficient trucking for potatoes. Third, we wanted to improve the port facilities, more particularly in the port of St. John and, finally, to provide a larger number as well as a better use and better quality of freight cars.

Last year, we also showed that there would be no shortage of cars in the current crop year, contrary to the alarm of an imminent crisis and shortage of cars expressed by opposition members, as indeed the hon. member for Egmont repeated tonight.

As a result of the above mentioned measures, the movement of potatoes from Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick to central Canada and export markets caused very little problems during the current crop year. Based on the facts that will be submitted to it by railways and shippers, the cabinet will make a decision in the coming weeks about the additional cars that will be required for the crop year 1978-79. The government is quite aware of the fact that additional cars will be required next year and that they will not be available unless specific steps are taken.

[English]

Once a decision is made on the cars for 1978-79, the working group on potatoes will continue to consider and implement other measures to improve the movement of potatoes. For example, they will be looking at further port improvements in Saint John and the need for additional cars two or three years from now, the possibility of increased use of containers and trucks, physical improvements at loading and unloading points, etc. By working closely with industry, the provinces and the carriers over an extended period, the government will deal with the many problems efficiently and effectively. The distribution system for potatoes has been improved by steps already undertaken; the acquisition of additional cars, and other measures to be implemented during 1978, will improve the system even further.

NORTHERN DEVELOPMENT—FRONTENAC COUNTY, ONT.—CONSTRUCTION OF TEMPORARY BRIDGE TO FACILITATE TRAVEL

Mr. A. D. Alkenbrack (Frontenac-Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, due to my decision to retire from the House of Commons at the termination of this thirtieth parliament, this will probably be one of the last occasions on which I will use the adjournment session to voice questions and grievances raised by my constituents in Frontenac-Lennox and Addington before this House. This being so, I wish to thank you for the many past favours and your indulgence to me and my constituency.

My remarks tonight stem from my question of March 14, 1978, as reported at page 3751 of Hansard, where I asked the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Faulkner) the following question:

> Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. I have in my possession a petition from 120 residents, including tourist operators, in the townships of Pittsburgh and Storrington, in Frontenac county, fronting on the Rideau River system, protesting the fact that with the construction of the new Brass Point bridge across the Rideau River, a detour of up to 30 miles will be necessary in the daily travel of the inhabitants and tourists, especially to and from Storrington, in order to gain access to Highway No. 15 and the Kingston area. My question is: why did this department not provide a temporary Bailey bridge to serve the public during the ten-month life of this $1.6 million contract, and avoid the extra energy, expense outlay and inconvenience to the people, to our tourist operators and to our American customers?

The minister on that day answered me as follows:

> Mr. Speaker, I will have to look into that matter and report to the hon. member.

And that was done. I recall that in sessions of our council at the municipal level petitions from constituents commanded the highest priority, and that also applies to this House of Commons. I have here in my hand the petition I referred to which is signed by about 120 constituents from Storrington and Pittsburgh townships, in which they complain of up to 30 miles of detour now required to gain access to highway 15 in the Kingston area during the seven months of construction of the new Brass Point bridge. Many of these petitioners are tourists and/or employees in the tourist industry. The petitioners feel that if there is no temporary crossing provided at the point of construction of the new bridge many of these tourist operators will lose their businesses or have to go out of business this summer and accept unemployment insurance as a result of the drop in business due to no thoroughfare. American tourists who patronize the other side of the Rideau River and the lake areas of Storrington will not know how to reach their recreational destinations and will probably go elsewhere.

I thank the minister for his letter of March 20 in response to my question. I note that he suggests that I send him a copy of the petition which I received from the local residents and that the matters of a temporary bridge will be reconsidered. I have with me another copy of the petition which I send him now across the floor of the House.

● (2222)

I called today at the site of construction and I was very courteously received by the departmental men in charge and by the contractor. I was in touch from there by telephone with Mr. Ken Dick, the department's superintendent of investigation of construction at Cornwall, and Mr. Christakos, the Ontario regional director, and they stated they were only too glad to co-operate in something economically feasible that would help to solve the temporary transportation problem at Brass Point.

I thank the minister and his department for the action being taken to provide us with a new bridge at Brass Point, and for the action that I am sure will now be taken to provide either a ferry service or a temporary bridge to solve this problem.

Mr. Ross Milne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, to learn that the hon. member for Frontenac-Lennox and Addington (Mr. Alkenbrack) does not intend to contest the seat for the next parliament. I think that we have differed on many issues at times, but I want to wish him well in his retirement and to say that I think he has been a tremendous ambassador for the constituency that he has represented so ably over the years. Indeed, tonight he is here at this late hour speaking on behalf of the concern of his constituents.

The hon. member might be interested, Mr. Speaker, to know that the Brass Point bridge, which is being reconstructed, dates from 1887 when it was built and paid for by the department of railways and canals. About 75 years ago, the original wood spans were replaced by four steel spans. Five years ago, the load limit of the bridge was reduced from five tons to two tons because an underwater investigation showed that the cribs, which were constructed prior to 1900, were not capable of supporting heavy loads. As a result, a decision was made to build a new bridge with a load limit of 15 tons, capable of carrying school buses, ambulances and fire-fighting vehicles.

The townships of Pittsburgh and Storrington were advised of the decision to build a new bridge and were invited to a meeting with the contractor. The matter of a temporary bridge was raised at this initial meeting. It was the consensus of that meeting that it was not practical to place a temporary crossing because of the length of the crossing, the depth of the water and the fact that vessels would have to be accommodated during the navigation season. Moreover, the cost of providing a temporary bridge has been estimated at more than $250,000.

In keeping with the minister's letter to the hon. member, and being in receipt of the petition he sent across the floor tonight, I will give him the undertaking that the minister and the department will have a further look at what alternatives might be available to solve this problem.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until two o'clock tomorrow afternoon.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10:24 p.m.

POST OFFICE

UNFULFILLED ORDERS FOR OLYMPIC COINS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that the Postmaster General (Mr. Lamontagne) has had time to consider the motion I presented in this House on Thursday, March 16, concerning apparent bankruptcies and possible fraudulent activities relating to unfilled Olympic coin orders, and due to the fact that the Canadian public has a right to protection under this federally-legislated program, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski):

That the Postmaster General state in this House today what action the government intends to take, and when, to remedy this unacceptable situation.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

REQUEST DAIRY COMMISSION SPEED UP SUBSIDY PAYMENTS TO QUEBEC PRODUCERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 and ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion relating to a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In light of the negotiations in progress in Quebec between fluid milk producers and industrial milk producers and given the fact that their differences will probably not be ironed out for a few weeks; considering that the Canadian Dairy Commission has arbitrarily decided not to pay subsidies to the milk producers of Quebec as long as both opposing groups will not agree; and considering that this withholding of subsidies has the effect of penalizing all milk producers in Quebec, of adding to their financial problems and that it could very well force many of them into bankruptcy and incite producers to abandon that field of farm production, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Huron-Middlesex (Mr. McKinley):

That the House urge the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) to direct the Canadian Dairy Commission to issue not later than April 1 the cheques which the milk producers of Quebec are entitled to and which should never be issued later than necessary because of protracted negotiations or legal hassles.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, presentation of such a motion can be made only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

LABOUR CONDITIONS

CALL FOR IMMEDIATE INSTITUTION OF JOB-CREATION PROGRAMS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Considering that Premier William Davis of Ontario has urged the federal government to implement immediately job-creation proposals at the very time his own government has brought in a budget which totally rejects job-creation programs and, indeed, introduced a regressive health tax increase of some 37.5 per cent, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House urges the Government of Canada and the provincial government of Ontario to adopt immediately full employment as their number one priority and immediately implement direct economic measures such as tax cuts and capital works projects as were announced recently in the budget brought down by the government of Saskatchewan.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

COMMITTEE TO RECOMMEND LENGTH OF PARLIAMENTS AND TIMING OF ELECTIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I wish to move a motion, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. It arises from the uncontrolled, discretionary power vested in the leader of a discredited and useless administration to postpone an opportunity for the electorate to reject the government, which situation continues the existing state of chaos and confusion in the country. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald):

That this House take steps to constitute a parliamentary committee to examine and report on the question of fixing the duration of parliaments and limiting the right of prime ministers to decide on an election date on the basis of partisan political expediency.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

MANPOWER

ALLEGATION MINISTER OF FINANCE USING INFLUENCE FOR JOB PLACEMENTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Cecil Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In the summers of 1976 and 1977, students from Shawinigan received preferential treatment in filling jobs in the mines at Flin Flon. Students arrived with their papers completed, thus bypassing the local Manpower counsellors and taking jobs that students in Flin Flon should have filled. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Annapolis Valley (Mr. Nowlan):

● (1412)

That the Minister of Finance not use his office to influence the preferential placements of students from his constituency in Flin Flon this summer.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

COMMITMENT OF CANADIAN PEACEKEEPING FORCES SUBJECT TO PARLIAMENTARY APPROVAL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, I rise on an urgent and pressing matter under the provisions of Standing Order 43. My motion concerns fears that the government is about to abandon the principle, reinforced by the Right Hon. Lester B. Pearson when he was in office, that no commitment of peacekeeping forces shall be made without the approval of this House by affirmative resolution. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon):

That as a binding principle of foreign policy, the government of the day, following the precedent set by a motion made by the former Prime Minister of Canada, the Right Hon. Lester B. Pearson on March 13, 1964, on the deployment of peacekeeping forces to Cyprus, shall not make a commitment of forces to a peacekeeping mission without the express consent of this House by affirmative resolution.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

INCOME TAX

SUGGESTED DEDUCTION FOR VOLUNTARY FIREMEN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, pursuant to Standing Order 43. In light of the fact that volunteer firefighters risk life and limb at all hours of the day and night to provide fire protection and emergency services for in excess of 2,500 communities in all provinces and territories, and in light of the fact that towns and municipalities provide compensation to volunteer firemen for their donation of time and personal expense, while the Government of Canada allows them only $300 maximum for tax exemption purposes, which does not cover costs and acts as a disincentive to serve, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay):

That this House acknowledge that due to inflation, the federal government deduction of $300 per year under the Income Tax Act is grossly inadequate and, further, that the allowable annual deduction for costs incurred by these community-minded volunteers be raised to the level of $1,000 per year.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion, pursuant to Standing Order 43, would require the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

RESEARCH

APPOINTMENT OF CHAIRMEN TO RESEARCH COUNCILS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that the chairmen appointed to two research councils, the Humanities Research Council and the Natural Science and Engineering Council, have been individuals drawn from the bureaucracy and give the appearance, at least, of being partisan political appointments, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald):

That the government explain on motions why it has not heeded the advice of the research community in appointing researchers to these positions, and that when the Medical Research Council chairman is appointed, it be an individual drawn from the research community.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for the presentation of such a motion?

PENSION EQUALITY FOR WOMEN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, and seconded by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes), I move:

That this House calls on the government, now that it has heard again from the National Action Committee on the Status of Women, to expedite the introduction of legislation to establish equality for women, and that as a step toward this goal special emphasis be placed on pension equality, including full rights for homemakers under the Canada Pension Plan, equal pension rights for all women between the ages of 60 and 65 regardless of marital status, increasing the pensions paid to widows under various government plans to at least 75 per cent, and the continuing payment of pensions granted to widows regardless of any subsequent change in marital status.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate, pursuant to the Standing Order, would require the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Oral Questions

[English]

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

TAX CUTS EFFECTIVE JANUARY 1, 1978

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance: I have given him notice of its general thrust. The question touches on the $3 billion tax stimulant which the minister has maintained was put in place as of January 1. Last Friday, when I asked him to explain to the House the form of this $3 billion tax stimulant, he was only able to indicate $700 million of what would be regarded as a tax cut effective January 1 this year. Having received notice, will the minister now indicate exactly where the $3 billion is expected to be?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the measures that were included in Bill C-11 at the end of December last were the stimulants to which I was referring. Indexation, which came into effect on January 1, accounted for $850 million. Then $730 million represented the $100 given to the seven million taxpayers for the first two months. Also, $100 million was the amount of credit for the creation of jobs—the bill was passed and became effective in February—and there was the $1.6 billion which was approved under Bill C-11, voted at the end of December. That is a package of $3.2 billion.

Mr. Stevens: A further question to the minister, based on the answer he has given. He referred to $850 million as a tax cut, but in fact it relates simply to the indexing of personal income tax. Would the hon. gentleman tell us whether it is not correct that $1.5 billion of what he claimed to be a tax cut effective on January 1 of this year did, in fact, become effective as long ago as January 1 or March 31 of last year? If he agrees with that proposition, why does he consistently maintain he must wait still longer to find out the effect of these measures?

Mr. Chrétien: I think that, technically, the hon. member is right when he says indexation was provided for previously in the law. One of the problems of indexation is that it amounts to a reduction in the amount of income tax people have to pay, but people do not realize this because it comes into play as a result of previous legislation. We are the only nation which has adopted such a system, and whenever there is a cut like that it means people have that much more money than in the previous year. It is only fair that a minister of finance should remind them of this. It is only fair we should repeat it, because the House voted in favour of this system continuing on an automatic basis. We have to tell the people that we have it, because in the United States they do not have that cut. We have it on an automatic basis; that is why I have to repeat it all the time.

Mr. Stevens: Since it is now established that the $3 billion to which the Minister of Finance was referring includes tax measures taken by his predecessor and by his predecessor twice removed, and since he has only been able to identify $1 billion, at most, of the tax cut effective as of January 1, would he explain why he consistently refuses to bring in a tax stimulus equal to $2 billion, as we have been suggesting, bearing in mind that this would result in the gross national product being $7 billion to $8 billion greater than it would otherwise be? We are talking about the creation of between 100,000 and 200,000 jobs.

Mr. Chrétien: I am delighted to hear that the hon. member is willing to increase the deficit by $2 billion more than the present figure. When I bring down a budget, I shall be delighted to remind the hon. member of his statement.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Halifax): May I ask the minister a question in a non-partisan way, purely for information? Is it his position that tax indexing amounts to a fiscal stimulus?

Mr. Chrétien: It is a stimulant because it changes the tax base in such a way that people have less tax from one year to another. This was an idea of the hon. gentleman when he was leader of the opposition and one we took from him. He has to recognize that this is a technique which has been used by Canada and not by the United States or other countries. We have to realize this and tell the public that when this automatic tax indexation is in place, people will have that much more money in their pockets.

• (1422)

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, in view of the disastrous effects to the Canadian people when the Minister of Finance operates under a total misconception—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: —I ask the minister not to take my word for it, but to get in touch with a former minister of finance, Mr. Turner, who, while a slow learner in this respect, eventually did learn that the indexation of personal income tax is not a fiscal stimulus but is merely a method of preventing an increase in the actual tax rate and a method of avoiding a drag on the economy. I therefore ask the minister if he would not mind getting in touch with Mr. Turner and having Mr. Turner explain this to him.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I have a very good relationship with the former minister of finance.

An hon. Member: Which one?

Mr. Chrétien: When I talk to him, I will say that I heard about him from a former colleague of his, the hon. member for Halifax. I will be delighted to communicate to him the words of the hon. member.

[Mr. Stevens.]

MEASURES TO CREATE JOBS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Unlike the Premier of the province of Ontario, the Premier of Saskatchewan practices what he preaches.

Mr. Beatty: Socialism.

Mr. Broadbent: In the budget which was brought down in Saskatchewan on the same day Premier Davis brought in his monstrosity in the province of Ontario, the Premier of Saskatchewan followed up at least one or two of the minimal accomplishments which were achieved at the first ministers' conference in terms of job creation. In the budget brought in in Saskatchewan there was, in addition to the effects of indexation, a 9 per cent tax cut offered to the people of that province. In addition, the decision was made to invest some public money to create jobs now, and to produce energy down the road.

Those were two concrete measures to create jobs, which the first ministers' conference alleged it was concerned about. I would like to ask the minister, in all seriousness, why does he not take similar action, now, at the national level.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I said earlier that I will decide to have a budget at the right time. I am looking at all the opportunities everyone is offering. By not putting forward a budget, at least I am not subjecting the House of Commons and the people of Canada to the kind of budget the government of Ontario put forward, which increased taxes.

Mr. Woolliams: What about Lougheed?

Mr. Broadbent: In addition to saying what he is not going to do, will the minister give us some expression of opinion at this point about the general orientation? Would he not agree that instead of spending between $4 billion and $5 billion which we are going to spend in deficit, so to speak, next year in unemployment insurance pay-outs to people to do nothing, it makes a lot more economic as well as social sense to take a part of that $4 billion to $5 billion and put it into public sector investment to create jobs now? That would also benefit the public in other areas down the road.

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, if that could be done automatically, things would be easy but I would be much surprised were the hon. member to agree to stop paying unemployment insurance as of tomorrow morning and invest those funds in public works. I suggest that the transfer is not done automatically and that there is a span of time between the two. We have employment incentive programs amounting to $600 or $700 million and administered by the Department of Employment and Immigration. Those programs are monitored on a permanent basis and if we feel we can put more people to work by expanding the budget of this department, we will be glad to do so. But it would be impossible to stop paying unemployment insurance for the time being. The leader of the New Democratic Party would certainly the first to complain about such a move.

[English]

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the minister knows full well that I am not suggesting he transfer funds from one area to another. The point I am making is that public sector spending, like unemployment insurance pay-outs, in some ways is money down the drain, economically. It produces no jobs, but investment does produce jobs. If I understand the minister's argument correctly, he is saying that the government is still waiting to see the effects of his mini-budget in the fall and those of the earlier budget last year.

● (1427)

Considering that almost every economic forecasting group, including most recently the Conference Board, have said that unemployment will increase this year and the growth rate is going down, will he make a commitment, now, to reduce taxes and have some public sector investment in job-creation projects before the next election is called?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I do not know when I will present a budget. I am now considering all proposals. Of course, projections made by the Conference Board went down from 5 to 4.5 and I am taking note of it. I only want to point out to the hon. member that it is nevertheless an increase in the level of economic growth which was at 2.5 last year. Even the Conference Board has now established that the economic growth will be at least 4.5 and if we can further stimulate the economy we will do so when we introduce a budget.

AGRICULTURE

INQUIRY WHETHER DAIRY POLICY WILL BE ANNOUNCED APRIL 1

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Agriculture, I should like to direct my question to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture.

Considering that the House will adjourn today and that surely we will not be sitting before March 31 since we are not expected back until April 3, and considering that the government's dairy policy is usually announced by March 31 at the latest, can the Minister of Agriculture tell the House if the government's dairy policy will be made public during the recess before the beginning of the year which starts on April 1?

Mr. Yves Caron (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the dairy policy will be announced as soon as possible and will be known to the people and the farmers in the next few days.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): I should like to put a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Considering the importance of that industry in Canada and the rather large quantities of imported cheese in past years when the minister assured us that imports would not exceed 50 million pounds, is the minister in a position to tell us whether our dairy industry has improved to the extent that an appreciable reduction of imports can be expected to compensate for reduced consumption anticipated in the months to come?

Mr. Caron: Mr. Speaker, the dairy policy as a whole is now under review. Several suggestions have been made by members on both sides to allow that dairy policy to maintain normal production. Many representations have been made and, as will be seen in the forthcoming announcement, we are waiting for all the suggestions made with respect to the 1978-79 dairy policy.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, can the parliamentary secretary tell the House whether there have been consultations with the producers' offices, either in Quebec or in the other provinces, with a view to reaching an agreement paving the way for announcing a dairy policy that would be satisfactory to the producers of both manufacturing and whole milk?

Mr. Caron: Mr. Speaker, with regard to consultations with the provincial federations, the hon. member for Bellechasse surely knows that the dairy policy is formulated jointly by the management committee and the Canadian Dairy Commission on the basis of recommendations by the provincial federations. I can assure the hon. member that the dairy policy for 1978-79 will be at least as good if not better than the one we had this year.

ARTS, LETTERS AND SCIENCES

HONORARY DEGREES AWARDED TO MEMBERS OF ROYAL FAMILY

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. I make no apology for asking the question, because we will be adjourning until April 3 which will be too late for a decision to be made that is of interest to universities across Canada. I would ask the minister first whether the decision was made by cabinet that no honorary degrees should be given to any member of the Royal Family without the consent of the Prime Minister of Canada?

• (1432)

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not know anything about this topic and cannot report to the right hon. member. I will inquire, but I have not heard of such a thing, inside or outside cabinet.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the minister's reply would indicate, therefore, that the decision was made by the Prime Minister himself, and it also reveals his primacy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I will bring a particular case to his attention because I know now, the cabinet having had nothing to do with it, who made the decision. Various universities are concerned about the fact that the government refused to permit the Governor General to pass on a message from the University of Western Ontario in which a request was made to have the Prince of Wales given an honorary degree during the centennial celebrations of that university. Some nine or ten months passed. The Minister of Labour may be able to answer this question; he is mumbling. That would be the most intelligent contribution he has made.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I would ask the Acting Prime Minister why, after a lapse of several months with no reply ever given, the request was turned down by verbal decision? Why was that done? The minister does not know, because the cabinet had nothing to do with it; but will he ascertain why the Prime Minister made the decision—and he must have done so?

This is just another example of the erosion of the monarchy which has taken place over and over again with the assistance of the hon. minister sitting behind the Minister of Finance. He has been one of the greatest offenders in this country.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I cannot subscribe to what the right hon. member says. Her Majesty the Queen has come to Canada, since the Prime Minister has been in office, much more often than she came when the right hon. member for Prince Albert was prime minister. He should be the last one to ask me that type of question, because he knows very well that the adviser to Her Majesty the Queen of Canada is the Prime Minister of Canada.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh, is that right?

Mr. Chrétien: Whenever there is such a request, there is communication with the Queen and the decision is made as to how often the Royal Family should come to Ottawa. I do not think Canadians have been deprived at all of royal visits during the last few years.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, everything was answered but the question. What business did the Prime Minister of Canada have to direct the Governor General not to forward that letter from the University of Western Ontario and hold it silent for several months?

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

FINANCE

DATE OF INTRODUCTION OF AMENDMENTS TO BANK ACT

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, can the Minister of Finance tell the House why he did not table the amendments to the Bank Act since he promised the House to do so before the end of March and today is the last sitting day this month? In addition, can he tell the House when he hopes to table those amendments?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to report to the hon. member that unfortunately the bill is not ready, and it has yet to go to cabinet. As soon as it has come back from cabinet, I shall table it in the House.

DRAFTING OF BILL TO AMEND BANK ACT

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, since the indication in the past has been that the drafting of these bills presented certain problems, could the Minister of Justice, who has responsibility for drafting legislation in his department, advise the House of the particular difficulties in the drafting of this legislation which has been in his hands for months? If this is so difficult, will he accept some official aid from the opposition in preparing this bill?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I cannot answer the question in full, for very obvious reasons. I would assure the hon. member that the cabinet, at the insistence of my colleague, the hon. Minister of Finance, some time ago directed that the drafting of the Bank Act bill be given top priority in the Department of Justice. From that point of view it has been, and is being, given that priority. I would hope my department will be able to produce very quickly to my colleague a print of that bill.

An hon. Member: Before the banks close?

Mr. Basford: I note the hon. member's offer of assitance in the drafting. I would have to check his legal credentials very carefully for offering such advice. However, depending on the outcome in Edmonton of the next election, he may have an opportunity in committee, as a member of the opposition, to offer his advice on the quality of the bill.

PUBLIC SERVICE

RELOCATION AND DECENTRALIZATION

Mr. Hugh Poulin (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Public Works. In view of the principal conclusions of the main recommendations of the Woods-Gordon report on relocation and decentralization of the public service, and in view of the many representations by individuals and groups to the Minister of Public Works, I should like to ask whether he is prepared to recommend to his cabinet colleagues any policy which would redress in total or in part the adverse effects being occasioned the central core of the city of Ottawa by the relocation and decentralization of the public service.

In addition, Mr. Speaker, would any such policy include a slowdown of the move to Hull until there is a modest rate of growth in the public service, namely, 2 per cent or 3 per cent, and a committment on behalf of this government to continue to rent at least 50 per cent—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows we have met with representatives of the Building Owners and Managers Association. We have given an undertaking concerning the space we will continue to lease beyond the completion of the move to Hull. We will do our utmost to try to keep the percentage of occupancy in the various buildings concerned at 50 per cent, but we do not believe we can stop the move. We think we would be accused by the Auditor General of irresponsibility if we held Crown-owned buildings vacant when leases had in fact expired.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

TAX CREDIT PROGRAM—REASON PROGRAM NOT IN PLACE

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Employment and Immigration, I will direct my question to the Minister of Finance. Notwithstanding the assurance the minister gave the House that the employment tax credit bill would be in place by March 1, we now know that because of technical difficulties the booklets designed to assist businessmen to take advantage of the program will not be ready until the end of April. Can the minister please explain why this bill, so important to the one million plus unemployed Canadians, is not ready and in place now in accordance with the assurance he gave the House when the bill was passed?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Employment and Immigration gave the House of Commons the assurance last week that the program was in place and that applicants could file their applications with the department; and as well as that, there are officers in every branch of his department to give explanations to the people who want to take advantage of the program.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that senior officials of the Department of Employment and Immigration have informed us that these booklets, so necessary to assist businesses that wish to take advantage of this program, will not be ready until the end of April because of technical difficulties, in view of the fact that application forms are only now going out into the field, and because of the importance of the bill to the unemployed people of this country, I ask the minister whether he is now able to give the House his assurance, for what it is worth, that the bill will be in place before the end of March?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, of course I can give that commitment to the hon. member: the bill has been in place since March 8, two weeks ago.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I ask the question again. The minister is playing with words. I am talking about the implementation of this important bill. We know it has been passed by parliament. That places the onus upon the government to implement it. Would the minister give the House the assurance that this bill will be implemented before the end of March, or give an explanation as to why not?

● (1442)

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I said the bill has been in place since March 8. People can file applications if they want to benefit from the program. This is the word received by the House of Commons from the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

GOVERNMENT CASH REQUIREMENTS FOR FISCAL YEAR 1978-79

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. My colleague, the hon. member for York-Simcoe, asked the minister on March 17 about the level of Crown corporation borrowings in the coming fiscal year in addition to the government's cash requirement of $11 billion. Now that the minister has had an opportunity to inquire, could he tell the House the anticipated borrowings of Crown corporations for the next fiscal year?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not have the figure available at this moment. Some of the financing for Crown corporations is not decided as yet, and I am not in a position to give the final figure.

Mr. Kempling: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. We are endeavouring to determine the total indebtedness of the Government of Canada, given its tendency to monetarize the increasing amount of debt in the country. We have noted that Statistics Canada, in a recent release, indicated that our balance of international payments was $42.3 billion, or over $2,000 for every man, woman and child in Canada.

Can the minister advise whether he is going to reveal this information on motions, whether it will be as a notation in a budget, whether we will get it from Treasury Board, or will we have to ask the Auditor General to make a special report on this matter?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, those figures are made public when we present our budget.

Mr. Clark: When is that?

Mr. Chrétien: We will be presenting a budget. If the hon. member wants to put a question on the order paper, I will see if I can reply.

An hon. Member: When is the budget?

Mr. Chrétien: Soon.

DISCOUNTING OF LOAN FLOATED IN NEW YORK

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Finance. As the loan that the government is now floating in New York is already being discounted, may I ask the minister if he anticipated this unusual and disconcerting event?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the dealers who handle the bond issue which went on sale this morning report that it has been very well received in the marketplace.

[English]

Mr. Ritchie: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the further loss of $400 million in foreign reserves so far this month, does the government intend to have further foreign borrowings, especially as the Prime Minister will be delivering his "We are broke; let's be kind to the bankers" speech tonight in New York?

Mr. Chrétien: First, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is using figures that do not exist.

Mr. Stevens: We have not been wrong yet.

Mr. Chrétien: We will reveal at the beginning of next month the amount of reserves we have. In the middle of the month there is no such figure being circulated.

[Mr. Kempling.]

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT APPROVES HON. LAURIN'S STATEMENT ON EDUCATION OF OFFICIALS' CHILDREN

Mr. Irénée Pelletier (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. Following last Saturday's visit in the Eastern Townships of Quebec Cultural Development Minister Camile Laurin, and his statement regarding the federal decentralization program to the effect that the government of Quebec would be willing to give federal civil servants coming into Quebec six years during which they could send their children to English schools, could the Acting Prime Minister tell the House if he has read the text of Mr. Laurin's statement and if the federal government agrees with that suggestion?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, yes I have read Mr. Laurin's statement. Regarding the move to Sherbrooke, our request that the Quebec government allow public servants affected by that move to send their children to English schools is the same as the request we make to other provincial governments whenever there is decentralization: we require that they provide French education to public servants moving to their cities. The request is the same for the province of Quebec as for all other provinces; furthermore the move will not occur for another six months. It is the government's intention to decentralize over a long period of time and public servants have the right to send their children to schools teaching in their mother tongue if they want, otherwise, pursuant to the commitments given to the House, we will not allow decentralization.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

MIDDLE EAST—CANADIAN PEACEKEEPING FORCE

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister. Would the minister comment on the veracity of the front page story in the Globe and Mail today concerning the commitment of troops to Lebanon. The article quotes the Prime Minister as saying:

Canada, if asked, will send a battalion of combat troops into southern Lebanon.

Is the Acting Prime Minister in a position ot inform the House whether that statement is the policy of the government?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I did not read the statement made by the Prime Minister. I know the Prime Minister had discussions with the Secretary General of the United Nations yesterday, and that he is prepared to help in the circumstances. There was an exchange of views on the help we can offer concerning this problem but no definite decision was made one way or another.

[English]

PEACEKEEPING FORCE—APPROVAL OF PARLIAMENT BEFORE COMMITMENT MADE

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, I will direct my supplementary question to a minister who is certainly interested in this matter, the Minister of National Defence.

As the Prime Minister's statement makes no mention of parliamentary approval or consultation before committing our troops to a new peacekeeping task, and runs counter to the precedent established when parliament approved the peacekeeping mission in Cyprus and the observers mission in Viet Nam, as well as making a total mockery of the blandishments of the Secretary of State for External Affairs during the past two days, will the minister assure the House that any commitment made will be subject to approval by a resolution of the House of Commons?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I really cannot comment on the press release itself. Certainly, as the Secretary of State for External Affairs said yesterday, there is no reason to hold back at all: we want full and frank information on this question.

In so far as specific parliamentary approval is concerned, I think it would be difficult to make that commitment because one might have to react to particular circumstances. It is rather hypothetical today, because the only forces we have been asked to supply and which we are supplying are those offering logistic support. That has been announced and some of those troops are already serving in that role. The forces needed for the peacekeeping operation have largely been committed. There is no indication that we will be asked to serve in that role at this time, even though in a general review one could say that we have troops ready and available and quite capable of doing that job.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

LEGISLATION TO AMEND BANK ACT—ECONOMIC PROJECTIONS

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we know that the Prime Minister keeps information from the public; we did not know until today that he also keeps it secret from his colleagues.

My question is to the Minister of Finance and it relates to the economic business and to the Bank Act that is being delayed by this government. It has now been established that the Department of Justice is drafting the bill. I presume the Minister of Finance has instructed the lawyers of his department on what he wants in the legislation. Would the minister tell the House now, as a matter of policy, whether it is the intention of the government to bring within the provisions of the Bank Act the caisses populaires and credit unions of Canada?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this will be known when we table the bill.

Mr. Clark: A supplementary question. I have another question about economic business that is being delayed by this government so that Canadians will not know what they plan or do not plan to do about the Canadian economy. The minister has admitted today that his claim about the amount of fiscal stimulus was false. It is clear that all the projections, both in his statement of October and in the budget of March last year, are incorrect.

We have a situation where uncertainty is being created by the statements of a minister which are false, and the projections of a minister which are wrong. In light of that uncertainty, will the minister reconsider his refusal to give some guidance to the Canadian economy? Will he not give a commitment now for an early date on which this House may receive a budget from this government?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, the only final decision I have made about a budget is that there will be no budget before the end of this month. I asked to wait until April or May, depending on the circumstances, and I will advise the public accordingly.

As far as projections are concerned, I would like to say to the Leader of the Opposition that in December the president of the Conference Board of Canada—who now is planning to be defeated as a Tory candidate—predicted exactly the same figure that I did, 5 per cent growth. The same day this gentleman announced that he was to run for the Tories, the Leader of the Opposition said that nobody believed my prediction. I would like to tell him that his own candidate was in complete agreement.

Mr. Clark: A further supplementary, Mr. Speaker. The minister knows that events have also passed him by in that regard. We have a situation now where there will be no budget and no revised Bank Act. Will the Minister of Finance tell us, at least, whether he and his government are prepared to respond to the request of the Premier of Ontario and to the request that I am sure is shared by the other provinces? Is he now in active consultation with the ministers of finance of the provinces, five of whom have already brought in budgets since the February meeting—the province of Quebec being the sixth province that will bring in a budget, leaving this government virtually alone in its refusal to bring in a financial statement and budget—and will the minister tell us whether there is an intention on his part, in the absence of a budget, in the absence of a Bank Act, in the absence of any other economic activity, to at least convene a meeting of the ministers of finance next month?

• (1452)

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I would rather have no budget at all than have budgets like the ones proposed by the Tory government of Ontario—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: —and the Tory government of Newfoundland, both of which have increased taxes. I find it unbelievable that the Premier of Ontario is sending telegrams asking this government to stimulate the economy, when less than two weeks ago he increased taxes for the people of Ontario by $350 million.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, will the minister answer the question? Is the minister now in active consultation with the ministers of finance of the various provinces, with an eye to convening a conference of the provincial ministers of finance next month so that there can be some agreement on general economic policy?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I had consultations with the ministers of finance about a month and a half ago. Because their deficits are less than the federal government's I asked them to stimulate their economies. I recognize that the minister of finance for Saskatchewan agreed with my argument. But as far as the Tory governments of Ontario and Newfoundland are concerned, they were not too positive about it. I am ready to meet them, but if they are as responsive as they have been so far, in increasing taxes, it is better for me not to ask them.

NATIONAL SECURITY

LEGALITY OF TASKS PERFORMED BY SECURITY SERVICES

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Solicitor General. Since there are now, despite ministerial denials earlier, several illegal acts on the record by the security service, has the Solicitor General satisfied himself that no illegal acts have been committed, directly or otherwise, by the Security Planning and Analysis Branch since its creation a few years ago? Can we have his unequivocal assurance on this score, in the same way as his predecessor assured the House and the country with reference to the conduct of the security service, with so little basis in fact?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. gentleman knows what the responsibility of the Security Planning and Analysis Branch is, and that it is not an operational branch. Unless he has some indication of specific areas where lack of operational ability could lead someone into trouble, I would have to indicate that his allegations are completely unfounded.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Speaker, I am always ready and willing to assist the Solicitor General. Since this group has, and has had, individuals employed, such as Messrs. Cobb, Armit, Banning and Schultz, among others, who have in the past been operational, does he still maintain to the House and the country, unequivocally, that the Security Planning and Analysis Branch is purely and simply a passive and non-operational analytical group, as has been maintained up to this point? Is that what he is telling the House unequivocally?

Mr. Blais: Yes, Mr. Speaker. Indeed, I might point out to the hon. gentleman that if he is relying on the story which appeared in the Globe and Mail this morning—he referred to one gentleman who was mentioned in that particular story—he is, in fact, a gentleman who did have a role in terms of security planning which is a role he played, as well, when he was involved in "G" branch, dealing not with operations but with security planning.

REVISION OF SUBSIDIES TO QUEBEC MILK PRODUCERS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Raynald Guay (Lévis): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture. Following the numerous representations which have been made, I would like to know whether there are new developments on the withholding of subsidies to milk producers in Quebec and all over Canada?

Mr. Yves Caron (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, considering the conflict between both federations in Quebec which resulted in a quota surplus of 2 per cent on the production market, the chairman of the Canadian Dairy Commission decided to hold back subsidies to milk producers for January 1978. I must assure the hon. member that since last Friday there were many negotiations between the chairman of the Canadian Dairy Commission and both federations, and the Canadian Dairy Commission decided unilaterally that if both groups have not come to an agreement by tomorrow evening, it would issue the cheques to industrial milk producers in Quebec.

NATIONAL SECURITY

REVIEW OF CORRESPONDENCE WITH RCMP AGENT

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the Solicitor General. It is supplementary to the question put by the hon. member for Central Nova, as well as earlier questions that were asked of the minister on this topic.

Has the minister now reviewed the voluminous correspondence concerning the RCMP agent whose case was brought forward last week? I know the minister has studied it. The correspondence included a letter from the minister's department to the agent, captioned "Recommendation for citizenship", and another letter from the Solicitor General, who wrote on December 22 last year: "I have been in contact with the minister of immigration, the Hon. Bud Cullen, and have made representations on your behalf. I expect you will be contacted shortly." I would like to ask the minister, now that his memory has been refreshed once again, what he has been doing on this case. Has he discussed this matter with the Minister of Employment and Immigration, and what action are they planning to take?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, of course, the hon. gentleman, from his question, recognizes the sensitivity of the file concerned. I am sure he would not want me at this time to comment on the actions I intend to take. I would indicate to the hon. member that I have received representations from the hon. member for Central Nova, and from him as well, in terms of this question. I am dealing with this matter very seriously indeed, and I will be communicating with him, as well as the hon. member for Central Nova, in due course.

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Solicitor General, in view of the renewed interest that the security branch has taken in this case, whether he could indicate to the House if there are written contracts of any nature with the agent in question?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I would not comment on that information at this time. I would indicate that it is not a question of renewed interest; it is a question of ongoing interest.

GRAIN

REQUEST FOR PROGRESS REPORT ON NEGOTIATIONS FOR NEW INTERNATIONAL GRAINS AGREEMENT

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the mnister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. It is a matter of great interest to Canadian farmers. My understanding is that negotiations for a new international grains agreement were originally to conclude by the end of March or thereabouts. I would like to ask the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board what progress is being made. Can he tell us in general the position Canada is now taking in these negotiations?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I should limit myself to saying that progress is being made in resolving some of the major differences between principal participants. It is anticipated now, however, that the agreement will not be concluded during this set of negotiations but, rather, that in a matter of weeks another meeting will be held to conclude the agreement.

● (1502)

Mr. Nystrom: Can the minister confirm that the government of Canada is taking a position of supporting reserve stocks without supporting a reserve price range for the sale of grain at the same time; in other words, a minimum-maximum price.

Mr. Lang: Expressed that way, Mr. Speaker, I think the question is somewhat misleading. It is our position that reserve stocks can be a very important part of an agreement. Of course, having those reserve stocks would involve having a bottom price or a low price at which stocks would have to be accumulated, and then they would be held off the market until a high price or a top price was achieved.

There is some difference of view among countries as to whether, at that bottom price or top price, in addition to the reserve action and other action, there should be certain commitments to supply over and above the reserve. We have not taken the position that that would be very workable and that, in fact, the reserve and other forms of action at those levels of price are the way to get a decent return for our producers.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ACTION TAKEN BY GOVERNMENT ON "BUY CANADIAN" POLICY

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I have a straightforward question for the Minister of Finance which I hope will elicit a straightforward answer regarding Premier Davis' letter to the Prime Minister of Canada. Premier Davis mentioned a number of areas in which there was agreement at the federal-provincial first ministers' conference for action to get the Canadian economy back on track and create new jobs. I ask the minister, what action has been taken by the government since the first ministers' conference to implement the agreed upon "Buy Canadian" policy, and also to provide new incentives for industrial research and development in Canada?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister was to write all premiers following the conference for a follow-up on those propositions. Of course, there was discussion in our government about research and development. However, I do not have anything to announce on that matter at this time.

Mr. Beatty: May I ask the minister about two other areas in which there was agreement between the provinces and the federal government on which Premier Davis feels there has been no action? Has any action been taken on the proposal to get the unemployed back to work by putting them to work on such projects as badly needed sections, rebuilding railroad beds, grade separation, and by taking action to protect Canadian jobs under the auto pact?

Pages

Mr. Chrétien: On the first proposition, Mr. Speaker, it is very easy for the Premier of Ontario to say that we should do that. However, when we had a budget a few weeks ago, he did not move very substantially to reduce the level of unemployment in Ontario. We will look at the problems within our jurisdiction in the spirit of the agreement of the first ministers' conference last February. It has only been a month; we have not had time to put the programs in place.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

EMPLOYMENT OF UNIVERSITY STUDENTS AS PAGES

Mr. Speaker: Before recognizing the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) on a question of privilege of which he has given the Chair notice, may I take three minutes to advise the House, before rising later in the day as has already been ordered by the House, of activities that have taken place which I think will be of interest to hon. members with regard to the employment of pages in the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The reason I preempt the time of the House to do this now is because it will relate to some interest members will have relative to possible enrollment dates at universities. I thought I should take a moment to explain this to members, because during the recess information will be going out about it. I thought hon. members ought to be the first to know.

[Mr. Beatty.]

Since coming here it has been an interest of mine, and many others have shared it and many others had it long before that time, that we find a way to encourage young Canadians to participate in the House of Commons by serving as pages here. That was attempted at the high school level and faced great difficulty because of discrepancies and differences in various academic programs throughout the provinces.

A couple of years ago I asked the Clerk of the House of Commons to attend in Washington to examine the system there. He did, and returned with a very thorough report which was referred to the Members' Services Committee. The members of that committee worked very diligently on the project, with great interest, and came up with what I think is an excellent idea. I hope all members will share it. It is that the program, instead of being operative at the high school level, be operative at the first year university level, which facilitates provincial interchange much more easily and enables residents away from home to lead a much more normal course of life.

Having given approval to that basic idea, we are attempting now in some hurry to implement, at least partially, this program before September, which will involve possible enrollment by students in two Ottawa universities, whose co-operation we have received throughout and for which we are very grateful.

I want to assure hon. members on a couple of counts. First, this program will be phased in in such a way as to ensure that all of those who have served so faithfully and well as pages will not in any way be prejudiced or jeopardized in the employment they have enjoyed here.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The obvious advantages bear some repetition. We will now be able to secure, in addition to this cross-Canada participation, young people for a year of university, for which they will work as pages and receive a full salary which will enable them to finance their education.

We will, of course, benefit from that kind of participation. We will benefit from being able to do something that is long overdue here, that is, to employ an appropriate number of female pages in the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: May I at the same time indicate that we will be giving, in the process, some serious consideration, and I hope that hon. members do not rebel at this, to altering the uniform being worn by pages in the House. While we feel we must maintain the dignity required in the Chamber, it will reflect something that is a little more in keeping with modern times. We have in mind something in the nature of a blazer in the House of Commons green colour, with an appropriate crest, and grey flannels for the boys and skirts for the girls. However, we will receive suggestions from members on that.

I expose this to the thinking of members at this time, first to thank all of those who have been involved in working on this project with such great interest. That includes the Clerk of the House, the Members' Services Committee, and the universities from which we have had cooperation.

I invite from all hon. members suggestions as to worthy candidates. We would expect that, while they need not necessarily be fluently bilingual, they would certainly have sufficient capacity in both languages to serve in the House which, of course, is a requirement familiar to all hon. members.

I look forward to co-operating with hon. members. I hope as well to elicit the co-operation of various provincial Speakers who probably have already received suggestions regarding pages whom they would like to employ but are unable to employ in some of the provincial legislatures. We will endeavour to make participation in the program as broad and universal as possible.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PRIVILEGE

MR. KNOWLES (WINNIPEG NORTH CENTRE)—ARCTIC WINTER GAMES—ALLEGED INTERFERENCE IN ELECTORAL NOMINATING PROCESS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege of which I gave Your Honour the required notice under Standing Order 17(2). My point of privilege relates to certain things that have been happening and may still be happening to my friend and colleague, the hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Firth). I have indicated to you, sir, the nature of the matter, and I have also discussed it with the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) (Mrs. Campagnolo).

Some time ago, back on February 13, a letter was written to the hon. member for Northwest Territories by the president of the 1978 Arctic Winter Games Host Society which read as follows:

Dear Mr. Firth:

The 1978 Arctic Winter Games will be held in Hay River and Pine Point from March 19 to 25, 1978. The games will be officially opened by Mrs. Iona Campagnolo, Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport, at 2 p.m., in Hay River, on March 19, 1978.

We would be most pleased to have you come to Hay River for the Opening Ceremonies, and to participate in the various activities at Hay River and Pine Point.

We would appreciate your early advice on this matter in order that we might make the necessary arrangements with respect to accommodation.

Yours very truly

D. M. Stewart

On February 27 my friend and colleague replied to Mr. Stewart's letter in these words:

Dear Mr. Stewart:

I would like to thank you for your kind invitation to be part of the Opening Ceremonies and to participate in the various activities at the 1978 Arctic Winter Games, to be held in Hay River and Pine Point from March 19 to 25.

I would be more than pleased to attend and should be arriving in Hay River on March 18.

With kindest regards

Sincerely yours,

Wally Firth, M.P.
Northwest Territories

• (1512)

That is where my hon. friend is today. Someone might ask whether this matter should not stand until he returns, but in my view when an affront is offered to one member of this House it is an affront to all of us.

I feel there has been an affront, and a certain amount of intimidation which I regard as rather serious. The invitation was quite clear. The hon. member for Northwest Territories was to take part in the activities connected with the Arctic Winter Games, particularly the opening ceremony at Hay River on Sunday, March 19, at 2 p.m. However, after that invitation had been extended and accepted there were certain telephone calls.

My information is that it was either Mr. Stewart himself, the Mayor of Hay River, who is also an official connected with the games, or someone from his office who telephoned to the office in this building of the hon. member for Northwest Territories and also to the office of my leader, the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent). A complaint was made that the hon. member for Northwest Territories would apparently be attending the Northwest Territories NDP nominating convention which would be held in Hay River during the time the Arctic Winter Games were taking place. What is wrong with that, I do not know.

Of greater concern to me than the affront to the hon. member is what seems to me to be intimidation with respect to the election process itself. This, indeed, is the serious matter which I raise. The information given by Mr. Stewart or his office to the office of my hon. friend and to the office of my leader was that unless the nominating convention were cancelled, his invitation to take part in the opening ceremonies and to participate in activities connected with the games would be cancelled.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): When my hon. friend refused to have anything to do with such a cancellation, pointing out that it was not he who was arranging the convention but the New Democratic Party in the Northwest Territories, the word came that unless the convention were postponed the invitation would be cancelled.

Furthermore, arrangements had been made for the convention to be held in a room in one of the schools in Hay River. That reservation was cancelled when the Northwest Territories NDP refused to postpone the convention. The convention is to be held tonight in the basement of the Caribou Inn, which is privately owned and completely separate from any governmental ties. As far as I know, plans are going ahead for the convention to be held this evening.

As it turns out, the invitation to Sunday's event was, in fact, cancelled. My hon. friend from the Northwest Territories turned up at the opening ceremonies on Sunday afternoon at 2 o'clock and, although he still held his card telling him which seat he could occupy, the list of persons who were to be present at that ceremony did not include his name.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport (Mrs. Campagnolo) was there—she is present in the chamber today—and my hon. friend from the Northwest Territories told me that after the occasion was over, when he saw her, she said to him "Wally, if I had known you were here I would have mentioned you".

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): My hon. friend believes the reason the minister did not know he was there was because his name was not on the list of invited guests. Although many officials at the territorial and municipal level were introduced, the hon. member for Northwest Territories was not introduced or mentioned in any way.

In addition, there was a reception of the usual kind given by the government of the Northwest Territories in Hay River on Monday night, to which anybody who had any kind of official status at the territorial or municipal level was invited. Also invited were former representatives of the Northwest Territories and at least one former member of parliament from the Northwest Territories. A former Governor General was there, too. All these people were invited, but the hon. member for the Northwest Territories was not.

An hon. Member: A shameful Grit trick!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): My friends in the Progressive Conservative party are trying to put the blame on the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport. My hon. friend from the Northwest Territories does not do that. He thinks she is on his side and that it is the local people, in charge of a project funded by government money, who are snubbing him and, what is worse, interfering with the election process.

I do not mind snubbing. I can take it. We all get it now and then. It is part of our occupation; our skin is not that thin. But when an invitation is rescinded and everyone else is invited, and when an hon. member who represents the largest constituency in Canada is not invited to a ceremony in his own constituency, it becomes an affront which I am sure the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport will not condone. In fact, I suspect she will be the first to extend an apology to the hon. member for Northwest Territories when he returns.

What I think is really serious is that local people who are operating a function which is largely, if not wholly, funded by federal money, should use their position to intimidate a person or group of persons in connection with the election process. At that point it becomes a matter of privilege as far as this House is concerned.

I suppose it may be said that the New Democratic Party in the Northwest Territories is taking advantage of the fact that many people have come in from all over that vast area and decided that it would be a good time to hold a convention. I think this makes good sense. It probably means saving money, because people might make the trip only once, rather than twice. And to suggest that a convention held in the basement of a motel in Hay River would interfere with the carrying on of the Arctic Winter Games is utter nonsense.

On the other side of the coin, persons like Mr. Stewart, who is president of the Arctic Winter Games Host Society and Mayor of Hay River, by taking these various steps to interfere with the election process are probably infringing the Canada Elections Act itself and this, consequently, is a case of privilege as far as hon. members here are concerned.

The things which have happened are too many for this to be accidental. There was the written invitation. It was not just one of those printed cards which might go to anyone. It was a personal letter. There was an acceptance. Then there was the telephone call saying that unless this convention was postponed the invitation would be rescinded. There were calls not only to the hon. member's office in this building but also to the office of the leader of this party. Then there is the fact that the name was omitted from the list of those attending the opening Sunday afternoon. There is the fact that there was no invitation to attend the reception held by the government of the Northwest Territories on Monday night. As I say, these things add up to an attempt to dissuade a member of this House from pursuing his rightful privilege of being a candidate for nomination for the next parliament.

I felt this matter should be raised without further delay. Obviously, Your Honour would not want to rule until the hon. member himself has returned from the games, and I hope he will be re-nominated tonight. Your Honour would want to look into this, as would the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport), perhaps the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Faulkner), and perhaps also the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen), who is in charge of the Canada Elections Act. However, I decry in the strongest terms this kind of interference on the part of local officials. Your Honour might, under normal circumstances, tell me to complain to those officials up there, but the fact is they are operating a function which is funded by the federal government.

I decry, in the strongest terms I can use, these practices which interfere with the rights of any citizen but particularly with the right of a member of this House of Commons to seek re-nomination so that he can return to this House. It is a matter which is the cause of a great deal of concern in the north. I have had read to me some of the things that are appearing in the newspapers. There is a feeling that there was an element of discrimination against the hon. member in his own person for certain reasons which I need not state, and I think the matter should be cleared up.

I am a little sorry that my friends to my right seem to think that the blame should be put on hon. members opposite. I do not want to blame the hon. minister opposite. I want her help. The hon. member for Northwest Territories says the minister was most kind to him when she spoke to him Sunday afternoon after the event was over, and I am sure she would not condone what has happened, but I hope somehow this matter can be sorted out and, if the time comes when Your Honour feels that either I or the hon. member for Northwest Territories has a prima facie case of privilege, either he or I will be prepared to make the necessary motion to refer to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections the specific matter of certain officials interfering with the election process.

Hon. Iona Campagnolo (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): Mr. Speaker, the chief magistrate of one of the host cities of the Arctic Winter Games has certain privileges in the administration of his city, but I do not believe it is our purpose to determine the scope of those administrative duties here.

I would like to note that there are two separate matters at issue in the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), and I thank him for giving me the information he did at the beginning of the question period. The first is the alleged lack of recognition by the games organizers of the presence of the hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Firth) at the opening ceremonies. The second point, I believe, is whether it was appropriate for the hon. member for Northwest Territories to use the assembly, for which all travel costs had been paid by the people of Canada, as an occasion at which to hold his nominating meeting for the next federal election in the Mackenzie constituency.

On the first point I would like to point out that there was a great deal of informality at the opening ceremonies of these games. The dais was crowded with honoured guests. Indeed, it was overcrowded with honoured guests, many of whom were not accorded public recognition in other than general terms.

As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre mentioned, I in fact did see the hon. member for Northwest Territories immediately after the ceremonies concluded. He was taking pictures from the front part of the dais, as he had moved himself from the seat he had, closer to the second row. The hon. member approached me, and I told him that if I had known he was there I would have recognized him in my preamble, as I certainly would have. However, I would like to note that there was no introduction of guests on the program. There was a spoken program. A man was acting as M.C.

Also on the platform was the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Milne), and he was not introduced either. I am sure that the parliamentary secretary was not being intimidated because he intended to have his nominating meeting for Peel-Dufferin-Simcoe as part of the opening of the Arctic Winter Games.

On the second point, which I feel is the more important point, the propriety or lack of it with regard to using the Arctic Winter Games as a vehicle for a collective meeting of northerners for a nomination meeting, I can only say that hon. members opposite have frequently said to me that they wish to see less involvement of politics in sport.

I am absolutely not in a position to comment on what was said between the mayor of Hay River and the hon. member for Northwest Territories. I have no way of establishing what was said in that conversation or if, indeed, it took place, as I am quite sure the hon. member will tell me when he returns. What one individual says to another is quite beyond the realm of purview of my ministry. However, just before making this statement I confirmed that the hon. member for Northwest Territories was and is a fully accredited official of the Arctic Winter Games. In addition, the Arctic Winter Games organizing committee has the hon. member registered as a V.I.P. of the society, which, I understand, grants him automatic inclusion in all events.

I regret very much that any slur might be cast upon the Arctic Winter Games, and I know that is not the intention of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. The Arctic Winter Games is the largest event of this type in the world above the 60th parallel, and since more than 600 athletes from Alaska, Yukon, and the Northwest Territories, organizers and volunteers, are all involved, I do not believe any of them should suffer because of the politicization of superb hospitality and fellowship for which these games are famous. I regret that the hon. member for Northwest Territories feels that a discourtesy has been done him, and I hope that we may look forward to the next Arctic Winter Games in 1980 in Whitehorse without any such charges of political opportunism being levelled.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I will be brief. I cannot understand what all the fuss is about. I think the question of privilege is quite spurious. I can see nothing wrong with the holding of a convention, whether it be at the Arctic Winter Games, at the Sourdough Rendez-vous or anywhere else. The question is one of popularity between a local member of parliament and local officials. I can only express my disappointment.

The minister has said that the hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Firth) is a fully accredited official of the Arctic Winter Games. I was not even invited, and yet my constituency is very vitally involved in this event of such magnitude, as the minister describes it, above the 60th parallel.

I can see nothing wrong in what has happened. As I say, it depends entirely upon the popularity of the hon. member involved with his own local officials, and perhaps he should improve his p.r. The Liberals held a convention in the middle of the Sourdough Rendez-vous a few years ago. I found nothing wrong in that.

Before I resume my seat, Mr. Speaker, with respect to Your Honour's announcement on the question of pages for the House of Commons—and I cast no reflection on Your Honour's announcement in this respect—the territories were omitted, and they should be included.

Mr. Speaker: On that last point, just to set it aside, I attempted to do this orally in a very quick way. The intention is to seek—and I did not get into numbers—36 pages in that respect, three from each of the areas, the ten provinces and the two territories.

● (1532)

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address myself to two questions that have been raised during the question of privilege. I must say that I was quite disappointed in the minister's response to what I thought was a very courteous and generous presentation of the issue by the House leader of my party.

The issue raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) in terms of holding a convention for any political party in Canada was that there should not be any kind of intimidation by any local group in this country, particularly a local group that has been federally funded, and that could inhibit that process. The local group concerned, if I understand it correctly, was appointed by the minister who spoke on the issue, intimidated—and I will use it openly—the member for the Northwest Territories (Mr. Firth), who happens to be, and it has not been mentioned, a Metis in this country. For that reason, he happens to be a little more sensitive maybe than the rest of us when he is subjected to what most of us could call a put-down by the white majority.

I think it is useful for us to discuss this issue, but not so naively as to assume that a minority feel just the same as the rest of us when they are confronted by such a situation. The hon. member for the Northwest Territories, in my view, very appropriately, in terms of the interests of the people he represents in that part of Canada, decided to have a political convention. It is true that he chose a time when a lot of people were coming in for another function, and it is true that they were going to be using public funds for that convention. I would like to point out to the minister that most of these people might not have been able to come the hundreds of miles to a political convention if such had not been the case.

The minister, who sort of oozed her way around the point that perhaps the hon. member for the Northwest Territories was inappropriately having a convention at that time, was incorrect. It was quite the contrary. I would like to see all of the political parties—and I am not making a criticism of the other parties—seize such opportunities, in a part of the country where most people are too damned poor to attend a political convention. Rather than seeing it as a fault, Mr. Speaker, I see it as a virtue.

The member for the Northwest Territories—and let us not be naive about that either—is going to get the nomination. He has done a good job, and there is no local opposition to him for the nomination. All he wanted to do was take advantage of the event and schedule the convention when it was going to be open to a lot of people who are in the main poor and spread over hundreds and thousands of miles. What happened was that a local official, for God knows what reason, but certainly not a good reason, attempted to intimidate that member and said, "No, you can't have this convention at this time or we are going to strike you off from the official list of participants in the opening of these important games."

I say that is wrong. There was nothing wrong with the scheduling of that meeting. I repeat, I would be happy if all the political parties of Canada could schedule their meetings at a time when people could attend. Once again, it was poor people in the main. I resent the minister getting up, and instead of replying with some courtesy to what I took to be a courteous and generous comment by the House leader of my party and, indeed, courteous comments of the member for the Northwest Territories himself, implying that it was inappropriate for him to have a convention at that time. That kind of suggestion on her part, to put it euphemistically, was less than gracious.

I do not want to take up the time of the House. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre stated, it is a ruling that you will have to make, Mr. Speaker, and it should probably be left over to a later date when the hon. member is back in this House. I wanted to make the comments that I did today because, instead of responding in an appropriate way, the minister who entered into the debate did just the opposite. Instead of coming to the defence of an hon. member in this House, who is trying to do his job in a democratic fashion, the minister brought up a spurious point and hurled irrelevant abuse in his direction.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, if I may make a very short contribution to the question of privilege, there is nothing wrong with any member of parliament taking advantage of a public occasion to hold a nominating convention. That is not a bad thing to do, and the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport (Mrs. Campagnolo) ought not to give umbrage to an hon. member doing just that.

The Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport did not take advantage of the suggestion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) that perhaps the other ministers involved would like to take part. If it is to be an issue—and the issue for you to decide is whether it is a question of privilege at all—we had better have all of the facts, including those of the hon. member for whom the nominating convention is alleged to have caused such great difficulty that the mayor of Hay River may have taken what I regard as a most unusual step. We are not here to determine the privileges of the members, and I think it might be appropriate to listen to the hon. member before we go any further. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that there are some considerable doubts as to whether it is a question of privilege.

I want to point out, however, that the New Democratic Party has successfully used up 37 minutes of time on this issue whereas we could have been dealing with the bill involving the northern pipeline.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I do not intend to use up any more time except to say that it is important to this country as a whole, particularly with respect to a matter that can be argued later, that we get to dealing with the bill on the northern pipeline, which can have some significance for the country and which, hopefully, we may be able to deal with in all final stages before the House rises at six o'clock today.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There has been rather lengthy discussion on this matter today, particularly in light of the fact that it remains to be established whether the matter does touch privilege. There are some serious concerns about it, and it is a very substantial matter. However, it does appear to relate to events outside the House essentially, and also to nominating conventions.

I am fascinated by the argument made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) initially, which does not come to the assistance of his general proposition, but which is that since members of the House as elected members really have no propriety or property in the nominating process, but it is that of a party, it may be a grievance among the local officials and the New Democratic Party of that particular area. It is difficult to extend it to members of the House because, in fact, the member of the House has no more right to be at that nominating convention as a candidate than any other candidate, who in this case does not exist.

In any event, I am not making a final ajudication. I simply say the matter is complicated, and if it is to be established as a question of privilege it would have to be done so on the basis of the intervention, that has been suggested, by the hon. member for the Northwest Territories (Mr. Firth). Accordingly I agree with those who have suggested that the matter ought to stand over until the hon. member himself is here and has had the opportunity to give us the benefit of his presentation. Perhaps then there may be contributions by other hon. members.

I have received notice of what I think may be an acceptable and very brief question of privilege by the Postmaster General (Mr. Lamontagne).

PRIVILEGE

MR. LAMONTAGNE—POSTAL SERVICE

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I shall be brief, because the bill dealing with the pipeline is more important. When a reputation has been attacked, I feel it is sometimes necessary to set the record straight and make public concrete evidence to dispel certain allegations.

Ever since I was elected to the House of Commons, I have noticed that hon. members are used to asking questions about the Post Office, the mail delivery, and that they often include in their preambles comments which are sometimes unfair and generalizations which smack of demagogy. They recall incidents which may have unduly undermined the confidence the Canadian public should have in the Post Office Department.

[English]

You will remember the incident of an offering to my predecessor, which was a Christmas cake that was accidentally damaged. You will remember the story—

An hon. Member: What is the question of privilege?

Mr. Lamontagne: I will come to it, sir.

There was an accidental mail spillover on Highway 401 that was made into a horror story, and yet was purely an accidental incident. Even yesterday the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) gave me a bundle of misdirected mail which arrived in the Yukon instead of Montreal. It, too, probably was an accidental incident.

Such stories tend to have an effect on our management and a great majority of our workers. I would like to mention something which happened in the last few days which indicates that the Post Office does not do everything wrong.

• (1542)

A few days ago I received a letter from Montreal. As usual, it took only one day to come from Montreal to Ottawa. The letter will confirm this.

[Translation]

I am sending you, under separate cover, the traditional Easter egg.

This Easter gift was in a way a show of confidence in the Post Office.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, this being the start of Holy Week, a time when all the faithful show compassion and generosity, it is my intention, with the permission of hon. members, to deposit this egg and a copy of the letter in the National Post Office Museum. This will reassure all Canadians, especially those in Toronto and Montreal, that not only is there great hope in the future for the Post Office—

Some hon. Members: Order, order!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MEASURE RESPECTING DURATION OF PARLIAMENTS

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-429, respecting the duration of every House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Roche: Mr. Speaker, I can explain this bill very briefly. Its purpose is to standardize the time for federal elections in this country so that a general election would be held every four years on the third Monday of June. In the event that a government loses the confidence of parliament, then an election would be held immediately, and thus parliamentary democracy would be preserved. The present system during majority parliaments turns election dates into protracted guessing games that disrupt the normal flow of business both within and without parliament. The selection of the election date ought not to be at the political whim of the Prime Minister, but should be fixed in law for the good of the country.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. With some procedural reservations about whether that has to do with the duration of parliament or the duration of the House of Commons, I am prepared to put the motion.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

[Mr. MacGuigan.]

CANADA STUDENT LOANS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-37, to amend the Canada Student Loans Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

CANADA COUNCIL ACT

MEASURE TO CHANGE COUNCIL NAME

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-430, to amend the Canada Council Act (Killam-Dunn).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, the explanatory notes with respect to this are very brief. It is in recognition of the contribution to the establishment of the Canada Council by two great industrialists and Canadians, Mr. Killam and Mr. Dunn. The purpose of this bill is to recognize, as I have indicated, the special and significant contribution of the late Sir Isaac Walton Killam and the late Sir James Dunn, two Canadian industrialists and philanthropists, which made possible in a very significant way the establishment of what is now the Canada Council. This bill would change the name of the Canada Council to the Killam-Dunn Council.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

MEASURE TO CHANGE COUNCIL NAME

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-431, to amend the Canada Council Act (Killam-Dunn).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. McCain: Mr. Speaker, the introduction of this bill is for a purpose parallel to that of the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall). It is in recognition of the fact that these two gentlemen, who were born in the Atlantic area, contributed to Canada's welfare and in turn contributed indirectly, but by the will of parliament, to the formation of the Canada Council. Their names should be remembered as the Canadians who created this fund. Therefore, it should be named the Killam-Dunn Foundation.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

REACTIVATION OF BOUNDARY BAY AIRPORT

Question No. 935—Mr. Friesen:

1. Does the Department of Transport have any plans to re-open Vancouver's Old Boundary Bay Airport and, if so, what type of aircraft would have the use of the facility?

2. (a) What is the estimated cost of bringing the facility up to standards (b) on what date would the work begin and what is the estimated length of time it would take to complete?

3. What amount was spent on the Airport in each of the past ten years by (a) DND (b) DOT (c) PW (d) S&S?

4. Approximately, how many light aircraft per month could be diverted to this location from Vancouver International Airport facilities?

5. What is the nature of negotiations with the municipality regarding increased use of municipal facilities i.e. roads etc. as a result of the ugrading?

6. Will the local municipality have to bear the cost to maintain access to the facility and safety procedures for those using the beach area?

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): I am informed by Transport Canada and the Departments of National Defence, Public Works and Supply and Services as follows: 1. Transport Canada is investigating the possibility of reactivating a portion of the Boundary Bay Aerodrome to accommodate piston engine and turbo-prop aircraft weighing less than 12,500 lbs. gross take-off weight.

2. (a) Preliminary cost estimates, which are currently under review, range from one to six million dollars depending on the standards to which the airport will be reactivated. (b) Reactivation of Boundary Bay Airport must await the completion of an Environmental Impact study for which the completion date is presently unknown, as well as a study of the financial impact upon present general aviation users of Vancouver International Airport. Therefore the proposal to reactivate Boundary Bay has not yet been approved. For these reasons, it is unlikely that any major reconstruction program would start before April 1, 1979, and would probably require up to two and a half years to complete.

3. (a) Old Boundary Bay airport was vacated by DND in 1971, and no financial records were retained except for data associated with caretaker—security service, which amounted to $33,000.00 during the fiscal year ending March, 1972. (b) Transport Canada has invested no Capital funds at the site since taking over the administration of the Aerodrome in June, 1972. The only identifiable O&M expenditure was a water bill in 1973 for approximately $30,000. (c) Public Works—None. (d) Supply and Services—None.

4. It is estimated that 50,000 aircraft movements (i.e. landings and take-offs) per year could be diverted from Vancouver International Airport to the Boundary Bay Airport. These movements can be attributed to approximately 150 aircraft that could be relocated from Vancouver International Airport to Boundary Bay.

5. Transport Canada has held preliminary discussion with the Municipality, the Corporation of Delta, on matters related to the demand for water, sewer and road facilities which may result as the aerodrome is reactivated. In addition, we have held preliminary discussions with the Municipality on the subject of the latter operating the proposed airport.

6. The cost of maintaining the access road to the Airport from the municipal road bordering the site will be the responsibility of the operator of the Airport (i.e. Transport Canada or Corporation of Delta). All aviation safety standards will be enforced.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD—MRS. JOCELYN PELCHAT-JOHNSON

Question No. 1,082—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Is Mrs. Jocelyn Pelchat-Johnson employed with the National Film Board and, if so (a) in what position; (b) what are all the qualifications that she possesses for her present job; (c) was she appointed to her present position by means of a competition and (i) if so, what are all the details of the competition including dates, etc. (ii) if not, for what reason; (d) is the government aware as to whether or not Mrs. Johnson holds separatist views?

2. Is the government aware that she is the daughter-in-law of the former Premier of Quebec, Mr. Daniel Johnson?

3. Is it government policy to permit government agencies, such as the National Film Board, to employ persons with separatist viewpoints?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): I am informed by the National Film Board as follows: 1. (a) Yes, her title is Chief of Information and Promotion. (b) In addition to having academic training in law, Mrs. Pelchat-Johnson had also acquired relevant experience in films, as she had, until she joined the National Film Board, been the assistant to the President of Faroun Films, one of the largest film companies in Quebec. She had also been in charge of the technical aspect of the Montreal Film Festival. It should be pointed out that Mrs. Pelchat-Johnson started to work for the NFB on September 3, 1975 as a distribution officer for the Commercial Division, Television Section, and was selected in a competition open to persons outside the Public Service. At that time, there were two vacancies and Mrs. Pelchat-Johnson was selected for one of them. (c) No. Because appointments at a certain level are at the discretion of the Division Director. However, a number of persons within the Public Service were approached about the position, and it was Mrs. Pelchat-Johnson who was finally appointed. (d) Our employees' political views are not among the criteria we consider when we hire them.

2. Yes, the selection board members who interviewed the candidates knew that Mrs. Pelchat-Johnson was married to Daniel Johnson Junior, the son of the former Premier of Quebec.

Order Paper Questions

3. The NFB's hiring policy does not discriminates on the grounds of sex, religion, social status or political views. Competence is always the key concern in hiring.

NON-PROFIT HOUSING DEFICITS

Question No. 1,244—Mr. Herbert:

Does the government accept, as part of any possible deficit on non profit housing, the inclusion of municipal and school taxes in cases where the provincial government has refused exemption from these taxes for such a project and would the federal coverage of 50% of any operating deficits cover the taxes which may be included in such deficits?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): I am advised as follows by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation: Non-profit housing, financed under the terms of Section 15 and 15.1 of the National Housing Act, is intended to operate on a full recovery basis. Deficits in the operation of non-profit housing are, therefore, not anticipated. If they should occur, adjustment to the rentals would be required to offset any operating losses. Some units in a non-profit project may be occupied by tenants who pay rent according to their income on the basis of a rent-to-income scale. Losses incurred in the operation of such units are shared by the province or agency thereof, and the Federal Government, on a 50/50 basis under an agreement made under Section 44(1)(b) of the N.H.A. The total operating costs of the project would include municipal and school taxes for which the non-profit project would be responsible, if the provincial government had refused exemption from these taxes.

2. Does the 1978 Post Office Calendar list July 1, 1978 as a designated holiday under the name Canada Day, and if so, is this a legal designation?

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): I am informed by the Department of the Secretary of State and the Post Office Department as follows: 1. The Holidays Act (ch. H-7, RSC 1970) stipulates that July 1 is a legal holiday and shall be kept and observed under the name of "Dominion Day". This provision has not been amended by Parliament.

2. Yes. "Canada Day", "Jour du Canada" has been used because such is the common usage to designate this holiday, although this designation has not been confirmed by law.

POINTS OF ORDER

MR. JONES—DELAY IN ANSWERING QUESTION NO. 145

Mr. Leonard C. Jones (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I put a starred question on the order paper back in July. Again it was put on the order paper on October 19 as question No. 145. I still have not received an answer. At one time in November the parliamentary secretary indicated that he would provide an answer within a couple of weeks. That is a long, long while ago. I wonder if he can provide the answer within a couple of days.

[Translation]

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the question concerns various departments. Unfortunately, I have not yet received detailed reports from each one of them and am therefore unable to give an adequate answer to the hon. member. He can rest assured though that as soon as I have all the information, he will be given a reply.

MR. TOWERS—DELAY IN ANSWERING QUESTION NO. 1,319

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I requested that the Postmaster General (Mr. Lamontagne) reply to question No. 1,319 before the Easter recess. It relates to the gold double-struck Olympic coins, which were struck under federal legislation. I am very disappointed in the Postmaster General, in that he did not answer that question. Perhaps if he tended to business, instead of capering around, we would all be better off, even those who are receiving mail.

COPY OF APPROXIMATELY 1,600 JOB STUDIES IN CONSTRUCTION TRADES ACROSS CANADA

Motion No. 60—Mr. Herbert:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the approximately 1600 job studies in the construction trades across Canada prepared in order to update the Canadian Classification and Dictionary of Occupants and contracted to Southam Business Publications, Don Mills, Ontario.

Mr. Raymond Dupont (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately I cannot follow up on that motion since information on employment which we asked contractors to gather for these studies can in many cases be considered as confidential by the business involved. That is why the firms which have provided contractors with information have received assurance from the former Department of Employment and Immigration that data provided would remain confidential. Given those circumstances, we cannot table those studies in the House of Commons.

NORTHERN PIPELINE ACT

ESTABLISHMENT OF AGENCY TO SUPERVISE PIPELINE CONSTRUCTION

The House resumed, from Tuesday, March 21, consideration of Bill C-25, to establish the Northern Pipeline Agency, to facilitate the planning and construction of a pipeline for the transmission of natural gas from Alaska and Northern Canada and to give effect to an Agreement between Canada and the United States of America on principles applicable to such a pipeline and to amend certain acts in relation thereto, as reported (with amendments) from the Special Committee on a Northern Gas Pipeline.

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak to my motion No. 3, which is on the Order Paper today, I think I should start perhaps by making the observation that when Bill C-25, to establish an agency to oversee the construction of the northern pipeline, passes the House of Commons and work gets under way, this project will likely be the largest and most important ever undertaken by private enterprise in the history of the world.

Canadians in all parts of the country support very strongly the creation of a northern pipeline. They recognize that as well as having tremendous benefits to Canada in terms of ensuring that in future we will have adequate supplies of energy for Canadian needs, it will also have industrial spin-offs in all parts of Canada and will have enormous benefits in terms of business in the country, trade, and badly needed jobs. No Canadians more than Ontarians and Quebecers support the construction of the pipeline. They recognize that their interests as Canadians and as members of particular provinces lie very directly with the creation of the pipeline itself.

The central point which I hope to make in moving the motion I have proposed is that the government appears to be bulling ahead in setting up an agency to oversee the construction of the northern pipeline without having provided for input from the provinces in all parts of the country.

Under clause 17 of the bill a federal-provincial consultative council is to be created which would have responsibility for carrying out the objects of Bill C-25. It would consist of the Commissioner and a representative of the Yukon Territory, named by the governor in council upon the recommendation of the Commissioner and Council of the Yukon Territory, and one representative of each of the provinces of British Columbia, Alberta, and Saskatchewan, nominated by the lieutentant governors in council of each of those provinces.

Perhaps it would be worth while to take a short bit of the time of the House to go back and review the objects of the bill as listed on pages 2 and 3. The three very important objects are these, and I would remind hon. member that I stress the fact that the objects are national in scope. They do not simply affect one part of Canada, but affect the development and future security of energy supply for all of Canada. Object (d) is:

(d) to facilitate, in relation to the pipeline, consultation and co-ordination with the governments of the provinces, the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories;

It does not say just the western provinces, it says "the provinces", meaning all the provinces.

Object (e) states:

(e) to maximize the social and economic benefits from the construction and operation of the pipeline including the maximizing of the opportunities for employment of Canadians while at the same time minimizing any adverse effect on the social and environmental conditions of the areas most directly affected by the pipeline;

Again, although there are some areas of the country that will be affected more than others, no one part of the country is excluded from this object of the bill.

Object (f) does not refer to provincial, northern or western. Object (f) states:

(f) to advance national economic and energy interests and to maximize related industrial benefits by ensuring the highest possible degree of Canadian participation in all aspects of the planning and construction of, and procurement for, the pipeline while ensuring that the procurement of goods and services for the pipeline will be on generally competitive terms.

Earlier today during the question period we heard comments by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) which amounted to an attack on the Premier of Ontario because of a letter he sent to the Prime Minister of Canada asking that he get under way in taking action on those proposals agreed upon by the provinces and the federal government to get the economy back on track. I believe the comments today, which were very unconstructive on the part of the Minister of Finance and will do nothing to help Canadians who today are unemployed, gave a very graphic example of this government's attitude toward co-operative federalism.

If we have problems in Canada today, for example the question of national unity, in large part the blame must be shouldered by the national government, by this government, because of its failure to consult with all the provinces and to share power with the provinces in determining what the national priorities will be for the development of Canada. If this government were serious about wanting to promote and foster national unity, and about building a strong, united, and harmonious country, it should show by example that it is prepared to open the doors and invite co-operation of the type from all levels of government.

It was with this intent in mind, of sharing in the decision-making process, and having the opportunity of input in the decisions which will affect the citizens of this province, that the Ontario Energy Minister, Mr. Reuben Baetz, came to Ottawa on March 14 to appear before the Special Committee on the Northern Gas Pipeline.

[Mr. Beatty.]

At that time Mr. Baetz argued very strongly about this federal-provincial consultative council being set up by the government to ensure that the objectives included in this bill are recognized and achieved properly. He argued that the government of Ontario and the citizens of this province ought to have their voices heard. I think the case made by the Ontario Minister of Energy was a compelling one.

That minister pointed out that Ontario is by far the largest market for natural gas in Canada; about 50 per cent of all the natural gas used in Canada today is consumed by Ontarians. He pointed out that, by far, Ontario is the largest potential market for gas from the Mackenzie Valley and Prudhoe Bay, particularly if a gas swap takes place. That is obvious as it would involve the transmission of gas to southern Ontario through the entire length of the pipeline. Ontario is also the largest producer of the goods and services which will be used in construction of the pipeline. Clearly Ontario has an interest in having some say in the policies which are set up and which will determine what sort of pipeline will be created.

The province and the people of Quebec, while not so immediately concerned with the pipeline project as are the citizens and the province of Ontario, will also be affected in the same way by decisions which will be made. The motion I propose is not simply to include a representative of the province of Ontario on this consultative mechanism, but also to include representatives of the other major consuming province, Quebec. The opportunity is here today for government members to show that they are concerned about the impact this pipeline will have on the citizens of these provinces, and to allow them to have some say in its development.

The province of Ontario has followed the pipeline hearings very closely and has been represented at many applications before the National Energy Board. Ontario was also represented on several occasions before the Mackenzie pipeline inquiry. Ontario is not requesting, and we should stress this, to be placed at the centre of the pipeline decision-making, but merely wants to be consulted and allowed to present alternative proposals on matters which very substantially touch it.

● (1602)

Liberal members on the committee see this federal-provincial consultative council as being responsible for the co-ordination of the pipeline in those areas where it is to be built. Unfortunately, I was out of the country on official business and was not able to be present at the committee meetings, but I have studied the transcript closely. If I understand their position correctly, government members of the committee see the bill in question as not being concerned with the pricing of gas for the Ontario and Quebec markets because this matter would go before the National Energy Board, but as being concerned with the construction of the pipeline. They also feel that if the Dempster lateral is built, a new regulatory agency might be set up for that project. Other members of the government feel that the government would successfully protect Ontario's interests. For some incongruous reason they feel that while the government is well equipped to protect the interests of the consuming provinces, it is necessary to set up a federal-provincial consultative mechanism to ensure that the interests of the territories, British Columbia, Alberta, and Saskatchewan, were protected. Why is the federal government in a position to protect the interests of the consuming provinces but not of the other provinces? That was not explained.

If the pipeline is to be built for the benefit of all Canadians, according to clause 3 of the bill, we have to recognize that consultation should not only take place in those parts of the country where the pipeline is to be built, but the provinces that are to consume the gas should also be heard. The fact that decisions on pricing may be taken later by the National Energy Board does not alter the fact that the way the pipeline is built will largely affect the final price. Ontario and Quebec have a real interest in seeing how this pipeline is to be built.

I do not intend to go on at great length, Mr. Speaker, but I think it is worth while to put on record an editorial which appeared in yesterday's Ottawa Citizen. Members of the government will recognize that this newspaper is not known as supporting this party, but traditionally supports the government. The editorial deals with the presentation made to the committee by the Minister of Energy for Ontario, which is the position I am trying to take today on behalf of the people of Ontario and Quebec. The editorial has a headline, "Why Not a Seat for Ontario?" and reads as follows:

> Is it so unreasonable for Ontario, this country's biggest consumer of natural gas, to have a seat on a federal-provincial pipeline council?
> Ontario Energy Minister Reuben Baetz thinks not, and his argument makes sense.
> But he's having trouble convincing the Commons pipeline committee. Liberal MPs argue that because the federal government will look after the interests of the country as a whole, that committee's membership logically should be limited to representatives from the areas through which the pipeline will pass.
> These areas—the Yukon, British Columbia, Alberta and Saskatchewan—don't seem to feel that way. Alberta has already told Baetz to apply for membership and the others have indicated they support his bid.

Let me stress this again, Mr. Speaker. The other provinces which are to be members of the federal-provincial consultative body, support the proposal made by Ontario. The only opposition comes from this government in this House.

The editorial continues:

> Ontario is neither trying to cash in on a major western project, nor step on federal jurisdiction.
> This province, from its experiences with Syncrude and Polar Gas, merely wants to ensure that "the Canadian portion of the northern pipeline (be) constructed in the most economic manner."
> All in the interests of what Baetz calls "co-operative federalism." Nothing sinister in that.

I think this editorial makes good sense, Mr. Speaker. It is up to members of the government to explain why they oppose allowing people in the consuming provinces to have a say in decisions which will very dramatically affect the level of industrial development in this part of Canada and also the cost of energy to Ontario consumers. I believe that if the government today is willing to be flexible, this can be a step forward for federal provincial consultations and for co-operative federalism.

I must say I was disappointed to read the comments of one Liberal member, in the committee transcript. The fact that he is a Quebec member is irrelevant and does not bear on this. The fact that any member of the federal parliament should make such a gratuitous attack on another province can only be a blow to federalism. In the proceedings of the Special Committee on a Northern Gas Pipeline of March 14, 1978, the hon. member for Louis-Hébert (Mr. Dawson) is reported as follows:

> As far as co-operative federalism is concerned, I would not want to be very critical but I do not think co-operative federalism means Ontario, Ontario, and Ontario. I think it has to be more than that. I do not think Ontario should be involved whether it is the construction of a pipeline in western Canada or of a Quebec and Maritime pipeline perhaps being built in the province of Quebec in future years.

This sort of statement coming today with national conditions in Canada being what they are, can only serve to polarize Canadians and to drive a wedge between the provinces. I think it is important that members of this parliament, members of the Canadian government, prove that they are prepared to recognize the right of all Canadians in every part of Canada to have a say in decisions which will affect their lives and the economy.

I hope that members of the government who are present today will review the motion I have placed on the order paper. I hope that they will search their consciences and ask themselves what their constituents would want them to do—whether they feel that their constituents believe that the consuming provinces have a right to be heard in decisions which will affect them? I hope they will agree to allow this very sensible amendment to go forth with the support of all sides of this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ross Milne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I just want to participate briefly and indicate that the government does not intend to accept this amendment. The purpose of the council is largely to deal with environmental and socio-economic matters, and it would seem to me that these relate almost entirely to the Yukon, British Columbia, Alberta and Saskatchewan.

I would suggest to the hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo (Mr. Beatty) that he refer to clause 9(c) of the bill which provides that an agreement can be entered into by the provinces that are not already on the consultative council, to deal with such things as information pertaining to the pipeline. The issue that would perhaps be of most interest to Ontario would be the procurement policies to be pursued by the pipeline contractors. The province of Ontario has been invited to sign such an agreement and I suggest, in light of the interest that its representatives expressed in committee, that they do just that.

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the amendment presented by the hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo (Mr. Beatty). I think he has outlined quite well the reasons why Ontario should be represented in the building of this northern pipeline. Not only are we going to be the major consumers of northern gas should the Dempster lateral ever be built, but we are certainly going to have a large role to play in providing the materials for the pipeline.

As the parliamentary Secretary to the minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Milne) said the committee will look at environmental and other matters. We all know that has a relationship to cost of material, and that in turn has a relationship to the bids that will be submitted and accepted.

The whole point of the NDP intervention in this debate has been to seek amendments that would ensure that Canadian companies and Canadian workers receive the maximum benefits, in terms of contracts and jobs, from this great energy project. I therefore see much merit in having the province of Ontario represented, along with British Columbia, Alberta, and Saskatchewan, in the decision-making process.

As I stated in my first amendment, I hope that we will get 90 per cent or more of the contract work and jobs that the government has been promising but is unwilling to commit itself to in black and white in the legislation before us. The major portion of the steel, if Canadian companies win the bids, will be fabricated in Ontario. This is of immense importance to the province.

We know, of course, the provision in the treaty which relates to the eventual construction of the Dempster lateral, a provision which states that if the construction costs of the part of the pipeline which moves through British Columbia and the Yukon exceeds the estimates by a certain amount, then the requirement that the United States compensate for the construction of the Dempster lateral, decreases on a sliding scale according to the increase in the cost of the main line. Therefore, it seems to me very important, as I mentioned, that the environmental and other matters will have an effect on the cost of the main line. It seems to me important in view of the eventual amount of steel of steel to be used, if the Dempster lateral is built, that Ontario have a voice in this Council which is dealing with these matters, because of its interest.

I commend to the House the motion moved by the hon. member. I think it makes sense. I do not understand this government's reluctance to involve the province of Ontario. I think there is some similarity with the Syncrude project. We have had joint federal-provincial involvement in energy projects like this in the past. It seems to me to make sense to include Ontario in this provision at this time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The question is on motion No. 3 standing in the name of the hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo (Mr. Beatty). All those in favour will please say yea.

[Mr. Symes.]

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Pursuant to section 11 of Standing Order 75 the recorded division on motion No. 3 stands deferred.

The next question is on motion No. 5 standing in the name of the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen).

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon) moved

Motion No. 5:

That Bill C-25, An Act to establish the Northern Pipeline Agency, to facilitate the planning and construction of a pipeline for the transmission of natural gas from Alaska and Northern Canada and to give effect to an Agreement between Canada and the United States of America on principles applicable to such a pipeline and to amend certain Acts in relation thereto, be amended in sub-clause 20(6) by striking out lines 29 and 30 at page 11 and substituting the following therefor:

"not, without the prior approval of the Governor in Council and the Board, terminate, alter or amend".

He said: The purpose of the amendment here which has been agreed to by the government and which was supported by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas), was to ensure that control of the ownership of the companies would not pass into foreign hands. After having read the shareholders' agreement very carefully and after referrring to the provisions of subsection 6 of Section 20, which we seek to amend, we simply restrict the discretion that resides under the shareholders' agreement in the NEB, and under subsection 6 of section 20 "in the minister". We restrict that discretionary process by enlarging it to place the responsibility on the governor in council of the making of any decision which would permit foreign control to occur over the ownership of the line once it has been financed and completed. If Canadian ownership does pass out of our hands, it is the responsibility of the government of the day. They have agreed to that amendment.

Mr. Ross Milne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, might I just put it on the record that the government does concur with this amendment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion No. 5. (Mr. Nielsen) agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The next question is on motion No. 7 standing in the name of the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Bawden).

Mr. Peter C. Bawden (Calgary South) moved

Motion No. 7:

That Bill C-25, An Act to establish the Northern Pipeline Agency, to facilitate the planning and construction of a pipeline for the transmission of natural gas from Alaska and Northern Canada and to give effect to an Agreement between Canada and the United States of America on principles applicable to such a pipline and to amend certain Acts in relation thereto, be amended in Subclause 29(1) by

(a) deleting the word "and" in line 10 at page 15

(b) striking out line 15 at page 15 and substituting the following therefor:

"to which the certificate is subject; and (c) provided that such amount payable by the company shall not exceed 1 per cent of the actual costs of building the said pipeline."

[Translation]

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Yes, yesterday I raised an objection concerning the admissibility of this amendment, and at that time Mr. Speaker suggested that he preferred to hear the opinions of other members before deciding if the amendment was acceptable or not, but to avoid a loss of time, before other members give their opinion on this subject, I would like to add the following. We have checked the situation concerning another gas pipeline, that of Alyeska, and it cost about $70 million for an agency similar to that which we want to create under Bill C-25. This pipeline was relatively short since it extended for only 800 miles as opposed to a pipeline of 2,025 miles. It is quite probable, Mr. Speaker, that the cost of the pipeline agency established under Bill C-25 will exceed the ceiling mentioned in the amendment. As I said yesterday, this would oblige the taxpayers to pay the difference and we do not have the royal recommendation required to move the amendment, which means it would be out of order to do so.

The argument I would like to add today concerning the inadmissibility of the amendment is that we have an example to follow. It concerns a pipeline much shorter than the one which now concerns us, and this pipeline cost $70 million, whereas, under the suggested amendment, the cost of the agency to be assumed by the company would be limited to some $42 million.

This is why, Mr. Speaker, to prevent useless debate I ask that the amendment be ruled out of order.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is rising on the same point of order.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure that I support the substance of this motion, in fact I suspect I would be against it, but I do rise to support its procedural admissibility. I always enjoy coming to the defence procedurally of something I may not agree with, but that is the position I take.

First of all, I should like to point out that when Mr. Speaker was giving us his preliminary review of all the proposed report stage amendments he did not raise any question about motion No. 7. This was not for want of his looking at the procedural aspects of the motions because he did question motion No. 2, and in due course ruled it out or order.

I followed the arguments put forward by the parliamentary secretary and I appreciate his point; indeed, I respect it. But it seems to me that what we have here is a motion in itself that corresponds to the situation of a private member seeking to move the reduction of a tax. That, I emphasize, Mr. Speaker, is permitted. A member cannot move for an increase in taxation, but on a number of occasions members have been allowed to move for a reduction in a proposed tax. When that has been done, members on the government side have argued that it upsets the balance of ways and means, that if the government loses money that it wants from one source it would have to make it up somewhere else. I have been around here long enough to remember when that argument carried some weight. But starting about 20 years ago it was discredited, it was argued that the phrase "balance of ways and means" really meant nothing even though the reduction in a tax might force the government to find the money somewhere else, it was still competent for a private member, without a Governor General's recommendation, to move a reduction in a tax.

What we are talking about here is a fee, tax, or cost that a private company would have to pay. The hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Bawden) is seeking to impose a limit on how much that private company might have to pay. In the interests of procedural consistency and in the interest of applying the same rule today that we apply when there are proposals to reduce taxation, the Speaker's original hunch that No. 7 was not out of order should be confirmed today.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, the decision as made by Mr. Speaker yesterday when he was in the Chair was as put by the hon. member or Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). He did go on to say that if it should emerge at some time during the debate on this motion that there might be the imposition of a cost to the Treasury, a decision could be made at that time as to whether it was procedurally out of order or not. Surely we should proceed with the discussion. Hopefully my friend from Calgary South will be able to convince the members of the government that the cap that he is proposing will not cost the taxpayer of Canada anything at all.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, it is precisely to avoid this discussion that I found it appropriate to draw your attention, before it even starts, on a specific fact which I did not raise yesterday in the House, and on the fact that I made a comparison a moment ago between the construction of another pipeline and its administrative costs, which makes it most probable that the ceiling suggested in this amendment is too low and that Canadians taxpayers will have to pay something.

So I am prepared to participate in this debate today if, even given this new fact which I draw to your attention, you still feel that it would be preferable to have a debate on this question in order to reserve judgment on the admissibility of the amendment based on the representations of hon. members. To avoid undue delay, I thought that my drawing to your attention the fact which I have just stated and which I shall not repeat would suffice for you to reject the amendment as being out of order, because it will definitely cost the taxpayers something.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The parliamentary secretary is quite correct, as is the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen). I indicated that while there were some concerns expressed by the Chair in this matter, the preferable course would be to wait for debate on the motion to see what it was in detail that was in the mind of the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Bawden) with regard to the operation of this. If it turns out that the regime which he is proposing by virtue of this amendment does result in a charge on the Treasury, obviously the amendment would be out of order.

Mr. Bawden: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Drummond (Mr. Pinard) has supported extremely well the arguments that I have made in the figures that he quoted in his remarks a few minutes ago. Yesterday I sought the advice of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) who has spoken on this question in a technical sense today. I will not cover that again.

The hon. member for Drummond stated that in his research he found that the Alyeska pipeline, which ran for some 800 miles, had cost the federal authorities in Alaska an amount of some $7 million. He then quoted the much longer length of the Foothills pipeline and made an exact comparison. The hon. member has related a cost of $70 million that was spent by their regulatory agency, the successor to the Federal Power Commission now known as the Federal Energy Resources Commission.

As I recall, the Alyeskan pipeline cost something between $7 billion and $8 billion. Therefore the 1 per cent formula that I have proposed would present a more conservative estimate of cost if we applied the same percentage of the total cost of the pipeline as we find that the costs of the regulatory agency in Alaska cost that agency in comparison with the total cost of other pipelines.

It is important to recognize that the Alaska pipeline planning costs started out at a very early time after oil was discovered on the north slope. It was extended for many years. It was shut down. It was held up for all kinds of technical reasons and environmental reasons. The fact is it stretched out over probably three or four times as long a construction period as would have been the case if it had been pursued expeditiously.

It is interesting to note that the Alaska pipeline was constructed to a large extent above ground. It carries oil, not gas. It offers many more serious problems in traversing perma frost. A lot of the pipeline is elevated rather than buried.

In summary, I was pleased to have the hon. member confirm to me that a 1 per cent formula to limit the costs of government expenditures in this project will be completely consistent and somewhat more conservative than was the case in Alaska where so many more difficulties were encountered.

Clause 29 of Bill C-25 states that the pipeline will pay the cost, not only of the regulatory agency that is proposed, but also of other government departments that have inputs and charges to this agency over a period of time as their activities relate to the northern pipeline. In other words, all of the costs that are chargeable as they relate to the pipeline are to be passed on to the Foothills Pipe Lines Limited. This is acceptable. However, these costs that are passed on should be within reason.

It is for this reason that I have proposed this amendment. I am convinced, by everything I have seen over a number of years as they relate to government departments, that these things can and likely will get seriously out of hand. If no upper limit is placed, we are in effect giving the government a blank cheque as it relates to its expenditures. I am sure all Canadians would be concerned about giving this government a blank cheque, particularly those connected with the Foothills Pipe Lines Limited.

A limit such as I am proposing could easily be a vital matter when it comes to financing. As we hear about the difficulties that are to be expected and the problems of the Foothills Company, one of their greatest problems and difficulties will be arranging the financing. If the Foothills Pipe Lines Limited can make their estimate of some $4 billion for a massive project like this, surely the government can give some estimate of what its costs are going to be.

The people who will be principally involved in the financing of this, in the final analysis are going to be the large institutions which carry the debt. It is important when we are passing this bill to recognize that limits—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I wonder if I could ask the indulgence of the hon. member for just a moment. It seems the clearest way to get at the procedural aspects of this motion is to ask the hon. member to give some indication. The import of his amendment is to put a ceiling on costs passed along to the pipeline. It is unclear to me whether the effect of the amendment is to put a ceiling on the costs themselves or simply to put a ceiling on those costs that are passed by the public treasury to the pipeline company.

● (1632)

If indeed it does not control the total cost, but only that portion which is passed along to the pipeline company, the effect of the amendment could be to leave the residue of cost as a charge on the public treasury. If, however, the effect of the amendment is to control the cost in the total and thereby limit the amounts that are passed along, it would seem there is not a procedural problem; it is an amendment the merits of which would be decided upon the floor of the House. All I want to hear from the hon. member is whether the effect would be to control the entire cost or simply that portion which is passed on to the pipeline, leaving the residue to be picked up by the taxpayer, in which case the amendment would require an amendment to the royal recommendation.

Mr. Bawden: I cannot be certain how the government or the pipeline agency will behave. If they know there is such a limitation in the legislation it might very well be they would work within the cost limitation proposed by the amendment. If, on the other hand, they chose, perhaps recklessly, to exceed this limitation, the cost would be carried by the public treasury. But it would depend entirely upon the activities and planning of the pipeline agency.

I feel it is important to bear in mind that this precedent will apply in the future to other massive energy projects. It could relate to pipelines in the southern part of Canada. Because of this it is important, in my view, that we do not allow the government an open-ended opportunity to spend money.

In relation to the point which Your Honour has made, I should like to make it clear that this formula would be much more generous if the pipeline were to be built in the southern part of one of our provinces or were related to other projects where similar government supervision was required. If, for instance, the agency proposed to overrun the expenditure limit suggested in my amendment, the money could easily be recovered from savings on future pipelines which might run through less difficult terrain. Over a period of time, the averaging principle would apply. As to the question of whether the government is likely to exceed this limit or not, I stress once again that the limit proposed is greater than in the case of the Alyeska pipeline and five times as great as the limit the Federal Resources Commission utilized in the United States.

Mr. Nielsen: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, it is a very fine distinction which has to be made here. Your Honour has expressed the view that if there is a risk that the amendment might impose a charge on the treasury it would be out of order. With great respect, I submit there must be clear evidence that a charge would be imposed on the public treasury before an amendment ought to be ruled out of order on such grounds.

The amendment before us could be further amended. One per cent amounts to $40 million. The amendment could be amended by the imposition of a 10 per cent limitation, and no one in his right mind would expect the government to impose a $400 million ceiling. As the hon. member has just told us, $40 million is five times the amount the United States has mentioned in its legislation on a similar matter and it is far greater than in the case of the Alyeska pipeline which was desperately mismanaged. There is no reason whatever why the $40 million ceiling suggested should be exceeded. Indeed, the argument put forward by the hon. member for Calgary South would, hopefully, persuade most hon. members that the cost to the government with respect to the agency and the plethora of other charges to be incurred will amount to much less than the one per cent limit suggested by the amendment.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, during the discussion in the standing committee on this matter I raised some objection to this proposed motion, both on the ground that it did probably impose a charge on the public and also because I did not think a percentage of this kind, if it were realistic, would be anything but a floor under expenditure. I propose to deal only with the first of these arguments since it touches the question Your Honour has raised.

It seems to me this proposal is only important if it does actually put forward a limitation. So when the hon. member for Yukon says it could be amended to 10 per cent, he does not mean it seriously. It would have no purpose at all, then. The whole purpose is to restrict in some way a charge upon the company. If it is to be a restriction it could very well result in an additional cost over and above the amount payable by the company. This would fall upon the Government of Canada and thus the proposed amendment would require a message which recommended such additional expenditure.

I might add that if the hon. gentleman intended this to be a real restriction he could have amended his proposal very easily by saying, "provided that such costs shall not exceed one per cent" and by adding the words "that would be the cost imposed upon the company."

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, the hub of the problem is very simple. The question is whether there is a real possibility of financial involvement for the taxpayer. Thus what is suggested by the hon. member in his amendment is a ceiling, not on the cost of the agency created by the legislation, but on the cost of the agency created by the legislation and payable by the company, putting aside the possibility that extra expenditures be paid by taxpayers.

When the hon. member says in his amendment that the administrative cost, as provided for in clause 29 of the bill, namely the costs incurred for overseeing and monitoring the construction of, and procurement for, the pipeline should not exceed one per cent, he is saying that they are limited to one per cent as regards the obligation for the company to pay or assume it. But he does not give us any guarantee of that. He does not ask that the cost be limited to "one per cent", so that he himself, by the very nature of his amendment, is indicating the possibility and indeed the probability that taxpayers would have to pay that difference of one per cent. Such surplus is all the more likely, Mr. Speaker, since, as I mentioned earlier, the only concrete example of another pipeline is the Alyeska pipeline where the cost to the agency was $70 million.

An hon. Member: Yes.

Mr. Pinard: My hon. colleague says yes but that pipeline cost nearly $7 billion, so there is my one per cent. On the other hand, one can ask: Should the over-all cost be used as a criterion to determine what is going to be the real cost of an agency to monitor and scrutinize the construction costs of the pipeline? Should the over-all cost of the pipeline or its length or the difficult circumstances in which it is built be used as the basis for that determination? The real example I am giving you, Mr. Speaker, which could be used as the basis to determine whether or not there is a danger that the taxpayer will have to pay the surplus is a pipeline that covers only 800 miles. Ours is 2,025 miles. All this to say that there is a real possibility as a result of the very nature of the amendment that the taxpayer will have to pay the difference over the limit of $42 million being suggested by the hon. member in his amendment. So if the Chair is convinced that there is a real possibility that the state, the government and the taxpayer will have to pay an amount of money equal to the surplus of what is to be paid by the company when we have not received the royal recommendation, I suggest that the amendment should be ruled out of order.

In concluding, I would like to point out another aspect of the discussion which leads me to believe there is a possibility that the taxpayer will have to pay an amount for the cost of the agency beyond what is to be paid by the company. That is the argumentation put forward by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen). He himself admits that and says, Mr. Speaker, that if those costs are found to be higher than the one per cent suggested as a ceiling, an amendment can always be brought in. But the very fact of that possibility makes it all the more likely that the taxpayer will eventually have to pay the difference in the cost of the agency between the amount paid by the company and the actual cost, and the taxpayers will be paying for it.

For all those reasons, Mr. Speaker, I suggest you are faced with a situation where there is a serious and real possibility that the taxpayer will have to pay for the cost of the agency because the private company, in this case Foothills, is being told: You will only pay up to one per cent or about $42 million when there is a much smaller pipeline where the agency cost $70 million. There is also a serious possibility that the taxpayer will have to pay the difference because the hon. member for Yukon himself already anticipates the introduction of amendments to allow us to raise the ceiling proposed by the hon. member. For all those reasons, I submit that, not having received the royal recommendation, the amendment is out of order.

● (1642)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. From a procedural point of view I indicated yesterday that the Chair had some reservations about the regime which was being set up here but wanted to understand it better and, indeed, what has happened is that the discussion today has given me a much clearer understanding of the implications of the amendment of the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Bawden). It raises a very difficult procedural problem because there is not the absolutely clear necessity of a charge upon the treasury which would usually enable the Chair to set the motion aside.

I now understand fully the intention of the hon. member for Calgary South. It is a measure of fiscal control on the operation, and therefore he is saying in his argument that what he is doing is not using this amendment in such a way as simply to limit that amount of money which is to be passed on to the pipeline by the government but rather is forewarning the government that, in providing the services that are required by the statute, it will suffer a limitation in the amount of money it can spend in respect to those services and pass on to the pipeline company, and therefore saying to the government that it does not have an open-ended cost recovery mechanism, and a blank cheque, as it were, to provide these services.

At first it appeared to me that that reasoning was sound and that the amendment could be allowed on procedural grounds. As I examine it, though, I am afraid that what it amounts to is this: In the first place, in addressing himself to the financial provisions that are contained here, His Excellency would be examining a statute which would be setting up a regime in which the government would be required to provide certain regulatory services at a cost which would not be subject to a limit, and that cost would be passed along to the private company and to the private sector by virtue of this section, and therefore would be no charge on the treasury.

The imposition of a limit, it seems to me, sets up either the possibility that the cost of providing these services would exceed the limit, in which case there would be a charge on the treasury which His Excellency could not have envisaged in giving his recommendation or, alternatively, the possibility that the government might have to come, in providing the services that are required of it in the statute, to a position in which it says, "These regulatory agencies that we are required to provide in this statute must be discontinued because we foresee that we have achieved the ceiling and, by virtue of this amendment, we cannot spend any more money. Therefore, we will have to take the regulatory agencies out of business".

I think that on the one hand the result of the hon. member's amendment would be a charge on the treasury. On the other hand, the one I have just described is surely a concept which is foreign to the statute as it now exists. If it is going to be introduced, it would have to be introduced in some other way because it seems to me to go beyond, in that respect, the scope of the statute as it was originally envisaged, and therefore it seems to me that on either one or the other procedural ground I have just cited, the amendment will have to be struck down.

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie) moved

Motion No. 4:

That Bill C-25, An Act to establish the Northern Pipeline Agency, to facilitate the planning and construction of pipeline for the transmission of natural gas from Alaska and Northern Canada and to give effect to an Agreement between Canada and the United States of America on principles applicable to such a pipeline and to amend certain Acts in relation thereto, be amended in sub-clause 20 (1) by striking out line 34 at page 10 and substituting the following therefor:

"respect of that company with the condition that construction on any section of the route will not precede a negotiated settlement of any native claims involving the affected section."

Mr. Speaker: My recollection is that motion No. 4 is to be taken together with motion No. 6.

Mr. J. R. Holmes (Lambton-Kent) moved

Motion No. 6:

That Bill C-25, An Act to establish the Nothern Pipeline Agency, to facilitate the planning and construction of a pipeline for the transmission of natural gas from Alaska and Northern Canada and to give effect to an Agreement between Canada and the United States of America on principles applicable to such a pipeline and to amend certain Acts in relation thereto, be amended by adding immediately after line 37 at page 12 the following new heading and clause:

"Native Claims

23.1 Notwithstanding this Act, any native claim, right, title or interest that the native people of Canada may have had prior to the coming into force of this Act in and to the land on which the pipeline will be situated continues to exist until a settlement in respect of any such claim, right, title or interest is effected."

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. It might assist the House if I were to mention—and ask for confirmation from the government—that motion No. 6 as put forward by us in the committee has been agreed to be the government.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, I understand that motions Nos. 4 and 6 will be dealt with together, but that a separate vote will be required for each motion, because the government is not ready to accept motion No. 4 but would accept motion No. 6.

[English]

Mr. Symes: Mr. Speaker, the intent of motion No. 4 standing in my name is to amend the pipeline bill so that we can be assured that the rights and interests of the native people of the Yukon will be upheld by parliament if a pipeline is to go through territory which would affect them in terms of their land claims. The intent of the amendment is to ensure that pipeline construction would not proceed on a section upon which a native land claim settlement has not yet been negotiated. As many hon. members realize, the situation in the Yukon is fraught with difficulty as far as relationships between native and non-native people are concerned.

● (1652)

There is hope among the majority of Yukoners that the Alcan pipeline will bring economic benefit in the form of new business, and the creation of jobs for local residents, and that it will do so in such a way as to provide economic benefit without significant economic damage. This is a concern I share with those who reside in the Yukon Territory.

Yukoners do not have to look very far to see the damaging economic and social effects that accompanied the construction of the Alyeska oil pipeline in the state of Alaska. There they saw tremendous price increases as hundreds of people moved into the area and land became scarce, which drove prices up and affected accommodation, goods, services and wage rates. Prices escalated to the point where many people employed in normal businesses or in municipal or state governments left their jobs for jobs related to pipeline construction. As a result, many essential services in the communities of Alaska suffered. There is fear among Yukoners that a similar situation might arise, and unless we have very strict monitoring of the pipeline, many people will face inflation that may get out of control.

Many people—and I think of public servants whose wages are going to be held down by this government—may find themselves falling further behind as inflation escalates in the general economy due to pipeline activity. The pipeline could be a blessing or it could be a disadvantage for Yukoners. In that kind of economic milieu, one must also be cognizant of the social impact of the pipeline, not only on the white or non-native community, but on the native community as well. Again, one need only look at the situation in Alaska to realize the social upheaval that occurred in that state during the construction of that pipeline which was of a negative nature as far as native people were concerned. With the influx of many white workers from the south and their different value systems and attitudes, the native people saw what was left of their traditional always and social patterns challenged.

In looking at the Yukon Territory, we must recognize—the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) and the hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Firth) will agree—that there is a great difference between the needs and situations of the native people in the Yukon and those indigenous people, the Inuit and the native people, of the Northwest Territories.

Mr. Justice Berger addressed himself to the social and economic implications of the proposed Mackenzie Valley pipeline for the indigenous people of the Northwest Territories. It was a thorough and exhaustive report which captured the imagination of northern and southern residents. Mr. Justice Berger stated in his report that the way we went about constructing a northern pipeline would tell us more about ourselves than anything else. It would tell us, who are the majority living south of 60, what we really believe to be the rights of those people living in the far north. It would tell us whether we put our own economic gains, through receiving energy from the north and jobs from construction, above the rights and interests of the people who have to live there after the pipeline has been constructed and the transient workers have moved on.

Mr. Justice Berger indicated that we have to accept and acknowledge the rights of the minority groups living north of 60. It is to the principle outlined in the exhaustive studies of Mr. Justice Berger and to a lesser extent the studies of Dean Lysyk that my amendment is addressed. We have to respect the rights of minorities in this country. Anyone committed to the principle of majority rule must acknowledge the other fundamental principle of a democracy, minority rights.

In the history of our country the acknowledgment of minority rights as they pertain to native people has been a very sad chapter. I need not catalogue the lists of broken promises and broken treaties that non-natives have perpetrated on the native people, who believed that when we signed something and when we said we believed in the rule of law and justice we should be taken at our word, only to find later that the white man spoke with a forked tongue. More recently, the history of this Liberal government only confirms the suspicions of the native people that they will get a raw deal when there are only verbal assurances. Indeed, even when there have been written treaties or written guarantees, they have been broken.

As a parliamentarian, I can only hope for the best. In my view the best is to have something that is the law of the land enshrined in an act of parliament which will hold this government responsible for its provisions. The bill we have before us on the northern pipeline has in it no mention of native land claims or native rights. This is an essential matter that must be settled before the pipeline can proceed. I cannot foresee Foothills being able to go to the money markets of the world to raise the necessary capital for this pipeline unless the issue of native land claims has been settled. When I see no provision in the bill for settlement of these claims, I become very suspicious. Surely, to have my amendment accepted would put some pressure on the government to settle native land claims expeditiously and fairly.

Negotiations on native land claims in the Yukon Territory began in a serious way in 1973. Here we are in 1978 with only minimum progress having been achieved. We require some type of measure to force the government to stop dragging its feet on the matter of native land claims.

● (1702)

Surely we need to put some pressure on the government, through a legislative amendment, in order for it to get down to business and to recognize that the land claims must be settled fairly before the pipeline can proceed. If that amendment is contained in the legislation, then there is the pressure of law and the pressure of the company to get these claims settled as well. Because we have that amendment in law, hopefully it will ensure a just settlement, and not have native people settling with a gun held to their heads. I understand that is the fear of many of the native people of the Yukon Territory: unless there is a hard provision in this bill, they will be sacrificed to the expediency of getting the pipeline constructed.

In this regard I should like to refer to the testimony of the chairman of the Council for Yukon Indians, when he appeared before the Lysyk inquiry, which was studying the issue of native land claims and environmental problems in the north. Before that inquiry, the chairman said the following:

> A pipeline now would mean a substantial influx of white immigration both as a direct and indirect result of the project. We would become an even smaller minority in our own land. We would have no land and no resources. We would have almost no political influence and decisions would be made by the vast white majority which would control our lives. We would not have had time to develop our own structures of decisions making and we would have no land or resources to make decisions about. We would be relegated to the political backwaters of our own land. We would remain an underdeveloped people with no prospect for improvement. Our constitutional and aboriginal claims to self-determination would be effectively lost.
> It would turn the land claims negotiations into an elaborate, although perhaps dramatic, farce, with our people relegated to playing a few bit parts in the scripts.

[Mr. Symes.]

That was the fear expressed by the Council of Yukon Indians. I believe it is still the fear of that group today.

We have received assurances from the president of Foothills indicating that he would not proceed to build a pipeline through that territory without the people in the affected region agreeing to it. I should like to refer to his policies and undertakings recorded in the transcription of his appearance before the National Energy Board. In particular I refer to the December 10, 1976, transcription under the heading: "Settlement of Land Claims and Public Acceptance of the Project". Mr. S. R. Blair stated the following:

> Foothills has taken the position that construction of a pipeline in Yukon should not proceed until there is a broad acceptance of the project by the residents of that area.

Of course that is open to interpretation. How does one define broad acceptance? Is that 10, 20, 50 or 60 per cent of the people? Approximately 20 to 30 per cent of the residents of the Yukon are of native origin. They are not an insignificant minority. Surely if the president of Foothills has given an undertaking that he will not proceed unless there is a broad acceptance on the part of the residents of the area, then the amendment which I have put forward is not unreasonable in terms of the opinion of the company itself.

One factor of the Foothills application which impressed Canadians, over that of the Mackenzie Valley one by Arctic Gas, was the commitment of the company to listen to the people of the area and to take account of their needs. Thus, in light of that testimony, I think my amendment would be acceptable to the company, given Mr. Blair's commitment to the people of the area.

Now, the government has undertaken preliminary negotiations. A planning council has been set up. This planning council is a government agency which was set up to negotiate with the native people. This was an attempt as expediting the negotiations. The planning council indicated that the goals of a settlement were as follows:

> Restore, protect, preserve and guarantee the identity of Yukon Indians and their freedom to choose a way of life in harmony with their cultural heritage.
> Provide land and other forms of compensation to the Yukon Indian people to compensate them for loss of lands traditionally used and given up under the settlement so that they may have the opportunity to build an economic base equal with that of other Yukon citizens.
>
> Provide the Yukon Indian people with the incentive and opportunity to have their rightful say, within the context of a one-government structure, in the decisionmaking authority which governs their everyday life.

That is a commitment of goals on the part of a government negotiating committee. I submit these goals are perfectly consistent with the amendment I am proposing today.

The native people in the Yukon Territory are not as dependent on land and the migratory hunting way of life as the people in the Northwest Territories and the Mackenzie Valley. Native people have been assimilated more into the white economy in society in the Yukon. Indeed, some native people have undertaken economic ventures in mining and what-have-you. That is to their credit. But a great sense of commitment to the land by these people still exists, as well as a realization that traditionally the land has been their way of life. Their rights to that land have never been extinguished by any treaty or similar provision. Therefore, if a pipeline is to go through that land, which has traditionally been theirs to live and hunt on, surely it is reasonable to expect some kind of compensation and some kind of formal arrangement as to what will remain their land and what will be ceded to the pipeline company. We require a formal arrangement regarding the settlement of native land claims.

I believe hon. members of the Conservative party, and particularly the official spokesman for Indian affairs, would have some sympathy with the amendments I propose. Construction of the pipeline through native lands, or lands claimed to be under native jurisdiction, should not proceed until a settlement regarding that land area has been negotiated. Indeed, I listened with interest to the hon. member for Lambton-Kent (Mr. Holmes), the Conservative spokesman on Indian affairs, during the debate on the northern pipeline, when he was commenting on the Lysyk inquiry. He quoted from that inquiry as follows:

● (1712)

For the reasons stated in Part E of this chapter, some additional time is desirable to avoid prejudice to a just settlement. Construction of the pipeline should not commence before August 1, 1981.

That is quoted from the Lysyk inquiry. The hon. member for Lambton-Kent went on to say:

Dean Lysyk was not recommending a moratorium. He was not recommending some unrealistic time delay; his was a responsible position. He was recommending a responsible time in keeping with the complexities and sensitivity of the issue in the Yukon Territory. Yet this government chose to ignore this important recommendation.

Further on during that debate on February 15, the hon. member for Lambton-Kent stated, as reported at page 2899 of Hansard:

The government's game plan is obvious. With the passage of this legislation the momentum of the project will impede efforts to conclude a fair and just settlement. The rights of individuals can be conveniently shunted aside in the name of progress.

I share the fear expressed by the hon. member for Lambton-Kent that unless we have some strong provisions in the bill before us, the native people will be sacrificed to the expediency of getting this construction under way by 1981. Indeed, the government has advanced Dean Lysyk's recommendation, that construction not begin until August, 1981, to January, 1981.

I think a fair and just native lands claim can be achieved by 1981, but only if this government begins to recognize that which it has failed to recognize so many times in the past, namely, the legitimate and just claims of the native people in the area. This government has dragged its feet in these negotiations. We need something in the legislation to prod it along, and make it realize that we will only accept a just settlement for the native people in that area.

I have looked as well at the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Lambton-Kent, which I understand the government will accept, regarding the issue of native land claims, and I fear it is not as strong as that hon. member would want, or as strong as I would like. It in effect says that if a land claim has not been settled by the time the pipeline is under construction through the affected territory, the pipeline will be allowed to continue to be constructed, but that will not jeopardize the future rights of the native people in the area to obtain a just land claim settlement.

Unfortunately, that is inadequate. The negotiating position of the native people is certainly weakened if that provision passes, because we will have a situation under which the pipeline in effect is in place, and therefore the negotiations in a sense will be after the fact.

Mr. Nielsen: Rubbish.

Mr. Symes: The native people will have to accept a fait accompli in respect of the pipeline and any disruption that takes place in their area, but they will still be guaranteed some kind of land settlement. Anyone who has been involved in negotiations knows that would be a very weakened position from which to negotiate. You are in a strengthened position to negotiate when you know the pipeline construction will not proceed until you have a settlement negotiated and concluded in law.

The motion of the hon. member for Lambton-Kent, while better than nothing, simply does not go far enough. I will support it if my amendment fails, but I still suggest his amendment is weak and that we should have an amendment along the lines of my proposal in order to guarantee this settlement. This is something we have not had many examples of in the past in negotiations between the federal government and the native people. For these reasons I hope I will find support among my friends in the Conservative party for my motion. We need the strongest kind of provisions possible in the bill, given the sad record of this government vis-à-vis native people. I commend my amendment to the House.

Mr. Ian Watson (Laprairie): Mr. Speaker, I should just like to make a few comments on the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Sault-Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes) as I feel he has given the House the impression that the government is not interested in expeditiously arriving at a settlement of the claims in the area that will be traversed by the pipeline. Had he bothered to attend any of the 21 committee meetings held on the subject, if he had read the committee reports, or if he had listened to the Deputy Prime Minister's (Mr. MacEachen) speech in the House on February 13, he would realize that the government has every intention of proceeding to settle these claims, if that is at all possible. The Deputy Prime Minister indicated on February 13 that the government would make every effort to settle native claims in the Yukon Territory. On March 1 at a meeting of the committee, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Faulkner) said:

I have always felt that the fair and just settlement of land claims was one of the most important things we are doing, not only as a government, but as a country. And I am convinced that the fair and just settlement of the land claims north of 60 is a precondition to the sort of normal political economic evolution that everyone in the north would like to see take place.

The government is in a position to back up what it has said with concrete evidence of what it has done within the last year on the question of land claims. The government was a party to the James Bay settlement. That was a settlement which members opposite have attempted to portray as a sell-out of Indian and Inuit interests. To the contrary, an examination of that settlement will demonstrate to any fair minded person that it is a good if not better than any other settlement made anywhere in the world by a government of a country in which native peoples live. It is even better when you take into consideration the various social services that will continue to be supplied by the two senior governments. It certainly is better than the Alaska settlement with the native people of Alaska.

On the basis of that settlement it is necessary in the future that governments, provincial or federal, when tackling this question of land settlement claims, must recognize that they have to pay for any interference with the rights exercised by the native people in a given area, whether those rights are in respect of trapping, hunting, fishing or otherwise. They must pay for any intereference with the original uses of the land. That is a precedent which had never before been accepted.

The second important precedent was set by the James Bay agreement, which the NDP chose to ignore, and which the hon. member for the Northwest Territories particularly chose to ignore, which I find very strange, that is, it set a precedent for the settlement of claims with non-status Indians. That is of extreme importance for the people of the Yukon and of major importance for the people in the north-east corner of British Columbia who are affected or will be affected by this pipeline. The James Bay settlement, whether or not it has been sold convincingly to most of the native people in this country, is another matter, but it provides an extremely good precedent, in my view, for the settlement of future claims.

What the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie proposes in this amendment would kill the bill. There is no doubt about that. I should like to know what the steelworkers of Sault Ste. Marie think about their member presenting an amendment which would kill a bill which, over the next few years, would provide enough work so that they would not have to worry about layoffs or loss of overtime. Because of this pipeline, the steelworking capacity of Canada will be functioning at its maximum over the next few years.

The New Democratic Party cannot have it both ways, Mr. Speaker. They want jobs in this country, but when an issue like this arises, whether because of lack of proper analysis or proper study of the problem, they make proposals which are totally contradictory. Either the pipeline is a good thing for Canada, or it is not. If it is good, then we must recognize that Canada is going to do the right thing by the native people. I agree that in the past this has not always been the case, but there are some recent examples of where we have done the right thing.

Perhaps the hon. member should consult the Crees of northern Quebec to find out whether they think we have done the right thing. I am sure he will find that they do. That is one group that is making more progress and has more control over their destiny than any other group of people in this country. They are optimistic. If he were to ask them what they think about the James Bay settlement, he would get a different response than the propaganda that has been fed to certain circles in the country for purposes that are not necessarily in the best interests of the native people involved. Mr. Speaker, I strongly urge the House to reject this amendment.

Mr. Holmes: Mr. Speaker, I want to address myself to motion No. 6 which stands in my name. At the outset, however, I want to thank the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes) for recognizing my interest in the problems of the native people. I am somewhat surprised that he did not share the same concern with respect to the native problem in British Columbia, specifically in the northeastern part of British Columbia, which is equally significant.

May I say to the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Watson) that I think that he has not quite understood the James Bay settlement. I am sure he remembers very well the position this party took on that question. It was a very fundamental principle that this government would extinguish unilaterally the rights and signatories of third parties to that agreement. The hon. member knows very well that that is the position this party took, and knows very well that an amendment that I presented to this House on the very fundamental issue, to preserve the minority rights of one group, was defeated by the government.

I recognize that the government has accepted the motion in my name, but I think it is important to reflect for a moment or two on what has transpired within the last few weeks and few years. In my view, it will reflect upon the sensitivity of the government with respect to Indian and native problems. I must say that despite the rhetoric we have heard from the government and the various pious statements we heard from the hon. member for Laprairie referring to some of them, if one follows the proceedings very carefully one comes to the inescapable conclusion that native and Indian people are being sacrificed in the name of progress. I made reference to this in the previous debate.

When the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Faulkner) spoke on second reading, he attempted to emasculate the government's position on the second stage inquiry. The minister attempted to convey to this House that the issue of land claims was proceeding very smoothly and that there would be no problem in resolving that issue. I know any individual in this House or in committee who has followed the events carefully over a period of time recognizes that that position was unrealistic and untenable.

One only had to listen to or read the testimony given by the Council of Yukon Indians or the Union of B.C. Chiefs when they appeared before the committee to understand the depth of feeling and concern for the future.

My colleague from Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle), described the problem in north-east British Columbia and the way in which he hoped this government might move to involve the native and Indian people of the area in the pipeline process.

When I spoke on second reading and at the committee hearings I raised several critical issues where, in my view, the government abrogated its responsibility in respect of the native and the Indian people. In doing so, it jeopardized the trust relationship between the native Indian people and the Government of Canada, and therefore seriously jeopardized the prospects for a fair and just settlement.

As I indicated, the government broke its promises with respect to a second stage inquiry. I have no intention of going into the details, Mr. Speaker, but you will recall that the Lysyk commission was formed and in a three-month period Dean Lysyk went to all the communities in the Yukon and indicated to the Indian and native people that there would be a second stage inquiry if the pipeline came through that area. Indeed, the former Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development made that promise, not only to the Indian and native people of that area but to the people of Canada, that if a decision was made for a pipeline in that area there would be a second stage inquiry. In the fall of 1977 the Union of B.C. Chiefs, under the very able direction of George Manuel, requested that a second stage inquiry be carried out in the north-east part of British Columbia. Again, that was rejected by the government.

In my opinion, there are still no guarantees in this legislation vis-à-vis the socio-economic impact, Mr. Speaker. It was pointed out very clearly in testimony that when one is setting the terms and conditions for pipelines, the socio-economic problems must be identified early and set out in those terms and conditions. That is why it was essential to have a complete study of the socio-economic impact with respect to the Indian and native community.

Extreme difficulties had been encountered on the issue of land claims. On second reading I pointed out that the government had dragged its feet. Let me review quickly what has transpired. The Council of Yukon Indians presented their excellent document entitled "Together Today for our Children Tomorrow", in 1973. Shortly after that negotiations got under way, but initially the negotiators had no mandate from the federal government to carry out any specific or effective negotiations, and progress was painfully slow. The former minister went north to Whitehorse on March 3, 1975, and made a unilateral offer to the native people, breaking down the normal consultative process that the Indian and native people anticipated. Obviously it was rejected at that time.

• (1732)

Then, sir, in October, 1975, they appointed Digby Hunt as a negotiator for the federal government. He was well known to be one of the architects of the development of the Mackenzie Valley pipeline. We knew at the time he would be rejected by the Indian and native people in terms of negotiations, and yet this government undertook to appoint him as a negotiator. Obviously, once again, the negotiations failed. Then for about the third time, in 1977 negotiations commenced with Dr. Naysmith. I can remember the minister of Indian affairs of those days telling us in glowing terms about the progress and success that were being achieved in those negotiations.

In a press release the Council of Yukon Indians, who appeared in Ottawa just prior to the second reading debate, gave a statement. During second reading of this bill I quoted from this press release the following:

> We are now faced with some clear choices. We can continue to oppose a pipeline until our land claims are settled and be labelled as radical and anti-development. Or, we can compromise, thereby, sacrificing our rights to self-determination on our home land.
>
> We have decided not to compromise but to fight!
> We will take our case to the Canadian people. We will demonstrate the humanity and justness of our position. We will use every legal means at our disposal to ensure that we achieve a fair and just settlement. On February 13th, the Federal Court will rule on our opposition to the National Energy Board recommendations. Our struggle to achieve self-determination will not stop there.

That, to me, is not a sign of negotiations proceeding smoothly with the federal government. The hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie referred to it when I spoke on second reading. I made reference to the very significant recommendation of Dean Lysyk which I quoted at page 2898 of Hansard, February 15, 1978. It reads:

> For the reasons stated in Part E of this chapter, some additional time is desirable to avoid prejudice to a just settlement. Construction of the pipeline should not commence before August 1, 1981.

Sir, one had to ask very serious questions at that time when the agreement between the United States and Canada was signed to commence construction of the pipeline in the Yukon on January 1, 1981. Why the difference? If the federal government had been truly interested in the Indian and native people in that area in the Yukon, surely it could have negotiated within the recommendations as outlined by Dean Lysyk. Obviously the federal government declined to do so.

Again, during the committee hearings we have the document which appeared at the pipeline committee hearing. Is there any wonder why the Indian and native people have distrust for this government, and why it is essential to have at least some sort of protection in this particular legislation? Let me quote from this document which appeared before the standing committee.

> The Government of Canada is prepared to extinguish native land claims if necessary by legislation to support its international word and commitment but it will only do so in a way which represents the fairest possible settlement to those involved.

There is additional material here which, quite frankly, cannot help but impair the trust relationship between a government and the Indian and native people. It must be recognized, sir, that it was in this context and with this background of material and the knowledge we have had, for example, of the James Bay experience, which my good friend from Laprairie referred to a few moments ago, that we approached this bill in committee. Indeed, I want to point out there was nothing in the original legislation that made reference to the Indian and native people. Can you imagine, sir, there was nothing in the original legislation that made reference to the Indian and native people? In Issue No. 1 as recorded at page 40 of the Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence of the Special Committee on a Northern Gas Pipeline during the very first meeting I asked the very question of the Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen). Let me give you his answer to my question regarding the fact that no reference to the Indian and native people was in the legislation itself. It reads:

MR. MACEACHEN: I am not exactly clear whether I understand your question properly, but I gather you have in mind some reference in the legislation to the desirability or the necessity of assuring a just settlement of Indian land claims, and the recognition of their rights. We have given some thought to that and we would certainly be interested in hearing further views as to how we might give that recognition in the legislation.

We offered some suggestions and we had one amendment, which I would have preferred. Let me read that amendment to you. It appeared in Issue No. 11 at page 11:7 of the minutes of the Special Committee on a Northern Gas Pipeline. It reads:

39.1 Nothing in this Act shall be construed so as to prejudice any existing rights or interests of Indian and Native people residing in the areas traversed by the pipeline nor shall any provisions of this Act in any manner be construed as as to prejudice the negotiation of the final settlement of those Indian and Native claims.

Hon. members can compare that amendment with the amendment now before us. As I indicated I would have preferred the one which I have just quoted, for two reasons. First of all, the amendment which I presented had the word "Indian" in it. I think that is important because it specifically recognizes the rights of that group of people, and the Indians as defined under the British North America Act, Section 91(24). This section was redefined again in the Supreme Court, as I recall, in 1938 for the Inuit or Eskimo. Secondly, there is the latter part, which is very significant. Let me read it again:

. . . nor shall any provisions of this Act in any manner be construed so as to prejudice the negotiation of the final settlement of those Indian and Native claims.

I suggested at the time, and I suggest again, that that amendment would have been a far more preferable one. But, sir, I must emphasize that it was not possible. It was rejected by the Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council, and rejected by the government. It was important to have something in this legislation to protect in some way the rights of the Indian and native people. With the amendment that is in my name, together with a significant change that was made under clause 3(c) and which I quote:

To facilitate the efficient and expeditious planning and construction of the pipeline, taking into account local and regional interests, the interests of residents, particularly of native people, and recognizing the responsibility of the Government of Canada and other governments, it is appropriate to ensure that any native claim related to the land on which the pipeline is to be situated is to be dealt with in a just and equitable fashion.

I do believe that gives some protection and some guarantee to the Indian and native people. On the other hand I must again emphasize my disappointment that the government did not support the initial amendment, or indeed some other amendments, which would have more adequately protected the rights of the Indian and native people.

Let me conclude by quoting from the excellent brief which was presented by the National Indian Brotherhood to the special Senate committee, I believe it was yesterday, March 21, 1978. At page 20 of the brief presented by Noel V. Starblanket, president of the National Indian Brotherhood, it states:

We respect the sovereignty of parliament. But we suggest that that too has its limits. If terms such as "a just and equitable settlement" have any real meaning, they must mean a settlement which speaks to the secure future of the Indian peoples as distinct peoples within confederation.

Sir, that should be the goal; that should be the objective of the government. I would hope that the government interprets the amendment which I have presented to the House in that fashion.

● (1742)

Mr. Ross Milne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I would like to participate very briefly. I want to make a couple of comments on the two motions before us, motion No. 6 which the government intends to accept, and motion No. 4 which the government intends to reject.

I agree in part with the hon. member for Lambton-Kent (Mr. Holmes) that the bill has been improved by the committee process and the number of amendments made to the bill as a result. I thought there was some very positive input from native groups, other people, and from members of parliament participating in the committee. I was very impressed with the reaction of the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) and the chief spokesmen for the opposition parties in the way they addressed themselves to the native question. Most important, the special pipeline committee and the Senate committee have given the native groups ample opportunity to express their views first-hand to them. As I said, they were certainly well listened to and reacted to by the government.

In response to the committee discussions, the government has agreed to accept two important amendments, recognizing, first, the need to take account of native interests in the planning and construction of the pipeline and the responsibilities of governments to ensure that native land claims are dealt with equitably and, second, affirming that any native land claims will continue to exist notwithstanding passage of the bill.

The government gives a very high priority to the settlement of claims on the pipeline route, and has made extensive efforts to achieve this objective. Sustained negotiations were conducted during 1977, and late in the autumn both sides expressed the view that an agreement should be attainable early in 1978.

Since then, the Indians have recessed the negotiations to review and revise their position. We hope to have their new position at an early date. An agreement, by definition, requires the assent of both parties. While the government is anxious to arrive at a settlement, it cannot move more quickly than the Indians are willing to go.

I wish to respond to a point made by the hon. member for Lambton-Kent which rather surprised me. He mentioned the report to which the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) made reference at the committee stage.

It seems to me that that, if anything, will only prejudice the successful conclusion of the land claims that were engaged in, and I want to put on record what the Deputy Prime Minister said in response to that in committee. He said:

> Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that it is important to state that the government has absolutely no intention of legislating a settlement. Our intention is to pursue negotiations and it has been stated by myself and the minister to proceed with negotiations. If we had in mind to legislate a settlement, probably it would be in the bill.

This was further substantiated by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) a day or so later in the House when, on March 16, he said as reported at page 3826 of Hansard:

> Mr. Speaker, I understand that this phrase was taken from a document prepared at a lower level of the bureaucracy, indicating various alternatives. There is no hesitation on my part in repeating what the Deputy Prime Minister said last night before the committee, that there is no intention on the part of the government to proceed in any way than by looking for a negotiated settlement. The legislation speaks for itself. It has been reported out of the committee today, I understand, and indicates no intention to legislate.

I would hope that through you, Mr. Speaker, we can extend this conversation to the native people in the north, to convey that statement by the Prime Minister and Deputy Prime Minister, a statement that has been made in this place and other places by a number of ministers of Indian affairs. It is a position the government subscribes to very sincerely.

I wish to respond to another point made by the hon. member for Lambton-Kent. He wished to have a much stronger amendment in place of amendment No. 6 that he has on the order paper. I suggest that one of the people he should have talked to in that regard is the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) who did not take a viewpoint which agreed entirely with that.

If you are talking about whether the government would have accepted a stronger amendment, I do not think the government would have had any difficulty accepting the original amendment which read "Nothing in this act shall operate so as to extinguish any native land claim, right, title or interest that the native people of Canada may have had prior to the coming into force of this act in and to the land on which the pipeline will be situated." This position was strongly supported and put forward by the Council of Yukon Indians last night at the pipeline hearings in the Senate.

The hon. member for Lambton-Kent might review again his comments on the second stage inquiry. With the proposal, as set out by the government, to take specific draft terms and conditions to the people in the Yukon and to the people in northern British Columbia, the native people will be in a much stronger position to be able to realize what is being proposed and to be able to react to the specifics, rather than have an open second stage inquiry which deals largely in generalities, perhaps describing problems rather than looking at the specific approaches that might be taken.

The government suggests this process will be more productive and, in the long run, more acceptable to the native people, both in the Yukon and British Columbia, than would another second stage inquiry as suggested by the hon. member for Lambton-Kent.

I conclude by again saying that the government intends to oppose motion No. 4 which would have left entirely in native hands the progress of the project and, indeed, the future of this bill, and by saying that we will be supporting motion No. 6.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, the speech of the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes) displays his abysmal ignorance with regard to the native people in the Yukon. He stood up and informed the members of this House that native people in the Yukon do not live in the traditional fashion. I invite him to visit Old Crow where they do just that all year round. There is a whole village of people in that area in the Yukon who live in just that way, and a great many others as well. His speech was full of inaccurate statements and absolute rubbish.

We would like to have seen a stronger amendment in this bill with regard to native rights. Let me make this clear at the outset. The original bill that was presented to parliament was glaring in its omission of any native presence. It was at the insistence of this party that that native presence was inserted in the bill. The general impression that is given in the media is that it is a government thought and a government amendment. That thought and that amendment were at our initiative. That amendment was supported in committee by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas).

It is surprising that where constructive discussions could have been had, the New Democratic Party representation on that committee did not advance a single amendment during the 21 hearings. Now they have a spokesman who has not even attended a single meeting of the 21 that were held. That is one of the reasons why they are not contributing intelligent amendments at this stage and not contributing intelligent debate. They are absolutely ignorant of what went on in committee. I do not criticize the absence of the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands. It is a pity he is not here to straighten out his colleagues who are participating in this debate.

If it were not for the contributions made in committee by this party, we would have had no native presence in this bill. We would have had no protection for them at all. However, we do not go along with the theory advanced by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie, on behalf of this party, that there should be no development whatsoever until native claims are settled. If you take that position, you may as well kiss goodbye to a project that is going to be very significant with regard to the creation of thousands of jobs and will contribute to the growth of a steel and pipe industry in Canada which will involve thousands of positions. Is that what the NDP want?

Is it to be held up by 5,000 native people because they insist on settlement before the project goes ahead? In our view, that is not progress. Our position has always been that there is no reason why negotiated settlement cannot go hand in hand with development. If you accept the native position, there would be no new mines employing workers, no industrial development whatsoever in the Yukon until native claims are settled.

It does not prejudice their rights and interests or their title, whatever that might be, one iota, if those negotiations proceed at the same time development proceeds. By taking their present position they deny themselves the jobs and other benefits in the form of economic development which they legitimately desire. Their position is unreasonable. They should adopt a reasonable stance of continuing the negotiations and arriving at a settlement as quickly as they can—this applies to the government, too—so that they can share in the economic development which is bound to flow from a project of this magnitude.

To hon. members to my left who are so sanctimonious about protecting native rights, I say: why did they not advance amendments in committee? Why did they not agree with the amendments we put forward to clause 3 and clause 23(1)? We wanted to reassure the native people with respect to the lands the pipe was crossing, and we wanted to make sure that negotiations would not be prejudiced.

Mr. Speaker, I hear a noise at the front door.

Mr. Speaker: It being after six o'clock, pursuant to the order made Thursday, March 9, 1978, this House stands adjourned until Monday, April 3, 1978, at two o'clock in the afternoon, pursuant to Standing Order 2. In the interval, any of those usual invitees who are still in the building at this hour are welcome to join me for a small libation and celebration of the Easter Bunny's scheduled arrival in only a few days.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

At 6.10 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Special Order.

PUBLIC SERVICE

BARGAINING AND OTHER RIGHTS OF CIVIL SERVANTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, even though this is a day on which all of us believe a budget will be announced, we do not want to lose sight of the public service. I therefore rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of pressing and urgent necessity to bring to the attention of the House, for immediate action, the deeply-aroused and justifiable fear among members of the public service arising out of the deliberate and drastic actions of the government which indicate that the rights of the public service to collective bargaining are in jeopardy.

I would, therefore, move, seconded by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen):

That this House declares its unequivocal support of existing undiminished bargaining rights for members of the public service, and protests the right of the government to assign or change duties of public servants, for such would end the classification standards and thereby reduce the merit system.

Furthermore, it protests and condemns the announced policy of the government as being discriminatory and unjust in that the ending shortly of wage and salary controls will not apply to the public service.

Mr. Speaker: Order. In accordance with the terms of Standing Order 43, such a motion cannot be put to the House in the absence of unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

INDUSTRY

LAY-OFFS BY AMERICAN MOTORS CORPORATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, following press reports of a few days ago that the American Motors Corporation will be laying off some 1,000 people on a temporary basis this summer and about 350 people on a permanent basis, all at its Brampton plant. In light of the fact that since 1974, American Motors has received the benefit of just under $18 million in remissions of duty payable on its car imports, having failed to meet the conditions of the auto pact with respect to production and jobs, all of which duty remissions have been passed by cabinet as orders in council, and since these latest lay-offs mean that American Motors will be even further away from meeting its commitments under the pact, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters):

That the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce be instructed to make a full report before this House as soon as possible of all discussions between his department and American Motors regarding the impact of these lay-offs, of what commitments his department has obtained from American Motors to get employment back up to reasonable levels in Brampton, and what sanctions the government is prepared to take against American Motors in light of its continued failure to meet employment commitments under the auto pact at its Brampton plant.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have heard the motion proposed by the hon. member. Under the terms of Standing Order 43, such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

POST OFFICE

DEPARTMENTAL ACTION TO LEGALIZE RATE INCREASES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I should like to present a motion, under Standing Order 43, on a matter of great urgency and pressing necessity. Notwithstanding the opinions expressed by the Standing Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments, and by eminent authorities such as Senator Eugene Forsey, that it was a grave invasion of the rights of parliament and an affront to the people of Canada to raise postal rates other than by amendment to the Post Office Act, and the recent reference of the proposed rate increase to the Ontario Supreme Court by the Periodical Publishers Association representing Canada's major postal users, the Postmaster General announced on April 1, April Fool's Day, popularly known as All Fools' Day, that he was proceeding to increase rates by administrative decree under the Financial Administration Act, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling):

S.O. 43

● (1412)

That the Postmaster General introduce amendments to the Post Office Act in the current session to legalize his actions, to restore the confidence of major users of the postal service and, particularly, to restore the morale of the employees of the Post Office Department by demonstrating leadership which is long overdue.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for debate at this time only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FINANCE

DEVALUATION OF CANADIAN DOLLAR—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that the Canadian dollar has now dropped to somewhat below 88 cents and continues to show signs of erosion, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin):

That in recognition of the individual who has been largely responsible, the Canadian dollar be renamed the Trudeau fuddle-buck.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Smith).

NATIONAL RESEARCH COUNCIL

PROTEST AGAINST TRANSFER OF PERSONNEL FROM CHURCHILL, MAN.—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Cecil Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. It has been brought to my attention that the National Research Council will be transferring 18 of the 22 families of NRC personnel now based in Churchill. The reason for the transfer is that the NRC cannot afford to pay the rent subsidy for housing as set out by Treasury Board order. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil):

That the minister act immediately to stop all plans to transfer National Research Council personnel out of Churchill.

A move such as this, after spending $50 million on the redevelopment of Churchill, would be another of the stupid, blundering errors that this government is so capable of making.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for debate only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

[Mr. Dinsdale.]

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

REQUEST WAR DISABILITY PENSIONS BE RAISED TO LEVEL OF 1973 FORMULA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a motion on a matter of urgency which I should like to present under Standing Order 43. If I am not careful, I shall find myself saying that it is seconded by the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe. The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that Jack Marshall and I have been such good friends for such a long time that it is hard to think of him as gone.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Accordingly, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters):

That this House urges the government, before this session is ended, to bring in legislation to restore the basic amount of the war disability pension to the average level of the five categories of public servants so designated in 1973, and to provide prorata pensions for the widows of veterans in those cases where the veteran's pension was less than 48 per cent, it being understood that this House will act quickly to pass such legislation.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for discussion, pursuant to Standing Order 43, can be done at this time only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

VACANCIES

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received a communication notifying me that two vacancies have occurred in the representation, namely, the hon. Joseph-P. Guay, P.C., member for the electoral district of St. Boniface, by resignation, and Jack Marshall, Esq., member for the electoral district of Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe, by resignation.

Accordingly, I have addressed my warrants to the Chief Electoral Officer for the issue of new writs of election for the said electoral districts.

BUGGING OF MPS' OFFICES

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I might take a moment, prior to beginning the question period—I will extend the question period by a minute or two, if I take that long—to inform the House of something. The initial action of the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) some weeks ago, followed by similar information given to me by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), respecting the presence of electronic devices in their offices caused me, after consultation with representatives of all parties, to request an investigation by the Ottawa police force. Hon. members will now know that that investigation has resulted in charges which were laid last week.

• (1417)

During the course of those investigations, I sought interim reports only by way of confirmation from the police that investigations were ongoing. I did not request any formal or written reports. I presume that had no conclusive actions resulted from those investigations, probably I would have asked for some sort of report which I would have passed on to the House. In any case, last week when I was out of the country, the Ottawa police force endeavoured to inform me of their intention to proceed with these charges. Being unable to reach me, they contacted the Clerk of the House, who reached me, and after discussion I advised the office of the Prime Minister and the office of the Leader of the Opposition through the Clerk of the House.

I completed the consultative process this morning by advising representatives of all parties of the actions that had been taken by the police, and as this matter is before the courts, I would not propose to seek a report of any sort from the police. In fact, I was informed later today—just before coming to the House—that if I were to do so, I could not really receive much more information than is publicly known, that is, that the investigations have led to the laying of charges and that these charges are now before the courts.

In the circumstances, I do not propose to pursue the matter any further. I will simply make a statement, after consultation with representatives of all parties, so the House is fully informed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INTRODUCTION OF BUDGET

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Can the minister tell the House whether he has reconsidered his refusal to bring in an immediate budget, and whether he is in a position today to give us the date when the budget will be brought down?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have never refused to have a budget. I said I did not want to have a budget before the end of March. I will be announcing the date of the budget after the cabinet meeting this week.

Mr. Clark: Can the Minister of Finance, now that we have finally forced him to bring in a budget—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: —tell the House of Commons when we can expect to have that statement of the economic plans of the Government of Canada brought before this House of Commons?

Mr. Chrétien: I just said I would give the date on Thursday, and it will not take too long a time to have a budget. I just want to tell the hon. member that in the last few months I have listened very carefully to the kind of thing he is proposing—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Chrétien: —and I think I have more confidence now that anything I do will never be as irresponsible as what the hon. member is proposing.

Mr. Clark: I am trying to elicit from the Minister of Finance some indication. He has told us that a decision will be made on Thursday, presumably when the cabinet meets, and that a date will be announced following that. I want to know whether it is likely that the House will have a budget within the next 30 days, or are we going to be faced with a date that is as long delayed as the by-election dates which have been delayed by the Prime Minister so that the Government of Canada can attempt to avoid an economic reckoning as it is attempting to avoid a political reckoning?

Mr. Chrétien: I think the hon. member does not have to worry about that. If I decided I would bring down a budget, it would not be too long before I brought it down. I am sure it will be soon, this month; that is all.

VALUE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR—GOVERNMENT INTENTIONS

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Finance. As we await the disclosure of the budget date, the dollar continues to decline, breaking the 88-cent level this morning. With over $500 million having been drained from our reserves in the month of March, and $20 million going out this morning alone in defence of the dollar—which, of course, is supposed to be floating—would the Minister of Finance indicate if the government plans any foreign issues in addition to the $750 million issue which was sold, dated April 1?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if I decide to seek other loans on foreign markets, I will advise the House and the markets the very day I seek them.

[English]

Mr. Stevens: My supplementary question is again to the Minister of Finance. As the United States 20-year pay issue dated April 1 is already selling at a $1.75 discount from its issue price, would the Minister of Finance indicate if the government had anticipated that type of discount when it originally placed the issue? If so, how do they feel that discount will be received by those who might buy future Canadian government United States' pay issues?

● (1422)

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I think I could not anticipate what the situation would be on the American market for all the bonds being dealt with there. I think I came at the right time in the market, so I got all the money I wanted at a good rate.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, my final supplementary question is directed to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the dollar is continuing to drop so dramatically, and that our $750 million issue is selling at a discount from its issue price, will the Prime Minister assure the House that he will not go on any more selling capers such as he did in New York, because it will be disastrous for Canada's reputation within the international communities?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

INFORMATION ON ECONOMIC SITUATION GIVEN TO U.S. AUDIENCE

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. A short while ago the Prime Minister spoke to the Economic Club of New York. During that speech he said "the recovery is under way": he was referring to Canada. Canadians were amazed to discover it, of course. Since unemployment currently registers officially at one million, and unofficially at 1.6 million, since investment intentions for 1978, according to the Minister of Finance, are worse than they were for 1977, since the dollar dropped 24 hours after the Prime Minister made his speech, and continues to drop, I ask the Prime Minister most seriously why he misinformed his American audience and, more importantly, why he misinformed Canadians who were watching that television performance? Can he cite one economic indicator which would substantiate his absurd claim?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, since the hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party is asking for one indicator, I will give him one or two. In the year 1977 there was a marked decline in domestic inflationary pressures. There was significant improvement in the trade balance as the year progressed, and a revival in corporate profits. Real exports rose by 7.7 per cent over 1976 levels, for a second year of strong improvement, while imports dropped only 2 per cent over 1976 levels, for a second year of strong improvement. Therefore, there was a strengthening in the last part of 1977. That is why I am saying that the trend is toward an optimistic outlook.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, considering that answer, perhaps the Prime Minister will be given the award for dubious economic achievement of the year at the Academy Awards tonight.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Even the Prime Minister should know that the facts he cited in relation to the new entrants into the labour market, the declining level of investment, and the need for new jobs are all misleading. There is a real demand for new job creation. As he indicated in his discussions at the first ministers' conference prior to his New York performance, when he referred to the recessionary state we are in, the picture is not at all rosy.

With reference to the intention of bringing in a budget, given the fact that manufacturing is operating at only 80 per cent capacity, and that we are not going to get new investment in 1978 even up to the low level of 1977, will he assure the House that there will be tax cuts for medium and low income taxpayers to stimulate economy and, second, some public sector investment in such things as housing and rail facilities, to create new jobs?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party is making some proposals for the budget consideration. If he waits for the budget statement, I think he will see whether some of them have been met or not and he will give his usual criticisms. I just want to point out to him that his party has been consistently negative on the economy since I have been around for the last 10 or 15 years.

An hon. Member: A long time.

● (1427)

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, since the Leader of the New Democratic Party was good enough to refer to my New York speech, he should look at the figures there and he will see that Canada consistently outperformed all the OECD countries in respect of most industries—except for Japan—in terms of real growth, and he will see that in terms of job creation—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, what makes the position of the opposition a little dubious is that consistently, year in and year out, they have poor-mouthed the economy; but any objective look at it will show that in the past 10 to 15 years—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: You are quite wrong, Pierre.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, maybe I can appeal to you as a reasonable person.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, in the past 10 to 12 years Canada has consistently outperformed all the other countries, and as I say—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: It has, by any objective standard. If one looks at the performance of the opposition during that period, he will see they have consistently said the economy is going down the drain. I had hoped that a little bit of historical perspective would make them a little more objective, but obviously they do not intend to be.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister will have to do a little better than that in the coming election. Since these countries—and this comes off the top of my mind—the Netherlands, Norway, Sweden, West Germany, not to mention Japan, and other industrial countries, either in terms of inflation or in terms of unemployment, have been away ahead of this country for more than a decade, why does the Prime Minister continue to try to misinform the House? Specifically with reference to the budget, will he give us assurances that the leading priority will be the job creation and the Canadian economy, so that the more than one million Canadians who do not believe this nonsense and want jobs will be able to get them?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, since the Leader of the New Democratic Party has described this nonsense as off the top of his head, which indeed is pretty shallow, perhaps rather than making general statements he would take some of the statistics I gave in New York and indicate which of them are wrong.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

FINANCE

REQUESTED REDUCTION IN FREIGHT RATE ON COPPER ORE TO ASSIST QUEBEC

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question either to the Minister of Finance or to the Prime Minister, indeed to the one in charge depending on the nature of the following question. Considering that the government should be anxious to improve the industrial and economic development of every region throughout the country and that there are situations as absurd as the fact that it costs from $5 to $16 more to import copper ore from British Columbia to Quebec while deliveries of this same ore to Japan cost $16 less, would the minister tell the House whether this year he intends to encourage, through lower freight rates, exports of copper ore from British Columbia to Quebec in order to improve economic and industrial development in Quebec to the same extent as in British Columbia?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in my opinion this question should be put to my colleague the Minister of Transport. Of course, the government is now implementing a report, that is Mr. Justice Hall's report, which aims at improving transportation in Canada and which we are considering. Some aspects of its recommendations have been accepted by the government and others will be later on.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

STATEMENTS MADE BY PRIME MINISTER—BUDGET PROPOSALS

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister. I ask it only in relation to the need for accuracy in looking at our economy. I have in front of me the Bank of Canada Review for February, 1978, which indicates on page 5 that in the last two years the rate of real growth in the Canadian economy was the lowest, except for Great Britain, of all the big seven countries. It also indicates on page 11 that the inflation rate in Canada was substantially above the average for those seven countries, for the last year, December to December. I am trying to reconcile those facts with the statements the Prime Minister has just been making in reference to the Canadian economy.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member is a student of serious documents, I can lend him the speech I made in New York, from which he will see I made the very point he is now underscoring. I was indicating that from 1965 to 1975 we had a performance which was better than practically every other country, a period during which his party and the New Democratic Party were consistently saying that Canadians were getting poorer than everyone else.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): What about 1969?

Mr. Trudeau: This hon. gentleman might want to read my speech, too. I indicated that the years 1976 and 1977—which is confirmed by the question—were bad years for Canada and we were, indeed, under the average. I indicated the most recent indices which indicate that our performance was improving and that we hope that 1978—and these are confirmed by the predictions of objective bodies—will be better for Canada than was the average and, indeed, amongst the best. That was my position in the speech and the hon. member will be glad to see that he confirms it by his question to me.

Mr. Gillies: Going back to the Minister of Finance—I was not referring to the right hon. member's speech, which I did in fact read; I was referring to his answers in the House of Commons today—it would seem to me to indicate that the government itself felt there were indications that the economy was performing in a substantially improved way. As I read these statistics, and I direct this question to the Minister of Finance—

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker—if I can make it clear—when you take the over-all period, we have performed better than other countries. I also took, as well as the two recent years, the period between 1972 and 1977 and I indicated—including the two bad years in Canada—that we have still done considerably better than the United States. This was the point I was making.

Mr. Gillies: If I can go back to the Prime Minister—not to prolong a discussion on interpretations with the Prime Minister—I take the position that the critical problem is not whether we did well between 1965 and 1972, or 1972 and 1975, and so forth, but what we are doing now and where the economy is moving at the present time. If you look at the statistics for the month of January, the rate of increase in the gross national product or the real national expenditure declines: it was down three-tenths of 1 per cent in the month of January. Retail sales are off, domestic investment is off, the dollar is down to 87 cents, the trade surplus is mixed.

I would suggest—and perhaps my question should go to the Minister of Finance—before you bring down the budget, will you bring into the House, as is the common practice, a statement about the economic affairs of the nation, for review by the House of Commons and the appropriate committee, and in that statement will we see revised forecasts for the performance of the economy based upon the way in which the economy was operating over the last year, which indicates the forecasts made last October have no possibility of being fulfilled during the coming year? I ask that question because, surely—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, all those answers will be in the budget statement which I will be bringing before this House soon. I would like to tell the hon. member that the one who predicted a couple of months ago a 4.5 or 5 per cent growth in the g.n.p. for 1978 made a good prediction. These growth rates were made public by Mr. de Cotret, of the Conference Board, who now indicates 5 per cent is not enough. The hon. member should read some of the statements made by the future critics of the opposition in economic matters.

An hon. Member: I do not believe you.

Mr. Chrétien: I believe him, and he is your man now.

[Mr. Gillies.]

TRANSPORT

SHORTAGE OF HOPPER CARS FOR MOVEMENT OF RAPESEED

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I direct my question to the Acting Minister of Transport. It arises out of the very serious shortage of hopper cars which are used for the movement of rapeseed products, particularly rapeseed meal. I ask the acting minister if he would prevail upon the CNR to ensure that sufficient rolling stock is made available for the movement of this very important export product. The result of the shortage has necessitated the closing down of some rapeseed-crushing facilities, specifically the United Oil Seeds crushing plant at Lloydminster. Could the acting minister undertake to impress upon CNR the necessity of providing sufficient rolling stock for this purpose?

[Translation]

Mr. Charles Lapointe (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, representations are constantly being made to the Canadian National in an effort to solve the extremely serious problem of the shortage of cars for the transportation of grain as well as of certain forestry products in Quebec and northern Ontario. I shall look into the matter for the hon. member and if I can supply him with further details in writing, I shall be happy to do so.

[English]

SHORTAGE OF HOPPER CARS FOR MOVEMENT OF CORN

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron-Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, further to the previous question, I would also like to direct a question to the Acting Minister of Transport. When looking into the matter with which the hon. member for Vegreville is concerned, would he also make sure that sufficient hopper cars are supplied to towns and elevators in southwestern Ontario for the movement of corn? There is a serious shortage in that regard.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles Lapointe (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it is not up to me or the Minister of Transport to supply those cars, but of course we shall be happy to make all the representations necessary to the railway companies.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

GOVERNMENT ACTION TO PREVENT DEFRAUDING OF FUND

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Since recently the public accounts committee received evidence that the overpayments in 1976 were, in fact, $160 million, of which $60 million was recovered for the unemployment insurance account—not as previously represented—and since the statistical evidence offered by the Clarkson, Gordon special report to the committee shows that fully 60 per cent of all applications for unemployment insurance benefits in 1976 contained some sort of irregularity, and more than 10 per cent of all applications resulted in overpayments, will the minister admit that these figures are correct now, and serious, and will he tell the House what measures, other than the $100 million advertising campaign, the government is taking to prevent this $100 million rip-off of the taxpayers?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, here again, the hon. member casts, frankly, a bad light on the people who are in fact receiving unemployment insurance. A very small minority receive overpayments and are involved in ripping-off the system, as he suggests. If the hon. member had seriously been interested in his figures and getting some approbation for them, he could have extended the courtesy of showing them to me in advance. He also neglected to report the series of actions that are being taken by my department to catch those who are, in fact, cheating the system. But the hon. member, of course, sees only one side of the coin, namely, the black side.

Mr. Clarke: Mr. Speaker, I would just stress, in advance—so that I am not misunderstood—this is not a suggestion from this side or from myself. I ask the minister, does the government have any plans to institute a type of means test by which an individual's total income, for example for a 12-month period, would be taken into consideration in determining eligibility for benefits?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, that is something we are considering. I do not want to usurp the role of the advisory council, who are going to be charged with looking at this particular issue. The situation, however, is that those in the top echelon of the salary range contribute a substantial amount to the fund and derive very few benefits in unemployment insurance. So there are source funds available from that particular group. I think we have to take a look at both sides of the issue to determine what would be in the best interests of the plan to cut off people who are, for example, over a particular salary level, from receiving unemployment insurance. It may be the fact that this tax is having the necessary impact.

ENERGY

RATIONING OF SUPPLIES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources: it follows a question that I asked three weeks ago about our medium-term oil supplies. Given the fact that the National Energy Board figures indicate that production will decline from two million barrels a day to one million barrels a day in ten years, and given Mr. Toombs' statement that a super conservation program will be required, suggesting that the government is considering rationing by 1980, is the government actually considering rationing? And if the situation is as bad as it appears to be, why are we waiting until 1980 for such action?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member's question was based on an inadequate or a shortened version of Mr. Toombs' remarks to a meeting very recently. He did indicate that in the event of an emergency—a phrase which was not carried in the press—it might be necessary to introduce rationing by the early 1980s. Of course, the government has recognized that an emergency could occur at any time; that is the reason we are presently drafting a bill which we hope to introduce in the next session of parliament to deal with the allocation of crude oil products and gas rationing. I emphasize, Mr. Speaker, that this is contingency planning based upon an emergency and not upon a normal course of events.

MINISTER'S ACTION TO IMPROVE SERVICE AND LOW EMPLOYEE MORALE

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Postmaster General relating to growing deficits in the Post Office which arise from poor management, low morale among employees and continuing loss of business due to deteriorating service. Now that the Postmaster General has decided to continue the negative policy of his predecessor in dealing with deficits by illegal rate increases rather than by the positive approach of improvements in service and marketing, when will the minister be providing the dynamic leadership he promised when he took over the department early in the new year?

[Translation]

Hon. J.-Gilles Lamontagne (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I only want to indicate that steps are being taken on a continuing basis to improve postal operations. As to the two problems facing the Post Office just now, namely labour relations and——management-labour relations, every step has been taken to try to improve communications with our employees. I can tell the hon. member that improvements have also been made so far as mechanization and automation are concerned. I do not think it is a question of leadership: it is there, and we exercise it.

[English]

Mr. Dinsdale: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could the minister assure the House that the amendments which have been mentioned as coming into effect after the election will be introduced during the current session? These amendments have been recommended by management and by employees, including rural mail carriers and postal users.

Because of the urgency of the matter, will these amendments be brought forward during the current session?

[Translation]

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, my department is compiling all sorts of changes which could be made to the Post Office Act. I suggest that these changes are not urgent, as they would not in any way solve the problems we are faced with in the areas of automation and labour relations.

For the time being, I will simply say that these changes to the Post Office Act will be made either during the current session or the next.

GRAIN

MOVEMENT OF NO. 3 WHEAT

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I have a question that should be directed to the minister in charge of the Wheat Board, but in his absence I will direct it to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the statement by a high official that the Wheat Board will not be making any more sales of wheat from this crop year due to transport limitations, can the minister tell the farmers of northern Manitoba and Saskatchewan if the large amount of No. 3 utility wheat will not be moved this crop year?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I think when the hon. member checks the record, he will find that more wheat was moved last year than in any year in the history of Canada. I am not in a position at this time to say what wheat will or will not be moved. I will have to check and let the hon. member know.

Mr. Ritchie: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. When making the inquiry from the Wheat Board, could the minister also find out what quotas farmers are likely to have for this type of wheat?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member can rest assured that I will check this for him with the Canadian Wheat Board.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

YOUNG CANADA WORKS PROGRAM—FUNDS TO ASSIST STUDENTS

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. In view of the fact that his department allocated $60 million dollars for Young Canada Works in 1977, but reduced the allocation to only $43.5 million, despite the record levels of youth unemployment in the country—in ridings such as mine the unemployment rate for students is running at 60 per cent—will the minister assure this House that additional funds will be committed to this program for the crucial summer ahead?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately the hon. member is only quoting part of the statistics. The fact is that some 40 per cent of those who participated in the Canada Works program are young people. Also, the economic growth factor that we are endeavouring to create is in permanent jobs, which has found great acceptance in the Atlantic provinces where we can use the money not on a temporary basis or on a band-aid basis, as the hon. member has indicated from time to time, but on a more permanent basis. I think this is a more effective use of taxpayers' dollars and in the long run will be more beneficial, particularly for his region of Canada.

Mr. Hogan: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The minister is still refusing to make available the extra funds that will be needed desperately by students who will have to return to universities and other educational institutions next year. I wish he would let me know, as one member from the Atlantic provinces, what this whole business of growth component is as it relates to mine and other constituencies in the Atlantic region, because we cannot get this information from his department.

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member cannot get it because he does not ask for the information.

Mr. Hogan: I do ask.

Mr. Cullen: That is the situation. I have been talking about the situation since the new legislation came into effect, and about the fact that this money will be available to the Atlantic provinces. I met with the forestry ministers of the Atlantic provinces and indicated to them the vast sums of money that could be made available to help them in the area of forestation. Instead of criticizing, the hon. member should be applauding the difference in emphasis.

Mr. Hogan: Ha, ha!

HOUSE OF COMMONS

HIRING OF EMPLOYEES ON PARLIAMENT HILL

Mr. A. D. Alkenbrack (Frontenac-Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the right hon. Prime Minister and pertains to a very important branch of government, the public service. It is now public knowledge that the management of the West Block cafeteria has received orders from the Trudeau administration to cease hiring English-speaking persons for serving food to persons dining there, and to hire English-speaking persons only for dishwashing and other kitchen duties in the rear. What is the reason for this autocratic order which creates two classes of employees and more national disunity—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Upon reflection, the hon. member will realize he is asking a question on a matter which is under my responsibility and not that of the Prime Minister.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

GRANTS TO PLANNED PARENTHOOD FEDERATION

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare, now that she has bought her year's supply of barbecue products from the hon. member for Vancouver East. The chairperson of the allocations committee of the Planned Parenthood Federation said in her report of June 17, 1977:

It is important for associations to remember that their primary role is to be agents for change rather than service agencies.

Since the federation receives about $670,000 annually from the federal government, most of it from the minister's department, I ask the minister whether she, as the principal financial supporter of that organization, endorses that statement?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am bit embarrassed to answer such a question. I do not know what we are doing in this place except making social change. I do not see what is wrong with the statement, taken out of context, that the hon. member read to me. I can see the implications he is suggesting, and I do not think that is an honest, intellectual way to work. First of all, I should like to read the report; secondly, if the hon. member has clear allegations I would prefer that he had the guts to announce them.

Mr. Friesen: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I am glad the hon. minister can attribute an intellectual question to me, whether she perceives it to be honest or not.

Miss Bégin: It is quite rare on that side.

Mr. Friesen: In view of the fact that of a 1977 budget of $701,653, only $30,624 come from non-governmental sources, thus indicating that there is really very little popular support for the federation, does the minister not feel that governmental financial support ought to be commensurate with public support or, alternatively, that the government should give equal financial support to agencies which project alternative views?

Miss Bégin: We are still in the dark about what the hon. member is referring to, Mr. Speaker. He does not call a spade a spade. I should like him to say what he is talking about that is supposed to be wrong with an association whose work is known to all Canadians, which obviously receives money from the private and public sectors and which is doing a good job. If the hon. member has something on his mind, why does he not say what it is?

COMMUNICATIONS

PRESS RELEASE ISSUED AFTER MEETING OF COMMUNICATIONS MINISTERS

Mr. Peter Stollery (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Communications.

[English]

After the meeting of communications ministers last week in Charlottetown, the minister was quoted as saying that it was a very successful one, but the press said that the meeting concluded with five hours of squabbling over the joint news release. Would the minister please inform the House which version is the correct one?

● (1452)

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, most of the newspaper reports I read reflected the very positive character of the meeting, but I did read one that referred to a squabble over the press release. It is true that there was a break in order to study the press release. It was rewritten. The reason it had to be rewritten was that the ministers felt it did not sufficiently reflect the vigour of the discussion and the amount of consensus we had reached. Apart from supporting Bill C-24 and urging early passage of that bill in the House, the ministers agreed that pay television is a very important phenomenon and a very important service which might be introduced in this country. Despite the fact that they said it was entirely their jurisdiction, they did entrust me with the mandate of developing a model for pay television if and when it is introduced in the country, taking into account that the model will encompass provincial interests as well as the national interest.

POST OFFICE

JURY NOTICES SENT BY REGISTERED MAIL

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Postmaster General regarding the efficiency of the Post Office. I am sure he now has material on his desk whereby the sheriff of the judicial district of Hamilton-Wentworth informed him that out of 70 jury notices forwarded by registered mail, 14 have not arrived. They were returnable on January 23. We all know the Post Office is in a mess, but we did not realize to what extent.

Has the minister looked into this matter, knowing that if you do not receive a jury notice and do not attend for service, you are subject to a jail term? Will the minister advise whether he looked into this matter in order to determine just what occurred?

Hon. J.-Gilles Lamontagne (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I looked into the matter as soon as I received the letter from Sheriff Betzner of Hamilton informing me that only two summonses were recovered from the 16 or 18. I wrote to the deputy postmaster general saying I was not satisfied with that answer and that a further inquiry should be made to determine who was responsible for this.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I think this problem calls for a little more than that. In light of the seriousness of this matter, and in view of the fact the minister has had it before him since about February 28, will he assure the House that he is actively considering this question by a full inquiry, as asked for by the sheriff of the county of Wentworth? Will he also assure the House that when he receives the results, they will be made public through a statement in the House by the minister, so that we can determine just what kind of mess the Post Office is really in?

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, I assure the hon. member that I am not the kind of man who would let something like that go. As soon as I receive a report from my department, I will see that the hon. member gets a full report from me.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

DEPARTMENTAL STEPS TO OFFSET INCREASE IN PRICE OF SKIM MILK POWDER

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare who expressed concern at the food conference regarding what she and many others perceive as a serious dietary problem in Canada. What steps does the minister intend to take to offset the 50 per cent increase in price that will be applied to powdered skim milk in Canada as a result of the move by the Minister of Agriculture to remove the subsidy? What steps is she taking to offset the effects this will have on the poor, the low income earners and the aged in this country?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I do not think that question should be addressed to me but, rather, to the Minister of Agriculture or the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. As far as my responsibility is concerned, I presume the hon. member is asking me the question on the assumption that it affects low income families. There are no specific programs of that nature. Our system of supplementation of income is through the route of family allowances or other income supplementation programs that we are studying in the department. When I am in a position to inform the House of further developments, I will.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I wish the Minister of Agriculture who was responsible for this would keep quiet until I ask my question. I can assure him that to the low income earners and the poor of this country it is not at all funny. In view of the high unemployment in Canada, the serious inflationary situation in the country and the importance of milk to an adequately nutritious diet, I ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare, in light of her responsibility as minister—which she may not realize—to give the House an undertaking that she will look into the consequences on the poor, the aged and the low income earners of this country of the 50 per cent price increase in powdered skim milk that will result from the inhumane action of the Minister of Agriculture by having it removed in the first place.

Miss Bégin: Mr. Speaker, that is a ridiculous way of making a representation on a problem that is badly presented. The general problem of those with low incomes in this country is my responsibility. This government looks after that mandate far more seriously than the hon. member opposite. I would very much like to see their social program for any election platform. I have not heard anything that even looks like redistribution or helping those in need.

Second, I, too, listen to the CBC. Two or three Sundays ago I saw a program, which was of concern to all Canadians, regarding the cost of skim milk powder in the hon. member's province of Newfoundland, where apparently some intermediaries in the food distribution process exaggerated their profits because the cost seemed to be unbearable. That, I regret to say, is not my responsibility.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I have a final supplementary for the minister, who just does not seem to appreciate the seriousness of this problem or her responsibility in addressing it. That is regrettable. In light of the impact this will have on the poor, the low income earners and the aged of this country, is the minister prepared to give an undertaking to this House that she will use part of her budget to pay for some of the surplus skim milk powder in this country and make it available to the poor and the aged?

Miss Bégin: Mr. Speaker, that is proof that the hon. member is not interested in a solution to the problem. He should have addressed that request to the minister who has the means to take such an approach. He deliberately asks me, as the Minister of National Health and Welfare, who does not have any other tools than those consisting of income supplementation programs. The hon. member knows very well the work we are trying to do. If he agrees with it, I will be before the committee tomorrow morning. I will be pleased to hear what his party has to say then, and he can give me his support.

FINANCE

AMENDMENTS TO BANK ACT

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question was for the Minister of Finance. As he is not here, I will address it to the Minister of Justice. Prior to the Easter adjournment, the Minister of Finance indicated that he had not received back from the drafting section of the Ministry of Justice the proposed amendments to the Bank Act. Is the Minister of Justice in a position to tell us when those instructions were received, what progress has been made, and when he anticipates his drafting section will be able to return the amendments to the Minister of Finance so that they may be introduced in the House?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Without answering all the details of the hon. member's question, Mr. Speaker, very considerable progress was made before and during the Easter recess. I hope the Minister of Finance will be in a position to introduce a bill very soon indeed.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I will address my supplementary to the Minister of Finance, who has returned to the chamber. The minister advised my colleagues earlier that a decision will be taken this week with regard to the presentation of a budget. Will he advise whether at the next full cabinet meeting there will be a decision as to when the amendments to the Bank Act will be introduced? In light of what has been said by the Minister of Justice, does the minister expect to introduce the new Bank Act provisions within the next fortnight?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, when the cabinet has decided, I will give the date to the House of Commons. However, I have nothing to add to the answer given by my colleague, the Minister of Justice.

COST-SHARING OF TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Will the Prime Minister inform the House whether his government is agreeing to finance 75 per cent of the cost of Trans-Canada Highway improvements in the province de Terre-Neuve or the Atlantic provinces generally? The provinces have asked for a 75-25 per cent sharing ratio with the federal government. The Minister of Transport said so far the federal government will only participate to the amount of 50 per cent. Has that now changed and have the proposals of Newfoundland and the Atlantic provinces been accepted by the federal government?

[Translation]

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, for a detailed and up-to-date report on the discussions, I refer the hon. member to the minister responsible for the negotiations, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

● (1502)

[English]

Mr. Crosbie: A further question to the Prime Minister. Since when has the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion replaced the Minister of Transport, who was the responsible minister in these negotiations with Newfoundland? Has the Prime Minister reallocated the duties of members of the cabinet?

[Translation]

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, through the Department of Regional Economic Expansion the government is spending huge funds for provincial infrastructures. Of course, the Minister of Transport also assumes some responsibilities and as the ministers of my cabinet refer to each other and co-operate, the hon. member can be assured that if one of them answers, I can answer for the other.

POST OFFICE

DELIVERY SERVICE TO NEW SUBDIVISIONS

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): I have a question for the Postmaster General, Mr. Speaker. The hon. gentleman has been back in his constituency and will now better understand the great demand which exists in new subdivisions for the extension of postal delivery services to those areas. I should like to know whether, after the Easter break, he is in a position to announce the government's intention to extend postal delivery services to these new areas. The people concerned are really mad about this.

[Translation]

Hon. J.-Gilles Lamontagne (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I must advise my colleague that I have just arrived from a visit in Edmonton which is in the vicinity of his constituency—

[English]

I listened carefully to all the remarks people were making in his constituency and I can assure the hon. member that I will make a careful assessment of what can be done with the means at our disposal.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The Postmaster General may understand that Saskatoon is in Saskatchewan. Will he give an undertaking to announce a delivery service to new subdivisions some time this month? Will he be able to make a statement of the government's intention this month?

Mr. Lamontagne: I am not aware of the particular problem in the hon. member's constituency. I will look into it and give him an answer.

HOLDBACK RESPECTING SKIM MILK POWDER—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Now that the dairy year has come to a close, I should like to ask whether, since stocks of skim milk powder have not accumulated at the rate anticipated, the minister is in a position to advise farmers that some proportion of the $7 holdback can now be rebated to those who have been penalized?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Not at this time, Mr. Speaker. The Canadian Dairy Commission is not in the business of giving away products. It does not make good sense that farmers should be penalized, if we are just going to give away the product on a world surplus market. Both the United States and the European Economic Community are in a surplus position with regard to skim milk powder.

I am sure the hon. member is aware that this year we withdrew the subsidy on skim milk powder, amounting to about $13 million, while at the same time transferring payments to pension indexing and social services, including family allowances, to the tune of $587 million in new funds. This money went into programs to help the poor of this country, and there is nothing inhumane about that at all, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Peters: The minister is a great one for answering everything but the question put to him. Farmers today are interested in knowing what the Canadian Dairy Commission is proposing for the coming year. When does the hon. gentleman anticipate he will be in a position to advise the House and the country with regard to the new dairy policy?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, this program is one which has taken a lot of time to put together—longer, indeed, than I had hoped—because of the need for consultation between provincial marketing groups and the producers themselves. A recommendation has now been placed before the government, and I hope within a few days we shall be able to announce that what has been one of the best dairy programs of any nation in the world will be even better than any seen in the past.

SKIM MILK POWDER

Question No. 35—Mr. Cossitt:

With reference to the Department of Agriculture's Dairy Programme announcement made on April 4, 1977, did the announcement state in part that the sum of $20,000,000 was budgeted for the Canadian International Development Agency to purchase skim milk powder for international food aid and, if so, how much has been spent to date, what was the disposition of the skim milk powder and if a balance remains, how will it be spent and how will the skim milk powder be disposed of?

Mr. Maurice Dupras (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): In so far as the Canadian International Development Agency is concerned, the answer is as follows: (a) Canadian Dairy Commission Policy No. 411,-871 dated April 1, 1977, stated that $20 million is budgeted for the Canadian International Development Agency (CIDA) to purchase skim milk powder for international food aid. (b) As of the February 8, 1978, CIDA has purchased $18,060,-741.25 or 36,654 metric tonnes of milk powder from its budget. (c) Disposition of the milk powder is outlined in table below. (d) The balance outstanding is held available to meet requests received from recipient countries, prior to the conclusion of this fiscal year (1977/78).

Question No. 458—Mr. Leggatt:

In each fiscal year since 1970, what amount was spent in the Constituency of New Westminster by the Department of Agriculture and those agencies that report to it?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Departmental accounting systems are not designed to provide expenditures by constituency. However, operational expenditures for offices located within the constituency are estimated as follows: 1970-71, $119,000; 1971-72, $128,000; 1972-73, $138,000; 1973-74,

The Canadian Dairy Commission has made no expenditures in the constituency of New Westminster.

CRISIS CENTRES

Question No. 962—Mr. Howie:

Since January 1, 1976, were studies made for the Department of the Solicitor General by outside consultants regarding crisis centres?

Mr. Rod Blaker (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): Yes. The Research and Systems Development Branch of the Department of the Solicitor General has entered into three research contracts to study crisis intervention techniques. One contract is with the University of Western Ontario for a research study to evaluate a crisis intervention strategy being used by the police in London, Ontario. The results of the study will be used to improve the effectiveness of intervention techniques in crisis situations, particularly those occurring during domestic disputes. A second contract is with the University of Ottawa for an exploratory study of the nature and effectiveness of rape crisis centers in responding to the needs of victims of rape. The United Way of greater Vancouver also has a research contract focussing on the social service role of the police, with particular reference to domestic crisis intervention.

[Mr. Whelan.]

This study has demonstrated that specific training of police officers is one effective technique in improving crisis intervention procedures. Canadian Penitentiary Service and National Parole Service, Royal Canadian Mounted Police, National Parole Board. Nil.

NEW BRUNSWICK—LAWYERS OR CONSULTANTS

Question No. 964—Mr. Howie:

Since January 1, 1977, did the Department of Labour engage outside lawyers or consultants in New Brunswick?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Yes.

LABOUR DISPUTES

Question No. 986—Mr. Howie:

Since January 1, 1976, has the Department of Labour conducted any studies into the use of a court-like forum for the settlement of labour disputes in substitution or prevention of strike action?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): The Department of Labour has under continuous review methods used for the prevention and settlement of labour disputes. Part V of the Canada Labour Code provides for a number of procedures, and for some flexibility of approach, to allow departmental intervention to be appropriate to the circumstances of each situation. Some of the existing procedures might be perceived as having characteristics of a "court-like forum." However, rigid, court-like attitudes and procedures are, in general, unsuitable for the expeditious handling of labour disputes and are not consistent with a free collective bargaining system.

STRIKE ACTION

Question No. 987—Mr. Howie:

Has the Department of Labour conducted any studies into alternatives to strike action since January 1, 1976?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): The Search for alternatives to strike action is a perennial one amongst major western industrial countries where collective bargaining is accepted as the most equitable and viable method of determining wages and working conditions. Over the past two years, the Canada Department of Labour has increased the activities aimed at improving the working environment and thus removing from the bargaining arena as many contentious issues as possible; improving the collective bargaining process by strengthening its legal framework, improving services and reducing delays; and improving the industrial relations system by fostering a sense of joint responsibility in making it work more efficiently and with less disruption.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. LEE—ELECTRONIC SURVEILLANCE

Mr. Art Lee (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. In view of Your Honour's earlier statement regarding electronic surveillance I wonder if Your Honour can assure the House that officers and principals of Uniserv Sound are not now operating within the precincts of parliament.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am not sure that the hon. member has a point of order. I understand his concern. However, I am, of course, not in a position to give any such assurance at this time, and I am not sure that I ever could be.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

NORTHERN PIPELINE ACT

ESTABLISHMENT OF AGENCY TO SUPERVISE PIPELINE CONSTRUCTION

The House resumed, from Wednesday, March 22, consideration of Bill C-25, to establish the Northern Pipeline Agency, to facilitate the planning and construction of a pipeline for the transmission of natural gas from Alaska and Northern Canada and to give effect to an Agreement between Canada and the United States of America on principles applicable to such a pipeline and to amend certain acts in relation thereto, as reported (with amendments) from the Special Committee on a Northern Gas Pipeline. And on motion No. 4 (Mr. Symes), and motion No. 6 (Mr. Holmes).

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I would first like to welcome back to the House the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) who was not with us on Tuesday, March 21, and Wednesday, March 22, when a major portion of these amendments was debated.

The minister's colleagues missed his presence. It is a pity that he was not here because the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas), who attended the majority of the committee meetings, seemed to have left his responsibilities to the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes), who advanced some rather empty, unintelligent, and innocuous amendments.

The amendments we were dealing with at the time of adjournment were motions Nos. 4 and 6 with respect to the injection of a native presence into the bill. I had made a few remarks with respect to the representations made by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie, but before I terminate my brief remarks I want to correct a mistaken impression which appears to have been held by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Milne). As stated by the hon. member for Lambton-Kent (Mr. Holmes), we on this side wanted to see a stronger amendment in the bill with respect to the native presence than that which is now set forth in motion No. 6. We wanted to see two elements in that amendment. We wanted to see, first, that the land which would be occupied along the route of the pipeline would be treated in such a manner that any existing native claims would not be prejudiced by that occupation.

Secondly, and equally as important, we wanted to reassure the native peoples that their ongoing negotiations toward a final settlement would not be prejudiced by the bill itself.

The first of those elements is in the amendment which the government has accepted. The second of those elements is not present. We settled on the basis of getting this much from the government. We would have liked to have seen the other element contained in the amendment. With those words I intend to leave the amendments with respect to native peoples. I believe that the amendment which the government finally did accept, as set forth in motion No. 6, adequately protects native interests not only in the Yukon but also in northern British Columbia as well as any which may exist in Alberta with respect to any interest the native peoples may have in the land on which the pipeline will be located. That, to my mind, covers the situation as far as the land itself is concerned, and adequately protects native claims. There was no such protection before, but this amendment will provide it.

I would like to say one last word about the position taken by the NDP. In essence it reflects the position which is being taken by the representations of the native people themselves. Members of the NDP say that there should be no development whatsoever until native claims are settled. The native organizations say there should be no development until their claims are settled. To my mind that is a totally irresponsible position to be taking.

Out of one side of their mouths members of the NDP are saying that we need jobs in Canada. They criticize the government, as we do, for bringing about a situation where there is in excess of one million unemployed, yet out of the other side of their mouths they try to throw up a roadblock by saying that there should be no pipeline whatsoever until native land claims are settled. They thereby would throw down the drain 100,000 man-years of employment.

It seems to me that members of the NDP cannot have it both ways. That is why, before the adjournment, I referred to them as being rather sanctimonious. It is quite a hypocritical stand for them to be taking. It is hypocritical to say that there should not be this development, thus dispensing effectively with the jobs they criticize the government for not creating. The stance of my party, as expressed by my leader repeatedly, is that there is no reason why negotiations for settlement of native claims cannot proceed hand in hand with any development, including the pipeline, without the one prejudicing the other.

No one has been able to convince me yet—and I invite members of the NDP to try—that the building of a pipeline would prejudice native land claims. No one has yet been able to convince me that the building of a road, the building of a bridge, or the bringing into being of a new mine would be prejudicial to the settlement of native land claims. I invite members of the NDP to tell me how they feel this would happen. It just would not happen at all.

Native peoples negotiate on the basis of land, cash, royalties and so forth. Whatever land is to be occupied by the development of a new mine can be negotiated on the basis of royalties. That has been done elsewhere in this country, and elsewhere in the western world where native land claims have been settled. There is no reason why that cannot be done here. In his ignorance of the Yukon the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie does not realize that 90 per cent of the native people in the Yukon do not share the views expressed by their leaders down here when they appear before committees. The Minister of State (Environment) (Mr. Marchand) is listening very carefully, and he knows what I say is true. Millions of dollars are poured into the support of native organizations, which are headed by bureaucrats.

Since 1973 well over $40 million or $50 million has been poured into native organizations in the Yukon, yet the kids in Pelly Crossing, Ross River Upper Liard and other native Yukon communities are still running around with no jeans on their backsides. So one wonders where the money goes, particularly when one legal counsel is paid $95,000 a year for a great many years. The present legal counsel is being paid $65,000 a year, and he was just appointed last June.

One wonders whether these moneys are being properly spent. The native people of the Yukon are not seeing the benefits. If they would come to an agreement in principle and pick up the $50 million which is now lying on the table waiting for them to pick up, they would be ready and capable of being part of the economic activity and development which will take place as part of the pipeline. However, instead of taking that sensible course, the result of the course they are taking is the loss of $400,000 a month in interest on that money. The economic and social conditions which exist in their villages throughout the Yukon will continue to exist while they adopt that dog-in-the-manger attitude.

It does them no good, it does the country no good, and it does the Yukon as a whole no good for any segment of the population anywhere along that line to adopt the attitude that they will prevent a project of such magnitude—a project that would bring about national benefits—for the sake of having a lever for the purpose of bringing about what they think will be a favourable settlement. On the contrary, it is in their best interest, just as it is in the national best interest and in the over-all best interest of the Yukon, to see that this project goes ahead without prejudice to the final settlement of their native land claims.

● (1522)

With those words stating our position on the matter I will leave those amendments, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Symes: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am sure the hon. member for the Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) would not want to misrepresent my position as put forward in the amendment. He knows full well that I am of the belief that the native land claims would be settled by 1981 or 1983. I would like to put this question to him: does he seriously believe that Foothills will be able to raise the necessary finances for this type of pipeline without the issue of native land claims having been settled first? I see no investor who would be willing to invest—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. Is the House ready for the question?

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I rise to make a few comments in response to some of the ridiculous statements made by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) who criticized my colleague, the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes), for moving the amendment and for putting forth the arguments he did, one of his reasons being that the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie had not attended meetings of the committee.

The hon. member for Yukon should be the last member in the House to talk about attendance of members of parliament, because he himself is so frequently absent from the House. The hon. member for Yukon knows, or should know, that the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie was not a member of that committee, that our member on the committee which dealt with this bill was the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas), who listened to all the evidence, who participated in the debate, and who holds exactly the same positions on the issue as the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie. If he were here today—I think he will be here later on this afternoon—he would be making arguments on precisely the same lines as those made by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie.

I am surprised that the hon. member for Yukon, who professes to be interested in the welfare of the native people of this country, should express surprise that we raise issues which are of concern to the native people. He has native people in his constituency, and he must know that the native people in his constituency, as in every other area of this country, have consistently been ignored, that whether one looks at the standards of education, the standards of health or standards of employment, the native people are at the bottom of the heap.

The infant mortality rate of native people is dramatically higher than that of any other group in this country; the educational attainments of the native people over the years have improved but they are still at the bottom of the totem pole, and the employment of native people is still worst of any group in this country. In the cities of Canada they find it almost impossible to find employment, and on the reserves unemployment runs at anywhere from 50 per cent to 95 per cent.

It is not surprising, therefore, that native people have been very suspicious—not just the native people in the Yukon but those in every part of Canada—of the supposed good intentions of the white people and of both the federal and provincial governments. It is not surprising, because they have had such bad experiences in the past. They know that the agreements and treaties have simply not been lived up to, and certainly have not been amended or changed to meet their needs in modern times. They have not been changed so that the spirit, which was supposedly contained in the treaties when they were originally signed, has any meaning in modern times.

Based on the experience of the native people in all parts of Canada, and based on the history of Canada, we have come to the conclusion—and we know we are right—that should the pipeline be proceeded with and should all the details, except those pertaining to native land claims, be proceeded with and the pipeline begun, the chances of the native people of the Yukon getting a fair and equitable settlement are virtually nil.

I suggest to the hon. member for Yukon that when he proposes, as he did consistently in his speech, that the pipeline be proceeded with immediately and the question of native land claims settled later, what he is saying in fact is that the native land claims are not important and that they would be settled probably at 2 cents on the dollar after the project has begun. That is the only clout which the native people of the Yukon have, and we saw a dramatic example of just how this works with regard to the James Bay claims.

Does the hon. member for Yukon really believe that if the native people of James Bay had not gone to court and had not been able to get a court order holding up the James Bay project, they would have achieved the kind of settlement which they got? There is not a chance in the world that that would have happened. If the James Bay people got a settlement which goes at least part way toward meeting their fair claims and which gives them the right to exclusive use of a fairly large piece of land in their ancestral homeground, if they got a large amount of money which will be used to help them develop alternative methods of employment, it is because they had the power, through the courts before the project was completed, of holding up the project. So when the hon. member for the Yukon says that we should leave this issue until later and go ahead with the project right now, what he is saying is that this project is so important to the non-native people of Canada that we must go ahead with it right away, and in doing so he is prepared to sacrifice the basic rights and needs of the native people of this country. We are not prepared to do that.

The hon. member for Yukon knows full well that no one in the NDP has tried to hold up the passage of this bill. He knows that this bill will pass in this session of parliament; it will probably be passed in the next few days. So when he says that we are prepared to stop this bill, he knows that what he is saying is not in fact correct. First of all, to put the case of the native people in the way in which it has not been done, certainly by the hon. member for the Yukon, I have a feeling he may not be speaking for all members of the Conservative party. Certainly he did not put the case for the native people, particularly those in his own constituency. By moving this amendment, we are attempting to provide the House with a clear opportunity to vote on a proposal suggesting that this project should not be proceeded with until the native land claims have been settled.

If the government is prepared to deal with native land claims in the Yukon in a fair and equitable manner, surely it should not be difficult to reach an agreement. The manner in which the government has blown hot and cold over the years on the question of native land claims is what bothers me. I put some questions on the order paper last October. They were not answered until a couple of weeks ago. At that time we saw how generously the lawyers who have acted for the native groups in the Yukon, the Northwest Territories, northern Manitoba and the James Bay area have been treated. They have been paid hundreds of thousands—millions of dollars—to act on behalf of native people in the courts in an attempt to protect their rights. I commend the government for that. I think the government should have done that, and I am glad it was done. The government then turned around and appointed people to negotiate on behalf of the government with native people. My experience indicates that the people appointed have very little sympathy for the rights and needs of native people. I am talking about the former cabinet minister, for example, who will be negotiating with the native people in the Northwest Territories. The government has blown hot and cold on this entire question of dealing with native people, their rights, and an equitable settlement in the near future.

No land claim settlement will jeopardize the construction of the pipeline. Failure to settle the land claims will create financing problems. Until there is a settlement, and as long as native people have the right to go to court in an attempt to block the construction of the project, as they did in James Bay, no financial institution will be willing to lend money to the pipeline construction, because they will not know when the project will begin, when it will be constructed finally, nor when the gas will move down the pipeline to the United States. The sales of gas to the United States will enable the companies involved to commence paying back the money which they borrowed for the construction.

This amendment will not hold up the construction of the pipeline. On the contrary, we are attempting to ensure that when the bill is passed there will be no difficulties created, nor will legal delays be possible which would postpone construction and place the entire project in jeopardy. We are attempting to guarantee native people that their land claims will be settled before the project goes ahead. It would be a guarantee to native people, as well as telling the government to get off its rear end and begin to negotiate seriously. We do not need the type of procrastination which we have experienced again and again. So-called negotiations have gone on from generation to generation, and not just for a year or two.

We urge hon. members to support this amendment. We feel it will make the bill stronger rather than weaker. Also it will facilitate the construction of the pipeline, rather than hold it up.

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie) moved:

Motion No. 8.

That Bill C-25, An Act to establish the Northern Pipeline Agency, to facilitate the planning and construction of a pipeline for the transmission of natural gas from Alaska and Northern Canada and to give effect to an Agreement between Canada and the United States of America on principles applicable to such a pipeline and to amend certain Acts in relation thereto, be amended in Schedule III at page 51 by striking out the third line of paragraph 9(a) and substituting the following therefor:

"plan consistent with paragraphs 3(e) and 3(f) and particularly sub-clause 21(2) of this Act designed to guarantee the maximum possible use of".

Motion No. 9.

That Bill C-25, An Act to establish the Northern Pipeline Agency, to facilitate the planning and construction of a pipeline for the transmission of natural gas from Alaska and Northern Canada and to give effect to an Agreement between Canada and the United States of America on principles applicable to such a pipeline and to amend certain Acts in relation thereto, be amended in Schedule III at page 51 by (a) striking out lines 1 to 3 of paragraph 10(a) and substituting the following therefor:

"(a) the company shall design a program consistent with paragraphs 3(e) and 3(f) and particularly sub-clause 21(2) of this Act for the procurement of all goods and services for the pipeline that guarantees that"

(b) deleting sub-paragraphs 10(a)(i) and 10(a)(ii) and substituting the following therefor:

"(i) where productive capacity exists in Canada preference will be given to Canadian sources in the procurement of such goods and services and their constituent components,

(ii) the level of Canadian content is at least 90 per cent with respect to the origin of products, services and their constituent components,".

Motion No. 10.

That Bill C-25, An Act to establish the Northern Pipeline Agency, to facilitate the planning and construction of a pipeline for the transmission of natural gas from Alaska and Northern Canada and to give effect to an Agreement between Canada and the United States of America on principles applicable to such a pipeline and to amend certain Acts in relation thereto, be amended in Schedule III at page 52 by striking out the last line of sub-paragraph 10(b)(ii) and substituting the following therefor:

"trade practices such as dumping, direct and indirect industrial subsidies, transportation subsidies and special tax incentives;".

He said: Mr. Speaker, motions Nos. 8, 9 and 10 standing in my name relate to the question of maximizing and guaranteeing Canadian content in the northern pipeline project. Motion No. 8 seeks to maximize and guarantee the Canadian labour content of the project. Motion No. 9 seeks to maximize and guarantee Canadian content in the pipeline itself, the steel and all other associated projects. Motion No. 10 seeks to define unfair trade practices for clarification, and to strengthen the bill before us so we will not have Canadian companies facing unfair foreign competition when bidding for contracts on this great project.

● (1542)

I should like to deal briefly with motion No. 8, because motion No. 9 is the most substantive and everything else relates to it. The labour content will, of course, relate to the material content of the pipeline.

Given the high state of unemployment in this country, with 1 million officially out of work, but with real unemployment, taking into account hidden unemployment, being somewhere around 1.5 million to 1.6 million, surely we should ensure that this project to build this pipeline from the Alaska gas fields through Canada to the United States provides the maximum possible employment for Canadian labour.

As I said before, the pipeline traverses Canadian territory, but in the foreseeable future we will not be deriving benefits from the natural gas flowing through it. Indeed, we will have to rely at some future date on the construction of the Dempster lateral, if and when it is built. In return for giving our American friends this land bridge to move their gas to their southern markets, surely it is not unreasonable to expect that we should get the maximum labour and material content in respect of this project.

The reason we are moving the amendments is that despite the assurances of the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) that we are going to have 100,000 man-years of employment, we are suspicious that this actually will be the case. The reasons for our suspicion were outlined at the second reading stage and I do not have to go into them at this time in great detail.

There are a number of points that should be remembered. First, the guarantee of the Deputy Prime Minister is verbal. It is nowhere stated in the legislation, and it can change as ministers, governments, or what have you change. For this reason we want to take the Deputy Prime Minister at his word and include in the legislation some of the concepts and figures he has given in this House. We have found in the past that what we had been promised by the Liberal government one day has not necessarily turned out to be the case a few months later.

We are also concerned that we will not get the 100,000 man-years promised by the Deputy Prime Minister. If one looks at the various reports put out by both U.S. and Canadian government departments estimating man-years, one will find quite a discrepancy. The company, in testimony before the National Energy Board, gave different figures. We find, for example, that the Department of Regional Economic Expansion commissioned a study on the pipeline and manpower, and concluded that unless we have guarantees written into the legislation, such as proposed by the NDP in its motions, we will not have 100,000 man-years of employment as promised by the Deputy Prime Minister, but something more like 67,000 man-years.

In addition, I referred to examples of United States government departments which also are very optimistic that the United States will get a high proportion of the labour content of this pipeline. They pretty well exclude all Canadian labour on the Alaska portion. The estimates in the United States are that the maximum we can get is about 3 per cent Canadian employment on that section of the line, and virtually nil in respect of the other portion in the United States.

We all remember, of course, that the United States has very many skilled pipeline labourers from the Alaskan, Alyeska Pipeline project available and ready to move in, if and when the opportunity arises. I know there is to be a monitoring agency in an attempt to maximize jobs for people in those areas through which the pipeline will be running, but we all know that the economic determinant here is skilled labour, and that much of that skilled labour is American.

My concern is that unless we have some very strong legislative guarantees we will not have the kind of man-years of employment promised again and again by the Deputy Prime Minister. We are supported in this, for example, by a department of this government, namely, the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. I would also refer to a report put out by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce of this government, entitled "Canadian Industrial and Manpower Requirements and Content for a Northern Gas Pipeline." This was an analysis published on February 24, 1978. It looks at various pipeline applications at the time; Arctic Gas and Alcan as well. At page 22 of this report it is stated:

> The study indicates that most, if not all, of the manpower requirements can be met in Canada. The Department of Manpower and Immigration has presented a policy statement to the Pipeline Commissioner to reflect the objective of 100 per cent Canadian labour sourcing. However, should foreign labour sourcing be necessary, care would have to be taken to ensure that Canadian worker content is optimized. In addition, it may be necessary to develop mechanisms to deal with a possible "spillover" of Alaska wage rates into the Canadian labour sector.

The report of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce indicates that we do have the labour available and, if given a fair chance, we can ensure that Canadians get the jobs.

In addition, the same report notes at page 7:

> It should be noted that apparent pressures from U.S.A. sources have caused Alcan to engage separate U.S.A. engineering management firms for the Alaska portion of the line despite the obvious efficiency of using the Canadian engineering team already assembled.

That gives rise to my concern that we are going to face a lot of pressure from Americans when both the bidding and construction get under way. There will be pressure to have American skilled labour used to the greatest extent possible on this pipeline project. For this reason we should strengthen every clause in the bill that supposedly assures us we will have maximum Canadian labour content.

Motion No. 8 strengthens the verbal commitment of the Deputy Prime Minister by the wording in the legislation.

Motion No. 9 deals with Canadian content, and seeks to again obtain hard, written guarantees in the legislation, particularly if we are going to have maximum Canadian content including steel, valve, and other industrial components.

To begin with I should like to examine what spokesmen for Foothills, the company that is to build this vast project, have said before the National Energy Board. In undertakings given in testimony before the National Energy Board, Foothills promised compliance in certain respects. At page 6D3 it is stated:

● (1552)

> The Applicant believes this policy of "Canadian Goods and Services First" will be in the best long term interest of all Canadians because:
> 1. The expertise gained by industry and the workmen involved will remain in Canada and will be available for future projects within Canada. In addition, this knowledge will provide a valuable commodity for export to countries in a less favoured position.
>
> 2. The expanded facilities and capability will provide Canada with a more diversified and stable industrial sector.
> 3. The Canadian purchases will produce positive employment and economic impact on the regional areas where the goods are produced.

I am sure my colleague in Cape Breton-East Richmond is very concerned about the regional spin-offs of such a pipeline construction in the steel industry.

4. A significant portion of the incomes generated by purchases of Canadian goods and services will be spent in Canada, generating further economic benefits. There will also be, because of import substitution, a positive effect on the balance of trade.

So, here was Foothills before the National Energy Board arguing that maximizing Canadian content of this project would have beneficial spinoffs in all areas of the Canadian economy, and we agree. That is why we would like to see some of the promises and undertakings before the NEB reinforced in this legislation that is before us. When it is left to wording such as maximize or optimize and so on, the whole percentage content can vary quite dramatically, and that is why I would like to see some specifics. In my motion I suggest that at least 90 per cent, as the Deputy Prime Minister has said on many occasions, of the content of the pipeline should be Canadian.

We are confident that on a competitive basis, and with that 90 per cent guarantee, there would be no price gouging, and certainly the amendment that we moved earlier, which was unfortunately ruled out of order, was to ensure that. In light of the guarantee, if there was any kind of exorbitant increase in prices, then the government would, of course, have the option of accepting bids outside Canada or from non-Canadian producers. Indeed, as I understand the treaty, that is still the case.

The treaty calls for competitive bidding and probably it would take precedence over some sections of the legislation before us. The fact that Foothills has said it would be a benefit and has given a kind of commitment that it will try to maximize Canadian content for us, is not quite good enough. We want to see that guarantee in the legislation. And why so? Looking at so many of the background reports that have been done on this pipeline, one gets the uneasy feeling that we may end up with less than the Deputy Prime Minister has been promising us. I refer to the report done by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, on page 3:

Given that American firms are very well placed to win contracts for the U.S.A. portions, they, as a result, are in a more favourable position to bid on contracts for the Canadian segment by being able to pass on to the pipeline contractor some portions of the savings to be achieved by combining the Canadian requirements with their existing production for the U.S.A. sections of the line.

Here is another government report which analyses the situation and raises the concern that without these kinds of guarantees there is a natural advantage to the American contractors and bidders.

And again from the same report on page 5:

The danger that sales contracts of Canadian branch plants of foreign multinationals which exceeded their existing capacity would simply be transferred to the non-Canadian parent instead of to alternative Canadian suppliers. Similar problems could occur if the low cost offshore plants were to be used to fill a bid made and originally intended for the successful Canadian subsidiary.

Here is another concern that, because of the branch-plant nature of our economy, if a subsidiary of an American company or any other company could not meet the requirements of the orders, rather than a Canadian company getting the surplus work it would be transferred to a parent company of that subsidiary. In other words, the possibility of diminishing Canadian content exists. It is a reality and has been acknowledged by a department of this government.

From the same report I point out on page 9, which deals with the pipeline itself:

Competition in world markets is intense and Canadian companies could be outbid by the pricing strategies of Japanese and European pipe producers. Projections by steel experts reflect a tough world competitive situation.

Again, we are committed to accepting bids on a world-wide basis, and we know—I will get into this when I move to my motion No. 10—that they are all unfair trading practices that foreign governments use with their industry to bring the cost of steel pipe below actual costs of production. If that happens, our steel manufacturers will be at a competitive disadvantage. They will not be able to meet these foreign bids. My fear is that there is no mechanism provided to stop that from going on. That is why I want this amendment in the bill.

The Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce study and report concerns me because it looks at the matter of pipe fittings and concludes that there may be difficulty in maximizing Canadian content. They state at page 10 of their report:

The Canadian supply market for pipe fittings has been dominated historically by wholesalers, who distribute imports mainly from Japan and the U.S.A., and distributing subsidiaries of large U.S. producers. These latter subsidiaries have historically procured the rough product from their U.S. parents and only minor additional value is added in Canada. If this situation is not to be perpetuated, it must be clearly stated that Canada expects a high Canadian content for pipe fittings manufacture, at least for the Canadian sections.

Going to page 11 it states:

Unless some form of initiatives in Canadian policy are taken there will be a great temptation to procure pipe fittings from abroad, especially low-priced imports from Japan.

Once again, Mr. Speaker, the studies that have gone on indicate that we should be concerned with maximizing Canadian content, and my amendment will guarantee us that maximizing that we all want.

When we look at the Foothills undertaking before the National Energy Board, they state on page 6D-2 under "Project Procurement":

The Applicant will purchase goods and services from sellers who provide the best combination of price, delivery, service and quality. This normal commercial purchasing criteria will, however, be specifically tempered by the policy which one of the Applicant's sponsor companies (The Alberta Gas Trunk Line Company Limited) has historically followed. This policy is one "where a sufficient number of qualifying Canadian sellers are available to provide competitive quotes, AGTL will limit its bid list to Canadian suppliers." When bids must be solicited from non-Canadian sources, the policy is to "buy Canadian" whenever the order can so be filled, and when price is reasonably competitive.

● (1602)

Again, Foothills is in agreement with the kind of amendment that I am putting forward, if one believes the testimony given before the National Energy Board.

Canada has the capability to produce the material content. We have the skilled labour. Surely this will be a great boost, not only in the short-term but in the long-term, for our manufacturing sector which has declined so badly in the past decade. It should be a great chance to regain some lost business. This is why we say it should be put in the legislation to maximize the Canadian content.

Let us say, as I do in my amendment, that we have the 90 per cent figure as the Deputy Prime Minister is so fond of telling us. I know the argument he has advanced in committee and in this House—that we cannot put these guarantees into the legislation because that would contravene the GATT. I thought that this pipeline agreement was a bilateral agreement between Canada and the United States, like other bilateral agreements we have had in the past. I think of the auto pact. Surely under this circumstance we are not bound by the GATT agreement. This is a joint energy undertaking and therefore, in light of the fact that we are providing a land bridge, it is quite normal and reasonable that we should expect domestic content in the construction materials and labour used in the pipeline.

The report of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce notes precedents on pages 35 and 36 in respect of pipeline construction. The last paragraph on page 35 reads as follows:

> At the time the Alyeska pipeline was built, it was made clear to several Canadian suppliers that they would have little chance in obtaining contracts for U.S.A. business if similar goods could be obtained in the U.S.A. In fact, ATCO prefab buildings were the only significant Canadian item imported. Similar reports are now being heard vis-à-vis the U.S.A. portions of this pipeline. It should be recalled that significant portions of the Trans-Canada gas pipeline and of two major oil pipelines supplying the Canadian market (the Interprovincial and the Portland-Montreal pipeline) are located in the U.S.A. These portions were built by U.S. management and manpower using primarily U.S. equipment and supplies. Even today, tariffs continue to be paid in the U.S. on the movement of Canadian-owned oil. Thus, in view of this established pattern, it seems reasonable that we should seek to optimize the Canadian content of a northern pipeline, regardless of the ownership of the gas to be transported.

So we have precedents of joint energy undertakings by the two countries whereby the country that had the major part of the pipeline going through it received the majority of contracts for the labour and building of the pipeline. It would seem to me that the Canadian portion of the line would not contravene GATT or anger the United States unduly if we insisted upon maximizing Canadian content for it.

I am somewhat amazed at the way the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) leaps to the defence of the government on this issue, saying that we do not really need these guarantees in the legislation. I recall the comments of the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander). There is a steel plant in his area, and in the past he has called for guarantees. I recall, as well, the comments of the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie), who is worried that without guarantees the pipeline is a sell-out. I was struck not only by his wit but his good sense when he referred to the spurious argument put forward by the government, that the GATT prevented us from having guarantees in the legislation. As reported at page 2866 of Hansard he said:

> The industry, trade and commerce report says that if we word it carefully we would have no problem with GATT. But this will not solve the project engineering services that are not affected by GATT. Japan, Germany and the United States don't care about GATT. The only ones who care about GATT are those in this "GATT government". The Canadian people have to get this GATT government so that it will not get them.

[Mr. Symes.]

As I say, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Yukon and other members of the Conservative party who have castigated this government for not making policy, and for its disastrous handling of the unemployment situation all of a sudden embrace as the stone tablet from Mount Sinai, so to speak, the words of the Deputy Prime Minister as being good for all time. Yet they should not trust this minister and the government, but should want guarantees written into the legislation, rather than take their word that there will be some monitoring agency under the control of this government which, as we all know, will be dealing with so many matters after the fact, and we will not get the content we want.

I predict that without these amendments we will not get the 90 per cent content or the 100,000 man-hours of employment the government is so fond of talking about.

Motion No. 10 relates to the unfair trade practices part of the bill. When I think of the way this government has failed to defend Canadian industry, large or small, against unfair trade practices, I wonder how serious it is about making sure we are not underbid on contracts because of these unfair trade practices. That is why I moved my amendment to define what is meant by unfair trade practices so that the government cannot get off the hook when some of these problems occur. The amendment reads in part as follows:

> "trade practices such as dumping, direct and indirect industrial subsidies, transportation subsidies and special tax incentives;"

The history of the steel industry in this country is quite clear. Countries such as Japan have been able to dump steel on the Canadian market, and Algoma Steel has proved this. We know, for example, that in order to get the contract for a Mexican gas pipeline, United States steel companies deliberately underbid by 20 per cent the whole cost of production. The object was to keep the mills in production rather than suffer temporary lay-offs. I think it is very important, therefore, that the government take these unfair trade practices into account.

I was appalled at the statement made in this House by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) when he said that we do not have to worry because we have our anti-dumping legislation which will suffice. I wonder how effective that legislation or any of our legislation is when put against the United States DISC program or the transportation subsidies given to Japanese steel, or the hidden tax subsidies given to West German and Italian steel companies. I do not know whether the government is monitoring all these factors. I do not know whether it will be able to show us that it will really look at the situation, should it occur. When the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce stands in this House and gives a bland assurance that the anti-dumping legislation will suffice, I am appalled. We have it in Hansard that he let the cat out of the bag. He obviously was quoting from briefing notes, and quoted part of those notes he should not have.

● (1612)

I wish to refresh the memory of hon. members on this issue. It concerns the whole business of unfair competition. I refer to page 3035 of Hansard. With regard to state subsidies and special tax concessions such as DISC, the minister stated, and I quote:

> Action under the Anti-dumping Act could be taken in cases where exports into Canada are financed under more favourable terms than are available to the foreign manufacturer for its domestic sales. Under regulation (11A) of the Anti-dumping regulations, credit and other financing terms can be taken into account in determining the normal value, export price, and, hence, the margins of dumping under the meaning of the act.

As I say, he should have stopped there, but he continued to read from his briefing notes, and this embarrassing statement came out:

> It should be noted that neither (11A) of the Anti-dumping regulations nor the imposition of countervailing duties for reasons of export financing subsidies appear to have been tested as yet. Moreover, the anti-dumping option would really only come into play after the fact, which renders its use, other than as a threat mechanism, somewhat ineffective.

Need I say more about this government's intent of legislative capacity to protect our domestic producers from unfair foreign competition? That is what worries us. As the bill is written, we will have open world competition on contracts for the Alcan pipeline. We know from the past we have had unfair foreign competition.

Our steel industries can compete on a fair basis. We do not deny that. In fact, we support it. It is the unfair competition we are worried about. That is why the New Democratic Party has put in these amendments to try to strengthen the protection for the Canadian steel industry and construction industry, and for the Canadian worker.

Surely it is only reasonable and logical that we do all we can to strengthen the legislation. As we all know, legislation is much more binding than any undertaking before the National Energy Board or any assurance, inside or outside this House, by a minister of the Crown. That is why we moved these amendments. I commend them to the House.

Everyone knows that we in this party are in favour of going ahead, but under the conditions that we maximize Canadian content and Canadian job creation, and prevent our industry losing these important contracts through unfair foreign competition. That is why we have moved these amendments to strengthen the bill. We do not have confidence in the minister or in any of the monitoring committees controlled by this government to effect what otherwise should be in the legislation.

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I want to make some comments on this matter of Canadian content. It is vital to future employment in a steel plant in Canada that is in very serious condition. When talking about the steel industry, everyone seems to talk about the Ontario steel industry. There is another important plant, not as important now for the whole of the national economy as in the past, but terribly important for the people of Nova Scotia, especially those in eastern Nova Scotia and Cape Breton Island. There is another plant, not one that is integrated such as Stelco, Algoma or Dofasco, in Regina which is also very important. It must be considered in relation to what will come out of this pipeline as far as Canadian content is concerned.

In order to put my concerns about the Sydney steel plant in perspective, I want to quote from a meeting of the Standing Committee on Regional Development held on Tuesday, March 21, 1978. I will skip over some parts and attempt not to distort the meaning of what was said, in an effort to get hon. members to realize that it is not only the Ontario steel industry involved here or whether the Ipsco plant in Regina will take part in these orders. In reality, world competitive conditions will decide in the ultimate analysis whether Canada will get a proper share of the pipe contracts.

I am not a member of this particular committee and, therefore, have not attended the committee meetings. However, I gather from what members of this party and other opposition members are saying, we are faced with a situation in which the determination of the steel content of the pipeline will be world competitive economic conditions.

The Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen), is basing a lot of fact on two points. The minister has said something very often. Many would probably be inclined to agree with him. I would question whether it is so. The last member of our party who spoke and most other members of our party feel the same about this. The two points emphasized by the Deputy Prime Minister are, first, that the Hamilton Stelco plant, with its pipe mill at Welland, does not have any worry. Because of its efficiency, it can compete against the Americans, Japanese, Italians and other Europeans. The type of pipe that will be used, the diameter and so on, will result in some spinoff to the Ipsco plant in Regina. Second, in addition, there will be a monitoring agency which will look at whether any unfair competitive practices will be followed by world competitors.

The Deputy Prime Minister and the government seem to believe that will guarantee us a fair share of the market, that it will mean 90 per cent Canadian content. I remind hon. members that, in the ultimate analysis, the Deputy Prime Minister is only saying that, in his opinion, the Canadian plants are capable of making this pipe and can compete because of their efficiency. That is the only guarantee we have.

You do not have to read too much Canadian economic history to realize that many types of barriers have been erected by other countries, especially the Japanese industry, which is a very different type of structured steel industry from our own.

● (1622)

Anyone who is familiar with the situation knows that the world steel industry is not an easy one to monitor. The previous speaker reminded us that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner), referring to anti-dumping regulations, had mentioned that section 11(a) had never really been tested. To my mind we are being totally unrealistic if we think only in terms of competition between Canada and the United States for these steel contracts in regard to the pipeline while completely ignoring the Italians, the rest of the European producers, and Japan.

The government appears to be depending upon world competitive conditions to maximize Canadian content. But consider the Japanese steel industry, for example. It is a private industry in the sense that it is owned by private shareholders. But aside from the fact that it receives the type of assistance which all corporations are given today under a mixed capitalist system, by way of deferred taxes, special depreciation allowances and so on, the Japanese steel industry is unique. Competing against the Japanese steel industry is not a matter of company against company; it is a matter of individual companies in Canada or the United States competing with the Japanese government.

The alliance between the Japanese government, industry, and labour has led to a unique situation. I do not know how many hon. members have read a fairly recent publication by Kenneth Galbraith entitled The New Industrial State. One of the reviewers of that book, another professor from Harvard University, said Mr. Galbraith, in his book, had given his readers new insights into the nature of multinational corporations and what are referred to as oligopolistic corporations, which means four or five industries which are capable of controlling output in such a way as to operate a good deal independent of the normal market restraints of supply and demand. As the previous speaker was making his point about the necessity of guarantees it occurred to me that the thesis of Mr. Galbraith's book was probably more applicable to the Japanese economy than to the economy of the United States. This is important because I believe the government itself has recently begun to realize that the economy is not working in the way the textbooks say it should. Things are not as they appeared when I taught Economics 100 and Economics 200.

Industry in Japan is so structured that it amounts to a corporate state in which private ownership is allowed to exist subject to a great deal of public control and regulation. The Japanese are not very interested in seeing that a particular steel firm makes a profit. They are concerned about whether that steel plan can produce efficiently enough to provide the steel necessary for construction, and especially for automobiles, at rates which will maintain Japanese exports in a strong position against world competition.

The point I am trying to make—and this is the third time I have repeated it—is this: in signing this guarantee, or in concluding this bilateral agreement with the United States, we acted under the assumption that the competition would largely be between Canadian and U.S. firms. The minister has contended that the provisions of GATT prevent us from insisting on guarantees. However, as the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes) has so well argued, this is no ordinary agreement. It is a special agreement. Why is it a special agreement? It is special because we are giving the Americans a land bridge so that they may transport a product which they desperately need. Surely this is not the kind of multilateral agreement which is covered by GATT. I maintain it is a special type of bilateral agreement.

Not only are there non-tariff barriers surrounding the steel industry which are very difficult to fathom, but firms in western Europe, and, of course, in Japan, are supported by government to an extent far greater than is the case in North America. This being the case there is a great deal of doubt in my mind that we shall be able to reach the figure of 90 per cent to which the Deputy Prime Minister has referred.

An hon. Member: He is naive.

Mr. Hogan: I am not sure whether it is naivete. But as I understand the way in which the international steel industry works, his reasoning leaves a lot to be desired as far as I can see. If the agreement had specified that the competition would be between Canada and the United States, we would today be in a different ball game altogether. Indeed, I would be inclined to agree with the thinking of the Deputy Prime Minister. But that is not the case. The companies which will be providing the gas obviously wish to keep their costs down so that they can make as much profit as possible. A number of the steel plants in the EEC countries, especially Italy, are in a position to supply the material which is needed. They have surplus capacity and they can produce the pipe. This being the case, I fear we may have to settle for 60 or 70 per cent instead of the 90 per cent the minister promised. Such a reduction would make an immense difference to the Sydney steel plant.

I know the Deputy Prime Minister is concerned in a general way that the Sydney steel plant should benefit from a spin-off effect in the form of orders for slabs and other materials which would be sent to Stelco, for example, which is expected to get a large share of the contract. But unless Canada gets 90 per cent of the work, there is little chance there will be any spin-off to the benefit of Cape Breton at a time the plant there desperately needs a shot in the arm.

● (1632)

When I asked Mr. McGee about this in the meeting of the regional economic committee, he told me it would take a year to a year and a half to complete studies on Sysco's renovation. The Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Lessard) is here, and he knows that what I am saying is true with regard to studies and action on the modernization of the Sydney steel plant, as reported by Mr. McGee, the Atlantic region administrator of DREE. Mr. Kent is the president of the Sydney Steel Corporation which, as most hon. members know, is under the provincial government of Nova Scotia and not under Devco where it should be, and when Mr. Kent appeared before the industry committee of the Nova Scotia government last week, he said that there would be a plan presented by the end of May. However, as I mentioned, just two weeks ago Mr. McGee told me that it would take a year to a year and a half before the studies would be completed and before it would be possible to take action. Mr. McGee went into detail, and I appreciated that very much. I am concerned about many things in this regard, but this is not the time to raise them all. I am concerned, however, about what will happen in the meantime, and one thing the Sydney plant vitally needs is a spin-off from the effects of this northern gas pipeline.

The Deputy Prime Minister is trained in economics, just as I have an academic economic background, and he knows that there is no way that there can be guarantees when the bidding is open to world competition. The Stelco pipe mill in Welland is very efficient, but there is still no way that we can provide guarantees when contracts will be open to world competition that Canadian firms will win as much as 90 per cent. As pointed out by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie as well as by myself, it is one thing to talk about North American competition, but it is another thing to allow Japanese competition and the competition of others who are helped in numerous ways by their governments, and who look at the steel industry in a different way than we in North America do. That is the reason I express fear about the lack of guarantees in this all-important legislation. My party is strongly in favour of this pipeline, but I also support the amendment in the name of the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie.

I know how difficult it must have been in the bilateral negotiations for Canada to reach this agreement with the United States, but it seems to me that history will record that the Deputy Prime Minister, who had the onerous job of conducting negotiations on our behalf, would have done better to have said to this House that we can expect to be able to compete because Stelco has an efficient plant in Welland and because there is a plant at Regina. However, the Deputy Prime Minister should also have said that since we are unable to exclude the Europeans and the Japanese from bidding and since the pipeline people want to keep costs down and make a profit, the goals of 100,000 man-years of employment and 90 per cent Canadian content will not be met. I think that would have been more realistic.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired. He may continue, however, with unanimous consent. Does the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. Hogan) have unanimous consent to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Hogan: Mr. Speaker, I thank hon. members for giving me additional time. I will take just one minute to repeat that I am convinced that the government has been trying to use the excuse that GATT will not allow us to enter into a special agreement with the United States, which I do not buy. I do not agree that the Anti-dumping Tribunal and the monitoring agency will be sufficient. I am not convinced that there will be 90 per cent Canadian content. I am willing to bet that the government cannot ensure 90 per cent Canadian content.

Mr. Kent recently described the steel plant in Cape Breton as an orphan which depends very much on selling semi-finished steel to big producers like Stelco, and the result of this lack of guarantees will be that the steel plant will suffer. Despite the difficulties which would be involved in negotiations we ought to have had guarantees. To repeat, I think our negotiators misunderstood the world competitive situation. Our negotiators were thinking in terms of Canadian-American relationships and forgot about the large role governments play in countries such as Japan and Italy. That role will make a big difference in the final analysis with regard to this pipeline.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The question is on motion No. 8 in the name of the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes). Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

• (1642)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Pursuant to Standing Order 75(11) the recorded division on the motion stands deferred.

Motion No. 9 standing in the name of the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie—

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I believe that the vote on motion No. 8 disposes of motions Nos. 9 and 10.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): No.

Mr. Nielsen: That is the way I had it from Mr. Speaker when he was in the chair.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Motions Nos. 9 and 10 deal with manpower and procurement and the conditions set out in schedule III and should be grouped for debate, with a vote on motion No. 8 and another one on motions Nos. 9 and 10.

The question is therefore on motions Nos. 9 and 10. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motions?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): All those in favour of the motions will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Call in the members.

● (1702)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question is on motion No. 1 in the name of the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes). The question on this motion will dispose also of motion No. 11.

EDUCATION

SUGGESTED ESTABLISHMENT OF OFFICE OF EDUCATION

The House resumed, from Monday, October 31, 1977, consideration of the motion of Mr. Herbert:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of establishing an office of education, to conduct research in the provinces with the co-operation of the provincial governments and also in other countries, to consider the provisions of federal financial assistance for second language training in elementary and high schools and to disseminate information with a view to improving the education of Canadian youth.

Mr. Hugh A. Anderson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak against the motion moved by the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) that the government should consider the advisability of establishing an office of education. I believe that at this time, when we are all concerned about fostering national unity, such a move would be regarded with deep distrust as an intrusion by the government of Canada into an area of provincial responsibility. Such a move would serve only to widen the gulf between the different levels of government rather than pulling us closer together as seems to be necessary today.

Historically, at the time of confederation the government of Canada played no role in education in Canadian society and the British North America Act placed the responsibility for education with provincial governments. The Government of Canada has been and is directly responsible for education in the Yukon and the Northwest Territories, in the armed forces, in the penitentiary service, and for the education of Canada's native peoples.

Throughout our nation's history there have been many occasions on which the government of Canada has been called upon to play an active role in educational developments. For example, the government of Canada became involved in education in response to the educational demands of industrialization in the early 1900's, the demands of veterans returning from two world wars, and the enormous expansion of post-secondary enrolments in the 1960's. In each case, participation by the government of Canada was effected without usurping the authority of provincial governments and for the benefit of the country as a whole.

In 1966 Prime Minister Pearson clearly stated the position of the government of Canada with respect to education. He said:

Education is, under our constitution, a matter of provincial jurisdiction. The federal government does not dispute this or wish in any way to do so. At the same time, education is obviously a matter of profound importance to the economic and social growth of the country as a whole . . . the federal government accepts primary responsibility for employment and economic activity generally in the country. We recognize that provincial governments share our concern in these matters and pursue these common aims in the conduct of their own affairs.

I believe that a review of the history of the involvement of the Government of Canada in education will demonstrate clearly that this involvement has occurred without usurping the constitutional rights of the provincial authorities.

● (1742)

Participation by the government of Canada in education dates back to 1876 when, in an effort to train more Canadians to serve as army officers, the Royal Military College was established at Kingston. Another early step was a 150,000 acre land endowment to the University of Manitoba in 1885, as provision for capital expenditures and establishment of a permanent source of revenue for the university. Although these early steps were of considerable significance, federal involvement was still quite limited in the latter part of the 19th century. Indeed, at that time education was considered to be a family responsibility and participation was largely determined by social status and religious belief. Public responsibility extended only to elementary schooling, and secondary schools, which were usually supported by religious organizations, were reserved to train future elites.

There was additional pressure on the Government of Canada in the early 1900's. This was linked specifically to the flow of young people from farms to cities, which began to jeopardize agricultural production, and to the shortage of skilled manpower in manufacturing industries. Following requests for action from business and labour, the Government of Canada appointed the Royal Commission on Industrial Training and Vocational Education in 1910. The work of the commission resulted in important legislation: the Agricultural Aid Act of 1912, and the Agricultural Instruction Act of 1913. The former supplied grants to provinces to develop agricultural education and techniques; the latter specifically gave assistance for training directly to the three existing veterinary colleges and, indirectly, by channelling funds through the provinces to agricultural colleges. This was the genesis of channelling federal aid for education through provincial governments.

In 1916, as a result of Canada's war involvement and a desire to improve research and development, the federal government formed the National Research Council. Initially, this was an effort to co-ordinate government research programs. During World War II, the National Research Council played a vital role in co-ordinating and conducting scientific research. The Council now has an extensive program of grants and fellowships.

When the federal government established the Dominion Bureau of Statistics in 1918, provision was made for a division to be concerned with education statistics. The education division published its first statistical report in 1921, and it has expanded its services and publications considerably since then.

Office of Education

The economic depression of the 1930's served to identify a major problem within the secondary school system. On school leaving, many students found that they had few occupational skills with which to enter the labour market. In an attempt to alleviate this problem, the federal government introduced a new program for technical education in 1937 with the Unemployment and Agricultural Assistance Act. This act, directed towards maintaining the morale and increasing the employability of young people, was negotiated in agreement with the provinces, on a cost-sharing basis, through the establishment of various occupational training projects. Eligibility was limited to those between the ages of 18 and 30. Emphasizing vocational and technical skill, this Act initially provided funds of about $2.5 million during its two years, but corrected only to a limited degree the inadequacies of technical and vocational education.

A Royal Commission on Dominion-Provincial Relations, known as the Rowell-Sirois Commission, was appointed in 1937 to make an assessment of the economic and financial basis of confederation; the distribution of federal and provincial powers; and federal-provincial financial relations. While its mandate did not extend to education, the commission felt that equality of educational opportunity did come within its domain. According to the commission, the concept "education" had changed and expanded to include new dimensions since the time of the BNA Act.

In view of this, the commission recommended that "the federal government should have full power to provide employment aid for those recognized as employable—which would make the training of unemployed youth a matter of even greater federal concern than at present." The commission assumed that the provinces would provide a system of courses to those Canadians requiring further training.

While the commission stated that a free hand in education was vital to provincial autonomy, it identified certain problems arising in this context. Representations were made to the commission concerning "the existence in several provinces of a sense of grievance which may well contribute to national disunity as well as to lack of harmony within the province concerned." Although the commission lamented the disparity in educational opportunity throughout the country, it made no relevant recommendations. Solutions rested on financial proposals which would place the provinces in a position to meet their responsibilities for education, if they chose to do so.

The commission also suggested that a council, analogous to the National Research Council, could be established to support research work in the social sciences in Canadian universities and elsewhere. The commission suggested, furthermore, that it might be appropriate for the federal government to establish a national library.

Growing Canadian cultural awareness and concern for a Canadian identity prompted the federal government to appoint in 1949 the Royal Commission on National Development in the Arts, Letters and Sciences. The commission, also known as the Massey Commission, released its report in June, 1951. In the field of higher learning the commission saw three major problems: scarcity of financial aid to the arts and humanities; the financial condition of universities; and orientation toward a small educated elite. As the commission noted, the number of veterans enrolling as students was quickly diminishing and, as a result, the federal aid that came with them was eroding. The commission believed that action was urgently required in this sector and that it was the duty of the federal government to assist in some way.

In view of the fact that the Canadian constitution did not forbid financial assistance to a citizen in order to help him to carry on studies in his chosen field, the commission did not feel that it would be improper to recommend federal aid in the form of contributions to individuals. A further recommendation was the continuation of federal support for the program of the National Research Council. As for disciplines outside of the boundaries of natural science, the commission recommended the establishment of what is today the Canada Council.

Perhaps I should stop at that point because we have certainly run into problems as a result of the establishment of this council. I would certainly recommend that the government look at the present Canada Council appointments and especially at whether parliament should in some way be involved with the appointment of people to the Canada Council instead of the present system whereby they are appointed under the direction of the Secretary of State.

Many of us are aware that some of the publications which have been subsidized by the Council—and I refer particularly to the Blue Ointment Press in Vancouver—are a degradation to the printed word in Canada. At a time when this parliament is examining the question of pornography and legislation to curb it, it seems very strange that pornographic materials should be published under the auspices of the Canada Council. I hope members on both sides will look very seriously at a body appointed by the federal government to determine whether funds should be appropriated to assist artists, novelists and poets which degrades itself by publishing pornographic materials. I think the House should look at this question, whether in a committee or whether when brought up on estimates.

● (1752)

I think there should be some regulation governing the Canada Council whereby members of this House would have the right to assist in appointments. In an attempt to be fair and impartial, so that decisions are not made by political bodies as to what is art and what is not and as to what should be funded in the cultural area, what has happened is that in appointing people who have a knowledge of the arts something has gone wrong, and material which should not be published is being published under the auspices of the Canada Council. I say that more in sorrow than in anger because I feel that the Canada Council has an important role to play in Canadian culture. However, if publications such as the one I mentioned by the Blue Ointment Press of Vancouver are published as a result of government funding, I suggest that a thorough examination should be made so that Canadian culture rather than Canadian pornography is advanced.

[Mr. Anderson.]

In view of the fact that the Canadian constitution does not forbid financial assistance to citizens, I wonder if I may raise another point which I think should be considered, since very seldom do we have the opportunity to discuss education in the House of Commons. It appears from what has occurred in the last several years that our educational system is not providing the skills which are needed in the work force. One of the highest rates of unemployment in Canada can be found among students.

I think we are dealing with an antiquated system. Our society needs more skilled people every year, but our students, while being educated, are not acquiring the skills required by the labour market. Perhaps even more importantly, they are coming out of high school without any definition as to what their role in society might be. High school graduates are going from job to job because they have not considered future occupations, and they are not being advised what opportunities there are or what path they should be taking. As time goes on I think it will become more and more important that there be guidance at both the provincial and federal levels. At a time when our school enrolments are decreasing our universities are attracting more and more students. I certainly do not believe that the Government of Canada has any right to step in and say to a person that he cannot make use of certain facilities because there is no forseeable need for certain skills; but this information should at least be made available.

Surely students should be counselled before they enter faculties of education or faculties of general arts. They should be told that their skills may not be needed, so that if they proceed they will at least know that they may have problems finding jobs upon graduation. For a number of years students have not been counselled as to what jobs might be available in the future or made aware that some job opportunities may diminish as time goes on because of a variety of factors. The birth rate has decreased over the last 15 years or so, and in the future fewer schools and fewer teachers will be required.

A great deal of work can be done, not necessarily through an educational council, but through working with the provinces. There have been various conferences in the last month or two at which federal and provincial governments have discussed matters of common concern. Earlier in the pipeline debate I said that there will be a crucial shortage of trained personnel when pipeline construction begins. At the present time we do not have enough welders and mechanics. We know that the pipeline will be coming on stream. Therefore, provincial and federal governments should be making arrangements. They should not wait until construction begins; these arrangements should be made several years in advance. That to me seems elementary. However, are we making those arrangements now? Is the federal government, in conjunction with the provinces, doing that?

I honestly believe that we do not need another bureaucracy. We need departments—for example, the Department of Employment and Immigration—which use common sense. Federal and provincial departments together should determine what the needs will be in the foreseeable future and work together. We need heavy duty mechanics. There is not one logging camp or mine in British Columbia which is not advertising for heavy duty mechanics. There are many people who wish to work, but I suggest there are not enough skilled people; one does not have to be the most gifted parliamentarian to understand that. On an almost daily basis business people come to me telling me that they cannot get Canadian labour and asking me if they can hire labour from outside Canada. What have we been doing with our education system for the last ten years? Why do we not know what our requirements are in the field of specialized skills? We are going to require more people with special skills when pipeline construction begins.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired.

Mr. Ralph Stewart (Cochrane): Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate that private members' hour had to start late today because this is an extremely important and interesting subject, and I had hoped to deal with it at some length.

I must say that I have some reservations about the motion before us. I have reservations not so much because of the principle of the motion but, rather, about the form of the motion. I am certainly on record as having favoured some kind of co-ordinating authority for Canadian education. I think it is deplorable that students across Canada are denied any degree of mobility from province to province because of different educational standards. I find it equally deplorable that Canadian history is different from one part of the country to another.

The hon. member who preceded me gave us a useful and succinct account of the constitutional aspects of education in Canada and the history of federal involvement. I think we have to remind ourselves that under the BNA Act the legislatures of the provinces are responsible for education. However, perhaps that act should be modified. Perhaps a modification is overdue, but I do not think the modification should be as outlined in the motion before us.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hour provided for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

ANTI-INFLATION ACT

AMENDMENT TO EXTEND RANGE OF PERSONS TO WHOM ANTI-INFLATION GUIDELINES APPLY

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-18, to amend the Anti-Inflation Act and guidelines, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, be concurred in.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): When shall the bill be read the third time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Chrétien moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

● (2012)

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put on the record a few remarks with respect to Bill C-18. I should like to emphasize that the history of this bill, both in the House and at committee, has been a most unfortunate one. The fact is we have had a Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) whom we all agree is only a part-time Minister of Finance.

Mr. Paproski: That is right.

Mr. Lalonde: Where was the hon. member for the last ten minutes?

Mr. Stevens: The hon. minister for intergovernmental affairs, whatever that means, has asked where I was. I was explaining to the Canadian Press why the minister has found it necessary to raise the bank rate another half point, and why he has now gone to the Canadian chartered banks and asked for $2.5 billion as the new line of credit, instead of the $1.5 billion standby line of credit which was originally arranged by the minister with our chartered banks.

Mr. Lalonde: Order. The hon. member should deal with the bill.

Mr. Stevens: As soon as I start giving an explanation as to where I was, the very same minister who asked for that explanation now interrupts by saying "Order".

In dealing with Bill C-18, it is critical for the House to realize how inept the federal government has been with respect to the handling of our economy, and in particular, the handling of the inflation situation in this country. The fact is the government has failed to give a proper explanation to the House, or certainly to a committee of the House, as to why its so-called anti-inflation program has failed so miserably.

We must bear in mind that we were told by the government this year that our inflation level would be down to 4 per cent by about October. Incidentally, the Minister of Finance keeps changing his story. Initially we were told in committee by the Minister of Finance that the inflation level in Canada would be 6 per cent during 1978. Realizing how devious this minister can be and how he twists his terms, we zeroed in specifically at committee and said: "Mr. Minister, would you explain? What do you mean by 6 per cent? Do you mean come June, 12 months over June 1977, it will be 6 per cent? Is it the average 1978 inflation level over the average 1977?" He said: "No doubt about that; I am talking average 1978 over average 1977". Within two weeks the minister reversed himself and said that he meant a 6 per cent inflation level in December this year compared to December 1977. That is an entirely different picture. The present Minister of Finance is about the only Canadian who believes today, if he in turn believes, that we are going to reach even a 6 per cent inflation level by December 1978.

The reason I refer to the sorry progress of this government with respect to Bill C-18, both in the House and in committee, is that when the government returned to the House and asked for this amending legislation to be passed in order to patch up some of the deficiencies in the initial anti-inflation program, I would have thought any responsible minister of finance would have said: "I feel you in the House should be given a full accounting of how the program has worked, a blow by blow description of how we have failed and where we have been successful in the anti-inflation program". I would have expected the minister to outline where the fiscal restraint, which was promised in October 1975, was felt in the economy. None of us can find the spending restraint which they claimed in October 1975 was going to be followed. I expected the Minister of Finance to explain why the monetary growth has been so aggressive since October 1975, yet we were told that they were going to be more restrained in their monetary growth at that time. Also, the Minister of Finance should have indicated where the promised deregulation took place since October 1975. In fact, more government regulation, not less, has been put on Canadian industry and the Canadian public since then.

I make these points to outline how the government has not given a proper accounting in the House regarding its anti-inflation program. Most importantly, the activities of the Anti-Inflation Board and the entire effect of the so-called anti-inflation program has been glossed over by the government. For example, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) attempted to get away with certain misstatements today during question period, when he indicated that somehow or other our economy was doing tremendously well. I do not know why he singled out Japan, but he indicated that, other than Japan, Canada is doing better than anyone else. That is an untruth which he put forward in the House and generally to the Canadian public.

Let me be specific on this important subject. In the February 1978 Bank of Canada Review there is a very interesting analysis of what the bank calls the international economic and financial developments in 1977. This report was prepared by the international department of the bank, under the direction of Mr. John White. At page 10, table II, it is made quite clear that Canada's record, as far as inflation is concerned, has been a disaster in spite of the controls program which we are now being asked to patch up, in the sense of relieving some of the deficiencies existent in the program from day one.

Every hon. member should read the entire Bank of Canada article, and in particular, what is said with respect to Bill C-18 concerning consumer prices. In the 12 month period of December 1976 to December 1977, the inflation level shown for Canada is 9.5 per cent. Of course, that is the rate put out by Statistics Canada on that date. The performances of seven major industrialized nations of the world have been reviewed. Included in the United States, Japan, Germany, France, United Kingdom, Italy and Canada. Inflation in those countries for that one year period ending last December reached a high of 7.2 per cent. So we have the startling revelation by the statistical department of the Bank of Canada, which is confirmed nothwithstanding the anti-inflation program introduced by the government in October 1975, that we have had higher inflation than other countries during the same period. In fact, our inflation was 2.3 per cent higher. When one reviews the figures of the Bank of Canada, perhaps the most serious observation to make is that our main trading partner has consistently had a better inflation record without controls than we have had with controls.

● (2022)

It is unforgiveable for the Minister of Finance to sit in the House tonight and remain mum about these facts when we are reviewing a bill designed to amend the legislation about which when it was brought in the government was saying it would perform such magic with inflation. This minister owes an explanation on behalf of his former minister of finance, and certainly on behalf of his emperor, sometimes called the Prime Minister of this country, as to why this country's record has unfortunately been so much worse than the economic records of other countries.

Let me go back to what I think is a most serious revelation, and that is the comparison of Canada's inflation level at various time periods, reviewed in the "Bank of Canada Review", with the inflation level for the same time periods of the United States, our main trading partner. For example, we find that in the 12 months ended December, 1975 the U.S. inflation level was 7 per cent while our inflation level was 9.5 per cent. For the 12 months ended June, 1976 the United States brought its inflation level down to 5.9 per cent, and I emphasize that this was without controls, whereas Canada's inflation level was still 7.8 per cent. For the 12 months ended December, 1976 the United States inflation level was down to 4.8 per cent—below 5 per cent—yet the Canadian rate was 5.8 per cent, still above the U.S. level. By the 12 months ended in June, 1977 the U.S. inflation rate was 6.8 per cent compared to the Canadian rate of 7.8 per cent.

In short, for every period to which I have referred there has been a worse Canadian inflation rate than that of the United States. In the last 12 months period ending in December the Canadian inflation rate was worse than the rate of any of the seven major industrialized nations, and certainly worse than the inflation rate of our main trading partner, the United States. For the 12 months period ended December last year the United States inflation rate was 6.8 per cent compared to an unbelievable Canadian rate of 9.5 per cent. This is the background for the debate we are entering into tonight, and these are the facts we must consider when deciding whether this government should receive support for Bill C-18, to amend the anti-inflation legislation.

As we know, the bank rate has been increased again tonight. This government has sought and obtained an additional $1 billion stand-by credit from our Canadian chartered banks. In all likelihood a revelation will be made tomorrow morning concerning the outflow of funds from our foreign exchange which will truly startle the international market once again. As I said today during the question period, it has been estimated there probably was an outflow of $500 million during March. My advisers quite frankly tell me it was much more; I was trying to low-ball the facts today. In fact, we believe this outflow could have been as much as $700 million during the month of March. In any event, we are going to know these figures in the morning.

In asking for an additional $1 billion to shore up the Canadian dollar, this government is clearly anticipating the anxiety to be felt tomorrow not only by Canadians but by the international market regarding our falling dollar and the state of our foreign exchange fund.

Is it surprising that we have this dilemma of high unemployment, high inflation and a current account deficit four times that of the average deficit of any major industrialized nation in the world? Is it surprising when we realize that since last December there has been thrust upon us a Minister of Finance who has turned out to be only a part-time minister? This is a position that requires the full-time attention of our best available person; but unfortunately we do not have such a man in our present Minister of Finance.

Having regard to the plight of our dollar, how often have we been told that somehow or other the fact that our dollar has depreciated or is falling in value has resulted suddenly in more attractive exports in international trade? We have been told that somehow or other we should have had a discounted dollar long ago. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) has told us that in his view an 89 cent dollar is a good thing for Canada.

I point out these facts because I believe this government has no idea of the effect of a cheap dollar on the inflation rate in this country. It is interesting to note that at page 10 of the "Bank of Canada Review", to which I have already referred, Mr. White comments concerning the falling dollar situation in Italy and the United Kingdom that occurred a few years ago. He states:

> In Italy and the United Kingdom where depreciation of their currencies have added to inflationary pressures the relative stability of both the lire and the pound this past year contributed to slower rates of price increases.

What Mr. White is confirming in that article is that a falling dollar means more inflation in the country whose currency is falling. It is as simple as that. Unfortunately our dollar has been falling because this government has been less than candid and less than clear as to the level at which it deems the Canadian dollar should be trading. This government's lack of knowledge about how to handle this type of problem has resulted in an undermining of world confidence as far as international money markets are concerned. This has created the impression that this government would somehow or other welcome an even lower level for our dollar. This is virtually a bottomless pit, and it apparently does not matter how far the dollar drops.

During one of the briefing sessions for Canadian businessmen by the Department of Finance the businessmen were floored when an official, asked if he would worry should our dollar drop to 80 cents, said that a floating dollar is a floating dollar, and if it goes to 80 cents, that is where it goes. That is not how international money markets operate. Other countries expect governments to have confidence in their ability to handle the economic affairs of their countries and they expect those governments to be able to indicate whether their currency is at a fair level in a specific range.

What this goverment has been doing is pretending on the one hand that it has not interfered with the behaviour of our dollar on international markets, while on the other hand it has been using hundreds of millions of dollars from our United States foreign exchange reserves to defend the dollar that it claims it would like to see float even lower. The sad result is that we now have the worst of all worlds. This is the result of this government's hard-nosed measures and tendencies to have the dollar dribble down and down in value, while at the same time allowing our reserves to be dissipated. Perhaps when the figures are revealed tomorrow we will find we have lost $1.5 billion of our reserves since January 1, while at the same time we have a dollar valued obviously much below the point to which the government felt it should fall.

Our dollar would not be trading at today's level if we had a government which inspired international confidence. This government can fool many Liberals in this country, as it likes to do; it can fool many Canadian voters, as it wants to do; but it will not fool for any prolonged period of time, if at all, those hardnosed international financiers of this world. This government has now faced up to the stark reality of having to deal with international bankers who do not want rhetoric or charisma, but rather, hard, cold facts about how our economy, which is obviously out of whack, is to be righted.

● (2032)

Those are the facts, Mr. Speaker, and it is pertinent when we are dealing with Bill C-18 to bear them in mind because I do not feel that this government even now has learned the lesson that their spending programs, previously and currently, their monetary increases, and that type of policy bring inflation which, in turn, undermines international confidence. This means that our currency will be put at a lower price level in relation to the other harder currencies; but perhaps they would like to see that.

When I say this I think of one piece of misrepresentation that we must put on the record and make sure there is no doubt, so far as Canadians are concerned, as to what it is all about. This government likes to fool various people. They went into New York and they tried in their way to fudge the issue concerning our economic picture for 1979. We have never been able to get a firm statement from this government as to what their revenue and expenditure position will be in the coming year. They have tried to fudge the issue.

When this government went to New York with a preliminary prospectus issued on March 8, 1978, they tried to get by with simply showing the fiscal 1978 figures for Canada and making no disclosure as to what the deficit might be for 1979. Frankly—and you will recall some of the questioning in this House, Mr. Speaker—this surprised us because we were told by certain investment officials with the American government: "There is no way that we were going to tolerate the Canadian government not making full, true and plain disclosure before $750 million was loaned to them" which is what the government was seeking effective April 1, 1978. They said: "Tell us what will be your cash deficit where 1979 is concerned; come clean." Let there be no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that is why this little Minister of Finance crept into this House on March 16 and gave a statement as to what in fact the deficit would be as far as cash needs for 1979 are concerned.

We now find that on March 22 the March 8 preliminary prospectus filed in Washington was changed to give a more complete disclosure as to the plight we are actually facing in Canada. There is a new footnote put into that prospectus and it very interestingly says this:

> In a statement by the Minister of Finance on March 16, 1978, it was indicated that financial requirements for fiscal 1978 are now expected to total $8,800 million—

This is up decidedly from what they tried to get by with showing in Washington and New York. The footnote goes on to state:

> —and are anticipated to be about $11,000 million for fiscal 1979.
